OFFICIAL REPORT—REVISED EDITION

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Speaker: HON. THOMAS SIMPSON SPROULE.

Wednesday, April 29, 1914.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 168, to amend part VI of the Canada Shipping Act. He said:

The House will remember that as a result of numerous representations made to me respecting the pilotage matters on the river St. Lawrence, more particularly in the district below the city of Quebec, I recommended to my colleagues in January, 1913, the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire fully into the question. This recommendation was approved and a commission was appointed consisting of Captain Lindsay, wreck commissioner for the department, Mr. Thomas Robb, manager and secretary of the Shipping Federation of Canada, and Captain Adjutor Lachance, president of the Corporation of Pilots for Quebec.

The commission commenced the inquiry at Montreal on February 13, 1913, and a series of sittings were continued in that city and in Quebec. A large number of witnesses were examined and nothing was left undone to make the investigation a thorough and comprehensive one. On the 9th of April of the same year, the commission finished its report and a few days later it was submitted to me. Soon after its receipt it was placed before Parliament by me and in that way the members of the House became aware of the nature of the recommendations made. Before I had an opportunity of fully considering the report, the season of navigation was well under way and consequently it was found inexpedient to put all the recommendations into effect last year. All those, however, that were considered material to efficient administration and that could be acted upon without obtaining legislation from this Parliament, were put into effect.

One of the chief recommendations made by the commission was for the abolition of the Corporation of Pilots for and below Quebec. The object of the present Bill is to give effect to this recommendation so far as it is considered necessary to do so. The Quebec Corporation of Pilots was created by chapter 123 of the Act of 1860. This Act, together with subsequent amendments, conferred upon the corporation certain powers, among others the power to select and appoint pilots and apprentices, to prescribe the qualifications necessary and generally to control and manage the entire pilotage service for the district. Referring to these powers the commissioners in their report say:

> The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as the pilotage authority, has only such powers as may be left to him by the Corporation of Pilots under its charter, and the statutes in amendment thereof. This, we are convinced, is a very unsatisfactory situation, and the commission is of opinion that the time has now arrived for a change to be made, for the minister to be constituted the only pilotage authority in the district. Evidence has been submitted against any change hinged mainly on the idea that it might be as well to leave things alone, in case the change resulted in a worse condition. Such an idea carried into ordinary everyday life would mean the standing still of business. However necessary the corporation was fifty years ago, it has outlived its usefulness and should give place to a more modern system.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the hon. minister's attention to the fact that it is laid down by Bourinot that when a motion is made for leave to introduce a Bill it is permissible to explain it clearly and succinctly, but not to debate it, as it seems to me the hon. gentleman is doing. It seems to me that on one or two occasions before, as well as on this present occasion, the hon. minister has taken the opportunity of dealing with the report of a commission and discussing it in connection with the introduction of a Bill. That appears to me to be going beyond the usual procedure or proper practise.

Mr. HAZEN: I was asked by the right hon. leader of the Opposition to explain the Bill, and was endeavouring to do so plainly and succinctly; but in order to explain it clearly and succinctly I thought it necessary to make a reference to this report of the commission, because it is on the report of the commission that the Bill is founded. I had almost concluded and shall take but a moment longer.

Captain Adjutor Lachance, President of the Pilots Corporation, who was a member of the commission, submitted a minority report dissenting from the recommendation for the abolition of the corporation.

After having given the above recommendation my very best consideration I have come to the conclusion that it is neither necessary nor desirable to carry it out in its entirety. The Act that is recommended for abolition confers other powers on the corporation than those alluded to, and, having regard to efficient administration and control, there does not appear to be any reason to interfere with them. It is considered sufficient to withdraw from the corporation the power to examine, license and control pilots, and to confer on the minister the power generally to control and manage all pilotage matters in the district to the same extent and in the same manner as obtains in the Montreal-Quebec district. The power to organize for mutual protection and improvement of their conditions, conferred by the Act of Incorporation, is a very desirable one, and if withdrawn by this Parliament could be obtained from the provincial legislature of Quebec. Equally desirable is the provision made by which a 'pilot fund' is established for the benefit of retiring members of the corporation. This fund at the present time is invested and managed subject to supervision by my department. No evidence has been adduced to cast even the slightest suspicion on the management by the corporation of this fund in the past. Holding these views I am unable to agree with the recommendation of the commission in this respect; but by the introduction of this measure I am seeking to comply with the substantial part of this report in its entirety. Thus we leave the Pilotage Corporation still in existence to discharge other duties, power to discharge which is conferred on it by the Act of 1860.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. EMMERSON: The patronage is taken over by the Government.

Mr. HAZEN: The management is taken over by the Government.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would say, with regard to this patricular Bill and the practice introduced in connection with it, that I hope it will not be taken as a precedent to be followed in other cases, because I can only say that it would not be done with the consent of the Speaker, as it is in my judgment irregular. It is not explaining the provisions of the Bill, but debating the need for the Bill and the conditions which have led to its introduction.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

Mr. MACDONALD:

Does the Government intend to take any steps at this session to assist in the extension of the advantages of technical education in Canada, or in carrying into effect the recommendations of the report of the Technical Education Commission?

Mr. DOHERTY: The whole subject has been under careful consideration and has been taken up with the Governments of the different provinces. The House will be duly informed of any legislative action which may be contemplated.

QUEBEC HARBOUR WORKS.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the attention of the Government been called to the following item which appeared in the Quebec Telegraph of April 15, in regard to the works in the harbour of Quebec: 'Mr. S. George Boswell, chief engineer of the Quebec Harbour Commission, has just returned from a six weeks' trip to the old country. The object of Mr. Boswell's trip was the inspection of the new apparatus for the Quebec harbour, now under construction on the other side. This includes a crane, a dredge, a floating grain elevator and a service boat. The fifty ton crane is being built by a well known Glasgow firm, and the dredge, which is of the ladder pattern, is being constructed in the same place by Wm. Simons and Company. The service boat, which will be a 125 foot, 1,000 h. p. craft, built on similar lines to the tug Sir Hugh Allan, used by the Montreal Harbour Commission, is being built by the Smith Stock Company, of Middlesboro, as is the floating grain elevator. The grain elevator, when completed, will be capable of taking a load of 35,000 bushels and will be able to load in about four hours. All the new purchases are expected out here in the month of June, and with the exception of the crane, all will cross the Atlantic on their own steam. The crane will probably not be assembled until it arrives in Quebec.'

2. Has any of that expenditure been authorized by the Department of Marine and Fisheries?

3. (a) Have any tenders been asked from any of the Canadian firms for any of the above proposed works? (b) If so, from what firms?

ST. LAMBERT RETAINING WALL.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Is the Government or the Minister of Public Works aware that the late Administration caused stone to the value of $5,000 to be carried on either side of the road between the town of Laprairie to the high lands of St. Lambert?

2. What part of that stone already paid by the department has been covered by other stone carried there by the present contractors?

3. Was the retaining wall, for a length of more than 700 feet, built with that stone under the late Government?

4. Has the minister given orders to the district engineer to charge to the new contractors the cost of said stone, which is there and belongs to the Government?

Mr. ROGERS:

THE CANADIAN MENACE.

*Mr. PROULX:

1. Have the Prime Minister and the Postmaster General received a copy of the following resolutions which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of the 25th April, 1914, as having been adopted at a recent meeting of the County Lodge of Montreal Loyal Orange Association:—

'Resolved,—That this Montreal County Lodge of the Loyal Orange Association, having learned of the action of Hon. Mr. Pelletier, Postmaster General, in prohibiting the Canadian Menace being sent through the mails, views such action with alarm and feels that if such action is allowed to pass, other periodicals may also be banned; be it resolved, therefore, that this County Lodge protests against the action of the Postmaster General as encroaching upon the liberty of the subject as well as the press, and calls upon all Orange lodges in the Dominion to pass similar resolutions.

'Further resolved, that copies of this resolution be sent to the Right Hon. Mr. Borden, Prime Minister; Hon. L. P. Pelletier, Postmaster General, and the local members of the federal Parliament.'

2. Has the Canadian Menace been granted the use of the mails? If so, since when?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes, and it has been answered as follows:

Postmaster General, Canada.
Ottawa, April 27, 1914.

Sir,—

I have duly received your letter of the 25th instant, with reference to the privileges of the mails having been withdrawn from The Menace.

In reply, I beg to give you the departmental reasons for the action taken in regard to this publication.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

The transmission by mail of letters, newspapers, etc., is authorized and permitted under a law which is known as the Post Office Act. A special department has been created over which the Postmaster General presides, and its duties and business are clearly defined.

Under that law, which is equally binding on both you and me, as Canadian citizens, the Post Office Department becomes the carrier for the transmission of correspondence and for all matter defined as mailable, but for nothing else.

That law gives to the citizens the right to use this mode of transmission for their correspondence and newspapers, provided they pay the statutory postal rates, but this statute imposes upon the Postmaster General a clear and well defined duty.

This duty is to follow and obey the law which has created the Post Office Department and the regulations which are based on the law.

What do we find in the law and in the regulations? In clear and unequivocal terms, they oblige the Postmaster General to consider as non-mailable matter and consequently to exclude from the mails:

1. Explosives and dangerous substances.

2. Letters upon the outside or upon the envelope of which there are words, devices, etc., tending to injuriously affect the social or commercial standing of the persons addressed.

3. Letters and circulars concerning illegal lotteries or other similar enterprises.

4. Communications concerning schemes and devices, intended to deceive and defraud the public.

5. Pamphlets containing recipes or prescriptions with the pretended object of procuring abortion, etc.

6. Publications, matters or things of an indecent, immoral, seditious, disloyal or scurrilous character.

These duties are imposed upon me. Can I shirk them for the reason of free speech which you allege?

I am sometimes told (because we often exclude some of these prohibited things, most of them being French publications of an obscene character) that I should allow such matters to pass through our mails and then bring criminal action.

In the first place, I have nothing to do with criminal proceedings. This is another remedy placed in other hands. This other remedy is cure. The one imposed upon me is prevention, and we all know that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

At all events, the law and the regulations do not tell me that I should institute criminal proceedings after the fact. It enjoins upon me the obligation to act before the fault is committed, in order to prevent these things from passing through our mails.

You have a right to say that the law and regulations are bad. They may be good or they may be bad; but they have existed for many years. They have been applied very often and have always been considered very good and proper. So long as they exist they must be obeyed. Am I right or wrong in this?

Public censors are by law authorized to prevent immoral and indecent plays from being put before the public. In this case, the Post Office Act makes of the Postmaster General a censor of what will or will not go through the mails.

When I decided, under the Parcel Post Act, that intoxicating liquors should not be allowed transmission through the post offices, I received many congratulations, but some dealers told me I was interfering with the liberty of commerce. To-day I stop dirt and filth from being disseminated in Canadian homes. Shall I be told that the principle of alleged free speech should in this case supersede the law of the land?

As I have no doubt that you will agree with me on the above, let us come now to the question as to whether I have used my powers at a fair and legitimate moment.

There are two papers called The Menace. One is sent to Canada from Aurora, Missouri, and it requested the privileges of the mails for a Canadian edition to be published at Aurora, Ontario. This application was made in the usual course to my deputy minister, Doctor Coulter, who requested that the publication should be submitted to him, as is usual in such cases. He came to the conclusion, without the least hesitation, that this paper published immoral, indecent and scurrilous things and he refused it the privileges of the mails. The Menace came out with flaming head-lines denouncing this and declaring—Doctor Coulter is a Protestant—that his action has been dictated to him by the 'hierarchy' and 'the Pope of Rome.' The matter was then brought to my attention. I looked through the paper and came to the conclusion that Doctor Coulter's action was right and proper, and I upheld it.

The question was put in Parliament as to the reasons for the action taken. I answered the question on the 2nd April by putting on 'Hansard' a memorandum prepared by Dr. Coulter, a copy of which I beg to enclose for your perusal. The newspaper men being anxious to see the text of this memorandum, I supplied them with as many copies as they required. I took care not to exclude the quotations made by the deputy minister to justify his action. Most of the newspapers on both sides of politics published the memorandum but every one of them, if I mistake not, omitted the quotations, and they informed me that they did so out of respect for their readers.

Members of Parliament, after reading those quotations in 'Hansard,' suggested that it would be more proper to have them expunged. This is the kind of thing I am now told should be distributed in the Canadian homes in the name of free speech. Some of the communications which I have received in that respect are accompanied by several kinds of threats. My answer is that I will obey the law and fulfil my duty whatever the consequences may be.

So much for the American Menace.

As to the Canadian Menace, the proprietor was told that the same rule would apply. The publishers came out with a leading article in large type acknowledging that we were right and undertaking not to publish this kind of obscene and immoral literature in future. They were told that the ban would be lifted, but, if they did not keep their promise, the privileges of the mails would be withdrawn from them.

Unfortunately, the question of religion and race has again been raised here as is so often done in our country by people who want to appeal to prejudices for their own selfish purposes, but there is no question of race and religion in this matter. There are several papers enjoying the privileges of the mails which constantly indulge in religious and controversial recriminations, both from a Catholic and Protestant point of view. There are others which are at the same time anti-Catholic and anti-Protestant, and which pretend that Catholics and Protestants are all imposters. I have one of these papers before me at this moment and amongst other things I find the following:

'Of all manner of shameless imposters are the "Christian" priests and preachers who profess Christ and follow Paul, knowing as they must, unless they are ignorant of history, for it is a historical record, that Paul was repudiated by the early Christians.'

I do believe that Protestantism and Catholicism will survive this.

If I were to forget that I am Postmaster General for all Canadians, Protestant and Catholic alike, and if I were so bigoted as to think of excluding Protestant newspapers from the mails, there are others than the Menace which would be much more worthy of my attention in this respect, but the law does not say that a newspaper will be excluded because it is strongly Catholic or strongly Protestant, and consequently, I have no right to bar any of them from the mails for that reason. The law and regulations do say, however, that no newspaper, Protestant or Catholic, will be obscene, immoral or scurrilous, and it does not seem to me possible that you and I, as Christian gentlemen, should disagree in a matter like this.

Hoping that the above will satisfy you that the course taken by this department was the only proper one under the circumstances, I remain, dear Sir,

Yours truly,
(Sgd) Louis P. Pelletier.

C. E. Irwin, Esq.,
Secretary Lorne L.O.L.,

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That the names of Messrs. Carroll and Sutherland be added to the Special Committee to consider Senate Bill B-2, intituled an Act to consolidate and amend the Railway Act, and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours therewith.

I am in support of the Canadian Northern railway proposal, and there is no warrant whatever for the Telegram's statement.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAY CLAIMS.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid, Bill No. 122, to amend the Government Railways Small Claims Act, was read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

The House again in Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

On resolution 3, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Loggie:

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.): Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat surprised last evening when several members on the Government side of the House appeared to treat this resolution with a good deal of levity. I was also a little surprised, I confess, to find that the Minister of Finance, who has always hitherto given a good deal of consideration to any question discussed in this House having reference to his department, and who is generally courteous to members of the House, apparently did not think that the subject was of importance. I therefore think the members and the minister himself are not seized of the merits of the question. It is an important matter for the Maritime provinces generally; for New Brunswick particularly, and still more for Prince Edward Island. The facts are that portions of New Brunswick, portions of Nova Scotia, and the whole of Prince Edward Island are particularly well adapted for the production of potatoes. It is also a fact that in the neighbouring republic there is but a small portion of that immense territory well adapted to such production. There are only ten states, and these lie along the Canadian boundary, that grow potatoes at all as a farm crop. These ten states comprise very much less than a quarter of the total area of that country. And there is only one state—and only a portion of that—which seems to be well adapted for the growth of potatoes.

Mr. EDWARDS: Which one is that?

Mr. HUGHES: The state of Maine. The particular portion of the state of Maine which is well adapted for the growth of potatoes is Aroostook county. It naturally follows that there is an immense market in that country for potatoes; and if we of the Maritime provinces, especially we of the province of Prince Edward Island, had free access to that market it would be of immense advantage to all of our people. That the cultivation of potatoes is most profitable where the cultivators have access to the markets of the United States can be proven in two or three ways. One way is this: I have already stated that there is but a portion of the state of Maine as well adapted as the Maritime provinces are to the production of potatoes. Farm lands in that particular portion of the state, Aroostook county, sell for from $80 to $100 an acre, while farm lands in other portions of the same state quite as well adapted to the growth of other crops sell for from $25 to $40 an acre, showing that where natural conditions are 4 p.m. favourable, potatoes are the most profitable crop that the farmers of that state can produce. Further than that—and it naturally follows from it—the farmers in Aroostook county, as a class, are the most prosperous in the United States. The average production of potatoes in the ten states where potatoes can be grown under fairly favourable conditions is only 90 bushels per acre. In the state of Maine, taking the whole state, the average figures are 177 bushels per acre; but in the particular portion of the state that is best adapted to the growth of potatoes, the average production per acre is 275 bushels. Now, we have sometimes been told—I heard it stated last night by hon. members on the other side of the House, who perhaps thought they were making a correct statement—that we do not send our potatoes to the province of Ontario; and we are asked why. For the simple reason that there is no market there for them, no steady market, and the transportation charges are so high that we cannot send them there. The province of Ontario is somewhat similar in climate and in soil to the province of Prince Edward Island, and I think, under ordinary conditions, produces enough potatoes for her own use. The same is true of the other provinces of Canada, but it is not true of the United States. More than thirty states in the American union do not produce anything like enough potatoes for their own use. There is, therefore, in the United States a steady market offering fairly remunerative prices all the time; and a steady market is just as important, if not more so, than a market that offers a high price at one time and a low price at another. In order to carry on his business successfully the farmer must be within reach of a market for his products at a reasonable price; otherwise he does not care to produce anything for export. As I have already pointed out, we can never be assured of that market in Canada. When we in Prince Edward Island have an abundant crop of potatoes, even upon a small acreage, generally they have at the same time a good crop in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia; and, although Nova Scotia does not produce enough potatoes for its own use, if we have an exceptionally large crop we can easily glut the market there, and the price goes so low that it does not pay the farmer to produce the crop.

Mr. EDWARDS: What is the annual potato production of the three Maritime provinces?

Mr. HUGHES: Even under present circumstances, when there is no great inducement to the farmer to pay particular attention to the growing of potatoes, we can easily produce 250 bushels to the acre. In Aroostook county, in the state of Maine, where they give special attention to the growing of potatoes, they produce 275 bushels to the acre.

Mr. EDWARDS: What is the aggregate production of Prince Edward Island?

Mr. HUGHES: I cannot give the total production, but I think that in 1912 something over 7,000,000 bushels were produced, on about 30,000 acres. That could be easily doubled or trebled. On 70,000 acres in Aroostook county the production was about 18,000,000 bushels. If we had access to a fairly profitable market, we could easily produce 20,000,000 bushels of potatoes in Prince Edward Island.

I want to point out one special advantage the farmer has in producing potatoes. It has been said that the continuous production of wheat exhausts the soil; for that reason the growing of wheat has sometimes been called the mining of the soil. The growing of potatoes or other vegetables can never exhaust the soil, for the reason that the soil must be well cultivated and tilled every year in order to produce a good crop. After a good crop of potatoes has been produced on any soil you can get from that soil almost any crop you wish to grow, particularly clover, which is a very valuable crop, enabling the farmer to feed his stock and enrich the soil at the same time. No part of Prince Edward Island is far from the sea, and an abundance of sea manure which is especially valuable for the growing of potatoes, can be obtained for nothing. We have the advantage of a friable soil with natural drainage, a cool climate—no great heat and no extreme cold—the very best conditions for the growing of potatoes. But the farmer cannot largely engage in the production of potatoes, for which the soil and climate are specially adapted, because he is shut out of an adequate market for his products. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) suggests that the decrease in our population can be traced to this circumstance. I have no doubt that it can, because the more prosperous the people are, the more inclined they will be to remain on the farm. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) has moved an amendment which is at present before the committee—an amendment which appears to me to be a most reasonable one. It merely asks that the duty on American potatoes coming into this country be taken off when the embargo on Canadian potatoes going into that country is removed. If it is a good thing for us to have a free exchange of potatoes with the United States, then it is surely a good thing for us to try to have the present embargo removed. I say here—and I think I can prove it to the satisfaction of every member of this committee—that the duty on American potatoes entering into this country is not and cannot under existing conditions be of any appreciable advantage to the farmers of Canada.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Then why did the Liberal Government raise the duty from 15 cents to 20 cents?

Mr. HUGHES: The reason was, I presume, that at that time the United States had a duty of 25 cents a bushel against Canadian potatoes, practically a prohibitive duty; and if we could not have reciprocity in trade we could at least have reciprocity of tariffs. Now the conditions are entirely changed. The United States now has a duty of 10 per cent against Canadian potatoes, a very small duty indeed. Under the reciprocity agreement we were offered free potatoes. Canadian growers of potatoes will never again have such an offer made to them.

Mr. SEXSMITH: You admit that the duty was beneficial to the farmer at that time.

Mr. HUGHES: No, I do not.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Then, why did you raise it?

Mr. HUGHES: Because, if the hon. member has followed my argument and if there is anything in it, I have proved that the price of potatoes in the United States must, generally speaking, be higher than in Canada, except perhaps during June, July and August, when we have not potatoes to supply our own needs.

Mr. BEST: Why is it that in a country where so many potatoes are produced there is not an abundance of potatoes in July, when they command a good price?

Mr. HUGHES: Is the hon. gentleman a farmer?

Mr. BEST: Yes, sir, I am a farmer who grows potatoes.

Mr. HUGHES: If the hon. gentleman is a farmer he will know that, except under extraordinary conditions, potatoes will not keep the year round, and that at the time I have mentioned they are hardly fit for use. The removal of the duty would not hurt the farmer, but would be of considerable advantage to the city dwellers—artisans, mechanics and others—who want potatoes at that particular season of the year. I do not suppose that the adoption of this amendment by itself would lead to the removal of the embargo placed upon our potatoes entering the United States; but it could possibly do no harm, and it might have this effect, that by it we would at least show our willingness to trade with the American people in this product upon equal terms. It might be construed as a friendly Act. The very fact that we keep a duty of 20 cents a bushel against American potatoes, while they are ready to take off entirely the duty upon our potatoes entering their market might, on the other hand, be considered an unfriendly Act.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Are they ready to take off the embargo?

Mr. HUGHES: The embargo was placed upon our potatoes because it was shown to the American authorities that Canadian potatoes were diseased.

Mr. HENDERSON: Do you believe that was correct?

Mr. HUGHES: I do not know whether it is correct or not. This I do know, that an official of this Government went to Washington last year in the month of December and told the authorities that our potatoes were diseased.

Mr. WRIGHT: Will the hon. gentleman give the name?

Mr. HUGHES: Dr. Gussow.

Mr. WRIGHT: After the embargo went on?

Mr. HUGHES: That was at the very time that the American authorities were considering the subject—on the 17th or 18th of December last. Dr. Gussow, an official of the Canadian Department of Agriculture, went to Washington and told the people there that Canadian potatoes were diseased. I think it was an unnecessary and unfortunate statement. There may have been disease, but surely it was not part of our duty to tell the American people so. I do not think there is any disease that would warrant the United States in placing an embargo upon potatoes grown in Prince Edward Island, but I suppose they could not discriminate between the provinces. My reason for holding that opinion is that I find this article in one of our local papers, which shows that the American Consul at Charlottetown took steps to show to his Government that there was no disease except the ordinary rot in Prince Edward Island potatoes. The statement is as follows:

> In regard to the potato embargo which is receiving so much attention at present it will be interesting to our people to know that Mr. Wesley Frost, American Consul, a few days ago, sent a report on conditions here to his government at Washington. He had made a careful study of the situation and informed the department in his report that the Island potatoes were affected only by dry rot and wet rot, and that they were free from the diseases specified in the Department of Agriculture's report. This favourable statement regarding the Island potatoes by Mr. Frost should certainly have an effect with the authorities.

Mr. BURNHAM: How would it be if they quarantined New Brunswick potatoes?

Mr. HUGHES: I do not think the question is at all pertinent; I do not understand the hon. gentleman. In view of what Mr. Frost, the American consul at Charlottetown, is doing and has done, according to this report, I am surprised to find that the legislature of the province, which prorogued a few days ago, did not do anything to second Mr. Frost's efforts or to help him show that the potatoes grown in Prince Edward Island were free from disease. I think that was a great oversight, and the local Government could not have been engaged in a more important work.

The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) being present, I wish to say to him that if there be disease in our potatoes in the Maritime provinces, and particularly in Prince Edward Island, he would be justified, if it were necessary in devoting the whole attention of his department to the eradication of that disease. He could not be engaged in a better or more profitable work. But it is not necessary for him to devote all his attention to that. I would like to know if the hon. Minister of Agriculture is seized with the importance of the subject and intends to put forth every effort he can, if disease there be, to stamp it out and to show the American people that we have no diseased potatoes in this country. It is most important to us in many ways. We send potatoes in fairly large quantities from Prince Edward Island to the Cuban market, and if the idea went abroad that our potatoes were diseased, there is a possibility that we would be shut out from the Cuban and West Indian markets as well. It is very important that this matter be taken hold of with energy and determination. If disease there be, it surely cannot be of such a character that it cannot be stamped out.

I see some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who want to treat this subject with levity. We cannot raise a question in this House, I am sorry to say, in which the farmers are deeply interested but hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House endeavour to treat it with levity and ridicule. If the manufacturers and the special interests came here, they would not be treated in that way; those who undertook to speak for them would not be so treated. These hon. gentlemen send over a picture which they think contains something that is funny. The little finger of the manufacturers appears to be thicker than the loins of the farmers in Canada, particularly with hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who laugh so heartily. It is one of the British poets who says that it is the loud laugh that speaks the vacant mind.

This amendment appears to me to be reasonable. It is surely one that will commend itself to the favourable consideration of the Minister of Finance. I cannot for the life of me see any argument against it. The minister did not offer any argument against it last night. He stated that he did not, and I think it was because he had not given the subject any consideration. The amendment merely asks that we take the duty off American potatoes when the United States take the embargo off Canadian potatoes. If they do not take the embargo off, conditions remain as they are, and if they do take it off and allow us to trade with them freely in this article, are we prepared to reciprocate? Surely we are. If the Minister of Finance refuses to accept this amendment, the only conclusion is that this Government is unwilling to allow the farmers the advantage of the United States market for their potatoes. They have set up the fetish of protection, the golden calf, and they are afraid to touch it lest the whole fabric tumble. The Minister of Finance said something to that effect last night. He made this statement:

> Mr. Chairman, I take the position that we must negative this resolution as being inconsistent with the fiscal policy which I have announced in the Budget.

No matter what the merits of the particular question may be, no matter what advantage it may give to the farmers of the Maritime provinces, particularly to the farmers of Prince Edward Island, no matter what advantage it may give at certain seasons of the year to the city dwellers in Canada, if it touches the citadel of protection in any way it cannot be accepted by this Government. That is practically what the Minister of Finance said last night. If that is the attitude of the Government it is as well for the farmers of my province at least to know it, and I intend that they shall know it. I see my colleagues from Prince Edward Island here. I would like to know what these gentlemen think upon this subject. They know the advantage of the American market to the farmers of Prince Edward Island if we had a free exchange of potatoes, and I would like to hear them. I presume I shall. I trust that the Minister of Finance will reconsider the subject and will not dismiss it as lightly as he did last night. It ought to receive more consideration than he has given to it.

Mr. JOHN A. BEST (Dufferin): Mr. Chairman, I was delighted to hear the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. J. J. Hughes) speaking so strongly in favour of the farmers, who, no doubt, constitute the great majority of the people of the Dominion of Canada. But it is very strange that the business men and lawyers are so much interested in the farmers when the farmers say that these are the men who are raising the price of the produce to the consumer. Yet these middlemen stand up in this House and tell us what they are going to do for the farmers.

There seems to be a combine on the other side of the House to try to catch the farmer and the consumer at the same time. Last night these gentlemen opposite were talking, not in the interests of the farmer but in the interests of the consumer, and they deplored how the consumer had to pay $5 a barrel for potatoes in the summer, and they declared that if the duty were taken off, he would get them cheaper. But if the consumer gets cheaper potatoes, with the duty off, I would like these gentlemen opposite to tell me how that would affect the price of Canadian potatoes. The hon. gentleman (Mr. J. J. Hughes) seemed to know all about the time that potatoes came in and how long they would keep, but I want to tell him that he did not know what he is talking about, when he made the statement he did. I live in Ontario where we produce as good, if not better, potatoes than are produced on the American continent. We have new potatoes on the 1st of July, pretty well north in the province of Ontario, and we have the potatoes of the previous year up to the 1st of August. These are facts that every farmer knows. There are many farmers in that province who plant from half an acre to two acres with early potatoes, which they are able to send to the market when potatoes are a little scarce, and there are people in the towns and cities who are willing to give a good price for a fancy article, which they like, when it first comes in season. If the duty were taken off at the very time hon. gentlemen opposite speak about, it would reduce the price, and then these farmers would not get for their potatoes anything like the price they do at the present time. There is no use in hon. gentlemen opposite trying to make the farmers of this Dominion believe that they are sincere, when they advocate taking the duty off farm products. I frankly admit that there are times in the year when the consumer would benefit by it, and every man who understands farming will be willing to admit that, but I do not believe that the workingmen and the mechanics in the towns and cities will take a chance of getting their potatoes a little cheaper, if they have in prospect the probability of losing their jobs, because if the duties were taken off all around they certainly would not get work as easily as they do at the present time. These gentlemen opposite might as well face the situation once for all, that they cannot talk about benefiting the producer and the consumer at the same time. There are times when probably both are benefited by protection, but not all the time. There is no county in Ontario more rural than the county of Dufferin, which I have the honour to represent, and I firmly believe that 98 per cent of the farmers of that county would advocate that the duty should be increased on farm produce coming from the United States into Canada. If the manufacturers of this Dominion want a duty on what they produce, why should not the farmers of Canada have protection on their products?

The hon. gentleman (Mr. J. J. Hughes) told us that the people of Canada made a mistake when they did not accept reciprocity, but my reply to him is, that there never was a greater insult thrown in the face of any people than was thrown into the face of the farmers of Ontario in respect to that reciprocity treaty. The truth is, that that treaty would have taken everything away from the farmer. If the farmer sent a load of wheat to the market he would have no protection, and he would have to sell it in competition with the wheat of the world. but if he took that load of wheat down to the mill, one mile out of the town, and had it turned into flour, and took that flour back home with him, made as it was from his own wheat, he would find there was a duty on flour and he would have to pay it. If he took a load of hogs, or of sheep, or of cattle, to the market, he had to sell them in competition with all the world, there being no duty on them while the farmer held them, but as soon as he went to the butcher shop to get meat, he had to pay a duty on it. Again, the vegetable grower would have no protection while he held the farm produce, but as soon as the canner got hold of it there was a duty on canned fruits and vegetables, and the consumer had to pay it. The facts are that the farmers stood to lose by it and the consumer gained nothing. The consumer does not want raw wheat, or live stock on the hoof, and there are more vegetables used canned than fresh, and while the farmer had to contend with a free market and sell his products in competition with all the world, the consumer did not get the benefit of what the farmer lost in the transaction. I am glad that the hon. gentleman who now presides over the financial affairs of this country has seen fit to protect the farmer, and I say that there never was a Budget brought down in Canada under which the farmers got a squarer deal than in the Budget submitted to this House this year by the Hon. Mr. White.

Mr. WM. WRIGHT (Muskoka): It is not my intention to deal with this matter at any great length, but I want to give a few figures. It would appear as if we were to have a re-hash of the old argument in favour of reciprocity from hon. gentlemen opposite. I, for one, would naturally have thought that it was so thoroughly discussed in this House and in the country in 1911 that we had heard the last of reciprocity for a long time to come. It appears, however, that we are to be afflicted with the same old arguments, which in my opinion will be about as effective as they were in 1911. Touching the question of potatoes, it was represented to us during the reciprocity discussion in 1911 that the American market, with its ninety millions or a hundred millions of consumers, was a great market for our potatoes. During the discussion on that question, early in April, 1911, I took occasion, together with the hon. member for East Peterborough (Mr. Sexsmith) to visit the United States and to investigate for ourselves the actual conditions there, to find out whether that great market existed, and to what extent. Two of the agricultural products of Canada were specially dwelt upon by hon. gentlemen opposite as being fit subjects to find a market in the United States, namely, potatoes and hay. I went into the state of New York, where they told us hay was put upon the market at $22 per ton, and from watching the farmer sell the hay right off their wagons we found it sold in even large cities at $10 per long ton of 2,240 pounds. We were told at that time that potatoes were bringing one dollar and more per bushel in the United States, and we actually saw them with our own eyes sold out of the stores in the city of Watertown and other cities in the United States at forty cents a bushel. The same condition of affairs prevailed over a large part of the United States at that time, and it prevails over a considerable portion of the United States to-day.

The great fact remains that the United States is an agricultural country, that they produce in abundance all kinds of agricultural products that we produce in Canada, that they can supply all their needs, potatoes and wheat included, with the products we raise in this country and that they have abundance for export. One of the best authorities in the United States made the statement during the reciprocity agitation that the agricultural land of the United States was capable of producing a sufficient amount of agricultural products, potatoes and wheat again included, to feed a population of 311,000,000 people.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They are not doing it.

Mr. WRIGHT: They are producing all they need at present and exporting large quantities, and if the hon. gentleman can name something they are not exporting I will be very pleased to hear from him.

[Mr. Wright.]

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That would not prove anything; they might be large importers at the same time.

Mr. WRIGHT: The facts are that while they do import certain tropical and semi-tropical products, which they do not produce in abundance in the United States, to the extent of about $500,000,000 annually, they are sending out of the United States over one billion dollars worth of agricultural products, and the products included in that vast export are of the quality and kind that we produce in Canada.

With regard to potatoes, it may not be out of the way to call the attention of the House to a few figures which I have taken from the trade and navigation returns for the year 1913. We made some exports, among other things potatoes. We managed to sell to that great American market, to those ninety million people, the grand total of 152,557 bushels.

Mr. CARVELL: What year was that?

Mr. WRIGHT: 1913.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: New Brunswick sold 50,000 bushels in three months last year.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am giving the figures from the Trade and Navigation returns.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It was stated last night that the province of New Brunswick exported 50,000 bushels into the United States in October, November and December of last year.

Mr. WRIGHT: I cannot help what the hon. gentleman says; I am giving the figures from the Trade and Navigation returns. The hon. gentleman will find them on page 457.

Mr. CARVELL: I realize that the hon. gentleman wants to be fair about this matter. He is quoting the returns down to the 31st of March, 1913, and the duty was not taken off until the 3rd day of October, 1913. The potatoes to which my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) refers, were shipped after the duty was removed.

Mr. WRIGHT: On the 1st of April, 1915, we shall be able to give official figures in regard to that.

Mr. CARVELL: I have a return here which I am willing to show to my hon. friend.

Mr. WRIGHT: As I said before, the grand total export of potatoes to the United States in 1913 was 152,557 bushels. To Cuba, which is only a dot on the map, we sold 567,105 bushels, or nearly four times as much as we sold to the whole of the United States during that year. To Bermuda we sold 50,862 bushels; to British Guiana, 58,145 bushels, and to the British West Indies, 49,907 bushels.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the hon. gentleman admit that the situation is entirely different now, and that he is not discussing the matter on the proper premises ?

Mr. WRIGHT: I am discussing it on conditions that have prevailed for years, during which time the hon. gentleman was representing that market as the great market for the people of Canada. Conditions were not different in 1913 from what they were in the previous years.

In 1913, we bought from the United States —and hon. gentlemen opposite will admit that the fact of their lowering the duty cannot have any effect upon the quantity of goods they send into this country—$441,142,593 worth of goods last year, and we managed to sell to them $167,110,382 worth. When we are asked to make free goods coming from the United States, we should consider the whole proposition as to our trade with that country, and we ought not to forget that we are buying from the United States three times as much as we are selling to them. Before we consider enlarging the free list of Canada, we ought to take cognizance of the fact that we are making free to the people of the United States a class of goods that enables them to sell as large a quantity of goods free of duty to Canada as we selling to them all told. Surely we ought not to be asked to enlarge our free list. If the Americans really need the goods that are produced in Canada, they know how to get them: all they have to do is to remove the duty. It is a remarkable thing that, whenever we commence to sell any very considerable quantity of goods to the United States, something happens. Our potatoes became infected with scab or canker. We sold to them a large number of cattle last fall, and the Americans discovered that there was grave danger of disease. There is a Bill before Congress now, which will undoubtedly become law, providing that no further importations of cattle will be allowed into the United States without having them undergo the tuberculin test and also remain in quarantine for a certain length of time. That will have a nice effect upon the big steers that are going over to the United States from Alberta. Just imagine lassoing those wild steers belonging to our hon. friend the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), and getting them into that calm and quiet condition that will enable the tuberculin test to be applied. After you have spent some weeks in getting that accomplished satisfactorily, the cattle will have to stay in quarantine on the other side of the line for many weeks.

Mr. WARNOCK: What authority has my hon. friend for saying that there is such a Bill before Congress?

Mr. WRIGHT: The notice in regard to the Bill before the Congress of the United States is set forth in the Congressional Record.

Mr. WARNOCK: I have the authority of the Veterinary Director General of Canada for saying that he has received no notice of any such legislation.

Mr. WRIGHT: It has not passed Congress yet.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will the hon. gentleman say if that is an administration Bill or a Bill introduced merely by some member of Congress?

Mr. WRIGHT: It is a Bill which the Government of the United States is fathering if I understand the matter correctly, and a Bill that will in all probability pass in the very near future.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Is my hon. friend a prophet?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will the hon. gentleman tell me what percentage of Bills pass in any one year in the United States Congress?

Mr. BLAIN: They put an embargo on potatoes, did they not?

Mr. WRIGHT: Let me draw the hon. gentleman's attention to one other feature with regard to our exports to the United States. Two or three years ago it was found that they were running short of raw material for certain kinds of leather, and they thought it wise to take the duty off certain kinds of hides. We commenced to ship some of those hides to our American friends; and they immediately discovered that there was danger of contamination and made a customs regulation that the hides should be taken out of the cars and fumigated and put in again. Those engaged in the business of exporting hides prayed the American authorities to put them back under the old conditions. The hon. gentleman will also remember a certain treaty made with our American friends in which certain kinds of fish from the Maritime provinces were allowed to go into the United States free of duty. While they could not break the treaty they discovered that they could put a duty on the cans, and thus they shut out those importations. Certain manufacturers of this country attempted to invade the American market a few years ago and commenced to make a few sales; but they were immediately assailed by the American authorities under some plea or other; they were haled into the courts, and they were glad to get out with their lives at a loss of $20,000. Therefore, they will leave that market severely alone in the future.

The British manufacturer of agricultural machinery made the same mistake. When the American market was made free to them, they thought they would invade that market. Their goods are piled up in one of the coast cities—if they are not there now they were there for a considerable time—and they were forced to get out of that market by very much the same kind of treatment. The fact is, disguise it as we may, that the people of Canada, whether engaged in manufacturing or in agriculture, will not be allowed to get into the American market to any great extent. The Americans will find some means to prevent us from occupying that market, even if we could successfully do so under existing conditions.

Mr. OLIVER: Is trade between Canada and the United States increasing or decreasing?

Mr. WRIGHT: It may be increasing, but it is increasing because we are buying goods from them, not because we are selling them goods to any appreciable extent.

Mr. OLIVER: So my hon. friend wants to continue a condition under which we shall be less able to sell them goods?

Mr. WRIGHT: I say we will not be allowed to sell to any great extent.

Mr. CARVELL: The Minister of Finance says that our exports to the United States are increasing.

Mr. WRIGHT: Not to any appreciable extent. Our total sales to the United States hardly equal what we are allowing to come in from the United States duty free, and that is over one-third of our total importations from that country. Of course, where you have countries lying side by side along an imaginary boundary line of four thousand miles, there is bound to be a certain quantity of goods cross—even if they are only going through to some other country—hauled by the American railways, financed by their banks and giving employment to their people.

Mr. OLIVER: Do I understand that the hon. gentleman objects to our goods going across that way?

Mr. WRIGHT: I am not taking objection; the objection comes from our American friends. They say unless they are allowed to be the agents of Canada, unless their financial concerns do the business for us, unless we are willing to become 'adjuncts,' mere hewers of wood and drawers of water, unless we are prepared to take that ignominious position, we shall not be allowed to trade.

Mr. OLIVER: But the Finance Minister says we are increasing our trade with them.

Mr. WRIGHT: It may please the hon. gentleman to adopt that humble attitude, but some of us do not feel like getting down on our knees. Now, with regard to the question of potatoes, let me point out that there has hardly been a year for many years when if potatoes have not been very plentiful in some sections of Canada, they have been plentiful in other sections. Taking Canada over and the United States over, the prices for potatoes obtained by farmers in Canada have been as good as those obtained by the farmers in the United States. In the town where I live, I had the opportunity a few weeks ago of buying New Brunswick potatoes and paying $1.40 a bag for them. And they were fairly good potatoes,—they grow fairly good potatoes down there; I do not think they are any better than are usually grown in the district I represent. It is a very unusual thing for us to buy anything but local potatoes in the section from which I come; but during the early part of last season we were subject to a very severe drought, and the potato crop last year was very small indeed in our locality. In other parts of Ontario they had a fairly good crop. Prices have ruled high in Toronto, Hamilton, Montreal and other large cities, and I should think that in Montreal and Toronto, where hundreds of thousands of bushels of potatoes have been marketed, our New Brunswick friends and our Prince Edward Island friends would have found a market sufficient to absorb all their surplus crop of potatoes and afford them a fairly good profit upon their product.

I hope we shall not be subject to another epidemic of talk on this 'ninety-million market.' But if our friends opposite desire discussion of that kind, we are prepared to meet them at any time, anywhere and under any circumstances; and the result will be the same as it was in 1911. I think they would be well advised to take up not more than a reasonable part of the time of this House in a discussion of this nature. For my part, I am quite prepared to support any legislation that will make for a better market for the farmers of Canada. But I want to be shown that it is going to be a better market. I am reminded of an incident that happened in the early settlement of the province of Ontario. Times were bad, and the people were hard pressed to make a living. One farmer who had got in early and had succeeded in getting a little property around him, had, among other things, a number of small pigs, which he kept in a pen not far from his shanty.

5 p.m. Two men who were hard pressed made up their minds that they would steal one of the pigs. Unfortunately for them, while they were deliberating and making their way to the place, a bear had got ahead of them and had devoured the pig. One of the men went in to secure the pig while the other remained outside to watch. After waiting for a time, the fellow outside said, 'Did you get him?' 'Yes,' answered the other, 'but he has got me and he is hugging me till he makes me squeal.' If our Canadian farmers did succeed in getting into the American market at the cost of throwing open the market of Canada, they would find that instead of getting the American market, the American farmer had got their market, and he would hug them till he made them squeal.

Mr. CARVELL: It is said that 'fools rush in where angels fear to tread,' and, with the full knowledge of the fearful responsibility that I am taking, and even in the face of the advice, almost threat, of my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. Wright), I must have a word or two to say, not on the reciprocity question, not on the tuberculin test on animals going into the United States, but on the question really at issue, the question whether something cannot be done to get access to the American market for the potatoes of the Maritime provinces—even if the people of Ontario do not want it. I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) on the able defence that has been given him, for apparently he has decided without any further discussion that he will not consent to this resolution. I congratulate him on the defence and the exposition of the possibility of raising and selling potatoes coming from a gentleman representing a constituency that is so rocky, so worthless, that they have to import potatoes 1,500 miles from New Brunswick in order to get a few to eat. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Wright) must know a lot about raising potatoes; his constituents must be vitally interested in whether the people of the Maritime provinces sell their potatoes in the United States or in any other part of the world. If the gentlemen who defend the attitude of the Minister of Finance are farmers, what kind of people must they represent? What kind of farmers must there be in the constituencies of gentlemen who get up and suggest that the farmers should keep rotten potatoes in their cellars until the middle of June or the last of July? Hon. gentlemen are disposed to treat with levity anything which they realize is against their particular interests, but there is no use in trying to brush aside lightly the great question of a market for potatoes so far as the Maritime provinces are concerned. It is of no use to say that the question was settled by the defeat of reciprocity. It was settled for three or four years, but if hon. gentlemen think this question is settled for all time to come, they still have three or four thinks coming to them. An economic question will never be settled until it is settled right, and so far as potatoes are concerned this question was not settled right in 1911. I do not know whether my hon. friend is a farmer or not; I think he does not represent a farming constituency.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am a farmer and I represent farmers. I produce a great deal more than the average farmer in the province of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CARVELL: Then, my hon. friend does not produce potatoes. He says we do not want to trade with the United States and the United States do not want to trade with us. I do not deny that they have been unfriendly; we are not all saints in this world and they are not all saints in the United States. They have done many unfriendly things with regard to their tariff, and I dare say they will do more unfriendly things. We have done unfriendly things with regard to our tariff, and probably we will do more unfriendly things; but it does not follow that we ought not to trade with the United States if by doing so we can make money. The hon. minister showed in his speech the other day that in the eleven months ended February 28, 1914, we exported $161,000,000 worth of goods to the United States, and that in the whole of the previous year we exported only $150,000,000 worth. There was an increase of $11,000,000 in the eleven months; it would probably be $15,000,000 for the whole year. Yet hon. gentlemen say that we do not want to trade with the United States. The minister admitted that the increase resulted from the putting into force of the Underwood tariff. The very moment the tariff restrictions imposed by the United States were removed, the sale of Canadian goods in the United States markets commenced. There is not a farmer in the western portion of Ontario to-day who has not reaped the benefit of the new American tariff; he would not have sent his goods to the United States if he did not find there a better market. In the months of October, November and December of the year 1911, from the province of New Brunswick we shipped to the United States 2,992 bushels of potatoes, about three or four carloads. In the same months of 1912 we shipped 2,341 bushels; in the same months of 1913 we shipped 650,000 bushels. Why did we ship such an enormous quantity of potatoes from the province of New Brunswick to the United States in those three months ? Simply because the tariff wall was partly taken down. The new American tariff was announced in the month of March, 1913. The potatoes are planted in New Brunswick in the month of May; the people knew that there was going to be a great reduction in the tariff; they doubled their acreage and ultimately exported this large quantity of potatoes.

But the trade returns do not tell the whole story so far as New Brunswick is concerned. My constituency extends fifty miles along the border of the United States. The district of potato production extends twenty-five or thirty miles into the constituency of the hon. member for York, N.B., and fifty or seventy-five miles into the constituency of the hon. member for Victoria. Fifty or seventy-five miles of that territory is a thickly settled portion of the country, the farms extending right up to the boundary line. On the American side of the line there is a railway within two or three miles of the boundary; on the Canadian side there is a railway ten miles to the east. During that period the farmer living two or three miles from the boundary line, instead of shipping his potatoes in the ordinary way, hauled them across the boundary line, load by load, paid the duty upon them and sold them to American buyers. I have no doubt that 150,000 or 200,000 bushels of potatoes were shipped in this way out of my county in those three months, and do not appear in the trade returns. I could not attempt to picture the prosperity that existed in my county at that time. We doubled our acreage, we had a good crop, we had fairly good weather and we received fairly good prices. The price of potatoes per barrel at that season of the year was from 80 cents to $1.

Mr. WRIGHT: What is the weight of your barrel?

Mr. CARVELL: 165 lb. We got from $1.15 to $1.35 per barrel for our potatoes during those months. When the embargo went on, in the latter part of December, 1913, we were getting about $1.35 per barrel for our potatoes, and just across the boundary line they were getting 15 cents a barrel more than that; we were losing just the 10 per cent. But the conditions were simply splendid. Farms were bought and sold that never had been dreamed of before. I was one of the victims myself. I bought a $5,000 farm, believing I was going to be able to make money raising potatoes; but the embargo was put on, and I do not know what I am going to do with my farm. I made a wrong guess. Property appreciated 50 per cent, and in some cases even 100 per cent, in three months. But farmers would not sell their property because they believed that the conditions were such that they could make money by holding it.

I am willing to agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Wright) that there are many people in the United States who are not friendly when it comes to trade matters. I will admit that all the trouble about the embargo came right from our neighbours in Aroostook county. That is the greatest potato producing territory on the continent; 12,000,000 or 13,000,000 barrels of potatoes are produced in that one county, and we could produce exactly the same quantity in the same area of territory in New Brunswick if we had the market for them. As I said, it was not the enormous price, but it was the scope of the market that was such an advantage. Mr. McKane, a very large shipper of potatoes, told me that he had to telegraph and write and look up a chance to sell three or four carloads of potatoes in Toronto; but the telephone would ring and an order would come from Boston: Can you ship me 25, 30, 40 or 50 cars. There was no limit to the market. It was only a question of getting the potatoes out of the fields, hauling them to the station and loading them on the cars. Had our farmers been able to get cars, instead of sending 600,000 or 800,000 bushels to the United States they would probably have sent twice that amount. Many farmers in Carleton county have in their possession carloads of fertilizers to be used this coming season. Each car means 15 or 20 tons at $40 a ton. Many farmers are spending $1,000 a year in fertilizer alone, and it pays them to do so. There are farmers in my county, who if the duty and embargo were removed, would this year spend $2,000 in fertilizer, and it would pay them. Gentlemen opposite who laugh at this do not know what they are laughing about. I suppose the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best) plants three or four acres of potatoes and would call that a large crop, and I suppose that if the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Wright) had a patch of half an acre he would consider he was doing wonders. In my county, if we had that American market, each farmer would raise 20 acres. In the state of Maine 25 to 50 acres is quite common, and many farmers raise 100 acres of potatoes a year. If these gentlemen went down there and saw something about this crop, we would not hear the guffaws that we heard from a certain gentleman leaning over here against the wall yesterday and this afternoon. These hon. gentlemen would then know what they are talking about and they would not insult men who come here who do know what they are talking of. A little lesson in manners would do some of these gentlemen good. If they do not want to know the economic conditions of the country, at least they ought to be taught good manners. If they would go to the Maritime provinces and see fields of potatoes of twenty to forty acres grown under the most modern plans and conditions they would be surprised. The seed is cut by machinery, it is planted by machinery, cultivated by machinery, sprayed by machinery, and the potatoes are dug up by machinery.

Mr. BEST: Then expounded here by gas.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is welcome to whatever he can get out of that. I take that from the source it came and it is about equal to the source from which it came. It shows the mental and business calibre of the man who would make a remark like that and only brings it back to my suggestion that it must be a wonderful constituency that will send a man of that character here to represent them. As my hon. friend beside me says that constituency should be embargoed from the House of Commons of Canada.

Here is the position in which we find ourselves. I know of many farmers who have carloads of fertilizers in their buildings to-day for the purpose of planting potatoes this year on a large scale; but the embargo is on and these men dare not plant their potatoes. It is out of the question. A man dare not plant 25 acres of potatoes in New Brunswick to-day, because he does not know where he will sell them. We can sell a certain amount of potatoes in Quebec and Ontario. Some years it is more, some less. During the last two years we have sold a fairly good quantity. I would say that from my constituency we have sold 250,000 to 300,000 barrels in Quebec and Ontario. The moment the embargo went on the price went down to $1 a barrel or practically 40 cents a bushel, and that price has continued stationary to the present or until two weeks ago when they commenced to go up because large quantities were demanded for seeds. Within the last three or four days I think they are probably worth $1.25 a barrel but nothing like the price in November and December when we were selling to the American market. In Maine to-day you will find that the farmer is getting $1.75 to $1.80 a barrel for potatoes.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: What would the duty on a barrel be?

Mr. CARVELL: The duty on that barrel to-day if we could get them in at all would be about 12 or 15 cents.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: The difference would be more than the duty.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, but we are prohibited from sending our potatoes there because there is an embargo. I am only showing the conditions on the other side of the line. Potatoes are worth, say, $1.25 to-day, or they have been for the last week or so, they have been a dollar all winter but on the other side of the line they are worth $1.75 to $1.80.

Mr. MORPHY: Is the embargo fair?

Mr. CARVELL: I will discuss that in a few moments. I will not skip the embargo, because that is the real object I had in rising to my feet. In New Brunswick an average farmer can raise five acres of potatoes and get rid of his product at some price in Quebec or Ontario. We also sell something to Cuba. I have a return which I obtained from the Department of Customs and I will send it over to any of my hon. friends who wish to see it. It will be seen that we have sent a few New Brunswick potatoes to Cuba—last year not very many, only about 50,000 or 60,000 bushels, and the year before about the same. Four or five years ago we sent a great many more. The Government of Canada granted a subsidy of $25,000 a year to a line of steamers sailing from St. John to Cuba for the purpose of trying to find an outlet for our potatoes and the Government of New Brunswick did something towards that object also. They established a warehouse in Cuba and also a warehouse in St. John. Everybody has realized that the great problem in New Brunswick, in so far as agriculture is concerned for the last five or six years, has been to find a market for these potatoes. We realize that once you give us a market there is no end to the production; we could raise ten times the amount we produce today if we could get a market. We tried to find a market in Cuba but this has been somewhat of a failure. We have to send forth the potatoes over a thousand miles by sea to a tropical climate and when we get there we find that there is a potato trust which is big enough to squeeze out every person who does not pay tribute to the trust. The result is that the effort has been almost a total failure. We cannot send potatoes to Europe because they are cheaper there than they are here. Therefore, we are circumscribed down to what we can do in the Dominion of Canada alone and there is just a certain limit beyond which we cannot go. There is no use producing more than we can find a market for and we cannot find a market unless we can get it in the United States.

During the summer of 1913 it became known that the American duty was going to be greatly reduced, if not entirely removed. The potato-growers of Maine are a very influential body of men and one of the brightest lot of farmers that I suppose exists on the continent of America to-day, men, who I am satisfied, are the richest class of farmers that you can find in America, a class that have grown so wealthy raising potatoes on exactly the same soil as we have that every other farmer in the States rides around in an automobile. It would do my friends from Ontario good to spend three or four days in Aroostook county in the state of Maine; it would be a revelation that they have never dreamed of. I am not here to praise up the state of Maine; I am only showing what we could have in the province of New Brunswick if we had the market to the south of us.

These people were just as narrow as some of our people were in 1911. They believed that the opening of the market of the United States to our potatoes would in some way affect them. They believed that we would produce potatoes enough to affect the American market. They may be right in that but I do not agree with them myself. I do not think they were as much afraid of the Canadian potatoes as of the European potatoes. It turned out that, just as soon as the duty was removed, potatoes went in from New Brunswick and also from other portions of Canada, but in certain quantities only as our powers were limited. We only had a certain quantity to sell. Potatoes came into the United States from Germany, Holland, Scotland, and, I think, from England. The growers of Maine organized themselves and determined to prevent potatoes coming in if they possibly could do so. They did not have to pass any law in the United States; they had a law already. I have forgotten what it is called but they had a law, the same as we have in Canada, which gave to the administration officials the power by regulation, as they call it—we would call it an Order in Council—to prohibit the importation of any diseased products. The potato-growers of Maine asked the United States Government to prohibit the importation of potatoes into the United States from all countries in which disease could be found. They claimed, and I do not think anybody denies it now, that there is an enormous amount of disease among German potatoes and there is also disease amongst the English and Scotch potatoes. They claimed that there was also disease in the Canadian potatoes. We found quite early in the season representatives of big American firms travelling through New Brunswick and examining our fields in order to see if they could find the existence of the disease which they called powdery scab.

Some of my hon. friends sent over here, I think in a jocular manner, a document which I hold in my hand. I will tell these hon. gentlemen that this is not a jocular matter in the province of New Brunswick. It is something which is issued by the Department of Agriculture here and for which I give them every credit in the world, a publication which, I believe, will mean thousands and tens of thousands of dollars to the people of the Maritime provinces. This is another evidence that if my hon. friends opposite knew what they were talking about we would not have seen the exhibition that we saw here yesterday and that we have seen this afternoon.

They claimed that the potatoes in New Brunswick were affected by disease known as powdery scab. As soon as this was found out—I am only speaking now for myself—I wrote to the department and told them that these agents were travelling through the province of New Brunswick trying to find this disease. I wired them, then I wrote them, then I wired them again and if you go to the Department of Agriculture you will find a great many communications from myself pointing out to the department what was going on. I am not saying that the department did not exercise reasonable precautions but I do not think that they became seized of the importance of this question. I asked the department to send agents all over the province of New Brunswick to investigate our potato fields and see if this disease did exist and, if it did not exist, to be in a position, when the matter came up in Washington, to prove that it did not exist. If I have any fault to find with the Government, or the Department of Agriculture, it is that they did not take the advice which I offered them, advice which was very much in their interest and which dealt with a question of almost life and death to the business interests of my constituents. It was announced that a meeting would be held at Washington on the 18th of December to discuss this matter and on that date the discussion took place before the Secretary of Agriculture for the United States. There were representatives from Germany, Holland, Belgium, England, Scotland and Canada. It is only with the Canadian side of the matter that I propose to deal.

Mr. BLAIN: Was that before or after the embargo was put on?

Mr. CARVELL: That was before. This was a meeting held after the potato-growers of the state of Maine had asked their government to impose the embargo. The Dominion Government was represented by the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Mr. O'Halloran, who, I do not think, pretended to know very much about it. I do not say it offensively because he did not go there professing to know much about the question. Canada was also represented by Dr. Gussow, the technical gentleman of the department, who may be eminently qualified—I do not know, I am sure. However, he was there. I must say that the report which I got from friends of mine who were present was not altogether complimentary to the doctor. They thought that he knew a great deal more about the technical and scientific side of the question than about the practical side.

Mr. BLAIN: He is the author of the document which my hon. friend has in his hand.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes; I am saying that he spent a long time in giving a very learned discourse upon the technical side of the disease, but I do not think he knew as much about the practical side of it. However, I am not here to throw any mud at anybody; I am trying to give the facts to the House and I want to see if something cannot be done to reinstate us in our former position.

Mr. BURNHAM: What effect will the abolition of the duty have upon European importations?

Mr. CARVELL: The resolution of my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) does not ask for the abolition of the duty.

Mr. BURNHAM: That is unfair, that is rank, that is absurd.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend (Mr. Burnham) is entitled to his opinion, but he will have a chance to talk later, and he can go over in an aeroplane if he wants to, and bring a cargo of potatoes back to Canada. The province of New Brunswick was represented at that meeting by the provincial Deputy Minister of Agriculture, and the potato dealers were represented by Mr. Guy Porter, of Porter and Manzen, Limited, which I think is the largest potato-jobbing firm in the Maritime provinces. The matter was argued very thoroughly. There were about three hundred representatives from different parts of the United States, all asking the department to prohibit the importation of potatoes on account of the disease, and the information which had been collected by these gentlemen was placed before the Secretary of Agriculture and they established that there was a disease in New Brunswick potatoes. I am not sure, but I think there was also some evidence given, that there was disease in Quebec potatoes, but I do not think there was any evidence given as to disease in Ontario or Prince Edward Island potatoes. The result was that some six or seven days afterwards an order went forth imposing an embargo on the importation of potatoes from any country in which disease was known to exist, and as they claimed that this disease was known to exist in Canada the importation of potatoes from Canada was prohibited. I understand that the terms of the order were such that the United States could exclude from its operation any province or provinces of Canada in which the disease did not exist, and therefore I believe that the province of Ontario could be excluded from the operation of the order, if the people of Ontario desired it. However, we cannot have New Brunswick or Quebec excluded. It would be in the interests of the producers, at least in Prince Edward Island, if an attempt were made to have the embargo removed with respect to potatoes from that province. I know that at present New Brunswick cannot get the embargo removed until we can convince the American authorities that our potatoes are free from disease.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the hon. member consider that the embargo by the American authorities on New Brunswick potatoes was a fair dealing between the American people and ourselves?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, I do. If the American authorities are honestly convinced of the existence of disease in our potatoes, I think it is a perfectly fair and justifiable proceeding on their part to prohibit their importation. In reference to that, I wish to quote from this morning's Citizen.

Mr. WRIGHT: When the matter was investigated by the United States committee, was it found that American potatoes were diseased?

Mr. CARVELL: In the first place, the producers in the state of Maine were responsible for the imposition of this embargo, and they brought it about purely from a selfish motive, believing that if they could prevent the importation of potatoes from any part of the world it would enhance the price of their potatoes, or at least it would prevent the price being reduced. These people sent their agents through our province, and they claimed they found, —and I do not say they did not,—evidence of this powdery scab. I have never yet seen in New Brunswick a potato exactly looking like the potato shown in the document issued by the Department of Agriculture and said to be afflicted with powdery scab. I do not raise potatoes, and the scab may exist in New Brunswick and I might not know it, but I have discussed the matter with potato-growers and potato merchants, and while some believe it does exist, yet nine out of every ten in the province of New Brunswick will contend that it does not exist. It is a moot question. Nobody yet has ever been able to convince me that the scab does exist, and yet if the American authorities say they have evidence of it, I would not feel like saying they have not. However, I have great doubt that this disease exists in New Brunswick. To continue with the history of the matter: other portions of the United States got busy as well as Maine, and their contention is that if the powdery scab existed in New Brunswick, which is right alongside of Maine, it was reasonable to expect that the powdery scab existed in the Maine potatoes as well. As a result of this, some two or three months ago a big delegation went from the county of Aroostook to Washington and they had a pretty bitter fight over it, and in the end a regulation was promulgated by which inspectors were put at every shipping point in Maine. Every carload of potatoes shipped from the county of Aroostook during the last two or three months has been inspected, and the inspector puts his seal upon the car, and if he finds what he thinks is scab or any other disease, he gives a certificate that these potatoes shall be used only for food purposes, because everybody knows that this disease does not render the potato poisonous. But, if the inspector finds that the scab or any other disease exists, he prohibits these potatoes from being used for seed purposes. In explanation of this it is necessary to understand that one-half of the potato output of the northern portion of the State of Maine is used for seed purposes in the south, and not for table use. It is contended that potatoes grown in the south will not reproduce as well as potatoes grown in the north, and the result is that no person will use southern potatoes for seed, if he can get northern grown potatoes. The New Brunswick potatoes would be used for seed purposes in the south, as are the potatoes grown in the state of Maine. I rather felt like chiding the Minister of Agriculture for not trying to have some such regulation as that which prevails in Maine applied in Canada. But even this rigid inspection did not satisfy the potato growers of other portions of the United States.

They claimed that if the disease existed in the state of Maine, that state ought not to be allowed to disseminate it throughout the rest of the United States. They have been making another move. I find in this morning's Citizen the following despatch from Washington:

> Washington, April 28.—Federal quarantine against Maine potatoes, effective August 1, next, has been declared by the Department of Agriculture, it was announced to-day, because of the prevalence of powdery scab. After August 1, no common or Irish potatoes can be shipped out of Maine except under regulations of the Department of Agriculture.

That ought to convince even such a skeptical gentleman as my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. Wright) that these people in the United States at least have some belief in the course of action which they are taking, and that it is not all for the purpose of being unfriendly to the potato growers of the Dominion of Canada. It is so easy for a man to twist the tail of the lion when he goes around the lodges in some of the back country districts that, when he comes to the House of Commons, he forgets that he is not on his native heath; he forgets that in the Parliament of Canada his arguments do not altogether fit in with conditions. I think that is the case with my hon. friend from Muskoka. He believes that every man in the United States is born with hoofs and horns, and that his sole object in life is to be unfriendly to the British Empire. We do not believe that; I do not believe it for a moment. In my judgment, the people of the United States are the shrewdest, brightest commercial people in the world; I give them credit for being the greatest successes in the commercial enterprises of the world, and I am willing to admit that they are probably as selfish a class of people as will be found anywhere. I do not want to paint the picture whiter or blacker than it ought to be. They are shrewd, enterprising people; they are looking to the interest of the American people every time, and they will never allow themselves to come second, if possible. I think I have correctly protrayed the condition of affairs that existed at that time. I see only one ray of hope in this whole question, which is that evidently the United States Department of Agriculture does not intend absolutely to prohibit the export of potatoes from the state of Maine into the rest of the United States, if we believe this despatch to be correct, because they cannot be shipped except under certain regulations of the Department of Agriculture. I want to know why our Minister of Agriculture cannot take advantage of that olive branch, and see if he can not in some way have those regulations applied to Canada. I do not believe there is any disease in the potatoes from Prince Edward Island. Do not be afraid to approach the United States Government; they will not bite, nor kick, nor do anything like that. They may not give you the best end of the trade; but I think we have long since fought out all this nonsense about the 'two flags,' 'under which flag,' and all that sort of rubbish. Let us get down to business. The people of the United States have shown that they are not half as bad as my hon. friend from Muskoka thinks they are. They have taken the duty off our cattle, our hogs, our sheep, our lambs; they have cut in half the duty on our hay, and they have reduced the duty on our barley. They say: The moment you take the duty off your wheat, we will take it off ours, and they say the same thing with regard to potatoes. They have held out the olive branch to us in a greater degree than has ever happened before in the memory of any hon. member. They want to trade with us. I admit that the people of the state of Maine do not want to trade with us in so far as potatoes are concerned; but I believe that the President, the Government and the great majority of the people of the United States want to trade with us in so far as potatoes are concerned. I believe, however, that they have an honest intention of trying to prevent the spreading of disease throughout their country. If they believe that this disease exists, how can we find fault with them for trying to prevent it from spreading? Believing that the people of the United States want to trade with us, I cannot see anything derogatory to the dignity of the Minister of Agriculture, or of his Government, or of any government, or of any official of any Government of Canada in going to the United States and seeing if some arrangement can not be made whereby our potatoes can be admitted into the United States under the same regulations under which potatoes are admitted from the state of Maine. We have found scab in New Brunswick and in Quebec; and they have found scab in the state of Maine. I know that for the last two months they have been allowing potatoes to be shipped from the state of Maine under certain regulations; and, as I read it, they are going to continue to do so. Why cannot we go to Washington and see if we can make a trade by which our potatoes can go in under the same regulations? I do not think that that is humbling ourselves in the dust or doing anything derogatory to the dignity of Canada, or of Canadians, or of good Britishers, as our hon. friends like to call themselves. It is only the real, hard practical problem of life, of trying to do business with people with whom you can do business and of making a dollar when you are doing it.

I want to give the Minister of Agriculture credit for issuing this document, which is not entirely new to me. I wish to tell my hon. friends opposite, who think that I am sometimes hardly fit to represent a constituency in this House, that there has been a good deal of confidence existing between the minister and myself during the last four or five months over this question. The first day I came to Ottawa in the beginning of this session, I placed a resolution on the Order Paper to discuss this question. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture thought it possibly might not produce any good result; he came to me like a gentleman and I met him in the same spirit. The result has been that I have never opened my mouth in regard to the potato question during the present session. If my hon. friends could realize what the potato question means in my constituency, they would probably feel that I had exercised a good deal of restraint when I refrained from making any remarks or from taking any part in any discussion regarding it. Hon. gentlemen opposite should not think for a moment that I have not been constrained to do so. I have on my desk to-day 200 letters from my best supporters in my county asking: Why do you not say something about this potato question? Why do you not do something in order to have this embargo removed? But I believe that the minister is working along lines which he thinks are correct, and I will give him credit for being square about the matter until I know to the contrary. He has now published this document, which my hon. friends sent over to the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Hughes) with so much gusto, and thinking they are perpetrating a practical joke upon him by sending him a document showing pictures of diseased potatoes.

Mr. HENDERSON: Copies of this document are in the post office for every member. There is no insult in the matter.

Mr. CARVELL: I am quite aware that they are in the post office; but there is no doubt about the motive of the hon. gentleman who has sent it over here. One of my hon. friends from Ontario must have sent it; no other man would do such a thing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CARVELL: That does not apply to the whole of Ontario. There are only about half a dozen members from that province who would do such a thing. If we go on, we will get down, by the process of exclusion, to the right man.

I want to compliment the Minister of Agriculture on the work he is doing. He has promised me that copies of this document will be spread broadcast throughout the province of New Brunswick, and I hope every farmer in the Maritime provinces will have a copy of this document placed in his hands. There is a lot of valuable information in it.

Mr. MARCIL: Are they going to be distributed ?

Mr. CARVELL: I was told so about a month ago by the Minister of Agriculture. I am satisfied that the minister will carry out his word; that they will be distributed, and that the people of the Maritime provinces will be able to see what a diseased potato looks like.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Would the hon. member please give the total production of potatoes in New Brunswick?

Mr. CARVELL: I am not in a position to do that. But I can tell him that in the three upper counties of Victoria, Madawaska and Carleton, there would be somewhere in the vicinity of 1,000,000 barrels, three-quarters of which would be from my own county, the county of Carleton. I am safe in saying that 3,000,000 bushels of potatoes were raised in my own constituency last year. So, hon. gentlemen can see what an enormous thing it must be. For we have only a population of 21,000 or 22,000, and we do not devote all our time to raising potatoes either.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What quantity could the county raise?

Mr. CARVELL: It could raise six, or eight, or perhaps ten times as many potatoes as it does to-day, and we would do it if we had the market in which to sell them.

At six o'clock Committee took recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

Mr. CARVELL (resuming): Before the committee rose at six o'clock I was endeavouring to point out what I understood to be the history of the United States embargo upon our potatoes. When this matter was first brought up in the month of December last there was a disposition on the part of certain persons in the province of New Brunswick—I mention the province of New Brunswick especially because that province was more deeply interested in the matter—to treat this as a political matter. We have all through the western part of the province of New Brunswick what is called the Potato Shippers' Association, which is composed of two dozen gentlemen who are in the business. They held a number of meetings in the month of December and, as I say, there was a disposition on the part of a few of the shippers, and on the part of some of the officials of the local Government, to treat the question as a matter of politics. It was not long before we heard the same old cry that went up during the reciprocity campaign: we do not want the American market anyway; it is no good to us—arguments similar to those advanced by the hon. member for Muskoka this afternoon. A meeting was held in my home town, attended by the shippers, by representatives of the local Government and by a representative of the federal Government in the person of Dr. Gussow, whose name has been mentioned here on two or three occasions. Representatives of the press were excluded from the meeting; I know not why, but they were told that their presence would not be desirable. When the question arose of trying to have this embargo removed and to obtain again access to the United States market, Dr. Gussow told the people to send their potatoes to Saskatchewan, where there was a good market for them; that they need not bother their heads about the American market. They told Dr. Gussow, in language so plain that it could not be mistaken, that he simply did not know what he was talking about; one gentleman told him that the transportation charges upon potatoes sent to Saskatchewan would be twice as much as the potatoes were worth. Mr. B. F. Smith, who was my opponent in the last election contest, and who probably will be my opponent again, was chairman of the meeting. It is true that during the campaign of 1911 Mr. Smith argued as strongly as possible that the home market was all that we needed and that the American market was no good, but on that occasion—and for this he is entitled to a great deal of credit—he told the people that the American market was the only natural market for our potatoes and that we would have to get that market in order to succeed and prosper as we should in the province of New Brunswick. From that day to this the question has not been mixed up with politics. It is on account of the attitude of the people of my province, both Liberal and Conservative, that I have taken the course I have in not bringing this matter before the House during the present session. I have taken that course not only because I wished to do whatever was in the best interests of the people, but because I believed that the Minister of Agriculture as well was sincere in trying to work out these interests and very largely at his request I have refrained from saying anything on the subject. I think that hon. gentlemen on this side have demonstrated to the committee that this is a matter vitally affecting the people of the Maritime provinces; vitally affecting the whole of Prince Edward Island, the western portion and, to a considerable extent, the whole of the province of New Brunswick, the whole of the Annapolis valley in the province of Nova Scotia, and the eastern portion of the province of Quebec. It is the most important question affecting our trade and commerce to-day; it is the most vital question affecting the prosperity of that portion of Canada which I have mentioned. It is too big to be mixed up with political discussions and it is because of the intense interest which every member representing constituencies in the Maritime provinces must have in this matter that we have placed it so plainly before our skeptical friends opposite from Ontario. I have tried to eliminate politics from my presentation of the case; we are not bringing the matter forward from a political standpoint. Rightly or wrongly, the Americans consider this matter as of some importance, because when they were framing the Underwood tariff they took exactly the same course with regard to potatoes that they did with regard to wheat and wheat products; they made potatoes free to all countries that did not exact a duty upon like products. As we exact a duty upon potatoes coming from the United States into Canada, we must pay the duty of 10 per cent which the United States has imposed on our potatoes. I do not believe the American producer will send a bushel of potatoes into Canada, if they are made free, that he does not send now, because he sends potatoes to Canada now only in those seasons of the year when we are not producing them. On those occasions we buy them from the southern states, and will continue to buy them from the southern states no matter whether the duty is taken off them or not. Evidently however, the Government of the United States think differently, because they have insisted that potatoes shall not be allowed to go into the United Sates from Canada free of duty unless we impose no duty upon potatoes coming from the United States into Canada. That being the case, it seems to me that we cannot with very good grace enter into negotiations with the United States with a view to obtaining the removal of this embargo unless we first comply with the terms of their tariff and remove the duty.

The burden is on us to do something, and I believe that if the Parliament of Canada will remove the duty on potatoes coming from the United States into Canada, we shall then be in a position to go to the United States and ask to have the embargo against our potatoes removed. I confess that I have no inside information on that subject; I have no authority for making the statement; I am only giving my judgment. I have lived alongside United States people all my life, I have known a great deal of their business relations, and I think I know the potato business as well as any man in Canada. I know how the Mairtime provinces people feel about it. I have tried to tell the committee the considerations which animated the people of the United States in imposing this embargo.

Mr. BLAIN: Does my hon. friend not think that the Government of the United States placed the embargo on at the request of the United States farmers as a protection to their market from the Canadian potatoes going into the United States?

Mr. CARVELL: To some extent, no doubt.

Mr. BLAIN: I say that for the reason that it has been very generally stated in this House that the embargo placed by the British Government on Canadian cattle is kept there as a protection to the producers of cattle in the United Kingdom.

Mr. CARVELL: I think there is no doubt about that to some extent, but I think that the demand came altogether from one portion of the United States. I have some information as to the real inside working of the placing of this embargo, but I do not think it would be wise to communicate it to the world. I can say without any breach of confidence that it all arose on account of the action of certain politicians in the state of Maine alone. I do not believe that the President or the Government or the great majority of the people of the United States are now as anxious to have this embargo kept on as a matter of trade protection as they are as a matter of protection from disease. I do believe, from the conduct of the United States Government, that the great body of the authorities in the United States to-day believe that it is necessary that this embargo should be maintained to some extent as a matter of protection against disease. I think it has reached that point, and the burden is on our Government to eradicate that idea from the minds of the United States authorities. I believe we should first show our good faith by removing the duty. I have no fault to find with the Minister of Agriculture, except that I do not think he moved rapidly enough in the beginning. I think he failed to realize the importance of this matter at first. Perhaps when I commenced sending letters and telegrams to him he may have thought that I was playing the game of politics, but I know that later on he received telegrams and letters from other people, his own political friends, whom he could not charge with playing the game of politics. I do not think that sufficient energy was displayed in the initiation of this matter in October and November of last year. Since then the minister has become thoroughly seized of the importance of the situation, and I believe is trying to do everything he can to overcome the existing difficulties. I believe that if you could convince the minister personally that the embargo could be removed by our removing the duty, he is sincere enough to vote for that; and I do not believe that he or any other reasonable man in the House can feel that the removal of the duty would cause any injury to the Canadian producer.

Just what can be done I am at a loss to know. I only argue from the premises which we have before us. I find that the United States are now treating the state of Maine just as they treat New Brunswick, having placed an embargo on its potatoes. That serves the people of Maine very well right. The growers of that state are getting a little of their own medicine, and if they had to do this over again I do not think they would take the selfish course they did last summer. However, they took it, and they are now paying the penalty as well as we are. The people of Maine will now use every possible effort to have the embargo removed as against their potatoes, and I think the same methods which will be used by the people of that state might be used by the Government of Canada to secure the removal of the embargo against New Brunswick potatoes. Therefore, the first duty of this Government is to approach the United States Government to ascertain the true situation to-day—to ascertain whether or not every province in Canada really comes under the embargo, and whether they cannot have the embargo removed as to those provinces which are not affected or about which they have no evidence of the existence of the disease; then, as to the provinces about which they claim to have evidence of the existence of disease, to see if the potatoes from those provinces cannot enter the United States under rigid inspection. If the disease exists it is necessary to take all steps to eradicate it, and I believe that the minister is giving the best advice possible to the farmers along these lines. If the disease exists it will take some time to eradicate it. But remember that every farm is not inoculated with this disease; it is only claimed that in the county of Carleton, the great potato-producing country, the disease exists in a few spots within six or eight miles from a small town. The difficulty is that the whole county is tabooed because of the existence of the disease in a few places. Then, it is only claimed that the disease has been found in one or two places in York county; in one place in Kings, twenty-five or thirty miles above St. John; in one place in Victoria; but not at all in Madawaska. It seems to me that if the United States Government are willing to allow potatoes to be sent out of the state of Maine under rigid inspection, we might arrange with them to allow us to send our potatoes under the same inspection. It is true that it means a good deal of difficulty, the appointment of inspectors and so on, and we of course would have to pay the United States inspectors; but that is a mere bagatelle in comparison with the enormous proportions of this great industry. I can only say again that, in the first place, we must remove this duty in order to be in a position to approach the United States Government. When that is done we can ask the United States Government to allow our potatoes to pass in under the same inspection as those of the state of Maine.

My hon. friends opposite must admit that I have not approached this question from a party standpoint. I am trying to impress on the Government and the committee the enormous importance of this great industry in my constituency and province and the eastern portion of Canada. I accept the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Northumberland and the hon. member for Kings, P.E.I., as showing conclusively that the removal of this duty will not in any way hurt the Canadian producer of potatoes, while in many cases it will help the Canadian consumer.

Believing as I do in the correctness of their proposition, and knowing as I do the importance of this industry to our country, I feel that the Government can, without any degradation to itself, and without any loss of national dignity, approach the United States as with a business proposition, and see if something cannot be done to allow our people to go on, do business and prosper, as they might have done if this embargo had not been imposed upon them, and as, to some extent, they have done in the past; because we find ourselves in a very much worse position to-day than that in which we were placed before the American tariff was reduced. When the American tariff was in existence it was possible, under some circumstances, to send some potatoes over there, notwithstanding the fact that the tariff was almost prohibitive. The year 1912 was the time of the potato famine in America. We were sending potatoes from New Brunswick even into British Columbia. Shippers could pay the transportation charges from New Brunswick to British Columbia and then pay the farmer $1.50 to $1.75 a barrel for his product. The same famine existed in the United States, and I find from the returns that in the month of March, 1912, we sent to the United States from New Brunswick 11,000 odd bushels; in April we sent 83,000 bushels; in May, 1913, we sent 28,000 bushels, and in June, 36,000 bushels in the face of a tariff of 25 cents a bushel. This shows you that when the market was open we could do some business, and there was some outlet for our farmers even although they could not make very much money out of it. Now, with the embargo on, these men are in a very much worse position than they were before. I am pointing this out to the minister to show the calamity which threatens the people of the Maritime provinces and the national necessity that everything possible should be done that can be done to get us access to that market so that our people may go there, do business and grow up and prosper as they ought to be allowed to do.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) began his remarks by quoting the words 'fools rush in'—leaving the rest to be inferred, and immediately proceeded to give us a demonstration of the truth of that in so far as he was concerned. If the hon. member for Carleton had addressed himself to this subject in a non-partisan way, if he had not been actuated by any other motive than the desire to obtain for his province what he believes would be in its interest, I think he might very well have left unsaid many of the remarks which he made. I did not see that the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Wright) had, in his remarks, said anything which warranted the hon. member for Carleton in addressing him in the disrespectful manner in which he did address him. Neither was he justified in speaking as he did of the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best). In his Chesterfieldian way he spoke of that hon. gentleman's mental and business capacity and he asked: What kind of people must they be who will send a man like that to represent them in Parliament? I do not believe that even the worst Grit in the county of Dufferin would send a man to Parliament like the hon. member for Carleton. Even in their wildest moments I do not believe they would make such a selection as that. What call was there for referring to my hon. friend from Muskoka in the way in which my hon. friend did refer to him, and for saying that they had talked of these things in the lodges on the back concessions? What had that to do with the motion before the Chair? Could anybody imagine the hon. member for Carleton being a member of any lodge? I could not. I do not think the hon. member for Carleton could become a member of any lodge or any association of men which was gathered together as a lodge, council, court or anything of the kind. If the hon. member for Carleton ever occupies any position at all in a lodge of any kind, it will be a position, I fancy, in which he will not require much decoration; that is to say, that of the goat.

It is idle for the hon. gentleman to say that he is not actuated by any political motives in his remarks here to-night. Fancy the hon. gentleman for Carleton addressing himself to any subject in this House in which he was not actuated by political motives! In referring, as he did refer, to different members from the province of Ontario he spoke in very discourteous tones of the class of people who inhabit the province of Ontario. The hon. gentleman forgets what the figures show in regard to his own province. If the hon. gentleman has the influence in the province of New Brunswick that one would suppose from his talk we would have expected very different results in the last election. I presume he talked potatoes in the election of 1911 and no doubt it was small potatoes too that he talked. His majority was reduced from 151 in 1908 to a very doubtful 11 in 1911. If the hon. gentleman had not made use of his fine legal knowledge and taken advantage of technicalities it is said that he would not have a seat in this House at all. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie), who also, I suppose, talked his potato ideas down in his county, had his majority reduced from 981 to 392. The hon. member for St. John city (Mr. Pugsley) had his majority reduced from 496 to 65. I suppose that he talked potatoes too. The hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) had his majority reduced from 1,385 to 64 and I presume he also talked about potatoes and the advantage it would be to the farmers of New Brunswick if potatoes were on the free list. I can only infer then that the people in different parts of New Brunswick—in these constituencies at least to which I have referred—had given this matter more thought and attention than their representatives had given it and had showed that they had given it more attention by the vote they gave in the election. The hon. member for Kings, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Hughes) stated there were only ten states on the other side of the line which grew potatoes to any extent, that really only one of these states, namely, the state of Maine, could be called a potato-growing state and that the United States was not adapted to the growing of potatoes. The hon. gentleman is entirely wrong in making any such assertion.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I did not catch what the hon. member stated in the early part of his reference to me.

Mr. EDWARDS: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the United States could not be regarded as a potato-growing country, that the state of Maine was the principal potato-growing state of the Union and that potato-growing in the United States was practically confined to ten states.

Mr. HUGHES: I said it was not a potato-growing country outside of the ten states along the Canadian boundary line.

Mr. EDWARDS: Of which you say Maine was the most important.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS: I want to take exception to that, and I think I can prove that the statement of the hon. gentleman is not correct. The state of Maine is not by any means the principal potato-producing state in the Union. I have here the statistical abstract of the United States for 1912, and at page 146 I find that the principal potato-producing state in the Union is New York, which produces 38,000,000 bushels.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: From what is the hon. gentleman quoting?

Mr. EDWARDS: The statistical abstract of the United States for the year 1912, issued by the Department of Commerce and Labour, and the statement at page 146 is that the principal potato-producing state of the Union is New York, which produces 38,000,000 bushels, next comes Michigan with 36,750,000 bushels, next, Wisconsin with 34,920,000 bushels, next, Minnesota with 33,000,000 bushels, next, Pennsylvania with 28,885,000 bushels, next, Ohio with 20,000,000 bushels, next, Illinois with 14,000,000 bushels. To summarize, only six of the forty-eight states in the American Union produce less than one million bushels of potatoes annually, and twenty-five states of the American Union produce annually from five million bushels to thirty-eight million bushels each. The tables show a considerable fluctuation, and there is hardly any farm product that fluctuates as much as potatoes; one year a large crop, another year a small crop, as is proven conclusively, not only by the figures for the United States, but by the Canadian figures.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: What is the average production in each of the states of the American Union?

Mr. EDWARDS: I am glad the hon. gentleman asked me that question, because it enables me to tell him he was wrong in another statement he made. The hon. gentleman said that the average was somewhere around ninety bushels to the acre, but allow me to tell him that he is entirely wrong there. The average yield per acre, for all of these states in the United States, is 113 bushels per acre, and it runs up as high as 198 bushels per acre. That is entirely contrary to what the hon. gentleman said. I am not giving any guess-work about this, I have given the information and the source whence I have obtained it, which purports to be an official document issued by the United States Government. I invite my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) or anybody else to refute the figures I have given.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: As the hon. gentleman has invited me, I suppose it will be all right for me to give him my authority for the statement I have made. I have here a statement prepared by Lawrence G. Dodge, an official of the United States Department of Agriculture, on the northern potato-growing states.

Mr. EDWARDS: For what year?

Mr. HUGHES: For 1908. He gives the average per acre for all of the United States as ninety bushels; the average in the state of Maine, 177 bushels, and in Aroostook county, 225 bushels per acre.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am not questioning the hon. gentleman's statement in regard to the yield per acre in the particular county to which he refers, nor am I questioning his statement with regard to the yield in the state of Maine, but the hon. gentleman is entirely illogical in taking a few selected states along the border and giving the average for these selected states, and assuming from an examination for one year of a few selected states of the Union, a figure covering the production of the whole of the United States, and drawing from that his conclusion that the United States is not a potato-producing country.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: It is not my statement; it is the statement made by Mr. Dodge, an American Government official.

Mr. EDWARDS: The statement is made by Mr. Dodge, but the statement and the hon. gentleman's conclusion are two different things.

Mr. HUGHES: My conclusion was drawn from the statement exactly as Mr. Dodge made it.

Mr. EDWARDS: Very well. We will follow the statement further and see what there is in it. In the first place, I very properly disputed his statement that Maine was the principal potato-producing state, by quoting figures to show that several states each produced more potatoes than Maine.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Not on the same area; they are larger states.

Mr. EDWARDS: Let us look at the product in some of these states; Maine produces 23,000,000 bushels, and the average price on the 1st of December, 1912, was 55 cents per bushel; New Hampshire produced 2,380,000 bushels and the average price was 61 cents per bushel; Vermont produced 3,640,000 bushels, and the average price was 55 cents per bushel; Massachusetts produced 3,380,000 bushels, and the average price was 75 cents per bushel. I am giving these states in the first place because they lie near the province of New Brunswick, and to show that there is a production in these four states of over thirty-two and one half million bushels, and the prices show that there is a difference in price in each state, as happens all over Ontario. Potatoes may be one price in Toronto, another price in Hamilton, another price in Woodstock; there is no commodity in which there is such variation in price. If you take the states of California, Washington, and Oregon, which if this resolution carried would naturally come into competition with British Columbia, you will find that they produce 11,000,000 and 10,000,000 bushels each, respectively, or a total of thirty-one and one half million bushels. The price in Oregon was 31 cents, the price in Washington 36 cents, and the price in California 65 cents, there being a difference between California and Oregon of 34 cents per bushel in the price of potatoes. Yet, there is no duty between those two states, which shows conclusively, as all the figures with respect to the matter show, that the price of potatoes is very largely regulated by local conditions—one week a dollar a bag, next week down to 75 or 80 cents a bag, as we all know.

Then, take the states which border along Saskatchewan, Alberta, and Manitoba. Surely those provinces should be able to produce not only enough potatoes for their own use, but potatoes for export. Those provinces, if this resolution should carry, would be thrown into competition with the border states of Idaho, Montana, North and South Dakota, Minnesota and Wisconsin. Those states produce pretty nearly 95,000,000 bushels of potatoes a year, and the price runs from 38 cents in North Dakota to 40 cents in Montana, which is the highest price per bushel in those states adjacent to the prairie provinces.

In Ontario, lying along the Great Lakes, we have the states of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Michigan. These states border on lake Ontario, lake Erie and lake Huron. The production of potatoes in those states could be easily marketed anywhere along the shores of those lakes; they could be sent into the Georgian bay ports, into Fort William or into any other part of Ontario. Those four states produce 124,627,000 bushels of potatoes a year, and the price ranges from 41 cents in Michigan to 58 cents in New York. It is 50 cents in Pennsylvania and 53 cents in Ohio. Again, if we take those states bordering on lake Huron, namely, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin and Michigan, they produce 95,000,000 bushels of potatoes, the price ranging from 41 cents to 60 cents per bushel. It is all folly for the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. J. J. Hughes) to claim that the state of Maine is the principal potato-producing state of the Union. It is sheer folly for him to state that the United States, generally speaking, is not a potato-producing country. Let me give you the American production of potatoes for a few years, which will bear out my statement:

1909	376,000,000	"
1910	349,000,000	"
1912	420,000,000	"

You see the immense fluctuation in the production of potatoes: 292,000,000 in one year, and 420,000,000 bushels the next year. What would happen if we removed the duty and allowed these potatoes to come from the United States into Canada? When they had a large crop in the United States, they would undoubtedly swamp our market to the detriment of our farmers.

In the province of Ontario we produce an average of about 18,000,000 bushels of potatoes a year. Our production in 1911 was nearly 14,000,000 bushels. In 1912 we produced 21,000,000 bushels. Taking the ten years from 1902 to 1911, our production averaged a little less than 18,000,000 bushels. Our price in 1911 was 84 cents, in 1912, 63 cents, and our average price for the ten years I have named was 51 cents.

Hon. gentlemen have stated that when the Underwood tariff came into effect potatoes went in much larger quantities to the other side of the line. Let us look into that for a moment. In 1909 Canada imported from the United States 127,000 bushels of potatoes. We exported to the United States that year 578,000 bushels. In 1910 we imported from the United States 217,000 bushels, and we exported to the United States 679,000 bushels. In 1911 we imported from the United States 445,000 bushels, and we exported only 22,000 bushels. In 1912 we imported from the United States 335,000 bushels, and we exported to the United States only 27,000 bushels. In 1913 we imported 459,000 bushels, and we exported 152,000 bushels. These figures, of course, are for the fiscal year. In three of the five years I have named we imported more potatoes from the United States than we exported to the United States. For five years the total imports amounted to 1,585,000 bushels, and the total exports 1,459,000 bushels—we imported from the United States 126,000 bushels more than we exported to the United States. These are figures which hon. gentlemen cannot successfully controvert. The hon. gentleman says: What about the export of potatoes since the Underwood tariff came into effect? I find that our export of potatoes to the United States, according to the figures published by the United States Government Summary of Commerce and Finance of the United States, December, 1913, on page 526, was as follows: In 1911, 1,542,289 bushels, of a value of $858,574; in 1912, 12,408,798 bushels, of a value of $6,550,178.

Mr. CARVELL: I have a statement here from our Department of Customs which shows the figures for 1912 as about 1-25th of what the hon. gentleman has quoted. Our friends must be wrong somewhere.

Mr. EDWARDS: I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken in the reading of his figures.

Mr. CARVELL: I shall send the document over to my hon. friend. I want to put him right.

Mr. EDWARDS: I have not time to look into it now.

Mr. CARVELL: You had better look into it before you give figures to the country that are not true.

Mr. EDWARDS: If my hon. friend, the Lord Chesterfield of this House, will maintain his soul in patience—I am not making statements without fairly and honestly and squarely giving the authority for them.

Mr. CARVELL: But the authority is wrong.

Mr. EDWARDS: My authority is a document issued by the United States Government. Of course, the hon. gentleman, who pretends to know everything about everything, may know more about the United States Government's affairs and about its official figures than they do themselves, but I may be excused, Mr. Chairman, if I accept these official figures rather than the statement of the hon. member for Carleton, N.B.

Mr. CARVELL: Then, take the statement of our own Government. Will the hon. gentleman accept that?

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. gentleman has made his own statement and I am making mine. 'Hansard' will place one statement over against the other, and if he can produce as good authority for his statement as I am producing for mine, let the country judge between us.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is the year of the issue of that document?

Mr. EDWARDS: December, 1913. It is issued by the Department of Commerce, and I have quoted from page 526.

Mr. CARVELL: I want to be fair about this thing. Is not the hon. gentleman reading the total importations into the United States?

Mr. EDWARDS: I am giving the importations into the United States.

Mr. CARVELL: But I am talking about the exports from Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS: I thought the hon. gentleman was talking through his hat. I never made the statement from beginning to end of my quotation of these figures that these were the importations from Canada to the United States. If the hon. gentleman will pay attention probably he will avoid making such an exhibition of himself. The importations of 1912 were 12,408,798 bushels, valued at $6,550,000. In 1913 the total importations were 3,170,522 bushels, valued at $1,549,592. You will observe that notwithstanding the reduction of duty made by the Underwood tariff the importation of potatoes into the United States for the year ending 31st December, 1913, were only about one-quarter as great as in the preceding year. Analyse these figures a little further, as is done in this report, and you find that the im portations for October, November and December, 1913, that is, after the Underwood tariff came into force, were 1,864,421 i nthis report, and you find that the importations for the nine months preceding were 1,306,101, valued at $723,527. I call attention particularly to the value of these potatoes. Work it out, and you will find that the value of these imports after the Underwood tariff came into force with its reduction of duties, was 44.3 cents per bushel, while the value of the potatoes imported for the nine months before was on the average 55.4 cents per bushel. That might help out hon. gentlemen opposite in their argument if these values were values in the United States; but according to this document, these figures represent the values in New Brunswick or other countries from which these potatoes came. So, instead of the duty having the effect hon. gentlemen opposite say it would have, of enhancing the price of potatoes, according to these figures, it had the effect of reducing the value. I do not claim that it did have that effect, but I say that the figures show that when the duty was reduced, the price of potatoes in countries from which they were imported into the United States was lower than before that reduction of duty. Now, what is my argument in regard to that? Here I take issue with the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie). He made use of the peculiar argument—if it may be dignified with that name—that when the Canadian farmer sends potatoes into the United States he has to pay duty to get them into that market—the duty came out of the pocket of the Canadian producer. He also placed alongside of that, the statement that when we imported potatoes from the United States we in Canada paid the duty— so to say, we got it in the neck going and coming. Now, if that argument is good, that we have to pay the duty no matter which way it goes, what would be the object of the United States in changing the duty? The question involved is really the old question, who pays the the duty? My contention in regard to that I will illustrate in this way: If we import into Canada tea, for instance, and impose a duty of five cents per pound on it, I argue that the Canadian purchaser will have to pay five cents per pound more for his tea. Why? Because we do not produce tea in this country nor anything that comes into competition with tea. When a duty is imposed upon an article produced in large quantities in Canada and produced in other countries as well, then I say that the removal of that duty does not inure wholly to the benefit of the country taking the duty off. There must inevitably be a levelling of prices tending to a common price, and my contention is that in such cases the common price will approach most nearly to the price in that country where the surplus production is the greater. So I contend that hon. gentlemen, in arguing as they do very frequently that the price of an article is enhanced by the amount of the duty, show that they have not given the matter as much thought as they should.

That is not all. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Northumberland is as follows:

> That tariff item No. 83 be amended by adding thereto the following words: Provided, however, that potatoes dry, desiccated or otherwise prepared, being the growth and production of the United States, shall be admitted free of duty when, and as soon as, the United States removes the embargo regulations now existing against like articles, the growth and production of Canada.

Why this restriction to the United States? Why is the United States specially singled out? Why not remove the duty altogether and allow the potatoes of other countries to come in? I am not sure that I caught the hon. member correctly in his answer to the question put to him by the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham). I think he said he did not want European potatoes to come in.

Mr. CARVELL: It is always necessary to keep my hon. friend straight. I made no such statement. I said that it did not refer to European potatoes, but merely to potatoes coming from the United States.

Mr. EDWARDS: I think that is what I said. Would the hon. gentleman be willing to remove the duty on European potatoes?

Mr. CARVELL: Would you?

Mr. EDWARDS: No. Will my hon. friend be equally frank?

Mr. CARVELL: I am not on the rack to-night.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend, in dealing with this matter, professes to be absolutely free from all political bias; to have approached this subject with the utmost candor and frankness, but when I put to him frankly and honestly, a pertinent question with regard to this matter, he refuses to answer it; he says he is not on the rack. Why does he not answer the question? The hon. member for Carleton is afraid to say that he is in favour of the removal of duty on potatoes coming into Canada from Great Britain. Let the United States potatoes come in here, he says; but he does not say that he is in favour of letting potatoes come into Canada from England free of duty, because they produce potatoes in Europe very much cheaper than we can produce them here.

Mr. CARVELL: Let me give my hon. friend some information. Under our existing tariff laws, the proposed resolution, if carried, will allow potatoes to come into Canada from Great Britain free of duty, but not from Germany, France or Belgium.

Mr. EDWARDS: Why not from Germany? The hon. gentleman is on the rack again. Why not let potatoes come in from Germany, France and all these other countries? Will my hon. friend say that he is willing to allow potatoes to come into Canada free of duty from these countries?

Mr. CARVELL: No, I will not.

Mr. EDWARDS: Why? Because labour in these countries is cheaper than it is in Canada, and the hon. gentleman dare not place the farmers of New Brunswick in a position where they would have to compete with the growers of European countries. The hon. member is a partial advocate of free food; he does not want free food in his province to the extent of placing the New Brunswick potato-growers in competition with the growers of Germany, Russia and other continental countries, but in 1911 the hon. gentleman threw his hat in the air and shouted from one end of the country to the other that this is exactly what he did want. He said: open the doors and let potatoes come in here from these twelve favoured nations. What a change has come over the hon. gentleman since that time; how emphatic he is in declaring that he would not let potatoes come in free of duty from continental Europe. In 1911 he was nearly as emphatic in declaring that it was all right to let the surplus potatoes of these continental countries, amounting to an exportation of 12,000,000 bushels yearly, come into this country free of duty. Now the hon. gentleman is harping another tune. I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Dufferin is perhaps the true solution of the problem: the small and doubtful majority of eleven in the county of Carleton has caused the hon. gentleman to be a little more careful now than he was in 1911. But these utterances are not at all strange, coming from hon. gentlemen on the other side. They may be like the Hamilton policy of the right hon. leader of the Opposition—only a momentary digression.

The hon. member for Carleton, in all the time he talked to-night, established only one or two things. I am satisfied that he established that the province of New Brunswick can grow good potatoes. At the present time, however, diseased potatoes are going out of the province of New Brunswick and I would not be at all surprised to find that the majority of these come from the county of Carleton, N.B. Potatoes are not the only deleteriously affected things that come out of the county of Carleton. Did you follow, Mr. Chairman, the gyrations, the serpentine movements of the hon. member for Carleton when he was speaking about this embargo on potatoes and about the diseased potatoes that come from the province of New Brunswick? He was much annoyed when he was handed a chart showing the extent to which these potatoes are diseased. He first argued that the United States was justified in placing an embargo upon New Brunswick and Maine potatoes; then he said: I am not convinced that there is any disease in the potatoes of New Brunswick. That is a style of argument which, I am happy to say, is peculiar to the hon. member for Carleton; it does not obtain generally in this House, and it is well for our debates that it does not.

Certain parts of the province of New Brunswick are well adapted to the raising of potatoes; I agree with that. I agree with the hon. gentleman also in his assertion that the province of New Brunswick can grow more potatoes than it does at the present time. But I will not agree with him in his assertion that the United States furnishes a market for the potatoes of New Brunswick; nor will I agree with him in advocating the removal of the duty on potatoes coming into Canada from the United States. The hon. member for Dufferin was perfectly justified in taking the ground that the farmers of Ontario, of Quebec, and of the whole of Canada, have a perfect right to the high prices which prevail for a few days after the new potatoes first come in. It is utter nonsense, as every member in this House knows, for any man to say that we are entirely out of potatoes at any month in the year. Every-one knows that from one crop to the next our potatoes can be kept, and are kept, the year round. Suppose the farmer of Ontario, Quebec or New Brunswick specially prepares his ground with the intention of placing some potatoes on the market at the earliest possible moment. He goes to extra trouble to do that, and gets the potatoes on the market perhaps two weeks before the ordinary crop is available. Is he not entitled to the high prices which he obtains for those potatoes? Who pays that price? Is it the general consumer? Is it the workingman, the labourer, the artisan—the men on behalf of whom hon. gentlemen opposite are making such frantic appeals with regard to the lowering of the price of potatoes? Not at all. The people who pay that high and fancy price for potatoes for a week or ten days or two weeks are the rich people who are well able to pay it. It goes as a direct benefit into the pockets of the farmers who are entitled to that benefit.

The hon. member for Carleton, the hon. member from Prince Edward Island, the hon. member for Northumberland, and others on that side of the House, say that we should take this duty off and allow the Americans to come in and get these fancy prices for fruits, tomatoes, etc., and let the Canadian producer come at the tail end and take what is left. They will have a hard time in convincing the Canadian farmer that that is a fair deal for him. I maintain that in a country situated as Canada is there is only one just and fair way to deal with the farmer, and that is by means of a protective tariff. In the United States, in their large population, they have about 10,000,000 blacks. There are upwards of half a million of these negroes in the border states along lake Ontario and lake Erie. The majority of the coloured population is in the south, but those people form a very large element among the labouring classes of the United States. They work at a rate of wages which we do not want our labourers to work at in this country, and I say that in such a country as Canada, where our farmers have to spend large sums in providing barns and expensive buildings to house their stock, and where they have, for from four to six months of the year, simply to wait until the next season opens up, being under expense all the time, they are entitled in all fairness to a protective tariff which will place them somewhere on an equal footing with people who, through climatic conditions, have advantages which they do not possess. That is what I have always claimed in this House, and that is why, when I sat on that side of the House, I found fault with the former Government because in certain respects the protection to the farmer was not as high as it should be. I say the same thing to-day, and if it were in my power to make any change I would increase the duty on many articles that the farmers of Canada now produce. New Brunswick is entitled to protection as well as the farmers of the other provinces. If they can produce potatoes in Maine, as has been said, at the rate of 275 bushels to the acre, and if that state produces 23,000,000 bushels, it is manifest that New Brunswick cannot send potatoes there; but in case of a drouth, the New Brunswick market will undoubtedly be flooded with potatoes from the adjoining state.

The hon. member who moved this amendment would not agree to allow continental Europe to send potatoes here. Why? Because he and hon. members who spoke with him knew that these potatoes coming in here would be taken off the steamers first in the Maritime provinces if the price would suit them. Hon. gentlemen are not consistent; if they want to talk free round, if that is their policy, let them say so frankly and candidly; let them come out and advocate that policy. But they advocate one thing for one portion of the country, and something else for another portion, a duty here and free trade somewhere else. They have a haphazard sort of policy which appeals to no person because it is absolutely illogical. I do not want to take up the time of the committee any further, but I would ask hon. members not merely to consider the production of potatoes in the state of Maine or in those two or three states, but to look carefully at the American returns for each state. They will find then that potato-growing is not confined to one state, but is scattered all over the United States. Not only would it affect New Brunswick but it would affect, and in my judgment affect very injuriously, British Columbia, the prairie provinces and the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I wish to read a short statement to show the committee the authority on which I made my statements.

As I said, it is from the Department of Agriculture at Washington, and is made by authority of Mr. Dodge, who says:

> The leading potato-growing states of the country, those where the crop is at home and where it forms an important farm crop, are the two northern tiers of states east of the one hundredth meridian. Besides this region there are several states growing large quantities of potatoes, but not at all comparable with the district mentioned.
> There are several states along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts where potatoes are an important crop, but in those states they must be reckoned as truck crops in the majority of cases rather than as a general farm crop.
> The average yield for the past ten years shows that the production per acre in Maine is nearly twice that of any of the other nine states enumerated, though there does not seem to be sufficient difference in the climatic or other natural conditions to account for this wide variation.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend has mentioned Maine and nine other states. Why not give the names of those nine other states?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Certainly; New York, Maine, Michigan, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Minnesota and Nebraska. The hon. gentleman from Frontenac has stated that the production last year in the United States was 300,000,000 bushels.

Mr. EDWARDS: In 1912. For last year I gave 420,647,000 bushels.

Mr. HUGHES: That was very high.

Mr. EDWARDS: Considerably higher than 1911. In 1911 it was 292,000,000 bushels.

Mr. HUGHES: That would be an average of between three hundred and four hundred million bushels a year, or about three or three and one-half bushels per head of the population. Anybody who will think of the situation will see that the United States under those circumstances must be an importing country for potatoes, having only three to three and one-half bushels per head of the population. We have a much larger production in Canada. In Prince Edward Island, with a small production, we have over seventy bushels per head.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. gentleman will understand that when I say potatoes I am not including sweet potatoes.

Mr. HUGHES: I assumed that; but I am sure that does not amount to anything.

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes, it does.

Mr. HUGHES: Well, take that for what it is worth. The production is between three and four bushels per head of the population. It is below the consumption.

Mr. EDWARDS: What authority has my hon. friend for saying that the average consumption is more than the production?

Mr. HUGHES: Naturally, I would take that to be the case. Common sense would indicate that. Therefore, I say that that country would constitute the best market in the world for potatoes.

Mr. FOWLER: The hon. gentleman is following his own preference. He is no doubt a large consumer of potatoes, and therefore he claims that the people of the United States are in the same catagory as himself. The people in the southern states do not use the sort of potato that is referred to in the statistics given by my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), which referred to the kind of potato which is the favorite of the hon. member for Kings.

Mr. HUGHES: What is your particular favorite?

Mr. FOWLER: I, like my hon. friend, prefer the Irish potato. That is where my hon. friend gets wrong in his statistics.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not propose to refer to any of the rambling remarks about what they are doing in the United States per head and what they are not doing. I would like to hear from some of my Conservative friends from the province of New Brunswick as to how they feel on this question. But I would be particularly interested in hearing from the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) on the question of the embargo if he does not want to talk on the question of the duty. I have tried to convince this committee that this is an important matter to the people of the Maritime provinces. I do not think that there is any person but will admit that. We all have to admit it and we are face to face with an exceedingly serious condition of affairs. It is no use for members on this side of the House or on the other to stand up and make general speeches on the theory of protection or free trade in so far as the farmers are concerned. We are discussing now a concrete case. There is no use in the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) quoting figures of the total production of the United States or the importations from Europe or anything like that. We know in the Maritime provinces that the United States would offer a market for our potatoes if we could get them in there. Every farmer in New Brunswick knows that, every farmer in Prince Edward Island knows that, every farmer in the Maritime provinces, be he Liberal or Conservative, knows it. Every man, no matter how he voted in 1911, knows it. They all want to get that market and they all realize that we cannot get into that market on account of this embargo. I want to come down to the real question at issue.

Mr. W. T. WHITE: I understood my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) to say that the United States would be influenced to remove the embargo if American potatoes were admitted into Canada free.

Mr. CARVELL: I said I believed that might have something to do with it.

Mr. WHITE: Let me ask my hon. friend one other question. What is the value to the American potato raiser of free entry into the Canadian market?—because I understood my hon. friend to say that that would be of no advantage to him. If that be so, what is the value of the Canadian market to the United States on the strength of which they will be influenced to remove the existing embargo?

Mr. CARVELL: That is a fair question. In my judgment it amounted to nothing, but I think the American Government must have considered it as amounting to something or they would not have framed their tariff as they did. They refused free entry of Canadian potatoes into the United States because we would not allow free entry of American potatoes into Canada. Otherwise, they would not have left them at 10 per cent. They removed the duty as against other countries and let potatoes in free. The United States never could send a barrel of potatoes to any country in the world except Canada or Cuba. It would not be common sense to talk about sending potatoes from the United States to Europe; yet they have allowed European potatoes to come in free and they have imposed a duty of 10 per cent against Canadian potatoes, unless by our legislation we allow theirs to come in free of duty. I believe that this market does not amount to anything whatever to the United States producer because there is, in my judgment, not the least possibility of potatoes coming into Canada from the United States, although in the summer months when we do not produce them they come from the southern or central states, where they mature much earlier than ours do in Canada. I may be wrong in my conclusions, my arguments and my beliefs, but these are my conclusions, my arguments and my beliefs.

Now, I want to come back to the Minister of Agriculture. I have tried in the course of this argument to treat him fairly and any man except some of the backbenchers who heard what I said to the minister will admit that I treated him fairly. I have given him credit for sincerely trying to meet the situation. I believe the minister is honestly and earnestly trying to see a way out. I give him great credit for sending out this statement which we have had placed in our hands to-day with reference to the potato disease. I think it is going to be of great benefit to the potato raisers of Canada. I want to give the minister full credit for the attention which he has tried to give to this great question. But I think this committee is entitled to a statement from the minister as to what the condition is, as to what has been done and as to what, in his opinion, can be done. Possibly he cannot agree with me in my idea of the remedy, but I do think the committee is entitled to some information from the minister on the situation as it exists to-day.

Mr. EDWARDS: In this publication which I hold in my hands, at page 603, are given the prices or values of potatoes, amongst other things, for each month, beginning with the month of December, 1912, and carrying it on through the year 1913. First, I will give the import prices on this side of the line. They are as follows:

1912—December	$1.25	per bushel.
1913—January	1.29	"
February	1.07	"
March	1.21	"
April	1.35	"
May	0.75	"
June	0.42	"
July	0.81	"
August	0.74	"
September	0.69	"
October	0.43	"
November	0.45	"
December	0.45	"

The prices for the same months on the other side of the line are as follows:

1912—December	0.74	per bushel.
1913—January	0.82	"
February	0.82	"
March	0.77	"
April	0.78	"
May	0.76	"
June	0.85	"
July	0.77	"
August	0.80	"
September	0.77	"
October	0.80	"
November	0.80	"
December	0.80	"

The figures for the month of December, 1912, and for these months in 1913, again indicate an enormous fluctuation in the prices of potatoes, not only in the different months, but in the different years. There is nothing so quickly affected by production as the price of potatoes.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queens, P.E.I.): For fear a wrong impression should go abroad with reference to the action taken by the Department of Agriculture in regard to potato diseases, I wish to inform the House that in Prince Edward Island, in 1912, and again in 1913, there were two officials of the department travelling from house to house conducting investigations into this potato disease. Last year it was the intention of the Government to place a laboratory in the province, and to put in charge a bacteriologist of repute, but owing to some mishap he was unable to go there. However, I understand that this year the Government have secured the services of an official competent to take this matter in charge, and that the investigation will be further prosecuted in Prince Edward Island. I may say also that the provincial Department of Agriculture is acting in accord with the Dominion Department of Agriculture, and good work is being done. Rapid strides are being made in agriculture in Prince Edward Island, as the hon. member for Kings (Mr. J. J. Hughes) knows. Had that hon. gentleman made inquiries at the department in Ottawa or at the department in Charlottetown, he would have found that these investigations were going on. I presume it is as a result of this investigation by the Department of Agriculture that this very interesting document, which we have received, has been issued. There is no doubt, as the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) has said, it is a move in the right direction, and one which probably should have been taken years ago, because it is well known that disease has existed in Canadian potatoes for many years.

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, no.

Mr. McLEAN: That is a fact. The nature of the disease was not known, but that disease existed there can be no doubt. Canker did not exist in Canada and does not exist to-day, but powdery scab has existed in this country, and so long as no action is taken by the farmers themselves it will spread. It is up to the farmers whether they will let this disease spread or not.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: It is a very serious statement for the hon. gentleman to make that potato disease has existed in Canada for years.

Mr. McLEAN: I know what I am talking about.

Mr. HUGHES: On what authority does the hon. gentleman make that statement?

Mr. McLEAN: I make the statement because I know it is a fact. It is a fact that there is potato disease in Canada to-day, and the hon. member for Carleton admitted, that by reason of that disease in his own province there was an embargo placed on potatoes going into the United States.

Mr. CARVELL: I must put the hon. member right there. I was careful not to make any such statement. I said the United States Government claimed that, and claimed to have evidence of the fact, but I do not know whether that evidence is well-founded or not. I do not admit it and I said that I had grave doubt that disease did exist. I do not want my hon. friend (Mr. A. A. McLean) to put words in my mouth that I did not use. I do not believe that powdery scab existed up to two years ago, even if it exists now. If the Minister of Agriculture wants to give certain information he can give it, but it would perhaps not be wise to give all the facts in connection with the introduction of this powdery scab into Canada, if it be in Canada at all.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Carvell) cannot help admitting that he said that the United States Government were justified in placing an embargo on Canadian potatoes.

Mr. CARVELL: There again, my hon. friend is misquoting me. I said the United States Government probably believed that they were justified.

Mr. McLEAN: That is a qualification that the hon. gentleman makes now.

Mr. CARVELL: No it is not.

Mr. McLEAN: We all heard what the hon. gentleman said; we all heard him make the broad, plain statement that the United States Government were justified in putting an embargo on Canadian potatoes.

Mr. CARVELL: No, I did not. This is a matter of too much importance to let pass. I protest against the hon. gentleman attributing to me any such statement as that. I do not want him to repeat it again, because it is not true and he knows it is not true.

Mr. McLEAN: The same statement was made by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) did not deny it.

Mr. CARVELL: I make it a practice in this House to not pay any attention whatever to anything said by the hon. member for Frontenac.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. gentleman has found it in his interest not to do so in the past.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not put my hon friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. A. A. McLean) in the same category with the hon. member for Frontenac, and therefore when he makes a statement that is not in accordance with the facts I must call him to order.

Mr. MORPHY: Before six o'clock I addressed a question to the hon. member for Carleton to this effect: Does the hon. gentleman believe that the United States in putting an embargo against Canadian potatoes, were fair? and the hon. member for Carleton said: 'Yes.'

Mr. CARVELL: Certainly I did; that is a correct statement.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: I have no doubt that when we get 'Hansard' to-morrow, we shall find that the statement I have made is correct.

Mr. CARVELL: I want my hon. friend to withdraw that statement, because it is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. McLEAN: I certainly make the statement that when 'Hansard' is published to-morrow, it will be seen whether I am right or whether the hon. member for Carleton is right.

Mr. CARVELL: I ask my hon. friend to withdraw that statement.

The CHAIRMAN: If a statement attributed to another member is denied by him, the word of the hon. member must be accepted.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. McLEAN: The hon. member for Carleton denies that he made that statement, and I suppose I must bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and withdraw my statement. But, notwithstanding, the statement I made was that 'Hansard' would show which one of us was right.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. CARVELL: That is good enough; go on now.

Mr. McLEAN: The hon. gentleman said further that he believed that probably scab existed in the state of Maine, and that the United States Government had appointed a commission to investigate the matter, and inspectors to inspect the potatoes shipped from that state. He said further, that if potatoes in Maine were found affected with scab, they were not allowed to be used for seed. There is no doubt that the hon. member for Carleton made the statement that the Maine potatoes were affected with powdery scab or some other infectious disease, because otherwise the United States Government, in whom he places great reliance in matters of this kind, would not have put an embargo on shipments of Maine potatoes for use as seed. We have this condition of affairs—an embargo put upon potatoes in the state of Maine and an embargo put upon potatoes from New Brunswick, or for that matter from the whole of Canada. It is the duty of the Government to investigate this matter, and I want to tell the hon. member for Kings (Mr. J. J. Hughes) that the Government has been investigating it for the last three or four years, that this investigation has been widespread, and that the Government is to-day in possession of very important information on the subject, which I have no doubt the Minister of Agriculture will give to the House.

I am not making a statement concerning things about which I know nothing. It is of so much importance to the people of my province that, no matter what it costs, the Government should take the matter up and investigate it properly. We were in the habit of selling our potatoes in the United States where we got very good prices for them. Sometimes we got a higher price than at other times. Sometimes prices in Boston were higher than in New York and sometimes higher in St. John than in Boston. So far as Prince Edward Island was concerned, we had a home market at Sydney, Stellarton and other mining towns of the Maritime provinces. New Brunswick was not in a position to produce enough potatoes to supply the markets of Nova Scotia. Sometimes the people of that province were not in a position to supply more potatoes than they could use themselves. Although New Brunswick is a large province, it has only about 40,000 acres under potatoes, which is a very small acreage in comparison with the acreage under potatoes in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. CARVELL: Would my hon. friend tell me how long ago it was that New Brunswick was not in a position to supply more potatoes than it used itself?

Mr. McLEAN: In 1911.

Mr. CARVELL: In 1911 we shipped half a million barrels of potatoes from my own county alone.

Mr. McLEAN: How was it, then, that potatoes came from the state of Maine to New Brunswick, and were sold in competition with potatoes of New Brunswick?

Mr. CARVELL: They did not come into the province of New Brunswick in 1911, and we have the records to show it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. HENDERSON: Take it back.

Mr. CARVELL: Nothing is accomplished by this.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Queens, Prince Edward Island, has the floor. The hon. member for Carleton knows that he has no right to interrupt.

Mr. McLEAN: I do not suppose there is any gentleman who knows so much or who presumes to know so much as the hon. member for Carleton, but I think other hon. members have a right to give utterance to their views on questions under discussion. The hon. member for Carleton should not assume all the rights of every member or even of the members of his own party.

Mr. CARVELL: When my hon. friend is wrong—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CARVELL: When my hon. friend is wrong, I am going to put him right; make no mistake about that. I think my hon. friend and I get along very well. I presume that he wants to be fair. I have here a statement from the Customs Department of the imports and exports of potatoes for the last two years. My hon. friend can get these, and be absolutely accurate in his statements. Instead of importing potatoes into New Brunswick in 1911, from my own county alone we exported close to half a million barrels, and the whole province of New Brunswick must have exported three-quarters of a million barrels in that year.

Mr. McLEAN: I have no doubt that, in his own mind, my hon. friend always thinks he is right, and he will not concede to any other hon. member the privilege of being right.

Mr. CARVELL: Not when he is wrong.

Mr. McLEAN: According to the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., anything that any hon. member on this side of the House states is wrong; everything that he thinks is evil. It is very unfair to hon. members on this side of the House to be treated in that way by my hon. friend. He ought to make this concession, that every one of us is actuated with good intentions. We are here, not for party purposes; we are here, not for the best interest of Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick or Nova Scotia or Ontario or Quebec; we are here for the best interest of the whole of Canada. When my hon. friend takes upon himself to say, as he has in effect said, that the whole politics of this country should be guided by the quantity of potatoes going into the county of Carleton, I think he goes far afield. He should, as was done in the case of agricultural implements upon which the duty was reduced, concede something to the manufacturers. He has conceded nothing to them. According to him, they should be turned down from one end of the country to the other. What would be the effect in the Maritime provinces to-day if the Nova Scotia Steel Works, the Dominion Steel Works, and the other great industries of that province were turned down, as would be the desire of the hon. member? Where would the markets be for the products of the farmer? There would be none. Since these manufactures have been established in the Maritime provinces under the tariff which we have now, the tariff of 1879, the farmers have become wealthy. To-day the farmers of Prince Edward Island, as a class, are the wealthiest people in Canada. We have the smallest province with the smallest population, but there is not another body of 95,000 people who have the same wealth as we have. The people of Prince Edward Island are all farmers, and have made their money through the farming industry —through selling potatoes, cheese and the other products of the farm. My hon. friends opposite want to take away the protection that the farmers have, the 20 per cent on potatoes, and allow the potatoes of their friends in Maine to come in and undersell our potatoes. Why did they not take that ground when the Laurier Administration increased the tariff on potatoes? Since 1896 the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Hughes) says that conditions have changed. Where is the change in conditions since the tariff on potatoes was increased from 15 cents to 20 cents? There is no change so far as I can see, and I venture to say there is not an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who can show that there is any change in conditions to-day.

Mr. LOGGIE: Might I ask the hon. gentleman a question? He wants to know what the change is, and why this resolution should not have been made prior to the present date? A very good answer is that the United States Government until last October had a duty of 25 cents a bushel against Canadian potatoes. Now they make the duty 10 per cent on condition that if we allow their potatoes in free, then, ipso facto, our potatoes go into the United States free.

Mr. McLEAN: And the hon. member for Kings, P.E.I., and the hon. member for Carleton boast that the state of Maine, the state adjoining the province of New Brunswick, raised last year 18,000,000 bushels of potatoes; and you want the farmers of the state of Maine to come in and undersell our farmers. There is no doubt that is what you want. What change has taken place in the conditions? The only change is that we have a better market to-day than we had when the duty on potatoes was raised from 15 cents to 20 cents, by reason of the great industries that have been established and the increasing population which has come into the industrial centres, composed not of men engaged in agriculture, but of men engaged in manufacturing. I wished particularly to make reference to the statement made by the hon. member for Kings that nothing was being done by the Department of Agriculture with reference to this matter. You see, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is now in Opposition and does not know what is going on. It is just as well that he should be made acquainted with the facts.

[Mr. A. A. McLean.]

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture): The House has probably learned more about potatoes last evening and to-day than ever before in the history of Parliament, and I should be loth to burden the patience of the House by discussing at much greater length questions relating to that useful vegetable. There are one or two things however to which I wish to refer briefly and also to make a statement as to the position of the department on some matters that have been touched upon. In the first place, I can hardly see how in any case, a member on this side of the House understanding the nature of resolutions and what they mean can possibly vote for so extraordinary a resolution as that moved by the hon. member for Northumberland, as follows:

> That resolution 3, schedule 'A,' be amended by adding after 79a, the following:
> That tariff item No. 83 be amended by adding thereto the following words: Provided, however, that potatoes dry, desiccated or otherwise prepared, being the growth and production of the United States and shall be admitted free of duty when, and as soon as, the United States removes the embargo regulations now existing against like articles, the growth and production of Canada.

I do not know what unhappy confusion of thought exists in the hon. gentleman's mind that may have induced him to frame his resolution in these words. It means, if it means anything that the United States are absolutely insincere in putting on that embargo. It is perfectly true—and this rather conflicts with the statement of the hon. member for Carleton—that it has been urged, and urged not without some reason, that powerful commercial interests were at work in inducing the United States to put that embargo on. I am not making the statement, but I say it has been urged, and urged with some force. But my hon. friend who is so courteous to the United States and complains that we on this side are trying to establish unfriendly instead of friendly relations is dealing them the most unkindest cut of all when he says that they put on the embargo for reasons of this kind. If his resolution does not mean that it means nothing, for it in effect declares that we should have a reduction of duty against the United States in return for the wiping out of the restriction against disease. I should find it, therefore, impossible, whatever my opinion on the duty question, to vote for a resolution so unsound. Speaking as a member

10 p.m. of this side and a member of the Government, I would certainly not vote for a resolution that would have the effect of wiping out the duty on an article produced so widely in our own country. I am not going to labour that point. In passing I might point out that my hon. friends opposite, especially those from the West, have a favourite way of stating the effect of duties on our products sent to the United States by saying that they pay the duty, but when an article is imported from the United States, they assume that they pay that duty also; but you cannot have it both going and coming. But, assume for the sake of the argument that the producer pays the duty on the potatoes exported from Canada to the United States, yet that duty is only ten per cent, and the price, if I remember the figures given by the hon. member for Carleton only forty cents per bushel, so that it would only amount to four cents per bushel. In order to wipe out a duty of four cents per bushel on our potatoes going to the United States, which it is not clear that the Canadian producer pays, the hon. gentleman is willing to abolish the twenty cents per bushel on potatoes coming into Canada which would be a hardship—

Mr. CARVELL: Forty cents per bushel is the average price under present conditions and has been for years past. But if the American market were free to us, it would be greater than that, and so it would mean the saving of I should think, five cents per bushel.

Mr. BURRELL: The difference is only one cent, and I will not dispute about that. But I am bound to say, with my limited knowledge—or perhaps a little more than limited knowledge—of the farming community of Canada as a whole, though perhaps New Brunswick is in a peculiar position with regard to the United States market, the farmers of Canada, and especially those of my own province, would oppose and strongly condemn me if I advocated the removal of the duty of 20 per cent per bushel on potatoes. I do not wish to go into the question of duty, but merely wish to say that I would vote against the resolution for this reason as well as for the other that I pointed out.

Now, I desire to say a few words in regard to another feature of the discussion which occupied a good deal of time, namely, the question of the embargo and the potato disease, which led up to the embargo. As members of the House know, the disease in question is a fungous disease, propagating once a year by spores, as all fungus growths do. We have lately heard much about two serious diseases. One of these diseases is potato canker or black canker of the potato. In 1910, the late Government issued an order prohibiting entirely the importation of potatoes from Newfoundland and from St. Pierre-Miquelon, for reasons that in those countries they had this canker, which was considered of a dangerous kind. In September, 1912, we got information that canker was very prevalent in certain parts of Europe, and that they were having great difficulty, especially in Great Britain, where they were quarantining large areas. After careful consideration, this Government issued an Order in Council prohibiting the importation of potatoes from Great Britain and from nearly all countries in Europe. This was followed shortly afterwards by action on the part of the United States of a similar kind, placing an absolute embargo on European countries for potato canker, which was admittedly a very serious disease. After we had done that, we thought it wise, as there had been some importations into Canada—very few; not nearly so great importations as had been made into the United States before the embargo was put on; I think there was a lot of 300,000 bushels arriving in Boston from Europe—to bring to the attention of the the farmers in this country, and so we issued a circular from our department and a coloured poster along the line of, and a little smaller than, the one shown here today. This led to potatoes supposedly affected with canker, or some other disease, being sent from all parts of the country to our Dominion botanist. We detected the existence of powdery scab in various parts of the country, perhaps most heavily in Kamouraska, Quebec. Perhaps I should not name these places, as it does not help to have the places talked about, but, on the other hand, it is often well to give these matters publicity with a view to remedy, so on the whole it is probably better to state all the circumstances. This disease, powdery scab, was found very slightly in Nova Scotia; a good many cases—about fifteen I think at that time—in New Brunswick; and in Prince Edward Island, in a considerably greater number. I was rather astonished to hear the hon. member for Kings, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Hughes) —and he will correct me if I am wrong—make in this House the extraordinary statement, the making of which, I think, shows that he is not familiar with farming problems and is not following attentively the progress of farming in Prince Edward Island—that no powdery scab existed in Prince Edward Island, nor any other disease. He stated that the American Consul, who, I suppose, is not considered a great authority on plant pathology, had made the statement that there was no powdery scab. And the hon. gentleman was surprised that the Government—I presumed he referred to the Prince Edward Island Government—did not at once confirm this statement.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I read from a paper published in Charlottetown, a statement to the effect that the American Consul had reported to his Government that there was no disease in the Prince Edward Island potatoes against which the United States were providing an embargo,—that the diseases were simply dry rot and wet rot. I did not vouch for that statement. I read the statement in a paper published in Charlottetown that the American Consul had made that report to his Government; I did not vouch for its authenticity at all.

Mr. BURRELL: I may have been wrong in assuming that my hon. friend endorsed that position, but I thought my hon. friend's argument led to the view that Prince Edward Island was free from this disease. I am surprised that the statement was made, and still more surprised that the hon. gentleman did not verify it before he cast blame upon the provincial Government for not backing up the statement of the American Consul, who evidently was not fully conversant with the subject. My hon. friend would only have to look up the annual report of the Dominion botanist to find where the disease existed and where it did not. While it is true that the distribution of the disease is rather widespread in Prince Edward Island, the infestation itself is comparatively slight. After we found out these things, we obtained the services of expert men—qualified plant pathologists who pay special attention to potato diseases—and sent them to Prince Edward Island and other points to examine carefully into the conditions so that we could take steps to educate the people to look after these things and to report if the existence of any of these diseases was discovered. I have given to this matter a great deal of attention, and I have never yet been convinced and never have seen reason to convince me that the powdery scab is of as malignant a character as the potato canker, which probably justified the embargo against Europe and other countries where it existed. The spores of the canker remain dormant under ground for eight years, always ready, when potatoes are planted, to take active life and propagate the disease. While a similar state of things may exist in a smaller degree with regard to powdery scab, the methods of combating it are attended with greater success, and I am bound to say that I cannot regard powdery scab as being in the same category as the potato canker. In the fall of 1913 reports appeared in the press to the effect that the United States was contemplating taking action against Canada in the way of prohibiting the entry of her potatoes. I would like to refer for a moment to the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton. I shall not criticise what he said; I appreciate the kindly references he made to myself and to the efforts of the department in this regard, but I do gather that he thought that the Minister of Agriculture or the department was slow in taking the initial steps and that a much better arrangement could have been made at Washington if we had moved more quickly at the beginning. I know that my hon. friend does not want to be unfair, and I want to put him right on that matter. I received a wire from the hon. gentleman on November 26, and I think he will recall the fact that I wired him the following day assuring him that this matter had been under the consideration of the department and that we were giving it every possible attention. His letter arrived during the week; on account of the reports which were appearing in the press, I had quite a number of letters and telegrams from New Brunswick and elsewhere along the same line. Prior to that time we had unofficial knowledge of the matter through correspondence between the experts of our department and the experts of the United States department, and in the weekly news letter of the United States Department of Agriculture we had previously seen a paragraph, which was, in a sense, official, intimating that the question whether the United States should take action against Canada in the way of embargo was to be discussed. I had a memorandum prepared with regard to the matter before it was brought to my attention by our various friends and by the hon. member for Carleton. We gave the matter further consideration and within a day or two of that time we took it up through the ambassador at Washington. I ought to point out that we were not neglectful of the interests of Canada, or of New Brunswick potato shippers, because we knew very well that under the terms of the Federal Quarantine Act the United States could not take action of that kind without giving us an opportunity to be heard; consequently we did not feel any particular alarm that they would immediately put on an embargo without giving us an opportunity for consultation. But, to make assurance doubly sure, we took the matter up with the ambassador at Washington. We pointed out that we did not consider that this disease was sufficiently serious to warrant the action which had been reported by the press as likely to be taken by the United States, and that if such action were seriously contemplated by the United States we trusted that they would give us ample opportunity to prepare a case and to appear before them, either through the embassy at Washington or personally, to make arrangements with regard to the whole matter. This was done. As my hon. friend knows, we went to Washington; a conference was held on December 18 and the whole matter was gone into very thoroughly.

The hon. member for Carleton said something about Mr. Gussow, the Dominion botanist and plant pathologist. I understood him to say that while he did not criticise Mr. Gussow's technical qualifications, he did not think that he was very practical. I may say in passing that Mr. Gussow's knowledge of plant diseases is looked upon with a great deal of respect by leading experts in the United States. In matters of this kind, therefore, we shall have to rest assured that Canada is being well represented so far as her export knowledge goes.

Mr. BLAIN: When was Mr. Gussow appointed?

Mr. BURRELL: He was appointed by my predecessor and is, I believe, a well qualified official. We are giving him every opportunity to carry on his work in a larger and more extended way in the future. At that conference business interests were represented; there were present congressmen and representatives from various states interested in potato growing. A large number of petitions were received from persons representing the interests of what we may call the commercial side of the potato industry. Although they would admit nothing in the way of infestation in their own country except an isolated case or two, it was pointed out at that conference by Mr. Gussow that we had knowledge of the fact that powdery scab did exist in Maine, Massachussets, Nebraska and Winconsin. I am not saying anything unfriendly, but it is not unfair to say that the proceedings at the conference were somewhat pro forma, and it was evident from what took place that the officials of the United States Department of Agriculture had made up their minds that an embargo of this kind would be placed upon Canadian potatoes. On December 22 they issued an order which took effect December 24, practically putting an embargo on our potatoes. Theoretically it was not, perhaps, an absolute embargo, inasmuch as they provided for the admission of our potatoes under certain restrictions.

But that is only another way of making an embargo, because the restrictions were such that it was impossible, in a practical commercial way, to ship potatoes into the country. Two of the conditions imposed were that there should be adequate field inspection, and also an adequate, clearly-defined location of infested areas. Hon. gentlemen who know anything about this matter can easily see that in December, when the crop was all harvested, some of it in the cellar and some in the hands of wholesalers, it would be quite impossible to make an adequate field inspection that year or to make a definition of infested areas that could possibly satisfy the United States authorities. That is why we regarded that as an embargo.

Mr. CARVELL: From any information which the minister may have from Washington, can he say if adequate inspection would mean inspection by United States officers or would they accept the inspection of Canadian officers?

Mr. BURRELL: They would require that inspection by our federal officers, Canadian officers, and it would have been impossible to carry that out. We have had many representations from New Brunswick and elsewhere, and some correspondence inviting us strongly to retaliate and put an embargo against the United States; others suggesting that we define the area. The more we looked into it the more difficult it seemed to deal with this particular condition of affairs. I did not think that because we believed another nation had made a mistake in putting on such severe restrictions, we would have been justified in adopting similar action, and so we did not retaliate. Early this year the United States authorities had to admit, because the evidence was multiplied, that there was a very widespread infestation in the state of Maine. I must point out that until then they had made no restriction in the United States; although they must have known, and we pointed out to them, that they had the disease in various portions of that country. United States officers have practically admitted that they had made nothing like the investigations into this matter that we had made, and I wish to add as a compliment to our own Dominion botanist that the poster got out a year and a half ago in reference to potato canker has been used and copied, and our other publications have been copied and published in the United States, and they have formed no unimportant part in the United States work against potato diseases. I think that is a good tribute to Canadian energy in facing these things. As I said, the United States until lately had imposed no restrictions, but they put a restriction against the state of Maine. Then there came this question: they restricted the state of Maine to this extent that they prohibited Maine shippers sending potatoes into other portions of the United States except they had a certificate of freedom from disease from officers in Maine; but the restrictions imposed upon the state of Maine were nothing like so onerous and severe as those imposed against Canada in the regulations published in order No. 11 of December 18. So we again, quite recently, have taken the matter up with the Embassy at Washington, and the Embassy, at our request, have made strong representations to the Department of Agriculture at Washington that they should give us just the same treatment in Canada that they are giving to Maine in regard to shipments into other states. We have not had any answer to that. I am not aware whether they will do it. I am not now criticising them except that I do say that they should, logically and fairly, give us as fair treatment in Canada as they gave their own state when they quarantined it for the same disease. While this matter was under discussion an international conference to deal with the whole question of plant diseases was called to meet in Rome. Mr. Gussow represented Canada. The United States was invited to be present, and it was understood that the head of their board for dealing with these diseases would attend; but unfortunately and unhappily the United States was not represented at that conference at all. The French Government proposed a resolution that all vegetation and grain should be required to carry certificates of freedom from disease before being allowed to go from nation to nation. This, however, was woted down. The question of the preparation of a definite list of quarantinable diseases was discussed. So far as the powdery scab was concerned, each nation was left to deal with it as it wished. We have fairly good evidence in the department that powdery scab has been in Canada for six or seven years, and possibly before that. I think we are justified in assuming it has been in the United States a great deal longer than that. We have got it from them, or they from us, or we may both have got it from Europe. We undoubtedly have not hitherto considered the powdery scab as the same malignant and sinister character as potato canker. I am not minimizing the fact that it is a serious disease and that farmers should use every method to stamp it out, and I am also strongly of the opinion that the federal and provincial Governments should do everything that can be done to aid the farmer and to bring about a wholesale co-operation between the people and the Governments resulting in stamping out powdery scab. As far as this Government is concerned, we are going to give every possible assistance.

The question of the regulations of the embargo must necessarily be left now for a time until we begin to deal with another crop. I notice the United States are putting on a further quarantine which does not take place until next August, so we will in the meantime have opportunity to consider the whole matter. In the meantime, this year we can only do our best by carrying on a campaign of education. We have added a number of men to our staff for temporary purposes. It is difficult to get good men, skilled in this work. We have engaged the services of Professor Adams, of the Science College of Dublin, who has made a specialty of potato diseases. He has entered the Canadian service, and will be put in charge of a lot of this work. We intend to try to educate the people to plant nothing but clean seed, to use fresh ground and to take every step possible to help us stamp out the disease, and I think it can be stamped out.

Something has been said about the publication distributed to the members of this House. I am not saying this in any spirit of boasting, as the entire publication has been prepared in the department, but I believe that publication is a credit to the Dominion of Canada. I do not believe that there has been another publication of the kind on the continent as good and as thoroughly reliable and lifelike in regard to illustration or more helpful in respect to methods of eradication of the disease.

That pamphlet cost the department about $3,000. I think it is money well spent. If it is necessary to spend more I think it will be well spent. We have now 165,000 copies of it, 125,000 in English and 40,000 in French, which we intend to have widely distributed. I venture to say that our friends in the United States will take particular interest in it and will try and copy our action in that respect.

I can only express my apologies for taking up so much of the time of the committee. The country may rest assured that in so far as this matter is concerned, the Department of Agriculture and the Government will take every step that can be taken in co-operation with everybody concerned to stamp out the disease.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Would the minister indicate the steps that can be taken by the farmers in planting their seed in order to take precautions against the disease? Can the seed be soaked?

Mr. BURRELL: No, that matter is all covered by the directions in the pamphlet. With regard to several of these diseases, including this one, you can do nothing in the way of soaking seed or treatment of any kind. The only method of value is to plant clean seed. You must not only not take seed from a crop that may seem to be sound, but you must take seed from a crop that has never had the disease and plant it in soil where diseased crops have never been grown. My hon. friend will find that the pamphlet is very full and explicit. The information is packed into small compass, but it will give immense help to potato growers, and in addition the services of our officers will be at the disposal of anybody in the country who wants to make use of them.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I was very much pleased to hear the remarks of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell), and especially was I pleased when he spoke of the efforts that the Government were making to induce the Government of the United States to place no more stringent regulations upon the importation of potatoes from Canada than they were putting on potatoes from the state of Maine. That was especially gratifying to me, because it shows clearly that, in the opinion of the minister and the Government, they value highly the market of the United States for Canadian potatoes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HUGHES: No better argument could be used. Why, if they did not value that market, were such efforts put forth to get the regulations against this country made no stricter than against the state of Maine? No better argument could be used in favour of the value of that market and no stronger one could be advanced in favour of the reduction of the duty on potatoes into this country in order to obtain free access to the American market.

Mr. W. T. WHITE: We are in committee and I avail myself of the privilege of speaking twice. I am the more inclined to this course because otherwise I might appear to be somewhat discourteous to my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Loggie). I am sure he will acquit me of any intention of that character. When I expressed the desire between twelve and one o'clock last night that the debate should be concluded, if possible, before the House rose, I had no idea that so many gentlemen intended to take part in this discussion, and that it would range over so large a field. Otherwise, of course, I should have been more than willing that the House should have adjourned and that the debate should have been continued to-day. The hon. member for Northumberland has offered an amendment, and in order that we may see precisely what we are debating, I propose to read the resolution which is offered for the consideration of the committee:

That tariff item No. 83 be amended by adding thereto the following words: Provided, however, that potatoes dry, desiccated or otherwise prepared, being the growth and production of the United States, shall be admitted free of duty when, and as soon as, the United States removes the embargo regulations now existing against like articles, the growth and production of Canada.

My hon. friend is evidently of the view that if this resolution were adopted and the tariff change which he has in mind made, the potatoes mentioned in the tariff item would be admitted free from the United States only, and that by reason of their free admission into this country Canada would become entitled to the benefits of the countervailing provisions of the Underwood tariff and that our potatoes would be given free access to the markets of the United States. I think that is a fair deduction from the wording of the resolution. I would point out to my hon. friend certain consequences that would flow if this tariff change were made. In the first place, we would have to admit free potatoes from the United States and from all the Britsh colonies and British possessions.

Mr. LOGGIE: I understood that.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend says that he understood that. I notice that he did not emphasize it. My hon. friend knows also that there are certain nations which are accorded most favoured nation treatment under the tariff laws of Canada.

Mr. LOGGIE: That is right.

Mr. WHITE: Among these are the Argentine republic, Austria-Hungary, Denmark, Japan, Norway, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland and Venezuela. In passing, I must express my surprise that such a good free trader as we have always understood the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) to be, should take exception to potatoes coming into Canada from Germany. I understood my hon. friend to be reluctant to admit that he should like to see potatoes coming into Canada from Germany.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend understood me absolutely correctly. I do not want to see them coming from Germany, because I do not think Germany has ever given us fair treatment and because German potatoes are diseased.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend says the reason is because they are diseased.

Mr. CARVELL: This would not bring them from Germany.

Mr. WHITE: Is it a fact that my hon. friend is objecting that cheaper potatoes would come into Canada from Germany, or some other nation, and break the price in Canada?

Mr. CARVELL: No.

[Mr. W. T. White.]

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend puts it entirely on the ground of disease.

Mr. NESBITT: I would like to ask the minister if Germany admits our potatoes free.

Mr. WHITE: I am unable, offhand, to answer that question.

Mr. CARVELL: I can tell you: They do not.

Mr. WHITE: Surely a good free trader who is in favour of free food could not by any possibility object to Canada buying cheaper potatoes, whether they come from Germany or any other country.

Mr. NESBITT: Purely for information, may I ask the minister if an effort was not made some years ago to have the most favoured nation clauses cancelled?

Mr. WHITE: I am coming to that in a moment. No less a personage than the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved a resolution in the Imperial conference having as its object the denunciation of those treaties.

Mr. CARVELL: And that was passed.

Mr. WHITE: Passed by the Imperial Conference.

Mr. CARVELL: And they agreed to cancel them whenever Canada wanted them cancelled.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend from Carleton was evidently of the view, or he gave the committee the view, that the United States Congress had made these countervailing provisions in respect to potatoes having in mind especially Canada

Mr. CARVELL: I thought so.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend surely does not argue that the provisions of the Underwood tariff are limited to Canada? I have those provisions here, and I will read them to my hon. friend. I quote from the free list of the Underwood tariff:

> Potatoes, and potatoes dried, desiccated, or otherwise prepared, not specially provided for in this section: Provided, that any of the foregoing specified articles shall be subject to a duty of ten per cent ad valorem when imported directly or indirectly from a country, dependency, or other subdivision of government, which imposes a duty on such articles imported from the United States.

Therefore the legislation is general to those countries which will admit potatoes the product of the United States free. The United States will extend the same privilege to them. That is the effect of this provision of the Underwood tariff.

I listened with as much interest and attention as to anything in the House, to the recital of my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) as to what was done by the Maine farmers as soon as the Underwood tariff reduced the duty upon potatoes to ten per cent. ad valorem. I may say that under the Canadian tariff the duty upon potatoes is twenty cents a bushel, and that previously to the introduction of the Underwood tariff the duty upon potatoes in the United States was twenty-five cents a bushel. By the Underwood tariff the duty upon potatoes was reduced to ten per cent ad valorem, which is the rate to-day. The recital of my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) was most graphic and illuminating, and I could not help but reflect upon the strange irony of political circumstances. I have not the slightest doubt—and I am not going to hark back to the reciprocity agreement—that my hon. friend went upon the platforms of New Brunswick and, powerful debater as he is, set forth to the people the advantages of the reciprocity agreement, under which Canadian potatoes would be admitted free to the markets of the United States. Mark you, at that time the duty on potatoes entering the United States from Canada was twenty-five cents a bushel, and my hon. friend naturally concluded that if that duty of twenty-five cents a bushel were removed, the potatoes of his native province would gain free access to the markets of the United States. Let us see what happened.

Following on the enactment of the Underwood tariff which did not abolish the duty but reduced it to ten per cent ad valorem, the Maine farmers, who appear to value protection pretty highly, at once sent agents, as I understood my hon. friend to say, through the province of New Brunswick, to ascertain if there was any disease in potatoes which they could bring to the notice of the Government at Washington. He also told us that New Brunswick was capable of multiplying threefold, yes tenfold, her present production of potatoes. Is there any doubt whatever that the Maine farmers had that capacity of potato production in New Brunswick in view when they initiated the proceedings which led to this embargo. I put it to my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) does he believe that if the United States duty upon potatoes had remained at twenty-five cents per bushel, that embargo would be in existence to-day?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend does not believe, and I do not believe it would be in existence to-day, if the duty of twenty-five cents a bushel had remained. The result then is that the reduction by the Underwood tariff from twenty-five cents a bushel to ten per cent ad valorem has caused the potato growers of New Brunswick to be absolutely shut out of the markets of the United States. Now, if that happened on a reduction to ten per cent ad valorem would it not have happened or something worse, if possible, if the duty had been entirely removed? I cannot help but reflect upon the strange irony of circumstances, which sent my hon. friend on the platforms of New Brunswick to point out the advantages which would be gained by the farmers of New Brunswick by reason of the reciprocity agreement which would admit their potatoes free to the American markets, thus enabling them to double, and treble, and multiply by ten, their output, and today forces him in this House to point out, that because of the reduction by the Underwood Tariff to ten per cent ad valorem, on the initiative the farmers of the United States who he said had strong political influence, the New Brunswick farmers are shut out absolutely from the markets of the United States, and they are not in as good a position as they were before.

Mr. CARVELL: I said on the initiative of the farmers of the state of Maine not of the United States as a whole.

Mr. WHITE: Maine is a powerful and influential state. The Minister of Agriculture said that at the conference which was held with respect to this question, commercial interests were represented as well. I desire to make no strong statements about this matter, because I was not before aware of the facts which have been called to the attention of the House this afternoon by my hon. friend from Carleton and by the Minister of Agriculture. But, is there any doubt that the farmers of Maine themselves, and through their political representatives, brought powerful influence to bear upon the Government of the United States, and that as a result this embargo was established? There is no doubt about it whatever. Therefore, I say that the farmers of New Brunswick are in a worse position than they would have been if the tariff of twenty-five cents a bushel had remained against Canadian potatoes, because the Canadian farmers would have at least been able to sell in the markets of the United States after the payment of the twenty-five cents per bushel duty. I point out to my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) that the hon. gentleman from Carleton (Mr. Carvell), in my judgment has this afternoon supplied the strongest possible argument against the adoption of his resolution. If the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Loggie) were adopted, what would follow? If the United States removes the embargo, then by reason of the countervailing provisions of the Underwood tariff, the potatoes of Canada would gain free entry to the markets of the United States. I put it to my hon. friend from Northumberland that if the farmers of Maine have taken the initiative and have by the influence they have been able to bear had this embargo put on because of a reduction of twenty-five cents a bushel to ten per cent ad valorem, what would they not do if this amendment were carried and they knew that the potatoes from Canada would go into the United States, not at a duty of ten per cent ad valorem but absolutely free of duty? That argument cannot be refuted. If the farmers of Maine had taken the initiative, and my hon. friend criticised them pretty roughly for doing so, to get an embargo placed on our potatoes because of a reduction in the duty, what would they not be disposed to do if the duty were wiped off altogether and they found themselves exposed to Canadian competition?

I need not tell my hon. friend from Carleton, who has a strong, virile intellect, what would happen under such circumstances. He knows that if this amendment were to pass this House the efforts of the Maine farmers would be redoubled.

Mr. CARVELL: Does my hon. friend want me to tell him what I know?

Mr. WHITE: Very well.

Mr. CARVELL: I know no such thing, and I tell him frankly that I do not believe the competition from the province of New Brunswick would affect the price of potatoes one cent in the United States, nor do I believe that the United States people would have attempted to put on this embargo so far as Canada is concerned. It was the European market they were afraid of. The hon. gentleman is harking back to reciprocity, but I can tell him that all of this trouble dates from the refusal of reciprocity, and had reciprocity gone through there would have been an embargo against the rest of the world and there would not be an embargo against Canada to-day.

Mr. WHITE: The hon. gentleman says that this embargo will not make a particle of difference so far as the price of potatoes in the United States is concerned.

Mr. CARVELL: We do not produce enough.

Mr. WHITE: I assume that the Maine farmers, to whom my hon. friend has paid a high tribute this afternoon, are a keen-witted, practical-minded set of men.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. WHITE: Will my hon. friend tell me why they took the trouble to send over agents to New Brunswick to see if they could find an example of powdery scab, in order that potatoes of New Brunswick might be debarred from the American market?

Mr. CARVELL: With the greatest of pleasure. I live alongside of those people; I know the men who have made the incursion into New Brunswick, and I have it from the potato men and the potato growers of the state of Maine. They did not fear the Canadian competition; but they were determined to prevent the free importation of potatoes into the United States from every country of the world, and they got their Government to put on this embargo in order to shut out the competition from Europe. When they shut out the competition from Europe, they wanted to shut it out from every country. Any one in the state of Maine will tell you that they did not fear the competition of New Brunswick or of Canada. If the competition only came from Canada, you would hear nothing about it; it was the competition from Europe that they desired to shut out.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend's argument is a little faulty, inasmuch as the United States had already a very effective embargo against Europe on account of canker, which is a different thing entirely.

Mr. CARVELL: They had no embargo against powdery scab, and it is professedly only against powdery scab that they are endeavouring to prohibit importations of potatoes from New Brunswick and other provinces of Canada into their country.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend did not understand me.

Mr. CARVELL: I did, and I think my hon. friend will see that I did before I have finished. They did not profess to put an embargo on potatoes on account of canker; they professed to do so on account of powdery scab. It is a fact that hundreds of thousands of bushels of European potatoes came into the United States from the 3rd day of October to the 24th day of December, 1913, from those countries which the United States believed did not possess canker, but did possess powdery scab. It was canker they were afraid of; and it was the fact that not merely a few carloads but whole shiploads of cankered potatoes came from Europe that made them determined to prohibit the importation of those potatoes, if possible.

Mr. BURRELL: I am afraid my hon. friend has made rather a wild statement. I do not think he can show that thousands and thousands of bushels of potatoes came from European countries to the United States prior to their action, because they had an effective embargo against all countries on account of potato canker.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture is all wrong.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CARVELL: I advise my hon. friends not to get too gay over it. My hon. friend, if he looks up the trade returns, will find that shipload after shipload of potatoes came from Europe into the ports of Boston and New York in November and early in December.

Mr. WHITE: I think my hon. friend will have some difficulty in making the country believe that, if the Maine farmers had in view only the prohibition of the importation of potatoes from Europe, they would seek to accomplish their purpose by making an investigation of the farms in the province of New Brunswick. There is no doubt about it whatever, and my hon. friend has supplied the reason in his own argument. He says that New Brunswick is capable of increasing its output of potatoes tenfold. Does he mean to tell hon. members that, having regard to freight rates and all the other matters that enter into the question of price, an increase of the potato-product of New Brunswick by ten will have no material influence upon the price in the nearby markets of the United States?

Mr. CARVELL: Does my hon. friend not know that the freight rate to the United States is greater from New Brunswick than from Europe?

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend says that they can keep out the European product by reason of canker.

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend knows just as well as I do that, if the Canadian output were increased by ten, and if the farmers had free access to the markets of the United States and sent in their products subject to a 10 per cent or other duty, it would have a material influence upon the price in the nearby markets of the United States.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think so.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend does not think so, but some of us do think so. The Maine farmers thought so, and their action was governed by what they thought. They came in and examined the farms of New Brunswick; they found powdery scab; they brought political influence to bear, and they had this embargo enforced against the potatoes of Canada. The farmers in my hon. friend's constituency are in worse case to-day, as I said, than they would have been under the Payne-Aldrich tariff of the United States, namely, 25 cents a bushel upon potatoes. That is the result of the reduction in the tariff of the United States, which I have no doubt my hon. friend has heralded as a great advantage to Canada.

There are a few other statements which my hon. friend made to which I wish to refer briefly. Before doing so, I wish to say that if the amendment of my hon. friend from Northumberland, N.B. (Mr. Loggie), were adopted, and the tariff reduced, the result, in my judgment, would be that the present embargo would be made perpetual against the potatoes of Canada, because I believe the farmers of Maine, realizing as they would that this would mean, in the event of the removal of the embargo, the free entry of Canadian potatoes into the United States in competition with theirs, would exert their influence more strongly even than they did on the last occasion. The result would be that the Canadian potatoes would be absolutely shut out under an embargo provision for all time from the markets of the United States.

My hon. friend said in the course of his remarks that the Canadian market would be of no advantage to the producers in the United States. That would seem to follow from his argument that prices were higher in the United States than in Canada. If that is so, I would put it to my hon. friend, what possible influence upon the action of the United States could we exercise by the removal of our duty against potatoes? If the market of Canada is of no value to the potato growers of the United States, I repeat, what influence would any action on our part in removing or reducing the duty on potatoes have upon the Government of the United States with respect to the embargo? My hon. friend confutes his own argument by his admission. Further, I put this to my hon. friend. He stated this afternoon that the United States acted fairly in imposing the embargo. What follows from his argument? He said in substance and effect: If you will remove the duty, we may look for an earlier removal of the embargo. What has he suggested in that? That the embargo might be continued beyond the time during which it is properly enforcible; in other words, that it might become a protection to the farmers of the United States instead of a quarantine measure.

That absolutely follows from the argument of my hon. friend; there is no getting away from it. The Minister of Agriculture said, referring to the resolution of the hon. member for Northumberland, that there is confusion of thought in that resolution. My hon. friend from Carleton has argued this afternoon that the market of Canada is of no use to the potato growers of the United States. He has argued, notwithstanding that admission, that it will be influential in having the embargo removed so far as Canada is concerned if we remove the Canadian duty and admit American potatoes to this market, which according to his own statement, would be of no advantage to the United States. And he has by implication charged the United States with imposing this embargo, not for quarantine reasons, not for the purpose of keeping out disease, but solely as a protective measure for their own farmers suffering from a reduction of the rates of duty under the provisions of the Underwood Tariff.

Let me put it another way:

11 p.m. The hon. gentleman knows that there are only two classes in the community who would be affected by an alteration in the tariff rates—the consumers and the producers. If there is no advantage to the producer of potatoes in the United States in having access to the Canadian market, is there any advantage to the consumer in the United States in having the American tariff reduced or removed? If my hon. friend says there is, I say the remedy is wholly in the hands of the United States: they can lower or remove their duty whenever they please.

Now, my hon. friend has spoken rather contemptuously of the home market.

Mr. CARVELL: Quite so.

Mr. WHITE: His words were: The home market and all that sort of nonsense.

Mr. CARVELL: I meant all that.

Mr. WHITE: I am sorry the hon. gentleman meant it, because I think he is a man capable of taking a broader view.

Mr. CARVELL: I have had experience.

Mr. WHITE: Probably in one section of the country only. But we must learn that in this country there are many children of Confederation, there are many provinces, and what is an immortal truth in Nova Scotia may be a heresy in British Columbia. That is brought home to me every day in connection with such matters as the tariff. I am the first to admit that there are sections of Canada in which there is a considerable advantage in having access to the American market; I have always admitted that. But the hon. gentleman must take the country as a whole. If he would visit to the province of Ontario or to the province of Quebec or many other provinces, he would find that the home market is not regarded as a bit of 'nonsense' by the agriculturists. I doubt if my hon. friend could carry his membership in any rural constituency in Ontario if he came out and talked about the 'nonsense' of the home market. I would point out that it was the appreciation by the Ontario farmer and the Quebec farmer of his home market that won the election on the reciprocity issue.

Mr. CARVELL: And I want to say that the election was won on money and the Ne Temere decree.

Mr. WHITE: I do not propose to bandy words with my hon. friend on any proposition so foolish as that. I have stumped Ontario, and know rural Ontario as well; I was born on an Ontario farm, and I know farming conditions. It is true not only of Ontario but of Quebec, and of British Columbia and of Manitoba, and I believe it will be increasingly true of other provinces, that the farmer values greatly his home market. And my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who committed himself for the moment to a free food policy at Hamilton, had to back up on that policy because of the condition that I have mentioned as existing—namely, the appreciation by the Canadian farmer of his home market.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How is he going to lose it in the event of reciprocity?

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend knows the difference between a home market and a foreign market.

Mr. MACLEAN: Do I understand the hon. minister to assert that in the event of reciprocity in potatoes between Canada and the United States our farmers would lose the home market? Surely he does not undertake to assert such a proposition.

Mr. WHITE: Let me say this to my hon. friend. Take the case of manufactures—

Mr. MACLEAN: Just one moment. I understood the hon. member for Carleton to say that there was considerable nonsense in hon. gentlemen opposite continually asserting the great importance of the home market when any one on this side suggests the desirability of having a market for their products where there is an exportable surplus.

Mr. CARVELL: I was talking about the home market for potatoes.

Mr. WHITE: The hon. member for Carleton does not need an interpreter; whatever faults he may have, vagueness is not one of them. I understand him, and he knew I understood him. He cast contempt upon the home market.

Mr. CARVELL: For potatoes.

Mr. WHITE: For potatoes and other produce. He is a free trader for every part of Canada except New Brunswick, and a free trader there in everything except potatoes. He reminds me of the lines in the Biglow paper:

> I du believe in Freedom's cause,
> Ez fur away ez Payris is;
> I love to see her stick her claws
> In them infernal Phayrisees.

So, with the hon. gentleman, protection is anathema on everything except the potatoes of New Brunswick. Now, I wish to say to him—because I have a good deal of respect for his ability and would like to see him take a larger view of this matter—that he cannot formulate a tariff policy by keeping in view only one province or one constituency; he must consider Canada as a whole. He is disregarding an obvious and patent fact if he jumps to the conclusion that the farmer of this country does not value his home market. If he does not want to take my word for it, let him have a heart to heart talk with his right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who had to withdraw from the policy set forth so eloquently in Hamilton because the rural members in Ontario and Quebec said to him: You are going to ruin us in our constituencies. That is what I meant when I said that free food means free trade. And it does; because if the protective duties that have been valued by the farmers since protection was introduced in 1879 are to be swept away, they will insist that others be swept away also; they all stand on the same footing, and when the farmer of Ontario and of other provinces values his protection so much, he is either going to have it or see that nobody else shall have it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Did I understand the minister to say that even if it could be shown that with potatoes on the free list in Canada and the United States it would be utterly impossible for the United States to send into this country potatoes in any substantial quantities and yet we could export in large quantities to the United States, he would still oppose the principle of this resolution?

Mr. MACLEAN: In Canada—and that he would adhere to a tariff upon potatoes simply because the placing of potatoes upon the free list would disturb the whole fabric of protection. Does my hon. friend mean that?

Mr. WHITE: I am of the opinion that Canada should make her own tariffs, and that the United States and every other country should make their own tariffs. I believe in having a policy to work upon; I do not believe in taking isolated articles here and there, and for political, demagogic or other reasons, singling them out for special tariff treatment.

Mr. MACLEAN: We are talking about potatoes in this resolution.

Mr. WHITE: I know that, but my hon. friend asked me for a general statement of opinion and I say that a minister of Finance should have a policy to work to. I laid down in my Budget speech a policy of reasonable protection for the industries of Canada, including agriculture, and I say, therefore, that you must deal with the products of agriculture as you deal with the products of manufacture; that is to say you must afford them reasonable protection. How much that reasonable protection should be at any given time I do not propose to say, because as conditions change from time to time, necessary tariff modifications have to be made. There might come a time when certain manufactured articles on which hitherto a duty has been imposed might be placed upon the free list; there might come a time when certain articles the product of the farm might well be placed upon the free list. But I lay down the general principle that the fiscal policy of the Government, as stated in the Budget speech, is one of reasonable protection for all the industries of Canada, including the great basic industry of agriculture. In the application of that principle we must be guided by the facts and conditions that are before us from time to time. I think that the resolution of the hon. member for Northumberland should be negatived, on several grounds. In the first place, it could not—and he evidently had in mind that it could—be confined to potatoes coming in from the United States of America. If the resolution were adopted, potatoes would come in from the United Kingdom, from all the British possessions and from all the most favoured nations. When my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) this afternoon indicated that he would be, to say the least, reluctant that potatoes should come into Canada from Germany or from any other nation but the United States free of duty, I could not help thinking of what his leader did at the Imperial Conference in 1911. This is the resolution which was moved by my right hon. friend and adopted by the Imperial Conference at that time:

That His Majesty's Government be requested to open negotiations with the several foreign governments having treaties which apply to the overseas Dominions with a view to securing liberty for any of those Dominions which may so desire to withdraw from the operation of the treaty without impairing the treaty in respect of the rest of the empire.

My right hon. friend obviously had in mind at that time the idea that these treaties should be denounced in order that these commodities should not come in free by reason of the reciprocity pact. My hon. friend a few moments ago said that he objected to potatoes coming in from Germany free of duty only on account of their being affected with disease.

Mr. CARVELL: I did not say so; my hon. friend said that for me.

[Mr. W. T. White.]

Mr. WHITE: What did my hon. friend say ?

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend drew that inference from my remarks; I did not make the statement.

Mr. WHITE: On what ground is my hon. friend unwilling that potatoes should enter New Brunswick from Germany free of duty?

Mr. CARVELL: I will answer when my hon. friend is through.

Mr. WHITE: I asked my hon. friend a few minutes ago whether he objected to pototoes coming into Canada from Germany free of duty on the ground that it would make them cheaper in New Brunswick, and I understood him to say—and by reason of what he said he got into a controversy with the Minister of Agriculture—that he objected on account of their being diseased. If this is the only reason, then does he subscribe to what was done by his leader at the Imperial Conference in 1911, whereby the right hon. gentleman desired to have the treaties denounced in order that these goods might enter Canada free of duty?

Mr. CARVELL: Absolutely.

Mr. WHITE: If my hon. friend does not want to see natural and manufactured products come from the most favoured nations free of duty, is he a free trader or is he a protectionist? If my hon. friend is not a protectionist, what objection has he to natural and manufactured products coming into Canada free of duty from the most favoured nations?

As I have said, the resolution of the hon. member for Northumberland should be negatived, on several grounds. One of them is that the goods from these other nations that I have mentioned would be admitted free to the markets of Canada. Secondly, as pointed out by the Minister of Agriculture, the resolution on the face of it implies that the United States has imposed this embargo for other than quarantine reasons. There is no getting away from that fact; the implication is evident from the arguments that followed. The implication of the hon. member for Northumberland and of the hon member for Carleton is that if Canada will place potatoes on the free list, the United States will be more likely, in the early future, to remove the embargo. On what ground should the United States remove the embargo? Only on the ground that, from the standpoint of quarantine and the interests of agriculture, there is no longer any necessity for it. My hon. friend has admitted that the Canadian market is of no value to the American farmer; yet he says that the American Government will be prone to remove this embargo at an earlier date if we admit their potatoes into Canada free of duty.

The third reason why the resolution of my hon. friend should not be accepted is that, as I stated last night, it is inconsistent with the fiscal policy of protection that I laid down in the Budget speech. I do not say, and I never have said, that a policy of protection means that no articles produced or manufactured in Canada should be placed upon the free list. On the contrary, I have said in my Budget speech and on other occasions that as conditions change, tariff modifications may be made; that duties may be reduced or wholly abolished as circumstances may permit or as the public interest may require. But, having regard to the facts adduced this evening by the hon. member for Frontenac and others as to the production of potatoes in Canada and in the United States, I say that the time has not come when we should place potatoes upon the free list; that to do so under the existing circumstances would be inconsistent with the fiscal policy of protection which I enunciated in the Budget speech. For all these reasons, therefore, I ask that this amendment be negatived.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend assumes that I announced in this House that I was an absolute free trader. I think he would have some difficulty in finding record of my having made any such assertion, either in this House or on the platforms of this country, wherever I have discussed these questions—and I have been discussing them for a great many years. I am not like my hon. friend, who is hidebound to some particular policy and cannot get away from it. I believe in a business tariff. If it is necessary to put on a reasonable amount of protection for business reasons, I am willing to have it put on. On the other hand, if good business dictates that a thing should be put on the free list, I am for putting it on the free list. I do not think my hon. friend can make very much capital by charging me with being neither free trader nor protectionist. I try to look at this thing from the business standpoint.

My hon. friend also brought up the question of the favoured nations. I did not intend to hark back to reciprocity and refrained from saying anything about what the result would have been if reciprocity had passed. I am one of those who said in 1911 that reciprocity was not dead and I say so now. It is as much alive to-day as ever and will always be until the matter is settled properly. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition, when he attended the Imperial Conference of 1911, secured the passage of a resolution favouring the abrogation of the favoured nation treaties so far as Canada is concerned. This was done for the purpose of putting Canada in a position to abrogate and get rid of these treaties if we wanted to do so. I do not want to allow Germany to send potatoes into Canada if we cannot get a corresponding advantage from them. The same thing applies to Denmark, Holland, Belgium or any other country. I do not know that I would be so patriotic that I would like Great Britain or anybody else to send potatoes in here if I did not think it would be to our benefit as well as to theirs. Therefore, when our friend harks back to the favoured nation treaties he knows that the resolution of my hon. friend from Northumberland has nothing to do with favoured nations, because under the resolution passed by the Imperial Conference, if this Government wants to they can denounce the treaty as against Germany or any other country.

Mr. WHITE: Is the hon. member in favour of putting on the free list all live stock and other products of agriculture in Canada either from Germany or any other country?

Mr. CARVELL: There may be a few exceptions but as a general principle it would be absolutely so and I think it is in the best interests of both producer and consumer in Canada. I would not say that there might not be a few exceptions because no person should be called on without going over the list to give an absolute answer to such a question. As a general thing I believe it would be of great benefit to the people of Canada as a whole. Therefore, I think we can dismiss the result of the favoured nation treaties on this question of potatoes. I stated that the result of this treaty would be to allow the potatoes from Great Britain to come in here free and I have no fault to find with potatoes coming from Great Britain provided they are not prevented by quarantine regulations of some kind.

My hon. friend talked about the home market and tried to show that I was inconsistent in my statement about it being of no value to the American producer. I stated that I did not believe the free entry of potatoes into Canada would be of any advantage to the American farmer. I said I believed that the American Government might have thought it to be of some advantage or they would not have insisted in their tariff that our potatoes would not enter their country without a corresponding concession on our part. My friends from Ontario, from whom all the opposition has come, do not seem to realize that they do not produce anything like the potatoes which they consume in Ontario.

Mr. HANNA: You do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. gentleman does not and I know what I am talking about. If the hon. gentleman goes to the Canadian Pacific railway office in Montreal he will find that for the last five or six years we have been exporting into Ontario from New Brunswick anywhere from 500,000 bushels to 1,000,000 bushels a year. These are pretty big figures but we cannot find them in the trade returns because there are no returns for interprovincial trade. The price of potatoes all over the cities of Ontario is entirely governed by the price of potatoes in New Brunswick. New Brunswick potatoes are quoted at from 5 to 10 cents a bag more than the native potatoes. When the American market was practically open to us in October, November and December of 1913 our potatoes practically all went to the American market. Dealers in New Brunswick told me that where they send one car to the Canadian market they send ten to the American. Therefore the price in Ontario of New Brunswick potatoes was governed entirely by the price in Boston and the price of New Brunswick potatoes governs the price of the home product in Ontario. If you take away from Ontario the potatoes we have been sending you—and that will be the result of opening the American market—you will be creating a demand for Ontario potatoes that you have not to-day, you will be compelled to raise half a million bushels a year more.

Mr. BURNHAM: We do not get a New Brunswick potato in the neighbourhood of Peterborough.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend does not know. They get them anyway in Muskoka, which is farther away than Peterborough.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. BURNHAM: I know a potato dealer very well and he says that.

Mr. CARVELL: If my hon. friend will go to his potato dealer and ask him if there has not been a carload of New Brunswick potatoes sold in Peterborough this year, I am satisfied that he will learn that they have been sold; and if he sends a telegram this minute I will pay for the telegram and the reply.

Mr. BURNHAM: You need not. I will tell you something shorter and quicker than that. Senator Ferguson's son from Prince Edward Island is a particular friend of mine in Peterborough, and he deals in potatoes. When there is a shortage in Peterborough through drouth he gets his potatoes from Prince Edward Island; he does not get them at all from New Brunswick.

Mr. CARVELL: There was a time in the spring of 1912 when some potatoes were sent from Prince Edward Island to Peterborough. I happen to have a big lawsuit in progress now over a shipment and I hope to fight it out before very long and of course I want to win; but my hon. friend is evidently not aware that they cannot get potatoes from Prince Edward Island from the last of December until the 1st of April because there is no practical way of getting them across the straits and they have to have them in Peterborough during the winter.

Mr. BURNHAM: I am telling you facts. It is no use trying to put that down my throat.

Mr. CARVELL: I think it is a helpless case; if my hon. friend will not believe me when I tell him that you cannot economically get them across the straits in winter time, I have nothing more to say to him. If he will consult his friends from Prince Edward Island I think he will find that I am pretty nearly correct. If ever there was a chance for my hon. friend to use an aeroplane in a commercial way it would be in getting potatoes across the straits in the winter time. However, the home market in Ontario would be immensely benefited by the reduction of this duty or the making of potatoes free in the United States because it would absolutely divert from Ontario the half million bushels which we are sending annually from the Maritime provinces.

Mr. DeWITT FOSTER: Will the price go up?

Mr. CARVELL: Will it go up to the Ontario farmer?

Mr. FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: Of course it will.

Mr. FOSTER: How will that affect the consumer?

Mr. CARVELL: It certainly will mean that he will pay a little more at some times and a little less at others; a little more in the winter months and a little less in the summer months. While it will help the Ontario producer it will not hurt the Ontario consumer. I have tried to make my statement to the Minister of Finance. I am sorry to have taken up the time of the House to this extent, but I felt it was only fair to myself and to the cause which I have so much at heart that I should give this answer to what the minister has said. I hope the minister will think it over for if he does he will see that it is a perfectly logical and accurate argument according to the facts. I am afraid it is too much to ask my hon. friend to change his views, because he has got to be such a hidebound protectionist that nothing will move him from that standpoint, but I do hope that I have convinced some of the Ontario farmers behind him that they had better think twice before voting against a proposition having such important ramification as this has.

Mr. NESBITT: After the very lucid explanation which the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) gave, and in which he stated that there was reason for the American Government putting an embargo on potatoes from the Maritime provinces, was it wise for the Minister of Finance to charge a great and friendly nation like the United States with sharp practice in putting on that embargo against Canada? I think nobody can take any other meet meaning out of the hon. gentleman's speech.

Mr. W. T. WHITE: This was my argument, and it was perfectly plain: I said that some of the Maine farmers upon the reduction of the duties by the Underwood tariff, had sent agents to New Brunswick, according to the statement of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), to ascertain if there was any powdery scab upon the potatoes raised there. I said that they had taken the initiative, and I also said—and I think that my hon. friend agreed with me—that if the duty had not been reduced the farmers would not have taken the initiative, and would not have brought the influences to bear which resulted in the investigation. I did not say then, and I do not say now, that the officials of the United States who held this investigation acted with any impropriety but that they would not have acted at all if the Maine farmers, of whom my hon. friend spoke this afternoon, had not taken the initiative. I believe he agreed with that view. I do not know if there is any powdery scab on the potatoes of New Brunswick or not, and I do not know whether the hon. Minister of Agriculture said there was or not. I was not dealing with the question of whether there was or not. I was dealing with this only, that by reason of the reduction of the tariff the farmers of Maine had taken the initiative which had brought about the embargo. I do not say whether it was properly imposed; I do not know whether it was or not. But I say that the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland, and the arguments which have been used in support of it, to the effect that the United States would be inclined to put an end to the embargo at an earlier date than they otherwise would if we gave free access for their potatoes to our markets, cast doubt upon their good faith in continuing the embargo. I did not cast that doubt. My hon. friend (Mr. Nesbitt) had better look to his own side for the implication, because I have made none. I have been dealing with the resolution, and I take the same view of it as was taken by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, namely, that its effect is to cast doubt upon the good faith of the United States Government in maintaining that embargo. I have made no such statement as that. The resolution implies that, and that is one of the reasons why it should be rejected.

Mr. NESBITT: I only put the question so that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance could have an opportunity of saying whether he intended that a minister of the Crown of Canada should question the good faith of a great and friendly nation like the United States.

Mr. WHITE: I certainly do not.

Mr. NESBITT: We in Ontario had no reason to complain of their good faith in so far as cattle, etc., are concerned. I do not think it is wise for a minister of the Crown, no matter what he may think, to question the good faith of a friendly nation.

Amendment (Mr. Loggie) negatived: Yeas, 33; nays, 60.

Item agreed to.

113. Cocoanuts, desiccated, sweetened or not, per pound—British preferential, 3 cents; intermediate, 4 cents; general, 4 cents.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there any change in that?

Mr. W. T. WHITE: There is a change rendered necessary by the action of last year in reference to the West Indian treaty. Previous to the negotiation of the West Indian treaty the rates were: British preferential, 3 cents; and general, 5 cents. On account of the West Indian theaty, and, in making the adjustment that was necessary in order to meet its provisions, we changed the rate to 3 cents British preferential, and 4 cents general tariff.

Immediately after the Budget was brought down last year, complaint was made by the manufacturers of dessicated cocoanut that the adjustment we had made was unfair to them and really prevented them from carrying on business in competition with the manufacturers of Ceylon. In Canada cocoanuts are bought in the West Indies. A bag of cocoanuts weighs 160 pounds and the freight has to be paid on that 160 pounds, while the product obtained from 160 pounds is only thirty-three pounds. The manufacturer in Ceylon who has cocoanuts at his own door, manufactures his desiccated cocoanut and ships it into Canada without having to pay the freight for hundreds of miles on cocoanuts, producing only one-fifth of their weight in product. I sent Mr. Russell to Montreal to inquire whether the complaint was well founded, and he reported it was, and in order to rectify what was an undoubted injustice to the cocoanut manufacturers of Canada, by reason of the changes which were rendered necessary by the West Indian treaty, we have had to propose this modification in the tariff and to increase the two cents British preference to three cents, in order that our manufacturers may be in as good a position as they were before the negotiation of the West Indian treaty.

Mr. OLIVER: Has item 99a, evaporated bananas, anything to do with the West Indian treaty?

Mr. WHITE: That is intended to promote West Indian trade and to put this commodity the trade in which is increasing between the West Indies and ourselves, upon the same basis as currants and raisins.

Mr. OLIVER: Is the rate increased or decreased?

Mr. WHITE: It will come in now free from the British West Indies. The value is about eight cents per pound and the former rate was—British preference seventeen and one-half per cent; intermediate, twenty-two and one-quarter per cent; general, thirty-five per cent.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is it?

Mr. WHITE: The Jamaica Food Products Company wrote to say that they were importing evaporated bananas from Jamaica, which business was said to be increasing with prospects of an enormous trade being built up in it. They say the evaporated bananas cannot be manufactured in Canada, as the fruit requires to be ripened on the tree, allowing all the starch therein to be turned in to fruit sugar.

Item agreed to.

Amyl alcohol or refined fusil oil, when imported by the Department of Inland Revenue or by a person licensed by the Minister of Inland Revneue, to be denatured for use in the manufacture of metal varnishes or lacquers, to be entered at ports prescribed by regulations of the Ministers of Customs and Inland Revenue, subject to the Inland Revenue Act and to the regulations of the Department of Inland Revenue—British preferential, free; intermediate, free; general, free.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the explanation of this?

Mr. WHITE: With the restriction mentioned in 157-a, amyl alcohol or refined fusil oil is placed upon the free list. The reason for the change is to encourage the manufacture of metal lacquers in Canada. The duty on amyl alcohol, which cannot be procured in Canada, is $2.40 per gallon under the present tariff, while the varnish made therefrom is dutiable at about 60 cents per gallon. In other words, $2.40 would have to be paid upon the raw material by the manufacture of lacquer, and by reason of this condition metal varnishes or lacquers cannot be made in Canada. An American firm has embarked upon the business of manufacturing metal varnishes or lacquers in the town of Port Hope. They were unaware, not having been advised, that this duty of $2.40 existed, and having got their plant installed and being ready to manufacture, they found they would have to pay this duty. I need not say to you that the good town of Port Hope was sorely disturbed about the matter, and upon representations having been made we brought down this tariff change which makes amyl alcohol or refined fusil oil, free, with the limitation mentioned in the item. A license of $50 a year will have to be paid by the parties importing and using this amyl alcohol, and 50 cents a gallon excise will have to be paid, and they will also have to pay for the time of the Inland Revenue officers in making the necessary inspection.

Provided that on the goods specified in item 178 and imported by mail on and after first day of July, 1914, duties may be paid by Customs Revenue stamps, under regulations by the Minister of Customs, at the rates specified in said item, except that on each separate package weighing not more than one ounce the duty shall be.....each—British preferential, 1 cent; intermediate, 1 cent; general, 1 cent.

Mr. OLIVER: What is referred to here?

Mr. WHITE: Item 178 of the Customs tariff relates to advertising and printed matter. A great deal of that matter comes in from outside, being sent in by firms desiring to advertise in Canada, not necessarily consigned to any party purchasing it, and it is dutiable under the provisions of item 178. When sent in in envelopes it is held at the frontier and the party has to be communicated with in order that the duty may be paid upon advertising matter which may weigh an ounce or two only. The Commissioner of Customs has suggested that the difficulties which have arisen under the present system can be met by the proviso in this item that Customs revenue stamps may be used, with the exception mentioned, namely, that on each separate package weighing not more than one ounce, the duty shall not be more than one cent, a cent being the smallest coin we mint. As the rate is fifteen cents a pound under item 178, and as there are sixteen ounces to the pound, a cent will be charged for the ounce and stamps may be used.

184. Newspapers, and quarterly, monthly, and semi-monthly magazines, and weekly literary papers, unbound; tailors', milliners' and mantle-makers' fashion plates when imported in single copies in sheet form with magazines or periodical trade journals—British preferential, free; intermediate, free; general, free.

Mr. WHITE: I am told that it was the original intention of the tariff of 1907 to provide that only single copies of fashion plates should come in free; but the item has been abused, and fashion plates are being ordered abroad and being brought in free of duty under this item. The intention of the amendment is to provide that single copies only shall be brought in with these newspapers and magazines. The result will be that these fashion plates will now be lithographed and printed in Canada instead of abroad.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What was the duty before?

Mr. WHITE: It was all under item 178—15 cents per pound.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is to be the tariff on fashion plates hereafter?

Mr. WHITE: That will fall under item 178—15 cents per pound.

Mr. MACLEAN: Were magazines and newspapers dutiable before?

Mr. WHITE: Magazines were not. The item is modified. If my hon. friend will look at item 184 in the tariff as it is now, he will observe that it stops short at the words 'fashion plates.' Under the change that I have made that item disappears, and item 184, as it appears in the tariff resolution, is inserted.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is not there any post office regulation prohibiting fashion plates coming through the mails in a periodical journal of any kind? Why would they come in single copies with journals?

Mr. LEMIEUX: As supplements.

Mr. WHITE: They are continually being sent in that way. The Ladies' Home Journal and other journals may have fashion plates enclosed. Some of the larger departmental stores have been giving their orders for fashion plates and for some of their advertising matter abroad, and bringing them in under this item free of duty. We think that business might fairly be reserved under a protective tariff to the printers and lithographers of Canada. It has been a very much discussed question; and I have on record here a number of letters from engraving companies stating that this matter has been under consideration for a long time and that it is of very great importance to the trade.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is a duty on catalogues, is there not?

Mr. WHITE: Ten and fifteen cents per pound.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do you propose to maintain that duty?

Mr. WHITE: Yes.

Item agreed to.

188a. Decalcomania paper not printed when imported by manufacturers of decalcomania transfers to be used in their own factories in the manufacture of decalcomania transfers—British preferential, free; intermediate, free; general, free.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Tell us the meaning of that first word, and we will let the item go through.

Mr. WHITE: I do not wonder at my hon. friend's asking that question. That word puzzled me for some little time. The decalcomania paper is used in making decalcomania transfers. There is a process of transferring prints from paper and making them adhere to glass, porcelain and other articles. Decalcomonia transfers are chiefly used for advertising purposes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is it of advantage to the paper-makers?

Mr. WHITE: Not to my knowledge. These people get in the decalcomania paper, which is not made in Canada, free under this item. They can put on their aluminum letters and transfer them to glass, porcelain and other articles.

208. Boracic acid and borax in packages of not less than twenty-five pounds weight; hydrofluosilicic acid; oxalic acid; tannic acid; ammonia, sulphate of; sal ammoniac and nitrate of ammonia; cyanide of potassium; cyanide of sodium and cyanogen bromide for reducing metals in mining operations; antimony salts, viz.:—tartar emetic, chlorine and lactate (antomonine); arsenous oxide; oxide of cobalt; oxide of tin; bichloride of tin; tin crystals; oxide of copper; precipitate of copper, crude; sulphate of copper (blue vitriol); verdigris or subacetate of copper, dry; sulphate of iron (copperas); sulphate of zinc; chloride of zinc; sulphur and brimstone, crude or in roll or flour; cream of tartar, in crystals or argols; tartaric acid crystals; iodine, crude; bromide; phosphorus; sulphide of arsenic; carbon bisulphide—British preferential, free; intermediate, free; general, free.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What is the change in this item?

Mr. WHITE: I would call attention to item 208a—chloride of lime and hypochlorite of lime. We have taken out of this item 208a of the tariff, chloride of lime and hypochlorite of lime, and we have inserted in it carbon bisulphide. Item 208 of the present tariff is repealed, and the new item 208 takes its place. We have placed carbon bisulphide on the free list because it is an article used in exterminating fruit and grain pests. We have been requested by the British Columbia Government through its Minister of Agriculture to place carbon bisulphide upon the free list.

Item agreed to.

208a. Chloride of lime and hypochlorite of lime—

1. When in packages of not less than twenty-five pounds weight each, per one hundred pounds—British preferential, 10 cents; intermediate, 15 cents; general, 15 cents.

2. When in packages of less than twenty-five pounds in weight each—British preferential, 17½ per cent; intermediate, 25 per cent; general, 25 per cent.

Mr. OLIVER: Why is chloride of lime subject to a duty when it was not subject before?

Mr. WHITE: If my hon. friend will look at item 210 and take up the two items together, I think I can more intelligently explain the matter. There is at Windsor, Ont., a salt plant, and there are, as my hon. friends know, deposits of salt in several parts of Ontario. The Windsor plant has at the present time a capacity of 4,000,000 pounds of caustic soda. This company have had no duty upon caustic soda which is one of the products of salt manufacture; nor have they had any duty upon chloride of lime or upon hypochlorite of lime, which are by-products on caustic soda production. They have been making application for a considerable time for a reasonable tariff in respect of these two articles. They have set forth the view that they could double their plant and their output and supply all the caustic soda, chloride of lime and hypochloride of lime required in Canada with a reasonable protection.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Without increasing the price, I hope.

Mr. WHITE: I hope so. Sometimes our hopes are not realized, I know. But I think that in time, with an increased output, there would be no substantial increase in the price. The committee will observe that the rates are specific, and they amount to about eleven per cent British preferential and sixteen and one-half per cent general tariff. The differentiation is shown in the items of the tariff as follows:

Caustic soda:
1. When in packages of not less than twenty-five pounds weight; free.
2. When in packages of less than twenty-five pounds weight; British preferential, 10 per cent; intermediate, 12½ per cent; general, 15 per cent.

These are on the free list when in packages of not less than twenty-five pounds. But when in packages of less than twenty-five pounds, the duty under the British preferential is ten per cent and under the general tariff fifteen per cent; now to be increased to seventeen and one-half and twenty-five per cent. The consumption in Canada is about 16,000,000 pounds and the material is used by soap manufacturers, cotton manufacturers—for bleaching purposes; chloride of lime, as hon. members know, is commercially known as 'bleaching powder'—by pulp and paper manufacturers and other industries. But these will not be affected to any serious extent.

Mr. NESBITT: Does the hon. minister mean to say that these people in Windsor will not put up the price? They would be crazy if they did not; there would be no use in protecting them from competition if they are to go on selling at the price of competition. This caustic soda is used largely by soap manufacturers. They buy it by the carload. So, while the duty is small—

Mr. WHITE: About 3 cents per 100 pound of soap.

Mr. NESBITT:—yet because of the large quantities used, this change will make quite a difference in the cost of the raw material. While I have nothing to say against my hon. friend from Essex, and do not wish to prevent this factory succeeding, I hardly think the benefit of the community from this industry will be sufficient to offset the increase in price of the material. These people have increased their price of salt in the last four or five years quite sufficiently to make a profit without protecting them on chloride of lime and caustic soda. The barrel of salt that we used to get for 90 cents we are now paying $1.55 for.

Mr. WHITE: Of course, the hon. gentleman is quite right; the tendency will be to increase the price. But I would not say that the price would be permanently increased, and I hope not. But discussing a similar question last night in connection with structural steel, I said that no doubt the price would be higher—otherwise, as the hon. gentleman said, there would be no use in imposing the duty. But this is not to raise the price necessarily, but to give the benefit of the market to the home manufacturer. There is no use in blinking the fact that we may look for a slight increase in price. Some representations have been made to me on behalf of those affected, but generally they look at it in a fair-minded way. The soap-makers say: We have, speaking generally, a protection of 15 to 35 per cent, and we can hardly deny the caustic soda and bleaching powder manufacturer a reasonable protection on his product. For the most part, I have been surprised at the fair-mindedness they have exhibited with regard to this proposed change, against which, of course, they cannot urge any objection on principle.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is the industry worth having?

Mr. WHITE: No doubt. If I were to give the floor to my hon. friend from North Essex (Mr. Wilcox), I have no doubt he could talk for an hour on that subject.

Mr. GRAHAM: Do not do it.

Mr. WILCOX: Let the item pass or I will.

Mr. OLIVER: Carried.

Mr. WHITE: The number of employees at present in the chemical plant is sixty-five and the value of that plant $750,000. Steps have been taken already to duplicate that plant in view of this tariff change.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is this not a by-product of salt? And in giving the number of employees, does not that include those engaged in the production of salt?

Mr. WHITE: No, these are in the chemical plant. I cannot put the doctrine of reasonable protection on a higher basis than to say that we get the manufacturers here if we have it and we do not get them if we do not have it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: But it is of very questionable value to the country, particularly where there is only one industry.

Mr. NESBITT: While I agree with the Minister of Finance in many respects, he must bear in mind that in the salt business they have a great number of men already employed, whereas this industry, even if doubled will only mean from 120 to 130 employees, and labourers at that—not experts by any manner or means.

Mr. WHITE: There are other establishments; there are large salt deposits in Ontario, as the hon. gentleman knows.

Mr. NESBITT: Of course there are, and what I say is that they should be able to make enough money out of the increased price of salt to be able to do without this protection on their by-products. There is no doubt that there is an arrangement among the salt people as to prices. Everybody knows that. You can no more break a price than you could if the industry were in the hands of one man. Therefore, I am not strongly in favour of putting on duty for that sort of people when, as the minister no doubt knows, there is an arrangement among them as to price.

Mr. WHITE: I do not know that.

Mr. NESBITT: But ordinary farmers, poor devils like myself, who have to buy salt, do not like these arrangements when the price rises so high. If they would be reasonable, if they would put it up to a reasonable amount it would be different. I am prepared to stand my portion of the duty to help anybody out, but there is reason in all things. And to compare this chemical factory with the steel industry is a very peculiar comparison.

Mr. WHITE: The principle is the same.

Mr. BOIVIN: Why is there a difference in the duty on chloride of lime in packages of different sizes.

Mr. WHITE: I cannot give that information off-hand. I will try to get it for my hon. friend to-morrow.

296. Flint, ground flint stones, felspar, fluorspar, magnesite, mica schist, cliff, chalk, china or Cornwall stone, ground or unground, refuse stone, not sawn, hammered or chiselled nor fit for flagstones, building stone or paving—British preferential, free; intermediate, free; general, free.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Were the articles enumerated in this item previously on the dutiable list? If so, what is the change?

Mr. WHITE: Mica schist is admitted free of duty under the present tariff. There has been some doubt in the minds of the customs officials as to whether under the existing tariff it should be admitted free, and we have decided, in order to clear the matter up, to put mica schist upon the free list. The change proposed in this item will make talc or soapstone dutiable under item 711 at fifteen per cent British preferential, seventeen and one-half intermediate and seventeen and one-half general. In other words, talc or soapstone, which was formerly on the free list, is now dutiable at seventeen and one-half per cent general tariff. I may say that this article may be obtained in unlimited quantities in the county of Hastings, Ontario.

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. FISHER: As a matter of privilege, I wish to draw the attention of the House to an article which appeared in the Toronto Globe of yesterday which among many others misstatements, contains the following:

> In addition, there is a strong hydro-electric wing of the Government's support which is said to be bitterly hostile to aiding the Mackenzie interests while the hydro-electric project of Ontario, which Hon. Adam Beck has carried on from its inception against the active antagonism of what is called the 'Mackenzie electrical ring,' is given the go-by. This element is said to include Mr. Gordon Wilson, of Wentworth, Mr. Donald Sutherland, of South Oxford, Mr. William Smith, of South Ontario, Mr. W. A. Clarke, of North Wellington, and Mr. J. H. Fisher, of Brant.

I simply wish to say that, as far as I am concerned, there is not the slightest foundation for that statement; it is absolutely untrue. I am only sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the rules of the House prevent me from characterizing this statement in the language which I would like to use, and which I have already used outside the House.

Mr. J. A. M. ARMSTRONG: Through the customary lack of veracity that so often characterizes the Toronto Globe, I am placed in the same category with the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Fisher). I would like to read another paragraph in the article to which my hon. friend has already alluded:

> Other members who for the past few weeks have been prominent in well defined rumours connecting them with outspoken opposition to the deal are. Mr. Andrew Broder, of Dundas, who stated that he was not present at to-day's caucus, but had informed Premier Borden personally as to his position on the matter; Mr. Bernard Hepburn, of Prince Edward; Colonel J. A. Currie, of North Simcoe; Mr. E. N. Rhodes, of Cumberland, N.S.; Mr. W. A. Boys, of South Simcoe; Mr. J. A. M. Armstrong, North York; Mr. J. A. Best, of Dufferin; Mr. A. C. Macdonell, South Toronto; Dr. M. Steele, South Perth; and Mr. H. J. Walker, of Northumberland.

The article is false on the face of it because it states that for the past few weeks these members have been outspoken in their criticism of the deal. Speaking for myself, I did not know what the deal would be until a few days ago, so this article is false like so many other articles appearing in the Toronto Globe. I wish to take this opportunity of characterizing that statement, so far as I am concerned, as a deliberate falsehood.

Mr. SMITH: I wish to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the statement read from the Toronto Globe by the hon. member for Brant, in which my name is included. I may say that the Canadian Northern railway have no warmer friend either in this House or out of it than I have been. Everything in that statement is untrue.

Mr. WALKER: I also wish to state that the article, so far as I am concerned, is entirely untrue; and I want it distinctly understood that I am entirely in accord with the stand the Government has taken in regard to the matter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege in order to show how rapidly a falsehood can spread. I wish to read from the Daily Sentinel Review of Woodstock, published in the county in which I live, an article which is as follows:

> Despatches from Ottawa this morning state that there is a strong hydro-electric ring of Conservative members opposed to the granting of $45,000,000 to Mackenzie and Mann interests in the Canadian Northern railway. These members are opposed on the ground that the hydro-electric radial plan was set aside by the Government while Mackenzie and Mann are being favoured. Among these members, so the despatches state, is Donald Sutherland, representative for South Oxford.

I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, that in so far as I am concerned there is no foundation for this despatch which they claim came from Ottawa. As has already been pointed out by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Fisher) and the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith), there is absolutely no ground for it in this instance, and I think it is an abuse of the privileges of the representatives of the press in this House that they will send out wilfully, deliberately, and of malice aforethought, despatches which they must know to be false.

Mr. GERMAN: Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Is the hon. gentleman in favour of the resolution on the Order Paper in connection with Mackenzie and Mann?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I will answer that at the proper time.

Mr. BEST: In regard to the article from yesterday's Globe read by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Fisher), wherein my name is used, I want to say that the statement in absolutely untrue. I never gave any reason to anybody, either directly or indirectly, which would justify the use of my name in that article. I did not know anything about what deal was going to be made until it was brought up in the caucus and I am satisfied that the Government has made the very best deal they possibly could. I think that this article is on a par with the greater part of the articles that appear in the Globe.

Mr. RHODES: With respect to the article in the Toronto Globe as read by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Fisher) and the hon. member for North York (Mr. Armstrong), in so far as it mentions my name, I wish to borrow the adjective used by these hon. gentlemen in respect to that article and to say that it is absolutely false. Perhaps I might conclude by saying that I believe these proposals are as good as the Government could possibly have made, and they have my heartiest approval.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

The House again in Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Before we proceed to the consideration of further items I would like to ask the Minister of Finance a question respecting items No. 208a and 210a which were passed last evening. What is the capital invested in the plant at Windsor, Ontario, which is now manufacturing chloride of lime and caustic soda ?

Mr. WHITE: The information I have is that the value of the chemical plant is $750,000.

306. Marble, sawn or sand rubbed, not polished; granite, sawn; paving blocks of stone; flag stone and building stone, other than marble or granite, sawn on not more than two sides—British preferential, 15 per cent. intermediate, 20 per cent; general, 20 per cent.

Mr. OLIVER: Is this an increase or a decrease ?

Mr. WHITE: This is somewhat an important item. I think my hon. friend will understand it better if I give a brief explanation as to this item and the two succeeding items. The rates fixed in respect to the articles mentioned in this item are the same as to British Preferention and General as before. In other words: Rough stone and stone sawn on not more than two sides may be brought into Canada, when the new tariff goes into effect, at the same rate as before. The rates have been increased on building stone, under item 306a, other than marble or granite sawn on more than two sides but not sawn on more than four sides, and item 306b says:

306b. Building stone, other than marble or granite, planed, turned, cut or further manufactured than sawn on four sides.

We have increased the duty upon the more finished stone. On stone sawn only on two sides the rate is the same as before. On building stone sawn on two sides, but not sawn on more than four sides, the rate has been fixed at 10 cents Preferential, and 15 cents General per 100 pounds.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What would that be ad valorem ?

Mr. WHITE: It would vary. The cheapest stone is worth 55 cents per cubic foot, and some other stone will run as high as one dollar per cubic foot. A cubic foot weighs about 160 pounds. The increase in the tariff is on the more finished article. Stone sawn on more than two sides and finished, under item 306b, will run from 30 per cent to 40 per cent ad valorem, the previous rates being twenty per cent British preference.

Mr. PARDEE: I desire to speak on this item on account of certain information I have received respecting a public building in the town of Walkerville. I myself know nothing about the building. The minister, in discussing this item in his Budget speech, as reported in 'Hansard,' said:

There is very great difficulty in administering the tariff to-day on account of the difficulty in ascertaining the value of finished, dressed stone coming in as an import. The average ad valorem of the specific rate which I have quoted is 30 per cent upon turned, planed, cut or further finished stone. I propose a rate of 45 cents per 100 pounds, which is equal to 30 per cent ad valorem.

As I understand it, this is done in the interest of the stonecutters of the Dominion of Canada. There is a quarry very close to Canada, at Bedford, Indiana, from which a great deal of this stone is imported in the finished state into Canada for public buildings. It would cost little more to bring in this stone in the finished state and pay the duty on it at the old rate than it would to bring the rough stone in and have it cut here. The argument is that, if the Government desire to help the stonecutters of the Dominion, they should prohibit the importation of the harder kinds of stone of which there are a great many quarries in the Dominion, principally in New Brunswick. In the Dominion there are no quarries of the kind of stone on which the minister proposes to increase the duty. In regard to the public building at Walkerville, my informant writes me as follows:

Herewith quotations covering all the stone for the Walkerville post office, f.o.b., Bedford, Indiana:

Alternate No. 1 includes the two courses for the foundation and step sides:—Stone, f.o.b., Bedford, price, $372; old duty, $74.20; new duty, $266.40; difference, $192.20.

Alternate No. 2 includes the steps:—Stone, f.o.b., Bedford, price, $187; old duty, $37.40; new duty, $133.65; difference, $96.25.

Alternate No. 3 includes the base course and copping on step walls:—Stone, f.o.b., Bedford, price, $457; old duty, $91.40; new duty, $327.60; difference, $266.20.

Alternate No. 4 includes all above the base course:—Stone, f.o.b., Bedford, price, $7,635; old duty, $1,727; new duty, $6,069.60; difference, $4,342.60

I am merely quoting this building as an instance where this stone is used, to show the difference that will be made in the price providing the change in the tariff brought down by the minister goes through. If these figures are correct—and my informant is a practical stone man who takes contracts for this class of work in a great many places in Ontario—the minister will see that it is practically a prohibitive duty. From these figures and taking the facts as they stand, namely, that this stone can be procured in the way I have mentioned, and that there are many quarries of the harder stone in Canada, it appears to me that, if this duty were put on the hard stone and left off this stone, it would be of more advantage to the stonecutters than the duty which the minister proposes to impose. We have an almost inexhaustible supply of granite at St. John, St. George, and other parts of the Dominion. If the duty on this cut stone were lowered to a reasonable amount and not made, as it is at present, absolutely prohibitive, the object for which the tariff is increased would be fairly well brought about.

Mr. WHITE: I am sorry that, on account of the noise that has prevailed in the House, I have been unable to follow my hon. friend as I should have liked, but I gather in a general way that he is arguing that this duty is prohibitive and that the price of finished stone will be greatly increased to the consumer in Canada. We have not increased the duty upon rough stone, or stone sawn on not more than two sides; that stone will come in, whether from the quarry in the United States that my hon. friend has in mind or from other United States quarries, at the same rate as before. What I intend to accomplish by this increase is, that the stone so brought in shall as far as possible be cut and finished in Canada by Canadian stonecutters. This matter has been before the Government for many years, and no item in the tariff has been more persistently or more earnestly brought to my attention since I have been Minister of Finance than this item relating to cut stone. I have here so much material that I would not know how to use it all, and I would not think of putting even a fraction of it upon 'Hansard.' I have here, for example, a bundle of petitions with respect to this matter, signed by members of the Stonecutting and Quarry Trades of Canada and by builders' exchanges from all parts of Canada. I will just read the endorsement upon this bundle of petitions, which bears the superscription of the Montreal Builders' Exchange:

We endorse the petition being presented by the Stonecutting and Quarry Trades of Canada. We desire to have the duty on all kinds of building stone except rough quarry blocks placed on a properly protective basis in the interest of quarrymen, stonecutters and stone contractors throughout the Dominion of Canada, namely, 65 cents per cubic foot, to be measured at its extreme dimensions.

My hon. friend will observe that the tariff modifications which we propose do not go nearly so far as that; but the allied stone industry of Canada, that is, the stonemen—the stonecutters and the stone contractors—have asked the Government, not only once but repeatedly, to give them a reasonable degree of protection so that the men engaged in the stonecutting trade, who from time to time, especially in the winter, are out of work in Canada, shall have the opportunity of dressing and cutting the stone used in the erection of buildings in Canada. If the stone to which my hon. friend refers comes in in the rough or dressed on not more than two sides, there is no reason why the cost to the consumers, that is to say, the parties, firms, corporations, or municipalities, erecting buildings, should be more than the cost of the raw material plus the cost of the labour bestowed upon that by Canadian artisans. I do not see that it can be any more than that. I have received requests for the revision of the tariff in respect of this item from the Journeymen Stone Cutters' Association of America, from the following branches: St. Marc des Carrières, Quebec; Quebec city, Montreal, St. Martin, Neilsonville, Terrebonne, Belanger Village, St. Michel, London, Ontario, Niagara Falls, Port Arthur, Ottawa, Kingston, Peterborough, Toronto, Winnipeg, St. Boniface, Tyndall, Calgary, Edmonton, Moosejaw, Regina, Vancouver and Victoria. Builders associations and builders exchanges in various places have also asked for this, putting it on the ground that they desire to have the opportunity of dressing and finishing the stone brought into Canada for use in the construction of our buildings. My own view is that if stone is brought in in the rough, the rate of duty being increased only on the dressed stone, the only increase that could take place to the consumer would be the cost of the labour bestowed by Canadian artisans after it is brought in, and the legislation proposed, whether well designed or not, is to accomplish that object. It is in the interest of the artisans, the stonecutters of Canada, and indirectly, as I stated in the Budget, it will be of advantage to Canadian quarrymen. I desire to read for the information of the committee extracts from the petitions that have been received by me from the various stonecutters associations I have mentioned.

Mr. PARDEE: If the duty on rough stone is not to be increased where does the advantage to the quarrymen come in?

Mr. WHITE: The advantage will be an indirect advantage. It will make generally for the development of the stonecutting in Canada. The quarry industry in Canada is not in a very satisfactory condition, nor is the stonecutting industry. My hon. friend seemed to doubt whether this legislation would be of any benefit to the stonecutter of Canada. I have a letter from the Journeymen Stonecutters' Association, signed by the secretary, and dated 24th of March, 1914, which is in part as follows:

I was instructed by the Stonecutters' Union to write in regard to tho stone tariff. We have no doubt that you have read the article in a recent issue of the Montreal Daily Mail in which it is stated that half the wealth of a nation is in its buildings. For a great many of the buildings mentioned in the article stone is brought from the United States ready to set though there was a large number of stonecutters around here looking for work. We think that if the tariff was raised on cut stone, contractors would cut their stone in Canada instead of getting it from the United States and in that way employ Canadian stonecutters and other connected with stone.

Mr. PARDEE: According to that letter, they hope that the stone will be cut in Canada. But the trouble is that the stone taken out at Bedford is in the rough, but it is allowed to be dressed there, they only pay freight on the dressed stone, and so they can get it to the point where it is to be used much cheaper.

Mr. WHITE: That is one of the very reasons for this legislation. The freight upon stone, whether rough or dressed, is according to its weight, and in the dressing the reduction of weight is considerable. The customs tariff hitherto has been uniform, being 20 per cent upon stone whether rough or dressed. If stone was brought into Canada in the rough, and a higher freight charge had to be paid than if it was brought in dressed, the result of the tariff, so far as it was designed to benefit the stonecutting industry in Canada was completely nullified, because the difference in freight more than neutralized the tariff advantage which was evidently the design of Parliament to give under the item in question. There is no doubt about this in the minds of the stonecutters of Canada. If the hon. gentleman will look through the mass of petitions and correspondence, extending over two or three years, that I have here, he can come to only one conclusion, and that is that there is no doubt in the minds of the stonecutters that it would be of advantage to them. This legislation is brought down because it is urged upon the Government, and the Government desire to bring about a benefit to the stonecutting industry in Canada.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is it sound economy to do so?

Mr. WHITE: Absolutely, I believe. Why should not stone be cut in this country and dressed by Canadian workmen?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have never given much consideration to the matter, but I should rather be inclined to believe that it would be of advantage to the country, and especially to the artisans and consumers, that stone should be made as cheap as possible, and that therefore it should be on the free list.

Mr. WHITE: Dressed stone?

Mr. MACLEAN: All kinds of stone.

Mr. WHITE: Of course, it is open to my hon. friend to put forward that view. But the quarry owners of the country have a very different opinion. My hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) argues that this does not benefit the quarrymen of Canada. So, my hon. friend from West Lambton and my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) are evidently wide apart upon the question.

Mr. PARDEE: I simply asked how it benefits the quarrymen.

Mr. WHITE: Let me ask my hon. friend, would he be in favour of taking the duty off stone, having regard to the condition of the quarry industry in Canada?

Mr. PARDEE: I have not given consideration to that matter.

Mr. TURRIFF: How about the interest of the consumer?

Mr. WHITE: We will come to that. The tariff has not been changed with regard to rough stone or stone sawn on not more than two sides. So, if the stone is cut in Canada by Canadian workmen, at reasonable rates, and if the stonecutting industry can thereby be developed I do not see how the consumer is disadvantaged. It seems to me a wise tariff policy to admit raw material in on the free list or at a low rate, and that the finishing of the raw material into the manufactured product should, as far as possible, be done by Canadians. Now, this matter seems to be of considerable interest to my hon. friend from West Lambton, and so I propose to read from the petitions we have received from the builders exchanges throughout Canada. The following representations appear in these petitions:

The statement given herewith constitutes the petition of stonecutting and quarry trade section of the Montreal Builders' Exchange. Our body desires to have the duty on all kinds of building stone, except rough quarry blocks, placed on a properly protected basis in the interests of quarrymen, stonecutters and stone contractors throughout the Dominion of Canada. Copies of this statement are now being signed from one end of the country to the other, and will be forwarded to you in due course before the meeting of Parliament.

The languishing industry for whose life we plead is that of the stone quarrymen, the stonecutters and the stone contractors of Canada. The Government statistics report that last year there were already more than sixty quarries in operation in the West alone. We who represent the capital invested in them know better than any one else under what immense difficulties they are kept alive—where they are not already practically closed—but these figures show the immense possibilities of this industry in a part of the country where industries are scarce; and these possibilities are of course quite as great—if not greater—in other provinces. Quarrying is an industry exceptionally localized and native. The very weight of the material handled should rivet it to the soil. That it does not do so in Canada, with its abundance of good stone, is proof positive that we are suffering from an altogether unusual and unjust competition.

There was a time when Canada quarried her own stone and even invaded successfully the American market. In many of the great American cities there rise to-day monuments to these victories of the past. The finest buildings of that time were built with Canadian stone; and when the American owners desire even now to enlarge or alter them, they must still come to our quarries to get similar material. But the shrewd and ambitious Americans were very unwilling to be dependent upon a foreign country for their building material. So the McKinley tariff put a duty of 50 per cent on building stone, except marble, and 65 cents a cubic foot on marble, with a view to shutting out the Canadian product and creating an American stone industry.

That duty did its work. Protection protected. A great American stone industry grew up which now not only satisfies the immense American demand, but dominates the Canadian situation and is slowly grinding our stone industry to powder. Our protection against this highly protected and splendidly organized and well equipped foreign industry is only 20 per cent on the face of the tariff; and—as we shall show—is really very much less than that. The 20 per cent is the duty on all building stone, sawn or dressed, which the customs authorities rule covers practically all American manufactured stone imported. There is a duty of 35 per cent on manufactures of marble or granite, and of 30 per cent on manufactures of stone; but under the ruling of our Customs Department, these duties are almost wholly inoperative.

The reason for this is also one of the reasons why the new American industry is so successful. By modern methods stone is manufactured for shipment when it is sawn. The up-to-date diamond saws render it unnecessary to manufacture it any further. It is then ready for the building and comes in under the 20 per cent duty. So the Americans are able to send in their manufactured stone under the description 'sawn' and escape with no more than a duty of 20 per cent. This 20 per cent, however, is levied upon their invoices—not upon the prices with which we must compete. They have an adroit system of bookkeeping by which they show that various other charges than the value of the stone are incorporated in the price they charge in Canada—as, for example, freight, cartage, insurance, etc. These items are taken from the total and they pay duty only on what they will admit is the quarry value of their stone. The result is that they are 'dumping' most flagrantly all the time.

And this whole question is a subject which deeply concerns Canadian labour. Formerly we had the best quarrymen and stonecutters on the continent. When the McKinley tariff drew our industry over to the United States, our workmen followed it. We would like to get them back. But they will not come back until we can offer them permanent employment and we can only do this when we are assured of our own market. We shall be compelled to pay them higher wages than they get in the United States, as the climatic conditions there permit of more continuous work during the winter months.

I desire to read the concluding paragraphs of this petition, which was signed, as I say, by the stonecutters' and builders' exchanges in all parts of Canada:

As we have intimated before, we are satisfied that no system of ad valorem duties will adequately protect our industry. Our foreign competitors are too fertile in devising means to avoid the intended effect of such duties. They have already succeeded in nullifying the plain intention of the Canadian Parliament by making our 30 and 35 per cent duties inoperative; and they have gone very much further, and, by a system of manipulated invoices, greatly reduced the effect of even the 20 per cent duty they nominally pay. Hence we are in favour of establishing a duty which will not be a high percentage on the proper and honest value of the article in question, but which will prevent misunderstanding and fraud. This should be a specific duty; and we should suggest a specific tariff of 65 cents a cubic foot on building stone of any kind, sawn, dressed, hewn, polished or otherwise manufactured. This is the very lowest minimum duty which can be of the slightest service to us; and we have named it badly with a view to taking the Government into our confidence and laying all our cards on the table. In order to make this effective at all, it must also be enacted that the stone be measured at its extreme dimensions, thus forestalling trouble in the matter of measurements.

If we are granted this protection, we think that we can confidently guarantee the Government that a widespread and important stone industry will grow up in Canada. Once more our cities will be built of Canadian stone manufactured by Canadian labour. The great buildings which are now rising in every centre in the land from the Atlantic to the Pacific will be monuments to Canadian natural wealth, to Canadian progress and to Canadian skill.

This legislation, whether wise or unwise, has been brought down by the Government by reason of the strong, earnest and continuous representations made to them by the stonecutters of Canada. They say that the present tariff affords them no protection and that they see no reason why the stonecutters of Canada should not dress and cut the stone used in Canadian buildings. If the stone of quarries not only of the United States but of other countries is desired for use in Canadian buildings, that stone may be brought in under the existing rates and may be dressed and further manufactured by the Canadian artisan. Personally, I cannot see why the cost of the stone, if not manufactured on more than two sides, should be increased beyond the cost of the raw material, plus the cost of the labour which would be bestowed upon it in Canada. It is a fact that, notwithstanding the enormous building activity in Canada, there are frequent and prolonged periods of unemployment for the Canadian stonecutters, when they drift across the line in the winter, whereas they might be continuously employed here. It does seem to me that if any protective legislation is justifiable, legislation of this character can certainly be justified upon the grounds that I have mentioned.

Mr. LOGGIE: I received a letter from the proprietor of a quarry in my county and, although it does not necessarily express my own opinion, I would like the minister to consider what this quarry owner has to say with regard to this increase of duty. The letter is as follows:

> This proposed change is solely in the interests of the large cut stone contractors, as the duty on rough blocks, 15 per cent, and on stone sawn on two sides, 20 per cent, is left unchanged. On the other hand, the duty is to be raised on stone sawn on four sides or further manufactured.

That, I think, is an error; the duty is not to be raised if the stone is not to be sawn on more than four sides. Item 306b means that there is a duty of 15 cents per hundred pounds on stone sawn on two sides, including also stone sawn on four sides. The 45 cent rate is on stone further manufactured than sawn on four sides.

Mr. WHITE: That last statement I think is correct; further manufactured than sawn on four sides is the higher rate.

Mr. EMMERSON: How does that help the stone cutters if you allow it in sawn on the four sides?

Mr. LOGGIE: My correspondent proceeds:

> On the other hand the duty is to be raised on stone sawed on four sides or further manufactured. If there is to be a change in the tariff, surely the quarrying industry—developing our own resources—is as worthy of increased protection as the cut stone industry—working largely on imported stone.
> As far as the stonecutter, as we know him, is concerned, the proposed change will make little difference to him. His work is mostly on local stone, as Montreal limestone and Maritime province stones, where the cutting is largely done by hand. On the other hand the large contractors working with imported stone, do most of their work with machinery.
> We have properties in your country that we propose to develop as soon as we get the necessary capital. It is the opinion of myself, and of very many people—architects and others—that Miramichi stone is the best and the most beautiful building stone on the continent. The Langevin Block, Ottawa, Lord Strathcona's house and the Birk's building, Montreal, are well known examples of work in which this stone has been used.

Every hon. gentleman present knows the stone because it is used in the Langevin block in Ottawa. I bring this matter to the attention of the minister in the hope that he may consider if he is treating our quarry men fairly in raising the duty on stone manufactured further than sawn on four sides to 45 cents and not increasing it on ordinary rough stone.

Mr. WHITE: Is it the opinion of my hon. friend that the tariff on rough stone finished on any more than two sides should be increased?

Mr. LOGGIE: It is the opinion of my friend who is writing to me, and I am not expressing my personal opinion on the matter. My correspondent is a quarry man interested in a quarry in my county and I want the minister to consider his representation of these matters. If I were asked an opinion personally I would say not to increase the duty, to leave the matter as it is.

Mr. TURRIFF: The more this matter is looked into the more we will discover that it is exactly like other particular changes in the tariff, in the interest of the big manufacturers of cut stone, not in the interest of the consumer. There is no question whatever that if this increased duty is levied you practically shut off all competition from outside and you will raise the cost of every building in which cut stone is used in the future. While possibly a larger amount of the work that is done will be done by Canadian stone-cutters, the result will be, in the end, an increase in the cost of building with cut stone, so that under the increased duty the Canadian stone-cutters will cut less stone than at the present. During the Budget debate I drew the attention of the minister to one particular case. I do not pretend to be posted on this matter and I would be most averse to taking work away from the Canadian stone cutter. But there is more than the Canadian stone-cutter to consider. One of the reports that the minister has just read pointed out that there were 60 quarries in the West, which, according to the report, are in a languishing condition. Why are they in a languishing condition? Because their prices are simply prohibitive. They want to have matters in their own hand now and their prices under the increased duty will be practically prohibitive. I drew the attention of the House to one circumstance that came under my own knowledge in connection with an office building in which I was interested which was being erected in Regina. They wanted cut stone in the front of the building. They instructed the architect to get prices on cut stone and to get the stone in Canada if possible. They sent down to Winnipeg where there are several quarries in operation and asked for prices. We got the stone delivered in Regina, freight and duty paid, for $1,600 less than the amount of the Canadian tenders, although the American tenderer paid the duty and freight two or three times as far as the freight from the quarries near Winnipeg to Regina. The stone near Winnipeg is first-class stone and would have been entirely satisfactory, but the prices were exorbitant; and if the Government now steps in and shuts off all competition a few of the large stone cutting firms will reap all the benefit, there is no question about that. They will make more money, but I claim that the Canadian quarry man, the Canadian stone-cutter will not reap any benefit and the Canadian consumer will get it where my hon. friend is generally inclined to give it to him, in the neck.

Mr. BRADBURY: Why will not the stone-cutter reap any benefit?

[Mr. Turriff.]

Mr. TURRIFF: Simply because the increased price will shut out the use of cut stone for trimming buildings. They will use brick and cement instead.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend says that this tariff change will not inure to the benefit of the stone-cutters.

Mr. TURRIFF: Not in the end.

Mr. WHITE: The opinion of the journeymen stone-cutters themselves ought to be as valuable at least as that of my hon. friend. I hold here petitions signed by stone-cutters associations from all parts of Canada. Many of these have been sent in to me by members who have been interested in this subject. I deem it of so much importance, in view of the statements made by my hon. friend that this will not inure to the benefit of the stone-cutters, that I am going to place one of these petitions on 'Hansard.' I will read it, as my hon. friend will find it interesting:

We, the officers of the Journeymen Stonecutters Association of North America, Montreal branch, have been authorized by a meeting of council held in Montreal on November 6, 1912, to call to your notice and ask you to give your favourable consideration to the following request:

We might state that we have a membership of about seven hundred mechanics, stonecutters and carvers in Montreal, and there are fully as many more scattered around in the province of Quebec, besides quarrymen and helpers employed in conjunction with us. Our very existence is being threatened by the invasion of stone imported from the United States, cut and finished, ready for erection in buildings owing to the present conditions of the tariff which does not protect our industries. This is caused largely by the improvements in machinery and transportation, but if the tariff was framed to allow only rough stone to be imported we are convinced that more machinery would be installed in Canada and our industry would get its natural expansion instead of the trade going from us.

We have taken cognizance of the petition dated October 8, 1912, presented by the Montreal Builders' Exchange. We agree with this petition and indorse it in every way. It would be useless to go further into details which are so well defined. It is in our interests as well as in the interests of capital that the cut stone and quarry industries get the protection asked for.

It would give us much steadier work if the tariff was adjusted as our employers would adjust their plants for winter work. Many large jobs have been cut outside of Canada when members of our Union have been idle here. This applies all over Canada. The stonecutters of the West are in a worse position than we are.

The Canadian quarries are not being developed simply because they are unable to compete with the cut stone imported from outside. We know that we have the stone in Canada but the quarries have not been worked and opened up. The quarries south of Canada were not developed until the great demand for cut stone came along; now we have an immense demand in Canada for first class buildings employing a lot of stone and we would request that the opportunity be given for the development of Canadian quarries. We have only scratched the surface of the rock in Canada and have not got down to the best layers of stone in any of the quarries. We would request our share of the expansion and prosperity which Canada is enjoying at the present time.

This petition is signed by journeymen's associations all over Canada. The journeymen should know where their interests lie, and when my hon. friend makes the assertion that this tariff change will not be of any benefit to the stonecutters of Canada, I can only conclude that he pays not the slightest attention to the expression of their opinion, as given in the petition I have just read.

Mr. TURRIFF: Does my hon. friend think that the stonecutters and quarrymen are the best judges in that matter?

Mr. WHITE: The stonecutters are the best judges as to whether this particular legislation will advantage them or not; as to whether it will have the effect of giving them employment in winter in finishing stone imported for use in buildings in Canada. My hon. friend has referred to the stone industry in the West. I agree with him that Canada ought to produce all the stone required for use in the construction of buildings throughout the Dominion. We have unlimited quantities of stone, but it is a fact that the quarrying industry of Canada has not developed as we might have expected. Complaint has been made that this is due to the fact that under the McKinley tariff Canadian stone was shut out almost entirely from the United States, and that by reason of the low Canadian tariff, cut stone was imported from the United States to meet the requirements of Canada. The result has been, according to the quarrymen's contention, that the Canadian quarries have not been developed.

In answer to the representations made by my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) through the letter of his correspondent, I would say that the Government had repeated requests from the quarry interests to increase the duty not only upon finished stone, but upon rough stone. So far the Government has not seen fit to act on these representations. What the correspondent of my hon. friend from Northumberland had in view was that the Government should be asked to increase the duty upon rough stone, which as I have said, has not been done.

Mr. LOGGIE: And sawn on four sides?

Mr. WHITE: Yes, sawn, not only on two sides, but up to four sides. I do not know whether my hon. friend subscribes to the opinion held by his correspondent, but his correspondent undoubtedly asks that the duty on rough stone shall be increased in the interest of Canadian quarries. No doubt a good deal can be said for that view, but so far the Government has not brought down legislation to increase the duty upon rough stone. Whether we shall do so in the future or not I am unable at this moment to say. I have been asked as to how this new legislation will benefit the Canadian quarrymen. I think the answer is supplied in the assertion of my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Pardee) that if this legislation goes through, stone in the rough will not be imported. If stone in the rough is not imported, it is obvious that the stone required for Canadian purposes will be supplied from our own quarries, and indirectly, therefore, the Canadian quarry industry will be advantaged by this legislation.

Mr. PARDEE: If you make the duty absolutely prohibitive—and I think the figures that I have quoted prove that it will be—would it not give the Canadian quarrymen power to charge just what they like for their stone, as in the case instanced by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff)? It would establish a monopoly.

Mr. WHITE: I do not admit that the duty is prohibitive; 30 to 35 per cent is not generally regarded as prohibitive. An equal duty is imposed on many items in the tariff. My hon. friend must bear in mind that there are many qualities of stone, and that they vary as to price. Take building stone sawn on four sides, for instance; the cheapest is 55 cents per cubic foot, but it runs as high as a dollar. The average duty upon this is about 30 per cent.

Mr. PARDEE: Might I put it in another way? Taking the concrete case of the Walkerville building, if stone f.o.b Bedford costs $7,635, the duty under the old tariff would amount to $1,727; under the new tariff the duty would be $3,200. Does the minister not consider that a prohibitive duty?

Mr. WHITE: I do not know whether my hon. friend's figures are correct or not; all of us are fallible at times, and my hon. friend may be mistaken as to his figures. But whether correct or not, I would not admit that if a prohibitive duty is imposed on an article that the cost to the Canadian consumer would be the cost of the article in a foreign market plus the duty, because that would presuppose that there was no competition within the tariff wall. I do not admit that for one moment. We have quarries all over Canada competing with each other. It has not been suggested that there is a combine among the quarrymen of Canada. On the contrary, there is competition. As long as the raw material is admitted at a reasonable rate of duty the only question that would arise, unless there is some understanding between all the quarrymen, is this: How much is the additional cost by reason of the fact that the raw material is finished in Canada by Canadian labour? I have not raised the rate upon rough stone and I have not raised the rate on stone sawn on two sides only. Therefore what question can arise? If the rough stone is finished in the United States the cost at the place where it is manufactured in the United States is the cost of the raw material plus the labour. It is precisely the same in Canada. The cost will be the cost of the rough stone, or stone sawn on not more than two sides, imported into Canada plus the cost of the Canadian labour bestowed upon it. The object of this resolution is to bring it about that by a reasonable tariff the Canadian stonecutting industry may get the advantage and the men may get work during the winter months who are now walking the streets idle.

Bedford, Indiana, limestone sawed four sides, 55 cents per cubic foot, f.o.b., quarry.

In respect to stone further manufactured than sawn on four sides the practice in the United States is to sell the stone on the basis of the rough stone plus a charge per hour for the work performed thereon. It is, therefore, impossible to state the exact price charged per cubic foot on finished stone, the requirements of no two customers being alike; the patterns in each case being different with the result that the machine work cost more on one than on the other. Invoices have been examined and the average is about $2 per cubic foot.

The case which has been brought to the attention of my hon. friend may be an extreme one. It is perfectly obvious from this statement that the prices vary. We must look at the average price, and the statement made here is that the average price is about $2 per cubic foot. This duty then would run from 30 to 40 per cent on the finished stone. Rough stone will remain precisely as it is under the present tariff.

Mr. PARDEE: The minister will admit that it is much more expensive to finish stone by all hand work than by the planer. If it is a fact that there is no stone on this side on which the planer can be used it must cost more to the consumer.

Mr. WHITE: Why can they not plane it here?

Mr. PARDEE: They do not do it.

Mr. WHITE: Why not?

Mr. PARDEE: I suppose there must be some good reason why there is no stone produced in Canada that is planed here and as a consequence it must be all done by hand work which makes it more expensive to the consumer. The minister says that, provided the duty is put on as he proposes, even according to the figures I have quoted on the Walkerville building, it does not necessarily mean that as a consequence the consumer will have to pay whatever charge may be asked of him by the producers of Canada because there is competition between the producers and as a result the price will be kept down. But, if my figures are correct, they simply go to show that it will be no time at all, because this tariff is prohibitive of importation, before there is a combine amongst the quarrymen of the Dominion and they will simply lift the prices to whatever height they see fit.

Mr. WHITE: Then we can deal with it.

Mr. PARDEE: It just brings me back to the conclusion that the very minute you put a prohibitive duty upon any article that is used by the public, that minute you make it possible to form a combine and allow the combine to charge what they like to the consumer.

Mr. WILCOX: My hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Pardee) seems to have based his argument entirely upon the stone that is supposed to enter into the federal building at Walkerville. From what I can gather from the specifications, the stone that is to enter into the construction of that building is Roman stone which is a kind of artificial stone manufactured in Toronto and which will not come from Bedford. Application has already been made by some other parties who manufacture another kind of stone, which they claim is equally as good as Roman stone, to have their product included in the specifications and the matter is now being considered by the architects in the Department of Public Works. Therefore, I am rather inclined to the view that my hon. friend has received his information from a wrong source and that the stone which will enter into the construction of this building will not come from the United States.

Mr. PARDEE: I did not say that it would come from the United States at all but my argument was based upon the figures which I have quoted and which come from a contractor who has tendered upon the Walkerville building.

Mr. WILCOX: You said that it would come from Bedford, Indiana?

Mr. PARDEE: Certainly, because if he gets the contract the stone will come from Bedford. If a prohibitive duty goes on his tender cannot be considered for one moment and he is shut out.

Mr. WILCOX: I think my hon. friend will agree that under the specifications which have been adopted by the department of Public Works the stone that is to be used is to be Roman stone and that it cannot be the sandstone which comes from Indiana.

Mr. EMMERSON: They will not allow Roman stone in Ontario, will they?

Mr. WILCOX: Oh, yes they will.

Mr. LOGGIE: The minister mentioned a moment ago that he had not raised the duty on stone sawn on two sides. I infer from that, that he is in doubt as to whether the duty on stone sawn on four sides has been raised. Would the minister mind telling me what the ad valorem rate would be equivalent to 15 cents per 100 pounds under item 306b?

Mr. WHITE: I have said that the average ad valorem rate is 30 per cent.

Mr. LOGGIE: As I understood the minister had not raised the duty on stone sawn on four sides but as a matter of fact he has.

Mr. WHITE: No.

Mr. LOGGIE: Well, I understand that under the present tariff it comes in at a rate of 20 per cent?

Mr. WHITE: Yes.

Mr. LOGGIE: If 15 cents per 100 pounds is the equivalent of 30 per cent then I am wrong; the minister has raised it 10 per cent.

Mr. WHITE: Yes.

Mr. LOGGIE: Then my correspondent is right and the minister has raised the duty.

Mr. WHITE: Your correspondent is right in this: We have raised the duty upon stone that is sawn on more than two sides. On building stone we have made two classes; on stone that is sawn on more than two sides but not sawn on more than four sides we have made a rate of 15 cents per 100 pounds. Then, under 306b, for which is cut stone, we have made a rate of 45 cents per 100 pounds.

Building stone, other than marble or granite, planed, turned, cut or further manufactured than sawn on four sides—

Mr. LOGGIE: I understood the minister to say that the ad valorem rate on stone sawn on four sides would be about 30 per cent. If that be true the cost of planing is very material.

Mr. WHITE: So it is.

Mr. LOGGIE: Then the minister has raised the duty on stone further finished than that to the extent of from 50 to 60 per cent, because it is three times as much on the further manufactured article, namely, 45 cents and it is raised 15 cents when it is manufactured to the extent of being sawn on four sides.

Mr. WHITE: In reducing a specific duty to the ad valorem rate the cost of the article dealt with must be considered.

Mr. LOGGIE: Quite so.

Mr. WHITE: Stone sawn on four sides only is not nearly as expensive as stone that is planed and further finished. The result is that the 45 cents per 100 lb., which appears to my hon. friend to be such a substantial increase, is, I believe, having regard to the value of the stone to which it relates, less than the 15 cents per 100 lbs. rate on stone sawn on four sides only. Where my hon. friend is confused is, that he has failed to recognize the in crease in value given to the stone by the cutting process to which it is subjected.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend the minister considers that the stone-cutters and the large firms who deal in cut stone are a sufficient authority for him to grant their request when they place before him the wants of their business. From their statement of the case, he increases the duty largely in accordance with their demand, but when the wheat growers of Canada come to this Government and present their case, the minister and the Government do not consider that they know anything about their business. Their ideas are not considered at all; they are turned down and other interests considered when it comes to deal with their industry. That shows the difference in the treatment handed out on the one hand to the wheat growers of Canada and on the other to the big cut-stone concerns, who wish to shut out all competition and charge any price they choose to the people who put up buildings in which cut stone is used.

Mr. BURNHAM: Taking up the last point, I maintain that the hon. member for Assiniboia is clearly wrong. The wheat raisers of Canada, not considering the West alone, do not want free wheat. Some of the stonecutters of West Peterborough have been out of work for years because the duty has been too low, and for the same reason the stonecutters of the United States have been enjoying the employment that Canadians should have had. Why the Opposition will persist in dragging in the principle of protection and free trade at every available opportunity is more than I can understand, because it really ought to be evident to them by this time that, if you have an evenly, properly balanced system of protection, both the consumer and the producer are relatively in precisely the same position in which they were before that duty was put on. They are in exactly the same relative position as if there were free trade. My hon. friends opposite, however, do not seem to be able to grasp the simple mathematical proposition that if you add equals to equals the results are equal. Add the duty to all and all are equal. It is a very simple proposition, and my hon. friends ought to be able to grasp it. There is a difference as regards the outsider or the foreigner, but we are not legislating for the outsider or the foreigner; we are legislating for ourselves, and there is absolutely no difference between the relative position of the producer and the consumer when each producer, who is also a consumer, receives a fair measure of protection.

These stonecutters of West Peterborough are very desirous of having this legislation passed; and, consistently with the true policy of protection which is so widely and so well promulgated and directed in Canada, and which has resulted to the very great glory and benefit of Canada, I say that we should have this legislation and I hope it will be promptly passed without any further objection.

Mr. BRADBURY: I desire to say a word or two on this question. I have, I suppose, in my county nearly all the quarries in Manitoba. There is at Garson, some thirty-five miles east of the city of Winnipeg, a plant that employs about 250 stonecutters; at least it did when it was in active operation. It is one of the largest quarries in Canada. During the presentation of the last Budget of the Hon. Mr. Fielding, I presented a petition from the stonecutters of Manitoba asking for increased protection, and pointing out that, if they did not get that protection, the industry in which they were engaged would be affected very materially. What has been the result in that institution? Owing to the fact that American stone could be brought in in competition with our own, that institution last year employed less than a quarter of the number it was employing before. The American stone was coming in in a finished condition; all the labour required to finish that stone being procured on the other side of the line. The dressing of the stone is the most valuable part of the work. The stonecutters, who are highly paid men, were leaving Garson, going to the other side of the line and building up industries there instead of in Canada. The protection now afforded to the stonecutters is, to my mind, a wise one.

I can very well understand how the case that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) gave us a moment ago in regard to the increased cost of stone at Regina might occur. I can believe there are cases where stone from the other side of the line can be brought in and manufactured in Canada cheaper than stone quarried at Garson, but I do not think there is any such difference in price as my hon. friend has quoted. So far as the case he has mentioned is concerned, he may be absolutely right. Anyone knows that contractors, when tendering for supplying a certain quantity of stone for a building, are very liable to make mistakes or to ask a greater sum than they are justified in getting for a certain work, but that does not apply generally. On some of the finest buildings in Winnipeg, and before there was any attempt to increase the duty, the contractors were using our Manitoba stone which is as good as any stone in America. This industry is surely worthy of being aided. I admit that it would be wrong to put a prohibitive duty on any article that would give any industry an opportunity to control the market. I do not, however, believe that this duty is prohibitive. The duty on sawn stone and on stone dressed on two sides has been increased only slightly. The rought stone still comes in at the old rate of 20 per cent. One of the hon. gentlemen pointed out that the fact that the stone came in in its rough state entailed an extra cost to the purchaser on account of the extra freight on the waste. Surely the fact that the stone is manufactured in Canada; that our stonecutters are being employed by the thousand to cut off that waste, more than compensates this country for the little extra cost of the freight to bring over that stone. It is the old story over again. If we are going to build up an industry in this country, we have to take care of it, and we have not in the past been taking care of the stone quarries or of the stonecutters.

I do not think there is any part of Canada more directly affected by the proposed change in the stone duties than is the province of Manitoba; and it would be a crime, almost, on the part of the Government if they did not do something at this time to protect that industry. I am strongly in favour of what the minister is trying to do, and I am not at all surprised at the arguments presented by hon. gentlemen on the other side. But I want to tell these gentlemen that while it is all right for those from rural districts like the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) who can make an appeal to the farmers, that hon. gentleman's friends who have to face the labouring men will find it a different proposition.

Mr. EMMERSON: The Minister of Finance will recall the fact that in the course of some remarks on a former occasion I called his attention to the representations made by certain quarrying interests. I discharged my obligation to my correspondent in bringing to the notice of the Finance Minister the views of my correspondent. I wish now to supplement what I stated by reading from another letter. My correspondent, who is a quarryman, says:

> The change is entirely in the interest of the stonecutters, or builders, or masons, whatever they may be called—perhaps contractors is the better word. The change gives them the right to import stone sawn on two sides as rough stone, and puts the Canadian quarries completely at the mercy of the contractors. They never import stone sawn on four sides, it is always sawn on two sides if sawn at all and is known as 'mill block.'

This is the representation of a quarryman from the Maritime provinces.

Mr. WHITE: Does the hon. member understand that we have not increased the duty upon rough stone?

Mr. EMMERSON: I understand that. The contention I attempted to make was that the change was made in the interest of the contractors, that is, of the men who take contracts to construct a building. It is made easier for them to bring their stone in the form in which they want it—sawn on two sides. In my judgment—only in my judgment, of course—this is not in the interest even of the stonecutter so called, but rather in the interest of the contractor and is against the interest of the thousands of quarrymen employed in the stone quarries throughout Canada.

Mr. WHITE: That view seems to be absolutely inconsistent with what we are at all events attempting to do by this legislation, and I cannot conceive how the hon. gentleman arrives at that conclusion.

Mr. EMMERSON: Because the contractor wants the stone sawn on two sides, he can bring that in more favourably.

Mr. WHITE: But I understood the hon. member for West Lambton to say that that was precisely what would not happen—that stone sawn on two sides would not come in now, and that stone would have to be got from Canadian quarries. That is what I had in view when I stated that indirectly it would help the quarrymen.

Mr. EMMERSON: I am speaking from the standpoint of the eastern quarrymen. The difficulty with him is to get a market in this section of Canada, because of the high transportation charges. The Indiana and Ohio quarrymen have an advantage over the sandstone quarrymen of eastern Canada by reason of the distance and expense of transportation. There is a disposition on the part of contractors in this section of Canada to purchase the stone from Indiana and Ohio. They now get it on payment of 20 per cent duty if it is sawn on not more than two sides.

Mr. WHITE: Is it the hon. member's opinion that the Government should raise the duty and keep out the stone from Indiana and Ohio?

Mr. EMMERSON: I am opposed to the raising of all duties.

Mr. WHITE: Then, what is the way out?

Mr. EMMERSON: The hon. minister will pardon me—I am representing for his consideration the views that are presented to me.

Mr. WHITE: I thought they were the hon. gentleman's own views.

Mr. EMMERSON: Not my own views at all. A quarry owner at Montreal writes to me as follows:

> You have no doubt observed in Budget speech that it is proposed to protect the stonecutting industry by increasing the duty on manufactured stone, making it 15 cents per 100 pounds on all stone sawn on four sides, and 45 cents per 100 pounds on further manufactured stone. That will prevent the importation of manufactured stone and is evidently worded in the interest of the stonecutting industry only, with the intention of importing stone sawn on two sides only, or unmanufactured. This, of course, would be of no benefit to the stone-quarrying industry of Canada and will not tend toward its development. It shows a very ungenerous disposition on the part of the stone industry and unfairness on the part of the Government towards the stone-quarrying industry of Canada.

The gentleman who wrote this letter is not a supporter of the Liberal party, but a Conservative. These are his views and he honours me with a request to place them before my hon. friend. Now, the point I wish to make is that if the hon. minister is under the impresssion that he he is favouring the man who handles the chisel and mallet, he is evidently mistaken.

Mr. WHITE: Why?

Mr. EMMERSON: For the simple reason that the contractors can bring in stone sawn on two sides, and they never want it sawn on four sides. And there is less work in connection with the stone sawn on two sides than there is in connection with the rough stone. In the case of the Chateau Laurier, for instance, or the Grand Trunk railway station yonder, the stones that are brought here sawn on two sides go into the building practically without additional labour. That is not Canadian stone, it is American stone. The sawing on more than two sides means the chased or carved work about the stone, which is done in Ohio quarries by machinery.

Mr. WHITE: It is in the mind of my hon. friend's correspondent—I understand that he has not put this forward as his own view—that the Government should have carried the increase further and placed a higher duty upon rough stone and stone sawn upon two sides? What we have done, as I have stated repeatedly to the committee is to leave the duty as it was. We have not reduced it; we have not increased it; we have left as it was the duty upon rough stone and upon stone sawn upon two sides. I think my hon. friend does not appreciate the fact that a great deal of work is done upon the finished stone; that is the work which we are trying to have done in Canada. We thought that the interests of the consumer would be conserved by allowing stone in the rough and sawn on not more than two sides, to come in under the present rates, and that the further dressing could be done in Canada. I point out to my hon. friend that his correspondent evidently had in mind the idea that the Government should have increased the duty upon stone in the rough and upon stone sawn on two sides.

Mr. EMMERSON: I have no knowledge of what was in the mind of my correspondent; I have placed on 'Hansard' his views and suggestions, wherein he stated what he did want. I mentioned at the time that I did not endorse his suggestion, but I submitted them for the benefit of my hon. friend and in order to show what a tangle protection places business in. When you take a step towards protecting some particular class of people, you disturb the equilibrium of others; then you have to go back and attempt to restore that equilibrium, thereby occasioning another disturbance.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I recall a discussion which took place in the House a few weeks ago in which I, as well as the Minister of Public Works, was criticised because in the construction of the public building in the city of Brantford American instead of Canadian stone had been used. The subject was introduced by the hon. member for North Oxford, who has kept a very watchful eye upon the Brantford building. It appears to me that the minister is trying to meet the views of the hon. member for North Oxford and others who think that Canadian stone should be used in the construction of Canadian public buildings. I am quite in accordance with that view and I regret 5 p.m. that it was found necessary to use American stone in the construction of the Brantford building. I think the tariff resolution now before the House has in view the doing away with the use of American stone in our Canadian public buildings. The minister is quite consistent when he says that this tariff readjustment is going to improve the quarry industry, and I disagree with the hon. member for Westmorland if he intended to convey the idea that the quarrymen will not be benefited.

Mr. EMMERSON: I was stating not my own views, but the views of quarrymen as to what they thought the result would be.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I followed the hon. gentleman as closely as possible and I found it very difficult to disentangle his views from those of his correspondent. I am not at all sure whether my hon. friend put any views of his own upon 'Hansard.'

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: How would this increased duty benefit the quarrymen?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It is evident on the face of it that it will benefit the quarrymen. Heretofore the quarrymen have not had the large machinery for planing the stone on two or four sides, and when the demand for the stone is made sufficiently large and the American stone is kept out when cut on four sides or further manufactured, the result will be the introduction of improved machinery into these smaller quarries, thus enabling the quarrymen to compete with the American manufactured article on even terms. I do not know what quarry the hon. member for Queens, Prince Edward Island, has in view, but I understand that in the province of New Brunswick—in Sackville, for instance—there are quarries which have this improved machinery, which I hope will be further introduced into Canada. I myself think that this Government are laying down the principle that in the construction of any public building to be built of stone, nothing but Canadian stone will be used. It must be evident to hon. gentlemen of the committee that we have ample stone in Canada to erect all our Canadian public buildings, and the use of Canadian stone should be encouraged as much as possible. I believe this resolution of the Minister of Finance will lead to the further production of Canadian stone; that it will result in the introduction of improved machinery and that stone planed, rounded, and manufactured on four sides will be produced in Canada instead of in the United States. The quarrymen will be distinctly benefited by this increase of duty on stone to 30 and 45 cents per hundred pounds. I want to make it perfectly clear that so far as I am concerned I should like to see Canadian stone used in all our Canadian public buildings. After the imposition of the duty which the Finance Minister is asking us to endorse to-day, I believe that no more buildings will be constructed in Brantford or elsewhere in Canada with American stone, because I believe that Canadian stone can successfully compete with the American product.

In addition to what the Finance Minister has presented, I have been waited on by three or four deputations of stonecutters asking for this very thing, that their industry be protected. It is a very large industry. I refer to the men who move about and use mallet and chisel. Anybody who watches the progress of a public building will note that these men are very much in evidence upon the ground. So far as the Brantford building is concerned, up to date about $15,000 has been paid to men who have been cutting stone right there on the ground. That is only in one building. What would it be on all the buildings in Canada if we were to enact legislation that would make it possible for stonecutters to cut all that work upon the ground, to have Canadian and British citizens working upon our own jobs instead of bringing in the stone in a manufactured state from the United States, much of it made by machinery in the very highly specialized quarries of Ohio and Indiana to which the hon. member for Westmorland has referred. I would think that hon. gentleman would be the first to hold up his hands for this duty. I know he would like to help his fellow citizens, but he has the free trade microbe firmly implanted in his brain and he does not think he can stretch a point even to help his own province of New Brunswick in this respect. I venture to say that these correspondents of his and others interested in the stone business in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Quebec and further west as well, all who are engaged in either the quarry business or in stonecutting, will be in full accord with the action of the minister. I think it is a patriotic and national policy with regard to stone and public edifices which every member on either side should encourage rather than criticise.

Mr. EMMERSON: I wish to inform my hon. friend that for the last twenty-five or thirty years or even more, they have been sawing stone in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The initiation of that industry in those provinces was at least contemporaneous with the beginning of the sawn stone industry at Berea, and other points in Ohio. I have very great sympathy for the stone quarrying industry but I have a very great sympathy also for all classes of our people; and while the selfishness of the stone quarry men might lead them to ask us to especially pick them out as being entitled to particular favours there is a great consuming class, a building class, the great mass of the people throughout Canada, who perhaps would take a contrary view. The germ to which my hon. friend refers has been for many years in my brain with respect to the matter.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Are very many of these small houses or cheaper class of buildings made of stone? Are they not usually made of brick or wood?

Mr. EMMERSON: In our part of Canada wood heretofore has been so very cheap that wooden buildings for residences have prevailed. They can be constructed at a much less cost and we have not so many millionaires although there are a few who live in stone edifices. Many of our public buildings are of stone or of brick.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: While I appreciate the fact that the minister is putting into effect a very good policy, and that there should be an increase of duty upon stone sawn on four sides, still I think that something should be done for the quarrymen. I would suggest that the duty of fifteen cents should be placed upon rough stone and upon stone sawn on two sides. I believe that if this were done we could develop a stone business in Canada which would fill the requirements of the whole country. To-day the duty of twenty per cent on rough stone is not sufficient. I think that the opinion of all quarrymen in Canada is that twenty per cent on rough stone and on stone sawn on two sides is no protection at all. It may be a benefit to the artisan, to the man engaged in cutting the stone; but will it be a benefit to the quarryman? I think you will find that the opinion of quarrymen all over Canada to-day is that it is no benefit at all. I have letters similar to that read by the hon. member for Westmorland, saying that the majority of the stone which comes in here to-day is stone sawn on two sides. That will still continue on the old twenty per cent basis, and the manufactured stone, of course, will come under the forty-five cent rate. I do not believe that much of that stone comes into Canada to-day. I do not think that the duty now introduced goes far enough. That is my own opinion and the opinion of gentlemen from whom I have received communications who are engaged in the business. I know that the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) is a free trader ostensibly in certain places. He gave an opinion here as the opinion of a friend of his who was a Liberal-Conservative, but I believe that if he spoke from his own heart he would express the same opinion, perhaps not in this House but to his friends outside.

Mr. EMMERSON: Order.

Mr. OLIVER: The question is not one of free trade against protection, it is a question of a revenue or reasonable tariff against protection. I do not want to be understood as objecting to a reasonable tariff or to the protection that results because of that tariff; but in regard to this item that we have under consideration I think, having listened to the discussion very carefully, that it goes altogether beyond protection and becomes pure piracy. The hon. member from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) has urged that there should be a balance in all these matters as between that which is protected and that at whose expense protection is given. In this case we have absolutely a minor industry of this country both as to the amount of stone quarried and as to the number of men employed in its quarrying or preparation. Of such a limited character is that industry that everybody knows that all over Canada stone is imported for building purposes. Right here in this city of Ottawa, founded upon a limestone rock, the stone for the largest and latest public buildings—no, I will say the stone for all the later buildings—has been imported. For instance, stone was imported for the Chateau Laurier, the Grand Trunk station, and for a great many office buidings in this city.

Mr. MARCIL: Are not all the Canadian buildings built with Canadian stone?

Mr. OLIVER: Possibly they were a good while ago, but I am speaking of what is occurring to-day or within the last two or three years. The evidence goes to show that for one reason or another this industry is a minor one, and when my hon. friend undertakes to impose such a measure of protection for a minor industry he is simply taxing the public at large for the benefit of a very small proportion of the community. He is placing the many under contribution for the benefit of a very few.

Mr. BLAIN: May I be permitted to correct my hon. friend when he makes the statement that all the public buildings in Ottawa recently erected have been built with American stone? The Birks building is of New Brunswick stone.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not say all the buildings. I instanced the Chateau Laurier, the Grand Trunk station, and there are several others, including, I think, the Carnegie library. The matter is beyond question. We had a debate in this House a short while ago in regard to the imported stone used in the public building at Brantford, and so it is all over the country. We have the case of the building in Regina, cited by my hon. friend from Assiniboia. If it were an important industry that would be benefited in a measurable degree without injury to the public at large, I could see some reason in my hon. friend's making the change; but when he undertakes to burden the community at large ostensibly for the benefit of an industry which is of an essentially minor character, I say that is not protection—it is piracy, and certainly should not form any part of the policy of a government of this country. There was a tariff on stone before this amendment was brought in. Why was that not a sufficient protection—if you want to call it protection —to those interested in the production of stone, either as quarrymen, builders, or stonecutters. Is it not a fact that stone suitable for building purposes is only found in isolated localities, and that the freight on that stone to the place where it is used is equal in large measure to the actual cost of production? That is to say, the freight is in all cases a large part of the total cost of the stone; therefore, stone situated near where it is going to be used enjoys an advantage, by reason of the freight rate, that with the duty formerly prevailing should be sufficient encouragement and protection to that industry. My hon. friend has mentioned conditions in the West. My hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) mentioned that in his constituency there are a large number of quarries—and that is true. But from there to the Rocky mountains there are 800 miles of territory where there is actually not one quarry or the possibility of one, but where there is the certainty of there being from day to day and for all time to come an enormous demand for building material. Does my hon. friend think it right that that vast area of country should be compelled to contribute to the industry that is located in his particular constituency? Does he think that is fair? Does he think that is the National Policy? It is a Selkirk policy, but it is not even a western policy.

Mr. BRADBURY: What about the policy you voted for last night?

Mr. OLIVER: Never mind about that. In what way does my hon. friend object to my vote of last night?

Mr. BRADBURY: It was a more selfish policy, so far as the National Policy is concerned, than this, and if it had been carried into effect it would have affected detrimentally farmers all over the country.

Mr. OLIVER: I voted for it because I believed it would have affected beneficially the farmers of my part of the country and of my hon. friend's part of the country.

Mr. BRADBURY: It would have ruined hundreds of people in my constituency.

Mr. OLIVER: Not one. It would have been of benefit to the farmers of my hon. friend's constituency and to the farmers of my own constituency. While on this point, let me say that the vote was a vote to allow the farmer to sell his potatoes where he could find a market for them. My hon. friend from Selkirk to-day is standing up in this House to say that the man who wants to build a good building in the prairie provinces shall not have the privilege of doing it unless he pays an unjust toll to the quarrymen in the constituency of Selkirk or in some other part of the country. That is the difference between the two policies. I say that it goes hard with the men who are refused the privilege of selling their products in the open market to be compelled to buy what they require under the high tariff that the minister sees fit to impose. He has said to-day that it is his purpose to compel them to do so.

Mr. WHITE: To do what?

Mr. OLIVER: To compel those who want to use good stone to pay the price that the quarrymen and stonecutters of Canada see fit to ask.

Mr. WHITE: How many farmers in the Northwest will use cut stone on their buildings?

Mr. OLIVER: The farmers of the Northwest will not use cut stone in their buildings; that is a certainty. More than that, I can tell my hon. friend that unless conditions in the West are changed—as he could change them by a change of policy—the farmers in the Northwest will not be able to build many buildings for many years to come. But there are other people in the Northwest besides the farmers.

Mr. WHITE: Is it not chiefly the large corporations, banks, railway companies and such like, that use cut stone; the Chateau Laurier for example?

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend and I are quite in agreement. I have told him that the farmers are not going to use cut stone; they are not even using lumber just now, as his lumber friends will tell him. But there are towns and cities throughout the Northwest which are using cut stone when they can get it at a reasonable price. It is the hope and ambition of the people of every little town, and of every big town too, in the West, to erect handsome buildings, good public buildings, and good private buildings. They desire to use cut stone, so far as possible, in the beautifying of those buildings; and at this particular time when times are harder than they have been for years my hon friend comes forward with a proposition that—as he has repeatedly declared to-day, and everybody knows it—will lay an abnormal tax on the use of cut stone. My hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Pardee) says it will be a prohibitive tax. I ask my hon. friend if I am not justified in using the expressions I have.

Mr. WHITE: Not by any means.

Mr. OLIVER: Speaking for a country where every particle of stone has to be imported, or brought in from some place outside, the burden is as heavy to-day as it need be by reason of the natural conditions, and it is doubly heavy under the present financial conditions. Yet, at this particular moment, my hon. friend sees fit to come forward with a proposition to put tax upon tax and stop the beautifying and development of those cities and towns throughout the West so far as it lies in his power to do it. Does my hon. friend not know that it is the pride of every little village to have a handsome school building and, in that country of mud and brick, to have a little stone ornamentation upon that building?

Mr. WHITE: Why cannot they have that ornamentation and why cannot the cutting of stone take place in Canada? I am admitting the rough stone at the same rate as before. Why cannot stonecutting industries be developed in Calgary, Regina and a number of other places to supply the needs of the West?

Mr. OLIVER: Can my hon. friend explain why the cut stone industry has not been established there long ago? The stone is there, the demand has been there but we have been importing cut stone from the United States. If the people in the quarry and stone industry have not made provision for meeting the demand in Canada, that is their fault and not ours, and we should not be punished for it. But my hon. friend is going to punish us because the men who own the quarries have not been as enterprising as he thinks they ought to have been. In so far as the consumer is concerned at any rate, my hon. friend undertakes to tie up the whole of the western country and to hand it over to a small number of quarrymen, contractors and stonecutters in order to prevent the erection and beautification of buildings throughout the whole western country.

My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) said a few moments ago that this would not ultimately redound to the benefit of the stonecutters. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance did not see fit to take up the matter as my hon. friend from Assiniboia had stated it. My hon. friend from Assiniboia stated, and he stated what was absolutely true, that the increase in the tax on cut stone will prevent the use of cut stone. My hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Pardee) has given figures which show that the rate is prohibitory under this new tariff. I ask then, if the use of cut stone is going to be prohibited by my hon. friend's tariff, how is the stonecutter going to get employment?

Mr. WHITE: It will not be prohibitive.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend did not contradict the figures of my hon. friend from Lambton, and certainly the figures declare that it is prohibitory. A few minutes ago the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Wilcox) told the committee that the Government was erecting a building in Walkerville, and was trimming that building with Roman stone—cement blocks —instead of with good cut stone. Are the stonecutters going to get any work out of that, I would ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance? If he puts on this imposition so that men cannot use cut stone and are compelled to do without ornamentation or use cement, where is the stonecutter being benefited by the proposal that he makes? My hon. friend has introduced a proposition that he thought some political capital was to be got out of upon the plea that it was going to furnish work for stonecutters. It is not only not going to furnish work for stonecutters, but he is going to do a great and lamentable injury, certainly to the prairie provinces, whatever may be the result in other parts of the country. My hon. friend seems to be very extreme on the question of protection. All that anybody has to do is to come to him with a suggestion for the imposition of taxation on the people of Canada, or of an increase of existing taxation, and forthwith it is imposed or increased.

Mr. WHITE: Oh, no.

Mr. OLIVER: There may be others—

Mr. WHITE: There are others.

Mr. OLIVER: There may be people who have thought of things that my hon. friend has not acceded to, but the list of things that he has acceded to is sufficiently startling, and there is none more inexcusable than the imposition of an increased duty on cut stone.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) appears, as usual, to misunderstand this question. But before I deal with the matter on its merits, in answer to my hon. friend, I desire to call attention to a new theory in economics put forward by the hon. gentleman, which I think merits the attention of the committee. He said that if you had a large, or a major, industry, it would be a proper case for an increase of the tariff.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend suggested that without question.

Mr. OLIVER: I beg my hon. friend's pardon.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend said that if you had a large industry there might be something said for a tariff increase.

Mr. OLIVER: I said that I could see the reason that my hon. friend would put forward.

Mr. WHITE: All right, let us say that my hon. friend could see it in connection with a large, or major, industry, which industry, being well established, in all probability does not need the assistance of a protective tariff. He says that it is statesmanship in the case of a large industry, but in the case of a minor industry he says it is piracy—statesmanship on the one hand in connection with a large industry that does not need protection, whereas, in the case of the minor industry, it is piracy.

Mr. OLIVER: Sure.

Mr. WHITE: How long will the stone-cuttting industry of Canada remain a minor industry unless we change this tariff? It will continue to remain a minor industry, but if we give this moderate tariff increase, this reasonable degree of protection, there is every prospect of this minor industry becoming a major industry. My hon. friend talked about this tariff change being prohibitory and about the people of the West and other parts of Canada being deprived of the privilege of using cut stone. My hon. friend has failed to understand the changes which the Government proposes. My hon. friend should know that any stone-cutting industry in the West can bring in rough stone and stone sawn on two sides at precisely the same rate as was approved by the Goverment of which he was a member. The tariff has not been increased in respect to stone in the rough and it can be brought from the United States or any other country. What we are seeking to do is to have that stone finished and further manufactured in Canada, and we believe that this change will have the effect of building up the stone-cutting industry and, by indirection, I believe, although that view is not concurred in by some gentlemen on my own side of the House, it will have the effect of assisting in the development of the stone quarries of Canda. I feel that I am on safe ground this afternoon for several reasons. In the first place, I am sure of the facts myself, and in the second place, we have had a great diversity of view on the other side of the House. We have had one hon. member contending that there should be no tariff upon stone, another, that the proposed changes should not be made, and some others on my own side, and I think one, by suggestion, at all events, upon the other side, putting forward the view that the tariff increases had not gone far enough and that they should be extended so as to give further protection to the quarry industry. I have adopted the middle course, the course which, I think, should recommend itself to this committee, and I therefore submit that this tariff change is reasonable and neither extreme nor prohibitive. An average duty of thirty per cent can not be regarded, under the conditions that exist in Canada to-day, as prohibitive. If my hon. friend will look at the tariff which he approved when he was a member of the late Government, he will find that thirty per cent was not regarded as a prohibitive rate. Why should he now say that it is a prohibitive rate? I absolutely deny that it is prohibitive.

Mr. OLIVER: Is there not a vast difference between thirty per cent on stone and thirty per cent, say, on cotton?

Mr. WHITE: As the tariff goes, thirty per cent is not a prohibitive rate, and this will not have the effect of prohibiting the use of cut stone in Canada. It ought, as a matter of fact, rather to increase the use of cut stone in Canada by building up stonecutting industries here.

Item agreed to.

315. Carbons over six inches in circumference or outside measurement and not exceeding thirty-five inches in circumference or outside measurement—British preferential, free; intermediate, free; general, free.

315a. Carbon electrodes exceeding thirty-five inches in circumference or outside measurement —British preferential, 12½ per cent; intermediate, 20 per cent; general, 20 per cent.

Mr. OLIVER: Is this a change?

Mr. WHITE: Under item 315 of the present Customs tariff, carbons over six inches in circumference are on the free list. The change that we propose in this item is that carbons over six inches in circumference or outside measurement, and not exceeding thirty-five inches in circumference or outside measurement, shall be on the free list. Carbons over thirty-five inches and under six inches in circumference come under the next item, 315a, and are subject to a duty of twenty per cent. In this item 315 I desire to change the word 'six' in the first line to 'three,' so that the item will read:

Carbons over three inches in circumference or outside measurement and not exceeding thirty-five inches in circumference or outside measurement—free.

Mr. EMMERSON: Does that enlarge the free list?

Mr. WHITE: That enlarges the free list in so far as this particular modification is concerned. The reason for the change is to encourage the manufacture of these electrodes at Welland.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there any increase in tariff under item 315a?

Mr. WHITE: Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN: Why make a distinction between the two carbons, under and over 35 inches respectively?

Mr. WHITE: Because the carbon electrodes exceeding 35 inches in circumference or outside measurement are now manufactured in Canada by the Electric Metals Limited of Welland. I am sorry that the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) is not here. He could give us a very lucid explanation of this matter.

Mr. MACLEAN: Why place these carbons on the free list down to 3 inches?

Mr. WHITE: The reason we left the 3 inches is because carbons used for electric lights are subject under item 316 to 35 per cent n.o.p. The rates of duty are now as follows: On electric carbons and carbon points, n.o.p., 35 per cent; carbons between 3 and 35 inches, on the free list; carbons over 35 inches, subject to a duty of 20 per cent, the reason being that carbon electrodes over 35 inches are now manufactured at Welland in sufficient quantities to supply the needs of the country.

Mr. MURPHY: By whom are they used?

Mr. WHITE: In electric furnaces. They are capable of producing intense heat. They may be used even in the smelting of steel. They are used by the American Cyanamid Company to make calcium nitrate, which is made from nitrogen and lime. They are also used in electric furnaces for the purpose of making certain chemicals or even for the smelting of steel.

Item agreed to.

353a. Aluminum leaf or foil—British preferential, free; intermediate, free; general, free.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does that put something else on the dutiable list?

Mr. WHITE: This article, aluminum leaf or foil, is used to make decalcomania transfers which are subject under item 180 to a duty of 15 per cent under the preferential tariff and 22½ per cent under the general tariff. It is also a competitive article as a wrapper with tinfoil, which is on the free list.

Item agreed to.

327a. Silvered lenses for automobile lamps—British preferential, 10 per cent; intermediate, 15 per cent; general, 15 per cent.

Mr. WHITE: The reason for this change is that we desire to encourage the manufacture of automobile lamps in Canada, because these lenses are not manufactured here at present. There are some manufacturers in Hamilton who think they can increase their manufacture of automobile lamps if these silvered lenses are allowed to come in at a lower rate, and therefore we have reduced the duty from 30 to 15 per cent.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is a case where you encourage manufacturing by reducing the duty?

Mr. WHITE: That may be said, but there is another feature in it. The duty on brass is being restored for a reason that I mentioned in my Budget speech. These manufacturers will have to pay a little more for their brass, and this is a small concession which I think will be useful to them in connection with their manufacture.

Item agreed to.

361. Gold and silver leaf; Dutch or schlag metal leaf; brocade and bronze powders—British preferential, 15 per cent; intermediate, 27½ per cent; general, 27½ per cent.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there any change?

Mr. WHITE: This is the same item with the aluminum leaf, which is dealt with in the previous item, left out.

Mr. EMMERSON: In the order of the items the next is 375. Referring to the Customs Tariff of 1907, item 372, we find a reference to basic furnace slag. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee at present in discussing this matter; but when we are considering the Bill on its second reading, I propose to offer an amendment relating to that item on basic slag, and also with respect to item 663 which treats of fertilizers, compounded or manufactured.

Item agreed to.

375. Iron in pigs, iron kentledge, and cast scrap iron; ferrosilicon containing not more than fifteen per cent silicon; ferromanganese and spiegeleisen, containing not more than fifteen per cent manganese per ton—British preferential, $1.50; intermediate, $2.50; general, $2.50.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is a change in the intermediate tariff?

Mr. WHITE: Yes, but I do not think it affects the Canadian situation. In many of the tariff changes that I have made I have equalized the intermediate with the general. Personally I have never seen any advantage in our having the intermediate tariff. I do not think the change to $2.50 in the intermediate tariff will have any bearing at all upon our importations.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What was it before?

Mr. WHITE: $2.25.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister was asked to deal with this particular item by those interested in this industry?

Mr. WHITE: The steel industry?

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes. A year ago there was an application to the minister to continue the bounty upon pig-iron. Did the minister consider that question, and what were his reasons for refusing to do anything for pig-iron by way of bounty?

Mr. WHITE: We have had several applications from iron and steel manufacturers, not for any specific form of assistance, but to take some tariff action that would be of advantage to the industry. If my hon. friend will—as I have no doubt he has—look over the legislation which I am bringing down now he will find that there are many changes which will inure to the advantage of the industry. But as to the ground upon which we refused to renew the bounties to the steel industries—which I understand to be his question—I may say that no application has been before the Government for a continuance of the bounties upon iron and steel during the past year or two. The more recent applications have been along the line of placing a tariff upon wire rods and taking authority to the Governor in Council to increase the duty on structural iron and steel of the heavier weights rather than for a renewal of bounties. I said in my Budget Speech, and I say now to the hon. gentleman, because he was not present on that occasion, that while I know there is a difference of opinion among members of this House and among the public with respect to the propriety of granting bounties, my own opinion is that bounties are justifiable in certain cases. Capital is always timid. There are always risks in connection with the establishment of a large new industry. In the case of the iron industry, as the hon. gentleman knows, each one presents its own problems, and it may be that even the best-conceived scheme will encounter vicissitudes of fortune in its early years causing capital to undergo very serious risks. The result is that capital is timid about embarking upon large new enterprises unless there is some Government assistance. My view is that the Government is justified in granting bounties in proper cases for the purpose of calling industries into being which otherwise would not be started or which might be delayed in establishment for many years. Consequently, I have never seen any reason to disagree with the policy of the late Government in granting bounties to call into existence the steel industry at Sydney. There are differences of opinion, as I say, but I am giving my own view. But after an industry has been established, and has enjoyed for many years the advantage of bounties, I think it should be allowed to stand upon its own basis. It would be evidence to me that the bounties had failed of effect if, after having been enjoyed for many years by an industry which has advantages in the way of raw material which would put it upon a par with similar industries in any part of the world, a continuance of the bounties should be required. If any assistance were required for such an industry I would rather give it by means of a tariff change. To more particularly answer my hon. friend, the question of continuance or renewal of bounties has not been actively before the Government for some considerable time.

Mr. MACDONALD: I wish to know in regard to the particular item of pig-iron, was there any request for a duty upon it?

Mr. WHITE: No specific request for a duty on pig-iron to my recollection.

At six o'clock, the Committee took recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

Mr. MACDONALD: If I remember correctly, the minister, speaking about pig-iron in his Budget speech, said that in his opinion it was not desirable that there should be any increase in duty. What is the minister's view with regard to the matter?

Mr. WHITE: I said—I am speaking from recollection—that my view was that the duty upon pig-iron, which is raw material to many manufacturers, should have a moderate protection; otherwise the duties upon many articles, such as agricultural implements, stoves and a great variety of other products, would have to be raised by reason of the increase in the duty upon pig-iron. If I recollect my words aright, I said that I believed that had been the view of most of my predecessors in reference to the matter of duties upon pig-iron.

Item agreed to.

375a. Ferrosilicon containing more than fifteen per cent silicon per ton—British preferential, $3; intermediate, $4.50; general, $4.50.

Mr. WHITE: There is a change in the duties upon ferrosilicon, ferromanganese and spiegeleisen, which are dealt with in items 375 and 375a. The duty upon ferrosilicon containing more than 15 per cent of silicon is increased to the extent of $2 a ton. The reason for the increase is that ferrosilicon is now manufactured in Canada by the Electro Metals, Limited, of Guelph. It is quoted in Pittsburg at about $70 a ton; $4.50 a ton is therefore a moderate tariff, about 6 per cent. Under item 375b, ferromanganese and spiegeleisen containing more than 15 per cent manganese have been placed upon the free list. Formerly these were dutiable at $2.50 a ton, general tariff. The reason for the change is that ferromanganese and spiegeleisen, which are practically the same commodity, are not manufactured in Canada, and are used in connection with the steel industry. I may say that those engaged in the steel industry are entirely content with these tariff changes.

Mr. NESBITT: What is the use of ferrosilicon?

Mr. WHITE: It is used in the making of steel.

Mr. NESBITT: I take that ferrosilicon containing more than fifteen per cent silicon is used in the manufacture of a higher grade of steel?

Mr. WHITE: That is what I understand.

Item agreed to.

378a. Galvanized rolled hoop iron or hoop steel, numbers twelve and thirteen gauge, per ton—British preferential, $4.25; intermediate, $7; general, $7.

Mr. WHITE: We are reducing the duty in this case from thirty per cent general to a specific tariff of $7 a ton, which is about the equivalent to seventeen and one-half per cent ad valorem. The reason is this: the manufacturers of barrels complained that the galvanized rolled hoop iron or hoop steel coming in upon barrels which, of course, are in competition with their production, were dutiable at the rate of thirty per cent, whereas the general tariff upon barrels is only twenty-five per cent. This is to remedy this anomaly in the tariff by equalizing the duty payable upon imported wooden barrels, and to place the manufacturer of barrels in as favourable a position as his competitors in respect of galvanized rolled hoop iron or hoop steel.

Mr. MACDONALD: Did the minister have any request from the iron and steel manufacturers to deal with item 378, bar steel, etc.? Were there not allegations that the tariff was not satisfactory?

Mr. WHITE: It has been brought to our attention, although I can hardly say at what particular time or times in the past year and a half that it might be desirable to increase the general tariff rate upon bar steel; but my hon. friend probably realizes that $7 a ton is a fairly substantial duty, giving a protection of 25 per cent to 35 per cent on these several items. My hon. friend will also, no doubt, realize that dealing with such an item as that in the tariff would involve changes running through a considerable part of the steel schedule. Something may possibly be said for that in the case of a general revision, but so far we have been unable to reach the view that the duty of $7 per ton should be increased, taking into consideration all the matters that would be involved in the case.

Mr. MACDONALD: $4.25 is the duty under the British preference, which is a very low ad valorem rate.

Mr. WHITE: I agree that the British preferential is low compared with the general tariff, and it is possible that on a general revision something might be done with that; but we have felt that as this is not a general revision of the tariff, it is inexpedient to deal with that item on which a reasonable degree of protection would seem to be afforded so far as the general tariff is concerned.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about 377 and 379, angles and girders?

Mr. WHITE: The same consideration arises in connection with 377. My hon. friend was probably here the other evening when I took authority to the Governor in Council to raise that duty to $7 a ton upon what are called merchantable products of 120 lbs. per lineal yard or less, when the Government was satisfied that they were being manufactured in Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is structural steel.

Mr. WHITE: When the Government is satisfied that these will be manufactured in substantial quantities in Canada, and I think possibly the steel industry which is in my hon. friend's constituency may be in a position in time to take advantage of that. Up to the present there has been a duty of $7 per ton upon these products up to 35 lbs. per lineal yard. The reason why that distinction was made in the tariff of 1907 was that such products up to 35 lbs. were manufactured in Canada, but not beyond that weight. I am in hopes that within the next year and a half or two years plants will be established at the Sault, and possibly at New Glasgow, Sydney and Hamilton, capable of manufacturing structural steel up to 120 lbs. per lineal yard. As soon as the Government is satisfied that structural steel up to that weight can be manufactured in Canada, the increased duty will come into effect. It is possible that some other adjustments of the tariff may have to be made by reason of that change when it comes into effect. For instance, the manufacturers of bridges are interested in this duty upon structural steel. The matter has received a great deal of attention on the part of the Government, particularly of myself; and we realize the importance of the steel industry as well as the necessity of giving a reasonable degree of protection as soon as the industry is in a position to show that it is reasonably in a position to meet the requirements of the Canadian business.

Mr. MACDONALD: Was it represented to the minister that it is proposed to make what is known as structural steel of the size spoken of in the Sault or any other place?

Mr. WHITE: The representations were first made to me, I think, by the president of the Algoma Steel Company, Mr. Fraser

Taylor, of London. The position is that they realize the desirability of broadening the basis of their production. I think that is realized by every steel plant in Canada. During the past three years they have all been busily engaged in the manufacture of steel rails, and I think they will continue to have large orders for rails because, as I said in the Budget speech, railways will always be building in Canada, and the demand for steel rails will be large and continuous. But it is desirable that the steel companies should broaden the basis of their production, and the Algoma Steel Company had evidently reached that conclusion. They therefore stated that if assurances could be given on behalf of the Government that as soon as they were in a position to produce merchant mill products of 120 lbs. per lineal yard and less the duty would be increased to $7 a ton, the rate which now applied to the same product up to 35 lbs. per lineal yard, they could get the capital to enable them to increase their plant and enlarge their merchant mill to turn out that heavier class of product. During the year I have had talks with representatives of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company and the Nova Scotia Steel Company. I understand that they, too, in due course of time will be in a position to avail themselves of the benefits of that increased tariff when it comes into operation. I think the New Glasgow company is manufacturing steel products now up to 50 or 60 lbs. per lineal yard, but in what quantities I am unable to say.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would like to ask the minister with reference to an establishment in the town of Morrisburg. A few years ago an industry was established there for the manufacture of tin plate, and if I remember correctly they applied to the Government for the imposition of a small duty on their product. The Government, however, did not see its way clear to grant that request and since that time the industry has passed into other hands. I was informed that the new owners contemplated manufacturing steel barrels. Does my hon. friend remember any application in connection with that industry?

Mr WHITE: I do not recall any application of the kind mentioned by my hon. friend. I would ask him if he is certain that they made any application with reference to the tariff. I am unable at the moment to say what the duty on steel barrels is, but I think they would have a substantial degree of protection under the tariff as it exists to-day, I may be wrong in that. However, I shall be very glad to look into the matter.

Mr. J. D. REID: I heard some time ago that this industry was to be reorganized, and that they were to manufacture steel barrels. I heard it from a gentleman who, I understood, had an interest in the company, but I have no recollection of any application being made with respect to the tariff. If there had been any great desire we should probably have heard about it, but as we have heard nothing of it, at all events during the last two or three months, I do not think any application could have been made.

Mr. NESBITT: I know something about that. One man has the power and another man has the building. They do not agree. The man that has the building cannot manufacture without the power, and the man with the power will not sell it because he has it leased to an American firm.

Mr. REID: That would have nothing to do with an application in regard to the tariff.

Mr. NESBITT: If their product is galvanized steel barrels it is protected now under the item of galvanized sheets, is it not?

Mr. MACDONALD: As I may not be here later, might I ask the minister now with reference to item 1,019 which reads:

> When imported by proprietors of coke ovens and converted at their coke ovens into coke for use in the smelting of metals from ores and in the melting of metals.

The drawback on bituminous coal would be 99 per cent. Do I understand that the effect of that is that persons can establish a coke industry, import coal, make it into coke and be entitled to the drawback if they sell the coke to persons in the iron and steel industry or the smelting industry, or, must it be consumed on the premises?

Mr. WHITE: I think I can explain best by stating the present position. My hon. friend knows that to-day coke is on the free list for all purposes. That means that a manufacturer of coke at Buffalo, having of course his bituminous coal free, can manufacture and sell his coke to any person in Canada free of duty. He can sell it to parties who are engaged in the smelting of metal ores—iron and steel manufacturers—and to foundrymen engaged in the melting of metals. Under the present tariff it is not possible for a Canadian manufacturer of coke to obtain the drawback upon the bituminous coal which he imports to be used in the manufacture of his product, if he sells that product to a foundryman engaged in business next door or in some adjacent town. That seems an anomaly, and the matter was drawn especially to our attention by the proposed establishment of a coke industry in Hamilton. It was represented to us that if the tariff were not changed, a firm would establish in Buffalo and sell its coke in the Hamilton district to those requiring it for smelting purposes or for the melting of metal. If, on the other hand, a drawback would be allowed—which it was represented to us would not in any way adversely affect the coal industry of Canada—in which I know my hon. friend from Pictou takes a special interest—the plant would be established in Hamilton. We gave this matter very careful and earnest consideration, consulting some of those engaged in the coal industry, and we came to the conclusion that the coal industry of Nova Scotia would not in any way be adversely affected, because we are limiting the drawback provision to bituminous coal imported by Proprietors of coke ovens and converted at their coke ovens into coke for use in the smelting of metals from ores and in the melting of metals.

That does not enable a man to engage in the general coke industry in Canada and get a drawback on bituminous coal. It limits the output in respect of which a drawback is granted to such product as is used by iron and steel manufacturers and foundrymen. After giving the matter very careful consideration, and bearing in mind what I am sure my hon. friend has in mind—that we did not desire in any way to prejudice or interfere with the coal industry of Nova Scotia—we came to the conclusion that this drawback item might be safely inserted in the tariff I think the result will be that a large industry, which would otherwise be located in the United States, will now be located in Canada, and it is probable that other industries may similarly establish themselves. This particular industry will sell its coke to the steel industry of Canada for use in the smelting of metals, and also to those engaged in the foundry business for the melting of metals.

Mr. MACDONALD: What I understand is that hereafter it will be possible for a person desiring to make coke or to import coal, get a drawback of 99 per cent upon it, and dispose of its product, the coke, to parties engaged in the iron or steel business, or in the melting of metals, and he does not need to consume it on his particular premises where the coke has been made which has been the limitation heretofore imposed?

Mr. WHITE: No, it is extended beyond the present drawback provision in that regard.

Mr. NESBITT: I would like to ask the minister if he has had any representations from the gas people who have been trying for years to get a drawback on their bituminous coal and who sell coke, which is a by-product of their manufacture, to the ordinary citizen.

Mr. WHITE: I confess that I am more puzzled than usual in talking to the Opposition on this question because I do not know where they stand on questions of fiscal policy. I wish my hon. friend from Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) would discuss this question with my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). It might be found that there was a very grave difference of opinion between them on this point. My hon. friend from North Oxford would like to see a drawback on bituminous coal used in the manufacture of gas. I do not desire to express the views of the hon. member for Pictou, who is quite capable of expressing them for himself, but I imagine that this raises a question as to whether it might not interfere seriously with the coal industry of Nova Scotia which sells its bituminous coal in all the eastern cities and some of whose product is used for the manufacture of gas. It is a question upon which I do not desire to express any opinion except to say that the Government has not reached the conclusion that the drawback provision should be extended beyond the limits of the item. If the hon. member for North Oxford will take the matter up with the hon. member for Pictou, and if they will come to me with their reasoned conclusions and tell me that they have both agreed upon a common policy in that regard, I will be very glad to receive their representations, but whether I will act upon them is a different matter.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I would almost rather trust the minister alone than rely upon the combined advice of my hon. friends.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not see any ground for disagreement between the hon. member for Pictou and myself. The hon. gentleman knows that the Nova Scotia people do not sell any coal west of Ottawa.

Mr. WHITE: No, but they do in Montreal.

Mr. NESBITT: If we were to open Canada to the competition of the American coal fields, the Nova Scotia people would sell where they do now just the same. I do not think it would make a cent's worth of difference to them. It is absolutely impossible for them to reach the western Ontario market, as the minister knows.

Mr. MACDONALD: I notice that if the minister is asked a question which is embarrassing, he resorts to this little joke about some fanciful difference of opinion on the other side of the House. I would remind the hon. gentleman that he happens to be the responsible party in regard to these questions; he is the one to settle the policy of the Government, and there is no reason why he should not take the full responsibility.

Mr. WHITE: I have always been willing, and I am willing now, to take the full responsibility. I agree with my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) absolutely in stating that the matter would be very much better in my hands than in the joint hands of the hon. member for Pictou and the hon. member for North Oxford, notwithstanding the great respect which I have for both these hon. gentlemen.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then the minister is coming around to the ideas of my hon. friend from Red Deer?

Mr. WHITE: The hon. member for Red Deer, at all events, expresses his opinions openly and with conviction upon tariff questions. The hon. member for North Oxford is right in saying that Nova Scotia coal does not go into Ontario and does not reach the West. On the other hand it does reach Montreal. There is no doubt that the coal industry of Nova Scotia has to be seriously and carefully considered—and very properly so—in connection with any proposed tariff changes, especially those which may be of far-reaching consequences. The Nova Scotia coal companies sell their products in Montreal and in the larger cities of the East. If a drawback were allowed upon bituminous coal used for the production of illuminating gas in these cities, there is no doubt that to that extent the Nova Scotia coal industry would feel the influence of the American competition. I am not passing any opinion upon the merits of this matter, but the tariff item that is now before the committee represents the limits which the Government feels itself at present justified in going in regard to the matter of drawbacks.

Mr. NESBITT: I am not pressing it at all; I am only asking if the Government had representations from the gas companies.

Item agreed to.

410. Coil chain, coil chain links including repair links, and chain shackles, of iron or steel, one and one-eighth of an inch in diameter and over—British preferential, free; intermediate, 5 per cent; general, 5 per cent.

Mr. LOGGIE: I desire to call the attention of the minister to this item in connection with the following item, 410a:

Coil chain, coil chain links including repair links, and chain shackles, of iron or steel, n.o.p.—British preferential, 15 per cent; intermediate, 20 per cent; general, 20 per cent.

May I ask the minister why he makes a difference between chain one and one-eighth of an inch in diameter or over, and chain of a less diameter? He has increased the rate of duties on chain five-sixteenth and up to one and one-eighth inch in diameter three times. The rate was five per cent before, and he has increased the intermediate rate from seven and one-half to twenty per cent, and the general tariff from ten per cent to twenty per cent. I would ask the minister if he has considered this. At the present time the minister gives a small drawback for the construction of vessels engaged in the coastwise or fishing trade, and he does this in the interests of the fisheries. He is now doubling the cost of a very important item in connection with the construction of these vessels. He makes no provision in the way of a drawback for the difference in duty. I think it is due to the fishing industry that the minister should consider the matter. On chain coming from Great Britain under the British preference he makes the duty fifteen per cent instead of five per cent. Cables and chains are used very largely in the development of the fishing industry and it seems to me that he might very fairly increase the drawback because this is going to largely increase the cost of every new vessel constructed.

Mr. WHITE: In respect to the distinction that is drawn between chain 1⅛ inch in diameter and over and chain which is under 1⅛ inch in diameter, I may say that the heavier chain is not manufactured in Canada.

Mr. LOGGIE: I assumed that that was the reason.

Mr. WHITE: Chain under 1⅛ inch in diameter is manufactured in Canada and the reason why we have increased the tariff upon the chain that is made in Canada is because we have increased the duty upon wire rods. Wire rods were formerly on the free list and we have imposed a duty upon them. There was also item 720—really an Order in Council—which has been repealed. The Order in Council to which I refer, read as follows:

Iron or steel rods rolled or drawn, not less than 5/16 of an inch in diameter, when imported bl manufacturers of chain for use by them in the manufacture of chain in their own factories, is placed upon the free list.

We have been anxious to establish the steel industry of Canada upon a firm foundation; and in order to do this, we have placed a duty of $3.50 per ton upon wire rods. We have repealed this Order in Council which I have just read, and then we have adopted a uniform rate with regard to item 410a. There were formerly two tariff items respecting these articles, as my hon. friend is aware. One was: British preferential, five per cent; intermediate, seven and one-half per cent, and general, ten per cent. The other was: British preferential, twenty per cent; intermediate, twenty-seven and one-half per cent, and general, thirty per cent. In the case of chains under five-sixteenths of an inch in diameter, the rate was thirty per cent under item 454. We have made item 410a, British preferential, fifteen per cent; intermediate, twenty per cent; general, twenty per cent, so that, while there has been an increase, there has also been a reduction. My hon. friend will observe from item 410 that we have reduced the tariff upon chain, one and one-eighth of an inch in diameter and over, which at present is five per cent under the British preferential and ten per cent under the general, to British preferential, free and general, five per cent. The change has been brought about by reason of the fact that we have placed a duty upon wire rods. It is one of the adjustments rendered necessary by these changes in the tariff.

Mr. NESBITT: Why does the minister exempt telephone wires, item 404?

Mr. WHITE: There would seem to be no good reason why, if there is a duty upon wire rods, there should not be a duty upon telephone and telegraph wire drawn from these rods. The exemption that I have made is upon wire used in wire fencing. Under the tariff as amended by these resolutions, the drawback applies to that wire only. It is a minor matter so far as telephone wires are concerned.

Mr. LOGGIE: The minister has advised us that he has reduced the rates on one and one-eighth inch chain and also on chain under five-sixteenths of an inch. The sizes between those two are the sizes used in the construction of vessels.

Mr. WHITE: There is an increase in the duty on the sizes between those two.

Mr. LOGGIE: Yes, a very material increase. The law now provides that we get a rebate to provide for the duty, but you do not provide any increase in the rebate when you treble the duty on chain used in the construction of vessels.

Mr. WHITE: What is the drawback in respect to vessels?

Mr. LOGGIE: I do not know; but I know, if you are constructing vessels, you get a drawback of so much per ton because of this duty paid on the material entering into their construction.

Mr. WHITE: I will look into the matter to which my hon. friend has drawn my attention. As to whether or not I can do anything in the matter, I am not at present able to say.

Mr. NESBITT: I want to congratulate the minister on what he has done in regard to item 404 on wire fencing. It will stop a great deal of deception to the poor old farmer and allow him to get wire fencing of the size that it is supposed to be.

Item agreed to.

411. Malleable sprocket chain, and link belting chain of steel, when imported by manufacturers of agricultural implements for use in the manufacture of such implements in their own factories—British preferential, free; intermediate, free; general, free.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is there any change?

Mr. WHITE: No. We have put these on the free list when imported by manufacturers for use in the manufacture of such implements in their own factories. When not imported as above proposed, the rates in the event of a change would be under 454, in which the British preferential is twenty per cent, and the general thirty per cent. This malleable sprocket chain is now manufactured in Canada from dutiable material. We have made no change in the importations for agricultural implements.

Item agreed to.

445. Mowing machines, harvesters, self-binding or without binders, binding attachments, reapers, and complete parts thereof, not including shafting or malleable iron castings, also finished parts for repairs of the machines specified in this item—British preferential, 12½ per cent; intermediate, 12½ per cent; general, 12½ per cent.

Mr. NESBITT: It has frequently been represented by manufacturers that the former duty of 17½ per cent was just sufficient to pay the difference in the freight from Toronto and Chicago to the West. I thought I would look up that matter, and I found that the difference in the freight was as follows. Let us take as an illustration a binder that is of the average weight of 1,550 pounds. In carload lots, the rate from Chicago to Calgary is $1.13 per 100 lb., so that the freight on a binder would be $17.52. On the same basis, the rate from Toronto to Chicago would be $1.20 per cwt., which would make the freight on a binder $18.60, a difference of $1.08 as between Chicago and Toronto. Binders are shipped from those points entirely in carload lots, not singly. If the manufacturers do not have sufficient binders to ship a carload to a central point, the railway company will allow carload rates on goods of the same classification. I mention that to the minister to show him that the idea of the difference in the freight is a fallacy.

Mr. WHITE: I never put forward the contention that seventeen and one-half per cent duty represented the difference in the freight.

Mr. NESBITT: I did not say that the minister had done so. I said that a great many people had.

Mr. WHITE: I have looked very carefully into the question of freight charges. For a period of over a year and a half or two years I have been giving very full and careful consideration to the question of the duty upon agricultural implements. In view of the statement made here the other night by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) with regard to the rates on binders at Minneapolis, I desire to place upon 'Hansard,' for the information of the House, a statement as to the difference between the freight rates from Chicago to Canadian points and to American points opposite Canadian points, and from Toronto or Hamilton to points in the Northwest.

I find that the freight charges upon an eight-foot binder are as follows:

From Chicago to—
Minneapolis	$ 3 90
Fargo, N.D.	8 19
Grand Forks, N.D	9 16
Valley City, N.D.	10 14
St. Thomas, N.D.	10 53
Devil's Lake, N.D.	11 31
St. John, N.D.	12 48
Rocklake, N.D.	12 48
Sarles, N.D.	12 48
Lansford, N.D.	12 87
Minot, N.D.	12 87
Gardiena, N.D.	12 87
Williston, N.D.	14 82
Havre, Mont.	22 81
Great Falls, Mont.	23 01
Billings, Mont.	21 84
Winnipeg	10 53
Brandon	12 09
Weyburn	15 79
Regina	16 18
Calgary	22 03
Edmonton	22 03
From Hamilton to—
Winnipeg	12 80
Brandon	14 40
Weyburn	17 40
Regina	17 80
Edmonton	24 00

I looked into the question and I found that the Canadian manufacturer, speaking generally, is at a disadvantage compared with his American competitor so far as freight rates are concerned. The rates from Hamilton to Winnipeg district—because the Northwest is divided into districts for the purpose of selling agricultural implements—are higher than rates from Chicago to points in which they are in competition with the manufacturers here. The Canadian manufacturer has two disadvantages. The first is that his cost of production is higher than the cost of production in Chicago or other American points, for the reason that as the House is aware, the cost of production is in inverse ratio to tonnage; the greater the tonnage, the lower the cost of production.

Mr. GRAHAM: That holds good up to a certain point.

Mr. WHITE: It holds good until you reach the maximum production of your plant.

Mr. NESBITT: That is just it.

Mr. WHITE: But my hon. friend is aware that modern plants are capable of turning out enormous tonnage.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How about the Canadian plants of American concerns?

Mr. WHITE: The hon. gentleman has asked a very pertinent question, and I am glad to deal with it, for I do not wish to discuss this matter in a political way but rather in an economic or business way. The International Harvester Company has an establishment at Hamilton. The tangible property in Canada of that concern amounts to about $4,000,000. It has a very large plant in Chicago. We looked very carefully into the question of the cost of production at Hamilton and at Chicago and found a very substantial difference in favour of Chicago by reason of the greater tonnage turned out there. Speaking from recollection, the difference was either $7 or $9 upon an eight-foot binder. I have in my desk—I am sorry I have not it here now—the statement made by Mr. Fielding, my predecessor, in this House a few years ago, in discussing a motion to reduce the duties on agricultural implements. That statement applies to-day as it did then. I will state generally what he said, and can quote his words later. He said he had brought that industry to Canada, and he thought it would be unfortunate in the extreme if by any action taken by the Parliament of Canada in reducing or abolishing the duty, the discontinuance of manufacture of agricultural implements in Hamilton were brought about; and it would be obvious to all that if the cost of production was higher in Hamilton than in Chicago and there were no protection in this market for the concerns engaged in this manufacture, the business would be transferred to Chicago, making the cost even less by the increase of the tonnage. In other words, the International Harvester Company would not maintain itself in the city of Hamilton in the manufacture of agricultural implements at a cost in excess of what it could manufacture for in Chicago if the Canadian market were open to it equally with the market of the United States.

9 p.m.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Did they give these figures?

Mr. WHITE: I sent a representative from my office to look into the factory cost in both places. In addition to that, as long ago as December, 1912, I asked the Commissioner of Customs to send a representative to our Canadian manufacurers of agricultural implements and to those engaged in the business in the United States, and also to their agents along the border, with a view to ascertaining as accurately as possible the difference in the selling price of agricultural implements on either side of the line. That report was made. It contains a good deal of matter that is confidential, and necessarily so, because our agent was given access to the books and was treated in a very fair fashion by all the manufacurers. I have in my possession a record of the selling prices which might form a basis of comparison for points in Canada with points in the United States, where freight rates are at all equal, I mention this to show that the matter has received very careful and full consideration on the part of the Government.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Could the minister make that statement part of his remarks by handing it to 'Hansard.' Would there be any objection to that?

Mr. WHITE: No, I think not. I am as anxious as my hon. friend is to deal with the matter fairly. For, after all, it is a business matter. There is an enormous amount of capital invested—a great deal of it English capital—in the manufacture of agricultural implements in Canada, particularly in Ontario. So far as the East is concerned, there is very little difference in the price of agricultural implements on either side of the line. The statement which I will give the committee, which is taken from the report made by Mr. Costello, a very trusted and, I believe, competent official of the Customs Department, gives the following as comparative prices cash on delivery of eight-foot binders:

United States: Fargo, $147.50; Grand Forks, $147.50; Valley City, $150; Devil's Lake, $150; Lansford, $160; Minot, $160; Gardiena, $160; Williston, $165; Havre, Mont., $190; Great Falls, $190; Billings, $190.

Canada: Winnipeg, $160; Brandon, $160; Weyburn, $165; Regina, $165; Calgary, $170; Edmonton, $170.

The difference, therefore, would run from $10 down in favour of the price at the American points. The committee will bear in mind two things that I have mentioned: first, that the Canadian manufacturer is at a disadvantage in respect of freight rates, which are higher from Toronto or Hamilton to the Canadian West than they are from Chicago. Second, the cost of production in Hamilton, as shown by the returns of the International Harvester Company, are considerably higher in that city than they are in Chicago. Bearing these two facts in mind, the committee will have one explanation at least for the fact that the cash price of agricultural implements is somewhat higher in the Canadian West than it is across the line.

Mr. McCOIG: The hon. gentleman has quoted the price of eight-foot binders at different points. Are these binders not turned out with different attachments at the different points?

Mr. WHITE: A statement which I have here in that regard says that the Canadian manufacturers of binders supply an extra equipment consisting of a knife, etc., valued at about $7. This extra equipment is not supplied in the United States.

Mr. McCOIG: The binders supplied by Chicago firms are equipped with only one knife, whereas the Canadian manufacturers supply an extra knife. In some cases with the American binders one may obtain a pole truck for $15 extra, and a transport truck for $10 extra.

Mr. WHITE: The comparative figures which I have given are in each case for an eight-foot binder; I understand that the Canadian machine, at the price which I have mentioned, carries an extra knife and certain other equipment valued at $7, which is not carried by the American binder. In answer to inquiries made, telegrams have been received from the following firms in North Dakota, stating the cash retail selling price of eight-foot binders: Lewis and Durocher, St. John, $155; Aitkens and Lea, Rocklake, $155; D. G. McIntosh, St. Thomas, $155; Hazelett and Naismith, Sarles, $160.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the International Harvester Company of Hamilton export binders?

Mr. WHITE: A very small portion of their output is for export; their export business is done from Chicago. Last year was not, of course, as good a year for the manufacturer of binders and other agricultural implements as the year before. The manufacturers expected a much larger business than they enjoyed, and as a consequence they are carrying very heavy inventories. It is by no means certain that this year the business will not be less than last year. I have taken the trouble to look very carefully into the whole situation and to examine, as I stated in my Budget speech, into the balance sheets of some of these representative concerns, and it seems to me that this year their cost of production is undoubtedly higher than it was a year and a half ago when the investigation was made by the Government, because with a reduced output the cost of production is increased.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is true of the American manufacturers also last year.

Mr. WHITE: That would be true of the American manufacturers; of course they have a very much larger market.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: But they are carrying large inventories.

Mr. WHITE: They are probably carrying large inventories, but they have not as large an amount of indebtedness upon their books as the firms doing business in Canada. I was surprised to find that one large concern doing business in Canada had over $30,000,000 cash, owing to them, a considerable part of it overdue, in respect of agricultural implements sold during the last three, four or five years.

Mr. EDWARDS: What is the valuation for duty of mowers, binders and reapers? Has any change in the valuation for duty purposes been made, or is any change contemplated?

Mr. WHITE: It is my understanding that no change whatever has been made in the valuation for import upon which customs duties are levied. I believe the Minister of Customs stated the other day that no such change had been made.

I would like to read what Hon. Mr. Fielding said in 1907, because in my view it precisely represents the situation today so far as the International Harvester Company's business in Hamilton is concerned; and I think we all agree that an industry such as that, with $4,000,000 of plant and doing a business of $40,000,000 in Canada, should, if possible, be retained in the country. Mr. Fielding said:

> My belief is that if this motion were passed we would strike a severe blow at one of the great industries of the country. I believe the International Harvester Company would find it to its interest to close up its business in Hamilton, at least so much of it as is devoted to mowers and binders and have them made at the American branch and bring them from the United States. The factory in Hamilton is an American concern. With a moderate duty we have induced American capital to come into Canada and to establish that great industry and after we have brought it in and established it in Canada I believe that if they were to pass this resolution the company operating that industry would find it profitable to close the Hamilton factory and bring in the goods which they make in the United States.

I am not passing any opinion upon the resolution in question, because I do not know how far it went, but I do say that if the duty on these particular agricultural implements manufactured by the International Harvester Company in Hamilton were reduced to a point at which it would be more profitable to the International Harvester Company to manufacture its binders, reapers and mowers in Chicago because of the less cost of construction, it would, of course, manufacture in Chicago for its Canadian trade.

Mr. GRAHAM: There may be this difference, that the cost of production in Canada is not as great, comparatively, now as it was in 1907. In 1907 the Canadian manufacturer was handicapped by a duty on coal, but in 1914 he has his water-power, very cheap power, cheaper than even the Chicago manufacturer has.

Mr. WHITE: That might be a factor, though I do not think it would go to the length of destroying the argument of my predecessor.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I think the hon. member for North Oxford did not make quite as much difference between the American and Canadian freight as he should have done. I have here the actual rates. An eight furrow engine gang plough, f.o.b., Brantford, weighs 5,618 lb., on which the freight to Winnipeg is 64 cents per hundred lb., or $35.96. The plough centre in the United States, which is the main competitor and is more remote than Chicago, is Moline, Ill. The freight rate from Moline to Winnipeg on 5,618 lb. is 53 cents a hundred, or in all $29.78, against $35.96, a difference of between $6 and $7 in freight alone between Brantford and Winnipeg and Moline and Winnipeg, the distributing centre of the West. I think the hon. member's figures are scarcely correct.

Mr. NESBITT: I got my figures from the Grand Trunk.

Mr. GRAHAM: The carload rate from Toronto to Winnipeg is sixty-four cents and from Chicago to Minneapolis it is fifty-four cents.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is the drawback to be continued to manufacturers of agricultural implements? There is some general misapprehension on the subject whether that drawback extends to material imported which enters into the manufacture of implements no matter whether they are for export or home consumption.

Mr. WHITE: The drawback in respect of mowing machines, harvesters, binders and reapers and complete parts thereof remains as it was. There is a ninety-nine per cent drawback whether sold in Canada or sold abroad. My hon. friend knows, of course, that all manufacturers are entitled to a drawback upon the duty paid on imported raw materials entering into products that are exported; but in addition to that the manufacturers of mowing machines and harvesters and binders receive a drawback of ninety-nine per cent upon the iron and steel entering into the manufacture of such machines sold in Canada. We have not changed that drawback provision.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the minister make a memorandum to obtain a statement of the amount of money that has been paid by way of drawback to manufacturers of implements in the past year?

Mr. WHITE: I am informed that that has already been brought down this session but I shall endeavour to remember it.

Mr. NESBITT: Can the minister say from memory that other implement makers, apart from the makers of binders and mowers and reapers, do not get a drawback except for export.

Mr. WHITE: Yes.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Would the minister say whether the difference in freights is based on mileage or on the rate per hundred pounds?

Mr. WHITE: The mileage is greater by the Canadian route. It is a greater distance from Hamilton to Winnipeg than from Chicago to Winnipeg.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Not only is there a difference in distance but a difference in freight rate per hundred pounds. Which side has the lower rate?

Mr. WHITE: I am sorry not to be able to answer that. I looked into the matter and ascertained that the rates were in favour of the American manufacturer.

Mr. GRAHAM: The freight rate per hundred, per carload, per mile, is dearer, I think, on the other side.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I do not think so.

Mr. GRAHAM: The freight rate on agricultural implements per hundred in carload lots is 64 cents between Toronto and Winnipeg, and 54 cents between Chicago and Minneapolis.

Mr. HANNA: The hon. gentleman is wrong.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Grand Trunk Railway Company gave me the figures.

Mr. HANNA: The price which was quoted me was 20 cents a hundred from Chicago to Minneapolis, and 64 cents from Hamilton or Toronto to Winnipeg.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Grand Trunk railway quoted me the rate per carload, namely, 64 cents per hundred in carload lots from Toronto to Winnipeg, and 54 cents from Chicago to Minneapolis. That is as plain as they could make it.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: In that case the American roads were quoting a competing rate with Canadian railways; in the other case they were not. My understanding is that freight rates are lower on the other side.

Mr. HANNA: The figures were given to me by a manufacturer of harvesting implements in Smith's Falls, and I think they are absolutely correct. Some statements had been made here in regard to the difference in price of agricultural implements in Winnipeg and Minneapolis and this gentleman gave me the following figures: on binders from Chicago to Minneapolis the rate is 20 cents a hundred, and from Hamilton, or Toronto, to Winnipeg, 64 cents; a difference of 44 cents making a difference of $9 on the binder. The difference in price between an 8-foot binder in Winnipeg and Minneapolis is $10 actually, so it only leaves one dollar of difference in the price of a binder when you take into account the difference in freight rates.

Item agreed to.

453a. Electrical dental engines—British preferential, 15 per cent; intermediate, 27½ per cent; general, 27½ per cent.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the change in that?

Mr. WHITE: Electrical dental engines were formerly on the free list. They are now manufactured in Canada and we have increased the rate.

Mr. NESBITT: Does the minister think that will raise the price of teeth fillings?

Mr. WHITE: I do not think so. Our dental friends made no objection; in fact, it will be a good thing for them, as they can get their material for repairs from Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. MACDONALD: Going back to item 445a, was any change made in regard to malleable iron castings?

Mr. WHITE: No change. I am glad my hon. friend has drawn attention to that. Item 445 under the present tariff includes Mowing machines, harvesters, self-binding or without binders, binding attachments, reapers and complete parts thereof, not including shafting, 17½ per cent.

We have reduced that to 12½ per cent. Malleable iron castings have not been included, as the manufacturers would not be able to stand the reduction from 17½ per cent to 12½ per cent. We have consequently allowed the rate on malleable iron castings to remain precisely as it was.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where are those industries located?

Mr. WHITE: There is one at Oshawa, another at Hamilton, and others in Ontario.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is the malleable iron casting company in Hamilton associated with the International Harvester Company?

Mr. WHITE: I was not aware, until some gentleman told me, that there was a malleable castings factory in Hamilton, so I am unable to answer my hon. friend. I know the one at Oshawa is not connected with the agricultural implement industry. There is another factory at Brantford, which is also an independent company.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would the minister point out the item in the tariff relating to iron tubes or iron pipes?

Mr. WHITE: We have passed that; it is item 398.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is there an increase in that?

Mr. WHITE: Yes. If my hon. friend will look at item 398 of the present tariff he will find the following:

Wrought or seamless iron or steel tubing, plain or galvanized, threaded and coupled or not, over 4 inches in diameter, n.o.p., 15 per cent.

Item 399 reads:

Wrought or seamless iron or steel tubing, plain or galvanized, threaded and coupled or not, 4 inches or less in diameter, n.o.p., 35 per cent.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Do the manufacturers import this material and put it together in this country?

Mr. WHITE: No, they manufacture it here from dutiable raw material. My hon. friend is probably aware that the reason for the difference between the 15 per cent and 35 per cent rate is because wrought or seamless iron or steel tubing over four inches in diameter was not manufactured in Canada. The Page Hersey Company, at Guelph, which has also an establishment at Welland, now manufactures this wrought or seamless iron or steel tubing up to 10 inches in diameter. We have therefore increased the duty on tubing between 4 and 10 inches in diameter. Item 398a in the new schedule covers tubing over 10 inches in diameter, which we have left at the rate of 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

471. Rolled round wire rods in the coil, of iron or steel not over three-eighths of an inch in diameter, when imported by wire manufacturers for use in making wire in the coil in their own factories, per ton—British preferential, $2.25; intermediate, $3.50; general, $3.50.

471a. Rolled round rods in the coil, or iron or steel, whether annealed or cleaned, or not, when imported by manufacturers of chain for use only in their own factories in the manufacture of chain, per ton—British preferential, $2.25; intermediate, $3.50; general, $3.50.

Mr. LOGGIE: Regarding items 471 and 471a, the minister said in his Budget speech:

We have reached the conclusion that the apprehension on the part of the nail-making firms who have opposed the granting of a duty is not well founded. We believe it is in the interest of the nail-making industry as well as the wire rod industry that a duty should be imposed.

The minister did not state why that apprehension was not well founded. He told us of the representations made by the small nail makers as to why the duty on wire rods should not be put on. Then he recited to us the reasons why the duty should be put on as asserted by the two large mills that make the greater proportion of the nails. If he had explained to us on what basis he comes to that conclusion we might the more intelligently conform to his suggestion that we place a duty upon wire rods. After I have had his answer to that I will have something further to say as to what will be the result of this duty on wire rods with respect to nails.

Mr. WHITE: There can be no object on the part of the manufacturers of wire rods, who would desire to increase their product and find a market for it in Canada, attempting to destroy those industries engaged in the manufacture of nails. They have expressly repudiated any intention of doing so and it has been my own experience that these large concerns do not deliberately set about trying to injure smaller concerns. The object of the manufacturers of wire rods—the Dominion Iron and Steel Companies and Steel Company of Hamilton, who are engaged in the manufacture of wire rods—is to sell their product to those engaged in the manufacture of nails and it is inconceivable that they should attempt to destroy them. My hon. friend will admit, I am sure, that those who have a protection at the present time of 60 cents per keg upon wire nails can hardly be heard to object to the imposition of a reasonable duty on wire rods. Wire rods, as my hon. friend knows, have been upon the free list. We have placed a duty of $3.50, general, upon wire rods when imported for us in making wire into coil in the importers' own factories. That is a duty under 15 per cent and it did not appear to me, after his having given the matter as careful and painstaking consideration as I have ever given any question in my life, that it would be just to deny to the manufacturers of wire rods a duty as reasonable as that by reason of the fact that the manufacturer of nails, having a duty of 60 cents a keg, which would represent probably 30 per cent or more—

Mr. LOGGIE: About 40 per cent.

Mr. WHITE:—would be apprehensive that the manufacturer of wire rods would take advantage of the duty for the purpose, to put it in a commonplace way, of putting him out of business.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If they did that, how would you propose to punish them? I understood the minister, when delivering his Budget speech, to utter a word of warning to the manufacturers of steel wire who are also engaged in the manufacture of nails, and I have been wondering what was in the mind of the minister.

Mr. WHITE: When I used those words, I used them generally, not speaking of the manufacture of wire rods only; but I have held the view that the manufacturers in Canada of any commodity, enjoying the benefits of the protective system, should endeavour to take care of their market, and should not pursue any course having as its object the destruction of other enterprises. In other words, I believe that they should carry on their business in a fair way. What is a fair way will depend upon circumstances and upon the judgment that is brought to bear upon the matter. I realise the difficulties of the Government undertaking to pronounce upon what is fair and what is unfair, but I would not hesitate to say that if I came to the conclusion that a deliberate course was being pursued—and no such circumstances have been brought to my attention since I have been a minister—of attempting to destroy or injure others who were endeavouring to carry on their business in a proper way in Canada, I would not hesitate to pass an Order in Council reducing or even abolishing the duty. Take the case of the cement cut; I held, and I said, too, in this House, that it was the duty of the cement manufacturers to take care of their market and to provide that, when the West wanted cement as they knew they would want cement, that cement should be at the head of the lakes in time to meet the requirements of the West. Having failed to do that in that particular year, I had no hesitation in reaching the conclusion that I should cut the duty in half for a limited period. In this case I do not hold out any threat, because I do not think any threat is necessary. I believe that it is in the interest of the manufacturers of wire rods to carry on their business fairly with the manufacturers of wire nails. I have no reason to believe that they will take any undue or improper advantage of this tariff imposition, which I believe is clearly necessary if we are to have a wire rod industry in Canada. Personally, I do not like to look forward to the possibility of this country having to depend absolutely upon a supply of wire rods from external sources.

Mr. LOGGIE: The large companies have assured the minister

That they will, by no means, injure those engaged in the nail business.

I did not know but that the minister might be able to give us some idea as to how they will be able to operate this business without injuring small nail-makers. In my judgment, the minister is creating a monopoly in the hands of two great companies that may jump the price of wire rods to the small nail men and then jump the price of nails to the people of Canada.

Mr. WHITE: Is my hon. friend aware that I have not raised the duty on nails?

Mr. LOGGIE: Yes, I am aware that the minister has not raised the duty on nails. If he had lowered the duty on nails he might have been able to protect the consumer, but instead of that he leaves the duty where it is, equal to about 40 per cent of the present value f.o.b. Pittsburg. The rate is 60 cents per keg, and the effect will be that by this duty of 17½ cents upon wire rods, the minister will take three-quarters of a million dollars out of the pockets of the people on the one item of nails, which are the product of wire rods. These two companies will not injure the small nail makers, but they will charge the small nail-makers 17½ cents more for their rods and then they will make the price that they will charge the wholesale trade, and I venture to say that you will find that nails when sold to the consumer will be at least fifty cents a keg higher than they were last year.

Mr. WHITE: May I ask the hon. gentleman if the price of nails has fallen in the last two years, and if so, how much?

Mr. LOGGIE: Yes.

Mr. WHITE: How much?

Mr. LOGGIE: I think about 20 cents per keg.

Mr. WHITE: Would the building trade resume its activity if they went up 20 cents a keg?

Mr. LOGGIE: I do not know that I would be very much surprised if they went up 50 cents a keg; that is what I expect to see.

Mr. WHITE: How much of the duty of 60 cents a keg is now taken by the manufacturer of nails in Canada?

Mr. LOGGIE: Nearly the whole of it is taken. The base price of nails in Canada is about $1.90 and the base price in Pittsburg is about $1.40, so that a large proportion of the duty of 60 cents per keg on nails is now added to the price by the Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. WHITE: I would like to ask my hon. friend how the price by any chance could go up 50 cents a keg if there is only 20 cents of a leeway under the tariff?

Mr. LOGGIE: There will be a perfect monopoly.

Mr. WHITE: I am not raising the duty on nails.

Mr. LOGGIE: I admit you are not raising the duty on nails; but the effect will be that, when the 17½ cents are added to the price of the raw material, notwithstanding the promise that the small nail manufacturers are not to be hurt, the two large mills that supply the wire rods to the small mills will be able to dictate prices. The small mills will make as much money as they make now and perhaps more. Possibly they are unduly competing one with another at the present time, and that is perhaps one reason why nails are being sold now at a reasonable price. The wholesale price at present, I think, is $2.10 to $2.15; but the Pender people in St. John and the Maritime people were selling them as low or a little lower than $2 base, but at present the price in Montreal is $2.15 in a small way. I may be wrong, but my judgment is that the minister is placing this industry of manufacturing nails in the hands of two great steel companies, the Dominion Iron and Steel Company and the Steel Company of Hamilton, who together manufacture 70 per cent of the 1,500,000 kegs used in Canada which amounts to 1,050,000 kegs, so that they can very well afford to accept 17½ cents per 100 lb. extra from the small companies when they have the power to dictate to the small companies what shall be the price of nails to the wholesale trade. As the hon. minister goes around the country in his automobile—

Mr. WHITE: I have not got one.

Mr. LOGGIE: —and when he sees the farmers using four or five kegs of nails in the construction of a barn, he will see that he is taking out of the consumers an extra tax of $2.50 for the construction of each barn, because of this duty. It would not be so bad if he could limit it to 17½ cents per 100 lb., the amount of the duty on the rods. There is no difficulty for a number of nail manufacturers to form a combine; but they sometimes become dissatisfied one with another, and the combine is not maintained. That has occurred recently. But owing to the control by the two large companies, I suggest that the small companies will be subject to their dictation as to the price at which the nails are to be sold to the trade.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is the price necessarily raised to the consumer?

Mr. LOGGIE: That has been our experience. You cannot have a monopoly where there is not a large investment; but whenever you have a large investment in say two companies, there can easily be arranged a monopoly as to selling price.

Mr. BURNHAM: Has the minister not provided against that?

Mr. LOGGIE: No, he has not provided. He has put into the hands of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company and the Steel Company of Hamilton the power to charge what prices they can.

Mr. WHITE: Apart from the tariff of sixty cents per one hundred pounds on nails, which I have not changed, what was to prevent the Dominion Iron and Steel Company and the Steel Company of Hamilton and the small nail manufacturers from getting together, because that is what my hon. friend suggested last summer? What change is there in that regard? My hon. friend says that will create a monopoly in the manufacture of nails. What was to hinder them from doing that last year? My hon. friend knows that I have not changed the duty on nails.

Mr. LOGGIE: That is exactly what was done. The prices went up but the monopoly did not stand. The agreement was not adhered to by each of them.

Mr. WHITE: That was under the present tariff?

Mr. LOGGIE: Yes.

Mr. WHITE: I was not responsible for that.

Mr. LOGGIE: But you are now confining the monopoly to two companies.

Mr. WHITE: The others are still in business.

Mr. LOGGIE: The others cannot move because they are dictated to by the wire companies that supply the wire rods. They will dictate to the people of Canada and take out of their pockets $750,000 because fifty cents a keg on 1,500,000 kegs is equal to $750,000.

Mr. WHITE: My hon friend comes from the Maritime provinces; and apart from the particular intelligence that characterizes all who come from there, they are all interested in the steel industry. The steel industry is one of the great basic industries of Canada, and I think it is a mistake to look upon these two companies simply as two companies, for we must remember that they represent a great deal of capital, including English and foreign capital. Does my hon. friend think it fair that under our system those two great industries should not have a reasonable measure of protection on their wire rod production, which is one of the most important branches of their production? Under present conditions, and especially under the conditions which prevail in the United States to-day, that powerful corporation, the United States Steel Company, highly specialized, developed over very many years under a protective system, is able to hold its own market and to sell its wire rods in Canada at two or three dollars a ton below the cost of production, let us say, at Hamilton. I have had the matter looked into, and I know the cost in the city of Hamilton to the Steel Company of Hamilton. My hon. friend, as I understand him, is opposed to the imposition of a duty upon wire rods.

Mr. LOGGIE: I have not so much objection to the duty on wire rods as I have to your allowing to remain a duty of 60 cents per keg on nails. If you would reduce the duty on nails, you would prevent and avoid the difficulty of a combine and an undue advance in the price of the manufactured article.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend is usually a very fair minded man. Does he not think he would get the manufacture of nails coming and going? Under the Fielding tariff, under which my hon. friend sat for many years, and to which, I believe, he gave very generous and loyal support, for which I do not blame him, the duty on nails was 60 cents per keg, and the wire rods from which those nails were made were on the free list. I have raised the duty on wire rods to $3.50 per ton, and my hon. friend does not dissent from my action. What about the manufacture of wire nails? Under the Fielding tariff he had 60 cents per keg protection, equal to from 30 per cent to 40 per cent, and he had his wire rods free. I raised his wire rods to $3.50; and my hon. friend, who never protested before, so far as I can learn, against the duty of 60 cents per keg imposed by the late Government, says now that it is an injustice to the consuming public because we do not reduce the duty upon wire nails. If we did that, as I said, we would get the manufacturer coming and going. We would increase the cost of his raw material, and we would decrease the protection, which presumably has been reasonable, because it was supported by my reasonable friend (Mr. Loggie), I think my hon. friend's apprehensions are not well founded, and I will tell him why. There is a competition in the country in respect of nails, and I do not believe a combine will be formed because it is too big a country. At the present time the nail manufacturers of Canada are not taking advantage of the full amount of the tariff rates. It is often stated in this House that the price of an article in Canada is determined by the cost of production plus the freight and the duty. That is not correct. It may be correct in some cases; but it is by no means correct in all cases, and it certainly is not correct in the case of nails.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How much of that tariff do the nail manufacturers pay?

Mr. WHITE: At the present time I am not in agreement with my hon. friend, although he may be correct. I will make this statement, that they are not taking anything like the whole of the tariff protection.

Mr. CURRIE: They are not taking any of it.

Mr. WHITE: I am glad to have my hon. friend, who is engaged in the business, make that statement. I understood they were either taking none or very little of the protection. In Canada we have an over-production of nails, which one would expect in a period like this; when there has been somewhat of a stagnation in building activities one would expect that the price of nails would fall. I have been advised, as my hon. friend (Mr. Currie) states, that the nail manufacturers are not taking any of the duty. Assuming that what my hon. friend (Mr. Loggie) states is correct, that is that they are taking a little more than half of the duty, the balance is leeway for them to go upon if they desire to take advantage of the protection afforded by the tariff rates. I do not suggest for a moment that should be done, because I think the price should be determined by competition in Canada within the tariff wall. And the safeguard against monopoly is the power of the Government to reduce the rates upon wire nails or other commodities in the event of a combine being formed, and there is the necessary legislation on the statute book already to enable the Government to take that action.

Mr. NESBITT: I quite appreciate the fear expressed by my hon. friends on this side. There is no monopoly at present; I understand some of the manufacturers are selling wire nails at less than cost. But when the Dominion Steel Company and the Canada Steel Company have the benefit of these duties on rods, as they manufacture nails also, it is possible that they will say to the other manufacturers of nails: We will sell your rods at a certain price, but if we catch you cutting the price of nails we will sell you no more rods. I am not a prophet, nor am I a prophet's son, so I am not going to say that that is what they will do. But they cannot do it now, because the rods come in free, and the smaller manufacturers can laugh at the big concerns and even compete with them. As to the help that this duty will give, I hope it will be as useful as my hon. friends thinks it will. My own notion is that both these concerns should be reorganized from the inside. I have said that before.

Mr. CURRIE: I desire to correct a wrong impression of my hon. friend when he spoke of the prices of nails in the United States and Canada. At present in the United States there are three large concerns that in the past twenty months have gone into the manufacture of nails—the Jones and Loughlon Company, of Pittsburg; the Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company, of Youngstown, Ohio; and the Cambria Company, of Johnstown, Pa. Prices are unduly depressed in the United States. I have here the Iron Age, which gives the price of nails in Chicago as $1.78. Nails are selling to-day in Toronto and Hamilton at $1.85. During my connection with the business, which extends over eight or nine years, I have never seen nails selling in Canada at higher prices than they were selling for in Chicago. Now, as a matter of fact, no person can buy wire rods in the United States cheaper than $24.50 per ton. If you take the cost of conversion, which is $15 per ton, from the cost per ton of the wire nails as sold at $1.78, you will find that wire rods for conversion purposes are estimated by these concerns at $20 per ton.

Now, as to the matter of wire nails, there is no possibility of combination. The American market for the finished product is so low as compared with the raw material, and the rate at which they can send them in here is so low that nails must always be sold at a very narrow margin in Canada. I do not think there is a possibility of anybody suffering through the imposition of this duty. Tremendous competition is an economic waste. Some makers may be better situated than others for getting raw material, and when there is a free market, they compete unduly. Take, for instance, the makers in New Brunswick. The man who manufactures wire in New Brunswick can bring in his raw material into St. John cheaper than can any manufacturer in the West, and at the same time, he can land his product in Winnipeg and the West, for virtually the same amount as can any manufacturer in Ontario.

So far as the manufacture of nails is concerned, I am sure that any change will be a change for the better. The companies are all confronted with the fact that the United States Steel Corporation is coming over shortly and will manufacture all lines of wire products and steel. They will supply themselves with semi-raw material on which they will take all the profit on the other side and will sell here in competition on that basis. Just as the American manufacturers of reapers do. They have branches here and they send in material from the United States semi-finished, they assemble it here and sell. There is no method of getting at such concerns for dumping, and there will be ample and free competition in Canada.

Now, as to whether anybody is going to suffer, whether anybody is going to be placed in the hands of the large corporations, I would remind the committee that the minister in his speech stated that if there was any attempt to squeeze the small manufacturer, the Government would take prompt action and put a stop to it. I do not think any Minister of the Crown has ever made that statement before in the case of an industry of this kind. In view of that statement, I think it would be well for us to accept the situation. For we must all recognize that if we are going to get the wider markets which my hon. friends from the West talk about, we must increase the number of workingmen in this country. The United States, in 1872, discovered that the state of Illinois was producing such large quantities of wheat that their surplus was more than ample to supply all the requirements of the British market. And a great panic ensued, the people fearing that they could not find a market. The Americans took that into consideration and increased their duty on everything, adopting a higher protective policy. They went on this basis: If a man in England is producing goods for the United States, only about ten per cent of the flour he consumes would be produced in the United States. And in our case today, if a man in the United States produces an article to be sent to Canada, only about one-tenth of one per cent of the food he consumes is produced in Canada. The remedy, of course, is to put up a tariff wall and have these men produce goods here. In that way the western farmer will get the benefit of the whole consumption of these people. And in the United States, by putting up that wall, they are enabled to consume virtually all the food they produce, except in some years when they have an exceptional margin of wheat, but are never in danger of suffering because of the need of a wider market.

The best place to get a wider market is right here in this country; Canada is suffering at the present time from too much importation. Many of our friends in the West, if given the choice between an American made and a Canadian made article, buy the American article. It does seem to me that the proper way to look at this matter is from the national standpoint; from the standpoint of what is going to benefit the country the most and of what is going to benefit the farmers in the West the most. How are they going to get their wider market? Every man who supplies goods to the people of this country should be compelled to live in Canada, so that he will help consume the grain of the West. Where are all these new cities going to get their workingmen? How are they going to exist unless the Government of this country wisely places a tariff upon certain articles and encourages their manufacture in this country? I heard a protest from hon. gentlemen from the West this afternoon with regard to quarry stone. A quarry employing 200 men is in operation a few miles this side of Winnipeg. Why should not all this stone be manufactured in Canada? I had some work to do in my riding on a public building, and I insisted that a large quantity of Canadian marble should be used in its construction. The result was that there was opened at Maddock a fine quarry that will supply millions of dollars worth of fine marble stone which might otherwise be brought all the way from Italy. Is it not better to have the workingmen of this country, who consume the beef and grain of the West, polish and manufacture this marble than to have it done by foreign workmen who consume only a very small proportion of the products of our farms? It is just as essential for us to have a large number of factories in this country and to have workingmen consuming our products as it is for the United States—and the example of the United States is a very good example to follow. I do not think anybody will suffer from this duty on wire rods; I do not think that the smaller people will be put out of business. I have an interest in a mill and if it were not beneficial I would be the first man to denounce it.

Mr. LOGGIE: I quite agree with my hon. friend that the duty will not hurt the small mill, but I fear the dictation of prices all over Canada. Why can we not in Canada manufacture rods into nails as cheaply as they can in the United States?

Mr. CURRIE: Does my hon. friend not think that the Canadian manufacturer is entitled to a fair and reasonable profit, or must he do business for nothing?

Mr. LOGGIE: Is it not a fair assumption that the United States manufacturer of nails makes a profit? Assuming that the rods cost the American manufacturer $24.50 a ton and the Canadian manufacturer $28 a ton, why should there be any greater difference between the prices of the manufactured article than the difference between the respective costs of the raw material? I have handled thousands of kegs of nails, and I have never in my life handled any other than Canadian nails for consumption in Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS: Have you ever made any money on them?

Mr. LOGGIE: I certainly have. I have bought United States nails in the United States for consumption in that country, and I have often wondered why there should be so much difference between the price in Canada and the price in the United States.

Mr. CURRIE: I told the hon. gentleman a moment ago that if the American manufacturers had to pay for their rods the price at which they are willing to sell them, $24.50, it would be impossible for them to sell nails at $1.75 a keg. But the American concerns have a great many improved processes of manufacture. The larger concerns across the line own their own ore and their own coal and manufacture their own pig iron and steel, and they are willing to forego the profits on ten operations perhaps in order to make a profit upon one. I have never known the manufacturers of this country to sell nails at a price one cent higher than they were selling in Chicago, and I think that if the Canadians can get their nails as cheaply in Canada as they are selling in Chicago, nobody need worry.

Mr. LOGGIE: If the Canadian can get his nails at the same price as the American, plus the amount of the duty we are placing upon the rods, I shall make no complaint whatever.

Mr. CURRIE: The Canadian manufacturer cannot get his labour nearly as cheaply as it is obtained in the big iron centres of the United States. The labour employed in this business is largely coloured and foreign labour, Poles and Bulgarians. They are paid $1.25 a day, whereas we pay labourers $2 a day.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I understand that there is a provision in the resolution whereby the new tariff applicable to wire rods shall not become operative until July next. If that is the case, will the minister explain why that provision has been made?

Mr. WHITE: Resolution 6 is as follows:

6. Resolved, that the foregoing provisions shall be held to have come into force on the seventh day of April, 1914, and to have applied to all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day, and to have also applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day, except as otherwise provided in the foregoing resolutions:

Provided, notwithstanding any increase in Customs under the said resolutions, that all goods actually purchased on or before the sixth day of April, 1914, for importation into Canada, on evidence satisfactory to the Minister of Customs of the purchase having been so made, and all goods in warehouse in Canada on such day, if entered for duty after importation prior to the first day of July, 1914, may be entered at the rate of duty in force on the said sixth day of April, 1914.

The hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll), referring to that proviso said it was unprecedented. That is not the fact and I privately drew his attention to it after his speech. In 1904, upon what was regarded, as I regard this, as a partial revision of the tariff, a similar provision was attached to the tariff resolutions. I shall read the resolution of that day:

6. Resolved, that the foregoing provision shall be held to have come into force on the eighth day of June, 1904, and to have applied to all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day, and to have also applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day, except as otherwise provided in the foregoing resolutions: Provided, that all goods actually purchased on or before the seventh day of June, 1904, at any place out of Canada, for importation into Canada, on evidence to the satisfaction of the Minister of Customs of the purchase having been so made, and all goods in warehouse in Canada on such day, may be entered for duty at the rate of duty in force immediately before the said day (without special duty); notwithstanding any increase in Customs duties under the said resolutions, but this proviso shall cease to have force and effect after the thirty-first day of August in the present year.

That was the resolution in 1904 applying to the tariff changes made at that time. I made inquiry about this matter and I think this was the reason that the proviso of 1904 was introduced just as is the reason for the proviso to-day: When a general revision of the tariff is being effected the people are aware that such revision is to be made and in consequence it is not usual to allow a time within which goods in respect of which contracts have been entered into for purchase shall be admitted; but in the case of such an extensive revision as, while not a general revision, is regarded as a partial revision of the tariff it is only fair that parties who have engaged to purchase goods, having had no notice that the partial revision was in contemplation, should be given a reasonable time within which to import at the existing rates goods which they had previously contracted to purchase. That is the reason why this proviso has been attached to the tariff resolution. It would seem to me manifestly unjust that in the case of a revision so extensive as this is men should be penalized by having to pay increased rates of duty in respect of goods they had ordered with delivery extending over a considerable period in the future, without having any notice that the revision was in contemplation.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There has been a long discussion of wire nails. I understand that there are a number of factories apart from nail manufactories using wire rods. Would the minister give a statement of the industries of which wire rods are the raw material?

Mr. WHITE: Wire rods are the basis of wire products of all kinds including wire nails. The manufacturers of wire draw their wire from the wire rods and would be affected in this that their raw material is now dutiable to the extent of $3.50 per ton. Of course, my hon. friend knows that they have the benefit of a protective tariff so far as their industry is concerned and my hon. friend also knows that I have given a drawback in respect of the duty on wire rods entering into the production of wire used for wire fencing. I did that because I thought that the agriculturist of Canada was interested in the price of wire fencing and I therefore, gave the drawback of 99 per cent in respect of wire rod entering into the production of wire of 9, 12 and 13 gauge which is used in the manufacture of fencing. I have dealt with wire and with wire rods. My hon. friend was not in the House when I dealt with the other tariff item, with chains.

Mr. CURRIE: The minister has given a drawback on rods imported for the manufacture of wire fencing and I understand from the resolution that that is confined to certain numbers. I think it would be a wise provision if that was made applicable to all sizes of wire. It then would not injure anybody and would enable the mills to manufacture the smaller sizes in Canada in competition with the large stuff imported. That would give employment to a large amount of labour in the country and I feel satisfied that as far as fencing is concerned it would reduce the price to the western farmer. For the farmers' use a No. 11 is as good as a No. 9 fencing. A fence made from a No. 11 will sell for about twenty cents a rod with a fair profit while if it was No. 9 the same fence would have to be sold on the same basis at twenty-seven or thirty cents a rod. I do not wish to raise any controversy but I suggest that the minister consider that before the Budget is finally passed. There is altogether $2,000,000 worth of wire imported into Canada for fencing and the general impression amongst the farming community is that this fencing is free. The raw material is free but the moment it is manufactured into fencing there is a duty of thirty per cent so that the beneficent influence of the Sarnia Fence Company and other fence companies is not apparent to me or to anyone who understands business. If that is the case and they are getting a good profit on fencing, why should not the wire manufacturer get a little of that profit on some $2,500,000 a year worth of a product which might as well be made in Canada as in the United States?

[Mr. W. T. White.]

Items agreed to.

478a. Iron or steel bands, strips or sheets, number fourteen gauge or thinner, coated, polished, or not, and rolled iron or steel sections, not being ordinary square, flat or round bars, when imported by manufacturers of saddlery, hardware and hames for use exclusively in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories—British preferential, free; intermediate, free; general, free.

Mr. BOIVIN: I see that iron and steel bands, etc., when imported by manufacturers of saddlery, for use exclusively in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories, are to be admitted free. I suppose that is to encourage the manufacturers?

Mr. WHITE: To assist the industry.

Mr. BOIVIN: In the old tariff from No. 470 to 483, there are a large number of similar items. I think an application was made some time ago to the minister by a company in my county manufacturing steel planes and carpenters' tools that steel blanks for plane cutters and plane cutter caps should either be put on the free list or be given a drawback. These dies do not exist in Canada, and the blanks cannot be manufactured here. I see nothing in the tariff to that effect. This industry did not exist when the Fielding tariff was drawn up, and I would ask the minister if he has any intention of giving the same protection to these plane manufacturers as to the manufacturer of saddlery, hardware and hames?

Mr. WHITE: I do not recall the application to which my hon. friend refers, although no doubt it was made. As my hon. friend knows, it is unusual except on the occasion of the Budget to make any announcement as to proposed tariff changes, but I shall be very glad to look into the matter.

Item agreed to.

486. Iron tubing, brass covered, not over three inches in diameter, and brass trimmings, not polished, lacquered or otherwise manufactured, when imported by manufacturers of iron or brass bedsteads for use exclusively in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories—British preferential, free; intermediate, free; general, free.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is that the item which the minister referred to in his Budget speech?

Mr. WHITE: No. The size of the tubing has been increased from 2 to 3 inches in diameter.

Mr. MACLEAN: I had in mind some item in connection with brass, but I cannot find it.

Mr. WHITE: I will explain that to my hon. friend. As the item does not appear, some explanation is necessary before my hon. friend or any one else can understand it. Under the tariff of 1907, brass in bars and rods, in coil or otherwise, not less than 6 feet in length, and brass in strips, sheets or plates, not polished, planished or coated, was dutiable at 10 per cent general. An Order in Council was passed on the 11th August, 1908, placing brass upon the free list, as brass was not then manufactured in Canada. I believe that a firm which had been manufacturing brass, discontinued business owing to a fire. No other changes were made by that Order in Council, the tariff upon brass products remaining the same. There has been established in Toronto within the last year or so a copper and brass rolling mill, in which $250,000 capital has been invested. The plant is ready to produce brass in bars, rods and other forms.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Can they meet the demands of the country?

Mr. WHITE: I am informed that they can. After making very careful inquiries we are convinced that no objection will be put forward by those who use brass as their raw material, to this restoration of brass to the old 10 per cent item in the tariff. My hon. friend will understand that at the time the tariff was fixed upon brass products, the minister would have in mind that there was this 10 per cent duty upon brass in bars or rods, which is the raw material for brass products of a more finished character. The Order in Council merely removed the duty upon brass,—the raw material,— but did not reduce the duty upon brass products. The mill in North Toronto being now in a position to manufacture brass in bars and rods, we are repealing item 717, which is the Order in Council of 11th August, 1908, and brass in bars and rods comes under the 1907 tariff. That is why it does not appear in these resolutions.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is the minister sure it can be done in that way? Is he sure that when once an article has been placed on the free list by Order in Council, it can be restored to the dutiable list by repealing the Order in Council?

Mr. WHITE: We repeal the Order in Council, but we do not repeal the item in the tariff under which this article will come.

M. MACLEAN: I quite understand that, but I was wondering whether the minister had power to put back to the dutiable list anything from the free list, simply by repealing the Order in Council. Perhaps he would have to amend the Customs Act.

Mr. WHITE: The item is standing in the tariff.

Mr. MACLEAN: I am talking about the raw material.

Mr. WHITE: The item is 349:

Brass in bars and rods, in coil or otherwise, not less than 6 feet in length, and brass in strips, sheets or plates, not polished, planished or coated—British preferential, 5 per cent; intermediate, 7½ per cent, general, 10 per cent.

That stands in the tariff to-day, and would be in force were it not for the Order in Council of 1908 which removed those duties. We are repealing the Order in Council so that brass will come under this item in the tariff.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I was just wondering whether you could do that.

Mr. WHITE: There may be something in my hon. friend's view. The tariff and customs officers seem to have no doubt about it, but my hon. friend's opinion is worthy of consideration, and I will be glad to consider it.

Item agreed to.

542. Jute or hemp yarn, plain, dyed or coloured, when imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories for weaving purposes, or for insulating wire, or for the manufacture of hammocks and twines—British preferential, free; intermediate, free; general, free.

Mr. SINCLAIR: In connection with these items, 542, 543 and 545, dealing with jute, linen yarn, etc., it might be a suitable time for me to draw the attention of the minister to the question of fishing twine, to which I have already referred on several occasions. I have already drawn the attention of the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Finance to a request of the fishermen on the Atlantic seaboard for free fishing twine used in lobster fishing. The particular kind of twine used in that industry is called unbarked marlin. At present, the twine known as barked marlin is free. The history of it is that in the tariff revision of 1907 it was intended that all fishing twine should be placed on the free list, but by some mistake unbarked marlin was not referred to in item 682 of the tariff which deals with the matter. It was announced by the Minister of Finance on that occasion that fishing twine was to be free. It was discovered later on that unbarked marlin was omitted. This discovery was not really made until two or three years ago and for a number of years after the last revision of the tariff this particular kind of twine was admitted free in the customs houses of Nova Scotia. When the present Government came into power a circular was sent out by the Minister of Customs warning the customs officers against admitting this twine free any longer. The consequence was that a duty of 25 per cent was levied upon this twine.

Mr. WHITE: Does my hon. friend suggest that the present Government rendered a decision in this matter that was not in force before?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes, practically that. I drew the matter to the attention of the Government in the session of 1912, and the minister will find in the discussion a copy of the notice that was sent out by the Commissioner of Customs notifying the customs houses to levy this 25 per cent duty upon this particular kind of twine. As a matter of fact, the first notice that was sent out was an instruction to levy on both kinds of twine used in the lobster fishery, but that was afterwards corrected and it was then confined to what is known as unbarked marlin. Right or wrong, this twine had been admitted free until these instructions went out subsequent to the advent of the present Government to power.

I thought I would only have to draw the matter to the attention of the Government to have it adjusted, and I have done so on several occasions. The last time, in February of this year, I had the assurance of the Minister of Customs that when the tariff was dealt with this matter would be attended to. It was not attended to, and when the Budget came down I made an inquiry and the minister on that occasion stated that there was some difficulty about it, but he did not explain very fully what the difficulty was.

I note that in these items that we are dealing with at the present time the minister is generous to the manufacturers, but he does not seem to have the same interest in the fishermen. For example, 533a:

> Garnetted wool waste in the white when imported by manufacturers of woollen goods for use exclusively in their own factories is free. The next item:

> Jute or hemp yarn, plain, dyed or coloured, when imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in their own factories for weaving purposes, or for insulating wire, or for the manufacture of hammocks and twines

is free. The next item, 543

> Linen yarn when imported by manufacturers of towels, damask, or seamless linen fire hose duck, for use exclusively in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories is free. If there is a reason for refusing the request of 65,000 fishermen on the coast of the Maritime provinces I would like to know what it is. In this discussion it has come out on more than one occasion that changes have been made and duties imposed at the instance of one small factory. Last night it was disclosed that a small firm of Yankees at Port Hope had influence enough with this Government to get their raw material placed on the free list. Another small firm at Windsor had influence enough to impose a tax on caustic soda which is used by the soap manufacturers of this country and which will affect every man who uses soap and we all do on this side of the House. How does it come that the fishermen have not any influence with this Government?

Mr. GRAHAM: They do not use the right kind of bait.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think that some little concession is due to the fishermen of this country. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) promised them free medicine although he seems to have forgotten all about it. The free twine I am asking for now is only a bagatelle compared with the expense of providing free medicine and free medical attendance for the 65,000 fishermen on the coast of eastern Canada. In my own constituency the fishermen and farmers have been turned down in every request they have made to the present Government. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) cancelled all the appropriations by the late Government for the building of breakwaters and improvements along the coast of the county I represent. He cancelled them after they had been voted and after tenders had been asked and contracts made in some cases. When I asked him why he did it he said that he had other more important places to attend to. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) cancelled a contract to build a branch line in my constituency and he did not stop there. He imposed a higher rate of freight on fresh fish and now the men who are engaged in the fishing industry have to struggle against that difficulty. If they want to send a carload of fish to the market they have to pay $10 or $12 more than they had to pay in 1911. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) when we asked him if he would consider an application from the fishermen along the coast for better communication with the Boston market so that they could get the advantage of the big prices that are going there for their fresh fish hardened his heart too and would not listen to our request. I thought I would have better luck with the Minister of Finance. I thought I was approaching a man who takes a broader view and does not allow questions of petty politics to enter into the consideration at all. I was depending upon him to do something and I must say that if he does not do something in this matter I will be very much disappointed. I am playing my last card now and if I lose the game it will be too bad. I will have to go home and tell the fishermen in my constituency that I have asked the Minister of Finance to put this right and that he has refused to do so. I trust that I will not have to do that.

Mr. LOGGIE: I would suggest to the minister that he might arrange the difficulty that my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has spoken of. Cordage and rope less than 1½ inches in diameter is now on the free list for use in the lobster fishery and if he will put manilla marlin for use in the lobstery fishery on the free list it will meet the case.

Mr. WHITE: With regard to the recital of his troubles by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) it puts me very much in mind of a line from Hamlet that I heard the other night:

> One woe doth tread upon another's heels.

I have had due regard to what the hon. member for Guysborough draws to my attention and I have taken occasion to look into this matter of lobster twine recently. There is a statement which my hon. friend has made which I think he will withdraw when the facts which I have before me are brought to his attention. I have understood him to say that the present Government made a ruling which had not been adopted during the late Government's period of office in respect to the matter of this duty upon twine.

These are the facts. On the 18th of March, 1909, the collector of customs at Yarmouth advised the department that this twine was also used by furniture manufacturers and iron foundries in tying packages for shipments; and on the 26th of March, 1909, the collector was advised that such twine, although used for lobster traps, was not entitled to free entry. On the 14th of March, 1911, the collector of customs at Chatham forwarded a letter to the Department of Customs, inquiring as to the tariff classification of this twine when used for lobster traps. He was advised on the 18th of March, 1911, that it was dutiable. The ruling made in December, 1911, was in accordance with decisions previously given. I have made some inquiries and have been informed, although I do not pretend to have exhausted my inquiries in the matter, that it is almost impossible to place this twine upon the free list with the limitation that it is to be free when used for the fishing business, because once it has found its way into the hands of the retail dealers, it is quite impossible to follow it, so that it would really be making it free for all purposes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We have the same provision in connection with ropes for lobster fishing.

Mr. WHITE: I am advised by the customs officers that, in their opinion, it would be impossible to follow the twine in question. The effect of placing it upon the free list for the purpose that my hon. friend has in mind would be that it would be practically free for all purposes. I intend to pursue my inquiries further, and I will give the matter careful consideration before the final revision of the tariff takes place. At the present time I am unable to accede to the request of my hon. friend and place this twine on the free list for the reasons that I have given.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am obliged to the minister for his explanation. I did not intend to mislead the committee about the facts. I did not have the information that prior to 1911 any inquiry had been made about the matter; but I was aware that a circular, which got into the press and was sent to all the Customs House officers, was issued in September, 1911, by the commissioner. That was the only circumstance brought to my attention in regard to the matter. I was also told by customs officers in the Maritime provinces that this particular twine was admitted free under the late Administration and I thought that information was correct. It was the case in some places. In regard to the difficulty, I think the minister will have no more difficulty than he has already in regard to twine admitted for fishing purposes. It is quite true that once in a while people will deceive the department, and that men will import rope for fishing purposes and use it for other purposes. I have no doubt they will do the same thing as regards twine, but I do not think the frauds committed in that way will be very extensive.

Mr. LOGGIE: I suppose the greatest difficulty will be that the country merchants who put the price down on the basis of its being imported and the buyer, as a rule, are under no special obligation.

Item agreed to.

546. Jute cloth or jute canvas, uncoloured, not further finished than cropped, bleached, mangled, or calendered—British preferential, 7½ per cent; intermediate, 10 per cent; general, 10 per cent.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will the minister please explain whether there is an increase in the duty upon these articles; and if so, the reason offered for the increase?

Mr. WHITE: This matter is a little difficult to explain. Will my hon. friend look at tariff item 545, which reads:

Jute and jute butts, jute cloth as taken from the loom, not coloured, cropped, mangled, pressed, calendered, not finished in any way; and jute canvas, free.

The change made is due partly to the fact that it is required for administrative purposes, because it is difficult to distinguish jute canvas from jute cloth. This item 545 formerly included jute canvas, uncoloured, without any limitation. As jute canvas is jute cloth, the Department of Customs in January, 1912, ruled that jute canvas, uncoloured, not further finished than cropped, bleached, mangled or calendered, was free. The ruling practically cancelled item 546. The change now made removes any doubt as to the intention of Parliament. In item 546 of the tariff resolutions, the words 'on jute canvas' have been added after the words 'jute cloth' and jute canvas uncoloured, not further finished than cropped, bleached, mangled or calendered, become subject to a general tariff of ten per cent.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: And for the last year you have not been collecting that duty?

Mr. WHITE: No, and jute canvas is now dutiable whereas before it was not.

Mr. MACLEAN: Is there any reason for that?

Mr. WHITE: No, except that it cannot be distinguished from jute cloth and there is the same reason for a duty on jute canvas as there is for a duty on jute cloth. I suppose the ordinary principle of reasonable protection would apply.

Mr. GRAHAM: Has this anything to do with the manufacture of bags?

Mr. WHITE: I think so, but, frankly, I do not know a great deal about jute canvas and jute cloth. The change is made as much for administrative purposes as any other.

Mr. GRAHAM: This matter was drawn to my attention through a gentleman, who said that he rather expected it would be dealt with in committee by the minister himself. He informs me that it will affect bag manfacturing, and so will affect the users of bags. The principal point to which he drew attention was in connection with the shipment of grain from the West. If grain is shipped westward for transit by the Panama canal, I think it is admitted that it will have to be bagged. Therefore a duty on this raw material for bags may form quite an item as against not only the bag manufacturers but the grain producers as well. As a matter of fact, it was the hon. member for Huntington (Mr. Robb) who brought me the information, and he being a leading miller is quite an authority. The party who brought it to his attention said he had made representations to the minister, who, he expected, would deal with it in committee.

Mr. WHITE: No objection has been raised to this change on behalf of any bag manufacturer. Under item 252 of the tariff bags or sacks of hemp, linen or jute are dutiable at 20 per cent. I am not increasing that duty. I imagine there is no danger of an increase in the price of bags, because those manufacturers like others will be charging such prices as they are able to obtain for their product. I cannot conceive that the imposition of a small duty on jute or canvas will have an appreciable effect upon the price of bags.

Mr. LOGGIE: Do not the bagmakers use jute imported free under item 545?

Mr. NESBITT: That is the intention. I brought this matter up the other night, and it was explained that the reason why there were these two items instead of the one item in the existing tariff, was that some manufacturers were bringing in jute canvas further manufactured than is allowed under section 545 because the custom houses were construing the clause improperly in some places.

Mr. J. D. REID: This is to make it plain.

Mr. WHITE: And I will draw attention to the fact—I believe it to be a fact, though I am not positive—that in the case of such exports of grain as the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) speaks of, a drawback is granted. 11 p.m.

Item agreed to.

548. Twine or yarn of paper when imported by manufacturers of furniture for use only in their own factories in the manufacture of furniture—British preferential, free; intermediate, free; general, free.

Mr. WHITE: The purpose of this change is to bring about uniformity with item 724 of the present tariff which provides that this article is to be admitted free when imported to be 'woven into fabrics' in Canadian factories. I am advised that it was intended that this should cover the case of manufacturers of furniture, but the words 'woven into fabrics' are not applicable to the processes in which the furniture manufacturer uses this twine. The change is designed to include manufacturers of furniture, widening the item to that extent.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It would be on all fours with the case I was putting to the minister in regard to fishing twine.

Mr. WHITE: But this could be much more readily checked up, the hon. gentleman will admit.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Perhaps so.

Item agreed to.

575. Embroideries, n.o.p., lace, n.o.p., braids, n.o.p., tapes of cotton or linen not over one and one-quarter inches in width, not including measuring tape lines, fringes, n.o.p., cords, elastic, round or flat, garter elastic, tassels, handkerchiefs of all kinds, lace collars and all manufactures of lace, nets and nettings of cotton, linen, silk or other material, n.o.p., shams and curtains, when made up, trimmed or untrimmed, corsets of all kinds, linen or cotton clothing, n.o.p.—British preferential, 25 per cent; intermediate, 32½ per cent; general, 35 per cent.

Mr. WHITE: We have included here all braids, n. o. p., and tapes of cotton or linen. This change is made partially for administrative purposes; the increase in revenue will not be considerable. These tapes are made by the Belding Paul Corticelli Company and other manufacturers in Canada, and it is almost impossible, I am told, to distinguish between the tapes and the braids. So we have placed tapes in the item.

Mr. BOIVIN: I see the word 'garter elastic.' But I understand there is another item in the tariff which covers elastic over one inch width on which the duty is 20 per cent. Can the minister tell me the reason for this difference of duty between 35 per cent on narrow elastic and 20 per cent on elastic slightly wider?

Mr. WHITE: This is a matter my hon. friend drew to my attention in connection with webbing used for the manufacture of suspenders. Is that what he has in mind?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Mr. WHITE: Respecting the request for additional duty on webbing used in the manufacture of suspenders and other articles, the manufacturers of suspenders contend that, owing to the large variety of designs or patterns of webbings required in their industry, it would not warrant the establishment of a factory in Canada to manufacture said webbings. The webbings form the component material of chief value in the manufacture of suspenders. It was, therefore, considered advisable to leave this matter over for attention when general revision of the tariff takes place. There was another matter to which my hon. friend drew attention.

Mr. BOIVIN: The other matter was giving relief to the manufacturer of this elastic either by giving him a drawback or allowing him a free entry for cotton yarns used in the manufacture of elastic. I see that under this tariff jute yarn, hemp yarn, linen yarn and woollen yarn are admitted free when used by Canadian manufacturers for the production of different articles.

Application has been made to the department—it has undoubtedly been considered, although no change has been made in the tariff—for the placing of cotton yarn on the free list in order that it may be used in the manufacture of elastic fabric. It is admitted by the cotton manufacturers that what they call combed yarn and mercerized yarn is not manufactured in Canada and cannot be obtained in this country. Coarse cotton yarn is produced in small quantities in only one factory in Canada, that of the Dominion Textile Company, I think. I understand that the minister has in his department a letter from that firm saying that they have used their entire output and have none for sale. There is in my constituency a factory engaged in the manufacture of elastic webbing. Four years ago elastic webbing was not manufactured in Canada; at the present time there is a factory at Granby—the Granby Elastic Webbing Company—and, I understand, one at Hamilton; these are the only two in Canada. The reason given by the hon. minister a moment ago for not increasing the duty on the wider fabric is a very good one, because that would increase the price to the suspender manufacturer and he in turn would be obliged to increase the price to the public. Of course, as the minister has said, it is only when the Budget is brought down that we are supposed to get from him information concerning the different changes in the tariff, but I would point out that this application has been before the department for almost two years; that two Budgets have been brought down and that we have never received any information. I would ask the minister if he could not give this matter his consideration with a view to seeing whether these cotton yarns could not be placed upon the free list. If he cannot, he should tell the committee now, in order that I may be in a position to transfer the information to the stockholders of this company, why this yarn is not to be placed upon the free list.

Mr. WHITE: I am obliged to my hon. friend for the information which he has given me. He is, no doubt, aware that no tariff changes are announced or no information given with respect to the modification of tariff rates except in the Budget speech. Facts are brought to the attention of the Minister from time to time and requests are made for tariff action. I frequently receive letters from parties—and their names are legion—asking me what I propose to do with regard to their requests, and my answer, couched always in very courteous terms, is that they will have to wait until tariff announcements are made in the Budget. The matter to which my hon. friend draws my attention might, I think, be dealt with in two ways. It might be dealt with in the Budget or it might be dealt with by Order in Council, because the Governor in Council, has the power, under existing legislation, to reduce or to remove the duties upon articles which enter into the manufacture of Canadian products. All that I can say to my hon. friend at the present moment—and I am sure that he will acquit me of any discourtesy—is that I shall be glad to give the matter careful consideration with a view to seeing whether or not anything can be done in the premises.

Mr. BOIVIN: I quite understand that the hon. minister cannot make any announcement of tariff policy to-night or at any other time, except in the Budget speech, but I thought in view of the fact that the request had been refused, that the reason for that refusal might be given. That would not be a tariff announcement.

Mr. WHITE: In a matter as complicated as the tariff, it is not feasible to give reasons for a refusal, because such diametrically opposite views exist with respect to tariff changes that on that ground alone it is not well that such reasons should be reduced to writing. My hon. friend will have to rest content with the answer which I give to all other parties making requests with regard to tariff matters: That if the Government has any announcement to make it will be either in the Budget or by action of the Order in Council. That is all that any Minister of Finance is able to say with respect to inquiries regarding tariff matters.

Mr. STANFIELD: Did I understand the hon. member for Shefford to say that the people manufacturing this material could not get combed yarn in Canada?

Mr. BOIVIN: I am not a member of the company, nor have I any direct interest in the undertaking, but I have been informed by the manager of the concern that it is impossible to get in Canada combed yarn for the manufacture of elastic webbing.

Mr. STANFIELD: The hon. gentleman may be interested to learn that it may be obtained in large quantities from the Dominion Cotton Company.

Item agreed to.

577. Silk in the gum or spun silk, when imported by manufacturers of silk thread, silk underwear or of woven labels, for use exclusively in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories—British preferential, free; intermediate, free; general, free.

Mr. WHITE: I desire to change the wording of this item so that it will read as follows:

Silk in the gum or spun silk when imported by manufacturers of silk underwear or of woven labels and spun silk, when imported by manufacturers of silk thread, when used exclusively for the manufacture of such artcles in their own factories, free.

Item as amended agreed to.

575. Embroidery, n.o.p., lace, n.o.p., braids, n.o.p.. etc.—British preferential, 25 per cent; intermediate, 32½ per cent; general, 35 per cent.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will that interfere with the cost of raw materials to the manufacturers of suspenders in Canada?

Mr. WHITE: I think not. We are simply inserting tapes because they cannot be distinguished for administration purposes from braids. I do not think it is an important item. No objection has been raised as far as I know to its inclusion in this item.

Mr. GRAHAM: I had an inquiry from a manufacturer in my own town asking about it and I was not prepared to say what the effect would be.

Item agreed to.

651a. Buttons of vegetable ivory, per gross—British preferential, 5 cents and 20 per cent; intermediate, 5 cents and 30 per cent; general, 5 cents and 30 per cent.

Mr. LOGGIE: Why is it necessary to add this high specific duty?

Mr. WHITE: It is due to the fact that manufacturers of buttons from vegetable ivory in Canada are subject to keen competition from Austria and Germany, the product of Austria being entitled to entry under the intermediate tariff. We have increased the rates on these buttons of vegetable ivory with a view of making conditions less trying to the Canadian manufacturer. I think it is a necessary change.

Mr. LOGGIE: It seems to me that the specific duty added to the thirty per cent ad valorem makes a very high rate.

Item agreed to.

On resolution No. 5—prohibited goods:

Mr. GRAHAM: The Customs Department ought to be careful that the officers know an aigrette when they see it. I was on a train and the customs officer was inclined to take a cheap plume from a lady, thinking, from the minister's speech, that it was one of the articles prohibited.

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. WHITE: In item 1023 I want to omit after the word 'bars' the words 'or turned and polished shafting', so that the item will read:

Rolled hexagon iron or steel bars when used in the manufacture of cold drawn or cold rolled iron or steel bars.

Mr. NESBITT: Why are those words being left out?

Mr. WHITE: If my hon. friend will allow me I will give that information to-morrow. It is so technical that I shall have to consult the experts. There are two resolutions, Nos. 29 and 31, of Government orders that relate to the tariff. I am advised that they may be taken up by the Committee of Ways and Means. I would ask if you, Mr. Chairman, or Mr. Speaker, see any objection to this course. They relate to the drawback provision in respect to duties paid on pig-iron imported into Canada and entering into the production of articles exported by Canadian manufacturers and into the manufacture of mowers, reapers and binders. It is my intention, because I think it inadvisable to have two tariff Bills in one session, that No. 31 should be included in this resolution so that all may be embodied in one Bill. No. 29 is a separate matter and will be covered by a separate Bill.

The CHAIRMAN: I have no objection.

Mr. WHITE: I shall be prepared to give information on resolutions 29 and 31 if the House desires it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is not the explanation practically what we have been discussing to-night; it synchronizes with what we have been debating. You have to have those resolutions in order to carry out your tariff.

Mr. WHITE: No. 31 is a resolution relating to the Customs tariff, and I am advised that I can move it now. My hon. friends opposite, I think, understand my object in making this change, which is for the purpose of benefiting the steel industry. Manufacturers of goods for export into which pig-iron enters as a basic material, and manufacturers of the articles mentioned in this resolution 31 on the Order Paper, who are entitled to a drawback in respect of their manufactures of mowing machines, reapers, harvesters, binders and attachments for binders, find it to their advantage to buy all their pig-iron from abroad rather than in Canada. It is at their request and after they have directed the attention of the Government to this matter on more than one occasion that we have decided to bring down this legislation. I explained it rather fully on the occasion of the Budget, and I do not think it is necessary to go into it now. The only question now is a matter of procedure. I would ask that Order No. 29 be not included in these resolutions, as it is an amendment to the Customs Act. No. 31 is an amendment to the Customs tariff, and it is the latter that I am anxious to have covered by the Bill which I shall introduce in respect to these resolutions, so that it will suffice, Mr. Chairman, if you include in the resolutions Order No. 31 on the Order Paper.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I did not catch the effect of the minister's amendment to item 1023, where he struck out the words 'or turned and polished shafting.' Does that mean that the manufacturers of shafting shall not get a drawback?

Mr. WHITE: The information I have is that rolled hexagon iron or steel bars are not used for shafting.

Resolutions reported, read the first and the second time and concurred in.

On motion of Mr. White, the House adjourned at 11.33 p.m.

Friday, May 1, 1914.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance): The resolutions which I introduced on the occasion of my Budget speech were yesterday approved by the Committee of Ways and Means, and afterwards concurred in by the House. I now beg leave to introduce a Bill No. 169, entitled an Act to amend the Customs tariff, 1907, founded upon those resolutions.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

[Mr. W. T. White.]

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. MACDONELL: I desire to rise to a question of privilege. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Fisher) and the hon. member for North York (Mr. J. A. M. Armstrong) yesterday brought to the attention of the House an article in the Toronto Globe of Wednesday, the 29th April, asserting that certain members of the Government were outspoken in their opposition to the Canadian Northern railway deal as announced by the Government. I was not in the House when the matter was brought up by the hon. member for Brant, otherwise I would have joined him in denying the accuracy of that statement. My own name was mentioned among others, and I take this first opportunity of denying that there is any reason or foundation for such a statement. On the contrary, I think the transaction has been handled in a most businesslike and thorough manner by the Government, and in the only manner in which it could be properly handled. The agreement will have my most cordial support.

THE DUTY ON STRUCTURAL STEEL.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance): My attention has been called to a report in to-day's issue of the Montreal Gazette and in certain other newspapers By inadvertence an erroneous impression has been created as to what I said yesterday during the discussion of certain steel items in the tariff. The report is as follows:

> That there may be some further revision of steel duties required to meet the existing conditions in Canada, particularly as regards structural steel, was intimated by Hon. W. T. White to-night, during the discussion of the steel items in the tariff schedules. Mr. White said that the bridge manufacturers and allied interests in particular were naturally deeply interested in this question, and would have representations to make which might result in some further changes. The nature of these he did not indicate.

I shall read from 'Hansard' what I said. I was speaking of the resolution under which the Governor in Council is authorized, when satisfied that rolled iron or steel angles, beams, channels, and other rolled shapes or sections of iron or steel weighing 120 pounds and less per lineal yard are manufactured in substantial quantities in Canada from steel made in Canada, to direct that there be substituted for tariff item 379 in schedule A to the customs tariff, 1907, the following:

379. Rolled iron or steel angles, beams, channels, and other rolled shapes or sections, of iron or steel, not punched, drilled or further manufactured than rolled, weighing over one hundred and twenty pounds per lineal yard, n.o.p. not being square, flat, oval or round shapes, and not being railway bars or rails per ton—British preferential, $2; intermediate, $3; general, $3.

I explained to the House that the effect would be that on structural steel, from 35 pounds per lineal yard up to 120 pounds per lineal yard, the general rate of $7 per ton would be imposed. That is now the rate on structural steel up to 35 pounds per lineal yard. The item which I have read will not become effective until the Governor in Council so directs, after being satisfied that rolled iron or steel angles and the other products mentioned are manufactured in substantial quantities in Canada. What I said, in answer to my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), was:

I am in hopes that within the next year and a half or two years plants will be established at the Sault, and possibly at New Glasgow, Sydney and Hamilton, capable of manufacturing structural steel up to 120 pounds per lineal yard. As soon as the Government is satisfied that structural steel up to that weight can be manufactured in Canada, the increased duty will come into effect. It is possible that some other adjustments of the tariff may have to be made by reason of that change when it comes into effect. For instance, the manufacturers of bridges are interested in this duty upon structural steel.

Of course, it was not in my mind that a change would be made in the $7 per ton duty which this item imposes. I said that when the change comes into effect it is possible that some other adjustments of the tariff will have to be made in consequence of that change. Not, of course, upon these products, but upon other products; or, in other words, what are known as consequential changes. I desire, therefore, to make it plain that the adjustment which I had in mind did not relate to these products. I may say, in order that there may be no doubt whatever about the matter, that it is not the intention of the Government to introduce any further tariff changes at this session of Parliament.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But to keep an open mind for the future.

Mr. WHITE: My right hon. friend knows that my distinguishing characteristic is an open mind.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes, that is so, but not always in the right way.

Mr. WHITE: I am glad that my right hon. friend and I agree upon the main point.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. George E. Foster (Minister of Trade and Commerce), the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Blondin in the Chair:

Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Canada Grain Act, chapter 27, of the Statutes of 1912, and to provide that advances to an amount not exceeding five hundred thousand dollars may be made to the minister out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada for the payment of freight charges and weighing and inspection fees on grain received into or shipped from elevators operated and managed by His Majesty, and that such payments shall be subject to all the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, and when the amounts so paid are refunded to His Majesty they shall be paid to the Minister of Finance and Receiver General of Canada for deposit to the credit of the said Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Mr. OLIVER: Before the resolution is adopted, I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce will give the committee some information that was asked for on a previous occasion in regard to the operation of the Canadian terminal elevators, to facilitate which operation this resolution is to be be passed.

Mr. FOSTER: Perhaps my hon. friend would be just as well pleased to take that up when we come to the Bill. This is simply a resolution, and the information that he requires I shall then be prepared with. If my hon. friend will kindly indicate what particular information he desires to have, I shall be ready with it when we take up the Bill, probably on Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. OLIVER: The information requested of the minister was as to the rates that were to be charged for services in connection with the interior elevators and the system under which business would be transacted.

Mr. FOSTER: I shall be prepared with any information relating to that.

Mr. OLIVER: We would like to have the fullest possible information in regard to how the Government intends to operate those elevators, pending their completion, and in regard to the handling of the coming crop. There may be further information required in regard to the terminal elevator at Fort William.

Mr. FOSTER: My hon. friend will recollect that, in Committee of Supply, we passed the Estimates referring to elevators, and I said that when we were on the Estimates referring to steamship subsidies, any questions that had not been asked with reference to the elevators or their operation could be asked and would be answered when we took up those Estimates. There is still an item remaining in the Estimates on which that could be brought up.

Mr. OLIVER: I should think, if I might make the suggestion, that the discussion of the Bill based on these resolutions would be the most convenient occasion for the minister to have all the information on the elevator business and the operation of the Grain Act.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Foster thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 170, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BUTTER SUBSTITUTES.

On the motion of Hon. Martin Burrell (Minister of Agriculture), the House went into Committee on Bill No. 112, to regulate the Manufacture and Sale of Dairy Products, and to prohibit the Manufacture or Sale of Butter Substitutes, Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

On section 4—quality of milk to be delivered to manufacturers or shippers:

Mr. BURRELL: This is the same as the section in the existing Act, except that the words milk powder or casein manufactory, or to a milk or cream shipping station, or to a milk bottling establishment or other premises where milk or cream is collected for sale or shipment, are added, in order to cover new processes introduced since the old Act was brought into force.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to delay the progress of the Bill, but the dairy industry is a very important industry in the part of the country I represent. While it may be that no trouble has arisen in the past, it strikes me that there is a great deal of room for trouble under sub-section (b) which reads:

(b) Milk from which any portion of that part of the milk known as strippings has been retained;

I do not know how far the hon. Minister of Agriculture is familiar with the practical operation of dairying, but I think this is a provision that is not practical, and that under it a dairyman might be made the subject of proceedings when such proceedings were not at all warranted. I quite agree that there should be punishment for putting in impure or diluted milk, but to say that a farmer must put all the milk he gets from each cow into the product he sends to the factory is, in my opinion, and with all due respect to former legislators, absurd.

Mr. BURRELL: I do not know that there has been any trouble under the old Act which included these words. And, of course, this is one of the causes that call for only minor penalties. But as the hon. gentleman knows, because he probably, like the rest of us, has milked a good many cow, the richest part of the milk is in what is known as the strippings, and there may be a temptation to a fraudulent keeping back of that part of the milk. I do not think there would be any harm in leaving the subsection in.

Mr. OLIVER: If the hon. gentleman does not want to improve the legislation, all right.

Mr. BURRELL: I think it better to leave it in.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—butter substitutes and remanufacture of butter prohibited:

Mr. BURNHAM: What are people to do who wish to purchase an absolutely healthy substance, labelled as what it is, and not purporting to be butter?

Mr. BURRELL: This matter has been discussed very thoroughly not only by the dairy associations but also in the Agricultural Committee of this House, where this clause was carefully considered. I am not disputing that oleomargarine might be made of perfectly healthy substances and be wholesome as food; but, on the other hand, this is the oldest piece of dairy legislation on our statute book, passed in 1886; and though there have been occasional criticisms, I do not think that any Government has thought it wise to change it, nor, I confess, do I. Although oleomargarine may be wholesome, yet, unfortunately, in practise, where the by-product of carcases of animals can be made up into a product resembling butter, although it may be sold by the merchant on its merits as oleomargarine, yet, by the time it gets to the table of the second-rate hotel or restaurant, it is sold to the customer who pays for butter. In the United States, where they have had some such provision as the hon. member would indicate, they found it almost impossible to work it out in practise, and it has given endless trouble. I must say that in the interests of the dairymen as well as of the general public it would be very unwise to alter this section.

Mr. BURNHAM: I cannot agree that this legislation is in the interests of the general public. Public inspectors may well be appointed, but the assertion that poor people should not have the privilege of buying a perfectly wholesome product is, on its face, untenable. I do not say for one moment that in the dairy interests this legislation is inadvisable, but it cannot be in the interests of all the public.

Mr. BURRELL: Of the majority of the public.

Mr. BURNHAM: Surely the object of legislation is to legislate for the people.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend knows that you cannot get absolute unanimity of opinion.

Mr. BURNHAM: I maintain that that portion of the public which is the least able to buy food and the least able to maintain its own rights should have every facility for the obtaining of food and should be allowed to purchase cheap food so long as it is good and wholesome. There is no denying that oleomargarine, if properly made, is good food, and to take any action to prohibit its use is to do something in the interests of the dairy people, but not in the interests of the public who would like to buy it.

Mr. BRODER: The real object of this legislation is to do away with imitations of real butter. People may eat lard and tallow if they wish to do so, but it should not be coloured and sold to the public as butter. The genuine article ought to be protected.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. member for Dundas says that if the people want to eat lard they can, but lard is not oleomargarine; it is a different thing altogether. Oleomargarine is a perfectly wholesome product, probably just as wholesome as butter. Of course, the Bill has been passed by the Agricultural Committee and, as the minister thinks that this legislation is in the interests of the country at large, I do not intend to say anything against it, but I share in a measure the views of the hon. member for West Peterborough.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the minister or the Government any information as to any infractions of the law?

Mr. BURRELL: I could not give my hon. friend any specific instances. We are continually enforcing our Butter Act; so far as oleomargarine is concerned, I think the law has been pretty well lived up to, because it is known that the department will strongly attack any attempt to contravene the law. Notwithstanding what the hon. member for West Peterborough says, I have no doubt that if we eliminate this section and allow the production of butter substitutes, it would take a whole army of inspectors to prevent fraud.

Mr. NESBITT: Does the minister know of any oleomargerine having been sold in Canada ?

Mr. BURRILL: I could not answer my hon. friend on the spur of the moment; I shall be glad to get him that information.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the minimum amount of water permitted in butter ?

Mr. BURRELL: Sixteen per cent.

Mr. OLIVER: Is subsection (c) a new provision ?

Mr. BURRELL: Perhaps I can make the matter clear by reading section 299 of the old Act:

> No person shall mix with butter any acid, alkali, chemical or any substance whatever, which is introduced or used for the purpose or with the effect of causing the butter to absorb water or any part of milk or cream; or manufacture, import into Canada, or offer, sell, expose or have in his possession for sale any such mixed butter, any renovated butter or process butter.

Subsection (c) of section 5 of the present Bill makes it quite plain that we can prosecute those who undertake commercially what is known as the process of renovating butter by re-churning and adding more water.

Mr. OLIVER: There is a difference between grading, mixing the butter and putting it into merchantable shape, and reworking it for the purpose of introducing an extra amount of water. The big dairying establishments have out-stations at which they buy cream and butter from the farmers. The butter is made up into different forms and qualities, but is probably perfectly good butter, though not in mer-chantable shape. It is brought to the central factory, graded, re-worked, put into merchantable shape and sold. I know that that is a legitimate part of the business of large dairy interests in Edmonton. I have never heard any objection to its being done; it always struck me as being a very proper proceeding.

Mr. BRADBURY: They closed a factory in Winnipeg for doing the very same thing.

Mr. OLIVER: Possibly; but it seems to me to be a method strictly in line with the best interests of all parties concerned. It enables the farmer to get a cash price for his butter and enables the dealer to dispose of it to the satisfaction of his customers.

Mr. BRODER: Re-churned?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know whether it is re-churned, but it is re-worked.

Mr. BURRELL: I think that would be all right. I understand what my hon. friend means. The trouble is that there has been a definite commercial process of absolute fraud in renovating butter, absolutely re-churning poor butter and adding water, the result being that it would keep for only a couple of days, while the water has been sold for the price of butter so that firms are making hundreds of dollars a day. There would be no desire to interfere with any legitimate process of re-working butter. The desire is to stop the fraud that is now being practised.

Mr. OLIVER: This section does not prevent the legitimate re-working of butter? I met a gentleman from Winnipeg who told me that he had been interested in some such enterprise and he had been put out of business.

Mr. BRADBURY: A firm in Winnipeg composed of men from my own town had a factory in which they invested $15,000. They were buying the cheaper grades of butter and re-working it. I do not know what the process was, but they were not making it out of any other substances than butter made by farmers in the surrounding district. They were put out of business by the late Minister of Agriculture and lost all the money invested. A claim was put in by Mr. D. F. Reid, of Selkirk, who had invested a lot of money, and the late Government promised to compensate him for putting him out of business because when he went into business there was no Act against it. I have always thought that the firm was treated in a very harsh manner, and that the Government of Canada owe these people about $10,000.

Mr. WEBSTER: The re-working of butter is permitted. A merchant goes through selections he has gathered, picks out the colour that suits best, puts it into the worker and makes up two or three tubs of the butter. The Bill does not interfere with that practice, but it does interfere with a man who melts butter and adds fresh milk and acid to give it a peculiar flavour which will last for three or four days. I have considered this Bill very carefully, and believe it cannot be improved upon in the interest of the public.

Mr. NESBITT: The wording of the section, I think, would prohibit that. The butter the hon. member speaks about would be a process butter, re-worked butter.

Mr. WEBSTER: Process butter is homogenized milk.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not agree that re-working butter would not come under this section.

Mr. WEBSTER: You must consider the difference between re-working and re-churning.

Mr. NESBITT: You cannot re-churn butter; that is a farce.

Mr. WEBSTER: My dear man, allow me to inform you that I can take you to a factory in Canada where they have been trying to do that for two years, and in some cases they have succeeded so well that they have sold two hundred pounds of water at the price of butter.

Mr. MORPHY: Coming from a county largely interested in dairying, I would urge that section 5 be extended to prohibit the sale of such butter. Probably, however, section 6 would sufficiently cover that.

Mr. OLIVER: I would like to have a definite statement as to whether these big dairy establishments in Edmonton are to be allowed to re-work butter in a legitimate way. I would read this section that they are not, but if the minister says it is the intention of the department to administer the law so as to permit the legitimate re-working of butter I would be satisfied with that; otherwise I would certainly have to protest against the section.

Mr. BURRELL: While I do not know the circumstances of the firms to which my hon. friend refers, I do not think there will be any attempt to stop the legitimate re-working of butter.

Mr. KNOWLES: But might not some private individual set in motion the machinery of the law? The enforcement of the federal law does not always come under federal authority. Things would be in a pretty mess if we would be safe in handing out reckless legislation on the country because we ourselves are so wise and prudent as not to take advantage of it. I think the minister's suggestion does not answer the objection raised by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver).

Mr. BURRELL: I do not think my hon. friend need be alarmed about that. So far as I know, there has never been an attempt by any government to impose the slightest hardship in this regard, but it is very difficult to cover all cases in the dairying business without phraseology seeming to cover something that may be illegitimate. The Act will be interpreted by the officers of the department so as not to interfere with anybody carrying on a reasonably proper business.

Mr. KNOWLES: Might there not be private prosecutions under this Act?

Mr. BURRELL: It has never been done, so far as I know.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not think that is any answer. There might be private prosecutions, and if there were would it be any reply on the part of the accused to say that the Minister of Agriculture had said in the House of Commons that such and such was not the intention of the Act.

Mr. BURRELL: This Bill has been given the most deep and careful consideration, and is believed to be in the interests of the country as well as the dairying industry. I think its provisions will have to stand as they are. If a man is doing something deliberately illegitimate he would certainly have to take his chances.

Mr. KNOWLES: If the minister continues to take the stand that he has taken up to the present and will not listen to argument, saying that the Bill is wise legislation and will have to stand as it is, I, for one, wish to register my protest against passing legislation in that way. He might as well not bring it to the House at all.

Mr. BURRELL: The practice in this House, of course, has been to refer Bills to committees composed of members of both sides of the House, who thresh out the details and report to the House. I have had a fairly long experience in the House, but I can only remember one instance—and that was a very extraordinary one—where the House did not accept the findings of the committee. I am not saying that the House is necessarily bound to accept their findings, because we know it is not. In this case, a great many members from both sides of the House gave this clause the most careful consideration in the committee and they passed it unanimously. I am only pointing that out to show that it has not been carelessly drawn up.

Mr. KNOWLES: A fair argument, but not final. It does not close the matter.

Mr. HANNA: If the hon. member has any objection to this Bill why does he not state it?

Mr. KNOWLES: That finishes me.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I think the hon. member has stated his objection; but I wish to refer to a point on which I think the hon. member for Brockville can put us right. I gather from what the hon. member said a little while ago that butter that has been re-worked would not be known as process or renovated butter. If the hon. member is sure about that there is no difficulty.

Mr. WEBSTER: You have grasped the situation exactly.

Mr. OLIVER: Subsection (a) of clause 3 says that no person shall sell or offer for sale butter that is not in a certain shape, but the last sentence says:

> Nothing in this paragraph shall be held to apply to butter in rolls or lumps, of indiscriminate weight, as sold by farmers.

If the farmers sells to anybody but the consumer, the person who buys from him has in turn to sell again, and it seems to me that the section as drafted can scarcely convey the intent that its framers had. There must be some way of permitting the merchant to sell the rolled butter that he has bought from the farmer without reworking it the shape that the first part of the clause calls for.

Mr. BURRELL: The first part of the clause applies to creameries and other large establishments who make a practice of selling butter in certain shapes, but it is not meant to apply to the ordinary farmer who may go into a store and offer a lot of rolls weighing either half a pound, three-quarters of a pound, or a pound, which are sold by total weight. The clause is designed to give to the public full weight from all the great butter-making establishments.

Mr. OLIVER: I quite agree with that. But does not my hon. friend see that this clause is mandatory? A merchant who buys butter from a farmer must have it in a certain shape before he can sell it again. It seems to me that that clause should be amended in some way.

Mr. WEBSTER: The clause reads:

Nothing in this paragraph shall be held to apply to butter in rolls or lumps, of indiscriminate weight, as sold by farmers.

Therefore, it is in a merchant's hands to sell any size and any shape of butter.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend did not read the whole sentence.

Mr. WEBSTER: I do not think there is any danger of a merchant buying butter from a farmer without weighing it up.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not know about that. I have had something to do with that business myself.

Mr. WEBSTER: I would risk you.

Mr. NESBITT: I know many merchants who buy round pats of butter supposed to weigh a pound, and they only count them, and the same with pound squares.

I think that many times I have seen the honest yeomanry in possesion of pats and squares of butter, not as flush in weight as they might be.

Mr. BRADBURY: This section says that no person shall sell butter, moulded or cut into prints, blocks, squares or pats, unless they are of the full weight of one-quarter of a pound, one-half pound, one pound, or two pounds, at the time they are moulded or cut. A consumer goes into a store to get a pound of butter, and finding the butter has shrunk in the meantime he takes objection, but the merchant tells him it was of the proper weight when moulded, and there is no recourse for the purchaser. It seems to me that a person who buys a pound of butter should get a pound of butter, whether it has shrunk or not. Again it says that nothing in this section shall apply to rolls or lumps, but it seems to me that butter sold in rolls or lumps should be of a defined weight, and that everything should be sold by the pound. The consumers of Canada are being robbed by legislation of this kind. This section would enable the merchant, or the farmer if you will, to sell butter under weight, and to say it was all right when it was moulded. I think the law should be made plain that if a man buys a one pound print of butter he must get one pound.

Mr. WEBSTER: When a pound package of butter has stood for two or three days, the paper around it will absorb possibly one-quarter of an ounce of the water, and most of the dairymen make allowance for that by putting in an extra ounce or three-quarters of an ounce.

Mr. BRADBURY: Why not say, then, in this act that the butter when sold shall be of the weight it purports to be?

Mr. WEBSTER: If a man ordered one hundred boxes of butter in pound packages in the fall of the year, and stored it for a few months, he would have to go over every package and add one-quarter of an ounce to it to make up for the shrinkage, which would not be fair.

Mr. BRADBURY: What about the consumer who pays for the pound of butter; is he not to be protected?

Mr. WEBSTER: That is unavoidable shrinkage.

Mr. OLIVER: It looks as if the dairymen were strong on the committee that drafted this Bill.

Mr. SEXSMITH: The objection raised by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury), as pointed out by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Webster), is not reasonable. You may ship one thousand pounds of butter, having ample weight when you shipped it, but when you store it the water evaporates and actually you get the same amount of butter, but you get a little less water. It was pointed out before the committee that certain persons in Montreal had been buying butter, rechurning it and remoulding it, and that samples were actually discovered which contained fifteen per cent of water. The object of this clause is to prevent anything like that, and I think it is perfectly clear.

Mr. BRADBURY: That may seem fair to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sexsmith), but is it fair to the consumers? For example, if one light-weight loaf is found in the establishment of a baker, his whole supply of bread is confiscated.

Mr. WEBSTER: But bread does not get to be three months old.

Mr. BRADBURY: Bread shrinks in weight very rapidly, and the baker has to make allowance for that when he is making up the loaf, and quite properly so in the interests of the consumer. If the dairyman knows that his butter is going to shrink, why should he not be compelled to put in the extra half ounce in the same way as the baker has to? A great necessity to-day is that we should have some proper law governing weights of commodities which are sold to the consumer. A man buys a pound of tea and he has to pay for the weight of the paper and the lead around the tea, which is absolutely unfair.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Is there anything in the law that regulates the percentage of moisture in bread?

Mr. OLIVER: Every one knows that bread shrinks in weight.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Yes, but there is nothing in the law to say that there shall only be a certain percentage of moisture in it, and the law provides for the percentage of moisture in the case of butter.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: Bread and butter go together, but they are not parallel examples in this case. A baker can tell fairly well how long the bread will be on his hands, and what percentage to allow for shrinkage, but the butter-maker does not know whether the butter will be consumed in three months, or twelve months, or the day after it is made. I agree with the member for Brockville that it would be almost impossible to lay down a rule as to the allowance that should be made for shrinkage in butter. The last part of this clause reads:

> Nothing in this paragraph shall be held to apply to butter in rolls or lumps, of indiscriminate weight, as sold by farmers.

I think that provision is all right, and it would be very difficult to get over the necessity for it. Many farmers make their butter up in lumps of indiscriminate weight, and if we do not prevent that practice altogether we will have to leave this section as it is. I do not think we have yet reached a stage at which it would be wise to prevent farmers making their butter up in rolls or lumps.

Mr. WEBSTER: To illustrate, I might say that last June a gentleman in the West ordered from me 1,000 boxes of fancy June butter which was put up for him and placed in one of the best storage houses in Montreal. On the 1st of September one carload was shipped to him, and it held its weight pretty well, but when the second lot was shipped to him in January some of the blocks were half an ounce light. How are you going to prevent that? The merchant bought at June prices, put the butter in storage at his own risk, and I would like any hon. gentleman to tell me how the natural shrinkage could be prevented.

Mr. SEXSMITH: The percentage of water was reduced in it?

Mr. WEBSTER: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: It seems clear that the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) and myself will have to form ourselves into a consumers' union, with regard to this matter; the dairymen seem to have control of the situation.

Mr. WEBSTER: Well, we get our bread from you.

Mr. OLIVER: If the contention of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) is right, with reference to the sale of butter in rolls and lumps, then the consumer has no protection at all, because, if a dealer has light-weight butter in his store, all he has to do is to say that he got it from a farmer, and he is free from any penalty. Again the unfortunate consumer gets the worst of the bargain.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I think the hon. member for Edmonton misunderstands the position. This is where there is no pretence of a discriminate weight. The farmers often bring to the country stores butter of indiscriminate weight. The farmer's wife, or whoever makes up the butter, makes it up into a lump of five pounds three ounces or five pounds five ounces or some other odd weight. The merchant pays the farmer for the weight of butter in the roll or lump; the farmer does not pretend to give any particular weight. It is in a different position from the other, in which there is a pretence of a certain weight, the butter being apparently in quarter-pound or half-pound or one pound prints. The butter referred to in this paragraph is not of any specified weight at all, and is weighed just as a load of wheat or a quantity of nails is weighed. As I understand it, the Bill does not pretend to guard people in such a case; it only attempts to guard where one has the right to assume that a certain article is of a certain weight. It requires that an article which pretends to be of a certain weight shall be of the weight which it pretends to be.

Mr. WEBSTER: In many cases where a merchant purchases a roll or a lump of butter, he does not sell it en bloc; he cuts it up to suit his customers, giving one customer two pounds, another one pound, and so on. When he purchases it, he weighs it and pays the farmer for the weight that he gets.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Supposing a creamery man puts up a thousand pounds of butter in prints with fifteen per cent of water, as he is compelled to keep within the percentage of water designated in this Bill, namely sixteen per cent. He sells that butter; it is placed in cold storage for perhaps six months, and the retail merchants sell it again. The butter was in legitimate prints when it was put into cold storage; but, according to the statements of some hon. members, when the retailer sells these prints, if the prints are under weight, say by half an ounce, the retailer should be liable. I think that is entirely wrong, because if we analysed that butter we would find a less percentage of water in it. If the retailer were to be held liable, butter could not be stored at all.

Mr. MORPHY: I think, after a careful consideration of this section, that the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) will be found to be right in his contention, at least to have a strong ground for it. The section is just a little hard to construe.

Mr. OLIVER: I appreciate the difficulty of it.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. member's point appeals to me. It is unfortunate that the following words are inserted:

Nothing in this paragraph shall be held to apply to butter in rolls or lumps of indiscriminate weight, as sold by farmers.

I think the section is sufficient without these words to apply to persons selling butter in pats, prints, blocks, or squares. The section could be read in this way with the same meaning:

Nothing in this paragraph shall be held to apply to butter in roll or lumps of indiscriminate weight, as bought from farmers.

Mr. OLIVER: I think that would be better.

Mr. MORPHY: Under that wording of the section, if a man bought fifty or a hundred pounds of butter from a farmer, and put it into rolls or prints, he could say: I do not have to have the weight, because I bought it from a farmer.

[Mr. L. Thomson.]

Mr. DEVLIN: What about butter in tubs?

Mr. MORPHY: The same thing would apply.

Mr. DEVLIN: Why put in the words 'rolls and lumps'? Why not have it read in this way:

Nothing in this paragraph shall be held to apply to butter of indiscriminate weight, as sold by farmers.

Mr. WEBSTER: After the careful consideration given by the committee to this Bill when last before them, I think it will be found to be very difficult to improve upon it. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) has grasped the situation as a practical man. One who has not had everyday practical experience has very little knowledge of the quantity of water sold illegally to the people of this country. I myself have bought what was called packed solid butter from a creamery and have weighed it the same night; I have set it out in a low temperature of say twenty degrees below zero, and the next day that same quantity of butter had shrunk three pounds per box. In some cases you will see the cloths in which the farmers have brought butter to market so wet that they will wet the paper and the basket through. That is owing to the temperature at which the butter has been worked, the butter having absorbed so much water. When the temperature is reduced the butter becomes solid and the water comes out. The hon. member for East Peterborough (Mr. Sexsmith) says he has given the question careful consideration; I have talked it over with the butter manufacturers, both wholesale and retail, in the country, and they tell me that this Bill covers the ground as well as it can possibly be done.

Mr. SEXSMITH: The reason of these words:

Nothing in this paragraph shall be held to apply to butter in rolls or lumps of indiscriminate weight, as sold by farmers.

—is because butter sold in this way is weighed by the customers; but butter put up in prints by a creamery or by a farmer in the little patent arrangement used for making a print is not weighed by the merchant when bought by a customer, if put up in a standard quarter-pound or half-pound or pound print. The object of this Bill is to protect the public from light weight in butter put up in this way. A grocer assumes that a pound of butter bought from a creamery is a pound of butter. If the public is protected to the extent that the creamery must put up the butter in that shape with a certain percentage of water, and that when it is put up it must not have less than that weight, I think that is ample protection.

Mr. DEVLIN: I would like to ask the minister for information as to what a lump of butter really is. Supposing a man is charged with having sold butter underweight, he says: I bought this from a farmer as a lump of butter. What is a lump of butter? Every square block of butter is a lump of butter.

Mr. BURRELL: Not in the trade.

Mr. DEVLIN: There is nothing in the Bill to define a lump of butter.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: The hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) is hardly clear on that. The Bill says:

> Nothing in this paragraph shall be held to apply to butter in rolls or lumps of indiscriminate weight.

My hon. friend raised an objection before in regard to butter in tubs. I do not think that this would apply to butter in tubs. When a farmer puts up a tub of butter it seems to me he does not require to make it a specific weight. I think tubs should also be allowed to be sold by weight.

Mr. WEBSTER: That is what is done.

Mr. BURRELL: The clause covers everything. It it were not in lump or roll, it would have to be in blocks or moulds. If it were in a crock, I should think it would be the same.

Mr. THOMSON: If the minister did not put in that last clause, his argument would be good. But when he states his exceptions, those exceptions would make quite a difference in the decision of the court. He evidently intends to define the sort of butter that shall not be covered by the main part of the section. It would be better to leave it out entirely or put in something that will cover it definitely.

Mr. DEVLIN: Would not a 'lump' of butter be covered by the expression 'pail of butter'?

Mr. THOMSON: No, I do not think it would.

Mr. DEVLIN: Suppose you took the butter out of the pail, what would you call it?

Mr. THOMSON: Butter is often sold in a pail or firkin.

Mr. DEVLIN: But suppose you were before a court of justice, charged with violation of this section, and you could show that you took the butter out of a pail, it would be a 'lump' of butter, would it not?

Mr. OLIVER: I agree with the suggestion of my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy), and I think my criticism of the section would be met if his suggestion were adopted. As it is, it makes the merchant who buys from the farmer subject to the final responsibility of sale to the consumer. The section should be made to read:

> Nothing in this paragraph shall be held to apply to butter in rolls or lumps of indiscriminate weight, as bought from the farmer.

This would protect dealers and would not interfere with the intent of the section.

Mr. BRADBURY: It would protect the dealer, but it would not protect the consumer. My hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) was making an argument with regard to the tub of butter. If one buys a pound of butter out of a tub, it is weighed, and he gets sixteen ounces if the scale is right. But a print of butter, though sold as a pound print, may contain only fourteen or fifteen ounces. Why should not the consumer be protected? Why should the merchant be allowed to sell what purports to be a pound of butter or of anything else when he really gives only fourteen or fifteen ounces?

Mr. MORPHY: I think that if the section were to read as follows, we should get over the difficulty:

> Nothing in this paragraph shall be held to apply to butter in rolls, blocks, tubs or other receptacles as bought from farmers.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does not the farmer sell butter in lumps?

Mr. MORPHY: That would not be a happy expression as applied to my district. It has a meaning of its own.

Mr. OLIVER: I think I would leave in the words 'of indiscriminate weight.'

Mr. MORPHY: Yes, and widen the clause so as to make it read 'bought from farmers,' instead of 'sold by farmers.'

Mr. BURRELL: I do not see any particular objection to that; but I do not think it would make much difference.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. member is only enlarging it; I think the clause is all right.

Mr. BURRELL: If hon. members insist on pressing the point, I cannot see objection to the change. But really, I think the Bill covers the point and will work out all right. We threshed out these points in the preparation of the Bill.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I think that the clause is plain. We do not have to protect the public if they buy from the crock or lump, for in that case the butter is weighed, but only in the case of prints which the dealer is not supposed to weigh.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—penalties:

Mr. OLIVER: I want to put in one final word on behalf of the farmer who is liable to be fined not less than $10 if he does not include the strippings with the rest of the milk. It seems to me that a maximum fine of $10 is rather extreme under the circumstances.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend may be assured that there would not be the slightest likelihood of a man being condemned under this unless for a very gross and deliberate violation.

Mr. OLIVER: If my hon. friend will harden his heart in that way, I do not know that I can do any more.

Mr. THOMSON: I think the minister should come down off his high horse in this matter, for he is entirely wrong. The department does not administer the law nor decide what it is. Any country magistrate has far more power in administering it than the minister has, and it should be in such shape as to be enforced.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister will not be there to tell the magistrate what is what.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—publication of regulations:

Mr. MORPHY: I believe that not one Canadian farmer in ten thousand ever sees the Canada Gazette. I have had under my own observation a case in which great expense was incurred by the withdrawal of one section from the statute regarding tuberculosis by Order in Council published only in the Canada Gazette. I readily appreciate the difficulty which is incurred in giving public notice of such changes to every individual in this country, but I do think that notice of the coming into force or the withdrawal by Order in Council of any section of the statutes should be given in some wider and more public way. Surely with all the printing we do; with all the millions that are spent every year on blue books, many of which are never read by those who receive them, some means can be devised whereby notices of changes in the law can be given to the public. Notice of any change could be inserted in the small local daily paper for, perhaps, fifty cents. The amount would run in the aggregate to a considerable sum of money, but I think the expenditure would be justified. I would ask the minister to give this matter his consideration.

Mr. BURRELL: So far as the legal aspect of the matter is concerned, my hon. friend, being a lawyer, appreciates the difficulty of having for this purpose anything but an official gazette. I may say that any regulations that are put in force by the department are published in pamphlet form, and as we have a mailing list of about 180,000 persons and firms interested in dairying and farming, the regulations are made more or less generally known.

Mr. MORPHY: I do not think that the departmental literature to which my hon. friend refers goes into every home in this country. Nothing would as efficiently give public notice of changes in the law as items in the local newspapers published in the various municipalities.

Mr. OLIVER: Modesty prevents me from urging too strongly the suggestion of my hon. friend, but I must say that it certainly appeals to me as being an adequate means of reaching the public.

Mr. BURRELL: The department will be very glad, of course, to do that.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Will the minister include in his list all organized societies of farmers? I am sure that if copies of these regulations are sent to the United Farmers of the province of Alberta they will be well distributed amongst their members.

Mr. BURRELL: We do send through our department to the press all over the country from time to time copies of any new regulations and matters of that kind, in order that they may be given wide publicity. I quite agree with hon. gentlemen as to the desirability of publicity.

Mr. DEVLIN: I would ask the minister to remember that a good many people in this country do not read the Grit newspapers; he should make sure, therefore, that these notices are sent to the Conservative organs. In case he should overlook the matter, I would suggest that he should send a few of them to the Grit newspapers as well.

Mr. BURRELL: We are very impartial.

Mr. MARCIL: I was glancing through a list of newspapers submitted by the Secretary of State the other day. I am an old newspaper man, and I am sure that not ten members in this House ever see some of the newspapers mentioned in that list, many of which are published solely for the purpose of getting Government advertising. I would advise the minister to have that list looked over by some newspaper men and reduced by about 25 per cent.

Mr. BURRELL: I may add that these changes and regulations are published in the Agricultural Gazette, which is sent to every paper in Canada, regardless of politics.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—proof in deteriorated milk prosecutions:

Mr. OLIVER: This section provides that the owner of the milk may be prosecuted without a definite statement as to the defect in the milk supplied. That seems very unfair as he might expect to be attacked on one point and in court find that he was being attacked on another point.

Mr. WEBSTER: The charge is generally either skimming the milk or adulterating it with water. When the farmer comes up he is charged with one of these offences and it is up to him to defend himself. As a matter of fact, when a charge is made conviction generally follows.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—evidence:

Mr. MORPHY: Is there anything in the meaning given to pure milk represented by a standard or percentage of butter fat? I have seen many prosecutions against men who I think were honest. They would be sending in milk to a factory from a cow that would give a percentage of butter fat of perhaps only two per cent. Thus their dealings were honest but suspicious. I wondered if the standard was fixed under the Act.

Mr. BURRELL: That point was not raised in the committee.

Mr. NESBITT: What is the standard?

Mr. BURRELL: A standard is fixed in the Inland Revenue Department for another purpose.

Mr. DEVLIN: Would it not be wise to define pure milk in the interpretation clause?

Mr. WEBSTER: The percentage of butter fat of course varies with the season of the year. The percentage is not nearly so high in April as in September and that would cause difficulty with a rigid standard. Then too some breeds of cows give a small quantity of milk with a high percentage of butter fat and others give a large quantity of milk with a small percentage of butter fat. Either one of these would be a quality of pure milk.

Mr. DEVLIN: What would be classed as 'inferior to pure milk?'

Mr. OLIVER: The difficulty is to define what is pure milk. The hon. member for Brockville says that pure milk in the fall is of a higher standard than in the spring and therefore a man might be convicted of an offence who was supplying pure milk of a standard up to the spring standard but less than the fall standard.

Mr. BURRELL: He would be judged by a comparison of the milk supplied with milk taken from a cow at the particular time of the year.

Mr. OLIVER: Looking at the matter from the standpoint of the liberty of the subject, it seems that with a sliding scale like that the producer of milk does not stand much chance.

Mr. DEVLIN: Would the milk from the Jersey and Holstein be qualified as inferior under this section?

Mr. BURRELL: Not at all. The criterion of whether it was pure milk or not would be a comparison with the milk as it comes from the cow.

Mr. SEXSMITH: The difficulty in defining pure milk in Ontario has been that a lot of milk is collected on the pooling system. Some factories buy by the Babcock test. Some cows of one breed might produce milk with not more than two and one-half per cent of butter fat and others might run up to five or six per cent. If you set a certain standard it will make it very difficult to continue that system.

5 p.m.

Mr. L. THOMSON: As I understand it, the penalty would not be inflicted unless a person had mixed something with milk.

Mr. BURRELL: Or skimmed it.

Mr. L. THOMSON: How is the test applied? I do not pretend to be an expert, and I would like to know how you can tell whether anything has been mixed with the milk or not. For instance, take the milk of a cow that tests at 3½, and suppose sufficient water was put in to make it test at only 3, is it possible to tell that it is not pure milk?

Mr. WEBSTER: Absolutely.

Section agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER: It would seem from the last few sentences of this Act that the only way for a man to preserve his liberty is to sell his cows.

Mr. NESBITT: I would like to ask the minister, or the Chairman of the Agricultural Committee, why, in the interpretation clause, a dairy is described as a place where the milk or cream of less than fifty cows is manufactured into butter. Why do they not call a dairyman a man who manufactures into butter the milk of his own cows only, and the place where he manufactures it a dairy? Why should a man with seventy or a hundred cows not be allowed to call his place a dairy, providing he does not take in outside milk? With us there a great many men with more than fifty cows, but their establishments are dairies, not creameries, as they manufacture no milk but what their own cows produce. My idea of a creamery is where they manufacture milk outside of their own production. I would like to know why the definition of a dairy stiplates for less than fifty cows, and why it was not on the basis I have suggested.

Mr. BURRELL: It is rather arbitrary, but it is difficult to define the difference between a dairy and a creamery, You have to draw the line somewhere. New Zealand has placed it exactly at fifty, I understand. I do not think there is any great object in having the definition altered.

Mr. NESBITT: I am not asking for that. Our farmers call their places dairies so long as they manufacture the milk from their own cows only; and call places that take in outside milk creameries. My hon. friend from Brockville is an experienced man, and I will ask him why a man should not be allowed to call his place a dairy so long as he manufactures his own milk only?

Mr. SEXSMITH: I think that if a farmer had the requisite number of cows to bring his place under the heading of a creamery, he would be very glad to do it. He would prefer to have it called a creamery because, as you will have noticed in the papers, creamery butter is dearer than dairy butter. In the committee, I took the ground that it was unfair to the farmer that we should designate a certain class of butter, dairy butter; and another class, creamery butter; so we decided on the fifty cows. There are a great many people making butter with less than fifty cows, whose product is as good as or better than the creamery product. We could not come to any other solution of the difficulty of distinguishing the two.

Mr. NESBITT: Would you mind my saying that with our farmers the old policy of putting 'creamery' on their wrappers is rapidly passing away, if it has not already passed. The idea in the public mind is that a creamery is more of a wholesale factory, taking in milk from various people. The word 'dairy' with us carries more weight than the word 'creamery' for the simple reason that if a man running his own dairy has cleanly habits his butter is likely to be more valuable than creamery butter made from milk from different farms, which may not be cleanly.

Mr. WEBSTER: I was present when this Bill was before the committee, and we discussed each of the clauses thoroughly. On the majority of farms in Ontario you will find less than fifty cows to a dairy, and for that reason we thought it right and just to say fifty in the Bill. A man with only fifty cows is very often not able to work up the milk on his own farm and has to send it to a creamery. There is a good deal of difference between creamery and dairy butter. One is the product of separated milk, and the other is not. My hon. friend would intimate that dairy butter is superior to creamery. From my own personal experience I can say that during what little time the Lord will allow me to live I want to eat creamery butter.

Mr. NESBITT: With us, any farmer with six or ten cows uses a separator.

Mr. WEBSTER: Not necessarily.

Mr. NESBITT: They are not forced to, but as a matter of practice they do. I do not know of anybody with more than six cows who does not use a separator in his dairy.

Mr. WEBSTER: I know some farmers following the deep water setting system.

Mr. NESBITT: I am glad to say that is not the case with us; we have advanced in the art. I know, as my hon. friend says, that the great majority of farmers have less than fifty cows There are a great many who want to call their butter 'dairy butter.'

Mr. WEBSTER: With us, they all want to call it 'creamery butter.'

Mr. SEXSMITH: The manufacture of butter in the old way is gradually diminishing. In my district a farmer who has only three or four cows uses a separator. I am surprised at the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) saying they want to call it dairy butter, because all over the Dominion the creamery butter is selling at a higher price.

Mr. NESBITT: There are dairymen in my riding who sell their butter at a higher price than any creamery butter will fetch. They sell it all the year around and they call it dairy butter, and any one who visits their dairies and sees how they conduct their business would pay more for their butter than for any creamery butter made from the milk of cows from the public.

SECOND READINGS OF BILLS.

Bill No. 146, to amend the Civil Service Act.—Mr. Pelletier.

Bill No. 147, to amend the Post Office Act.—Mr. Pelletier.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

Agriculture—health of animals, $500,000.

Mr. OLIVER: What proportion of this vote would be for service, and what proportion for compensation for animals slaughtered?

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture): The heaviest expense is for the inspectors, of whom we have about 131, counting the riders in the mange district and including their assistants.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the mange decreasing?

Mr. BURRELL: There are some areas that have been relieved in Alberta, and we have wiped out the whole of the mange district in British Columbia. In the mange districts we have certain herds which are quarantined and under special inspection. From the whole of the mange area animals are not allowed to be moved outside of the area unless they are dipped, but those not quarantined can be moved within the area. The only execeptions are animals consigned for slaughter to the abattoirs, in which case some are inspected at Winnipeg and some go straight to the abattoirs on the Pacific coast, or to places in the mountain districts where there are no agricultural areas. The outlook is more hopeful.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does dipping mean two immersions?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the situation in regard to hog cholera ?

Mr. BURRELL: We have this year paid out more for hog cholera than we did last year. I will give my hon. friend the comparative figures. In 1911-12 we paid out $23,446; in 1912-13, $52,785, and in 1913-14, for ten months, $46,860. There has been some increase in that, noticeably in parts of Saskatchewan and Ontario, but on the whole nothing like what we had to contend with during the first year or two after the Act came into force. Although it is costing a good deal, I do not think we can adopt any other method than the one we are following now. In the United States they have an entirely different system, whereby they immunize the hogs from cholera. It has been found, however, that a particular hog may be immunized and still be a carrier of the disease. Their system costs them millions of dollars as compared with our thousands. We passed a regulation prohibiting the introduction of virus for this particular form of inoculation. We think the best system we can adopt is the system we are carrying out at the present time.

There is no doubt that many cases of hog cholera have been spread from points where uncooked garbage containing infected meat has been brought in from the other side, or even from hogs on this side. In regard to that, not only are we urging better sanitary precautions on the part of the local municipalities who should observe them, but we have passed an Order in Council stating positively that the Government will not undertake to pay compensation to people who deliberately feed uncooked garbage to their hogs. I think that is in the public interest.

Mr. OLIVER: Under what circumstances have the outbreaks of hog cholera taken place recently? Have most of them been owing to garbage-fed hogs, or have they occurred outside of such conditions?

Mr. BURRELL: I think most of the cases have occurred as my hon. friend has stated. We think we have been able to trace them to garbage-fed hogs. In some cases the disease has been brought in from the other side, although our regulations are pretty strict. This year we contemplate putting two or three special men to do educational work in regard to cleaning up garbage and seeing that it is properly cooked, especially wherever hog cholera has already been prevalent, so as to drive into the public mind the great importance of feeding properly cooked garbage.

Mr. NESBITT: There was hog cholera last year amongst my hogs, although they never saw garbage of any kind. They were all fed on good, clean, second-grade flour, and shorts and oil cakes. They ran in pens that were what we call gravel-loam soil, and the inside pen was just as clean as this chamber. Every condition that was possible to surround them with was perfect, even with regard to running water. I think the Lord sent the cholera. I do not know where they got it.

Mr. OLIVER: As my hon. friend the minister knows, I am asking for definite information for very definite reasons. How far can the department go in the matter of preventing this disease, having regard to the conditions surrounding the keeping and feeding of hogs?

Mr. BURRELL: I would not like to answer that question offhand, because it is in the nature of a legal question. I suppose we can go pretty far, but I imagine there will be still ample power in the municipal and provincial authorities to deal with some phases of the matter. I do not know how far we can interfere locally with sanitary questions such as my hon. friend has mentioned. We could plainly say that if they do not live up to certain conditions, we shall refuse to pay any compensation in that district. I would not, however, like to express any opinion offhand.

[Mr. Burrell.]

Mr. OLIVER: What is the action that the department is permitted to take and, as a matter of fact, does take, as regards the measure of responsibility assumed by the Government under the law as it stands at present, in case of an outbreak of cholera?

Mr. BURRELL: Directly we are informed of an outbreak or discover it in any place, we send an inspector there. The place is immediately quarantined and the hogs are slaughtered. In some cases, where there is a holding of a large number of hogs and where there has been very slight contact, it may possibly be necessary to slaughter all the hogs; but we are coming very fast to the conclusion that it is dangerous to exempt any, and that it is better to slaughter all the hogs that have come in contact with hogs infected with the disease. I think we ought, before another session, to consider the raising of the valuation of hogs, because they have increased very much in price during the last two years. Last year we took up the increased valuation of horses, and I am not sure that we should not go into the question with regard to hogs. Some people will argue that you should not pay compensation for any of these things, because it is in the owner's interest and in the public interest to stamp out these diseases; but if you do not compensate, you will have people concealing these diseases, and you will never be able to stamp them out.

Mr. KNOWLES: Where a man owns an animal and another man has a lien note or a chattel mortgage on it and the animal is killed, to whom does the Government pay the money?

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend is better able to answer that question than I am, because he is a lawyer. I think the owner of the animal would get the money.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have seen the point come up, and it is very embarrassing.

Mr. BURRELL: I am afraid I cannot speak offhand in regard to it.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would like an answer in regard to it, because I understand that the ruling of the department is that they will not give anything to the lien holder. That works an injustice, because if a man of straw owns a pig and another man has a lien on it, the luckiest thing the owner can do is to give the pig hog cholera.

Mr. BURRELL: I will make a note of the matter.

Mr. OLIVER: There has been a substantial increase in the valuation of hogs in recent years, so that the valuation that was perfectly good a few years ago is not so now. Therefore I think there should be a measurable increase in the valuation.

Mr. BURRELL: I agree with my hon. friend. We shall have to deal with that matter before long.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister local inspectors in the district of Quebec, or are they all grouped in the city of Quebec.?

Mr. BURRELL: We do not have such things as local inspectors. Our inspectors are liable to be transferred to any point throughout the country. Some of them, of course, have a very wide range of territory. When they enter the service, they do so on the distinct understanding that they are liable to be transferred from one point to another. The late Government found and we have found it a bad thing to keep one man in a locality for a long time, because he gets to know a large number of people and is swayed by personal interest, and it is just as well that he be transferred from place to place.

Mr. MARCIL: How many inspectors are there for the province of Quebec?

Mr. BURRELL: I have forgotten. The chief inspector is Dr. Couture, at Quebec.

Mr. MARCIL: In the case of a district many miles removed from the residence of an inspector, when an inspector is sent for sometimes he comes, and sometimes he does not. I think a certain route should be marked out and periodical visits made.

Mr. BURRELL: We do not undertake to do the local work. We do the work at boundary points. We do not undertake to have local inspectors at all points throughout the country, but we try to cover the ground we are supposed to occupy.

Mr. MARCIL: How about a case where an animal is diseased?

Mr. BURRELL: That is a private business, and the owner calls in a local veterinarian.

Mr. MARCIL: But how about the case of a contagious disease?

Mr. BURRELL. Of course, if it is one of the diseases scheduled by the Act, that is different. But there are very few such diseases—hog cholera, glanders and dourine are the only ones at present.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there any glanders in Quebec?

Mr. BURRELL: Very slight. Our greatest trouble is in Saskatchewan.

Mr. NESBITT: Is the minister not yet able to enlarge his field to cover tuberculosis in cattle?

Mr. BURRELL: We have that under consideration, and in fact, the increase in the Estimate for this year was partly made in order that, if we decided to take a step in that direction, we could do so. I am sorry I am not in a position to make a definite statement on the subject. I hope to be able to make a start in the matter, though, as the hon. gentleman knows it is a very difficult question, and the more it is looked into the more difficult it becomes.

Mr. WILLIAM CHISHOLM: Does the minister intend to take steps to eradicate the weed which, as he knows, produces what is known as 'cattle disease'? The minister reached the conclusion that it was not a contagious disease, and therefore no compensation was allowed for losses. But as the Government has undertaken to act in co-operation with the local governments, I think it should take steps to prevent the spread of the disease, and to that end to destroy this weed which, by causing this disease, has led to the loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars in the eastern part of the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. BURRELL: We reached the definite conclusion that the disease was due to the weed in question and that it is not contagious. So far as cleaning up the area infested by that weed is concerned, that is a matter for the local authorities. Anything that we can do to co-operate with them, of course, we shall be glad to do.

Mr. CHISHOLM: But the minister has not decided to act in co-operation with the local government to eradicate the cause of the disease!

Mr. BURRELL: I cannot say that we have entered into any arrangement with a local government as to the eradication of weeds in their district. I cannot tell at this moment what may have taken place lately as between the local authorities and the officials of the department.

Mr. MACDONALD: I lately received a letter from a clergyman in the eastern part of my county, which adjoins that of my hon. friend. This clergyman sent me statistics that were absolutely astonishing as to the losses going on through this disease. It is extending eastward and in some cases to the Island of Cape Breton. It seems to me that some investigation ought to be made with the view to ascertaining whether some cure could not be effected. A careful diagnosis of the symptoms might lead to such a result. Apparently, when a veterinary is called in to attend a sick animal, if he diagnoses it as a case of 'cattle disease' that is the end of it—he seems to regard it as a hopeless case. It seems to me that the finding of a remedy is a subject to which the department might well direct its energies. Of course, in Nova Scotia, the eradication of weeds and matters of that kind have been for a long time vested in the municipalities, and many local efforts have been made for the eradication of this weed. Notwithstanding these efforts, however, the disease still pursues its destroying course. Now, the question of following up the good work that has been done in ascertaining the cause, by ascertaining also the cure, seems to me one that might well deserve the minister's attention. I would ask him if he would consider having an investigation as to whether some remedy could be found. By some combination with municipal authorities or the provincial government, and, as I understand it, the minister's department works cordially with Professor Cummings the head of the Nova Scotia department—the minister might try to assist in stopping what has become a terrible plague among the farmers of eastern Nova Scotia.

Mr. BURRELL: I can only repeat that the disease is directly traceable to the weed referred to, and the question involved is simply one of the eradication of that weed. What the hon. gentleman says concerning Nova Scotia is true also of Ontario—the control of weeds is a matter for the municipality. It would seem a local question. However, I will look into it.

Mr. MACDONALD: But the practical difficulty is this: The farmers interested have taken great care to prevent the growth of the weed. But where there is a vacant farm, or one that nobody is looking after, that becomes a plague spot that will spoil the whole community. Should not the minister, through his officials, attempt to find some cure for the disease. When the symptoms are known, why should there not be some attempt to check or control the disease? But, as I have said, that is not done—when the veterinary diagnoses it as 'cattle disease,' that is the end of it.

Mr. BURRELL: If an antidote can be found we shall be very glad of it.

Mr. WARNOCK: This weed exists in New South Wales.

Mr. BURRELL: And in Africa too.

Mr. WARNOCK—The Chief Inspector in New South Wales has been experimenting for a number of years, and I think it was found that there was no remedy except to eradicate the weed.

Mr. BURRELL: That is my information.

Mr. WARNOCK: And that can only be done by grazing sheep on the land.

Mr. WILLIAM CHISHOLM: But I believe it has been found that sheep also may be affected by the weed under certain conditions—if they are allowed to run at large in the fall of the year. They nibble this weed—rag-weed, it is called—and a number of them have been lost. Of course, they are not affected to the same extent as cattle or horses.

Mr. WARNOCK: May I ask the minister if there is any chance of getting a modification of shipping regulations respecting cattle from points in Alberta to British Columbia?

Mr. BURRELL: I do not know. Does the hon. gentleman think they are too onerous?

Mr. WARNOCK—Yes. It has been so represented to me, and I think the minister has had the same representations from local shippers.

Mr. BURRELL: I think the department has been exercising a good deal of moderation. It is hard to go further in modifying restrictions. The hon. gentleman knows some of the difficulties. We had mange imported into British Columbia in shipments from Alberta, and great expense was involved in exterminating it. The shippers turned the animals out in various districts to graze. At the present time, as the hon. member knows, those that go for immediate slaughter get the inspection before they are started, and in the Crowsnest, they are followed up a little more carefully, as there are no abattoirs, but are delivered to butchers. We made that concession.

In fact, we made that concession at Crowsnest Pass primarily for the benefit of southern Alberta, and in view of the conditions I do not think that we should assent to any relaxing of restrictions.

Mr. WARNOCK: The point is that these cattle have to be dipped immediately before they are shipped. This is a great hardship, because the butcher does not want cattle that have been knocked about and bruised by dipping almost immediately before they are slaughtered. One of the large companies that violated the mange regulation is greatly benefited by the regulations now in force. They are permitted to ship their cattle to Vancouver and other points on the coast for slaughter, while the small man who ships to Nelson, Fernie, or other points in the Crowsnest Pass must dip his cattle once before shipment. The consequence is that, because of the dipping regulation, the butchers along the Crowsnest Pass would rather buy from the large packers in Calgary or Edmonton than buy live cattle in southern Alberta.

Mr. BURRELL: I will look into the matter and see what can be done.

Mr. OLIVER: I understand that if a portion of a herd of hogs is found diseased, the whole herd is destroyed. Is compensation paid for those that are slaughtered, but are not found to be diseased?

Mr. BURRELL: Yes, compensation is paid for all.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it permitted to dispose of the carcases of those animals which are slaughtered but not found to be diseased?

Mr. BURRELL: Under the regulations, the whole herd may be killed and no use permitted of any of the animals destroyed. In some cases in the past animals which have been in contact with the diseased herd, but which have not shown symptoms of the disease, have been used for food. But the difficulty is that while no lesions might be apparent, on account of the disease being in its early stages, the virus might nevertheless be there, and if the meat were left around uncooked it could actually transfer hog cholera to another district. On account of this danger the regulations provide for our dealing with the matter in a most drastic way, and paying compensation accordingly.

Mr. OLIVER: Has compensation been paid in the case of the outbreak of hog cholera at Edmonton ?

Mr. BURRELL: I think so.

Mr. OLIVER: There was a question as to whether the garbage was cooked or not; some think it was not cooked.

Mr. BURRELL: Before the Order in Council to which I have referred was passed, the people were informed that if they did this unknowingly or unwittingly they would be compensated, but if a man, after being warned, deliberately fed uncooked garbage to the animals with the result that hog cholera was contracted, he would not be entitled to compensation. Although some discretion has been used in the enforcement of the Order in Council, I think we shall have to educate the public to understand that if they feed uncooked garbage to the animals and hog cholera results, they will not be entitled to compensation.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister been made aware of the development of the horse meat industry in the county of Chambly ?

Mr. BURRELL: The matter has come to the attention of the department. This horse flesh is being supplied, I believe, to the city of Montreal. We were asked to appoint an inspector to see that the meat was not diseased, but we did not feel that it came under our department. I must say that we have taken no steps to encourage that particular industry.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does it not come under the Department of Agriculture ?

Mr. BURRELL: No.

Mr. DEVLIN: What about the inspection of the meat ?

Mr. BURRELL: We inspect only those shipments which are concerned with interprovincial trade. I understand that this industry is confined to the province of Quebec, Montreal being the only city in which horse flesh is being eaten at the present time.

Mr. MARCIL: The newspapers have announced that a large portion of this product is sent to Sweden. Would not shipments in that case come under the control of the minister?

Mr. BURRELL: I have not the Act before me, but I think that its provisions would not permit us to deal with horse flesh.

Mr. MARCIL: For export?

Mr. BURRELL: I do not think the Act covers the inspection of horse meat.

Mr. MARCIL: As this is a rather important question for the city of Montreal, perhaps the minister would look into it.

Mr. BURRELL: I will give it careful consideration.

Mr. WARNOCK: Has the minister any information with regard to a serious outbreak of dourine at Raymond, Alberta?

Mr. BURRELL: We are paying a very heavy compensation there, and hope to get the situation under hand before very long. As my hon. friend may know, through the excellent work of Dr. Watson at Lethbridge we have adopted the complement fixation test which enables us to detect almost without any doubt the existence of dourine. We have tested several hundreds of these horses and the chances are that before we are through it will cost us $40,000, or more but we hope to wipe out the disease.

Mr. WARNOCK: I understand that some of these animals were recently imported.

Mr. BURRELL: I think so; I know that some of them were pure bred. The area is a comparatively restricted one. We are not having half as much trouble as they have in the United States, where it is costing a great deal more, and I think by going after it in this drastic way we shall be able to control it.

Mr. WARNOCK: The United States authorities told us for many years that we were wrong and that they did not have it, but the chief inspector told me not long ago that they had some eight or ten thousand cases.

At six o'clock the House resumed and then took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

Intercolonial railway—air brakes, to improve triple valves, $7,150.

Hon. J. D. REID (acting Minister of Railways): This is to improve the triple valve air brakes on the Intercolonial, in continuance of the policy of gradually improving the air brake system of that road. Since 1907 improvements have been made from year to year. The explanation I have to give in connection with this item is as follows: The 'K' triple valve has additional features known as quick service, uniform release, and uniform recharge to meet modern conditions of freight service, using less air and being far superior for controlling trains on heavy grades. It is strongly recommended by the Westinghouse Air Brake Company, and is being adopted on a number of railways. The number of cars to be fitted is 10,910, at $5.50 each; a total of $60,005. In 1907-8, 1,273 cars were fitted with this triple valve; in 1908-9, 1,273; and a similar number every year since.

Mr. NESBITT: Have all these cars been fitted with the same kind of valve?

Mr. REID: Yes. The total amount expended to date is $49,450, leaving $10,554 to be expended in fitting the balance of the cars with this valve. We are taking exactly the same vote this year as has been taken in the last seven years, namely, $7,150.

Intercolonial railway—Amherst—additional facilities $16,000.

Mr. REID: This is for improving the sidings and for general work around the yard at Amherst, necessary on account of the increased traffic. The estimated cost is $16,000.

Mr. EMMERSON: Will it be done by contract or by day labour?

Mr. REID: Day labour.

Mr. EMMERSON: I should think the conditions at Amherst would lend themselves to the work being done by contract.

Mr. REID: The improvements are going on right in the yard where they are working all the time, and I understand that it is customary to do such work by day labour.

Mr. WILLIAM CHISHOLM: Has the minister received a copy of a resolution passed by the Antigonish Board of Trade, asking the department to make a survey of a railway line, starting at or near Antigonish and running through South River valley to Country Harbour? If the minister has received such resolution, what does he purpose about it?

Mr. REID: I cannot remember just now; although I think there was such a resolution received. I shall be able to give the hon. gentleman full information later.

Mr. WILLIAM CHISHOLM (Antigonish): I appreciate, that the hon. gentleman being only acting Minister of Railways, it would hardly be fair to ask him to make a statement on a matter of this kind, but I desire to take advantage of this opportunity to put on record, for the guidance of the Minister of Railways when he returns, the importance of complying with the request of the petition of the Board of Trade of Antigonish. On March 27, 1912, I had occasion to bring the question of this line from Antigonish to Country Harbour to the attention of the House, and I then set out the importance of the road and the desirability of constructing it. The Minister of Railways seemed to realize then that that line was shorter than any of the proposed lines to connect Guysborough county with the main line of the Intercolonial railway. The remarks I made will be found at page 6227 'Hansard,' March 27, 1912. I asked the minister if he had in contemplation making a survey of that route with the view of building such a railway, and he replied that he would take occasion to investigate the different routes during his tour of inspection and decide which would be the best. Later, on January 30, 1913, I brought the matter up again and put this question (page 2416 'Hansard,' 1913):

Has a survey been made for for the proposed railway route between Country Harbour through the South River valley, connecting with the Intercolonial. If so, has a report been made?
Mr. Cochrane: The department has no knowledge of any such survey having been made.

This was rather an extraordinary statement for the minister to make, on the 30th of January, 1913, in view of the solemn promise he had given on the 27th of March, 1912, that he would have a survey made. I was particularly surprised to see such an answer, because there was a by-election in Antigonish for the local Legislature in January, 1913, and during that by-election what purported to be copies of correspondence with the Minister of Railways were exhibited, and it was stated throughout the length and breadth of the district that that part of the country was to be afforded the railway communication asked for. On April 13, 1913, some months after that by-election, I brought the matter up again, and to my great surprise I found the Minister of Railways repudiating the statements made in the county, regarding the construction of this road, by men of responsible position, one of whom was seeking to be a member of the local Legislature, and another was an honourable senator. There were also read letters which purported to have come from the Minister of Railways, but which were afterwards repudiated by the minister of Railways on April 30, 1913. I pressed the minister for an answer to the question why the survey had not been made and what the intention of the Government was in respect to that. As the Minister of Railway was stolid, implacable and impervious to anv appeals for information I made on that occasion, I was obliged, in order to place myself right, to make some further extended remarks with respect to the necessity of building that road. Those remarks will be found, under date of April 30, 1913, at pages 8873 and 8875 of volume 5 of 'Hansard,' 1912-13. Therefore, I do not propose to enter into the argument into which I entered on that occasion. Those references will be sufficient to show my position in the matter, and to call the attention of the Minister of Railways, when he returns—which I hope will be in a very short time—to resume the duties of his office, to the reasons why I urge that that road should be built.

I have just one more observation to make. I moved for a return for the correspondence on file with reference to the suggested survey and construction of a line of railway from Country Harbour to Antigonish to connect with the Intercolonial railway. A return was brought down on the 22nd day of January, 1914, but I cannot find in it any reference, or petition, or request from those persons who claimed to be doing so much for the good of the road, and to be endeavouring to secure the accommodation so much desired in that vicinity; nor can I find any suggestion of any kind urging the building of a line of railway through that section, except letters from myself, which are dated May 14, 1913, March 3, 1910, and January 13, 1911, also a letter from the secretary, Mr. Jones, under date of March 18, 1912, and a letter from Mr. W. C. Milner, under date of January 22, 1912. Mr. Milner was asking for a subsidy for a line of railway in that locality and I was endorsing his application with my humble support. My conduct has been subjected to more or less criticism, by my political opponents, it being alleged that I have not been friendly to this proposition, and that is why I take this opportunity of putting myself on record.

I can only say, in conclusion, that I hope the minister, when he returns, will see that a survey is made, and I would call his attention to the facts expressed by myself to the House on the occasions to which I have referred, particularly on the 27th of March, 1912, and again on the 30th April, 1913. I would urge upon the minister to see that the survey is made as soon as possible.

Let us have something more tangible than pre-election promises by men whose assurances are now very properly discounted in that part of the country, for it is now clear to every one that these pretending friends of the road were after votes, when they needed them, and not the railway. But the people there want the road, and are entitled to it, and it should no longer be denied or delayed to them.

Mr. REID: I will certainly look into the matter myself and see if I can get any further information, which I will give to the hon. member. I will also draw the remarks made by the hon. member to the attention of the hon. minister on his return, which I hope will be at a not very distant date.

Mr. KYTE: Will the hon. minister be good enough to say whether or not any move has been made with a view to taking over the branch line owned by the Cape Breton railway between St. Peters and Sydney?

Mr. REID: No move has been made yet.

Mr. KYTE: Has any engineer been sent over the road within the last few weeks for the purpose of making a report to the department?

Mr. REID: I do not know. An engineer may have been sent by the general manager of the Intercolonial, but I know nothing about it. If I understand the situation aright, the Department of Railways or the Government cannot take over any of these branch lines under the present law; that is, without bringing a Bill into Parliament and having it passed. There is no intention, so far as I know, of taking over the road mentioned during the present session.

Mr. KYTE: When I was at St. Peter's a few weeks ago, I was informed that Dr. Martin Murphy, formerly provincial engineer for the province of Nova Scotia, was to be sent down by the Department of Railways and Canals in a few days for the purpose of making an investigation as to the physical condition of the road, and making a report to the department. I understand from the remarks of the hon. minister that neither Dr. Murphy nor any other engineer has gone over the road for that purpose.

Mr. REID: I do not know. Several gentlemen have suggested to me that there should be some scheme for developing the Bras d'Or lakes, and that there should be some hotel system there in connection with the Intercolonial railway. I suggested that perhaps it would be well for the general manager to send an engineer or some one down to look over the situation and advise me.

Mr. MACDONALD: What does an engineer know about hotels?

Mr. REID: It would be necessary to look over the road. It may be for that reason that an engineer has been sent down. I do not know whether or not there is anything in it.

Mr. KYTE: No action has been taken by the department to make a survey of the proposed route between St. Peter's and Sydney with a view to extending the line in that direction?

Mr. REID: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: Mr. Gutelius has been doing things that the minister does not know anything about. Did not Mr. Gutelius have an interview within the last two weeks at Halifax with certain gentlemen in regard to taking over the line between New Glasgow and Thorburn?

Mr. REID: I did not see it in the newspapers.

Mr. MACDONALD: Neither did I, but did not Mr. Gutelius have an interview with certain gentlemen interested in the taking over of the line belonging to the Acadia Coal company from New Glasgow to Thorburn?

Mr. REID: I do not know whether he met them or not.

Mr. MACDONALD: Did the minister authorize him to meet them?

Mr. REID: No, I did not.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Speaking of branch lines, I wish to say a word in favour of the Gaspé railway. My hon. friend knows that what is known as the Gaspé railway is made up of two lines: One extending from Matapedia on the Intercolonial railway to New Carlisle, and the other from New Carlisle up to Gaspé basin in the county of Gaspé. The first section was built thirty or thirty-five years ago and cost the country a very large sum of money. It serves a very rich section of the country, which might be very prosperous if the line were in good order. The first twenty miles of the section, called the Atlantic and lake Superior, was built originally by the Government. It had been intended at first to build it from Matapedia to Gaspé basin, as a branch of the Intercolonial. This decision had been arrived at when Sir Chas. Tupper, I believe, was Minister of Railways and Canals. For some reason or other that idea was abandoned and the road was taken over by Mr. C. N. Armstrong, a gentleman well known in the railway world; and, by subsidies from the Dominion Government and from the Provincial Government, he succeeded in building the first hundred miles, that is to say, from Matapedia to New Carlisle. It is a beautiful section of country represented by my hon. friend the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil). Unfortunately it seemed that the large fishing establishment known as Robin and Company, later on merged into the Robin-Colas Company, a Jersey firm, was opposed to any railway construction in that country because, forsooth, the railway might induce the fishermen to migrate into other sections of the country, and the fishing establishment would be deprived of the valuable services of that population of fishermen. After many years that first section was finally completed, but it is to-day, as it has been for a long time, in very poor condition indeed. If the hon. member for Bonaventure were in his seat, he could describe to the committee the very dangerous condition of that road. When I was elected member for the county of Gaspé in 1896 I took up the question of building the second section of the road, extending from New Carlisle to Gaspé Basin. A company was formed, subsidies were voted by this Parliament, a land grant was voted by the legislature of Quebec and the second section of the line was completed in 1910. There is quite a difference between the two lines. The first, as I have said, is in very poor condition; the second is a really well-built road, upon which trains run regularly from New Carlisle to Gaspé Basin. But in order to connect the Gaspé end with the other parts of the country, the trains have to run on the first section, which is not in good condition, and the result is that one section of the line is in good order and the other is not. As has very often been said, it is an extraordinary thing that the original intention of the present Government has not been carried out; that is to say, that this section of the country has not been connected with branch railway lines as part of the Intercolonial system. To-day, on account of this mishap to the first section of the road, the company cannot prosper. It is true that trains are run both ways, but they are run without profit. If the Government were to make the necessary arrangements with the company and obtain the road upon fair terms, I am sure that they would be really doing something for that most interesting section of the country. For almost half a century that section of the country was deprived of railway communication; yet it is the oldest county in the whole of this Dominion. It is well known that when Jacques Cartier came to Canada in the sixteenth century, he first landed on the shores of the bay of Gaspé. I understand that the Government cannot acquire the road without introducing special legislation to that effect. In order to facilitate the acquiring of those lines, why should not the minister and the department feel their way by approaching the various companies and establishing to their satisfaction, as well as to the satisfaction of Parliament, what would be the cost of taking over those branch lines? It seems to me that this would be putting the oxen before the cart. I believe that if last year Parliament had been made aware of the cost of the various branch lines, the legislation which was introduced could have been passed and the amendment introduced by the Senate would probably not have been made. During the time that I was member for Gaspé, a period of 16 years, I received many communications on this subject. Although their end of the road is in perfect order, my former electors in the county of Gaspé are anxious, in order to ameliorate the conditions, that this road should be taken over as a branch line from Matapedia to Gaspé Basin.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman has opened up the question of the acquisition of branch line railways as a part of the Intercolonial system. The hon. gentleman will agree that the very fact that the Minister of Railways last year introduced a Bill to that effect shows that he is much interested in the matter and that he intended to take over many or all of the branch line railways and make them part of the Intercolonial. The House unanimously, I think, passed the Branch Lines Bill, but unfortunately the Senate amended it in such a way that it did not become law. During the time that I have been acting for the Minister of Railways and Canals, I have certainly been convinced that it would be a good thing for the Intercolonial and a good thing for many parts of the country if these branch lines were taken over. They would be great feeders of the main line, and could be managed at less cost than at present, as these various railway companies have a large amount of rolling stock, etc., that would not be required if the Intercolonial took them over. If I were in a position to-day to do so under existing legislation, I would be in favour of taking over many of these branch lines, but, as the hon. member has stated, the Branch Lines Act which is now on the statute book does not permit the taking over of branch lines without further legislation, and I would not feel like assuming the responsibility of taking any additional steps in the matter in the absence of the Minister of Railways.

I do not know that there is much more I can do in the matter. But, so far as I am concerned, I believe that it would be of great advantage to the Intercolonial railway to have some of these branch lines, and, in taking them over, an extension of fifteen, twenty or twenty-five miles further would be most helpful to many parts of the country. I am in hopes that the time will come, and that soon, when the Government will be in a position to take over some of the branch lines. I do not know how many should be taken over; I have not gone into the matter. The hon. member knows that the minister must have much information in connection with the branch lines, for he has had this matter before as also had his predecessor. The owners of branch lines are continually appealing to the department asking the Intercolonial railway to take the lines over, and in many cases information is obtained as to their value and what the owners expect for them. Then again, surveys and inspections have been made on many of them. We have a great deal of data in the department on this subject, and I am sure the department will be ready to act upon it as soon as it is in a position to do so. And the very line the hon. member mentioned is one which was brought to my attention, and I believe it would be a good feeder for the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would suggest that during the holidays the minister should do his best to meet the representatives of the various companies and ascertain in some of the cases what would be the cost of acquiring the lines. This would pave the way to enabling legislation empowering the minister to purchase a certain number of railways. If beforehand he could say to Parliament that it would cost so much for this or that line, Parliament would feel better able to deal with it.

Mr. REID: That is a very good suggestion, and I will draw the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals to it, or, if he should not be there, I shall be glad to follow it up.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Can the minister tell us what is proposed this year in branch line construction? Some of us on this side were much encouraged by the Government accepting a resolution moved by the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) favouring the construction of certain new branch lines in Nova Scotia in counties not now provided with railway facilities. Will the minister say whether any provision will be made in the Supplementary Estimates for the construction of any of these branch lines in Nova Scotia?

Mr. REID: There is no vote for new branch lines; there is a vote for surveys to be made, and I think that the staff are at work, or are about starting at work, on the surveys along the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is no vote in the Main Estimates but we would like to know whether there will be a provision in the Supplementaries.

Mr. REID: I could hardly state that until the Supplementaries are passed by Council. In the Main Estimates is a vote for $50,000 for surveys and inspection. I do not think the hon. gentleman would expect me to make an announcement as to the other.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I think the acting minister should be prepared to state the policy of the Government with regard to the branch lines, so that the committee might know whether the department intend to go forward this year or not. That would be a proper thing for the minister to deal with when he is bringing in his railway Budget. I am not asking him to reveal secrets or to say how much he is going to spend. But will he spend any?

Mr. REID: The Supplementary Estimates will have to be discussed in Council before I can make any announcement.

Mr. WILLIAM CHISHOLM (Antigonish): While I am in hearty accord with the policy of the Government in taking over the branch lines, I would suggest to the acting minister that he must be just before he is generous. On a former occasion I brought up the question of the refund of damages paid by the municipalities of Pictou, Antigonish and Guysborough for the right of way for that portion of the Intercolonial railway running between New Glasgow and the strait of Canso. The subject was discussed on that occasion, but not at great length. The Prime Minister discussed the matter shortly, and the hon. member for Cape Breton, the hon. member for Guysborough, and I think the hon. member for Pictou made some observations regarding the injustice of this claim. But the minister of Railways on that occasion stated that he did not know anything about this claim until it had been discussed that night. He, however, gave an assurance that he would look into the question so that he could discuss it at a future date. His remarks will be found in volume VI of 'Hansard,' 1912-13. The occasion for the discussion of the matter was the proposal for a subsidy to the Ontario Government of $2,000,000 in connection with the building of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway. It was pointed out by myself, and urged by others, that in view of the precedent thus established there was no reason for further delay in paying to the municipalities the sums they had expended in that portion of the Intercolonial railway to which I have referred. The whole of the Intercolonial railway from Sydney to Montreal has been paid for by this Government —by the people of Canada. But as I was explaining, and as I am sure it will surprise the acting minister to know, the municipalities of these three counties have had to bear the cost of the right of way of that portion of the Intercolonial railway and the money was never refunded. There are other parts of the Intercolonial railway that were taken over from time to time in connection with the general scheme of building, but the provinces that had put their money into these lines were recouped. I do not think I can lay the case before the committee better than by giving somewhat in detail what was urged for and against the claim made by the Province of Nova Scotia in this connection, so that the minister may have all the facts when he returns; and I propose to give both sides of the case. This is an old question, dating back as far as 1891. There is a history to it, and I think it right that both sides of the case should be presented. Therefore, at the risk of wearying the committee, I propose to put on the pages of 'Hansard' the pros and cons.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman stated that this dates back to 1891?

Mr. CHISHOLM: The history of it goes back to 1891.

Mr. REID: Yes, but did the claim originate then on the building of the Intercolonial railway?

Mr. CHISHOLM: It originated before that portion of the road known as the Eastern extension, running from New Glasgow to the strait of Canso, was taken over by the Dominion Government. That railway was built by a company subsidized by the province, and the municipalities paid for the right of way. Later, the Dominion Government took it over and repaid the province what it had put into the road, but never repaid the municipalities the amount they had paid for the right of way. My point is that for every other part of the Intercolonial from Sydney to Montreal the municipalities have been held free from any portion of the cost. The Government paid the whole cost of the road. The matter will be explained better than I can explain it if I place on 'Hansard' the resolutions that were passed as far back as 1891. On the 15th day of May, 1891, the legislature of Nova Scotia passed, and afterwards presented in due course to His Excellency the Governor General, an address which sets forth the facts as follows:

That the Intercolonial railway of Canada, extending from the harbour of Quebec to the harbour of Sydney, in the island of Cape Breton, is fully recognized by the Government and Parliament of Canada as a Dominion work.

That one section of the said railway, extending from the town of New Glasgow, in the county of Pictou, to Port Mulgrave in the county of Guysborough, a distance of about eighty miles, was not constructed by the Government of Canada, but was subsidized by the funds of the province of Nova Scotia to the extent of six hundred and seventy-one thousand eight hundred and thirty six dollars and two cents ($671,836.02).

That such section of the Intercolonial railway, formerly called the Eastern extension railway, was constructed by a company under legislation of the province of Nova Scotia, in conjunction with the legislation of the Parliament of Canada granting the Pictou branch of the Intercolonial as a bonus to assist such construction.

That under such legislation the Pictou branch was to be transferred to the company on the completion of the Eastern Extension railway, or to the Government of Nova Scotia, in the event of their acquiring the Eastern Extension railway from the company.

That the Government of Nova Scotia acquired the said Eastern Extension railway from the company, and applied to the Government of Canada for a transfer of the Pictou branch.

That the Government of Canada refused to transfer said Pictou branch, except upon conditions which the Government of Nova Scotia deemed unjust.

That negotiations were entered into between the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia with a view to a transfer of the provincial interests in the said Eastern Extension railway to the Dominion.

That in such negotiations a refund of the provincial subsidy was sought by the Government of Nova Scotia and was refused.

That the Government of Nova Scotia, being compelled to accept such terms as the Government of the Dominion would agree to, or enter upon protracted and expensive litigation to assert the rights of the province, consented to dispose of the provincial interests in the said railway for the sum estimated to be equal to the costs to the province of acquiring the road from the company, apart altogether from the sum paid to the company by the province by way of subsidy.

That notwithstanding such disposal of the property to the Dominion, the province has an equitable right to be refunded its expenditure on what is acknowledged to be a part of the Intercolonial railway of Canada.

That while it is the established policy of the Government of Canada, in constructing sections of the Intercolonial railway, to pay the cost of land for the track of said railway, in the case of the railway from New Glasgow to Port Mulgrave, the right of way was paid for by the municipalities of Pictou, Antigonish and Guysborougn under Acts of the legislature of Nova Scotia.

The address concludes by praying His Excellency to take such steps as will lead to the payment by the Government of Canada to the Government of Nova Scotia the sum of money expended by the Local Government in the construction of the railway from New Glasgow to Port Mulgrave and also—

To the payment to the municipalities of Pictou, Antigonish, St. Mary's, and Guysborough, of the sum expended by them for the right of way of the railway from New Glasgow to Port Mulgrave with interest in each case.

Before proceeding to the next step in the negotiations between the Nova Scotia Government and this Government, let me refer back to the previous action of the municipality of Antigonish, and I cannot express its position any better than by quoting the resolution passed by its municipal council at the annual meeting on the 20th January, 1888. It is as follows:

Whereas the Government of Nova Scotia previous to the passing of the British North American Act paid for the right of way of the railway in Pictou county, between Truro and New Glasgow;

Whereas the Government of Canada is paying the right of way of the railway now in course of construction in the island of Cape Breton;

Whereas the county of Antigonish paid for the right of way of the Eastern Extension railway passing through said county when it was constructed and owned by the Halifax and the Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company;

Whereas the Government of Canada has acquired and now owns the said Eastern Extension railway:

Therefore resolved that this council demand from the Government of Canada the amount that has been paid by the county of Antigonish for their right of way of said Eastern Extension railway throughout said county of Antigonish.

That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Minister of Railways and to our representative at Ottawa, and also that it be published in the local papers.

Similar resolutions were passed by the other municipalities interested which are to be found in a return to an order of the House moved for by me on the 15th of January, 1913, and brought down the 19th of January of this year. I refer to those resolutions to make clear the claims of the municipalities as set forth in the memorial to this Government which I read a moment ago.

I desire to refrain from introducing anything controversial in the remarks which I am making, but the House and the Government will pardon me if I allude to the fact that in the matter of these claims the party spirit asserted itself. The Government was a Liberal Government in Nova Scotia, then led by the brilliant and gifted statesman who was afterwards Minister of Finance in the late Laurier Administration. The Conservative Opposition in the local legislature opposed the claims made against this Government. I am not going to question the motives for their actions which, to me, at this date, seem to have been very unpatriotic to say the least. Suffice it to say they condemned the Government for having transferred the eastern extension to this Government, and contended there was no justice in the claims made. They virtually took the position which this Government adopted, as shown in their answer to the claims made, which I shall put on 'Hansard' a little later. They divided the House twice on this matter, and I have no doubt their unpatriotic conduct influenced their Conservative friends at Ottawa in the action taken by the latter.

To return to the memorial of the Government of Nova Scotia, which I read a moment ago. The memorial was duly received, and acknowledged, but no definite reply to it was forthcoming. So in the year 1892 a delegation composed of the Attorney General, now Judge Longley, of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court bench, and the late Hon. Thomas Johnson, who was then, I tnink, Commissioner of Works, came to Ottawa to urge a compliance with the terms of the memorial. Subsequently, the Secretary of State sent an official communication to the Government of Nova Scotia declining to entertain the claims. The answer of this Government is found in a report of a Committee of the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency, the Governor General in Council on the 28th October, 1893, from which I quote as follows:

The Minister of Railways and Canals, to whom the memorials were referred, reports, with reference to the first item of the claim, in which it is alleged that a certain subsidy amounting to $671,836.02 granted and paid by the Government of the province of Nova Scotia in aid of the Halifax and Cape Breton Railway—better known as the Eastern Extension —should now be recouped to that province, that the Halifax and Cape Breton railway was originally constructed under a charter granted by the Legislature of Nova Scotia, and the Government of that province appears to have voluntarily granted, and paid out of the funds under its control the above mentioned sum as a subsidy to the Halifax and Cape Breton Railway Company, which was the company originally chartered, and was the company under whose management the line was constructed;

That the provincial Government reserved to itself the right, under certain conditions, to acquire the said road, in order that it should be operated efficiently in the interests of the people of the counties through which it passed;

That in accordance with the right thus reserved, the railway in question was so acquired, and became the property of the Government of the province of Nova Scotia, which, subsequently, made a demand upon the Government of Canada for a transfer of the Pictou Branch railway on the ground that the last named railway had been promised by the Dominion Government as an aid to the Eastern Extension. To this demand the Dominion Government replied in effect that the conditions upon which such grant of the Pictou Branch railway had been offered had not been fulfilled and were then incapable of fulfilment. It was suggested, however, by the Dominion Government that they should ask Parliament for power to transfer the Pictou Branch railway in accordance with the original design, if the Government of Nova Scotia would give certain reasonable guarantees which the Dominion Government deemed essential to secure the efficient operation of the line in the interests of the people of eastern Nova Scotia. These guarantees the Government of Nova Scotia declined to give; and in 1883, two delegates from that Government, the Hon. W. T. Pipes and the Hon. W. S. Fielding, visited Ottawa and urgently pressed upon the Government of Canada the desirability of the last mentioned Government purchasing the Eastern Extension railway, in order to relieve the provincial Government from the operation of that line, which was then burdensome to the province and likely to continue so;

That after a full discussion of the terms of purchase, in which the interests of the provincial Government were fully canvassed, it was finally agreed that the Dominion Government should accept the transfer of the rights and interest of the provincial Government in the said railway in consideration of a payment to the provincial Government of the sum of $1,284,311.97. The present claim was then fully considered and disposed of. The memorials now under consideration assert 'that in such negotiations, a refund of the provincial subsidy was sought by the Government of Nova Scotia and refused.' Notwithstanding the refusal, the Government of Nova Scotia accepted the sum offered by the Dominion Government, and transferred its title and interest in consideration of that sum;

That from the date of the transfer until the present time, the Government of Canada have kept faith with the people in whose interest the line was constructed, and at great expense have improved the roadbed, added largely to the rolling stock and equipment, and have given much more efficient service than could reasonably have been expected of the company to whom the subsidy was oringinally granted.

The minister observes that he fails to see that the fact that the provincial Government in disposing of this property to the federal Government for the sum named did not obtain the full amount they desired—being only recouped their own expenditure in the acquisition of the road from the company—constitutes any grievance. The views of the seller and buyer were, at first, divergent on the question of price, but the transaction was finally closed on terms which one side was willing to give and the other concluded to accept. To reopen, as is now attempted, the question of the price would, in his, the minister's opinion, be contrary to justice and reason.

The minister submits, as to the demand on the Dominion Government for payment to the municipalities of Pictou, Antigonish, St. Mary's and Guysborough of the sums expended by these municipalities for the right of way of the railway above referred to, that before the said railway was constructed, and in view of the facilities and accommodation which the construction of the said railway would confer on the people of the municipalities mentioned, the said municipalities voluntarily offered and agreed to pay the amounts involved in the purchase of the right of way of the said line. Such were contributed in consideration of the advantages to be derived from the construction of the line, and were not intended to form any lien upon the railway so constructed, nor were they paid under any expectation of reimbursement. That since the railway had been operated by the Dominion Government, its efficiency has been increased far in excess of what could have been reasonably anticipated by the residents of the above mentioned municipalities when making the grant which they did in aid of the construction of the line.

That the mere fact that some other counties did not make a like contribution to railways which were constructed through them does not seem to afford substantial reason for the present claim.

Mr. J. D. REID: What date was that?

Mr. CHISHOLM: About 1893. The matter stood thus for some years until happily for the province of Nova Scotia a Liberal Administration came into power at Ottawa in 1896. So impressed with the justice of the claims made was the Government of Nova Scotia that, notwithstanding their previous refusal, they again submitted their claim to a Government which was naturally supposed to be more sympathetic, and in which they believed they had an especial friend at court in the person of the then Minister of Finance, the Hon. Mr. Fielding. On the 15th of October, 1897, the claim was again presented to the Laurier Government. Inasmuch as I have read to you the position taken by the previous Conservative Administration here, as disclosed in the report of the Privy Council of the 28th of October, 1893, from which I have quoted, it is fitting that the rejoinder thereto should be placed on 'Hansard.' The House will pardon me for taking up its time, but I want all the facts laid before it so that the Minister of Railways, who is unfortunately absent, may grasp all the facts of the case, about which there seemed a great deal of misapprehension in certain quarters. Therefore, I propose to lay on 'Hansard' the further argument of the Government of Nova Scotia as contained in the documents presented to the late Laurier Government in 1897. I quote the following:

Eastern Extension Railway.

The terms of Confederation imposed upon the federal Government the responsibility of constructing the Intercolonial railway as a Government work, and, while the actual terms of the British North America Act only required that the railway should connect the river St. Lawrence with the city of Halifax in Nova Scotia, the Government has seen fit, as a matter of public policy, to extend this road on the one side from Rivière du Loup to Lévis, and still later to the city of Montreal, and on the other to Sydney Harbour, in the county of Cape Breton. Every portion of this railway has been constructed and paid for out of the consolidated revenues of Canada, and the right of way for the whole work has been paid for out of the consolidated revenues of Canada except one portion between New Glasgow and the strait of Canso. That portion was built by the Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company, by aid of a Liberal subvention from the Government of Nova Scotia. It was undertaken upon condition that on its completion it should be further aided by being handed over the line of railway then belonging to the Dominion between Truro and Pictou, which was then and still is a very profitable piece of road. Believing that it was in the public interest that this Eastern railway system should be in the hands of the provincial Government rather than in the hands of a company, the Government of Nova Scotia, in the session of 1883, took steps to acquire the Eastern Extension railway which carried with it the right of possession and ownership of the Pictou branch. A clause had been inserted in the contract with the Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company enabling the Government, after the completion of the line, to take it over by paying the amount of the actual outlay of the company over and above the amount of subsidy it had received from the Government. The power of acquiring was exercised, and the Eastern Extension railway came into the hands of the Government during the year 1883, and was operated by the Commissioner of Public Works. On applying to the Dominion Government for the handing over of the Pictou branch, under the terms of the agreement and Act of Parliament, the federal Government imposed such conditions in respect of the transfer as made it impossible for the Government of Nova Scotia to carry out its policy of acquiring and managing the Eastern railway system, with its contemplated extension through the island of Cape Breton, without incurring finanical responsibility far beyond its resources. The terms which the Dominion Government imposed as the conditions of handing over the Pictou branch were so unreasonable and so exacting as to raise a very strong presumption that they were imposed in furtherance of the well devised policy of the Government to themselves make this Eastern Extension a part of the Intercolonial and extend the same to Sydney Harbour. The result was that the Government of Nova Scotia was compelled reluctantly to abandon its own policy, and to hand over the Eastern Extension railway to the Dominion Government as a part of the Intercolonial railway system upon being refunded the amount that they had actually paid to the Halifax and Cape Breton Railway and Coal Company. At the time of this transfer, as will be found in the Journals of the House of Assembly, 1884, the Hon. Messrs. Pipes and Fielding, who were the delegates representing the Government of Nova Scotia, urged on behalf of the Government of Nova Scotia that the Dominion Government on taking over the Eastern Extension railway, should not only pay its costs to the provincial Government, but the provincial subsidy as well; and no doubt this would have been insisted upon if it had not been that the action of the Dominion Government in refusing to hand over the Pictou branch, except upon terms which were quite unreasonable and quite impossible of fulfilment, compelled the provincial Government, in self-defence, to give up the road upon being recouped the actual amount which had been paid out to the company.

The fact remains that from Lévis to Sydney Harbour every single mile of the Intercolonial railway now running, has been paid out of the consolidated revenues of Canada, including the right of way with the exception of the short piece between New Glasgow and the strait of Canso, and this part of the national highway has been partially paid for out of the revenues of the province of Nova Scotia, and the right of way has been paid for by the ratepayers of the municipalities of Pictou, Antigonish, St. Mary's and Guysborough. The Government of Nova Scotia simply asked that this portion of the Intercolonial railway be placed in precisely the same condition as all the other parts of the Intercolonial railway; that the sum of six hundred and seventy-one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six dollars ($671,836), which the province of Nova Scotia, out of its limited resources, has paid as a subsidy to this part of the Intercolonial railway, be refunded to the province, inasmuch as if the Intercolonial railway had been extended by the Dominion Government eastward—as it actually has been in accordance with its well defined policy—it would have been necessary to have paid for the construction of the portion between New Glasgow and the strait of Canso as much as the amount which had actually been paid for it, plus the subsidy which has been paid out of the revenue of the province of Nova Scotia; also the cost of the right of way. The piece of road between the strait of Canso and Sydney Harbour stands in precisely the same position as a part of the whole national work. Every dollar of the cost of construction has been paid for by the Dominion Government, and it will be difficult to devise means of pointing out any distinction which exists between the case of that portion of the Intercolonial railway, and the portion between New Glasgow and the strait of Canso, towards which the province of Nova Scotia has actually contributed the sum of six hundred and seventy-one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six dollars ($671,836).

It is scarcely necessary to remind you of the action of the Government of Canada in relation to the province of Quebec in respect of a case so very similar to this, only, perhaps, not as strong. In that case the Dominion Government undertook to refund to the province of Quebec their subsidies paid for the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental, because it seemed to be a part of the general railway system of the country. The case is surely not as strong as in a case where the road itself becomes the property of the Federal Government, and is being operated now as a national Government railway.

The claim, therefore, of the province of Nova Scotia is that this sum should be refunded with interest and that the amount paid by the municipalities of Pictou, Antigonish, St. Mary's and Guysborough for a right of way should likewise be refunded to those municipalities.

Now, Sir, I have laid before the House both sides of the case. The temptation to discuss the arguments pro and con is very strong; but that would be inexcusable as we have a quasi judicial pronouncement on the facts.

The Laurier Government showed its sympathy with the claimants by directing that the whole matter so far as these claims are concerned should be left to arbitration. The arbitrators appointed under an Order in Council dated July 19, 1900 were: Sir George Burton, an ex-Chief Justice of the province of Ontario; F. B. Wade, a leading lawyer of the city of Halifax; and Edmund J. Barbeau, a prominent banker of the city of Montreal. The case of the province was presented by the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, and the present member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), and part of the time by the late Christopher Robinson, K.C., of Toronto, while Mr. Lafleur, K.C., of Montreal, represented the Dominion Government. The decision of the arbitrators will be found in the sessional papers for 1901, Vol. xxxv, No. 13, as Sessional Paper No. 73. It is a complete vindication of the position taken by the Fielding Government, and afterwards by the Murray Government of Nova Scotia. It finds that the claim of the province was a just one. To quote the language of the board:

> We are forced to the conclusion that the claim of the province is a just one and we respectfully recommend that they should be paid the sum of $671,836, the amount of the bonus.

The findings of the arbitrators must be regarded as binding in law and fact, and conclusive as to the matters in dispute between the two governments—just as binding as a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada or the Privy Council in a matter that properly comes before them. The personell of the arbitrators, their high standing, and the professional standing of the counsel employed on either side renders the decision of the board such as makes it acceptable to all parties. The argument was made on behalf of the Government that the province voluntarily transferred the eastern extension for a certain fixed amount, namely the amount paid by the provincial government to the company for a transfer of the road by the company including their rights and interest in the Truro branch under the tripartite agreement, so called, and all parties were bound by that bargain. The amount was as stated $1,284,311.97. This amount, it will be observed, did not include the subsidies that had been given by the province during the construction of the road, amounting to $671,836, nor what was paid by the municipalities for the right of way, which with interest to date would in round numbers approximate:

Due	municipality of	Pictou	$141,000
"	"	St. Mary's..	5,000
"	"	Antigonish..	55,000
"	"	Guysborough	32,000

It will be noted that the refund to the municipalities for the amount paid to them for the right of way was on all occasions as strongly urged as was the claim for the refund of the provincial subsidies paid the company. It would seem manifestly unfair that the Dominion Government, representing the whole of Canada, should take over that railway as a part of the Intercolonial railway belonging to the whole of Canada and constructed and operated for the whole of Canada, and not for the convenience or accommodation of any particular section of it, without paying for it every cent that it actually cost. Whilst individuals or corporations may well be justified in driving the best bargain they can, and may well insist on enjoying any legitimate advantage the one obtains over the other in a bargain made, I submit that rule should not be invoked by the Government of the country dealing for the whole country. It should not deal in a huckstering spirit, but should have regard to what is fair and equitable and just in foro conscientiae, without seeking to take advantage of any technical objections available, or of anything strictly legal, in contradistinction to equitable, defences. From a reading of the arbitrators' report it appears this view seemed to have properly influenced them. They found this Government should repay the subsidies advanced by the province in the building of that part of the Canadian road. Can any one doubt that if the claim of the municipalities had been dealt with by these same arbitrators they would have been allowed? If it was right and proper, if fairplay and justice demanded, that the province should get back the money that it expended in that part of the national road, equally just and equitable is it that the municipalities should be refunded their contributions. It does not seem fair that Canada as a whole should pay for the right of way of every other portion of the people's road except that portion from New Glasgow to Mulgrave. It does not seem fair, and there is no principle of justice or equity on which you can contend, that these municipalities of Antigonish, Pictou, Guysborough and St. Marys should alone, of all the municipalities from Cape Breton to Montreal contribute directly or indirectly to building or extending the national railway required to be provided by Canada as a whole under the terms of Confederation? The late Conservative Government took the position that in view of 'the facilities and accommodation which the construction of the said railway would confer on the people of the municipalities mentioned, the said municipalities voluntarily offered and agreed to pay the amounts involved in the purchase of the right of way of the said line,' and that 'such were contributed in consideration of the advantages to be derived from the construction of the line.' As a matter of fact, they did not do so voluntarily. But do not the very same advantages, facilities and accommodations extend to every other municipality from Montreal to Sydney? Why, therefore, should we be saddled with burdens which the others have not had to bear? When the Intercolonial railway was extended from Mulgrave to Sydney did the municipalities through which it ran have to bear the cost of the right of way in view of and in consideration of the advantages, facilities and accommodation such extension would give? Not at all. I submit therefore, that the position taken by the Minister of Railways in 1893 is not tenable, and his conclusion 'that the mere fact that some other counties did not make a like contribution to railways which were constructed through them, does not seem to afford substantial reason for the present claim,' is alike illogical, unjustifiable and unfair.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you may ask, why was not the claim of the municipalities which on its face seems much stronger than that of the province submitted to the board of reference. It is unfortunate under the circumstances that it was not, for unquestionably it would have received favourable consideration. You have observed these claims were urged in the various memorials presented. These memorials were passed in 1886, 1889, 1891, 1894 and 1898 respectively. In the report of the arbitrators I find a reference to the municipalities' claims as follows:

> A claim was made at the opening of the case by several municipalities who had assisted the railway by grants of money, to be heard by this board; but it was determined that such claims did not come within the scope of the reference, and we adhere to that position.

My information is that when it came to the submission to arbitration, the claims of the municipalities were intentionally omitted in the order of reference. It was thought advisable not to confuse or complicate the issue by submitting more than one claim. The claim of the municipalities being considered much the stronger, the claim of the province was first submitted alone, it being assumed that if a favourable award were obtained in this case, there would be no question about the right of the municipalities to recover later. On the other hand, in the event of an adverse decision by the board, so far as the claim of the province went, the claim of the municipalities might be jeopardized by being linked up with the weaker claim. At any rate, the board did not adjudicate these claims, and they now come before this Government for settlement.

After the award was made in favour of the province and the amount thereof nearly three-quarters of a million dollars was paid, the municipalities claimed the province should recoup the amounts expended by them. The contention was made amongst others, that the local Government at the time had unjustly imposed and reimposed the obligation of paying for the right of way upon these municipalities against their will; that the province in undertaking to deal with the road and to transfer it to the Dominion Government was bound in fairness to pay them itself, or as a result of their dealing with it, to obtain payment for them; and that under these circumstances it was the duty of the local Government to see that the claims of the municipalities were included at the time of the arbitration held in 1901, as a part of the claim to which the province was entitled, and which the province should refund to the municipalities inasmuch as the province had improperly, it was urged, fastened this burden upon them when the construction of the road was undertaken. I am not going into details regarding this phase of the matter. I may say, however, that under chapter 3 of the Nova Scotia Acts of 1905, and chapter 50 of the Act of 1907, which extended the scope of the inquiry, a commission was appointed by the local Legislature to report on and adjudicate the claims of the municipalities, as made against that Legislature. There was some delay on the part of the municipalities in availing themselves of the machinery to adjudicate their claims; and it was not until the 24th of June, 1912, that the commission, consisting of Chief Justice Fitzpatrick of the Supreme Court of Canada, Chief Justice Townsend and Judge Drysdale, of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court, gave their decision, finding that there was no claim against the Government of the province in connection with the matter referred to them. The question they decided was the liability of the province to recoup the counties. The right of the municipalities to be recouped by somebody was evidently assumed. The commission decided that the province was under no legal or moral duty to do so. The inference is obvious. Disappointing as this decision may be to the municipalities, it is, and must be, accepted. This was not a commission composed of party friends of the local Government, who would in advance take instructions as to the goal desired, the decision to be reached; but it was composed of men who know not politics since their elevation to the Bench, and who, before their appointment to the positions they now adorn, although they had their party affiliations, two of them Liberals and one Conservative, could always rise above and beyond the level of the partisan to the higher plane of professional duty, and always had and retained the confidence of the public generally. Their investigations were not ex parte, or conducted in secret; but on the contrary, in open court and in the presence of counsel for all parties interested. I make these observations in passing, because I know it to have been stated by men prominent in politics, some of whom occupy positions in public life that would at least lead you to expect more honesty from them, that the Murray Government at Halifax referred the matter of the claims to this commission in order to secure the dismissal of the claims as against them. Such an assertion is as false as it is malicious.

It is very easy to be wise after the act. Men's hindsight is greater than their foresight. It is perhaps for that reason I could never see why the claim of the municipalities was not made, in the first instance, against the federal Government, instead of against the local Government. The local Government, under the Burton award, only received the amount of provincial subventions which went into the building of the Eastern extension. Had that board dealt generally with the cost of the Eastern Extension railway and the amount which, as a matter of equity, the Dominion Government should have paid for that portion of the Intercolonial, when it was taken over, and an award had been made accordingly, then I could understand the municipalities properly claiming to be recouped by the provincial Government. But as it dealt specifically with the subventions from the provincial treasury alone, and it was distinctly stated in the award the claim of the municipalities could not then be considered by them under their order of reference, it is obvious, to me at any rate, that the further claims should have been made later against this Government, and not against the local Government. I have no doubt that, had the municipalities promptly pressed their claims against the Dominion Government, they would, in the face of that Burton award, have been settled long before now. But as I have already stated, it is easy to be wise after the act. The municipalities, doubtless, thought the claims could be more expeditiously, and with less expense, recovered from the province; and the province could then claim from this Government. The principle on which the municipalities rest their claims against this Government is found not only in the Burton award, and in that case where the Dominion Government refunded the province of Quebec their subsidies paid for the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental railway, mentioned in the memorial dated October 15, 1897, but also in a more recent case, which I happened to come across, that of the claim of New Brunswick in re the eastern extension. In that case, the facts, which are almost on all fours with the claims made by Nova Scotia, were as follows: In 1869 the Dominion Government took over and adopted as a part of the Intercolonial railway that part of the road formerly known as the Eastern Extension railway, and extending from Painsec Junction eastwardly to the boundary line between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, a distance of 37½ miles. The Dominion Government paid $894,000 for it, of which $644,000 was paid by them to the contractors who built the road, and the balance of $250,000 was paid to the New Brunswick Government, by being passed to the credit of the province on debt account. The province had up to that time paid for the construction of the road $400,000, and there was, therefore, a balance of $150,000 of the total expenditure by the province in the road. In 1884 the Dominion Government voted $150,000 to reimburse the Government of New Brunswick for money expended by them in the construction of this section of the railway, and this was, on July 1, 1884, passed to the credit of the province on debt account. The province up to that time had not only claimed this balance of $150,000, but in addition, interest on that amount from 1869, when it was claimed this balance should have been placed to the credit of the province. The Dominion Government, on the other hand claimed that the payment of $150,000 was in full of all claims by the province in connection with that road. On the 16th February, 1900, an arbitration board was created to inquire into the claim made by the province and adjust same. The arbitrators were Judge Barker, of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, Judge Langelier, of the Supreme Court of Quebec, and Mr. Duncan Coulson, general manager of the Bank of Toronto. On the 1st April, 1901, they made their award, allowing the province the interest claimed, compounded, which amounted to $145,218.75. This report is found in the sessional papers for 1901, Volume xxxv No. 13, and in sessional papers is No. 73b. Not only was it considered equitable that the amount certified by the engineer to have gone into the construction of this section of the road should be paid, but the interest on it, from the time it should have been paid, must also be allowed. The actual expenditure by the provincial government should be recouped. It was thought but fair that the Dominion Government should pay every cent that portion of the Intercolonial railway cost.

Now I ask you, Mr. Speaker, are not the claims of the municipalities which I am endeavouring to present not only just, fair and reasonable in themselves, but their payment by this Government justified to the hilt by precedent? For very many years, this has been a source of rankling and complaint with the people of these municipalities. They have considered, and very justly so, that justice has been denied them by the late Conservative Government and delayed to them by the late Liberal Administration. From the view point of the late Conservative Government, they saw no legal duty on them to pay these demands although clearly, as indicated by the decisions and awards which I have read, the moral and equitable obligation was there. And so far as the late Liberal Administration went, they virtually admitted their liability, when they recognized their obligation in the similar cases, to which I have referred. It is hoped, therefore, that the grievance which has rankled in the minds of the people of these counties will be speedily removed.

Before leaving this point, let me give some brief quotations expressive of the opinion of the leader of the Opposition in the province of Nova Scotia on this subject. In the debates of 1912 at page 304, Mr. Tanner is reported thus:

He had always held that the federal Government should pay the claim. He had said so in 1905, and he had never hidden his opinion.

Again:

He would repeat now what he said then, if the federal Government would now pay the claim, the provincial Government should do so.

Also:

He would say that in his opinion the provincial claim was a very weak one, and that the municipal claim is stronger than the provincial one.

These observations were made before the board of arbitrators was appointed to deal with the liability of the province in respect to these municipalities' claims. Mr. Tanner had no doubt the federal Government should pay these claims, and he apparently took the position, which it turned out was the correct one, that it was to the federal Government the municipalities should look rather than to the provincial; but so impressed was he with the justice of the municipalities' claim that he went so far as to say that if the federal Government did not pay the claims, the local Government should.

In conclusion, and here I again apologize for taking up so much time—let me summarize the grounds why these claims should be paid, by quoting from the statement of claim on behalf of the municipality of the county of Pictou, found in the return brought down lately, and invoking these grounds on behalf of the county of Antigonish which I have the honour to represent:

1. Because the Government of Canada are now the owners of the piece of railway between New Glasgow and the strait of Canso and have never paid to any one the cost of the right of way and land on which said railway is built, and should for equitable reasons pay to the county of Pictou the amount they were compelled to pay to the original proprietors over whose lands the railway was built.

2. The road from New Glasgow to the strait of Canso forms part of the Intercolonial railway, extending from Montreal to North Sydney, which road by the provisions of the section 145 of the British North America Act was to be a national work, and constructed as it has been at the expense of the federal authorities. Being a national work, it cannot be expected that a municipality should be compelled against its will, to bear the expense of the right of way or any part of it.

3. By the extension of the Intercolonial railway to North Sydney as one of its Atlantic termini and making it the commercial highway through the last named point with the colony of Newfoundland, the Parliament of Canada has made and declared that part of it from New Glasgow to the strait of Canso within the meaning and intent of section 92 sub-section 10 (c) of the British North America Act a railway and public work for the general advantage of Canada, and should therefore assume any liability imposed in the course of its construction upon a local authority like the claimants.

4. The Government of Canada have recognized their right to pay for the right of way in regard to all other portions of the Intercolonial railway and to deal with this municipality as with all other bodies and owners.

5. The Eastern Extension railway is not a railway principally of local importance or for the benefit of Nova Scotia, but is of importance to the whole Dominion just as is that part of the Intercolonial railway running from Lévis to Montreal or a part of the canal system of Canada as being a national work.

Mr. REID: The hon. member has certainly put his case very well in support of the claims of the municipalities to which he refers. But what strikes me with reference to his claim is this: The claim has been in existence for twenty or twenty-five years. In that time there have been five or six Ministers of Railways, and, I suppose, the claim has been brought before each one of them, and must have been gone into very fully. Of course, the hon. member will understand that I can hardly be expected to be acquainted with the facts, as I am only acting for the Minister of Railways and have been so acting but for a short time. I am sorry that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) is not able to be present, but we all know the reason. It was in the latter part of last session that the hon. member asked the question of the Minister of Railways, and the minister agreed to look into it and give an answer. No doubt, were he here to-night he would give that answer. What makes me feel specially that it is difficult for the Government to assume this claim is that Hon. Mr. Fielding, ex-Minister of Finance, was Prime Minister of the province of Nova Scotia, as I understand it, when this road was sold to the Dominion Government. Of course, he knew all the facts in connection with the case. The claim was presented to him in 1897, and, no doubt, pressed very strongly upon him. I am surprised that he was not able to do something in the matter if he considered the claim a just and fair one.

I shall certainly draw the matter again to the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals; whether or not he will be able to take any action with regard to the claim I do not know. As I have said, the fact of its being such an old claim and of its having been brought so many times before the minister seems to indicate that there is some difficulty in the way of its being paid.

In reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Pictou yesterday, I may say that the total coal requirement for the Intercolonial railway for the current year is 680,000 tons, of which 163,000 tons are to be delivered by water at Montreal and Levis and 517,000 tons by rail. Of the 163,000 tons, 81,500 tons are to be delivered by the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company and 81,500 tons by the Dominion Coal Company. The other coal contracts have not been finally awarded. Following is a statement of the different contracts for 414,800 tons of the amount to be delivered by rail:

	Tons.
Colonial Coal Co.	21,650
Cape Breton Coal and Iron Co.	30,000
Inverness Railway and Coal Co., Ltd.	39,150
Minudie Coal Co.	50,000
Rothwell Coal Co.	6,000
G. H. King	3,000
Intercolonial Coal Mining Co.	75,000
Dominion Coal Co. (Springhill)	100,000
Maritime Coal Co.	90,000

Mr. MACDONALD: I wish to supplement the argument made by the hon. member of Antigonish with regard to the line of railway in the counties referred to. The cost of the right of way was paid by the municipalities mentioned, not voluntarily, but under an Act of the province of Nova Scotia which imposed the liability upon them. The legislature of Nova Scotia, after the transfer of 1884, always asserted that the province should pay back to the municipalities the sum of $671,000 which, they alleged, had been wrongfully withheld from them by way of duress, and that the amount paid for the right of way should also be refunded to the municipalities. A reference was made, and the municipalities were under the impression that the order of reference to Chief Justice Burton covered the claim of the municipalities. When the case came before the tribunal Chief Justice Burton ruled that the terms of the reference were not sufficiently wide to enable him to adjudicate upon the matter, consequently the question has since been left undetermined. The municipalities urged the local Government to pay them out of the money they had received. The reference my hon. friend made to Mr. Fielding has really no application to the case, because previous to his being minister he urged, not on behalf of the province, but on behalf of the municipalities, through the legislature, the justness of the claim. The intention of the parties at the time the order for reference was made was that the claim should be adjudicated upon by Chief Justice Burton, but on account of his having ruled that the terms of the reference were not sufficiently wide, no supplementary reference having since been made, the matter remain unsettled. I hope the minister of Railways will look into the matter very carefully; the facts will warrant his taking some action with regard to it.

With regard to the coal contracts, I would be obliged to the minister if, before he takes up his Estimates again, he will get fuller information with regard to the delay in the settlement of one of these contracts, which happens to be in connection with a company in my county. Just now the mines in my county are working only half time—two of them have been closed—and owing to the uncertainty occasioned by the delay in awarding these contracts, arrangements for the season's output are considerably delayed. As a consequence the spring operations have not been resumed, and in some cases real hardship exists among the miners on account of failure to get work. With the settlement of this contract they may go on with some reasonable degree of certainty.

I wish to call particularly to the minister's attention to-night a matter referred to in a return which he brought down some time ago with regard to a question of very wide importance. In January of this year the importance of obtaining a shorter distance on the Intercolonial between Moncton and the industrial centres of New Glasgow and Sydney occupied the attention of the officials of the department. On January 28, the chief engineer wrote a letter to Mr. Gutelius, as follows:

> In connection with the proposed low grade line from Moncton and Sydney, via Oxford Junction, Pictou, New Glasgow, etc., I would be pleased if you would authorize the necessary surveys, borings and soundings to determine what it would cost to build a bridge across Pictou harbour to a connection with the branch from Pictou Landing to New Glasgow. If this bridge site does not prove feasible, I would request authority to make such surveys, soundings, etc., as may be necessary to secure a low grade line from the vicinity of Lyons Brook, on the Pictou and Oxford Junction line, to a connection with the present line at or near New Glasgow. Either of these propositions will eliminate the present wooden bridge across the river between Brown's Point and Loch Broom and the heavy grades between Loch Broom and Stellarton.

There is a special report of the chief engineer of the department to Mr. Gutelius, dated January 28, in which he says:

As the traffic, tonnage and number of trains on the Intercolonial railway is increasing, and considering the character of the tonnage hauled and the low rates in force in connection with same, it is desirable that grades be reduced and the double tracking extended on certain sections of the road in order to increase the efficiency and economy of operation.

These conditions are at present most pressing on those portions of the line east of Moncton, where between Moncton and Halifax there is a greater frequency of train movement and where the present lines between Moncton, Halifax and Sydney are operated over very heavy grades.

The following scheme is, therefore, outlined in order to meet these conditions and the addition of traffic which may be expected when the Transcontinental railway is put into operation; and is divided into two parts as follows:

Moncton to Halifax.

First,—Extend double track on low grade not exceeding six tenths per cent from Painsec Junction to Oxford junction and strengthen bridges.

Second,—Extend double track on low grade not exceeding six tenths per cent from Windsor junction, and strengthening bridges for heavy power.

Third,—Strengthening bridges to take the heaviest power and introduce passing sidings between Oxford junction and Truro.

General,—This whole work from Moncton to Halifax to include such additions and revisions to existing terminal yards and passing sidings, strengthening of bridges and track for heavy power, installation of telephone despatching lines and automatic block signal as may be necessary to economically and efficiently operate the line.

Second Part.

Instead of hauling the low rate tonnage between Moncton and the Sydneys over the Cobequid mountains between Oxford junction and Truro and Truro and New Glasgow it is recommended:

First—That the grades be reduced between Sydney and New Glasgow where our freight earnings are considerably less than our cost of operation.

Second,—Grade revision between Oxford junction and New Glasgow including new bridge across the river at or near Pictou connecting with the present line between Pictou landing and New Glasgow.

This whole grade revision scheme to include such revision of terminal yards, passing, sidings, strengthening of track and bridges for heavy power as may be necessary to make a first-class up to date standard line for the economical handling of traffic.

The scheme proposed by the chief engineer involved the double tracking of the road from Painsec Junction to Oxford Junction and involves the utilization of what has been known as the short line railway running through the counties of Cumberland, Pictou and Colchester. Crossing the harbour of Pictou is a bridge built twenty-seven years ago. It will have to be rebuilt, being a wooden bridge on piles and the sentiment of the community as I am sure it has been urged upon the minister, and the view that has been urged by such prominent gentlemen connected with our industries as Mr. Cantley of the steel works is that the harbour of Pictou should be passed by a permanent bridge at a point lower down connecting immediately with the line of railway which runs near the Nova Scotia steel works.

Mr. REID: That is in accordance with the recommendation. I understand that the hon. member agrees to the recommendation.

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes, I am bound to say to the minister that I think the proposition of the chief engineer is a good one and I hope he will endeavour to see it is carried into effect. I hope that something will be found in the supplementaries this year that will enable construction to be proceeded with for this reason, that the condition of the old bridge is such that it would be unwise to spend a large amount on it and it is desirable that the new construction should proceed without delay. The report of the chief engineer points out some advantages that would result from this plan, but it does not mention all. The large productive traffic for the Intercolonial railway in Nova Scotia, once the ocean steamboats are off in the summer time, is in the industrial portion of the province where the coal, iron and steel furnish return traffic on the Intercolonial railway to the West. All that traffic has to be carried up two very steep grades to-day at a much greater cost of operation than would be the case if the traffic went by the shorter line of railway built by Sir Chas. Tupper, in 1887, for the avowed purpose of improving the conditions which have always existed and have never been overcome. That line of railway could be utilized with low gradients and proper curvatures and then the freight from the industrial portion of the province could be hauled to the main line and brought to Moncton and other places west at a much less cost than to-day. The figures brought down in response to the inquiry of the hon. member for Guysborough show conclusively the importance of that particular locality as the place where the major portion of the freight for the Intercolonial railway originates. The necessity for immediate action in regard to the matter is on account of the need for cheaper railway operation which is recognized by the officials. It also exists because there must be a new bridge across Pictou harbour. I would press upon the minister strongly the desirability of taking advantage of the necessity of building the new bridge to erect the new one in such a place that all these difficulties in regard to gradients will be overcome and a condition will arise under which all our freight from eastern Nova Scotia will be hauled more expeditiously and cheaper for the railway. Then, this piece of railway, which was built especially and almost solely for the purpose of giving a shorter haul under better conditions, might be utilized. I am here to ask the minister to carry out the recommendation of his own officials. I hope that in doing so on this occasion they will do the thing right. I am sure that the minister could make no better investment on the Intercolonial railway in regard to cheapening transportation than placing a permanent bridge from Pictou to Pictou landing.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I understand that the contract for coal awarded to the Inverness Coal company amounts to 39,100 tons. Could the minister tell me how this compares with the quantity awarded to the same company last year?

Mr. REID: I am sorry not to have that to-night, but I will get it.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: It is a pity that the contract was not awarded sooner. The mine is working half time now for the first time in its history. If this contract had been given to them some time ago they might have been able to run full time, but for the first time in the history of the mine they are not able to get orders.

Mr. REID: The Intercolonial railway has been taking coal right along from the coal company without interruption, as they required it. The hon. member will agree that all our railways throughout Canada and the United States have been suffering for the want of business. The receipts are much less.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I have only the interests of the coal mines in view.

Mr. REID: The railways did not require as much coal, as they have not been running as many trains.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: These contracts are for coal that is to be used afterwards. The Department of Railways and Canals knew quite well the amount of coal they expected to use in the coming season, and if they had awarded these contracts it would have enabled the coal producers in my county to employ their men more than two days a week, which is all they have been able to do of late.

Mr. REID: I shall be glad to get the hon. member the information.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. minister was going to say something with reference to the matter I mentioned.

Mr. REID: I have discussed that with the general manager of the Intercolonial, Mr. Gutelius, and he is very strongly in favour of having that work proceeded with at the earliest possible moment. I will take the matter up and see if I can get an item in the Supplementary Estimates for that work. I know the general manager of the Intercolonial railway spoke to Mr. Cochrane about it before he left for Europe, and there is no question about what the feelings of the minister are. I certainly am of the same opinion as Mr. Gutelius and the minister, and I hope we may be able to proceed with the work during the present season.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Before the minister closes, I would like to say a word with reference to the matter brought up by my hon. friend from Antigonish (Mr. W. Chisholm). My constituency is interested in that claim, and I want the minister to know that I am interested in the discussion and would like him to give the matter his careful attention. The chief reason the minister gave in reply—if I understood him correctly—was that the claim was an old one, and that it ought to have been settled by the late Administration. The municipalities were endeavouring to collect this claim from the local Government for a number of years. The local Government through its legislation compelled them to pay for the right of way. The municipalities resisted and the county of Pictou brought up a test case which went against them. They were finally compelled to assess themselves to pay for the right of way. The municipalities naturally felt that their claim was against the local Government of Nova Scotia and they continued to press that claim until a few years ago when the local Government of Nova Scotia consented to an arbitration. The Chief Justice of Canada was chairman of the arbitration board. The claim against the Government of Nova Scotia—not this Government—was argued before that board and the Chief Justice decided against the municipality, who, now, naturally say that some one ought to pay for this right of way. We contributed against our will. The local Government and the Dominion Government between them have acquired the road which is now part of the Intercolonial railway. The other municipalities along the line of the Intercolonial have all been paid for the right of way but the four municipalities mentioned by my hon. friend have not been paid. Eighty miles of right of way has not been paid for by any one, and that stretch is one of the most profitable portions of the Intercolonial. The municipalities certainly have a moral claim against this Government, if not a legal one. I have given these facts to account for the delay in bringing this claim forward. I think it was only two years ago that the decision was given that the local Government was not liable, and the municipalities are now claiming against this Government on the principle that there must be a remedy somewhere, and if it is not in Nova Scotia they think it is here. I am not going to argue the claim to-night, but I wish to say that it is a matter too important to be brushed aside, and one that should receive the serious consideration of the minister. I would also like to get some information in regard to proposed improvements of the grade of the Intercolonial between Halifax and Moncton. Several schemes were proposed. This matter was discussed last year, and I have no doubt the minister has the information at hand that he may lay before the House before the Intercolonial discussion is concluded. There were two or three proposals: one was that a line should be built by Parrsboro; another for a line across the mountains, and a third proposal was that a northern direction should be taken around by New Glasgow. A good deal of money has been spent in surveys and investigations, but the country has not yet got information as to the policy of the Government in regard to this matter or as to the result of the investigations. If the minister, before Tuesday, when I understand the Railway Estimates are coming up again, would furnish the House with any reports he has on that question, and give us some idea as to the policy of the Government in this matter I should be very glad because a great deal of interest is felt in this question in the province of Nova Scotia and the people are waiting for some statement by the acting minister as to the Government's intentions.

Mr. REID: I remember discussing this matter with the minister when going down to Halifax to see him off. I remember the place too where there is a very heavy grade. The minister had a discussion with Mr. Gutelius at that time, and I know they had in view the reducing of the grade at that place. Mr. Gutelius said they were making surveys with a view to trying to get around it in some way. I will see if they have any information in the department. Of course, the Minister of Railways, if he were here, could explain the whole situation, as he understands it thoroughly. If I have not any information in the department, I will write the minister or telegraph the general manager for information, which will, no doubt, reach us before the end of the session. We will leave some of the Intercolonial items on which to discuss any question in connection with the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If the minister has the engineer's reports, I would like to see them.

Mr. REID: If there is anything in the department I will bring it down on Tuesday; but if I have to communicate with Moncton, the hon. gentleman will understand that it will take a week or two to get the information.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand from the observations made by the hon. member for Pictou and the answers given by the minister, that general improvements in connection with the Intercolonial in Nova Scotia are in contemplation. In the island of Cape Breton, from which I come, it is particularly important that any general improvements contemplated should have reference to the facilities at the strait of Canso. The enormous traffic between the Dominion of Canada and Newfoundland landed at Sydney comes, of course, by the strait of Canso. Unless better facilities are provided there, I would submit to the minister that whatever improvements he makes in the rest of the road will not give him the results that he might expect. We have only one steamer on the strait of Canso, the Scotia. She is good enough for her size, but she is only one steamer.

Mr. REID: I think another steamer has been purchased.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. REID: The contract has been let for a new steamer.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is not so good as the first statement of the minister, but it is well to know the contract has been let. I presume the new steamer will be of equal capacity with the Scotia, which is a very good boat.

Mr. REID: She is much larger.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is still better. When you are building for the strait of Canso you are building for Newfoundland, because although possibly there is no obligation on us to build for Newfoundland, yet for the purpose of bringing traffic to the Intercolonial railway it is just as well to do so. It has been said that a bridge over the strait of Canso is quite feasible, and if my hon. friend should continue to be Minister of Railways——

Mr. REID: I hope not.

Mr. McKENZIE: If he should continue to be Minister of Railways a monument to his memory would be a bridge over the strait of Canso.

Mr. REID: If I should continue to be Minister of Railways I would have a monument sooner than that.

Mr. McKENZIE: The bridge over the Grand Narrows is a monument to the memory of the late Sir John Macdonald. At one time it was thought that Cape Breton would forever be handicapped with a ferry across the Grand Narrows, but in 1888 we had the honour of a visit from Sir John Macdonald, then Prime Minister, who having seen the situation there, decided to bridge the Grand Narrows, which has been a vast advantage to the Intercolonial and to all that part of Canada. Some years ago an Act was passed by this Parliament constituting a private company to bridge the strait of Canso, and a very eminent engineer who was in the service of that company pronounced that it was quite feasible to do so. If it was feasible for a private company, much more would it be for the Government of Canada. It would certainly be a great thing for the island of Cape Breton and for the whole of Canada. I wish that the minister, when he is looking to betterment of the conditions of the Intercolonial railway, would make inquiry as to whether a bridge should not be built across the strait of Canso.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

There is another matter to which I wish to call the attention of the minister. The hon. gentleman pointed out to the member for Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm) that he is possibly too late now in making a claim for a refund to these municipalities on account of the right-of-way, and so I want to guard against being too late by now making a claim somewhat akin to that which the hon. member for Antigonish has made. There is a diversion of the Intercolonial in the island of Cape Breton, known as the Georges river, Little Bras D'Or, Sydney Mines and North Sydney diversion. I congratulate the Government on putting the road now where it should have been put thirty-five years ago when it was first built, but by this diversion they are abandoning about five miles of the present road between North Sydney Junction and the town of North Sydney, and for which five miles the right-of-way was paid for by the town of North Sydney when the road was built in 1888. Now that the Government is abandoning that five miles of road, and that it is not to be put to the use for which the town of North Sydney bought the right-of-way, the municipality should be put in the position in which it was before, and the money it paid for the right-of-way refunded to it. That diversion is not yet completed, and this five miles is still in operation, so that the contention cannot be raised that the claim was made too late. I give notice to the minister now that when the five miles is abandoned the town of Sydney will expect to be recouped for their investment in that right of way.

Mr. REID: The diversion is not yet constructed and the five miles will have to be operated for some time yet, so that the question could not come up during the present session. I will draw the attention of the Minister of Railways to the statement of my hon. friend.

Progress reported.

In motion of Mr. Reid, the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

Monday, May 4, 1914.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

THE CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In reference to the resolutions with regard to the Canadian Northern railway, the business of the House would be facilitated if my right hon. friend the Prime Minister could lay on the table at as early a date as possible the correspondence which must have preceded the resolutions. It is stated in the preamble of these resolutions that the constituent and subsidiary companies are desirous that aid should be given. Therefore there must be petitions, letters or correspondence in the possession of my right hon. friend manifesting their desire. It is stated also in the first section of the resolutions that the stock of all these constituent and subsidiary companies is owned or controlled by the Canadian Northern Railway Company. It would be of advantage and interest to know what are the companies the stock of which is owned and controlled by the Canadian Northern. Then, there are some other matters as to which we should have some information; for instance: what are the liabilities of each one of these companies mentioned in the first part of the second schedule of the resolutions? Another very important question is, when and in what way was the $3,000,000 worth of stock in the Canadian Northern Alberta transferred so that it might be available for the present purposes of the resolutions?

Mr. BORDEN: I shall expedite the matter as much as possible. I am not sure if there is any correspondence to be brought down. The other details that my right hon. friend has mentioned can, I think, be attended to without much delay.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will the statement which my right hon. friend purposes bringing down show the gross earnings of the constituent and subsidiary companies?

Mr. BORDEN: I am not sure about that. With the consent of the House, I lay upon the table the following documents:

1. Four copies of the trust deed, dated June 30, 1903, between the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the British Empire Trust Company and the National Trust Company, Limited;

2. Four copies of the trust deed, dated May 6, 1910, between the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the British Empire Trust Company and the National Trust Company, Limited;

3. Three copies of the trust deed, dated November 19, 1913, between the Canadian Northern Railway Company, Mackenzie, Mann and Company, Limited, and the British Empire Trust Company and the National Trust Company, Limited;

4. Four copies of a statement showing the floating liabilities of the railway companies embraced in the general title of the Canadian Northern Railway system.

5. Four copies of a statement of securities pledged as collateral to temporary loans of the Canadian Northern Railway system.

6. Four copies of a statement showing the engineer's estimate of the cost of completing the Canadian Northern Railway system.

THE FARMERS BANK.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) lay on the table of the House a statement showing the deposits of the Farmers Bank on the 31st day of September, 1906, 1907, 1908, 1909 and 1910, distinguishing between deposits subject to call and otherwise.

Mr. W. T. WHITE: Only to-day I received a list of the depositors of the Farmers Bank, which is very lengthy. Unless my hon. friend has some special object in view in distinguishing the different years, I should think the statement I have received would meet his requirements. The statement which he is now asking for would entail very considerable work upon the liquidator.

Mr. MACLEAN: I do not think that it would entail much work, and it is rather important to have it. I thought that the annual statements made by the bank to the Finance Department would be available, and that without very much work to the department that information could be obtained. Possibly it might be obtained by going through the Canada Gazette.

Mr. WHITE: Is my hon. friend referring to the depositors or to the shareholders?

Mr. MACLEAN: The depositors—the amount on deposit at the end of each year beginning with the year of incorporation, 1906.

Mr. WHITE: Does my hon. friend mean a detailed list, or just the amount?

Mr. MACLEAN: No, just the amount.

Mr. WHITE: I have misunderstood my hon. friend; I will have the pleasure in getting the information he requires.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. BORDEN: My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) made inquiry a week or more ago in regard to the legislation which was under consideration and which would probably be brought down this session. I think I can give him the information asked for in a fairly definite way. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries purposes to bring down a Bill respecting the Grading and Inspection of Pickled Fish. The Minister of Justice hopes that there will be a report from the Committee on Elections which will result in a Bill to amend in very important particulars the Controverted Elections Act. It will probably be necessary to make some provision with regard to the lists for elections under the Canada Temperance Act, as that Act has apparently not been taken into consideration in the preparation of the Electoral Franchise Act. Any such legislation will not, I think, be of a controversial character The Minister of Justice has in mind a Bill to amend the Criminal Code, not I think in any very important respect. The Minister of Finance has in hand a Bill to Amend and Consolidate the Civil Service Acts, and a Bill to Provide for the Superannuation of Civil Servants. These Bills will be introduced, and it will depend upon the length of time which they are likely to occupy as to whether or not they will be put through at the present session. We are not desirous of hurrying them through, as we are anxious that they should have the best consideration of the House and of the Senate. The Minister of Finance intends also to introduce a Bill respecting co-operative credit banks. There are also two minor Bills, one to amend the Dominion Notes Act, and the other to amend the Quebec Battlefields Commission Act, which the Minister of Finance has in hand. The Minister of Public Works will introduce a Bill to amend the Drydock Subsidies Act. The acting Minister of Railways and Canals informs me that it will be necessary to introduce a Bill confirming an agreement between the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company, the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Crown respecting the entrance to the Winnipeg terminals, as it appears that there is some agreement which will require the confirmation of Parliament. The acting Minister of Railways and Canals will also introduce a Bill respecting bridges over the St. John river, which has already been the subject of some discussion in this House. The Secretary of State has had in hand for some time past a Bill respecting the storage and handling of explosives founded more or less upon a Bill introduced by Mr. Templeman. The question of federal rights and provincial rights has been under consideration in connection with that Bill; otherwise it would have been introduced at an earlier date. It has been found necessary to have communication and correspondence with the provincial Governments in regard to it. The Secretary of States has also in hand a Bill amending the Joint Stock Companies Act. There may be one or two other matters of which I shall speak to my right hon. friend, but of which I am not sure at the moment. These Bills and what there is already on the Order Paper constitute the programme of the Government.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This is the 4th of May, and if we are to take up the programme which my right hon. friend has already laid before us and the legislation still to be introduced by the Government, we need not look forward to prorogation for some time to come. Some of the legislation mentioned by my right hon. friend is not of a very heavy character; but some of the Bills are important, such as those respecting the Civil Service. I presume these can be introduced this session, and if they cannot be taken up before prorogation, they will be before the public and the public will have the advantage of knowing the intention of the Government respecting that very important legislation. With regard to the other matters, they do not seem to be of a very contentious character. Pickled fish will not give very much trouble. As to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, when he brings in his Bill he can tell us about the Georgian Bay canal and the French river.

Mr. EMMERSON: Might I ask the Minister of Finance whether or not the legislation regarding the Quebec Battlefields Commission is to have any reference to the old forts in the Maritime provinces? That subject was brought to his attention at the last session of Parliament; and I think assurances were given, if not by himself by other members of the Government, to the effect that some action would be taken. A letter reached me this morning inquiring with respect to this matter, and I hope that some attention will be given to it. These old forts are decaying day by day, and some of them will be beyond all recognition very shortly if some action is not taken. I refer to Fort Beausejour, now known as Fort Cumberland, Fort Monkton, and several others. Hon. members from the Maritime provinces section of the country will be familiar with them.

Mr. W. T. WHITE: The matter has been under consideration, but it has not yet been decided definitely whether or not the work of preservation that my hon. friend has in view will be committed to the Quebec Battlefields Commission. When I bring down the Bill to amend the Quebec Battlefields Commission Act, which has been delayed because I have in contemplation some amendments, I shall be able to give a more definite answer to my hon. friend.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. GRAHAM: May I ask the hon. Minister of Finance when he intends going on with his Insurance Bill, which is a very important one? I have been receiving many inquiries with regard to this Bill, which will affect in a material way the investments of insurance companies, who are very anxious to know what, if anything, is to be done this session with regard to it.

Mr. WHITE: There are two or three sections of the Bill, one relating to the matter which my hon. friend has in view, which I think will require very careful consideration before being enacted into law. It is probable that I may allow the Bill to stand in order that they may receive during the recess further consideration in the light of all the facts that may be presented to me as having a bearing upon them. Legislation of that character should not be pressed. When I introduced the Bill I had copies sent to the various insurance companies in order that all possible objections might be brought to my attention. It is probable that the Bill will not be proceeded with this session; but, if I decide otherwise, I will give my hon. friend ample notice.

MADOC BANK FAILURE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I ask the hon. Minister of Finance if he is aware that another bank has lately failed at Belleville, Ontario, and if it is his intention to reimburse the depositors of that bank?

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend no doubt refers to a private bank—the Madoc Bank?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

Mr. WHITE: The answer is that the Government has no intention of reimbursing the depositors, there being no ground upon which the Government can be held liable.

THE MILITIA ESTIMATES.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Mr. Speaker, I observe that the Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes) is in his place. Therefore, I desire to say that I received from him—it appears to me some weeks ago—a somewhat formal missive, signed with his own hand, asking me to be present in the Chamber at an early day when he was going to introduce his Estimates. May I ask him if he has gone back on that intention, and when we may expect his Estimates to be taken up for discussion?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: The letter was signed with my own hand, Mr. Speaker; I never use a rubber stamp when writing to a member of Parliament. I wish other hon. gentlemen would observe a similar rule. But to come down to the point at issue, I may say that I have been waiting most patiently to enlighten my hon. friend and others who need enlightenment, and to instruct them generally in regard to matters of the Militia Department. But other matters have been on the list in advance, and I have been reluctantly compelled to delay the bringing forward of my Estimates. I hope, however, that by Thursday, if nothing goes wrong, I shall be able to claim the attention of hon. members with my Estimates. I am sure that I shall have a very ardent supporter in my hon. friend. I may say that my reason for sending out the invitation was that there were a number of gentlemen who, I knew, were anxious to be here, and who, fearing that my Estimates might be held up until the last day, were getting rather uneasy, and so I thought I would intimate to them that I would bring these Estimates forward as early as possible.

Mr. GRAHAM: The threat will be carried out on Thursday?

Mr. HUGHES: I will do my best.

Mr. BELAND: Will street clothes be allowed?

Mr. HUGHES: So long as my hon. friend is clothed and in his right mind, that is all I ask.

PRIVATE BILLS.

TORONTO, NIAGARA AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 59, respecting the Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Currie. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 1—short title:

Mr. LANCASTER: With regard to this Bill, I think an explanation is due the committee. This is an ordinary extension of time for the construction of a railway which has made considerable progress with its work and has spent a good deal of money. In the Railway Committee several sections were added. One of these sections, I regret to say, I shall feel it my duty to ask the House to strike out, notwithstanding that it was inserted by the committee. The Bill was reprinted as reported by the committee, and the section whose excision I shall move is section 7 of reprint. Let me briefly explain the sections. Section 1 is the ordinary section. In section 2, we made an amendment to rectify an incorrect description of the authority controlling Burlington Beach. The section provided that railway should not be built along the beach without the consent of the corporation of the township of Saltfleet. But Burlington Beach is not under the control of the township of Saltfleet but under the control of the Burlington Beach Commission, that commission receiving its authority from the Provincial Legislature of Ontario. Section 3 enacts the ordinary limitations—two years to commence and three years to complete the unfinished portions. Section 4 of the reprint has been added by the committee. This was done at my instance and was carried unanimously. The effect is to repeal section 10 of the statute of 1903. That section permitted a part of this railway to remain under the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature, notwithstanding that we were declaring the whole work to be for the general advantage of Canada. It struck me, and the committee agreed with me unanimously, that to expect the Dominion Railway Commission to control a railway, a portion of which was outside of their control and under the control of a provincial legislature, was incongruous. Sections 5, 6, and 7 were inserted at the instance of the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell). It is with regard to one of these sections that I intend to move. But I ask the committee not to dispose of my motion at this time. I am informed that the hon. member for South Toronto has telegraphed that it is impossible for him to be here to-day, and as it is a section inserted at his instance that I am moving to strike out, in fairness to him I think this committee should hear what he has to say before acting upon my motion. I will present my explanation of the case now, because, reluctantly, and much against my will—but I am bound to obey my doctor's advice—I am unable to be here to-morrow. The condition of my health compels me to get away and not annoy you gentlemen longer, much as I should like to continue.

As to these three sections, I must admit to this House that I do not think I am entirely without blame for the mistake—as I believe it to have been—that the committee made in regard to one of these sections. I have always found this House quite unduly inclined, as I think, to have respect for what I do as Chairman of the Railway Committee. So I am not going to leave here without stating frankly the position with regard to this section. The hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) moved three sections in one paper. Where I am to blame, I think, is in not having insisted that these sections should be separated and put before the committee one by one. I am satisfied that had this been done, the one to which I shall raise objection would not have carried—that is only my opinion, of course, and I have no right to say more than enough to make myself clear. These three sections are aimed at protecting the rights of the city of Toronto in regard to street railway franchise.

They are aimed at preventing any railway from coming into Toronto and interfering with the valuable street railway franchises of that city. Sections 5 and 6 are, in my opinion, quite proper for that purpose. I think section 5 as reprinted is waste paper, because, as I understand the Railway Act, the Railway Commission has exactly the same power as section 5 provides that they shall exercise with regard to preventing any railway from interfering with the street railway franchises of the city of Toronto. Section 6, however, is of some use to the city of Toronto, and I am in favour of it in so far as it provides for the protection of urban rights by preventing a railway from coming into the city under the guise of being a work for the general advantage of Canada, but having in view only the object of doing a purely street railway business. Section 6 of the reprinted Bill is as follows:

> Neither the company nor any other company that may acquire or have the right to run over the line of the company within the city of Toronto shall receive, carry or discharge passengers from any point within the limits of the said city to any other point within the limits of the said city; but the powers for the carriage of passenger traffic that may be exercised by the company or by any other company over the line of the company within the limits of the said city, shall only extend to and include the receiving, forwarding and delivering of through passenger traffic originating outside the limits of the said city for delivery within the limits of the said city, or originating within the limits of the said city for delivery outside the limits of the said city.

Section 7 of the reprint is a peculiarly worded section. The only argument used in the Railway Committee in support of that section was that similar sections were inserted in three other Bills three or four years ago by this House. These were new companies seeking incorporation; they were companies that had done nothing; had no vested rights, had built no part of their right of way and had spent no money. The Hamilton, Waterloo and Guelph Railway Act is chapter 108 of the Statutes of 1910; the Western Central is chapter 150 of the Statutes of 1911, and the Toronto and Eastern railway is chapter 167 of the Statutes of 1910. Two of these railways were taken over from the province without anything having been done and one was granted a charter by original Act of this House. Nothing had been done when those clauses were inserted; they were given their franchise upon the express condition set forth in those clauses, and upon no other. I do not think it makes any difference in the year 1914 what my opinion was in the year 1910 or 1911, but at that time I was of the opinion that this very section which I am attacking was not a provision which should go into a Dominion railway corporation Act, because we have a tribunal —to which we have given ample jurisdiction and to which we keep adding every jurisdiction that may possibly be necessary —in the Board of Railway Commissioners of Canada, which properly and successfully deals with the question of railway crossings. The difference, however, between those three Acts and the one under consideration —this, I think, is where the Railway Committee made a mistake; and I take my share of the blame for not having emphasized the point by putting these three sections separately instead of in one, as I did in the Railway Committee upon the motion of the hon. member for South Toronto—the difference is that vested rights do exist in regard to this railway company, but this section puts upon them an embargo in regard to their entering the city of Toronto. What is it that I call the embargo? It is that the mayor and aldermen of the city of Toronto, and they alone, can decide that this railway may cross upon the level of any of the highways in the city of Toronto, notwithstanding that the Board of Railway Commissioners might decide that this railway and others should cross upon the level in one place until a viaduct or underground passage should be constructed. Notwithstanding what the Railway Commission might do in regard to any other railway, the mayor and aldermen of the city of Toronto can permit this railway to run across the streets of the city, upon the highway level. This simply means that any dispute between the railway and the city of Toronto will be decided by the mayor and aldermen of that city. On first principles it would strike me that this provision is absolutely wrong. It is classed as a safeguard for the city of Toronto. It certainly is a safeguard for the city of Toronto, but the trouble is that it is much more than a safeguard. It is somewhat the sort of safeguard which would exist if the provincial Government would pass an Act providing that no lawyer should practise in the city of St. Catharines without my consent. That is a safeguard to me; it protects me wonderfully well, and gives me great power, I dare say, in the city of St. Catharines, but is it the sort of safeguard that I should have? Having regard to a provincially chartered railway coming in contact at the outskirts of the city with a railway which is chartered by Dominion legislation, should the city of Toronto decide whether that Dominion railway should or should not cross its streets? Hon. gentlemen should bear in mind the fact that this Bill, like all other Bills that pass the Railway Committee, contains a full protection to the city of Toronto in that its streets cannot be used for any right of way; that railways cannot be built along or upon any highway level. But authority for these railways to cross must be given by the absolute power and plenary jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament, else we cannot be sure that any railway can build from one part of Canada to another. There must be authority here to decide, in the interests of Canada, upon what terms those railways shall cross highway levels, whether the city concerned be Toronto, Hamilton, Winnipeg, Calgary, Montreal or any other, because they must cross in order to get from one place to another. The power absolutely to prevent building upon and across highways for right of way purposes is, of course, a very different thing.

I said that this railway had vested rights; let me point out what they are. As I say, the companies, in the legislation respecting which these provisions were put in, in 1910 and 1911, had done nothing. They have attempted to do nothing; and they tell me they will not attempt to do anything because of the embargo which the city of Toronto has against them whereby they cannot possibly enter that city without the consent of the mayor and aldermen. From these facts hon. gentlemen can draw their own inferences: during the course of three years these three railway companies have attempted to do nothing under their franchises. But the history of this particular Bill is very different. In 1903 the company was incorporated under the name of the Toronto and Hamilton Railway Company. It was then a line from Toronto to Hamilton and the company were authorized to acquire by purchase, lease or otherwise all the rights, powers, stocks and everything else of certain other railways, including the Toronto and Suburban Railway Company, not under the ordinary provisions allowing amalgamation, as provided by sections 361, et sequentia, of the Railway Act, but under special provision to buy up the stock and acquire the franchises of these three railways, including the Toronto Suburban. They went ahead and did so. In 1904 an extension was authorized and in 1906 its name was changed to the Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway, which is its present name. The company were authorized to extend their lines to other places, which I need not mention, to increase their capital stock to $6,000,000 and to buy up holus bolus, as I have said, and acquire absolutely these other companies.

The railway then proceeded. They went first to the Minister of Railways and got their route map approved. Then they went to the Board of Railway Commissioners, and as soon as the matter came before the Railway Committee, realizing its importance, I obtained from the board the record of what took place. I should tell the committee that in 1909 we recognized that the railway had partially constructed their road and obtained permission to complete within five years. It was admitted by Parliament that they had commenced their construction and had spent more than 15 per cent and all they required was not time to commence but time to complete. We gave an extension of five years from 1909 which will run out this year. The next year they went to the Railway Commission and applied for permission to cross these twenty-five different streets in the outskirts of the city of Toronto, where the Canadian Pacific railway and other railways are crossing the streets upon the level of the highway; and for the convenience of the public, and I suppose for the purpose of getting the ear and sympathy of the commission, they built their track right alongside the Canadian Pacific railway, so that in making their crossing upon the highways at grade level they crossed at exactly the same places as the Canadian Pacific railway had crossed for some years and is still crossing. The board heard the matter, and I shall read briefly from the proceedings on the 28th of January, 1910. Mr. Johnston, city solicitor of the city of Toronto, said:

> If the board thinks that the entrance should be allowed, then it should be on conditions, that they should provide protection if required, or there should be a condition in the order that if the Canadian Pacific Railway tracks are elevated further west, they should go up on the elevation also. I think with that perhaps the city would be satisfied.
> Hon. Mr. Mabee: Is that agreeable?

Mr. Royce, counsel for the railway made some remarks upon the point, I suppose not wanting to give in too easily, and then the order was pronounced by the chairman in these words:

> One order may go in these twenty-five applications. I think one order will cover the whole of them. They may all be consolidated and one order issued in these terms. Authority given to applicants to construct across the streets mentioned, subject to the following conditions:
> 1. That if the tracks of the Canadian Pacific railway are at any future time elevated, then the tracks of the applicants shall be likewise elevated along the course of the line where the right of way lie adjacent to each other, upon such terms as the board may direct.
> 2. Protection to be provided at such crossings as the chief engineer of the board may require before the road is opened for traffic, and if protection is recommended at crossings that any other road is interested in, then the apportionment of the cost of such protection is reserved.

Hon. gentlemen who are familiar with the Railway Act and the way we have struggled for the last fourteen years in this House—I speak only of the time during which I have been a member—will see the practical result of legislation that was passed here in 1909 for the very purpose of causing the least injury to be done to the fewest possible number of people and the greatest good to be done to the general public by allowing railways to enter into every city and town at the least possible inconvenience and risk of life and property. Here the board, in its jurisdiction, makes the sensible order that as the Canadian Pacific railway is now crossing these streets on the level, the Toronto, Niagara and Western railway may run beside it, but that when the Canadian Pacific railway is compelled to raise its tracks, the Toronto, Niagara and Western railway must not use the permission granted to them as a ground for claiming that its tracks should not be elevated. We know that the Railway Act gives ample power to the Board of Railway Commissioners to adjust in a fair and equitable way the cost of such elevations. Under the Act, as this railway was not constructed before 1909, the whole cost of the elevation must fall on the railway itself. That is the amendment of 1909, that a railway not then constructed, when required by the Board of Railway Commissioners to get off the level, must bear the whole cost; whereas vested rights were recognized in railways already constructed by apportioning the cost of abolishing the level crossing between the grade crossing fund, the municipality and the railway. So Toronto is quite clear from any responsibility for the cost of elevation, and the Board of Railway Commissioners have done what I would expect them to do, they have looked ahead and made the most wise order they could. They have said to the Toronto, Niagara and Western, you may run on this highway as long as the Canadian Pacific Railway is doing so, you are right alongside the Canadian Pacific railway and are creating no additional danger; but the permission that is now granted you is not to be used in future as a ground for claiming a right to continue to run on the level, and you must elevate your tracks at your own expense, under the statute of 1909, as soon as we require the Canadian Pacific railway tracks to be elevated. Under a former order of the board of December 17, 1909, the railway had acquired the right of entry into the city of Toronto, a distance of two and a half miles. They asserted, and hon. gentlemen from Toronto did not dispute, that they bought every inch of that right of way for two and a half miles under that order. They have paid some money for right of way to the city of Toronto itself. We are now asked to drastically interfere with them after they have bought that right of way and expended $1,500,000 in buying the right of way into the city of Toronto and in building towards the city of Guelph. They asserted, and gentlemen from that locality agreed, that they had acquired the right of way and had graded it almost the whole of the distance from Toronto to Guelph. I was accused by a former Minister of Railways, who many years since went to his last rest, that I was a socialist and radical because I wanted to amend the Railway Act against the vested interests of the railway companies. With what little common sense I have left I must press upon the House that there are vested rights in this case; the railway company have spent one and a quarter millions of dollars in acquiring a right of way, have graded it and prepared it for the rails, and it does seem to me that, where they are simply asking for an extension of five years in which to complete construction, it would be bad legislation to refuse their request. We are incorporating railways for the advantage of Canada. That means that we must give them some power to exercise properly, and, under proper authority, to proceed into or through any city or town, from Halifax to Vancouver, or else our charters are waste paper. If the city of Toronto has sections of this kind put in with regard to a railway which we take care to say by the other clauses of the Bill shall not do a street railway business, any ordinary Dominion railway can be held up—if you wish to use that term—by the city of Toronto, and we should have the Board of Railway Commissioners dethroned as to their power to decide whether, under any circumstances, a railway should go in on the level of the highway. If we do that with Toronto we shall soon have to do it with Winnipeg, Hamilton, Montreal and every other city. We can not say that the city of Toronto is to have certain powers in regard to railways going into that city and at the same time allow the rest of the cities of the Dominion to be at the mercy—if you want to use that word, but I would prefer the word 'justice'—of the Board of Railway Commissioners. With that statement I leave the matter with the House. There are a lot of elaborations that could be made, but I shall not deal with them now, but, as I leave to-morrow, I do not want to go away without expressing my opinion on this matter for what it is worth. The House, with undue kindness, as I said at the outset, pays too much respect to my work as Chairman of the Railway Committee. Feeling as I do that my physical condition will not allow me to stand on my feet any longer, I will ask the House to be contented with the statement I have made, although I may be able to answer some questions from my seat. I move to strike out section 7 of the Bill as reprinted.

Mr. GRAHAM: As I understand it, the Bill was taken up not for final action but to allow the Chairman of the Railway Committee to make a statement concerning it, and to make his motion to strike out certain clauses which he thinks are objectionable. I think I am expressing the unanimous feeling of the House when I say that we deeply regret the indisposition of the Chairman of the Railway Committee. For some years I was ever in attendance on that committee, and among those who were seldom, if ever, absent was the hon. gentleman now chairman of that committee. Whatever his views were, he always expressed them fearlessly, and I think I am absolutely correct in saying that in no instance did he ever introduce partisanship into a discussion of any measures before that committee. Those with whom I am more intimately acquainted are unanimous in their approval of his conduct as chairman. He has fully maintained the high standard set by his predecessors in that important position, because, Sir, it is an important position. The Chairman of the Railway Committee, perhaps the largest and one of the most important, if not the most important, committees of the House, sometimes has a very difficult and delicate task to perform. Just before he leaves the House to take a much-needed rest I wish to take this opportunity of expressing what I am sure is the feeling of every member of the House, that his work is fully appreciated by the House and, I trust, by the country. If I have any chiding to do, it is that the hon. gentleman has remained at his post so long as he has. It is an example of devotion to duty in the Dominion which certainly rivets the attention of the members of this House and of the people of Canada, especially valuable at this time when there are so many people prone to intimate that men in public life are merely there for some sinister purpose, and are not sincere in their professed devotion to duty. I think it will not be disputed that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) would not have devoted to his private business the attention he has given to the public business of this House during the past few weeks. He has stuck to his post longer than he should have, and our earnest hope is that after a much-needed rest he will return to his domestic enjoyments fully restored to health.

The Bill which he has discussed this afternoon with such clearness has a delicate side to it, and is one that cannot be disposed of offhand. Those of us who were not in the committee, perhaps do not understand the situation as clearly as we shall when the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) has given his views. For myself, I am almost egotistical enough to think I understand it as it is a twin brother to several others with which I have had to deal. The city of Toronto, like all large centres of population, has its difficulties and problems to solve. Sometimes I think its representatives endeavour to solve them perhaps too strictly along the lines of local views and without the widest outlook on the transportation problems of the Dominion—but it is not my purpose to criticise. We have had the statement of the Chairman of the Railway Committee and I think we should not put him to any more work answering questions. We shall be able to give his argument full weight when the matter comes up for final action, and I would now suggest that we report progress to discuss this matter at another time.

4. p.m.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Before the proposal is put, I would like to say that only one hour is allowed for private Bills to-morrow night, and this one may provoke considerable discussion. The Bill affects very considerably the counties of Halton, Waterloo, Perth, Wentworth, Peel, Wellington, and several other counties; and the position is a very peculiar one. I want to endorse as strongly as I can the motion of the Chairman of the Railway Committee that clause 7 be stricken out. The railway has now been graded from the westerly limit of Toronto to and through Guelph, a distance of fifty miles. It has also been surveyed, and the right of way purchased, on to Berlin. In some places steel has been laid. A large amount of money has been spent on the project, but the whole thing will be worthless unless we can get an entrance into the city of Toronto. Going home during the present session, I have been asked time and again how this matter stood; and while I agree that the city of Toronto should have reasonable protection for its streets, in this instance we can make out a case of proprietary or vested rights. I hope when the Bill comes up again we shall have a free and full discussion as the people outside Toronto desire an entrance into that city. To my mind, Toronto has no right to deny that entrance.

Mr. J. D. REID: I would move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. LANCASTER: I might give a word or two of explanation in regard to three or four other sections of the Bill, unless the committee choose to pass them on my statement that they are all right. The other sections are the standard municipal clauses adjusted to this Bill so as to give the city of Toronto, and every other municipality, ample protection of their highways against telegraph and telephone lines, lines for the purpose of distributing electrical energy, and things of that kind.

Progress reported.

PATENT OF RUDOLF GOLDSCHMIDT.

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 135, respecting a certain patent of Rudolf Goldschmidt.—Mr. Fripp. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 1—authority for variation of conditions as to manufacture, etc., in Canada:

Mr. BURRELL: The Bill deals with the patent of an invention with regard to wireless telegraphy. It was not put under the compulsory provision clause of the Patent Act, and the patent was allowed to lapse in February, 1912. It has taken a great many years to perfect this invention and to bring it up to the point at which it can be usefully employed. A large amount of money has been spent upon it, and they have now got it to the point where it can be practically exploited all over the world. The Bill received a good deal of consideration in the Senate, and the Senate came to the conclusion that the patent should be put under the compulsory clause of the Patent Act. The Bill was held up for a time because the patent is associated more or less with the Marconi patents with regard to wireless telegraphy. The Government has the right to use those patents, and we were not sure whether this particular patent was to be exempted from the privilege of the Government use. Consequently, the department took objection. That objection has been removed because the parties have agreed that it comes under the general list of Marconi patents and that the Government has the right to use it. As far as the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Marine and Fisheries are concerned, they have no objection to the Bill.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FREDERICTON AND GRAND LAKE COAL AND RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House in Committee on Bill No. 107, respecting the Fredericton and Grand Lake Coal and Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Fowler.

On section 1—declaratory:

Mr. LANCASTER: This Bill has been entirely recast. It was introduced apparently with an entirely wrong conception of the legislation that was required for the purpose desired. They introduced a Bill asking us to declare a certain provincial railway in New Brunswick to be a work for the general advantage of Canada and then to allow them to amalgamate with another railway under section 361 of the Railway Act. It struck me at once that there must be some reason why we should take away a franchise from the province of New Brunswick, and a most peculiar franchise it is, too, and make Dominion legislation of a private Act of the New Brunswick Legislature, the like of which I never saw, in a great many respects, in any Dominion legislation. I said to the promoters of the Bill: You must either try to make the Bill contain such a power as we would want you to have, or tell me frankly what you want. It seems that all they wanted to do was to make an amalgamation of the lines under section 361 and the following sections of the Railway Act; so I had the Bill recast. The effect simply is that we strike out the clause taking that railway over and making it a work for the general advantage of Canada and permitting the railway, of whose rights we are the custodians and over whom we must exercise control, that is the Canadian Pacific railway, to take a lease under the amalgamation clauses of the Railway Act.

Mr. GRAHAM: As I understand, whatever powers this company has, it gets from the New Brunswick Legislature?

Mr. LANCASTER: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Legislature can give it whatever powers it likes. As far as we are concerned, we give the Canadian Pacific Railway Company power to carry out its share of the bargain which this other company wishes to make.

Mr. LANCASTER: Yes, and the other company must get its power from its own authority.

Mr. EMMERSON: Does that bring it under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission?

Mr. LANCASTER: The Railway Commission will have to sanction the lease under the provision of section 361 and following sections of the Railway Act. We say that the Railway Commission may grant such a lease if they comply with the Act. But, of course, as the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. Graham) says, the lease is no good on the part of the lessors unless their own guardian, the New Brunswick Legislature, permit them to make it.

Mr. EMMERSON: I would like to know whether, under the proposed legislation, this company is brought under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission of Canada. I understand the company has been incorporated under the laws of New Brunswick. The railway was constructed, it has since been leased by the Canadian Pacific railway, and the Canadian Pacific railway now want some legislation in respect to the company. I fancy they propose operating it under the name of the Fredericton and Grand Lake Coal and Railway Company. In reality they will be the operators. Does this legislation enable the Board of Railway Commissioners to have control of the rates which are to prevail on this road?

Mr. LANCASTER In my opinion, under the provision, it does. The Railway Act is quite clear on that point.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think the company is under the Act and not under the board.

Mr. EMMERSON: It is a matter of very great importance that this railway should be operated under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. LANCASTER: That is what the Canadian Pacific railway thinks in agreeing to this section.

Mr. EMMERSON: It is a coal road running in connection with the coal mines in the county of Queens. It connects with another railway formerly known as the Central of New Brunswick, which in its turn connects with the Intercolonial at Norton in Kings county. The system will now extend from Norton on the Intercolonial through Chipman on to Minto, thence to Fredericton. I was not in the Railway Committee the day the Bill was under consideration, and I would like to have some assurance that this railway will come under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. LANCASTER: The only assurance I can give my hon. friend is my opinion, which is not given ex cathedra at all, but it was also the opinion of the Canadian Pacific railway in promoting this Bill. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company cannot obtain a lease until they get permission. When they get permission they make a lease and take it to the Board of Railway Commissioners, which, under sections 361, 362 and so on of the Railway Act, has the power to say that in its opinion this is a proper lease for the Canadian Pacific railway to take from this company. In my humble opinion—and I am fortified by decisions as well as by the actual language of the Act—the moment a Dominion railway operates trains over the lines of another railway, under a lease or otherwise, it comes under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. EMMERSON: Supposing the Canadian Pacific Railway Company continued to operate this road under the name of the Fredericton and Grand Lake Coal and Railway Company, and the name of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company did not appear openly in connection with the traffic, in what way could the Board of Railway Commissioners have jurisdiction over the freight tariffs that be filed with the Railway Commission by the Fredericton and Grand Lake Coal and Railway Company?

Mr. LANCASTER: Any municipality or anybody interested in that locality would only have to go to the Board of Railway Commissioners and say: You have on record that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is leasing this road and is running it, and this is Canadian Pacific traffic. On receiving proof of that, the Board of Railway Commissioners would at once have jurisdiction. The board would know that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was actually operating the road.

Mr. EMMERSON: I do not know whether or not this matter was discussed in the Railway Committee. If it was, I withdraw any opposition. I would be satisfied if the committee, having considered the question, determined that under the lease the operation of the road came under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners. Possibly my hon. friend is aware of the fact that this point was considered in the committee.

Mr. LANCASTER: I thought I said that. What happened was this: I pointed out, as I said in the beginning, that to ask us to take over the road and make it a work for the general advantage of Canada would be simply ridiculous. The counsel for the Canadian Pacific railway had several conferences with me about the matter. I said: 'What is it you really want to do and I will help you to do it properly? He said: 'We simply want to get a lease under the amalgamating clauses of the Railway Act.' I said. 'If you operate the road, the Board of Railway Commissioners will have control over you.' He wanted to consult his superior counsel at Montreal in regard to the matter. After some correspondence back and forth, they finally agreed to this section. I personally have no doubt in regard to the matter, but I do not want to force my opinion upon the committee. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company believed that in operating this road they will be under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. GRAHAM: What did the Railway Committee think?

Mr. LANCASTER: They agreed with me, so far as I could tell.

Section agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

LORD SELKIRK'S PIONEER SETTLERS.

Mr. PROULX:

Is it the policy of the Interior Department or the Government to set up the statute of limitations as a bar to the right of Lord Selkirk's pioneer settlers of Manitoba, who have been deprived of the power of protecting their civil rights through the failure of the Crown to take over the custody of the land registers and state papers of Lord Selkirk's estate from 1812 to 1835, at the transfer of that country to Canada in 1870?

Mr. ROCHE: The Department of the Interior is not aware of any further rights of Lord Selkirk's pioneer settlers of Manitoba, nor is it aware that such settlers have been deprived of the power to protect their civil rights. There is no policy or intention to set up any statute of limitations in the matter.

2. What is the date of such complaint?

3. Who has been appointed his successor?

4. Who recommended said successor?

ROYAL CANADIAN BAND.

Mr. KYTE: I desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence to a message which I have just received to the effect that the Royal Canadian band paraded the streets of Halifax in full uniform Saturday evening to celebrate the discharge of a certain gentleman who was imprisoned for a short period for contempt of the Legislature of Nova Scotia.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. KYTE: I desire to ask the hon. Minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

MORNING SITTINGS.

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That on and from Tuesday next, the 5th instant, and until the end of the session, the House shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning, and that in addition to the usual intermission at 6 o'clock p.m., there shall be an intermission from one to three o'clock p.m.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I appreciate the fact that at this stage of the session everybody desires to make as much headway as possible towards prorogation, but I submit to my hon. friend that this motion should not be pressed to-day. The moment we have before us information as to the legislation that is to be brought down, we shall be ready for that resolution, but not before. If my hon. friend will hasten business and bring down as soon as possible all the legislation that he intends to introduce, we will do all we can to hasten matters.

Mr. BORDEN: I wish to assure the right hon. gentleman that I have done the best I could. There seems to be some force, however, in what he suggests with regard to the matter, and I will not press the motion to-day. I will endeavour to impress upon the ministers the importance of getting all the legislation down.

Motion stands.

DRAWBACK ON PIG-IRON.

On motion of Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance), the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Blain in the Chair:

[Mr. Kyte.]

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council, may under regulations made for the purpose, allow, on the exportation of goods manufactured in Canada and into the manufacture of which pig-iron imported into Canada mixed with pig-iron made in Canada has entered, a drawback, equal to the duty paid, less such deductions therefrom as is provided in such regulations, on all pig-iron imported and used by the manufacturer of such goods in manufacturing the goods exported and other goods, and the drawback may be computed on the total quantity of pig-iron, including pig-iron made as aforesaid, entering into such exported goods.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would the minister state just what that change is?

Mr. WHITE: I explained the reasons for this legislation upon the occasion of the Budget speech, but I have prepared a succinct statement, which is as follows:

The object of this amendment is to enable drawback to be paid on pig-iron used in articles exported, but not exceeding the weight imported, and entered for duty.

When manufacturing the same article for export and for home consumption, it is found impracticable to keep the melts of foreign and domestic iron separate, so that only foreign pig-iron will be used in the article exported, and domestic pig-iron in the like article for home consumption.

The proposed amendment is designed to enable drawback to be paid to the extent of the weight of pig-iron used in the exported article, but not in excess of the quantity imported, and on which duty has been paid.

Section 288 of the Customs Act, which is amended, is as follows:

The Governor in Council may, under regulations made for that purpose, allow on the exportation of goods which have been imported into Canada, and on which a duty of customs has been paid, a drawback equal to the duty so paid with such deductions therefrom as is provided in such regulations.

In the administration of this drawback provision the Customs Department has found itself confronted with a difficulty which really makes it in the interest of Canadian manufacturers who manufacture for export as well as for home consumption to purchase all their pig-iron abroad. I can best illustrate to the House by a concrete example. Let us say that a manufacturer of articles into which pig-iron enters, for home consumption as well as for export, requires 30,000 tons of pig-iron during the year for his entire business, both domestic and export. Let us say that he buys 10,000 tons of pig-iron from the United States and 20,000 tons of domestic pig-iron; and let us assume that he exports 10,000 tons of manufactured product made from pig-iron. He is entitled to a drawback in respect of duties paid upon pig-iron which has entered into his export product, 10,000 tons. The Customs Department will not allow him a drawback to the amount of the duty paid upon the 10,000 tons of pig-iron which he has imported from the United States because, they say that in the melts (a technical term) in his manufacturing of both his domestic and his foreign products he has combined the foreign pig-iron and domestic pig-iron in the proportion of one and two. They therefore will allow him only one-third of the duties which he has paid upon the 10,000 tons of imported pig-iron by way of drawback; that is to say, they will allow him the duty paid in respect of 3,333 tons only, although he has melted 10,000 tons of American pig-iron and has imported 10,000 tons of his manufactured product. The manufacturer, therefore, whose case we have under consideration, says: Well, I will buy all my pig-iron, the whole 30,000 tons, in the United States, because then no question can possibly arise as to confusion in the melts; I can buy the 20,000 tons in the United States just as cheaply as I can in Canada, and I can buy the 10,000 tons just as cheaply in the United States as I can in Canada, and therefore I will buy it all there. He gets a drawback in respect of the duties paid on 10,000 tons, because he has used 10,000 tons of imported pig-iron in the product which he has exported, and no question arises as to the confusion of the metals in the melts. This matter was brought to our attention by the iron and steel companies of Canada. They said—and I think the matter is beyond question—that by reason of the administration of the drawback provision by the Customs Department in the past, they had been debarred from making sales to manufacturers who use pig-iron in their production; they requested that this change be made whereby a rebate of duty will be given in respect of the entire amount of pig-iron imported from abroad, provided the drawback does not exceed the total amount of duty paid upon the pig-iron imported by a manufacturer and entering into his exported product.

Mr. EMMERSON: What is the duty on pig-iron imported into Canada?

Mr. WHITE: Two dollars and a half, general.

Mr. EMMERSON: Newfoundland comes under the British preference?

Mr. WHITE: The British preferential on pig iron is $1.50.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Can the minister give us the regulations as they now stand?

Mr. WHITE: I have not the regulations before me, but I may say—

Mr. MACLEAN: If goods made in Canada, and exported, are made of imported pig-iron then there is a rebate. Do I understand that the rebate is only applicable to goods made in Canada, and exported therefrom, and into which foreign pig-iron enters?

Mr. WHITE: Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN: The rebate does not apply to goods made in Canada and sold in Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The explanation, as my hon. friend says, is very technical. As I understand it, the manufacturer who buys 10,000 tons of pig-iron in the United States gets a rebate if my hon. friend is sure that 10,000 tons goes into the product he exports.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend is substantially stating the facts although, perhaps, he is generalizing. I do not know whether my right hon. friend approves of the legislation or not, but he sees the alternative. The alternative is that the manufacturer buys all his pig-iron in the United States, and then if he exports 10,000 tons of product made from pig-iron, he gets a drawback upon the duties paid on 10,000 tons. Of course if he bought the entire 30,000 tons from the United States, no question could arise as to the melting of that with Canadian pig-iron. I am told that the Massey-Harris Company has bought its pig-iron outside of Canada for years, and the same thing has also been brought to my attention in connection with the International Harvester Company.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Massey-Harris Company could not have bought it in the United States with the object of getting a rebate because they get a rebate both on their domestic and foreign ore.

Mr. WHITE: Take the case of the International Harvester Company of Hamilton. It has been represented to me by the Steel Company of Canada, and by the International Harvester people themselves, that if the drawback provision were amended the latter would buy some of their pig-iron from the Steel Company of Canada in Hamilton, who are neighbours to them—just across the street, so to speak. But until this drawback provision is amended it pays the International Harvester Company to buy all their pig-iron in the United States. On the face of it, this legislation would seem to be a disadvantage to the Canadian iron and steel companies, but it is not so. They have asked for it, and I think the illustration shows clearly that it will be in the interest of the iron and steel companies of Canada to have this legislation enacted, because it will put them in a favourable position for the sale of their product to manufacturers who require it. At the present time the drawback regulations are to their disadvantage.

Mr. MACDONALD: If that is the end the minister wishes to attain, he is not attaining it at all according to the explanation he has given to the House.

Mr. WHITE: Why not?

Mr. MACDONALD: Because my hon. friend says that to-day the Canadian manufacturer who imports 10,000 tons of pig-iron from the United States and takes at the same time 20,000 tons from the Canadian manufacturer, and uses that in the production of exported goods, is not able to get a full drawback on the 10,000 tons from the United States, but only one-third of the drawback. My hon. friend is making it easier for him to get the full drawback on the 10,000 tons of imported product.

5 p.m.

Mr. WHITE: I took a hypothetical case which, by reason of the administration of the drawback provision in the Customs Act, could not actually arise.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why does not my hon. friend take an actual case? His hypothetical one disproves the argument in favour of the proposed legislation.

Mr. WHITE: If the manufacturer buys 20,000 tons in Canada and 10,000 tons from abroad and gets only one-third drawback, it might be argued that that was an advantage to the Canadian iron manufacturer; but as a matter of fact it is to their interest to buy all their pig-iron from the United States, and, as I have said, the Massey-Harris Company does it.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Massey-Harris Company used to buy their pig-iron from the Nova Scotia Company in my county. They took almost the total output of the concern for the manufacture of agricultural implements.

Mr. ARTHURS: Pig-iron?

[Mr. W. T. White.]

Mr. MACDONALD: Pig-iron and steel products, which come under these drawbacks. But they have been purchasing in the United States for a number of years and they apparently do not want to purchase in Canada. It is one of the anomalies of the Massey-Harris people that they are coming here asking protection when they do not show the slightest interest in behalf of the people who produce their raw material and are continually pressing the Minister of Finance, as they pressed the previous Minister of Finance, to give them the widest opportunities of going out and getting their raw material in the United States which they do. I would like to get from the Minister of Finance some clear explanation as to how this proposition is going to be worked out. My hon. friend will be bound to admit, that, having regard to the hypothetical case which he submitted to the House, the effect of this legislation he is now proposing is to make it easier and more natural for the Canadian manufacturer to go to the United States to get the whole of the pig-iron that he wants than even it is now.

Mr. WHITE: He is going there now; I want to make it in his interest not to go.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend was dealing with a case in which a Canadian manufacturer was purchasing one-third of his necessities in the United States and two-thirds in Canada. He said that if the manufacturer did that he would only be able to get one-third of the duty he had paid on 10,000 tons of pig-iron, taking the hypothetical case, whereas, under this new legislation he would be able to get the whole of the duty paid on the 10,000 tons.

Mr. WHITE: Let us assume that the manufacturer, as in the hypothetical case, purchased 20,000 tons of pig-iron in Canada and 10,000 in the United States and, as in the hypothetical case, got a drawback of duties in respect of only 3,333 tons; I would ask my hon. friend what he would do next year. Next year, after having bought 10,000 in the United States and 20,000 in Canada and finding that he only got a rebate of duty in respect to 3,333 tons, he would do precisely what the manufacturers are doing to-day; he would find that it paid him better to buy his entire 30,000 tons in the United States and he would do so.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend has made clear what he failed to make clear before. My hon. friend takes the ground that, because of the administration of the Customs Department and interpretation of the law as to the proportion of drawback that he is entitled to upon the material that he has purchased, the manufacturer has been induced to go to the United States in order that there might be no question as to the proportion.

Mr. WHITE: Exactly.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where, in the province of Ontario, is pig-iron manufactured and sold to other manufacturers?

Mr. WHITE: In Hamilton.

Mr. MACDONALD: In Hamilton alone?

Mr. WHITE: Pig-iron was manufactured at Midland and charcoal iron at Deseronto and Parry Sound. Pig-iron is manufactured at Hamilton and Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. MACDONALD: For sale?

Mr. WHITE: For sale.

Mr. DEVLIN: How does the Government establish the quantity of pig-iron that has been imported and which has entered into the manufacture of different articles which are exported? Does it take the manufacturer's word?

Mr. WHITE: A customs officer visits the establishment of the manufacturer making application for drawback, examines his records, ascertains the amount of his export product, and the amount of raw material imported from various sources that has entered into that product, and makes the necessary calculation.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The more this matter is explained the more mysterious it seems to be. The present law is that the manufacturer who imports iron from the United States gets a drawback of one-third when manufactured and exported, and my hon. friend argues that he is encouraged to buy more iron in the United States. My hon. friend is going to prevent him now from doing that. He is going to take away the inducement to purchase iron in the United States by increasing the bounty from one-third to three-thirds. I do not know how that will work out, but it seems to me that it will work out according to ordinary rules of common sense. I do not object to the legislation of my hon. friend, because, like my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Michael Clark), I am in favour of a low tariff, and if this contributes to a lowering of the tariff I shall not object to it. But, unfortunately, it is not the Canadian consumer who will benefit by it, but the foreign consumer.

Mr. ARTHURS: Representing a county interested in the pig-iron industry, I have only one objection to this proposed legislation, and it is that it does not go far enough. I think that when you are granting a bonus, or a rebate, on articles manufactured out of Canadian iron and steel, you should also give a bonus of an equal amount for the whole of the pig-iron that is manufactured in Canada and goes into the construction of these implements.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Where will you get the money?

Mr. ARTHURS: The money is easily got. Any man who understands the question thoroughly can easily see what the minister is trying to do by this legislation. For instance, if a manufacturer imports any number of tons of pig-iron for the manufacture of implements to be exported from Canada, he receives a bounty for exactly that amount. If, on the other hand, he imports only one-third of the iron entering into these implements, he only gets, under the present regulation, one-third of the rebate. The distinction is that the man importing the total amount of pig-iron entering into the exported articles receives under the present law 99 per cent of the customs duty paid by him on that imported pig-iron. Thus, the man who imports one-third of his pig-iron and uses two-thirds Canadian pig-iron, according to the legislation now in force, is handicapped as compared with the man who imports the whole quantity. That is the present situation, and these are the conditions that we have to meet. If a manufacturer, using 100,000 tons of pig-iron a year, imports that pig-iron from the United States, he gets a rebate on 100,000 tons. If, on the other hand, he uses 100,000 tons for export, of which any amount is purchased from Canadian smelters, he only gets a rebate for the amount on which he has paid duty, or, for the amount that he has purchased from the United States. This resolution, as I understand it, is to allow a man to receive a rebate to the extent of his exported product. If he exports 10,000 tons of manufactured goods, and if he has imported from the United States 10,000 tons of pig-iron, he receives a rebate upon the whole of it, notwithstanding the fact that he may have purchased 50,000 tons of Canadian ore in the meantime and used it in the production of exactly similar implements. My only objection is that I believe that any one engaged in exactly similar business, using exactly the same material, and manufacturing in all probability similar products, should receive exactly the same treatment as the man who imports from the United States, and that is all that the minister is asking for at the present time.

He is simply asking that the manufacturer who is honest enough, Canadian enough, to buy as much as possible in Canada should receive the same treatment as the manufacturer who imports entirely from the United States.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend has forgotten the point that the manufacturer can solve the problem by not importing any of it from the United States. Then he will not require to ask for any drawback.

Mr. WHITE: The price is better.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then, how is my hon. friend to assist the manufacturer of pig-iron in Canada by giving the full drawback to the person who goes to the United States to purchase pig-iron, when he can get it cheaper there than in Canada, even when handicapped by the fact that he can get only one-third of the duty back? Under the existing legislation, the International Harvester Company, for example, if they want to encourage Canadian production of pig-iron, can go to my hon. friend's (Mr. Arthurs) constituency and buy it. If they buy it in the United States, they get only one-third of the drawback on the duty. My hon. friend is proposing to give back the whole of the duty. The consequence will be that if the manufacturers can get pig-iron cheaper in the United States, they will buy it in the United States. That is what the Massey-Harris people did. While clamouring for the maintenance of the duty on their products, and asserting that they could not make goods wholesale in Canada without the assistance of the duty, they were purchasing all their raw material in the United States. If these manufacturers who purchase pig-iron for raw material are patriotic and Canadian enough to encourage Canadian industries, they will purchase all their pig-iron in Canada without asking my hon. friend to give them the whole drawback and thus remove all the impediments which lie between them and purchasing in the United States. When the Hon. Mr. Fielding was Minister of Finance, he had to defend the maintenance of bounties on pig-iron; and I heard many hon. members from the province of Ontario denounce the then Government for giving bounties to that industry.

Mr. ARTHURS: Is my hon. friend in favour of bounties now?

Mr. MACDONALD: I was in favour of a bounty on pig-iron at the time when my hon. friends were opposing it in this House, and were going up and down the province of Ontario saying that the revenues of Canada would be used by the manufacturers of pig-iron to build private yachts. If my hon. friend will turn to 'Hansard' of 1900 he will find that several hon. members who have seats in the House to-day turned their eyes askance at any gentleman on this side who said anything in regard to a duty on iron, although their statements were not nearly so extreme as what my hon. friends said when the late Government's proposals in respect to iron were brought down. My hon. friend (Mr. White), in dealing with this question of the duty on iron, has made a tariff for a few friends of his in the province of Ontario.

Mr. WHITE: What about wire rods?

Mr. MACDONALD: Were it not for the fact that wire rods happen to be manufactured in the province of Nova Scotia, my hon. friend would have absolutely disregarded the iron industry in that province, where iron was first made in the Dominion. My hon. friend has been working for the Steel Company of Canada and one or two industries in the province of Ontario which have peculiar interest for him, and he is entirely disregarding the interest of the people in the other provinces of Canada.

Mr. WHITE: What complaint or suggestion has my hon. friend to make—because I have not heard from him as yet—in regard to the change in the iron and steel schedule?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend, in response to the requests made to him by the iron and steel people throughout this country, has so framed the schedule that, with the exception of the one item of wire rods, which happens to be manufactured in the province of Nova Scotia, his iron and steel changes have been made for his particular friends in the province of Ontario, and he knows it.

Mr. WHITE: I fail entirely to follow my hon. friend. He is a member of this House; and, if he has any criticisms to make of the Budget proposals in respect to the tariff, it is his duty to make them.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am making them.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend is doing so in a very vague fashion. He says: You are favouring some of your friends in the province of Ontario, and, incidentally, you are affording some advantage to the Steel Company of Sydney. Does my hon. friend object to the imposition of a duty on wire rods? If he does, he should say so. I have not understood him to object to that. As nearly as I can make out the burden of his complaint against me, it is that, in some fashion, which he does not deign to particularize, I have overlooked one or more companies; and that, in the tariff resolutions which I have brought down, the beneficiaries are an Ontario concern, as he puts it, and incidentally the Dominion Iron and Steel Company is pretty important company. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) during his term of office paid bounties of about $15,000,000 to establish, amongst others, the steel plant at Sydney. Speaking for myself, I made no objection to that. I said that I thought bounties were justified to call into being large industries of the kind in question. Now my hon. friend has made this resolution, which relates to drawback, the occasion of an attack upon me for not doing more for the steel industry; and yet he does not particularize. I have reason to complain that he does not bring to my attention any particulars as to what he has in mind. If he has in mind the raising of the duty on steel billets and pig-iron, I will let him fight it out with my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark), who will do the job very much better than I can. My hon. friends on the other side say: Let us abolish the duty on agricultural implements; and my hon. friend says by implication: Let us raise the duty on raw materials for the manufacture of agricultural implements. He is what may be described as an incidental or casual or occasional Conservative. We on this side call ourselves Liberal-Conservatives. My hon. friend passes occasionally as a Conservative-Liberal; yet he has not the courage of his convictions, and does not say frankly in this House what he wants. If he is in favour of raising the tariff on steel products, let him say so, instead of making these veiled charges that I have overlooked certain of his friends—because that is really what is back of it all—and have favoured certain others engaged in the steel industry. As a matter of fact, I have given the most careful and painstaking attention to the whole matter of the steel schedule; and I believe the steel industry, as a whole, is quite satisfied with what has been done. My hon. friend knows that, to raise the duty upon pig-iron and upon steel billets necessitates a revision of the entire steel schedule. It means the raising of the duty on agricultural implements, stoves, castings and everything into which steel and iron enters as a base product. He knows this is not a year of general revision. This is a year in which certain readjustments of the tariff have had to be made, for the reasons I have given, namely, so far as the steel industry is concerned, because the steel companies have had to broaden or change the basis of their production to meet the altered conditions, as I explained in my Budget speech and in Committee of Ways and Means when the resolutions relating to the steel tariff were under consideration. My hon. friend makes an attack to-day that he failed to make on the occasion of the discussion on the Budget or in the discussion of the resolution in the Committee of Ways and Means. My hon. friend does not understand—at least, if he does, he desires not to be understood as understanding. My hon. friend says: If he can buy cheaper in the United States, why will he not buy all his supply in the United States? I will tell him why. Take the case of a company in Hamilton, let us say, manufacturing both for export and for domestic consumption. They are entitled to a drawback upon duties paid in respect of foreign pig-iron entering into their exported products; they are not entitled to a drawback in respect of duties upon imported pig-iron entering into their products consumed at home, with the exceptions which I have indicated to my hon. friend from Halifax. That company can buy cheaper in the United States if they are getting the drawback, but not if they have to pay the duty without receiving a drawback. In that situation, the question arises whether it will pay them to import all their pig-iron by reason of the fact that they get a drawback upon that part of it, which they export. Let us assume that with the drawback allowed they can buy in the United States more cheaply than in Hamilton. It does not follow that they can buy all their pig-iron more cheaply than in Hamilton; if they could, of course they would not buy in Hamilton. Even if the manufactures can buy some of their pig-iron as cheaply in Canada as they can buy it in the United States, after payment of the freight and duty upon it, under the regulations that now exist it would pay them to buy all their pig-ron in the United States, both for home and for foreign trade. Under the amendment which I am introducing to the Customs Act they will receive a drawback in respect of the pig-iron which they import from the United States, provided they export an amount of manufactured iron equivalent to the amount imported.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the hon. minister say that they can buy pig-iron in Canada more cheaply in Canada than they can buy in the United States and pay the duty?

Mr. WHITE. Not necessarily. There is usually a parity of price. Suppose the agricultural implement manufacturer in Hamilton could buy in Pittsburg at a price which, freight and duty paid, would lay the pig-iron down in Hamilton at $15 a ton. In that case, the Hamilton price would be about $15 a ton. It might be that they would lower the price to get the business. As a general thing, they cut a little below the price of the American product, plus the freight and duty, to get the market.

Mr. CARROLL: As the minister is changing the law with regard to drawback, I think he should change it so as to give no drawback. If he intends that the Canadian consumer shall use pig-iron produced in Canada, the obvious way is to refuse to give any drawback, and give no advantage on the exported article either. Suppose that this change is some advantage to the Canadian manufacturer of pig-iron, it is no advantage to the Canadian consumer. The only persons who get advantage, according to the minister, is the manufacturer who imports from abroad and the outside consumer of the manufactured article.

Mr. WHITE: This relates only to export products.

Mr. CARROLL: Exactly so. The minister tells us that this change is designed to benefit the iron and steel manufacturers of Canada. But if that is his intention, I say he should give no drawback at all. If it is a benefit to the iron and steel producers that the user of the material should not be allowed a drawback on goods sold for home consumption, it would be a double benefit if no drawback were allowed in any case. Does the minister follow me?

[Mr. W. T. White.]

Mr. WHITE: I follow you, but I do not agree with you.

Mr. CARROLL: The minister agrees with me that it would be more to the advantage of the Canadian manufacturers of iron and steel if no drawback were allowed. If the object is to benefit the producer of iron and steel, why not then do away with the drawback altogether? When this resolution was first brought down, I said in my remarks on the Budget that the change would be injurious to the manufacturer of iron. If the minister is right in his contention, I can see where there is some advantage. But I go further and say that this change does not benefit the Canadian consumer, so I think the minister has made a mistake in not doing away with drawbacks altogether, thus making the manufacturers buy pig-iron altogether from the producers of iron in Canada.

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend surely is not serious, or, if serious, he has not considered the question. His suggestion is that there should be no drawback of duties paid in respect of raw materials entering into products of Canadian manufacturers exported from Canada. Let me point out to what that would lead. The Canadian manufacturer, of course, in respect of his export business, is in competition with the manufacturers of the world. Now, let me ask my hon. friend, who is a good business man, to suppose for a moment that he is a manufacturer of agricultural implements which he is selling in the markets of the world in competition with similar manufacturers of the United States. And suppose he received no drawback on pig-iron bought in the United States. The agricultural implement maker in the United States would have his pig-iron at about $2.25 or $2.50 a ton cheaper than my hon. friend would have his pig-iron if he were forced to buy in Canada. The result would be that because the cost of manufacture is so much less to the American manufacturer, my hon. friend could not compete in the markets of the world with the manufacturer of the United States, and he would have no export business at all. The provision as to drawback does not relate only to iron and steel; it relates to all raw material imported by Canadian manufacturers in respect of their export business, and the reason is that either they must be placed on an equality with foreign manufacturers, who get their raw material cheaper, or they cannot compete. Surely that must be perfectly plain to my hon. friend. If they are not put on that same footing, the pig-iron manufacturer of Canada, who occasionally—but seldom, I admit—can sell his products to the manufacturer, even in respect of his export business, would be in a worse position to manufacture for export; in fact he would not be able to carry on business successfully at all.

Mr. CARROLL: What about manufactured articles exported to Great Britain? Does the Canadian manufacturer get his drawback there?

Mr. WHITE: Supposing the Canadian manufacturer is competing with the British manufacturer in the market of free trade Great Britain. The British manufacturer gets his raw material free; the Canadian manufacturer has to pay for whatever raw material he imports to Canada a price determined to a certain extent by the duty payable upon it. The Canadian manufacturer, therefore, could not compete with the British manufacturer at all. It is absolutely necessary that the Canadian manufacturer should have a drawback in respect of raw material if he wishes to be placed upon an equal footing with the foreign competitor.

Mr. CARROLL: When the minister made his statement to the House he said that this was to be done for the advantage of the steel manufacturers of this country. I want to draw the minister out and show that he is also benefiting the manufacturers of agricultural implements and of all other things that are manufactured from iron. If he had told the House that when he was making his statement he would have told the whole truth.

Mr. WHITE: Every manufacturer in Canada to-day gets a drawback in respect of the raw material that he imports or uses in his export business, so that there is absolutely no charge in that regard. The Massey-Harris Company and the International Harvester Company buy practically all their pig-iron in the United States, for the reasons which I have given, and what I desire to do in this legislation is to enable them to buy some of their pig-iron in Canada, and to prevent the pig-iron manufacturers of Canada from losing business by reason of the regulation of the Customs Department, which at present allows to manufacturers in respect of their export products a drawback upon commodities to the percentage that the imported American pig-iron bears to the amount of the American and the Canadian pig-iron used in their product, both for domestic and foreign export trade.

Mr. CARROLL: The minister does not suppose they are going to buy it in Canada if they can get it cheaper in the United States?

Mr. WHITE: No.

Mr. CARROLL: They can get it cheaper in the United States with the duty as it is now.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Does my hon. friend think this regulation will help the export trade to the United States of manufactured iron goods?

Mr. WHITE: No.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: It is not meant to do that?

Mr. WHITE: I do not expect that that will be its effect.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I would like to understand exactly the attitude of the minister in the matter. He seems to be in favour of the export of these manufactured iron goods into the United States.

Mr. WHITE: If my hon. friend asks whether I am in favour of manufacture in Canada for export to the United States, I say, of course.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I am surprised, because when I want some beneficial arrangement on behalf of the western wheat growers I get sermons the length of the minister's arm preached to me about the advantages of the home market. Why should not the hon. minister and his friends be content with the home market? Is not the sauce for the western goose good enough for the Ontario gander?

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. minister complains that I did not make the few remarks which I did at some other time. I want to tell my hon. friend that I will trouble the House whenever it suits me to do so, not when it may happen to please my hon. friend. I said—and I repeat it—that in dealing with this iron and steel schedule during the present session of Parliament, the minister has had in view, with the single exception of the wire rod industry in Nova Scotia, solely the interests of some of his friends in the province of Ontario. My hon. friend did not venture to question that statement; he did not meet that proposition and cannot meet it, because it is absolutely correct. This is not his time, he says, for a general revision of the tariff. My hon. friend knows that if he did not lead certain iron and steel people in this country after 1911 to believe that the alleged anomalies of the tariff with regard to iron and steel, would be removed at an early day, some of his colleagues did. My hon friend knows that the iron and steel people in this country, particularly in Nova Scotia, were led to believe by some of his colleagues that the bounty which expired in 1911 with regard to pig-iron and certain other products would be renewed.

Mr. WHITE: Is my hon. friend complaining that they were not renewed?

Mr. MACDONALD: I am discussing my hon. friend's position as Minister of Finance and his relation to the iron and steel people; I will discuss my own attitude when it suits me to do so. My hon. friend need not to be alarmed about my attitude in this matter; when the responsibility is placed upon hon. gentlemen on this side they will give to Canada, in regard not only to iron and steel but to other items as well, such a reasonable tariff that Canada will prosper as she did when the Liberals were in power. They will not, as the hon. gentlemen have done, dilly-dally with the question for nearly three years, creating business uncertainty throughout the land, a lack of public confidence here and abroad, and a condition in Canada where in almost every industrial centre manufacturing establishments are closed and workingmen are walking the streets. It is the attitude of my hon. friend and the performances of his party that have to be considered. I repeat that in 1911 the iron and steel people of this country were led to believe that the bounties on iron and steel, which expired in that year, would be renewed.

Mr. J. D. REID: Who did that?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend knows who did it; my hon. friend knows that some of his colleagues made representations to men connected with the iron and steel industry. My hon. friends know what happened last year and the year before. They know the expectations that were raised in regard to this question and how they proved to be illusory. My hon. friend had not the nerve to tackle this question, and now he says: Oh, this is not the time for a general revision of the tariff; wait until two or three years have passed, and we have dealt with this matter; then come around and criticise us when we have dealt with the whole thing. I say to my hon. friend now that in so far as he has dealt with the iron and steel tariff he has dealt with it on local lines, dealt with it in such a manner that the men who expected a great deal from him had a right to be disappointed and are disappointed.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I do not wish to interrupt the dispute between the hon. members from Ontario and Nova Scotia, but I am anxious to expedite the non-contentious business in order to get to the really contentious business of the session, and if possible reach an end. I only intervened to ask one of these hon. gentlemen who are conducting this interesting dispute to explain to me, as a resident of one of the other seven provinces of Canada, how the policy which they both seem to support, if it is applied only to the locality in which they are particularly interested, ever came to have or can in any way deserve the term 'national' as applied to it. I do not care which hon. gentleman gives me the explanation.

Mr. W. T. WHITE: Perhaps I should say: after you my dear Alphonse, because my hon. friend is so much more eloquent than I am. I do not want to mar the humour of my hon. friend's remarks by any answer, and I am sure he will overlook the fact that an answer is not given. With regard to what the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has said, he may know of some promises having been given with respect to bounties. Personally I know of none.

Mr. MACDONALD: I said they were led to believe.

Mr. WHITE: I do not know by whom they were led to believe. As far as I know, any promises that this party have given have been lived up to.

Mr. MACDONALD: All?

Mr. WHITE: I am quite satisfied that no tariff promises were made on the eve of any election; at least, on the occasion of the election of 1911; I am not so sure about the promises of 1896. My hon. friend seems to be disappointed at something I have refrained from doing, and yet he does not put forward what that something is. I have a very great respect for my hon. friend and for his ability, and any time he will rise in the House and tell me precisely what he has to suggest in the way of increased duties I will say to him what I do to every member of the House or the public who bring matters of that kind to my attention: I shall be glad to give it careful and serious consideration. The complaint I have against my hon. friend is that while he does not agree with what I have done he does not make any suggestions which indicate his own views. If at any time he will tell me what he complains about I shall be glad to meet that complaint as far as I am able. He has put forward no representations; he has not asked for any increased duties. If he did he would find himself in conflict with distinguished gentlemen whom I see on the other side of the House, his friends and colleagues. Under these circumstances I must continue to do what I have done: administer the tariff according to my own best judgment—in view of the facts before me. I repeat, if my hon. friend has any specific complaint to make that we have not raised duties in respect of the products of any particular industry, local or otherwise, in which he is particularly interested, if he can tell me in specific language what he is complaining about, I shall be glad to take any statement and any representations he may make under my careful consideration.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is very good of my hon. friend, but he has not met my point.

Mr. McKENZIE: Together with the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) I am particularly interested in the manufacture of iron and steel, especially pig-iron, which is under discussion this afternoon. I would say to the minister that the producers of pig-iron in Canada are quite capable of supplying the legitimate demands of the manufacturers of Canada. I do not pretend to be an expert on questions of duty as applied to the subject matter before the committee, but, generally, I make the statement that I believe the large producers in Canada are to-day capable of producing pig-iron sufficient to supply the Canadian market, and if we are capable of supplying the market we are equally capable of supplying it with a first-class article. I speak particularly for the Dominion Steel Company at Sydney, and the Nova Scotia Iron and Steel Company, operating in the county which I have the honour to represent. Taking for granted that we have a supply in Canada of a first-class article sufficient to meet the demand, the question is why would not that article be purchased if it be purchasable at about the price at which the same article can be purchased from the United States? The theory of the National Policy of which we heard so much, with which I have grown up and of which I profess to know something, was that protection would enable us to manufacture our own products for our own use, and that local competition would give our people the manufactured article at a price not any higher than that of the foreign market. If that theory were carried out, then, of course, protection would have its uses. But we had to contend with such things as combines, when there was no local legitimate competition. When combines arose this local competition which was promised to us was destroyed and so we have not got the National Policy in this particular sense, and some other remedy should be applied. I wish to point out to the minister that I cannot see the difference between a drawback and free admission, as far as the article upon which the drawback is given is concerned. I think it is as broad as it is long. If a man has to go into the United States or any other foreign country and import a thousand tons of pig-iron, paying duty of $2.50 a ton, knowing that under certain conditions he will get that money back, it is tantamount to free trade. If protection is worth anything at all, and of course so far as my own industries are concerned and because I understand those industries well, I am in favour of protection of the industry of the country from which I come—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am always pleased to get a cheer from my hon. friends opposite. I cannot understand why I get a cheer on this occasion, because I have spoken in this House a great many times in the last ten or twelve years and when iron and steel and coal were under discussion I was always a tried and true protectionist. There is no reason why I should be particularly congratulated upon my stand to-day, it is an old stand and until conditions are changed it is the position to which I propose to adhere. The fault I have to find with the policy of the Minister of Finance is that he gives this drawback at all. If protection is good, if it is given for the purpose of encouraging the production of pig-iron in Canada, why give us the will o' the wisp of giving us protection and taking it away the moment it becomes of any service to us? I think the protection should stand there for the Canadian pig-iron producer, particularly when we produce a first class article and lay it down for the same price that pig-iron can be got elsewhere. In this way we would encourage the production of manufactured goods in Canada and encourage our own manufacturers to supply the local market. If the local producer's horizon is widened, if the places where he can sell in the West and elsewhere become more numerous, he is encouraged to go more fully into the manufacture of his article, which in turn encourages the parties who are producing the raw material. I do not profess to understand the nice mechanism of the resolution before the House. I find it almost as difficult to understand as Mr. Hennessy found Mr. Dooley's explanation of Kruger's franchise. I do not for a moment say that my hon. friend is of the same calibre or ingenuity as Kruger, but I find this resolution extremely difficult to follow. One thing, however, I do understand; I think it is for the purpose of making it easier for the Canadian manufacturer to get his raw material from the United States, and while he professes to be paying the duty, he is getting it back. Another thing, it encourages the home manufacturer to produce articles to be sent out of the country instead of to be sold in Canada, where they would have the effect of making things cheaper for our own people. In conclusion, my idea is that the $2.50, which we are told is a protection to the pig-iron producer, should mean something and stay there as a permanent protection.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. WHITE thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 171, to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General), the House went into Committee on Bill No. 146, to amend the Civil Service Act, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

On section 1—salaries increased from $500 to $600; annual increase from $50 to $100.

Mr. PELLETIER: This Bill was explained when we were in Committee on the resolution. This Bill affects the clerks in city post offices, the offices of the post office inspectors, the offices of the superintendents of the railway mail service and the money order exchange offices. It raises the initial salary from $500 to $600, and it raises the annual increase from $50 to $100. When the resolution was in Committee it had the concurrence of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux).

Mr. GRAHAM: How many employees will this affect, and how much money does it amount to in the aggregate?

Mr. PELLETIER: I have sent for the deputy minister, who has that information for me.

Mr. KNOWLES: I understand that in the West, when a man's salary reached a certain stage, his living allowance dropped; but I also understand that the Government has amended that so that a man's living allowance never recedes. Is that done by this Bill?

Mr. PELLETIER: No; what we have arranged has been done by Order in Council.

Mr. MORPHY: I notice that the railway mail clerks are not included in this Bill?

Mr. PELLETIER: No, they come under another Bill.

Mr. HENDERSON: What class of officials does this affect?

Mr. PELLETIER: The clerks in city post offices, the offices of the post office inspectors, the offices of the superintendents of the railway mail service, and the money order exchange offices; in fact, it covers every clerk in the outside service except the railway mail clerks, who will be provided for in a Bill which comes after this.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is there not another class not included in city post offices or the offices of post office inspectors? For instance, there are certain post offices that are created city offices, although they may not be in cities. Then, there is another class of post office which does not come under that heading.

Mr. PELLETIER: Like Brantford or Brockville, for instance; that is what we call a semi-staff office.

Mr. GRAHAM: It will not affect the standing of those clerks?

Mr. PELLETIER: The semi-staff offices are on the same footing, as far as the payment of the clerks is concerned, as the city post offices.

Mr. GRAHAM: By whom are the clerks engaged?

Mr. PELLETIER: They are engaged by the department.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is the staff at Renfrew engaged by the department or by the postmaster?

Mr. PELLETIER: That is a revenue office.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will this Bill have the effect of saying to the postmaster there: You must pay a certain salary to your staff?

Mr. PELLETIER: These people in Renfrew will not be affected by this Bill, because the Renfrew office is a revenue office. Brockville is a semi-staff office and Toronto a city office.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is nothing in this Bill for the aid of employees at Renfrew or Arnprior?

Mr. PELLETIER: No, these people are employed by the postmaster himself, and he pays them out of his revenue.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Is it the intention of the minister to create Medicine Hat and Lethbridge city post offices? At present they do not rank as such.

Mr. PELLETIER: These are semi-staff offices.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Is it the intention of the department to place them in the rank of city post offices?

Mr. PELLETIER: The question is under consideration.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will there be anything in any Bill that will affect the staff in revenue offices?

Mr. PELLETIER: Not in this Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: I know it is not in this Bill; but is it in the mind of the Postmaster General? Is he thinking of doing something of that kind? A clerk may do just as much work in a post office in a town the size of Renfrew or Arnprior as another clerk will do in an office that is on a different status. There are certain post offices where the salaries are fixed and the appointments are made by the department. In post offices in towns like Renfrew or Arnprior the postmaster gets a certain salary from the revenue and engages his own staff. There seems to be somewhat of an anomaly. In one post office a clerk may be working for $400 a year; whereas in a post office in a neighbouring town, where possibly an equal amount of business is done, a clerk may be getting $600 a year from the department. I think there should be some way in which the salaries of the staff can be regulated, even though the revenues alter.

Mr. PELLETIER: The whole difference is this, that in the revenue offices we do not control the salaries at all; the employees are not our employees; they are engaged and paid by the postmaster. We have, therefore, nothing to say as to what their salaries shall be. If a post office were not kept properly, if the postmaster had not the necessary number of employees, we would hear complaints about it and probably would have to interfere; but so long as we hear no complaints, we take it for granted that the office is properly equipped and run to the satisfaction of the public, and we have nothing to say about the salaries which the postmaster pays to his employees.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does the department never intimate to the postmaster whom he ought to employ?

Mr. PELLETIER: No.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—minimum salaries:

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the length of the probationary period?

Mr. PELLETIER: Six months.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will these salaries date from the 1st day of April, or is that merely the qualification of the employment?

Mr. PELLETIER: The salaries will date from the first day of the financial year.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—temporary clerks:

Mr. GRAHAM: What is that?

Mr. PELLETIER: It is the same thing —to put the initial salary at $600 instead of $500.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

On the motion of Mr. Pelletier for the third reading of the Bill:

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has my hon. friend not considered the advisability of bringing all these outside clerks under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. PELLETIER: That will not come under this Bill.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But has not the Government considered, as a matter of policy, the bringing of the outside civil servants in those large offices under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. PELLETIER: We cannot do anything for the Post Office Department unless we do it for all the departments.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is to be the policy of the Government in the future?

Mr. PELLETIER: That is under consideration for the moment.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We have discussed this question on several occasions, and I have always understood that the day is not far distant when the Government may bring those officers under the Civil Service Commission. It would be in the best interest of the service and in the interest of the Government to do so.

Mr. BORDEN: It might not be practicable to bring them all under the Civil Service Commission in the near future, but some of them might be brought. Probably that matter will be discussed in connection with the Civil Service Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General) the House went into Committee on Bill No. 147, to amend the Post Office Act, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 1—Revised Statutes, c. 66, amended:

Mr. GRAHAM: This is an amendment to the Revised Statutes of 1906. Will the Postmaster General tell us briefly what changes are to be effected?

Mr. PELLETIER: The main object of the first change, that is, in paragraph (e), is to make it quite clear that the right of looking at newspapers, parcels and so on, is absolutely confined to those, and that there is no right to open letters. The section, as it stands at present, as my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) knows, leaves the question open as to whether or not it is right to open letters. I want to make it quite clear that that right does not exist.

We are amending the clause, so that there is no possibility of doubt, by inserting the words 'except in the case of letters.' So we keep the right to open all other mailable matter, to carry out the purpose and intention of the Act, but making it quite clear that there is no right whatever to open letters. There are other matters of detail, but this is the main object of this clause.

Mr. CARROLL: Is the regulation making it compulsory to register letters containing money still in force?

Mr. PELLETIER: There is no obligation at all upon anybody to register letters. But we have complaints from a great many people that they had sent money through the mail in letters not registered, and that their money has been stolen. My hon. friend knows that it is impossible to follow letters which are not registered, and people are subject to loss of money on a great many occasions in this way. At the same time, we have found that it is a great temptation for clerks in some of the offices to examine unregistered letters and some of these clerks are very apt to guess that there might be money in these letters. We have found that it was therefore a suitable thing to try and protect the public, and also save these clerks from temptation by asking the people to have their letters registered if there is money in them. But we do not exact that. We have a regulation under which we impress upon the public that they should not send money in letters, containing over a dollar, without taking the precaution of registering them. But it is not compulsory.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I suppose this amendment is made in connection with the regulations concerning the parcel post. The department is aware that people are sending all sorts of things through the new channel, and there must be some regulation, in order to prevent, for instance, chemicals and things of that kind being sent through the mails. I do not know whether the Postmaster General has seen the item in the Montreal paper that white rats were sent by mail, and that the department decided that the white rats ought to pass. I believe that the regulation, provided that letters are not interfered with, is desirable. The Postmaster General should have the authority to describe what kind of material should be handled. As regards the sending of coins in letters, I cannot agree with the criticism that has been made against the regulation of the department a few days ago. I remember when I was Postmaster General, some institutions, especially religious institutions, were being constantly robbed of small sums that were sent to them in letters. It is very easy to detect whether an envelope contains a coin, and I know of one or two institutions in Ottawa—and the Postmaster General knows, too—whose money some clerks had been tempted into taking for months and years. Sometimes the money is lost through the breaking of the envelopes, and complaints are made to the post office. It is better, under the circumstances, that the department should give the public notice that it is taking great risk in sending money in coins in that matter. And the mode of registration is so easy, and after all so cheap, that the public should register their letters when sending money through the mails.

Mr. CARROLL: I should be against any compulsory order to people to register their mail. I had correspondence with people in Cape Breton on this subject. They interpreted this as being compulsory, and I may tell the Postmaster General that some country postmasters have assumed it to be compulsory.

Mr. PELLETIER: My hon. friend may tell people who ask him for information on the subject that it is not compulsory. The regulation is merely an effort to persuade the people of what they should do, but there is no sanction to it except that we hope to bring the people to the right point of view in this matter, as so well expressed by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) a moment ago.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Another point I wish to discuss with my hon. friend. Of course, the secrecy of correspondence is kept; that is a privilege which the public enjoy, high or low. At the same time, there is a regulation in the Post Office Department, which permits the Postmaster General to open letters in the case of what is called fraud order. The section under discussion would not affect that right on the part of the Postmaster General. The Postmaster General was away the other day—he was in Quebec I believe—when my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) brought to the notice of the Minister of Finance the case of some lotteries which were making use of the mails in order to extract as much money as possible from the gullible people. He cited instances in his own county, in which large sums of money had been taken from the people by this improper use of the mails. My hon. friend (Mr. Pelletier) can refer to the report of that debate, and he will see that in one case at least the department some years ago took drastic measures to prevent a lottery from using the mails. I think the hon. Postmaster General will do well to look into it and prevent the improper use of the mail by lotteries.

Mr. PELLETIER: I have had the Deputy Postmaster General take a note of the fact referred to. He will look into it. We are doing this every week or two—stopping fraudulent practices by mail. We will take special care to refer to the matter of which the hon. gentleman has spoken.

Mr. KNOWLES: I desire to call the attention of the Postmaster General to a matter which may not have been mentioned in the House before. During past years the gentlemen who represent the people in this House have had the privilege while in the city of Ottawa of franking parcels sent through the mail. The hon. minister has recently adopted a system of parcel post, upon which I shall not make any comment at this moment, but why that should have been made the occasion of taking away the privilege which the representatives of the people formerly enjoyed is something which I do not understand. If there is any reason why the privilege of the franking of parcels should be taken away from members of the House, that reason existed, of course, before the parcel post system came into operation. There are many occasions when it is to the advantage of the constituents whom we represent that we should have that privilege. Very often we visit the Experimental Farm and are favoured with a sample of wheat or oats which we wish to send to our constituents, and now we have to pay postage upon any parcel containing such samples. I raise the question not as asking a favour; I suppose that any hon. gentleman can put his hand in his pocket and pay postage, but it is a matter of public policy, and, so far I have not learned any reason why we should not have the same privileges that we formerly enjoyed.

Mr. PELLETIER: My hon. friend says that members of the House should not be deprived of the privileges that they had before. The Post Office Department has deprived itself of the very privilege to which my hon. friend refers. When the parcel post system was put into operation on February 10 last, we decided to make no exemption from the payment of postage; the Prime Minister of Canada and the Postmaster General have to pay postage on all parcels sent through the mails. Our experience shows that this is the best policy. The franking privilege has not been taken away from members of Parliament; they may continue to frank literature sent by book post as well as anything in the shape or form of a letter.

Mr. KNOWLES: If anything is mailed in an envelope the franking privilege may be used?

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Many members who have clerical staffs in their home towns have been in the habit of sending home envelopes to be addressed by their stenographers or secretaries, who have the voters' lists and other information at hand; and the envelopes are returned to Ottawa when the work is completed. Under present conditions members have to send these envelopes home by express or by parcel post. I think the taking away of the franking privilege in regard to parcel post is not right. A great deal of the work we do while in this city we do because we are members; a great deal of the expense we incur is incurred because we are the people's representatives. I do not think the minister intended to be small, but I think it was a small piece of business to take this privilege away from members. The hon. Postmaster General says that the Post Office Department has deprived itself of the privilege. To say the least, that is a shallow argument, for my hon. friend knows that with the department it is a mere matter of book-keeping. The department buys the stamps and gets the money that is paid for them; of course, no money is paid out, so that it is just the same as franking. The amount is credited to revenue, of course, and this helps to increase the revenue and to bolster up a surplus, although in these hard times there should not be any surplus.

Mr. BELAND: Why should members of Parliament be asked to pay postage upon parcels addressed to them which do not carry any or sufficient postage stamps?

[Mr. Pelletier.]

Mr. PELLETIER: That is a regulation that applies to everybody. The postmaster should not receive a parcel unless the proper amount of postage is paid and the necessary stamps are affixed thereon. The same thing applies to letters. When a letter arrives at the point of destination, if the necessary stamps have not been put on it, the man who receives it has to pay double the amount of the postage due.

Mr. BELAND: It appears that postmasters in the country receive parcels which are addressed to members of Parliament and are not properly franked. When the members receive these parcels, they are asked sometimes to pay as much as forty cents for postage due. I think this is an injustice. If the postmasters in the country have not received instructions to refuse all parcels addressed to members of Parliament which do not bear the proper frank, we should not be asked to pay the cost of transporting them. I was asked to pay forty cents, I think it was, on a parcel. I did not know where it came from, and I refused to pay the amount. In this case it turned out to be a model sent to me for the patent office. A month later the gentlemen who sent me the model, discovering that it had been lost, came to me and explained the whole matter. Certainly the postmaster should not have received the parcel, and I think that in such cases we should not be asked to pay postage.

Mr. PELLETIER: My deputy informs me that the postmasters have been duly informed of their duty in this respect. Probably some of them overlooked the instructions. We will see that this is remedied.

Mr. EMMERSON: It has not been explained to me why the franking privilege with regard to parcel post has been taken away from members. As an individual member of Parliament I do not ask for the privilege of the free use of parcel post, but I have been a member of this House for fifteen years, and certain small parcels are frequently sent me by constituents. Why should the privilege be withdrawn because of the establishment of parcel post? If the motive is economy, I do not think the Post Office Department is as economical in other directions. If the principle is wrong, withdraw the franking privilege from members; but surely no good reasons have been shown why the privilege heretofore accorded should be withdrawn at this time.

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not object to this discussion, because it is only fair that people should have a chance to ventilate that grievance, if it is one, on the floor of this House; but I may say that this subject does not come within the scope of this Bill. I shall look further into it, and when the question comes up on the Estimates I shall be glad to say more to my hon. friends.

Mr. EMMERSON: Perhaps the minister will note that in subsection (c) he is given power to establish rates of postage on all mailable matter not being letters. That is with respect to a regulation and he has made the application. Nowhere under the law has the privilege been withdrawn. If the hon. member can point out to me where there has been a change in the law I shall stand corrected; but the mere establishment of the parcel post system in no way changes the law as respects the franking privilege enjoyed by members of Parliament since 1867.

Mr. EDWARDS: I would ask if there has really been any departure from the principle which was always recognized in this House? Has there been any taking away from the members of any privilege? I have always understood that when the House was in session a member of Parliament had a right to frank letters, books and certain parcels from this House; but I have always understood that the general public had the same privilege of sending letters, parcels, books, etc., to any member of this House. In what respect has the principle been violated? We enjoy as members exactly the same privileges as the general public enjoy. Frequently I have had reference made to the franking privilege of members. My answer has been: You possess the same privilege I possess; while the House is in session you have the right to send any mailable matter to any member of Parliament; or to any department of Government at any time free. While the House is in session we have the privilege of sending mail free so that we are on exactly the same footing with the general public. If we had the right of franking parcels from this House, which right was not enjoyed by the general public, it would be a departure from the principle which has always hitherto obtained.

Mr. KNOWLES: The principle which the hon. member lays down is now as it always has been, namely that the member and the constituents in the country have the same right. But to-day neither has the same right that was enjoyed before a certain day in February when the minister changed the whole system, as I stated, in an ultra vires fashion. I have had constituents send me samples of their soil, from different points in my very large riding, to submit to the proper department and ascertain the properties of the soil and the way in which it should be treated. I have had men send me ore. The public have had the privilege of sending such things, but they have not that privilege any longer; they must now pay postage to swell the revenue of the Post Office Department. The only justification for taking away that privilege is penury, economy; and as long as the inspector of the Post Office Department at Sherbrooke can go gallivanting around the country in a $4,500 Packard car, I do not think that they need to economize as much as the minister says in reference to parcel post. I think the minister should reconsider this and not economize on this little matter, but restore to us, as the peoples' representatives, the privileges of the parcel post. I would like to know what the hon. member for Selkirk thinks of this. He is close to the Cabinet, not in it, but I hope he soon will be.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have read on several occasions in the press a rumour that the Canadian rate of postage on newspapers was to be increased. I do not suppose this will be carried out. The rate is one-quarter of a cent per pound now. Not very long ago I learned that there were loud complaints against newspapers abusing that privilege. Papers were published at one cent per number which did not contain the average number of pages of editorial matter but which contained more or less advertising and stories. The Postmaster General has the right according to the Post Office Act, to decide what is a newspaper and what is not a newspaper, and I daresay he will have to exercise his judgment, because there are these loud complaints from newspapers that their rivals in the business are selling newspapers in Montreal, for instance, at one cent a copy, the annual subscription being $3.00, while the same newspapers, very heavy, containing any amount of advertising and stories, are sold all over the Maritime provinces, after they have passed a certain zone, at only $1 a year. It seems unfair to the regular newspapers that they should have to face such competition. Whilst I am speaking about newspapers, is the minister at present discussing with the British Postmaster General the question of renewing the post office arrangement which I made in 1907 with the then British Postmaster General, Right Hon. Sydney Buxton, by which the rate of postage on British magazines and newspapers was reduced from four pence a pound to one penny a pound, or from eight cents to two cents a pound in our currency? The arrangement was made because at that time many British organizations and leagues were clamouring for a more widespread circulation of British and imperial news with the dominions. At that time British newspapers and magazines had a very limited circulation in the dominions because they were handicapped by the heavy postage, and as a result here in Canada we were flooded with American newspapers and magazines. The question of increasing the circulation of British publications in Canada came up at that time, notably in the Canadian Senate under the lead of the late Sir George Drummond. I decided to take up the matter with the British Postmaster General, and we came to an agreement whereby British magazines and newspapers should pay two cents a pound instead of eight cents from the British post office to Liverpool, the transit charge from Liverpool being borne by the Canadian post office. The result has been very gratifying indeed. I remember standing one day on the wharf at Liverpool a few months after that agreement came into force, and I asked the captain of the steamer to give me an idea of the increase that had taken place in the number of British magazines and newspapers coming to Canada. I was simply amazed to see the number of baskets and bags filled with newspapers and magazines as a result of that agreement. The figures have since been published, and are very gratifying indeed. In 1906, the year before that agreement came into force, the weight of British publications sent to Canada was comparatively infinitesimal, but the reduction in postage which took place in 1907 has borne fruit as follows: In 1908 the weight of British publications coming to Canada was 2,328,000 pounds; in 1909, 2,910,000 pounds; in 1910, 3,836,000 pounds; in 1911, 4,747,000 pounds; in 1912, 5,785,000 pounds. Fancy what this means to this country where we have so many immigrants from the British Isles, especially in the West. By this arrangement, the newly-arrived immigrant can continue to receive papers from home at a very cheap rate; and besides that, not only our newspapers but our clubs, our associations, and our public men can afford to receive the news from the right centre. It was stated on many occasions when we were discussing in this House the reduction of the cable rates that nearly all our papers both in the West and the East received tainted news from American sources. Personally, I do not believe that the news service is 9 p.m. tainted, but yet if it comes via New York the news has first been addressed to New York papers, or perhaps to Chicago, or San Francisco, through American agencies and for American consumption, and then it is served afterwards to the Canadian public. The difference in the news may not be great, but when you compare it with the British dailies that arrive a week or two afterwards you find quite a difference; and that is why, on both sides of the House, we have been endeavouring for the last few years to get better postal regulations and cheaper telegraphic communication between the mother country and Canada. I was reading the other day a letter in the London Times of Monday, 6th April, signed by Evelyn Wrench. I dare say Evelyn is a feminine name but there are so many strange names in English that I am not quite sure.

Mr. GEORGE E. FOSTER: It is not a feminine name in that case.

Mr. LEMIEUX: At all events it matters little—so much the better if it is feminine. With your leave, Mr. Chairman, I will read a few extracts from that letter because the correspondent has travelled in the dominions since the arrangement of 1907 was made, and it is interesting to know what his experience has been. The article is headed, 'Canadian Magazine Post'—'Great Imperial Issue,' and reads as follows:

To the editor of the Times:

Sir,—So much of our attention is focussed on problems at home at the present moment that there is a danger of the non-renewal of the Canadian Magazine Post Agreement, a matter of vital importance to the empire, being overlooked.

I might say, en passant, that when my hon. friend the present Postmaster General saw that the ocean transit reached a high figure he insisted that the British post office should share in the cost. I do not know what he has decided, but no doubt he will give us his views in a few moments. The letter continues:

And yet it is not too much to say that the question of Canada's ultimate destiny and the real fate of the empire—that is, of the self-governing dominions—will be decided, not in Downing Street, but in the prairie provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and in British Columbia. Can the hundreds of thousands of Americans and foreigners who have taken up residence in the 'last best West' during the past twelve years and the millions of future settlers be made to realize that Canada's destiny lies as a self-governing nation within the Britannic system and not outside?

That is the crux of the Imperial problem, and those who are most closely in touch with Canada and Canadian conditions feel that one of the most useful pieces of empire work which can be performed is the sending to Canada of the best English literature and the publication of accurate British cable news. Both are equally important. No one can over-estimate the benefits resulting from the Canadian Magazine Post Agreement of 1907, entered upon by Mr. Lemieux and Sir Sydney Buxton. On every visit to Canada subsequent to that date one could not fail to be impressed with the enormous increase in the sale of high-class English publications. Before 1907 it was the exception rather than the rule to find English newspapers and periodicals in the Canadian home. In those days Canada was almost entirely dependent for current literature upon the United States. Even to-day the sale of American magazines in the Dominion reaches an enormous total, but they no longer occupy that unchallenged position which was theirs prior to 1907.

During a recent tour which extended from the St. Lawrence to Prince Rupert, B.C., I was impressed with the great facility with which British publications can now be obtained in even the smallest prairie township, while the words 'English mail just arrived' are a frequent sign outside the local news store in all parts of the Dominion.

It goes on to say:

One of the things which most impresses the visitor to Australia, New Zealand and South Africa familiar with Canadian conditions is the wonderful cable service of British news, and not only news of Great Britain, but of the outside empire as well, to be found in all the leading newspapers in those dominions. Or to put the matter in another way, the visitor to Canada acquainted with conditions in the other self-governing dominions is shocked at the meagre British cable service, and, above all, at the distorted statements which percolate through by way of New York. Society divorce cases, extraordinary statements concerning our leading public men—hashed up with all the skill of the American newspaper writer—meet the eye on all sides. Till Canada receives all its British news direct from London, as do the other self-governing dominions, matters can never be regarded as satisfactory. All the more need, therefore, to strain every nerve to promote the widest dissemination of current British literature, as has been effected by the existing Canadian magazine rate, which only remains in force for three more months.

This question has attracted some attention in England and I noticed that a few days ago a delegation met the present Postmaster General in England, Mr. Hobhouse. but from the answer which was published in the press I am afraid that the British Postmaster General is not much inclined to alter the agreement so as to meet the views of my hon. friend the Canadian Postmaster General. But I dare say that as my hon. friend has greatly increased the ocean mail subsidy from $600,000 to $1,000,000—I think that is the amount—

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX:—if there are difficulties in coming to a satisfactory arrangement with the British post office, he will find means of continuing the service. I am not more British than the King, but still I am British enough to be willing to go at least half way in this matter. When we took up this question in 1907 we found that in the mining camps at Cobalt and elsewhere our people were provided with very cheap magazines and with questionable newspapers. We thought that by facilitating the circulation of British newspapers and magazines we might perhaps render a real service to the Imperial cause in Canada. The arrangement has proven very successful indeed according to the figures I have quoted to the House and I sincerely hope that my hon. friend will do his best to induce the British authorities to renew it. It would be a great pity indeed if the Postmaster General in England were to re-enact the old prohibitive postal rate as regards newspapers and magazines mailed to Canada. Quite a trade has been established in Canada. As this correspondent, Mr. Wrench, states in every little village, in every township in the West, you find the board at the railway station with the announcement that the British mail has arrived, or will arrive at a certain date and there also you will find for sale, quite a collection of British magazines and newspapers. I think that my hon. friend should strain a point in order to meet the views of the British postmaster and see that there is a renewal of the arrangement.

Mr. PELLETIER: The matter of which my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has spoken is a very important one. I would not like to go into all the details at the present moment because the whole question is the subject matter of negotiations between the British and Canadian post office departments. I am heartily in sympathy with almost everything that my hon. friend has said on this subject, but I think that, whilst he has shown that he is well posted on nearly all the details, there is one aspect about it upon which he is mistaken. He says that the effort of the department should be to get the British Postmaster General to renew the agreement. It would be rather an easy matter indeed to do that. That is what he is asking for but I think that my hon. friend will remember that what the Post Office Department did under his direction and guidance in this respect was not absolutely on the lines which he has indicated. The general outline of it is all right as expressed by my hon. friend but there are some details that are of importance. It is absolutely true, as my hon. friend has said, that before that change was adopted by the Canadian post office in 1907, American literature in the shape of magazines was coming into this country in large volume. We had few British magazines. My hon. friend, when he was Postmaster General, saw fit to enter into an arrangement with the British post office by which, for a certain number of years, it was provided that British magazines should come into this country on most favoured terms. This arrangement was for a period of four years. It was entered into in 1907. It has been continued during the four years in question and after its expiration it was renewed for a further period of one year. After I came into office I thought that the policy adopted by my predecessor was a good one in many respects and I renewed the arrangement for a year. But when the arrangement was renewed the British post office was informed that when the year upon which we were then entering had expired probably some other arrangement would have to be made.

It is important for hon. members to know what those arrangements are, so that they may be able to form a correct opinion in regard to the matter. On the British magazines which come to Canada the British post office collects postage at the rate of one penny or two cents per pound to pay for their carriage from London to Liverpool, a distance of 210 miles. The British post office gets that money; whilst Canada takes these same magazines at Liverpool and carries them to any point in Canada, as far as Vancouver or Victoria, and gets absolutely nothing for so doing. The British post office gets two cents per pound for carrying these magazines 210 miles and we get nothing for carrying them five or six thousand miles. That is the present condition of affairs. I do not intend to pass any judgment on it or to ask the House to do so. The American magazines coming into this country pay a postage rate of four cents per pound or one cent for four ounces. We have suggested to the British post office that the penny which they collect should be divided between Great Britain and Canada—that they keep one cent for their 210 miles and we get one cent for our five or six thousand miles. I think this is offering a pretty fair bargain. If we succeed in making that arrangement, the British magazines will continue to come into Canada for one-half of what it is costing the American magazines to come here. As a matter of fact, the object for which the old arrangement was entered into is exactly as stated by my hon. friend the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), namely, to encourage British literature to come into this country, and this object has been attained. When this arrangement was entered into, there were less than 500,000 pounds of British magazines coming to Canada. My hon. friend from Rouville told the House that there were over 2,000,000 pounds at a certain time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In 1908, 2,328,000 pounds, and in 1912, 5,785,000 pounds. The quantity is increasing all the time.

Mr. PELLETIER: Who benefits by that increase? There is no question that Canada does; but the publishers of these magazines also reap a great benefit. The British post office has realized every year $100,000 for carrying these magazines from London to Liverpool; and it seems to me that we are very reasonable if, now that the object has been accomplished, now that we have succeeded in getting these magazines into Canada, we ask the British post office to share with us the two cents postage.

The old arrangement was renewed in 1912 for a year. In 1913 the British post office asked us to continue it for another year. We said: In order to give you time to consider the matter, we will continue it for six months. The arrangement was accordingly continued up to the 1st of December last, and then the British post office asked us to extend it for another period of six months. We said: We will extend it for another three months. When those three months were up, they asked us to extend it for another six months. It suits them very well to extend the arrangement from time to time, because during all that time they are collecting all the postage. We have again extended the arrangement for another period of three months, which will expire at the end of July. Meanwhile we hope—in fact, we are almost sure—that we shall come to some reasonable agreement under which these magazines shall have a kind of preferential rate, because that is what they are getting to come to Canada. My hon. friend from Rouville knows that whatever we do in this matter is not in any way, shape or form going to hurt the editors of these magazines, because they do not pay us anything at all. They do not deal with us; they mail their productions in the post offices in Great Britain. The British post office pays the Canadian Government the international postal union rates on all mail matter which comes to Canada under the Canadian Government contract for the carrying of the ocean mail. If this temporary agreement had not been entered into, the British post office would have paid us on these productions the same rate as they paid on all other kinds of mailable matter. They have been exempted from doing so, and the whole question resolves itself into this: Will the British post office pay to the Canadian Government on these magazines, not the same amount as they pay on other available matter, but a proportion of it; or will Canada carry for nothing these magazines for all time to come? After all, the present arrangement is an encouragement to the editors of British magazines. We have gone very far to help them, and we are prepared again to help them; but we would like the British post office to meet us and to come to some other arrangement which would continue the preference which these magazines get at present. We think that the British post office should come, not half-way, but some little distance, in order to meet us in this matter.

Mr. OLIVER: Is not the position in regard to this matter of postage on magazines exactly the same as the matter of postage on letters, namely, that each country collects its own postage on matter going to the other country, and carries the matter that comes from the other country free? I understand that that is the principle.

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes, but there is some distinction. When the letter is mailed in England, people put on their stamps there and that goes to the British post office, but the British post office pays the Canadian Government thirty-five cents a pound for all letters which come over on our steamers, while as for those magazines the British post office, under the present arrangement, has not paid one cent. That is the point of difference.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend has here an illustration of what free trade means. He says we should get one cent out of the two cents a pound on newspapers and magazines collected by the British post office from London and Liverpool. But the British Postmaster General might perhaps answer my hon. friend: Well, when we send goods to Canada we meet with customs duties ranging from twenty-five to sixty per cent. Of course, you Canadians love the mother country, you love the empire, but you tax the goods sent from England to Canada, while you send your manufactured goods and all your products to Britain without paying duties, and Britain is, after all, your best customer.

However, that is not the issue at the moment; I simply bring it in to show my hon. friend that the Postmaster General in England could make a very good rejoinder to his argument. He must not forget that special treatment was given to Canada by Great Britain, that is to say a special alteration in the postal laws was made in England so as to meet the case of Canada.

Mr. PELLETIER: Special treatment?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes. This arrangement does not exist with the other colonies or dominions, but only with Canada, and possibly Newfoundland. Therefore it was just to meet the special Canadian case. My hon. friend must not forget that if Sir William Mulock and the Canadian Government were able, in 1897, to obtain penny postage on letters addressed to any part of the empire, it was due to the bold action taken by the British postal authorities. Canada, of course, took the lead in that matter, and was foremost. The reduction from three cents to two cents had been promoted in Canada and by some parties in England, but unsuccessfully, for a period of ten or fifteen years. I remember reading the procès verbal of the Imperial Conference discussion on that subject. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the reports of the various conferences he will see how reluctantly the British authorities yielded at last. But it was due to that acquiescence of the British post office that Canada obtained the reduced rate of postage throughout the whole of the British Empire. It was done at the request of Canada, it was given after a very able presentment of the case by Sir William Mulock. It was a masterly stroke, and no one will question to-day that this reduction in postal rates in all parts of the British Empire has created an immense amount of good. Now, there is give and take in these matters. I know the post office in Canada loses some thousands of dollars—

Mr. PELLETIER: Fifty thousand.

Mr. LEMIEUX:—but is it worth while for the Postmaster General to destroy this intellectual preference between Great Britain and Canada because of the paltry sum of $50,000? When I tell him that we tax British goods while England accepts our products duty free, and when we know that England has yielded to the request of the Canadian post office to establish penny postage throughout the empire, should we not compromise?

Mr. PELLETIER: If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will draw his attention to the fact that the amount of $50,000 would be the amount we would get if the two cents, which is now collected by the British post office, were divided between the British and Canadian post offices. But the amount which the British post office would have to pay the Canadian Government if the rates that apply to this class of business were collected is $235,000. That is the extent to which the British magazines benefit by the present postal arrangement. The only suggestion made now is that instead of imposing the same rates as we do on foreign magazines, the amount that is collected should be divided between us. I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me that this is not a matter of trade arrangement between the home Government and our Government. I take it that this is purely and simply a matter of arrangement between the British and Canadian post offices. Of course, if we go further and say that since England takes our products without charging us duty we should therefore yield this benefit to England, I think that we are driving far afield from the real point at issue. England is a free trade country and does not charge high customs duties on Canadian products or on products from any other country in the world. This is not done as a special benefit to Canada; it is the free trade policy of England. It is for that reason, no doubt, that the British Government has not brought forward the argument mentioned by my hon. friend, and I do not expect they will do so in the future. I hope the new British Postmaster General will be able to meet us and to make another kind of agreement which will be helpful and continue to be helpful to the British magazines, without leaving the poorer government of the two, that is the Canadian Post Office Department, to bear the whole cost without any remuneration whatever. That is the whole point at issue, and the only one. The hon. member suggests that this should be an entirely one-sided arrangement. It has been so for seven years. The object has been attained, because we do not get now much more than the five or six million pounds to which the hon. gentleman referred as coming in in 1910. It is not increasing very much, and I take it that if we leave the foreign rate at four cents a pound and the rate for British magazines at two cents a pound, they will have had a full realization of the hopes they entertained at that time. The reasons for entering into that agreement are on record. It was stated that if this preference were given for three or four years, the British magazines would be enabled to get a strong foothold in this country, and that they could then be put on the same footing as the others. They now have a strong foothold in Canada, and I hope that hon. gentlemen on both sides will join with me in trying to meet the new situation which is thus created. We have had to increase the ocean mail subsidies by a large amount, and we have had to increase the amount paid the railway companies for the transportation of our mails. They carry our mails on a car mile basis. Under the new arrangements we are going to carry 6,000,000 lb. of British magazines a year, and we will have to pay the railways sixteen cents a car mile or nine cents a car mile, as the case may be, for the carrying of this mail matter. Under these circumstances I think that the British Post Office Department should meet us, and I hope they will. The British publishers of these periodicals had a meeting with the Right Hon. Mr. Hobhouse the other day in London. Some of them told him that the Canadian post office was right in its contention. They said that they appreciated what the Canadian Government had done. The English press—the Times, for instance—say that the Canadian Post Office Department is taking a reasonable view of this matter. The answer Mr. Hobhouse made to the publishers was that they might increase to a very small extent the subscription prices of their publications. They in turn tried to put the shoe on the other foot; they told Mr. Hobhouse that he should consent to our request without asking for any increase in the charges. In a matter like this all the members of the Canadian Parliament should be of one mind, and while we do desire to continue to give preference to the British magazines, the Canadian post office should not bear all the burden; the British post office should do its share.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would impress upon the hon. Postmaster General the advisability of coming to an understanding, even if the same agreement should be renewed, because the matter of a few thousand dollars should not stand in the way of an agreement which, from the moral as well as from the imperial point of view, has worked so wonderfully well during the past few years. My hon. friend has referred to the delegation which met Mr. Hobhouse on April 21. For the information of the committee let me read briefly what was said to the British Postmaster General. A despatch which I have in my hand says:

Hon. Harry Lawson, for the Empire Press Union, who organized the deputation, said the matter was one of more than mere pounds, shillings and pence. To raise the rate would be a retrograde step, unprecedented of its kind. The reduction in 1906 meant that British magazines for the first time were able to compete with the American publications. The amount of magazine matter now carried totals a value of 6,000,000 pounds yearly, more than half of which was sent to Canada by private persons.

This means that the connection between the British immigrant to Canada and his home in the old country is not broken, and that means a great deal for all those who believe not only in the desirability of that connection but also in the value of British literature generally. Certainly this agreement has worked wonders since it was entered into. Mr. Lawson says that half of the 6,000,000 pounds of British magazines and newspapers carried are sent not by publishers but by relatives of our immigrants in the West. He goes on to say:

Publishing firms here had instituted canvassing campaigns in Canada, with very successful results.

Even a minor change in the rates will destroy that business, and it is one which ought to be encouraged—the dissemination of news and the distribution of pure literature. The article goes on:

Any change in the cost of carriage would have a serious effect on an important industry. The cost to the British post office of maintaining the present rate was estimated at not more than £13,000,000 yearly.

Sir George Riddell spoke specially on behalf of fictional matter provided for Canadian reading. He told the Postmaster General that the American system of love-making differed from the English method, in fiction especially, and the English publishers were anxious that the young people of Canada should be instructed in good English ways in such matters.

Points made by subsequent speakers were that before the present rates came into force, American magazines sold in Canada for fifteen cents, as against twenty-five cents charged for the English magazines, and that nowadays forty per cent of the magazines circulated in Canada were of English origin, as against about five per cent under former conditions.

The business in British magazines has therefore increased from five per cent to forty per cent of the whole magazine business of Canada. I know my hon. friend's position; the agreement was made by the Canadian post office, and we have gone a long way to meet the desires of our people and the demand of the publishers of the other side. The agreement has been in force for several years; it has been wonderfully successful from a purely imperial as well as from a literary point of view. I have no hesitation in saying, with all due respect to American publications, that the British publications are in my judgment far superior to other publications in the English language. Now that the British magazines have reached the highwater mark of forty per cent, any retrograde steps taken would surely not be in the interests of Canada. Again I ask my hon. friend to do his very best to see that this agreement is renewed; even if the Canadian post office should lose a few thousand dollars by not charging the British post office for the ocean transit, let him do so. I think it is in the interest of the country.

Mr. GEO. E. FOSTER: I want to say one word, and I do it because I would not like the British Postmaster General to feel that the argument which has just been put forth by my hon. friend is the prevailing sentiment of this House or of this committee, if it were to be interpreted in the sense that it was supporting the British Postmaster General in refusing to meet what I think is a very fair proposition made to him by our own Postmaster General. I of course quite understand and fully appreciate the desirability of literature of the kind which has been described to-night coming from the centre of the empire to our own country in increasing quantities; but there are two sides to this question. Whilst we are willing to do much and suffer much and bear much and put our whole effort into extending and increasing that sentiment, it is equally important, I think, that the mother country should have just as strong a voice and as strong tendencies in that direction as ourselves. I cannot see for my part how it is possible for the British Postmaster General to refuse to accede to the very moderate proposition that has been put to him by our Postmaster General. Where we carried almost nothing a number of years ago we are now carrying six million pounds of magazines. We are carrying these absolutely at our own cost and charges. I am quite willing that we should carry that and twice as much as that at our own cost and charges if it is necessary; but I would like the arguments and the views to be put as strongly as possible in the mother country that the imperial sentiment is as much to them as to us, and that therefore they ought to be willing to bear their fair share of the burden.

Mr. OLIVER: The Postmaster General gave us information that the letter postage from Great Britain to Canada paid thirty-five cents a pound for the ocean transport.

Mr. PELLETIER: To the Canadian authorities?

Mr. OLIVER: To the Canadian authorities. Does not the Postmaster General think that the price is fairly high? It seems to me that thirty-five cents a pound for the transport of the mail matter across the ocean, when the freight rate is exorbitant at one cent a pound, is really not helping out the transport of information across the ocean.

Mr. PELLETIER: These are the Postal Union rates.

Mr. OLIVER: I am only saying that is not a low rate and the country is not losing anything on that side of the transaction, or if it is it ought not to be.

Mr. PELLETIER: We lose heavily.

Mr. OLIVER: Under what circumstances and conditions do we pay this amount? I understand the British Post Office Department pays our department and our department pays the steamship lines. To whom do we pay more than thirty-five cents a pound for the carriage of our mails across the ocean?

Mr. PELLETIER: To the steamship companies.

Mr. OLIVER: What companies?

Mr. PELLETIER: Four.

Mr. OLIVER: Are these the same steamship companies that we pay a million dollars a year subsidy to?

Mr. PELLETIER: That is the amount we pay for the transportation of our mail, one million dollars; that covers everything. That is the amount of the contract. There are four companies, the Allan, the Canadian Pacific railway, the White Star and the Canadian Northern railway lines have entered into a contract with us under which we pay to the whole of them one million dollars a year for transportation of all mails from Canada to Great Britain and the return mail from Great Britain to Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: Therefore, really it does not make any difference to us whether we carry one ton or one hundred tons of mail matter or what rate we may be charged for it; we pay a fixed amount to the steamship companies, and we get such service as they give us for that.

Mr. PELLETIER: My hon. friend is mistaken in that last statement. This year the steamship companies have approached the Post Office Department, and I think the Department of Trade and Commerce, and they have told us that the increase in the amount of mail matter is such that we would have to increase our price. But there is another more tangible point. When we come to take these magazines at Halifax or St. John in winter and to Quebec or Montreal in summer we pay for the transportation of these six million pounds sixteen cents a car mile.

Mr. OLIVER: I am only getting down to the ocean transport, and it is still in my mind that although, as a matter of bookkeeping, we are paying 35 cents a pound for the carriage of the mail, as a matter of fact we are not paying anything; we are paying a million dollars a year for the purpose of establishing a steamship monopoly between Canada and England. We are not paying anything for the carrying of mail; the carriage of mail is an incident subordinate to the payment of subsidy, which we pay whether they carry a pound of mail or not.

Mr. PELLETIER: We have the right to put all our mail and all United States mail which may go through Canada on board these steamers, and they are obliged to carry all the mail from Great Britain or other European countries to this country. That is a flat rate arrangement. It covers the whole world.

Mr. OLIVER: If we were not sending or receiving a pound of mail by any of the steamers of either of these four lines we would be paying one million dollars just the same.

Mr. PELLETIER: But we would not make the contract.

Mr. OLIVER: The contract being as it is, whether they bring a pound of mail or not, they would get the one million dollars.

Mr. PELLETIER: It is a mail subsidy we are giving these companies.

Mr. OLIVER: As a matter of fact, it does not make any difference to the Canadian Government in cash whether they bring five million pounds of magazines or not, it is costing not one cent for ocean transport over what would be paid whether the magazines came or not.

Mr. PELLETIER: It does not look like that to me. The proposition of the hon. member for Edmonton is one that cannot happen. The British magazines that come from the old country have their subscribers in this country, and there is always a certain amount of this matter to be carried. The amount of mail coming over is almost as regular as clockwork, except that it seems to increase in weight and size. The amount of mail matter carried in steamers has increased immensely. We have not seen as yet—and I do not think we ever shall see—any one of those steamers coming in without any mail. If the hon. member for Rouville could see the mail being landed at Rimouski or Halifax or Quebec he would be amazed at the large amount of mail matter brought by every one of those steamers. At Quebec, in the summer time, I have seen as many as twelve or fourteen full carloads unloaded from the steamers.

Mr. OLIVER: We need not dispute about that; we know the mail comes on those steamers, but I was wishing to get clear in my mind the point the hon. minister was making that we were sacrificing in cash a large amount for the benefit of the English magazines, which cost should be borne by the British post office. I am only wanting to get clear in my own mind and in the mind of Parliament that as a matter of actual fact the coming of these British magazines does not cost the Dominion of Canada one cent, so far as their transportation across the Atlantic is concerned. The British Post Office Department does not pay the Canadian Government 35 cents a pound as it does in the case of letters. In my humble judgment, the Canadian Post Office, in the slang of the day, is 'putting one over' the British Post Office Department when it charges 35 cents a pound for mail matter carried on these steamers. But we will not find fault with that; we are glad to see the Post Office Department showing a due dilligence in the collection of revenue, especially revenue that is not collected from the Canadian people. We do not wish the argument to be made, however, that Canada is actually making a sacrifice in cash when, as a matter of fact, she is not making any such sacrifice. In regard to transportation of mail by rail in Canada I wish to deal with the subject matter of this section, and there is some little connection between the point I had primarily in mind and this carriage of English magazines. We pay a certain rate to the railway companies for carrying our mail matter through Canada. Do we pay by the pound or by the car mile?

Mr. PELLETIER: By the car mile.

Mr. OLIVER: And it works out something on the same principle as in the case of the steamers. If we have no mail matter to load, we pay just the same as if the car were full. Is that correct?

Mr. PELLETIER: No. We pay by the car mile, but if we need only half a car we pay for only half a car; that 10 p.m. is, we pay for the space we use. So, whatever the worth of my hon. friend's argument in the case of sea transit, he will have some trouble in arriving at the same conclusion in regard to mail carried by rail.

Mr. OLIVER: I just wanted to get the facts clear in my mind. I wish to deal with the matter of newspaper transportation, which was brought up by my hon. friend from Rouville. I notice that the section of the Bill gives authority to the minister to establish the rates of postage on all mailable matter 'not being letters and prescribe the terms and conditions, etc.' I am sure the question has been before the Postmaster General very frequently, and as he must have come to some conclusion on the matter, I think it is in order that he should tell the House what his conclusion is. He is asking for power; let us know how he proposes to exercise that power.

Mr. PELLETIER: That is in the old law.

Mr. OLIVER: It is not the old law, but the new conditions that are the question.

The law expressly places the responsibility on the Postmaster General, and gives him due authority, and we would like to know how the minister proposes to deal with this question. I am speaking of a question that I am sure has been brought to the attention of the minister very frequently, that is, as to the postal rates on newspapers of different classes, and the question of drawing a distinction between newspapers which are published primarily for the purpose of carrying advertising, and newspapers which are published primarily for the purpose of distributing news.

Mr. PELLETIER: I have not reached any conclusion so far, but the matter has been the subject of a good deal of thought and care. We have taken this matter up with the Canadian Press Association, and have asked them to meet us with the view of coming to some arrangement. We are very desirous to arrange this matter by consent, and I must say that the Canadian Press, Limited, and the Canadian Press Association have shown a good deal of the right spirit in this matter. They have sent delegations to us, and have appointed a committee to look into the matter. That committee has made a report to them, which they have adopted. They have sent a second delegation to the Post Office Department to try to come to some conclusion. We have not been able yet to come to a complete agreement, but I may say we have agreed on certain points of detail, and we hope to be able to come to a complete agreement some time after the session. I have had no time lately to devote to the matter, but when you realize that in this country the newspapers only pay one-quarter of a cent per pound for postage to be carried all the way from Vancouver to Halifax, or vice versa, and that in England they pay one cent per copy—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Ours is the cheapest rate in the world.

Mr. PELLETIER: My hon. friend who has been Postmaster General knows that. There is not a country in the world where such rates are in existence. The rates do not begin to pay for the cost. In the United States the rate is one cent per pound. I may say to the credit of the newspaper men that they agree that our rates are not high enough, and they have admitted that in black and white in their report, which is now on file in the Department. We have gone pretty far in the way of effecting an agreement when they have reached the conclusion that the present state of things cannot continue. Just what changes will be made, is another question. Some newspaper proprietors suggest that we should increase the rates in a certain way, and others suggest a different way. I would like to say that the different suggestions which have been made would be to the greater or less benefit of the owners in question. They have however shown a good deal of public spirit in the matter. The rates will be and I hope it will be done with the consent of the newspapers. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) will realize that it would be a somewhat difficult matter for the Postmaster General to antagonize all the newspapers in the country and it is not a very desirable thing to do, although, if it should come to that, I want it to be understood that as a matter of public duty I would not hesitate to do it. But, I prefer doing it with their consent. However, I am happy to say, that they have met us fairly, and I think that next session I will be able to tell this House that we have reached a certain point and that we have made some progress.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to delay the committee on this question but I wish to state the views which I hold. The newspaper rate of postage in Canada is no doubt very low. It was made low in order that the literary matter published by the newspapers might reach as large a proportion of the population as possible. It was recognized that it was a country of vast area with a comparatively small population and that the conditions being exceptional it was desirable to disseminate the newspapers at the lowest possible cost. As my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) has spoken of the arrangement in regard to British magazines, it was understood to be an intellectual preference. At this time conditions have changed. We have entered upon an era of newspaper publication wherein, from year to year, the newspaper is published rather as a vehicle of advertising than as a means of disseminating news and opinions. Just in proportion as the newspaper expands as an advertising medium, as compared with its value as a news service, it departs from the conditions that warranted the low postal rate that was given to newspapers in the earlier days. I do not think that a newspaper which is published primarily as an advertising medium is entitled to the rate of postage it would have been entitled to if it were published primarily as a vehicle of news or opinion. I would be sorry that any increase in the postal rate should apply to newspapers published primarily as newspapers. I think it would only be just to the country and to the newspapers that are published as newspapers rather than as advertising mediums that there should be a difference of treatment between these two classes of so-called publications. I do not lay down any rule, I do not suggest any division, I quite appreciate the difficulties that will have to be met, but as one who has published newspapers for a long time I would resent very much any increase in the burden of legitimate newspapers whereby they were compelled to carry that burden which is levied by the Post Office Department by reason of these papers published as advertising mediums rather than as newspapers.

The low rate that was given to newspapers was given as an intellectual preference and so, if the department is carrying that quantity of paper under the name of newspapers which are really advertising mediums at a price much below the cost, my hon. friend has no very good case to demand with any serious strength a radical revision of the rates in regard to the British magazines. Let us put our own house on a business basis before we undertake to dictate to the people across the water how they must do business. I was more than astonished to hear some gentlemen who so eloquently and so vociferously undertook a year ago to insist upon making a free gift of $35,000,000 to the Government of Great Britain to-night protest that it was necessary as a matter of good business that the British Post Office Department should pay, or help to pay, for the carriage of British magazines across the ocean when that carriage does not cost this Dominion of Canada one extra cent.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) is more inaccurate than usual in the statement he has made just now. The $35,000,000 that we proposed last year was to be used for the construction of ships to remain in the ownership of the Canadian people, and to be placed at the disposal of His Majesty for the common defence of the empire until recalled. As far as his argument is concerned in regard to some other matters that he mentioned, he might as well say that we could carry all the letters and other mail matter from the United States to Great Britain without charging anything for it and not be out of pocket, as to make the argument that he has made in regard to these magazines. As I understand, the Canadian post office, in respect to the transmission of mails across the Atlantic, acts as a courier, and charges the United States Government, for example, certain rates, not rates fixed by the Post Office Department, but fixed by an international arrangement, and charges the British Government or any other Government, for these mails, the transportation of which is arranged for by this Government through a mail subsidy of $1,000,000. While in one sense, of course, if we did not charge the British Government, the United States Government, or any other Government, we would not be out of pocket if we should continue to pay that $1,000,000; still it would hardly be a very good argument that we should give up charging any of the nations of the world for the transmission of their mail matter across the Atlantic. The magazines that have been alluded to by my hon. friend the Postmaster General are precisely in the same category as any other mail matter. The Postmaster General has merely suggested to the British Postmaster General that, inasmuch as a penny a pound is charged upon these magazines, a reasonable proportion which he has suggested to be a half, should be paid to the Canadian Government for the transmission of these mails by the Post Office Department of Canada as a courier across the Atlantic and by other means throughout our territory as a reasonable compensation for that carriage.

Mr. WILLIAM CHISHOLM: On the item before the House we have been discussing the franking privilege, the character of the literature that goes through the post office, and mailing privileges generally. Therefore I think I am in order if I ask the Postmaster General whether or not the sheet called The Liberator, with which he is familiar, published in the city of Ottawa, is accorded the privilege of the mails. I am not a subscriber to that paper, but I receive it regularly through the post office here. I do not know whether postage is paid on it or not. The reason I ask that question is that I observed in the last issue that the editor or publisher had some fears of the present Postmaster General. The paper stated editorially that the present Postmaster General was watching it pretty closely, and that there was some diabolical influence behind him that was likely to make trouble for it whenever the Postmaster General could screw up enough courage to make the attack. So far as the editor of that paper is concerned, it seems to me, in view of the courage and strength and forcefulness which the Postmaster General displayed with reference to the sheet called the Menace, which is characterized as scurrilous, indecent and immoral, that there should be no cause for anxiety or misgiving in the breast of Mr. Morgan at all. I would like, however, to have some official statement from the minister as to whether or not this paper has the privileges of the mails. I know it does not have very much circulation outside the city of Ottawa, but in Ottawa it is known and has been denounced by all the leading clergymen of the city.

Mr. PELLETIER: The Liberator, published in Ottawa, does not go very much through the mails; its circulation is almost entirely in the city. I understand from the deputy minister that this paper has been warned that it must not publish any immoral literature, and on that condition the privileges of the mails have been given to it. I have not the pleasure of reading that paper as carefully as my hon. friend; but I hear from him to-night that it says that it is being watched. It is not being watched by me at all events; but there are officers in the department whose duty it is to watch all that is going through the mails, not from the point of view of religion, but from the point of view of decency and public morals, and the Liberator or any other paper, whether Protestant or Catholic, which does not come within that rule, will be dealt with in the same manner.

Mr. KNOWLES: Since the Menace has been mentioned, and as it was I who first placed the question on the Order Paper, I wish to ask the minister why he ruled first that the Canadian Menace should not be allowed, and later ruled that it should be allowed, the privileges of the mails. I am not at the moment asking him to enter into a dissertation as to the merits of the Menace or as to his own personal view of it or as to the view of his deputy minister or of any one in his department, although in one of his letters he hid behind the fact that his deputy minister happened to be a Protestant. It is not a matter of concern to us what is the religion of the deputy minister or whether he has any religion. We vote the deputy minister his salary; and, as we all have troubles of our own, we have not the time to consider the religion of the deputy minister. In answer to my question the minister said that the Menace of Aurora, Ontario, was denied the mails for the same reason that the Menace of Aurora, Missouri, had been denied, namely, because it was scurrilous and indecent and immoral. I wish to ask him, because I think the public have a right to know the reason, why later on he admitted the Canadian Menace to the privileges of the mails.

Mr. PELLETIER: I gave a full and complete answer to that question only a few days ago. My answer will be found on 'Hansard' and I would like my hon. friend to read it. The reason for which the Canadian Menace was refused the privileges of the mails in the first instance was that it was going to be a Canadian edition of the scurrilous sheet published at Aurora, Missouri. Later on the Canadian Menace acknowledged that we were right in our contention that it had no right to publish dirt and filth, and promised not to do so; consequently it was given the privileges of the mails.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Some time ago the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) stated that the paper, the Liberator, published in Ottawa, came through the mails and was put into our boxes. The Postmaster General very frankly said at that time that this matter did not come under his supervision, but was under the control of the Speaker. If I remember aright, the Speaker told us at the time that he would see that this would not occur again. We have been surprised to see that this paper, though without any franking privileges at all, is placed in our boxes. I would like to know if the Speaker has forgotten or if he is going to give new orders. We do not want to see this paper in our boxes.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not make that statement. What I said was that my attention had never been drawn to the matter, but that I would look into it and endeavour to see who had the authority and what the nature of the sheet was. I made inquiry and was told that the censorship over all mail matter was exercised in the Postmaster General's department, and therefore the House of Commons had nothing to do with it.

Mr. GAUVREAU: But what I should like to know is how it happens that this paper is placed in our boxes, not franked, with nothing to show from what source it comes or by whom it is placed in our boxes. Is the responsibility on the Postmaster General? I am afraid it is. Is it on the Speaker? If so I hope you will be more careful in the future.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think the House will see that a radical change is made as regards the insurance of letters. I do not wish to delay the committee, but I think the House is entitled to the information.

Mr. PELLETIER: We have the power of insurance now. We are making a distinction between the power of registration and the power to insure. The two are now mixed up. We are limiting it now to $25, as compensation which people who register mail matter should have the right to claim as a result of the loss. This is carrying into effect a proposal which I explained last year, and it will enable those who wish to do so to insure their parcels going through the mails. This is done, if I mistake not, in all countries where parcel post exists. We thought, and I still think, that we might have that power, but there was some doubt expressed about it, so we thought it best to come to Parliament and have the whole thing on the statutes so that there might be no mistake. We are going to keep to the five cents for registration fee. We will make the charge for insurance of parcels not large, but we may have to charge a little more for insurance purposes. Our present intention, as advised by the officers of the department, is that the proper limit would be $50.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Insurance brokers are taking advantage of the Post Office Department in this way: they insure parcels, so to speak, and really they do not insure them, but they profit by the registration of the post office and are satisfied with paying the small amount of five cents instead of paying for the regular insurance, and in that way they are taking away the money due the Post Office Department. I understand that the amendment is to cover that point.

Mr. PELLETIER: The hon. gentleman has put it exactly as it is. I was coming to that point. Money is taken by some companies and for it a receipt is given, and they undertake to carry it to the point of destination. What do they do? They just simply put the money through the Post Office Department and get the profit. We think we might as well get the profit, and this clause is in order to cover such cases.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to an item in the Orange Sentinel of the 23rd of April, complaining that a certain paper called the Catholic Register had trangressed the requirements of the mail service even more than the Menace. The Postmaster General told us that one paper was under supervision, if that is the word—or censorship—and he told us that there is no other paper besides the Liberator that is under censorship—I think that is the word.

Mr. PELLETIER: I did not use that word.

Mr. KNOWLES: We will say 'observation.'

Mr. PELLETIER: All papers in this country are under observation.

Mr. KNOWLES: And so the Sentinel is?

Mr. PELLETIER: It is exactly in the same position as the Catholic Register, and the Catholic Register is in the same position as the Sentinel; and if the Catholic Register were to publish things like those in the Menace, it would not be tolerated for five minutes by the Post Office Department.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think the hon. gentleman said it had been warned and was under some sort of supervision.

Mr. PELLETIER: Like the other papers.

Mr. KNOWLES: The same sort of supervision as the Mail and Empire and the Montreal Star?

Mr. PELLETIER: There are some papers over which this kind of observation would be more necessary than over others, because we hear so many people complaining, of these newspapers telling lies about them, but this does not come under the censorship of the Post Office Department; we are only looking at the decent and moral side.

Mr. KNOWLES: If the minister is not interfering with papers telling lies, probably then the Mail and Empire can get along all right. The Orange Sentinel does not take the same view with regard to the action taken by the Postmaster General as he himself has taken. The Sentinel says that the reason he turned rightabout face was that the Orange lodges made him do so. I do not know either Orangeman or Catholic so far as this House goes, or so far as the public business goes; but I know the Postmaster General as a man responsible to this House for the discharge of his duties, and it is scarcely right that a paper of wide circulation like the Sentinel should make the charge that the Postmaster General had changed his views—which we must assume were conscientious—because the Sentinel and his friends made him do so, and that no explanation should be given. The Sentinel says:

> The ban on the Canadian Menace has been raised. Hon. Mr. Pelletier has seen a new light and has conceded interim postal privileges. So long as the Menace refrains from imitation of the paper of the same name in the United States, it is likely to be allowed to pass through the mails.
> Credit for the vindication of the liberty of the press is largely due to Orangemen. Thousands of them protested in vigorous terms against Rome's attempt to establish herself as press censor and allowed it to be known that they would break party affiliations rather than endure a violation of the Protestant principles.
> Had the Orange Association and its official organ been less influential, Canada would still be disgraced by the State's suppression of a publication disliked by Rome. No one can tell what the end would have been.
> The lesson for our members is that if they will get all their friends to read the Sentinel and succeed in inducing them to join the Order, and fight for equal rights and one school, one flag, and one language, it will not be long before Orangeism is triumphant all along the line.
> It is time all Protestants got up on the band wagon.

Now, one of two things is correct: Either this paper has committed a gross libel upon the minister—and it is not becoming the dignity of this House that one of our members should be so libelled—or we are in the hands of a Postmaster General who would have done us a wrong, unless the Sentinel and its Orange friends had in some divine way come to our assistance. Either one of these is an unfortunate position, and I think it is the minister's duty to straighten the matter out.

Mr. PELLETIER: My hon. friend is very witty and draws a great many smiles from his friends around him. Why he is bringing this matter up and putting it before the committee I do not know, but I would advise him to consult some of his friends on the other side as to whether they think the matter to which he has referred is a good and proper one to bring before the House in the way he is bringing it. So far as I am concerned it is not a question of my doing what I am told by the Orange Lodges, by the Catholic Church or by anybody else; what I try to do is that which I think is right; that is my only guide. That is what I am going to continue to do, whether it pleases the one church or the other, and whether my hon. friend from the West is satisfied or not.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I want to speak of the proposed changes in newspaper rates in so far as they concern newspapers published in western Canada, and I would like to place before the Postmaster General some views in that regard based upon practical experience. If there is to be an increase in postal rates, special consideration should be given to the newspapers of western Canada on account of the extent to which the cost of production exceeds that of eastern newspapers. I have some figures here which I prepared last session when this matter was under consideration, and which I did not place before the House. In the first place, I would like the minister to consider that the field covered by the western daily newspaper is very wide compared with that covered by the eastern newspaper. For instance, there is no daily newspaper between Moosejaw and Medicine Hat and there is no daily newspaper between Medicine Hat and Calgary; consequently the newspapers in those western cities cover a very large territory.

This is not the case in Ontario, where daily newspapers are published in nearly every incorporated city and in some of the towns. What I want to emphasize is the fact that the cost of publication in western Canada is much heavier—much more so, perhaps, than the Postmaster General realizes—than it is in eastern Canada. Apart from the matter of high telegraph and cable tolls and from the question of wages—and wages in western Canada are considerably higher than they are in the East—the cost of publication is higher in the West than in the East and higher in Winnipeg than in the cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul. Dealing with the item of freight rates on the paper on which newspapers are printed, I would like to quote these figures: Winnipeg papers pay 61 cents a hundred pounds; Regina, 99 cents; Calgary, $1.32; Edmonton, $1.32; Lethbridge, $1.27; Saskatoon, 1.09; Nelson, B.C., $1.71; Rossland, $1.71; Minneapolis and St. Paul, 10 cents; eastern Canadian newspapers, from 10 to 20 cents. It will be observed that the cost of production in the West is very much larger than in the East, in respect of the one item of freight rates upon paper. The newspapers of western Canada have been of great value to my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior in providing a great deal of publicity, for the western Canadian newspapers circulate not only in their own respective districts, but very largely in the United States and Great Britain. They are of value also in developing a strong Canadian and British sentiment in this country, and that is very important in a new part of the country like western Canada. I hope that the Postmaster General will take up the case of the newspapers of western Canada which, I believe, has been presented to him by influential western publishers, and give it the serious consideration which I feel sure it deserves.

Mr. PELLETIER: The remarks of the hon. gentleman are worthy of attention, and they will be taken into serious consideration when we take up this matter at the end of the present session.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—qualifications of superintendent.

Mr. G. V. WHITE: Has it been decided by the department to establish a new railway mail district at North Bay.

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes.

Mr. H. BOULAY (Rimouski). I would like to ask the Postmaster General whether there is any amendment in the law under this clause 2? I understood there was an amendment in connection with the length of time the mail clerks should be employed before being appointed as superintendents.

Mr. PELLETIER. Before the existing law, the mail clerk had to be employed for a number of years in the office and to act for a certain time as a railway mail clerk. Under the new law, it will be sufficient to have been in the office for a certain time, even though he had never been a railway mail clerk; as long as he has been in the office for a certain length of time, he may be appointed as superintendent.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—temporary appointments:

Mr. MURPHY: When this Bill was before the committee in the shape of a resolution, some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House asked my hon. friend for an explanation with regard to this section. A partial explanation was given, but, with all respect to my hon. friend, I must say that he did not satisfy this side of the House that he was not taking power under these amendments to appoint without examination a host of political friends, who will serve as travelling political agents for the Government of which my hon. friend is a valued and useful member. If my hon. friends on this side of the House who have been complaining about dismissals will apply their attention to this section and observe the difference between it and the provisions of the section for which it is a substitute, they will readily understand what has become of many of their political friends of whose dismissals they have previously complained. One remarkable feature of subsection 3 of this section is that it is retroactive; it is to be effective from March 12, 1912. It provides among other things that persons who were then in the employ of the railway mail service shall be continued in the service, irrespective of age, and notwithstanding the fact that they have not passed the Civil Service examinations.

It then makes a further amendment of the previously existing law, which declared that such persons shall not be eligible for an increase until they pass the Civil Service examination, while the new section provides that they shall be eligible for an annual increase until their salaries amount to $1,000 so they may be continued for an indefinite length of time in the service without examination and have their salaries increased to $1,000. After that the new section provides that they shall not be eligible for an increase above $1,000 until they have passed the qualifying examination. Perhaps the minister can give me some explanation.

Mr. PELLETIER: There is no such radical change in the Bill, as my hon. friend may learn from the hon. member for Rouville. Clerks are taken on as temporary employees not only in the post office but in all the departments. Before the date mentioned in that section, that is, the 12th of March, 1912, under the law as it then existed the Post office Department had the right to appoint these employees as they were appointed; but subsequently we ourselves passed a law under which it became necessary to pass certain examinations. Thus, instead of relaxing the rigorous state of the law, we have made it more rigorous.

Mr. MURPHY: Not by this amendment.

Mr. PELLETIER: This amendment is not as my hon. friend read it. The only thing which this Bill provides which is a change from the present law is that these people, if they are satisfactory, may get their increases like everyone else. There is no such radical change as he suggests.

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend has referred to some subsequent legislation. I do not know whether he referred to chapter 41, of the statutes of 1912, or to some Act subsequent to that. If his reference is to chapter 41 of the statutes of 1912, I would submit that the observations I have made are entirely borne out by this amendment. This amendment is doing precisely what I stated a few moments ago it is intended to do.

Mr. PELLETIER: There is now a law in existence under which railway mail clerks can be kept as temporary employees for more than twelve months. They have then to pass the preliminary examination, or they have to go; even if we wanted to keep them the Auditor General would not pay them. When an employee has passed the preliminary examination he can be kept, but his salary does not go beyond a certain limit until he has passed the qualifying examination. Some of the temporary clerks in the Post Office Department have had no increase because they did not pass the preliminary examination at the end of the first year of their appointment, and did not pass it because they were not then obliged by law to pass it. Then the law came into force saying that no increase would be given to those who had not passed the examinations. The law discriminated against these clerks, and we are taking care of this special condition by this clause. My hon. friend will see that this Bill makes no great change.

Mr. MURPHY: What I see is the reverse of what the hon. gentleman has stated. Under subsection 3 surely my hon. friend will not contend that he has not taken power to appoint.

Mr. PELLETIER: The clause only refers to those appointed before the 12th of March, 1912. The clause does not refer to future appointments.

Mr. MURPHY: I am not speaking about the future, but about people who have been in the service. My statement is that the intention is to make them practically permanent officials, turning them from temporary into permanent employees without examination.

Mr. PELLETIER: But this does not give me the power to make temporary appointments, as my hon. friend says, he speaks of political agents going around the country It refers to appointments made prior to the 12th of March, 1912. These people have been in the service during all that time, and we would like those who are qualified for the work and who are recommended by their superior officers, to have the increases to which they would have been entitled if they had been appointed under the same circumstances as the others who were appointed since that date. That is all the clause provides for.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In other words, the law says that no man can be appointed railway mail clerk until he has passed certain examinations and not if he is over thirty years of age. My hon. friend has not been able, as I was not able, to find young men of less than thirty years who would be willing to accept the paltry sum of $500 to serve as railway mail clerks and he has appointed, under the name of labourers, many mail clerks over thirty years, some fifty years of age and probably some sixty. My hon. friend wishes to put these men regularly in the service but he gives them a little salve because under the existing law unless they pass the qualifying examination he would be unable to give them a salary beyond $1,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Can my hon. friend tell the committee to how many employees this will apply?

Mr. PELLETIER: That question was put by the hon. member for Oxford, and I have the information here, as to the number of people affected and the amount involved. By reason of the annual increase from $50 to $100 for the people now in the service it will cost $66,200.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is for the staff?

Mr. PELLETIER: This gives the information for the Bill we have passed and the Bill we are now engaged on. To raise the salaries of permanent clerks from $500 to $600 will cost $38,300. To raise the salaries of temporary clerks now employed from $500 to $600 will cost $25,300. The total amount involved is $129,800. The total number of persons affected is as follows: Temporary clerks who will be raised from $500 to $600, 89; permanent clerks who will be raised from $500 to $600, 126; clerks who will receive an annual increase of $100 instead of $50, 490; altogether 705 people will come under the preceding Bill and the Bill we are now discussing.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Seven hundred and five will be made permanent.

Mr. PELLETIER: No, that relates to salary. The figures I have given include railway mail clerks, who are provided for by this Bill, employees in the city post offices, and in the other offices.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many will be made permanent?

Mr. PELLETIER: I have not that information, but there are not many.

Mr. GRAHAM: About 90?

Mr. PELLETIER: Oh, no.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend read the figures 89. Were those temporary clerks being made permanent?

Mr. PELLETIER: No, that is the number of temporary clerks who will be raised from $500 to $600.

Mr. GRAHAM: Were most of these temporary clerks appointed after October, 1911?

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: Most of them I suppose?

Mr. MURPHY: How many of that class will this section make permanent?

Mr. PELLETIER: I have not that information, but I will make a note of it. Temporary clerks are paid the same salary as the initial salary of the permanent clerks, and as the initial salary of permanent clerks has been raised to $600 the temporary clerks will be paid at the same rate, but they do not go beyond that point.

11 p.m.

Mr. G. V. WHITE: I do not wish to delay the passage of this very important Bill, but there is a matter which I think is deserving of the attention of the Postmaster General, and that is in connection with the maximum salary of the railway mail clerks. The Postmaster General is to be congratulated upon his action in increasing both the minimum and the maximum salary of those clerks. Every member of the House realizes that the employees of the railway mail service are subject to very many casualties. Employees in that branch probably run greater risks than in any other branch of the Government service, and I am pleased to see that the Postmaster General has seen fit to recognize the railway mail service by raising the minimum and maximum salaries. I would like to have seen my hon. friend the Postmaster General go a little farther and make the maximum salary $1,500 instead of $1,400. I have in mind the case of a railway mail clerk who lives in my town who was appointed to the service in 1884, and it was only last year, after being thirty years in the service, that he reached his maximum. However, the present legislation making the annual increase $100 instead of $50 will enable clerks in this particular branch to reach their maximum much more rapidly. I should be glad if the Postmaster General could see his way clear, if not this session, perhaps at the next session of Parliament, to make the maximum $1,500 instead of $1,400.

Mr. WM. CHISHOLM: I do not think this legislation is quite as innocent as the Postmaster General tries to make it appear. There is no objection, of course, to raising the minimum salary to $600. Five hundred dollars may appear low; in fact it is low. If $500 was a proper salary ten or twenty years ago, $600 is low enough to-day. The annual increase of $100 instead of $50 is all right too, but the vicious principle in this Bill is the dispensing with any qualifying examination, and giving the Postmaster General power to promote any man whether he possesses the necessary qualifications or not.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am not asking for that at all.

Mr. CHISHOLM: This section provides:

3. Any person employed temporarily as a railway mail clerk on the twelfth day of March, 1912, may, if his services have been satisfactory—

Who is to be the judge?

—and if recommended by the superintendent and the controller of the railway mail service, be appointed to the permanent staff at a salary not exceeding the amount he is then receiving, irrespective of age and notwithstanding the fact that he has not passed the Civil Serviec examination.

Why should he not be required to pass the Civil Service examination? It was the law some years ago that a clerk appointed at $500 should serve a probationary period of one year, and then if he passed the examination—if he had ability and character enough he would pass the examination—and his services had been satisfactory and his habits were correct, he was in line for promotion, and could be appointed to the permanent staff and rise to the maximum salary. Why not require that to be done to-day? Is it not just as important to-day as it was fifteen years ago that railway mail clerks be men of character and intelligence? I say that principle is vicious.

Then again this Bill makes it retroactive. The whole history of the thing is this: There were men who had to be provided for after the last election. I know one case where a man wanted a certain job, but it had been promised to so many persons that he was left out in the cold. Next thing the committee takes him in hand and says: We will appoint you to the railway mail service. The man made inquiries, read up the Civil Service Act, and found that as he was over 31—he was 33—he would be entitled to a salary of only $500 after he had passed an examination. His business was not of a clerical character at all; he had been a professional man, but had not made much of a success in his profession. He was good enough for the purpose, however, and they proposed to get him in the railway mail service. But there was some hitch and he did not go in. I am quite sure, however, that many did get in who have not the qualifications, and whose services would not be found satisfactory if tested by an independent and competent body; but they will be kept on. This matter will be left at the discretion of the department, and for those with the proper political leanings places will be found. Not only should this power not be put in the hands of the Post Office Department, but there should be a system under which persons who are absolutely useless should not be kept on. The man who cannot pass the examination at the expiration of a year is not the proper kind of a man to have. There are lots of young men who can be got by the Post Office Department. If the salary is too low, raise it, as this Bill proposes to do. There will be lots of men available then. There is no reason why any person should not be required to pass the examination. If it is left in the hands of the Postmaster General these men will not qualify themselves.

Mr. PELLETIER: If my hon. friend will read section 4 he will see that his argument does not apply. Section 3 only applies to a fixed number of people who were appointed before a certain date. Let me read section 4:

> No person shall be eligible for the appointment to the permanent staff of railway mail clerks unless he has passed either the Civil Service preliminary or qualifying examination, or is a graduate of the Royal Military College or of a university of Canada.

[Mr. W. Chisholm.]

Mr. WM. CHISHOLM: Can he not be brought in under clause 3, supposing his services are satisfactory, without passing the examination?

Mr. PELLETIER: Those who were appointed before the date mentioned in that clause. At that time it was not necessary for these people to pass an examination.

Mr. WM. CHISHOLM: Was not the law then that they had to serve as probationers for a year at a salary of $500, and that, at the expiration of that period, if their services were not satisfactory, they were to be barred out?

Mr. PELLETIER: If that clause had been in existence these people would not be in the Post Office Department now, because more than twelve months would have elapsed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am inclined to think that the clause is one that should not give us very much difficulty. There were some people appointed before the 12th March, 1912, as temporary employees. We know that it was difficult to obtain suitable men in all cases to fill these positions; the salaries were too small. They were put on as temporary employees. They could not be put on the permanent list until they had passed the examination. They remained on year after year and did not pass the examination. Then we changed the law. That change was to the effect that a man had to pass the examination within a year. If I understand this section aright, it is only to apply to a small number of men who were in that peculiar position prior to the 12th March, 1912. I agree that no man should be eligible, as provided by the next subsection in future unless he has passed the proper examination. For my part I do not see much objection to the clause as it stands now.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish to bring to the minister's attention a matter that has been the subject of a resolution of the Association of Railway Mail Clerks in my own city. Among other things they asked the department that they might use their good offices to secure for railway mail clerks transportation privileges while they are on their holidays. At the present time railway mail clerks, although they are very closely indentified with the transportation system of the country, have to pay out of their own pockets for their transportation while on vacation. They have, by a formal resolution, asked that the Government might use its good offices to get railway transportation for them during their holidays. The Government is very close to the railway companies and especially the railway mail service branch of the Post Office Department. Immense sums are paid to the railway companies by the Post Office Department and there seems to be a great deal of pith in what any constituents say that the influence of the Postmaster General would be very great with the railway companies in securing this concession. I am told that the employees of the express companies get this privilege to which I am referring. The department might accomplish this end, if in no other way, by allowing railway mail clerks to travel in the mail car itself which would not do any harm inasmuch as the men engaged in that service might very well be trusted to travel in the mail car. If the minister would be kind enough to assure me that he would do his utmost with the railway companies to come to an understanding with them that they would grant vacation passes such as they grant to their own employees I am sure it would be quite satisfactory to the railway mail clerks. I think they might grant such passes not only to the railway mail clerk but to the railway mail clerk and his wife. I would commend this to his favourable consideration.

Mr. PELLETIER: My hon. friend certainly overestimates the power which the Postmaster General has with the railways. If he could only have been present at the numerous interviews which were held in order to come to a settlement of the vexed question of the increase of the rates he would have known that the railway companies are not so willing to give the Post Office Department favours as he supposes. Instead of giving us a pass for the railway mail clerk going on his vacation with his wife, his children and maybe his cousins, his aunts, his friends, or his lady friend—

Mr. KNOWLES: That was on the ground of morality, I suppose.

Mr. PELLETIER—I do not know; some of these people stand on very high ground, I understand. They even contended that we had no right to send a second clerk on duty on the postal car and that if we did so we had to pay for his passage. My hon. friend sees that instead of giving us passes for the railway mail clerks going away on their vacations they are so exacting in that respect that we would have very little chance of securing such a concession. We had to take the stand that the railway mail clerks who were on the mail car on duty should not be called upon to pay anything for their passage. The railway companies will not give the railway mail clerks passes for their vacations and I would not ask for them. We have to hold our own with the railway companies and we do not want to ask for these favours. They wanted $4,000,000 of an increase for the mail service and we succeeded in bringing their claim down to $780,000 but if at that time we had made it a condition that railway mail clerks, their wives and children, should be carried free perhaps we would not have succeeded in bringing that claim down to such an extent. I have received the request from the railway mail clerks to which my hon. friend has referred. I think all my employees will give me credit for doing everything that I can for them but this is a request that it is not in my power to grant.

Mr. KNOWLES: If the post office inspectors, the assistant post office inspectors and the railway mail superintendent have passes, why should not these much more poorly remunerated clerks get the same privilege?

Mr. PELLETIER: That is on duty.

Mr. KNOWLES: But they have annual passes. The minister, of course, has the power, if he would only consider the request reasonable. I would ask that the men who are so closely connected with the transportation system, and whose lives are imperiled in the discharge of their duty, should have the same privilege that every person else has who is connected with transportation; that is an annual free trip.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—age limit of railway mail clerks:

Mr. MURPHY: What is the reason for that change?

Mr. PELLETIER: That section corresponds with the other ones. For the railway mail clerks the age is now thirty, whereas for the other clerks in the post offices it is thirty six; we are putting them all on the same footing.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—repeal:

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the meaning of this section?

Mr. PELLETIER: The preceding amendment has rendered useless the four sections in question, and the consequence is that they are repealed.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not at all agree with the policy of the minister in taking power to himself to make regulations for the postage of newspapers without the direct sanction of Parliament. The postal rates are provided at present by the sections that are being repealed. I think postal rates should be established by authority of Parliament and should be embodied in the statute. I do not agree that it is proper legislation or a proper discharge of the responsibilities of this House merely to authorize the Postmaster General to fix any rate of postage that he may think fit. The rule that has prevailed in the past, whereby the rate of postage is set down in the statute on the responsibility of Parliament as recommended by the Government, is the proper way and the only way in which that matter should be dealt with.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the minister provide under that section to blot out the statute regulation in regard to newspapers and to take the whole thing into his own hands? What ground does he give for taking such powers?

Mr. PELLETIER: We have it in everything else; it is a matter of regulation. If one reads the law as it exists at present, one may reach the conclusion that we have that power at the present time, whereas another may reach a different conclusion; but it has been considered by me as a matter of regulation in the department. We are desirous to reach an agreement with the newspaper owners to increase the rates of postage on newspapers. If we cannot make this a matter of regulation, our hands will be paralyzed. Under the Parcel Post Act we have the power to make the rates as they are; we have the power to increase or to decrease them.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is an experimental proposition.

Mr. PELLETIER: We are about to change the rates on newspapers and we expect to do it with the consent of the newspaper owners.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will there be an increase?

Mr. PELLETIER: The rates may not be increased in all cases. The press associations have admitted that the rates should be increased but they propose, not the same zones, but the same system of zones as exist for parcel post. They say that we should ask a higher rate of postage for newspapers beyond a certain distance. If this has all to be put into the law by Parliament, our hands will be tied and we shall not be able to make any such arrangement with the newspapers owners. This power exists for parcel post and for everything else. Last year we were told, when parcel post came up, that we should take that power and fix the rates. We cannot do that except by regulations which are adopted, which have to be published in the official Gazette, and which come into force only after being so published. These rates, of course, can be recalled. For parcel post, to which the same principle applies absolutely, if we had had to wait for Parliament to fix these rates, we could not have prepared as we did; and if in the course of our experience in regard to parcel post, we see that these rates may be decreased for the benefit of the public, we can do it without coming to Parliament for sanction. It is all a question as to whether or not the officers of the department, in whose hands this matter lies to a great extent, can be trusted to do what is right in the matter. There never has been a complaint in regard to the matter, and I do not think there ever will be.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the minister nothing to do with these things himself?

Mr. PELLETIER: I take a great interest in these matters as I do in all matters concerning my department. I have met the newspaper editors several times and have discussed this matter with them. They have been good enough to tell me that I have met them in the proper spirit and that they are willing to do all they can to meet my views, because they think I am right, at least to a certain extent. I do not think there is any great danger in this section.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I can say to my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that the minister is right in his explanation. The Postmaster General, if you read his powers in the Post Office Act, can himself make all these regulations for newspapers, for parcel post and so on.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Postmaster General says that he does not look after these matters; that it is his officials who do so.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend can trust the Postmaster General not to quarrel with the newspapers. I can credit him to be an astute enough politician to play fair with them.

Mr. MACDONALD: On some occasions lately I have found my hon. friend the Postmaster General to be a gentleman of wonderfully fertile resources. He is very plausible in regard to this proposition concerning the newspapers, but he has a way of putting his officials in front of him when there is anything for which he does not want to assume the responsibility, and he tells us that is all right. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) is a newpaper man, and he has rather impressed me with his argument in regard to the matter. If my hon. friend the minister finds it necessary in the carrying on of the business of his department to deal with matters of detail, and if he is going to take the power—and he has made an argument to impress the House that he ought to have the power—to negotiate and do all these things between sessions, there ought to be an ultimate reference to Parliament when changes are to be made.

Mr. PELLETIER: I agree with my hon. friend; but the revising power of Parliament exists even if I do not reserve it in this case. If I make an arrangement with the newspaper editors and owners which is not suitable to Parliament, hon. members can tell me so at the next session. I think I understand what my hon. friend has in mind. I am not asking for powers to make the Liberal newspapers pay a certain rate and the Conservative newspapers pay another rate.

Mr. MACDONALD: I never would have thought that at all.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am asking that the same rates shall apply to all newspapers, and no Postmaster General would think of doing anything else than that. Under the circumstances, as my hon. friend from Rouville has very properly said, there are a great many guarantees that this matter will be approached in the right spirit. I think we can accomplish some good if there is no doubt about these powers being vested in the Postmaster General. I am of the opinion that these powers are at present vested in the Postmaster General but there is some doubt in regard to the matter and I would like to make it clear, so that there will be no question about it.

Mr. GRAHAM: This question of zone, of which my hon. friend has spoken, cannot be operated generally so as to be satisfactory. But let me point out the difference. It is all right where the newspaper is located with a country surrounding it on all sides. But take newspapers published along the frontier, the circulation of which is in Canada alone, they have only half a zone in which to circulate. Now, unless provision is made to make the centre of their zone somewhere else than the place of publication, they are at a disadvantage. I have had a good deal of correspondence with newspaper men on this subject, and I said that if there was the change proposed it would be unfair to the newspapers on the frontier. Heretofore, the place of publication was at the edge of the zone, which was fair. But the change that is proposed will take away a quarter of the privilege of these newspapers.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I hold no brief for the newspapers, but I hope no regulation will be made to make it difficult for people in the country to get a cheap newspaper. It is a great advantage that the Montreal Star, the Toronto Globe, and other large newspapers can go out to distant places in the country at cheap rates. The farmers will not pay a big price for a daily paper, but it certainly makes a country district a better place to live in if its people have access to daily newspapers, even though they be three or four days old. We are all agreed that rural life should be made more attractive, and cheap newspapers is one of the means to that end. If the Postmaster General takes away from the country people the opportunity to get newspapers at cheap rates, he will strike a heavier blow at the welfare of the country than he thinks. I hope he will give the matter very serious consideration.

Mr. OLIVER: I desire to protest as emphatically as I can, without delaying the committee, against the position of the Postmaster General that this should be by regulation. I say emphatically that it should not be by regulation, but by statute. It has always been by statute and is so now. But the minister proposes to strike that provision out of the statute and take power to regulate as he may please. The minister has given no reason so far to justify that position. It is right that associations of newspaper men should meet the officers of the department and discuss the proposed changes with them, and it is entirely desirable that they should reach an amicable conclusion. But that does not alter the fact that changes in such an important service as the postal rates on newspapers should be at the discretion of Parliament, and of Parliament alone. It is not a matter that should be fixed between my hon. friend's department and an association of newspaper publishers; it is a matter that should be set right on the floor of the House, not in the interest of the newspaper publishers and the officials of the department, but in the interest of the people of Canada who are interested in the newspapers and in the postal service. There is a very material reason from the newspaper publisher's point of view why this matter should be by statute and not by regulation. The newspaper postage, although it is small on each number of the paper, is, in the aggregate, a very important part of the charges upon any considerable newspaper enterprise, and it is important to the enterprise, wherever it may be located and whether large or small, that it should know that that feature of its existence and this limitation of its opportunities should not be subject to change without due notice and without the fullest consideration.

Mr. PELLETIER: This does not interfere with all that.

Mr. OLIVER: If postal charges are to be subject to change simply at the will of the department, after consultation with this, that, or the other association of newspapers, there is no reasonable assurance of permanence in the regulations of the newspaper publishers at large, such as there would be if there could be change only by Parliament only after full discussion on the floor of this House. From that standpoint, the practical effect of my hon. friend making the change from statute to regulations, is entirely against the material interest of the newspaper publishers.

The Postmaster General has instanced the case of the parcel post rates as provided by regulation. He received authority from Parliament at the last session to establish a parcel post system with rates and regulations such as he should fix. And he concludes that because he was given that authority at that time therefore he should be given this authority now. Without introducing controversial matters, I say that for my part, as a representative of the people, as a member of this Parliament, I am responsible, measurably responsible, for my hon. friend's parcel post system and the rates he levied. Now, I am not in agreement with his parcel post system or the rates he levied; I do not think the system is well-conceived or well carried out, and I do not think it is fair to me or to members of this House that I have no opportunity to give my opinion with regard to that matter. So, his instance of the parcel post system is unfortunate from my point of view. This is a matter of very great importance to the people of Canada, and the representatives of the people of Canada in Parliament assembled should have the deciding vote.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—section 116 amended:

Mr. MURPHY: A rather important change is made in this section. Will the hon. Postmaster General explain why he is proposing that the Postmaster General should leave so much out of his report?

Mr. PELLETIER: This is a matter on which I shall not insist if the committee oppose it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It will give rise to a long discussion. For my part I shall oppose it very strongly.

Mr. PELLETIER: Let me explain the facts, and then if the House does not agree I am not much concerned except that it is a great waste of public money. We publish in the Postmaster General's Report an enormous amount of stuff.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Information.

Mr. PELLETIER: It may be information, but it is information which the people never read, and such as is not published by any other postmaster general in the civilized world, and moreover a great part of this same information is contained in the Auditor General's Report. I do not think that we should print that information twice.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I take issue with my hon. friend when he says that there is a lot of information in the Postmaster General's annual report that is not read by the people. What affects my county may not be of interest to the hon. member for Halifax or the hon. member for South Renfrew, but it is somewhat interesting to me and to the people of my constituency to whom I send the report. The tendency of Parliament nowadays is to give as much information as possible to the public and not to reserve that information to the select few. Of course, I do not object to lopping off from the blue book of the Post Office Department what is already published in the Auditor General's Report, but I certainly would object to taking away anything from that report which concerns the service.

Mr. PELLETIER: I will not insist upon the passing of this clause if hon. gentlemen do not agree upon it; I will drop it for the present and bring it up another year.

Section dropped.

On section 9—letter carriers on electric railways:

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would suggest to the minister that he strike out the words 'except municipally owned electric railways.' In the city of Guelph in my riding the electric railway is municipally owned. It was a stock company; the city acquired the stock, and it is operated under a commission named by the council. I do not think that any arrangement has ever been made with them for the carrying of letter-carriers. I notice in the section that the Postmaster General proposes that letter-carriers shall be conveyed on every electric railway in Canada except municipally owned railways, on such terms and conditions and under such regulations as are made by the Postmaster General. Why make an exception of the municipally owned railways? If they will not make terms, the Postmaster General can set the price. I think that should apply to municipalities as well as to companies. Nearly all electric companies are provincial companies, and the Postmaster General assumes under the section the right to prescribe rates for these companies. Municipal institutions are provincial institutions; if the Postmaster General can prescribe rates for the one he can prescribe them for the other. It would be a hardship to twelve or fifteen young men in the town where distances are long, and a hardship to the public as well, if they cannot get and deliver the letters as speedily as they could if they were permitted to use this electric road. I have heard it said that the Railway Commission at Guelph is exorbitant in its requests. I do not know what those requests are, but I think that the Postmaster General should take action at once to fix a price, and if he will strike out the words which I have indicated he will be able to fix a price.

Mr. BUCHANAN: For what reason are municipally owned railways excluded?

Mr. PELLETIER: In all our experience we have had no trouble whatever with the municipally owned electric railways. I was asked by them: have you any reason to complain about us? I told them: no, you have been very decent about it. They said: if so, why put us on the same footing as the others who are so exacting? I thought they were right. The letter carriers in every city would like to enjoy this privilege, which is now so general; but in many cases they are prevented from doing so on account of the prohibitive price which certain tramway companies endeavour to exact from the department. In the case of Guelph or other towns where there are municipally owned railways we have authorities who will help us to come to terms and to meet the views of the letter carriers in a fair way, and those are the reasons why we have not included the municipally-owned railway. So far as my knowledge goes, the municipally-owned railways have given us rates which compare in a favourable manner with those of the joint stock companies.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Have the Guelph people done so?

Mr. PELLETIER: I am not in a position to tell my hon. friend about it just at the moment, but if the matter is not settled by the Guelph people on proper lines my hon. friend can count on me to do what is right in the matter. If that tramway in Guelph is the property of the corporation, probably we cannot reach them under this clause, but if it is in the hands of a company we can reach them. I have put this section in in order to show the other companies with which we have been having so much trouble—companies which are making enormous profits and which have no consideration for employees who are obliged to walk the streets with their loads—to show them that we intend to make a distinction between them and those companies which offer us fair terms. I want to make a clear distinction between the people who act in a fair way in the matter and those who demand from us prohibitive rates and, if they do not get them, decline to take care of the transportation of the men. We have been unable to come to terms with the company in Moosejaw; that is one of the few places in the West where we have been unable to come to a reasonable arrangement with the company.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What did you offer?

Mr. PELLETIER: I cannot recall the figures, but I offered the same rates as are paid all over corresponding area in the West. They admitted that the other companies were prepared to accept the rates offered, but they said: We will not accept them; we will get more. I found a very fair spirit on the part of the men, who told me not to give that price to the company. but to give them the difference and they would provide their own transportation. I have agreed to do that. I would say to my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) that I would rather have this legislation passed as it is and if there is one case that is left out I shall tell this corporation that we have passed this law for this year and that they may be one of the exceptions among all municipally owned railways, but if they do not agree to it, another law will be enacted so as to reach them. I want to see all letter carriers taken care of in this respect and these tramway companies should do it. If they do not wish to do so I will see that they do.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am glad to have that assurance from the hon. Postmaster General. I am afraid there may be some difficulty in coming to terms with the Guelph electric railway. That is an ordinary provincial electric company. The city bought a controlling interest in its stock and operates it through a controlling commission which is elected, but it is just in the same position as an ordinary privately owned company. I cannot see why the words 'except municipally owned railways' should not be omitted. The present condition is unfair to the letter carriers but to the citizens of Guelph because they are kept waiting for their mail. If the words referred to were struck out the Postmaster General would have power to control the Guelph company and secure a reasonable rate there.

Mr. PELLETIER: I wish to give credit to the people who are entitled to it. These people have acted in the proper spirit and I told them that when I asked Parliament to enact that clause they would be given this consideration. I would like to keep faith with them, but I can tell the hon. member for South Wellington that I am quite prepared to do for Guelph what I am doing at the present time for Moosejaw, if the letter carriers there are in the same position and if the company is not willing to do what it ought to do. The letter carriers in Moosejaw are satisfied with the arrangement and it is at their request that I am doing it. I do not remember having received any communications from the letter carriers of Guelph.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have received them.

Mr. PELLETIER: If my hon. friend will tell the letter carriers in Guelph to send me a representation to that effect I will take it up and see they are treated fairly.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am glad to hear it.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Guelph railway is a company but the majority of the stock in the company is owned by the city. In Moosejaw it may happen that the municipality owns some of the stock of the company.

Mr. PELLETIER: That is a corporation.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is a corporation in Guelph only the city of Guelph owns practically all the stock. But that does not take it away from the operation of this clause. Has the minister satisfied himself that this Parliament has power to pass this legislation?

Mr. PELLETIER: Oh, yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Take the Moosejaw or Toronto street railway companies incorporated by provincial legislatures, their rates are subject to whatever bodies the legislature may create in the shape of a provincial railway commission. I very much question if this House has power to say to a provincially created company: You will carry people for a certain price. We might as well say we have power to compel a three cent rate in Toronto. I question if the minister has power to pass the legislation.

Mr. PELLETIER: This Bill was presented last year, not the whole of it, but this clause, and this question was raised. Some of the most important companies, one in particular, were trying to hold us up. The question whether we had this power was raised. We were at the tail end of the session and we were not able to come to an agreement with the company in question. Finally, I succeeded in making an arrangement. So I told that Parliament that I would drop the Bill for last year. The Department of Justice have been consulted in this matter. They have gone thoroughly into it and have told us that the Bill was well intra vires of the powers of this Parliament. If there was any doubt about it I think we might fairly run that little risk in order to see that we are not imposed upon by certain companies who think they can exact anything from the public and who are not desirous of helping the public as they ought to. At all events, the Department of Justice having fully considered the question, I do not venture to offer my own opinion about it. If I were to do so, I might. Under the circumstances I think this is a Bill very much in the public interest, and one for the assistance of the letter-carriers who are doing a great deal of good work and ought to be protected against the exaction of some of the corporations.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. W. J. Roche (Minister of the Interior), Bill No. 136, to amend the Dominion Lands Act, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Mr. ROCHE: This Bill provides for two principal amendments: one is in reference to the matter of pre-emptions, and the other is in reference to proving up on homestead pre-emptions, and purchased homesteads that are not suitable for agricultural purposes, by keeping a certain number of stock. When I was in the West last summer, and since then, a great many representations were made to me that people in the pre-emption area are labouring under certain disabilities in the matter of pre-emptions, which they desire to see removed. The first request was that they would not be charged interest the first three years. The present Act provides that interest shall be charged during the first three years, but not collected until the end of the third year, when the homestead patent has been earned, Although they are charged interest during that time, they are not allowed to pay either interest or any portion of the principal until the expiration of the three years. We are making provision to throw off the interest for the first three years. The pre-emption area is located in what was formerly known as a semi-arid district, and it was considered by the minister who created this pre-emption area that 320 acres in that particular district would not do more towards sustaining a farmer than 160 acres in a more productive part of the country. For that reason the lands were sold at $3 per acre, interest to be charged from the first. The first request made to me was to throw off the three years' interest. As time went on the requests became a little more drastic in character, and we have been asked to throw off the principal as well as the interest, allowing them to spend the same amount of money on fencing and to keep a certain number of stock. The third request was that we should treat the pre-emptions exactly as we treat the homesteads; that is that we should charge them nothing for them and give a refund to those who had already paid up in whole or in part. That was rather too radical a step, as it would mean the refunding of upwards of two or three million dollars to those who had already paid for their pre-emptions, in whole or in part. However, I am taking power under the amendments to shorten the time in which they may receive patents for their pre-emptions. By doing their cultivation and residential duties they may, if they desire to pay up in full, obtain their pre-emption patents at the same time they are entitled to receive homestead patents, or at any time between the three years and the six years as at present. These are the principal amendments. In connection with the amendment relating to stock, we are merely taking power to allow them to prove up by keeping a certain number of stock on lands not suitable for cultivation purposes. There was a time in the history of the Land Act when we had a stock provision, but it was abolished some years ago—possibly for good reasons. I have no doubt it was abused to a certain extent. However, we are safeguarding as far as we possibly can against abuses like occurred in the past. There are other minor amendments, not very important, to which I shall not refer to-night.

REPORT.

Report of the Dairy and Cold Storage Commission.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

BRITISH NATIONALITY NATURALIZATION.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 173, respecting British Nationality Naturalization and Aliens. He said:

The principal purpose of this Bill is to provide the legislation necessary under the agreement arrived at between this Government, the Home Government and the governments of the other dominions, to bring about an empire-wide naturalization.

The first part of the Bill deals with the definition of natural-born British subjects. It modifies the existing law, I think, substantially only to this extent: that whereas a person born out of the realm, whose father or grandfather was a British subject, is under the existing law a natural-born British subject, under the proposed legislation it is required that the father of such person should be a natural-born British subject. This is a reproduction of legislation enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

The next part of the Bill deals with naturalization, and it is that part the adoption of which by us is necessary in order to give effect to the arrangement arrived at. It prescribes the conditions of naturalization, which are those prescribed by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. It differs in several respects from our existing legislation. This difference results from the fact that we have agreed, after conference with the Government of the United Kingdom and the governments of the other self-governing dominions, upon conditions of naturalization that are to be similar in the United Kingdom and in each of the self-governing dominions.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: What do the other self-governing dominions include under the meaning of the Bill?

Mr. DOHERTY: They are set forth in the schedule to the Bill: the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, Newfoundland, the Dominion of Canada. The second part of the Act passed in the Parliament of the United Kingdom is intended to be effective throughout the empire, with the exception that it is not to be effective within the self-governing dominions unless it is adopted by the legislatures of those dominions. The purpose of this part of the Bill is to adopt, to meet that requirement, dispositions for naturalization presenting conditions similar to those prescribed by the legislation of the United Kingdom. Under the Act passed by the Home Parliament it is expressly provided that that part of it which has to do with naturalization shall have no application to the self-governing dominions unless adopted by their legislatures. It is further provided that, subject to the adoption by the legislature of any dominion, the government of that dominion shall have power to issue certificates of naturalization, which shall have the same effect as certificates issued by the Secretary of State, under the legislation of the United Kingdom. That is to say, it shall be effective throughout the empire generally, including, of course, the United Kingdom, and in all self-governing dominions which also adopt this legislation. This measure, after enacting the requirements for naturalization in conformity with the legislation of the Home Parliament, confers a similar power upon the Secretary of State in England and upon the governments of other self-governing dominions who adopt this legislation, to issue certificates which shall have the same effect as certificates issued under this Act by our Secretary of State.

I do not know that I need to-day go into details of this Bill, because it will be before the House for examination. Perhaps it would be well to point out some of the material differences between the requirements of our existing law and the requirements of this Bill. The period of residence differs in term, and differs also with regard to the place in which it must have been passed. The requirement as regards the period of time is that it shall be five years, but that it is sufficient that the last of the five years shall have been passed within the Dominion of Canada, provided the other four years were passed within the British possessions. There are requirements of adequate knowledge of the languages official in the country; in Canada, the French and the English languages. The certificates under this legislation are to be issued by the Secretary of State. They are not to emanate directly from the court, but under the sections which deal with the procedure there, the courts are to be resorted to for the purpose of establishing before them compliance with the essential conditions. The ultimate certificate however, will be issued by the Secretary of State upon the decision of the proper courts, which are practically the courts that now deal with these matters, when the party has established the possession of the necessary qualifications for naturalization. The other part of the Act deals with the effect of marriage upon the status of women with the question of throwing off nationality by British subjects, the question of alienage, and the question of the status of aliens. I do not think these will be found to differ in any important respect from our own law as we have it at present, nor indeed to differ from the disposition of the law of the United Kingdom as it stood before their recent legislation.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. DOHERTY moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 174, to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act, 1908. He said:

This Bill contains but one clause. Its purpose is to provide for the appointment of a deputy judge of the Juvenile Delinquent Court. It permits the appointment of a deputy judge by the judge of the Juvenile Delinquent Court, with the approval of the attorney general of the province. The consideration that has led me to regard as desirable the enactment of this legislation is that it has been found, in the operation of this Juvenile Delinquent Court—which, as is well known, seeks to deal with children in a manner to bring about their correction rather than for the purpose of inflicting punishment—there are a great many small matters that to-day are within the jurisdiction of that court, and therefore cannot be decided in the absence of the judge. In many instances it is very desirable that these matters should be proceeded with without delay, and it has been thought that in a great many cases it would be quite a suitable arrangement that the clerk of the court, who is perfectly familiar with the routine proceedings, should have power to deal with such matters in the absence of the judge. It is for the purpose of creating a condition in which that may be done that this legislation is sought to be enacted. I may say that this Bill is introduced at the instance of Judge Choquette, of the Juvenile Court of Montreal, whose experience has led him to make the suggestion. As the appointment is to be by the judge subject to the approval of the attorney general of the province, I think we may rely on it that the power will not be used for the appointment of other than suitable persons. The clerk of the court I have referred to is Mr. Dawson, and it will be generally acknowledged that he is a very competent person indeed to perform the duties, and that he is one who has proven himself most earnest in the work of endeavouring to bring about the correction and improvement of errant and apparently incorrigible children.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPREME COURT ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. DOHERTY moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 175, to amend the Supreme Court Act. He said:

It will be remembered that at the last session of this Parliament an amendment was made to the Supreme Court Act for the purpose of making appealable from the province of Ontario, and from other provinces to which are applicable the same conditions of appeal as to those of the province of Ontario, a judgment rendered in a suit where the judgment decides some substantial right on the part of the parties, even though such judgment may not be final. In the application of the law so enacted the question has been raised whether that legislation applies to cases which have been instituted before the enactment of that legislation, and, if I mistake not, it has been held that it does not apply. It is considered desirable that in such cases the amendment should be made applicable, and the purpose of the present Bill is to provide that this amendment—quoting the words of the Bill itself:

> Shall apply as well to actions, suits, causes, matters, or other judicial proceedings commenced before the date of the passing of the said chapter 51 as to actions, suits, causes, matters, or other judicial proceedings commenced since that date.

There is a proviso against this legislation being applicable in any case where the question has been decided in a sense opposed to the effect of this legislation.

Mr. MURPHY: Is there any particular case that this is designed to affect?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not aware of any particular case. I have had correspondence with lawyers upon the subject pointing out that difficulties have arisen. I believe there is one decision in the matter; I will look it up and communicate it to my hon. friend.

Mr. MURPHY: Do I understand the minister to say that this Bill will not apply to any case which has been decided as being without the provisions of the Bill of last session?

Mr. DOHERTY: We would not undertake to interfere with any judgment that has been rendered in any particular case.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill No. 172, respecting the Toronto Terminals Railway Company.—Mr. Macdonell.

COMMUTATION OF SENTENCE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. KYTE: I desire to ask the Minister of Justice if application has been made to him for commutation of the sentence passed upon Frank Haynes, sentenced to death for the killing of Ben Atkinson of Sydney.

Mr. DOHERTY: Application was made yesterday for commutation of sentence.

Mr. KYTE: Has any determination been reached in the matter?

Mr. DOHERTY: I had an opportunity of hearing these gentlemen only last evening and this morning, and I have not, since the application was made, been in a position to arrive at any decision upon it. I may say that the matter had consideration before this application was made.

THE CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY RESOLUTION.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. GRAHAM: I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister to a statement included among those presented to the House yesterday in regard to the proposed Canadian Northern Railway guarantee. This statement is headed:

> Engineers' estimate of cost—Canadian Northern Railway System. All lines—summary sheet. Estimated cost of betterments.

At the foot of the page there is a statement which reads as follows:

Construction as above		$41,987,565
Amount due on construction, sub-contractors' accounts, etc., not in above—see accompanying statement—
Western lines	$8,348,290
Eastern lines	6,606,424
		$14,954,714
Rolling stock		27,441,086
Betterments		10,000,000
		$100,379,099
Proceeds of securities earned or available against the above		58,473,988
Balance		$41,905,117

I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that the sum of $100,379,009 is evidently the wrong amount. An item of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 must be missing.

Mr. BORDEN: There is an item missing, that of Montreal terminals, $5,595,754. It was dropped in making the copy. The securities which are to provide for the construction of those terminals are included in the item of $58,473,982, but in the copying of the document the same item was omitted by the typewriter. I did not notice this omission when I placed the document on the table of the House; in fact, it was placed in my hands just as I presented it to the House. I am sorry the mistake occurred and I have given instructions that an amended copy, including this, shall be laid upon the table of the House; in fact, I expected to have it here to-day.

I would like to say to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition that the statement of the capitalization of the various companies was to have been laid on the table of the House to-day. On looking over it I saw that the capitalization of one of the minor companies had been omitted and I therefore sent it back. It will be here within ten or fifteen minutes, and I will take the opportunity to lay it on the table at a later date. In addition to that, a number of other documents will be laid upon the table to-morrow. I hope to have them in such form that several copies will be available.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Would the Prime Minister look over the statement just read by my friend beside me. There is an item to this effect:

> Sub-contractors, amounts not in above, see accompanying statement.

I do not see that accompanying statement.

Mr. BORDEN: If it is desired that we should set out the names of all the sub-contractors to whom amounts are owing, I do not know that there would be any great objection.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: At all events, it is stated here that there is an accompanying statement.

Mr. BORDEN: It was not thought desirable, unless urgently required, to lay the names of the various creditors on the table of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It would be advisable to have something in the way of a statement, because it refers here to the accompanying statement; so evidently it has been prepared.

Mr. BORDEN: It has been prepared.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Then I would expect my right hon. friend to lay it on the table.

Mr. BORDEN: I shall consider that. It was not thought advisable, in the absence of some urgent reason, that the names of the various creditors should be laid on the table of the House.

Mr. MURPHY: I would again draw attention to a delayed return with reference to the Canadian Northern railway. In March last I placed a question on the Order Paper asking for certain information. That question was allowed to remain unanswered for over a month. Then, at the request of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, it was turned into an order for a return. That happened some weeks ago, but the return has not yet been brought down. In the interval, the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) put a question on the Order Paper covering somewhat the same ground, and obtained the desired information within a very few days. I am not going to complain about discrimination, but I hope I shall not have again to draw the attention of my hon. friend to the delay in connection with this return.

Mr. J. D. REID: I will send over to the deputy minister now and ask why there is delay in presenting the return.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I should like to inquire, before the debate on the Canadian Northern Railway resolution is proceeded with, whether the Government is in a position to furnish the House with particulars of the $38,000,000 alleged to be in hand. This amount is supposed to be the proceeds arising from the sale of the securities of the Canadian Northern Pacific, Canadian Northern Ontario, and the Canadian Northern Alberta railway. I should like to know how this sum is made up.

Mr. BORDEN: Information will be laid on the table of the House with regard to that. The amount is constituted not solely of the proceeds from the sale of securities, but of subsidies yet to be earned as well.

ST. LAWRENCE SHIP ACCIDENTS.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would invite the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the fact that there has been another accident on the St. Lawrence. The Saturnia met with an accident somewhere around the Traverse below Quebec, and I see from the newspaper report of the invesigation which is taking place that the accident was due to the lack of equipment on the part of the marine agency at Quebec. It appears that the lightship was not placed there in due time and that if the lightship had been towed to position by the proper vessel it would have arrived in time to avert the accident. Strict investigation should be held into this matter, because since the opening of navigation only a few days ago, this is the third accident on the St. Lawrence route.

Mr. HAZEN: I have a memorandum regarding the matter which I shall read to the House in a moment. I do not think that any report of the nature mentioned by my hon. friend. from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has been made by the wreck commissioner who is investigating the disaster with the assistance of two nautical assessors. Their report will no doubt place the blame where it belongs. I may say that while the lightship was not at the Traverse, every step was taken that could be taken by the engineer of the department at Quebec and the agency at Quebec, whose business it is to look after matters of this kind. As the hon. gentleman is aware, the aids to navigation on the St. Lawrence, or any other river which is infested with ice, cannot be placed until the ice is out of the river. I understand that this year, through an attempt to place buoys at an earlier date than ice conditions justified, seven or eight buoys were destroyed. If the buoys and lightships and aids to navigation are placed at an earlier date than ice conditions will permit, great loss occurs and no benefit is derived. I saw the newspaper report to which my hon. friend refers, and asked the officials to furnish me with a memorandum stating exactly the facts so far as the department knew them. This is the statement placed in my hands by the officials of the department; it bears the initials of the inspector of lights, Mr. McPhail:

> In the matter of statements in the Montreal Gazette of today, respecting absence of buoys and the Lower Traverse lightship, the usual arrangements were made this spring whereby all equipment would be in readiness to place in operation as soon as ice conditions would permit.
> Accordingly, about the 15th instant, the buoys in the wider part of the river, from Hare island downward, were placed.
> Immediately the statements in the Montreal Gazette came to my attention, I telephoned to the superintendent of lights at Quebec with respect to those statements and learned that on the morning of Monday, the 27th instant, the Druid left Quebec with the buoys to be placed between Quebec and Portneuf, to stand by against the time that the ice would pass down, which was expected to occur on the following day, namely the 28th. As a matter of fact ice did not go out on the 28th and the buoys were accordingly placed, and the work downwards was followed up with all possible despatch, and is at the present time proceeding. It is unfortunate that the Montcalm is out of commission this spring, as the work of placing the buoys cannot be completed as expeditiously as usual. In any case the work in that section between Portneuf and the Traverse could not have been commenced earlier than it was, for the reason that had the buoys been placed in the narrow part of the river below, which was open, they would surely have been carried away and the lanterns would have been destroyed by the lake St. Peter ice when it passed down. We had an example in the Montreal Agency the day before yesterday and yesterday of eight lanterns being damaged by running ice, on account of the buoys having been placed earlier than nature ordained. It is true the buoys in the clear part of the river below Quebec might have been placed before the lake St. Peter ice went out, but not only would the lanterns have been destroyed but the buoys themselves would have been endangered and would certainly have been dragged from their proper positions and thereby constitute a menace to navigation.

As to the Lower Traverse lightship, the same arguments apply, to a lesser extent, to her as to the buoys with respect to running ice. I learned by telephone that she was cut out of the Louise basin last week by a tug and prepared for commission against the time that it would be safe to place her. It was considered safe to despatch her on Sunday, but unfortunately, when preparing to get under way, it was discovered that the rudder was still frozen and had to be thawed out by them. She left Quebec at 9 a.m. on Monday morning, arriving at the Pillars in the evening at the turn of the tide and, not being able to proceed against flood tide, anchored there and took up her station on Tuesday morning. The pilots were advised that it was uncertain whether or not the lightship would be on her station Monday night.

As stated in the Gazette article, the channel was suitably marked for day navigation by spars, which are not in danger of being destroyed or deranged by running ice.

The superintendent of lights will report in detail on these several matters.

Ottawa, 30th April, 1914.

My hon. friend will see, therefore, that we are taking steps to ascertain all the facts, and no doubt the Wreck Commissioners' court, which is now sitting in Quebec, will place the blame, if any exists, on the proper shoulders and report the facts so that they will be known to shipping men generally, and to the House.

HALIFAX NAVAL COLLEGE.

On the Orders of the Day being called.

Mr. MACDONALD: I saw an announcement in the press the other day with regard to the Naval College at Halifax which, if true, should be made to the House. I would like to ask the Minister of Naval Affairs what changes the department proposes to make in regard to the future operation of that college, the basis of the changes, and whether or not the college is to be continued.

Mr. HAZEN: The regulations have been laid on the table of the House and have been published in the Canada Gazette in full; more clearly and briefly, perhaps, than I could give the information.

Mr. MACDONALD: What, in brief, is the policy of the Government in regard to the college?

Mr. HAZEN: Students entering the Naval College in future will be trained there to a certain extent—as in the Military College at Kingston—not only for naval work, but for work in civil life; as, for instance, for the Hydrographic Survey, Tidal Survey, and other scientific work of that description. A change has been made in the curriculum to provide for this. The course of study has also been changed from a two-year course to a three-year course.

THE SAN FRANCISCO EXHIBITION.

On the motion of Mr. White for Committee of Supply:

Mr. W. G. WEICHEL (North Waterloo): Before the House goes into Committee of Supply I wish to refer to a very important matter that is to-day attracting great attention throughout Canada and the empire, namely, the opening of the Panama canal and the San Francisco exposition.

Great Britain's refusal to participate in the Panama exposition to be held in San Francisco in 1915 was received with regret by many business interests throughout the empire. Many urgent requests have been made by commercial bodies, and petitions have been sent by over half the members of the British House of Commons, for the Government of Great Britain to reconsider her decision, but so far they have not been successful. The reason given by both Great Britain and Germany, who also refused to participate at that time, was that it entailed too great an expense for any possible commensurate returns, especially in view of the almost prohibitive United States tariff which prevailed at that time. To the ordinary observer, however, it was apparent that these two countries resented discrimination against them in the Panama tolls legislation, which was considered by them a breach of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty regarding the use of the Panama canal. These were the conditions obtaining when invitations to participate were extended and, at that time, refused. Since then the high tariff of the United States has been considerably reduced; in fact, it is almost on a par with that of the Dominion of Canada, and this reduction is of the greatest moment to European countries as well as to our own Dominion.

The people of this country, as well as those of other countries, watched with interest the magnificent fight waged by President Wilson in the House at Washington for the repeal of the legislation in question. He has succeeded in carrying through the House of Representatives, by a majority of 86, a Bill to repeal the Panama tolls legislation of last Congress. Therefore, I am of the opinion that it is not unlikely that the British Government will reconsider their refusal, and signify by their action that they appreciate President Wilson's courageous and honourable course. I might here refer to an article which appeared in the Chamber of Commerce Journal in April last, from which I extract the following:

In answer to a question by Mr. Lynch, Mr. Harcourt said that Canada would participate and New Zealand, and he understood in some degree Australia, but not South Africa. He forwarded the invitation of the United States Government to the self-governing dominions in May, 1912, and had been in communication with them ever since, but he was not informed of what they proposed to do in detail. Some of them had applied for information at different times as to the attitude of His Majesty's Government, but none of them had expressed a desire that we should reconsider our decision.

We in Canada are participating in the exposition, and as we are in closest proximity to the United States and friendly in our intercourse with that great nation, I believe it would strengthen the bonds of friendship existing between Great Britain and the United States if the British Government could be persuaded to reconsider their decision, and to participate in the San Francisco exposition. It is desirable because the event synchronizes with the very important celebration of the centenary of peace between the two nations, and it would strengthen and cement the existing friendly relations. It would come with great force from the Dominion Parliament, and would create a great response of good feeling from the United States. If Great Britain reverses her decision, Germany may follow, and thus strengthen the ties between these three great countries. Many Canadians intend visiting San Francisco during the exposition in 1915, and participation by the mother country would be hailed with delight by many of us who are anxiously looking forward to a visit during that time. The exposition is creating a good deal of interest throughout Canada. I have in my hand a resolution which I received from the Berlin Board of Trade, dated March 23, 1914, and which reads as follows:

Moved by Mr. D. B. Detweiler, seconded by Mr. W. D. Cleghorn:

Whereas the completion of the Panama canal, a work of world-wide significance, will be commemorated by the Panama exposition at San Francisco in 1915, in which exhibition the United States has invited all friendly nations to unite;

And whereas participation in the exhibition not merely by Canada, but by the Empire as a whole, is especially desirable because the event synchronizes with the very important celebration of the Century of Peace between the two nations, and will not only strengthen and cement the existing happy relations, but will sustain British prestige in the Americas and the Orient, an object of special moment to Canada as the portion of the empire in closest proximity to these nations:

Therefore, be it resolved that the Berlin Board of Trade respectfully request the Parliament of Canada to urge upon the Imperial Government the great desirability of reconsidering the present decision not to participate in that exhibition; and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to W. G. Weichel, M.P., for North Waterloo, for transmission to the Canadian House of Commons.

Mr. BORDEN: I am sure that we all appreciate the observations which the hon. member has just addressed to the House with regard to the subject of participation in the great exposition which is to be held next year in San Francisco in commemoration of the opening of the Panama canal. When the question arose as to whether or not this country should participate in that exhibition, we had no difficulty whatever in arriving at the conclusion that it would be desirable to do so from every standpoint. My hon. friend and colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell), to whose department such matters appertain, has made and is making very effective and thorough preparations in order that Canada may be adequately represented at that exhibition and take no small part therein. We should all be glad, I am sure, if the mother country had seen fit to take the same course, but we have not thought it at all necessary or desirable that any representations should be made by Canada in that regard, inasmuch as the question is one for the Government and Parliament of the United Kingdom just as our own participation is a matter for the Government and Parliament of Canada.

I shall give my best consideration, however, to what my hon. friend has urged and to the representations which are set forth in the resolution from the Berlin Board of Trade which he has placed before the House. I am thoroughly confident, and indeed we had the pronouncement in Parliament by the Prime Minister and other ministers of the United Kingdom, that the failure of the mother country to take part in the exhibition is not induced by any feeling of resentment or otherwise in connection with any of the matters which have been alluded to. Full explanations and statements have been made in that regard in the Imperial Parliament, to which I am sure every hon. member, every citizen of this country and of the empire, will give full credence and credit. I agree most heartily in what my hon. friend has said in regard to the desirability of maintaining and strengthening in every way the existing cordial relations between the great empire of which Canada forms a part and the great neighbouring republic. I am sure we are all happy beyond measure that these relations were never more cordial or more friendly than they are at the present time. On both sides of the House hon. members will agree that everything possible for the purpose of strengthening the friendliness of those relations, if that friendliness can be increased, ought to be done. I cannot say more at the moment than that the suggestion which my hon. friend has placed before the House will receive the best consideration of the Government.

MANAGEMENT OF THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

On motion of Hon. W. T. White (Minister of Finance) for Committee of Supply:

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, we were favoured about a month ago with the annual Budget delivered by the acting Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) in connection with the department over which he now presides, in which considerable reference was made to the Intercolonial railway. My hon. friend gave a statement of the affairs of that railway but apparently his words on that occasion in that regard at least have been entirely lost sight of. I assume it was because of the lengthy discussion which occurred in connection with the Trancontinental Railway report brought to the notice of the House by my hon. friend at that time. The Intercolonial is a subject that has received considerable attention in times past. I myself I think, have been guilty on many occasions of dealing with the subject, if guilt there is connected with it at all. I want to make some few observations this afternoon relating to the management of that road. I shall conclude my remarks with a motion.

I do not wish to repeat anything that has been said in the past in respect to the historical phase of the Intercolonial or the part played in our Canadian commerce or nationality. I want to deal with the situation of the Intercolonial as it presents itself to me, and, as I think, it presents itself to the major portion of the inhabitants of eastern Canada. I shall deal with the subject under three heads practically. First, I shall endeavour to show, and I hope I shall be able to succeed in so doing, that the present management of the Intercolonial railway is detrimental to the successful and satisfactory operation of the road in the interests of the people; second, that the management, in violation of the law, makes the railway subservient to other competitive railway interests, thereby discriminating against the general public and patrons of the Government railway system and causing a disturbance and diversion of its legitimate traffic; and, third, that the management of the Intercolonial railway is manifestly unfair to those trained upon the system and who are familiar with the conditions and needs of its patrons.

I shall deal with the first, having regard to the situation of the railway, as to what it is at this moment, as to what I think it should be, and in relation to its financial condition Let me remind the House of some of the utterances of my hon. friend the acting Minister of Railways and Canals on the 24th March last. On that occasion he mentioned the fact that there had been a change in the method of managing the road; that is to say, that the management by means of a board of managers had been dispensed with and that there had been substituted therefor a one man management in the form of general manager, he claiming that the substitution of a general manager for the board of management made it much more direct and satisfactory. I concur in this conclusion. I have always favoured the management of the road directly by a general manager in preference to a board of managers. Others differ from me in that respect, but I think the results justify not only the prophecy I made in respect to it, but the contentions which I put forward as regards the actual results. But my hon. friend seemed to put this forward as if the management by a board had not continued under the present Government, but that the change had been made at the time of the change of Administration.

I am sure my hon. friend did not wish to create such a false impression, because he knows that for a year and a half after the present Administration came into power, that board of management was continued. My hon. friend went on to say that previous to the change in management the board had decided to increase the rates and it was their intention to do so, thus implying that the present management were not responsible for the increased freight charge under the present tariff. I have always contended that no matter how you manage the Intercolonial railway no government can free itself of responsibility for the management of that railway, and if after the change of administration the board of management concluded to increase the freight rates, it could not be done without an Order in Council. No minister of railways, no general manager of the Intercolonial, could add one cent to the freight charges of that railway except by Order in Council, thus making the whole Government fully responsible. My hon. friend went on to speak of the financial condition of the railway, and estimating a certain revenue for February and March he figured out that there would be a surplus of $300,000, which he claimed would be appropriated to the renewal of equipment account. The Hon. Mr. Cochrane, Minister of Railways, who was present last session, and whose absence now we regret and particularly on account of his illness, took great kudos for the fact that on the 31st of March, 1913, the surplus of earnings on the Intercolonial railway over expenditure would amount to $770,000. I naturally, in common with others, shared in the congratulations that were properly due on account of that financial result, assuming the statement to be correct, which unfortunately it was not. The railway statistics for the Dominion of Canada for the year ending June 30, 1913, which have been placed on the table of the House are prepared by direction of the Government for the fiscal year beginning the 1st of July and ending the 30th of June, in accordance with the practice of railways generally throughout the Dominion. From the railway statistics I find that the total operating expenses of the Intercolonial for the year ending 30th June, 1913, amounted to $12,510,311.73; while the earnings and income for the same year amounted to $12,349,296.06, or an actual deficit of $161,015.16. Now, how did that occur? It occurred simply because, in order to make a more favourable balance sheet for the year ending 31st March, 1913, there must have been withheld from the accounts of that year expenditures that properly should have been charged to the year ending the 31st March, 1913. It would appear that work that should have been paid for out of the operating expenses of the year ending the 31st of March, 1913, was projected into the succeeding year, and that between the 1st of April and the 30th day of June these expenditures incurred in the previous fiscal year had to be paid. This demonstrates that the operation of the Intercolonial railway for that year resulted in a deficit instead of a surplus. I regret this very much indeed. I am willing to give to this Government to any minister of railways all the kudos he is entitled to if he can successfully manage the Intercolonial in the interests of the Dominion, and when I heard the Minister of Railways make the statement I felt like congratulating him and the people of the country on that fact. But unfortunately the surplus did not exist and in its stead there was a deficit on the year's operation. In times past ministers of railways have been charged with so arranging the accounts of the Intercolonial railway that at the end of the fiscal year a surplus was shown where, if the bills had all been paid for the year, and the work done that ought to have been done, there would have been a deficit I remember that some years ago, I think it was in 1905, there was demonstrated to this Parliament a great deficit on the operation of the Intercolonial railway. How did that occur? Because we seized the opportunity to pay off all liabilities, to bring to an end all outstanding accounts and to have the year close clean and clear with the payment of every dollar. Unfortunately it showed to our disadvantage for that year, but in the years that followed the equilibrium was restored. Meantime, it was at least demonstrated that the accounts were properly managed and all bills paid at the proper time. Now, my hon. friend would have us believe that on the year's operation ending March 31 last, the excess of revenue over expenditure on the Intercolonial railway was $300,000, which, he claims, is to be applied to the renewal of equipment account. He explains as follows:

> I might explain for the benefit of the members of the House, as I dare say there are many who do not understand the statement, that it is proposed to transfer this, to the 'renewal of equipment account.'

The change to which the hon. gentleman refers was made, and I think it was made during the time I had the honour to preside over that department. But the account was a suspense account, and these charges were first made against it, and whatever surplus was shown was over and above these charges. Had my hon. friend acted in accordance with the practice of the past he would have charged up that $300,000 before he mentioned surplus. But had he done that, there would have been no surplus for him to speak about. That money was necessary to provide renewals of equipment, that should be charged to revenue and not to capital account. So that he stands in this position—that for the year ending 31st of March last there was no surplus, if he follow the practice of book-keeping inaugurated five or six years ago, and continued, as I understand it, down to the present time.

Mr. BORDEN: I desire to follow the hon. gentleman's argument. Does he mean that there never could be a surplus, because in any case the income over expenditure would have to be transferred to that account before the accounts were made up?

Mr. EMMERSON: No, what I mean is that there was a provision made by the opening of this account whereby a certain sum should be applied yearly—

Mr. BORDEN: How much?

Mr. EMMERSON: It commenced with $250,000, and the amount was increased in later years. The amount was charged up just as any other expenditure, but in suspense, and the surplus, if any, would be lessened by the amount of that charge. Had my hon. friend charged up the $300,000, or whatever sum he proposes to charge up on the year's operation, his surplus would have been reduced; or, if he proposed to apply more than $300,000, then he would have shown a deficit instead of a surplus.

Mr. BORDEN: There has been a statute providing that any excess shall be used for the purpose of the railway instead of passing into the consolidated revenue fund. Is it in relation to that that he is speaking? I ask for information.

Mr. EMMERSON: The statute was not passed in the first place, it was inaugurated by Order in Council; but within the last few years, I think, during the regime of my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), the statute was passed. The effect is that no matter what sum stood to the credit of the Intercolonial railway as a surplus at the end of the year should be applied to the interests of the railway, and not go into the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. BORDEN: Was not that amended during the last two or three years?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not sure; I do not recollect.

Mr. J. D. REID: May I ask is it not the fact that each month a certain amount is charged up to the working expense of the road and credited to this special fund—say at the rate of $300,000 a year—and then at the end of the year, if there is any further surplus, it is also added to this special fund, and the total amount is expended on new equipment?

Mr. EMMERSON: I do not know what is the practice of the department to-day; I speak of it as it was. A certain amount was applied as the requirements of the railway demanded.

Mr. REID: Was that the way it was done when the hon. gentleman was Minister of Railways and Canals, or was a certain amount charged to be laid aside for new equipment, and then if there was a further surplus that also was transferred to the same account and used in the same way?

Mr. EMMERSON: The work was actually done and it was paid for; the money went into the operating expenses of the railway, and if at the end of the year the amount which we had allowed for that purpose was more than made up by the surplus, we credited it to the same account and then we showed a surplus if we could. But my hon. friend adopts a different method. Were he to charge up this amount, there would be no surplus of earnings. I hold that any surplus that is shown by reason of the non-charging of these necessary items of expenditure to current account is a false surplus and does not properly show the real condition of the railway. If he intends to apply to equipment only a sum equal to this so-called surplus, then he has secured an equilibrium of expenditure and revenue, and upon that he is to be commended, and we congratulate him.

So much with regard to the financial condition of the railway. There has been adopted in connection with the management of the Intercolonial a new policy—an innovation in the affairs of that railway which has proved to be not only detrimental to the railway itself but also very much against the interests of its patrons. I have said that I thought that the management was detrimental to the successful and satisfactory operation of the railway and the interests of the people. Let me say that in not proceeding with the branch line policy which was promised by my right hon. friend when he was in opposition, the interests of the Intercolonial have been very materially interfered with. I know that when we ask hon. gentlemen: do you purpose purchasing or acquiring by lease or otherwise these branch lines? the answer given is: no, the Senate intervened. In what way did the Senate intervene? It would seem to me that my right hon. friend and the Minister of Finance, who is not now in his seat, considered that the Senate did them a very great service when they did not pass that Bill without amendment. I submit that the Senate did not carve the Bill so that no further action could be taken. They simply proposed an amendment whereby the Department of Railways and Canals would be compelled to place before Parliament any contract or any arrangement which they made in respect to any particular railway. Does that prevent them from going on? It can be recalled that branch lines have been acquired in the past for the Intercolonial. In these cases, was any special legislation secured before the action was taken? I recall the fact that the Canada Eastern railway in New Brunswick was acquired in the interests of the Intercolonial and in the interests of the people; it was acquired by contract which was submitted to Parliament, after which the arrangement was carried out. If the present Administration were desirous of acquiring any of the branch lines connected with the Intercolonial they could have done it without regard to the action of the Senate and without regard to any legislation. I want to make this statement to my right hon. friend and to the acting Minister of Railways: arrangements have been tentatively entered into between certain of the branch lines railway companies and the Intercolonial Railway Company whereby these railways may, upon certain terms, be acquired. If I am not correct in that statement, I desire to be corrected. Such arrangements were made; why have they not been carried out? Why has not the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway, running between Sackville, in the county of Westmorland, and Cape Tormentine, and connecting the Intercolonial railway with water communication with Prince Edward Island; why has that railway not been acquired? An arrangement was agreed upon whereby, in my judgment, it could have been reasonably secured in the interests of the Intercolonial and in the interests of the people. Nothing, however, has been done, and when any member or any supporter of the Government goes into the county of Westmorland, instead of frankly telling the people that the Government could have done this; that the Government could have carried this through without the legislation that was proposed to be amended by the Senate, he says: Oh, we could not go on with it because the Senate killed the Bill. Mr. Speaker, that is not so. The Senate did not kill the Bill relating to branch line railways; they merely suggested a very reasonable amendment, and I think the Government and the management of the Intercolonial stand convicted for not carrying out that policy with respect to these branch lines. I shall not give further illustrations; they are in existence and they could be cited, but I say that the Government in not securing these branch lines are doing not only an injury to the Intercolonial railway itself, but they are doing also a grave injury to the trade and commerce of the country. They are materially obstructing the interests of Prince Edward Island; they are injuring the coal interests of Nova Scotia; they are injuring the fishing and quarrying interests of New Brunswick; they are impeding the development and progress of eastern Canada by their inaction in connection with this matter. I say that it is a matter of serious impeachment against the Government that they have been so inactive. The truth is that the present Minister of Railways—I am not referring to my hon. friend the acting minister—the present Minister of Railways, who is now absent, is entirely opposed to the acquisition of any branch lines connected with the Intercolonial railway. He has argued against them; he has called them not feeders but milkers; he has spoken of them derisively and contemptuously. So far as his utterances, confirmed by his actions, are concerned, certainly he stands as being entirely opposed to the carrying out of the branch lines policy which was promised by my right hon. friend, when he was leader of the Opposition, during the elections of 1911.

The service on the Intercolonial has never been at such a low ebb as it has been during the past season. It has been deteriorating. Take the train service between Montreal, Halifax and the Sydneys; during the past year and a half or two years the service has been deteriorated to a degree that cannot well be described. Whether in the matter of accommodation, the matter of parlour-car or dining-car service; in whatever way you speak of it, it has deteriorated. The road-bed has not, I think, been maintained at the proper standard. Yet the revenues of the railway have grown year by year; where a few years ago we had $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 of a revenue, to-day we have between $12,000,000 and $13,000,000. I maintain that during the present year the standard of our gross earnings would have been kept up had the service been commensurate with the requirements of the country. To my mind, the cutting off of the Ocean Limited was one of the most injurious things that has been done in connection with the railway in many years. It diverted and cut off the traffic that was growing year by year. During the last and preceding years, when we had in operation over the Intercolonial the Ocean Limited and the Maritime Express, eighty per cent of the westbound traffic went over the whole of the Intercolonial to Montreal, and only twenty or twenty-five per cent went over the Canadian Pacific railway from St. John.

Mr. HAZEN: Is it not a fact that during every year except the year 1913 the Ocean Limited did not run during the months of February and March, and that during the present year it was off only during February and March, as in the previous years, except 1913?

Mr. EMMERSON: My hon. friend is absolutely correct. When the Ocean Limited was first initiated it was intended only as a tourist train and ran for a few months during the summer season. Its fame went abroad. The first year it was not successful; the second year it was not continued on very much longer, but it was a greater success that year than it was in the preceding year and so on in each succeeding year the traffic upon that train grew. It advertised Canada abroad in a way that it had not been advertised so far as its train service was concerned. It increased the tourist traffic along the St. Lawrence and down through Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and to Prince Edward Island. It became a success, and as it was successful the management continued it in operation until finally they ran it throughout the season, a wise course to be adopted. But what happened? When it was run only as a summer train the traffic was diverted during the winter months over the Canadian Pacific railway, and a large percentage of it, so far as my observation teaches me, continued to be diverted throughout the summer months, even after the Ocean Limited had been restored. But it grew, and the fact of that train being in operation on the Intercolonial explains very much as regards the increased gross passenger earnings on the Intercolonial. And I say that it was rotten policy, it was against the interests of the railway, and it was playing into the hands of the Canadian Pacific railway to discontinue that train last winter when it had been so successful, comparatively speaking, the previous winter.

Mr. HAZEN: Will the hon. gentleman inform the House what the loss to the country was in operating the Ocean Limited during February and March, 1913?

Mr. EMMERSON: My hon. friend may have these figures, I have not. If its operation during those months did result in a direct loss, I say that indirectly it would have been a gain to the Intercolonial railway to have continued it. Many trains, the suburban trains in which my hon. friends are interested, are not successful in isolated cases, but will any railway management say that it is not in the general interest of railways to run certain trains at a loss when in the main the advantage to the railway may be demonstrated?

Mr. HAZEN: My information is that the loss on running the Ocean Limited during February and March, 1913, amounted to very nearly $300,000.

Mr. EMMERSON: It may have, I am not in a position to answer my hon. friend. I do not know. But even at such a loss, if it had been continued it would have been more than made up by the increased continuance of travel during the remainder of the year. We all know that travel is easily diverted. We are creatures of habit, individually and collectively. We get into a habit of going by a certain route and we continue to go there. Suddenly there is no opportunity of following the course we have always pursued and we become accustomed to some other route. Naturally we continue the diversion and so it is with respect to the Ocean Limited. I believe that the continuance of that train over the Intercolonial railway has contributed as much as any other agency to the growth of the earning power of the Intercolonial railway. I think it has advertised the Intercolonial throughout America in a way that no other train has done in past history, and I believe that it is a penny-wise and pound-foolish policy for the Intercolonial railway, because of the loss that might be entailed during certain months of the year, to discontinue that train. When there was only one train over the Intercolonial railway from Halifax to Montreal, the Canadian Pacific railway had a practical monopoly or a large proportion of the traffic between those two points, and for very obvious reasons, one being the time of departure from Montreal. When this second train was put on over the Intercolonial railway, in 1905 or 1906, there was a great change in this respect. I asked the department for certain information respecting the percentage of westbound traffic over the respective trains and I was furnished with this information:

Year.	Via Intercolonial.		Via St. John.
	No. of passengers.	Per cent.	No. of passengers.	Per cent.
1910.....	9,077	69·6	3,968	30·4
1911.....	9,300	69·7	4,034	30·3
1912.....	11,206	73·	4,108	27·
1913.....	12,674	80·	3,113	20·

This shows that when the Intercolonial railway operated the Ocean Limited all the year round the traffic over that line from east to west was steadily increasing and the percentage of passenger traffic over the Canadian Pacific railway from east to west was steadily decreasing.

Mr. BORDEN: Between what points?

Mr. EMMERSON: This takes in all points—St. John and east of St. John.

The foregoing are from returns compiled in the office of the general passenger agent and for his information, not for accounting purposes. Corresponding figures are not available for the eastbound traffic, but usually the movement in the two directions about balance.

That demonstrates this fact: when you have two through expresses between Montreal and Halifax, running continuously throughout the year, your traffic is expanding and increasing, and it is to the advantage of the Intercolonial that those results should be brought about.

I now come to the second point. I hold that the interests of the Intercolonial are being made subsidiary and subservient to the Canadian Pacific, the other competitive railway; and that the patrons of the Government railway system are being discriminated against by the diversion of the legitimate traffic of that railway. The rates on the Intercolonial have increased very materially in the past few years. They are turning the screw at every point. I have a return here with respect to the freight charges on hay from points in Quebec eastward, and I find that the increases are in many cases as high as a dollar a ton, or from $30 to $40 a car. In some instances they are half that, and in some cases even less than that. The rates range from one to five cents a pound for hay. The Intercolonial service has been degraded, and the charges to the general public have been increased. I do not say that with respect to passenger traffic—yet, I do, because whereas in the past certain privileges were accorded to the patrons of the railway in the way of excursion and holiday rates, these have been withdrawn and the patrons are now compelled to pay the regular rates. The revenues necessarily have been increased by reason of the increased freight and passenger rates, but I hold that the service has not been commensurate. We have brought to the railway some very high-priced officials: Mr. Gutelius for one. He gets $20,000 a year, and we have another gentleman who gets $12,000. On the engineering staff of the Intercolonial to-day, there are twenty-seven engineers, where six years ago there were only four or five to do the whole work. We have engineers of almost every conceivable name; and not only engineers, but assistant engineers, and in the main they come from the Canadian Pacific railway. The manager, himself, comes from there. Canadian Pacific Railway officials are replacing Intercolonial officials, who have the proper qualifications, and have had experience on that railway. These new officials are making the Intercolonial subservient to the Canadian Pacific railway. Even the very forms that are in use in the offices and railway stations have been changed to conform to the Canadian Pacific's forms. The standard rules of the Canadian Pacific railway were adopted on the Intercolonial on the first of May. The men who have been long in the service, who have safely operated the trains under certain rules, and to a degree that accidents on that railway compare favourably with the accidents on any other railway on this continent—and particularly with the Canadian Pacific railway, which is held up to us as a model of operation and safety, but which according to the statistical returns of the Government of Canada has a larger proportion of accidents than the Intercolonial—are expected within a few months to become familiar with the standard rules of the Canadian Pacific railway. Let me say that there are 673 rules; rules upon which depend the safety of the lives of the passengers and trainmen. In a few months the old men, from 50 to 65 years of age are expected to become familiar with these 673 rules, and at the same time to continue running the trains under the old rules. The confusion that has resulted can be imagined. The men on the Intercolonial have been protesting in regard to this matter. When the Boston and Maine Railway system changed their rules they allowed two years for the new rules to be put in operation. The Government of Canada allows only two or three months, which will result, in my judgment, to the injury of the railway, of its employees, and of the passengers who travel on that line. The Intercolonial railway has been made subservient to the Canadian Pacific railway in connection with the Gutelius-Bosworth agreement. I have referred to this matter before and shall not now go into it in detail, but let me say that it is an agreement entered into without the authority of law, in my judgment, and without the approval of an Order in Council, whereby the Intercolonial carries a train of 400 to 500 tons from St. John to Halifax for $300, and agrees to bring back the cars to St. John free of charge; and not only that, but to pay the Canadian Pacific railway for the use of the cars which have been attached to that train. The answer has been made that it pays the Intercolonial to do it. I have a return before me showing clearly that it costs the Intercolonial at the very least .56 or over half a cent to transport freight per ton mile. That was the average cost during the months of April, May and June, 1913. That means that it costs $2.24 to carry 400 tons one mile. The distance between St. John and Halifax is 275 miles. A special freight train under the agreement consists of 500 tons eastbound and 400 tons westbound. Special passenger trains are limited to twelve cars including the vans, which, of course, are governed by weather conditions. That is the contention of the Intercolonial railway. I understand that the Canadian Pacific railway contend that the arrangement includes the carriage of a greater tonnage. But assuming it to be 400 tons, it costs the Intercolonial railway $616 to transport those 400 tons from St. John to Halifax for which it receives $300, taking the return of the Intercolonial itself in respect to the cost of transporting freight.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is that the actual cost or does it include overhead charges as well?

Mr. EMMERSON: I assume that includes all the charges because the statement is headed 'Intercolonial Railway; cost of transporting freight per ton mile, April, May and June, 1913, and April, May and June, 1912.' The items are given in the statement and show the cost per ton mile in 1913, to be ·56 while in 1912 the cost per ton mile was only ·50. In the month of June, 1913, it was ·67.

Mr. J. D. REID: Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the statement showed that the cost per ton mile for carrying freight on the Intercolonial was ·05 per cent?

Mr. EMMERSON: It is a little over half a cent per ton per mile.

Mr. REID: Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that 400 tons of freight cost $616? If so, would not that show 1½ cents per ton mile?

Mr. EMMERSON: No, I said that it cost the railway a little over half a cent to carry one ton a mile, and that if you carried 400 tons one mile it would cost $2.24. If you multiply that $2.24 by 275 miles you get the final results, namely, $616.

Mr. BORDEN: Why do you bring in 400 miles and then 275 miles?

Mr. EMMERSON: I mean 400 tons.

Mr. BORDEN: You said 400 miles.

Mr. EMMERSON: I was wrong. The cost of one ton would be a little over half a cent—·56. To carry 400 tons one mile would cost $2.24, and if you carried 400 tons 275 miles, which is the distance to Halifax, it would cost $616. That is according to the return placed upon the table by the minister. What does the Intercolonial get for carrying that freight?—$300.

It is inconceivable. What are the charges that are made against the general public in respect to the carriage of freight? This arrangement discriminates for some particular purpose in favour of the competing railway interest to the detriment of the general interests of the railway. That is my contention and I say it is one of the most iniquitous agreements that was ever entered into, that it was entered into without the authority of law and that the Government condoned and continued it. I am speaking without reference to any rival interests in this regard; I am speaking of this simply in the interest of the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. CARVELL: They have to bring back the empties?

Mr. EMMERSON: They have to bring back these cars free. All deadheading of cars is done by the Intercolonial without charge.

Mr. J. D. REID: But they take 5 p.m. loads back.

Mr. EMMERSON: No.

Mr. REID: If there is any freight they take it.

Mr. EMMERSON: If there is any freight they utilize the cars, but otherwise the cars are carried free. I have seen empty cars going back from St. John or the other way. One of the most serious hitches in this agreement is that it has disorganized the traffic of the Intercolonial railway. They were short of motive power. The discontinuance of many of the suburban trains, about which complaint has been made, was necessitated by the railway utilizing the motive power in order to do Canadian Pacific railway business. Suburban trains had to be cut off. The general interests of the people had to be interfered with. They were discriminated against in the interests of a competing railway. Would any such agreement be entered into between private railway corporations? Could the Canadian Northern, which has its steamers landing at St. John throughout the winter months, secure rates anything like that between Montreal and St. John over the rails of the Canadian Pacific railway? It would not be thought of, and I venture to say that if a proposition of that kind were made to the Canadian Pacific railway they would spurn it, and properly so, in my judgment.

The Government are responsible for the management of the road. They are responsible for every act of their general manager. They are responsible for this Gutelius-Bosworth agreement. They are responsible for the importation of men from the United States to carry on the business of the railway. I do not take the position that simply because a man is an American citizen he should not be employed by the Government or by any private interests. I do remember that in 1905, on the floors of this Parliament, I listened to a most severe condemnation of the Government of that day because they had condoned the employment by the Grand Trunk Pacific of American engineers in running the preliminary surveys through the northern part of Ontario and the West. The condemnation by hon. gentlemen opposite was very strong; motions were presented and complaints were made even by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister himself in respect to this matter because, forsooth, American citizens had been employed by the Grand Trunk Pacific in running surveys for the purpose of getting information for the advantage of that railway that they proposed to construct from North Bay to the prairies of the West. A commission was appointed by the Government of the day, at the demand of Parliament, to inquire into that. I believe in reciprocity of trade between Canada and the United States; I believe in reciprocity of brains between this country and the United States; I believe that we have in the pulpits and educational institutions of the United States, Canadians who stand foremost as pulpit orators and great educationists, and I think properly so; and we have in Canada, Americans of the same calibre who are occupying similar positions here. It is well it should be so, but the point I am making is that the Conservative party when in opposition howled themselves black in the face because temporary employees who were United States citizens were taken into the service of the Liberal Government, while to-day they are placing on the Intercolonial permanent officials who are not British subjects. In the town from which I come a party consisting of sixteen or seventeen men and boys is making a survey of the grades on the Intercolonial railway, and three of them are Americans.

Mr. J. D. REID: They have been in the country eight or ten years.

Mr. EMMERSON: No, they are men brought in by Mr. Gutelius and his friends. The chief engineer of the Intercolonial was appointed when he was an American citizen.

Mr. REID: He has been in the country eight or ten years.

Mr. EMMERSON: I do not know how long he has been in the country, but he is an American citizen and he has been appointed on the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. MACDONALD: It makes it all the worse if he has been in the country for eight or ten years without becoming naturalized.

Mr. EMMERSON: Did the Government insist on these men changing their allegiance before they appointed them to office? The complaint I have to make is that all this is done to the detriment of the employees of the Intercolonial. There is not an official holding a position of highest responsibility on the Intercolonial who was trained in the service of that railway. You can find men trained on the Intercolonial holding the highest positions in the service of great American railways, and when it appears that this Government has imported twenty-seven engineers to the staff of the Intercolonial to the exclusion of men who had been trained in the service of that railway, it will be easily seen that this system is to the detriment of old employees. The Government has even ignored the age limit in making appointments. Under the Provident Fund Act no man can be appointed who exceeds the age of 45, and if he has no railway experience his age must not be over 35. But this Government, to the detriment of the men on the Intercolonial, are bringing in outsiders from other railways, whose ages far exceed the limit of 45. One of them, for example, was 83 years old.

Mr. J. D. REID: Who was that?

Mr. EMMERSON: Mr. Murphy.

Mr. REID: Is that the only one?

Mr. EMMERSON: There are others beyond the age of 45. I mention that case because it was an outstanding case.

Mr. REID: I think you are only imagining the rest.

Mr. EMMERSON: These men are employed permanently to the exclusion of others, and the result is that the men on the Intercolonial have no hope of preferment, and are injured in their standing as railway men. Mr. Gutelius was imported by the Canadian Pacific railway from the United States, then from the Canadian Pacific railway to the National Transcontinental Railway inquiry, and then he was placed in the position of general manager of the Intercolonial railway at a salary nearly four times as much as that paid to his predecessor, Mr. Pottinger. Mr. Gutelius believes in the employment of railway men from outside, because they are closely allied with him. We have a general superintendent of the Intercolonial railway with his brother-in-law the assistant superintendent. Nepotism prevails. Talk about political influences; worse than political influence prevails to the great injury of the Intercolonial Railway employees who entered the service years ago and who are familiar with the conditions of that road. Nothing is said against their qualification, but other men are placed over their heads. It is true that Mr. Gutelius came into the service of the Intercolonial railway, stating that the Intercolonial railway was under-officered and over-manned, but I think I am justified in making the statement that the Intercolonial railway to-day is over-officered in its engineering staff and in other branches of the service. There are assistants here and assistants there, and offices have been created that were never known before in connection with the operation of that railway, and salaries beyond anything heretofore paid are now being paid to these importations from other railway systems. The men are complaining all over the road of this system, and I think they are justified. It is to the injury of the country and to the injury of the railway. It cauterizes ambition, suppresses the natural aspirations of the employees, and does incalculable injury to the railway itself. I shall not now go into the many details I have at hand in connection with the management of that road; I think I have demonstrated sufficiently the facts to justify me in moving, seconded by Mr. Marcil, in amendment:

That all the words after the word 'that' in the proposed motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

That the methods of the present management of the Intercolonial railway are oppressive and unfair to the railway employees and to the public and detrimental to the business interests of the country and the railway; and, that in the opinion of this House the Government is deserving of censure therefor.

Hon. J. D. REID (acting Minister of Railways): Mr. Speaker, I may say at the outset that I am sorry the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) is not present to reply to the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) because of course the hon. minister knows more about the whole situation on the Intercolonial railway than I could possibly know.

However, I will try to follow the hon.

member and reply to a few of the statements he has made.

He remarked at the outset that the Intercolonial railway has received considerable attention for a number of years past in this House. That is certainly the fact. I remember that while we were in Opposition we certainly criticised the Intercolonial railway, and I believe rightly. I was very glad to know that the hon. gentleman agrees with the policy of the Minister of Railways and Canals in having the road managed by a general manager instead of by a board of management. Later, of course, he did not appear to be satisfied—

Mr. EMMERSON: With the selection.

Mr. REID:—with either the selection or the way the present general manager carries on his work. I will come to that later on. The hon. gentleman objects to the statement I made in my speech of the 24th of March, with reference to the board of management putting in force the increased rates on the Intercolonial railway. As I understand the matter, some time previous to the change of Government, the board of management had been considering the advisability of increasing the passenger and freight rates. The board thought it necessary to increase the rates, on account of the increased working expenses of the road. The board had gone into this matter thoroughly, and it takes months and months, I suppose, to figure out a new schedule of rates. They decided upon a schedule that they believed fair and reasonable, and just prior to their going out of office they put these rates into effect. The general manager, Mr. Gutelius, if I remember rightly, did not take office until the 1st of May, some time after these new rates were put in force. When the new rates were fixed, there is no doubt, there was a great outcry on the part of many of those along the line who use the Intercolonial railway for the shipment of their products. But since Mr. Gutelius has had with him Mr. Hayes as general freight agent, to assist him in remedying the grievances that certainly did exist, those grievances were remedied as fast as the work could possibly be done, Mr. Hayes, took office, I think, on the 1st of July, and the result of his work has been, I think, that there are now no grievances on the Intercolonial railway so far as rates are concerned. So I think I was perfectly justified in making the statement that I made on the 24th of March, that if there was blame in connection with the advanced rates, that blame rested upon the board of management.

Another point raised by the hon. member is with regard to the surplus on the Intercolonial railway. The system was adopted—seven or eight years ago, according to the hon. gentleman—under which $25,000 a month or $300,000 per annum, was to be charged to the working expenses, and to be laid aside instead of being paid into the consolidated revenue fund; and was to be spent each year for new equipment on the road. If at the end of the fiscal year there was a surplus over and above working expenses including this $300,000, the surplus also was to be transferred to this fund and spent for further equipment. In other words, it was decided that all the profits made should go back into the system for renewal of equipment.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who decided that? The hon. gentleman means that the minister decided in a particular year to do that.

Mr. REID: It was decided, I understand, in 1906, to charge $25,000 a month, $300,000 per annum, to working expenses. If there was anything over and above that, it was a surplus; if there was any deficiency, it was a loss. Every year there has been at least $300,000 on hand to be expended for renewal of equipment.

During the course of his remarks, the hon. gentleman made reference to my statement in which I showed a surplus of $300,000. In this statement, which I made on March 24—page 2039 of 'Hansard'—I gave the exact figures for every month during the whole of the year 1913-14, with the exception of the last two months. The figures with regard to those months had to be estimated, and I understand that they are about correct. In totalling up the working expenses, this $300,000, or $25,000 a month, was first charged, and the earnings, $12,802,973, show a surplus of $300,000 over and above working expenses. My statement, therefore, was perfectly fair and right; I do not think anything the hon. member has said would justify any other conclusion. I have before me a statement made by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals last session, which, I believe, was made up in the same way as my statement was made up this session.

Mr. EMMERSON: What does the hon. gentleman say with respect to the figures for last year, which showed a deficit of $161,000 on June 30?

Mr. REID: I have not the statistics before me just at this moment. The hon. gentleman complains that the Government have not taken over the branch line railways. I think that last session it was agreed by every member of the House that it was impossible for the Government to take over the branch lines under the law as it stands on the statute book. This conclusion was borne out by the fact of the hon. member for South Renfrew bringing in a resolution in 1911 to take over a number of branch lines instead of acting under legislation already on the statute book. The hon. member, with every other member of this House, agreed last year that the Bill which was passed by the House was right and fair; there was not one dissenting voice.

Mr. EMMERSON: I dissented from it. I said I would not press my opposition to the Bill, but I took exception to the character of the legislation.

Mr. HAZEN: I think the hon. gentleman took exception to the Bill because it did not go far enough.

Mr. EMMERSON: I took exception on the ground that it was dangerous legislation; that no minister should have power to purchase a railway 200 miles in length without submitting the matter to Parliament. The point I make is that, regardless of present legislation, the Government of the day can acquire any one of these lines if they want to.

Mr. REID: When the Branch Lines Bill was before the House last year, hon. gentlemen unanimously agreed that the Bill should go through, but, just before the House prorogued, the Senate returned the Bill with an amendment, after this House had unanimously passed it without amendment.

Mr. EMMERSON: What was the amendment?

Mr. REID: I have not the Bill before me; at all events, the Senate amended the Bill, for the purpose, I believe, of preventing it from being passed.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is there to prevent my hon. friend from making an arrangement to purchase the branch lines and asking Parliament before prorogation to ratify that arrangement?

Mr. REID: I will answer my hon. friend in a moment. As I understand the matter, there is no way in which we can possibly acquire any of those branch lines without asking Parliament to pass a Bill authorizing us to acquire them by purchase or lease.

Mr. CARVELL: What is wrong with that proposition?

Mr. REID: The session is not yet over. I do not think the Government are entitled to any blame for not bringing in that legislation; the session has not yet come to an end.

Mr. EMMERSON: Bring it down; we will help you pass it.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman has no reason to complain so long as we are here in session. There is no doubt about the fact that there are some branch lines in the provinces which we must or should have, but until the necessary legislation is passed by Parliament we cannot, under the law as it exists at present on the statute book, take over these railways, unless we do as suggested by the hon. member for Pictou.

Mr. CARVELL: I am told that an agreement has been signed by the general manager of the Intercolonial railway to purchase the International railway. What is to prevent the minister from bringing down during the present session a Bill to provide for the acquisition of that railway?

Mr. REID: The hon. member knows that the general manager has no power to make an agreement with any branch line railway without its being confirmed by the minister, by the Government and by Parliament. I did not know that there was any such agreement; the hon. gentleman knows more about it than I do.

Mr. CARVELL: I have not seen it, but I am satisfied that it exists. Will my hon. friend the acting minister say that there is not in existence an agreement, signed by Mr. Gutelius, for the taking over of the International railway?

Mr. REID: If the hon. gentleman wants to get information on that point, he will have to ask the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals upon his return. He is running the department; I am only acting for him.

Mr. CARVELL: What about the acting minister?

Mr. REID: I have had nothing to do with it, so that I cannot answer the question. The hon. member complains that the Intercolonial railway roadbed has not been maintained up to a proper standard; that it is not in as good a condition as it was two or three years ago. My information is that not only the roadbed has been kept up but it is in much better condition than it was a few years ago. In fact every person I have met who has travelled over the Intercolonial railway has told me that it is one of the best roadbeds in Canada. So far as the management is concerned I understand that the whole passenger service is carried on in the very best way. I am surprised that the hon. member should make an attack such as he has made to-day with respect to the service because I do not believe that it will be good for the railway to have an attack of that kind made on it when there is, in my opinion, no just reason for making the attack. The hon. member complains about the standard rules. I know that on the Intercolonial railway to-day we have two systems of rules. We have the standard rules in existence on the part of the road from Montreal to Lévis, and then we have the old rules on the other parts of the system. The condition to-day is that different parts of the road are under these two different sets of rules and I think every member will agree that that is not a good plan to have in force on any railway system. In putting the standard rules into force I believe the general manager is right, because every other railway in Canada is adopting these standard rules. They have been approved by the Railway Commission and surely, if the other large railways, like the Canadian Pacific railway, Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern railway, are using the standard rules they must be better than the old system that has been in force on the Intercolonial railway for very many years. In putting these rules into force the general manager has given several months' notice to the employees and my information is that up to the present time some fifty or sixty per cent of the employees on the part of the system where the standard rules are not now in force have passed the examinations satisfactorily and are well pleased with the prospect of the standard rules coming into force. In addition to that the general manager tells me that a great many of the rules that are embodied in the standard rules are a part of those that are in force on the Intercolonial Railway system, and therefore it is not so much trouble for the employees to become acquainted with the standard rules in a very short time. In addition to that the general manager tells me that he has some twelve or thirteen instructors along the line educating the employees in so far as the standard rules are concerned and he is doing everything possible to see that the men who have been on the Intercolonial railway for many years have every chance of learning the rules with the view of keeping them in the same employment that they are in at the present time. In addition to that, in case it should be found that there are any employees not qualified on account of not being able to learn the rules, it is the intention of the general manager that those men will not be thrown out of employment but that they will be given some other position on the Intercolonial railway where they will be well looked after and will continue in the employment of the railway. Is it not right that we should look to safety first? Is it not right, and I am sure the employee himself will agree that if it is found that he is not qualified, perhaps on account of his eyesight or some other disability, to continue in his position on the railway, he should be relieved of the responsibility and put in some other position on the railway? On the other railways the adoption of the standard rules was for the purpose of protecting the public, protecting life from danger; and in putting them into force on the Intercolonial railway that is the object of the management.

Mr. CARROLL: Has the department any statistics to show the comparative number of accidents on the Intercolonial railway under the old rules and on other roads under the standard rules?

Mr. REID: I could not say. I have not been following the railway statistics to get that information on account of the short time I have been acting for the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. The hon. member also complains because some employees are, as he states, American citizens. There is no doubt at all that the hon. member made that statement for political reasons. He wishes that to be heralded down in the lower provinces that we are putting on American citizens on the Intercolonial railway. Let me tell the hon. member that any men who have been employed on the Intercolonial railway have been in this country for years, and surely in taking them from some other place or position that they have been occupying in other parts of Canada and putting them on the Intercolonial railway, we have not questioned whether they were Canadian or American citizens.

Mr. EMMERSON: I know my hon. friend does not wish to misrepresent me. I did not say that because a man was an American citizen he should not be employed. I expressed surprise that a party that would raise such a fuss in 1903 with respect to the employment of American citizens should be employing permanently American citizens on the Government railway. What I did complain of particularly was the importation from the Canadian Pacific railway to the exclusion of Intercolonial-trained men. That was the point I wished to strongly make.

Mr. REID: As I understand the hon. member he claims there are no Intercolonial-trained men occupying important positions on the Intercolonial railway. The general manager is Mr. Gutelius. Then there is Mr. Hayes, the general freight agent.

Mr. EMMERSON: Mr. Hayes is an American citizen.

Mr. REID: I do not know if he is or not, but if he is he has been in this country for many years.

Mr. EMMERSON: He is a good man, I am not complaining.

Mr. REID: The hon. member made that statement for some purpose. He threw out the insinuation that they were American citizens. Then there is Mr. Brown and Mr. Brady the superintendent who was taken from the Canadian Pacific railway by the Government in power at the time he was appointed, so that taking men from the Canadian Pacific railway originated with the late Government.

Mr. EMMERSON: He was out of employment.

Mr. REID: No; he was taken right from the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. EMMERSON: Oh, no.

Mr. REID: Then there is Mr. Richardson, his brother-in-law, who was put on by the former Government. The four superintendents are all men who have been on the Intercolonial for many years. As I understand, there are four district superintendents, and they have been practically raised on the Intercolonial.

Mr. EMMERSON: Mr. Hallisey was replaced by Richardson.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. REID: Mr. Hallisey has not been replaced; the hon. member knows that. Mr. Hallisey, one of the superintendents, is located at Truro, and I am informed by the general manager that he is one of the best on the line.

Mr. EMMERSON: I agree with you.

Mr. REID: A short time ago he was, unfortunately, taken ill and had to be allowed two or three months' leave of absence. In the meantime Mr. Richardson is acting temporarily in Mr. Hallisey's place, and when he returns Mr. Richardson will go back to his old position. There is nothing wrong in that, surely, and I cannot see why the hon. gentleman should raise a rumpus over it. The hon. member complains that many men are taken on the Intercolonial who are over age, and he mentioned Mr. Martin Murphy.

Mr. EMMERSON: There are many others.

Mr. REID: The hon. member has not mentioned any others. At all events, Mr. Murphy seems to be the one he has a grievance against.

Mr. EMMERSON: How old is this gentleman?

Mr. HAZEN: He is not as old as Mr. Schreiber.

Mr. REID: The hon. member states that he is about eighty. As I understand it, Mr. Murphy held some position in Nova Scotia which puts him in an especially favourable position for collecting certain statistics, and he has been temporarily engaged to do that work. I do not see where the grievances exist. I think my hon. friend has simply made his little speech with a view of trying to make political capital in the lower provinces. From the information I have, the Intercolonial is running satisfactorily to the public, and I am having no complaints in connection with it. The Ocean Limited, which the hon. member complained about, was taken off because the cost was so great and the traffic so small during those two months that it was considered better to return to the policy that had been in existence for so many years. With only one train running the results are practically the same as when the Ocean Limited and the other train were running together. At all events, that is the information I had some little time ago, and I believe it is correct. I do not think that the hon. member has made any statement that would justify the House in supporting his motion, and I therefore trust that it will be voted down.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): The resolution which has been moved by my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson), asks the House to declare that in its opinion the methods of the present management of the Intercolonial are oppressive and unfair to the railway employees and to the public, and detrimental to the business interests of the country and of the railway. The allegation contained in that resolution is but the expression of the opinion held all over the Maritime provinces in regard to the administration of the Intercolonial by this Government. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Reid) congratulates himself that he has not been bothered with many complaints in regard to the Intercolonial; and if he has not, he is certainly entitled to be congratulated. I am satisfied, however, that the hon. gentlemen sitting behind him who come from the Maritime constituencies, have heard a different story. Let me just instance the condition of affairs there as stated upon what must be good authority to my hon. friend. My hon. friend, the chief whip of the Conservative party owns and controls a newspaper in the town of Truro, called the Truro Chronicle. Nobody will accuse the Truro Chronicle of being in sympathy with anything which pertains to the Liberal party in the slightest degree. A few issues ago, it gave vent in a long editorial to the views of the people of the county of Colchester, and of the Maritime provinces generally, in regard to the management of the Intercolonial. I will just read enough to disillusionize the acting Minister of Railways of his idea as to the condition of affairs:

> We would respectfully suggest to Right Hon. R. L. Borden that he, as soon as possible, undertake a personal investigation of the Intercolonial railway matters. Do so before it is too late.
> As things stand to-day, there is not a constituency through which the Intercolonial railway passes, and that means about ten counties in Nova Scotia, that can be counted safe for the Government.
> The statement is not made in a spirit of carping criticism, but rather in that of the candid friend. Did we want to see the Government defeated, we would hold our peace in respect to these things, knowing that they are working to that end; but we do not want to see the Government defeated, hence we speak out in 'meetin,' and we know what we are talking about.
> Unless there is a change right soon, Conservatives representing Intercolonial railway constituencies had better resign now, and thus save themselves the humiliation of being turned down by the people when election day comes around.

So that my hon. friend is certainly living in an imaginative state of mind because the organ of the chief whip of the Conservative party regards the situation so seriously as to call the attention of the Premier himself to it, demanding that he, disregarding the acting Minister of Railways and everybody else, should personally give his attention to the situation. I think, therefore, that my hon. friend the member for Westmorland was quite justified in calling the attention of Parliament to the condition of affairs, which my right hon. friend the Premier has entirely failed to look into. The indictment which the hon. member for Westmorland has presented to-day is but the expression of what is stated everywhere along the line of the Intercolonial from Drummondville to the city of Sydney. And why is that? Let us examine the condition of affairs that has arisen under this Government. My right hon. friend, in the platform which he issued to the people of this country, declared that when he came into power he would place in control of the Intercolonial, a commission—no general manager, but a commission which would be actuated by the highest ideals, who would run the Intercolonial absolutely free from partisanship, without any regard to political patronage, animated solely and only by the idea that the best men should be got to fill the superintendent positions, and that the Intercolonial should be run in the interests of the people.

My right hon. friend dilated at very great length, wherever he spoke in the Maritime provinces, upon what he was going to do with the Intercolonial railway and with this commission which was going to be inaugurated. He came in, and found a commission there with limited powers. He said that their powers should be extended and that they alone should control, free from political influences at Ottawa or otherwise, the whole administration of the Intercolonial railway.

The Government assumed office, and the Minister of Railways and Canals immediately proceeded to violate my right hon. friend's promises, to obliterate everything in the way of commission control that had existed, and to find an expatriated American, whom he had utilized for other purposes, the making of reports and such like matters, to take charge of the Intercolonial railway. As a consequence, my right hon. friend's friends are speaking out in meeting, as they say, and asking him to come around and look into the situation because this gentleman who is in charge of the Intercolonial railway is falsifying all the splendid, idealistic things that he had pictured before the people of the Maritime provinces and his old friends in regard to the operation of the Intercolonial railway.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

TORONTO, NIAGARA, AND WESTERN RAIWAY.

The House in Committee on Bill No. 59, respecting the Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Currie. Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) yesterday discussed this Bill at some length and moved certain amendments. Unrevised 'Hansard' got it mixed up in some way, and set forth that the objection of the hon. gentleman was to clause 5, but I think it was clause 7 to which he had reference.

Mr. BLAIN: My hon. friend from South Renfrew is quite correct; the Chairman of the Railway made the necessary corrections in unrevised 'Hansard.'

On section 7—construction of railway:

Mr. MACDONELL: We all regret, I am sure, the reason which made it necessary for the hon. member for Lincoln to speak on this Bill in advance of it being discussed in Committee of the Whole. No one regrets the hon. gentleman's ill-health more than I, and trust that the Chairman of the Railway Committee may be back here soon in his accustomed good health. I think the hon. gentleman has an obsession with regard to the importance of this section. This Bill was on two occasions before the Standing Orders Committee, once after it had been discussed by the Railway Committee, and it was held that these amendments would be quite proper in the Bill. In the Railway Committee, the corporation counsel of Toronto and others were heard; the matter was fully and thoroughly discussed, and on a vote of 14 to 25, clauses 5, 6 and 7 were, on my motion, added to the Bill. Clause 7 is not a new clause. The clauses were all designed to safeguard the city of Toronto. Toronto has its difficulties with regard to railways entering the city, and it is now in the midst of solving them. For years past the city has been endeavouring to wipe out all level crossings, and to-day it is contributing over four million dollars to assist the railways to that end. Toronto asks no special privileges, but, owing to the circumstances of the case and the congestion of traffic, the problem of level crossings in Toronto is very different from that of level crossings in country districts or in smaller towns. The level crossing is now practically a thing of the past in Toronto. The railways along the entire waterfront from the extreme east to the extreme west are now being put on viaducts, and other means have been taken to remove level crossings, so that it may be said that the city has in hand a complete and final solution of the level crossing difficulty. There soon will not be a level crossing in the south part of Toronto, and the city is now embarking on a scheme for the removal of level crossings in the northern part of the city. Just where this railway has its right of way, adjacent to the Canadian Pacific railway tracks, the city has, at an expense of between one and two million dollars, contributed towards aiding the Canadian Pacific railway to raise their tracks on a viaduct from Yonge street to a point west of Dufferin street, over two and a half miles in length. The right of way of this road runs alongside of that.

The chairman of the Railway Committee talks about vested rights, but this company has no vested rights. The hon. gentleman was quite mistaken when he said that this company had undertaken certain work in the city of Toronto. They have not removed one shovelful of earth, they have not graded a rod, and they have not laid a tie. All they have done is to acquire the right of way, for about two and a half miles, which crosses on the level some twenty-four or twenty-five streets in the city. All that the amendment asks is that this company be not permitted, without the consent of the city, to cross these streets on the level. This company was incorporated in 1903, eleven years ago, and, though it has had various extensions of time since, up to the present they have not done anything in the city of Toronto. They were granted extensions in 1904, 1906 and 1909, and they are now asking for a further extension. The uncontradicted evidence produced before the Railway Committee was that they had done no work outside of Toronto. It is true that they formed some combination with the Toronto

Suburban Railway Company, and that that company has done certain work outside of the city, but no work has been done by this company under its charter either inside or outside of the city of Toronto except the acquiring of a certain right of way. As I have said, they cross twenty-four or twenty-five streets in the course of the two and a half miles which they have already purchased, and they may go through two and a half miles more of the city and cross fifty streets. It is now asked, in view of the fact that Toronto is now spending millions of dollars with a view to removing its level crossings, that this railway should not be allowed to do what other railways are not allowed to do. This same provision has been put in railway Bills during the last three or four years. While the hon. member for South Wellington presided over the Railway Committee, similar clauses, identical in language, were inserted in at least three different railway Bills. In 1910 a similar clause was put in Acts respecting the Western Central Railway Company and the Toronto Eastern Railway Company, and in 1911 in the Act relating to the Hamilton, Waterloo and Guelph Railway Company. This clause, therefore, has become a practically standard one, as applied to railways getting a charter into the city of Toronto, and similar clauses have been accepted by the committee from 1910 up to the present time, uniformly and without exception. It is interesting to note that the railway company is quite satisfied with these provisions. In their opinion, they are suffering no hardship. In the Railway Committee they agreed to accept these safeguarding provisions, and there can be no objection, so far as I can see, why they should not be inserted in the Bill.

The Chairman of the Railway Committee yesterday protested against the insertion of this safeguarding clause in the Bill because of vested rights. There are no vested rights in this matter; these people have had a charter for eleven years and have done nothing. When they got their charter, the district through which they were to go was almost entirely uninhabited; it was then part of the suburbs or outskirts of the city of Toronto. Now that very district is as near the centre of the city of Toronto geographically, east and west, as any line can be. If the wish of the hon. member for Lincoln is to prevail, they are to be permitted now to lay a railway, ten or eleven years after obtaining their charter, through a district which is in the centre of the city of Toronto. The reasons for safeguarding the people of that district have arisen since the charter was granted. Vested rights, if there are any, are in the citizens of Toronto through which city that road runs. The right of way bought and paid for by the company is to-day worth many times what they paid for it, and they are suffering no loss or injury in that respect; nor can they by any possibility be subject to any loss or damage in connection with their investment in Toronto. In view of the fact that the committee during the last four years deliberately approved these sections respecting railways entering Toronto, I do not see why at this late date we should make any change, especially in view of the fact that the railway people themselves are perfectly satisfied to accept these provisions. I ask the committee to pass the Bill as it came from the Railway Committee and the other committees of the House through which it went.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The point raised in connection with this amendment is an exceedingly important one, especially to those who reside outside of the city of Toronto. A very large portion of the people of Ontario desire to go to Toronto and to have every reasonable means afforded to them of obtaining access to the heart of that city. It so happens—and, I think, has happened during the last eight or ten years—that whenever railway proposals affecting the city of Toronto come before this House or before the Railway Committee, Toronto representatives are inclined to insist upon terms being inserted in the charters which are not accorded to any other cities in the province of Ontario or, so far as I am aware, in the Dominion of Canada. The question may possibly arise in the city of Toronto by reason of the fact that their street franchise, which is now held by the Toronto Railway Company, will expire in the course of six or seven years and they probably want to control their own streets at the expiration of that time. But apart altogether from the question of Toronto's rights in the matter, the people of Ontario also have their rights. Until the year 1910 I do not believe that any charter was ever granted in this House containing such a provision as section 7 of the present Bill. The reason why similar clauses were inserted in charters to which my hon. friend referred was that they were new undertakings. They had no previous rights; they had never spent a dollar and the committee took the view that as they had never expended any money nor committed themselves to any great extent, they should be brought face to face with the fact that Toronto did not want any railways on or across their streets until the question of their street franchise was decided. That was, perhaps, a reasonable view and in the Bills enumerated by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, clause 7 was inserted. But the result was that these railways were blocked. The Toronto, Hamilton and Waterloo railway, which my hon. friend has mentioned, was granted a charter containing a clause similar to section 7 of this Bill. It was supported by capitalists. A gentleman who attended the sittings of the committee where the Bill was very strongly opposed was His Honour the present Lieutenant Governor of Ontario. I have been assured by him that clause 7 was the blocking clause which really meant that the enterprise could not enter the city of Toronto except by tunnel, and the cost of that would have been so great that the project was finally abandoned.

But this railway, the Toronto, Niagara and Western, is an entirely different proposition. It obtained its charter, I think, in 1903 or 1904, and it has had its time extended once or twice. In the year 1909, it began active operations, or undertook the work of construction with a definite end in view. For that purpose the company went to the Railway Board, as the law says they shall do, and had their plans approved into the city of Toronto. Their application to the Railway Board was made in December 1909, and I have in my hand the order made by the board on that occasion. It was made in the presence of counsel for the city of Toronto, and for the Grand Trunk railway and for the Canadian Pacific railway. The company was authorized to cross streets in the city of Toronto to enable them to get at the terminal points they desired. That was only a preliminary order of the board. A subsequent order, made on the 10th of December, approves their plans of location of their line in the city of Toronto, crossing the twenty-four or twenty-five streets mentioned by my hon. friend from South Toronto. Then it was that the company expended its money. They did not take the streets, but they bought their own right of way immediately adjoining the Canadian Pacific railway to their terminal point. They paid a large sum of money, something in the neighbourhood of $100,000 or $125,000. Part of that money was paid to the city of Toronto itself for land which the city sold to the railway company. That location was approved by the Minister and approved by the board and they have held that location ever since, being in this respect in the same position as is the Canadian Pacific railway at this moment. Having that entrance, they immediately looked around for other points to which their railway might go in the province of Ontario. Their charters were from time to time extended—very much extended. They have the right to run from Toronto to Niagara, from Hamilton to Brantford, and on to Windsor; also through the counties of Peel, Halton, Wellington, Waterloo, Perth, and I think, Middlesex and Lambton. The road now under construction is from the western boundary of the city of Toronto to the city of Guelph. They have bought all the right of way.

Mr. MACDONELL: If I may be allowed, the hon. gentleman, in the committee was aware of the fact that it was stated that it was not this railway that was building from Toronto to Guelph, but another railway.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will explain that: it is their money anyway.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps I can explain that too. They have done their grading on a part of the road—I may say the distance from Toronto to Guelph is fifty miles. They have bought the right of way through the city of Guelph, and between Guelph and Berlin, and I believe they have surveyors out between Berlin and Stratford. Now, we in this House gave them power, not to amalgamate with other railways, but a peculiar power—power to invest in the stocks of other companies. This Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway Company, under the power we gave them in 1909, did invest in the stock of the Toronto and Suburban Railway Company, and the stock of that railway is to-day owned by the Toronto, Niagara and Western. The bonds which were sold were the Toronto and Suburban bonds now owned and controlled by the applicant company in the present case, and they obtained their money and went on to construct their road. The building is still going on, and ultimately, I believe, the road on the northern line will extend to Stratford, and perhaps through to Sarnia. On the southern branch it is now at Niagara Falls, it has purchased the right of way to Brantford, and I believe it is graded through the city of Brantford and the intention is to go on to Windsor—thus making a very extensive system of radial lines in western Ontario. They have spent about a quarter of a million dollars, I believe. But the whole enterprise is being held up through want of an entrance in the city of Toronto, and if clause seven, as it is printed in this Bill stands, that railway will never get an entrance into the city of Toronto. The Board of Railway Commissioners in the order which they made, took care of the rights of the city of Toronto, placing this company on the same plane as the Canadian Pacific railway. The order of the board quoted last night by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster), is as follows:

> One order may go in these twenty-five applications. I think one order will cover the whole of them. They may all be consolidated and one order issued in these terms. Authority given to applicants to construct across the streets mentioned, subject to the following conditions:
> 1. That if the tracks of the Canadian Pacific railway are at any future time elevated, then the tracks of the applicants shall be likewise elevated along the course of the line where the right of way lie adjacent to each other, upon such terms as the board may direct.
> 2. Protection to be provided at such crossings as the chief engineer of the board may require before the road is opened for traffic, and if protection is recommended at crossings that any other road is interested in, then the apportionment of the cost of such protection is reserved.

There is the authority of the board placing the Toronto, Niagara and Western upon the same plane as the Canadian Pacific railway. Now, the Canadian Pacific railway has not elevated its tracks.

Mr. CURRIE: Excuse me, the Canadian Pacific railway has elevated its tracks.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In North Toronto, where this road is?

Mr. CURRIE: Yes, that is where the hon. gentleman is wrong.

Mr. MACDONELL: For two and a half miles from Yonge street westwards.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then, the city of Toronto is absolutely protected without clause 7, because they cannot construct without elevating these tracks.

Mr. CURRIE: Taking into consideration that the Canadian Pacific railway has elevated its tracks, and that the order of the Railway Board says that this company shall do the same as the Canadian Pacific railway, and the clause in the Bill being merely to provide the same in effect, I do not see what objection there can be to the clause.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The clause in the Bill gives the power to the city engineer absolutely to prohibit the line—

Mr. MACDONELL: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Read the clause:

> Unless with the consent of the city of Toronto expressed by by-law the railway of the company shall not be constructed along, upon, above or below any highway as defined by the Railway Act, but notwithstanding anything in this section the railway of the company may be constructed across any such highway, or along or across any easement acquired for public works in the said city, but only above or below such highway or easement, and only after the levels, plans and specifications thereof are approved by the engineer, for the time being, of the said city, or such engineer as may be appointed for that purpose, and the engineer for the time being of the company, and in the event of the said engineers failing to agree, by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.

Now, if the Canadian Pacific railway has elevated its track where they are adjacent to the right of way of the Toronto, Niagara and Western, there is no necessity for the clause, because the order of the board provides that this company's tracks also shall be elevated.

Mr. CURRIE: The railway does not go alongside the Canadian Pacific railway for the whole of its length through the city. Is the hon. gentleman going to have it go on the level in these parts?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The parts where it is not adjacent to the Canadian Pacific railway. Now, my information is not the information I have been given by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the Canadian Pacific railway has elevated its tracks.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I know it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: A portion of the tracks have been elevated, I know; but there is a large portion of the track that has not been elevated, and it is being operated, and the city of Toronto is not offering any serious objection; and in this case the city of Toronto got our money. Part of the money we paid for right of way was paid into the coffers of the city of Toronto.

Mr. CURRIE: I am rather surprised to hear the hon. gentleman express his ownership in this Bill. I have the Bill in my name, and I certainly have not a cent invested. It is very unusual for a member to come into this House and promote a Bill, stating that he has an interest in it in that manner.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, as a resident of the province of Ontario desiring to enter the city of Toronto as freely as we enter other cities in Canada, I have an interest in it; and if such legislation is to be passed for the city of Toronto, it should be passed also for the cities of Brantford, Hamilton, Guelph and the other cities of the Dominion. Toronto should not have the exclusive right to say what railways shall come in or what shall not. The clause is a useless clause, if the Canadian Pacific railway has elevated its tracks because you have the order of the Board then to compel others. If the Canadian Pacific railway has not elevated its tracks—and I am still of the opinion that it has not for the entire distance—you have no right to stop these people coming. It is all right for the hon. member for South Toronto to say the land they bought is worth more to-day than when they bought it. That is problematical. I know some people who have land in Toronto who do not think it is worth what they paid for it, and they bought it within the last two or three years. This is a narrow strip of land not saleable except for railway purposes. But this company comes here having paid the city of Toronto and the private owners its money, having its plans approved on the order of the Railway Commission; and still because they ask time to complete their road the committee has said: no, we will block you at the city of Toronto. What use is the road to the rest of the province if it is to be blocked at the western limits of the city of Toronto? We do not want to transfer there from this railway to a street railway or one of the other railways. The Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway Company cannot do a street railway business through the streets of Toronto. That is provided against by another clause—clause 5. All the railway company want is a terminal point within the city where they can discharge their outside passengers and freight. The point in the Railway Committee was not argued very fully; the vote was a small one, only forty members being represented by the vote. The chairman and the minister were present, but expressed no opinion.

Mr. MACDONELL: The chairman expressed many opinions.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He left me a letter which he said I might read to the House, but I do not think it becomes necessary to read it. The whole truth of the matter is, so far as the vote is concerned that the hon. member for North Simcoe, in whose name the Bill stood, accepted certain suggestions of the city of Toronto. That changed the opinion of the whole committee, and after the hon. member accepted the amendment of the member for South Toronto a great many who otherwise would have voted to exclude section 7 either did not vote or voted against its exclusion. But to my mind it is nothing but an outrage that those of us who live in the outlying counties, who desire to go to Toronto, cannot enter the city without getting off at the western boundary or taking another line in. We should be entitled to go in on this radial road. This railway runs within 200 yards of the house where I live. I know how convenient it is to me and to many people between Guelph and Toronto and so on to the city of Berlin. For these reasons I submit that the resolution offered by the chairman of the Railway Committee should be agreed to and that clause 7 should be stricken out.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: This road goes through the constituency which I represent. Ten or twelve years ago we had a population there of some ten thousand. Now the population is a good deal over one hundred thousand. At the time the first Act of Incorporation was given, as was said here this afternoon, there was no population to any extent, not even a suburban population. Now it is largely built up. There are certain things incidental to a railway charter. If you got a charter thirteen years under certain conditions then prevailing, it does not follow that if you fail to take advantage of the privilege granted you, the rights you then got must continue.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is only four years ago.

Mr. MACLEAN: Twelve years ago they got their first charter. They did not act on it. The city has grown and we are trying now in Canada to do away with level crossings, even in the country. Nobody took a more active part than the chairman of the Railway Committe in the fight to secure the abolition of level crossings in connection with the city of St. Catharines, in his own riding. Toronto has become congested as a city and it has gone to great expense to elevate the railway tracks. It is elevating them at the water front at a joint expense of millions of dollars. Now in the upper portion of the city at an expenditure of millions it is doing the same thing. I think we laid down the principle that all railroads in the city must be elevated, especially those that are to be built hereafter. We get nothing for our policy of trying to do away with level crossings if all those that come along now may make conditions worse after the expenditures we have made to remove this trouble. It is true that the Canadian Pacific railway to-day is being elevated at the north and where it adjoins this railroad; but this road goes further where it is not adjacent to the Canadian Pacific railway and therefore we will have the evil of a railway coming in to the congested streets of a city with insecure protection to the public. The very same people who have this charter, as I believe, the Canadian Northern railway, recently got legislation to enter the city of Montreal. They come into Montreal by an expensive tunnel; but when they come to the city they were compelled to elevate their tracks and that is only in the last two or three years. The city of Montreal came to this House, represented by their mayor, and made the argument before our committee, and practically everything of the Canadian Northern railway is now elevated entering Montreal. I believe that in the public interest this road should elevate its track, but it certainly should consult the city as to its entrance. If they cannot agree they can go, as the Bill provides, to the Railway Commission for relief. In the country we should try and abolish the level crossing; certainly we ought to stop it in the city. We are paying liberally to have it stopped and after spending that money if we cannot get relief we expect we might as well have kept our money and have the whole city grid-ironed with street railways on the level. The city itself hopes in a short time to give a tube entrance for all radial lines and I hope by the time this railway is constructed there will be a tube provided for their entrance. One of the great menaces of city life to-day is the destruction of human life, the number of people who are run down by street cars, automobiles and railways makes it a serious risk, and if we are to have railways coming into the city in a congested portion of Toronto there will be great danger to life; it will cost the company as much in the long run even if we do give them the privilege to come in on the level now. After ten years they would have to elevate at their own expense, and it is far better for the city and for the company that that should be done now for the safeguarding of public life. Safety first is everything in these things. We are making it more unsafe to go into the city, and we are interfering in a way with the right the city of Toronto has to control its own street railway franchises or underground franchises, whatever they may happen to be. Toronto wants to have a high-class city railway service owned by the public. It may take seven years more, or it may take only one year, but the moment the people own the railway the city of Toronto will be prepared to give, on terms, a first-class underground or elevated service for every railway that wants to come in. The city is prepared to put in tubes to give a first-class local service, and to provide the amplest accommodation for every radial to come into the city. We are also forcing another idea; that is, the joint usage of these elevated roads. Why should one compnay be allowed to build an entrance into the city on the level if some other company has already an elevated track? What the Railway Commission should do, and what Parliament should insist on, is to compel them all to come in over the same elevated tracks wherever it may be, thereby avoiding different grades; and we are trying to work that out. We are not trying to keep any railway from coming into the city of Toronto, we welcome them with open arms, but we say: Come in on reasonable terms, and if in a congested district consult the city as to the elevation of your tracks. For that reason I think the amendment already in the Bill is a good one. We have it in other Bills, and I think no injury will be done by continuing the principle and putting the same clause in Bills for other cities if they desire it.

Mr. CURRIE: As the Bill is in my name, perhaps a word from me may not be amiss. Unfortunately I had not read this Bill when it was placed in my name. When the Bill came before the committee strong opposition developed, and as a citizen of Toronto I thought that opposition was perfectly justified. I asked the promoters and solicitor of the road if they were prepared to accept the standard amendments which appeared in the Toronto and Eastern Railway Company's Bill. They said, certainly they were. The matter was put to the committee, and it was so carried and so ordered. Let me touch first of all upon the complaint of the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). There is no doubt that the city of Toronto is very badly served by radial railways. That is not the fault of the Parliament of Canada, nor the fault of the legislature. In the first place, Toronto's street railway gauge is not the standard gauge. Everybody knows that radial railway to be successful must be able to carry express and light freight, and be able to handle freight cars, but no radial railway of standard gauge can match up to the traffic of the Toronto street railway, which is carried on a different gauge. I had the good or bad fortune to be reporting the council of the city of Toronto when that agreement was made. They decided then that they did not want any freight traffic over their streets, and they fixed their gauge so that the radial or steam railways could not move along their streets as they do in Winnipeg, St. Louis, Chicago and other places; so a radial coming into the city of Toronto must have a special track of its own or the gauge of some part of the street railway of Toronto must be altered. I think myself that the time has come when the city of Toronto must come to this Parliament to ask for a Bill enabling it to construct certain tracks across the city, if need be, so as to connect up with radial lines of an international character such as this, and which require a Dominion charter. Toronto is opposed to this Bill, and it has been pointed out to me that if this Bill passes in its original form it will virtually give a franchise to this company, on the level, over every street in the city of Toronto. I would prefer to sacrifice my seat in this House rather than have such an injustice done to the city of Toronto, or any other city, and I think that should be the feeling of every hon. member here. If the Bill as originally drafted contains such clauses, and does not contain the necessary safeguards for the city, it would be a very great injustice to Toronto, and a very valuable charter to the people who got it. As the promoters have accepted these clauses, and have never expressed anything to me to the contrary, notwithstanding everything that has occurred in this House, I do not see why any hon. member should get up and argue in favour of putting the Bill back in its original form. Bills have been passing in this form for years, and I think all interests will be served if the Bill passes in its present form. I live within gunshot of the Canadian Pacific railway tracks in the city of Toronto and close to the railway right of way mentioned by my hon. friend, and I know that the Canadian Pacific track has been elevated for a considerable distance and in a few months will be elevated right across the centre of the city. Having seen people killed at level crossings, and having narrowly escaped, myself, once in the city of Toronto, I have no great friendship for level crossings. I think this House has made up its mind that the day of level crossings is ended so far as any new charters are concerned. If this charter is all right and the road was needed, it should have been built a number of years ago when the promoters had all the rights which it is held they now want. I think the committee will be perfectly justified in putting the Bill through as it is, instead of obstructing it and ending by not passing it at all. We have very few minutes left in which to pass it.

Mr. HENDERSON: This is not a new quarrel. I think the trouble of keeping radial railways out of Toronto commenced a good many years ago.

Mr. GRAHAM: When I was young.

Mr. HENDERSON: When more of us were young, younger than the ex-Minister of Railways. The Hamilton and Toronto Radial railway was the first to be refused the right to go into the city of Toronto. It has been constructed and is running as far as the town of Oakville in my county, which is about twenty miles from Toronto. Some portions of the road between Oakville and Toronto have been completed, but no entrance has been obtained into the city of Toronto; and consequently the promoters of the road are not attempting to connect up the different links between the city of Toronto and, I think, Mimico. True, legislation was passed by this House to enable that road to go into the city of Toronto, but it was on such onerous terms that it was impossible for the promoters to finance it, and consequently the matter has been practically abandoned. It was blocked simply because the city of Toronto got support enough to make the road so terribly expensive that the promoters could not raise the money, and the result is that the road is at a standstill, and will be until some cheaper way of getting into the city is found. I think the next Bill that came before us was that for the railway on the east side of Toronto coming from Oshawa or Whitby. The same fight was continued there. The people of Toronto, desirous of keeping every radial railway out of the city—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. HENDERSON: They say, Oh, no; but I know the history of this question. I have been as long in this House as any of these hon. gentlemen, and I know the fights that came up year after year and how many fights we had to try and get an entrance into the city of Toronto from the rural sections. There is no doubt about it that the people of the counties outside of Toronto claim that they have a right—I would say a vested right—to get into the city of Toronto. They have helped to build up Toronto. If it had not been for the people of the adjacent counties the city of Toronto would be a small town. The people of Toronto are indebted to the people of the country for the size of their city and the sooner they permit the people in the counties lying east and west to enjoy the privileges which they are by nature entitled to have the better for the city of Toronto. If they do not want our fresh eggs and prefer eating stale eggs, of course, they can shut us out, but they can have their choice. We prefer the fresh eggs, and we will use them. We have an abundance of them. We can supply the people of Toronto every day with all they want and more than they need if they will only let us in. But, unfortunately, they made a bad contract about twenty-five years ago with a company, giving them a franchise over the streets of Toronto to last for thirty years. That contract will not expire for six or seven years yet, and the people of Toronto are afraid that whoever owns this franchise in Toronto will claim heavy damages if any other electric road is permitted to get into the city and pass over its streets. Consequently these gentlemen are fighting, not for the city of Toronto, but to protect themselves against the penalties that would be imposed upon them if this road were permitted to get in. I hope and trust that very soon they will be willing to give up the fight, that they will see eye to eye with us and will be willing to let these outside roads find a way in. After they had imposed onerous conditions on the road coming in from the east, another application was made for the Hamilton and Guelph Railway Company—I am not sure whether that is the name or not, as there are so many of them—and these conditions were imposed so onerously that that company was prohibited from getting in. I do not want to talk the Bill out, but I want to get a resolution passed that will repeal clause 7, and then I am willing that the Bill should go through. The Toronto and suburban road is being constructed now through my county from one side of it to the other. It is graded, everything is ready practically to lay down the ties, and then we will have a road running from Guelph to Toronto if we can only get into Toronto. But the people of Toronto play—I was going to say hog, but I shall not use that term—they are very selfish, they say: No, we will not let you in; we have a railway in Toronto that claims the franchise and if we let any other railway in we will have to pay a penalty to Sir William Mackenzie; we do not want to fight him, but we would rather fight the people of the county of Halton. Consequently, they are putting a clause in this Bill that makes it impossible for this company to get in. I am told as a fact that when this clause found its way into the Bill three clauses were included in one motion. Had they been moved separately I do not believe this clause would ever have gone into the Bill but this was a shrewd plan adopted by those who were promoting the Bill to get this clause in. Consequently, they moved two clauses quite inoffensive and acceptable and a third clause very offensive and not acceptable and all went through together. The result is that the clause as it appears here practically shuts this road out of Toronto as long as this Act remains on the statute book. I appeal to the members of this House to be fair to the outlying counties and give the people the right to get into this big market which I contend the rural sections have created. I am quite sure that the people of Toronto will be well satisfied when they come to find the great advantage that will accrue to them from the operation of this road.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They will have a chance to get Georgetown stone then.

Mr. HENDERSON: Yes, they will get it in abundance and get good stone too.

Mr. CURRIE: Would the hon. gentleman prefer to have the Bill talked out or to have it withdrawn?

Mr. HENDERSON: The hon. gentleman cannot withdraw the Bill without the consent of the House.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 7 be adopted?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, Mr. Chairman.

9 p.m. After hearing all that has been said—

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report progress on this Bill?

Progress reported—the hour for private Bills having expired.

MANAGEMENT OF THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. MACDONALD (resuming): My right hon. friend who now leads the Government (Mr. Borden) had a policy of his own in regard to the operation of the Intercolonial railway. The basis of that policy was the constitution of a non-partisan commission to rid the railway from all the evils of patronage and of political influence in regard to its operation and to provide for the operation of the railway solely and purely as a business proposition. My right hon. friend, I have no doubt, was sincere when he made those professions in 1907 and in various years down to the moment when the responsibility of dealing with the situation was placed upon him. Then my right hon. friend forgot the promises which he had made, the professions which he had uttered, and we have the system which exists to-day on the Intercolonial railway. When my right hon. friend had the responsibility of action in dealing with these propositions, he forgot all these professions, and, instead of having a non-partisan commission, he proceeded to do away with the commission which he found in existence when he came to power, and to appoint, as general manager of the road the gentleman who now fills that office. Under the regime of this gentleman we have gone back to all the evils of which my right hon. friend then complained. Partisanship in regard to the employment of men on the Intercolonial exists not only to the degree which he denounced some years ago, but to a very much greater degree than ever before in the whole history of the road. No man can be employed on the Intercolonial to-day unless he has a letter to the responsible official having to do with the operation of the road, from the Conservative member of the constituency, or from the Conservative defeated candidate, or from the Conservative committee. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, who sits next the Prime Minister, in the last Parliament moved in this House a resolution in which he condemned in the strongest possible terms the evils of patronage as applied to the selection of officials upon mere party grounds, and as to the purchase of supplies from political friends. Why is it that to-day these professions are forgotten, not only with regard to the employment of men, but in regard to the furnishing of supplies to the Intercolonial railway, for no man is allowed to furnish supplies to that railway unless his name is on the patronage list. And when it comes to the question of the distribution of contracts, I have known the present Minister of Railways to call for tenders for important supplies, and to disregard the tenders sent in and to proceed to distribute among his party friends the proportion of the articles required, according as it suited his political judgment.

In regard to the question of dealing with the men, I have here a letter from an employee of the road who gives cases which indicate how, under the present management, men who get drunk while engaged in operating trains are treated with favouritism by the present officials. Here is the case of a conductor whose train while unprotected was run into by another train, and the conductor had been taking a little something, and thirty demerits were charged against him. A railway engineer in Truro yard was taken off his engine and put on a shunter in the yard because he was shown to have been drunk; another one who had been working on a shunter was given a lower grade of employment, simply and solely because he had political influence to get the rules disregarded. There is a conductor on the Intercolonial railway running out of Truro, who is known to everybody in the province of Nova Scotia who travels on the train as having been frequently drunk while on duty. He was discharged, but he had the political influence to be taken back and he is now running as a baggage-master on one of the through trains of the Intercolonial. These are the conditions that exist to-day, and when my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) moves asking the House to condemn these things, the Prime Minister should remember what he said seven years ago, and if he meant what he said he should at least take hold of this question and, as has been suggested by his own friends, he should inquire into the management of the Intercolonial and see whether he cannot fulfil some of his promises in regard to it.

Mr. BORDEN: Will my hon. friend give the names of these men to whom he has referred?

Mr. MACDONALD: I will give my right hon. friend privately the names of the men as they have been given to me. In regard to this whole question of the Intercolonial, one fault I find with the present minister, genial gentleman as he is personally, is that he is indoctrinated by the narrow view that it is his particular business to see that he shall get out of the Intercolonial all the money he can get out of it. I want to point out to the Prime Minister, coming as I do from the same province as he, that a proper conception in regard to the operation of the Intercolonial is that it is a national proposition, and one which was provided for under the terms of Confederation, not for the purpose that Canada as a whole should proceed to extort money out of it, but that there should be provided for the people who lived in the then far away Maritime provinces, a convenient mode of access to this, what was then, the central portion of the Dominion of Canada. There went into the whole of the assets of the Dominion at the time of Confederation, the great system of canals to which we have been adding every year since Confederation until we have spent in the vicinity of one hundred million dollars upon that system. We did that for the purpose of carrying the products of the people of this part of Canada and of the West down through the province of Ontario, and we are carrying them absolutely free. Where have we ever heard in this House from any hon. gentleman from any other province of the Dominion any request or demand that the people of Canada should look to these canals and to their operation, as returning something into the treasury of this country? No such plea has ever been made, and for the simple reason that it was recognized that cheap transportation was one of the important things in the development of the country. We of the Maritime provinces, in respect to the operation of the Intercolonial railway, have the right to say to this Parliament, and to the Minister of Railways, that in the operation of the Intercolonial he has no right to tax our people; his only right is to see that the operation of that railway is so guided and controlled that he can get things to come out even. When the present Minister of Railways took charge of the Intercolonial he increased the rates then prevailing and put these increased rates in force. The present acting Minister of Railways, in that genial easy way of his, took the precaution when on March 24 he gave a review of the railway situation, to anticipate the objections that he had heard with reference to this increase of rates, by intimating that the members of the commission who had been in charge, subject to the govermental responsibility and control, had contemplated increasing the rates before the present manager of the Intercolonial railway came into office. The very fact that there had been in contemplation an increase of rates under the Hon. Mr. Cochrane, shows that the present managers of the road were acting under his guidance.

Mr. J. D. REID: It was done long before Mr. Cochrane came into office.

Mr. MACDONALD: The introduction of these rates was not done long before he came into office.

Mr. REID: Yes, it was.

Mr. MACDONALD: Excuse me, it was not.

Mr. REID: The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) had an Order in Council ready.

Mr. MACDONALD: Whether the hon. member for South Renfrew had an Order in Council or not, the increase of rates never took place under Liberal rule.

Mr. REID: That is because you went out of power.

Mr. MACDONALD: Let hon. gentlemen on both sides be judged by their actions. Who put these increased rates into force? They were put into force under the regime of the Hon. Mr. Cochrane. And for what purpose? For the purpose of extracting more and unnecessary money out of the provinces down by the sea. The hon. Minister of Railways found, after he had put these rates into force, that there came from every portion of the country vehement objection to his action. So, when Mr. Hayes came in, he was sent around to deal with the question. And what did he do?

Mr. J. D. REID: Reduced the rates.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not at all. The rates were increased in the first place from twenty-five to fifty per cent according to the schedule. In my own constituency the products of the farm and the products of the coal mines were increased from thirty to fifty per cent. But after these rates had been in force for some time along came Mr. Hayes. Did he bring these rates back to where they had been under Liberal rule? Not at all. But instead of decreasing them by from thirty to fifty per cent, he increased them anywhere from fifteen to thirty per cent. And then the acting minister tells us that he reduced them. A nice way to 'reduce' them! Taking the schedules as applied all over the line, the increases under Mr. Hayes and under this minister, upon the people of the Maritime provinces, have been from fifteen to twenty per cent. And what is the reason why this is necessary? Because under this Government they have been sending gentlemen who do not understand local conditions and do not take the trouble to find out. They go there with the idea they are sent to run this road as a business proposition to the disregard of the people and of business interests along the line; and because they have been given carte blanche to run this as a business proposition, they have got it into their heads that the proper thing is to disregard the people, to believe that the people of the Maritime provinces, as some have said, have been 'living off the Intercolonial,' and it is time this should stop. That is what has occurred under the present Minister of Railways and the acting minister. If the present Minister of Railways wanted a general manager to put in charge of the road, David Pottinger, who had grown up from a boy on the line, and whose ability as a railway man is unquestionable and is recognized by everybody who knows him, would have dealt with the operation of the railway, and I venture to say that had he been appointed we should not find it necessary here to-night to criticise the Minister of Railways and the Prime Minister for the management of the line. For Mr. Pottinger would have applied intelligently the knowledge which he gained from his long experience on the Intercolonial Railway system and would not have put us in the position we are in to-day under these gentlemen who go down there from the various departments—mostly from the United States according to my hon. friend from Westmorland—and who know nothing about our people, their aspirations and desires, and whose ideas of the Intercolonial railway are so far away from the real position that they will never learn how to run it.

Let me give an illustration in regard to our great coal and iron industry. Up to the time that, under Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Drummond railway was purchased and made part of the Intercolonial railway and we thus had a railway which reached the commercial metropolis of Canada, it was impossible for us to send these products of our province into Montreal on account of the extra charge made necessary by having to run over the Grand Trunk railway from Lévis to Montreal. Since that time, under reasonable rates and provisions made under the Liberal Government, these industries in the winter time were able to keep their men employed and keep their mines operating by sending their coal over the Intercolonial railway into Montreal. But when the new policy was inaugurated by the present general manager, the policy of penalizing these industries by raising rates to such a point that it was impossible for them to compete with American coal in the city of Montreal, we had this winter destitution, for the first time in seventeen years, around the coal mines of our province. And this is for the reason that under this management of the railway the products of these mines were debarred from the city of Montreal. Day after day, the coal mines did not work, because they could not get transportation for their products except at penalizing rates. That may be splendid statesmanship; that may be the means of building up a surplus of $300,000 or $400,000 to put in the general treasury of the Dominion, but I question whether, if you sum up the whole question of advantage and disadvantage to the people of this country, it can be characterized by any other name than that of stupidity. What has been the action of this gentleman, particularly in regard to the coal industry? A year ago, instead of awarding the coal contract to the coal mines in Nova Scotia for the Intercolonial railway supply in February or early in March, as had always been the case under previous managers, the situation was dawdled with, and no contracts were awarded until the spring opened. Now, along the Intercolonial railway, you have a condition that does not exist on any other line of railway east of the Rocky Mountains; you have the coal to run the railway right alongside of the railway itself. In Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan that situation does not exist, and only to a certain extent does it exist in Alberta. That any general manager of the Intercolonial railway should find it necessary to go to the United States to purchase coal for his railway would seem incredible. But what occurred? Instead of settling these contracts at an early period of the year, they were allowed to remain unsettled until late. Then contracts were awarded to the different coal mines of Nova Scotia. At that time the coal mines which shipped coal by water to the St. Lawrence had practically made their contracts for the use of steamers during the summer season and as a consequence, the coal necessary for Levis and other points along the St. Lawrence were delivered by the two companies that tendered for the Nova Scotia and the Dominion, the quantity awarded in the spring by the present Minister of Railways. Everything went on as usual so far as their deliveries were concerned until about the end of September, when the general manager made up his mind that he wanted more coal at Levis and Montreal. He had got the supply he had asked for, but in September he decided to get more. So he wrote to these two companies engaged in the business of shipping coal to Montreal by water and asked them to supply him. One company said: we have made up our allotments for all we can do up to the close of navigation. The other agreed to give an additional quantity, and they did. But did not satisfy him and he went to two other companies that had not been engaged in shipping coal by water and asked them—this was early in October—to tender for the supply of 15,000 tons of coal at Levis. Now, when you come to Octobe in the gulf of St. Lawrence you come to a dangerous period of the year. The very fact that he proposed to ship by water when he had the railway and could have hauled it himself shows the ludicrousness of the position. He never asked the other fifteen companies that were raising coal and shipping it on the Intercolonial railway to send any at all. He asked the firm of George Hall and Company, of Ogdensburg, whether they could sell him 15,000 tons of American coal. The correspondence brought down shows what took place. Messrs. George Hall and Company agreed to sell the manager of the Intercolonial railway, for $3 a net ton, 15,000 tons of run of mine coal, to be delivered at Massena Springs, near the boundary line. Was that not a singular transaction, considering the political assertions of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to their attitude in respect of trade with the people to the south of us? Was it not a singular thing for a department of the Government, without making any special effort to get the coal elsewhere; without demonstrating the necessity for getting it where they did get it, to disregard the 19 operating coal mines which were ready to supply coal along the line of the Intercolonial railway, and to purchase this coal in the United States, paying for it $3 a net ton, delivered at Massena Springs? How much did it cost us then? When they buy coal from the Nova Scotia mines they buy it, not by the net ton but by the gross ton, and they pay only $3.15 a ton for it. The price which they paid George Hall and Company for coal delivered at Massena Springs was $3.36 per gross ton, or 21 cents a ton more than they could get it for in Nova Scotia, delivered on their own rails. Upon that coal they were compelled to pay a duty of 53 cents a ton. According to the return which was brought down, it cost them 57 cents a ton for freight from Massena Springs to St. Rosalie Junction. On the same basis it would cost something like 23 cents a ton to bring the coal to Levis. They paid, therefore, $4.69 a ton for that coal at Levis, when they could have got it along the line of the Intercolonial railway for $3.15 a ton, could have hauled it every foot of the way over their own railway, could have found employment for their own men, and could have gone a long way towards preventing the destitution which existed during the past winter in the coal mining districts of the province of Nova Scotia.

Public attention having been called to the matter, the general manager of the Intercolonial railway gave an interview in Montreal on March 23. These are the reasons he gave for buying the coal in the United States; I want the House to follow me on this point:

> Here is the story in a nutshell. We purchase about 750,000 tons of coal, and last fall we ascertained by correspondence with the Dominion Steel Corporation, the Nova Scotia Company, and other sources of supply, that they were absolutely unable to deliver us enough, so we purchased 15,000 tons from the George Hall Company. We adopted this policy in view of the fact that we had decided to do away with the previous custom of hauling coal through from Sydney in the winter, while steamship freight from Halifax was side-tracked along the line to the loss and inconvenience of both the road and its customers. As for the future, I do not think that it will be found necessary to purchase any coal outside of the Dominion.

You will notice what this gentleman says: In the first place, he mentions the very extremity of the road as the place from which they would have to haul the coal if it were bought in Nova Scotia. I would point out that he could have got the coal in the constituency of the hon. member for Cumberland, 300 miles nearer Lévis than Sydney, where there are seven or eight mines operating. He could have got the coal in my constituency, which is only 500 miles from Lévis, and could have hauled it over the Intercolonial railway. But I want hon. gentlemen to note another absolutely incorrect statement which he made in giving another reason for the procedure to which I have referred. He said that he did not want the sidings filled up during the winter with steamship freight coming from Halifax. Fortunately the information extracted from hon. gentlemen opposite by the hon. member for Guysborough shows the baseless character of that defence for this absolutely unjustifiable proceeding. In an answer obtained by the hon. member for Guysborough to a question he asked the other day, it is stated that the quantity of freight which originated in the province of Nova Scotia during the past year was 2,693,024 tons. What proportion of that amount was made up of freight which came from the seaport of Halifax? This tremendous amount of freight which prevented the general manager of the Intercolonial railway from keeping the coal mines of Nova Scotia going and from saving the coal miners from want. The proportion is 1/26—99,308 tons. That covers not merely the months of December, January, February and March, but the month of April of the previous year as well. So that the freight with which Mr. Gutelius did not want to interfere is but an infinitesimal portion of the freight going over the Intercolonial in winter. I want to submit to hon. gentlemen on the other side the question: Is it fair or right that we who live along the line of the Intercolonial railway and who are debarred in winter from connection by water with the central parts of the Dominion, should be told by the Government railway: we will not burn the coal that you produce in Nova Scotia; we will not haul it over the Government railway; we prefer to pay $1.50 more a ton to the Yankees than to buy our own coal and employ our own men on the Intercolonial railway. Is it any wonder that the hon. member for Westmorland moves a resolution asking that the operation of the railway under these conditions be condemned?

Having given that excuse as to why he purchased the coal last fall in the United States, what did the general manager do next? What did he do when the spring came, when the steamers were running to Montreal and there was no extra freight coming over the Intercolonial from the Atlantic coast? He shows the absolute flimsiness of his excuse by writing to the following companies:

J. Bert Ross, Buffalo, N.Y.
American Steel Company, Pittsburg, Pa.
Moreland Coke Company, Pittsburg, Pa.
Ernest Law & Company, Philadelphia, Pa.
Keystone Coal and Coke Co., Philadelphia, Pa.
Watkins Coal Company, Philadelphia, Pa.
Pennsylvania Coal and Coke Co., New York, N.Y.
Geo. Hall Coal Company, Ogdensburg, N.Y.
J. H. Weaver and Company, Philadelphia, Pa.
Whitney and Kemmerer, Philadelphia, Pa.
Widnoon Coal Mining Co., Buffalo, N.Y.
H. W. Somers, Albany, N.Y.

He asks these coal operators in the United States if they will submit to him an offer to supply all the coal required on the Intercolonial railway during the year 1914, 750,000 tons. When the general manager of the road, in the interview which he gave at Montreal, put forward the excuse which he did for purchasing coal from the George Hall Company last fall, he did not give the country the whole truth, If he did, why did he, in the spring of this year, ask fifteen American coal companies whether they would supply coal to the Intercolonial for this year? If somebody had not called public attention to the fact, the acting Minister of Railways and Canals would have been compelled—and I know he would have disliked it very much—to stand up in this House and admit that the Intercolonial Railway management had purchased summer coal in the United States, and try to apologize for it.

Fortunately for him we succeeded in calling public attention to this matter and scared the general manager of the Intercolonial off so that he did not venture to award any contract for this year to the American coal people. All the while the Department was dickering with these operators in the United States, in every coal centre in Nova Scotia there were women and children who were suffering from want under the conditions that exist under this Government. The conditions in every coal mining town in eastern Nova Scotia during the past winter have never been equalled in any year since 1895, when, fortunately for Canada, the Conservative party were put out of power. They brought all this back again. These gentlemen with their splendid administration of the Intercolonial railway, do not know enough about what is going on down in the country which this railway serves, to know that the last thing they should have done was to do what no other railway company would have done, go to the United States and ask them to supply coal to the Intercolonial during this year.

What further? When they got these offers the general manager, notwithstanding the poor condition of the coal industry in Nova Scotia, proceeded to insist that he would not pay the coal managers of Nova Scotia last year's prices and so he drove the coal managers of Nova Scotia under these conditions to accept a less price than was paid last year and the year before. That is what these gentlemen are doing in regard to the operation of the Intercolonial in respect of these things. What has occurred further? Of course the general manager, with his huge salary, will probably save enough under this method of oppression which he is adopting in dealing with the coal industry of Nova Scotia, to pay this large salary of his for two years. But is the game worth the candle? Not only are they doing that, but by the increased rates which have been maintained in regard to these products they absolutely prevent the exportation of coal from the Maritime provinces into the central portions of Canada. I think the hon. member for Westmorland, in proposing the resolution, has only put into language what is the opinion of everybody who lives along the line of this railway from a business standpoint. There has been also complete disarrangement of the very satisfactory conditions that have existed among the men. We have in every department of the Intercolonial railway the brotherhood systems that exist on every other railway in the country, and notwithstanding this as a result of these new methods that have been introduced the principle of promotion of men born and brought up on the Intercolonial railway has been absolutely stopped. Wherever a new position was created whose occupant would have to assume some responsibility nobody but a man from some other railway either in Canada or the United States would be appointed. I think we can claim, and the Premier will not venture to dispute the assertion, that the men who are on the Intercolonial railway, no matter what party appointed them within the last twenty-five or thirty years, are the equal of intelligence and capacity of any other men on any other railway in Canada or in the United States. But no matter what the capacity or ability of a man may be he cannot be promoted. The principle seems to be that such a man is not fit for any job involving responsibility under this Government. The heartlessness that has been exhibited in regard to some cases there is striking. I have here a letter from a poor old man who has been on the railway for twelve years. One day he received a letter without any notice—no allegations of political partisanship about this, no suggestion of anything of that kind—but on March 23 this old man gets a letter as follows: 'Please arrange to make out form 86 for so-and-so, stopping this man from the service. Please see that this man is laid off on the night of March 31.' A week's notice to this man who is a car builder in the railway town of Stellarton; no complaint against him on the ground of politics; a quiet, simple old man doing his work. But some of these gentlemen in Moncton wakened up to the fact that he happened to be an old man. He had been on the road since January, 1905; his name is William Friel; he has been on the road almost ten years. If he were allowed to remain on until next year he would have qualified under the Provident Fund Act. Into that fund he had paid two and a half cents a day every day he had been on the railway since the Act came into force. He was set adrift almost in the middle of winter on a week's notice, no money was given him, not even the money he had paid in. He was told to go out and find what he could do; there was no fault except that he was getting old. I am bound to say that if the Minister of Railways were here—and in saying this I am not reflecting on the acting minister—he would have dealt with this case. Mr. Cochrane knows very well that there exist along the Intercolonial railway numerous cases of men who have grown old who might be thrown out in order to make way for younger men but who had not filled the allotted time. I understood that it was generally understood along the line of the Intercolonial railway that this winter legislation would be introduced to provide for these cases, that they would get back either the money that they had put in or participate in the fund, as they had a right to do. What I complain of is that men managing the Intercolonial railway have so little knowledge of our conditions down there that without any complaint against a man they discharge him on a week's notice, disregarding the claim which he had, if not in law at least in equity, upon the provident fund to which he had paid every day during his service on the road. Then there has been a rearrangement of railway centres in order to gratify the political friends who exercise political pressure. Men who have been living at the various railway centres, who have their homes there, who have had the conditions of life there were twisted around, their runs were changed and they were sent to different places and compelled to be away from their homes at night without any reason whatever. If there had been in charge of the Intercolonial railway a general manager who had been brought up on the road, these conditions would have been recognized. It is no wonder that the Truro Citizen says to the Prime Minister what the real position of his friends is on the Intercolonial railway and this because of the absolute failure of the management to realize existing conditions that prompt men to make these charges as they occur in the Truro Citizen. We heard the present minister talk about safety first, the desirability of safety first among the employees. I was very much amused to hear him dilate upon that because I discovered in the Truro Citizen, which is said to be the organ of the Conservative whip in this House—whether it is his organ or not he is said to own it and probably he cannot control the editor—the paper furnished a veritable gold mine of criticism. It has a sarcastic article saying that under this railway management there are a great number of well-paid men going up and down the line instructing the old employees. One of those special officials sent out from Moncton a week ago a carload of dynamite attached to a passenger train. Such a thing had never been heard of on the Intercolonial before. Dynamite had always been taken under special conditions, and the train crew protested against the car of dynamite being attached to the train on which there were twenty-two passengers.

Mr. EMMERSON: That was safety last.

Mr. MACDONALD: You can have a great many theories about safety first and bring high-priced people from the United States to operate the people's road in this country, but the first thing the general manager should do is to find out all about the people for whom he is going to operate the road; that is, if he is going to operate it with any regard for their ideas. I do think it is the duty of the Government to think over, for a little while, this question of the indiscriminate employment of American citizens on the Intercolonial. No man should be proscribed on account of his birth. Where you have to do with companies, you have one condition; but when the Government of this country employs aliens to perform Government work, you have a condition that is not to be found in any other country in the world. Why, says my hon. friend the acting Minister of Railways, these men have been in Canada a long time; therefore that answers the argument that we should not employ them. They have been in Canada this long, that they do not want to give up their American citizenship. Certainly there has been some legislation removing the difficulties in regard to aliens. My hon. friend the member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins) perhaps can supply the common law on the subject of the employment of aliens under the Crown.

Mr. AIKINS: Might I ask the hon. member if the people of the United States do not employ hundreds of thousands of Canadians in the services of that country?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend was talking to the Prime Minister about the Canadian Northern railway, and he did not catch my point. When he listens to it I am sure he will agree with me. I offer no objection to a corporation employing a man, no matter where they get him; but I do object to the Government of this country taking money out of the treasury to employ aliens upon Government work when they can get Canadians just as good as the aliens they are employing.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And when there are thousands of unemployed in this country.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think that point should appeal to my hon. friend the acting Minister of Railways because he has had strong feelings upon this question. I recall the vigorous attitude he adopted in this House some three years ago, when he said that Canada's identity would be imperiled if certain things were done. One thing is certain, and that is that one department of the Government will soon be in the hands of an alien race—as they would put it—if the present policy is continued. The Intercolonial will soon be entirely under the control of the American people, who not only want to man it but who go across the line to buy United States coal in order to run it.

Mr. EMMERSON: An adjunct.

Mr. MACDONALD: Surely it is about time this thing should stop. I am surprised at the Prime Minister allowing it, but I do not believe he knows what has been going on. Now that his attention has been called to it, I am sure he will stop it.

Mr. CARVELL: Quite sure?

Mr. MACDONALD: I am beginning to lose confidence in my right hon. friend. He has good intentions, but so far I have failed to see him implement them.

Mr. CARVELL: Bad associates.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think the Prime Minister has voted in this House for a resolution that it is desirable in the interests of the Intercolonial that we should get branch lines. I am quite sure he has, but he has not been doing much at that particular job since coming into power. He found several propositions at hand which he might have accepted with the greatest possible ease, and without the expenditure of much money. Having admitted the principle that it is desirable in the interests of the Intercolonial to have as many feeders for that line as possible, my right hon. friend has not been at all active in the pursuit of that laudable idea. I do admire some hon. gentlemen opposite. When they want to excuse their inaction on any matter they say: The Senate will not permit us to do it. I have been waiting to hear a vigorous denunciation of the Senate from the Prime Minister, and an assertion on the part of the Government and himself of their intention to wipe out that nefarious institution; but he does not move on that line at all. He wants the Senate there to be blamed for all the things this Government have left undone that they ought to have done, and so that they can say when this branch lines question comes up: We could not take over branch lines because the Senate is there. My right hon. friend knows very well how flimsy that excuse is. When the Senate insisted upon the Government laying before Parliament all propositions for ratification, and insisted upon that principle alone, they were not doing anything so especially outrageous, or deserving of condemnation. My right hon. friend knows that to-morrow he could introduce into this House a Bill to ratify any arrangement that he made to take over branch lines for the Intercolonial. What does he mean by putting on the Order Paper a resolution providing all this money for the Canadian Northern railway. The Senate has not been asked to permit him to do anything of the kind. Of his own initiative he went out and made this agreement, brings it here to Parliament, and, if it is incorporated in an Act of Parliament, he has full rights to carry out the agreement notwithstanding anything the Senate has done. If he has not taken over branch lines for the Intercolonial, it is not on account of the Senate, but simply and solely because he does not want to do it. That is the whole proposition. If my right hon. friend addresses the House upon this question, and pays me the compliment of referring to anything I have said, I would like him to meet that proposition squarely, and let the House know as to whether the proposition I make is not correct. As a matter of law and of parliamentary practice, there is nothing to prevent him introducing a Bill, or any number of Bills, to take over any number of branch lines he wants along the line of the Intercolonial. It is just as well for the people of this country to realize that my right hon. friend and his party are responsible for not taking over those branch lines. Not only that, but my right hon. friend has utterly failed to supply the necessary branch lines for which funds had been provided when he came into power. I do submit to my right hon. friend that it was really unfair—he cannot justify it—that out of the two branch lines for which my hon. friend the member for South Renfrew had provided funds in the session of 1911, he should have picked out the one in his own constituency, and absolutely disregarded the other one for which the people interested had been fighting for a long period of time. That was pretty shabby treatment, and unworthy of my right hon. friend. I am surprised that he should have permitted such a course to be taken. The eastern portion of Nova Scotia is entitled to that railway accommodation. What is the use of the Minister of Railways saying: If somebody will show me where I am going to get some money out of this thing, I will consider it. That is not the kind of policy that is adopted in other cases. It is the excuse put forward to strike out of the Estimates all the provisions which had been made by my hon. friend for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) and to disregard the contracts which had been entered into for a railway to Guysboro. That is part and parcel of the management of the Intercolonial railway and it is all included in the condemnation embodied in the resolution introduced by my hon. friend from Westmorland.

My hon. friend from Westmorland has referred to the terms upon which the Government have undertaken to haul Canadian Pacific railway trains from St. John to Halifax. I do not think that my hon. friend has quite caught the point in regard to the matter, if he will permit me to say so. The reason why the Canadian Pacific railway are paying the Intercolonial for hauling their trains from St. John to Moncton or Halifax to-day is because the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) was able to prevent the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) from giving them running powers over the Intercolonial to Halifax. The Canadian Pacific railway wanted to have running powers from St. John to Halifax in order to operate their steamers permanently from that point as their Atlantic terminus in the Dominion. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries prevented them from getting those running powers but they insisted that the Government could not refuse to give them those terms. They said: You cannot refuse to haul our trains if we pay you for it. Whether the amount paid for this service is small or large, I have not inspected the proposition as my hon. friend from Westmorland has. But this was the compromise which this Government made in order to protect the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in St. John. My right hon. friend, although he would not give running powers to the Canadian Pacific railway in order to get to Halifax, has, however, undertaken to give the Canadian Northern running powers over the whole Intercolonial railway from Montreal down to Sydney and to leave it to the Railway Commission to determine what they should pay for the privilege.

There is another phase of the management of the Intercolonial railway which comes within the confines of this resolution. The one thing that has characterized the present administration of the Intercolonial railway under this Government is the absolute disregard of the interests of the people. It is a development of the old Conservative spirit, the old theory that was enunciated in this House by a representative of the Conservative party that to those who belonged to that great party had been given the sole and divine right to rule and therefore we must assume the reigns of office and disregard the public. When they are dealing with a public service like the Intercolonial railway they operate it to suit themselves and with an absolute disregard of the interests of the people who are connected with it and the people who live along the road. To show that this opinion is not one which is held by myself alone, I resort again to the Truro Citizen of April 18, which has some very apt remarks in regard to this matter, and I think the House would like to hear them. It says:

[Mr. Macdonald.]

The gentlemen who are managing the Intercolonial railway at present may, to use a Yankee term, be as smart as chain lightning, but when they make a time table and leave the serving of part of the people out of it, their stock is liable to drop a point or two. It is time now to revise the statement that the Intercolonial railway was built for the people of the Maritime provinces. We have no doubt but that it was, but it has got nicely over it.

There has got to be a change. Those gentlemen, good railway men as they may be, have got to come down off their perches and see the people, or the people will cut the perches from under them. There are old ladies in this country wearing the old-fashioned caps and knitting rock maple socks that know more about the geography of the country than some of the latter day managers of the Intercolonial railway seem to know.

This gentleman has caught the point I was endeavouring to make that the trouble is that these men go down there not knowing anything about the Maritime provinces and they will not attempt to know.

Less provocation than is to be found in the management of the Intercolonial railway those days has driven men to drink and dogs from home.

He is a facetious gentleman, this:

The hard thing to understand is what particular spite they have against Right Hon. R. L. Borden and his followers in the House. They are certainly making trouble for those gentlemen. If these officials made the same trouble for the road they came from as they are making for the Government, little wonder they were exported and that, too, without an export duty. It is time for a change.

Mr. LAW: What paper is that?

Mr. MACDONALD: That is the Truro Citizen, a paper published in Truro and reputed to be owned by the Conservative whip in this House, who founded it and, as it says, it speaks out in meetings once in awhile. I might at greater length deal with the various questions that come up in regard to the operation of the Intercolonial railway, but speaking from the standpoint of the Maritime provinces, living there, connected with the business life

10 p.m. of those provinces, knowing something of the men who work on the road, knowing something of the condition of these provinces, I say that at no time in my recollection has there been such utter and complete disregard of the business interests of those provinces and the interests of the individual men who work upon the road and the common people of the Maritime provinces. I shall unhesitatingly, and with the greatest possible pleasure, support the resolution of my hon. friend from Westmorland.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have spent two or three hours very pleasantly listening to various disquisitions upon branch lines, aliens, the Senate, coal, and boards of management. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) had better get a little instruction from the late Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham). He seems to think that the Intercolonial railway was managed by commission under the regime of that hon. gentleman. I have heard the hon. member for South Renfrew take exception in this House to the statement that the road was managed under a commission, and draw attention distinctly to the point which he had made that the road under his regime was not managed by a commission, but by a board of management. But the hon. member for Pictou, not having looked into that question very carefully, has fallen into a misapprehension in that regard. I take great pleasure in correcting him, and for the purpose of further detail in correction I would refer him to the hon. member for South Renfrew who has made it very plain to the House on various occasions.

My hon. friend from Pictou has made the allegation that the Intercolonial railway, under the management of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane), has been directed entirely by partisan considerations, not by considerations of reasonable business management. I take exception to that in the most unqualified terms, and I say that in so far as I have had a complaint—and I have had a complaint from time to time—in regard to the management of the Intercolonial railway, it has been that the railway has been managed too strictly on a business basis and not according to the basis upon which the management was founded in days gone by. I venture to say that if there is any dissatisfaction with the Intercolonial railway, it has proceeded from time to time more from the fact that the Minister of Railways and Canals has been disposed to give what has been regarded as too strict attention to purely business considerations in the management of the road. I do not think that any hon. gentleman who knows anything of the management of the Intercolonial railway during the last two or three years will venture to dissent from what I have stated in that regard.

A good deal has been said about the freight rates on the Intercolonial railway, but the hon. member for Westmorland apparently has not a very clear recollection of what took place under his own regime. He has asserted that an Order in Council is necessary to increase freight rates on the Intercolonial; but if he remembered clearly and distinctly the facts, he would, as I am informed, have known that an Order in Council was passed fixing maximum rates on the Intercolonial according to the standard in force on the Drummond Counties railway, and this without any special Order in Council, under the management of hon. gentlemen opposite, the rates on the Intercolonial were increased, because the increase did not bring them up to that maximum. I am also informed that the recent freight rate increases on the Intercolonial have never on any occasion reached that maximum, and that therefore no Order in Council was necessary, nor has one been passed. My hon. friend (Mr. Emmerson) does not seem to have been very well informed on this point. As to the increase in rates, the justification put forward by the Minister of Railways in this House last year, and I think by the acting minister this year, was, that certain items, amounting altogether to nearly $800,000 per annum, constituted an increase in the cost of operating the Intercolonial, and that among these items were a very proper increase of wages to the employees of the Intercolonial and a very large increase in the cost of coal, which together amounted to nearly $600,000. The Minister of Railways, acting within the maximum rates which had been fixed, not by us but by our predecessors in office, sanctioned certain increases of rates. Those increases were apparently not very well considered in respect to certain items, and complaints were made—and I am bound to say that I think those complaints in some instances were fully justified. Mr. Hayes, who had been appointed as freight traffic manager of the Intercolonial, was directed by the minister, with whom I had conference on the subject, immediately to inquire into these alleged grievances in every case, and, so far as I am informed, at present every grievance that was brought to the attention of the management of the Intercolonial railway or to the attention of the minister has been inquired into and wholly or in large measure redressed. I do not think there is in the province of Nova Scotia at the moment any very serious complaint with regard to increases of rates, upon which subject my hon. friend from Westmorland has so dilated.

He and my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) have dwelt upon the iniquity of the management of the Intercolonial railway by reason of the fact that certain persons who happen to have been born south of the boundary line between Canada and the United States, but who had been residents and citizens of this country for a great many years, are at present in the employment of the Intercolonial railway. One would think to hear these gentlemen that there was hardly any person in the employment of the Intercolonial railway who was not an American citizen. I have no personal knowledge of the subject, but I made inquiry since this debate began, and I am informed that every superintendent upon the Intercolonial railway to-day is a Canadian citizen, and, with the exception of Mr. Richardson, has been brought up and trained in the service of the Intercolonial. That does not accord very well with the picture that has been drawn by the hon. member for Westmorland and the hon. member for Pictou.

I am entirely in agreement with these gentlemen on the principle that it is a proper thing for men who have been in the service of that railway to be promoted from time to time so far as their abilities will justify and so far as their experience will warrant. I would want no other system than that upon the Intercolonial or upon any other railway in this country, and I believe that that principle will be carried out and is being carried out on the Intercolonial. But it is necessary from time to time to obtain some person with peculiar and special experience in a particular line of railway management; and I believe it is only in that connection that a few men, I do not know how many, have been brought in, either from the Canadian Pacific railway or from the Grand Trunk.

The hon. member for Westmorland has taken upon himself to say that there has been not only this indiscriminate dealing in aliens, as he calls them, but that the assistant superintendent is the brother-in-law of the general superintendent. I do not know that even if that were true it would necessitate taking up more than an hour or two of the time of Parliament in dilating on it; but, as a matter of fact, I am informed—and I sent a telegram for the purpose of inquiring about it—that there is not one word of truth in that assertion. The charge of nepotism, as it seems to be based wholly upon the fallacious illustration which the hon. gentleman brought forward, falls completely to the ground.

There has been, I daresay, some dissatisfaction with regard to the management of the Intercolonial railway, both under this Administration and under the late Administration; but I would like the hon. member for Pictou to remember that that dissatisfaction has not arisen solely in respect to officials appointed by the present Administration. If I am not absolutely mistaken, the hon. member for Pictou himself went on strike, if I may use a common expression, on account of his dissatisfaction with a gentleman appointed by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) when he was minister, to a very important position on that railroad. I am very glad to observe that the hon. member for Pictou bows assent to what I have just said.

Mr. MACDONALD: I did not bow.

Mr. BORDEN: It perhaps was an involuntary bowing of the head which might under the circumstances be taken to give assent.

Mr. MACDONALD: No.

Mr. BORDEN: There has been a great deal of time taken up in discussing the purchase of coal. One would suppose that the 14,000 tons of coal, which were purchased last year by the Intercolonial railway from the United States under very special circumstances, constitute the only case in which coal was purchased for that railway. I think some 60,000 tons were purchased about 13 years ago by the late Administration.

Mr. MACDONALD: How much was it?

Mr. BORDEN: 60,000 tons.

Mr. MACDONALD: Never delivered?

Mr. REID: Oh, yes.

Mr. MACDONALD: Any coal that was purchased in the United States was purchased at the time of a strike.

Mr. BORDEN: In the first place, my hon. friend says the coal was not purchased at all, and then he says if it was purchased it was purchased during a strike. I think he is confusing two cases: one in which the hon. member for Westmorland was very anxious to have large purchases of coal made in the United States, and the other in which there were actually large purchases of coal made there.

Mr. EMMERSON: Not in my day, as I recall it.

Mr. BORDEN: Perhaps not in my hon. friend's day, but I will read documents that will convince him that he was very anxious that there should be such purchases. In 1901, I think it was, there was a purchase of 60,000 tons of American coal by the late Government. My hon. friend from Pictou says that that was purchased by reason of a strike in one of the mines.

Mr. MACDONALD: More than one.

Mr. BORDEN: How many?

Mr. MACDONALD: A general strike, as I recollect it.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not think there was any general strike in the coal mines of Nova Scotia at that time.

Mr. MACDONALD: In different counties.

Mr. BORDEN: I speak subject to correction, but I am not aware of any conditions such as my hon. friend mentions having existed at that time, and I believe that what took place was this: A certain coal company, or perhaps more than one—I am not familiar personally with the facts—was not able to fulfil its contract with the Government, and therefore the Government purchased 60,000 tons of coal in the United States. If we are to apply the argument to which we have listened, and with which we have been edified by the hon. member for Pictou, why did not the Government procure that coal from the mines where there was no strike? I presume it may have been because those mines not having made contracts for the delivery of that coal, the Government were not in a position to call upon them. And I should think that if my hon. friend had given to this subject proper reflection, which evidently he did not give, he might have arrived at the conclusion that the same conditions brought about the purchase of the 14,000 tons of coal to which he has alluded and in contemplation of which he almost wept during the course of his speech.

Mr. MACDONALD: The general manager never asked fifteen of the nineteen companies whether they could deliver.

Mr. BORDEN: Neither did they in the case to which I refer, so far as I am aware. Does the hon. gentleman undertake to say—

Mr. MACDONALD: Better bring down the papers about that.

Mr. BORDEN: If the hon. gentleman thinks so, he should have fortified himself with the facts before he undertook to make this charge—

Mr. MACDONALD: I have all the papers in the case to which I refer. I proved what I alleged, and it cannot be controverted.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend knew perfectly well in this other case the reasons which brought it about, and he might very well have reached the conclusion that precisely similar reasons brought about the purchase of a much smaller quantity of coal during the past year.

Mr. MACDONALD: I know what the circumstances were in that case, and I do not know about the other.

Mr. BORDEN: I will tell my hon. friend something about the circumstances to which he has alluded and which perhaps he does not know.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then, the papers should have been brought down.

Mr. BORDEN: The Dominion Coal Company had a contract for 100,000 tons of coal to be furnished from the Springhill mines. The quantity they should have delivered by the end of September at the average monthly rate was 50,000 tons; they had actually delivered 41,335 tons, or nearly 9,000 tons short. The Maritime Coal, Railway and Power Company was under contract to supply 120,000 tons. By the end of September they should have delivered 55,600; they had delivered only 49,850 tons. The Minudie Coal Company were under contract to deliver 130,000 tons; by the end of September they should have delivered 65,000 tons; they had delivered only 17,333 tons. The Acadia Coal Company were under contract to deliver 100,000 tons; they should have delivered by the end of September 50,000; they had actually delivered more than that—57,680 tons.

The Intercolonial Coal Mining Company was under contract to deliver 65,000 tons; their deliveries up to the end of September should have been 37,500 tons, but the actual deliveries were only 14,240 tons. It is only fair to observe that in the contract with the Minudie Company there is included 60,000 tons of run-of-mine coal. The company were under the impression that this tender had not been accepted, but Mr. Lavoie said it was—the Intercolonial railway, through their officer, was under the impression that there was that contract. Under these circumstances, as the time had passed in which the coal could be ordered from Nova Scotia to be delivered by water carriage, 13,393 long tons were ordered from the George Hall Company at $3 net ton delivered f.o.b. cars Massena Springs; duty 53 cents, freight 57½ cents, total $4.10½ per net ton delivered at Ste. Rosalie Junction. Under the circumstances, I do not know what the Intercolonial railway authorities could otherwise have done. They were able to get 17,334 tons from the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company at $3.95 per gross ton delivered in vessels at Princess pier near Point Lévis, and also from the Canadian Import Company, agents of the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, 15,000 tons at $4.20 per gross ton f.o.b. cars at their discharging plant, Montreal. But they were obliged to get also 14,000 tons from the United States, and they did so for the reason I have mentioned and no other. Under the circumstances, I think there is ample precedent in what took place ten or twelve years ago for the purchase made last year.

Now, as I have stated, in 1900 or 1901, 60,000 tons of American coal were purchased by the late Government. This was not because there was a strike, as the statement was given to me, but because a strike among the miners in Nova Scotia was anticipated, and this quantity of American coal was laid in to prevent the railway being caught short. This coal cost $4.85 per gross ton. At that time the railway was not paying custom charges, but duty has been included to make the comparison. The hon. member for Westmorland, I am informed, was very anxious in 1907 to have extensive purchases of coal from the United States. To refresh his memory, I will read one or two telegrams furnished me by the Department of Railways and Canals, which would seem to indicate that what I have said is quite correct.

Mr. MACDONALD: There was a great strike in that year, and the Dominion Coal Company, the biggest producers in the province, were not raising coal at all.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend nods his head as if he thought he had scored a great point, but I would like to say to him that I think Mr. Butler succeeded in making arrangements to get the coal elsewhere. Here is a telegram:

Cleveland, Ohio, Nov. 13, 1907.

M. J. Butler,
Deputy Minister of Railways,
Ottawa, Ont.

If coal not secured, could make good arrangements here Pittsburg run-of-mine, which would satisfactorily meet your requirements. Could you inform through rate gross ton from Cheswick on Bessemer and Lake Erie railway via International Bridge and Grand Trunk to Montreal or Ste. Rosalie? Wire early to-morrow Hollonden House here.

H. R. Emmerson.

Here is another from Mr. Butler:

Ottawa, Ont., Nov. 14, 1907.

Hon. H. R. Emmerson,
Hollanden House,
Cleveland, Ohio.

Please make best price f.o.b cars. We will figure out duty and freight and will take care of same for say 50,000 tons.

M. J. Butler.

The hon. member for Westmorland then sent this telegram:

Cleveland, Ohio, Nov. 14, 1907.

M. J. Butler,
Deputy Minister of Railways,
Ottawa, Ont.

Can arrange 50,000 tons delivered on cars Cheswick, Pennsylvania, at rate of one thirty-eight two thousand pounds. Delivery beginning first of December, finished first March. Wire me Manhattan hotel, New York, to-morrow, if you wish me act. Coal represented very best for your purposes. Could get cheaper quality. Would require special arrangement made for return of cars to International Bridge to prevent detention by Grand Trunk.

H. R. Emmerson.

Mr. EMMERSON: I was not Minister of Railways at that time; I was simply getting some information for Mr. Butler. The statement referred to the period when I was Minister of Railways, and I stated that there was no actual purchasing during that period. This relates to a later period, when the hon. member for South Renfrew was Minister of Railways. If I had been minister, it is well recognized that my views on fiscal matters as a free trader would have justified the action.

Mr. BORDEN: Let me read another telegram from Mr. Butler:

Ottawa, Ont., Nov. 15, 1907.

Hon. H. R. Emmerson,
Manhattan Hotel,
New York, U.S.A.

Have placed order with Moreland Company for twenty thousand tons at lower price and hope to get balance of requirements from Nova Scotia.

M. J. Butler.

Mr. EMMERSON: I was simply getting some information for Mr. Butler.

Mr. BORDEN: Apparently, as Minister of Railways my hon. friend thought that this coal should be purchased outside of Canada, but as a private citizen he thinks it is right to buy it in the United States. That is a rather remarkable suggestion.

Coming back for a moment to the rates which I mentioned a moment ago, I am informed by officials of the Department of Railways and Canals that although there has been this slight increase in rates upon the Intercolonial, they are lower to-day than corresponding rates on the Canadian Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, the Canadian Northern railway and the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway. Of course, I have no personal knowledge of that, nor, indeed, would I be competent to make a comparison of the rates, but that is the information which has been afforded by the officials of the department.

The hon. member for Westmorland endeavoured to make a very strong case against the Government in connection with an arrangement which was negotiated between Mr. Gutelius and Mr. Boswell of the Canadian Pacific railway, and my hon. friend is of the opinion that the rates are altogether too low. Is my hon. friend aware of the fact that under his own administration, in the case of wheat carried from points in Ontario to Halifax, for the 837 miles of haulage over the Intercolonial railway, the Intercolonial received only 95 cents per ton? The hon. member will see that as the distance from Halifax to St. John is a little less than one-third of the distance from Halifax to Montreal, the corresponding rate in respect of the distance from Halifax to Montreal would be $1.85 per ton. The comparison so far as flour is concerned is perhaps not so cogent. Flour from Toronto is carried to Halifax over the Intercolonial railway, and the share of the Intercolonial railway for the 837 miles of haulage from Montreal to Halifax is $1.49. Under the arrangement which has been made between the Canadian Pacific railway and the Intercolonial railway, the corresponding rate would be about $1.85. I do not pretend to have sufficient knowledge to say whether or not this is a fair rate, and with all due deference to my hon. friend the member for Westmorland, although he was for a certain period Minister of Railways and Canals, I doubt very much whether he has the expert knowledge to make the necessary comparisons and to take into consideration everything which must be taken into account in coming to a conclusion as to whether or not this is a paying rate. Officials of the Intercolonial railway who have this matter in hand say that the rate is a paying rate under the circumstances, and a fair rate. In the absence of anything better than has been suggested here to-night, I am bound to accept their conclusion, and so is the Minister of Railways and Canals. Further than that, I placed before this House on a previous occasion a comparison of this rate with rates upon grain which was hauled in 1903 and 1904 from Parry Sound to Halifax. I pointed out then in detail what I shall only allude to at the present time, that is to say, that the rate provided in the contract between Mr. Gutelius and Mr. Boswell is very much higher than the rate which the late Administration said was a fair and paying rate at that time—two or three times as high, if I remember correctly. The statement is already upon 'Hansard,' and I shall not take up the time of the House in giving it again.

Mr. EMMERSON: I do not pose as a freight rate expert, but I was pointing out from the return of the Department of Railways that it was costing the Intercolonial much more for train hauling between St. John and Halifax than they were getting. I was not presuming or assuming; I was making and basing my assertions upon the figures furnished by the department itself.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend did not take into account some of the things which are contained in the agreement: the assumption of clerical work, checking, waybilling and accounting, by the Canadian Pacific railway, and, so far as I understand, the assumption by the Canadian Pacific railway of certain liability for loss and damage, as well as of certain terminal charges. There are a great many matters of that kind which must necessarily be taken into account. It is necessary also to take into account, as I understand it, the rate at which new and additional business may be profitably carried when the road is already under operation.

I am informed by the traffic expert of the Intercolonial railway that, taking all these things into consideration, the rate provided in the agreement which has been alluded to was a fair and reasonable rate.

My hon. friend has endeavoured to cast discredit upon the statements made in this House as to the surplus claimed for the operation of the Intercolonial railway last year. I understand that $300,000, or $25,000 per month, was set aside for the improvement of equipment, and that $300,000 was set aside at the end of the year for the same purpose, making a total of $600,000 taken out of the income of the road for the purpose of improving equipment and keeping it up to the proper standard. My hon. friend has endeavoured to cast discredit on that by comparing the railway statistics issued by the department but made up for a different fiscal year; they are made up for the year ending 30th of June, while the accounts of the Intercolonial railway are kept by the ordinary fiscal year of the Government, which ends 31st of March. I do not think that any comparison instituted in that way could be a very fair or convenient comparison, and the statements given to the House by the acting minister in that respect are statements furnished to him by his officials on which he has a right to rely and upon which also the House has a right to rely in the absence of some criticism more cogent than that which the hon. member for Westmorland has been able to make against it.

He also finds fault with the standard rules. I do not know very much about these rules. I do not know in what respect they differ from the rules which have prevailed in the past on certain portions of the Intercolonial railway but the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada has made it necessary for all railways of Canada subject to its jurisdiction to adopt these rules. My hon. friend from Westmorland says that these rules constitute a menace not only to the men employed on the Intercolonial railway but to the passengers carried on that road, at least I so understood him. It seems to me remarkable that rules adopted by all the great railways of Canada, except the Intercolonial railway, and approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada are likely to constitute a menace to the men employed on the Intercolonial railway or to the people carried over it. My hon. friend from Westmorland—

Mr. EMMERSON: My right hon. friend did not quite apprehend my statement. My complaint was that they were making the change so suddenly when other railways have taken two or three years to bring about the change gradually, not attempting to do it within so short a period, and that in doing so it was a menace and a danger to the railway and to the passenger.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend would have more knowledge as to matters of that kind than I would as he has been in charge of the Railway Department; but, with deference to what he has said, my information is that roads have sometimes adopted these rules within a shorter period than that provided in the case of the Intercolonial railway. Certainly there is no desire to act oppressively towards these men or to have the rules adopted in too short a time. I am not aware of the terms on which these rules are to be adopted, but I am sure that the time provided is ample and I cannot understand what motive could induce those who are managing the Intercolonial railway to seek to adopt these rules within too short a period. If there is any error in that respect it is an error of judgment and not of intention most assuredly, and I still deny that there is any such danger as my hon. friend suggests.

Returning to the question of promotion upon the Intercolonial, as I said, I am heartily in sympathy with the idea of men working up in the service as their experience and ability will entitle them to work up and I know that the Minister of Railways and Canals has that idea in mind also, and wishes to carry it out. He wishes to carry it out apart from any party political consideration. I know that that is his thought; but as a matter of fact for many years now past we have had this experience upon the Intercolonial railway. We found men leaving the Intercolonial railway and going into the service of other railways, either in Canada or the United States, and obtaining very high positions. I remember Mr. Pottinger, whose management of the Intercolonial has been referred to in terms of praise to-night—and in those terms I entirely concur—I remember that within the last two years Mr. Pottinger made out for me a memorandum of twelve or fifteen men who had entered railway service on the Intercolonial railway during the period when he was general manager, who had left the service under one Government or the other and had attained splendid positions in the United States or in Canada. That does sometimes happen, and I for one am very sorry that the Intercolonial should lose such men. I would like to have the services of these men retained for the Intercolonial railway and I hope and, more than that, I am absolutely confident that the Minister of Railways and Canals will adopt no other policy or principle in his management of the Intercolonial of Canada. It is a right principle, it is a proper principle that there should be promotion according to ability and experience and that men who have the capacity to hold high positions in the service of any railway, should in the service of the Intercolonial be promoted as their ability and their experience would justify. If any departure from a policy of that kind should be entered upon, as far as the Intercolonial railway is concerned, I for one would be disposed to enter my strongest caveat against it, because the principle which has been spoken of in that regard by the hon. member for Westmorland and the hon. member for Pictou is an absolutely sound and correct principle in which I thoroughly concur.

Something has been said about branch lines, and if I am not mistaken my hon. friend the member for Pictou has challenged me to make some observations upon this question. Otherwise I would not refer to it as my views with regard to it have been expressed on more than one occasion. The hon. member for Pictou says that if at any time we desire to acquire a branch line for the Intercolonial railway in any part of the country upon any terms whatever, we can do it, we can come in here and be absolutely sure that the proposal of the Government will receive the sanction not only of this House but of the Senate. I am very glad to have the assurance of the hon. member for Pictou in that regard although it goes a little farther than I would really desire because I would hardly expect that a proposal of any kind that we might bring in here for the acquisition of a branch line of railway in any part of Canada would necessarily receive the support of one or other branch of the legislature. What happened last year is well understood, although the hon. member for Westmorland sought to minimize it. I did declare in the election of 1911 that I was in favour of a general policy of acquiring branch lines for the Intercolonial, and for very good reasons as it seemed to me, because a great trunk line must necessarily have feeders and even if those feeders are not profitable at the very first they usually become profitable in a very few years. A road cannot exist without local traffic, and local traffic can only be gathered up in a large way by means of these feeders. We brought in last session a Bill in the form of a resolution empowering the Minister of Railways and Canals to make contracts for the purchase or sale of branch lines, and it was in terms so wide that when I discussed the subject with the Minister of Railways after it had been debated in committee I frankly told him that I thought his resolution was too wide and conferred too much power upon him, and I myself drafted a resolution in very much narrower terms which I brought into the House, handed to my hon. friends opposite and asked them if they desired to take time to consider it. They looked over it and said that they did not desire delay and that they thoroughly approved of it. It passed the House unanimously and the Minister of Railways and Canals introduced the Bill. The hon. member for Westmorland had criticised the first resolution but he did not criticise the second. When the Bill was introduced he raised the question as to whether or not the lines which the minister might construct, should exceed ten miles in length. We were prepared to cut the figures down from twenty-five to twenty miles, but the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) entered a strong protest against it being cut down at all. My hon. friend from Westmorland did not seem to have any support, so it went through in that way. It went to the Senate, and some hon. gentlemen opposite have stated in the course of this debate that the Bill came back from the Senate in a workable form. I say it came back from the Senate meaning absolutely nothing. It simply said that we could do what every hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House has said we can do without any Bill. It provided that the Minister of Railways might make a contract and bring it to Parliament for ratification; but he can do that, as has been urged by hon. gentlemen opposite, without any Bill. Therefore, the Bill as amended by the Senate meant absolutely nothing, because it conferred no greater powers on the Minister of Railways than those which, according to the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, he possesses at the present time. I expected that the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who had unanimously concurred in this Bill would stand strongly in support of the Bill which had passed this House without one dissenting voice, and therefore, with some confidence I rose in my place and said: 'We cannot agree to the amendments of the Senate, because they have absolutely emasculated the Bill and made it meaningless and useless.' To my astonishment the very gentlemen on the other side of the House who had concurred in the terms of the resolution which I had drafted as embodied in the Bill, stood up and voted that they were absolutely wrong on the previous occasion. Now, this story is not out of comic opera; it is a sober and accurate statement of what actually took place in this Parliament last session.

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend edited the article. It is not really what occurred.

Mr. BORDEN: In what respect is it not?

Mr. GRAHAM: I will tell my right hon. friend in a few moments.

Mr. BORDEN: I say it is absolutely what occurred, and, further than that, I say that when I made the statement in this House as to what had occurred with regard to the resolution upon which the Bill was founded, my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) stood up in the House and stated that my account of what had taken place was absolutely correct—and his words can be quoted from 'Hansard' to that effect. If I have mis-stated anything in that regard, I have done so inadvertently. I have endeavoured to give an absolutely accurate statement of what took place. I say in the first place that the resolution which I substituted for that of Mr. Cochrane was approved by gentlemen opposite when I submitted it; and I say further that I offered to give them time for further consideration, but they said they did not want it. The resolution as orginally proposed was then withdrawn, and Mr. Cochrane substituted therefor the resolution which I had submitted to my right hon. friend. That resolution went through the committee without a dissenting voice, and the Bill founded upon it went through this House without a dissenting voice, and when the amendments came back from the Senate—unless I am very much mistaken—hon. gentlemen opposite stood up and voted in support of those amendments.

Mr. EMMERSON: I do not think that is correct.

Mr. BORDEN: I thought there was a vote on it; I am not absolutely sure.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think there was.

Mr. BORDEN: I will not contradict my hon. friend in that regard, because I have not a clear recollection, but at all events that is the history of what took place on that occasion. So far as branch lines are concerned, we are absolutely of the same opinion as we have always been. We think that a number of branch lines ought to be acquired if they can be purchased or leased on reasonable terms. We are desirous of going on with that policy, and hope to carry it out in one way or another in the early future.

So far as the general condition of the Intercolonial is concerned, I am sure that the description which my hon. friend has given of the service upon that road is one which he can hardly be prepared to endorse upon a little reflection. He said that the passenger service and the freight service have deteriorated; that the roadbed has not been kept up to the proper standard. For my part, I have had no knowledge or intimation that such is the case except that which I have derived from my hon friend the member for Westmorland. I know it is the desire of the Minister of Railways and Canals to keep that road up to the highest possible standard, and to give the best possible service to the people of Canada, especially the people of Quebec and the Maritime provinces. My hon. friend from Westmorland and other members of this House will remember that the efforts of the Minister of Railways and Canals in that regard have received marked and unusual commendation from some of their own political friends in the Maritime provinces.

I am sorry that some reflections have been made on the Minister of Railways and Canals while he is not here in person to answer them. I find no fault with any criticism of him or of his administration, because, although he is necessarily absent, members of this House have a perfect right to criticise him as a member of the Government. I am sure, however, that notwithstanding any such criticism, hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House as well as hon. gentlemen on this side realize that it is the desire and purpose of the Minister of Railways and Canals to make the Intercolonial railway worthy of the people of Canada, and by means of that railway to give the best possible service to the people of this country.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM: The right hon. the Prime Minister has invited me into this discussion. Being somewhat polite I do not like to decline the invitation. I had not intended taking any part in this discussion, as I thought the members from the Maritime provinces were fully competent to discuss the Intercolonial railway in all its phases. My right hon. friend, a moment ago, took exception to my statement that he was editing some of the proceedings of the House. I meant by that, that he was rather revising the record and putting it in a way which was not warranted by the record itself. He intimated that we were performing an act of comic opera in that members of the House stood up and said they were all wrong in their previous attitude on the resolution in regard to branch lines. The Prime Minister was wrong himself, in my judgment. I think there was no vote taken in that case. There very seldom is in such a case, unless it is forced to a vote, but the Government would not acquiesce in the amendments by the Senate.

Even if there had been a vote my hon. friend would hardly be justified. Bill after Bill comes back from the Senate amended, and these amendments are agreed to by this House, although the House has unanimously passed another kind of Bill altogether. Cases identical to the one referred to by my right hon. friend occur here every day and no person is accused of any inconsistency. We take the Bill with its amendments sooner than have no Bill at all. If that change had been adopted it would have meant that this House is in favour of branch lines with this amendment while the other side declared itself unfavourable to a Branch Line Bill, unless it could have its own scheme. My right hon. friend supported the amendment to the Bank Act, altering the Bank Act materially, and I would not charge that in voting that way he resembled comic opera because the Bank Act did not go through as he voted it should go through. These things occur every day, and there is no criticism to be directed at either side of the House or any member in it for saying: We will accept the amendment of the Senate. We do it every day, that is if a Bill is amended we accept it sooner than have no Bill at all. In the history which my hon. friend gave of the Branch Lines Bill his reference except this departure from the record was absolutely correct. In the first place, his Minister of Railways introduced a resolution that he himself said was a bad resolution I am not speaking from comic opera; it actually occurred. His own Minister of Railways, after full consideration, no doubt, in Council brought in a Bill which was all wrong and which he could not agree to himself. I am not quoting from comic opera; I am quoting from what the Prime Minister told us. This resolution as brought in by the Government, would have allowed the Minister of Railways and Canals to have taken over the Canadian Pacific railway without coming to this House, and after a good deal of argument the Prime Minister was convinced that the resolution should be withdrawn, and he prepared another one himself. He submitted the one which he had prepared to myself, my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) and others. After conferring with my right hon. friend I said: These are powers never before given to a minister, but I am prepared to go that far so that there may be no obstacle in the way of this Government implementing the promise of its leader and taking over the branch lines. Under the Bill founded on that resolution we gave greater powers than were ever given to any minister.

Mr. EMMERSON: Never before given.

Mr. GRAHAM: Never given to any minister. The Senate said we went too far, and when the Bill came back with an amendment that the Government should be responsible to Parliament and that the business should not be done by Order in Council, we said: We will take the Bill as it has been amended, but hon. gentlemen opposite said: We will have the Bill passed or nothing. At bottom I do not believe the Minister of Railways wants to take over the branch lines. When I first brought in a Bill for the acquisition of branch lines, I was met with constant and persistent opposition, not by the then leader of the Opposition, but by men sitting behind him from the province of Ontario. My right hon. friend did not help me to get this Bill through at all, but it was clipped in all its features at the demand of members of the then Opposition.

Mr. BORDEN: Was it not the Senate that clipped it?

Mr. GRAHAM: No, the Senate did not do the clipping at that time. It was the members behind my right hon. friend who did the clipping.

Mr. BORDEN: I am speaking seriously; did not the Bill come back from the Senate with a very important amendment, and were not some amendments accepted?

Mr. GRAHAM: That was another Bill. I am referring to the first Bill that I introduced. I think that my hon. friend has reference to the second Bill that I introduced. I accepted amendment after amendment made by hon. members of the then Opposition. One of them was that no road should be taken over unless it was in the interests of the Intercolonial railway, which was a departure from the idea in my mind. I accepted a number of amendments in order to get the Bill through. The then leader of the Opposition put this question to me: Does my hon. friend mean to say that he has not power now to take over branch lines if he so desires without this Bill? My reply was that the Government did have that power with the sanction of Parliament, but that I was very anxious to get the Parliament of Canada committed to the principle of taking over branch lines, and I was therefore willing to accept even the remnant of an Act to put it through and secure the recognition of that principle. That principle is on the statute books to-day, and this Government can take over any branch lines in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec or anywhere else, bring the bargain to Parliament and have it ratified. There is no law on the statute book to hinder them. But my hon. friend spoke strongly about branch lines, and he said that he was in favour of the policy of taking over these branch lines. I would remind my hon. friend that a contract for a branch line in Nova Scotia was cancelled by this Government when they came into power. It had nothing to do with the leasing of branch lines, but it was for the building of a new branch line that a contract had been let, and this Government cancelled it to show how much they were in favour of taking over the branch lines in the Maritime provinces or in the province of Quebec.

Now, I desire to say just a word upon the question of the employment of American engineers. No person can accuse me of being narrow as to the employment of able and efficient men, no matter where we get them, to do our business, always bearing in mind that the preference must be given to British subjects and Canadians. My right hon. friend cannot object to what I am about to say, because he used the tu quoque argument to-night; and the acting Minister of Railways and Canals will also remember what I am about to say, because he spoke as loudly as I ever do on this question once or twice. Great objection was taken, when the Transcontinental railway construction first began, and while it was proceeding, by the then Opposition, including the present acting Minister of Railways and Canals, to the employment of certain engineers on that work. What was the argument used? They were told that the company had engaged these foreign experts for this work, but the reply of these hon. gentlemen was that this was the money of the people of the Dominion of Canada, and that the taxpayers ought to have returned to them through their engineers every dollar, as far as possible, of the money taken from them in the form of taxes for this great project. They pointed to the number of engineers turned out at Queen's University, Toronto University and McGill. The chief features are all fresh in my mind, because I was running a newspaper at that time and I had to discuss these questions every day. So strongly did these hon. gentlemen argue their case that a commission was appointed to find out how many of these American engineers had been engaged upon this work, and to find a remedy for the situation. These same gentlemen, who argued so strongly that the Government did wrongly a few years ago, say it is all right now to engage American engineers to work upon a Government road constructed and operated with the taxes of the people. That is as much a comic opera situation as the position of hon. gentlemen opposite on the branch lines question. I am not saying that the Government are wrong with reference to the Intercolonial railway. That has been argued by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. But I am saying that the Government are absolutely inconsistent as between the position which they have taken with regard to the Intercolonial railway and the position which they took a few years ago with regard to the engagement of American engineers to work on the Transcontinental railway. On the question of a commission for the Intercolonial railway, the right hon. gentleman referred the hon. member for Pictou to me as a standard authority. When I was Minister of Railways a board was appointed for the management of the Intercolonial railway, and some members on both sides took exception to it. It was an experiment but it was based on the practice of one or two of the most successful American railways, on which the heads of the different departments, together with the manager, formed a board, the members of which, after consultation with each other, laid down the policy of the road. The Prime Minister, then leader of the Opposition, took me to task for the appointment of this board and he announced, as a better policy, that there should be a commission appointed which would be responsible, in the same way as the Auditor General, not to the Government of the day but to the authority of Parliament. On that policy the right hon. gentleman went to the country. The board appointed when I was minister was responsible to the minister, and I say now that I do not care how many general managers are appointed, or what authority is given the general manager, or how long a contract is made with him, the Minister of Railways and through him the Government of Canada will be held responsible by the people for the management of the people's road. When the right hon. gentleman came to power, instead of carrying out his idea of a commission, he reverted to a general manager, a course which was distinctly contrary to the policy he announced to the people of the Maritime provinces. Hence some of the irritation about the Intercolonial. I do not intend to criticise the management of the Intercolonial to-night; others have done that. It is not an easy thing to manage, but I do say, and every Government that has been in power in Canada and every Government that will be in power in Canada will find it to be true, that the patrons of the Intercolonial railway cannot be treated as the patrons of a company railway. The Intercolonial had its origin in a different way from an ordinary company road. The ordinary company railway is constructed to make money for the shareholders, but the Intercolonial was not constructed to make money for anybody. It was constructed to bring the people of the Maritime provinces into closer touch with the trade centres of Canada; it was built because the people of the Maritime provinces were taken by Confederation away from their natural markets across the line.

I want to take a little credit to myself during the last few years, for changing the views of the people of Ontario in regard to the Intercolonial. Go where you will to-day in Ontario you cannot find any prejudice against the Intercolonial, and you will find very few, if any, who want the Intercolonial run for the purpose of making money. It is recognized that the people of Ontario do a great deal of business with the people of the Maritime provinces, and they get the benefit of any cheap rates that may be on the Intercolonial just as well as do the people in the East. I say seriously, that the people of the East are just as much entitled to have the Intercolonial run independent of a profit, so long as it pays its way, as the people of Canada are to have the canal system operated in the same way. In consequence of the peculiar conditions surrounding the Intercolonial, when an official is taken from a big company to manage it, he wants to make a record for himself in showing that the Intercolonial is a great money-making institution. My right hon. friend has referred to the fact that I appointed a gentleman to the Intercolonial whose conduct was criticised a good deal; I admit that, and no person knows it better than I do. But during the past year or two any criticism of Mr. Brady has faded into the utmost insignificance as compared with the criticism of Mr. Gutelius. Mr Brady is gentle as a sucking-dove, so the Maritime province people seem to think, compared with Mr. Gutelius. Let me put it bluntly: you cannot run the Intercolonial railway with a club, and you cannot deal with the people along the Intercolonial railway with a club. They have been accustomed, and rightly so, through many years of the management of the Intercolonial railway to being consulted in the details of their business and in everything appertaining to the line, and a man with some tact can continue to do that on the Intercolonial and still approximate business methods. But if the official has no tact, if he goes in just with the idea that he is running a big company road, and says to the patrons if you do not like this I will hit you on the head, and says to the employees: if you do not want to work for the Intercolonial at this rate of pay I can get plenty of men to take your place, he will always make a failure of it no matter how laudable his object may be.

A word as to the system of book-keeping on the Intercolonial railway. One difficulty of the Intercolonial railway has always been (and it has always placed the Intercolonial railway at a disadvantage with other roads), that it has to publish the details of its business more completely than any company in the world would think of doing, and thus, under our system and the Auditor General's Report, the whole of its business is open to the inspection of its competitors. Another disadvantage the Intercolonial laboured under was that up to a few years ago every dollar of its revenue had to be handed over to the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and then it had to get a vote from Parliament every year to get its own money back again. Under this system, although the Intercolonial railway would earn enough money over expenditure to pay for betterments, that money could not be used without an annual vote from this Parliament. Some years ago a simple system was started by which each month a certain sum was set aside, and at the end of the year if there was enough in the fund a vote was made by Parliament to transfer the balance to the renewal equipment fund. Then there were certain replacements of rails necessary—the renewal equipment account referred to rolling stock and motive power—and I found, as my predecessor had, that every year there was a good deal of discussion about certain new rails bought to replace old ones, and I suggested that we should also have a rail renewal account and each month there was set aside a certain sum of money for this rail renewal account. Then there were certain losses every year by the burning of freight sheds, and necessary replacements on account of small fires, and there was set aside a certain amount each year for fire protection work. That was the custom when I was in the department and I think it is the custom still, and these amounts are recognized as part of the expenditure of the Intercolonial railway, and until they are set aside each year there cannot be any surplus. I believe this is being carried out at the present time. I suppose it is the same now as it was then. And I say fearlessly, and after having investigated the matter thoroughly—for the hon. member for North Toronto and I had several tilts over this question,—that when I left the department, the Intercolonial railway was spending more money out of revenue for betterments—more by thousands of dollars—than the Interstate Commerce Commission would allow a company under their jurisdiction to spend without charging it to capital.

Mr. BORDEN: Out of income?

Mr. GRAHAM: I say that the Intercolonial railway at that time spent thousands every year out of income and for betterments that the Interstate Commerce Commission would compel any company under their jurisdiction to spend on capital account. This they would do in order to protect the shareholders. It would be saying to the railway in effect: You owe that money to your shareholders in dividends and not in betterments. There is a distinct line of demarcation drawn between capital expenditures and revenue expenditures, and the Intercolonial railway, so far as my knowledge goes, exceeds the limit of what is ordinarily spent out of revenue. I think it is better that it should be in that condition than the other way.

Now, I have one word to say about branch lines in connection with the Intercolonial railway. I wish to make it clear, and I think that in what I say, I voice the opinion of practically every man in Ontario. We want the Intercolonial railway line kept up to a high state of efficiency and we want it to serve the people well, and we do not want a cent of profit out of it. We are prepared to bear our share of the expenditure to acquire branch lines, not merely where they can pay but where the people require these transportation facilities wherever it will help to make these people more contented we are prepared to pay our share of taxation to give them such facilities as we enjoy, whether it pays the Intercolonial railway or not.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): The hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) has asked this House to say that the Government is deserving of censure in connection with the management of the Intercolonial railway for two reasons—first, because the methods of the present management are oppressive and unfair to employees and the public; and second, because the methods of the present management are detrimental to the interests of the country and of the railway. I have listened to every word of the speech of my hon. friend, as well as to every word of the speech of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and of the speech of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), and while it may be said that I am not an unprejudiced judge as to what the hon. gentleman said, yet I submit in all candor and fairness to this House, that the hon. gentlemen have not laid before the House facts that would make out a case in support of the position taken in the resolution.

Now, the hon. member for Westmorland dealt very largely in generalities. But where he came down, as he did in one or two instances, to give concrete examples in support of his position, it became clearly evident that he has been willing to listen to every rumour, to every word of gossip circulated regarding the officials of the Intercolonial railway and has not taken the pains to investigate for himself, an investigation which I think the gravity of the subject would deserve, and which he should have taken before asking that the Government be censured for the acts of these officials. Early in his remarks he told the House—I think I quote him correctly—that nepotism was rampant in the affairs of the Intercolonial railway. The only instance he gave of 'nepotism' was that Mr. Brady had appointed a gentleman named Richardson, who was his brother-in-law, to take the place of Mr. Hallisey, a trusted official of the Intercolonial railway. It appears now from the statement made by the Prime Minister that there was no justification for the allegation—that Mr. Richardson is neither the brother-in-law nor any other relation of Mr. Brady, and that he is only temporarily taking Mr. Hallisey's place, and that as soon as Mr. Hallisey recovers from the illness from which he is suffering, which we hope will be in a very short time, he will return to the position which he has filled so long and so acceptably, and Mr. Richardson will cease to fill that position.

In his opening remarks, the hon. member referred to the branch line policy of the Intercolonial railway. In the Maritime provinces, and among those who have studied the question whether they live in the Maritime provinces or not, there is a practical consensus of opinion in favour of the Government of Canada purchasing or acquiring by some means the branch lines of railways and running them as part of the Intercolonial Railway system. The belief is that not only would such a policy be much to the advantage of the country through which these branch lines run, but in the interest of the Intercolonial railway itself, giving it important feeders. And these branch lines operated from the head office, it is believed, would be operated more in the public interest and with greater economy than it is possible to manage them as separate units each under its own company and having no harmonious management in the interest of all. Therefore this feeling strongly exists, and the hon. gentleman knowing that it exists, takes the opportunity to try to create feeling against the administration of the Railway Department by complaining that steps have not been taken for the acquisition of these branch lines. Now, I am not resorting to the tu quoque argument, but it would be interesting to ask what the hon. gentleman did to acquire branch lines when he was Minister of Railways and a supporter of the Government of the day. I think I am correct in saying that the hon. gentleman became a member of Parliament in 1900. Subsequently he became Minister of Railways. As he has been fourteen years a member of the House, and for a part of that time Minister of Railways, I think I am justified in asking what he did when supporting the Government in power or when he was himself a member of that Government to bring about the acquisition of branch lines which he condemns the Minister of Railways for not acquiring. It is true, he acquired the Canada Eastern from Fredericton to Chatham and Loggieville, a distance of about 112 miles for $800,000, or about $7,000 a mile.

Mr. EMMERSON: It is 136 miles.

Mr. HAZEN: It may be that including sidings and branches, but I think the main line is 112 miles from Fredericton to Chatham. But was his Government entirely moved by the public interest in acquiring that road? At that time there was a gentleman in this House representing the county of York, Mr. Alexander Gibson, jr., who was an active supporter of my hon. friend. Mr. Gibson's father was very largely interested in the Canada Eastern railway and his financial position at that time, made it desirable, if not necessary that he part with the control of that road. Therefore, every step was taken to induce the Government to acquire that road from Mr. Gibson. The Government did acquire it, and then their zeal for the acquirement of branch lines seemed to disappear and for the remainder of their term of office they took no practical other step to acquire branch lines though there were some which might have been as important feeders to the Intercolonial railway as the Canada Eastern. Perhaps if there had been other constituencies in New Brunswick represented by hon. gentlemen who were interested in these branch lines to the same extent as the hon. member for York was at that time, there might have been further acquisition of such lines, but nothing of the sort occurred; no further branch lines were acquired by hon. gentlemen opposite.

The hon. gentleman condemns the present Administration, which has been in power for less than three years, for not having acquired the branch lines; for not having done in two years and a half what my hon. friend failed to do during the time he was Minister of Railways and what his party failed to do during the fifteen years that they were in power, from 1896 to 1911. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the judgment of this House, that the criticism levelled at my hon. friend and leader for not having accomplished something in this direction is not well directed and not well supported by the facts. In the session of 1912, only about a year and a half after this Government came into power, the Minister of Railways and Canals introduced a Bill to facilitate the taking over of these branch lines. Something has been said to-night with regard to the action of this House and the action of the Senate in respect to that Bill. As there seems to be some difference of opinion in the minds of hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this resolution this evening, I will take this opportunity, though I do not wish to trespass long upon the time of this House, to refer to the report in 'Hansard' of what actually did take place. On April 30, 1913, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals introduced a resolution in the House, as follows:

That it is expedient to provide that the Minister of Railways may, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council, construct, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, in whole or in part any railway, railway bridge, railway station, railway terminal, railway ferry, or other railway work, and that any such railway or other work shall become part of the Government railway system.

That resolution was discussed at some length. Permit me to say in passing that I think my hon. friend, as well as other hon. gentlemen on the other side, did the Minister of Railways and Canals an injustice—unintentionally, no doubt—when they made the assertion that the minister was opposed to the acquisition of these branch lines. When this resolution was introduced, the hon. member for Westmorland said:

I do not think that my hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane), in this instance is frank with the country in regard to it.

The following discussion then took place:

Mr. Borden: He is decidedly frank.

Mr. Emmerson: He may be frank, but not candid. He has, in remarks which he has uttered in this House, given us to understand that he does not want to acquire any branch lines that he does not think it in the interest of the Intercolonial that they should be so acquired.

Mr. Cochrane: I do not think I was as frank as that.

Mr. Emmerson: Well, I so understood my hon. friend. Does my hon. friend repudiate that insinuation?

Mr. Cochrane: I repudiate the broad statement that was made. I said that I did not want to acquire some of the branch lines.

Mr. Emmerson: Well then, my hon. friend wants to acquire some of them?

Mr. Cochrane: Yes.

This extract which I have read from 'Hansard' shows that the contention of my hon. friend the member for Westmorland and other hon. gentlemen, who say that the Minister of Railways and Canals was opposed to acquiring branch lines, is unjustifiable. After a considerable discussion the resolution as introduced by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals was withdrawn and another substituted in its place. This resolution, which may be found on page 8874 of 'Hansard' of the year 1913, met with the unanimous approval of the members of this House. There was no division; not a single member criticised the resolution in any way whatever. On May 12 the Minister of Railways and Canals moved in the House the second reading of the Bill to amend the Railway Act, and the House went into committee thereon. This Bill was criticised a little on the ground that the Government should not be allowed to build 25 miles of railway under the provisions of this Act without first coming to Parliament for authority to do so. The contention was made that it should be reduced to 20 miles, and at that point the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) interposed in the following emphatic language:

This idea of 25 miles strikes me with great significance, and I would not like to see it cut down at all. It fits in splendidly for the county of Victoria. I had an idea that the minister had that section particularly in his mind.

After this remark on the part of the hon. member for North Cape Breton, all opposition vanished, and the Bill was agreed to without a dissenting voice, and was sent to the Senate for consideration. Although unanimously agreed to in this House, when the Bill went to the Senate it was emasculated and its purposes entirely destroyed. Under the Bill as it came back from the Senate, no power was given to the Government other than they would possess without the passage of the Bill at all. When the Bill came back to the House the Minister of Railways moved that the Senate amendment should not be concurred in, giving the reasons therefor. A discussion ensued, and I would commend to hon. gentlemen who say that the amendment made by the Senate was harmless and that it did not affect the Bill in any way, the remarks of the hon. member for the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley), who discussed the matter on that occasion. By his remarks he showed that he regarded the amendments made by the Senate as being very important and as very considerably affecting the Bill. He said:

It seems to me that there is not very much in issue. The amendment, as I understand it, is that such lease or contract of purchase shall be laid before Parliament for ratification. The Senate has omitted one of the most important features of the Bill; that is, the entering into a contract to build 25 miles of new road.

There we have the hon. member for the city of St. John saying that the Senate has omitted one of the most important features contained in the Bill. He goes on to suggest that there should be a conference between the House and the Senate with a view to coming to a compromise. He said:

The minister might be authorized to lease a feeder of the Intercolonial without the authority of Parliament. That is, if in any case, the minister might think it in the public interest to acquire the absolute right to the railway, he might put in the lease a provision that the minister, with the approval of Parliament, might purchase the road at a price which should be named in the lease, within a certain period of time which would be specified.

The hon. member for the city of St. John takes distinct issue with the statements made here to-night by hon. gentlemen to the effect that the amendments made by the Senate were colourless and did not affect the Bill. He points out that they omitted one of the most important features of the Bill, and suggests a compromise in order that some arrangement should be effected.

Mr. EMMERSON: What was the answer of the Prime Minister to that suggestion?

Mr. HAZEN: The Prime Minister said:

> Mr. Borden: I think it would be necessary to send an answer to the Senate, and I doubt very much whether a formal conference could be held at this stage of the session, which would accomplish any good result. I think the Minister of Railways would be perfectly willing to hold an informal conference, which would answer the purpose, and some hon. gentlemen of the Senate might be appointed.
> Mr. Graham: That could be done informally to-night.
> Sir Wilfrid Laurier: The matter can stand.
> Mr. Cochrane: If you want a conference, should not the motion pass so that the Bill may go back to the Senate, and if they want a conference, I would be very glad to meet them.

In that discussion the Prime Minister stated the facts accurately as he has stated them to the House to-night, that he drafted this resolution which was substituted for the one originally introduced, that he sent it over to the member for St. John and the member for South Renfrew, that he discussed it with them, that it was unanimously accepted by them, and that amendment went through—> —without a single word of objection and with the absolute assent of hon. gentlemen on the other side, after I had privately discussed it with the hon. gentlemen whom I have mentioned and others, and when some question was raised about reducing the twenty-five miles to twenty, the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), insisted that it should remain exactly as it was, because he hoped to have a branch constructed in his own county.

In that the member for St. John and the member for South Renfrew agreed, and their words are on 'Hansard,' that that is an accurate account of what took place. During the debate I asked the hon. member for Westmorland if he did not say he did not think the Bill went far enough. The hon. gentleman stated that he did not recollect that he said anything of the sort. My question was based on my recollection of these words, which I find in the speech of the hon. member for Westmorland on June 5, referring to the fact that he was anxious for the legislation to go through:

> I was equally anxious because I have to acknowledge that I have taken a very deep and sincere interest in this policy. I would like to see it carried out and I would even give great powers to the Minister of Railways in respect to the matter. I do not know but that I would go so far as to permit him to legislate on the matter, although I do not think his sympathies are quite as strong on behalf of the policy as I would like them to be. I think he has doubts and I do not think that he recognizes the branch lines as feeders, because he said on the floor of this House that they are milkers and not feeders. I certainly think it would be very desirable that an understanding should be had with the Senate. We must all be desirous of seeing this policy put into execution and of seeing these lines acquired. I do not think there is such a case of urgency with respect to the construction of branch lines because parliament is sitting long enough to enable any legislation to be put through to construct the railways. I would strongly urge that there be a conference and that some united action be taken in regard to the matter.

He also advocated giving the Minister the power of expropriating the branch lines. What was the purpose of my hon. friend in urging that there should be a conference and that some united action should be taken in the matter, if his opinion then was as he expressed it to-night, that the Senate had not interfered with this Bill and that the Senate amendments were of a harmless character? It is perfectly clear that the gentlemen interested in the passage of this Bill, the hon. member for Westmorland and the hon. member for St. John, fully agreed with the position taken by the Minister of Railways and the Prime Minister that the amendments made by the Senate were not only vexatious but were absolutely striking at the foundation of the Bill, and that they did not take the view put forward in this House to-night that the amendments were simple and innocent in their character and that the Bill as it came from the Senate was all that the Government would require. I desire the fact to go out to this country that it was the interference with this Bill by the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite in the Senate of this country that has prevented the Government up to the present time from taking effective measures to acquire branch line railways, and that if it had not been for the emasculation of that Bill in the Senate arrangements would have been made by which branch lines of the Intercolonial railway would have been taken over and acquired by the Intercolonial, not only in the province of New Brunswick but in every other province through which the Intercolonial railway runs.

My hon. friend, as an instance of the way in which public interests are being neglected under the present Intercolonial management, referred to the Ocean Limited. The facts in connection with the Ocean Limited are these, that until 1913 this train never ran during the months of February and March. In 1913 the Minister of Railways and Canals made the experiment of running the Ocean Limited during those months, and the result of that experiment was a loss to this country of several hundred thousand dollars, and it was demonstrated that running the train during those months, when the travel was light and there was no tourist traffic, was not in the fiscal interest or other interest of the country. Consequently, in 1914, the Railway Department very properly as I submit, returned to the policy of not running the Ocean Limited during February and March. Why should they run that train during February and March when their experiment in 1913, when there was more railway traffic generally and more travel in the country than in 1914, had demonstrated that it could only be run at a tremendous loss to the Canadian taxpayer? It seems to me that instead of being condemned for not running the Ocean Limited during February and March in 1914, the Minister of Railways and the Railway Department, in view of their experiment in 1913, would have deserved condemnation if they had continued to run the Ocean Limited during February and March, 1914. No interest has suffered by their not doing so, and no condemnation will be made in this country of the Railway Department for their course in that respect, when the facts are known and the case is fairly placed before the people for consideration.

My hon. friend also says that there has been an increase in freight rates on the Intercolonial, and that there has been dissatisfaction in consequence. I am not prepared to dispute that statement, but a little glimpse into the past history of the Intercolonial railway will show that there has been dissatisfaction during every period of transition in regard to the management of that railway. Gentlemen within the sound of my voice to-night will remember that previous to 1896 the management of the Intercolonial railway was a frequent subject of attack, and that after the Liberal party came into power in that year and Mr. Blair became Minister of Railways the statement was heralded all over this country that business methods were going to prevail in the management of that road, that there would be an entire change in the system of management resulting in large surpluses and better results generally. After the Liberals had been in power for a short time they started upon this system of business management, and they pushed to one side Mr. Pottinger, who had been so long general manager. Mr. Blair sent down to manage that road a gentleman by the name of Harris then, and now, occupying a position of importance with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. What was the result? The rates were put up far higher than the ratio of increase which occurred after the change of Government in 1911. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) quoted from a newspaper published in the town of Truro to the effect that the Governmen were in danger of losing all their seats in the counties through which the Intercolonial runs. There may be gentlemen opposite who will remember that after Mr. Harris had been in charge of the Intercolonial, and after the Government had started on their plan of business management of that road, a gentleman who represented the constituency now represented by my hon. friend from Guysborough, and who was afterwards Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, came back to this Parliament and made the announcement that if that management continued on the Intercolonial the Government would not carry a seat within fifty miles of that road. In any period of transition there is bound to be trouble. There are always people who will feel aggrieved when changes take place from any one system to any other; and therefore with the changes that have taken place in regard to the Intercolonial in recent years, with the appointing of a general manager instead of a board of control, it is not at all extraordinary that there should have been grievances among the patrons of the road in different parts of the Maritime provinces, who were not at all favourable to the changes that took place. The rate increases took place possibly without the consideration required, but I am here prepared to state that those increases made under the Order in Council passed by the previous Government—not by this Government—were small compared with the rate increases made by the Liberal Government after they came into power in 1896. A gentleman of prominence in the commercial life of St.

John—a large patron of the Intercolonial, and one whose word would carry weight wherever he is known, and that is very generally throughout this country—made an estimate showing that in consequence of the readjustment made when the Liberals came into power in 1896, an additional $100,000 were taken from the people of New Brunswick alone every year by the increase, not in the through rates but in the local rates that were imposed by hon. gentlemen opposite at that time; and those rates have continued year in and year out. Mistakes may have been made in changing the rates on the Intercolonial in the last few years, and I am not here to argue to the contrary. The management found themselves face to face with this condition: they had to meet the demands and wishes of the brotherhoods and unions, and very justly give wages to the railway employees that would be in accord with the wages paid on other railways in this country; they found that their annual expenses for this reason alone increased by about $350,000; they further found that in consequence of the large increase in the price of coal another $350,000 was added every year to the expenses of that road, and there were other expenses which in accordance with the advance in price of all materials which had to be borne. Under those circumstances, they felt there should be some readjustment of the rates. This readjustment did not give satisfaction; on the contrary a feeling of hostility was caused. but so far as I know the difficulty has been settled in such a way that there is now little or no complaint along the line of the Intercolonial over the rates that are being charged. The people of the Maritime provinces do not want any undue favours at the hands of the Intercolonial authorities, or anybody else; all they ask is fair play. The question is, are the rates charged on the Intercolonial to-day unjust as compared with the rates charged on the Canadian Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk railway, and the other railways of this country? The statement has been made to-night that they are less than the rates on those roads, and less than the rates on the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway, which is owned and operated by the Province of Ontario. If that is the case, the people of the Maritime provinces have no complaint to make, and I believe that at the present time, with the consideration that has been given to the new rates and the reductions and readjustments that have taken place, there is little fault-finding in the Maritime provinces with regard to the rates. My hon. friend referred to the taking off of the suburban service. I think that was a mistake, and I so expressed myself at the time. It interfered with people in Halifax and St. John and in places in Westmorland and York counties, who had been for years depending upon that service. The facts were made known to the authorities and investigated, with the result that those suburban services which were changed without a proper knowledge of the localities affected have been restored, and as good suburban services are now being given as before. As I said, in any transition period there is bound to be trouble, as was demonstrated by Mr. Blair's experience with the Intercolonial; but after a few months of operation, and when conditions become better known, these troubles disappear. That will be the case with the grievances that existed along the line of the Intercolonial some months ago but which do not exist nearly so strongly to-day. I think my hon. friend would have had better ground for moving his resolution some months ago than at the present time.

My hon. friend has dwelt upon the fact that men are employed on the Intercolonial who have been previously employed by the Canadian Pacific railway, and from that he draws the conclusion that the Intercolonial is being made subordinate to the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. EMMERSON: That was not the only reason. I referred to the Gutelius-Bosworth agreement.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think my hon. friend is justified in drawing any such conclusion. As was pointed out by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, the Government at the time when the hon. member for South Renfrew was Minister of Railways, required a man for a high position on the Intercolonial went to the Canadian Pacific railway and obtained from them Mr. Brady.

Mr. EMMERSON: Mr. Brady was not employed by any railway at the time of his employment by the Intercolonial.

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend may be correct, but my information is that Mr. Brady had been an official of the Canadian Pacific railway practically up to the time of joining the Intercolonial. I do not for a moment think that because a man has been trained in one railway service, and to better his condition leaves it to work for another railway that he is therefore, going to be disloyal to the corporation or Government who have obtained his services. Nor do I think it can be argued for a moment that he will have any desire to advance the interests of the company from which he came to the disadvantage of the concern employing him. It is not an unusual thing among the banks of Canada for a man to leave one bank to become manager of another, but does any one argue that this gentleman will be loyal to the interest which he has left to the disadvantage of the interest which is employing him at the time? We find the same thing in commerce. Surely it cannot be argued for a moment that because a man has been employed by the Canadian Pacific railway before coming to the Intercolonial that he will therefore, try to make the Intercolonial subordinate to the interests of the road he has left. I am sure my hon. friend himself would not subscribe to a doctrine of that sort. If men are required for positions on the Intercolonial, and if it should be that there are not suitable men in the employ of the road to advance to those positions, I would ask where could you get better railroad men than those trained in the employ of the Canadian Pacific railway, which has been the most successful railway in the world and whose success is largely due and dependent upon the training and ability and loyalty of its officials? But my hon. friend goes farther. He could not, of course, ask anyone of intelligence to accept that argument, and therefore, he says: 'Just look at what was done in connection with the Gutelius-Bosworth agreement. That is conclusive evidence that Mr. Gutelius is playing the game of the Canadian Pacific railway and is not loyal to the Intercolonial.' If such is the case, I would ask my hon. friend what conclusion he would draw from the fact that the Canadian Northern railway were given running rights from Quebec down to Halifax at a rate far less than the rate paid by the Canadian Pacific railway from St. John to Halifax under the Gutelius-Bosworth agreement. Would he not draw even more strongly the conclusion that the officials who were responsible for entering into that agreement with the Canadian Northern railway, for the handling and transportation of freight from Quebec to Halifax, were playing the game of the Canadian Northern railway and were loyal to the Mackenzie and Mann interests to the disadvantage of the Government of Canada which they were serving.

The facts in connection with the Gutelius-Bosworth agreement, to which I wish to refer, are briefly these: The Board of Trade of the city of St. John, approaching this question in no narrow spirit, are of opinion that the rate charged is not an adequate rate and that the agreement is not justified from the railway standpoint. They did not take the ground that the Intercolonial should refuse to haul the freight and cars of the Canadian Pacific railway from St. John to Halifax, or any other point, but they did take the ground that if they did so they should do so at the proper rates and at rates that are justifiable from the railway standpoint, at such rates as the Board of Railway Commissioners would prescribe if a privately owned road went to the Railway Commission and asked for running rights over some other road for which rights rates should be prescribed. That is the position that was taken by the Board of Trade of St. John and they made application to the Minister of Railways and Canals asking that the agreement should be submitted for the consideration of the Board of Railway Commissioners. The Minister of Railways and Canals acceded to that request. The Railway Commission were prepared to hear the matter at any time. The Council of the Board of Trade of St. John retained counsel, one of whom was my hon. friend who represents the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and the other the recorder of the city, and they placed the matter in their hands. But from that moment to the present, no application has been made by, or on behalf of, the Board of Trade to the Railway Commissioners to secure an opinion or a decision as to whether that agreement was fair and just from a railway standpoint or whether it was discriminatory against the port of St. John. The reasons that induced the Board of Trade not to proceed with this matter I do not know. I understand that it was considered that as the agreement was only for a few months, and as it has expired now, no good purpose would be served by pressing the matter before the Board of Railway Commissioners, but the fact remain that the Minister of Railways and Canals at once acceded to the request that the matter should be referred to the Railway Commission and the commission were prepared to give a decision in regard to it.

I have felt it only right to refer to this in view of what my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) has said. Different opinions have been expressed. Mr. Gutelius has asserted that from the railway traffic standpoint the agreement was thoroughly justifiable. Other gentlemen have made different statements and my hon. friend from Westmorland has made a statement to the same effect but at that time my hon. friend did not know of the rates which were given to the Canadian Northern railway from Quebec to Halifax.

Mr. EMMERSON: That does not affect the question.

Mr. HAZEN: That does not affect it except to make it so much worse for the arrangement entered into by my hon. friend and the Government which my hon. friend supported because the rate was not an adequate or proper rate and not one which could be justified from the railway standpoint.

Mr. EMMERSON: That does not justify this.

Mr. HAZEN: If this cannot be justified what will be said of the arrangement entered into by my hon. friend to enable the Canadian Northern to take its freight from Quebec to Halifax? I have every confidence that the difficulties which have existed in connection with the Intercolonial railway will disappear, and that the gentlemen who have been placed at the head of the railway will do their very best to meet the requirements of the country and of those who are connected with the railway itself. I further believe that all these difficulties which have been so often exaggerated and dwelt upon by hon. gentlemen opposite and by the press which supports their party will disappear entirely before long and that it will be found that the road will be run in the interest of the Maritime provinces and for the general good and welfare of the people of the country as a whole.

There were other matters that I intended to refer to but I think that at this late hour I will not farther trespass upon the time of the House. I submit again to you, Sir, with all possible confidence that no case has been made out by the hon. gentlemen who have addressed this House in support of this resolution that would justify the House in voting that the Government is deserving of censure on the ground that the methods of the present management of the Intercolonial railway are oppressive and unfair to the present railway employees and that nothing has been shown to the detriment of their interests or that of the business interests of the country.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, if I can get the attention of the House for a few minutes I will endeavour to be very brief in the remarks which I intend to make. It is an easy matter to find fault with the management of the Intercolonial railway. It has been always more or less easy, but, in my judgment, it never was so easy at any time in our history as under the present management. My desk is full of various kinds of complaints against the way in which the Intercolonial railway is managed. I have reason to know that the desks of hon. gentlemen sitting around me are in the same position. I do not intend to refer at all to these complaints. We, on this side of the House, unlike my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), who has just taken his seat, are not thinking of yesterday. We are thinking of to-morrow. The question is: Can the Government of Canada successfully manage a big enterprise like this? Can the breath of life be put into the management of the Intercolonial railway? Can it be built up to be a great transportation system with modern grades, curves and branch lines reaching out for traffic in all directions where traffic is available and in this way become a real factor in the development of the great natural resources of the country through which it passes? In the past the Intercolonial railway has actually retarded the development of the Maritime provinces. It is doing that to-day, and the question is: How long will it continue to do that? The fact that the Intercolonial railway occupies the field has kept other railway companies out of the field. No company wants to compete with the Government. The delay in extending the railway to the island of Cape Breton is a good illustration of the apathy that has characterised the Intercolonial railway ever since inception. It cannot be disputed that the ninety miles of railway in the island of Cape Breton is the greatest traffic-producing part of the road, but Confederation was twenty-five years old before that railway ran to the island of Cape Breton. Does any man believe that any progressive company would have looked across the strait of Canso for twenty-five years without endeavouring to tap the resources of that rich and prosperous island? The first minister of railways to pull the Intercolonial out of the mud was the Hon. A. G. Blair. His successors in the late Administration followed up his good work. He saw that the Intercolonial railway never could succeed while its terminus was in a field at Lévis. Within one year from the date on which the late Government took office the Intercolonial railway was extended to the city of Montreal. Immediately improvements began to be made; the road-bed was improved, the light 65-lb. rails were taken up and 80 or 90-lb. rails were put in their places; the Maritime Express was greatly improved and made into a modern train. Fast freight trains were added by which freight was carried from the ports of the Maritime provinces to Montreal on schedule time, something that had never been done in Canada before. Then again the Ocean Limited was added to take care of the tourist traffic. Shortly before the defeat of the late Administration, they embarked upon the policy of acquiring and building branch lines but they did not have time to develop this part of their policy prior to their defeat. It is true that this Government have talked a great deal about branch lines and the improvement of grades and curves, but it has all ended in talk. If they had kept their hands off we would have had now two important branch lines in eastern Nova Scotia, but the step having been taken by the late Administration, the present Administration and no Administration in Canada can go back.

We on this side of the House were much encouraged a few weeks ago when the views of my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) were accepted by the House, and we hope that this indicates a change of heart on the part of the Administration. The resolution of my hon. friend which was carried unanimously on March 16, was in the following words:

That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived for the extension of the Intercolonial Railway of Canada into the non-railway sections of the Maritime provinces within reasonable range of the said railway.

The House of Commons is supreme in these matters; the House of Commons has said that the time has arrived for the Government to act in regard to that question, and the House of Commons having said so, it is now the duty of the Government to carry out the mandate of the House of Commons, or else to take the advice of my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) and make room for some more capable Government which will do so. It will not be denied that this resolution has special reference to a branch into the constituency I have the honour to represent. My constituents will await with a great deal of interest the action of the Government when the supplementary Estimates are brought down. There is no use in any more empty promises of investigations and of surveys; the only thing that will count now is cash to be expended in actual construction. Even then it will be difficult for my constituents to forget that this Government cancelled a contract made by the late Government and deprived us of our rights for three years.

The Prime Minister has told us to-night that there is an absolute absence of political or party consideration in the management of the Intercolonial railway. I am compelled to take direct issue with the right hon. gentleman on that statement. I will say on behalf of the Minister of Railways, whose absence and whose illness we all regret, that if he had his own way I think there would be less politics in the management of the Intercolonial railway than there is to-day, but if there are no political considerations in the management of the Intercolonial, how does the Prime Minister explain the dismissal of so many of its officials. A large number were dismissed in the eastern part of Nova Scotia, and in my own constituency there were men dismissed on evidence that turned out to be perjury; but the official has not been restored to his former position.

Mr. HAZEN: How does my hon. friend from Guysborough explain the wholesale dismissals after the return of the Liberals to power in 1896?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am not making the statement that there were no politics in the Intercolonial under former management, but the Prime Minister has stated to-night that there are no political consideration governing the management of the Intercolonial railway to-day, and I am refuting that statement, and I say it is impossible for the Prime Minister to square that statement with the fact that a large number of officials have been dismissed. I have referred to some dismissals which took place in my own constituency, and I am informed that in the county of Antigonish, two out of every three employees on the Intercolonial were dismissed by this Government, and that some of them were replaced by men who were beyond the legal age.

Will the Prime Minister say that if the county of Guysborough and the county of North Cape Breton had returned supporters of his Government at the last election that he would have cancelled these two railway contracts? I question very much if the Prime Minister will make that statement, and if he cannot make that statement it is idle for him to tell us that there are no political considerations entering now into the Intercolonial railway management.

My hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) said that in regard to the branch lines, he wanted the idea to go abroad throughout this country that the defeat of the Branch Line Bill by the Senate is the reason why the Government were not taking over the branch lines throughout eastern Canada.

Mr. GRAHAM: Did he say that?

Mr. SINCLAIR: He did. But even though that statement does go abroad, the people of the country will not believe it because they know that numerous branch lines have been taken over by the Government and by the Intercolonial without any Bill such as he speaks of. What about the Drummond County railway, a large and important railway, in respect of which there was no general authority enabling the Government to take it over? What about the Eastern Extension railway, which became part of the Intercolonial some years ago; what about the Sunnybrae branch and numerous others which have been taken over without any such Bill? In each of these cases the transfers were authorized by Parliament. It is idle for the Minister of Marine to try to spread throughout the country the idea that the defeat of that Bill is the reason why the Government is failing to do anything with regard to the branch lines.

There is another matter I wish to draw attention to and that is an interview given by Mr. F. P. Gutelius, the general manager of the Intercolonial railway, and published in the Montreal Gazette on the 23rd of March last. This interview was referred to by my hon. friend from Pictou to-night, and it was given for the purpose of explaining the purchase of United States coal for use on the Intercolonial. Mr. Gutelius travels out of his way to discuss other matters relating to the railway, and he undertakes to inform the public as to the most profitable section of that system. This question is one of considerable interest. It is always regarded as important by members representing constituencies in Nova Scotia, when we are asking for improvements or additions, or for branch lines, if we are able to show that the roads that have been built in Nova Scotia are profitable to the Government. I make the statement here that every expenditure of that kind and every branch line that has been built in Nova Scotia has been an excellent investment for the Intercolonial railway. Here is what Mr. Gutelius is reported to have said in the Montreal Gazette:

As far as the revenues of the road are concerned, Mr. Gutelius said there was no questioning the fact that the province of Quebec is the banner province as far as the revenue producing capacity of the Intercolonial railway is concerned. The money is made in Quebec, New Brunswick comes out about square, while the loss is in Nova Scotia, notwithstanding the statement made in a pamphlet issued down in Pictou showing the earning qualities of that section of the railway.

That is a very positive statement. Mr. Gutelius says there is no question about the fact that Quebec is the banner province as far as revenue producing qualities are concerned, and that the loss of the Intercolonial is made in the province of Nova Scotia. But what are the facts? I do not profess to be an expert on these matters, nor do I profess to know more about the revenue producing sections of the Intercolonial railway than does the general manager. However, I felt confident that the statements made by Mr. Gutelius to the Montreal Gazette on that occasion were not in accordance with the facts. I accordingly moved for a return to ascertain the exact facts as to where the revenues came from and that return was brought down a few days ago. It was delayed for some weeks, as I understand the information had to come from Moncton, and I have no doubt the return was made under the direct supervision of Mr. Gutelius himself. And, when brought down, it turns out to be a direct refutation of the statement made by Mr. Gutelius. This return shows that in Nova Scotia, with only one-third of the mileage of the Intercolonial, produces about one-half the revenue, and, instead of Quebec being the banner province so far as traffic is concerned, it is shown by this return that Nova Scotia is the banner province. It is also clear that this high-paid official did not know, when he gave that information to the newspaper, what he was talking about. In order to be fair to the House, I shall read the exact questions I put to the acting Minister of Railways, and the answers I received in reply. The following are the questions and answers:

1. How many tons of freight were carried by the Intercolonial railway during the year ending March 31, 1913, distinguishing between eastbound and westbound traffic?

The answer to this question brought down by the acting minister is, as follows:

Total eastbound traffic	2,182,084 tons.
Total westbound traffic..	3,021,385 "
Grand total..	5,203,469 "

The other questions and answers were as follows:

2. How many tons of freight referred to in paragraph one, originated in the province of Nova Scotia, including all freight delivered to the said Intercolonial railway at the seaports of the said province?

Answer: The tonnage originating in the province of Nova Scotia during said year was 2,693,024 tons. Of this amount, 99,308 tons were delivered to the Intercolonial railway by steamships at the seaports in Nova Scotia for furtherance by rail.

3. What was the gross amount received by said railway during said year for passenger traffic in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec respectively?

Answer:

Nova Scotia	$1,128,640 07
New Brunswick	670,343 47
Quebec	844,783 09
Total	$2,643,766 63

4. How many tons of the total freight carried by the Intercolonial railway during the said year originated in the province of Quebec and New Brunswick respectively?

Answer:

	Tons.
Total number of tons originating in New Brunswick	799,824
Total number of tons originating in Quebec	1,008,406

Now, making a short abstract of these answers, we get the following result:

Year ending March 31, 1913.

	Tons.
Tonnage originating in Nova Scotia	2,693,024
" " New Brunswick	799,824
" " Quebec	1,008,406
" " Ontario and elsewhere	702,215
Total	5,203,469

So you will see that Nova Scotia contributes more than half the tonnage of the Intercolonial railway. Now, let us turn to the passenger traffic. The following is the amount of cash taken for the tickets sold in the various provinces through which the line runs—leaving out of course, the province of Prince Edward Island:

Nova Scotia	$1,128,640 07
New Brunswick	670,343 47
Quebec	844,783 09
Total	$2,643,766 63

So you will see that Nova Scotia contributes about half the total passenger traffic of the road. Thus it is shown that the general manager in this interview made a reckless and incorrect statement, reflecting upon the business of Nova Scotia. I submit, that when the general manager undertakes to make a business statement to the public on a matter of this kind, he should be very careful to be correct in his facts.

Mr. CURRIE: With the permission of the hon. gentleman, I would like to ask if in the statistics he has prepared he has compared the profit or loss of handling the traffic in these several provinces. The bulk of the traffic might originate in Nova Scotia and yet that traffic might be carried at a loss per ton mile as compared with the other provinces, and no doubt that is what the general manager means.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I assume that freight can be moved as cheaply in Nova Scotia as in Quebec. I do not pretend that this statement that I am giving is absolute proof. It may require some qualification. I am only showing that the province of Nova Scotia, with one-third of the mileage, produces about one-half the freight traffic, and brings in about half the money paid for passenger tickets.

Mr. CURRIE: But might not the result be that there were far too many employed in the operation of the road and that that is the reason he fired them.

Mr. SINCLAIR. If there are too many officials that is the fault of Mr. Gutelius himself. And if he dismissed any, he took care to put others in their places. I have shown that the Department put in old men far beyond the age limit provided by law. Now, I come to another paragraph of this interview to show how poorly the general manager is informed. He does not know the distances even on his own road. The hon. member for Pictou quoted from a Conservative paper a statement that there were old women busy with their knitting in Nova Scotia who knew more of the geography of the road than some of those Yankee officials. I will show you that this applies to the general manager himself. Mr. Gutelius announces that he has inaugurated a new policy on the Intercolonial railway. Let me give his own language:

A new policy is also to be inaugurated in the way of heavy shipments from Montreal to Sydney and vice versa, by sending trains around by the so-called short line from Oxford Junction to Stellarton, Pictou county, instead of by Truro, thus saving forty miles in distance, but also avoiding the very heavy grades between Oxford and Truro and near Westville. Sir Charles Tupper who was Minister of Railways and Canals when this short line was built, said the day would come when this route would be the leading freight line between the Sydneys and the west, and thus the prophecy of the ex-Prime Minister is being verified.

There are two glaring inaccuracies in that statement. By diverting the traffic to the so-called short line we do not avoid the grade at Westville, as that grade is on the short line and not on the main line. It is a conundrum to those who read that statement how Mr. Gutelius can get traffic from Stellarton to Oxford or from Oxford to Stellarton by the so-called 'short line,' without taking same over the Westville grade. As for his statement that he will save forty miles in distance, this also is incorrect as he could have found out by referring to his own time-table. We find the exact facts, as taken from the time-table issued by Mr. Gutelius himself to be as follows:

Distance Oxford to Stellarton via Truro	87.3 miles.
Distance Oxford to Stellarton via Short Line	79.6 "
Difference in favour of Short Line.	7.7 miles.

So, instead of saving forty miles he saves a little over seven and a half miles. I have no objection to Mr. Gutelius throwing bouquets at Sir Charles Tupper, but I would advise him when he wishes to get exact information, not to rely on Sir Charles Tupper's old speeches. It will be remembered that Sir Charles Tupper was Minister of Railways when the short line was built. And when he secured the vote for it he assured Parliament that he would save forty miles in distance between Oxford and Stellarton. But when he had accommodated his friends in Colchester, Cumberland and Pictou, he had made the line so crooked that he had only saved seven and a half miles. This is well known to every one in Nova Scotia, though it does not seem to be known to the general manager of the Intercolonial railway. The most objectionable part of this interview is the gratuitous reflection it makes upon the business of Nova Scotia. In order to give weight to this statement, Mr. Gutelius had to falsify the facts, and I can imagine no excuse whatever for such an interview being given out to the public. A man in the position of Mr. Gutelius, in charge of a great railway, should have some regard to the responsibility of his position and to the facts before he gives to a great commercial newspaper like the Montreal Gazette such an interview as he did give. Besides, it is no part of the duty of this official to make odious comparisons in regard to any province. Mr. Gutelius costs the people of Canada $20,000 a year, and I venture to say that he could not earn one-half that sum in any other profession or calling that is open to him. The hon. member for Westmorland pointed out that the service given by the Intercolonial railway was never worse than it has been since this highly-paid official came into charge, and that is absolutely true. My only purpose in calling attention to this interview is to induce the acting Minister of Railways to instruct this bumptious official of his to stop issuing manifestos in the newspapers and to attend to his business with a view to making some adequate return for the money which the people of Canada are paying him, and with a view to rescuing the Intercolonial railway from the condition of confusion that has overtaken it since he assumed its management.

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester, N.B.): I shall give my support to the resolution moved by the hon. member for Westmorland. I wish to say that I agree with what has been said on this side of the House with regard to the management of the Intercolonial railway.

A great deal has been said with regard to the branch lines policy of the Government and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who is not now in his seat, has criticised the former Administration, and more particularly the former Minister of Railways and Canals, the hon. member for Westmorland, as well as the hon. member for South Renfrew, for the manner in which they dealt with this question when hon. gentlemen on this side were in power. I may say in a few words that we on this side of the House have had to educate the people of Ontario to a realization of the fact that the Intercolonial is a Canadian railway, not the sole property of the Maritime provinces, and no person has given more devotion to that principle than the hon. member for Westmorland. May I be permitted to say that we in the Maritime provinces owe a great debt of gratitude to the hon. member for South Renfrew for the better feeling which he created in Ontario from the moment he took charge of the Intercolonial railway. It is to the credit largely of the hon. member for South Renfrew that it is possible for the Government of the day to acquire branch lines to be operated as part of the Intercolonial.

My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has made a statement which I am not prepared to accept, notwithstanding the courtesy which I wish to extend to him at all times. My hon. friend imputed motives to the Minister of Railways in the late Administration in connection with the taking over of the Canada Eastern Railway. The minister seemed to dwell upon the fact that that railway was owned at the time by one Mr. Gibson, whose son was then a member of this House, supporting the Liberal Administration. I cannot allow that assertion to pass without refutation. The real desire was not to favour Mr. Gibson or his son or any member of that company; the time had come when that railway would be taken over by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company if it had not been acquired by the Government of the day. It would have been the greatest misfortune for the people of the Maritime provinces had the Government of the day allowed that railway to go into the hands of the Canadian Pacific railway, because it carries a great deal of the trade of the counties of Northumberland and Kent, being particularly valuable for the transportation of fish from points in Gloucester and Kent counties.

The hon. gentleman says that because of the action of the Senate the branch lines policy was not put in operation last year. Although we on this side of the House agreed with the members of the Government to accept the Bill as presented by the minister at that time, the Senate were not prevented from looking into the constitutional aspect of the matter. The Senate cannot be accused of partisanship in that regard. We on this side of the House agreed as to the desirability of the taking over of the branch lines by the Government, to be operated as part of the Intercolonial railway, but the Senate thought that it was not in accordance with the principle of the constitution to give the minister power to acquire and build branch lines without the authority of Parliament. The people of this country to-day understand the duties of both branches of Parliament. The people understand that the Senate as well as this branch of the legislature should perform their duty to the people of Canada and that they were justified in introducing that amendment, which merely provided that the minister should obtain the authority of Parliament before purchasing or building branch lines. When that Bill came back to the House the Government refused to accept this amendment made by the Senate, although hon. gentlemen on this side were willing to accept it. It has been said that the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) suggested that a conference should be held between this House and the Senate and, therefore, if my right hon. friend and the members supporting him really had had at heart the acquisition of these branch lines, in the Maritime provinces more particularly, they could have either accepted the amendment or had a conference with the Senate and I for one feel that, in the exercise of my duty, I have to cast the blame upon the Administration of to-day for having failed to acquire some of these branch lines. I am more particularly interested in this because in my county there is one of the longest and most productive branches along the Intercolonial railway, extending from Bathurst to Shippegan, sixty-five miles and from Inkerman to Tracadie, twelve or fifteen miles, and the people have been waiting for relief. We in that county are now subject to a double tariff; since the Intercolonial under its new management raised the freight rates the Caraquet company have also increased their tariff and therefore our people have to pay much more than they used to.

There is another branch to which I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister and more particularly of the Minister of Marine, that is the extension of the Bathurst line to the harbour of Bathurst. This question was mentioned some time ago. The Minister of Marine has given his support, when Premier of New Brunswick to the construction of this road. I referred to the line from Bathurst Mines to Nepisiguit Junction, four miles. The mine will certainly continue to be operated because it is inexhaustible and, much as I regret the cessation of business by the Canada Iron company, I am in a position to say that arrangements have been made with the receiver by another company to operate the mines and therefore shipments will continue from the mines to Nepisiguit Junction and to Newcastle for some time. This line should be taken over and operated by the Government. The traffic for that line is not confined merely to the shipment of iron ore. The town of Bathurst is well known to the Minister of Marine. He has encouraged the railway by giving a guarantee of about $15,000 when he was Premier of the province. I have done everything I could in behalf of that enterprise and urged it upon the former Minister of Railways and Canals and the former Administration had practically decided to build the railway and operate it themselves when the Canada Iron company suggested that they would prefer to build it and operate it for their own business. There is now a considerable lumber industry there which would provide additional traffic. The minister is aware that a pulp and paper mill upon which $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 will be spent is under erection at Bathurst and it will continue to give trade on that line from the harbour of Bathurst to Bathurst Mines. The Government should build the rest of that line from Nepisiguit Junction to the harbour, four miles, which would make a saving of over thirty-seven miles in the transportation of the ore. I do not think it would be necessary for the Government to put an item in the Estimates for this season for the construction of that line, because the harbour improvements which I hope will be completed early next spring are not yet ready. I would hope that a survey be made of the balance of that railway out from Nepisiguit Junction to the harbour, four miles, and meanwhile the department might communicate with the receiver or the proper authorities of the Canada Iron company. They have had a double subsidy, one from this Government and one from the Federal Government. The road bed is a first class construction. I ask the Prime Minister to take this matter into his consideration and I hope before long he will have his engineers make this survey.

I shall vote for the amendment brought in by the hon. member for Westmorland.

Mr. H. BOULAY (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to address the House at some length in regard to the question brought forward by the hon. gentleman from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson); but in view of the lateness of the hour, I shall be content with a few remarks suggested by certain statements which hon. gentlemen opposite have ventured to make.

They endeavoured to show, among other things, that the Bill passed by the House last year, making provision for the taking over of the branch railways by the Intercolonial, had not been effectually sidetracked through the action of the Senate, where their party is in the majority. The truth of the matter is that in this House that Bill was unanimously carried; both parties having come to an agreement in regard to the matter, the taking over of these branch lines was decided without a dissentient voice. It was the general opinion that such taking over was of absolute necessity in the interest of the Intercolonial, as well as of the province of Quebec and of the Maritime provinces. The matter was so well understood, that not a dissentient voice was heard condemning the proposal. To my mind, that would be an additional reason for the Senate to pass the Bill without changing a word, since no differences of opinion had been voiced in the House of Commons in connection with the proposal. It seems to me that in respect to such an important Bill, when there was unanimity of feeling, the Senate should not have taken the liberty of mutilating the Bill as forwarded from the House of Commons, in such a way as to render it useless. The Senate might have been justified in taking such a stand in respect to a measure which had been the occasion of much wrangling in this Chamber. But that was not the case as regards that Bill; and the Senate amended it to such an extent that the Government was no longer in a position to make use of it, and as a consequence the branch lines were not taken over.

It was even stated that the hon. Minister of Railways was opposed to the policy of acquiring those branch lines, and that this was probably the reason why the Senate amendment was not accepted. Now the facts point in the opposite direction. It was the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) himself who introduced the Bill, who put it through the House, and that hon. gentleman is too much of a business man not to have perceived at once that this was a vital issue and of the greatest moment for the future of the Intercolonial. There is, for instance, the International railway whose earnings cover ten times over its expenditure; the Caraquet railway which shows a handsome margin of profits; also the Chaleurs Bay railway and the Canadian-Gulf railway, which runs from Ste. Flavie to Matane, and shows receipts double its expenditure. So it will be seen that the Minister of Railways had no reason whatever to object to the taking over of these branch lines.

Exception has also been taken to the doing away with the train service known as the Ocean Limited, between Halifax and Montreal. On that point I agree with those hon. gentlemen, and I say that the said train should have been left on. If it was necessary to cut off some of the trains, it would have been preferable to do away with train services 33 and 34, so-called. There is not the least doubt that during some winter months, such as February and March, two passenger trains are more than is required. Undoubtedly the Ocean Limited is by far the most convenient for those who travel between Halifax and Montreal, and the people of the province of Quebec, especially as it runs by night. If I had any suggestion to offer to the hon. Minister of Railways, it would be to cut out those two trains 33 and 34, and leave on the Ocean Limited.

Exception was also taken to the management of the Intercolonial. As to the condition of the railway proper, I am bound to say that, as stated by the hon. Prime Minister this evening, it is in as good condition as it was two or three years ago, that is under the management of hon. gentlemen opposite. But the criticism I have to offer, and the grievance which is complained of in my district, at any rate, is that the engines used in the Matapedia valley are rather too heavy and bulky for the curves to be met with along that part of the road. Whoever is acquainted with the valley of the Matapedia between Campbellton and Ste. Flavie, realizes that those engines are too heavy and that it would be advisable to use lighter engines, as on some occasions those heavy engines have caused the trains to run off the tracks and inflicted losses on the Intercolonial railway. But all that does not affect the condition of the road, and it is as good as it was under the Liberal rule.

I noticed that the hon. member for Pictou charged the Government with being too lax in its repression of the use of liquor. It was stated that both an engineer and a conductor in Nova Scotia had been kept on the service after some rather damaging evidence had been adduced against them. Well, I do not know whether the Intercolonial has two weights and two measures, but I doubt very much the correctness of the charge, as, in my county, I know of two men who were dismissed for taking a single glass of liquor. I should add that under the circumstances I found the measure rather drastic, and it surprises me that such laxness should have been shown in Nova Scotia, as contended by the hon. member for Pictou. I do not understand why so much harshness should have been shown in the province of Quebec in dealing with two men who acknowledged taking some liquor. The circumstances are well worth stating. At Campbellton, for some time past, the disappearances of large quantities of liquor had been noticed on the Intercolonial, and steps were being taken with a view to finding out those who were guilty of these pilferings. A Moncton detective approached these two men, who were working on some engines, with a view to obtaining some information from them, and, to attain his object, he promised them on behalf of the officials that, should they give out information in their possession concerning these liquor thefts, no action would be taken against them. The promise was made to them that they would be exempt from all punishment, and under such circumstances, as is well known, in any court of justice, the King's evidence goes scot free. Besides, those people not being under oath, were not obliged to state the truth. They admitted, in answer to the detective's questions, that they had taken a glass of liquor, and immediately they were dismissed by the Intercolonial management, in spite of the promise of immunity which had been made to them.

All that leads me to think that the charge proferred by the hon. member for Pictou is without foundation, unless the Intercolonial has two weights and two measures.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Is the hon. member in a position to say where they had secured those two glasses of liquor?

Mr. BOULAY: They had got the liquor from another man in the employ of the Intercolonial. That was the whole of the evidence adduced at the time. However, that was enough to put the detective on the track of part of the stolen liquor. What I find to blame under the circumstances, is the dismissal of those two men, after they had been promised exemption on behalf of the management of the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (South Cape Breton)—Mr. Speaker, at this late hour, and as the question has been fully discussed I do not intend to take up much of the time of the House in a further discussion of the state of affairs on the Intercolonial. There are, however, a few observations which I wish to make. I do not intend to go into the question of the acquisition of branch lines for the Intercolonial, or into the question of building new lines as feeders for that railway, which, incidentally, would open up new country in the Maritime provinces. My views on that question are well known to the House, and particularly as regards the taking over of the St. Peter's road by the Intercolonial, and its extension to Louisburg, thence to the mining distrcts of Cape Breton county and on to Sydney, opening up new country and giving to the mining people of Cape Breton county a chance to get lower freight and passenger rates than they at present enjoy under the system of railways which we have in that part of the country. I wish also to say a few words on the question of the management of the Intercolonial promoting men from the ranks of that railway to its high positions. I also wish to say a word or two as to the advisability of this or any other Government buying coal for fuel on the Intercolonial from the United States or any other country but Canada, in view of the fact that we have as good a supply of coal for that purpose in the eastern part of this country as can be obtained anywhere in the world. I shall also say a few words as to the introduction of standard rules on the eastern section of the Intercolonial.

With reference to the promotion of men from the ranks of the Intercolonial to the higher positions on that road, I wish to say that neither this Government nor any other Government in this country has given that question the serious consideration which it demands. If I had time, I could show that men who have grown up in the service of the Intercolonial have obtained positions of the very highest character in railways across the line, and in the Canadian Pacific railway, and Grand Trunk in this country. The Premier has told us that it is the policy of this Government to promote men from the ranks to fill the high official positions on the Intercolonial. I am sorry to tell my right hon. friend, and this House, that the Government is not putting that policy into effect. On the 26th of February last, I asked the following question:

1. What are the names of the new appointees of the head office staff of the Intercolonial railway, since September 21, 1911?
2. Who were their predecessors?
3. What is the salary of the individual new appointees, and what is the salary of their predecessors respectively?
4. On what railways did the new appointees see service, and what were their respective salaries there?

The answer was that nine changes had been made in the head office staff at Moncton, and the House will be surprised when I tell them that not one of those nine were taken from the ranks of the Intercolonial. Mr. F. P. Gutelius, previous to his appointment, was employed by the Investigating Commission of the Transcontinental railway, and previous to that by the Canadian Pacific railway; C. A. Hayes, who took the place of E. Tiffin, and who previously had a salary of $700 a month, came from the Grand Trunk railway and was promoted to the office at Moncton at a salary of $833.33 a month. H. F. Alward, who had previously received a salary of $3,200 a year, was promoted from another railway and given a position on the Intercolonial at a salary of $333.33 per month; C. B. Brown, who came from the Canadian Pacific railway to succeed W. B. Mackenzie, and who had previously received a salary of $4,500 a year, was appointed at $500 a month; W. A. Duff came from the Transcontinental railway to take the place of A. E. Killam. He had previously been getting a salary of $250, and receives the same from the Intercolonial; R. G. Gage was appointed at a salary of $200 a month to take the place of E. A. Rolfe. He came from the General Railway Signal Company of Canada. W. R. Devenish came from the Transcontinental Investigating Commission and receives $200 a month; G. E. Smart came from the Canadian Pacific railway and assumes part of the duties of W. N. Appleton, W. E. Barnes and Mr. Sharp, at a salary of $300 a month. Robt. Klock is the only person of the whole nine who can be said to have had any experience with the Intercolonial. He came from the Department of Railways and Canals, and probably had very little experience with the Intercolonial. So while the Prime Minister tells us that it is the policy of the Government to fill these high positions on the Intercolonial with men who have grown up in that service, I want to point out as evidence of their not putting that policy into effect the return which came down on the 26th of February last, and from which I have just been reading. I take the ground that there are men in the employ of the Intercolonial as well equipped to fill the places of responsibility on that road, either in connection with the head office or any other department, as you can find anywhere on the continent of America; and there is no justification in the world for this Government or any other to go outside the Intercolonial to get excellent men to fill those high positions. I am not going further into that question, except to point out that all the chief offices of that railway which have been filled by this Government are occupied by men who had previous experience on other railways than the Intercolonial, and therefore this Government is not making effective the policy which was announced in the House to-night by the Prime Minister. I could go on and point out further cases of men who have given their life's work to the Intercolonial—for a consideration, to be sure—good men, qualified in every respect, but who were overlooked in favour of men taken from other roads to fill places which they could well have filled.

In connection with the buying of coal for the Intercolonial, I take the stand that where it is at all possible to buy coal from the mines in the province of Nova Scotia, or in other parts of Canada, it is not good policy for this Government or any other government to go abroad to buy coal. The 15,000 tons of coal purchased by the general manager of the Intercolonial this year could have been obtained from the collieries of Nova Scotia. In the interview which Mr. Gutelius gave to the press of this country, he showed no justification whatever for going outside the province of Nova Scotia to buy this coal, especially in view of the fact that the 15,000 tons which he imported from the United States cost the Intercolonial about $1.25 a ton more than the Nova Scotia coal would have cost, and this at a time when the mines of Nova Scotia, especially the smaller ones, were working half time, and when some of their employees were absolutely in want. I want to point out another thing in connection with the buying of this coal. This Government has gone far away from the policy that any government in this country should have in asking fourteen or fifteen coal dealers in the United States to tender for the coal supplies of the Intercolonial. If these tenders had been awarded to the Nova Scotia collieries in December, January or February for the supply of coal for the following year the collieries of Nova Scotia would have been in a position to mine the coal which was demanded, because the collieries are not going to bank up their coal if they have no prospect of contracts in the near future. That gave rise to a lot of hardship and inconvenience to the coal miners of Nova Scotia during the past winter. If these contracts had been made it would have given a great deal more employment to the people who make their livelihood by digging coal and other work in connection with mining. The fact that Mr. Gutelius, bought 15,000 tons of American coal, though there were fifteen collieries in Nova Scotia, never even approached to ascertain whether they could give the supply that was demanded by the Intercolonial railway was met by the statement that in 1901 coal was bought from the United States by the late Administration. I am not partisan enough not to condemn that act if there was no justification for it. But in 1901 there was a coal strike threatened in Nova Scotia and the managers of the collieries were not in a position to say whether they could give the Intercolonial railway a full supply of coal. Notwithstanding that fact there were only fifty thousand of sixty thousand tons of coal purchased. In 1907 there was no coal purchased from the United States but there was threatened strike then and there was an actual strike in the mines at Springhill which, unfortunately, became widespread in the year 1909. It was for that reason that the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals at that time was seeking to ascertain what prices would be quoted for coal on the other side of the line. But notwithstanding the fact that there was a strike in the Nova Scotia collieries at that time no coal was bought outsile Canada. I take the ground that no tenders should be asked for the supply of coal for the Intercolonial railway from collieries outside of Canada. I take the ground that where it is at all possible to obtain a supply of coal in Nova Scotia coal should not be imported for the Intercolonial railway.

1 a.m.

In reference to the introduction of the standard rules on the Intercolonial railway, it is true that the Board of Railway Commissioners issued an order to the effect that the railways under its jurisdiction should bring into operation the standard railway rules. But that has no bearing whatever upon the management of the Intercolonial railway because the Board of Railway Commissioners has no jurisdiction and does not take jurisdiction over the Government railway. Therefore, the order of the board has nothing to do with the rules of the Intercolonial railway. Some days ago I put a question on the Order Paper to the acting Minister of Railways and Canals as to why these rules were introduced and what their introduction had cost. The answer of the minister is as follows:

> Standard rules are all in force on part of the Intercolonial railway and many of them in force on the balance of the Intercolonial railway system.

He also stated that there were as many as fourteen tutors employed by the Government to bring the rules into effect on the Intercolonial and that it had cost the management $5,000, the payment of these tutors, to teach men the railway business who probably knew far more about railway operation than the tutors did. But the most wonderful part of the answer that I got from the acting minister was this. I asked him why these rules were brought into effect and his answer was: To promote safety on the Intercolonial railway. When the minister was making his statement in this debate to-night I asked him a question as to the loss of life and the number of accidents on the Intercolonial railway as compared with other railways of this country. What was the answer he gave me? Notwithstanding the fact that about four days ago he gave as the reason for making these rules effective that it was to promote safety, he could not answer the question that I put to him because he knew nothing at all about it. Therefore, when he answered the question I put to him as to the reasons for putting these rules into effect he gave the answer he did because he did not have any statistics to show that the standard rules had promoted safety any more than the rules which we have had in force on the Intercolonial for many years. He also gave the answer to my question that these rules had been adopted to promote 'economy and despatch in the operation of the railway.' Complaints have come to me from railway men operating between Truro and Sydney, which latter place happens to be in the constituency I represent, against the introduction and operation of these standard rules. There are very many old employees who have served twenty, thirty, or forty years on the Intercolonial railway, who have been in the service since the inception of the road, who have grown old in the service, and who do not readily understand how to grasp these rules and how to put them into force, they having been brought up from their childhood so to speak, to the rules which hitherto have been in effect on the Intercolonial railway. The result is that many of these old employees are unable to make themselves sufficiently acquainted with the standard rules to put them into effect on their trains, and they will, in consequence, be forced to leave the employment of the Intercolonial railway. The acting Minister of Railways and Canals to-night gave force to their contention by saying that there were some of them who were not becoming efficient in the enforcement of these rules. What is he going to do with them? He could bring in men from the Canadian Pacific railway and the Grand Trunk railway who know these rules and who understand how to use them. He would place them in the positions which have been occupied by men who have grown up in the service of the Intercolonial railway, conductors, etc., and he would place these old conductors perhaps in positions as switchmen, or something like that at very much reduced salaries. I ask the acting Minister of Railways and Canals if he thinks that is a fair proposition to make. I ask him if, in view of the fact that the railway employees in that part of the country have sent him statistics to show that there have been less accidents on the Intercolonial in proportion to the number of passengers carried than on any other railway in Canada, it is necessary to introduce these standard rules especially on the eastern section of the Intercolonial railway. What were the reasons which actuated the Board of Railway Commissioners in recommending the standard rules? The standard rules were recommended because in Toronto, Montreal and the larger cities of central Canada different railway companies were operating on same lines. In order to promote safety on such lines it was necessary to have uniform railway rules, but no such reason as that obtains in the eastern section of Nova Scotia, and no such reason obtains on any part of the Intercolonial with the exception of the line towards Montreal, and if I am correctly informed the standard rules have been in effect there for some time.

There are very many other matters in connection with the Intercolonial that I would like to discuss, but I will not delay the House at this late hour. The acting Minister of Railways need not come to this House and say that he is not receiving remonstrances from the railway men as well as from the patrons of the Intercolonial railway in the eastern section of Nova Scotia. If he does not receive such remonstrances he is the only member of the House who does not, because every member from Nova Scotia and from New Brunswick and from the eastern section of Quebec received day after day a list of grievances from the employees of the railway and from its patrons, which should be looked into by the Government. The acting minister told the hon. member for Westmorland that he brought this resolution to the attention of the House in order to make political capital out of it. Let me assure the hon. gentlemen that if the Liberal members of this House were only looking to make political capital out of the Intercolonial they would never have brought this to the attention of the House at all, because we have it on the responsibility of the editor of a newspaper in Nova Scotia, which is owned by the chief Conservative whip, that if the Government adhere to their present policy of operating the Intercolonial railway they will not have a Conservative candidate elected in any of the counties of Nova Scotia through which the Intercolonial railway runs. If we were only looking for political effect, we would leave well enough alone and let the Government hang itself and defeat its own friends in Nova Scotia. But I think any hon. member of this House through whose county the Intercolonial runs would be remiss in his duty if he did not bring to the attention of the House and the country the grievances which exist which demand a speedy remedy. There has never been a time when the Intercolonial was more unpopular, both with its patrons and employees, than it is to-day, and I trust that the Government will undertake to at once remedy the defects. I hope they will see to it that the Intercolonial is not run on the same basis as a company railroad, because it was never built with that intention. The Intercolonial railway was built as the people's road and has been operated as the people's road, and if ever there was a time when it ceased to be such, the people rose in their wrath and forced the Government of the day to a true understanding of their duties in respect to it. It is with that intention that my hon. friend has moved the amendment which I cordially support.

The House divided on the amendment of Mr. Emmerson:

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

Having already 15,732 feet of available land near Bonaventure station, Montreal, for postal purposes, as per answer given by the Minister of Public Works on April 27, 1914, is the Government still negotiating for the purchase of the Carslake hotel property?

Mr. REID: The Minister of Public Works never stated that we had 15,732 feet of available land near Bonaventure Station. In 1907, the superficial area of 15,732 feet was taken in exchange by the Government for property on Cathedral street. The available area has been reduced by the city's homologated line, which leaves only 10,984 feet of property of an irregular shape. Expropriation proceedings for Carslake hotel property are now pending.

MORNING SITTINGS.

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That on and from Monday next, the 11th instant, and until the end of the session, the House shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning, and that in addition to the usual intermission at 6 o'clock p.m., there shall be an intermission from one to three o'clock p.m.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My right hon. friend the other day gave me a list of fourteen measures which have still to be introduced by the Government during the present session. I observe that in the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday notice is given of five of these Bills, leaving nine still to be introduced. I will rely upon my right hon. friend, if these measures are to be introduced this session, to have them brought down this week; if they are not brought down this week, I would ask that they stand over until next session. Many of them are not of an important character, although they have their usefulness, and I think that at this time we should expedite business as much as possible. I would suggest that the first morning sitting be held not on Monday but on Wednesday, because many of the members cannot be here on Monday.

Mr. BORDEN: If it does not make a great deal of difference to my right hon. friend, I would rather begin on Monday. We can arrange, if he so desires, to take up on that day business that is not of a controversial character. I think we had better make a beginning, or we shall never reach the end of the session. So far as my right hon. friend's suggestion with regard to bringing down certain measures this week is concerned, without fully committing myself to the proposition, I think there is a great deal to commend it. I can assure him that exhortations of mine to that end have not been wanting in the past, and shall not be wanting in the future.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Exhortations do not seem to be sufficient. Is the Co-operative Bank Bill to be introduced this session?

Mr. BORDEN: I am not quite sure that it will be introduced.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY RAILWAY.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to place before the Prime Minister a number of inquiries with a view to facilitating discussion on the Canadian Northern aid. I shall simply place them on 'Hansard' in order that the Prime Minister may procure the information. They are as follows:

Is any part of the money to be raised under the guarantee to be used in the completion, betterment or extension of the Canadian Northern lines in Alberta and Saskatchewan; or for the completion, betterment or extension of the Canadian Northern Alberta, or Canadian Northern Western lines in Alberta, or of the Canadian Northern Saskatchewan lines in Saskatchewan? If so, on what lines is such expenditure to be made, and how much is to be expended on each line in

(a) Payment of existing liabilities,

(b) Completion of construction now in progress,

(c) Betterment of completed lines,

(d) Extension of existing system?

In case of default of the Canadian Northern and foreclosure by the Government, to what extent are the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan protected by the terms of the resolution in respect of their guarantees to the Canadian Northern and constituent companies by provision for the completion and operation of lines the subject of such guarantees and payment of the interest guaranteed?

Can the terms of section 10 be construed to override in any degree or alter the effect of any agreements made between the provinces of Alberta or Saskatchewan and the Canadian Northern regarding their lines in these provinces?

Mr. BORDEN: I am very much obliged to my hon. friend for his courtesy in notifying me in advance of the proposed inquiries. If there are any other hon. gentlemen on either side of the House who can give us suggestions as to information which they desire, I would deem it a favour if they would make us acquainted with them.

I beg to lay upon the table of the House a statement of capital stock authorized and issued of the companies set forth in the first schedule. I may say to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that I expected to lay upon the table of the House to-day a considerable number of documents, which included a great many of those that have been asked for; but, in the anxiety to secure copies of these documents, as well as the originals themselves, they are not quite ready at the moment. Since I became aware that the delay had occurred on account of an insufficient number of copies having been provided, I sent word to have the originals brought in at once, so that they at least may be laid upon the table of the House to-day, and the copies to which I allude will be laid on the table either to-night or to-morrow. I am not sure that the papers alluded to include everything mentioned in the letter I received from my right hon. friend to-day, but I have asked that every effort be made to secure that information also.

Mr. GERMAN: Will the Prime Minister lay on the table of the House the amount of capital stock that all these various companies are authorized to issue. For instance, clause 2, subsection a of the agreement says:

> Grant a first, fixed, and specific mortgage or charge upon the shares mentioned in the first part of the second schedule thereto.

Certain shares are mentioned, stock to be transferred free from prior charges. Will the Government lay on the table of the House the amount of capital stock authorized to be issued by all the companies mentioned in the first part of the second schedule?

Mr. BORDEN: A statement has just been laid upon the table of the House which sets forth the authorized capital and the issued capital of all these companies. So far as I understand this covers my hon. friend's inquiry. If it does not, I shall be glad to give any further information.

Some of the documents to which I alluded a moment ago have now arrived. I desire to lay on the table of the House correspondence including official applications for assistance and detailed statements asked for thereon by the Government showing particulars of capitalization, earnings, cost to complete, etc.

I also desire to lay on the table several corrected copies of the estimated cost of betterments. In reply to the hon. member for South Renfrew yesterday I mentioned that the item of $5,595,754 for Montreal terminals had been omitted from that statement, although it was included in the addition. The copies now laid upon the table have that correction.

I also desire to lay upon the table of the House the report of the first inspection and examination of the company's affairs made by auditors appointed by the Government. There was another, and I think a more thorough investigation, made afterwards, resulting in a more elaborate report. That will be laid upon the table of the House to-morrow.

[Mr. Borden.]

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 136, to amend the Dominion Lands Act.—Mr. Roche. Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): The minister explained the object of his amendments when the Bill was before the House the other evening. I might go a little more fully into the matter, because I represent a district largely affected by this measure. Those who have taken up homesteads and pre-emptions in the pre-emption district in Southern Alberta find conditions very unsatisfactory; and that is one of the reasons for the demand which has been made upon the minister and the Government for a change in the Act. The crops have been unsatisfactory, and farmers have not been in a position to meet their payments. In my district, the almost general demand is that the payment shall be cancelled altogether, and petitions have been placed in my hand, and no doubt in the hands of the minister to that effect. I know that the proposed amendments are not satisfactory to a great majority of the homesteaders. The petition which has been most largely signed was prepared by the Farmers' Union at Foremost, Alberta, and it is known as the Foremost Plan. I might read it to give the House an idea of how the homesteaders feel and what they actually want:

> To the Minister of the Interior, Ottawa, Ontario:
> We, the undersigned pre-emption holders humbly petition the Minister of the Interior to allow proof to be made for a pre-emption at the same time as a homestead or any time thereafter, providing the necessary improvements have been made, and without payment at the time of making such proof or obtaining such patent.
> The Government refunding the payments of interest and principal to the original payee that have already been made on pre-empted lands, over and above the average hereinafter mentioned.
> The average to be struck from the total amount already paid on all pre-emptions.
> Such average amount to be filed against every existing pre-emption in the shape of a lien against the land, bearing interest at 5 per cent, and no further charges to be made for such pre-emptions by the Government.

I think that is the view of the majority of the homesteaders. They have been very much discouraged, and I myself know that they are not actually in a position to make any payments. I have had some letters endorsing the proposals of the minister, and some claiming that more liberal action should be taken in regard to the provisions of this Act. One objection offered is that it enables the man with money, and who is anxious to get a patent for his land, to pay for it and get out of the country, leaving the land to lie idle. One trouble in many sections of my district is what is known as the professional homesteader who proves up and goes away, leaving the land to lie idle. Consequently, the land is not made productive and settlement is interfered with. The argument has been advanced that if the minister had made provisions whereby settlement would have been guaranteed—if, for instance, he had provided for a reduction in the cost of homesteads and pre-emptions in case of further improvements—it would have been more in the interests of the country and permanent settlement; that if more were required in regard to fencing, and the amount of cultivation, or provision made that a certain number of stock should be kept, the pre-emption fee might be reduced or abolished altogether, thereby encouraging settlement. Knowing as I do, and as most of the western members in the House do, the effect of abandoned homesteads, I believe that assistance along that line would have been of greater benefit to the country than the proposed amendments. The minister has provided for the removal of a portion of the interest. My own view is he should have gone all the way and abolished the interest for every year. If it is wise to remove the interest for a certain period, certainly it should be wise to remove it altogether; and I want to urge upon the minister and upon the Government that the interest should be removed altogether so as to give some assistance to the homesteaders in that country.

I would like to emphasize the fact that the proposed provision looks to me to be of more assistance to the man with money, who is taking up a homestead or pre-emption with the object of getting his patent in order to make a sale, and who then leaves the country, than to the man who wants to become a permanent settler. I would like to read a letter I have here giving the opinion of a homesteader who wants to remain permanently in Alberta, and who is anxious that whatever provisions are made by this Government shall be along the line of encouraging permanent settlers. He says:

> I notice in the Lethbridge Daily Herald of March 31, an article informing us that the Dominion Lands Act is about to be amended. I have read the proposed amendments through carefully, and have honestly concluded that a worse thing could not possibly happen this immediate locality than to allow those amendments to become law. The Government thought —and, I persume, honestly, that it was doing a great thing for the homesteader when it exempted him from building a $300 house and allowed him to perfect his proof with any kind of a 'shack' or 'hovel'. Whom did this benefit, and what is the result? It surely did not benefit the actual bona fide settler who wishes to make his home here, raise a family, build schools, churches, roads, bridges, and other evidences of progress and civilization, and who could not possibly live in a house that cost less than $300. The only one it could possibly help is the man that takes up a homestead on a gamble, living on it just long enough to make necessary improvements to comply with the law, and who then returns to the cities or states whence he came, leaving the homestead and 'shack' a breeding place for noxious weeds and gophers, and an eye sore to the actual settler who remained hoping to build up the country, and whose efforts will naturally enhance the value of the absentee's land. Now regarding those amendments, of what benefit are they to the locality as a whole? They will enable a number of those fellows to prove up on their pre-emptions at once, and return to the States with a title to 320 acres of land in their pockets; but the actual settler who wishes to make his permanent home here, what difference does it make to him whether he proves up on his land this year or three years hence? Regarding the amendment allowing a homesteader to have stock instead of breaking, I will say in all sincerity that 320 acres of this land will not support 24 head of cattle all the year, unless the homesteader raises grain and tame grasses; and in order to do so he has to do the breaking, anyhow. So of what use is this 'concession'?

I merely read this letter to give you the opinion of a very intelligent and representative homesteader in my district offering objections to provisions, which, in a way, will help the homesteader who is a speculator to get his land very readily, and, if he so desires, to leave the country. I want particularly to urge upon the minister that the interest should be removed entirely. If it was wise to remove it for a part of the period, it ought to be wise also to remove it altogether, and that would be of some practical assistance to the farmer. In my district, as I said before, the sentiment is that the amendment should be even more liberal, and, in order to encourage permanent settlement, if some amendments had been made to encourage improvements, and the investment of the money in the actual improvement of the land, to offset the payment made to the Government, it would have gone a long way towards encouraging settlers and homesteaders.

Mr. J. A. M. AIKINS (Brandon): Mr. Chairman, I am indebted to my hon.

friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) for having incorporated in this Bill some provisions of the Bill which, in the earlier part of the session, I introduced. Unfortunately, being introduced by a private member, that Bill did not receive the consideration of the House. I would like the Government to take up the question of giving greater opportunities to private members to introduce Bills and carry them through regarding matters of public importance. The Government of Canada is supposed to be a Government for the benefit of the people, and, in the administration of the public domain and property, it is also supposed that it is acting for the benefit of the many and not of the few. It has not always so resulted, sometimes by design, but mainly by reason of a lack of knowledge of the present and prospective values of the lands and natural resources and a lack of foresight. The result of the policy of homesteading and pre-emption shows it has not been entirely successful. I do not mean to say that that policy should be discontinued, but it should be so carefully put into operation that it would accomplish its purpose, namely, to give land to the actual settler, who will make full use of the property and fully develop it as it should be developed. This would mean not only prosperity for the man himself, but prosperity for the country.

The total area granted in homesteads, up to the present day, according to the records of the department, is 50,100,000 acres, and for pre-emptions and purchased homesteads it is 8,400,000 acres, making a total of 58,500,000 acres granted for homesteads, pre-emptions and purchased homesteads under the Act which is being amended. The following statement will show the area under crop, according to the records of the Department of the Interior, in the year 1913, in the three prairie provinces:

Crops.	Acres.
Wheat	10,036,000
Oats	5,792,000
Barley	1,025,000
Flax	1,545,000
Other products	565,200
Total	18,963,000

If you allow one-third more for resting the land each year or for fallow, it would give a total area under cultivation of 25,284,000 acres. If to that was added one-third more of the last mentioned area for the purpose of pasture, namely, 8,428,000 acres, it gives a total area which should be properly farmed of 33,712,000 acres, or a little more than one-half of the total area granted for homesteads, pre-emptions and purchased homesteads. It falls short of that area by 24,788,000 acres, or by about two-fifths. This shows one thing very clearly, that the homesteading provisions of the Dominion Lands Act, and the regulations under it, have not accomplished the purpose for which they were intended. If we attribute the whole of the cultivated lands in these three provinces to homesteads, we find that there is about two-fifths of the homestead area not being fully used.

The intention in giving this land to the homesteader was that he would receive it and properly and continuously use and cultivate it. That is not being done. One reason why it is not being done was mentioned by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Buchanan) when he said that there are a large number of professional homesteaders. Under the provisions of the Act, the Government has allowed a great many people to take up homesteads who are not qualified to be homesteaders because they do not know how to properly cultivate the farm. In the earlier years of the West there was a large number of remittance men, who took up homesteads with the view of getting a patent. When they received the patent they sold the property to the speculator or to a loan company by means of a mortgage and then left it. In addition, there was at one time a provision relating to second homesteading, but that has now been dropped. The result has been a comparative failure of the homestead law to accomplish the purpose for which it was intended. That failure becomes more apparent if you consider the fact that there are millions of acres outside of the land which was actually homesteaded not under cultivation. Therefore, I think that the greatest possible care should be taken respecting the provisions of the Land Act concerning homesteading, and that instead of relaxing these provisions there ought to be watchfulness to see that all the homestead conditions are complied with. I have the impression that in times past governments have been too lax in granting the lands in the Northwest, not only to settlers, but to private persons, railway companies, colonization companies, and other organizations at a nominal, or certainly inadequate, consideration. We find from the records of the department that the following grants have been made:

	Acres.
To railways	31,864,074
Sales, special grants and half-breeds	7,647,100
River lots	687,600
Sales of Indian reserves surrendered	664,600
Irrigation sales	1,052,100
University of Manitoba	150,000
Total	42,065,474

Let us say, roughly, 42,000,000 acres.

This does not include in the surveyed area and the Hudson Bay Company land, 6,779,900 acres; the school land endowment, 8,616,900 acres; Manitoba swamp lands, 1,050,000 acres; grazing leases, 3,876,800 acres. Exclusive of these there has been granted in round figures 42,000,000 acres.

We who have lived in the West know that the Government could have easily commuted in the earlier years almost all of these lands at $1 an acre; and later on at $2 an acre. But, say for $3 an acre; and if we take $3 an acre for 42,000,000 acres, it would mean $126,000,000. Calculating interest on this for a term of twenty years at three and a half per cent compounded the total cost to date to the Government if they had commuted, would be $249,813,540. I venture to say—and those who live in the West will understand that I am quite within the mark—that all that land could now easily be sold for an average of $15 an acre. There are large tracts which cannot be had now for $40 or $50 an acre. But take it at an average of $15 an acre, the total value of the land to-day would be $630,000,000. If we deduct from that $630,000,000 what it would have cost the Government to have repurchased that land or commuted for $3 an acre, and interest, namely, $249,813,540, it means a loss to Canada of $340,186,460. What could not Canada have done with that $340,000,000. But, instead of the Dominion of Canada and the people of Canada having now the benefit of that large sum the land is held by speculators or by private companies who expect to get the increased value of that land which results from the intelligence and industry of those who are holding adjoining lands.

The very same policy of lavish grants has been pursued in respect to other natural resources such as our great coal areas, gas lands, and coal oil lands. The policy that should have been adopted by the Government is the policy which is adopted by individuals who own property, to know the value of that property. Only when it knows the value of the property can it deal with it intelligently. The result of not knowing the quality and value has been that those people who do know the natural resources and their value, better than the Government officials, have speculated in these natural resources and have made millions of dollars out of them of which the people might have received the benefit. It seems to me that the policy should be adopted by the Department of the Interior and by the Government of spending some money in order to ascertain the real value of the property the Crown possesses. That policy will pay the public in the long run. If we do not do this, then individuals and corporations will reap the benefit of superior knowledge, and the people of Canada be deprived of that advantage which is their natural right.

The same may be said of our water-powers. We have in the Winnipeg river one of the greatest assets any country ever possessed. That river drains an area of 55,000 square miles. In that area is the lake 4 p.m. of the Woods, of 1,500 square miles, and Rainy lake of 330 square miles. Into the Winnipeg river flows the English river, and that river has a minimum flow of 12,000 feet per second. If it were properly regulated at the lake of the Woods and at the English river it would have a flow of 22,000 second feet. It is not, however, at present regulated. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the necessity of properly regulating the flow. As it is now, even without proper regulation, it may be made to develop 500,000 horse-power. Why has not that been done? There is in that river a fall of 371 feet from the lake of the Woods to lake Winnipeg, 240 feet of which fall is within the province of Manitoba and about 70 feet in the province of Ontario. There are a number of natural falls and cup basins which make it easy to develop electrical power. One of these powers on the Winnipeg river is at Point du Bois on the eastern boundary of Manitoba, and has head of 47 feet. That fall has been developed by the city of Winnipeg. The present installation is 28,000 horse-power, and the capacity of the present building is about 50,000 horse-power. The ultimate installation will be 100,000 horse-power. It has cost the city of Winnipeg to develop that power without distribution $3,780,000, and with distribution $6,000,000. Prior to the development by the city of this electrical power and the transmission of it to the city of Winnipeg, the citizens were paying for electrical energy from steam plant 20 cents per kilowatt hour. The Winnipeg Electric Company built its hydro plant in the Pinawa channel, but maintained these high rates. The city of Winnipeg thought it proper that they should ask for offers to develop power on the Winnipeg river and transmit it to the city of Winnipeg. The result of such offers was that the Winnipeg Electric Railway Company reduced the cost of electric power from 20 cents per kilo-watt hour to about 10 cents. As another company had offered to supply the city 3,000 horse-power at $50 per horse-power per year, but demanded a monopoly of the city's streets for distribution for fifty years, that offer was refused. The city of Winnipeg thereupon built the plant at Point du Bois at a cost of $6,000,000, and it has reduced the cost of electrical power to the people of the city to about three cents per kilo-watt hour, thus saving annually to the people using power and light in Winnipeg about $500,000. The cost of that power delivered at Winnipeg is $12 per horse-power. When the full installation is made by the city it will be reduced to $10 per horse-power. The city of Winnipeg own the transformers, the right of way to Point du Bois, about 77 miles out, and over 100 miles of distributing system. All this shows what can be done with the natural resources of our country for the benefit of the people, if they are properly developed. The city of Winnipeg was able to develop that power, because it is a large community and had facilities for raising the money. If the other towns and cities in the province of Manitoba were able to raise the money as the city of Winnipeg did, and procure power cheaply, they, too, would become industrial centres. My hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) knows well that if they could only get cheap power in Manitou, his city would grow rapidly; and the same thing may be said of Brandon, of Souris, of Portage la Prairie, and of other centres in Manitoba.

These water-powers belong to the Dominion of Canada, and the Dominion receives abundant funds from the West by the payment of duties by the people. Some of that large revenue ought to be expended by the Dominion for the development of the water-powers in the West, the creation of electric energy and its transmission to the cities and towns. If industrial centres were thus established in the west of Canada, the result would be a benefit to the farmers also. In their interest I suggest to the Minister of the Interior the propriety of developing these water-powers on the Winnipeg river. It is true that the late Government, through a lack of foresight, gave concessions and grants of a large number of the falls on the Winnipeg river. For instance, in 1906 the late Administration made a grant to the Mackenzie and Mann interests of a water-power on the Pinawa channel, which channel practically parallels the main channel of the Winnipeg river for about twenty-five miles. By the development of the power on the Pinawa channel—and I wish to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to this—two other falls on the main channel have been rendered inefficient for development, because so much water is required for the use of the Mackenzie and Mann power plant in the Pinawa channel, namely, a flow of about 8,000 feet per second. The total flow is about 12,000 feet per second; so that there is a flow of only about 4,000 feet per second along the main channel of the river. Thus have been injured the two falls called the Seven Sisters falls, which cannot now be developed efficiently, unless the flow is regulated on the English river and on the lake of the Woods, so as to make it about 20,000 feet per second. Of the Seven Sisters falls, the first has a head of 34 feet, the second a head of 37 feet. If these falls had not been rendered inefficient and were properly developed, there could be produced 34,800 horse-power at the first falls, and 37,800 horse-power at the second falls.

The next fall, that on the Winnipeg river, is the Slave fall. It has a head of 26 feet, including a fall of 8 feet, on a basis of 75 per cent efficiency at an 8/10 gate, it will produce 26,600 horse-power, with a natural flow of 12,000 feet per second, and at a construction cost of $94 per horse-power. If the flow of the river is regulated on English river and the lake of the Woods, it can be made to produce 44,000 horse-power at a cost of about $84 per horse-power.

The next fall is the McArthur fall which has a head of 18 feet. On a basis of 75 per cent efficiency at an 8/10 gate, this will produce 18,400 horse-power at a cost of $123 per horse-power. If the flow is regulated, it will produce 30,700 horse-power at a cost of $97.50 per horse-power.

The next falls are the Grand du Bonnet, Little du Bonnet and Whitemud, a concession of which was made in 1910 by the last Administration to R. R. Muir. This fall has a head of 56 feet, and on a basis of 75 per cent efficiency at an 8/10 gate, it will produce 78,700 horse-power at a cost of $69 per horse-power. As a concession, however, was made to R. R. Muir, this fall has eventually got into the hands of the Winnipeg Electric Railway Company, which can develop that power now in almost any way it thinks proper under regulations which are not adequate for the protection of the public interest.

The other falls granted in 1906 are Silver falls, which with the Pine falls have a total head of 37 feet. On a basis of 75 per cent efficiency, at an 8/10 rate, they will produce 38,000 horse-power at a cost of $70 per horse-power. One fall cannot be efficiently developed without the other. In 1906 there was an agreement of sale made by the last Administration with one J. S. Cummins, of Chicago, of land where the Silver falls are located—river lot 1 and fractional west half of section 1, township 18, range 10, east 271 acres, at $250 per acre, or a total of $67,750, payable in ten annual instalments. This was made without any regulations at all respecting the development or the use of the power. The effect will be, if the agreement remains outstanding—and I wish to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to this—that it will render inefficient the Pine falls. There therefore are left for development on the Winnipeg river only two main falls—the Slave falls and the McArthur falls. It will be to the interest of the people of the West if the Government will repossess itself of those powers which are not developed, and will develop them for the benefit of the people of the West, of the cities and towns of the West and of the farming community generally.

I wish now to refer to the regulations which are existing, in order to show that they are entirely inadequate when compared with the regulations of other countries, or with the regulations of the province of Ontario. Under the Act respecting water-powers in Ontario, it is required by paragraph 4, sub-paragraph (d):

> That the applicant 'shall furnish proof satisfactory to the minister that the said water privilege is required for the applicant's own mechanical or industrial purposes or to supply an actual or anticipated demand for power in the neighbourhood of the privilege,' and may require a deposit for the proposed development.

There are no such requirements in our Dominion regulations. Paragraph 9 of the Ontario regulations says:

> No such lease shall be granted for a longer term than twenty years, but the lessee shall have the right of renewal of such lease for two further and successive terms of ten years each upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon or may be fixed by the minister.

Paragraph 13 provides:

> The Lieutenant Governor may cancel, if the lessee does not comply with the requirements of the regulations.

Compare that with the Dominion regulations. Paragraph 8, sub-paragraph (a) says:

> The term of the license shall be twenty-one years, renewable for three further consecutive terms of twenty-one years each, at a fixed fee payable annually, and to be readjusted at the beginning of each term, as hereunder provided.

In other words, those powers are tied up for a period of eighty-four years under the Dominion regulations. Paragraph 8, sub-paragraph (c) provides:

> At the expiry of each term of twenty-one years the Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the minister, order and direct that the license and any lease granted in connection therewith be cancelled: Provided that the minister shall have given at least one year's notice to the licensee of intention so to cancel.

Mr. NEELY: Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell me which particular part of the Bill he is discussing at the present time?

Mr. AIKINS: Paragraph 1 relates to water-powers.

Mr. NEELY: Land, I think.

Mr. AIKINS: Land and water-powers. The Dominion regulations provide for cancellation in certain cases, but not to the extent provided by the Ontario regulations. Paragraph 8, sub-paragraph (e) provides:

> That on the termination of the third renewal—that is at the end of 63 years—compensation shall be paid for the works to the amount fixed by arbitration.

The Ontario regulations provide, in paragraph 12, subsection 1:

> That at the expiry or sooner determination of the lease the water privilege shall revert to and become the property of the Crown together with all dams, weirs, tunnels, races, etc., and all buildings erected on land covered by the lease; but the lessee may remove all machinery, but if the buildings are of a suitable character for utilizing the water privilege the Hydro-Electric Commission may fix compensation.

They provide further—paragraph 12, subsection (m):

> The lease shall at all times be subject to any general regulations thereafter made by the Lieutenant Governor in Council affecting the construction and operation of works for the development of water privileges or the supply of power therefrom.

There appears to be no similar provision in the Dominion regulations.

The Ontario regulations, paragraph 12, subsection (b), may require the lessee to develop to the full capacity, and makes provision for the use by other parties than the lessee of the surplus or unused water not required by him for the purposes of his business on such terms as may be agreed upon. No such salutary provision occurs in the Dominion regulations.

The Ontario regulations, paragraph 12, subsection (d) provides that if a person desires to have power from the lessee and they cannot agree, on report by the Power Commission, the Lieutenant Governor in Council may fix the rates to be paid by the person desiring such power, and, in fixing the compensation, the commission may demand the production of books, records, verifications, etc. No such provision exists in the Dominion Regulations, nor in those regulations is there any provision that the lessee shall be obliged to furnish power to other persons or public bodies.

The Dominion regulations provide that a schedule of rates and prices to be charged to the public for the use of power shall be submitted by the licensee to the Board of Railway Commissioners for adjustment and approval before being put into effect, and that the schedule shall be readjusted and approved every seven years; but, as was pointed out, the licensee is not obliged to sell to the public that power nor is there any body provided for fixing rates for power from time to time required by the users of power.

Compare the two sets of regulations, and one can easily see which is more for the interest of the public. We know that under the Ontario regulations the Hydro-Electric Commission has done much to develop the industries of our country by procuring for it cheap power.

The only reason why this amending clause was introduced in the Act was that there should be no homesteading of any lands upon which there are water-powers or which are adjacent to water-powers and are required for their development. I think that this provision is a thoroughly suitable one. I wish again to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the necessity of developing those water-powers which belong to the Dominion Government, so that industries may be established in the West and so that the people of the western country may be placed in a similar position to that of the farmers of the western part of Ontario who have the benefit of home markets and established industrial centres.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not altogether agree with my hon. friend when he counsels the Government against any relaxation of homestead regulations. The duties and responsibilities of Government vary with changing conditions. While there is much to be said in favour of the general principle laid down by my hon. friend—much to be said in support of the facts as he stated them, namely, that there is a tendency on the part of the homesteaders in some cases to evade the requirements of the regulations—on the other hand, there is a necessity, under certain conditions, that the regulations should be made more reasonable. It appears to me that in this country either we must face a diminution in our rate of progress or we must make some change in the conditions relating to homesteading. I do not need to argue that notwithstanding, as my hon. friend has said, that only a small proportion of the land alienated is actually cultivated, the fact remains that it is the bringing under cultivation of that comparatively small percentage that has given Canada the progress that she has made during recent years. If there is a diminution in the rate of increase of homesteading, there must necessarily be a corresponding diminution of the rate of progress of Canada at large—industrially, commercially, financially and in the way of transportation. So, when the minister is face to face with a condition which shows a rapid and steady decrease in the number of homestead entries in our western country and a startling decrease in the number of pre-emption entries, it is his business to look around and see what he can do to meet the conditions and to recover the rate of progress that is not only desirable but absolutely necessary to the prosperity of Canada. In the answer to a question asked by myself on February 2, it was stated that in the calendar year 1911 the homestead entries were 38,585, in 1912, 35,226, and in 1913, 29,640, not including the returns from Peace River and Grand Prairie for the week ending December 31. Our pre-emption entries were 10,583 in 1911, 8,947 in 1912, and 6,483 in 1913. Our homestead entries have gone down 10,000 in two years, and our pre-emption entries have gone down very nearly 50 per cent in that time. These being the facts, I think the minister is well warranted in considering in what way he may, by relaxation of the requirements of homestead and pre-emption duties, stimulate further occupation of western lands. There is no denying that the condition exists, and that it has a very important bearing upon our progress. I have already given the figures to the House, but I take the liberty of repeating that sales of land, which amounted in 1911 to 1,406,000 acres, bringing a total of $19,122,937, have fallen to 707,149 acres, bringing $9,867,155 in the fiscal year 1913. There has been a decrease in the demand for land all along the line.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Would not the fact that there are fewer homesteads and pre-emptions accessible now than there were a few years ago have some bearing upon what my hon. friend has said?

Mr. OLIVER: There are certainly fewer homesteads and pre-emptions available to-day than there were three years ago; that, of course, goes without saying.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I mean near the railways; they are nearly all taken up.

Mr. OLIVER: The construction of railways has largely rendered accessible land that a few years was not accessible because of the lack of railways. There were less lands available for either homestead or pre-emption entry in 1911 than there were in 1908, but there were a great many more homestead and pre-emptions taken up in 1911 than were taken up in 1908. There is a vast country in the Northwest that is almost untouched by settlement, but to which settlement is going. The great Peace River country is available for settlement; its land is surveyed, and people are going there in thousands. I do not think, therefore, that there is any argument in the suggestion that there is not now plenty of land for people to take if they want to take it. I am prepared to maintain that the people do not want the land in the year 1914, under present conditions, as they did in the year 1911.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: What are the conditions?

Mr. OLIVER: In the first place—and I make no apology for dealing with the matter from this point of view—I think I have already established in the minds of the members of this House the fundamental importance of the question of homesteading to the welfare and progress of the whole Dominion of Canada; and, when we find that homestead and pre-emption entries are on the rapid decrease, that is a time when we can surely impress upon the House and upon the country the reason for that decrease that is so detrimental to the welfare of our country.

Mr. McKAY: When the hon. member speaks of homestead entries that were made, does he include the purchased homesteads?

Mr. OLIVER: I am just giving the return; I think they are included. At any rate, the purchased homsteads are not so numerous as to make any serious difference in the total count.

There is no doubt that first and foremost, in the years of rapid increase from 1905 to 1911 there were favourable conditions in regard to crop prices which stimulated homesteading. There was a further belief in the minds of settlers of that day that the Government of the day, in its policy and administration, had the interests of homesteaders and homesteading, the interests of the residents and cultivators of the western country, at heart, and that in the efforts they were making they could depend upon it that the Government was behind them. It need not be emphasized, as the facts have been brought forward in this House time and time again, that since our friends took office, since their views in regard to public policy have had sway, that condition has been absolutely reversed, and that to-day the homesteader of the West—the resident, the farmer—feels that he has not the sympathy and support of the Government, that he has not the advantage of a Government policy that is favourable to the success of his endeavours.

Mr. CURRIE: That is what the hon. gentleman and his followers are trying to make them think; they are discouraging them.

Mr. OLIVER: I am placing before the House a certain condition of facts which is shown in the blue book issued by the Minister of the Interior. It is for the House and the country either to take cognizance of these facts or not as they please; but the facts are there and it is not what I say or what anybody else says, it is the fact that homestead entries are decreasing and showing a continued decrease showing that people do not want the land of the western country as they did under former circumstances. That is not a matter of argument; it is a matter of fact, and I am taking the opportunity to place before the House and the country and the Government the tremendous responsibility that rests upon the Government in adherence to the policy which they have enunciated in this House from time to time since they took office.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE: In what way has this Government reversed the policy against the farmer of western Canada?

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend knows that in the elections of 1911—

Mr. SHARPE: But you carried on the Government before that.

Mr. OLIVER: The Government of the day administered the affairs of the West to the satisfaction of the people of the West.

Mr. SHARPE: How have we changed that?

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend has changed it in this way, that he has not changed his policy or his administration to meet the change of conditions. As long as prices were high and were going up, a condition of facts existed that called for a certain administration; but when prices were going down a different administration was required, and that is where there is a lack of confidence to-day. When there is a falling of prices in the West, instead of means being taken by this Government, as were taken by their predecessors, to improve conditions, the demand for an open market has been turned down specifically and repeatedly in this House by the Government and its supporters, including my hon. friend.

Mr. AIKINS: Wherein is there any difference between the policy of the late Administration prior to 1911 and the policy of the present Administration relating to homesteading?

Mr. OLIVER: I will deal with the homesteads later. I am dealing now with the trade question, with the general question of the prosperity and welfare of the country; and I say that this Government has taken a stand, ever since it has been in office, which has created a distrust and dissatisfaction in the minds of the people who are on the land in the western country that is reflected in the conditions of homesteading as shown by the return from the Government itself. I say therefore that the Government must accept on behalf of its policy the results which are shown there and be responsible for the necessary consequences and results of that policy to the country.

Now, as to the administration of the land. I shall not weary the House or burden it with details, but the first act of this Government when it took office was to practically make a clean sweep of the land administration throughout those western provinces and establish, from beginning to end, an absolutely political administration, a political organization absolutely for political purposes. The facts have been placed before the House repeatedly. It is not necessary, at least at this late date in the session, to go into details. We have the facts, homestead inspectors canvassing for votes along with candidates of the Conservative party, homestead inspectors tried for intimidating voters in their positions as homestead inspectors.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Is that anything new?

Mr. OLIVER: I am apoligizing for repeating it, but to round out the argument I wish to do so. It is a fact that a homestead inspector named Ambrose Grey was himself a candidate in the Alberta elections. He is to-day homestead inspector. I need not multiply instances; there are plenty of them. From Winnipeg to the Rocky mountains they have established a political organization in control of the heritage of the people of this country. They have established a reign of terror among the homesteaders on the prairie, and the result is reflected in the returns as you see them here. I am not young in that country; I have been there a long time. I have seen several changes of Government, and the very model of the administration that has taken place since this Government came into power is the Administration that prevailed from 1878 to 1896, with the result that in 1896 there were a few less homesteads taken up than in 1878. We had twenty years of absolute stagnation in that country as a result of the methods that our hon. friends opposite installed the moment they took office, and which they have carried on consistently ever since. They cannot blame Providence; they cannot blame circumstances for conditions that they themselves have absolutely created, and for which they are immediately and directly responsible. If this country, to-day, is suffering from a condition of stagnation so far as western progress is concerned—and western progress means eastern progress as every man in this House knows, and as most men in eastern Canada are beginning to thoroughly understand—it has resulted from the policy of the Government, and the Government must take full responsibility for it. The stagnation of western Canada means the stagnation of the whole of Canada.

Mr. WRIGHT: My hon. friend is criticising the homestead inspectors and the officials. I would ask him if he can name a single inspector who was removed from office by the present Government who had not been proved to be a violent partisan under the late Administration.

Mr. OLIVER: Most undoubtedly. Some time ago I asked for a return in regard to officials removed in my district, and the return showed that there was not even a suggestion of partisanship against the dismissed officials.

Mr. WRIGHT: Have you the names?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes: Gordon Macdonald is one; Peter Tompkin is another. They made a general accusation against the latter, but there was absolutely no evidence of partisanship, and no investigation was held. In the other cases there was no pretense of removal because of political partisanship. These removals were made for the purpose of appointing political partisans in order to establish a party organization in the prairie provinces at the cost of the people of Canada. That party organization is at work to-day. It has established a reign of terror amongst the homesteaders with the result that homestead and pre-emption entries have decreased, and the minister has to come forward and suggest relaxation of the conditions in order, as he hopes, to stimulate further interest. I hope he will be successful.

Mr. WRIGHT: I would like to say that travelling through that northwestern country I met man after man who told me, when I asked which party he supported, that he was supporting the Liberal party simply because he could never hope to get a patent without supporting that party.

Mr. OLIVER: I am sorry for my hon. friend in the kind of people he associated with when in the West. I do not believe they were a fair sample of the people of that country. The number of patents that were issued during the time that the Liberal Government was in power is evidence that the suggestions of my hon. friend are not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. BORDEN: I would like to tell my hon. friend that grave complaint has been made to me many times during the past few years, that in large sections of the prairie provinces the people are still under the impression that the hon. member for Edmonton is Minister of the Interior.

Mr. OLIVER: I have the same complaint to make myself, I regret to say. I receive many appeals for consideration from one man and another.

Mr. BORDEN: If they imagine that there is a reign of terror, they must be attributing it to my hon. friend.

Mr. OLIVER: Some of them, no doubt, do. Judging by the letters I receive, there are people who fully believe that the Government with which I was associated is responsible for the conditions they complain of; but that is not my fault, nor does it vitiate the argument I make. In the majority of cases the homesteaders are well aware of the change. Whether one Government is in their minds or another, the fact remains that they do not want land to-day as they did three years ago; and one of the reasons is that they believe they do not get a square deal from the Department of the Interior to-day. That is the essential point. My point is that the yearly increase in the number of homestead and pre-emption entries under the stringent conditions that were imposed by the late Government—purposely stringent—is good evidence that the people were satisfied with the administration of the Department of the Interior, just as the fact that the demands for land are on the decrease is evidence that, to-day, they are not satisfied with the conditions that cause them to dispose of the land, or with the conditions under which they can obtain land.

Mr. GEORGE E. FOSTER: How does my hon. friend explain that from 1906 to 1908 there was an almost exactly similar decrease in homestead entries? Are the reasons that he gives to-day good reasons for that decrease, or what is the reason?

Mr. OLIVER: That is a matter that may very well call for explanation. The reason is this: before I became minister, my predecessor was doing just exactly as my hon. friend proposes to do now. He was administering under very lax regulations in order to stimulate entries, and one of those regulations was the right of proxy entry. Any person might make entry on behalf of a number of people in Ontario, or the Maritime provinces, or the States, so that when these people came out to the West their land would be already selected. That was a perfectly good proposal so long as there was not an abnormal demand for land. But as soon as speculative conditions entered into it the privilege was seriously abused, and the practice of blanketing homesteads took place. One man would come in and blanket a whole township with entries, and dispose of those entries to his friends at an advantage. We found that privilege so much abused that we were compelled to cut it out, and while I was Minister of the Interior I had to turn loose the whole homestead inspection staff, all over the West, in order to wipe out the blanket entries that had been made for speculative purposes rather than for settlement. The large number of entries in 1906, or whatever year it was, was when the blanketing had reached its maximum. The hon. Minister will remember that the matter was discussed in the House. The cutting out of that practice accounts for the tremendous drop that took place in the number of entries immediately afterwards. Entries shortly afterwards began to steadily increase, as the returns show. If we are to maintain the rate of progress that we have had in the past, I say that the conditions certainly call for a change in some way.

I find no fault with the minister for making the changes along the lines that he has suggested. I do not agree with him altogether in the details of the changes, but I find no fault with him for making them. Under the present conditions it is necessary to do something and this is possibly one of the things that may be done. But the trouble is wider and deeper than that; it is the political administration of the Lands Department and the Government's fiscal and trade policy that retards the progress and welfare of the people of that western country.

Mr. KNOWLES: The present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) has now been in office, I think, a year. It has been of great interest to those of us who represent thousands and scores of thousands living on the prairies to make a study of the policy which he proposed to adopt and the line of action which he proposed to direct his employees to follow. My first expectation and belief in regard to what the minister would set himself out to do was that he would endeavour to give the people a square deal. I have taken the trouble, in two or three instances, to test the minister and as far as the cases have enabled me to succeed, I have been disappointed in what I have learned in regard to the minister's control of his officials. About a month ago, in this Chamber, I called attention to the way in which homestead inspectors spent their time during the provincial elections of 1912 and I showed the minister that homestead inspectors were going out for as long as ten days at a time without making any inspections at all. I also showed that this was connived at and that such actions were never rebuked. They did not seem to phase the minister in the slightest. He seemed to be of the opinion that officials at election time were perfectly at liberty to spend week after week doing nothing for their salaries except running up their expenses. If there was nothing else to convince me that the minister was failing to take that personal interest in the administration of his department in the West that his duty would require him to take this one circumstance would be sufficient.

The minister is, in the last resort, the hope and confidence of the homesteader on the prairie. The minister is bound, amongst his lower officials, unless he weeds them out carefully to have in his service a great many people who have not honesty enough to give the homesteader a square deal. There are a number of party heelers in every party. There are undercurrents and motives, even of the smallest kind, which affect the administration of the law, and unless at the top of the department there is a man whom the under officials fear, some of these officials will be corrupt and will persecute the poor homesteaders on the land. In the last resort, while I do not think that, even unfortunate as has been my experience, the minister personally would initiate anything that was wrong, yet it is the duty of the minister not only to be straight himself but in a stringent way to compel straightness and honesty in the people who serve under him. Unless the minister asserts his authority over his subordinates and sees that right is done he is derelict in regard to the trust that is reposed in him.

It is a very serious thing for the minister to sit calmly in his office and say: Well, Mr. Cuttle, my man out West, says so and so should get the homestead, then put his O.K. on the file and let it go. The homestead, after all, is the most precious thing that the man on the prairie has. It is the one hope that the man, his wife and children have in their lives, and it is as precious to that constituent of mine as the home of the Prime Minister in the city of Ottawa.

It is just as hard a thing for that homesteader, his wife and his children, to be turned out on the concession line in Saskatchewan as it would be for the Prime Minister to be turned out of his home in Ottawa. There is no difference in principle and it is just as unjust to turn the homesteader out of his homestead on the prairie as it would be to turn the rich man or the professional man out of his home in the city. Until the minister realizes that he is the custodian and guardian of the rights and hearths of these people the minister will fail to realize the responsibility that is placed upon him.

I called the minister's attention by a long telegram last fall to a case which called for investigation on his part. I wired him, stating the case and telling him that a great wrong was being done. I got an answer from his secretary, or some employee of the department, saying that the minister was in Winnipeg and that the wire would be forwarded to him. I never heard another word about it, directly or indirectly, until I brought it up in this House. I moved for the papers when I got down here although it was early in September that the telegram had been sent. I followed the case up and insisted that an investigation be held. The minister directed that an investigation should take place. The evidence was taken and the facts that I am going to show are established not only by the evidence but by the return which the minister has brought down. I shall try to show that in that case the minister, speaking of him as a minister of the Crown, is just as responsible for the injustice done to that man as if he were the man who had initiated the wrong. I asked for the papers. I found that a man by the name of J. N. Beaubien had held the homestead to which I refer, six miles from Gravelbourg, ever since 1907 and that there is no evidence of one day's residence during that time. This return to which I refer, No. 110H, was brought down on March 19, 1914, and there are affidavits of some six or seven persons showing that this man, Beaubien, had, during all these years, lived with his family over his butcher shop, in the town, or village, of Gravelbourg. On the same file there is the affidavit of Beaubien himself saying, on two different occasions, that all the time he had lived on the homestead with his family. Beaubien I neither know nor know not in the way of desiring to say anything about him. He is a mere pawn upon the chess board to-day. I have met him. He was a Liberal—a fawning, sycophantic, favour-asking Liberal, such an uninfluential fellow that no man would consider it worth while to refer to him with the slightest personal feeling. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior has him now, but he will find that his support is not worth having. He was a supporter of mine up to the last election; at the present time he is a supporter of the Prime Minister. As far as I know, he and creatures like him, are of no use to any party and we are fortunate in having lost him. He always should have been a Tory. The declaration of Beaubien is held to be false by the finding and the report of Mr. Cuttle himself who held the investigation. In the return which the minister brought down, page 7, Beaubien makes the following false statement:

For what period did your wife and family reside with you during such residence? If not with you, where have they resided?

The answer is as follows:

On the homestead all the time, always with me.

I shall show before I am through that in this investigation Beaubien himself said that his wife had not lived with him but had been keeping a boarding house over his butcher shop in the town of Gravelbourg.

He is askeed at page 77 of this return:

Q. What actual residence have you since performed—(if the period of residence is not continuous state the months or portions of months in each year)?

A. From May 29, 1907 to May 31, 1910, except during December, 1908, and from May 31, 1910, practically to date.

That is shown later to be an absolute falsehood. At page 47 of the return, Beaubien repeats this false evidence. He is asked:

Q. What actual residence have you since performed?

A. Practically the whole time since.

Q. For what period have your wife and family resided with you during such residence?

A. All the time.

If the minister looked into this as it was his duty to do when I called his attention to it, he would have found that this was an absolute falsehood. To start with, he has given that homestead to a perjurer and the minister will not dare to say that there is the slightest evidence of truthfulness in that statement, and Mr. Cuttle who was the tool of the heelers in that district says he was not in good standing when the man Arguin got the entry. There is no debating whatever about it, the minister will not say that there is the slightest element of truth in it.

Mr. MORPHY: Do you contend that perjury having been proven the minister should not cancel?

Mr. KNOWLES: Under the late Government it was the custom when men made false statements about their homesteads to call them to account very sharply. There were quite a number of prosecutions for perjury. It is the only way in which the public could be protected. I fancy that under this Government there have been some prosecutions also, but the minister will know about that better than I. If a person deliberately makes a false statement as to his residence duty I would have no hesitation in answering that his entry should be cancelled. On pages 62, 63, 70 and 73 of this same return there are statements of people who say that all the time Beaubien with his family had been residing in the village of Gravelbourg.

The department, on the 22nd of February, 1912 (page 67 of this return), ordered that the homestead inspector's report be received in this matter. Arguin's application for cancellation proceedings was first taken on the 10th of November, 1911. The inspector's report was ordered the 22nd of February, 1912, and this report was not made until September 14, seven months later. Everything was done to protect this man to the very fullest extent, the seven months' delay proving the same as an interim protection for him. The provincial elections were on, and the inspectors no doubt were busy at other places, although there is evidence that the inspector was on several occasions in the vicinity of this homestead. On page 59 of the return we have the homestead inspector's report, which is false as false can be, and it is simply an indication to the minister of the kind of homestead inspectors he has landed on him. He is asked:

Q. What residence has been performed?

And he says:

From May 29, 1910 to November 30, 1911, and is now in residence.

5 p.m. The statement that he was then in residence, the evidence shows to be false. Arguin, the applicant for cancellation, continued seeking redress from the minister and he wrote to the minister personally on different occasions, as will be found by the return, pages 54 and 40. There were almost supplicating letters from Arguin for a square deal. Things dragged on throughout all that year, and the man Beaubien was protected until December, 1912. Then, for over a year cancellation proceedings had been hanging fire. He then, without any reason at all so far as the file shows, had been given further gratuitous protection until April 1, and here we come to the important part of it. On December 28, the department wrote to Arguin the following letter:

Ottawa, December 28, 1912.

N.E. ¼ 22-11-5 W. 3rd M.

Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated the 10th instant, in reference to the cancellation proceedings instituted on your behalf against the pre-emption entry of Jos. N. Beaubien for the above land, and in reply to say that under the general rule of the department cancellations are deferred until the 1st April, 1913.

However, it will be necessary for Mr. Beaubien, by the date mentioned, to satisfy the local agent at Moosejaw that he is in residence with the intention of remaining there and completing the duties; otherwise the agent will cancel his entry without further notice and you will be given an opportunity to re-enter for the land.

Your obedient servant,

F. Nelson,

for Assistant Secretary.

Joseph W. Arguin, Esq.,
Gravelbourg, Sask.

The same kind of letter was sent to Beaubien, and the same kind of letter was sent to the agent. The 1st of April, 1913, came around and it was practically a year and a half after cancellation proceedings had been under way. Arguin then sought on the 1st of April, 1913, to make his entry. Beaubien was not in residence. He did not comply with his requirement to satisfy the agent, as he was told that he was in residence, and according to the letter that was written from Ottawa his entry should have been ipso facto cancelled. I want to call the attention of the minister to another part of the political influence in this. Did the agent cancel it as he was instructed in the letter of the 28th of December? When Arguin sought to get his entry on the 1st of April as he was promised it would be cancelled, they refused it and the agent instead wrote back to Ottawa for instructions. That was a subterfuge, it was playing the game of Beaubien. The department wrote back and said: You are to follow the instructions of the letter of the 28th December, 1912, and cancel the entry. And then, unwillingly and reluctantly, the agent cancelled the entry and Arguin got entry for the land. That was what he had been seeking, and that was the proper thing to do but even if it rested there, there would still be complaint on Arguin's part because he had been kept a year and a half out of the homestead. But Beaubien got busy. The file does not tell what he did. Rumour said he saw the minister himself, personally, when in Moosejaw; rumour has it that in an upper room apart by themselves, secretly by night, Beaubien and his friends gathered to see the minister and that they were told it would be all right and that Beaubien would get the homestead back. I do not know about that rumour, but I know they saw the minister; and I know they placed it before him, and I know the result, namely, that he gave Beaubien back the entry.

Mr. ROCHE: Where was this supposed to have taken place?

Mr. KNOWLES: The geographical location of it is a matter of indifference. Beaubien did not tell me the location of it, but he boasted everywhere in Gravelbourg that he had such a pull with the Government that the minister would be compelled to give the homestead back to him. I know that the minister, while in the West, was seen on behalf of Beaubien and I know further that he gave Beaubien back the homestead. There is not the slightest scintilla of evidence to show that the entry of Beaubien was wrongfully cancelled. It was the proper thing to cancel Beaubien's entry it would have been the proper thing to cancel it a year before it was cancelled. Just because Beaubien comes along with his political heelers and gets after the homestead inspector, after Mr. Cuttle, after the land agent, after the minister himself, the entry of Arguin is cancelled and the homestead is given back to Beaubien. There was absolutely no justification for doing so. I do not know of another case where a man has rightfully obtained entry, as Arguin obtained his entry, and then has had his homestead taken away from him just because of political influence. Mr. Beaubien was in default and his homestead entry was rightfully cancelled; but the excuse was made that he was in Winnipeg—he had not told the land agent that he was going—with his wife who had to undergo a slight operation on her throat in the Winnipeg hospital, and the minister drove Arguin and his wife and children off the homestead and gave it back to Beaubien, although Arguin was rightfully in possession of the land. An investigation was held, but everybody in Gravelbourg believed and said that it was a cut-and-dried matter that Beaubien would get back his homestead. I was West when the investigation was held and I told the investigators to stay their judgment because I had some doubts as to whether the Minister of the Interior would after all permit his political heelers to do a wrong like that to Arguin.

Evidence was taken at the investigation. I do not intend to weary the House by reading it, but I am going to refer to a few pages of it. Mr. Cuttle held the investigation in Gravelbourg. I do not know him, but I know that he has done a raw and heartless thing that the so-called thin-red-line Leach would never have done. Under the circumstances I think we had better nickname this man cut-throat Cuttle. If the present Minister of Public Works had been in charge of the Department of the Interior, then I believe this would never have happened, because he has a kind heart and does not believe in seeing men with their wives and children turned out on the road and deprived of their homes wrongfully; and I believe he would have looked into the matter a little more carefully than the Minister of the Interior has done. Cuttle has shown the spirit of a cut-throat in the wrong he has done. When the investigation was held, Mr. Cuttle made Arguin's lawyer prove his case; he made him start with every witness, and Beaubien's lawyer would not allow him to lead the witnesses, although in this case it was surely up to Beaubien to show why he should be restored. Arguin had got rightful entry, and Beaubien had been cancelled rightfully, but from start to finish Arguin's lawyer had to examine every witness first. There is the evidence of twelve witnesses, every one of whom says that Mr. Beaubien was living, as far as the witness knew, in the town of Gravelbourg. Two of these witnesses were bank managers, who for two or three years had lived right opposite Beaubien in the town of Gravelbourg, and who swore that, as far as they knew, Beaubien was living with his family at his butchershop and his boarding-house in the town. The minister knows that, if a man is going to carry on business in a town, he must have his wife and children living on the homestead. Beaubien did not even sleep on his homestead; but, even if he had done so, it would not have been putting in residence, because a man carrying on business in a town must have his family on the homestead. Under that rule a single man cannot earn his homestead if he is carrying on business in a town.

I wish to refer especially to the following witnesses: Mr. Dureault, at page 16 of the evidence; Mr. Gray, manager of the Union Bank of Canada in Gravelbourg, page 22; Mr. Magee, manager of the Bank of Toronto in Gravelbourg, page 30; Mr. Hamlin, telegraph operator, who has been in Gravelbourg for three years, page 33; Mr. Dubinsson, one of the witnesses and friends of Mr. Beaubien himself, page 51. All the evidence was to the effect that Mr. Beaubien had not put in any residence duties at all. Long after Arguin had been placed in possession of the land, some affidavits were put in by certain friends of Beaubien to cover his entry to the effect that the residence duties had been performed. They were merely general statements, nobody daring to give the dates or to say that Beaubien's wife had ever lived anywhere except in the town of Gravelbourg. In fact it was regarded as a joke in the town to say that Beaubien's family were living on the homestead, because they were not doing so. There is nothing at all in these affidavits except general statements to make a sort of cushion on which Beaubien might be let down.

After the evidence was taken, Mr. Cuttle made the only report he could, namely that Beaubien was in default. The first part of his letter to the department states who appeared as counsel and so on. Mr. Cuttle further says:

> While I am of the opinion that Mr. Beaubien has not performed bona fide residence duties for his pre-emption entry, I feel that, as Mr. Beaubien was protected until April 1 to go into residence, it should be taken into account the serious illness of his wife. The evidence is quite clear that Mr. Beaubien left with his wife for the Winnipeg hospital about March 24, and did not return to Gravelbourg until April 5, and while he was absent his land was cancelled. I am not prepared to say that Mr. Beaubien would have been in residence if his wife had not taken sick, but I think he should be given the benefit of the doubt.

If you are going to cancel a man's homestead in the West just because a former entrant who has held it for four years and has not done anything on it, happens to be in Winnipeg because his wife is undergoing an operation at the time that his last extension runs out, no man in the West will be able to feel sure of his entry. Mr. Beaubien swore in the evidence that he did not want the land himself, because he had lots of land. In his evidence on page 116 he said that he wanted it only for his son. Mr. Beaubien is a rich man. Mr. Cuttle, in a letter of his to the department trying to get the thing straightened out at an earlier stage of the game, said that Beaubien was a very influential man in the town of Gravelbourg. In another letter he says that the witnesses of Mr. Beaubien, are very influential. If that be true, it demonstrates the necessity of the minister protecting the poor man as against the rich man. If he be a butcher, a storekeeper or a man in any business—not the kind of person who would likely be a bona fide settler—the duty of the minister is all the more apparent. This reference of Mr. Cuttle to Mr. Beaubien being an influential man may be found on pages 29 and 30 of the return brought down by the minister.

The lawyer who defended Beaubien is a prominent Conservative. In the same rig they drove twenty-eight or thirty miles from Gravelbourg after the hearing was over. I wish to make no reflection upon my brother lawyer of the city of Moosejaw who acted as cousel, but I do say that the gentleman who acted as judge should have kept more to himself if he were desirous of listening only to the evidence. Mr. Cuttle's report was sent to the department and came before Mr. Cory, the deputy minister. I will say this for Mr. Cory: he recommended the confirming of Beaubien's entry only because Mr. Cuttle himself recommended it. He says in his memorandum:

> As Mr. Cuttle inquired personally into this matter, I think that he should be considered as being in a better position than any one else to judge of the respective merits of each claim and I beg, therefore to recommend that Beaubien's entry be confirmed.

The matter comes before the minister, and the minister, by putting 'O.K., W.J.R.' upon the files, drives Arguin off his quarter-section and gives the land to this Tory heeler Beaubien. That was a fatal thing for the minister to do; it was a great wrong. Mr. Cuttle himself says that Beaubien was not in good standing. Well, says the minister, if he is not in good standing, give the entry to his son. For nine years I have been giving most of my time to the service of my constituents, and I know something about homesteads. I know that a father cannot transfer his homestead to his son while there is application for cancellation against him; his entry must be in good standing before he can do so. If it were determined that this outlandish wrong should be done, the minister should have said to Beaubien: get into residence for thirty days; put yourself in good standing, and you can abandon the pre-emption in favour of your son. According to the evidence, Beaubien had not been in residence for many years; yet, with cancellation proceedings against him, he was allowed to abandon the quarter-section in favour of his son. If I had no other ground for argument, I would rest my case upon that point. In view of the fact that the man was in bad standing, if the minister would not give the land to the applicant for cancellation, the least he could do would be to protect the man until he got his land in good standing. The rules were absolutely violated when Mr. Arguin's application for cancellation was brushed aside and Mr. Beaubien's son given the homestead.

Either the minister has read this file and knows that what I say is true, or he has not. I do not believe the minister could read this evidence and come to the conclusion that the department was justified in cancelling Arguin's entry and putting Beaubien back on the land; I rather think that he never studied the files. But even though I take that charitable view of the matter, in view of the actions of the crowd of Tory heelers who are operating out West, I will have to give to the thousands of homesteaders whom I represent the message that no man is safe on his home on the prairie uness he appeases the desires of the Tory wolves who are trying to get his land. That statement I make on my responsibility as a member of this House. The only source of protection for the homesteader is the hon. minister, and if the minister fails to do his duty the homesteader will be left at the mercy of the unprincipled men who do such wrongs as those to which I have referred.

Mr. ROCHE: I have not before me the original file of the department in connection with this case; I got a copy of it as soon as the hon. member started to speak, and I have not, therefore, summed up the evidence. I did not think that a discussion of this kind would arise on a Bill to amend the Dominion Lands Act. This whole matter was gone into when the Estimates were up, and no doubt it will be taken up a third time when the Estimates are up again. I may say that I have had no reason to change the views which I expressed in my statement of the case when the hon. gentleman brought the matter up the first time.

Mr. KNOWLES: The investigation was held since.

Mr. ROCHE: Nothing that took place in connection with the investigation has changed my mind with regard to the recommendation originally made by the inspector of land agencies, which was confirmed by him after the holding of this sworn investigation.

Mr. Beaubien was in possession of this land for some years; he had a homestead and a pre-emption. He had his residence on the homestead and he discharged his duties, so far as cultivation is concerned, beyond question. The hon. gentleman himself does not deny that he more than carried out the provisions of the law, in order to prove up his patent. As a matter of fact he has brought into cultivation 115 acres, almost the entire quarter-section. There is a question as to whether he has lived up to the residential part of his duties, but one would imagine from the remarks of the hon. gentleman this afternoon that this case has no parallel in the history of the West. To my personal knowledge, in years gone by Liberals in my home town conducted their business and went out to their homesteads three or four nights a week in order to qualify for their patent. This kind of residence was passed upon and approved in countless instances by Liberal Ministers of the Interior.

Mr. KNOWLES: Was that under the present regulations, or under regulations which permitted it?

Mr. ROCHE: The regulations did not permit it at that time; it was not a question of the regulations being different from what they are to-day. In the West the manner in which Liberals were enabled to secure patents with practically no residence upon the land was a by-word among the people. Yet the hon. gentleman gets up and endeavours to make political capital against the minister and the Government because the gentleman in question conducted a business in the town, where a portion of his family resided, notwithstanding the fact that he performed his other homestead duties in a satisfactory manner. Were the Liberals in power I am sure that, having regard to the homestead duties which this man performed, he would, if of the required political faith, have at once been granted the patent. As a matter of fact, this gentleman had protection to the first day of April, in accordance with a general order which was issued last December. A great many bachelors who reside on their pre-emptions are desirous of going out during the cold winter months and earning something in the woods, and the greatest leniency has been extended to them by this Government during the last two or three years with a view to giving them an opportunity to go out during the winter to earn money which they may expend upon their lands when the period of protection has closed.

All homesteads were protected by order of the department up to the 1st of April. It is true that before the 1st of April this gentleman had to go to a Winnipeg hospital with his wife and during his absence overlooked the fact that he should have notified the land agent of the district that he was going to be absent. But, as a matter of fact, his own evidence shows that when he went to Winnipeg he expected to be back before the 1st of April.

Mr. KNOWLES: Where does the minister find that he was required to tell the agent that he was going away? The edict of the department was that he must be there in residence.

Mr. ROCHE: An order of protection is issued and if the homesteader is not able to go in residence at the time that the protection ceases he is supposed to give to the land agent the reasons why he could not go on the land, and if these reasons are looked upon by the agent as sufficient he is further protected. This gentleman was advised by his wife's physician in Winnipeg that if he stayed a few days longer his wife could return with him. He did so. During his absence this man Arguin stepped in and cancelled his homestead entry.

Mr. KNOWLES: No, he cancelled it a year and a half before, and in September all parties were told that it would be permanently cancelled on the 1st of April unless the man proved his residence. But your agent would not cancel it; he flim-flammed around and sent it to Ottawa again.

Mr. ROCHE: There is no flim-flamming about it. The hon. gentleman is carried away by his political bias and cannot lay the true facts before the House.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is not it; I have a little humanity.

Mr. ROCHE: This man returned and when he returned his place had been entered for during his absence. He therefore made application to have his entry reinstated and there was an investigation, not under oath, not a court case, held by Mr. Cuttle, who reported that as Beaubien had done so much and showed such evidence of being a bona fide homesteader by cultivating so much land, Beaubien should be reinstated under the circumstances, and accordingly his entry was reinstated. The hon. member for Moosejaw speaks about rumour stating that in some dark room in some place in the West this man Beaubien had a secret conference with myself and that I there pledged myself to restore his entry and that he had such a pull, to use the hon. member's own words, with the minister that no matter what defence was put in by Arguin he was going to get the land.

Mr. KNOWLES: I did not say rumour. I made the statement that this man or his friends saw the minister and interfered on behalf of Beaubien.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. member said, at night time, in some room, in secret. All of that is absolutely untrue because it was in Moosejaw that I saw the man. I went into Moosejaw early and left at two o'clock in the afternoon. I met many friends while I was there, a luncheon was tendered to me and after the luncheon, when I had only a few minutes to catch the train, Beaubien, with a deputation, saw me. I did not have five minutes conversation with them and I promised investigation; and on the strength of the telegram that the hon. gentleman himself sent here in my absence I asked that this entry should be held up until the investigation was made. Still the hon. member accuses me of political bias and says I would not extend him the ordinary courtesy of a reply. I held up Beaubien's entry and got some very severe letters in regard to it from Beaubien's friends because he fully expected that he was going to get his land, that he was justified after the report of the inspector of land agencies. The investigation has now been held at the instance of the hon. gentleman. I have not had time to go over all the evidence since coming into the House, although I have read it before. The hon. gentleman says there is not one tittle of evidence to show that a day's residence was performed.

Mr. KNOWLES: Bona fide residence, I make that statement.

Mr. ROCHE: And Arguin himself in his evidence, at page 35, when cross-questioned by the lawyer was asked:

> Would you say under oath that Beaubien never put in more than six or seven weeks on his homestead?
> A. Never had any knowledge that he done more.

This is the man who wanted the land, and in the face of that the hon. member gets up and says that there is not a tittle of evidence to show that Beaubien ever put in a single day of residence and Arguin himself says that not to his knowledge did he ever put in more than seven weeks.

Mr. KNOWLES. Would the minister hang a cat on that? In the first place, Arguin does not know what official residence is, he must have had his family there.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman is speaking about the evidence.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is not evidence. Arguin does not know what residence is and it is only a negative statement. He says: I do not know. He does not say that he stayed there seven weeks.

Mr. ROCHE: If the hon. gentleman is going to exclude a portion of this evidence that is not in accordance with his own views and state that is no evidence, it is no use arguing with a gentleman of that bias.

Mr. KNOWLES. The minister must not say that. I say that Arguin does not say that the man had stayed seven weeks. He said he did not stay more.

Mr. ROCHE: I think it is unworthy of the hon. member to try to hang his hat on such a peg. All of these parties, more than twelve of them, gave evidence to the effect that this gentleman had not put in any bona fide residence whatever, says the member for Moosejaw.

Mr. KNOWLES: I did not say that. I said that as far as I knew his home had been in Gravelbourg.

Mr. ROCHE: He is taking back now a good deal of what he stated. In fact I am afraid that when on his feet the hon. member really states things that in his calmer moments he would regret. Some of these witnesses, when cross questioned, admitted that they could not swear whether this man had been on his farm or not. One of the gentlemen referred is Levasseur. This was his total examination:

Q. You are living on a farm, Mr. Levasseur?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How far from Beaubien's place?
A. Two miles.
Q. Do you remember Mr. Beaubien being in residence there since 1910?
A. I used to stay home and he lived two miles from me.
Q. Had you occasion to go by the place?
A. No.
Q. Then you could not tell me whether he lived there or not?
A. No.

That is the total examination of one of the witnesses for Arguin and still the hon. member quotes this man as one of the witnesses to bear out the statement of Arguin in regard to Beaubien's residence. From the evidence of other witnesses I could quote much the same all the way through if I wanted to take up the time of the House, but I think I have quoted sufficient to impress at least the fair minded members that the hon. gentleman exceeded his duties entirely in drawing upon his imagination rather than relying on the facts as stated in this report of the investigation. He states that the deputy minister really approved of this and recommended it because it was recommended by Cuttle, the inspector of agencies, who conducted the investigation, was on the ground and was in a better position to judge than we are here. I do not desire to screen myself behind any officials of the department. I realize my responsibility as head of the department; but, at the same time not knowing the details myself, having had an investigation conducted by a gentleman in whose impartiality honour and integrity I have every confidence, notwithstanding the scurrilous names applied to him by the hon. member for Moosejaw to-day in a manner that was unworthy of the hon. gentleman, when the deputy minister coincided in the view of the commissioner that no matter what doubt there might be as to the completeness of Beaubien's residence under the circumstances it would be a shame—that in effect is their report—to drive Beaubien from the land, I concurred in that decision.

I notice that he tried to make a point by stating that this cold-hearted man had driven Arguin, with his wife and family, out on the concession lines. Now, Arguin's own residence, where he had been living all the time previous to going over to Beaubien's farm, was only on the adjoining quarter-section, so he had not far to go to reach his home. As soon as Beaubien went away Arguin seized the opportunity, left his own home on the adjoining quarter-section, and moved over to Beaubien's, though the land laws did not require him to do so. Residence on the adjoining quarter-section was all that was necessary in order to secure a patent for this pre-emption, but in order to qualify a little more strongly, he moved over to Beaubien's pre-emption. When Arguin was turned out, as the hon. member states he was, he was at perfect liberty to go into residence on his own farm as heretofore. Mr. Beaubien had upwards of 115 acres under cultivation, and, having given the evidence he had as to the reasons for his absence, the department considered that sufficient to reinstate him in his entry, which they accordingly did; and I do not think any impartial member in this House or anybody in the country would condemn the Government for restoring that entry after all that cultivation had been done, and after he had performed his duties as to fencing and residence—although perhaps he did not live on the homestead all the time with his family; he did not say he did so. Although the hon. gentleman stated that there was not a tittle of evidence as to this man's bona fide residence, he afterwards referred to the fact that Beaubien had sworn that he was in residence, and the hon. member said that Beaubien's evidence was false; in other words, that it meant nothing at all. There were other affidavits sent in, prior to this investigation, by friends of Beaubien—gentlemen of repute in Gravelbourg who went to prove that Beaubien was in actual residence on his land. The hon. gentleman ignores that, but the department cannot afford to ignore it. Certainly somebody has been telling an untruth, but at any rate a great many of those witnesses on whom the hon. gentleman is relying, when cross-examined, could not swear that Beaubien did not reside on his farm, and in view of that we thought —and thought justly—that Beaubien's entry should be restored. I do not think our action has created any irritation in that part of the country except perhaps amongst some hard-headed Liberal friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. The general public, so far as my knowledge goes, believe that the man who should be in possession of the land is now in possession of it. The hon. member also made a point about Beaubien's handing the land over to his son. That is not at all contrary to the land laws. When Beaubien's entry was restored, the effect of that was to terminate the cancellation proceedings. His entry was in good standing, and he had a perfect right to transfer it to his son who was about to leave for Montana to take up land. He naturally desired to keep his son in the neighbourhood, and therefore transferred his land to him. That is a matter of almost every-day occurrence, and is quite in accordance with the regulations of the department. It is something that I think should be encouraged. When a father has sufficient land of his own to set up his sons, I do not see any harm in his doing that. I do not wish to take up the time of the House in dealing with this matter any further because, after all, I realize that it is not a case that should be discussed here on amendments to the Land Act. Grievances like this should be brought up when we are in Supply. This grievance was aired on one occasion when my Estimates were before the House, and I think the hon. gentleman might have waited till the Estimates came up again, and not have blocked the passing of legislation that is bound to be—at least I think so—in the interests of the western farmers. Other statements have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Medicine Hat spoke about receiving petitions to the effect that the holders of pre-emptions desired to get their land absolutely free like their homesteads. A number of those petitions came into the department, also petitions of quite a different character. As I stated when I moved the second reading of this Bill the other evening, representations of various kinds have been made to me. One proposal was to refund the interest that had been paid. It is an involved question and a very important one, and after giving it my very best consideration, I came to the conclusion that the Government could not come down to Parliament and ask for the refunding of this money, paid in whole or in part, which would run up to over $2,000,000. I thought that was an unreasonable request, and, under the circumstances, I thought the best I could do would be to recommend that the three years' interest should for the future be thrown off. That was the first request made to me by the holders of pre-emptions when I was out in the West last summer; but their requests have gradually become more drastic in character, I came to the conclusion that inasmuch as a man could qualify for his homestead at the end of three years, and while the present law provides that he shall be charged interest on his pre-emption for the first three years—though he is not allowed to pay any portion of interest or principal—that it was only right that the farmers should be relieved of interest during those three years. The member for Medicine Hat, I understand, was in favour of shortening up the time within which pre-emption patents could be secured. That is another request that has been made to the department, and I have endeavoured to meet the wishes of those who were desirous of getting their pre-emption patents at the same time as the homestead patents. I know the hardships they are labouring under out there. It may have been a questionable proceeding to have ever instituted this pre-emption area; in fact, a great many people now resident in the West say that it was a mistake to have ever allowed pre emptions. Much of that land is not fit for cultivation. In some portions—perhaps a limited area—once the sod is turned up you cannot get even grass to grow. It is only fit for ranching, and I think that land like that should never have been thrown open for pre-emptions. I agree with the farmers who take exception to the large pre-emption area which has been created, by reason of the fact that much of that land has been represented to me as not fit for cultivation at all, and as only suitable for grazing. It would be no use imposing additional cultivation on those farmers, as the hon. member for Medicine Hat suggested. Before they get the pre-emption patent they have to cultivate fifty acres more than in the case of a homestead. This Bill provides that they may prove up for their pre-emptions at the end of three years, or as soon thereafter as they can pay for the pre-emption (less the interest, for the three years), and have done the necessary residential and cultivation duties. I think that is as long a step as we can take at the present time. The hon. gentleman also quoted from a letter which he received from a gentleman who took exception to shortening up the time in which they could prove up. This gentleman insisted on a longer residence as otherwise the land holders were likely to return to the United States. I do not think there is any likelihood of that. We have to compete just now with the United States land laws, which have recently been considerably relaxed. They are striving to get our people over there by allowing them what they call 'enlarged' homesteads of 320 acres, whereas formerly only 160 acres were allowed. They are also stipulating for three years' residence instead of five, as formerly. I think I am therefore justified in bringing in this Bill to relax the existing regulations in our pre-emption area. Far from having received complaints in regard to this Bill, I have received numerous letters quite to the contrary. Far from complaints coming to the department regarding this proposed Bill, I have received numerous letters to the contrary. One enthusiastic pre-emption holder has written to me that after perusing the provisions of the Bill he would not want one word changed. He said that it was suitable to the holders of pre-emptions in the West. There may be differences of opinion and there may be petitions as the hon. gentleman states, but on the whole I think that the Bill will give fairly general satisfaction. In regard to what the hon. member from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has stated about the desirability of changing our land laws to meet the changed conditions, all I have to say is that I agree with him and that is the reason I am introducing this Bill, but when he answered the very cogent question put to him by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) as to how he explained the falling off in the number of homestead entries from 1906 to 1908, I did not take very much stock in the explanation that he gave, namely, that it was by reason of the fact of one man being allowed to blanket a number of entries. From 1902 to 1903 the entries dropped by 5,000. I am sure that my hon. friend from Edmonton would be the last to claim that this decline was due to the actions of the Government of those days. In two years' time, between 1906 and 1908 the number of homestead entries fell off more than they have fallen off in the last two years. They fell off to the extent of 11,450. I do not attribute it to the blanketing process which my hon. friend states was in existence for some years. But I rather attribute it, and I am charitable enough to give the late Government the benefit of this opinion, to the very same considerations that have caused the homestead entries to fall off in the last two years. In times of financial stringency, we have a lessening of business credit and activity, of necessity agricultural developments will be held in check, just the same as industrial development, and during those two years there were some 10,000 less homestead entries than there were in 1911. History is repeating itself. How do those conditions differ from those of 1906 to 1908? At that time there was, as I have said, a considerable falling off in the number of homestead entries. The falling off in the last two years is not due to any inherent policy on the part of the present Government because there has not been any departure with regard to the land laws up to the present time. The people of Europe, the British Isles and on the American side of the boundary are not aware of any terrorizing process that may have been going on here before they have come to the country to make their homestead entries. It is useless to attribute to the homestead inspectors or to any officials of the Department of the Interior the falling off in the number of homestead entries.

I am not going to enter into any acrimonious political discussion in regard to the various actions of the homestead and other inspectors of the Government in connection with elections, but I desire to give my personal experience of the officials of the late Government and I do not know that conditions differed from those which were found in my own constituency. Well do I remember that I was contesting my seat against the Liberal homestead inspector who had resigned his position shortly before nomination day in order to contest the seat against me and he used his position in the interval to secure the political support at a certain poll of a large section of foreigners who did not know the law of the land and who were terrorized into casting their votes in favour of my opponent. A homestead inspector was there and he herded these foreigners in a room where a supporter of mine heard everything that took place and this inspector told them that if they desired to get their patents for their homesteads they would have to vote for my political opponent. They lined up next day under the auspices of this homestead inspector who was at the poll, assisted by a gentleman sent out by the Immigration Department from Winnipeg. This latter gentleman was not allowed at the poll because he went out on the train on Saturday. A warrant was out for his arrest for bribery in another constituency and a policeman was sent to escort him back to the city of Winnipeg.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, that is right: they found him on Sunday morning as he was starting out to do his peculiar work. He was arrested and it transpired that he had $600 in two-dollar bills in his pocket. The remark he made to the policeman who arrested him was: 'fifteen minutes more, and I would have been in the bush and you would never have found me.' This was the man who was utilizing his position to terrorize the foreign element, who had just come to the country, and who were not acquainted with our laws.

Mr. OLIVER: Was he terrorizing them with two-dollar bills?

Mr. ROCHE: He did not get a chance, because the officers took the money from him and kept it under lock and key until after election day. He did not have time to get it in circulation.

Mr. OLIVER: Was he scaring them badly?

Mr. ROCHE: No, they were not scared by that. But it showed the estimate placed on the purchasable vote when they divided this money up into two-dollar bills. There was another gentleman, a mounted policeman, sent out from the city of Regina. I am sorry that the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is not in his place. That right hon. gentleman, when the fact was brought to his attention, denied that there were any mounted policemen in connection with the Department of the Interior, but I proved to his own satisfaction that there were certain mounted policemen associated with the forestry branch of the Department of the Interior. This gentleman, who was sent out by the then Minister of the Interior, took his position at the door of the polling booth, wearing his side arms in order to terrorize the people who had come from countries where compulsory military service was in vogue, and to convince them that if they did not vote against myself there would be military conscription in this country.

After the arrest on Sunday in Winnipeg of the gentleman to whom I have referred, a telegram was sent on Monday to the Yorkton office and another interpreter came down to take the place of the man who had been taken into custody. He stood at the door of the poll with two other officials of the Government, and by reason of the efforts of these Government officials the result of the vote cast in that one poll was 112 for my opponent and eight for your humble servant. I give this as an instance, not to justify anything that might be wrong in connection with the officials of the present Government, but to show how badly it comes from a member of the late Government to accuse the homestead inspectors and officials of the Government of terrorizing the people in the West. Terrorism—they do not know the meaning of the term.

Mr. KNOWLES: They are learning it.

Mr. ROCHE: I hope they do learn it in some respects, at any rate, not that I admit that there is any terrorizing done. The gentlemen who have been accused of terrorizing have no reason to claim that they have not been informed as to what their duties are. I have pointed out to them their duties, and I have told them that the department will not tolerate any activity in elections. At the same time, I think it is only fair to say, that the charges which have been made on the floor of this House have been refuted by these men. I do not mean to take up the time of the House in order to go any more lengthily into that phase of the question, but I just wish to say a word in regard to the charges which are being made about the departure from the past policy. There is a departure from the past policy but it is a departure for the better. The homestead inspectors are doing their duty and they are making thousands and thousands more inspections than were made by the homestead inspectors when the Liberals were in power.

Mr. KNOWLES: Not at election times.

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, at all times.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the minister ever read their diaries?

Mr. ROCHE: No, I have not read their diaries, but I have read the reports of their inspections. They state that there are so many demands in connection with proving on homesteads that there are not sufficient homestead inspectors to keep up with the work.

In reply to the remarks of my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Aikins) about water-powers, I may tell him that I realize the importance of that branch of the department. There is a very great deal of force indeed in what the hon. gentleman has stated. The Winnipeg river is a river of vast water-powers, and it is the intention of the Government to conserve them. The hon. gentleman may have been a little misled in regard to the water-powers that still remain vested in the Crown. My information from the head official of that branch is that at least fifty per cent of the available water-powers on that river are still vested in the Crown, and those that were alienated were not alienated by this Government, but by the preceding Government. It is a question as to whether we are prepared to go in for Government ownership and operation of water-powers. I do not know whether we are that far advanced; I do not think we are at the present time, but I can see the propriety and the wisdom of conserving these powers and not allowing them to get into private hands for exploitation. I can assure hon. gentlemen that at the present time all the powers on the Winnipeg river are reserved and will not be disposed of. There have of course been applications from private capitalists for these water-powers, with stipulations that they would erect pulp mills of large capacity on that river. But, after consulting Judge Robson, the Utility Commissioner for Manitoba appointed by the provincial Government, who is opposed to the alienation of any of these water-powers, I thought it wise to carry out his recommendation.

I trust that this Bill shall receive the sympathetic consideration of hon. gentlemen. I do not wish to encourage any debate that would lead us away from the due consideration of its various provisions, but I felt called upon to defend myself when such serious accusations were made against the management of the department as were made this afternoon.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before the House rose at six o'clock my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior had replied to some extent to the arguments which I had made with regard to the Gravelbourg homestead. The minister then proceeded to discuss the general merits of his Bill, and I had not an opportunity to reply before these other remarks had intervened. I had purposely refrained from taking up the time of the committee in the way of quoting evidence; but my hon. friend the minister went out of his way to quote some of the evidence, and I do not propose to allow it to stand as he has put it, namely: that the evidence has failed to establish what I have stated. Therefore I purpose putting on 'Hansard' a few references and exact quotations from the evidence to show that what I have said is correct.

My hon. friend in the first place referred to the witness who said that he could not swear that Mr. Beaubien was not on his homestead at any certain date. The weakness of my hon. friend's case is manifest in such an argument because it is impossible to establish a negative of this kind. The witness in question, whose name is Levasseur, was able to say only that he had lived in Gravelbourg, and that Mr. Beaubien lived there also. On cross-examination he, of course, could not state any certain date on which he was in Gravelbourg, and he could not swear to any certain date on which Beaubien was not on the homestead. All that he could do, and all that any of these witnesses could do, was to establish that the home of Mr. Beaubien and his family was in Gravelbourg during the years to which I have referred. On page 4 of the evidence, in the examination of this same witness, there appear the following question and answer:

Q. As far as you know, he lived there?
A. Yes sir, in the village.

No man living can prove that any one is in default in his homestead duties if he has to give the day and the date; but reputable citizens swore that Mr. Beaubien, to their certain knowledge, had his permanent home in the town.

Mr. HENDERSON: I submit that the hon. gentleman is not speaking to the question before the House. He is entirely out of order, and we may as well proceed to discuss this Bill. We might keep on all night discussing matters that are not relevant, and I think it would be just as well if you, Sir, would hold the hon. gentleman down to the question before the House.

The CHAIRMAN: I hope the hon. member for Moosejaw will confine his remarks as much as possible to the Bill.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: The point of order is very badly taken at this moment. Possibly it would have been a good time to take it when my hon. friend originally introduced the question; but, the question having been introduced and discussed very fully by my hon. friend from Moosejaw, and having been replied to equally fully by the Minister of the Interior, it seems to me that the point of order is taken a little tardily, to say the least. My hon. friend is a little slow in his movements.

Mr. HENDERSON: The hon. member from Moosejaw having discussed the question so fully and the minister having replied, our duty is to proceed with the discussion of the Bill. I am not asking that any privileges be taken away from the hon. member for Moosejaw or from the hon. Minister of the Interior. They have both had their say. I rather think the point raised by my hon. friend from Red Deer is not well taken.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I am perfectly sure my hon. friend from Halton will be as dispassionate as myself in a desire to arrive at correct conclusions. I wish to submit to his extremely lucid and impartial intellect the statement that the hon. member from Moosejaw is at present engaged in stating that the hon. Minister of the Interior has quoted parts of certain evidence. The hon. member for Moosejaw goes on to state that other parts of the evidence, not quoted by the Minister of the Interior, go to contradict the parts of the evidence that have been quoted by the Minister of the Interior. I submit to my hon. friend from Halton the consideration that he and I, having this desire to bring a lucid and dispassionate consideration to the full evidence, are bound to allow my hon. friend from Moosejaw to quote the evidence which he says absolutely refutes and disproves the evidence already quoted by the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. HENDERSON: And neither had anything to do with the question.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is it possible to discuss the point of order without permission from the Chair?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Always in order, I understand.

The CHAIRMAN: I think it is always in order for any member to rise to a point of order, and discussion is allowed.

Mr. KNOWLES: When I first rose, I intended to refer to a few portions of the evidence, but now I intend to refer to more of it. If my hon. friend from Halton wastes much more of my time, I will perhaps read the whole business.

Mr. HENDERSON: I rise to a point of order. I certainly was not wasting the time of the hon. member for Moosejaw. I rose to a question that I had a perfect right to rise to, and my hon. friend has no right to charge me with interfering with his time. The fact of the matter is that he is interfering with the time of the House.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a point of order. There is no point of order before the House. I have the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON: I rose to a point of order on account of the reference that the hon. member for Moosejaw made to myself. When I get through with that, then the hon. member will have the floor. I did not understand, Mr. Chairman, that you had decided that the hon. member for Moosejaw could discuss whether the moon was made of green cheese or any other question outside of that before the House. I submit that the hon. member should confine himself to the question and that you, Sir, should ask him to do so.

The CHAIRMAN: I have already asked the hon. member for Moosejaw to confine his remarks to the Bill. I hope that the hon. gentlemen taking part in this discussion will assist the Chair in keeping order and expediting business.

Mr. KNOWLES: I take your request in all kindness, Mr. Chairman, but I do not think it is needed. The first reference which I wish to make is to page 15 of the evidence, where Mr. Dureault distinctly says that Mr. Beaubien's residence was in Gravelbourg. I quote the following from Mr. Dureault's evidence:

Q. You are acquainted with Mr. J. N. Beaubien?—A. Yes.
Q. Where does he live?—A. In town.
Q. The town of Gravelbourg?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Does he live in the town of Gravelbourg with his family?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. How many years have you been carrying on a business in the town of Gravelbourg? A. Two years in May.
Q. During the time you have carried on your business in Gravelbourg was Mr. Beaubien also carrying on business?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. During all the time?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. His family resided with him in town?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Can you see from your own place the house or place of business of Mr. Beaubien? —A. Yes, sir.

This merchant, who lived just across the street, testified that Mr. Beaubien carried on business in Gravelbourg and that he lived there with his family. On page 20 the following evidence is given by Mr. Gray manager of the Union Bank of Canada at Gravelbourg:

Q. You are manager of the Union bank in Gravelbourg?—A. Yes.
Q. How long have you been there?—A. Three years—going on three years.

Turning to page 22 we find the following:

Q. She has been residing there ever since you have been in Gravelbourg?—A. That I cannot say. To the best of my knowledge and belief they have.

In a small place like Gravelbourg everybody knows where everybody else lives, and this evidence that to the best of the witness's knowledge and belief Mrs. Beaubien had been doing business there is sufficiently conclusive.

On page 30 Mr. McKay, manager of the Bank of Toronto, gives the following evidence:

Q. You know Mrs. Beaubien and the children?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. And you lived just across the street?—A Yes, sir.
Q. And you are in a position to say that while you were in Gravelbourg Mr. Beaubien and his family lived just across the street?—Yes, sir.

The evidence of Mr. Hamlin, Government telegraph operator, employed by the Department of Public Works, may be found on page 33. I quote the following:

Q. How long have you been here?—A. I have been here three years at the end of this month or at the end of May.
Q. During that time he kept a boarding house in Gravelbourg—any other business?—A. A store and a butcher shop.
Q. During all that time were you boarding at his place?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who was the housekeeper and who looked after the table?—A. Mr. Beaubien's daughters and Mrs. Beaubien, as far as I know.
Q. Mr. Beaubien and his family lived in the village at the boarding house?—A. As far as I know, yes sir.

This is the evidence of a telegraph operator who boarded at that very house, and had been in Gravelbourg for three years. My hon. friend endeavoured to produce as evidence of Mr. Beaubien's having been in residence the fact that one of his witnesses would not swear that for three years he had not resided seven weeks each year on his homestead. The minister can produce no other case where such residence has been regarded as sufficient. I did not say that there was evidence that Beaubien had never lived on his homestead; I did say that there was no evidence of his bona fide residence upon it. A bona fide homesteader is one who lives on the homestead with his wife and children. The facts are so indisputably uncontradicted that the efforts of Beaubien to prove that he did live upon the land with his wife and family show that he is a falsifier. I repeat what I have already said: that the minister gave the homestead to a man who could not show that he was entitled to it, and in so doing he committed a great injustice.

The minister dwelt upon the fact that Arguin resided on the quarter-section. He went there because he had so little faith in the minister's officers that he wanted to establish his position beyond peradventure and to get into residence on the quarter-section. Time after time, in writing to the minister, Arguin said that it was doubtful whether he would be able to secure a square deal, and that he was afraid that there would be false reports. Such a report was made by a man named Erratt. Let me say, in passing, that Mr. Cuttle never called on Beaubien to give a single bit of evidence; Beaubien himself had to be called by Arguin. The whole burden of proving the negative was put upon Arguin, and, even with that burden, the merits of the case are entirely on his side. At page 102 Mr. Beaubien is asked:

Q. Do you know Mr. W. H. Erratt who used to be homestead inspector?
A. Yes, I know him, I remember him.
Q. Did you go to your land with him?
A. Yes, I came up from Moosejaw with him.

The fact is that he went to Moosejaw, got the homestead inspector and brought him to the homestead to make this partisan report. The inspector who, at the beck and call of political tools, drives 80 miles to a homestead for the purpose of doing special inspection work, and then reports, the evidence to the contrary notwithstanding, that the man has been in residence; that inspector is neglecting his legitimate duties and subjecting himself to the undue influence of the person for whom he makes such a report. This condition of affairs, on the face of it, is indicative of improper relationship between this politcal tool and the homestead inspector. If the former Minister of the Interior, the hon. member for Edmonton, had been in office and this matter had come to his knowledge, the homestead inspector would have had a very short shrift for his position.

Mr. McKAY: At the time of the taking of the evidence from which my hon. friend is quoting, who was in possession?

Mr. KNOWLES: Arguin.

Mr. CURRIE: Beaubien owned the land in the first place, as I understand it, and this man Arguin was what they call a claim jumper. I have been in camps where he would have been shot on sight for jumping another man's property.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friend has yet a great deal to learn. What he calls claim jumpers are among our best citizens.

Mr. CURRIE: I have no doubt about that.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not think the minister will contradict me when I say that one-half of our homesteaders are claim jumpers. I think that is correct that they have entered for homestead which they have secured in the same way as Arguin has secured this by applying to have cancellation proceedings commenced. Tens of thousands of the best citizens we have, and my hon. friend, without knowing anything about it, goes out of his way to cast a slur on them.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. CURRIE: The only case of this kind that came to my notice was that of a gentleman who was taken ill with typhoid and his wife took him to the hospital. The time expired while he was in the hospital, and they lost the house and farm and the labour of years. I consider that if such a law is relaxed a little in case of sickness or disability to be on the land, there is nothing wrong with it; but I have not much use for a man who has lots of property for himself and a homestead of his own who tries to jump another man's claim.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friend should not be so harsh on this man, because he does not know much about it. My hon. friend is quite at sea in the matter.

Mr. CURRIE: I am looking at the ethical side of it.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friend will take my word for it that he is wrong. In conclusion, I would call attention to the fact that there was an improper relationship between Erratt and Beaubien. I think the minister will agree that when we were able to establish out of the mouth of Beaubien himself that he went in to Moosejaw and brought out the homestead inspector, we have established a prima facie case for suspicion. The minister argues that because Beaubien was cancelled and Arguin entered and then Arguin cancelled and Beaubien restored, that wiped out and abandoned the cancellation proceedings. The minister should be careful in what he says. Will he lay it down as a departmental ruling that an application for cancellation is to be removed because it has been successful and then its success has been taken away from the man? Will he lay it down as a departmental ruling that I can get my homestead in good standing by allowing cancellation to go through and then have the cancellation withdrawn, and that I will then be better off than I was before? The minister cannot mean that. If there was a new entry and another $10 paid, it might be a different matter. Surely all that was done was that Arguin was cancelled and there was a restoration to the original condition of affairs. I cannot believe the minister is serious in saying that in restoring Beaubien there was, ipso facto, an abandonment of the cancellation proceedings. If that is so, if things were restored to their former conditions, then the cancellation proceedings were outstanding against Beaubien until he put himself in good standing by doing at least thirty days' residence, and according to the law of Canada he could not be allowed to abandon in favour of his son. There is no need to labour that point, it is too clear. Somebody has slipped there in his anxiety to help out Beaubien the better and put this poor fellow on the street, and has overlooked the fact that all the restoration did was to restore things to their former position. The Postmaster General was not here when I stated that Beaubien said he saw him about this matter in Moosejaw last summer. Does the minister remember seeing a man named Beaubien who spoke about a homestead this summer?

Mr. PELLETIER: Put your question in writing and I will think over it.

Mr. KNOWLES: I dare say he did see the minister. I do not know whether he came to Ottawa and saw the Prime Minister or not, but he seems to have looked after the Cabinet pretty well. I do not say it is because of that fact, but the result is that the man has the land. Let me tell the minister that his administration has become in very bad odour out there. I have not said anything against Cuttle other than what I find in this file. The minister has brought out a great many general charges about Liberals. In the first place that has nothing to do with this matter and he has not the record. I have the record here for what I have to say and it is this we are concerned with. The minister is asking us to change his Dominion Lands Act and we want, before we entrust him with other powers and a new condition of affairs, to tell him what we think of his management of western lands under the present law. There is a growing want of confidence in the honesty and integrity of the administration of the lands in the West. The minister has had homestead inspectors who were a disgrace to the department. He has had to fire many of them. He has had land agents whom he has had to fire because they played the game too coarsely. Do not let him think that I am talking about something that does not exist. I have 130,000 or 140,000 constituents. I say that I believe on my soul their ownership of their homesteads is not safe and that they are not getting a square deal in the homestead office at Moosejaw. I made my charge against Beaubien and I proved it and I may have more definite charges to make about officials in the land office and how good money looks to them before I am through. If the minister thinks that everything is going on well in the West he is in a fool's paradise. The people do not think it. The homestead inspectors are not doing their work. We have one man there who was appointed homestead inspector. He hung around for a while and then they wanted him to do some work. He said: why, I worked before the elections, you do not expect me to work now do you? By and by he quit because they insisted on his doing some work. The people are not getting any service at all. When I read to the minister the diaries of men who go for ten days without doing anything he must know that they are not doing their work. I have here a letter from a poor fellow who has been trying to get $160 refunded on his improvements. Such a refund would be everything to him, more than $50,000 to the minister. He has applied for an order to get the money, the minister's instructions have been out for nearly a year to get the homestead inspector to make a report on these improvements so that the man could get the money. I put the question on the Order Paper: When was an inspection ordered? The answer was that it was ordered on the 5th of April, 1913, and on the 23rd of April of this year there had been no inspection. Question No. 5 was: Has the homestead inspector's report been received? The minister's answer was:

A. No. The land is situated north of the south Saskatchewan river and the homestead inspector recently explained that on account of weather and the state of the roads it has been practically impossible to do any work in that country for some time, but that he would make his report as soon after first of the month as weather and roads would permit.

On the same file in regard to the same man there are three letters signed by the minister. Here is one last summer saying: I am writing to have the inspector make a report. The inspectors treat the minister like a nonentity, saying that the weather is bad and the roads are bad. They reply to the minister: when we get good roads we will go and inspect. The man wrote finally to the minister and got a reply on the 27th of October. He was honoured with an autograph signature of the minister.

My dear Sir,—I am in receipt of your letter of the 15th instant, with regard to the improvements placed by you on the S.W. ¼ of 3,23,12, W. 3rd meridian, when you held entry for the same.

In reply I beg to say that instructions were given on the 3rd instant, to have a homestead inspector make a careful valuation of the improvements placed on this land by you, and in view of your recent communication, further instructions have now been given to have this valuation made at the earliest possible date. As soon as the inspector's report is received you will be further advised.

Yours faithfully,
W. J. ROCHE.

I must say to the credit of the minister that his mistake as to the date mentioned in this letter was unintentional. The minister states that instructions were given on the 3rd inst. What he should have said was that instructions were given several months ago; they were given away back in May, nearly six months before he wrote this letter. I come to another letter dated January 23, 1914—no homestead inspector's report yet.

My dear Sir,—I am in receipt of your letter of the 15th instant, with regard to the south west ¼ of section 3, township 23, range 12, west of the 3rd meridian.

In reply, I regret very much that you have suffered any inconvenience on account of the delay in the department in dealing with this case, but I may assure you that most explicit instructions have been given to have the homestead inspector make the required report at once, and also that the report is to be forwarded here as soon as made. When this report is received in the department your request will be dealt with as promptly as possible, and you will be fully advised as to what action the department can take.

Yours faithfully,
W. J. Roche.

H. R. McVeigh, Esq.,
Outlook, Sask.

Is it not remarkable that any member of the Government can wait as calmly in his office at Ottawa as the minister did from October till the 23rd of January of the following year, after having given explicit instructions for a report to be made at once? But that was not all. This man wrote and re-wrote, and on February 10 the minister sent him the following letter:

My dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 3rd instant, in which you point out that you have not been advised of the decision of the department in regard to the south west ¼ of section 3, township 3, range 12, west of the 3rd Meridian.

In reply, I beg to inform you that the homestead inspector's report has not as yet been received. I am wiring the agent to have the matter attended to at once.

Yours faithfully,
W. J. Roche.

Is not that a funny way to serve the people of Canada? After reading all the pathetic letters this man wrote, the minister's heart was touched, and he sent him $50 to keep him from starving, although the man was entitled to $145 or $165, I forget which. Fancy a minister of the Crown taking such disobedience from his Homestead Inspector, and writing such letters saying 'I assure you I have given explicit instructions,' etc. The minister might just as well have written: I am doing the best I can, but the homestead inspector tells me to go plumb to the mischief; for that is what it amounts to. Imagine a homestead inspector saying to the minister: When the weather is pleasant and the roads are nice I will go out and make the report, but till then you can hold your horses. It is time the minister put his foot down and let his homestead inspectors know he is boss; let them realize that they are there to do their work honestly and not for political purposes; that their duty is to serve the men that are making that country and Canada —not the men on the patronage list or friends of the Government, but the man behind the pair of oxen breaking up the sod on the homestead; and that they are not appointed to send back silly answers to the minister, after a year has gone by, that when the weather is pleasant and the roads are nice they will make a report. I care not how honest the minister may be in his own mind, he must take the responsibility, and my message to my constituents is that they have very little to hope for from the minister and the Government of Canada, and from the lazy political heelers landed in those Government jobs in Saskatchewan.

Mr. OLIVER: I just want to speak for a minute or two along the line my hon. friend from Moosejaw has taken. I have made the statement that the administration of the Department of the Interior is not conducive to the development of the country, and I just want to give one instance. Hitherto the practice has been to sell land which has been withdrawn from reservation by auction after public notice. This case relates to the southeast quarter of 16-25-5-W., 5th meridian, which is just a little west of Calgary. I will give a brief sketch of the return which was brought down relating to that piece of land. On April 21, 1902, C. E. Sibbald applied to enter for this land. He was informed that the land was under reservation as a water reserve. Some years passed, and finally the country around was fairly well settled. During the late Administration there were several applications for entry for this particular section. On January 15, 1908. Mr. J. A. W. Fraser was informed by myself, when he applied for homestead rights, that the land would have to be sold by auction. On January 24, 1908, Mr.

Pereira wrote another applicant, called McDougal, that the land when withdrawn would be sold by auction. On July 15, 1911, an order was issued by the department to have the land inspected for withdrawal. Apparently the inspector did not make the inspection, and on April 9, 1912—when this Government was in power—Mr. Pereira repeated the order for inspection, and said that Fraser was pressing for an answer. On April 15, 1912, Charles Grayson, a homestead inspector, recommended withdrawal; and on May 10, 1912, Pereira writes Fraser, the latest applicant, that the land when withdrawn would be sold by auction. On November 16, 1912, F. Nelson, for the department, writes the Dominion Lands agent at Calgary ordering an inspection for valuation. On December 26, 1912, Inspector W. Tempany reports that the land is worth $5 an acre. On February 19, 1913, Mr. N. O. Coté writes Fraser giving authority to purchase at $5 an acre; one-quarter down, balance in three equal annual instalments. That is a case, if the value of the land were the same, on all fours with the Donaldson homestead. The land was under reservation. The practice of the department, and the regulations, require that whenever land is withdrawn from the reservation it should be offered for sale at public auction—the reason being obvious. If the land is under reservation nobody has the opportunity to acquire it; when it is withdrawn, everybody should have an equal opportunity to acquire it. However, Fraser was able to make interest with the department just as Mr. Donaldson was, and the land was withdrawn and sold to him at a valuation. His neighbours were just as much entitled to the opportunity of acquiring this land as he was, but they were cut out from that opportunity, and, as I say, that is altogether contrary to the former practice of the department and is an entirely improper practice. A similar instance occurred in the town of Gimli on lake Winnipeg. A piece of land was under reservation there for many years, and finally—I think it was within the past year—it was withdrawn and sold at a valuation to the then mayor of the town. It is useless to suggest that this is done in a fair spirit, or that it is giving every one a fair chance. It is just a matter of political favouritism. When the idea of political favouritism dominates the administration of the department a condition is created that is detrimental to the well-being of the settler of the western country and of all Canada.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman, who has been a Minister of the Crown himself, knows how unusual it is to bring up cases of this nature when a Bill is before the House. It is impossible for any minister to have his memory charged with all the information in reference to these cases of which he gets no notice whatever. He knows that it has been the practice, when Estimates are up, to bring up anything of this nature and discuss it and he also knows that it has not been the practice to bring up these matters on a public Bill which is engaging the attention of the House. I am quite well aware of the fact that stock-watering reserves, when they are withdrawn, when they are no longer required for stock-watering purposes, are offered for sale at auction. There is no regulation to that effect but that has been the practice and, I may say, a practice which was departed from by the hon. gentleman himself when he was the minister. One or two cases were presented to me during the hon. gentleman's administration in which he departed from that practice. I do not know about these cases to which he has called my attention. I could not say from recollection whether they have been brought to my notice or not. Very likely they were disposed of by the department, as other cases are disposed of. I do not know whether they occurred while I was minister, but I cannot be expected to have my memory charged with the details of everything that has taken place in a vast department like the Department of the Interior. I shall be glad to inform myself on this subject and give all the information possible at the proper time.

Mr. OLIVER: I was not bringing the question before the House for the purpose of obtaining a reconsideration of the matter. I made a broad, general statement in regard to the administration of the Act and I thought it due to the House and to the minister that I should give absolute evidence of the facts as I stated them. I am not bringing it up for the purpose of getting a readjustment. I am bringing it up to establish the point that the administration is an administration of political favouritism and not an administration in the interests of the settler or the people.

Mr. BRADBURY: If the hon. gentleman has been so guilty himself such a statement surely comes with bad grace from him.

Mr. OLIVER: I was minister for a number of years. My hon. friend (Mr. Bradbury) was in opposition during those years, and any transgressions of mine were surely open for the consideration of the House at that time and are open yet if it is thought worth while to take up the time of the House in considering them. I laid down a definite principle when I was administering the affairs of the department, and I laid it down in print, made it absolutely public, and if I transgress from that I will have to take the responsibility and discredit of it. When I was administering the affairs of the department, and until I ceased to administer the affairs of the department, the records and results show that the people concerned were satisfied. They must have been satisfied or there would not have been the enormous amount of settlement which took place. Just as soon as the Government and system of administration changed the progress of settlement was checked. It is not an act of Providence, it is not a matter of chance, it is an actual and necessary result of the change in method of administration.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 1 be adopted?

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to point out to the minister that section 1 as it is now drawn, is not in a shape that conveys to the ordinary man its intent and meaning. Instead of setting out on the face of the section what it is intended to mean, reference is made to two other sections further on in the Act. That confuses the mind of the ordinary individual and if it is desirable to amend the section, I would certainly urge that the amendment be made on the face of the section so that when a person who is interested in homesteading took up the law and read the section he would know everything that it was intended to convey, and he would not be obliged to refer to some other part of the Act and read some other sections to find out exactly what his rights were.

Mr. ROCHE: This section is intended to make the provision more clear in regard to the lands that will be open for homesteading and the lands that will not be open. The references are to section 35 and 36. Section 35, which is a portion of the Act, refers to land adjacent to water-powers. Section 36 refers to land reserved for purposes of a harbour, landing, bridges, railway terminus, station or town site. It extends as well to all lands that are on the reserve list for any purpose whatever. The Bill has been drafted by the law clerk of the House of Commons. I am not a lawyer myself, and not accustomed to the drafting of statutes, but I cannot see anything in the drafting of this Bill that would create any complication such as the hon. gentleman refers to.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not at all saying that the section as drafted is not perfectly good law, and I am not saying that a member of the legal fraternity will not thoroughly understand it, but I do say that the ordinary citizen will not understand it as well as if the whole case were stated in the body of the section. That seems elementary.

Mr. CURRIE: Would not the whole statute have to be re-enacted in order to do that?

Mr. OLIVER: No.

Mr. CURRIE: It would have to be consolidated and the whole reprinted and re-enacted.

Mr. OLIVER: If it is desired to exempt from homestead entry lands adjacent to water-powers and lands reserved for other purposes you might as well state that in so many words in the section instead of having to refer to two other sections.

Mr. CURRIE: Where there is an addition to the law by the passage of a new Bill it is not customary to repeat what is contained in the original statute.

Mr. AIKINS: The section was drafted in order that it might be concise and at the same time explicit. It is a part of the one Act and all a person has to do, after he reads the first section, is to turn to sections 35 and 36 and they will show clearly the land to which homesteading is not applicable. It would mean the repetition of these very same sections in this section if it were drawn otherwise.

Mr. OLIVER: It is not for me to take the responsibility of drafting the section, but I did not think it right to let it pass without giving my opinion as a layman desiring to pass legislation which can be understood by other laymen.

Another point is that when we are declaring that lands contiguous to water-powers and to certain other waters are reserved from settlement, who is to tell the prospective settler that this land is so reserved. Is he to be the judge of whether there is a possible water privilege at that place or not, or is it intended that if a man settles on such property his homestead rights shall cease to exist because it is afterwards discovered that land is appurtenant to a water-power.

Mr. CURRIE: It would be only sensible to suppose that under such conditions he would have the privilege of locating somewhere else, and that has been the custom in the past.

Mr. OLIVER: But as the legislation is now worded, that man is left without security for his outlay and the time he has expended.

Mr. AIKINS: It is assumed that the Government will know what water-powers there are and that the Government will reserve whatever land they think proper in connection with that water-power, so that it will not be available for homestead entry.

Mr. OLIVER: If that were so stated in the Bill it would be all right, because the man would not get entry, but as it stands he is liable to get entry upon land which this Bill says he shall not hold.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman knows that cases have arisen during his administration where settlers had to be removed from certain tracts that were reserved, and without any specific law these settlers were allowed to pick out the best land they could find elsewhere and all their homestead duties were allowed. That has been the custom from time immemorial, and the hon. gentleman himself has given effect to it when he was minister.

Mr. OLIVER: And I know how unfortunate it was to have to do it in some cases.

Mr. CURRIE: It did not hurt any one; they were as a rule better off.

Mr. OLIVER: In certain conditions a very difficult situation has existed, and it is unfortunate that in amend-
9 p.m. ment to the Act we should create such a condition as that of a settler who has located inside of a forest reserve.

Mr. ROCHE: In the case of the Winnipeg river we have made such a reservation as the hon. gentleman suggests. Any person who goes on land can see a water-power, and he makes his entry at his own risk.

Mr. OLIVER: I am putting in my protest, and I do not wish to press the point. There are cases in which power can be created by a moderate expenditure of money, where there is no evidence to the ordinary man in the natural condition that water-power exists. On the Bow river, application has been made to create a water-power at a certain place where there is a swift current, but no waterfall, and an ordinary settler would not be warned that a water-power existed there.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The point which my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) has raised exists in connection with timber reserves. I know a case in my own constituency in which a man has made entry for a homestead on land which was formerly a timber reserve, and having performed the work of clearing and expended nearly $5,000, he is now notified that he cannot get entry. This man thought he was in a district which was not of commercial value as a timber reserve.

Mr. CURRIE: How much timber did he take?

Mr. DOUGLAS: He took none; the timber was not of any commercial value, and he was preparing to burn it to get the land cleared.

Mr. BRADBURY: What authority had he to go on the land?

Mr. DOUGLAS: Other people had been getting entry in the same district. I must say in fairness to the minister that I have taken the matter up with him and he is prepared to deal with the case in a fair and equitable manner, but there is something wrong in a regulation which allows such a thing to occur. If we can remedy it in this case we should do so now when we are passing the legislation. We have in northern Alberta a lot of timber which is not of a merchantable character, and yet there may be more than the necessary twenty-five acres on a quarter-section to render it not available for settlement. The timber may be only fit for firewood, and on account of the distance from a railway it is of no value even as firewood, and the entrant would be delighted if a prairie fire swept it away, but yet this land is not eligible for entry. This regulation has had the effect of keeping a very considerable quantity of valuable land from being settled. I do not know that this particular case comes under section 2 of this Bill, but the question is worthy of consideration if in many cases timber lands, which have been reserved for timber purposes and which now prove to be of no value for merchantable timber, should not be thrown open and the privilege given to settlers to make entry on these lands without any drawbacks by the department.

Mr. ROCHE: The difficulty in the case to which my hon. friend refers is that the man who made his entry swore that there was not more than twenty-five acres of timber.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Of merchantable timber.

Mr. ROCHE: If a man wilfully does that, you can see the difficulty which the department would experience in granting entry. I believe, however, it is the practice of the department not to dispossess a man who has gone in and taken up land on which there is more than twenty-five acres of timber; but he is asked to map out the twenty-five acres, and then the department issues permits to the settlers to cut on the balance of the land.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—proviso as to residence of entrant.

Mr. KNOWLES: The whole question of pre-emptions is re-opened in this section. In the session of 1906-07, a Bill providing for pre-emptions was introduced by the present member for Edmonton, then Minister of the Interior of the late Government. His Bill was opposed partly by the late Hon. Thomas Greenway; and long speeches of criticism were made by hon. gentlemen opposite, notably by my hon. friend the present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) and by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). The present Minister of the Interior by no means supported that legislation at that time and he allied himself with the late Mr. Greenway. If the minister desires a reference for that, I can give the same to him, although I suppose he recalls the statements he made at that time. He made certain objections to the way in which the regulation would work out, and on the whole he threw cold water on the scheme. The hon. member for North Toronto discouraged the proposition as much as possible, and said that the giving of this land was like the giving of money. On March 14, 1907, he spoke in this House as follows:

> Your agriculturist is just as good a unit of the population and just as good a citizen of Canada, in Ontario, as he is in Saskatchewan or Manitoba. And one of his assets is his share in the public franchises and the public property of this country. Yet, you propose to go to the treasury, and to take out of it millions of dollars, out of which you give him no benefit at all and you give it only to a section of his class, a favoured few (so far as this goes) who reside within a certain area in the country. If those lands that you propose to give as largess, as bonus, to people who are outside of the area of need, not weighed down by poverty, not encountering difficulties, but so peaceful and happy and prosperous in the enjoyment of a princely gift of 160 acres of good land—if those lands which you propose to give them were transmuted into money, and that money were put into the treasury of this Dominion, it would be just exactly what it is now, though in a transmuted form. The transmutation of it does not change its essential character, does not make it any less an asset of this country, in which every citizen has his share; and what do you propose to do? You propose to legislate out of the grand treasury of this country, for a few people in one section of it, millions of dollars of value, making them a present of that, and giving to none of the rest of the people of this country any share in the usufruct.

It was impossible to get the Bill through during that session on account of the opposition it met, and accordingly the Bill was introduced the following session in a slightly modified form and became law. The pre-emptions were very popular. My own district is the one in which by far the most pre-emptions have been taken up. On the first of September, 1908, the pre-emption privilege was extended, and everybody knows that it was the most popular thing in Canada at that time. Wherever pre-emptions and purchase homesteads were available, there was the greatest activity on the part of the people concerned to get the quarter-sections of their choice. The people were then satisfied—indeed they were grateful for the terms which the present member for Edmonton, then Minister of the Interior, granted to them. At that time there was prosperity throughout the West and there was no need for reducing the requirements and asking the people to dispense with the payment of the interest or with the residence duties. Unfortunately for our country that condition of prosperity has ceased. My hon. friend to-day is grappling with a condition of affairs, which his own Government has created, in which the people require some relief. My hon. friend and his friends did what they could to keep from the people the relief offered to them in 1911 in the way of wider markets, and now it is necessary for them to come to the people, in this condition that is more or less desperate with some measure of relief. The relief is brought in this form and I support it. In fact, there is no relief which I will not support in the present condition of the people. The last tariff changes brought down have convinced me more than ever that it is my duty to grasp and to encourage any measure of relief that this Government will give. For my part I will support the waiving of the payment altogether in order to give the people an opportunity, in the untoward circumstances and unfavourable environment in which they are now situated, to make a success. The minister is to be pitied more or less on account of the depression which has followed the existence of this Government just as surely as the night the day; but he must realize in his heart that, if the people who grow their wheat and other cereals on their homesteads and pre-emptions had the open market at their door, the three years' interest of $72 would be a mere bagatelle to them, and the minister would not have had this cry from them.

The minister in one way is inconsistent in this Bill. If I understand him correctly—I am speaking not of the interest part, but of the residence part—it is his intention that, after a man has completed his residence duties, if he has $480, he can get patent for his pre-emption if he has fifty acres of breaking done; but if he has not $480 that year but has it the next year, then when he comes a year or two years later, as the case may be, he is not forgiven his residence duties in the interval.

Am I right in saying that a man who has spent two years after the protection time commences in working and slaving under unfavourable circumstances to get the $480, is charged up, after he gets that amount, with eighteen months' residence?

Mr. ROCHE: That is right.

Mr. KNOWLES: I want to protest against that. It seems that even in respect of this small amount the Government is discriminating in favour of the man who has the ready money as against the man who has to work hard to raise the amount. It seems to me that that is unjust discrimination. I have constituents who can pay the $480 at once, but I have a great many more who cannot. Unfortunately, under the present Government, the latter class is becoming larger and the former class is becoming smaller. I protest against making these people comply with the residence required because they are compelled to wait a little while to earn the money. I cannot conceive why the richer man should be forgiven; why he should be relieved of his residence duties for six months in the year while the poor man has to work and slave for it, perhaps keeping a wife and family at the same time. I ask the minister to adjust this matter; I ask him to do what is right by the man in poorer circumstances. I ask in the name of many thousands of my constituents that he afford to the poorer man the same relief from residence duties that he grants to the richer man.

Mr. ROCHE: If the homesteader chooses to avail himself of the provisions of the present Act as it is now upon the statute books he will be in no worse position in the future than he is at the present time, and he will be in a better position in that he will have to pay no interest during the first three years. He has the option of taking the time provided by the present statute in order to get the patent for his pre-emption, or of taking advantage of one of the provisions of this Bill: that at the end of three years, when he secures the patent for his homestead, he may, by paying his pre-emption money, secure a patent for his pre-emption. He is thus relieved of his homestead duties in the future, provided he has put in the necessary residence up to that time and performed the necessary cultivation duties. It is not a question of discrimination as between the rich man and the poor man; many poor men have asked for a provision of this kind. If a man has the ready money, he can cultivate or improve his pre-emption, if he so desires. This provision is intended to give all the option of continuing under the present Act and to improve their position to the extent of forgiving them their interest. Or, if they desire, by raising money on their homestead, to get a patent, at the end of the time they qualify for homestead they may qualify for patent for pre-emption by making the necessary payment. The hon. gentleman has placed a rather strained interpretation upon this Act as at present drafted, it is not designed at all to discriminate in favour of the rich man.

Mr. McKAY: I would remind the committee that the area of land that this section refers to is that portion which, roughly speaking, begins east of the centre of the southern boundary of the province, runs north westerly and northerly along the third meridian up to the forty-fourth township and thence westerly and southerly and easterly to the place of commencement. The inhabitants of that area were given the special privilege of taking up homestead and purchasing pre-emption because of the semi-arid nature of the locality generally. But we must bear in mind that it is practically impossible to select from that district land which is entirely of that nature. I venture to say that the hon. member for Moosejaw will claim that his constituency is one of the most fertile belts in the province; yet the city of Moosejaw is within this area. The Governor in Council selects certain townships within that area to which is extended the privilege of getting homestead and pre-emption. That area, as I have said, was set apart, because, owing to lack of rainfall, no man could be expected to cultivate the whole 160 acres. Under the conditions there, 160 acres were not sufficient for a person with a family; therefore, it was considered but right that in the townships selected by the Governor in Council this special privilege should be given of allowing the homesteaders to purchase an additional 160 acres. I wish to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that in part of my constituency the same conditions exist from causes directly opposite to those which pertain to the area which has been set apart. In portions of my constituency the abundance of water which occupies arable land prevents the farmer from cultivating the whole of his 160 acres homestead.

I know of some cases where out of the hundred and sixty acres there are ponds that take up perhaps one-half of the homestead, leaving only eighty acres which the farmer can cultivate; and eighty acres we consider is hardly sufficient for a farmer to make a living on, particularly where he has a family. Furthermore, a great many of our farmers, in fact I think I can almost say by far the larger percentage of them, go into mixed farming and it is absolutely necessary, in order that they should make a good living and bring up their families in a better way than they are able to bring them up on one hundred and sixty acres, that they should be given the privilege of purchasing, where they can, pre-emptions and homesteads in the same way as the farmers in this section with which we are now dealing are allowed to purchase pre-emptions and homesteads. I noticed in looking up the discussion that took place when the Bill was first introduced and also in 1908 that the reason given by a number of speakers, including the then hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) was that in the other portions of the province north of this belt to which I referred the railway companies had land and the person taking up a homestead could purchase another one hundred and sixty acres from a railway company. But that particular portion of country is very largely settled and most of these lands have been bought. I am speaking more particularly of the section north and south of the Saskatchewan River where in some cases it is impossible to purchase lands and where there are still some homesteads that could be taken up. In fact, in a great many cases people will not take up homesteads because there is not sufficient arable land in the homestead for a man to make a living. If they were allowed to take two homesteads, say three hundred and twenty acres, it would make a very good farm, perhaps only equal to one hundred and sixty acres in the prairie sections of the country. I would therefore ask the minister to consider the advisability of extending that area within which purchasable homesteads and pre-emptions may be secured. Roughly speaking, I would suggest that the area could be extended from say the main line of the Canadian Northern railway running from Kamsack westerly up to Warman, etc., starting from the third meridian, the present boundary of the area, and running along the present line of the Canadian Northern railway and taking in the northern portion of the province. Extending the area in this way does not necessarily mean that all of that area could be dealt with in this way, but simply gives the Governor in Council power to select any township within that area and allow people residing within that area to have the privileges that are extended to those residing in the area now under discussion. This matter has been brought to my attention by a number of farmers residing east of the third meridian and the farmers in that area would appreciate it very much if this matter was taken into consideration and something done along this line. No doubt the minister may require to consider this matter, but if he is not able to do so during the present session I would suggest that officials of his department should be instructed to make an inspection in that section of the country and the matter could be considered later.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sorry the minister cannot accede to my request in the matter of residence duties. His answer, however, must be final.

Mr. NEELY: The minister must recognize that he is making a very important departure in our land regulations by his amendment in section 2. I have always understood that the purpose of having this duty demanded from entrants for homesteads and for purchase homesteads was to have the land actually brought under cultivation, and not to give our land a speculative value that might be given to it by the spending of a few dollars in cultivation without having the entrants perform a certain amount of residence on the land. I am not going to say whether the minister is right or wrong, the hon. member for Moosejaw has given reasons why conditions could be made more lenient in these days than they have been in days gone by, but I would say to the minister, notwithstanding his explanations, and I tried to follow them as closely as possible, that I am still afraid he is doing an injustice to a great many entrants for pre-emptions throughout the West. He makes the statement that by giving the privilege of paying $480, the price of a pre-emption homestead, he is actually lessening the onerous conditions of the pre-emption. I fail to see that. The real effect is that the minister is compelling the man who cannot furnish the money to go on and perform residence duty; and he cannot fail to see that he is putting a premium on the case where a man can take out from his bank account $480 and free himself from all future responsibility. It may be urged that the man who has not the means can go to the bank when the bank knows that he is going to get his patent for pre-emption shortly, and get the money to pay off the Government. But what kind of bargain would that be for the man who has not the means to make the payment? The Government charge him five per cent, but the bank would probably charge him ten per cent or twelve per cent. I should assume the minister is penalizing that man who wants to get his patent by going to the bank or the trust company or the mortgage or loan company from five per cent to seven per cent, if he wants to have the same privilege as the man who has the money in the bank and who can make the payment to the Government. The minister cannot get away from that. The minister is taking the responsibility of making the conditions of life less onerous for certain of the settlers who have had the privilege of taking purchase homesteads or pre-empted homesteads. If he is going to change those conditions, he ought to make the conditions equal to all parties concerned. Why should the minister penalize this man? Here are both cases, the man who can pay up at the end of three years from the date of his homestead entry, and the man who cannot. Both of these parties, under the legislation now proposed, will be exempted from three years interest. After three years from the time at which the entry was made for the homestead you find the conditions exactly the same so far as these men are concerned, they both have three years' exemption from interest. The conditions are absolutely even up to that point, but then they become absolutely different. The man who can pay down $480 cash is to be relieved of all further responsibility as to residing on his pre-empted homestead, while the man who cannot afford to pay the $480—unless he borrows it and pays 10 per cent or 12 per cent interest—is to be penalized by having to perform still further residence duties. I do not think that is a square deal. If the minister wants to do something to make himself popular with the homesteaders,—and Lord knows he needs it, at any rate this Government at Ottawa do—if he is going to make conditions of life less onerous for the men who have purchased pre-emptions in that particular area he should make the conditions absolutely even, and no amount of argument can persuade me that conditions contained in section 2 of this Bill are in any way just and right as between the man who has means and the man who has not.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—price:

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister seems unwilling to assist us in the matter of readjusting the residence duties on pre-emptions, but perhaps he will meet us on this. The minister lays it down as correct—and I think it is wise legislation at this juncture—that the entrant shall not pay interest on his $480 for the first three years after he enters on his pre-emption. He must pay it after the pre-emption time, so to call it, commences to run. I am not quite sure how the minister is going to run this thing. His Bill looks to me to be a very strange one. We have just passed clause 2, and I am quite sure no man in the House can tell us just what it means. For instance, it says you will have to do the residence duties for the fraction of time during which you are rustling for the $480. But if it takes a man fifteen months to get that amount, how much residence duties would he have to do? But the minister, following his practice of doing no wrong, will no doubt see that it is carried out correctly. The department will have some trouble over that; it is ill-digested. The responsibility, however, is on the minister who does not seem to care to discuss it with us. Perhaps he will tell us later how much residence duty the man will have to do who has to go out and rustle fifteen months to get the $480. With regard to section 3 a strange principle is involved. For the first three years the man is charged no rent and no interest. At the end of the third year, or whenever his pre-emption time commences, he pays down a dollar an acre and commences to pay interest on the $320. Why should he pay interest on the $320 more than on the $480? It cannot be for rent, because he has had the use of the land all the time, and it cannot be to show the earnestness of his bargain, because he has already paid $160. If he should be forgiven his interest for the first three years, he should be forgiven every cent the Government can take off his back; he should be forgiven all the interest. If he is not to be charged interest on the $480, he should not be charged interest on the balance of $320. The minister says he will commence to use the land more after the third year; but he has had the use of the land from the start and can grow as good a crop in the second year as in the fifth or sixth. I think the minister should make this interest-waiving apply to the whole amount. I wish to move the following amendment:

That section 3 be amended by striking out all the words between the word 'instalments' in the eighth line of said section and the word 'provided' in the fourteenth line thereof and substituting the following:

Any instalment or instalments not paid on the due date thereof shall bear interest at the rate of five per centum per annum from such due date until the date of payment, but no instalment shall bear interest prior to the due date thereof.

I hope the minister will agree to that.

Mr. ROCHE: I think the hon. member for Moosejaw is using the wrong term when he states that the man is being penalized because he has to pay interest after the expiration of the first three years. Is he penalized at the present day. The only way he is being penalized under this Act is that he is being forgiven the first three years' interest, and if that is penalizing, I think the pre-emptor will be very glad to be penalized in that manner. The interest starts under this Act at the end of the first three years on the $480. If the pre-emptor should pay an instalment of $100, or whatever it may be, he will have to pay interest on just that much less; so he is not being penalized at all. I do not think there is any necessity for the hon. gentleman's amendment, though I am quite willing that the section should stand for further consideration and amendment. Both the hon. member for Moosejaw and the hon. member for Humboldt have said that we are penalizing the poor man.

Mr. KNOWLES: We will cut out the word penalizing, and say charging. Penalizing may be a little strong, but I feel very keenly about this matter.

Mr. ROCHE: It is an impossibility not to have inequalities so long as there is an unequal distribution of wealth. I do not think it is necessary to charge the present Act with undue discrimination against the poor man, for I have brought this amendment in largely at the instance of the poor pre-emptor who desires to secure his homestead patent in order that he may raise the money to pay for his pre-emption at the same time. I am sure that they will not feel they are being discriminated against simply because the rich man may be able to pay at the end of the three years. The poor man has exactly the same option. He can pay at the end of the three years, or go on paying exactly as under the present Act. The hon. gentleman's argument, as I understand it, is that the poor homesteader is being discriminated against. I am lightening his burdens by taking off three years' interest, and he has the option of getting his homestead patent and raising the money to pay for his pre-emption at the same time, or he can go on paying for it as the present Act provides.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not think the minister quite understands me. I do not say that John Smith is any worse off because you are good to George Brown; but it is not fair to be good to George Brown and not apply the same principle to John Smith. John Smith may have to wait two years before he gets his money and he has to do twelve months' residence duties. Suppose the minister made a law that he would not charge $3 an acre to men whose names commence with the letters A to M, and that he would charge the full price to the other fellows whose names start with the letters N to Z; to the men whose names begin with the letters from N to Z the minister says: Although I have not charged these other people, I shall charge you, but you are not hurt as you are the same as you were. Perhaps penalizing would not be the word to use, but there would be discrimination. The minister has not answered the point that there is an unfair discrimination in his proposed legislation against a man who has to wait a year before he gets his $420 gathered together as compared with the man who happens to have the money in the bank.

Mr. NEELY: Do I understand the minister to say that he is going to let that section stand?

Mr. ROCHE: I would not like to accept the amendment without giving it further consideration.

Mr. NEELY: Have there been any pre-emptions granted under the Act of 1908?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Mr. NEELY: I notice that the minister, according to his footnote, is going to make this measure retroactive as far as present entrants for pre-emption are concerned? Is that not the purport of the measure?

Mr. ROCHE: We are going to allow any person who has not qualified, that is, who has not obtained his patent up to the present time, to come under the provisions of the Act.

Mr. NEELY: The man who may have held his entry for five or six years, but who has not complied with these regulations and has not obtained his patent, is going to get the benefit of a certain number of years' interest. What about the man who has in the last year or so applied for and obtained his patent, should the minister not give his case consideration? He has his patent, it is true, but he has obtained it under the conditions that he had to pay and perform the residence duties. Surely, because one man has been a little slower than another in applying for his patent, the minister is not going to penalize the man who has been good enough to promptly pay the Government what is due and to fulfil his residence and other duties?

Mr. ROCHE: Now the hon. gentleman is putting up an argument for the man who has money and has been fortunate and wealthy enough to pay for his pre-emption. There were 879 patents issued for pre-emption. What would this amount to? If we were to refund to these 879 people it would amount to a little over $2,000,000. If I were to bring down a Supplementary Estimate for $2,000,000 to refund to those who have paid for the right of pre-emption, would the hon. gentleman support such a proposition as that?

Mr. NEELY: Has the minister actually figured up that the interest charges on patents already granted would amount to over $2,000,000?

Mr. ROCHE: No, not the interest charges.

Mr. NEELY: I am speaking of the interest charges. The minister is not proposing to pay back the principal?

Mr. ROCHE: I was referring to principal and interest.

Section stands.

On section 4—entrant not required to erect house on purchased homestead:

Mr. DOUGLAS: Under clause 4 a question may arise which affects particularly the northern part of the province of Alberta. We are exempted from the provisions of this pre-emption act inasmuch as no pre-emptions are allowed north of the 44th township. I think this is working a hardship because the northern section of Alberta is largely a brush country and a homesteader may not have arable land enough on his quarter-section of 160 acres to permit him to earn a livelihood. This makes it necessary that he should be enabled to secure more land. I think that the minister should grant, in lieu of pre-emption privileges being allowed in the northern part of Alberta, the right to homesteaders or entrants to take up purchased homesteads in that section of the province. We have in the Peace river country a tremendous amount of arable land and we also have a large number of people who have acquired homesteads possibly in other provinces or who have exhausted their homestead rights either by abandonment or in some other manner and I think it should be the policy of the department to allow these people to have the privilege of acquiring a purchased homestead such as is granted in the province of Saskatchewan, and in the southern part of Alberta, under the purchased homestead provisions. In the northern section of Alberta the purchased homestead area should be extended so as to permit entrants to obtain purchased homesteads. If the minister will not acquiesce in this suggestion I would like to move

That section 28 be amended by striking out the words 'open for entry in the manner set forth in this section' when they occur in lines 22 and 23 thereof, and by further striking out all the words contained in lines 36 to 53 thereof, both inclusive.

This is to permit of purchased homesteads being acquired north of township 44.

Mr. ROCHE: Purchased homesteads were allowed, as the hon. gentleman states, to those who had exhausted their rights to take up another homestead. There was a time when a person was entitled to take up a second homestead. That privilege has been cancelled and in order to allow persons coming within this class to obtain more land within a certain area, much the same area as the pre-emption area, they are allowed to take up purchased homesteads on much the same conditions as people may take up pre-emptions. As this area is largely the same area as the pre-emption area, it was considered at the time that it would not be wise to extend it farther north or into other portions of the same province that had not this particular character of land. I would make the same answer to the hon. gentleman that I would have made had I replied to my hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. McKay) in regard to the extension of the pre-emption area. It was designed originally because it was considered that 320 acres in that area would maintain a farmer and his family no better than 160 acres in a more productive part of the country. In view of so many people being of the opinion that it was very doubtful wisdom to have established the original pre-emption area, I do not feel now like recommending an extension of it, or of the purchased homestead area. The northern part of the province is more adapted for mixed farming. The conditions referred to by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. McKay), where there is too much water, makes a difference from the semi-arid district, but as drainage propositions are put into effect, much of the land now under water will be drained and made arable. I think it is better to encourage mixed farming in the northern district, and I think a farmer in that part of the country which is wooded and well watered will thrive much better under mixed farming than mere grain growing. I do not think it would be wise to accede at present to the requests of the hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for Strathcona to enlarge the area either for pre-emption or purchased homesteads.

[Mr. Douglas.[

Mr. OLIVER: I do not think the minister's reasons are apt as applied to the purchased homesteads. The results have shown that the pre-emption provision was a wise one, and that it brought in a large population to a vast area of country that up to the time of its adoption had not been occupied. The purchased homestead has nothing to do with giving the settler a greater area than a quarter-section. The purchased homestead merely allows the man who has exhausted his homestead right, and who, if he is looking for land again, must go across the line for it, to take up another homestead on certain specified conditions. He pays $3 an acre for it; he does a larger measure of cultivation than on the first homestead, and in every way the interests of the country are guaranteed under the purchased homestead provision. Every old-timer in the West knows of hundreds of cases where people have exhausted their homestead rights under difficult circumstances, and to whom it would be of great advantage to be allowed to take up homesteads and be pioneers once more. The only reason purchased homesteads were restricted to the pre-emption area was because at the time there was a general objection to allowing a purchased homestead at all. I felt convinced that it was desirable from every point of view that there should be such a privilege accorded, and I was able to get the consent of the House to that, if restricted to the pre-emption area, when I was not able to get that consent when I had asked for it to be applied to the whole country. Experience has shown that the danger which was feared at that time from the granting of this privilege—the fear of a transfer of whole bodies of people as a result of the privilege—does not now exist. To-day, in the light of our experience, I am sure that the Government would be well advised, and would be acting strictly in the public interest as well as in the interest of many hundreds of pioneers who have exhausted their rights and who now are not in a position to give the best service of which they are capable to their country, because they are not able to take up another homestead, as they would if granted this privilege. I would urge very strongly on the minister that he assent to the proposal. Or possibly he might allow the matter to stand to consider it at a later date.

10 p.m.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: I am sorry the minister does not look with favour on the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Douglas). The minister states that in his opinion a quarter-section of land in the north country would produce as much as a half-section further south. That may be true of some sections but it is not true generally. I know that from possibly township 44 to township 54, which is considered the best district in the province of Alberta, it might be true, but taking it from township 54 north, the country is very much broken and I question whether the average quarter-section would contain over 80 acres of arable land, I thought it was a great mistake that the pre-emption regulation, when first introduced, did not extend over the whole province. It is misleading to new settlers; people come here from other countries with the expectation of being able to take up half a section, and they are disappointed. In the semi-arid or dry belt it may be that the land does not yield as much as in the north, but there is a great deal of land south of 44 that is just as productive as any land north of 44, so that you cannot make any general application of a law in that respect. It would, in my opinion, be better if the homestead regulations were made general so that every one would understand. North of 54 there is a good deal of timber and a good deal of water. I know quarter-sections not far from railways which on account of the water and the wood on them are not fit to cultivate. There are in some places side hills that would make grazing land, but there may be 50 or 60 acres of water, and a man could not make a livelihood with the number of cattle he could keep on 70 or 80 acres. There are other places where the water floods in the spring, which makes it impossible to farm, but still stock could be raised on that land. If a man be confined to a quarter-section he cannot raise more than 35 or 40 head of cattle, which would hardly sustain a family. The man in the north, considering the nature of the country, has just as much need of a half section as has the settler in the south. The minister is an old settler; he has lived in the West for a long time and he knows that years ago, before we had the advantage of the railways, many of the first settlers who located in the northern part of the country found themselves in difficulty after some years. There were no markets and they were forced off the land. Many of them lost their land altogether, and some sold it for four or five hundred dollars. Afterwards when they had advantages that they did not have at that time, they found themselves without land and without means to secure land. I cannot see any good reason why any man, if he is willing to go on the land, to live on it for a few years, to fulfill the homestead requirements and to pay for it, should not have an opportunity, now that conditions are more favourable, to make good on the land. Many of these settlers wasted the land when it was of no value; they gave it away for nothing because they could not exist on it, and by so doing they lost the opportunity of making a living on it as they could now do.

Mr. DOUGLAS: In emphasizing the point which I raised a few moments ago, I wish to inform the minister that within a radius of fifteen miles of the city of Edmonton, a city of 70,000 inhabitants, there are homestead lands available to-day in the Beaver hills which are not considered valuable enough to be taken up by homesteaders. If this concession were granted of a purchased homestead, the chances are that a great deal of this land would be taken up for the purpose of raising stock. This land is full of hollows and valleys and it is not suitable for the raising of agricultural products; but at the same time, if a man were permitted to secure 320 acres in this particular section, he would most likely be able to make a living in raising stock which would be of great value from a local standpoint, within that very reasonable area from a city the size of the city of Edmonton. The minister should take into consideration the facts as set forth by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. White) who is fully conversant with conditions in that country; and he should give every consideration to this amendment, because in many cases the land is covered with scrub-timber, which is absolutely detrimental to the settlers and which is of no value whatever from a commercial point of view. It is of no value for firewood; and fire going through that country is a God-send to the settlers. The minister should permit these people, who are prepared to go into mixed farming, but who are not permitted to do so under the present homestead regulations, to make a living and at the same time clear this land which costs twenty to twenty-five dollars an acre for clearing purposes. If this so-called timber were of merchantable value, I could understand the minister adhering to his regulation as regards the 160 acres, but this timber is of no value commercially.

Mr. ROCHE: I think the stock provision here will overcome to a considerable extent some of the difficulties to which my hon. friend has referred. In the case of land such as my hon. friend has described that is fit for the raising of stock, there is a stock provision in this Bill which will allow people to qualify for a homestead by keeping cattle instead of cultivating land not suitable for agricultural purposes. I am aware that the hon. gentleman takes the point that 160 acres is scarcely sufficient for a man to raise stock on. Still, many farmers are craving for that privilege at the present time. They have their 160 acres, which they claim is not suitable for breaking, the 30 acres, which they have to break under the present Dominion Lands Act; and they ask for the privilege of qualifying for the patent by keeping a certain number of stock. I cannot see my way clear at the present time to recommend that 320 acres be given instead of 160.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Will the minister not take it into consideration?

Mr. ROCHE: I am quite willing to give the matter every consideration.

Mr. DOUGLAS: The regulation regarding the raising of stock is absolutely under the control of the homestead inspector. His report is the only information the minister has to go by, and it is a very questionable recommendation.

Mr. ROCHE: How would the hon. gentleman do it—give it indiscriminately?

Mr. DOUGLAS: It would be quite feasible to have certain areas mapped out that would be open for the qualification of stockraising. We have lots of areas large enough to permit of that.

Amendment of Mr. Douglas negatived: yeas, 26; nays, 37.

Mr. NEELY: While we are discussing these sections that relate to the money question, I want to call the minister's attention to a small point, where I think an amendment should be inserted in the present Dominion Lands Act. If the minister does not want to insert the amendment, he should alter the regulations. Section 32 of the Dominion Lands Act deals with the sale of agricultural land, and gives the minister power to sell a fractional quarter section, with or without homestead conditions, the rate not to be less than $3 per acre. In the constituency that I represent, we have neither the right of pre-emption nor the right of purchased homesteads; but in the northern part of the constituency we have a large number of small bodies of water and a large number of fractional quarter sections. I do not know what the practice was under the late Administration with regard to the sale of these fractional quarter sections, that is as to price, except in regard to those that came under my observation.

In all cases that have come under my own observation I have never known a higher charge to be made than the minimum $3 per acre, which is mentioned in section 6. In these areas we have not pre-emption or purchased homestead rights. In the purchased homestead and pre-emption district the 160 acres can be bought for $3 an acre. A gentleman in my constituency made the complaint to me the other day that a number of his neighbours paid for fractional quarter-sections only $3 an acre, whilst he had to pay $5. I brought the matter to the attention of the commissioner of Crown lands, and I bring it now to the attention of the minister. I understand that the valuations are made by an official of the local land office, who is allowed to say whether or not these fractional quarters are worth $3 or more an acre. These quarter-sections, which never consist of more than 80 acres, are not sufficient to make a farm and I do not see any reason why we, who have not the right of pre-emption, should have to pay more than the minimum price in any case.

Mr. ROCHE: The valuation is placed upon these fractional quarter-sections by officials of the Government. As the hon. gentleman knows, some fractional areas are much more valuable than others. The provisions regarding fractional areas are not confined to any particular portion of the province; they apply equally to any portion of the province where there may be a fractional area. In that respect the fractional areas differ from the pre-emption and purchased homestead areas. The preference is always given to the man who is the owner of land and who purchases a fractional area of eighty acres or less immediately adjoining. In many instances these lands have been valued at an amount considerably above the minimum valuation.

Mr. NEELY: Does the minister think that is fair?

Mr. ROCHE: I do. The department has to look after its revenue and when no discrimination is made against any part of the West I think it is quite right that these valuations should be made.

Mr. KNOWLES: I beg to move that section 4 of this Bill be amended by adding thereto the following words:

Section 28, subsection 5 of the Dominion Lands Act is amended by striking out all the words between the word 'instalment' in the fourth line of said subsection and the word 'provided' in the seventh and eighth lines thereof and substituting therefor the following: Any instalment or instalments not paid on the due date thereof shall bear interest at the rate of five per centum per annum from such due date until the date of payment, but no instalment shall bear interest prior to the due date thereof.

This amendment would have the same effect with regard to purchased homesteads as the one which I proposed with regard to pre-emptions.

Mr. ROCHE: I am not at all antagonistic to the object of the hon. member, but I think that his amendment had better stand, as well as the clause under discussion. I think that his amendment, which is not very happily worded, is subject to some improvement.

Motion withdrawn.

Section stands.

On section 5—section 31 amended:

Mr. KNOWLES: Have any changes been made since this Government came into power in the regulations with regard to buildings on purchased homesteads?

Mr. ROCHE: There has been a change. Homesteaders are only required to have a habitable house on their lands; the regulations previously provided that there should be upon the homestead a house of the value of $300.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—lease of school lands:

Mr. NEELY: Under this section the minister proposes to take to himself larger powers with reference to school lands, which are held in trust by the federal Government for the three prairie provinces. I would like the minister to explain the additional power which he proposes to take unto himself under this section, which says:

Notwithstanding anything in this section, or elsewhere in this Act, school lands may be leased for any purpose whatsoever, to any person, municipality or other corporation, under and subject to terms and conditions to be provided by regulations made by the Governor in Council.

I think there is some use to which these school lands could very justifiably be put. For instance, at the present time grazing permits are given in respect of school lands. Does the minister propose to lease these lands that they may be cultivated? If he is taking that power he is taking all kinds of power in the proposed section, and I would suggest that these lands might very greatly deteriorate as salable property when they come to be sold for the benefit of the school endowment funds of the three prairie provinces.

Mr. ROCHE: I quite agree that there are uses to which the school lands might be put, if the regulation so provided, that would not be at all justifiable. That is not the intention. It is the intention to take the power which we have not now of leasing those schools lands and thus adding to the school land endowment funds. I think it is only right and proper that we should increase that trust fund by every legitimate means at our command. At present we have not the power to lease school lands for any purpose and this section is intended to allow us to take the power of leasing them. It will not at all interfere with their sale and the leases will be subject to cancellation at any time when the sale is made. But in the meantime we will have them as a source of revenue for the Government, not by having them cultivated but by giving grazing leases on them. At present there are permits issued for cutting hay, etc.

Mr NEELY: If the minister gives the assurance that these leases will be subject to immediate cancellation, that obviates one objection to the proposal. I would suggest that once the Government take power unto themselves under this clause to lease these lands, they will have innumerable applications from persons who wish to break up the lands and cultivate them. If that privilege were granted to good farmers, to men who farmed their land in the proper manner, cleanly and well, no great disadvantage would come to these lands; but in my judgment it would be very much better to do without the revenue that would be acquired in this way than to have the lands subjected to bad farming and thus be greatly deteriorated in value in case they are put up for sale.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—conditional assignments:

Mr. ROCHE: I have a few amendments to make in this section. It has been pointed out that the wording does not exactly cover the object intended. At the present time assignments are made, for instance, to the railway companies for rights of way. As originally drafted an assignment was prevented unless a definite area forming a portion of a quarter-section held under entry, and the precise location of that entry, were defined. It will be understood that a right of way agent for a railway desiring to go through a man's farm is not in a position, when negotiating with him, to define offhand the exact location of the right of way and therefore I suggest to insert the word 'undefined' instead of 'defined area so formed' and to make the corresponding changes in the other lines of the section.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 14—stock in lieu of cultivation in case of certain quarter-sections:

Mr. McKAY: I would draw attention to the words arable land in the third line. The section begins:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in this Act, if by a report from a homestead inspector it is shown that any quarter-section does not contain arable land to the extent required to earn patent under this Act—

A good many homesteads in northern Saskatchewan are covered with brush and timber. The land is arable, but it costs a good deal to clear it. The hon. member for Strathcona states that it costs from $22 to $25 an acre to clear the land around Edmonton, and the same conditions exists in northern Saskatchewan. In some homesteads the land is very fertile, but is covered with brush and other timber, and it costs in some cases as high as $30 to clear the land. Consequently the farmer in the northern portion of the province is handicapped to a great extent as compared with the farmer on the prairie. We have already dealt with the privilege the farmer on the prairie has of taking a free homestead and purchasing pre-emption, and, in addition to that, with the land on his homestead, the very day he lands there he can put his team of horses or his traction engine on his ploughs and start ploughing the whole 160 acres. In northern Saskatchewan—and I presume the same thing applies in northern Alberta—in many cases the farmer cannot find more than two acres clear on his 160 acres. I know that in some cases he cannot find an acre clear of brush. He first has to go to work and clear this land, spending perhaps $15, $20 and as high as $30 an acre. What is the interpretation to be put upon the words 'arable land?' Does it mean land that is clear of brush or does it mean land that is capable of being cultivated after it is cleared? I would suggest to the minister that those words should be made plain. For instance, after the words 'arable land' there might be added 'free of timber or brush' because as it is at present, if it is construed that this means land that is capable of cultivation notwithstanding the fact that it has brush or timber on it, the privilege given whereby homesteaders can prove up by cattle would not apply because there would be arable land there, the only difficulty being that it would have to be cleared first. That is just what we want to obviate in northern Saskatchewan. We want to have the privilege that where a homesteader cannot find the required number of acres clear of timber and brush to prove up for his homestead he should be allowed, instead of cultivating that homestead, to prove up by the cattle. It seems to me that this section is not happily worded. I would also draw the attention of the minister to subsection 7 of section 14, which provides that the whole quarter section of land entered for shall be enclosed by a substantial fence to the satisfaction of the minister. That is one of the conditions imposed upon the homesteader before he can get his patent. Cases may arise where a homesteader is not called upon to fence his land; for instance, in some portions there is a herd law, and the homesteader with a herd of cattle is not required to fence his land. Under this Act the homesteader, before he can secure his patent, has to fence his land although not actually necessary for practical purposes. I submit that that clause should be changed so as to make it possible for the homesteader to get his patent without necessarily having to fence his land.

Mr. ROCHE: The terms the hon. member takes exception to are commonly used in connection with the land acts. The hon. member emphasized the fact that to clear land of timber or scrub entails a vast amount of labour. At the present time it is the practice of the department not to require thirty acres to be cultivated on a homestead of that character. Of course a similar interpretation would be called into requisition in connection with the word 'arable' as to whether the stock provision should prevail. I think the suggestion of the hon. member as to this scrub or timber land would make the clause too wide. Nearly every person having a quarter section of land would take advantage of it, and avoid cultivation by keeping a certain number of stock. We wish to encourage a reasonable amount of improvements, and that same explanation will attach itself to the fencing regulation. Under the old stock provision I believe it was necessary to fence at least 80 acres out of the 160. As the hon. gentleman states, there are certain districts having a herd law where it is not necessary to fence the farms, but that is a municipal affair, and what may be the herd law to-day may be wiped out of existence to-morrow. I do not think it would be right to discriminate in favour of a district having a herd law because municipal councils who pass that law change every year, and the next council may wipe the law out of existence. One of the principal points emphasized by the deputation of farmers and ranchers which waited upon me last year was in connection with the keeping of stock. All the farmers were quite willing to see the ranchers getting leases, provided these ranches were fenced so that the cattle could not trespass on neighbouring farms. The only thing we can do is to make the application universal, applying to all lands. Of course, we have to use judgment and common sense in our interpretation. Wherever there is land such as the hon. gentleman has referred to, the practice has been to insist on only six acres being cleared instead of thirty acres, as in the case of a farm clear of scrub and timber.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I wish to endorse what the hon. member for Prince Albert has said in regard to scrub land. In the section from which I come three-fourths of the homesteads are composed of scrub land, which costs the settler from $15 to $30 an acre to clear. I am in perfect sympathy with the regulation of the minister which permits of stock being put on land to prove up. That is a splendid idea and a good regulation, but you are putting a tremendous amount of responsibility on your homestead inspectors.

Mr. ROCHE: No more than at the present time in connection with homesteads.

Mr. DOUGLAS: True; but still there is a tremendous responsibility in deciding what constitutes arable land. I know many cases where homesteaders have taken up quarter-sections, 150 acres of which were scrub land which was absolutely useless as regards the commercial value of its timber or scrub. You are leaving it to your homestead inspectors to say whether that is timber of any value or not, and whether it is land which might be permitted to prove up under your stock regulation. I have no objection in regard to the question of fencing. I have never heard any objection in my section of the country. We have a herd law there which compels every man to fence his own land. As I say, you are leaving a tremendous leverage in the hands of the homestead inspectors when you give them power to decide what constitutes arable land. The question is a large one, and I do not know how you can regulate the matter, but I think there should be some recourse from the report of the homestead inspector in case he puts in a biased report, because I know of many cases in which homesteaders have been discriminated against by the homestead inspector, not from political motives, but as a matter of judgment as to what constitutes arable land. What the hon. member for Prince Albert has said with regard to the cost of clearing scrub land is absolutely true. It is a very expensive operation, and I am glad to hear that in some cases the minister requires only six acres cleared instead of thirty, because to clear six acres of scrub land represents more cash outlay than to clear thirty acres of prairie land. Many farmers are loth to enter upon scrub land, and I think the more latitude the department allows entrants on that class of land the better it will be for the settlement of the country. I reiterate that in northern Alberta three-fourths of the land available for homesteads is scrub land, which entails a tremendous expense to clear; and any alleviation the department can give to those homesteaders is absolutely in the interest of the country at large. I would strongly recommend that the minister do everything in his power, in the discretion of his department, to allow these men to get their patents without undue hardship or restrictions.

Mr. NEELY: I do not want this section to pass without emphasizing to some extent what has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. When a homesteader applies for patent at the end of three years' residence, or four or five, as the case may be, I do not think it should be left to the homestead inspector at that stage of the proceedings—I do not care whether he has had the power in the past or not—to decide whether or not that homesteader has fulfilled the requirements of the Act as to keeping so many head of stock, or breaking so many acres of land. I do not know how the difficulty may be worked out, but I do not see how any provision of that sort can fail to be abused as long as human nature is human nature. A homestead inspector should not have that authority. It gives the homestead inspector the power to make it difficult or easy for the applicant as his sympathies may dictate in each instance. The minister has increased the staff very considerably, he has spent a lot of money on that department of the public service and consequently he will not tell us that these men are overburdened with work. If the declaration of the applicant shows that the land is inclined to be rough in character, heavily wooded, and that sort of thing, the beginning of the residence of the homesteader is the proper time to have the inspection and declaration made so that this homesteader may then take his choice as to whether he will carry out his duties by cultivation of a certain area of land or take advantage of the stock provision. That ought to be done at the commencement of the operation and not at the finish. I did not take any part in the discussion this afternoon along these lines. I did not see that I would be altogether justified in discussing what might be somewhat of a partisan question on a public measure, but I do say that no homestead inspector ought to have authority over these men or the right to say a homesteader, who is applying for his patent, has not, in the opinion of the inspector, fulfilled his duties.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: I think the fairest way would be to put a value on cultivation. It might be worth $30 or $40 an acre to break land that is rough and scrubby whereas on the open plain it might only be worth $5. The homestead inspector would be the proper person to value the cultivation and that would be the fairest way. Then it would not be left to the discretion of the homestead inspector except that he would be required to make the valuation. A man would soon know pretty nearly the value of the land and he would know whether it would be worth while going on with it or not.

Progress reported.

ADULTERATION ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. W. B. Nantel (Minister of Inland Revenue), the House went into Committee on Bill No. 99, to amend the Adulteration Act, Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

On section 1—definition:

Mr. GRAHAM: If the minister will give us an explanation of what this Bill means, it will expedite it.

Mr. NANTEL: Most of the amendments to the Adulteration Act contained in this Bill are not important. The material one is regarding maple syrup and maple sugar. The first amendment is only a definition of agricultural fertilizers. We have decided to put in the Adulteration Act the same definition of fertilizers as that contained in the Fertilizer Act.

On section 6—standard for maple sugar:

Mr. GRAHAM: Does that mean that maple sugar cannot be mixed with muscavado or brown sugar?

Mr. NANTEL: The amendment contained in the sixth section is that the Governor in Council shall have the right to amend the standard according to the desire of the analyst. If it were necessary, in the opinion of the analyst, to change the standard, this could be done by Order in Council instead of by legislation.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

VOLUNTEER BOUNTY ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Sam. Hughes (Minister of Militia and Defence) the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Blondin in the Chair:

Resolved, that it is expedient to authorize the payment of a grant of one hundred dollars at any time before the thirty-first day of December, 1915, to every volunteer who is living on the date of the passing of an Act based upon this resolution, who was regularly enlisted in and served with the militia called out for active service in the year 1866 by the Governments of Canada, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, or in the year 1870, by the Government of Canada, with the exception of certain battalions or riflemen formed for service in the Northwest; and also to provide that such grant may be paid to the widow or legal representative of every volunteer who was living on the first day of April, 1912, and to whom no grant has previously been made under the authority of any Act.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the province of Prince Edward Island is not included in this resolution. Will the minister explain why?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: There can be no objection to including Prince Edward Island. Of course, the Prince Edward Islander will have to show that he had been called out for active service. We can insert the words 'Prince Edward Island' after New Brunswick.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I have prepared a short amendment to add the following words:

Or who has drilled in the province of Prince Edward Island in preparation for repelling the threatened Fenian invasions of 1866 and 1870.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: No, we will just put in the words 'Prince Edward Island.'

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: If it is made essential that the men had to be called out by proclamation, the volunteers in Prince Edward Island may possibly be excluded, but I presume the minister will not insist upon that as it is likely a technical proof that will be required. The member for Annapolis is uttering the usual hollow laugh he utters when anybody on this side is referring to a question before the House, but that does not make any difference. If the minister is furnished with proof that in any province where preparations were made to repel the invasion threatened at that time, where men drilled and prepared, and where everything was done that could be done under the existing conditions, I presume the minister would be satisfied with that proof. In that year the governor of the colony of Prince Edward Island, in opening the legislature, called attention to the fact that Canada was threatened with invasion, and he asked the legislature to make preparation to meet it. The legislature of Prince Edward Island did make such provision, and it passed a special Militia Act rendering every male in the province, between the ages of 16 and 60 years, liable for military service, excepting a few, such as clergymen and schoolmasters. The legislature then placed the whole revenue of the colony at the service of the governor, who was commander-in-chief. The men of Prince Edward Island secured drill sergeants from the regular army at Halifax, and, at a very great expense to themselves, they carried on drilling operations for a very considerable period of time. I do not know that anything more was done in any province, or that any more could be done. In proof of my statement I will read from the records of the time. In the Parliamentary Reporter for the session of 1866 of the legislature of Prince Edward Island, on April 9, I find this paragraph in the speech of the governor at the opening of Parliament:

11 p.m.

Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House of Assembly:

You will, I am sure, have observed, with just pride, the loyalty and the spirit which your fellow subjects in the neighbouring provinces have displayed, when threatened by piratical attacks at the hands of lawless men. I know that, should an emergency ever unfortunately occur in this island, I could rely with confidence on a like spirit in its inhabitants of every creed and station. But I must seriously urge upon you the necessity of doing all in your power towards making due preparation for such an emergency by giving your earnest consideration to the laws which at present regulate the militia and the volunteer force.

In reply to that speech the legislature said in paragraph 9:

It is with feelings of just pride that we have observed, the loyalty and the spirit evinced by our fellow subjects in the neighbouring provinces when threatened by piratical attacks at the hands of lawless men. And we beg to assure Your Excellency that, should a similar emergency ever unfortunately occur in this island, Your Excellency could rely with confidence on a like spirit in its inhabitants of every creed and station, and we admit the necessity of doing all in our power towards making due preparation for such an emergency by earnestly considering the laws which at present regulate the militia and the volunteer force.

A few days afterwards the legislature proceeded to pass a Militia Act. I quote:

On the motion of the hon. Solicitor-General the House went into Committee on the Bill for the regulation of the militia and volunteer forces.

The militia shall consist of all male inhabitants of the island, from sixteen to sixty years of age, not exempted by law; to be divided into two classes, namely active and sedentary militia; the active to be divided into two classes, namely, volunteer and regular militia.

For the purposes of enrolment and organization, each county shall be divided into as many regimental districts as may be decided upon by the Commander-in-Chief; and each such district shall again be divided into company districts. Each of the former districts to furnish one militia regiment, and each of the latter to furnish one regular and one sedentary company of militia.

And so on.

I find this resolution, moved by the Solicitor General at that time:

Resolved, that in consequence of the threatened invasion of the British colonies by bands of Fenian marauders, this House pledges itself to place the whole of the revenue of the island at the disposal of the Government for the purpose of organizing the militia and volunteers, and for such other military purposes as may be deemed expedient for the protection and defence of the colonies.

That was accordingly done. The leader of the Opposition at that time, Mr. Coles, seconded that resolution and it passed the House unanimously. In accordance with the laws in force at that time, as I have already stated, all the male inhabitants of the island were called out by that Act and proceeded to drill. I have here letters from men who took part in the drilling at that time.

Mr. EDWARDS: Were all the male inhabitants from sixteen to sixty under arms?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: All with the exception of the exemptions. I will read a few of the letters to the committee, just to show what has been done by men who are still living. This is a letter from a man named James Feehan, of French village, Prince Edward Island, written on the 24th of February last:

I was one of the militia at that time, 48 years ago. We were drilled weeks at a time, three days each week, and sworn to proceed to headquarters at once on call, to be loyal to the Queen, and do our best to defend the country. One man of our company named Neil McKay, now of New Brunswick, got paid last fall. His claim is no better than mine. There are very few of the number living now.

There are other parts of the letter that do not relate to this matter which I need not read. Here is a letter addressed to me from a man named N. E. Mathewson:

Seeing that you have interested yourself in provincial volunteers and their pay at the time of the Fenian raid, I take the liberty of sending you the enclosed sketch of the Strathalbyn volunteers at the time. I suppose it is too late for any of us who are yet living to look for any recognition.

This is the sketch that he sent:

At the first murmur of danger the young men of Strathalbyn formed themselves into a volunteer company and called themselves the Strathalbyn volunteers. They elected me as their captain, the late Mr. A. B. McKenzie, lieutenant and Mr. Alexander Stewart, ensign. They assembled regularly for drill. I was their instructor, for there was no other convenient, and I had studied the manual then in use, and when we received our rifles, I taught them the manual of arms, and superintended their rifle practice. For some time we were drilled by a sergeant from H.M.O. 16th regiment, then stationed at Halifax. Lieutenant Governor George Dundas, at that time Commander-in-Chief of our island came out to see the company and was pleased with it. A squad of my company camped at the annual shooting match in Charlottetown.

This is a letter from a Mr. Keefe, dated February 18 last:

I drilled at the time of the Fenian raid. The captain of the company I drilled in was Lawrence Peters. Malcolm Leslie was drill sergeant assisted by a drill sergeant from Halifax. Our ages were taken and our height, also sworn in. We were liable to a fine of $25 if we were not in the ranks. We drilled in Souris and Rollo Bay. That would be in lot 44. I was living in Rollo Bay at that time.

Here is a letter from a man now living in Gloucester, Massachusetts:

I have been informed that all the men that served in the militia at the time of the Fenian raid in 1864 and 1865 have been awarded $100 by the Canadian Government. I have been speaking to five or six who have received their money. Now, I drilled for two years at Souris, Rollo Bay and the North Side, East point. I do not just remember our captain's name, but our adjutant's name was Leslie, and our covering sergeant was John McIntyre. As I was born in Souris, I wrote to James Mineghy, but could not get any information concerning the bounty.

Here is a letter from a man named Peter Gormley, who appeared to be active in the service at the time. He gives a list of the men who drilled with him and who went about thirty miles from their homes for that purpose. His letter, which is addressed to myself, reads as follows:

Having read in the paper of the inquiry of volunteers at the time of the Fenian raid of 1866, I will give you a list of some of them. I am informed by those who served or drilled for two years or more, and I was present at every call. The last was at South Port, Prince Edward Island. Every one had to find himself and no pay for their time. Each one had to board or find himself in his eatables. I will give you a list of the people on St. Mary's road.

Here is the list:

Dan. Hughes, Michael Gormley, James Gormley, James McGuigan, Patrick McGuigan, John McGuigan, Thomas McCarron, Dan. McKenna, Thomas Hughes, Bernard McGuigan, Brian McCarron, Thomas Cassidy, Martin McCarthy, William McCarthy, Robert McCarron, Patrick McGee, Alex. Lawson, John Laverty, Colin Steel, Donald R. Steele, Patrick McKearney, Thomas Daly, John McCarron.

I think that if any men in the Dominion of Canada are entitled to recompense for what they did on that occasion, these men are. The Legislature of the province did everything that was necessary. Members of the Legislature at that time said that they were willing that the Prince Edward Island volunteers should go to the other provinces if they could render better assistance in that way than by remaining on the island. I think they did as much as was done by any other province. While the volunteers were not technically called out by proclamation, everything was done that could be done; the procedure was just as complete as if the volunteers had been called out by Governor's proclamation. I would ask the minister not to insist upon the words 'called out by proclamation.'

Mr. MACDONALD: I think the minister's amendment would not be of any advantage to my hon. friend the hon. member for Kings, Prince Edward Island, because the resolution would apply only in cases where the volunteers had been called out by proclamation of the Governor in Council. I understood my hon. friend to say that while there was no technical proclamation by the Government, there was action by the Legislature which would be substantially the same thing. I assume also from what he said that there was voluntary drilling of volunteers, although there was no regular militia at that time other than that which was initiated under the Act passed that year.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: Section 2 of the Act passed in 1912 reads as follows:

In this Act 'volunteer' means any person who was regularly enrolled or enlisted in and served with any militia corps which the Government of Canada, or of Nova Scotia, or of New Brunswick called out for active service in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, or which the Government of Canada called out for active service in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy, excepting, however, the two battalions of riflemen formed for active service in the Northwest.

As was stated by the hon. member for Kings, the Legislature of Prince Edward Island provided for this emergency. The ninth clause of the Government's speech was as follows:

It is with feelings of just pride that we have observed the loyalty and spirit evinced by our fellow citizens in the neighbouring provinces when threatened by piratical attacks at the hands of lawless men.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does it specifically mention the Fenians?

Mr. McLEAN: The Fenians were the only men who were disturbing the peace of the country at that time. A unanimous vote of the Legislature of Prince Edward Island was passed pledging the whole revenue and resources of the island towards rendering assistance to repel this attack, and at the same session a militia Act was passed. That militia Act was sent to England for the assent of the Queen. Some objection was taken to it by the Colonial Secretary and it was returned with the suggestion that it be re-enacted. In the session of 1866 the Act was repassed with amendments. In the meantime, in the month of January, 1865, all the militia was called out; if you look at the journals of the House of Assembly of Prince Edward Island you will find the Adjutant General's report of the militia of the province. It was an unusual thing to call the militia out at this time; the purpose was that Prince Edward Island should be in the same position as the other provinces so far as repelling the piratical attacks referred to in the Governor's address was concerned. In the year 1865 large sums of money were voted to equip the militia and at the inspection of the militia in the city of Charlottetown in 1865 there were present 1,000 men. That was not an ordinary thing in the province of Prince Edward Island at that time. Of these men, 813 were equipped with uniforms. In the meantime the British Government had loaned the colony a large number of rifles; the Adjutant General's report states where these rifles were and how they were being used. The journals of the House of Assembly of that year show that a large sum of money was expended for the purpose of organizing the militia and of putting them in shape in order that they might go into the field if necessary. So we have the militia of Prince Edward Island in the same position as the militia of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Canada. It is true that they were not called out by special order of the Governor of the province of Prince Edward Island, but the Legislature of the province made the provision that they should be put into a position to go into the field if necessary. As will be found in the Adjutant General's report, a number of drills were held; the number of officers and men and the quantity of equipment are also mentioned. Full details may be found in the journals of the Assembly of Prince Edward Island. I understand that all these men were properly enrolled, and that the enrolment lists are to-day in the city of Halifax. When the militia was taken away from Charlottetown six or seven years ago, the militia authorities in Halifax asked that all papers in connection with the militia of Prince Edward Island should be handed over to the Dominion authorities. Without any reference to the authorities in Prince Edward Island, all of the old militia lists were handed over and sent on to Halifax. This was an improper proceeding on the part of Dominion authorities because these lists of the militia of Prince Edward Island before Confederation should have remained in the hands of the provincial authorities. They are to-day, however, in the hands of the authorities at Halifax and if the minister would take the trouble he could get them and see exactly what the condition of affairs was in 1866. I do not think the conditions in Prince Edward Island differed very much from the condition in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, and the militia of Prince Edward Island are entitled to the same considerations as the militia of Nova Scotia or of New Brunswick. If the technicality of the calling out of the militia is to be taken into consideration, and if the authorities in Ottawa insist that this proclamation must be produced, we cannot produce it, but I think that the technicality should not be allowed to be insisted upon in a matter of this kind. If the militia in Nova Scotia are paid, those in Prince Edward Island are as much entitled to it as they. It is true that a great sum has been paid to these men and the probability is that many people who are entitled to this grant will not receive it. If the Dominion Government insists that the authorities in each province shall produce the Order in Council, then, of course, the militia in Prince Edward Island cannot get the grant; but I do not think that would be a fair way to deal with the militia in Prince Edward Island, who did as much as the militia in any other province. Many of the militia in Nova Scotia and Upper Canada simply drilled, they were called out and met at a certain place and were inspected by an officer and that is all that happened. They get their $100. Why should not those in Prince Edward Island get theirs? There is no reason. If the Government of Canada insists that that proclamation should be produced, then I would ask them to deal in a different way with the militia of Prince Edward Island, that is to grant the Government of Prince Edward Island a sum equivalent to the money which they spent in the calling out and drilling of the militia and a certain sum for the militia who were called out. There must be some way of dealing with this matter in order to do something for the militia of the different provinces who took part in the emergency.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I beg to submit an amendment. I think it will cover the ground and I am sure it will meet with the approval of the minister and of the committee:

That the resolution be amended by adding after the words 'New Brunswick' in the sixth line 'or who drilled in the province of Prince Edward Island in preparation for repelling the threatened Fenian invasion of 1886 and 1870.'

[Mr. A. A. McLean.]

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: I am sure the House is very much interested and instructed by the data which have been placed before us by the two representatives of Prince Edward Island. It shows a splendid spirit in anticipation. But I think the hon. member for King's failed to note that in introducing the subject as he did, by quoting from the proceedings of the legislature of Prince Edward Island that they had observed with pride how the people of the neighbouring provinces had turned out to repel the threatened invasion, he made it evident that the threatened invasion had passed and gone before they were organized. The keynote of the whole matter is that if the militia were called out for active service in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or Canada they complied with the law, and I am sure my hon. friends from Prince Edward Island would not ask for anything more than the other provinces receive. If they were called out for active service they come under the Act. If they were not called out for active service they do not come under the Act. Therefore, in consenting to insert the words 'Prince Edward Island,' I think ample justice will be done to the people and representatives of that province. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for King's (Mr. J. J. Hughes) would simply hand over the bounty of $100 to every man between the ages of 16 and 60 in the province. There was not a part of the province of Ontario but turned out at that time to drill. In Nova Scotia there was undoubtedly a very peculiar condition of affairs. There was a universal compulsory service law in Nova Scotia, and the entire militia of that province were called out under that Act. It was a rather peculiar condition of affairs. Nevertheless they turned out, they were called out and I believe, from all the evidence submitted to the committee in the House here from representatives of both parties in the province, they turned out loyally and well on that occasion. If there is any evidence of that kind from Prince Edward Island, I would be glad to insert the words 'Prince Edward Island,' but the amendment of the hon. member for King's of course would be ridiculous. It would simply hand over the money to every man in Nova Scotia who was an adult at that time.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not like to harp back and say, I told you so; but if the minister will remember that when the Bill was introduced in 1912 I called his attention to the fact that he would have a lot of difficulty in the administration of the law, because he did not properly describe what was meant by the words 'called out.' If he will refer to the debate of that year he will find that I particularly called his attention to that fact. I do not pretend to have any more insight into these things than any other member, but from my little knowledge of militia matters I should say that a lot of the difficulty started from that. There were not over 600 in Nova Scotia, and yet he is compelled to stand up and tell us that the men were called out and loyally obeyed the summons. He does not believe that in his heart himself.

Mr. SAM HUGHES: Oh, yes, he does.

Mr. CARVELL: No, he does not. He knows that this is one of the most contemptible scandals in Canadian history. Twelve thousand or fifteen thousand men have received $100 each in Nova Scotia who were never called out in the proper sense any more than I was called out, and I was only born a year or two before that. It is true there was a proclamation by the Government of Nova Scotia calling out the active militia to perform annual drill, probably in anticipation of the Fenian raid. I daresay that they met the technical requirements of his Act. But does the minister believe that a man away down in Cape Breton island who was called out to perform annual drill really complied with the spirit of the Bill passed in 1912 providing a Fenian Raid bounty of $100? That is 48 years ago. Assuming that the man was eighteen years of age when he became a member of the active militia, that would make him 66 years of age to-day Does my hon. friend believe that there are 15,000 militia men in Nova Scotia to-day, 66 years of age, who were members of the militia at that time? It is not possible. I believe thousands of men in Nova Scotia have been paid who were barely born at the time of the Fenian Raid, and my hon. friend knows it. He believes it anyway. It is simply a scandal.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is evidence that 81,000 men responded to the call at that time in Nova Scotia alone.

Mr. CARVELL: That is the evidence now, I dare say, but go back 48 years ago and what was the evidence then? I think that nearly every able-bodied man in Nova Scotia claims now that he was a member of the militia at that time, and was called out. I was down in Nova Scotia when the minister's officials were going around. In the first place there were two or three officials from Ottawa; then a provincial organizer came down to lead the Ottawa officials round; a county official then appeared, and he was drumming them up. They held meetings in each constituency. I went down with my hon. friend from Guysborough to hold a political meeting at Canso, and the whole crowd was on the same boat drumming up these veterans.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: Did the hon. member tell them on that occasion that they were all fakes?

Mr. CARVELL: No, I was not discussing that question at all, because I did not believe the minister was going to be fool enough to be caught by it. Perhaps if I had realized how easy the minister is I might have had something to say. They were only getting ready for the coup at that time. I know the minister is flighty, to use as mild a term as possible, when it comes to militia matters, and that he is not governed by the ordinary horse sense that actuates him in the business affairs of life. I think the minister would make every man a Colonel who would accept it, or a Brigadier-General. He would give away all the resources of Canada to militia men if his followers would allow him to do so. But the minister has sane business moments, and he knows that a great fraud is being perpetrated upon his department by the people of Nova Scotia. If he has a law which is capable of being so interpreted that frauds are being perpetrated upon the country why does not the minister amend his law to prevent this, and to bring within its purview those who are properly entitled to the bounty? If it be necessary to bring in Prince Edward Island, bring it in, but on a reasonable business basis. Give these people a bounty if they are entitled to it, but if they are not, do not. I want to compliment the minister in that there has been no scandal in connection with this matter in my province. I think the minister has tried to administer the law fairly in most cases. I have two or three complaints before me, which I shall call to his attention later, but, generally speaking, I think the law has been fairly administered. I think the great majority of those entitled to the bounty have received it. In New Brunswick, there really was an attempted invasion of Canada. I think only three points in the whole Dominion were threatened. One was in western Ontario, another in the Eastern Townships, and the other point was near St. Andrews, in New Brunswick. The people of New Brunswick responded, generally, and I think there was no outside assistance. They came from Woodstock, my own town, from Fredericton, and different points 100 miles away, and the threatened invasion was repelled. I think they only did their duty; they only did what British subjects ought to do, and what common humanity teaches every man to do—to defend his home and fireside. As I said before, I very much doubt the wisdom of the minister's granting a bounty at all. I do not see any reason why a man should be rewarded for defending his home and fireside in case of emergency. But if my hon. friend is determined—I think for political purposes—to grant this money, surely it ought to be granted in a sane business-like manner, and if he would apply the law all over Canada as in New Brunswick I do not think there would be much fault to find. I repeat that the manner in which these 15,000 people in Nova Scotia have been paid the bounty is simply a scandal. They never expected to be called out on active service; they never realized what it meant, and when the minister passed his law I do not think he realized what it meant. He used the words 'called out,' and it so happened that his friends in Nova Scotia found that the conditions fitted in with the words of the Act, and the minister had not the moral courage to repeal it. I have a few individual cases to bring to the attention of my hon. friend so that he can amend the law to meet these cases. On general principles I want to know if the minister will not try to get down to real honest business, and if he feels he has a right to pass a law providing a bounty to do it in a way that will reflect credit upon his department?

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. member that the amendment before the committee provides for an enlargement of the provisions made in the resolution under consideration, and therefore I must rule the hon. member out of order.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The motion is before the committee as well as the amendment, and I think members are at liberty to discuss it. I supported this Act at its inception, and I have not changed my mind since. I want to say a few words in response to my hon. friend the member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). I think my hon. friend is altogether mistaken, and does not understand the facts as regards Nova Scotia at that time. Very great preparations were made in that province—much greater preparations, I have no doubt, than in any other province of Canada. For certain reasons the people of Nova Scotia were very much alarmed at the time. They expected an attack by sea, and the entire militia of the province was ordered out and turned out. There was a very strong force of militia in Nova Scotia at the time, considering the population of the province. No man who reads the history of those days, and the discussions in the local legislature, and who makes himself acquainted with conditions in Nova Scotia at that time, will have any doubt of the fact that there was a very large force of militia prepared to take a hand against this invasion, if it had been necessary to do so; but, of course, everyone is well aware that the real invasion never took place; and that, in the view of some people, is a weakness in the claims of those people for compensation. The title to compensation rests, I understand, on a legal point: on the words of a proclamation which was issued on the 17th of March, 1866, which reads as follows:

Proclamation by His Excellency Sir William Fenwick Williams.

Whereas a hostile invasion of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick is threatened, by which the lives and property of Her Majesty's subjects therein may be put in jeopardy, and preparations are necessary to repel such invasion if made:

And, whereas, in such an emergency, I am by law authorized and required to call out the militia force of Nova Scotia in aid of Her Majesty's regular forces for its defence:

I do hereby command and require all officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the militia force of Nova Scotia, and all persons liable to perform militia duty in said province, to turn out for actual service as in time of war, according to law, and subject, on failure so to do, to the pains, penalties, and forfeitures thereby imposed and provided.

Of which all persons interested will take notice, and govern themselves accordingly.

Given under my hand and seal at Halifax, this seventeenth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, and in the twenty-ninth year of Her Majesty's reign.

By command of His Excellency the Lieutenant Governor and Commander-in-chief.

Charles Tupper.

You will note that this proclamation orders the whole force of Nova Scotia out for actual service as in time of war. The language happens to be the same as the language in the Act which we have passed and I suppose it was unknown to the minister at the time this proclamation existed in the form in which it does. There is ample proof that the force responded very loyally to this call. Sir Charles Tupper was Premier of Nova Scotia and the legislature met just about that time. On the 19th of March the Premier of the province laid this proclamation before the members of the legislature and he made a statement which is contained in the following minute of the legislature:

Hon. Provincial Secretary laid on the table, by command of His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor, a copy of the proclamation made by the Commander-in-Chief, calling out the militia of the province, and in so doing moved the following resolution:

Resolved, that this House cordially approve of the action of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief calling out the militia, as stated in the proclamation now laid on the table, and will provide for any expense required for the adequate protection of the province.

He said the condition of this province in relation to its local defence had occupied the attention of the Government and the Imperial authorities for a considerable period. It was of recent date, however, owing to circumstances to which he need not particularly allude, because they were familiar to every member—owing to the fact that a large body of lawless men were openly and publicly, in the heart of the adjoining republic, threatening the securities, the rights and liberties, of the people of British North America—that the subject had become one of immediate importance.

Mr. Prior said:

That the most cordial reception and the most hearty cheering had greeted the reading of the proclamation of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief by the regiments who that day had been mustered on the common. He was confident that should the foe invade our province there would be hearts and hands to meet them on the threshold and to defend the hearth stones of our country. He gave this information not because the country would need any additional inducement but in order that the slight and sarcasm that was frequently thrown upon a mixed population like that of Halifax might have no effect.

Sir Charles Tupper also made the following remarks:

Numbers of persons had been sent to Ireland, and large sums had been contributed to a movement having for its object the subversion of the integrity of the empire, by securing the independence of Ireland from British rule. While he believed that by proper precautions being taken we need not continue in apprehension, the Government had felt it their duty to watch most narrowly the course of affairs, and to take such measure as the security of the country might require. After the adjournment of the House on Saturday, information had been received of such character as to demand instantaneous action. Under the law, the only means by which the militia force could be made available for active service was by a proclamation embodying the militia, and placing them in a position in which their services could be readily obtained. He was unwilling to place before the House the information that had been received by His Excellency and by the Commander-in-Chief of Her Majesty's forces, and the House would absolve him from any such necessity, because such a course would be extremely prejudicial to the public interests, as it would have the effect of cutting off the sources of information hitherto at command, and so far from increasing the security would have the opposite operation. But His Excellency had considered the circumstances as of such a grave character, and the danger of an attack upon some part of the province sufficiently imminent to warrant immediate action being taken without waiting to consult the House. The entire militia force of the province had, therefore, been turned out.

That was the statement made by Sir Charles Tupper two days after the issue of the proclamation by the Lieutenant Governor. There was great excitement throughout the province at that time, and on the occasion of the next meeting of the legislature, in 1867, there was a discussion as to what did take place, and reports from militia officers as to the number of men who did turn out to drill. The information is given in great detail. I find that the following statement was made by Sir William Fenwick Williams on the opening of the Legislature:

While the colonies have been subjected to threats and in some instances to the invasion of lawless men our province has been exempted from an attack, and although our local forces nobly responded to the call that was made upon them at the early part of the year to arm for the purpose of defence, happily no necessity occurred to require their services to repel an invader.

The exigencies of the province of New Brunswick rendered it necessary for a time to withdraw a large portion of Her Majesty's troops from this garrison for the protection of that colony—

My hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) led us to believe that the people of New Brunswick were looking after themselves but it appears that the regular forces of Nova Scotia were withdrawn and sent over to New Brunswick for the purpose of protecting the frontier of that province.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: Also two companies of militia, the Shubenacadie and one more, and some volunteers from Halifax.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Sir William Fenwick-Williams continues:

—and it was with the utmost satisfaction that I was enabled to fill their places for garrison duty by portions of the Halifax volunteer and militia artillery and the volunteer battalion and to mark how well that service was performed. The readiness and good discipline of the officers and men who were then employed showed how much has been effected by the efforts made during the last years to place our local forces in a proper condition and how much we can depend upon them in the hour of need.

That shows the response that was made to the call. My object in reading these extracts is to show the House and the country that in so far as Nova Scotia is concerned the veterans did their duty and if any recognition is going to be given they deserve to share in it. The Historical Society of Nova Scotia has collected a lot of information in regard to this matter and if any gentleman chooses to look at this book which I have in my hand, he will see a picture of the Sydney Mines volunteers in their regimentals, and with their guns at their sides, drilling in 1866, and preparing to resist the invasion. My hon. friend (Mr. Carvell), runs away with the idea that they did not turn out at all, but here is a photograph which shows that in one section at least they were drilling on that occasion.

Mr. CARVELL: How many men were in the photograph?

Mr. SINCLAIR: You can count them yourself; there is a very great number of men. There is a paragraph in this historical statement that I would like to read to the minister. It shows that prior to 1866, in the years 1863, 1864 and 1865, very great activity existed in Nova Scotia in militia affairs.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: Forty-four thousand drilled in one year.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I find in this volume, published by the Nova Scotia Historical Society, the following:

> Much good work was done during this year (1864) towards maintaining and improving the force. The counties were divided into regimental districts; the officers and non-commissioned officers were brought into closer touch with the men under their command; the appointment of regimental adjutants was made one of competition, not of favour; and the position of commanding officer of a regiment was conditional on his efficiency, and not necessarily on his seniority in the corps. On 30th June, 105 regiments appeared on the roll, with a total strength of 48,675 officers and men; six months later this had grown to 110 regiments embracing 56,111 of all ranks.

Showing that the militia force of Nova Scotia at that date was very large indeed, compared with the population of the province. If there are 15,000 now in Nova Scotia it would not be a wonderful thing, because 1866 is only forty-eight years ago, and every man who was sixteen years of age was liable to be called out to drill. In my province, where people live to a ripe old age, it is not surprising that out of 56,000 who did actually drill at that time there should be 15,000 living to-day. I do not agree with the statement that young men have been applying for this bounty. That is not the case in the constituency I represent, and I never heard of it in the province of Nova Scotia.

I want to draw the attention of the minister to the provision with regard to the widows of the veterans. The Bill provides for payment of the bounty to the widows of the veterans who were living on the 1st day of April, 1912. I see no good reason why it should be limited to the widows of veterans who were then alive. It appears to me that surviving widows of veterans who died prior to that date have the same right to the bounty as the widows of veterans who were living on the 1st day of April, 1912. Early in the present session I put a question on the Order Paper asking what the view of the minister was in regard to this matter, and he was kind enough to give me an answer which I interpreted to mean that he would make provision for the case of these widows.

Mr. EDWARDS: How many of them would there be in Nova Scotia?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I was surprised, however, when I read the resolution, to find that it did not contain any such provision. I asked the minister:

> Has the Government considered the advisability of amending the Fenian Raid Volunteer Bounty Act so as to make provision for the payment of the bounty to the widows of veterans who departed this life prior to 1912?

Here is his reply:

> Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The Act will be amended if necessary to meet every case that is not settled yet.

The cases of these widows are cases that are not settled yet, and I expected that the minister would make provision for them. I suppose that inadvertently he overlooked it and I hope that before the resolution is finally passed he will deal with this matter.

Mr. MORPHY: The hour is late, but I cannot let the resolution pass without saying a word with reference to the position of affairs in the city of Stratford, in the riding I have the honour to represent, with regard to this matter. At the time of the Fenian raid there was in Stratford what was known as the Grand Trunk Brigade, a body of very estimable men, some of whom are still living but a great many of whom have passed to their reward. Those who are living are looking, not for reward, but for like recognition for their services as that accorded to others. The wording of this amendment is very broad, and it would apply to those who were called out to drill.

The CHAIRMAN: Both amendments have been ruled out of order, and the main resolution is now before the committee.

Mr. MORPHY: In the case of the Nova Scotia veterans, they appear to have been called out by some authority which is not clearly defined, but in the case of the Grand Trunk Brigade of Stratford, the men not only drilled but they went into active service and travelled seventy miles to the American border at Port Huron, defended the lines of communication, and put in all the service that any soldier could perform, until the trouble was over. I have nothing to say against the case of the Nova Scotia veterans, but here is a case which equitably is a much stronger one on which to appeal for recognition. The Stratford men went out as soldiers, performed their duties until all was over, and then were disbanded. I have fought it out with the minister, but he is obdurate. I have not been able to make any headway with him yet, and I give him credit for standing to his guns, but I hope that after hearing my statement to-night he will reconsider the matter. The men who were called out in Nova Scotia merely went to the market square and drilled, but as they were called out by virtue of a proclamation which happens to fit in under the peculiar wording of the Act, they are to be recognized. Surely a brigade like the Grand Trunk Brigade of Stratford, with the regulation uniform, the regulation arms, all the equipment required, going into active service, travelling seventy miles from their homes, and defending their country, ought to be recognized in this legislation?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: On what ground does the minister decline to recognize such a fair claim?

Mr. MORPHY: Because the men were not regularly called out by duly constituted authority. The point he makes is that they were not part of a military unit or regiment, and unfortunately in Ontario there were no such wide and generous terms of proclamation as in Nova Scotia. In justice to my constituents, I must call the attention of the minister to this particularly hard case, which discriminates against men who are splendid citizens of Canada to-day. I would ask the minister to see that some legislation be enacted which will provide, that in equity the men who went into active service and who discharged their duty faithfully to their Sovereign and their country, should have their loyalty and patriotism recognized.

There was also recognized in my county at that time and enrolled for the defence of the country what was known as the Crosshill Company of Millbank, many of the members of which belonged to North Perth, and some to North Waterloo. These men drilled, they were advanced some distance towards the front, and then recalled. In Nova Scotia men who went to the market square by virtue of a proclamation are to get their reward, but in the cases to which I draw attention the men who actually went on active service are to be left out in the cold. Probably it is too late to amend the law this session, but I ask the minister in all candour to give it serious consideration and for the nonce to relax that strict military discipline which actuates him and to let his heart soften so that he may bring these men under the terms of some legislation which will give them that reward which is given to others who performed less service in defence of their country.

Mr. LAW: The hour is so late that I feel like apologizing for speaking on this question, but I cannot let the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) go without expressing my disapproval of them. The hon. member for Carleton is usually sane and clothed in his right mind, but to-night I think he has gone to the other extreme. There are about 800 applicants for the Fenian Raid bounty from the county which I have the honour to represent, and I do not know of a single applicant whose claim is not valid and just and right. I should certainly not wish to think otherwise. If the volunteers of Nova Scotia turned out in such large numbers in 1866, and ran the risk of losing their lives and leaving widows and orphans behind them, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) should not be so severe on them. If the militiamen of New Brunswick, when they found the danger at their door, had taken to the woods, I am sure nobody could find any fault with them if they did not get the bounty which the Minister of Militia is voting for them.

I wish to urge upon the Minister of Militia the advisability of having this bounty paid as quickly as possible. These men are getting very old. Some of the volunteers in the county of Yarmouth are very old indeed. Several of them during this last year have been in very poor circumstances; and, if they had this bounty last fall, it would, no doubt, have prolonged their lives for a time and have prevented some of them from going to the poor asylum, where they died a few weeks after going there. There are other cases of death which have occurred since the bounty should have been paid. The minister is open to censure for not having the bounty paid in the county of Yarmouth when the bounties for the other counties were paid, and I do not see any valid reason why the payment to the volunteers of the county of Yarmouth should have been delayed so long. The minister is also open to censure for not having brought this resolution to the attention of the House before. It should have been brought down before so that these bounties could have been paid before the Easter holidays.

I wish also to refer to the payment of claims of the widows of the veterans who died previous to the passing of the Act in April, 1912. I see no reason why the widows of these volunteers who came out and drilled and were prepared to go to the front, if necessary, should not be entitled to the bounty as much as widows of the men who lived until April 1, 1912. I trust the minister will amend the Act in such a way that the widows of these men may be paid the bounty.

I wish to call the attention of the minister to a circular issued in the county of Yarmouth, dated Chegoggin, N.S., December 2, 1913. I may say that Chegoggin is in the county of Yarmouth. The circular, which is addressed to the Fenian Raid veterans whose claims had been approved at that date, reads as follows:

I have received from Ottawa a list of the applications for the Fenian Raid volunteer bounty that went in from Yarmouth county previous to September 1. Your application has been approved together with about six hundred others from this county. There are thousands of cheques to be issued to Fenian Raid veterans in different counties, which involves a very large amount of extra labour on the Finance Department; but as soon as your turn is reached, your cheque will be mailed to you in a registered letter direct from Ottawa. Congratulating you on the success of your application and wishing you the compliments of the season.

I am,
Yours faithfully,
Howard W. Corning.

[Mr. Law.]

Had Mr. Corning any authority from the Department of Militia to send that circular to the Fenian Raid veterans of my county?

Mr. SAM HUGHES: Neither directly nor indirectly did any Liberal or any Conservative get any information from the Department of Militia concerning any of these names until the papers were laid on the table, and they got nothing except those papers, with one exception, namely, that I spoke to the Prime Minister and gave him data on a certain matter which does not concern the question before the House. Any man who attended the courts of Nova Scotia could have taken down a list of every man whose claim was approved. I have received similar circulars; and when I took my officers to task, they assured me that nothing had been given out by them, but that representatives of newspapers had been sitting in the courts at the time and had checked off the names as the claims were approved. I do not wish to waste the time of the House on such a trivial matter.

Mr. LAW: The answer of the minister is the same as the reply he gave to a question which I put in this House on March 18, of this year. The minister calls it a very trivial matter. I think it is not a trivial matter when Mr. Corning sends out this circular and makes statements which cannot be verified.

In the third paragraph of the circular Mr. Corning says:

There are thousands of checks to be issued to Fenian Raid veterans which involves a very large amount of extra labour on the Finance Department, but as soon as your turn is reached your check will be mailed you in a registered letter direct from Ottawa.

This led the Fenian Raid applicants in the county of Yarmouth to believe that they were to get their checks at once. On December 30, after this circular had been mailed by Mr. Corning, the payments ceased and no further bounties were paid. This caused a great deal of trouble to the applicants in the county of Yarmouth. Many of the men, expecting to get their checks at once, purchased goods or borrowed money, and have been unable up to the present time to repay those from whom they got these favours. The minister is quite right in saying that the Conservatives in the county of Yarmouth are making all the political capital they can out of this matter. I think it is absolutely wrong that the money of the people of Canada should be used for political purposes under the guise of loyalty to these veterans and to their widows.

Permit me to say further that the report circulated by the Conservatives in Yarmouth and other counties that I voted against the Fenian Rail bounties is absolutely untrue. I am in favour of these bounties and I hope that payments will be made to the veterans as soon as possible.

Mr. CARVELL: The remarks made by the hon. member for Yarmouth bear out my assertion that this matter is nothing but a game of politics. The minister himself has said that it is a political matter; let the politicians in Nova Scotia fight it out among themselves. To-day 800 men in the county of Yarmouth claim to have been members of the militia 48 years ago. I want to oppose for all I am worth the suggestion of the hon. member for Guysborough that the widows of the veterans should receive bounties. I think this thing has gone far enough; when you have paid nearly every man who was born in the province of Nova Scotia forty-eight years ago $100, it seems to me that you ought not to pay the widows. The hon. member for Yarmouth spoke about the people of Nova Scotia rallying to the flag and drilling to protect their homes and firesides against invasion. How on earth does my hon. friend think that that band of lawless persons in the neighbouring republic were going to attack Nova Scotia? The whole fleet of the United States at that time consisted of only a few old wooden hulks, and the whole British navy was ready to protect the province of Nova Scotia against invasion by sea. The hon. member for Yarmouth talked as if the people of New Brunswick went to the woods at the time of this raid. I know of a great many people who went to St. Andrews at that time, where there was a possibility of real danger; in my portion of the province of New Brunswick every able-bodied man responded to the call, and none but those who actually did take part in repelling the invasion are asking to be paid. My father was one of the men who enlisted and if he were alive he would be entitled to a bounty. But I want to point out to my friends from Nova Scotia that my mother is alive and she does not want any $100 from this Government because of what my father did on that occasion. I think it is placing a very small premium upon the loyalty of the people of this country to say that after forty-eight years have passed not only the men but the widows should receive grants; ordinary commonsense should impress upon everybody the fact that these men were but doing their duty.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE: The hon. member for Guysborough is quite right in resenting the imputation that has been cast upon those persons who have sent claims to the Government for Fenian raid bounties. If the hon. member for Carleton charges that the men who sent in these claims are crooks and perjurers, the Nova Scotia people have a right to resent his imputations in the strongest possible manner. The charges made by the hon. member against a respected body of men in the province of Nova Scotia are the most serious that have been made since I became a member of this House. He has not only insulted the members who have made these applications, but he has insulted the whole province of Nova Scotia. I think there should be an official investigation into the matter, and if the allegations of the hon. member are true, wholesale prosecutions of practically the whole population of Nova Scotia should be made; the men who made these false declarations, as well as the men who helped draw them up and secure the signatures, should be prosecuted. These wholesale accusations made by the hon. member for Carleton should either be proved or withdrawn.

Mr. McMILLAN: Thirty or forty veterans in the county of Glengarry have made application to the hon. Minister of Militia for this grant. I can cite one case, that of the Hon. A. D. Macdonald, ex-Lieutenant Governor for Ontario who was in a village called Lancaster. He was giving the word as he passed along that the Fenians were coming and that there would likely be an invasion near Lancaster. He sent word to Captain Macdonald, of Alexandria, who sent the word out through Glengarry to bring in volunteers, and before six o'clock in the morning four hundred of our stalwarts arrived in Alexandria with pitchforks ready to defend their country. While I have perhaps not the nerve to appeal to the minister for grants to the men who came with pitchforks to defend their duty, I still feel that he is in a rather awkward and embarrassing position. He is trying to do his duty to those who are deserving and when there are so many who are deserving, where is he to draw the line? I would ask the hon. minister of Militia whether the men who came with pitchforks are not as deserving of the $100 grant as those who came with shot-guns, because they did as much duty as far as the defence of the country is concerned. Therefore I feel that I really should appeal to him to grant them the $100. We have other cases from Glengarry. I hold in my hand the medal awarded to one of those who perhaps was more deserving according to the argument that has been advanced. Two men, Norman McRae and Sandy McIntosh, who were pals in those days, who marched side by side and heart to heart, ready to shed their blood in defence of Canada, applied for the grant when it was announced that the Government had decided to give $100 to the Fenian raid veterans of '66 and '70. In fact these men were the first of the file claims. Norman McRae was Sandy McIntosh's witness and Sandy McIntosh was Norman McRae's witness. They came together and sent in the application, and the result was that McRae got his $100 but poor Sandy McIntosh has not yet received his. I investigated and found that Sandy's name was not on the pay roll but Norman's was. I would ask the minister how it was that Norman McRae got his money and Sandy McIntosh did not. Sandy surely was there because I hold his medal in my hand. If the minister figures this out on the basis of the names appearing on the pay roll in order to entitle a man to the grant of $100, it is wrong, because poor Sandy was there with Norman and Norman was there with Sandy. Norman got the grant but Sandy did not. I think myself that we should perhaps remodel the legislation under which these grants are made. There are many good men who did service, even those who came in with their pitchforks, who were ready to do their duty and who are just as much entitled to the grant as those regularly enrolled in the militia. The Government should settle this matter for all time.

Mr. MACDONALD: We sat very late last night, and the subject of this resolution is not a matter of contention in any specific way for the simple reason that there has been a statute bearing on this matter since 1912. The principle has been recognized that the sum of $100 should be paid by way of bounty to the men who were called out for active service in the years 1866 and 1870. Under the terms of that Act, chapter 53 of II. George V., the time within which these applications could be made in order to take advantage of this Act was December 31, 1913. The minister has now asked the House to extend that time. Practically that is all that is involved in this resolution. In regard to the terms of the resolution, I would point out that there are some things that should be amended. My hon. friend provides for the grant of $100 to every volunteer who is living at the date of the passing of the Act based on this resolution. In view of the fact that in the latter portion of the resolution, in the grant which he makes to widows, that grant is made to the widows of volunteers alive on the 1st of April, 1912, that being the date upon which the Act of two years ago was passed. I think the minister should amend this Act so as to make the money payable to the volunteer who was living on the 1st day of April, 1912, because subsequently he goes on to provide for the payment of the money to the widows or legal representatives of the volunteers who died since that time. As a matter of good drafting, I think that should be done.

I would point out to the minister that I think in the great majority of cases that would be affected by this resolution, the applications are on file in the department, and were on file previous to the 31st of December, 1913. The number of cases in which the grant has not been applied for must be very few, and all purposes would be met by the minister limiting the time for the payment of this money to the end of this present year.

Having regard to every question involved, I think it would be better to have this question settled during this year because otherwise, in view of the expectations which have been raised in the minds of those who have sent in their applications, there would be a great deal of dissatisfaction. I would like to ask the minister to consider amending the resolution by substituting 1914 for 1915. I would also like him to consider the suggestion made by my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) as to the pension for widows and whether the time could not be extended. In view of the fact that the principle of this Bill was agreed to about two years ago, and as it is only asking for extension of time, I think the minister might well consider the suggestions which have been made. I think if the minister would ask to report progress and consider the suggestions the results would be as well in the end.

Mr. FOWLER: I am somewhat surprised at the character of the speech which has been made by the hon. member for Pictou. In view of the broad and sweeping character of the allegations made by the hon. member for Carleton, I thought that some one at least of the different members from Nova Scotia upon that side of the House would have resented those charges against the people of Nova Scotia. Where was the hon. member for North Cape Breton? Why did he sit silent in this House after those charges had been made?

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member has thought it proper to introduce my name. The discussion is not yet closed; there is plenty of time to hear from the member from North Cape Breton.

Mr. FOWLER: It is to be hoped that we will. I am afraid the sort of artillery my hon. friend uses is a little obsolete now; the rough bore is going out of fashion. The hon. member for Carleton is so much in the habit of making charges that he cannot refrain from attacking his own friends. I suppose that accounts for his attack upon the people of Nova Scotia to-night. Is it because my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) sits so close to my hon. friend from Carleton that he is afraid to resent those charges? We have had a speech from the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Law). He took up most of his time abusing two people: Mr. Corning who was fortunate enough to win an election in Yarmouth against the utmost efforts put forth by the hon. member for that constituency, and that, no doubt, is why he feels so sore against him. The remainder of his speech was taken up by an attempt to censure the Minister of Militia for doing what the hon. member for Yarmouth approves of. The only fault he has to find is that it was not done more quickly, so as to keep a lot of people in Yarmouth out of the poorhouse, because he said that was where they were going last winter.

Mr. LAW: I did not say any such thing.

Mr. FOWLER: It seems to me that the people of Yarmouth will not thank the hon. member for his somewhat unfortunate reflection upon the people of that town. But there are other members from Nova Scotia; there is the hon. member for Richmond. He sits quiet in his seat under the sneers of the hon. member for Carleton.

Mr. KYTE: The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. McKay) did not give me a chance to speak.

Mr. FOWLER: I am glad the hon. member still has the use of his speech, which we have often heard in this House—not often with pleasure. I had hoped that some of those members would have resented the charges made by the hon. member for Carleton against the people of Nova Scotia. The junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) sits silent in his seat under those reproaches. If some member on this side of the House had made that statement in regard to the 15,000 good men and true of the province of New Brunswick—men who did not shed any blood but probably shed some sweat drilling in the market place—and had called those men perjurers because, inferentially, that is what they were called by the hon. member for Carleton, what a row there would have been! I am surprised at the junior member for Halifax, and pained as well, because I did think that with all his faults (which he possesses in a high degree) there was in him some loyalty to the people of his native province. The people of Nova Scotia are not perjurers, I know they are honest men. The generation of 1866 was loyal, and so are their descendants, but so have their representatives in this House fallen that they will permit the hon. member for Carleton to insult them, and yet not one will lift his voice in protest. We have seen the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) wax eloquent in this House in regard to Nova Scotia and its people, yet he was as mild as any sucking dove when he got up to speak. Where have all the fireworks gone? Is the stock exhausted that we did not have an exhibition from the member for Pictou to-night? We might have expected him to hurl back in the very teeth of the gentleman who sits behind him the charges that that hon. member distributed so plentifully with regard to the people of Nova Scotia. Not only has my hon. friend charged the people of that province with perjury, but he has, inferentially, charged the members from Nova Scotia who have been supporting the claims of those people with what you may call subornation or perjury. Gentlemen opposite are as much guardians of the treasury as those who sit on the Treasury benches, yet these representatives are trying to get these bounties granted to people who, my hon. friend says, are not entitled to them. They are helping to rob the treasury of these various $100 bounties against the best interests of the country. I hope some members from Nova Scotia upon that side of the House will do their duty.

Mr. CARVELL: What about that side?

Mr. FOWLER: Members upon this side can always be depended upon to do their duty, but surely the first to spring to their feet should be members on the side from which the hon. gentleman comes who makes the charges. They have failed, and I have no doubt that we will hear from some gentlemen on this side from Nova Scotia.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I was not willing at first to butt into the merry little family quarrel that has been going on on the other side of the House, but inasmuch as I represent a Nova Scotia constituency, and inasmuch as the hon. gentleman who is the offender in this respect evidently expects some remarks from this side of the House, I cannot resist the temptation of making a statement, although the hour is somewhat late. In the first place, I shall refer very briefly to the remarks of the hon. member for Kings, Prince Edward Island (Mr. J. J. Hughes). I think we all sympathized with him in the plea he put forward for the payment of claims to the citizens of Prince Edward Island, even though, as he himself explained, the claims of those people for the bounty are very slight indeed.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I made no such statement.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I understood the effect of the hon. gentleman's speech to be that the citizens of Prince Edward Island, who had turned out to drill in 1866, should be paid the bounty.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: You are correct in the sense that they would not come under the provisions of the resolution when the minister insisted upon them being called out by proclamation, but they were just as well entitled to receive this consideration as the men in any other province of the Dominion.

Mr. DAVIDSON: That is really what I wanted to say, but I have not the facility of speech that my hon. friend has and perhaps the House will pardon me if my remarks are somewhat obscure. The point I wish to make is that it seems somewhat regrettable that when this hon. gentleman was sitting on this side of the House, and when the party of his own political persuasion was in power, he do not take the same interest in this question. Not only did he not make a proposition of this kind when his own party was in power, not only did he not lift his voice for his constituents, but he actually voted against a proposition of this kind. When a gentleman on our side of the House, then in Opposition, advocated the payment of bounties to the Fenian Raid veterans, my hon. friend voted against any proposition of that kind.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Tell me when that took place?

Mr. DAVIDSON: It was in the year of our Lord 1906. If my hon. friend looks at page 614 of 'Hansard' of 1906 he will see that Mr. F. D. Monk moved the following resolution:

> That it is desirable that the Government of Canada should recognize in some substantial manner the services rendered during the Fenian raids of 1866 and 1870 by our Canadian volunteers.

Mr. Hughes' name is recorded as one of those who voted against that resolution. I was not only shocked but I was absolutely pained at the very unwarranted remarks which were made to-night by my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell). My hon. friend actually states that 15,000 of the good people of Nova Scotia perjured themselves.

Mr. CARVELL: I want my hon. friend to withdraw that statement because I did not make it.

An hon. MEMBER: A big proportion.

Mr. CARVELL: No, nor a big proportion. I asked this House if they believed there were 15,000 men old enough to have been members of the militia at that time. I did not say that they had all perjured themselves. I always stand by what I say and it is not for the hon. gentleman to attribute to me something that I did not say.

An hon. MEMBER: What did you say?

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. gentleman can read what I said, and he can take his own meaning out of it.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I do not want to put words into the mouth of the hon. gentleman that he does not utter because there is no necessity of doing that. I understood him to say that this was a stupendous farce, that it was absurd.

Mr. CARVELL: I said that it was a scandal, and I repeat it.

Mr. DAVIDSON; If there are 15,000 people receiving the payment of this bounty, it means that 30,000 people have made statutory declarations because otherwise the payment would not have been made. My hon. friend pretends that he has authority for the statement that he makes because he visited Nova Scotia last year and he says that because of that visit he is in a position to speak emphatically on that point. Why was the hon. gentleman in Nova Scotia last year? He was called over by hon. gentlemen from the province of Nova Scotia who occupy seats on the other side of the House to enlighten the people of that province upon political affairs. He addressed a series of public meetings in Nova Scotia. The people of Nova Scotia, Liberals and Conservatives alike, treated him very courteously indeed. They attended his meetings, not in large numbers, but in several places in Nova Scotia electors actually went out and listened to the hon. gentleman speak for two hours. Those of us who have sat in this House and heard the hon. gentleman know what a sacrifice that was on the part of the people of Nova Scotia. Yet that is the way he rewards the hospitality that was extended to him. He comes here and says that the people of Nova Scotia by wholesale would commit perjury. If this hon. gentleman has charges to make of any kind against the people of Nova Scotia let him ask for a committee. The people of Nova Scotia are not afraid that he will establish any charges of that kind. The hon. gentleman is busy, I understand, making charges against public men in the province of New Brunswick. I know nothing about the merits of those charges but if they are no better supported than the very grave charges he has made to-night against a very large number of the citizens of Nova Scotia they are not worthy of the consideration of a commission.

I was pleased to see my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) rise to the defence, in a limited way, of the province of Nova Scotia notwithstanding the fact that that hon. gentleman and all the other Liberal members from Nova Scotia, had their faces wreathed in the most approving smiles during the course of the utterances of the hon. member for Carleton. I was very glad when it came to a question of something being recorded on 'Hansard,' to see the hon. member for Guysborough rise to the defence of the province of Nova Scotia. He defended to-night the payment of these claims to the people of that province.

I know very little about any other county than the county I represent in this House, but I do want to say that I do not believe one person who has put in an application from Annapolis has been guilty of perjury. In nearly every particular, in the county of Annapolis, the original rolls are kept showing each day that the veterans attended drill. We have the original records. It is not a case merely of taking the affidavits of these people but we have the statutory proof and if the hon. member (Mr. Carvell), wants to come to Annapolis and to say that the people of that country are perjurers we will welcome him indeed. I think the hon. gentleman will be a little tardy before he again visits Nova Scotia to lecture the people of that province on political questions.

I was rather pleased that the hon. member for Guysborough, even at this late date, rose to defend the action of the Government in this regard, because, as a matter of fact, he has not always been the advocate of the payment of these bounties. I do not think my hon. friend will deny that.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes. What does the hon. gentleman mean by saying that I have not always advocated the payment of these bounties?

Mr. DAVIDSON: I will try to explain. In the year of our Lord 1906 the hon. gentleman was in the House representing the county of Guysborough. A resolution was proposed which I have already read, by an hon. member, Mr. Monk. On that occasion did the hon. member for Guysborough vote for Mr. Monk's resolution?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Mr. Monk's resolution had no reference whatever to the payment of $100 to the Fenian Raid veterans. I understood the resolution referred to a land grant.

Mr. DAVIDSON: These are the words:

> That it is desirable that the Government of Canada should recognize in some substantial manner the services rendered during the Fenian Raid of 1866 and 1870 by our Canadian volunteers.

Is there anything there about a land grant?

Mr. SINCLAIR: If you will read the speech you will find he did refer to land grants and nothing but land grants.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am not reading the speech. I am reading the resolution—the thing that was voted on.

Mr. PROULX: Was there an amendment to that resolution?

Mr. DAVIDSON: And the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sinclair) in 1906 voted against that resolution which did not say anything about land grants, and which merely asked that these veterans be rewarded in some substantial way. Furthermore, in the year

1911, my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) proposed substantially the same resolution, which is to be found at page 9603 'Hansard':

> That it is desirable that the Government of Canada should recognize in some substantial manner the services rendered during the Fenian raids of 1866 and 1870 by our Canadian volunteers.

It is seen therefore that some years after the first we have a second resolution and nothing about a land grant in it, and yet the hon. member for Guysborough when his friends were in power voted that they should do nothing to reward the veterans.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I desire positively to contradict the statement made by my hon. friend. I was not present; I was not in the Dominion of Canada at the time that resolution was moved in the House.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I will refer the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sinclair) to page 9634 of 'Hansard'. I do not think my hon. friend will repudiate a pair, and I find, among other names on that page, the euphonious name of Sinclair, which I presume means him.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend does not find on that page that I voted against the resolution of my hon. friend from North Grey, and if he says so he is not telling the truth.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I will be very glad to hand the book over to my hon. friend.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I was not in the country at the time; I was in England.

Mr. DAVIDSON: The hon. gentleman was paired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Do hon. gentlemen opposite say that pairing is not voting?

Mr. MACDONALD: Certainly.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Do they say that a pair means nothing? I want to say
1 a.m. that it either means something or that the whip on the Liberal side of the House on that occasion practised the grossest fraud on this side of the House. I am a very young member of this House, but I have been a watchful student of 'Hansard,' and I never found yet an instance in which a member of Parliament denied or repudiated a pair.

Mr. CURRIE: He is the first man to do it in the House.

[Mr. Davidson.]

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is not repudiating a pair.

Mr. DAVIDSON: My hon. friend from Guysborough is not alone in this regard, because other members from Nova Scotia, in fact, every single Liberal member who was then representing Nova Scotia, including my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), including my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald)—

Mr. MACDONALD: Just wait there. I want to say to my hon. friend that he has suppressed the facts in regard to the resolution of 1906. Mr. Monk, in moving the resolution, did not know that there was a Fenian Raid veteran in the province of Nova Scotia, and that resolution was opposed by Sir Frederick Borden, representing the Government, who pointed out to Mr. Monk that Nova Scotia had a large number of veterans whose claims should be taken into consideration. He asked Mr. Monk to withdraw the resolution in order that the whole question might be inquired into, and we voted against Mr. Monk's resolution because he did not know up to that time that there was a single Fenian Raid veteran in Nova Scotia.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. MACDONALD: The noisy brigade over there on the other side do not know what they are talking about. Furthermore, in regard to 1911—

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am very glad to have my hon. friend endeavour to correct a mistake, but I do not want him to make a speech when I am addressing the House. I think he occupies as much of the time of the House as I do, and I do not think he should deny me the little time I am taking now.

Mr. MACDONALD: If my hon. friend does not want me to correct a mistake in regard to 1911, I shall not make any further reference to it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACDONALD: Do I understand that my hon. friend (Mr. Davidson) will permit me to correct a mistake with regard to 1911?

Mr. DAVIDSON: Certainly, you can give your side of the case if you wish.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman will find a list of pairs on the resolution moved by Mr. Middlebro. This resolution was a purely obstructive motion made on going into Supply, as everybody knows. At the time the motion was made my hon. friend from Guysborough was in England, and the hon. member (Mr. Davidson) indulges in diatribes against him because his name appears in the list of pairs. I was in Nova Scotia at the time; I was not in the House. I never knew the resolution was moved, and how can I be charged with responsibility?

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am very glad to have the explanation of the hon. member from Pictou, because I do not want to do that hon. gentleman any injustice. He is very careful not to do injustice to anybody else, and I do not want to do injustice to him.

Mr. LAW: Did I understand the hon. member (Mr. Davidson) to say that every member from the province of Nova Scotia on the Liberal side voted against that resolution in 1911?

Mr. DAVIDSON: Every member on the Liberal side who was in the House.

Mr. LAW: You did not qualify your statement in that way before.

Mr. DAVIDSON: When this motion was put in 1906, the hon. gentleman appears as voting against it, and he never repudiated the pair until this late hour, when it cannot do him any harm.

Mr. LAW: I am not down there as paired; I defy the hon. gentleman to show it.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is 'Mr. Low,' not 'Mr. Law.'

Mr. DAVIDSON: We will find out about that.

Mr. LAW: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davidson) had better get on another pair of glasses if he wants to find my name there. I call on him to apologize for his statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. LAW: I ask him to withdraw the statement. It is absolutely untrue. It has been stated in Yarmouth and in other counties over and over again by Conservatives. The statement is a wilful and deliberate lie. I ask the hon. gentleman, if he is a gentleman at all, to withdraw the statement.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am very sorry that my hon. friend (Mr. Law) has shown so much heat, because really it is a case where he has to take back water, not I. If he will look at page 647 of 'Hansard,' 1906, he will find his name is there, L-A-W, and while I would like to accommodate my hon. friend and take back any statement displeasing to him, yet as a good constitutional member of this House I am bound to stand by the records, and now I am going to ask my hon. friend from Yarmouth to take back the statement he made.

Mr. LAW: I say I did not vote, and my name is not there as voting, but it may be there as a pair.

Mr. DAVIDSON. The statement I made was that the hon. gentleman appeared as a pair and he said he did not.

Mr. CARVELL: Read the record as it is and let us have it all.

Mr. DAVIDSON: You will find it at page 647.

Mr. CARVELL: We have not all got that volume of 'Hansard' here.

Mr. DAVIDSON: There are a great many names of Nova Scotia Liberal members who either voted or were paired.

Mr. CARVELL: Give us the names of those who voted and those who were paired.

Mr. DAVIDSON: It is really too much bother to pick them out but they are there. My hon. friend from Pictou, and my hon. friend from Yarmouth, and my hon. friend from Guysborough come forward now when their party is not in power, notwithstanding the fact that they appear as voting against this proposition, when their own party was in power. and they now say, when they are in opposition and when they have no responsibility, that we on this side have not gone far enough. They say that we should pay not only those who were alive in the year 1912, and the widows of those who have died since that date, but the widows of all Fenian Raid veterans and their children. All hon. members opposite deplored that the Minister of Militia was so slow and dilatory in making these payments. Had my hon. friends opposite stood to the back of Mr. Monk in 1906, or to the back of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), in the year 1911 and forced their Government to enact legislation such as we enacted the moment we got into power, then these people would not have had to wait so long; they would have all been paid and a great many widows, whose husbands have died since 1906, in all these counties would also have been paid. Hon. gentlemen opposite cut a very peculiar figure at the present time. When their party was in power, they were very careful as to what obligations their Government would assume; but when they are in opposition, when their words are merely as idle tales, then they are very generous. They remind me of a Bible story. It is recorded in Holy Writ how Lazarus begged alms of Dives in this world and although Dives, when he was alive and had the pull, would not give Lazarus a crumb, after he went to his reward he became very full of concern for his relatives. He thought the Lord could not be trusted to look after his relatives that he had left on the earth, and he wanted to go back to the earth to warn them. Hon. gentlemen when they are out of power, when they have no influence, when between us and them there is a deep gulf fixed, are very anxious to come forward with a great deal of advice and explanation; but it counts for very little and the people understand that.

A great deal of talk was engaged in by the other side in reference to an alleged attempt of the Conservative party in Nova Scotia to make a party issue of this affair. Hon. gentlemen opposite became very wrathful when they referred to the tactics of our side in trying to make political capital out of this. I have yet to learn that such tactics have been practised by our side, but I know that hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to do something very much like making political capital out of this affair. This is one letter, of which I have scores in my desk, which has been sent out to veterans in Nova Scotia:

My Dear Sir:

I have been receiving so many inquiries asking for an explanation as to why the claims of Fenian Raid veterans in Yarmouth county have not been paid, that I thought it advisable to obtain a complete list (which is the first and only one furnished by the Department of Militia) of those whose claims have not been paid so that I would be in a position to give such information on the subject as is available here.

I find your name on the list of those that have been approved. The authority under which this bounty is being paid expired December 31, 1913, and no further cheques can be issued until the Act is amended and provision made for the unpaid approved claims of which there are over six hundred in our county.

The Minister of Militia has given the assurance to the House that legislation will be introduced to authorize the payment of all outstanding approved claims and when this Act is introduced it will receive my hearty and cordial support as the original Act did which passed the House with the full approval and support of all the Liberal members.

I desire to take this opportunity to say that the statement made from time to time in Yarmouth that I voted against the payment of the bounty to Fenian Raid veterans is absolutely untrue, as the measure granting the bounty passed the House without a dissenting voice, and the grant to Nova Scotia veterans was largely due to the energy displayed by some of our Nova Scotia Liberal members.

I beg to assure you that I shall do all I can to expedite the payment to all Yarmouth county veterans.

I remain,
Yours faithfully,
Bowman B. Law.

There is another letter here signed by my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), which is exactly the same and in which this striking sentence again occurs:

I desire to take this opportunity to say that the statement made from time to time in certain newspapers that I voted against the payment of the bounty to Fenian Raid veterans is absolutely untrue. The measure granting the bounty passed the House without a dissenting voice, and the grant to Nova Scotia veterans was largely due to the energy displayed by some of our Nova Scotia Liberal members.

I would like the hon. gentlemen to explain what particular energies they displayed in order to make these bounties payable.

Mr. SINCLAIR: At the time that the Fenian Raid Bounty Act was passed, about the 1st of April, 1912, my hon. friend from Annapolis was a member of this House and I have no doubt that he was in his place at the time when this question was asked by myself. He will find the question on page 6255 of 'Hansard' of that date:

Mr. Sinclair: Will the Act apply to men who were called out to drill? I understand that in the province of Nova Scotia a number of men were drafted and collected at some particular place, and submitted themselves to some few weeks of drill preparatory to going to the front, but they never did go. What will be done in the case of those men?

Mr. Hughes (Victoria): The law says they must have been called out for active service and the man who is called out for drill is not called out for active service. He has to be called out in anticipation of meeting the enemy.

My hon. friend was in his place, and he did not rise to say a word against the decision of the minister, who practically said, when the bill was being adopted by this House, that not one dollar of the bounty was to go to Nova Scotia.

Mr. DAVIDSON: What is the date?

Mr. SINCLAIR: March 27, 1912.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: The mistake was made by the hon. member for Guysborough who did not seem to know the difference between annual drill and active service.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. minister, one year after this Act was passed, admitted that he did not intend in 1912 that all the people that now come within the Act should be included.

Mr. DAVIDSON: It is absolutely a matter of interpretation of the Act. What the minister said was that every person in Canada who could show that he came under the provisions of the Act would get the bounty. That is exactly the meaning of the statement read by the hon. member for Guysborough.

If any person could prove that he had been called out for active service under that provision, he would be entitled to the bounty. It was up to those interested in the Nova Scotia veterans merely to show that the Nova Scotia militia had been called out for the actual service and then the Nova Scotia veterans would come under the Act. The Bill as passed provides that those persons called out for actual service were entitled to the bounty. Hon. gentlemen representing Nova Scotia constituencies on this side of the House were able to prove—

Mr. MACDONALD: Not a single Tory in Nova Scotia knew that this Act was to apply until last year.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Exactly, we did not know until we hunted up the proof. The hon. member for Guysborough never opened his mouth until we had obtained the decision of the department and until we had notified the public of that decision through the press of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MACDONALD: The first bounty paid in the province of Nova Scotia was paid to a man from my county, upon application which I sent in in the autumn of 1912.

Mr. DAVIDSON: It was not paid until after we had provided the department with the proof that the Nova Scotia militia were actually called out for service.

Mr. MACDONALD: It was paid in December, 1912.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am familiar with the matter to which the hon. gentleman refers. I read a speech which he made in the county of Pictou and in which he referred to this; I took the trouble to go to the department and look the matter up and I found that this application was not paid until after we had gone to the department and got this decision. Furthermore, the hon. member for Guysborough never said anything about this in the House until he saw the papers coming from our constituencies in which the whole law was explained to the electors, and the proclamation upon which we based our case was set out.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The hon. gentleman is making a mis-statement.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I think I have stood a reasonable number of interruptions.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Middlebro): The rule is that unless the member speaking permits it, he shall not be interrupted.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understood my hon. friend to say that I did not raise my voice at all at the time the Act was being passed, but that I did so later.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I made no such assertion.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. member said that some months after the Act was passed 'we' discovered that all who had been called out for active service were entitled to the bounty. Will the hon. member explain to me and to the committee what he meant by 'we' discovered that certain people were entitled to the bounty, and that it had not been known that they were so entitled at the time of the passing of the Act?

Mr. DAVIDSON: When this Act went upon the statute book members representing Nova Scotia constituencies, who were in the habit of conferring together with regard to these matters, were receiving a large number of letters from Fenian Raid veterans inquiring as to the possibility of their obtaining the bounty. Upon looking at the Act we found that it applied only to those persons who had been called out for actual service. The question then arose as to what constituted actual service, and whether or not Nova Scotia veterans could qualify under that Act. We first went to the department, and the department insisted that proof must be given that the Nova Scotia people had actually been called out for active service. At first we were not able to get any evidence to convince the department, but afterwards we discovered a proclamation that had been issued by the Governor of Nova Scotia, signed by Sir Charles Tupper, who was then provincial secretary of the province, in which all members of the militia in Nova Scotia were called out for active service by the express terms of the proclamation. We presented our case to the department, and the department said that that was satisfactory. We then, in turn, notified our constituents to that effect.

Mr. MACDONALD: When was that?

Mr. DAVIDSON: We notified our constituents in February, 1913. Applications had gone in from various counties, but no bounties had been paid up to the time when the proclamation was discovered. In March, after certain persons had sent copies of the newspapers containing this information to hon. gentlemen opposite, the hon. member for Halifax, the hon. member for Pictou, the hon. member for Guysborough and several other hon. gentlemen opposite rose, with apparent indignation, and criticised us for following this procedure and for appointing commissioners to take these applications. A few weeks afterwards these hon. gentlemen were doing the same thing themselves.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Doing what?

Mr. DAVIDSON: Following the very course which we pursued.

Mr. MACLEAN: What course was that?

Mr. DAVIDSON: That of informing their constituents, through the press, that those who were called out under the terms of the proclamation were entitled to the bounty, and the further course of appointing competent and intelligent commissioners in the county to take these applications. That was the course we followed, and that was the course imitated by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does my hon. friend say that it was in February of 1913, when he first discovered that the veterans of Nova Scotia were sure of obtaining the bounties?

Mr. DAVIDSON: No, I said nothing of the kind. Some time previous to February, 1913, we made the discovery and in that month we wrote the press.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The hon. gentleman—

Mr. DAVIDSON: Surely, Mr. Chairman, I have been interrupted often enough.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Middlebro): I must rule that no member has a right to interrupt the speaker without his permission.

Mr. DAVIDSON: With regard to this letter sent out by Mr. Law, I understand that all the Liberal members of Nova Scotia circulated the identical letter, under a different name.

[Mr. Davidson.]

Mr. CARROLL: I must give that assertion a most emphatic denial. I have written to every applicant in the county of Cape Breton, but I have written no such letter as the hon. gentleman has read.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I do not wish to do the hon. gentlemen an injustice, and I am happy to accept his explanation. I do not wonder that he protests his innocence and that he desires to escape criticism of this kind. I think it should be borne in mind that every Liberal member from the province of Nova Scotia, when his party was in power, did everything in his power to prevent the Fenian Raid veterans of the province of Nova Scotia from receiving these bounties.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is absolutely untrue.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Hon. gentlemen need not give the lie to me; they will have to give the lie to the records of this House. The records are there; they will speak for themselves. Every time the House was divided upon this question when the Liberal party was in power, hon. gentlemen opposite gave their deadly and hostile opposition to the measure. The moment we got into power we started to redeem our pledges and one of the first acts of this Government was to redeem its pledge in this respect. Hon. gentlemen opposite are not satisfied and those gentlemen who would not do anything when their party was in power are now claiming that this Government is not going far enough.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: As the Chairman has ruled that an amendment to this resolution cannot be accepted under the rules, I would ask that the minister withdraw the resolution and get the consent of the Governor General to add the province of Prince Edward Island with the others.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You cannot beat Hughes out that way.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: I understand that this resolution would amount to an increase in the vote and that is the reason an amendment cannot be made. The only way that this can be done is by getting the authority of the Governor in Council, if it is not withdrawn now and a Bill is brought in on this resolution, no amendment can be made to it and I would think the proper way for the minister to do justice to Prince Edward Island would be to withdraw this resolution and bring in another in a few day's time.

Mr. KYTE: The bold and defiant challenge which the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) hurled across the floor of the House to hon. gentlemen on this side has its parallel in the nursery legend of a family in my town. A little boy, two and a half years old, was wearing his first pair of trousers and was very proud of them. He came out on the sidewalk to see if any one would notice them. The butcher came along, stopped his team at the door, and while he was cutting the order of meat which the boy's mother gave, the young fellow stood in front with his hands in his trousers' pockets. The butcher did not notice him. Then the boy went around in front of the horse, looked at the horse and finally said: 'Say, mister, is your horse afwaid of twousies?' I wish to say to the hon. member for Annapolis that I am not afraid of his trousers nor of the hon. member who stands in them. Hon. gentlemen express some surpise that the members from Nova Scotia did not protest against what they were pleased to call an imputation upon the honesty and good faith of the people of the province of Nova Scotia who applied for Fenian Raid bounties. I want them to understand that they are not the first men who are willing to stand up in this House and defend the honesty of the people of that province. But I did not understand the hon. member for Carleton to cast any imputation on the people of Nova Scotia in respect of fraudulent applications for Fenian Raid bounties. What I did understand the hon. member for Carleton to say was that it was preposterous that in Nova Scotia the bounty should be given to men who did not go to the front to repel the invaders who threatened the shores of Canada in 1866, men who simply served in the militia at home, whereas the men in New Brunswick who actually left their homes and went to the front to meet the invaders did not receive a single dollar. If the people of Nova Scotia are enjoying the advantage of a bounty of $100 in respect of the service they performed in 1866 then the people of Nova Scotia have very little to thank my hon. friend from Annapolis for or any hon. gentleman supporting the Government in this House. My hon. friend in the course of his observations endeavoured to fasten upon the Liberal members in this House a charge of having voted against remuneration for Fenian Raid bounties in Nova Scotia when in 1906 they voted down a resolution moved by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that Mr. Monk's resolution was not for a pension or for a grant of money to compensate these men for their services. His whole argument was in favour of a grant of land to be paid, not to the veterans of Nova Scotia, not to the veterans of New Brunswick, or of Prince Edward Island, but simply to the men who were called out in Ontario and Quebec in 1866.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Will my hon. friend be good enough to show by the resolution of Mr. Monk where it is stated that it is confined to the people of Quebec?

Mr. MACDONALD: He never heard of Nova Scotia having Fenian Raid veterans when he moved the motion.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I understood the hon. member to say that what the Nova Scotia Liberal members voted against was that payments should be made not only to citizens of Ontario and Quebec. That, furthermore, it was not for a money payment but for land. I ask him to point out, in the resolution which was voted down, anything to that effect.

Mr. KYTE: It is just the size of the hon. member for Annapolis to endeavour to confine my remarks to the resolution. What I propose to do is to direct the attention of the committee to Mr. Monk's interpretation of the resolution. Mr. Monk said:

> As to the kind of acknowledgment to be given, undoubtedly that which has been talked about during these interviews, and probbably on that account is most mentioned amongst the veterans, is a grant of land. We have a very large territory still in the hands of the Government which we are endeavouring to settle. It is most desirable that that territory should be settled as soon as possible and with the best sort of people. I do not think it would be possible to find better men to undertake the settlement of our great Northwest than these men. Objection has been taken on the ground that there are not only the veterans whose claim I am now urging, but also other deserving classes. Reference is made to the volunteers, who, in 1885 went up to the Northwest to put down the rebellion there. There were also those who saw active service during the Boer war in South Africa.

He did not even want these veterans to get the land free. He said:

> I am advocating, not an absolutely free grant of land perhaps to those men, but on account of their merits we should acknowledge their services, the fidelity with which they have performed their duties, and at the same time encourage the volunteer movement, which I think should be encouraged in this country.

Reference to the speech of Mr. Monk will show that his resolution was designed to bring about some recognition for the volunteers in the province of Quebec and in the province of Ontario. He proceeded:

> Scrip might be given to them, quarter-sections might be given to them without conditions and they would do with them what they saw fit, or conditions might be imposed upon them whilst granting them each a quarter-section which would enable them if they would not ensure their own presence on the lands to be settled—because most of them have reached an age when it is to a certain extent impossible for them to go themselves and settle these lands—to delegate the execution of the restrictions upon them for the settlement and for the final patenting of these lots to members of their own families.

Now, Mr. Monk, in the light of the interpretation which he places on the resolution by his own language, certainly was not seeking support for his resolution from the Liberal members from the province of Nova Scotia. These volunteers in Nova Scotia performed their service in 1866. It was forty odd years afterwards that Mr. Monk moved his resolution in this House, and at that stage, when the youngest of these men must have been sixty years of age, the only compensation he desired for them, even if he intended they should benefit by it, was that they should pull up their stakes, leave the homes they had won in Nova Scotia, leave the land which they had cultivated, on which they had brought up their families and go out to the Northwest to take up quarter sections—and even these were not to be free to them.

Mr. S. SHARPE: Under the terms of that resolution might not $100 be given instead of land?

Mr. KYTE: There is an old story about what might have happened if something else had not happened. I am only speaking about this resolution. Sir Frederick Borden said on that occasion:

> I understood one of his arguments to be that after all, this will not be such a serious matter because there were less than 2,000 of these men living in the province of Quebec and some 10,000 or 12,000 in Ontario.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend unnecessarily—

Mr. KYTE: Do not do it then.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I said 'unnecessarily.' Is the hon. gentleman quoting from 'Hansard' of 1906?

Mr. KYTE: Yes.

[Mr. Kyte.]

Mr. DAVIDSON: It was in 1911 that the hon. member voted against the principle?

Mr. KYTE: I did not vote against it. To continue the quotation:

> Well, what about the other 15,000 or 20,000 who answered the call to arms and were ready to go to the front and who have since passed away? Are their children not to be recognized? Are we to limit this recognition entirely to the men now living and restrict it to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec? Why not include Nova Scotia and New Brunswick?

There we have the crux of the whole matter. I think that I have convinced you, Mr. Chairman, and members of this committee—even if I have failed to impress the validity of my argument upon the member for Annapolis—that if the members from the province of Nova Scotia were present and voted against that resolution they were amply justified in doing so in the interests of the veterans of that province. If that resolution had been carried not one dollar would have been paid to the veterans of Nova Scotia; not an acre of land would have been granted to them, and yet the hon. member for Annapolis would endeavour to make out a charge of disloyalty on the part of Liberal members of this House against the people of that province because they did not vote away a grant of land to the veterans of Ontario and Quebec. I am not so sure that my hon. friend from Annapolis was always so considerate in respect of the claims of the people of Ontario and Quebec. I recall that in years gone by, when the province of Quebec was sending a very substantial majority to support the Liberal Government, my hon. friend from Annapolis was not so considerate or so anxious to accord favours to the people of that important province. So much for the resolution moved by Mr. Monk in 1906. I say that if that resolution were before the House to-day I would vote against it, and I venture to say that the hon. member for Annapolis would not have the courage to stand up and support it.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Most emphatically I would support it.

Mr. KYTE: In 1911 another resolution was moved in this House by yourself, Mr. Chairman (Mr. Middlebro), and I find it is in the exact terms of the resolution moved by Mr. Monk in 1906.

Mr. S. SHARPE: How did you vote?

Mr. KYTE: I will tell my hon. friend. The information will come just as soon as he wants it. The resolution moved in 1911 by yourself, Mr. Chairman, read as follows:

> It is desirable that the Government of Canada should recognize in some substantial manner the services rendered during the Fenian Raids of 1866 and 1870 by our Canadian volunteers.

It is unnecessary for me to remind you, Mr. Chairman, that the time and manner in which you moved that resolution made it absolutely a resolution of want of confidence. But, Sir, I am not going to justify upon that ground the action of any Liberal member from Nova Scotia for voting against that resolution. I pointed out that the resolution which you moved, Sir, was in the exact terms of the resolution moved by Mr. Monk. But the hon. member for Jacques Cartier interpreted what his resolution meant. It meant that the volunteers of Ontario and Quebec, only, should be compensated for their services, and compensated in respect of a grant of land in the Northwest. Before you closed your speech, you also interpreted your resolution in the following language:

> It is not for me to say what form that recognition should take, whether a grant of land or a pension. If a pension, it is to be remembered that most of these men must be close to 80 years of age and cannot live long. I think it is as little as the Government can do to give some substantial recognition to these men who came to the aid of the country in time of stress.

It will be observed that it was your desire, Mr. Chairman, that either a grant of land, or a pension should be given to the volunteers who took part in the defence of their country against the Fenian raid of 1866. Does the Act passed by the Minister of Militia in 1912 provide for a grant of land or a pension to the volunteers of 1866 and 1870? Do the veterans of Nova Scotia, who came out to drill in 1866, get a pension or a grant of land, according to the intention that you had, when you moved your resolution? Therefore, when hon. gentlemen say that hon. members from Nova Scotia, or any other province, who voted against the resolution moved by yourself, voted against the grant of $100 to the Fenian Raid veterans of Nova Scotia, they are stating what is absolutely untrue, and which cannot be justified by the facts. I was not present when the vote was taken in 1911.

Mr. S. SHARPE: Oh, oh.

Mr. KYTE: My hon. friend across the way is inclined to be jocular, but perhaps I can give an explanation of why my vote was not recorded against that motion, which will even satisfy him. Parliament adjourned that year about the 24th of May to enable the right hon. leader of the Government and other members to attend the coronation of His Gracious Majesty King George V. Parliament resumed on the 18th of July. That was on Tuesday. I left my home on Monday morning for the purpose coming to Ottawa by the fastest and most expeditious route. I went by the fastest and most expeditious route, but did not arrive in Ottawa city until a quarter to twelve on the Tuesday night following. Before I arrived here, the motion of the hon. member for North Grey had been disposed of; the vote had been taken, and I had not recorded my vote.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Is the hon. gentleman's vote not recorded against that?

Mr. KYTE: My vote is not recorded against it, as the record shows.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I think the record shows exactly the opposite.

Mr. KYTE: My hon. friend has been long enough in Parliament to have some idea of the elementary principles that govern with regard to divisions, and inasmuch as he has not been able to master them I will explain them to him. When a special vote is to be taken at a certain definite time it is usual for any two members to pair on that particular vote. Such a pair was not recorded as regards my vote. Parliament adjourned on the 24th of May. The hon. member for North Grey had not intimated in any manner whatever that he intended to bring a resolution of that kind before the House. Not a single member in the House knew that the hon. member intended to move such a resolution; certainly I had no intimation of it. That being the case, and Parliament having adjourned on the 24th of May, and having resumed on the 18th July, having received no notice or intimation from the hon. member for North Grey that he was going to move that resolution, how could I have been paired on that vote?

I would like to ask any hon. member if he thinks that on every motion that is brought up, and on every vote that is taken which is not specifically brought home to him, he is bound by a pair made for him in his absence for the convenience of the whips.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Does the hon. gentleman want an answer?

Mr. KYTE: I must object to the hon. gentleman interrupting me any further.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I understood the hon. member to ask a question.

Mr. KYTE: I did not ask the hon. gentleman any question because I know I could not get any information from that source. It is well known that there are dead pairs, that there are pairs which are alive and that there are pairs which are farcical. We do know that when a vote is taken in the House and when members on either side happen to be absent, in order to make it appear, that members are always in their places in the House, the two whips get together without reference to the opinions, wills or wishes of the men who are absent, and say: Put down the name of so-and-so on the Liberal side against the name of so-and-so on the Conservative side and that is the way in which formal pairs are made. I am not endeavouring to shirk any responsibility in respect to my vote on the resolution of the hon. member for North Grey. In view of the fact that the resolution of the hon. member for North Grey was in the exact words of the resolution of Mr. Monk who stated that he had reference to grants of land to the Fenian Raid veterans, in Quebec and Ontario, and in view of the fact that the hon. member for North Grey stated that he was not certain whether he wanted a land grant or a pension for the volunteers in Ontario and Quebec, I would have been amply justified in voting against the resolution because it did not cover the case of the Fenian Raid veterans of Nova Scotia. My observations in regard to my own vote and my own pair on the resolution of the hon. member for North Grey in 1911 apply absolutely to every other Liberal member from the province of Nova Scotia who was not present during that vote.

We can point to the Bill passed in 1912, which is the subject more particularly of the discussion here this evening. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence having been aware that a considerable agitation had developed and continued in Quebec and Ontario for some years in respect to the compensation that ought to be paid to Fenian Raid veterans, considered that the time was opportune to deal with it. I venture to assert that before I have concluded my observations I will be able to prove that the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence, like the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, did not have in mind compensating the Fenian Raid veterans of Nova Scotia. The veterans of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were not in his mind at the time; he simply had reference to the veterans of Quebec and Ontario when this Bill was under discussion. I quote from 'Hansard,' 1912:

Mr. Currie: Might I ask the minister if it is intended to give the men of 1866 the same amount of pensions for wounds as the 1886 men got?

Mr. Hughes (Victoria): This is not dealing with pensions at all. That would have to be done by way of special Act.

Mr. Broder: This applies to veterans of 1866 and 1870.

Mr. Hughes (Victoria): If a man were called out in active service in either year. Some men were out only a week, and they come in under the Act; some were out three months and they get just the same. It is a thing one cannot possibly equalize in any other way.

Mr. Sinclair: Will the Act apply to men who were called out to drill? I understand that in the province of Nova Scotia a number of men were drafted and collected at some particular place, and submitted themselves to some few weeks of drill preparatory to going to the front, but they never did go. What will be done in the case of those men?

Mr. Hughes (Victoria): The law says they must have been called out for active service and the man who is called out for drill is not called out for active service. He has to be called out in anticipation of meeting the enemy.

Mr. Sinclair: I have no doubt it was in anticipation of service, but the raid, as everybody remembers, was short. These men were not required to go to the front, but they were drafted. They went through the process of being drafted, selections were made from each regiment and those men that were selected, were taken from different places and submitted to drill preparatory to going to the front, but there was no call for them to go to the front.

Mr. Hughes (Victoria): My hon. friend will realize from his legal knowledge that if the official notification to the officers in the locality called out these troops in a certain year for preparatory drill only, then they do not come under the Act. If they were called out for active service—as certain of the Nova Scotia volunteers were called out, and went to the front—they do come under the Act.

There cannot be any question as to what was in the mind of the Minister of Militia and Defence. According to his interpretation of the Act which he was endeavouring to get through Parliament, it was only such men, such volunteers, as were called out and went to the front that were entitled to the volunteer bounties provided for by the Act.

The hon. member for Annapolis was sitting in his place at that time and other hon. gentlemen from Nova Scotia, supporting the Government were, I presume, sitting in their places but yet not a single one of them raised his voice in behalf of the men of Nova Scotia who came out to drill but who were not called to the front. Therefore the hon. member for Annapolis, as every other hon. gentleman from Nova Scotia, knew absolutely, in view of the interpretation which the minister gave to that section, that not one of the men in Nova Scotia who drilled in 1866 would profit to the extent of a single dollar in respect to that bounty.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: Not one man in Nova Scotia who was simply called out to drill has received the bounty or will receive it.

Mr. KYTE: If he was called out?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: Not one man in Nova Scotia who was simply called out to drill, unless he has perjured himself—and I do not believe that any man has perjured himself—has received the bounty or will receive it. He must have been called out for active service.

Mr. MACDONALD: If he was called out in response to the proclamation, even if he only drilled, he receives the bounty.

Mr. HUGHES: If he was called out for active service.

Mr. KYTE: Did he go to the front?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: Yes.

Mr. KYTE: He went in spirit to the front but in body he lagged behind.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: I am sorry to hear the hon. gentleman slandering the people of Nova Scotia and to see him joining hands with the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell).

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Where was the front? Was it in Nova Scotia?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: Prince Edward Island.

Mr. KYTE: I have a letter that was written by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Stewart) in respect to the Fenian Raid bounty. It is as follows:

Bridgewater, N.S., November 14, 1912.
F. C. Lavers, Esq., M.D.,
New Ross.

Dear Sir,—I have your letter of recent date re Fenian Raid Bounty Act.

The Act as it stands at present only applies to those who saw active service and those who drilled under the old Nova Scotia Militia Act in 1865 and 1866, are not on that account alone qualified to receive the bounty. They must also have seen active service and who saw active service at that been on the pay roll of the country.

Yours truly,
(Sgd) Dugald Stewart.

Another letter reads as follows:

November 1, 1912.

The Act you refer to was passed last winter and referred to those times of the Fenian Raid. Just what the most liberal interpretation of active service means has not been clearly defined, but so far only those who were in active engagements or were on the pay roll of the country at the time, are recognized as being entitled to the bounty.

Therefore, as late as November, 1912, seven months after the Act had been passed and received the assent of His Royal Highness, a member as closely associated with the Minister of Militia as the hon. member for Lunenburg believed in his mind and heart that only those men who went to the front were entitled to the Fenian Raid bounty. I think I have some more proof as to what men higher up in the councils of the Government believed. Last session of Parliament the following question was asked the Right Hon. R. L. Borden by Mr. Sinclair:

Are the parties who subjected themselves to drill and who made preparations to go to the front if they were required entitled to share in the bounty that is to be given to Fenian Raid veterans?

Mr. Borden: I regret that I am not in a position to give my hon. friend any very definite information on the subject, as the question to which he has alluded has not been brought to my personal attention. I would suppose that it would depend upon the terms of the statute and upon the construction placed upon the statute by the legal advisers of the Department of Militia and Defence.

I wonder if the member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) was the legal adviser called in by the Government to interpret the Act passed by this Parliament. Then again, Mr. Macdonald said:

The hon. minister should make an authoritative statement as to whether or not any one in the province who did not respond to the call for active service which was made under proclamation in the spring of 1866, but who did perform military service in that year, is entitled to receive anything under the Act. The interpretation of the Act seems to be reasonably clear, and I ask these questions for the purpose of adding the weight of the authority of the hon. minister to the information already at hand, so that Parliament and the country will understand exactly what the policy of the Government is on the subject. What did Col. Sam Hughes say in answer to that question:—

The answer of the Minister of Militia and Defence was:

The Governor of Nova Scotia on the 17th day of March issued a proclamation calling out the volunteers of that province for active service on the 18th. They had only twenty-four hours' notice but the men turned out in large numbers and drilled for a few days until the scare was over. At the time the Act was passed I had not read the proclamation, but my attention was drawn to the fact that the proclamation issued to the people of Nova Scotia actually called them out for active service. Every man therefore who can prove that he was called out and that he turned out to drill under that proclamation for active service, is, under the law, entitled to a bounty.

No change has been made in the regulations. The hon. member for Pictou county, (Mr. Macdonald) has correctly interpreted them. The consideration of the subject involves the question of actual service as compared with annual drill.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Who said that?

Mr. KYTE: The present Minister of Militia and Defence. It is obvious from this quotation I have read that at the time this Act was passed it was not contemplated that any person except those who went to the front were to share in the Fenian Raid bounty.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to confine himself to the language I used?

Mr. KYTE: I have read the language used by the minister.

Mr. ROGERS: What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. KYTE: I am reading the answer of the Minister of Militia and Defence.

Mr. HUGHES: What is the page of 'Hansard'?

Mr. MACDONALD: March 28, 1913.

Mr. KYTE: If it were not for the accident of the Minister of Militia having his attention called to a proclamation issued by the Governor of Nova Scotia on March 17, 1866—

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: Will the hon. member read the language I used and not his comments?

Mr. KYTE: I read the language of the minister. I assure the minister that I do not desire to misinterpret him, but sometimes the minister uses language that ordinary members can not always follow or are familiar with. If I cannot use the very concise, although sometimes curt, language of the minister it is my misfortune but it is not my desire to mislead. If it were not for the fact that the proclamation issued by the Governor of the province of Nova Scotia on the 17th of March, 1866, had been dug out of the dusty archives of the province of Nova Scotia, no such interpretation would be given to the Act as would enable the people of Nova Scotia to get any acknowledgment in respect of their services performed in the Fenian Raid of 1866. I think I have satisfied the members of this committee that it was never intended that Nova Scotians, other than those who actually went to the front, should get a single dollar of Fenian Raid bounty, and yet while such a restrictive interpretation was placed upon the legislation by the Minister of Militia, not a single Conservative member from the province of Nova Scotia got up to enter his protest against the unfair discrimination against the people of Nova Scotia. It was the Monk resolution over and over again; it was the resolution of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) over and over again. I nearly made the mistake of saying that the Conservative members from the province of Nova Scotia in 1906 voted against the Monk resolution, but it so happened that there was not at that time a single Conservative member from Nova Scotia in this House to vote against the resolution, and that is why they did not vote against it. In the general elections of 1904 there was not a single Conservative elected in Nova Scotia, so that if the names of Conservative members from that province do not appear as having voted for the Monk resolution, it is owing to circumstances over which they had no control. In view of the arraignment made by the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) against my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Law), for having voted against the Monk resolution, I must assume that had my hon. friend from Annapolis been in the House, and had other Conservative members from Nova Scotia been in the House, then they would have felt bound to vote for the Monk resolution; a resolution which, according to Mr. Monk's own language, only provided for grants of lands in the West for the veterans of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and under which there was not a single dollar of money or a single acre of land to be given to the veterans of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

2 a.m.

Mr. MACDONALD: You mean they would have voted against the Monk resolution.

Mr. KYTE: I say that in view of the strictures made upon the hon. member for Yarmouth for having voted against the Monk resolution I am bound to assume the Conservatives would have voted for it if they had been in the House. The hon. gentleman from Annapolis stated that the Monk resolution was a perfectly proper resolution to vote for, and he condemned my hon. friend from Yarmouth for having voted against it, and, therfore, I am bound to assume that if there was a Conservative member from Nova Scotia in the House at that time, he would have supported the resolution of Mr. Monk and would have voted for gifts of land to the veterans of Ontario and Quebec without providing a single grant of an acre of land or a dollar of money for the veterans of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. Had I been present in this House when the resolution of my hon. friend from North Grey was moved, and had I voted against that resolution, I would not thereby have been voting against the grant of $100 each to the veterans of Nova Scotia, because on the admission of the hon. member for North Grey himself, he had in mind either the granting of land or the granting of a pension for the Fenian Raid veterans, neither of which is secured to the veterans of Nova Scotia by the Bill under consideration.

I have no doubt there are some other observations made by my hon. friend from Annapolis that merit passing comment, but I shall not refer to them at this late hour. I only desire to say further that so far as the applications from the county I have the honour to represent are concerned, they are made in good faith and are supported by absolute evidence, and they have been filed in the Department with the most honest intention on the part of every applicant. From my county some 650 applications have been received, of which 444 have been paid. Some doubt has been expressed that there could be living at the present time 15,000 men in the province of Nova Scotia who were old enough to come out and drill forty-eight years ago. For the enlightenment of my hon. friend from Carleton, I desire to say that there is to-day living in the county of Richmond one aged citizen who did not qualify for the Fenian Raid bounty because he did not come out in 1866. The reason that he did not do so was that he was too old to come out. That man is still living. He is a loyal citizen, born in the good old English county of Devon. He still possesses all his faculties and is one of the most intelligent men I have ever met. I shall be glad, if the hon. minister does us the honour to visit the county of Richmond, to take him to the home of this aged man and show him how the healthful climate of the county of Richmond—and it is not confined to the county of Richmond alone, but is common to the province of Nova Scotia—preserves men to a great age with the possession of all their faculties. Therefore it is not extraordinary that there are 15,000 men living in the province of Nova Scotia who are qualified for the Fenian Raid bounty.

I desire to impress upon the minister the desirability of bringing down his legislation as speedily as possible, so that applications filed in the department in the months of September, October and November of last year will be promptly paid.

The hon. Minister of Militia seems to be somewhat mystified as to how certain lists of Fenian Raid applications became circulated throughout the province of Nova Scotia. At an early date in this session, I put on the Order Paper a notice of motion for return showing all the applications for Fenian Raid bounties in my county. The hon. minister intimated that it would be extremely difficult to get such a list as it involved a large amount of work. I stated that I had already seen a copy of that list, and that therefore it could not be very difficult to duplicate it. The hon. minister seems to express some doubt that there exists anywhere in the province of Nova Scotia lists of Fenian Raid bounty applicants. When the Fenian Raid Bounty Commission visited the province of Nova Scotia in 1913, the members of the board were all provided with lists of the applicants in that province. The local members of the board in each county also have lists. Therefore, it is not extraordinary if copies of these lists got out. The information came, I suppose, through the officers of the department, properly, and not through the officers having any desire to violate the instructions they had received.

The hon. minister stated, in answer to my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Law), that it was possible that some person might have attended the courts in the province of Nova Scotia and taken down each claim as it was passed. I am afraid that the hon. minister is not very familiar with the procedure and duties of that court or he would not have urged that as an explanation. The duties of the members of the board who visited Nova Scotia did not impose any obligation upon them to investigate individual claims. They simply visited Nova Scotia to ascertain whether or not the different regiments, claimed to have been called out, and of which individual claimants were members, had been called out. It was not their intention or purpose to receive proof of individual claims. The moment they proved that regiment No. 3, for instance, in the county of Richmond had been called out, that proof, taken with the claim of each individual member that he had drilled with the regiment, was proof that the applicant was entitled to the $100. In no instance did the Fenian Raid Bounty Commission, sent to the province of Nova Scotia, undertake to prove individual claims. There were instances where men came forward who believed that, unless they gave oral testimony before the board, they would be jeopardizing their right to the Fenian Raid bounty. The members of the commission, with that courtesy which always characterizes officers of the militia, were good enough to take their testimony; but I was assured by the chairman of the board that it was not necessary to so substantiate their claims.

I desire to support the request of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and of my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Law) that provision should be made in the Act to pay all the surviving widows of Fenian Raid volunteers, no matter at what date those volunteers died. Those aged widows, who have been widowed for twenty or thirty years, are possibly more in need of the hundred dollars than those widowed since 1912. There is no logical, no real compassionate consideration which can lead the hon. Minister of Militia to confine the payment of these bounties to the widows of men who have died since 1912. Under all the circumstances, the widow of every man who came out in 1866 is entitled to the Fenian Raid bounty no matter at what date her husband may have died.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: Possibly I might assist in a solution of some of the questions that have arisen. There is no objection to changing the figure '5' to '4,' and letting the payment conclude in 1914. The mere fact that the words 'Nova Scotia' or 'New Brunswick' occur in the resolution, I should imagine would be conclusive proof that I had in my mind the fact that there were volunteers from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick who were entitled to come under this Act at the time it was passed. I knew from general knowledge of the affair at St. Andrews, that the regulars and some volunteers had been called over to St. Andrews. I understood that a company from Halifax had gone and that to replace the regulars in the garrison at Halifax, a number of volunteers had been called out. I never saw the order which called out the volunteers in Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, or Nova Scotia. Therefore it did not matter to me whether there was an order or not. The law was here and no man could come out on active service unless he had been called out under those orders.

There is a difference between annual drill and active service. Annual drill is just being called out to perform the ordinary drill, for the year. Nova Scotia has this drill every year. In 1866, Nova Scotia drilled in August or September. No man who merely drilled in August or September could possibly get the bounty unless he perjured himself, and I do not think any man in Nova Scotia intentionally did so. My officers have assured me that the men from Nova Scotia were a fine body of men. Active service refers to those who were called out under the proclamation made at the time of the emergency spoken of to-night. In Nova Scotia they were called out for annual drill some time during the summer of the same year. Those who were called out to actual service are entitled to the bounty and those who came out for annual drill are not entitled to it.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: Speaking earlier in the evening, the minister said that the people of Prince Edward Island were too late in drilling to qualify for the bounty.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: I said that the Governor in his address spoke about how proud they were to have observed the splendid manner in which the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick people had turned out, showing that the emergency had then passed.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The emergency could not have passed, because the minister under this proposed legislation intends to pay the men who drilled as late as 1870, four years afterwards. The minister is certainly discriminating against the province of Prince Edward Island. The legislature passed a special Militia Act to meet the conditions; all the able-bodied men in the province met to drill for that special purpose. Surely that is just as good as if they were called out by proclamation of the Government. The very fact that the minister takes shelter under a technical point is conclusive proof that he does not wish to deal fairly with the people of Prince Edward Island and with the men who drilled on that occasion for that special purpose. The minister said that if he recognized that the volunteers of Prince Edward Island were eligible for consideration under this resolution, a very large number of men would claim the bounty. He considered that to be an argument against it, while the fact that a great number of men in the province of Nova Scotia are eligible under this resolution is considered meritorious. You could not get better proof that the minister does not want to act fairly toward the people of my province and does not intend to do so. If any further proof were necessary, I would point to the fact that the minister was willing to amend the resolution to include Prince Edward Island, but in such a way that it would not give the men of Prince Edward Island one dollar. I do not think that any greater proof of insincerity could be adduced.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: It would suit the hon. member a great deal better to devote a little more energy to looking up the records and finding out whether or not any persons in Prince Edward Island are entitled to this bounty, than to come here and make insinuations. It has not been shown that the men in Prince Edward Island are entitled to this bounty. If the hon. member will produce evidence to show that one man in Prince Edward Island was called out for active service, I will bring in a new Bill.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I produced that evidence this evening. I have a great deal of evidence, but the minister does not want to receive it.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: I certainly will not pay for annual drill.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: This was not annual drill; it was special drill for a special purpose. What better proof does the minister want?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: I do not think the hon. gentleman is competent to judge.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I am not competent to judge of what the minister may think, because he has very peculiar ideas and commits very peculiar actions. Amongst other things, for a minister of the Crown, he is neither courteous nor dignified. The hon. member for Annapolis said that I voted against the motion made in 1906 by the member for Jacques Cartier. It has been proved and demonstrated beyond the shadow of a doubt that that resolution was not intended to apply to the Maritime provinces at all, and was not intended to apply in any way to the province of Prince Edward Island. I was justified in voting against that resolution; I would vote against a similar resolution to-night if one were presented, and I am justified in voting against the resolution now before the committee because it unfairly discriminates against my province. The hon. member for Queens, Prince Edward Island, supporting this Government, made a very fair suggestion to the Minister of Militia and Defence, but he would not accept it. I say again that there is proof that this Government does not want to deal fairly in this matter with the people of Prince Edward Island, and the hon. member for Queens knows it. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier did not want to deal fairly with Prince Edward Island in 1906, and hon. gentlemen opposite, now in power, desire still to discriminate against that province. They use this money only where they think it will be of political advantage to them; they take the money of all the people to buy the political support of some of the people.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: The hon. member for Kings, Prince Edward Island, wishes certain concessions made to Prince Edward Island.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I do not want concessions; I want fair play.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: Does the hon. member want every other province of Canada to be similarly treated? Does he wish that every man who drilled during that period shall get the bounty?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The minister is doing the same in the other provinces; I simply want fair play for Prince Edward Island. The men of Prince Edward Island drilled specially for the purpose; they could not do any more and no more was done in any other province. I think they are entitled to some consideration.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Three or four companies in my riding, and dozens in the surrounding districts, went so far as 50 miles from home to drill in 1866 and 1870, and they have been refused anything under this Act.

Mr. CARVELL: I have nothing to take back that I said to-night regarding this matter. I do not accuse 15,000 people in Nova Scotia of perjuring themselves; I have too much regard for the assertions that I make and for the people of Nova Scotia to say anything like that. But I do not believe that there are 15,000 people in the province of Nova Scotia to-day who were actually called out in the month of March, 1866, to repel an invasion. It is not common sense to believe that more than 25 per cent of the persons who belonged to the militia of the province of Nova Scotia 48 years ago, who must have been 18 or 20 years of age at that time, are alive to-day. I said this thing was a scandal; I repeat it, and the only man I am blaming is the minister. I do not blame the members from Nova Scotia for digging up an old proclamation upon which they get the minister to take action in this matter; that is their business.

When the minister tries to hide himself behind a play on words as he has done to-night when he says to the member for Kings: I will not pay the man who performs annual drill but only the man who was ordered out, he knows he is only playing on words, helping on this scandal. He admitted by his own interpretation of this clause, when I challenged him in 1912, and told him there would be trouble over this pension and who were called out, the minister gave his interpretation, and I admit it was very reasonable. But even then I could see difficulties ahead. The minister then said that the man who was called out under the Act as he interpreted it would be the man who actually was called out and went to face the enemy, not the man who performed his annual drill. The minister stuck to that for a year. I do not know what caused him to change his mind, but he changed his mind, and now we have the spectacle of every man in Nova Scotia who can prove that his name was on the pay roll and that he was sixteen years of age, being entitled to this bounty. My object in raising this discussion was to see if the minister would not abandon the unreasonable interpretation which he places upon his statute, or, if he cannot do that, change it and bring it around to reasonable common sense.

The hon. member for North Grey raised a question with a good deal of merit. He said that he has two or three regiments and scores of individuals who went fifty miles down to the lake, really to the frontier, intending to be ready to repel an invasion, as my father did and as thousands did in New Brunswick. But the minister says: I have never been able yet to see a proclamation calling out the troops in Ontario or Quebec, and therefore I cannot recognize them. Why cannot the minister be reasonable?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: The minister never said anything of the kind.

Mr. CARVELL: I took down his words at the time, I have not yet seen the order in Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. HUGHES: The hon. member to be honest anl square should follow up his lines. He says that I gave that as my reason for not recognizing these men. He knows that is unfair and that I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend need not get indignant; it will not do any good.

Mr. HUGHES: I intend that the hon. member shall be honest when he addresses me.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend might as well cool off, because I can stay here as long as he can, and there is no use getting indignant. My hon. friend has three or four measures to get through this House, and I advise him to be cool. When my hon. friend brings in legislation of this kind he need not expect to get off without criticism.

Mr. HUGHES: I want honest criticism.

Mr. CARVELL: And you will get it; you will get criticism of every kind, and you deserve all you will get and a good deal more.

Mr. HUGHES: Certainly from men of your class.

Mr. CARVELL: I was referring to the position taken by the hon. member for North Grey. It is a reasonable position. The minister says: I have not yet seen an order in Ontario and Quebec, and the only conclusion I can arrive at from his statement is that because he has never seen any order to bring out these troops en masse he cannot recognize the troops in Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick as he can those in Nova Scotia. I think that is an illogical conclusion and if my friend would not fly off the handle because it is a little late we would not have such exhibitions of temper as he exhibited a few minutes ago.

Mr. HUGHES: I notice the hon. member for Carleton is fairly cool now.

Mr. CARVELL: No, the member for Carleton never loses his temper and he can usually stick to his text. I have several cases in New Brunswick exactly in a line with the case brought forward by the member for North Grey. I have written the minister about four men at least in Charlotte county. I have sent him the correspondence. There is a man named J. Milliken who was right on the ground, within a few miles of where the actual invasion took place at St. George. He is one of a number who were on guard night and day for a month, men belonging to No. 3 company of home guards. They received their arms and accoutrements from the capital of the province, Fredericton. They were ordered out by Col. Wetmore, in charge of the militia forces in that portion of New Brunswick. These men were called out by somebody, it is true not by a proclamation made by the Governor, and the men referred to by North Grey were called out by somebody, possibly not by the Governor of the province. Surely my hon. friend can get broad enough, surely he can see the justice of this contention and will amend this resolution. He has it in his power now. It is not going through to-night, he will have time to think over it and dream over it and surely he can amend it and bring down a reasonable Bill. I am not pleading, I have always taken the ground that a man should not be paid for defending his fireside. I take that ground to-night. But if my hon. friend, for political purpose and nothing else, is going to introduce legislation like this, then I am like the member from Kings, I say that every portion of this Dominion should be treated alike and treated fairly. If my hon. friend is going to say that, because of the digging up of an old musty record of the city of Halifax, the volunteers of the province of Nova Scotia had a right to this money on a technicality, surely my hon. friend ought to big enough man to amend his law; if he does not want to reduce the men of Nova Scotia, bring everybody else in Canada up to that level. If he cannot bring other people up to it, cut them down, get it into some sort of reasonable shape. Take the men mentioned by the hon. member for North Grey. Take the men I have referred to here in Charlotte in New Brunswick and the men in other places who actually were called out, I do not say by the Government, but by somebody over them, in this case by Colonel Wetmore, the chief military officer of that portion of the province. These were men who were called out, who went to the front, who complied with all the technicalities and the definition laid down by the minister when the Bill was introduced two years ago. Surely my hon. friend can be big enough to amend his Bill and take in the men who really, in all common sense and honesty, ought to be included in this and not stick to the jug-handled interpretation which he is applying. I think I am justified in saying, in view of what has taken place to-night, in view of the statement of the hon. member for Annapolis that they did not know anything about this for a year after the Bill was passed until finally they found the old proclamation, in view of all this the minister ought to come down to the House with a reasonable measure, which will give the bonus to the people entitled to it and put every province and every person in this Dominion on a fair footing and get the Bill through and make an end of the whole matter. I do not think that the minister should get chesty because some criticism is made of this measure and I do not think that the member for North Ontario and Kings and Albert have helped him along very much by attempting to throw stones at me because I do not mind them very much and, as I said before, I usually come back and say what I want to say in the end. I think I am putting to the minister now a reasonable proposition. I am only asking him to change the law and make it reasonable and apply it to every section of Canada alike.

Mr. HUGHES: I know the cases of these four men. I have looked them up. They undoubtedly turned out voluntarily as did thousands in the county from which I come, and drilled, but I have never yet seen an order from Colonel Wetmore ordering these men out. If the men can produce that we will be glad to see it. We have looked into the case as carefully as possible. We have had men down there in every case; the officers in charge have done their level best to follow the cases up.

Mr. CARVELL: Here again is where I contend my hon. friend is not reasonable. One of these four men is no less a person than Senator Gillmor, a man alive and well to-day. All these men have made affidavits, but Senator Gillmor does not want the $100; he holds the same views as I do. The other men do want it. What better evidence does my hon. friend want than that?

Mr. HUGHES: I am not the board.

Mr. CARVELL: Then make a law to comply with it; make the law fair.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think that every hon. gentleman will agree with me that we could discuss this resolution much more effectively in daylight.

Mr. HUGHES: On the second reading.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend will make the change in 1914?

Mr. HUGHES: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: There was such a strong attack made upon the members of Nova Scotia by the hon. gentleman who was put up by the minister for that purpose—

Mr. HUGHES: Now, now, he can get up himself.

Mr. McKENZIE: When the minister has any legislation of any character to put to the House, if he has anything to say to members on this side of the kind that was meted out to us to-night, it would be more to the purpose and more manly, if I may use the word, for him to say it himself than to get a muck dredge like the hon. member for Annapolis, who has one spout in the air and another in the mud, to do the service.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think the minister would do well to dispense with this muck dredge performance the next time he has a resolution to put through. I must say that I cannot congratulate the hon. member for Annapolis on the way in which he handles Holy Writ. He might know something about muck dredges and things of that sort, but when he goes into the realms of Moses and the prophets I am afraid he is on territory that he knows nothing about. There are certain things which we should all observe. I am not now referring particularly to the hon. member for Annapolis. When there is a real scoundrel walking up and down this country nature provides against his making havoc among the people by putting a certain stamp upon his face that warns them: This chap is a scoundrel, look out for him.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I hope my face compares favourably with the hon. gentleman's.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Lord has put a stamp on the face of the hon. member for Annapolis which says: You are prohibited from handling the book of Holy Writ; To you it is a sealed book; the seven seals cannot be touched by you. The hon. member for Annapolis showed to-night that the holy volume is to him a sealed book of which he knows nothing whatever. He made a most unfortunate comparison: he put himself up as the wealthy man who had all the power behind him, and spoke of us poor chaps on this side of the House as Lazarus. Perhaps there is some truth in the comparison; poor Lazarus was licked by a dog. My hon. friend will not perhaps wish to apply that part of the Scriptures to himself. There was another point; the rich man passed through the dissolution of the tabernacle and in hell he lifted up his eyes. Does the hon. member for Annapolis wish to apply that portion of the Scriptures to himself? I trust he will go home and say his prayers before he does the disappearing act in a chariot of fire, smelling of brimstone. This is the very cheap vaudeville that we have received from the hon. member for Annapolis. I suppose the minister gave him a trial before he took him on, just as actors undergo before going on the boards. I suppose he performed before the minister. There is an account of a certain damsel who performed before a king who promised her anything to the half of his kingdom. I suppose the minister had this man perform before him before giving him the task of abusing members on this side of the House. If so, I cannot congratulate him on his judgment in giving the job to the hon. member for Annapolis. There are some hon. gentlemen on that side of the House who could have done this thing with better effect, and whose word would be accepted with some degree of credence and weight in the country. The minister will find that the faults of the man he chose are something like the faults in the Frenchman's horse. A Frenchman had traded a horse. He said: 'Now that we have made the trade I might as well state that the horse has two faults.' 'Oh, what are they?' 'Well', said the Frenchman, 'when you let him go he is pretty hard to catch, and when you catch him he is not worth a damn.'

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. McKENZIE: It may have been difficult for the minister to get a man to perform the muck dredge act, but when he did get one he turns out to be something like the Frenchman's horse. If the hon. member for Annapolis thought he was going to make capital against Nova Scotia members by his performance he is very much mistaken. For myself—and I am but the least among the members of Nova Scotia—I am not at all afraid of any attack the hon. member for Annapolis will make upon me in the eastern part of Nova Scotia, or in the county I represent. As to what took place in this Parliament in 1906, I must plead all ignorance, for I was not here. I first came to the House in 1904; I resigned early in 1906, and came back again in 1908. So what took place in 1906 is not attributable to me in any way whatsoever. But if I had been here when that resolution was passed, so long as the resolution had reference only to Ontario and Quebec, and involved no benefits to Nova Scotia, I would have recorded my vote against it. The same resolution exactly was repeated when I was here in 1911, and for two reasons I voted against it: first, because it was brought in as a vote of want of confidence; and secondly, because it was exactly similar to the resolution introduced in 1906 having reference particularly to a grant of land; the people of Nova Scotia at that time could not go out to the West, and the grant of land under the conditions mentioned would have been of no benefit to them. I submit therefore that in view of what was involved in the resolutions of 1906 and 1911, they were not capable of conferring any advantage on the veterans of Nova Scotia, and we have committed no sin in voting against them. Since then the legislation that the minister has brought down for the purpose of paying $100 has come before Parliament, and I have given it my cordial support. On the 28th March, 1912, I made these observations:

> I would ask the minister if there is any clear definition of what is meant by a volunteer? I think that when the men were called out and went into camp, and were prepared to go to the front, they should be regarded as volunteers. Any man who went into camp to drill by reason of that raid, and was prepared for active service, should be called a volunteer. Having turned out and gone into camp, even though it was not necessary for them to go to the front, still I think they are entitled to recognition.

That is the position I took, and that is the position I take now, I never saw any letters forwarded such as were read by the hon. member for Annapolis. I had tried to help people in my county to put their claims properly before the department. I helped hundreds of them, and I would help them again. Several little mistakes happened in the department, for which I do not blame them, owing to similarity of names, such as Macdonalds, Mackenzies and Campbells, and other causes. The member for the county can be serviceable in straightening out mistakes that are liable to occur. As representing the electors in my county, I tried to help them out in that way. Many gave wrong addresses, or mistakes were made resulting in the address turning out wrong. Cheques were held in the Finance Department because they did not have the right addresses. I have straightened out very many of these things. If the hon. member for Annapolis thinks it a censurable action on my part to help an old gentleman who may be in my county and does not get his cheque, I do not agree with him, because I think it is my duty to help him as quickly as possible. I am doing that. Every member has such duties to perform, and I presume he performs them. The hon. member for Annapolis, I presume at the suggestion of the minister, comes forward, lashes himself into a fury, and tries to foment the whole House and make little of us through the province of Nova Scotia because we are trying to help out the veterans in our respective counties in getting the bounty which the minister has been kind enough to give them. This should not be a matter of politics at all. It should not have been dragged into politics. I do not think we have any right to try and make politics out of it. I do not say what we might have done but we are not to be accused of what we might have done when we have not done it. It is not a matter of politics, it is a matter of recognizing deserving acts performed by patriotic citizens forty or fifty years ago. When the hon. member for Annapolis broke out in a fury and endeavoured to make political capital out of it he disregarded every higher consideration which this gift by the minister might involve. There are other things that perhaps we can deal with later on. I am sorry indeed that this gift on the part of the minister and of the Government has been used in the vilest possible form in every election in Nova Scotia from the little town elections to the top notch elections it is used in every shape for corrupting purposes. I presume that was not the intention of the minister and I am sure he would do well if he would try and put an end to it as quickly as possible. I make these observations so that 'Hansard' will not go out this morning with the flaring observations of the assistant deputy minister of Militia, the hon. member for Annapolis, and without some statement in defence of the position that I have taken.

Mr. MACDONALD: In the second line of the resolution I understand that the minister has agreed to put '1914' instead of '1915.' Then, in place of the words 'to every volunteer who is living on the date of the passing of an act based upon this resolution,' I suggest that the minister make it read 'to every volunteer who was living on the first day of April, 1912.' This resolution is continuing chapter 53 of the Act of 1912, and that language is there. 'Every volunteer who was living on the date of the passing of this Act,' which was April 1, 1912, is the language used. If the minister would make that change, then the latter part of the resolution would be consistent with that which provides for the payment to widows of parties who were living on that date. Then, the last words of the resolution read: 'and to whom no grant has previously been made under the authority of any Act.' That does not appear in chapter 53, and I do not know that it is relevant. I would suggest that, while we have no objection to the resolution going through, the minister would be wise if he would frame his act so as to make clear the points that I have called his attention to.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: I will read two clauses of the proposed Act. The first two sections are the same as those in the previous Act. Then, section 3 provides that:

The Governor in Council may at any time before the 31st December 1915—

We will change that to 1914.

—grant the sum of one hundred dollars to every volunteer who is living on the date of the passing of this Act.

Mr. MACDONALD: They must have been living on the 1st day of April, 1912.

Mr. HUGHES: In order to be living to-day they must have been living then. Then, section 4 reads:

The Governor in Council may at any time before the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and fifteen—

That will be changed to 1914.

Mr. EDWARDS: Has that been decided upon? I do not agree with the hon. member for Pictou on that point.

Mr. HUGHES: We can fight that out on the second reading.

The Governor in Council may at any time before the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and fifteen, grant the sum of one hundred dollars to the widow, or, through being no widow, then to the legal representative, of every volunteer who was living on the first day of April, one thousand nine hundred and twelve, and to whom, or on account of whose services as a volunteer, no grant had previously been made under the authority of this act or under the authority of the Fenian Raid Volunteer Bounty Act.

The object is to prevent the trouble of probating.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister distinctly agreed earlier in the evening as to it being 1914 and that has been eliminated from the discussion. I am speaking particularly for the people in our province because all our applications are in. If there are any people who have not put their applications in the time can be extended but from our standpoint, and I think in the interest of the whole country, it is desirable that the matter should be closed up as soon as possible. Our discussion on the question has gone upon the assumption that the minister gave us that assurance earlier in the evening.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not think you are justified in taking that position.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister said so.

Mr. EDWARDS: I did not understand it in that way.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: My legal officers advise 1914.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. HUGHES thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 176, to make further provision for bounties to volunteers who served the Crown during the Fenian raids.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 2.55 a.m. Thursday.

Thursday, May 7, 1914.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY PAPERS.

Mr. BORDEN: I beg to lay on the table the following papers:

1. Copy of a trust mortgage of October 4, 1911, between the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Guardian Trust Company, Limited, and the British Empire Trust Company, Limited, and His Majesty the King and the Canadian Northern Railway Company;

2. A statement setting forth a list of companies whose total issued stock is owned by the Canadian Northern Railway Company;

3. A statement setting forth a list of companies whose total issued stock is to be transferred to the Canadian Northern Railway Company;

4. A statement setting forth a list of companies in which a controlling interest is to be transferred to the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

I beg also to lay on the table three copies of the second report of the auditors who were employed by the Government in making inquiries into certain affairs of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and other companies constituting the Canadian Northern Railway system.

There are also some additional copies of papers already brought down which I place on the table for the convenience of members:

A statement of the capital stock authorized and issued in the companies set out in the first schedule.

Also some additional copies of the engineers' statement of the estimated cost of betterments.

Further copies of correspondence, including official application and detailed statement showing the particulars of capitalization, earnings and cost of building.

Two additional copies of the first auditors' report which were laid on the table yesterday.

Two additional copies of the second auditors' report

These are [illegible] systematic order, but the House will see to it that they are placed in order.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Does this complete the information that the Government is to bring down with regard to this matter, or is there something yet to be brought down?

Mr. BORDEN: My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) alluded to a trust deed of December 28, 1913. I cannot get information as to that.

I also lay upon the table of the House the correspondence to which I alluded a moment ago, consisting of a telegram from the Premier of Nova Scotia, a telegram from the Premier of British Columbia, a cablegram from the Premier of Alberta and a letter from the acting Premier of Saskatchewan—all in regard to the granting of aid to the Canadian Northern Railway system.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. LOUIS CODERRE (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 177, to amend the Companies Act. He said:

This Bill is designed to provide certain amendments to the Companies' Act which are considered to be necessary. Section 2 provides that companies incorporated under the Companies Act shall be entitled to issue share warrants and section 3 provides that companies shall be authorized to permit the issue of debentures and debenture stock to the amount of $100. It has been suggested to the Department by a number of persons interested in obtaining money from Europe for investment in Canadian enterprises that larger sums for investment may be obtained if authority is given to issue debentures in smaller amounts. It is also provided that companies shall have the power to re-issue debentures. These are the main features of the proposed amendments to the Companies Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 178, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act. He said:

The purpose of this Bill is simply to substitute the word 'Truro' for the word 'Halifax' in order properly to indicate the location of the Nova Scotia reformatory, which has been changed from Halifax to Truro.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 179, to amend the Criminal Code. He said:

The purpose of this Bill is to constitute it an offence, and subject to a penalty, knowingly to publish or cause to be published any advertisement for promoting the disposal or sale of property of any kind, containing any false statement. It has been represented that there have come into existence very wide-spread abuses in connection with the advertising of properties for sale, more particularly with regard to the advertising for sale of real property.

The Act, of course, does not purport to go further than to make it an offence for a person knowingly to make a statement representing something to be a fact which is not a fact.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SHIPPING ACCIDENT AT QUEBEC.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. MARCIL: The Minister of Marine will pardon me if I call his attention to the accident that happened to the steamer Saturnia in the harbour of Quebec. I have a letter from an old acquaintance, David Taylor, the master in charge of the ship at the time. He has been in charge of steamers coming to the St. Lawrence for twenty-one years. He says in his letter that there was no lightship or buoys placed in position to mark the channel, as is customary. I merely mention this fact to follow up the question put by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) in connection with the investigation into the wreck, hoping that no injustice will be done to Captain Taylor.

Mr. HAZEN: The investigation has been held by the Wreck Commissioner assisted by two nautical assessors. I expect the report will be filed to-morrow. In the meantime, I understand from my deputy minister that the opinion of Captain Lindsay and the nautical assessors is that the fact that the lightship at the Traverse was not in position was not in any way a factor in the accident which occurred.

Mr. MARCIL: The boat at the time was in charge of a duly licensed pilot, Jules Lachance.

Mr. HAZEN: In view of the interest which has been aroused by this accident, a question having previously been asked by the hon. member for Rouville, as soon as the judgment of the Wreck Commissioner's Court reaches me I shall lay it on the table of the House.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply. Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

Hon. SAM. HUGHES (Minister of Militia and Defence): It has been my privilege on two previous occasions to submit in advance to the members of the House a detailed statement in connection with the Militia Estimates. In accordance wtih my practice on two previous occasions about a week ago I sent every member of the House a detailed explanation of these Estimates, giving particulars as far as possible. I feel that it is only courteous to do so. The charge has been made in times gone by, that the Militia Estimates have been held up to the last days of the session and then rushed through without any notice being given. I am a little nervous in presenting these Estimates—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HUGHES:—owing to the fact that we are drawing near to the end of a century of peace between Canada and the United States. The columns of the press, and the atmosphere generally, is so full of platitudes about peace that the poor fellow who wishes to keep up the militia is regarded as almost a blood-thirsty mortal who is not entitled to any consideration. However, I have more or less confidence when I review the first few years of this great century of peace. I find, despite the cry of peace, of which we hear so much to-day, that the first thirteen years of this century have witnessed appalling wars: the South African war; the Phillipine war; the Cuban war; the Russo-Japanese war; the Turko-Italian war; the Moroccan-French war; the Somaliland war; the Balkan-Bulgarian-Servian-Greek war; the Mexican war; the German South West African war; and the wars in China, Tibet and of the United States in Cuba, and now the war of the United States in Mexico.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do not forget the Ulster war.

Mr. HUGHES: It is not on yet. My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) will doubtless watch with interest, and from a long range, the Ulster war when it comes on. I might point out to the hon. member that the Ulster men are of the same class as those who followed Stonewall Jackson—

Mr. DEVLIN: Down in Virginia?

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, down in Virginia. And if hon. gentlemen want to form an opinion as to how the Ulster men will fight, let them read the record of Stonewall Jackson's division in the American Civil war. A strange incident recently occurred in connection with the Mexican war. In this country we have been more or less interested in the peace agitation. It was only a few years ago that we had some distinguished Americans, accompanied by distinguished Canadians, occupying the pulpits and platforms of the country preaching peace on the eve of an election, the object evidently being to further the question of free trade between Canada and the United States. This peace organization of the United States is the only institution I know of that has endorsed the incipient war of the United States on Mexico. Before the very first shot was fired this organization forgot its principles, and, in place of imploring the Government to hold its hand and to submit the matter to arbitration, they immediately wired President Wilson as follows:

> Our league is an ardent peace organization, but not of the 'peace at any price' kind.

Of course, the peace at any price kind would involve some great national principle, having for its object the uplifting of humanity; and I presume the question as to who fired the first salute would constitute a casus belli worthy of the endorsation of this great peace organization.

Turning to our own border, I do not think there is any great evidence of the human mind being in a position to guarantee perpetual peace in Canada. In this House we occasionally have illustrations that the human mind is not so disciplined, even amongst gentlemen who are supposed to be the highest in the land, as to guarantee internal peace. I have not the slightest doubt that some hon. gentlemen opposite will have the hardihood to even criticise my Estimates when they come up. Let us look for a moment at our courts of law and the convictions made in the Dominion of Canada. In 1911-12 alone, 113,260 persons in the Dominion of Canada were convicted in the courts of this country. The cost of the administration of justice in Canada the year before last—last year's figures have not yet been published—was a little in advance of the cost of the whole militia. The cost of administering justice in Canada in 1911-12 was $9,420,000, which is slightly in excess of the cost of the militia of the whole country. The customs and excise returns show that the customs duties on liquors in 1912-13 amounted to $9,270,600, and the excise duties, $11,488,104, or a total of $20,758,704. On tobaccos, customs duties amounted to $1,551,109, and the excise duties to $9,794,450, or a total of $11,345,559; making a grand total for liquors and tobaccos of $32,104,263. I do not necessarily imply that these breed criminals, but such figures are generally considered a fair indication of the moral standard of a community. I might refer to strikes. It is no use disguising the fact that a strike is an incipient civil war. Strikes have happened in every part of the country, and troops have had to be turned out to preserve order. At the present time the troops are still under arms in British Columbia in order to preserve law and order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is a fine state of things under Tory rule.

Mr. HUGHES: I want my good friend to observe that law and order are preserved under Tory rule. However, Sir, let us hope, in regard to this century, 'a bad beginning may bring a good ending.' The ground must be prepared for peace, as an Irishman once said, as well as for potatoes. You must lay the foundation deep and strong in the hearts and intellects not only of one community, but in all communities, in order to preserve peace. That condition of affairs has not been reached in any country, much less in our country. That is a condition, as Robbie Burns said, that involves two parties:

> Nae mon can be at peace unless his neighbour let him.

The condition involves education, culture, gentleness, firmness, self-control, obedience—that is the power or capacity to obey—control or power to command others, responsibility and individuality. These have been defined as the triumph through wisdom and reason of sound principles of human government. Peace is also a condition brought about by the knowledge on the part of those concerned that each party comes of a race who are careful to know and value sacred rights, who will seek every honourable means of settling differences, but who, in case an opponent should be determined to be domineering, unjust, dishonourable or repressive, would know how to defend the honour of home, of loved ones and country, and who, in defence of those sacred heritages, would willingly sacrifice each his own life. The essentials, therefore, of peace are discipline on the part of the people; training in self-defence; manœuvring, shooting straight, withstanding fatigue, privations, etc.; stout hearts and stubborn wills; preparedness, arms, equipment, stores, etc. The great peace advocate, who heroically passed away on that awful night amid the icy waters, on the Titantic, Mr. W. T. Stead, said:

> When a nation shall have reached the point where every citizen feels it is his duty and privilege to be trained for the defence of the fatherland, it will become a greater, a saner and more efficient people.

That is the aim and object which I have in view, and my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, I believe, holds similar views. Another prominent writer, Major Stewart L. Murray, said:

> A great power cannot escape adequate payment for national defence. It is not a matter of what we choose to pay. It is a matter of what we must pay, even in the form of adequate preparation for victory; or later in the form of a war indemnity for defeat.

The country that is overrun or invaded is the country that suffers. While a country that is invaded and devastated undoubtedly suffers much, it is on the other hand an historical fact that it is the country which has not been invaded which eventually comes to the front. I might point out in that regard, to meet the arguments that are sometimes advanced, that the great upheavals in literary effort and production and intellectual development have invariably followed great wars by which, although the invaded countries have been practically ruined for the time being, yet all have risen thereafter to hitherto undreamed of heights of literary and intellectual splendour, as instance the Augustan age, the Renaissance, the Elizabethan period and the Reformation. These periods of intellectual activity followed closely upon great wars. Mr. Harold F. Wyatt says:

> The discovery that Christianity is incompatible with military spirit is made only among decaying peoples. While a nation is still vigorous, while its population is still expanding, while the blood in its veins is strong, then on this head no scruples are felt. But when its energies begin to wither, when self-indulgence takes the place of self-sacrifice, when its sons and daughters become degenerate, then it is that a spurious and bastard humanitarianism masquerading as religion declares war to be an anachronism and a barbarous sin.

Lord Roberts, on the same lines, says:

> The dramatic three weeks' campaign which ended in the complete collapse of the Turkish army shows, with a ruthless logic, the effect of apathy and unpreparedness. . . The ghastly accounts of the slaughter that has transformed Albania into a shambles should surely bring home to us what war in a country may mean to that country. . . The days of muddling through a war . . . are over. Let me implore you, as a soldier of more than fifty years' service, who knows what war was and what it is now, not to be led away by any such dangerous beliefs.

Instance after instance might be quoted to show that countries that have progressed and prospered are countries that have been visited by war. The great Machiavelli said:

> All the armed prophets have conquered; all the unarmed have perished.

We have Eliza Cook saying:

> Never trust the soft breathing that preaches of Peace.
> With a pledge-giving lip and a smile-lighted eye—
> Hear it all with good will, but be provident still—
> With men that are earnest and powder that's dry.

The German Chancellor recently said:

> As long as men are men and States are States, the question of limiting armaments will remain insoluble.

Therefore, I am sorry that I have to fall in with the ranks of those who believe that universal peace is yet far off, and that wars will continue to devastate, and that just as eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, so eternal readiness to defend loved ones, home and country, is the price of peace. Ex-President Roosevelt has been more or less laughed at, but nevertheless the old gentleman keeps up his pace through the world and keeps his hat on his head fairly well in spite of the sneers and criticisms of minor intellects. Mr. Roosevelt has been recently on a trip to South America and he has pointed out that the only two countries where he found anything like a stable form of civilized or constitutional government are Argentina and Chile. He attributes that entirely to the fact that these two peoples have fairly respectable militia systems and are trained in self-control and self-development. In case of war, the farmers and shippers of this country would lose more in a month than preparedness for war would cost them in a generation. My hon. friend (Mr. Devlin) has pointed out the fact that I went on a junket to Virginia recently. I did take a junket through Virginia.

An hon. MEMBER: How did you find it?

Mr. HUGHES: I liked it very well, and I would recommend my hon. friend to go. Let me point out that Virginia was the scene of many battles in the great American Civil War, and that while the portions of the country that were actually devastated, where houses were burned and farms destroyed, have not yet recovered their former status, all those parts of the country that were not actually invaded, long, long ago recovered; in fact, their recovery was almost immediate. I read a letter in this House once from a former Canadian resident in New York, pointing out the imperative need of the people of this country being ready to repel any invasion coming from whatever quarter it might, and I agree that it is our duty to maintain such a state of preparedness.

Civilization depends on liberty. There can be no civilization without liberty, no liberty without law and order, no law and order without power—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Powder.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, powder comes next. There can be no law and order without power, and there can be no power without the army; and you can either put it down as power or powder as you like. There can be no army without discipline, there can be no discipline without training, no training without pay and no pay without taxation for the maintenance of the militia force. My good friends on the other side of the House, as well as on this, have been willing to tax themselves fairly liberally for the maintenance of a system of defence for our homes and our loved ones.

However, my aim is not war. No man in the service is anxious for war. It is the speculator, the fellow who is going to make money, who is in favour of wars between nations. The soldier is never in favour of war. The soldier in any land is always the fellow who has to face the music. He is the one who has to take his chance whether he will go down or not. Wars are never caused by soldiers. As I have pointed out before, wars are caused by stock gamblers, by speculators. What is generally supposed to be the cause of the war in Mexico? It is supposed to be two commercial institutions that are struggling for mastery in that country to-day. The funds for carrying on the war in Mexico are furnished by large industrial institutions in certain other countries of the world. Wars are sometimes caused by the clerical profession, sometimes by the legal profession, sometimes by the newspapers; but wars are never caused by soldiers. Therefore it is a common fallacy to say that, in building up a system of militia in the country, we are building up militarism.

My plan, in which I am fortified by speeches which I have heard my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition deliver on more than one occasion, is the building up of the youth and beauty of the country in manhood and womanhood, physically, mentally, morally and, I have not the slightest doubt, spiritually. Far in the rear comes the question of defence. I have pointed out on many previous occasions that, if war were to be wiped off the face of the earth and peace were to reign, I would still be in favour of having a cadet system and of having the youth and beauty of the country trained in physical development and in the art of carrying themselves properly.

There is an incident which I shall endeavour to recall to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. On the occasion to which I refer I was very proud of him, although I must say that I am not always proud of him. It was at the time of the Palma match when representatives from England, Australia, United States, Canada, and Newfoundland met at the rifle ranges at Ottawa and competed for the Palma trophy. Our Canadian boys came out first at the long ranges, although they were beaten by a point or two on the total ranges. That evening my right hon. friend pointed out to the audience that his belief was that every man should be furnished with a rifle, a horse and a saddle; that he should be able to shoot straight; that all should be trained in manoeuvring, and that rifle ranges should be provided for every unit of the militia. I heartily endorsed his stand then, and I have been endeavouring in a modest way gradually to work up to that high standard. I have figured up the cost of this as carefully as I can, taking everything at wholesale prices, and I find that to carry out this idea it would cost the modest sum of $450,000,000, nearly as much as the cost of some of our public undertakings in this country. Therefore I feel I would not be justified in asking the Prime Minister, my colleagues and the House to vote that sum this session. My present plan, however, is the voluntary training of the youth and manhood of the country, and I have been gradually developing this scheme. When I was a boy, there were some first-class cadet corps in Canada, but no system was developed. I desire to give all credit to my predecessor in office who had to deal with my hon. friends opposite. He stated in this House how thankful he was for the loyal gentlemen of the Liberal-Conservative party, who stood by him shoulder to shoulder in all his great schemes for the upbuilding of the militia of the country.

Mr. CARVELL: The Ross rifle.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes. I believe my predecessor would even have endorsed the bounty to the Nova Scotia veterans.

4 p.m.

Mr. CARVELL: I have my doubts.

Mr. HUGHES: My hon. friend will excuse me for touching a tender spot. The memories of last night seem still too fresh. These cadet corps were organized on a small scale; they were not systematized. We are now endeavouring to systematize them throughout the length and breadth of the country. During the last year we have drilled, equipped and inspected 44,680 cadets, of whom it is estimated that upwards of 30,000 are sixteen years of age and upwards. When I point out that many of the men who fought in the ranks at Alma, especially in the Welsh regiments who fought at Waterloo, who fought during the American war, were sixteen years of age and upwards—Wolfe himself was only fifteen when he entered the army—it will be seen that boys of sixteen years of age and upwards make very good soldiers, and it will be realized what an asset these cadets are for the defence of the Dominion of Canada. Any commercial traveller in Canada will tell you pretty accurately what towns have cadet corps by the manhood, straightforward, cleanly bearing of the young boys and young ladies in those towns. I have no hesitation in saying that I aspire to raise the character of these boys and girls throughout this Dominion.

Mr. MARCIL: What about the province of Quebec?

Mr. HUGHES: In the province of Quebec, that everybody is afraid to touch even with a pair of tongs, we have 16,320 cadets trained in the secondary schools and colleges and senior primary schools. I, a fire-eating Orangeman, inspected 4,800 French-Canadian boys in the city of Montreal, and there were 160 priests there also. These boys are a credit to any country; and it is my purpose, if I can get away, to go down to Montreal on Saturday with brother John and watch him review 500 boys in one institution there. If any of my hon. friends come along with me, they will see four battalions of cadets in Mont St. Louis college fit to take the field to-morrow and to handle rifles with any ordinary regiment. In addition to this we have trained 12,000 teachers during the last year or two. Our object in training these teachers is that they may take their classes and train them in squad drill. I have seen 1,800 children of five years and upwards, come out of a school and march around, forming two deep and four deep, and scarcely a child out of step. These have all been trained by lady teachers. We believe in training people when they are young, because no man can become a good base-ball player or cricket player or lacrosse player unless he learns the game when he is a boy. When he is grown up, he has not the activity and suppleness of the muscles necessary for the development of perfection in the science. We have a large number of trained teachers in every large centre in Canada to-day; they train the teachers in the schools who in turn train the children, and thus the country is saved a great deal of expense in not having to send instructors to these places. Since I have assumed office 12,000 have taken cadet certificates, and 17,000 officers and teachers in Canada have been given military certificates. It is unnecessary for me to go into the details. Our instructional staff now numbers 251 persons.

Now, coming to the question of drill-halls It is true we have indulged in the construction of these buildings, and criticism has been made, some kindly and some unkindly. But let me remind hon. members of what Barnum once said—that he spent $75,000 in publishing condemnations of his own show and $750,000 in positively advertising it. And he said: I get ten times the value from the $75,000 than I do from the $750,000, for the condemnation is widely copied and is discussed everywhere, but the advertisement is just the same for nobody pays a particle of attention to the adverse criticism. So, in this drill-hall business, adverse and even unkind criticism only helps the popularity of this policy. Not more than a thousand years ago certain gentlemen in a political campaign indulged in criticisms of drill-halls, but since the people have had time to settle down to an understanding of the situation the public generally, including the farmers, are becoming strongly favourable to this policy of drill-halls. Six weeks ago I had a deputation of eighty-five representatives from a town in a farming locality, many of them farmers, asking for a drill-hall. I asked one of these farmers: Why are you interested in this? And he said: I have my son to think of; why should he grow up without the opportunity for physical development and training that is afforded to the boys in the towns? Why should not we have some place for Saturdays or week evenings to which our boys could go for drill under the direction of your drill instructor? I want to tell this House and the community at large that in the Militia Department we have applications for over a thousand drill-halls, and we can only supply twenty-five of them this year.

Mr. MARCIL: Are these drill-halls for the general use of the community?

Mr. HUGHES: I am glad my hon. friend mentioned that point. The policy is to have them primarily for the use of the militia and cadet corps, but they are there for the use of any other organization that wants them for similar purposes. They can be thrown open also for any town gathering where there is no hall—any philanthropic or patriotic meeting, any meeting of a farmers' association and other gatherings of that kind as a friend near me suggests they are there for any laudable public use.

Mr. MARCIL: Are they given free?

Mr. HUGHES: So far as we are concerned, they are always given free. But I suppose there is a local charge for cleaning them up and that kind of thing.

Mr. MARCIL: The hon. minister should have no difficulty in finding places to accept drill halls all over the country, on those conditions.

Mr. HUGHES: That is what I want to do if I can get the money. And I am coming to that in a minute—I will show my hon. friend how we are going to get that money. An hon. gentleman near me asks if these drill halls are allowed to be used for political purposes. I say, certainly—let them be used by either party. Suppose that in a town there is no suitable hall and this is visited by an ex-minister of the Crown or a member of Parliament who is to deliver an address, why should not he speak in the drill hall? If my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) comes to my town, for instance, to address the free and independent electors there, he will find the drill hall available for his use.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I might get one of the hon. minister's automobiles, too.

Mr. HUGHES: I should be glad to give the hon. gentleman a ride in mine. But the automobiles of the Militia Department are such cheap ones—$550 and $750—that a gentleman of his position, one accustomed to the $6,000 and $8,000 automobiles, would find it rather beneath his dignity, I fear, to ride in one of ours. The one in which he stuck in the Modder river and where he waived his hand and said: Get out you men from other colonies and pull me out, was one of the high price kind, I assume, so he would hardly be satisfied with the seven hundred dollar automobile which the Minister of Militia is content to use.

Let me point out that since Confederation in Canada, drill halls have cost the tremendous sum of $4,900,000 all told. In the fifty years, almost, of the Canadian Confederation, the whole cost of drill halls has been less than $5,000,000. Why, Toronto alone, one city, is putting in new schools this year to the amount of $3,000,000, and Canada, throughout its whole territory from the Atlantic to the Pacific, in the course of forty years has spent less than $5,000,000 on drill halls.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does not the hon. minister think that schools are better than drill halls?

Mr. HUGHES: Both are necessary; the drill hall is the secondary and continuation school for the public school of the village. Go into any town in Canada, and what do you find? You find boys and girls running the streets uncontrolled, and going into these nickel shows—what do they call them?

An hon. MEMBER: Movies.

Mr. HUGHES: I say the boys and girls are running the streets uncontrolled. But ask my hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong), ask any of these hon. gentlemen who has a drill hall erected in his place where the caretaker has been long enough employed to get the work going, and you will find that they have a cadet corps which the boys join with enthusiasm and have an opportunity for development in gymnastics and physical drill. These drill halls become the centres for the whole community.

Mr. CARVELL: I may tell the hon. minister that in my town even the band is not allowed to get in the drill hall. They have to fight the minister to get even room there.

Mr. HUGHES: I did not erect the drill hall there.

Mr. CARVELL: But you are in control of it now.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, and this summer I intend to devote some attention to that part of the world, which seems to have gone tother end around; I do not know why, whether it is the effect of the ruling genius there or not. I am going to visit it this summer, and I will ask my hon. friend to help me—he is not half a bad fellow if you can keep him cool.

Mr. CARVELL: You will revise many of your ideals when you get there.

Mr. HUGHES: Oh, I have met 'harder shells' than my hon. friend. I have been a great hand to win representatives of the people to a right mind of thinking, and I do not doubt that I shall be able to bring him around, and we shall be able to agree about that drill hall.

Mr. CARVELL: The first thing is to get rid of your caretaker.

Mr. HUGHES: I am going to talk about the caretaker, too. I intend that the caretakers shall be men who can instruct and look after the affairs of the drill halls properly. He is not the only one who will go if found unfitted for these duties, and this regardless of party. I have stated that the amount spent by Canada on drill halls since Confederation was $4,900,000. Between June, 1896, and October 1911, the period of office of hon. gentlemen opposite, there were erected drill halls at a cost of $2,974,000. So, the Liberal party saw the need of drill halls; the difficulty was that they did not develop along the right lines and push the system to a more successful conclusion.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many years was that?

Mr. HUGHES: Let the hon. gentleman subtract 1896 from 1911, and he will have it. Perhaps the hon. gentleman on his right (Mr. Marcil), will help him on that question of subtraction. Now, since 1911, the Conservative party have constructed fifty drill halls, and spent upon them $2,367,000.

An hon. MEMBER: Not bad.

Mr. HUGHES: I am sorry it is not much more, but we are doing our best. Now, look across the border; and take the state of New York which has a population about equal to that of the Dominion of Canada. But instead of having 100,000 trained people, they have only 16,000. Their method over there is that the Adjutant General and other officers of the State hold a meeting to decide whether a drill hall in a certain place is necessary and they order that a building costing a certain amount and of a certain capacity shall be erected. In New York state alone they have spent $40,000,000 on drill halls and $10,000,000 on equipment, $50,000,000, or ten times as much as is invested in drill-halls in the whole of the Dominion of Canada. So ardent are the people of this country to have their children drilled in these drill-halls and to have the opportunity of using the halls for philanthropic and other gatherings, and that in hundreds of instances we are offered free sites. The city of Edmonton has given us an entire square. The hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) knows what a splendid site his city has contributed. The hon. gentleman has recommended a fairly good caretaker, although he is a Grit, and, crime of crimes, he has had the audacity and the hardihood to recommend an honorary colonel.

Mr. KNOWLES: I did not recommend an honorary colonel.

Mr. HUGHES: The hon. gentleman himself spoke to me about it, and gave me all the details.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister sent a man named Colonel Williams, who is connected with the Militia Department, to see me. He said he was instructed by the Minister of Militia to introduce himself to me, and he asked my views on the suitability of this gentleman as an honorary colonel. I was pleased to speak very highly of the gentleman whom the hon. minister's officer in command had recommended.

Mr. HUGHES: The hon. gentleman will remember that he spoke to me about this matter one day in the corridor.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is correct, but I did not recommend the gentleman in question.

Mr. HUGHES: All right, if the hon. gentleman repudiates it.

Mr. KNOWLES: I repudiate nothing but the minister's incorrect statement.

Mr. HUGHES: The minister has made no incorrect statement. I say that in the corridor the hon. member for Moosejaw spoke to me and asked me to appoint this gentleman.

Mr. KNOWLES: I said that I did not. The minister initiated the conversation in the corridor.

Mr. HUGHES: Is the hon. gentleman rising to a point of order?

Mr. KNOWLES: No, a question of privilege.

Mr. HUGHES: Then, I shall not make way.

Mr. KNOWLES: Well, a point of order, then.

Mr. HUGHES: Very well, I'll make way.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish to state what did occur in the corridor. At that time I mentioned to the minister that his officer commanding had, many months ago, so I was informed, made a recommendation under the instructions of his superior and the minister, and I said that the fact that nothing was being done was occasioning a good deal of comment. The minister then asked me about the qualifications of the gentleman, and I told him that he was worthy of the position. The minister later asked Mr. Erratt, president of the Conservative Association for the province of Saskatchewan, if Hitchcock was a good man, and Mr. Erratt confirmed what I had said about him.

Mr. HUGHES: The hon. member merely confirms what I have said; he came to me and gave me the information—I did not ask for it.

Although the caretakers appointed in the past have been, generally speaking, good men, they have not been capable in all cases of drilling the youths of the villages and towns; in other words, they have not been in all respects suited for the position. It is our intention to appoint only men who are capable of drilling the youths of the country, and it is our hope that within a year we will have a good system in vogue in that regard.

The cost of these drill-halls has been much criticised. Let me point out that the cost of each mile of the Transcontinental railway would build ten drill-halls; in other words, we could have had one drill-hall every 170 yards from the Atlantic to the Pacific if we had put into drill-halls the money spent upon the National Transcontinental railway. I am not saying that this would be a good expenditure of money, but, if properly distributed throughout the country, a few drill-halls built with some of this money would have done no harm. The money spent upon the Newmarket canal would have built 100 splendid drill-halls. The expenditure upon useless dredging, useless wharfs and useless breakwaters would have built at least 1,500 drill-halls. All I want to build this year is 50 drill-halls. The cost of the Quebec bridge would represent fully 1,000 drill-halls. Even the sawdust wharf would represent two, and the late lamented technical commission would represent ten.

Mr. CARVELL: What about the Fort Frances post office site?

Mr. HUGHES: That is not in my line. The Fort Frances locks expenditure would have built eighteen or twenty drill-halls, and the Logan's farm and St. Helen's Island deal would build and maintain all the drill-halls and rifle ranges that Canada will require for the next 100 years. The expenditure upon the Toronto exhibition grounds would provide forty or fifty of the best-drill halls and fully 200 of the middle-class drill-halls. The land that has been alienated from the Militia Department in Quebec alone would represent at least 600 drill-halls. Some of my friends are perhaps, not aware that St. Helen's island, that beautiful historic spot in the St. Lawrence opposite the city of Montreal, was handed over to that city for $200,000, whereas 117 acres, Lafontaine park, was handed over to the city of Montreal and not a dollar of revenue, except one dollar a year, came to the Dominion Treasury from it.

Mr. MARCIL: Is it not true that both of these properties have been applied to the very best purposes, that is, public parks for the women and children of the city?

Mr. HUGHES: Then let Montreal buy her parks the same as the town of Lindsay buys her parks. The Militia Department of Canada is not going to buy parks for the people of Montreal or Toronto or any other place; and although the Militia Department handed over to the city of Montreal Lafontaine park, nominally that it might be used for park purposes, the city of Montreal, until I brought them to time, hesitated to allow the militia of Montreal, their own citizens, to drill on Fletcher's field.

Mr. MARCIL: The opinion prevails in Montreal that both these parks are used for the best purpose.

Mr. HUGHES: I have no doubt. I do not know of any grafting institution anywhere that would not accept anything when it could get it for nothing, when it could get it on a sideshow and rob the Militia Department of it, and then use us as though we were mendicants.

Mr. CARVELL: You have to go fifteen miles out of the city to get your barracks.

Mr. HUGHES: Twelve miles. My hon. friend, with his characteristic persistence, is wrong again. These same properties in Montreal would build one thousand drill-halls of regimental size and five thousand five hundred of medium size; and all that Canada will want for the next five years will be fifteen hundred.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about the decision of the minister as to the rifle range in Ottawa?

Mr. HUGHES: It is generally known, especially to the militia men, that the old ranges at Rockliffe are inadequate. They were inadequate in my predecessor's time. He was doing his best to meet the difficulty, but the growth was very great; he had a plan to enlarge the ranges although he could not enlarge them sufficiently. So when I came into office I immediately took the matter up with the riflemen of the community and we have secured ranges west of the city.

Mr. LEMIEUX: From whom?

Mr. HUGHES: From the farmers, I do not know who they are.

Mr. GERMAN: What is the matter with the Rockliffe ranges?

Mr. HUGHES: The Rockcliffe rifle range has an area of 445 acres. It was nearly seven miles from the centre of the city of Ottawa. We could get only sixty-nine targets there, and in order to carry on the Dominion of Canada matches we had to begin shooting early in the morning, before the mists had risen from the ground and continue until late at night, until almost sunset, so that the men shooting early and late had no show. Moreover, in case of a rainstorm the matches had to be abandoned.

Mr. GERMAN: They can get the full distance?

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, 1,000 yards, a short range.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Rockliffe ranges are not seven miles from the post office.

Mr. HUGHES: I am taking from Dundonald park, the centre of population. It is about seven miles from Dundonald park to Rockliffe range.

Mr. MURPHY: Early in the session the hon. member answered a question, and said that the Connaught range was twelve miles by the travelled road.

Mr. HUGHES: From the post office.

Mr. MURPHY: There is not a mile difference from the post office to Dundonald park.

Mr. HUGHES: That makes two miles.

Mr. MURPHY: It might make five for the minister, but for an ordinary man it would not make more than one.

Mr. HUGHES: If we add one mile to the five and take it off the other, it just makes two miles difference. The Connaught rifle range is situated in the township of South March, a few miles beyond Britannia. The area is 2,662 acres. It is ten miles from Dundonald park by road, and a little less by rail. We will have 528 targets when it is completed, and I may say that thus far we have expended $224,000 on the property.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How much did you pay for the site?

Mr. HUGHES: $193,379.

Mr. GERMAN: How many targets are there at Rockliffe?

Mr. HUGHES: There are sixty-nine. The present value of the property at Rockliffe is estimated at $1,350,000, and some estimate it as high as $1,750,000; so that it is a transfer of accounts.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the Rockliffe range for sale?

Mr. HUGHES: It has not been considered by the Cabinet at all.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does the minister know how many farms there are in the Connaught range?

Mr. HUGHES: No; but I shall get the information. The Connaught ranges will cost, all told, upwards of $500,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is there a townsite near the Connaught range?

Mr. HUGHES: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the nearest town?

Mr. HUGHES: I think Britannia is not far away.

Mr. DEVLIN: Is not Britannia about twelve miles from that Connaught range?

Mr. HUGHES: Oh, no; about three miles air line, or four miles by road.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How far is it from Borden City ?

Mr. HUGHES: I do not know.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is the new townsite ?

Mr. HUGHES: That is a new town. It could not be better named.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not object to the name.

Mr. HUGHES: This is a transfer of accounts. Supposing we had wished to keep the money out of the Estimates—although we are not doing it, we voted it—and had sold the present Rockliffe range and followed the very proper custom of my predecessor and the right hon. leader of the Opposition by placing this money to the credit of the Militia Department for construction of this range, we would have been able to construct three ranges, or at least two and a half, out of the money which we would have received from the sale of the Rockliffe rifle range.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How much ?

Mr. HUGHES: I have been asked if I would take $1,350,000 for it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: From whom ?

Mr. HUGHES: I am not going to say. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would like to know the colour of his hair.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not think that is a proper answer from the minister. He says he has had an offer for the sale of the Rockliffe range. I want to know from whom.

Mr. HUGHES: I said I was asked if I would take it.

Mr. MARCIL: Would it not be more satisfactory to sell a large property like that by public auction ?

Mr. HUGHES: The rule of the department is that they must be sold by public tender.

[Mr. S. Hughes.]

Mr. DEVLIN: And bought by private sale ?

Mr. HUGHES: Oh, yes. It would not be well to go and buy ranges by public arrangement, it would be like duck-hunting with a brass band.

Another important matter which we have before the department is the training of officers. In order to secure a splendid lot of officers in the service we have developed officers' training corps in connection with the universities and some of the larger institutions of the land. In connection with McGill university, Lord Strathcona, before his death, handed over a sum of nearly $100,000 wherewith to purchase a site for a drill hall adjacent to McGill university. There is an officers' training corps in connection with McGill University. Canon Dauth of Laval University, Montreal, has already organized five companies. These companies are made up of 450 of the students who are training for law, medicine, and the professions. He promised me that before the end of the year he would have 800 or 900 in training. In connection with Queen's University, I might say that an old friend of that institution—a distinguished graduate of the Royal Military College and an engineer of note—has presented Queen's University with ground on which the Government is supposed to erect a drill hall. He has also presented ground on which to erect residence buildings. Altogether, it is costing him $600,000 of his own money. That is the spirit that is abroad in the community to-day. Laval, McGill, Queen's, Dalhousie, the British Columbia University, Sackville University—the president of which, I may say, came all the way to Ottawa in connection with organizing an officers' training corps—Toronto, Manitoba, and Edmonton—all these universities are making arrangements for the establishment of officers' training corps. They have found the effect of discipline on the students so splendid that they are going more and more into it in the future. These young gentlemen will go out into the country as lawyers, doctors, leading business men—they will be educated gentlemen, at all events—and although maybe having no intention of becoming military men, they will gravitate towards some military company, and the country will have the benefit of their services. That is my policy in connection with university officers' training corps. It costs the country very little. There is no harm in my mentioning that Colonel Leonard is the gentleman who is making that gift to Queen's University. The students will reside in the buildings he will erect, and the Government will pay just what we would pay at our schools of instruction. We will furnish the instructors, and the country will get the benefit of the services of these young gentlemen of the best calibre. We also hold classes for those men in the villages throughout the country who are so busy that they cannot take the time to go to camp, and an officer or sergeant goes down to those localities and puts the men into shape, so that we are getting all the practical benefit of schools at a minimum of expense. We have also musketry schools all over the country where officers are trained in the art of teaching the rudiments of musketry. We have also cadet instructors, and the Royal Military College, as usual, is doing splendid work. There is another matter to which I have given a little attention, and which has been more or less belittled by our friends opposite—for what reason I do not know. It is not always the man who wears a uniform that becomes a great warrior. Clive, Nicholson, Lawton, Wood of the United States army, were all civilians. General Wood was a doctor, and a doctor is not generally expected to be a great warrior. Many of the best soldiers in history were civilians. Stonewall Jackson was a university professor.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: You are a civilian yourself.

Mr. HUGHES: Certainly; that is the very point I am making. I remember in my old athletic days the question arose as to whether or not an amateur lacrosse team was as good as a professional team, and I want to tell my hon. friend that the boys of the city of Toronto proved on many a hard-fought field that the amateur can meet the professional any day, and I have no hesitation in saying that the same thing applies to the army. Some gentlemen say you cannot have a democratic army. I admit that you cannot have a democratic standing army, but you can have a democratic militia. If it is properly trained from the earliest years of school life, and the training is carried on afterwards, there is no reason why you should not have a democratic army, the equal, if not the superior, of any standing army in the world.

Hon. gentlemen have pointed with more or less ridicule to the honorary colonels. I do not mind criticism; I am an old campaigner, and I can take my knocks. Some hon. gentlemen opposite are always taking left handed shots at Sir Frederick Borden every time they can get a crack at him over my shoulders. Sir Frederick, I am free to say, is far in advance, if not of all gentlemen on the other side, at least of the carping critics. I want to point out to my hon. friends that Sir Frederick Borden committed a terrible crime. He appointed 104 men without previous rank as honorary colonels, and 70 of those who had had previous rank, or a total of 174. My worthy predecessor, a tip-top fellow, appointed that number of honorary colonels to the militia of Canada.

Mr. DEVLIN: In how many years?

Mr. HUGHES: I must again refer my hon. friend to the mathematician of his party. My hon. friend from Carleton, I will not say the unworthy representative of that constituency, is always trying to get in a left hander at the militia. What did the late Minister of Militia ever do to my hon. friend that he has a crack at the militia every chance; and he nearly always ends with a dig at my predecessor. What has been the trouble? Were their minds not in harmony? Sir Frederick Borden, I say, deserves credit for appointing 174 honorary colonels and I do not think I am deserving of condemnation for appointing 45 without previous rank and 40 with previous rank, or a total of 85. I have looked around the country as Roosevelt did when he appointed General Wood. When I can get a man at the head of a railway to accept a position in the transport service, I follow the custom in England and am glad to get him. They see to the transportation of troops to camp and are willing to give their personal attention to organizing the transport of troops. It is the first time in the history of Canada that we have got these men, and I think I am deserving of nothing but praise for making these gentlemen honorary colonels. Take the case of Rev. Dr. McMillan, of Halifax. He was chaplain of my own regiment, I trained him.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Did you train him in theology or in military science?

Mr. HUGHES: I think that possibly I influenced him in both by my frank and open way in life, showing him that it was possible for a man to be a man and still be a soldier and I think that I possibly broadened him and made him a bigger man. So it is with Rev. Dr. Johnston, of the American Presbyterian Church, Montreal, another old chaplain of my own regiment. I have had the honour to make gentlemen of this class honorary lieutenant-colonels because they understand the cadet business and the training of the youth of the country. Everything I have done in this connection has always been with that object in view. I made Sir Glenholme Falconbridge an honorary lieutenant-colonel. Some of my friends belittle him. Sir Glenholme Falconbridge has a military school training and he obtained a certificate long years ago which entitled him to the command of a regiment. He served in the Queen's Own before and after the Fenian raid. He has served his country in various ways and he has given a great deal of attention to the cadet work. I could name almost every other man who is on the list in connection with the deep interest he has taken in the service. I have no apology to make and I make none. I made George Ham an honorary colonel the other day.

Mr. MARCIL: That was the most popular appointment on the list.

Mr. HUGHES: If my hon. friend will take a little interest in the cadet movement we will keep our eye on him and bring him forward. It is like the Senate; whenever I hear a man condemning the Senate and making speeches against it I say: That man will be over there in a year or two. Whenever I find a man condemning the cadet corps, it is not more than a day or two before some of his friends come around and say: Could you not make Emmerson an honorary colonel?

Coming now to the active militia, I may say that the active militia is divided into two classes, the permanent corps and the non-permanent, the permanent corps consisting of 3,021 officers and men and the non-permanent force consisting of 74,606 officers and men. We hear a great deal about militarism in Canada. I have never been an advocate of a permanent or standing army except for instructional purposes. I am reducing the permanent force. I inherited, in the permanent force, an army service corps which was in size 25 per cent of the army service corps that the whole of the British army has. I am reducing that. I am putting men in other employment and I have made up my mind that I will not have a large number of men in our army service corps about the country. The danger to the country is from the permanent end of the military forces, not the non-permanent end. In the permanent service men are taken out of continuous employment, they are taken from the other services of the country and they become a special and privileged class while the great majority of the people are untrained. Under these circumstances people are like men standing around the edge of a football field—mere rooters watching the regulars go by. With a permanent army, in a time of crisis in the nation's history, there is danger, unless the officers are constitutionally trained, of the officers and men obeying the mandate of some oligarchic government, autocratic Upper House, or Divine right ruler.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What do you mean by that ?

Mr. HUGHES: My hon. friend can read and he can exercise his intellectual powers. In olden times home training fitted men for the army. To-day it does not. In olden times every boy could handle the quarter-staff and the single stick. To-day the service is very different; the sword is no more used, but the long-range rifle in the hands of the straight shooter is what counts. We must have the militia spirit if we want to have a proper militia system, because we could not, in a country such as Canada, afford to maintain a large standing army. The non-permanent militia of the country represent the people at large. It is the right and duty of every citizen to demand to be trained. Counting corps organized and those asking to be equipped, we have 78,000 men. There is a regiment in Hull, another in Maisonneuve, another in Sault Ste. Marie, another in Toronto, and regiments all over Canada, organized and officers selected for them, but we have not the armament, the equipment or the money to enable them to be trained. There are cavalry regiments waiting. There is a regiment in Prince Edward Island, and there are regiments in other places, but we have not the equipment which would be required to put men into harness. Otherwise, instead of having 78,000, I would have 150,000 men and 40,000 cadets. It is the right of every citizen to demand to be trained, and it is the right of every government to meet the citizens, in so far as possible, in their demand to be trained. If you have trained the manhood of the nation, you need never be afraid of any coup d'etat on the part of any standing army. It is our boys scattered up and down the country, on the concessions and side lines, and behind the counters that we must rely upon, and if they are properly trained we need never be afraid of any autocratic demagogue trying to get control of the Government by means of a coup d'etat. There is no money which so readily reaches the people as money appropriated for militia purposes. The following statement shows the strength of active militia from 1909 to 1913:

		Established.	Trained
1909.	Officers	3,546	2,904
	Men	40,197	33,320
		43,742	36,224
1910.	Officers	4,874	3,621
	Men	52,820	40,521
		57,694	44,142
1911.	Officers	4,942	3,505
	Men	55,239	41,205
		60,181	44,710
1912.	Officers	5,259	3,763
	Men	61,103	44,450
		66,362	48,213
1913.	Officers	5,615	4,300
	Men	68,991	53,227
		74,606	57,527

Long years ago—in 1841—in Upper and Lower Canada alone they trained 235,000 men. Upper Canada had 118,000 and Lower Canada 117,000 men regularly trained at their own expense, equipped with their own weapons, and turned out four times a year for drill. The year previous to that upon which I took office, my predecessor had drilled 44,710 men, and there were 60,000 men enrolled. Last year we drilled 57,527 men, and there were enrolled 74,606. We exempted about 17,000 from drill. To summarize our militia force, we have in Canada:

Permanent corps for 1913	3,021
Non-permanent	74,606
Total for 1913	77,627
Cadets	44,680
Civilian rifle associations	23,880
Reserves, volunteers, Canadian and British	500,000
Corps organized and asking to be equipped	78,000
Total	724,187
To these add:
Teachers and cadet instructors trained since October, 1911	12,000
Grand total	736,187

These have been trained for the defence of the country. Now, I come to the question of cost. At Confederation the principle was laid down that a maximum of 10 per cent and a minimum of 8¾ per cent of the revenue, or one-tenth maximum and one-twelfth minimum, should be devoted to militia and defence. The following figures will show how this principle has been carried out:

Year.	Per cent Revenue.	Per cent Customs and Excise.
1905-6	7½	10
1908-9	8½	11½
1910-11	6	8
1911-12	5¾	7⅓
1912-13	5⅝	7
1913-14	5⅝	7

The percentage of revenue expended on the militia last year is the lowest percentage that has been expended in any one year in our history.

When I took office, I found an overdraft of $649,508 on the 31st of March, 1912, which could not be paid because the money had not been voted. I am not finding any fault on account of this; I am not casting any blame on my predecessor, because every hon. member in the House at that time, even the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), endorsed my predecessor's policy. During the few months that I was in office that year, I paid $702,979 on back accounts. I found also—and I want my hon. friends opposite to observe this—orders placed by my predecessor chiefly in following up Sir John French's report, amounting to $4,044,493, a load on my back that had to be paid to preserve the honour of the country. I am not finding any fault with this, because every hon. member endorsed my predecessor's action. This sum was not provided for. It had to be paid in three years; I am paying it, and I am not kicking about it.

Mr. EMMERSON: Pretty hard on your bank account.

Mr. HUGHES: I will draw on my hon. friend when I want any money. This matter would never have been brought up by me in this House had it not been for attacks made on me by one or two subordinate members outside the House. Of this sum of $4,044,493, not one cent of which was for orders placed by myself, I have paid $2,079,797, and the first shipment of cannon came to hand only about two days ago, although the orders were placed three years ago. I have been paying for these contracts during the past three years, and have been damned as an extravagant Minister of Militia when I have been paying the debts of my predecessor.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the hon. minister give the details of the $649,508 of an overdraft?

Mr. HUGHES: Ordnance, equipment.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the minister give a little more detail than that?

Mr. HUGHES: The whole thing is in an account. There were certain quantities of ordnance, equipment, clothing, etc., ordered.

Mr. CARVELL: Have the goods been delivered?

Mr. HUGHES: They were long ago delivered.

Mr. CARVELL: Were they delivered when my hon. friend took office?

Mr. HUGHES: Yes. I paid $702,979 that year. I am not complaining; I am not finding fault; I am merely explaining why these Estimates seem large.

Mr. CARVELL: Was not that on account of the Main Estimates not being voted before the election in 1911?

Mr. HUGHES: No. These debts had been contracted and had to be paid.

Mr. CARVELL: But they were paid out of the Estimates of that year.

5 p.m. Mr. HUGHES: The $649,508 was not paid.

Mr. CARVELL: The money had not been voted; that was the trouble.

Mr. HUGHES: The money for 1911-12 was not voted by me; the debt was contracted by my predecessor.

Mr. CARVELL: When my hon. friend took office, a certain portion of the Estimates for 1911 had been voted, I think five-twelfths or seven-twelfths. After my hon. friend took office, the balance of that year's Estimates were voted by him?

Mr. HUGHES: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: Is it not a fact that my hon. friend paid the $702,979 after he came into office out of the balance of that year's Estimates?

Mr. HUGHES: No, the debt was there. The House voted whatever balance was to vote and it went to pay these debts.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is not answering the question. Was not this sum of $702,979 paid out of the Estimates voted in 1911?

[Mr. S. Hughes.]

Mr. HUGHES: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: Well, that is the end of the whole thing.

Mr. HUGHES: That is what I am trying to put into my hon. friend's head.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend said that he had a debt to pay, whereas he paid only his own debts out of the appropriations voted by Parliament.

Mr. HUGHES: I want my hon. friend to understand that he got a lesson in bluffing last night, and he will get another to-day. The Estimates were presented to the House by Sir Frederick Borden and not by Sam. Hughes.

Mr. CARVELL: And you paid your bills out of the balance of the Estimates voted?

Mr. HUGHES: No. We paid some money out of the sums asked for by my predecessor.

Mr. CARVELL: And now you leave the impression that you had a deficit.

Mr. HUGHES: Nothing of the kind. I found that my predecessor had asked only for certain sums of money that had been paid, and that $649,508 above that had not been voted.

Mr. CARVELL: And we voted that for the year 1911 and paid the bills.

Mr. HUGHES: You did not. Not a dollar of it was voted in 1911.

Mr. CARVELL: I say we voted it for the year 1911.

Mr. HUGHES: No.

Mr. CARVELL: I know that we came back here in 1911. My hon. friend talks about bluffing. He will find it just as well not to use that word. My hon. friend knows that we came back here in 1911 and voted seven-twelfths of the Estimates for 1911-12. Is that right?

Mr. HUGHES: You are making the speech.

Mr. CARVELL: I am asking my hon. friend. I want my hon. friend to answer the question. Did not we in 1912 vote—

Mr. HUGHES: You were not in power in 1912.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend will not facilitate the passing of his Estimates by any such conduct as this. Will my hon. friend, or will he not, answer my question?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. CARVELL: I want the minister to say whether or not he will answer my question.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CARVELL: I want the minister to answer. Will he answer my question or not?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: Militia and Defence—

Mr. CARVELL: I knew the hon. minister could not answer it. He knows he is trying to bluff the House; and when his bluff is called, he is not man enough to answer it. That is the trouble with the minister.

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. member that the hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. HUGHES: I will repeat it again. I do not expect to convince the hon. member for Carleton, because a colleague of his opposite, not a thousand years ago, said that my hon. friend was unbalanced on the top story. I will repeat it again in case there may be some hon. gentleman nearly as dense as my hon. friend is, who does not understand it. My predecessor voted certain Estimates in 1911-12. Whether or not they were all passed makes no difference. After I came into office, out of the moneys, no matter where they came from, we paid $702,979, although probably there had been some moneys paid previously to that. That year's vote was not sufficient by $649,508 to pay all the moneys that were due that year, and therefore there was an overhang.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How did the hon. gentleman pay it if he had not the appropriation?

Mr. HUGHES: I paid it the next year, and had an appropriation for it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That appropriation must have been passed.

Mr. HUGHES: Let not the right hon. gentleman indulge in quibbling. He knows the Ordnance accounts; he has gone into that before.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What I contend is that—

Mr. HUGHES: I do not wish to be discourteous, but I have the floor and I intend to get a fair hearing. My right hon. friend knows that Sir Frederick Borden ordered, in the summer of 1911, four million dollars' worth of armaments and equipment for this country, and he knows that I have been paying that ever since.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend could not pay it unless he had an appropriation for it.

Mr. HUGHES: It was a debt on current account, and the right hon. gentleman knows all about it; if not, I will enlighten him and the House too.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Let us understand what the hon. member is talking about; let us make it clear.

Mr. HUGHES: To a great financier like—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NESBITT: The minister will not get his Estimates through in that way.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: All I ask the hon. minister to do is to make himself intelligible to the House;—or the question he is discussing intelligible to the House—or else abandon this style of his speech.

Mr. HUGHES: I know this is distasteful to these hon. gentlemen. They have been talking about the extravagance of the Militia Department, and they do not care for these figures. Now, I want to point out to them that there was this debt of $649,000, the money for which my predecessor should have asked, and which I have had to pay.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman says it is a small matter; why, then, does he make such a fuss about it?

Mr. HUGHES: I will show later this is part of the account. No, I will give it now. In 1911-2—that was my predecessor's year—the militia payments amounted to $7,729,948.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. minister might tell us what the Estimates were.

Mr. HUGHES: I do not know. They exceeded that, but I have not the figures.

Mr. NESBITT: But that would show exactly what we want to get at.

Mr. HUGHES: The hon. gentleman will have to look them up.

Mr. CARVELL: The minister should have these figures.

Mr. HUGHES: Add to these payments $649,000 for the goods which were delivered under my predecessor's order, and we find that the payments for the year should have been $8,379,000.

Mr. NESBITT: Has not the minister got the Estimates there? We are asking a fair question.

Mr. HUGHES: The question of the Estimates has nothing to do with it.

Mr. NESBITT: Why not?

Mr. HUGHES: If it had anything to do with it, the hon. gentleman can show it when his turn comes to speak. Now, this overdraft was for armament and equipment alone, and does not include minor accounts nor anything on account of the $4,000,000 for armament ordered in the summer of 1911. When I took office the equipment in the stores was practically exhausted. We had not enough uniforms in all Canada to furnish two regiments; not enough equipment for one. Therefore, we have been obliged to build up from that time. The stores were exhausted, I suppose, on account of the South African war. Now, there were other expenditures which my predecessor did not have to face and which should be allowed for if one is to reach a fair basis of comparison. There was an increase of upwards of twenty-five per cent in the force, thus necessitating a considerably larger expenditure. The pay for both horses and men was increased—for the horses twenty-five cents per day. The city corps have been brought out to camp for several days extra. The cadet corps have been developed; 12,000 teachers have been trained; the instruction staff has been greatly increased; and drill halls and rifle ranges have been provided wherever possible. Let me summarize this explanation in the following financial statement:

1911-12—last Liberal year cost		$7,729,948
Add—'Overhang'		649,508
Total		$8,379,456
1912-13—first Tory year		$10,272,759
Deduct—
Fenian bounty	$ 991,600
'Overhang'	649,508
1/3 Overdraft	1,333,333
Connaught Rifle Range	250,000
Total	$3,224,441	3,224,441
Real amount for 1912-13		$7,048,318

Thus the expenditure for 1912-13, was really only 4½ per cent of the revenue. There is an item of about $125,000 for a new rifle range in Victoria, B.C., that is a transferance of account. We have a range in this city worth $1,000,000. It is dangerous and the city wants to get rid of it. The city of Victoria has a valuable property which it has given to the Public Works; and the plan was the Public Works would build the rifle ranges or furnish the money therefor. But the funds have not been so furnished. I demanded of the Public Works Department that they build my rifle range and charge it up, but I have not got a dollar. So, the Militia Department is building that range though we have a rifle range in the city and the charge should be made a matter of transfer of account.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the rifle range at Victoria to be used as a public park?

Mr. HUGHES: The old one, yes. That is what they want. They have given the Public Works Department of this country nearly a million dollars worth of property. Our rifle range was to go to the Public Works Department. The Public Works Department, it is supposed, will swap the two properties.

Mr. LEMIEUX: At what do you value yours?

Mr. HUGHES: Three quarters of a million, and I am going to get it out of the Public Works Department. No matter whether it is a city corporation or another department, I intend to fight for the Militia Department after this—and I have been doing it all along. So, it will be seen, according to the figures I have given, that my expenditure on a comparative basis as between my predecessor and myself is not very much greater than his. I am not finding fault with what was done. I cheerfully endorse the spending of this $4,000,000, though I knew nothing about it. Sir Frederick Borden explained that it was the necessary result of the adoption of General French's report; and I am not going to criticise my predecessor for having obeyed the order of the House in buying these arms, etc.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the minister give details of this equipment.

Mr. HUGHES: I have not got it here.

Mr. CARVELL: Could the minister not give it generally.

Mr. HUGHES: I will come to it in a moment. I have here the statement of these extraordinary expenditures for the financial year 1912-1913:

Extras—
Fenian Raid Bounty	$ 991,600
Overdraft, 1911	649,508
1/3 of $4,000,000	1.333,333
Increase in militia	550,000
City Corps in camp	200,000

Increase pay—
Men and horses	$ 80,000
Cadets and teachers	350,000
Drill-halls	530,000
Connaught Rifle Range	235,000
Extra clothing, etc.	500,000
Total	$5,419,441

The expenditure for that year was $10,272,759. If we deduct these extraordinary expenditures of $5,419,441, we ascertain the expenditure on the same basis as that made by my predecessor. We find, therefore, that the relative net expenditure for 1912-1913 was $4,853,318.

Last year the following classes were trained: permanent, 3,000; non-permanent, 57,527; cadets, 44,680; teachers, 12,000; a total of 117,207 persons.

Mr. PARDEE: The minister mentioned the sum of $4,000,000; did he arrive at that by a process of elimination, or is that what the whole militia is costing this year?

Mr. HUGHES: I am giving these figures only for purposes of comparison. As the hon. gentleman has indulged in criticism of the alleged extravagance of the Militia Department, I am making a comparison of previous expenditures with expenditures under this Administration. After deducting extras, of which I have given a list, I find that the expenditure is only $4,000,000.

Mr. EMMERSON: The hon. gentleman is simply making a tu quoque argument.

Mr. HUGHES: That is all. In 1911-12 there was spent on the militia the sum of $7,729,948, which, plus overdraft due, $649,508, makes a total of $8,379,456. In that year the following were trained: permanent, 3,000; non-permanent, 44,710; cadets, 12,000; teachers, 221; total, 59,931, an average of $139 per head.

Upon the army and navy Great Britain spends 40 per cent of her revenue; France, 30 per cent; Germany, 53 per cent; Italy, 24 per cent; United States, 47 per cent, including expenditure on pensions; Australia, 27 per cent; New Zealand, 5½ per cent; Canada, 7¼ per cent, including pensions; Canada, militia alone, 5⅝ per cent; Switzerland, 26 per cent. To show that the Militia Department has been moderate in its increase of expenditure, I wish to point out that the increased percentage of expenditure in 1913-14 over 1912-13 was 166 per cent in the Department of Public Works, 37 per cent in the Department of Railways and Canals, 59 per cent in the Department of the Interior, and 22 per cent in the Department of Militia. The expenditures in the Militia Department in 1913-14 were but 5⅜ per cent of the total revenue, while in the Department of Public Works the percentage was 29½ per cent, and in the Department of Railways and Canals, 24⅝ per cent. In 1913 Great Britain spent, per capita, $2.99 upon her army and $4.97 upon her navy, a total of $7.96. The figures for France are $4.92 for the army and $2.29 for the navy, total, $7.21. Germany: army, $4.50; navy, $1.71; total, $6.21. Italy: army, $2.36; navy, $1.44; total, $3.80. United States: army, $1.74; navy, $1.44; pensions, $1.90. That does not include the state militia. Australia: army, $3.01; navy, $2.49; total, $5.50. New Zealand: army, $2.29; navy, 45 cents; total, $2.74. Canada: militia, $1.27; navy, 36 cents; total, $1.63.

I wish to point out that the money expended upon the militia is more evenly distributed throughout the length and breadth of the land than the money expended by any other department. The Marine and Fisheries Department includes, of course, the fishery protection service. The following statement shows the distribution of funds as estimated for 1914-15:

Pay, wages, money, allowances, etc.	$5,088,300
Forage, rations, food, etc.	621,631
Transport	662,469
Purchase of clothing, stores and supplies in Canada	2,791,500
Purchase of lands, rents, water, lighting, heating of buildings and other expenses	699,000
Purchase of warlike stores in England	1,182,500

I know that hon. gentlemen of the Committee will be interested in information regarding the inspections made by Sir John French in 1910 and Sir Ian Hamilton in 1912. Sir John French made twenty inspections; Sir Ian Hamilton thirty-one. Sir John French inspected 105 units; Sir Ian Hamilton, 190. 19,611 troops were inspected by Sir John French, and 37,401 by Sir Ian Hamilton. The cost of the inspections made by Sir John French was $10,992.88. The Department of Railways and Canals supplied free the cars necessary for Sir John French and staff; hence there is no charge for these in 1910. The cost of the inspection made by Sir Ian Hamilton was $20,740. Inasmuch as the Department of Railways and Canals had not cars available for General Sir Ian Hamilton and party, these had to be hired from the Canadian Pacific railway and the Pullman Company.

Mr. PROULX: Was there a special train?

Mr. HUGHES: Sir John French travelled 3,633 miles.

Mr. PROULX: I am asking the hon. member a question. Did Sir Ian Hamilton and party travel in a special train?

Mr. HUGHES: I will be glad to answer any questions gentlemen on the other side ask. Sir Ian Halmilton travelled 13,051 miles.

Mr. CARVELL: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman says that he will answer any questions asked by gentlemen on this side, yet he has not answered the question asked by the hon. member for Prescott.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand that the point of order is that the hon. member for Prescott has asked the minister a question, which has not been answered. The rule says that any member who has the floor is at liberty to answer or not to answer any question which is asked of him. If the minister does not answer the question, we must understand that he does not desire to do so.

Mr. CARVELL: We understand that he did not mean what he said.

Mr. HUGHES: Owing to the fact that the camps of training were laid out in the worst possible manner, to economize time, a great deal of additional and unnecessary time and travel were rendered obligatory in order to enable Sir Ian Hamilton to see the various bodies of troops. I now wish to give to the committee the recommendations of Sir John French, Sir Percy Lake and Sir Ian Hamilton with regard to guns. The following guns were recommended by Sir John French and Sir Percy Lake:

13 pr.	24
18 pr.	220
Howitzers	72
Heavy	24

The following were delivered up to October, 1911:

13 pr.	24
18 pr.	100
Howitzers	8
Heavy	24

No guns have been delivered since October, 1911. I want to be distinctly understood as not finding fault with or criticising my predecessor. This House endorsed Sir John French's report when it was made, and I take my full share of responsibility in that connection. The comparisons I have made are presented merely with a view to showing that I am bearing the cost of orders placed before I took office and that if my predecessor were still in power he would have to increase his Estimates the same as I am doing. The distribution of rifles has been as follows:

Short Ross—
Issued to troops and cadets	54,286
On ordnance charge	5,725
	60,011

Note.—Of those, approximately 40,000 are fitted with aperture sights.

Long Ross—
Issued to troops	8,960
On ordnance charge	3,429
	12,389

Note.—These rifles are supplied with bridges on which rear aperture sights may be fitted when available.

Mark III—
On order	20,000

Note.—These rifles are being fitted with rear aperture sights and are now being delivered.

I think since I came into office I have ordered one batch of ten thousand. There is an order due last November and I only learned yesterday that I had never put the Order in Council through. There should be ten thousand every year and I have only given one order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has that Order in Council been passed?

Mr. HUGHES: No, not yet.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the price of the rifle?

Mr. HUGHES: It is $26.90 I think. I shall give these particulars later. I wish to discuss the subject of European visits.

Mr. LEMIEUX: South African visits.

Mr. HUGHES: South African visits? I have not been to China and Japan yet, but I am going and will come back wearing my hair the proper way.

Annually, for a number of years, my predecessor sent military officers to the old land. In 1907-8, seven officers and six non-commissioned officers were sent. They cost the country $26,772 or two and a half ordinary good town drill-halls. In 1908-9, my predecessor sent six officers and six non-commissioned officers. Mark you, these were all of the permanent force and these moneys were voted by this Parliament, my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition being then Prime Minister, supported by hon. gentlemen opposite. For these six officers and six non-commissioned officers the cost in 1908-9 was $32,601, or three drill-halls and a half.

Mr. CARVELL: Would the minister say how long the officers remained in England?

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, later on I shall. If the hon. gentleman will let me proceed in my own way I shall be delighted to do it.

Mr. CARVELL: We will have to if he will not give the information.

Mr. HUGHES: I shall give the information but I shall give it in my own way. We may as well understand one another from the drop of the hat. For 1909-10, seven officers and six non-commissioned officers cost $20,315; a moderate sum, only two drill-halls. In 1910-11, fifteen officers and six non-commissioned officers cost $46,-082. These men were sent to England by my predecessor in office. I am not finding fault with him for that, I endorse him, and I am man enough to back him up for doing it; I am not coward enough to turn around and criticise him now that he is out of power for doing this, because he did it in the best interests of the force. I backed him then and I back him to-day. I varied the programme slightly.

Mr. MARCIL: Is it not a fact that the hon. gentleman's predecessor in office did more for the Militia Department than any other Minister of Militia ever did before?

Mr. HUGHES: That is a relative question. It is like asking a fellow which is the more beautiful girl when both are present. I shall say this much for my predecessor, that he was a mighty good Minister of Militia. I have said that before and I will say it here.

Mr. EMMERSON: Perhaps my hon. friend will explain for what reason the officers went over?

Mr. HUGHES: For training, just to learn. If hon. gentlemen will allow me I want to present my statements in my own logical way. I like to do things logically.

Mr. CARVELL: Your own logic.

Mr. HUGHES: That is all right, I go through the world that way. I do not go through the world engineered by any other fellow. In 1911-12, for twelve officers and six non-commissioned officers, my predecessor paid $38,729 of the money of the people of Canada and I endorsed him in it and I endorse him to-day. That is four drill halls. In 1912-13, the first year I was in office, this jumped up to $44,707; but every officer who was sent had been picked and billed to go by my predecessor and I carried out the bill. I shall tell you how I showed my loyalty to my predecessor as I would to any man whom I succeeded. One officer had stood at the polls at Halifax and had turned all the votes he could from my right hon. leader (Mr. Borden), had canvassed against him and got men out of the way whom he could not influence against him. I should have dismissed the fellow from the force. I did not do it, he was a good officer.

Mr. EMMERSON: You applied the golden rule?

Mr. HUGHES: No, I did not; I gave him a lecture.

Mr. GRAHAM: You gave him the worse punishment of the two.

Mr. HUGHES: I brought him to Ottawa.

Mr. KYTE: Slow torture.

Mr. EMMERSON: What did the Postmaster General say about it?

Mr. HUGHES: I brought him to Ottawa. He saw his mistake and I forgave him, but I sent him back to his regiment. He was a good officer but a foolish misguided fellow in politics. He was brought before me, I showed him his error and sent him back to his regiment. I found out that he was one of those billed to go to England, and although the department had been largely loaded up by friends of the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, I sent that fellow to England to take his course, and his expenses form part of the $44,000 rolled up here. The next year, 1913-14, I changed the programme and the cost of sending officers to England was reduced to $10,000. These officers went over from the permanent force. I am not saying one word against the permanent force. The officers are splendid fellows as a rule, tip-top fellows; but I want the House to understand that the Dominion of Canada has too long educated these men. The farmers and taxpayers of Canada have been educating the permanent officers for a good many years. We send them to the schools, we take them in as novices, we send them for the long course in England. I claim that this course could be as well administered here and accordingly we brought out—for my predecessor had adopted this plan and we carried it on—we brought out officers for especially training these men. We let the officers who are being trained carry on their work in the regiment in the ordinary service at the same time that they were taking their instruction and in this way we saved money. The permanent force in Canada are but a handful, some three thousand, many of them are utilized as servants. The officers, nice young fellows, would not officer more than a couple of regiments. The men who would have to do the fighting, who have done the fighting, are largely the non-permanent officers and non-permanent men of this country. I looked around from the Atlantic to the Pacific, I saw men of worth, education, stand and culture like my hon. friend from Woodstock, N.B. (Mr. Carvell), and myself and a lot more of us who had given their time, energy and skill for years—

Mr. CARVELL: I am not in your class.

Mr. HUGHES: I was going to bring you up to my level. I could give the names of officers who have spent $50,000 on their regiments, and who annually spend $5,000 to $10,000 on the militia. Lawyers, doctors, teachers, farmers, business men, and preachers—for we get some of them—are the men who officer the militia of this country. I made up my mind that the young permanent corps fellows, splendid boys though they be, were not going to be the only ones to have an opportunity of studying the militia of other lands. The first year I had a chance, I sent over seven officers and two non-commissioned officers to the British manoeuvres. The success of the experiment was splendid. The cost was $6,800, and they watched the British and French manoeuvres for weeks. In 1913-14, sixteen non-permanent officers and five permanent officers went over at a cost of $24,-620.33—two drill-halls and a half. They saw the British manoeuvres, the French and the Swiss manoeuvres. The officers who went over were chosen from all parts of Canada, regardless of politics. There was, I think, one more Grit than Tory in the party.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Did you go to Belgium?

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, personally.

Mr. MARCIL: Were you recognized as Canadians or Britishers?

Mr. HUGHES: I do not know what the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. MARCIL: Were you recognized as British officers?

Mr. HUGHES: They knew we were Canadians, but of course my hon. friend is aware that the arrangements were made through the British authorities.

[Mr. S. Hughes.]

We are British officers, although we are Canadians. I am a British officer. We were received with the utmost courtesy. I might point out that at these foreign manoeuvres only two officers are allowed in uniform from each country, and the rest go in mufti.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am told that my hon. friend was taken for Kitchener.

Mr. HUGHES: I take that as a compliment; I certainly was not taken for the Emperor of Japan. The officers owed much to the kindness of General French, General Hamilton and General Ellison. General Ellison was a very old friend to the Swiss and his kindness made the way smooth for us. Every officer from Canada received the most courteous treatment everywhere, I am glad to say.

In regard to Switzerland, I have been studying with a great deal of interest the militia system of that country for the past two years. In that country the service is obligatory and universal. There are three classes: the Elite, comprised of men between twenty and thirty-two years of age; the Landwehr, thirty-three to forty years; and the Landsturm, forty-one to forty-eight years. The administration is partly by cantons, and partly by the Confederation. There is a non-training tax. I want to emphasize that point. Every man, rich or poor, who does not train has to pay 6 francs a year, and an additional 1½ francs for each 1,000 francs of net property and 100 francs net income. In 1911 the Swiss people paid 44,777,894.15 francs towards the militia out of a total expenditure of 172,439,221 francs. That is in Confederation taxes alone. The amount spent on the militia represents 26 per cent of the total expenditure of the country. The rifle ranges, and organizations of that sort, are paid for by the cantons. The total force in 1911 was 408,600,851; made up of 142,054 men in the Elite; 69,513 in the Landwehr; 68,579 in the Landsturm; and 206,705 in the Complementary. I think the oath of the Swiss soldier will stand repeating:

Le serment de fidélité au drapeau est prêté selon la formule suivante:

'Les officiers, sous-officiers ou soldats jurent ou promettent solennellement:

'De rester fidèles à la Confédération; de sacrifier leur vie pour la défense de la patrie et de sa constitution; de ne jamais abandonner les drapeaux; de se conformer strictement aux lois militaires; d'obéir scrupuleusement et ponctuellement aux ordres de leurs chefs; de maintenir et d'observer une discipline sévère et de faire tout ce que l'honneur et la liberté de la patrie exigent d'eux.'

Or, in English:

Officers, non-commissioned officers and soldiers, swear, or promise, solemnly to remain faithful to the Confederation; each to sacrifice his life for the defence of the country and of its Constitution; never to abandon the colours; to conform strictly to military law; to obey scrupulously and punctually the orders of superior officers; to maintain and observe a rigid discipline and to do everything which the honour and the freedom of the country require of them.

In passing, I might say that all the officers who went over to the British manoeuvres were men of high standing in their local communities. Since their return they have given, regularly, lectures to the various corps in the country—a thing never done before, and in that way the whole militia is getting the benefit of their experience at the foreign manoeuvres.

The Dominion arsenal has been revised. Without going into details, I might say we found defects in the ammunition. Accidents were occurring all the time, and two of the very best experts were brought over from the war office to look over the arsenal. In brief, their report was as follows: No adequate inspection; twelve million rounds of rifle ammunition was ordered to be destroyed as unfit; eighteen-pounder quick-firing ammunition was found to be defective, the loss on these eighteen-pounders amounting to $100,000; there was no cordite for 6 months during which time bullets and cases were made; seven thousand eighteen-pounder shells had been completed, and 20,000 partly so, but only one was found to be properly shaped; 75 were selected for the firing test, 15 of which would not enter the gun at all; one burst within the gun and nearly spoiled it—a $7,000 gun. New dies and machinery have been put in and the very best ammunition is now being turned out. I would ask the House to call it six o'clock. I wish to thank hon. gentlemen very much for their patience.

Mr. CARVELL: Would the minister answer the questions which I asked of him as he so kindly promised?

Mr. HUGHES: I have taken a note of the questions.

Mr. CARVELL: That is as to the time the officers remained in England during the years 1907-8-9-10.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Blondin in the chair.

Militia and Defence—allowances, active militia, $123,000.

Mr. PROULX: Before we proceed to any item, I desire to say that the minister this afternoon said that he courted any question we wanted to put to him from this side of the House. I rose a few times to put some questions to the minister and he did not pay any attention to me. I have been informed that he said that he would answer only questions put by gentlemen. I would like to know whether or not he made that statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Answer.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I think the hon. member should speak to the question.

Mr. PROULX: I put some questions to the hon. minister this afternoon and he did not pay any attention to me. I am told that he said that he would answer only questions put by gentlemen. I want to know whether or not he made that statement.

Mr. HUGHES: I do not find the item in the Estimates.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I hardly think that you, Mr. Chairman, should encourage the Minister of Militia not to answer the question of my hon. friend from Prescott. It is surely a fair question and it does not matter whether or not it is pertinent to the item before us; it is certainly deserving of a reply. My own impression is that the hon. minister did not make the remark which the hon. member for Prescott has been advised was made by the minister, but it would be assuring to have the minister say that he did not make that remark.

Mr. HUGHES: I will not answer any such question put in any such tone.

Mr. CARVELL: I hope my hon. friend the minister will not take this course. He evidently is labouring under a very grave delusion. He has invited the members of the Opposition to be here; and while we realize that the minister is running the affairs of the Militia Department at the present time, surely he does not deny the right of members of the Opposition, when they are invited to be here, to ask him questions. I do not know just what object the minister had this afternoon in treating the member for Prescott as he did. I called his attention in a gentlemanly manner to the fact that the hon. member for Prescott had asked him a question and that he had not answered it. No matter whether or not the minister has some feeling against the hon.

member for Prescott, the hon. member for Prescott is a member of this House and the minister, I think, is approaching this matter from entirely wrong premises. He seems to have the idea that the moment a member of the Opposition asks him a question, it is a signal for battle and he must fire some pert reply at him. We do not ask the minister questions with that object in view, and surely he does not want us to reply in kind. I do not want to threaten the minister, but the course he is taking does not lead to a proper discussion of his Estimates. When the minister is asking us to vote ten or eleven million dollars, surely he must admit the right of members of the Opposition to ask questions. I appeal to the minister to forget any feeling he may have and to forget the fact that he has done what perhaps no other minister has done in the history of Canada, namely, sent out a notice to every member of the Opposition to be here, which is practically a challenge: Come along now and I will insult you, because that is evidently the way in which it appeals to us. The minister may say that he has not that object in view. If he does, we will accept his statement, and we shall be glad to have him take that ground. We do not want to feel that the minister has tried to insult us, but when any member of the Opposition asks the minister a fair question, he is entitled to a fair answer, regardless of any personal feeling the minister may have toward that member. I think that is a fair proposition.

The minister this afternoon took occasion to tell me that I was bluffing him. I was not doing so; I was trying to get information. I do not want to reveal any personal matters, but I had a conversation with the minister about this very matter before, and I think the minister will remember the occasion. I went to the gentleman who was responsible at the time and asked him about it, and he told me there was nothing in it. I want the information. I do not care if Sir Frederick Borden left a debt of $2,000,000; that is Sir Frederick Borden's business, and the minister is perfectly justified in giving the facts to Parliament. We do not want the minister to gloss over anything that took place in the regime of his predecessor; we want him to give the facts. I had a right to ask the minister the question, and I had a right to receive a fair answer, and I do not want to be charged with bluffing when I ask the minister a fair question. I am not threatening; I want the minister to get that idea out of his mind once and for all. I am only trying to present this proposition to him; and the minister ought to get rid of all his bellicose ideas and realize that he is not the Minister of War to-night, but a minister of the Government, coming here to ask Parliament to vote him ten or eleven million dollars, and that the members of the Opposition have a right to ask him questions and receive reasonable and courteous replies. The minister stated to me that he would be pleased to answer any question put by any gentleman. I do not mean to say that the minister intended to convey any insulting reference to the hon. member for Prescott. I must say that, when the answer was given to me, it did not so impress me; and I do not think the minister intended to take that course; but it evidently impressed the member for Prescott in an entirely different manner. The minister made that statement; and I think it is only fair to himself, let alone the hon. member for Prescott, that he should tell the hon. member whether he intended to apply that remark to him in an insulting manner or whether it was only said in a courteous way.

Mr. HUGHES: I am obliged for the very nice lecture I have just received—

Mr. CARVELL: There you are again.

Mr. HUGHES: What right has the hon. member to stand up and lecture me? I have answered every question that has been put to me this afternoon.

Mr. CARVELL: Save one.

Mr. HUGHES: I had not the data at hand in regard to that one; I have it now. I have answered every question that any gentleman has asked me this afternoon. I need not have answered any question at all when I was making my remarks. I was in the midst of an idea when the right hon. leader of the Opposition sought to ask me a question; but as he was interrupting the thread of my argument at the time, I asked him to wait until I got through with my line of thought. The hon. member for Carleton is not in a position to lecture me. He got up once or twice this afternoon to make a speech, if I remember aright—

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Mr. HUGHES: Well, a miniature speech we can call it. I will answer any question courteously put to me; but I must decline the right of anybody to catechize me as to what sort of temper I was in, or whether I made a statement in this manner or in that manner; my language will speak for itself. I think the hon. member will search in vain the annals of this House for the record of any man who has been more ready to furnish information and data to his opponents than myself. During the three years that I have been presenting the Militia Estimates, the items were sent out every time to every hon. member in advance, so that they could have the fullest opportunity of getting posted as to the facts.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is in error. The same course was pursued by his predecessor.

Mr. HUGHES: In general, not in detail. I have all the reports.

Mr. CARVELL: There was a document of some kind.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, a general document, but my information was sent out in detail, giving every vote.

Mr. CARVELL: That is a matter of degree.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, but I sent out the information, showing that I was anxious to inform the House and the country as to the matters of my department. I have come here and shown frankly that I endorsed every vote that Sir Frederick Borden asked for. I am not finding fault with that; I have brought this matter up merely to show that, no matter who was in charge of the Militia Department, these accounts had to be paid.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The minister has indeed been very generous in answering questions, but the complaint of the hon. member for Prescott is a rather personal one and I think the minister should give it his attention.

Mr. HUGHES: If it is a personal matter, let the hon. member come to me personally and I will talk to him.

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind hon. members that the rule is that the point of order or objection to any word must be taken immediately upon its being spoken. I myself did not hear the word, but the rule as laid down by Bourinot is as I have said and I rule accordingly.

Mr. PROULX: I put a fair question to the minister this afternoon; I will put it to him again and I hope he will answer it. He was speaking about the travelling expenses of Sir Ian Hamilton and himself last summer and he was comparing them with the expenses of the trip of Sir John French. I asked him whether or not he travelled with Sir Ian Hamilton in a special train and he declined to answer my question. Will the minister answer the question now?

Mr. HUGHES: Sir Ian Hamilton travelled with me in a special train.

Mr. PROULX: How much did the hon. gentleman pay for that special train?

Mr. HUGHES: I gave the figures this afternoon.

Mr. PROULX: The figures were given in a lump sum; I would like to know what was the cost of this special train?

Mr. HUGHES: The figures have been given two or three times during this session, in answer to questions.

Mr. PROULX: Can the minister not give me the information now?

Mr. HUGHES: I will get the information for the hon. gentleman when we take up the item.

The CHAIRMAN: I am confronted with a difficult question. I would like to know whether it is the desire of the committee to have a general discussion, or whether we shall proceed item by item.

Mr. HUGHES: Having given my general statement this afternoon, I am now ready to be interrupted just as often as hon. gentlemen desire to ask questions. I will endeavour to answer their questions, as I have always done, frankly and squarely, with no turning corners and with no equivocation whatever.

The CHAIRMAN: I must insist on having the decision of the committee, because I am in a difficult position. The rule says that speeches in Committee of the Whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under discussion.

Mr. CARVELL: Would it not be a very grave error on the part of this committee to depart from the rule which has been adhered to, according to my recollection, for the last ten years? The rule has always been in our book of rules, but we have never been absolutely confined to the single item under discussion. A wide range of discussion is allowed, and I do not think the Minister of Militia will take the ground that we are to be absolutely bound down to the item under discussion.

Mr. HUGHES: Last year and other years there was always a great deal of rambling over almost everything.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not think we should have this as a matter of grace or favour from the minister. We do not want any favours from this minister, conversation in the corridor used in public addresses to the contrary notwithstanding. I do not wish to reflect upon your action in raising the point, Mr. Chairman, but it seems to me to be very strange that it should be necessary to have the decision of the committee formally declared in this matter when the wide discussion of Estimates has been the custom, to my knowledge, for nine sessions. If the Chair were anxious to comply with the rules, would it not have been more in order to say: have we the unanimous consent of the committee to go on with these Estimates to-day, it being Thursday, and the Estimates not having been previously taken up? I wish to place myself on record as contending that we have the right, according to custom almost from time immemorial in this House, to ask the minister at the opening of his Estimates any question with regard to the expenditures of his department,

Mr. McCREA: I asked the minister some questions in connection with the renting or purchasing of property in Sherbrooke from Mrs. A. N. Worthington, and I got the reply that the property was leased at a rental of $100 a month and was being used for temporary quarters. For what purpose are those quarters to be used?

Mr. HUGHES: As the hon. member knows, the armoury part of the drill hall of the 53rd regiment is not yet ready. The old court house is to be fitted up for that purpose, and in the meantime the officers, non-commissioned officers and band must have other quarters. These rooms have been rented for that purpose.

Mr. McCREA: Are the men going to drill there?

Mr. HUGHES: They are to have their lectures and meetings there, the same as they do in drill halls.

Mr. McCREA: Are these premises to be used, according to military terms, as an officers' mess, or what I would call an officers' club? For what purpose are they to be used?

Mr. HUGHES: In every drill hall in Canada they have rooms for the purpose of holding meetings, lectures and so on, and where the drill hall does not provide that accommodation, we rent premises outside. They are used by the officers for lecture purposes, for examination purposes, for studying and, I presume, for conversation and smoking.

Mr. McCREA: The St. George's Club building was burned last fall, and the club moved into this building and are now, or were until lately, occupying it. Have any arrangements been made with the St. George's club to remain there, and if so, on what terms?

Mr. HUGHES: I understand that the club has given notive to vacate the premises and allow the officers to take charge.

Mr. McCREA: How soon?

Mr. HUGHES: I do not know the details, but I can find out.

Mr. McCREA: My information from people in Sherbrooke is that the members of the St. George club are to remain there as the guests of the officers of the 53rd regiment until such time as they have rebuilt their own building. Is that correct?

Mr. HUGHES: I have never heard of it, but I will look into the matter.

Mr. McCREA: When was this building rented from Mrs. Worthington?

Mr. HUGHES: Very recently; within the last few weeks.

Mr. McCREA: Permit me to ask again whether or not these premises are to be used for what is called in military terms an officers' mess?

Mr. HUGHES: It is used identically for the same purposes as similar rooms are used in drill halls: for the holding of meetings and for any legitimate purpose in connection with the regiment.

Mr. McCREA: This building, I believe, has been used as an officers' mess, or officers' club. It is also used, and has been since last December, by the St. George's Club, and I understand and believe they are still occupying it. My information was they were invited to remain there as guests of the 53rd Regiment until they had rebuilt their own building.

I am not jealous of this, nor do I think the recompense is more than the St. George's Club deserves, for I think they are worthy of nearly everything the Conservative party can do for them, because that institution has been a Conservative committee room ever since I knew anything about it, and I assume it is yet. But what I am a little inquisitive about is whether it is necessary to have a place of this kind or not. We have two drill-halls in the city of Sherbrooke, and a good deal of military equipment. I am inclined to think that the expenditure of public money for an officers' club is not quite the best use of public money, even for military purposes. I think the people of the county of Sherbrooke will tell you so when the proper time comes. The city of Sherbrooke has a population of less than 20,000. We have two pretty expensive drill-halls, as I have said, one with a complete armoury, and the other is to have an up-to-date armoury in every respect. Now, militarism may be a good thing, but I do not know that a population of nearly 20,000 needs two drill-halls. Besides these, the militia occupy two other buildings. In the Brooks block, they are using the upper stories, as well as an apartment downstairs, for which they pay $75 per month, and they rent this property from Mrs. Worthington, for which they pay $100 per month. I think that public money could be spent to better advantage. If, for instance, the same amount were devoted to teaching the people how to farm properly, it would serve a better purpose than spending it on militarism. I am not inclined to find a great deal of fault politically, because I think this will do more good to me than to the party it was intended to help. But politics is not a thing in which I make my living nor is it a thing in which I am much interested. My business here is to give the Government my advice and opinion; and my advice and opinion is that it would be well for the Prime Minister to pay a little attention to the militia administration.

The Minister of Militia, this afternoon, referring to an answer I had made to him, said that I had just woke up. Perhaps I have; and perhaps I have taken longer to wake up than I ought. But I think he will find that a lot of other people have waked up, and are waking up. They say that a word to the wise is sufficient; and I will just take the minister into my confidence to the extent of telling him that I do not think his militarism is quite as popular in the county of Sherbrooke as he believes it to be. I would advise him to go slow and be careful. The minister also said that it was a necessary part of the training of young men to teach them to shoot straight in case of trouble. I do not know whether the people who attend that club will be able to shoot straight when the time comes or not. My impression is they will not.

Mr. HUGHES: The hon member has proven himself a veritable warrior—blackguarding the St. George's club behind their backs.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HUGHES: I know nothing about it; never knew there was such a club in existence, and do not know it yet.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a point of order. I ask whether if it is in order even for a minister of the Crown to say that an hon. member of this House 'blackguards' anybody. And if that expression is unparliamentary I ask that the minister be commanded to take it back.

Mr. HUGHES: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister has a right to speak to the point of order.

Mr. HUGHES: I did not charge any man with blackguarding—

Mr. KNOWLES: What did you say?

Mr. HUGHES: The hon. gentleman can find that out from the 'Hansard'. The hon. member has seen fit to take a certain course—

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. minister can speak to the point of order, but he cannot speak on other matters until the Chair has ruled. My point is this: That the Minister of Militia did say of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) that he had blackguarded the St. George's club behind their backs.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that the words have been used?

Mr. HUGHES: You heard what I said.

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the word 'blackguard' applied to any hon. member of this House is pretty strong language. It is better that it should not be used in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw. Take it back.

Mr. HUGHES: I have not used the word with reference to any member of this House.

Mr. KNOWLES: I ask your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I say that in my hearing the hon. minister used the expression in regard to the hon. member for Sherbrooke 'blackguarding the St. George's club behind their backs'.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister had better explain what he meant and to whom he applied the word. If the word was applied to the hon. member, I must repeat, it should not be used in this House and should be taken back.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I understand the minister says he did not apply the word to the hon. member.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He did.

Mr. KNOWLES: My point of order is— But I see the minister has risen, does he wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. HUGHES: I am not speaking to a point of order.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then, I am not through with it, Mr. Chairman. It is not enough for you to rule that the expression should be withdrawn, but it is your duty to compel its withdrawal. If a member commits a breach of parliamentary decorum, he cannot evade or escape the ruling of the Chair by saying that he did not say what every member heard him say. As he has used the expression—as you heard him use it—it is not only your duty to rule it out of order as unparliamentary, but it is equally and imperatively your duty to command him to take it back.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: May I be allowed to analyse briefly what the minister said. Perhaps he does not have a full appreciation of the significance of the language he used and, I say that in all charity. What we heard on this side was a charge on the part of the minister that the hon. member for Sherbrooke had blackguarded the St. George's club of his town of Sherbrooke—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Behind their backs.

Mr. CLARK: That does not apply. Now, to blackguard persons as I understand that word, is to use blackguardly language concerning them. And blackguardly language is used only by a blackguard. Therefore, when the minister charged the hon. member with having blackguarded the club, he, in effect, charged him with being a blackguard. I offer that suggestion to the minister in all charitableness and fairness. And, I think Mr. Chairman, the use of such language as I have quoted is sailing very close to the wind to say the very least of it.

The CHAIRMAN: There is a rule which says that whatever a member says in explanation, whether relating to the words or to the meaning of his speech, is to be taken as true and not afterwards called into question. It is true that I have heard the word 'blackguard,' but the fact that the minister said that he did not apply the word to the hon. member falls under this rule, and I think even if it could be interpreted in the way some members interpret it, it can be taken as having been taken back.

Mr. HUGHES: The hon. member has referred to the renting of these halls. He knows as well as any one that there are two regiments in Sherbrooke, and he knows as well as any one the cause of the difficulty that has arisen in the city of Sherbrooke. One is a very excellent French-Canadian regiment.

Mr. PARDEE: What was your ruling, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: I ruled that the hon. minister having declared that he did not apply the words to the hon. member for Sherbrooke, the point of order is settled.

Mr. PARDEE: To whom did he apply them?

Mr. CARVELL: I have been listening attentively, and I have not yet heard the minister say that he did not apply these words to the hon. member for Sherbrooke.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is settled.

Mr. CARVELL: I think the minister has almost attempted to deny having used these words. We all know he did use them. His friends behind him as well as members on this side know that he did use the words. If the minister wants to make an explanation according to your ruling, and say that he did not apply them to the member for Sherbrooke, possibly he would have the right to do so. I feel that we ought to have this matter settled, and the minister has no more right in this House than a common member. Surely the minister does not want to transgress the rules of debate. I think it is his duty to explain exactly what he did mean by the word he used.

Mr. HUGHES: I have stated that I did not apply the words to the hon. member for Sherbrooke, and that ends the matter as far as I am concerned.

Mr. CARVELL: To whom did you apply them?

Mr. HUGHES: I am not called upon to say.

Mr. KNOWLES: On the point of order—

The CHAIRMAN: I consider that the point of order is settled.

Mr. KNOWLES: No; I have the right to appeal; but before appealing—

The CHAIRMAN: It is perfectly in order to appeal—

Mr. KNOWLES: Before appealing, I wish to ask the Prime Minister, who is regarded on this side of the House as in every way a perfect gentleman, if he will give to us an expression of his opinion as to the propriety of the language used by his Minister of Militia with regard to the hon. member for Sherbrooke. The Prime Minister is responsible for the decorum in this House and I ask him, partly out of kindness for the Minister of Militia himself, to give us an expression of his opinion of that language.

Mr. BORDEN: As I understood the Minister of Militia he said he did not apply any such expression to any hon. member in this House.

Mr. KNOWLES: Did you believe him.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend knows that the significance of the words of any member of this House must be taken according to his intention as declared. He has declared that he did not apply any such expression or intend to apply any such expression to any hon. member in this House.

Mr. CARVELL: Why did he use it?

Mr. KNOWLES: The Prime Minister has not told us all he thinks about it.

Mr. HUGHES: The member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) knows the reason for the new regiment there. One is French-Canadian and the other is English. The 53rd had no drill-hall, they were occupying the drill-hall in the French-Canadian end of the town and in order to get rid of the difficulty created not by me but by my predecessor—I do not know whether my hon. friend was instrumental in having the matter arranged—at all events it was done under the rule of my predecessor the French-Canadian regiment, the 54th, a very excellent regiment, was placed at the upper end of the town in the new drill hall. The 53rd were going to occupy it at certain times until their own drill-hall would be ready. Their own drill-hall was not ready, and the armouries, as the hon. gentleman knows, were not ready. They had good quarters in the old drill-hall. It would have been unfair to have asked them to leave this old drill-hall, to give up the rooms where the officers held their meetings and go uptown where they had no rooms to go to. In other words, the department having moved them out of the old drill-hall, had to put them into the armouries where they would have offices. These are the offices for the new regiment, the 53rd and it is the intention to occupy these until the old building has been placed in a condition to be used as offices for the 53rd Regiment. The hon. member knows that as well as any one and I fail to see the motive for his action to-night. I have never heard of any other purpose until to-night.

Mr. TOBIN: I might say to the Minister of Militia that the people of the Eastern Townships are surprised at the minister, after saying that he is abolishing liquor in all camps throughout this Dominion, allowing his officers to have rooms in the St. George's Club and pay rent for same. The St. George's Club is known in the city of Sherbrooke as a Tory organization. The minister says that he does not know what the St. George's Club is. I am surprised that he would come before this House of intelligent men and make such a statement. In the city of Sherbrooke, as the minister has explained, there are two large drill-halls built at a very large expense. After the St. George's Club was burned last fall, they rented the premises of Mrs. Worthington. I suppose they found it hard to keep up the expense and they asked the minister to help bear the expense. In that club they serve something besides cold water. The minister knows it and if he does not he should know it. Two years ago the minister was down in the city of Sherbrooke. Will he say he did not go to the St. George's Club?

Mr. HUGHES: I went to some club and had a luncheon; I do not know where it was.

Mr. TOBIN: And you know whether they served some whisky blanc there. I am surprised when the minister says he did not know that there was such a club. Now he has to admit it.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: The hon. member has put words in my mouth that I did not use. I never heard of the St. George's in my life before to-night, and I never knew that liquor was sold in the club. I presume that, following the custom of clubs throughout Canada, liquor may be sold in it. I am not running the clubs, I am running the militia of Canada. When the officers rent a building I can assure the House that we look after it, and if there is any such condition of affairs, if the St. George's Club is using the quarters of the 53rd Regiment, inquiry will be made and action will be taken.

Mr. TOBIN: Will the minister say that they have not rooms enough in the two drill-halls in Sherbrooke for the accommodation of both battalions? Or is it just for a gentlemen's mess? We do not want that in the Eastern Townships. We are willing to spend a certain amount on the militia, but we are not willing to have the minister pay out money to have gentlemen's clubs. I am surprised. I understood the Minister of Militia to be working always for the interests of the militia and a lot of our young men in the Eastern Townships do not approve of such action as this.

Mr. McCREA: The minister says that Mrs. Worthington's property has been rented for offices for the 53rd. Is he aware that the upper flat in the Brooks block, which was rented by the department some time before Mrs. Worthington's property, would make splendid offices? That upper flat was used as the city hall of Sherbrooke up to within a couple of years ago, and answered the purpose very well. They had all the room they wanted. The minister would have us believe that Mrs. Worthington's property is used not for an officers' mess, but for offices where the men can transact their business.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: I do not know what the Brooks block is. We have two apartments in the city of Sherbrooke. One is where the non-commissioned officers have their classes, and the other is for the officers. If the hon. member knows of any more buildings we have in Sherbrooke I would like to know it. I remember distinctly that these buildings were rented only temporarily.

Mr. BOIVIN: Until what time?

Mr. HUGHES: Until our other quarters are ready.

Mr. BOIVIN: When will that be?

Mr. HUGHES: During this year, I hope.

Mr. TOBIN: If liquor is sold there will you stop paying rent?

Mr. HUGHES: Not at all. I may as well tell the House that liquor is not used in camps of instruction. This is not a camp of instruction, but if I find the use of liquor, which was tolerated by my predecessors from time immemorial, being abused by the officers in any drill-hall they will quickly walk out of that building.

Mr. TOBIN: The minister knows that the St. George's club is in the same building.

Mr. HUGHES: I do not know anything about it.

Mr. TOBIN: I can vouch for it. One of the militia men told me that the St. George's club serves whisky, and all kinds of liquor. They have a good time there and I do not blame them, but I do not think it is right that the department should pay $100 a month rent for those rooms. Now that the minister knows that the St. George's club occupies part of that building I think he should see to it that the officers leave the building.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: I have already assured the House that I know nothing whatever about any club, and the House may rest assured that if we find any liquor being used excessively or improperly in the buildings we pay rent for, it shall be stopped immediately; but in the first place I shall require some evidence, and at the present time I have no evidence of it whatever.

Mr. McCREA: Who rented this building, and who is it rented from?

Mr. HUGHES: The building was rented on petition of the officers I expect through Colonel Denison, the commanding officer. It was rented from Mrs. Worthington.

Mr. McCREA: Does the minister mean to tell me that Mrs. Worthington, who had already rented that property to the St. George's Club, who are now occupying the building, would rent it over again to the department without saying anything about it?

Mr. HUGHES: I know nothing about it further than that the building was asked for by our officers, and that Mrs. Worthington wrote a letter requesting the department to take the building. The building was rented in the ordinary regular way.

Mr. TOBIN: Did not the minister state some time ago that he had not only rented that building, but bought it from Mrs. Worthington?

Mr HUGHES: Never.

Mr. TOBIN: I am surprised at the minister saying that. He told some gentlemen who asked him about it the other day that his department had bought it. I have no objections to him buying it, but what I do object to is that the minister should allow his officers to remain in the same building as the St. George's Club, after he has been going up and down this country trying to catch votes from the temperance people by saying that he will not allow whisky to be sold in canteens. I think it is about time the minister should be shown up in his true colours. At two meetings I attended in the Eastern Townships, I heard the hon. minister's friends making a point of that, and trying to catch the votes of the temperance people. The minister surely remembers going to Sherbrooke in 1912, during the provincial election campaign, and promising some of the electors that he would build a drill-hall there if they would elect his friend. The people, however, elected a good Liberal, and the minister's friend was defeated. The minister went to the St. George's Club then, and he knows that they are serving not only white whisky, but different kinds of wine.

Mr. HUGHES: If the hon. member means to say that I visited Srerbrooke in connection with a provincial election, he is stating what is deliberately untrue. Does the hon. member mean to say that I took part in that provincial election? If he does, he is stating something for which there is absolutely no foundation.

Mr. TOBIN: Do you want me to answer that question?

Mr. HUGHES: Moreover, I never saw liquor at any club in Sherbrooke. I had dinner at a club there one day—I do not know whether it was the St. George's club or not—but there was no liquor used in my presence on that occasion.

Mr. TOBIN: We had a provincial election in the province of Quebec in May, 1912, and shortly before that election the hon. minister visited Sherbrooke. He promised them almost everything if they would elect his friend. I do not know if he came down purposely to take part in the provincial election, but he was there and made those promises at that time. He went to St. George's club, and then he stated to-night that he did not know what St. George's club was. I do not want to insinuate that the minister took too much whisky blanc, but I know they had some there, and he knows it, too.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: I was not there at night.

Mr. CROMWELL: I would like to throw some light on St. George's club. I do not think the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Tobin) has any right to throw slurs on the members of St. George's club. They are just as respectable people as exist in the eastern townships. There are in almost every club, for the use of its members, wines and liquors, and every member of this House knows it; but there is no liquor in St. George's club for distribution or for sale, or for any visitors to go in and partake of unless it is at the invitation of a member of the club. The house that was owned by Mrs. Worthington has been rented by St. George's club since the time of the burning down of the St. George's club house. As far as I know, it is still occupied, or partially occupied, by St. George's club. I think they intend to use it for the officers of the 53rd. I repeat that the members of St. George's club are as respectable a body of people as live in the Eastern Townships.

Mr. TOBIN: I have not said that the members of St. George's club are not respectable. I can tell my hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Cromwell) that I was a member of that club for about ten years, and that I resigned last January. I knew what they served there, and it is a respectable place to go to. But when we have a Minister of Militia who goes from one end of the country to the other preaching temperance, receiving telegrams of congratulation, addressing the temperance ladies throughout the Dominion, and having him pass resolutions commending him for his pronounced determination to stop the sale of wines and liquors in the canteens at the summer drill camps, when he goes down to the city of Sherbrooke and leases as officers' quarters this club in which they serve all kinds of wines and liquors, and when he comes back here and says he does not know anything about St. George's club, I think it is about time that the people should know it. He is sailing under false colors. I have no objection to a man taking a drink of whisky. The hon. member for Compton cannot say that St. George's club is not known to be a pretty good Tory organization. That is why I resigned from it.

Mr. HUGHES: It is not worth while pursuing the matter any further. I do not mean to say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tobin) is deliberately making a statement that he knows to be untrue, but he states what is absolutely without foundation when he says that I was at this club and saw liquor used there. Even if such were the case, it would not be my place, when I was a guest at a public institution, to interfere. I have nothing to do with St. George's club, I never heard of it and was never associated with it. We have rented a building for the officers, but St. George's club has nothing to do with it that I am aware of and if it is found that there are any civilians using that club all I can say is that they will very soon cease using it.

Mr. TOBIN: The hon. member for Compton, imagining the minister to be very innocent, must have rented the building for the minister's department without telling him anything about St. George's club being there. I hope the minister will see to it that his officers move from the building.

Mr. CROMWELL: The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe has stated that I must have rented the building occupied by St. George's club for the minister. If I had rented the building for the minister it would have been perfectly right, because I could rent a building as well as any man from the Eastern Townships. But I want to repudiate the insinuation of the hon. gentleman that the St. George's club was an institution which sold liquor. I have been in St. George's club a great many times and I have never seen such a thing take place there in my life. When I said that St. George's club was as respectable a club as was to be found in tre Eastern Townships I was speaking of the present time; I was not going back to the resignation of any member of the club.

Mr. TOBIN: If the hon. gentleman says that he did not know that they served any liquor at that club, he was not there at the time.

Mr. HUGHES: It is the custom of clubs all over Canada to sell liquor. The leader of the Liberal Opposition in Ontario, who, I believe, is a distinguished temperance man for political purposes, is a member of the Ontario club, which sells liquor.

Mr. J. D. REID: President of it.

Mr. PARDEE: The minister has just referred to the leader of the Opposition in the province of Ontario. True it is he belongs to the Ontario club where liquor is sold but I do not believe that even the minister will stand in his place and say that Mr. Rowell is anything but a most consistent temperance man.

9 p.m. Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PARDEE. Hon. gentlemen may say 'oh, oh,' but there is no one who can say that N. W. Rowell is not a most consistent temperance man or one who does not live up to the tenets that he preaches to a degree that perhaps no other man in public life in Canada does to-day. The Minister of Militia has opened up a discussion here upon the militia question in Canada. And he has opened it very widely. He has asked us to come and we are here. He has given us a statement as to how the militia expenditure has been carried on since 1911. I think that hon. members on both sides of the House will agree that from the beginning to the end of the minister's remarks they breathe nothing but militancy. It was fight from the beginning, it was fight to the end. You would have thought that the people of Canada were an absolutely warlike people looking for war and trouble instead of devoting themselves to the arts of peace. There was nothing about beating the sword into the ploughshare with the Minister of Militia. With him it was to sharpen the sword on the grindstone and to find a head to cut off and let it fall into the basket. His attitude was: where is the man who will knock that chip off my shoulder and let Canada and the empire go for him! The minister has several times devoured

Germany almost before breakfast. The latest thing to which he has turned his attention and that of the Militia Department is the eating up of Ireland and all those who do not believe in her cause. Ever since the year 1911, when the Conservative party came into power and when the hon. minister took over the management of the Militia Department—and I say it in all honesty and sincerity—the Minister of Militia has not been as hoping to build up a militia which may be and which ought to be useful; he has been simply building up a militia which may be called out for war at any minute. His idea is absolutely wrong and it is not a good idea for the young people of Canada to grow up with. I am in favour of the militia; but a minister, who is in charge of the Militia Department of the Dominion of Canada, and who is building up a militia day in and day out along the lines that perhaps to-morrow we shall be at war with somebody, has not got the right idea in mind and is imbuing the spirit of war into the souls of the people of this Dominion. There is no question about the necessity of a militia; but why we should expend on militia the enormous sums that we are expending to-day, is more than I can understand. Canada is a young and growing country, and we need the $14,000,000 that the minister purposes spending upon militia in the year 1914-5 more for the development of this country than for the purposes to which the Minister of Militia intends putting it.

I would like to give a few figures to the House to show how much has been spent upon the militia since 1911. The hon. Minister of Militia practically stated this afternoon that the people of Canada were quite willing to be taxed for militia expenditures and to be taxed liberally. I take absolute issue with him upon that point. The people of Canada are perfectly willing and satisfied that they should be taxed to a moderate degree in so far as militia expenditures are concerned; but I believe the people have shown that they are not content that they should be taxed to the extent that the Minister of Militia is taxing them to-day. The hon. minister this afternoon compared the expenditures of his predecessor, Sir Frederick Borden, with his own expenditures since 1911. I was unable to follow his argument. Perhaps it was due to my own denseness, but by some subtle jugglery of figures he showed that there was a difference of only $4,000,000 between himself and his predecessor.

Mr. HUGHES: In my favour.

Mr. PARDEE: Let us see whether that statement holds good. I have a list of the expenditures upon the militia from 1896 to 1911. During that period the total expenditure by the Liberal Government was $63,134,120.

Mr. WARNOCK: What was the expenditure in 1896?

Mr. PARDEE: $2,478,179. The total expenditure in 1911, the last year of Liberal rule, was $7,009,822, and the total expenditure under the Liberal rule from 1896 to 1911, fifteen years, was $63,134,120, the total expenditure of the hon. Minister of Militia under this Conservative Government from 1911 to the year 1914, three years, was $43,102,987.

Mr. HUGHES: Is the hon. member counting 1910-1911 as the last year of the Liberal Administration, or is he counting that the Liberals are responsible for the expenditure in 1911-1912?

Mr. PARDEE: I am counting 1910-1911, and 1911 with $7,009,822, as the last year of Liberal expenditure. The figures for 1914-1915 are as follows:

Main Estimates	$10,845,400
Supplementary Estimates	339,975
Statutory pay to military members of Militia Council and Inspector General	21,000
Items in Public Works Estimates to be spent on drill halls, armouries, etc.	2,355,000
Total	$13,561,375

The hon. Minister of Militia says that his expenditure is $4,000,000 less than that of his predecessor. Although he will explain that perhaps to the satisfaction of hon. gentlemen on his own side of the House, he will not explain it to the satisfaction of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House or of the people of the Dominion of Canada, if the expenditure in 1910-1911 under the Liberal Administration was $7,009,822 and in 1914-1915 under the Conservative Administration, $13,561,375.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman, in stating the expenditure of the preceding regime, omitted to note the fact that all the drill-halls and public buildings in connection with the militia were charged to public works.

Mr. MACDONALD: So they are now.

Mr. PARDEE: So they are now. I am including them in the statement I have made of $2,355,000. You cannot get away from it; it is there in the Public Accounts, it is there in the Estimates. I have given correctly the amount that is being expended for militia in the Dominion of Canada to-day and it represents $2 a head. The minister comes and tells us—it is a pretty story and reads almost like a poem —that he is establishing drill-halls everywhere, and concerning every public expenditure from 1896 down to the present time, whether for the Grand Trunk Pacific or anything else, the minister sees in that expenditure what was purchased or accomplished but the number of drill-halls that might have been constructed with the money. His mind is obsessed with drill-halls; it is absolutely taken up with soldiers and drill. He can go no further and see no further. He does not seem to realize that what the people want is a fair expenditure for militia, but what they want still more is to have the revenues of this Dominion used for the development of our latent resources and not for the promotion of a warlike spirit. The Minister of Militia wholly mistakes the temper and idea of the people of Canada if he continues on the same line he has been following since 1911. Why, let us look where these sums for drill-halls have been expended. He has spent in the province of Ontario alone upon drill-halls $1,154,800, and he has put them in the following places: Kincardine, Mount Forest, Wingham, Watford—small places ranging from two to six thousand people. These drill-halls he put up, he tells us, that the young men might meet at night to receive physical instruction, that they might receive education along the lines of drill; and above all, as we may judge from what we know of this chivalrous Minister of Militia, that they may meet the young ladies and see that a good time is had during the evening. But take the whole list, and you will find that with the exception of two places in the province of Ontario, these drill halls for the culture of the youth and beauty—as the minister put it—of the province, had been established where Tory candidates were returned in 1911. As to the rest of the places, why, the young people may grow up stunted, untrained, undrilled, but the minister's answer is: You returned a Grit candidate and are without the pale.

Mr. HUGHES: If I may be permitted a question, would the hon. gentleman name a riding in Ontario represented by a Grit where a drill hall could be put?

Mr. PARDEE: Sarnia. The site has been bought and paid for; it is lying there,—but a Grit was returned and so the minister will not build the drill hall. That is as near home as I know, and the minister can take what comfort out of it he may; it is a shining example of a Grit representative and no armoury.

Mr. HUGHES: May I ask another question?

Mr. PARDEE: Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES: Would he undertake to draw for this House, or have some one else draw, a plan for the site at Sarnia? It is like a pismire, narrow in the middle and large at either end, fronting on two streets.

Mr. PARDEE: It may be, but if you are to take that description of it politically, it remarkably resembles himself. He asked for an example, and I have given him one. And so you have it all along the line—for the Grits nothing, for the Tories culture and drill halls. I do not know how it is in British Columbia; one would naturally suppose there must be a drill hall there on every side line. However that may be, certain it is that it is absolutely true that the minister stands here to-day and justifies his huge expenditure on drill halls since 1911 by telling us that he wishes the youth of this country to be brought up in a proper way, to receive physical drill, mental drill, and moral drill—

Mr. NESBITT: And spiritual drill.

Mr. PARDEE: Yes, so he said, and I am indebted to my hon. friend for that word. But the cold fact remains, and he cannot get away from it, that though he preaches this lofty doctrine, he practises it only so far as ridings that have returned Tories are concerned. It is a lovely sight, this man of beautiful ideals whose spirit soars above the clouds when he thinks out these Utopian plans. We cannot but feel that if long ago he had been allowed to come into this mundane sphere and arrange for the culture of the young people—especially during the last fifteen years—he would have so greatly affected the career of the Dominion. Yet he only spends the public money where his henchmen are true to his party.

Mr. GERALD V. WHITE: What about the drill-hall in South Renfrew.

Mr. PARDEE: I said there were two exceptions. My hon. friend evidently does not know his own county.

Mr. WHITE: I know it better than the hon. gentleman does.

Mr. PARDEE: I have had some experience of it, and the hon. gentleman was not in the running. I believe the minister said in the course of his remarks this afternoon that about 73,000 men belonged to the militia of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: There are 77,000 regular militia, not counting cadets.

Mr. PARDEE. I understood the hon. minister to say 73,000. The Minister of Militia has a force of 73,000 men, some of them, I take it, volunteers, few of them on the permanent force and many of them honorary colonels. With a permanent force of about 73,000 men and the remainder volunteers, who are called out annually to drill, and who, I understand, are no expense to the country except during the time of that annual drill, it appears to me, and to many people in the Dominon with whom I have discussed this matter, to be an extraordinary thing that the headquarters staff and the expenses of its upkeep should assume such tremendous proportions. Expenditures upon the headquarters staff of the militia to March 31, 1913, amounted to $103,309.37 and this year the hon. Minister of Militia is asking for $205,000. To expend upon this staff, most of whom, I take it, live in the city of Ottawa, some in Toronto, some in London, and some in the northern divisions, that large sum for the supervision of 70,000 volunteers and 3,000 regulars; to expend that money in salaries and gold lace is nothing more or less than an unwarranted taxation of the people of Canada. Here are some of the salaries; I shall read only a few of them:

Major General C. C. Mackenzie, Chief of General Staff, $7,500; Major General Macdonald, $4,000; Majer General Lessard, $3,000; Colonel Williams, $3,000; Colonel Rutherford, $4,000; Colonel Biggar, $3,500.

These amounts, together with expenditures for travelling expenses and upkeep of the general headquarters staff, run up to an enormous total. It would seem to me that that expenditure is wholly unwarranted.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: What has the increase been since 1911?

Mr. PARDEE: I do not know. Let me say in conclusion that, having regard to the militia expenditures and to the whole facts of the matter, it is apparent, as I said in a speech not long ago, that the present Minister of Militia has gone more or less military mad. He is absolutely obsessed with militarism; it is his one thought and aim from the time he gets up in the morning until he goes to bed at night. I am wholly in favour of a militia; I believe that the young men of our country should be properly taught, but I am absolutely opposed to a militia which is not commensurate with the needs of the country in every respect. I do believe that if the minister is well advised he will follow in the footsteps of his predecessor; he will dispel from his mind the idea that we should continually prepare for war with an absolutely unseen foe. If he is well advised he will devote the resources of this country more to the arts of peace than to the arts of war and thereby bring credit to himself and vastly more satisfaction to the people of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. CARVELL: Can the minister now give me the information he promised me this afternoon with regard to the length of time the officers remained in Europe in the years 1907, 1908 and 1909 and 1910?

Mr. HUGHES: In some cases they spent two or three months of the year, sometimes longer.

Mr. CARVELL: Would the average for the years mentioned be six or eight months?

Mr. HUGHES: I should imagine that would be the average.

Mr. CARVELL: As I understand it, they were taking a staff course.

Mr. HUGHES: Some were taking the staff course, some minor courses.

Mr. CARVELL: Does my hon. friend consider there is any fair comparison between men who seriously go to a college or institution of knowledge to become proficient in their profession, which we must assume was the object of their going in previous years, and the exhibition which the Canadian officers made last year in junketting through Europe with a lot of ladies in automobiles? My hon. friend comes to this House and wants to make the people of this country believe that because they did not spend as much money last year as during a number of previous years, they should be commended. I tell my hon.

friend, following up the line of argument advanced by the hon. member for Lambton, while I do object to the expenditure of this enormous amount of money I object even more strongly to the manner in which it is being expended. When I think of the Minister of Militia of Canada, a man who ought to set an example to the rest of the people of Canada, going through Europe as he went last year, even as shown by the return brought down here—and I imagine we have only a little of the story—every Canadian ought to blush with shame to think of such a thing. He takes twenty or twenty-one officers. He says they are members of the ordinary active militia. They went to Europe. I do not know how long they stayed in England but they went to France and they had the automobiles from the 2nd of September until the middle of October.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How much per day?

Mr. CARVELL: I find from the return that they paid altogether some $7,000 or $8,000 for these automobiles. Just think of it, a lot of Canadian officers going over there and travelling all over Europe with a fleet of automobiles at an expenditure of $7,000 or $8,000! My hon. friend says they saw the manoeuvres and learned so much about the art of war. My hon. friend does not believe that; he knows they did not learn anything about the art of war. He knows it was only a lot of his Tory officers and friends whom he took over there to have a good time, and the people of this country are paying the bill. I am not justifying the amounts of money spent in previous years; I think too much has been expended on the militia in previous years, and I have tried to make that plain every time I have spoken in this House. I do not altogether justify it. I think if $35,000 or $40,000 was spent in sending officers to the other side, the money might have been nearly wasted but they were at least attempting to do something. When my hon. friend went to Europe last year with his friends they were not attempting to do anything except to have a good time. My hon. friend says it cost $24,000. As I figure from the return it cost nearly $35,000. There is an expenditure of $24,262 given in the return; but in addition to that the officers were paid, according to their rank, practically $4,000, and they had $10 a day each for allowance. That brings it up to $34,000 or $35,000.

Mr. HUGHES: Those items are included in the $24,000.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. CARVELL: I am glad to know that. The way the question was answered, one would be led to believe that these items were in addition to the $24,000. Now, what earthly military knowledge could my hon. friend and his political friends obtain in scooting from France to Switzerland, from Switzerland to Germany, from Germany to Belgium, and from Belgium back to France with a lot of automobiles and having a glorious good time? What earthly military knowledge could they gain in a series of excursions like that?

Mr. BLAIN: My hon. friend has twice repeated that these officers were political friends of the Minister of Militia. My hon. friend has forgotten that the minister stated this afternoon that there were more Liberals than Conservatives in the party.

Mr. CARVELL: I did not hear the minister make that statement.

Mr. BLAIN: He did make that statement.

Mr. CARVELL: I think my hon. friend must be in error.

Mr. BLAIN: I am not in error. The minister made the statement this afternoon that there was a majority of Liberals in the company that went to the old country last year.

Mr. CARVELL: I shall ask the minister.

Mr. GERMAN: Perhaps the minister might explain what military advantage was gained by the expenditure of $24,000.

Mr. HUGHES: I never inquired into the politics of the members of the party. I knew that Colonel McLeod was a Tory, and Dave Watson of Quebec. I have been informed that there were one more Liberals than Tories. I am very sorry; I should have had more Tories—but they were good fellows.

Mr. CARVELL: I was right, the hon. member did not say that before.

Mr. BLAIN: He said it this afternoon. It was on the strength of his statement that I corrected my hon. friend.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend also says that he never inquired into their politics. He told about one gentleman from Halifax who had taken an active part against the Premier at the polls. I assume in that case he must have been a Liberal. He brought the officer up here and gave him a lecture and told him to go back home and be good and then took him on this trip. My hon. friend wants the people to believe that these officers have received some military training, that they have learned something about the art of war. My hon. friend does not believe that. There is not a man sitting behind him who believes that. The officers who went there would not, on their honour, state that they believed it, because they know better. No matter who they may be they know that they simply went over there and had a good time at the country's expense. I was amused not long ago when the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a gentleman whom I think would like to administer the affairs of the country on an economical basis, was discussing subsidies to the steamship lines. There were two little steamship lines running out of Pictou, one I think to Cape Breton and one to Antigonish, the subsidies coming to $3,000 or $4,000 altogether. The minister thought he could save $1,000 of this and amalgamated them. It was pointed out that it was a mistake and caused all sorts of trouble and the minister admitted it, he said the darn thing had given him more trouble than anything he had ever had to deal with. I thought then that he should have handed it over to the Minister of Militia who does not economize on a few thousand dollars, but talks in hundreds of thousands of dollars. He sizes up everything in the way of expenditure by drill-halls and tens of thousands of dollars. The hon. member for Lambton has pointed out that the minister had gone militia mad I think his own friends will admit that; it has become a mania with the hon. gentleman. If we can believe what he tells us this afternoon he is willing to spend half the revenue of Canada on the militia if we will give him the money to expend. He sees the force of our criticism. He has been getting hauled over the coals by his own friends or he would not have made the speech he did to-day, because his whole speech was a justification for his expenditure. He went through some jugglery of figures to try to show that he did not spend as much as the former minister. I could not follow him, probably that is my misfortune. There is no doubt that the minister's statement was plain, but I am satisfied that no member of this House understood him any more than my hon. friend from Lambton and I could. Does the Minister of Militia think that he can convince any reasonable elector in the Dominion of Canada that he has spent $4,000,000 less in the last year than his predecessor did on the militia? That is what he says. He does not believe it, he knows it is not true. He knows that from the public accounts he will find that in the year 1911, $6,868,000 was expended on the militia and in 1913 they spent $9,114,533, and this year, outside of his drill-halls which are being paid for by the public Works Department, he is asking for $10,867,000; and he hopes that some man in the country will be fool enough to believe him when he makes the statement that in 1911-12 he spent $4,000,000 less than his predecessor. This is only a sample of the kind of argument my hon. friend puts up, and which he is compelled to put up in order to satisfy the grumblings of the people behind him; because, if the truth were known, members on the Government side of the House are just as much disgusted as gentlemen on this side. If this money was being honestly expended for the benefit of the people it would not be so bad. My hon. friend said this afternoon that no money gets back into the pockets of the people so quickly as money spent on the militia. That is true as regards money that goes to the real militia, but my hon. friend took care not to tell us just how much goes to the real militia. Just look at his Estimates. He only wants $2,000,000 for annual drill; that is for the real men; the 74,000 in the active militia, and he is spending nearly $14,000,000 altogether. It is true he is spending $2,300,000 for the permanent force, but so far as the active militia is concerned he is only asking for $2,000,000. In addition to that there is something for clothing—an item of $800,600; that would include both the permanent and the active forces. Then there is something for contingencies. The difficulty with my hon. friend is that he has a permanent staff big enough for an army of half a million men. That is the whole trouble. Two hundred and five thousand dollars goes on fuss and feathers, for a lot of men living on the country who are not earning a dollar, and not contributing a dollar to the wealth of the country; men who are getting salaries which would be princely in any other walk of life. I want to tell my hon. friend that he had better set the whole lot of these gentlemen to earning their own living. He has to have a certain number of officials, I admit, but to spend $205,000 to keep officers, who do nothing, in gold lace, is absurd. The money would be far better expended in the ordinary walks of peace. Take here at Ottawa: $89,000, according to the statement placed in our hands, is to be spent on the permanent staff in Ottawa alone. When you go down on Slater street you would almost think that we were in the midst of an active campaign. About every other man you see is going around with brass buttons and gold lace. Do you think, Mr. Chairman, that in a country where we have the ordinary civil officers there is any need of these men going around in uniform? It is no wonder the minister laughs, he is ashamed of it himself?

Mr. HAZEN: Can the hon. member tell the House whether this permanent staff is any larger to-day than when the present minister took office?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know how much larger it is, but I want to tell the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that I am not excusing the former minister. I have said that here a good many times. The permanent staff of this country is a disgrace to Canada, and they have so many of these officers that they cannot even do the business of the country. I know what I am talking about. Unfortunately I have a little business to do with the Department of Militia. A company of which I am a director has to render a bill to these gentlemen once a month. It is only a small amount, about $8 or $10, but the moment a dispute arises we always figure on firing the whole thing away because the account would cost more to collect than it is worth. It takes two or three months to get a little $5 account settled, and the reason is this: They have so many of these officers that they have to provide something for them to do. The moment any business comes in it has to go through the whole machinery; it goes through half a dozen officers' hands and through half a dozen different offices. It goes from Woodstock to Fredericton, and from Fredericton to Halifax, and from there to Ottawa, and the Lord knows where after that; and it is weeks and months before you get the thing back. This has to be done in order to justify the existence of these gentlemen. If they were not given something to do there would be trouble. Just let me give an illustration of how they provide work for these officials. This is something that took place at the headquarters staff on Slater street. Not very long ago a gentleman wrote a very polite note to the department asking for a map or plan of some kind. Without giving names, I have here the exact transcript of the thing as it came back:

Letter passed through five stages.

1. Letter received in department and noted.
2. Letter endorsed thus:
'D.G.F.S.—For action' and then passed on.
3. Letter next endorsed thus:
'A.D.M.S.—For action please—G.E.M.' D.G.F.S. and again passed on.
4. Letter next endorsed thus:
'D.G.E.S.—Sent to-day—
'M. Anderson, Major Assistant, Director of Military Surveys.' and once more passed on.
5. Letter next endorsed thus:
'To note Min. 4.'
'G. S. Maunsell, Lt.-Col. R. E. D.G.E.S.' and then returned with the map.

Mr. EMMERSON: Have you a key to the abbreviations?

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Mr. CURRIE: Does the hon. gentleman say what the correspondent was asking for?

Mr. CARVELL: A map.

Mr. CURRIE: It is the rule to refuse to give military plans to any person.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend can talk after a little while. This gentleman was not asking for any secrets; he was not a traitor or a rebel; he was not trying to get into the secrets of the department; he was a loyal member of Parliament, who is sitting not more than a hundred feet away from where I stand.

Mr. EMMERSON: Was he a Nationalist?

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Mr. CURRIE: I happen to be an officer of the militia and a commanding officer. If any maps are issued to me, for any reason, I have to return them to the department immediately they are done with. I think that is a very good thing. Topographical maps of this country, plans of fortresses—

Mr. CARVELL: I object to my hon. friend making a speech. He need not get excited; he will have a chance later on. I did not say that this man was asking for a topographical map or for a plan of a fortress; it was only a little bit of a blue print, something which he had a perfect right to get, and the fact that he got it is the best evidence that it was all right. The minister's officers would not have given it to him if it had not been all right.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The fortress was taken.

Mr. CARVELL: No, it was protected. The man got the map all right, but, instead of getting it by the next mail, as in the case of any ordinary business concern, he had to wait till the letter had travelled around this circuitous route. It had to pass through all these officers' hands to justify their existence. If these letters were answered like the Minister of Railways, or the Minister of the Interior, or any other minister of this Government would answer them, four out of every five of these gold-laced chaps down there would have to be dismissed. These gentlemen are kept down there for the glorification of the minister. If the minister had only two or three officials down on Slater street, there would be no officer there to salute him when he went down there in the morning, and it would not be necessary for members of Parliament to get a pass in order to go down there to do business. It would be an ordinary business transaction

Mr. CURRIE: Has my hon. friend—

Mr. CARVELL: Now, what is the trouble again?

Mr. CURRIE: I would like the hon. gentleman to be fair. I would like to ask him if there has been any addition to the number of officers on the headquarters' staff since the present minister took charge of the department?

Mr. CARVELL: I answered that question.

Mr. CURRIE: Another question: Who initiated the pass system that the hon. gentleman speaks so much about?

Mr. CARVELL: I answered that question once before. I say that there has been an increase in the number of officers—I cannot tell how many—but there was an increase of eight or nine according to the statement, I think, last year. I am admitting that the former minister was guilty, not as guilty as the present minister, because it would be almost an impossibility to find a man in Canada who was quite as crazy on military matters as the present minister. I know that the hon. member for North Simcoe is looking for his shoes and if the conditions were changed and the hon. member for North Simcoe was in the present minister's place I do not think he would be hardly as bad as the present minister. I presume that is the reason why he has not been taken in; he does not fit in with the conditions. It would be a pretty serious matter to get rid of a lot of these gold lace gentlemen.

Mr. CURRIE: Now, just a minute; I would like to enlighten the hon. gentleman on that point. When the other Government was in office I was a member of this House, an officer of the militia—

Mr. CARVELL: Now, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CURRIE: I can—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CURRIE: Oh, I am not—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Carvell) objects he cannot be interrupted.

Mr. CURRIE: He does not object.

An hon. MEMBER: He does, sit down.

Mr. CURRIE: After I have made my statement—

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member (Mr. Carvell) objects—

Mr. CURRIE: Well, I presume—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend (Mr. Currie) asked me a question and I answered him as best I knew how. If my hon. friend wants to ask another question I am willing to give him an opportunity but I do not intend to allow my hon. friend to make a speech until I am through.

Mr. CURRIE: I presume the hon. gentleman desires to be fair?

10 p.m. Mr. CARVELL: Certainly.

Mr. CURRIE: During the regime of the previous Government I sat for an hour and a half outside an official's door down in the Militia Department and could not get in. Would the hon. gentleman consider that fair treatment?

Mr. CARVELL: That is a fair question and if my hon. friend was compelled to sit an hour and a half I do not think he was properly treated.

Mr. CURRIE: Has the present minister ever done that to you?

Mr. CARVELL: He has not done that with me because I have only been down there but once since he was minister and when I was there I found a whole regiment of officials around. I found the department bristling with brass buttons. Officials were standing every five or six feet apart from the time I went into the building until I got out of it.

MINES BRANCH LIBRARY

Mr. LEMIEUX: Did they salute?

Mr. CARVELL: No, and they did not ask me for a pass; they let me go in. If my hon. friend has been held up by officials during the present Administration I am sorry for him. But I seem to have disturbed my hon. friend. Possibly I have called up unpleasant thoughts to him; I am sorry for having done so. I did not intend to say anything personal. He is young in the world yet. It is true that he is a full fledged colonel, he is getting along very well and he probably may get to be Minister of Militia some day. He has yet twenty-five years ahead of him, he will have obtained a little more information and I believe that if he does reach this high position he will not be as bad as the present Minister of Militia because I think that is almost impossible.

I have tried to point out to the minister the way they are running things on this headquarters' staff. Let us go down to the provinces. Go down, for instance, to the little province of New Brunswick. You will find a lot of this outfit around Fredericton. I do not know how many there are there. You will see them on the streets, they have great big barracks, and when you go to Halifax you find them more numerous and the barracks much bigger. They have all these expensive men just simply to sign things like this: 'for action—place—D.G.M.,' and so on. That is all they are doing. One good clerk at a salary of $1,000 a year in New Brunswick—and he would not be employed all his time—and two men at Halifax could do the whole business. No matter how little the thing may be that you want done, you have to have a man sent down all the way to Halifax to do it. This applies to the most trifling little thing you could imagine. Not long ago I spoke to the minister about a piece of property in my own town. There was no question about it, they had the deed of the property, and the thing was perfectly plain. I wanted him to give me some information about it, and he said: I will have to send my engineer officer down there. The result was that the engineer officer was sent all the way from Ottawa to Woodstock with nothing in the world for him to do that I could see, because they had had three or four sets of officers doing the same thing, and I suppose it cost $100 to get this gentleman down there. That is going on all over the country. These are things that the people are getting tired of. If they had been spending this money on the militia, if the men and the boys, as the minister calls them, who go out and drill, were the ones to get some of this money the people would not have so much fault to find, but when you have one string of officers after another string of officers travelling around the country and squandering money the people most decidedly object. Not only do you pay the headquarters' staff $205,000, but you pay something like $100,000 for travel and transportation.

Mr. EMMERSON: $200,000 for transport.

Mr. CARVELL: No, that is the transport of the militia generally, but there is something for the transport of this headquarters' staff as well. I see here that there is a charge of $30,000 for the travelling expenses of the headquarters' and district staffs. Add that to $205,000, and you have $235,000, in addition to which there are some thousands of dollars of contingencies. I suppose you will have close upon $300,000 as the amount which is being used up by a lot of these men, not one of whom earns really a thousand dollars a year. I know that I am not making myself popular with these gentlemen in talking in this way, but I am telling the minister the truth. I am trying to tell him how the people look upon it, and if he thinks he is going to make himself and the Government popular, and that they will be pleased by such figures as were recited here this afternoon, he is very much mistaken. I congratulate the minister on the fact that he has sobered down a little this evening, and that he has given this matter a little more serious thought than I have ever seen him give it before.

The minister stated this afternoon that one of the objects of this organization was to teach men how to shoot. I agree that that is a laudable object. If he is going to have a militia force that is to be of any earthly use he must have one composed of men who are able to handle a rifle or a big gun or a piece of artillery. But it is simply pitiable when you consider the amount of money that is being expended on the really necessary portion of the militia. If you take the rifle associations of the Dominion of Canada, organizations which really try to do something to carry out the excuse for the existence of the militia, you will find in the summary under grants to associations and bands, the magnificient sum of $80,900. That includes all the little associations throughout the country. I presume that sum would include eight armouries or drill-halls?

Mr. HUGHES: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. minister has allowed eight drill-halls per year for rifle shooting and things of that kind.

Mr. EMMERSON: A drill-hall is a unit.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, a drill-hall is a unit of value. In my own province of New Brunswick, which is not large, there is an association to which I belonged and which had seventy or eighty members—I think I have seen over 100 members there. The Provincial Rifle Association of New Brunswick is getting the magnificient sum of $1,300 out of the $14,000,000 that the minister is spending on gold lace, frills, fuss and feathers.

Mr. CURRIE: There is ammunition in addition to that.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, 200 rounds of ammunition.

Mr. CURRIE: If my hon. friend belonged to an association—

Mr. CARVELL: I have belonged to an association as long as my hon. friend has, and I know as much about it as he does.

Mr. HUGHES: Do you hope to be a colonel?

Mr. CARVELL: No, I have not any hopes, because I know that my hon. friend will never make me a colonel as a reward of merit; it will be only as a punishment. I find that the Provincial Rifle Association of Nova Scotia gets the magnificient sum of $1,600, and the whole Dominion of Canada recevies for bands and rifle associations only $80,900. The very thing that means something to the militia, the very thing for which the militia exists, is absolutely thrown to the winds and the money is squandered in the manner described by my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) and by myself. If my hon. friend did not want his own glorification, but a real militia force, he would spend $800,000 instead of $80,000 for this purpose. It must be remembered that all the rifle associations are included in this; and if my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) will look at the details, he will find that the Militia Department gives a rifle association thirty or forty dollars and expects it to exist on that. A staff colonel will spend twice that amount of money in making a trip that is not necessary.

My hon. friend has certain branches of the service which may just as well for all practical purposes be eliminated entirely. I am speaking now about the artillery and the engineers, and I have some practical knowledge in regard to these branches of the militia. Not only is the present artillery of Canada of no use, but it would be a menace in time of trouble because the officers are not properly trained. My hon. friend knows that modern artillery has no value whatever excepting in the hands of highly technically trained officers. He has battery after battery of field artillery and has not a qualified officer, let alone a technically trained one. My hon. friend is not doing anything to remedy this condition of affairs. When he speaks about sending instructors throughout the country, he knows that he has sent a few, but they are not doing anything. My hon. friend will tell us that his predecessor is liable for this condition of affairs but he is spending $4,000,000 on the artillery—

Mr. HUGHES: There are other armaments and equipment connected with that.

Mr. CARVELL: Then my statement was practically correct. If my hon. friend is going to add thirty or forty new batteries and make them of any service, he will have to spend three or four thousand dollars in educating officers. He is not doing it; he is not trying to do it. My hon. friend does not seem to appreciate the value of this at all. His sole idea is to have something for his own glorification, something for show and exhibition, but nothing in the world for real value. It would be a crime to send the artillery of this country into active service under present conditions. I am sorry to make this statement, because I was an officer of a battery of artillery, but I am telling the minister the honest truth. When I come to the engineers corps, I think they are in an even worse plight than is the artillery. These are technical branches of the service, and yet practically nothing is being done in order to make them any better than they were ten years ago. If the minister will take some of these million dollars and spend the money intelligently, it will not be so bad, but the money is simply being squandered. Nevertheless the minister makes a speech of two hours and a half—

Mr. HUGHES: Two hours exactly.

Mr. CARVELL: And he thinks the whole thing a huge joke. He gets annoyed when a member asks him a question, becomes almost ungentlemanly in one instance when I asked him what I thought to be a reasonable and fair question. He apparently feels that all he has to do is to travel throughout the country in special trains; to spend $20,000 in going to the old country; to ask every man to take off his hat and hurrah for Colonel Hughes; to take the English officers who come out here, I think for no very good purpose, to Conservative picnics to have their photographs taken—I have a photograph here which I shall send to the minister if he wishes it.

Mr. EMMERSON: With the Borden Club?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, the whole thing—the Prime Minister, General Hamilton and a lot more of these chaps at a Conservative picnic. The minister does not appreciate what it means to be a Minister of Militia.

Mr. MACDONALD: Were they against Home Rule at that picnic?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know.

Mr. EMMERSON: It is a very appropriate aggregation.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, especially for a minister who pretends to be a non-political Minister of Militia. The minister has three or four things to explain that he forgot to explain in his two hours' speech this afternoon. He tells us: Oh, I am spending this money to elevate the moral tone of the young men and women of this country; I am building drill-halls in order that the young men and women may meet there on Saturday afternoons and improve their manners and morals and even their religion. Well, Sir, the militia is a different kind of organization from what it was when I belonged to it if it helps anybody's morals, manners or religion. I have no son, but if I had, I should want to keep pretty close to him while he belonged to the militia of Canada, judging from past experience. It is true, the hobby of the minister just now is temperance. We have had that pretty well aired here this afternoon. He is going round preaching to the Women's Christian Temperance Union organization and telling them what a great temperance organizer he is and what good things he has done—no more liquor in the camps and all that kind of thing. He was at nearly all the camps last year, and he knows—or ought to know—that there was not a camp in Canada in which liquor did not flow like water—not an officers' mess in which there was not liquor galore. Take the case of Sussex, or take the case of Petawawa, I know officers who were at those camps, and I speak of them because I know something about them. If the minister says there was no liquor in those messes, then he is a greater innocent than I give him credit for being. Oh, no, he knows better. When he makes these statements, he is simply sailing under false colours. Why, we had an illustration here given by my hon. friend from Sherbrooke. The minister takes their building off the hands of a political club and pays the rent. They are running the club and selling the liquor—and as a club that is all right; I have no fault to find with it, for I know that there is probably not a club in Canada that has not the right to sell liquor. But the minister is paying the rent of this club, and the country, to that extent, is standing its expense, and they are selling the liquor. And then the minister will go to the Women's Christian Temperance Union organization and say: Look at me, the only real temperance Minister of Militia. I hope the minister will practise what he preaches. The greatest objection I have to the militia of Canada is that it is not a temperance organization but a 'boozorium.'

Mr. SAM. HUGHES: That is unparliamentary.

Mr. CARVELL: Why, I have heard the minister himself use it.

Mr. HUGHES: But I had to retract it.

Mr. CARVELL: But I am sure the minister does not want me to retract it, because he knows it is true. Now if he were honestly trying to keep liquor out of these camps he would be doing a wonderful thing. But he is not doing it. He holds out these drill halls as of great advantage to the country. I have one in my own town. It cost $30,000 or $32,000. It is big enough for the purpose for which it was designed—perhaps a little too big, but big enough. The minister ought to know, and I think he does know, that instead of that being used for the moral and religious uplift of the people, it is not used for anything. Nobody is allowed to go there except members of the militia. They have their club, and the report is that it is not a strictly temperance organization. However, that is their affair. Not long ago they had a fight of nearly a year's duration before even the regimental band could get the right to use a room there. The hon. minister talks about people generally getting the use of these drill halls on Saturday afternoon and so on. Why, the drill hall is locked up. And if a Liberal were to show his nose there, I really believe he would be dynamited. The sign is practically up: Liberals keep out; this is our drill hall. The minister tells us there is no politics in this thing. In my town it is presided over by a strong Conservative—and I am not finding any fault with him. But all over the country these are run as part of the Tory machine. What is the use of the minister talking; the militia never was so much a political machine as it has come to be since the present minister began to preside over it. There is not a member within the sound of my voice on whatever side of the House he may sit, but knows that what I am saying is true—the militia is just one great Tory machine from Halifax to Vancouver. The only Liberals allowed are those of whom they are trying to make proselytes. Yet the minister travels around and declares that there is no politics in this thing.

Now, I have pointed out to the minister a few of the things to which I take very serious objection in the militia. And I know I am voicing the sentiments of many of those who sit behind him as well as of those on this side. The members who sit behind him are not in a position to tell him publicly what they think about it, but, fortunately, those on this side are not in that position. I say, Sir, that it is almost a disgrace that $14,000,000 a year of the public revenues of this country should be spent in militia matters. Who in the world are we going to fight with? Let us talk that over as a matter of business for one moment. Against whom are we arming? Why is it necessary to have three or four millions spent on artillery and to have 140,000 armed and trained men, which is the number the minister says he wants to have? He said he had something like 77,000 now, and he has another 70,000 ready, but has not the arms and equipment for them. It is a blessing for Canada that he has not the arms and equipment for these men. And, let me tell him he has not got 77,000 men in Canada ready to do service—he has not got 50,000. Many of the figures he has given have no better basis than his own vivid imagination. He himself has admitted that 25 per cent of his enlistment did not go to camp last year. He said this afternoon that they were 'relieved.' He knows very well that he could not get them to go to camp.

Mr. HUGHES: I do not know that.

Mr. CARVELL: Then, he ought to know. He will hardly find a rural corps in eastern Canada up to its strength, the reason being that they cannot get the men to enlist. And there is not a rural corps in Canada that does not take into camp men from forty-five to sixty-five years of age. They shave off their beards and give assumed names when the paymaster comes around. The minister knows that; he is not so innocent as not to know it. But even with all these tricks they cannot get up to their strength. It is true that the cavalry and artillery are nearly up to their strength. If a man has a horse, that horse brings pay and brings the man too. I can tell him that there are some corps where not a horse can get in unless it brings in a man also. And so they start recruiting horses and not men. The minister knows all these things, and yet he stands here and paints a glowing picture of the enthusiasm existing all over Canada for the militia service. He knows that they have to take into camp old men, as I have said. He knows that especially regarding the engineer corps—and I think that is the most useless of all. He knows that every year they have twenty-five or thirty-five horses a year that simply stand on the picket lines and do nothing but haul water and draw their $1.25 a day and forage. They would not be able to get one-half their enlistment if they did not take those horses along. My hon. friend painted a picture this afternoon which would seem to indicate that the people of the country are dying to go to war. My advice to the minister is to quit this nonsense. Instead of trying to raise a force of 140,000 or 150,000 men, let him cut it down to 35,000 or 40,000; let him give them officers who are of some value, especially in the technical branches of the service. Give the men regular and frequent target practice; give them not 200 but 1,000 rounds of ammunition. Give the artillery technical officers and ample target practice. I admit that this would be expensive, but the artillery are of no use unless they are efficient. My hon. friend talks about having all these men ready to go out at a moment's notice in case of war. After all, what does twelve days in camp really mean? The man who goes to camp for twelve days has no more knowledge of the rudiments of war than he had twelve days before he went to camp. I have endeavoured to point out the sins of the omission and commission of my hon. friend the minister and I have endeavoured to portray the facts as they really exist. If I can bring my hon. friend down to earth and get him to view this matter along reasonable and rational lines, my words shall not have been in vain.

Mr. NESBITT: I wish to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that in the printed information he has sent out he says:

Compared with 1913-14, there is a decrease of $71,905.

Are there to be any further amounts in the Supplementary Estimates?

Mr. HUGHES: I hope so.

Mr. NESBITT: Is this statement which I have read, then, not a misrepresentation?

Mr. HUGHES: Not at all; these are the Main Estimates.

Mr. KYTE: A few days ago I put a question to the hon. minister respecting the Royal Canadian band taking part in a certain demonstration in the city of Halifax. The questions and the answers were as follows:

1. Who authorized the band of the Royal Canadian Regiment to take part in a demonstration in connection with a public meeting in the Province building, Halifax, on the evening of Wednesday, April 8, 1914?,

2. Who requested the services of the said band to take part in the demonstration?

3. Was any payment made for the services of said band, and by whom was payment made?

4. If payment has not been made, is there any charge made against any person in connection with such service?

Mr. Sam. Hughes:

1. The officer commanding the Royal Canadian Regiment, under the provisions of paragraph 875, K. R. & O. (Canada), 1910, as amended by H.Q. 35-1-5, of 7th March, 1914.

2. F. Pennington Bligh, Esq.

3. No.

4. A charge of $45 has been made against C. R. Hoben, Esq.

Is the hon. minister in a position to say whether or not that charge has been paid?

Mr. HUGHES: I have no information on the subject; it will be paid.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. KYTE: I endeavoured also to call the attention of the hon. minister a few days ago to another incident in connection with the Royal Canadian Regiment band at Halifax, which only goes to show how true is the assertion of the hon. member for Carleton that the militia force of the province of Nova Scotia is becoming an adjunct of the Tory party. It is well known to people who read the newspapers in the province of Nova Scotia that a very serious libel was published upon the Legislature of that province by a newspaper in the city of Halifax. A special committee of the Legislature was appointed for the purpose of inquiring into this libel. One of the witnesses, having refused to answer a proper and legitimate question which was put to him, was ordered to be committed to the common jail of the city of Halifax for forty-eight hours. The moment he was committed to jail, the Royal Canadian band, acting under the instructions, I have no doubt, of the Tory mayor of the city of Halifax, came out in full regimentals for the purpose of serenading this man who was incarcerated for gross libel upon the Legislature of the province of Nova Scotia. My informant says:

Royal Canadian band in King's uniform, with soliders in uniform at their head, carrying Union Jack, paraded Saturday to serenade McCurdy imprisoned in county jail by warrant of Speaker for misbehaviour in refusing to answer questions asked by Committee of House of Assembly.

I endeavoured to ascertain from the minister the other day what authority was given to permit the band to commit this second offence upon the common decency of the people of the city of Halifax, but I was ruled out of order. As we have plenty of time to discuss the question now, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence under what authority the band came out under the circumstances which I have related.

Mr. HUGHES: Information relating to this band was laid before the House in answer to a question asked by the hon. member himself, I think, yesterday or the day before. I received complaint about this terrible band a short time ago to the effect that they had actually turned out with the Hibernian Society, carrying a Union Jack with a bit of green ribbon tied around the flag pole over the flag. I now have another complaint that the band turned out to serenade some poor fellow who had been locked up in jail; about that I know nothing. There is no reason in the world why the band should not turn out if it is paid, so long as the officer in command of the district, who is responsible for the band, inquires into the nature of the proceedings in which the band is to take part and gives it his authority to turn out. If my hon. friend holds a meeting in Halifax, I shall be delighted, provided he pays for their services, if the band turns out and plays for him or for any other decent person who comes along and engages them. I was delighted that they played for the Hibernians; I would be delighted if they would play on the 12th of July for the Orangemen, and if they place a bit of orange ribbon upon the flag pole I shall not raise any more objection to it than I did to the tying of a green ribbon to the flag pole on St. Patrick's day.

Mr. KYTE: The hon. Minister of Militia might well have enumerated other occasions on which objections were raised to regimental bands coming out on occasions if not of a public, of a quasi-public character. I remember an objection raised by the hon. Minister of Militia himself because soldiers marched on the occasion of a religious celebration held in the city of Montreal. When the hon. Minister of Militia enumerates the numerous objections that are made with regard to bands and regiments of soldiers participating in events which are not entirely of a public character, he should not forget that he several times raised objections in this House because certain regimental bands and troops in the city of Montreal were allowed to march under the circumstances which I have indicated.

Mr. HUGHES: I would like to correct the hon. member right there. I never objected to a band, but I do object, and shall object, to any regiment turning out with arms for any religious procession, I care not what it may be. That is against the law. They must not carry their rifles, that would be contrary to the rule the world over.

Mr. KYTE: I beg to inform the minister that not only did the band serenade McCurdy in jail the other night, but soldiers in uniform marched at the head of the band carrying the Union Jack, and assisted in the serenade of McCurdy in the jail; so evidently the instructions of the minister were not observed.

Mr. HUGHES: The man carrying the flag is part of the band and he must wear the uniform.

Mr. KYTE: I have no doubt there has been more flag flying and band playing since the minister took over the department than ever before. I repeat that the conduct of the band and those in command at Halifax is absolute proof that the militia in Halifax, as well as elsewhere, has become an adjunct of the Tory party.

Mr. HUGHES: The only official I have known to do any political work in Halifax was the officer whose case I cited to-day, who stood at the polls and tried to prevent officers and non-commissioned officers and men from voting for the right hon. gentleman who has the honour of being Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. KYTE: I venture to say that notwithstanding the apparent fair mindedness with which the Minister of Militia and Defence is discussing this question, if the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) or I or any other member supporting the Liberal party required the services of the band in Halifax we could not have it.

Mr. HUGHS: Yes, you could.

Mr. KYTE: Or the price would be such as would make the use of the band absolutely impossible. No time would be given for payment, as apparently time has been given to the mayor of Halifax on an account that has not yet been paid, so far as the minister knows. Here is the language of the Minister of Militia and Defence in this House on the 25th November, 1910:

> I am opposed to any man wearing the uniform of the militia of this country turning out in honour of any representative of any organization that is not directly under the control or auspices of the State, whether it be clerical or anything else.

The hon. minister has changed his mind on that, as he has on other questions which are germane to what we are now discussing. I notice that the Minister of Militia visited Toronto the other night and gave an address to certain officers. I have here a press despatch which I assume contains a fairly correct report of his utterance. If it is not correct, of course he will put the committee in possession of the exact language he used:

> Toronto, May 2—At the annual dinner of the 48th Highlanders Sergeants' Mess, last night, the guest of honour was Colonel Sam. Hughes, Minister of Militia, who in replying to the toast of the Canadian Militia, spoke of the relatively high state of efficiency of which the militia of the country has attained, and declared his intention of continuing the policy so long as he remains Minister of Militia, of increasing that efficiency, so that Canada will always be in a position to guard against any danger of attack.
> In the course of his remarks Colonel Hughes declared that at the present time he is perpared to place in the field, tomorrow, if necessary, a force of 60,000 men, capable of meeting any enemy, while throughout Canada, he states, there are 750,000 men ready to take the field at once, and this number he hopes will be doubled by next year.

The politicians who do not see eye to eye with Colonel Hughes on military matters came in for some condemnation when he remarked that he rather liked to have 'these yelping politicians' attack him and that their attack reminded him of a certain pup near Lindsay, Ont., who regularly used to meet the incoming train and bark at it. To stop to argue with these same politicians Colonel Hughes considered would be on a line with the action of the engineer of the said train if he were to stop it to shy coals at the dog.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. KYTE: I did not know that the suggestion of dogs would have raised so many yelpers. The minister has not denied the language attributed to him and therefore—

Mr. HUGHES: I have not been asked to deny it.

Mr. KYTE: I did ask him whether or not the language attributed to him is correct.

Mr. HUGHES: There is an error. I said that the engineer would be very foolish to stop the train.

Mr. KYTE: Just for the same reason the people of this country would be very foolish to continue the services of the hon. minister, and they will not do so any longer than they can help. According to the admission of the Minister of Militia, every politician in this country, every paid representative of the people who raises his voice in favour of economy in the expenditure of the Department of Militia, is referred to as a yelping politician. That is the term that the Minister of Militia applies to them. I hope that this paragraph will sink down into the minds of the tax payers of this country. We have a condition existing in Canada such as has not existed for the last seventeen or eighteen years. All over Canada there is unemployment, there is a time of distress. People are organizing charity societies to raise funds to meet the conditions of the working men in many centres of population. Everybody admits that it is a time when economy ought to be practised. The Minister of Finance, a few days ago, in delivering his Budget to this House, pointed out the necessity for putting on the brakes and said that he intended, as Minister of Finance, to take into account the circumstance that this is not an opportune time to engage in any large expenditure. Every other service of the country is to be curtailed. I believe that every other minister in the Government except the Minister of Militia is disposed to take the same view of the financial situation as is taken by the Minister of Finance. But if the tax-payers of Canada suggest that the expenditure on militia is the most useless indulged in by any department of the Government, if the representatives of the people in Parliament should suggest to the minister that he ought to put the brakes upon his expenditures, the only answer is that they are yelping politicians and he compares them with his own pup in his own town of Lindsay. The Minister of Militia does not always take himself as seriously as he appears to take himself with regard to this particular matter. Last night, when we were discussing another subject pertaining to his department with reference to the payment of Fenian Raid bounties in Nova Scotia, my hon. friend from Carleton pointed out that a very large sum of money was being paid in Nova Scotia to men who had not actually gone to the front to fight the battles that threatened at that time, whereas, on the other hand, those who actually did go to the front were not receiving the bounty. The Minister of Militia and Defence, in the face of the fact well known to everybody from Nova Scotia, actually stated that no man in Nova Scotia was paid a dollar for Fenian Raid bounties unless he had gone to the front. I think it is time the people of this country realized that statements made by the Minister of Militia with respect to expenditures in his department should be taken, not with the usual grain of salt, but with a very considerable modicum of that article.

The hon. minister is determined, it appears, to expend ten per cent of the total revenue of this country in fuss and feathers, as my hon. friend from Carleton describes it. I remember that two years ago there was summoned from the four corners of this Dominion soldiers of more or less importance, in the military organization. The city of Ottawa had the appearance of a beleaguered camp for a whole week. One scarcely dared pass through the corridors of this House for fear of tumbling over burnished spurs or having a bayonet run through some vital part of his anatomy. That junketing expedition, brought about for the glorification of the minister, cost the people of Canada a tidy sum. I did hear very loud complaints not only on the part of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House but from gentlemen on the Government benches as regards this absolutely useless expenditure. I was present at one of the meetings, and I saw the magnificent manner in which the whole thing was staged. The Minister of Militia in his very best suit of regimentals sat on a sort of raised throne. He had an orderly on one side and an orderly on the other, and whenever he rose to speak the orderlies doffed their hats and bowed low as though they were paying obeisance to a most revered, and exalted deity. All this was for the glorification of the minister, who refers to the representatives of the taxpayers of this country as yelping politicians, and compares them to his pet pup in the town of Lindsay.

Mr. HUGHES: I desire to point out that the hon. gentleman never saw any such scene, except in his own disordered imagination. I never sat in uniform at one of the meetings, and the description is a fabrication from start to finish.

Mr. KYTE. The hon. minister would not be the minister if he was not in uniform. I have seen him coming into this House dressed in uniform. If he did not wear feathers he wore a coat of such brilliant colours as to almost dazzle the eyes of hon. members of this House.

Mr. HUGHES: I dare say it is contrary to the wishes and spirit of the hon. gentleman to see that scarlet uniform.

Mr. KYTE: The hon. minister presides over the department that has control of the men who have sworn to His Majesty to defend this country and His Majesty on all occasions, and yet one of the officers of the militia, who occupies a seat in this House, sitting behind the minister, offered his services a few weeks ago to Sir Edward Carson for the purpose of aiding an armed rebellion against law and order in the province of Ulster. The minister is very loyal when interests of a certain element in this country are concerned, but the minister would permit every officer of the militia to bear arms against law and authority if it is on behalf of the Orangemen of Ulster.

Mr. HUGHES: Might I correct the hon. gentleman. That just shows his tyrannical spirit. The militia of Canada are free men when they are not on duty, and the Minister of Militia has no more right to oppose their will than in the case of any other citizen of this country. When not under orders, the men of the militia are as free as any other men.

Mr. MACDONALD: They are not free to take arms against the Crown.

Mr. HUGHES: That is not my concern. I want to point out to my hon. friend, and other gentlemen of the committee, that he mistakes the function of an officer in charge of a department if he thinks the minister should undertake to use forcible measures against those who have the right to breathe the free air of Heaven.

Mr. KYTE: Would the minister explain what he means by using forcible measures against those who have the right to breathe the free air of Heaven?

Mr. HUGHES: If the hon. gentleman's intelligence cannot interpret it, I am not going to take up the time of the House in doing it for him.

Mr. CURRIE: I rise to a point of order and it is this: the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) has charged a member of this House with desiring to go and take up arms against His Majesty. That is a very serious charge.

Mr. MACDONALD: Did he not do it?

Mr. KYTE: If the hon. member says he did not send the telegram, I accept his word.

Mr. CURRIE: I am not the gentleman at all. The hon. member has made a very serious charge against a member of this House.

Mr. KYTE: If the hon. member that I refer to rises from his seat in this House, and says that he never sent that telegram offering his services to Sir Edward Carson, assuring him that he would fight with him to the last ditch, I am bound to accept his statement; and I will do it with the utmost pleasure, because it will be an assurance to me that there is one more loyal man in Canada than I thought there was.

Mr. CURRIE: I think the hon. member had better bring the matter up when the gentleman he refers to is here.

Mr. KYTE: I want to assure my hon. friend that he cannot inspire any member of this House with fear.

Mr. CURRIE: If such a charge had been made against a member on that side of the House, I would have been the first to get up and refute it.

Mr. KYTE: If it is true that the telegram was not sent, I shall be very glad to hear it from the lips of the hon. gentleman himself, but I refuse to accept it by proxy.

Mr. CURRIE: I rise to a point of order. I do not think it is fair for an hon. member of this House to make such a serious charge against another member during his absence.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not understand the hon. member for Richmond to make a charge against any member of this House. The facts recited by the hon. member had reference to a telegram, and that is all.

Mr. KYTE: As I said, if the hon. member will deny sending that telegram, I will be the first to accept his denial. The minister stated a moment ago, as justification of the action of that officer, that the men in the militia were free men, and that they could go and come where they pleased; but under certain conditions they are not free. They are not free in Montreal. I remember that a few years ago the question of their attending a certain quasi-public function in Montreal was the subject of criticism on the part of the present Minister of Militia with respect to his predecessor in that office.

Mr. HUGHES: I may point out that when an officer is in uniform he is on duty.

Mr. KYTE: That is the whole point. The hon. minister is willing that they should be on duty under certain circumstances, and under other circumstances he is not willing that they should be on duty. When the hon. member for North Simcoe interrupted me, I was making a statement with respect to the extraordinary amount of money that is being spent from year to year on the militia. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) gave some figures with regard to the expenditure of public money in respect to the period when the Liberal Government was in power. There was a very considerable increase in the expenditure for militia purposes under the regime of the late Minister of Militia and Defence due entirely to the Government taking over the fortifications at Halifax and Esquimalt. The total expenditure for militia for several years previous to the taking over of these fortifications was about $2,000,000. The taking over of these fortifications increased the expenditure to $7,000,000 and it practically remained at that figure during the time that the late Government was in office. But then, we had a sane Minister of Militia who recognized that he had some other duties to perform, that he owed something more to the taxpayers of Canada, than to go around parading with officers in automobiles, touring through Europe and indulging in junketing expeditions from one end of the country to the other from which no value can accrue to the people of the Dominion. The item of the expenditure for militia is one that cannot be too long debated in this House particularly in view of the defiant attitude assumed by the minister in Toronto the other night when he referred to the representatives of the people in this country who endeavoured to reduce the expenditure for militia purpose as yelping politicians.

Mr. HUGHES: Does the hon. gentleman class himself in that outfit?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Shame.

Mr. HUGHES: I never put him there.

Mr. KYTE: One yelper always provokes another yelper to reply.

Mr. HUGHES: If he chooses to put himself there I did not put him there.

Mr. NEELY. Perhaps the minister will explain what he did mean. I am sure the minister appreciates the unanimous way in which the members on this side of the House, by their presence here this afternoon, have expressed their appreciation of the minister's very kind invitation, extended through the mail some days ago, to be present when he made his statement on the militia expenditure. Being such a genial member of the Government as the minister is, what was there for us to do but to accept the very gracious invitation on his part and be present? I was very much disappointed at the sentiments expressed by the minister some days ago in Toronto because the character of the note of invitation misled me as to his attitude. I thought the minister wanted us to be present for the purpose of hearing an impartial statement of his movements as minister, of the doings of his department and of the different ways in which he has been spending $13,000,000 or $14,000,000 in the country's interests. I thought that was what was portended in the invitation of the minister. I thought he wanted us to be present to hear a thoroughly statesmanlike utterance as to the proposed expenditure of $13,000,000 or $14,000,000 on the militia. The minister might at least have waited until members of this House had had the opportunity of listening to his statement and of offering some criticism, favourable or otherwise, before giving utterance to the expression which has been referred to. The minister, of course, could not foretell the kind of criticism that would be made, but apparently from the article which my hon. friend has read he anticipated that there would be some unfavourable criticism, and he has labelled every man, not my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) alone, but every member of this House and every citizen of this country whether he be in this House or out of it, as a yelping cur if he offered any criticism of this august personage who presides over the Department of Militia and Defence. If the minister thinks he is going to get away with that sort of thing he is sadly mistaken, because there are members on this side of the House who are not afraid to take the gloves off with the minister in the House or out of it any time he wishes to discuss public questions or his own department. But the House can congratulate the minister on one thing at least, and that is that he has furnished this Parliament and the people of the country with about as fine an exhibition of vaudeville as most gentlemen have even paid good money for in the many years of their experience. The minister takes himself so wonderfully seriously both in this House and out of it that he is fast becoming a joke in the country, but the expenditure that is being carried on in his department and under his direction is much too expensive a joke for the people to enjoy.

The minister undertook to tell the House this afternoon that the expenditures of his department were actually decreasing as compared with the expenditures of his predecessor. That, as a statement of fact, is something that must be regarded as being beyond a joke, because it is not very far to the library, and all we have to do is to take the militia Estimates for years past, and in no possible way, by the juggling of figures, can you reach the conclusion reached by the Minister of Militia. Then, if you look at the Auditor General's Report as to what the minister actually does expend, you are confronted with this difficulty, that you have to look here and there all through that report, and almost all through Public Works as well as Militia and Sundry Expenditures, to find what the minister is actually expending for the maintenance of the militia, the construction of drill-halls and other appurtenances of the militia throughout Canada. The minister, both in this House and out of it, has taken the ground, as stated by my hon. friend for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) that the people of this country want more money spent on the militia than has been spent in years gone by. I am here to-night to tell him that the people in certain parts of the country, at any rate, whatever they may do in others, and I represent one of those parts, do not want to see the militia expenditure jumping up by leaps and bounds as it is under the administration of the present incumbent of the office. I represent in this House a constituency 108 miles long by 108 miles wide—I would be very glad if it were smaller whether I represented it or not—and I suppose there are some twenty to forty villages and towns in that constituency, varying from 500 population to 2,500 population. I have not heard of any four corners, leaving out the towns and villages in the constituency of Humboldt, having a drill-hall costing the country from ten to fifteen thousand dollars planted there simply because that particular corner happened to cast a good Tory vote in the last election. I have heard of things of that sort in eastern Canada, for instance in the province of Ontario, if I have been correctly informed. In regard to this expenditure on drill-halls in small places throughout Canada—and especially is the practice reprehensible in country districts where there is no sign of a militia at all and where these halls are built for the social entertainments of that particular community—I desire to point out that every one of these drill-halls is adding to the fixed cost of the Government of this country. There is the money that is invested not bringing one dollar of revenue to this country; there are the men employed to take care of these buildings, and there is the cost of upkeep and maintenance, year after year. If the hon. minister is allowed to go on with a free hand and build ten, fifteen and twenty thousand dollar drill-halls in little villages and small towns and even at country post offices where there are neither villages nor towns nor railroads, in a few years the revenue of this country will have to be doubled and trebled to keep up the fixed charges to be paid for these drill-halls that are absolutely useless so far as any permanent benefit to the militia of this country is concerned.

Representing a people who are trying to make Canada a nation by developing her natural resources, by increasing her national wealth, by contributing as they do largely to the Government of this country, I cannot afford to sit still and hear the sentiment uttered by the Minister of Militia in this House and out it that Canada is in favour of increasing her militia expenditures. I do not believe that to be the case. I think the Minister of Militia has been feeling simply his own pulse in this instance and not the pulse of the people when he has made this diagnosis so far as the sentiment of the people in military matters are concerned.

I have not very much criticism to offer of some of the lines of expenditure pursued by the present Minister of Militia since he has taken office. I presume that the question of a little outing with a number of friends across the Atlantic and that sort of thing seems like a pretty good proposition to the minister. After fifteen years in opposition, I presume he came to the conclusion, when he got hold of his present position, that it was about time that he was enjoying himself at the expense of his country having represented it in this Parliament for so many years. These expenses might perhaps be regarded by the minister as incidental, but they go to make up the grand total. If the Department of Railways does not furnish the minister with a private car as quickly as he thinks it ought to do, I cannot find great fault with him if he buys one himself, because he will have that for the service of himself and of the department; and I would not like to see him put to the trouble of having to ask the Department of Railways for a private car every time he wanted to take a particular jaunt somewhere. But the minister deliberately adopts the policy of sinking the money of this country, as he has been doing for the last two or three years, in such useless and unnecessary expenditures as for drill-halls in little villages in the Tory constituencies of this country, and when he calls that money spent in the public interest, that is the time I have to raise my voice in objection. I would like to be in a position where I would not have to charge the minister with using his position and the department over which he presides in a partisan manner; I would like to think there was one bright and shining light sitting on the Government benches; but I do not see how anybody in this House can come to the conclusion that the Minister of Militia and Defence is that particular bright and shining light. I happened the other day to run across a newspaper published in the home town of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, and I think it is a good Tory newspaper from the tone of the articles it contained. It is called the Daily Warder, and in the issue of the 28th of April of this year, I find a large front page article, the heading of which is 'Some Facts.' This paper is published in the town of Lindsay, and I understand it is the personal organ of the minister. The minister may not own it, but it comes to his aid in time of political warfare and distress.

Mr. HUGHES: I had every paper in the county against me in 1904.

Mr. NEELY: I shall not be surprised if in 1915-16 the hon. gentleman does not find himself in the same position.

Mr. HUGHES: My majority will be greatly increased.

Mr. NEELY: Some change has taken place since 1904 so far as this paper is concerned, because it devotes some space to the doings of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence. I do not intend to read the whole article, because it is a long one; but I want to point out the purpose that the Minister of Militia evidently tries to effect by these expenditures which I am now criticising. I think it is a fair inference to take a paper in the minister's own town that gives its support to the minister. These are some of the facts quoted in this article. In the third paragraph I read as follows:

> Colonel Hughes has done much to help Lindsay in its onward march of progress. Were it not for the Minister of Militia Lindsay to-day would not have the fine structure on Victoria Park—

That, of course, is the drill hall.

> —the Government armoury, a building worth many thousands of dollars. In giving this building to Lindsay, Colonel Hughes specifically stated that it was for the use of the citizens for the holding of various kinds of gatherings, as well as for military purposes.

So, if it were not used for military purposes it would be put to some use anyway.

Under the Liberal régime at Ottawa it was impossible to get a clock for the post office tower, yet through the instrumentality of Colonel Hughes, the time piece is to be installed and the tower raised so that the clock will be discernible from all parts of the town. A light will be placed in position to show the time by night.

So, when you go into the minister's town, night or day, even if your watch is not running you need not worry; there will be the bright and shining light representing the Minister of Militia and the clock to tell you the time.

Mr. McKENZIE: Enable you to see the dog.

Mr. NEELY: Yes.

With the completion of armouries and surrounding grounds a large and up-to-date band stand will be erected.

That, no doubt, will be necessary. Even with all his duties here, the minister must sometimes visit his own town, and when he does, of course, they will want a band stand in front of the armouries so that the regimental band may give a proper reception to one who has done so much for the town. I said I would not read the whole article. I have read so much only to bring out this point; though the minister says he is not making these expenditures for political purposes, but for the good of the country, for the upbuilding of a strong and efficient militia force, yet the newspaper that supports him in his own town, does not agree with that view.

Mr. EMMERSON: But that only cost $47,000.

Mr. NEELY: Here is a summary of the things the minister has done since this Government came into power for his town and constituency:

In summing up, it is interesting to note that improvements have been secured for Lindsay as follows through the instrumentality of our member:

New armouries, at a cost of $35,000.

There must have been extras, and this paper has not included them.

New lighthouses on Scugog; rural routes established throughout the county; improvements to post office already made; dredging of Scugog river in Lindsay, $25,000; building of new wharfs at summer resorts;—

I wonder what effect that last will have in improving the condition of Canada generally. This newpaper does not give the amount, but I presume these works are numerous because this is in the plural.

—addition to post office and exterior alterations, $25,000; post office tower to be extended and large clock installed; improvements to Victoria Park; paved laneway east of post office; dredging improvements at Balsover and on Balsam lake; new band stand for Victoria Park.

Mr. MACDONALD: How did he do that band stand?

Mr. NEELY: I do not know whether it is part of the necessary equipment of these armouries or not; I do not know whether it is built on Government property or outside. The minister can inform us about that. Here is the organ in the minister's own town that supports the minister, giving this list of things done by him for the benefit of the town and constituency.

Mr. HUGHES: Are these all completed?

Mr. NEELY: Evidently, or they are expected soon to be completed, and probably they are under way. The minister's own organ in his own town distinctly uses the different things the minister has done to win for him support in that town. So, as we watch the development of his drill-hall policy, the conclusion to which every member of the House is driven is that the minister has deliberately set out to spend money, even in places where it is absolutely not needed for militia purposes, for the benefit of the party to which he belongs.

Mr. HUGHES: Will the hon. member permit me a statement?

Mr. NEELY: Yes.

Mr. HUGHES: If you figure up the militia expenditure in the province of Ontario, you will find that more money has been expended in Liberal constituencies in proportion to their number than in Conservative constituencies. I refer particularly to drill-halls at Alexandria and Renfrew, one represented by the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), and the other by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McMillan).

Mr. EMMERSON: I would suggest that if the minister spent money in Ontario at all, it would almost necessarily have to be in Conservative constituencies.

Mr. NEELY: The minister may be correct so far as the figures are concerned, yet, that is not the inference that is drawn so far as concerns favoritism to the constituencies—

Mr. HUGHES: I wish to correct the hon. gentleman there. There was no favouritism. These expenditures were made because the people in the localities deserved them. The officer commanding the Glengarry regiment, a staunch Liberal and son of a prominent Liberal, is one of the most worthy officers in Canada. I have no hesitation in saying that he commands one of the best regiments—

Mr. EMMERSON: The hon. minister is not trying to seduce the constituency, is he?

Mr. HUGHES: The officer to whom I refer is the son of a former Grit lieutenant-governor of Ontario, and I do not think you can turn him to be a Tory now.

Mr. NEELY: What the minister has said does not detract in the slightest from the statement I have made. There may be the two instances to which he has referred in which, under urgent necessity, he has been forced to spend money where otherwise he would not have spent it, following the course he has followed throughout the length and breadth of Ontario—and I want to know if the minister will deny it?

Mr. HUGHES: I certainly do deny it.

Mr. NEELY: What about the drill hall at Blackstock, in the province of Ontario ?

Mr. HUGHES: One of the best companies in Canada is at Blackstock—the company that broke the lines at Batoche, a few miles from where the hon. gentleman lives, came from Blackstock.

Mr. NEELY: I know that it is a country village, three or four miles from any railway; yet the minister has built a drill hall there.

Mr. HUGHES: In 1885 a call came to this company, to which I had the honour of first belonging, for 42 men, and they turned out 125 men inside of twenty-four hours. I have no hesitation in saying that this company is not surpassed by any other company in Canada.

Mr. NEELY: What happened in 1885 does not particularly concern us at the present moment; conditions have changed in many parts of Ontario. I have been informed—I may have been wrongly informed, but I think not—that at the present time there is no militia force at this little four-corners in the country, four miles from any railway; yet the minister has seen fit to spend a considerable sum of money in building a drill hall at that place. But I do not hold the minister to any one particular instance. If hon. gentlemen will go from town to town and from village to village throughout the province of Ontario they will find to what extent these drill halls are being used to build up a strong and efficient militia in this country. Many of them, as the minister must know, are hardly used from one year's end to the other except by the people for purposes of entertainment. I protest against that method of expenditure of the public money of this country.

As the hon. member for Carleton and the hon. member for Richmond have pointed out, the minister has taken credit unto himself for certain moral reforms which he claims to be responsible for in the training camps of this country. If the Minister of Militia carries out his objects, so far as I am concerned he will have hearty support. But, during the course of last summer I made casual inquiries from gentlemen who were at Niagara, Petawawa and other points last year, and I was informed that the officers of the various companies treated the order of the minister as a joke, and that the old conditions still prevailed. This is not my personal observation, as I do not go to a militia camp to drill, but I am told by responsible men who go to camp year after year as officers of regiments that while the minister has been proclaiming himself from one end of the country to the other as the originator of the policy that there shall be no more canteens and no more liquor in the camps his mandate has been disregarded. If the minister's attitude is an honest and sincere one, I am sure that every man in this House will endorse his attempt to protect the young men who go to camp to drill, and who should be protected as far as possible from temptation to which they are not subjected in their own homes. But I do object to the minister's taking to himself credit for a great reform which I believe is not put into effect in a single training camp in Canada.

Mr. G. V. WHITE: It has been my privilege to visit the Petawawa camp on many occasions and I can assure the hon. member for Humboldt that the instructions issued by the hon. minister have been carried out to the letter so far as that camp is concerned. I know absolutely that the minister has given strict instructions; that those instructions have been carried out and that there has been no sale of liquor in or around that camp since the present minister took charge of the affairs of the Department of Militia.

Mr. NEELY: All I can say to my hon. friend that I can give him privately the names of some very responsible men who were at that camp during the past summer and who say that the condition of affairs pictured by the hon. member for North Renfrew does not exist.

Mr. G. V. WHITE: I would like my hon. friend to give me the names.

Mr. NEELY: I shall be delighted.

Mr. G. V. WHITE: I do not suppose the hon. gentleman holds the minister responsible for the consumption of liquor that has been taken into the camps by individuals. It has been my privilege, as representing my constituency, to see the minister in connection with getting the canteen privilege for some of my constituents, and the stipulation which he has always made is that he would not under any circumstances tolerate the use or sale of liquor within the camp grounds.

Mr. NESBITT: When the hon. minister issued his statement of militia expenses for this year. I felt like congratulating him upon the business-like way in which he put his statement before the committee. But tonight, when I asked him, having regard to the comparison which he made between the estimates for 1914-15 and the expens s for 1913-14, whether we were to consider that to be the whole of the expenses for 1914-15, he told me, very briefly, that he hoped not. I notice, however, that the heading over the expenditure for 1914 says: voted in Main and Supplementary Estimates. Then required for 1915 is the heading over the other column. He takes credit at the bottom of the page for a saving of $71,905, but he told me quite frankly that he expected to add to the Estimate for 1914-15 by the Supplementary Estimates. Therefore, this statement was a deception, as I told him before, which I do not think he should have tried on business men such as we are in this House. He has put forward a statement that was not true on its face. I have no fault—

Mr. HUGHES: I might point out in all fairness that it is impossible to give the amount in the Supplementaries as they have not been brought down and have not even been sent in.

Mr. NESBITT: I quite appreciate that.

Mr. HUGHES: My statement shows that on its face; one column is 'Main' and Supplementary,' the other 'Main.'

Mr. NESBITT: I quite appreciate that probably he could not have shown us the Supplementaries for this year; but he should not have pretended, in large letters at the bottom of the page, to say that he had made a saving of $71,705. That is what I find fault with. I notice that in the additional Supplementaries for last year, which have not all been passed yet, there is quite a large amount. That, I presume, is not counted. I have no fault to find with the minister in his enthusiasm for the militia, and I believe that he honestly tries to do what he says he is doing in order to correct the evil habits, if there are any, in the militia and to train the young men of the country. What I do find fault with is that the expenditures, to a very great extent, are increasing too rapidly for the revenues of the country and for the good-will of the people in so far as I know their feelings. No expenditure incurred by the Government during the year so stinks in the nostrils of the public as the unnecessary militia expenditures. I have pointed out before that the expenditures on armouries in some instances are totally and absolutely unnecessary. One hon. member this afternoon said that the minister figured in armouries. As far as I can gather from him, he assumed that the ordinary armoury would cost $10,000 to $12,000; but in no case during the last few years has there been an expenditure, so far as I know, of only $10,000 or $12,000 on an armoury. I have here an Estimate for an additional armoury in Brantford to cost $75,000. The vote last year was $25,000. Over the page there is a vote for an armoury in Port Arthur and the Estimate for this year is $100,000. Last year the vote was $99,000. That is an expenditure already incurred and asked for this year of $199,000 in a town of ten thousand people.

Mr. HUGHES: Is my hon. friend aware that the site was purchased for a large sum and the plans made by my predecessor?

Mr. NESBITT: That does not make any difference; we are not accounting for my hon. friend's predecessor, but for what he is doing now.

Mr. HUGHES: I am not apologizing, but I am loyally carrying out any undertakings entered into by my predecessor or on his behalf.

Mr. NESBITT: The expenditure of $199,000 in Port Arthur, and I have no doubt that that will not be the only expenditure, it seems to me to be excessive. In Woodstock we have an armoury that cost $50,000 that is quite good enough for any town of 20,000 or 25,000. The armoury in Port Arthur, therefore, is a sheer waste of public money. All of these expenditures on armouries are, in my judgment, largely waste of money. I believe that we do not want armouries in many places where we propose to build them. I am quite in accord with the minister on certain of his expenditures, such as the cadet service and the expenditure for what they call civilian rifle associations. I believe that is proper expenditure. But to jump the expenditure up, as this statement has shown us, to $11,000,000, without counting these armouries, appears to be quite unjustified, and it will be found that the Estimates do not include a great many expenditures that will be incurred this year. I absolutely agree with the hon. member for Lambton that while the minister may be enthusiastic over his militia expenditure and training, I think he has largely lost his balance over these expenditures. He is proposing to and has put the country to an expenditure for militarism that the people of the country are not in accord with. Many of my hon. friends opposite know that as well as I do. Let me give the minister credit for being, I think, honest in his purpose; but he has gone military mad; he talks militarism every place he goes. I ask my friend, with all due deference to himself, if such a speech as was read by my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) to-night is courteous to the people of this country whom we on this side of the House have the honour to represent. In every constituency represented by the supporters of my hon. friend there are some Liberals, and they, too, must feel insulted by such a speech as was read to-night. My hon. friend said that report was all correct, except that he had said that the the engineer should not stop the train. When my hon. friend gets off a speech like that he is casting a direct insult, in my opinion, not only upon the members on this side of the House but upon all the Liberals of Canada, and I question whether they will not resent such talk as that—whether it is before or after dinner. We, who understand these dinner parties might excuse these after-dinner remarks, but as a minister of the Crown there is no possible excuse for the hon. gentleman using the language he did on that occasion.

Mr. HUGHES: I never read the article. I was referring to some articles wherein I was charged by certain gentlemen with training the people up to be blood-thirsty and assassins, and nonsense of that kind; and I take this opportunity of saying that that kind of talk is nonsense. I had no reference to the politicians—not that I am making any apology—I was speaking of the peace-at-any-price gentlemen, who endeavoured to bring about the annexation of Canada to the United States, and who charge me with being blood-thirsty and training the children to be assassins. I do not know anything about Rev. Mr. Brown.

Mr. NESBITT: I do not want to know who the Rev. Mr. Brown is. The minister did not give that explanation to the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte).

Mr. HUGHES: It was not asked for in the same spirit.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend from Richmond read an article, and the minister knows what answer he made. I am not a peace-at-any-price individual, though I am for peace. I believe this far with the minister, that it is necessary to train the youth of the country to a certain extent, and I believe they take no harm by it; but that does not cost very much. I think this year's Estimate for cadet service is $392,500, the same as last year. Why should not the rest of the Estimates be in proportion? There is an inclination to increase all along the line. I absolutely agree with the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee) that there is too much expense at the top, and I think the minister must agree with that too; and there is too little expenditure on what would give good service to the country in case of trouble. I refer to teaching the ordinary civilian how to shoot, as well as the militia men. I believe the minister has a great deal of trouble in keeping the militia men up to the standard, because, I confess, the pay is so small. The people might grumble, I suppose, if it was very much increased. At the same time it would be better to increase the expenditure in that direction for the benefit of the men who join the ranks and who, after all, are the militia of this country than for the benefit of the people at the top. I have no doubt that the officers endeavour to do their duty, but as my hon. friend from Carleton pointed out there is a great deal of red tape and unnecessary expenditure in connection with the Militia Department. I have argued that with the minister's predecessor both publicly and privately, and I still think there could be a great deal of improvement along that line. The principal mistake in my judgment is in building unnecessarily expensive armouries throughout the country. If the minister would confine himself to his calculations this afternoon, that is spending $10,000 or $12,000 for an armoury where it is needed, not much fault could be found. I think there is an estimate in this book for a million dollar armoury in Toronto. They have several armouries there now.

Mr. HUGHES: I never heard of a million dollar armoury in Toronto.

Mr. NESBITT: Perhaps it is not true. I saw the Estimate somewhere, either last year or this. Take the grounds at Montreal recently bought for military purposes. That was undoubtedly an extravagant expenditure, and I cannot agree with my hon. friend that it was necessary to do away with the shooting ranges here and put it in a place that is not so accessible. I am perfectly willing to see the minister get Estimates through for a reasonable expenditure for militia purposes, but I do not think the absolutely unnecessary expenditure upon militarism in this country will be tolerated by the people of Canada. They are, so far as I know, willing to stand for a certain expenditure on the militia, but the minister must bear in mind that there is a great deal of truth in the comment of my hon. friend from Carleton as to the unnecessary junketing—if I may be privileged so to call it—on the part of the militia officers throughout the country. I think no one finds fault with the minister for visiting the various military manoeuvres in order to get the knowledge that he, as minister, should acquire, but in my judgment it was absolutely unnecessary to take so many men over with him, and to go to an expense that the people of this country do not think necessary. My hon. friend will be safely guided if he follows the advice given by the hon. member for Lambton to-night, to curtail to a very great extent the military expenditure that he proposes to make in this country. I am not going to pretend to abuse the minister in any manner or form, but I do say in all fairness and frankness that he will be well advised to decrease the military expenditure in a great many ways, more especially as regards the absolutely unnecessary expensive armouries. How am I going to explain to the people I have the honour to represent, who are not of the peace-at-any-price kind, by any means—

Mr. HUGHES: Is there not a drill hall in Woodstock, and what is the cost?

Mr. NESBITT: There is a very good one, which cost a little less than $50,000.

Mr. HUGHES: I think it cost over $100,000.

Mr. NESBITT: I think the minister will find that it cost less than that. I helped to put up a deposit for one of the tenderers. His tender was for $55,000 and he lost the contract, which makes me remember it very distinctly. The armoury in Woodstock would be absolutely good enough for Port Arthur and Fort William combined.

Mr. HUGHES: I find that the Woodstock armoury, built in 1906, cost $73,091.

Mr. NESBITT: If there is anything over $50,000 or $48,000 it will be additional for heating, grounds, or something of that kind. They have very beautiful grounds, large enough for a city of 50,000 people. Then here we have Vancouver drill-hall, $100,000 re-vote, but the amount voted in 1912-14 was $275,000. That would leave $175,000, with this year $100,000, and we have no reason to believe that is the end of it.

Mr. HUGHES: There is militia property in Vancouver that is unsuitable for this purpose that can be disposed of for much more than that amount, so that it is merely a transfer.

Mr. NESBITT: Victoria is just above.

Mr. HUGHES: In Victoria we will have $500,000 to our credit.

Mr. NESBITT: Here is an expenditure of $275,000 to be applied to a drill-hall in Vancouver. The hon. gentleman could drill the whole population of Vancouver in a building of that kind.

Mr. HUGHES: Vancouver city is built on property belonging to the Militia Department worth $20,000,000, and we have never got a dollar for it.

Mr. NESBITT: I have heard the hon. gentleman say something about certain properties being given in Montreal by the Militia Department to the city of Montreal. My hon. friend would almost lead us to believe that the Militia Department was an earning department and had property of its own. These properties belong to the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. HUGHES: To the Militia Department.

Mr. NESBITT: But they were given by the Dominion to the Militia Department.

Mr. HUGHES: They were handed over by the imperial authorities to the Militia Department.

Mr. NESBITT: That was very kind of the Imperial authorities. The land belonged to Canada. It is just like my hon. friend to claim that the Militia Department own the land, when the fact is that they own nothing at all. It belongs to the people of Canada, and the Militia Department happens to be a department, that is all. What nonsense to talk about the imperial authorities giving this land. It was very kind of them to give the people of Canada something that belonged to the people.

Mr. HUGHES: We have upwards of 1,200 cities in the Dominion of Canada openly and publicly offering free sites for drill-halls. How does the hon. gentleman account for that if the people do not want drill-halls?

Mr. NESBITT: That proves nothing. I believe that in Woodstock they might have been willing to give a site to have a $40,000 or $50,000 drill-hall built there. Cities and towns want expensive buildings erected in their localities. That is why this is supposed to be such a drawing card for the Government and their supporters. Instead of erecting a $10,000 or $12,000 drill-hall they put up buildings costing $100,000, $150,- 12 p.m. 000, $200,000 and $300,000 in various places. I do not wonder that when they provide buildings of that kind municipalities offer free sites. The site may have cost the municipality nothing. When the armouries are built in some of these places the minister will find a great difficulty in forming corps to fill them. In many instances it will be absolutely impossible for him to find corps to occupy these armouries. Then, it is absolutely absurd to talk about turning these armouries into pleasure resorts. Why should the Government spend money in erecting armouries to be used as pleasure resorts? The minister talks about keeping the boys and girls off the streets and away from the movies. That is worse than absurd. If my hon. friend will come to Woodstock as my guest, I will go down the street with him on Saturday night and he will see how many boys and girls there are at the armouries and how many at the movies. I will bet him a box of good cigars that he will not have much trouble in counting them at the armoury while he will have a lot of trouble in counting them on the street coming out of the movies. My hon. friend talks about teaching the boys and girls manners. That is all tommy-rot, or, as the Indian says, walla walla. My hon. friend is all right as long as he keeps himself under reasonable control. I believe that the people will be with him as long as he controls his vast enthusiasm on this question, comes down here with a common sense proposition and does for the people what is necessary with regard to militia affairs and nothing more.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Borden, the House adjourned at 12.03 a.m. Friday.

Friday, May 8, 1914.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

FARMERS BANK PAPERS.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance): I have laid upon the table a list in detail of the depositors of the Farmers Bank in Canada, both on current and savings accounts. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) asked me to furnish him with information as to the amount of deposits payable on demand and of deposits payable after notice as of the last day of each of the years 1907, 1908, 1909 and 1910. I have obtained that information and laid a statement of it upon the table. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition asked for a return of all papers, documents and correspondence relating to the matter of the Farmers Bank. I find upon inquiry that two returns have been brought down to the House, one in 1912 and the other in 1913. Of the former I have obtained a copy, and as my right hon. friend may desire to look at it I laid it also on the table. The return which I laid on the table in 1913 was on the motion of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and I believe that he has or had it in his possession. I have been unable to locate it. In addition to the documents which I have mentioned I have made a careful search, and I find that I have several printed appeals or applications for aid. No doubt these have been furnished to the members, but as I have them among the documents I lay them upon the table. In addition I lay upon the table an approximate statement of affairs as of May 1. I think that completes all the documents I have in my possession or shall be able to obtain.

Mr. MACDONALD: I remember seeing the return to which my hon. friend refers after it was brought down, but I have been unable to find it among my papers. It may be in my office at home. I have communicated with my office and shall endeavour to find out. I presume that the minister will have a copy of the return.

Mr. WHITE: I find I have not a copy, the reason being that I laid my copy upon the table, and I think my hon. friend then got his copy. In some way they have both been mislaid. The information now asked for was brought down, and I do not know that it was of especial importance; but if any member requires anything in addition to what is now before the House I shall be only too glad to endeavour to get it.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY PAPERS.

Mr. BORDEN: My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition spoke yesterday of the desirability of having the documents in connection with the Canadian Northern Railway proposals printed and laid upon the table of the House. We had provided a number of copies which it was anticipated might be sufficient for the use of those who desire to discuss the question, and this was done in the hope that I might take up the resolution on Monday. My right hon. friend has represented to me that it is desirable to have certain portions of the documents printed, and accordingly my colleague from Halifax and the Solicitor General have gone over the papers and made a selection, which, in order to expedite the matter, has already been placed in the hands of the printer. It is necessary, however, to make a motion to have the matter regular; therefore, I beg to move:

That such portions of the documents laid upon the table of the House in connection with the proposed resolutions relating to the Canadian Northern Railway system as have been selected for the purpose shall be printed forthwith, and that the provisions of rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That will be quite satisfactory. I may say to my right hon. friend that he will find the trust deed of December 28, 1913, which yesterday he said he could not find, in schedule 2, part 2, item 3. It is not necessary to have it printed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. DOHERTY moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 180, to amend the Canada Temperance Act. He said:

There are several purposes for which it is sought to amend the Act. The first amendment is to make such provisions as are necessary to make the Act applicable in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Under the dispositions of the law as it now stands, the Act is not susceptible of practical application in those provinces. The second amendment looks to the providing of a list of electors for use in the election for the adoption of the Canada Temperance Act in different districts. The difficulty that has arisen, and that is sought to be obviated, has arisen in those portions of the province of Ontario which constitute unorganized territory. The general provision of the Act is that persons who would be entitled to vote at a Dominion election if such an election were being held, are entitled to vote on the election for the adoption of the Canada Temperance Act. The lists in unorganized territory for use in the Dominion elections are, under the provisions of the law, to be made each year, unless the Governor in Council decides in any particular year that it is not necessary that they should be made; and in practice such an Order in Council is passed save in years where it is anticipated that there will be an election. The result is that it may happen, and it has happened, that where it is desired to adopt the Canada Temperance Act in any district composed in whole or in part of unorganized territory in the province of Ontario, there is as regards that part no list of electors in force, and it is necessary to have one made which may serve at the election for the adoption of the Act. Under the law as it now stands, even if only a portion of a riding forms part of the district in which it is sought to bring the Canada Temperance Act into force, it is necessary to make a list of that entire Dominion riding, which entails a very large and useless expense. The purpose of this amendment is to provide that when an election has been ordered for the adoption of the Temperance Act a list shall be made for such portion of the unorganized territory as is included in the district in which the election is to take place; and, further, that that list shall be for the purpose of that Temperance Act election only. The reason of that last provision is that where for a purpose of that kind a list was made of the electors in only a portion of the riding, in the event of a Dominion election coming on in that riding, it did not seem proper that there should be one list for one part made at one time, and the balance made later on. There are, in addition, two provisions made to settle doubts; that is to say, provisions with regard to contestations of the election for the adoption of the Canada Temperance Act. These provisions declare that the superior courts of the different provinces shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such contestations; and further provision is made as to the procedure, in substance enacting that any person entitled to vote at the election may attack the validity of the election, and that he shall be bound to advertise notice of his contestation during a period of two weeks. As there are no persons who have any special quality to be defendants on such contestation, it is provided that any interested person may appear to contest the petition; and power is given to the judge, in the event of more than one such qualified person appearing, to make such order as may be required for the consolidating of the defences or contestation, and such other orders as may be necessary to prevent the incurring of unnecessary expense as the result of multiple contestation.

Mr. OLIVER: May I ask if the conditions in the prairie provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, where municipalities are nor organized, are recognized in the amendment?

Mr. DOHERTY: The provision is that the word 'county' in the Act, as regards Alberta and Saskatchewan, has the meaning of electoral riding.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

[Mr. Doherty.]

WINNIPEG JOINT TERMINALS.

Hon. J. D. REID (acting Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 181, respecting the entrance of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian Northern Railway Company into their joint terminals at the city of Winnipeg.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Explain.

Mr. REID: On April 10, 1911, the Minister of Railways and Canals, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern entered into an agreement by which the Grand Trunk Pacific would have running rights over, and the use of, the terminals in the city of Wininpeg. This Bill is simply to ratify the agreement. The Bill has just one clause ratifying the agreement, and a schedule setting out the whole agreement.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE NEW GOVERNOR GENERAL.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. EMMERSON: I would like to ask if the Government have any official information in respect to the appointment of a Governor General to succeed the present incumbent of the office? I see rumours in the press, and I presume that the people of Canada would like to know what foundation there is for them. I hope that the rumours are not true. Still, I speak individually.

Mr. BORDEN: There has been a telegram received by His Royal Highness the Governor General, announcing that His Majesty has been pleased to approve of the appointment of Prince Alexander of Teck to succeed His Royal Highness as Governor General.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. During the remarks of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Sam. Hughes) yesterday afternoon, he referred to a conversation between himself and myself in regard to the appointment of certain honorary lieutenant colonels. I wish to call attention to an omission in 'Hansard' at page 3535.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman would be good enough to state what the question of privilege is, we would know whether it is a question of privilege or only a correction of something, which, I take it, would not be a question of privilege, but which he has properly the right to do.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not understand; I was doing the best I could to tell you.

Mr. SPEAKER: My request to the hon. gentleman was to state what the question of privilege was before going on with the reading. If it is merely a correction, it would not be a question of privilege. Very often a request is made by an hon. member to rise to a question of privilege, when in reality it is not a question of privilege at all, but simply a correction of something that is wrong in 'Hansard,' or a misprint in regard to something that the hon. gentleman had said.

Mr. KNOWLES: You will have to watch me closely, because if I say something that is not a question of privilege you will have to stop me. I cannot do anything better than I am doing. I said that I had risen to correct an omission in the 'Hansard.' There is something left out that I want in 'Hansard.'

Mr. SPEAKER: It is quite proper to draw attention to an incorrect report and to ask for a correction, but it would not ordinarily be regarded as a question of privilege.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do I understand you to rule that I am to go on?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is quite in order for the hon. gentleman to go on and make the correction.

Mr. KNOWLES: I will have to start again, for I have forgotten where I was stopped. Yesterday the Minister of Militia and Defence made a speech, and in the course of that speech he took occasion to make some allegations with reference to a conversation which had occurred between himself and myself, with regard to the appointment of an honorary colonel. On that occasion I controverted the minister's statement, but it is not on that I wish to dwell. In corroboration of what I said, I made a further statement of a matter of fact, which is entirely omitted from 'Hansard'. In corroboration of my rendition of the fact, I stated that a certain gentleman named Colonel Williams—there is no reference to Colonel Williams in 'Hansard'—I said a certain gentleman named Colonel Williams, who is connected with the Militia Department, and who is a member of the Militia Council, sought me out. I never heard of Colonel Williams before. He sought me out in my room, 212, bringing a file with him and saying he was instructed by the Minister of Militia to seek me and introduce himself to me, and he asked my views on the suitability of this gentleman as an honorary colonel. I told him my views, which were favourable to this gentleman. I never asked Colonel Williams directly or indirectly, I never asked the minister or anybody else, to appoint any person honorary colonel. I simply answered the question, giving my opinion as to the suitability and character of this gentleman. The whole reference to this interview of Colonel Williams, who was sent as an emissary from the minister, with me, is entirely omitted from 'Hansard'.

INSPECTION OF PICKLED FISH.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Hazen (Minister of Marine and Fisheries), the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Blondin in the Chair:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide for the inspection and branding of pickled fish, for the appointment of inspectors and the making of regulations, the nature of brands and the capacity of barrels, and penalties for infraction of the regulations.

Mr. HAZEN. The purpose of this resolution and the Bill which is to be founded on it is to give an impetus to the pickled fish industry throughout Canada, more especially the pickled herring business. At the present time, herring put up in Scotland and other parts of the world sell for prices far in advance of the prices that are obtained for herrings and other fish pickled in Canada. It is believed that this is due entirely to the absence of proper methods in pickling this fish in Canada, because the fish that are taken in Canadian waters are quite equal to those taken in Scotland or anywhere else. Scotch herrings bring a price of $10 a barrel as against $3.50 a barrel obtained for Canadian herrings. The object is to provide for a proper system of inspection so that fish put up in a certain way will bear the hallmark, as it were, of the Canadian inspector, and people buying this fish will know that proper inspection of it has taken place.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Will the Bill prescribe the character of the package?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the inspection be compulsory?

Mr. HAZEN: No; but we hope and believe that the result will be that after a short time those who put up pickled fish will see the very great advantage of having it inspected and bearing the mark of the inspector. As a result it is hoped that the prices obtained for this inspected and branded fish will be very much higher than present prices.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will there be inspectors named for this inspection?

Mr. HAZEN: The inspectors will visit different parts of Canada where fish is put up. For example, if the inspector is advised that at some point in Gaspé, or Bonaventure, or in the Maritime provinces fish are ready for inspection, he will go there and put his mark on the barrel according to the grade of the fish. When the Bill is introduced it is my intention to move that it be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Marine and Fisheries, so that it may have the advantage of its details being discussed by that committee, and the opinion of the officials of the department presented. I have no doubt it will receive careful consideration from the committee, and if any amendments are offered in the public interest they will be considered, because although the Bill is, I think, very carefully thought out at present, there may be improvements made in it.

The pickled fish industry of Canada, which includes the trade in salted herring, mackerel, alewives and salmon, has been for years in a languishing condition. Dealers in many cases refuse absolutely to have anything to do with the cured product. The cause of this is to be found, first, in the poor, leaky packages of varying size, which are in common use and which invariably ruin their contents in the course of transportation; and, second, to the lack of a proper system of grading the fish, together with careless, unsystematic packing.

This Bill, as I have pointed out to the committee, is intended to bring into general use an improved standard barrel for curing and marketing pickled fish, and to raise the standard of curing and packing to such a degree that the cured article shall secure the confidence of dealers at home and abroad.

To carry out the provisions of the Bill, when it becomes law, a small staff of inspectors will be appointed and duly drilled and instructed in their duties. These will thereafter form a sort of travelling school of instruction in their several districts, for barrel-makers, fishermen and other packers. In addition to this, regulations in the form of a book of detailed instructions will be placed in the hands of packers, etc., for their guidance.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How will these inspectors be paid ?

Mr. HAZEN: They will be paid by the Department of Marine and Fisheries out of the general appropriation placed at our command.

Mr. MACLEAN: Will any charge be made to the packers for the inspection ?

Mr. HAZEN: It is not proposed to do so at present. The inspectors will thoroughly examine all pickled fish presented to them for inspection, while the goods are still in the hands of the original packer. If the barrel is of the standard size and make, and the fish are graded in accordance with the regulations contained in this Bill, they will apply to each barrel so conforming to the requirements, a brand or guarantee of quality, which will show the grade of the fish, the year in which the fish was packed, and the inspecting officer's initials or number.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What will be the cost of administration ?

Mr. HAZEN: We do not think that the cost will be at all large. Some of the officials at present in the department can be utilized for the purpose, and a few other inspectors may have to be appointed who will not only act as inspectors, but go about the country preparing for this work by meeting the fishermen in the different sections; pointing out to them exactly what the provisions of the Bill and the regulations are and educating them on the subject in the same way that lecturers go to the farmers to-day and give them instructions in regard to agriculture. It is not anticipated that any large additional number of inspectors will be required.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is the Bill the same as the Act in force in this country some years ago?

Mr. HAZEN: I am unable to answer the question of my hon. friend, because I do not know the provisions of that Act. My attention has not been called to it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the Bill provide for a standard barrel?

Mr. HAZEN: The Bill and the regulations under the Bill will provide the sort of barrel that will have to be used in order that the inspector will be justified in putting his mark on it, showing that it has been inspected by him and contains a certain quality of fish. It will have to be a barrel of a certain quality and of a certain kind, because I believe the great difficulty in the putting up of pickled fish to-day is that they are put up in barrels that are leaking in many cases, so that the pickle runs out and the fish become rusty. The term 'rusty' is familiar to all of us who live near the sea. Our friends from the interior will hardly know the expression as applied to fish. Unless you get the proper barrel to put up the fish in, you can not be sure that the fish will continue to be of good quality, because when a barrel full of fish with pickle in it is sent about the country by train, etc., the staves work loose; the pickle runs out, and the fish are destroyed. It is largely due to that fact that pickled fish put up in Canada brings such a very small price as compared with the pickled herring cured in Scotland, which in very considerable quantities are sold in this country and on this side of the Atlantic for a sum fully three times as large as is obtained for pickled fish put up in Canada at the present time. There is of course also a difference in the method of curing.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is the inspection in Scotland done by the Government?

Mr. HAZEN: The pickled fish industry in Scotland was built up under legislation of this character. A good many years ago there was the same trouble with the pickled fish industry in Scotland. Under Acts which are somewhat similar to this Bill, but which I believe also provided for a bounty, the pickled fish industry in Scotland, from being a comparatively small industry and one that did not give very large returns to those engaged in it, has become a most important industry. This was largely brought about by the passage of legislation, the object of which was to give assurance to the man buying the products that what he was buying had been properly inspected, and that he was getting an article up to a certain standard of excellence.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: At the start it referred only to herring.

Mr. HAZEN: Yes. As a matter of fact, if this Bill becomes law, it will be used chiefly in connection with herrings. It mentions alewives. Hon. gentlemen know that alewives, also known as gaspereaux, are smoked and cured and sent down to the West Indies. There is very little sale for alewives in this country. There is also a provision in the Bill that any other class of fish may be brought within its scope if it is thought desirable to do so. It will also apply to mackerel and salmon; and it is possible that in the future, although it is not likely, because the shad is not an important commercial fish in this country, it may also be applied to shad.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If the Government stamp is placed on a barrel of fish, I suppose that the Government will be responsible that there is good fish in the barrel; and if there is anything wrong with the fish, that the Government will pay the damages. It is something in the nature of a guarantee—like the Farmers' Bank.

Mr. HAZEN: If the Government stamp is put on a barrel, and if it turns out that the goods contained in the barrel are not up to the proper standard, it will be perfectly clear that we have appointed somebody as inspector who is not fit to perform his duties, and that he should be removed and another inspector appointed in his place. A great deal will depend upon the efficiency of the inspectors and upon the fidelity and care with which they discharge their duties.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the appointments of the inspectors be political?

Mr. HAZEN: The appointments will be made by the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MARCIL: Will they be political appointments?

Mr. HAZEN: No. The inspectors will be men qualified to fill the position. If we do not get men of that class, this legislation will certainly not be a success.

Mr. MARCIL: Will codfish be included?

Mr. HAZEN: Codfish are not put up in barrels; they are dry-cured.

Mr. MARCIL: The hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) says that they are pickled at certain seasons of the year.

Mr. HAZEN: My experience with codfish is that they are dried sometimes in the sun and at other times by process of steam.

All these matters will be considered by the Committee of Marine and Fisheries when they meet. If, in the opinion of that committee, which is composed of gentlemen who have more or less acquaintance with matters relating to fisheries, this legislation should be extended to other fish, I shall be very glad indeed that the Bill should be amended in that respect.

Mr. McKENZIE: What I mentioned to the hon. member (Mr. Marcil) was that in my part of the country in the fall of the year large quantities of codfish are caught. They cannot be sun-dried, and are pickled and put up in barrels and sent to the market in that shape, which is termed 'green-cured.' That is what I have in mind.

Mr. LOGGIE: Does this Bill contemplate a specification for the construction of the barrels, which I think is a most important matter?

Mr. HAZEN: It does.

Mr. LOGGIE: How thick are the staves to be?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not wish to take up too much time, but perhaps I had better run over the Bill section by section, that the House may understand the nature of its provisions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does not this inpection imply at the same time the proper curing of the fish?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Some years ago the department established curing stations and secured the services of some Scotch experts. I know that in the county of Gaspé the assistance thus afforded was well received. Will the minister maintain that organization?

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend will see at once that you will have to have something more than the right sort of barrel; you will have to see that the fish is properly cured.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And to that end you will have to teach the fishermen.

Mr. HAZEN: We will do that as far as possible. The inspectors will go through the districts concerned and will get the fishermen and those interested in fishing together to explain the matter to them. If this were in relation to the agricultural industry, we would call such meetings farmers' institutes. Similar gatherings to the farmers' institutes will be held among the fishermen. A certain amount of missionary work will have to be done before this new system can be brought into successful operation. These inspectors will not only distribute literature showing what the regulations are and what requirements must be complied with before the brand can be placed on the barrels, but will have to explain the matter by word of mouth and answer questions as far as possible, so that the fishermen may have complete and accurate information.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Can the hon. minister give us an idea of the number of inspectors that will be required?

Mr. HAZEN: I cannot tell exactly, but the opinion in the department is that the number to be appointed at the present time will not be large.

4 p.m. Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I have had some experience with these inspectors——

Mr. HAZEN: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me first to explain the Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: Before the explanation is entered upon will the minister please state whether this measure has been submitted to the Fishermen's union or any opinion obtained upon it from them.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think so. I know that requests have been made of the department from time to time that something should be done for the purpose of developing the herring fishery to a greater extent than at present. And this measure will apply, as hon. gentlemen know, not only to the East but to the West. There are exceedingly valuable herring fisheries in British Columbia. In some places there the waters teem with herring, but little use is made of them.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Are they the same fish as in the Atlantic ?

Mr. HAZEN: They may not be exactly the same, but they are good fish. The only fisheries that are developed in British Columbia to-day are salmon and halibut fisheries. Very little is done with the herring. This Bill will apply to the Pacific as well as to the Atlantic coast, though results will perhaps be made sooner apparent on the Atlantic than on the Pacific. But it is believed by gentlemen from British Columbia interested in the fishing business with whom I have discussed the matter that there is a great future for the herring industry on the Pacific coast.

Sections 1 and 2 of the Bill are the title and interpretation clause. Section 3 provides that the Bill shall apply to salted herring, alewives, mackerel and salmon and the barrels or half barrels in which such fish are salted and marketed. It provides that the Governor in Council may extend the provisions of the Bill to any other kind of fish. It may be deemed advisable to extend it to the codfishing industry, though, speaking subject to correction, from what I know of that industry I think that will not be necessary. Section 4 provides that the Governor in Council may appoint a general inspector and other officers for the carrying out of the provisions of the Act. Section 5 prescribes the form of oath of office to be taken by these officers. Under section 6, the Governor in Council may make such regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of the Act, as to him seem necessary for the carrying out of the provisions of the Act. Section 7 enacts that the brand provided by the Act shall not be put on any barrel containing herring, alewives, mackerel, salmon or any other fish that may hereafter be brought under the provisions of this Act, or on any half barrel of the same, unless such fish have been cured and packed in Canada or on board a Canadian vessel. My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), I think it was, asked a question about the place of inspection. Section 8 provides that the inspection shall take place at the port or place where such fish may have been cured and packed, provided that when curing and packing have been performed at sea the inspection shall take place at any port of landing in Canada. The system of inspection is as follows: Any curer or packer of the fish referred to, desiring to obtain the brand provided for, shall give notice in writing to the nearest inspecting officer of the number of barrels or half barrels of each of the kinds of fish named which he desires to present to the officer for inspection. The inspecting officer shall require the owner or packer to sign a statutory declaration that the fish were cured and packed in Canada or on board a Canadian vessel or boat within the period prescribed for the various classes of fish by the regulation. The brand prescribed shall not be placed on any barrel or half barrel the capacity of which is not as prescribed under the regulations, and which barrel or half barrel is not made and marked in accordance with such regulations. When these barrels are presented to be inspected they shall be opened and the inspector may remove as many fish as are necessary in order to gain the information required and to make a thorough inspection. If the inspection is satisfactory, the inspector shall place the brand provided for upon the barrel. Inspecting officers may enter curing places. Penalty for unauthorized using of the brand or the falsifying of official documents is provided, and there is a provision that barrels cannot be used without destroying the official brand. Forfeiture of barrels of fish may be enforced in case of alteration or defacing of marks. Section 20 of the Bill provides that in case of dispute arising between any inspecting officer and the owner or packer of fish with regard to the quality or condition of the barrels or the fish they contain, the dispute shall be forthwith referred to another inspecting officer whose decision shall be final, provided that no appeal shall be considered where the identity of the article in dispute has not been preserved. It is provided that the Governor in Council may make rules for re-examination. Penalties are provided for the infraction of the Act, and provision is made for the fixing of venue. Section 26 answers a question that was asked me. It is as follows:

> Nothing contained in this Act shall compel any person to present for inspection any fish or barrels or half barrels in which they are contained.

It is provided that the Act shall come into force on the 1st of May, 1915, but the officers referred to in the Act may be appointed and regulations made at any time after the passing of the Act.

The reason for that is that it is important that between now and the coming into force of the Act the inspectors should be actually travelling through the fishing districts, affording the people information which they ought to have before this Act is put in force, of the actual work of inspection, so that the people may understand the proper steps to be taken.

Then, there is a provision with regard to penalties. As I have said, it is my intention to move, after the second reading, that this Bill be referred to the Committee on Marine and Fisheries. I think that most of the members interested in the fishing industry are members of that committee. Of course, the Bill is absolutely non-political, and it is desirable, in the interest of the preserved fish industry, that the gentlemen who are interested in it should give their best thought and consideration to the Bill with the purpose of perfecting it as far as possible.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Hazen thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 182, to provide for the inspection and branding of pickled fish.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Hazen, the Bill was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Marine and Fisheries.

PENSION TO GUARD'S WIDOW.

On motion of Mr. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice), the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Blondin in the Chair:

Resolved, that it is expedient to grant from the first day of April, 1914, during her natural life, an annual allowance of $500 to Mrs. Alice Joynson, widow of the late J. H. Joynson, in his lifetime a guard in the British Columbia penitentiary, who was killed in the performance of his duty.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Bill which it is intended to found upon this resolution provides an annuity of $500 for Mrs. Alice Joynson, who is mentioned in the resolution. This lady is the widow of a man named Joynson, who was employed as a guard in the British Columbia penitentiary. Something over a year ago, this man was killed in endeavouring to prevent the escape from the penitentiary of two very desperate criminals. In their endeavour to escape, one of the criminals was killed and, very unfortunately, this man Joynson was also killed. I may say that his conduct on the occasion showed what I think may be properly described as conspicuous bravery. These two desperate men had succeeded, in the first place, in depriving one of the guards of the penitentiary, who was in immediate supervision over them, of his revolver, and then, by threatening other guards as they passed through different portions of the penitentiary grounds with this revolver, they succeeded in possessing themselves of the revolvers of those guards too. They had reached the final gates which separated them from liberty and were threatening the guards upon the wall when this man Joynson came to the rescue and at the risk, and, as it proved, at the price of his own life, intervened to prevent the escape. As I said, one of the two men endeavouring to escape was, after the intervention of Joynson, shot by the guard who was upon the wall. The other one was captured and subsequently tried for the murder of Joynson, convicted, and hanged. Mr. Joynson left a widow, who is in poor health and has two or three small children. She is, as I am reliably informed, incapable really of earning her livelihood and has no one to whom she may look for support or assistance. It has seemed to us that this was a deserving case from every point of view. Apart from the needs of this unfortunate woman and her young children, we have been very much influenced by the consideration that bravery such as that displayed by this man in the performance of his duty calls for recognition. It would seem to me in the public interest that guards in our penitentiaries who may be called upon to perform a duty similar to that which this man so courageously performed should have the encouragement of realizing that if, in endeavouring to perform that duty, they sacrifice their lives, those who are dearest to them and are dependent upon them shall not be left in want by their conduct.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I certainly will not offer any objection to the resolution, and I think the widow who is to be given this pension is fully entitled to it. Nobody, I am sure, will question the propriety of the Government encouraging bravery such as was shown by this particular officer, but I would suggest that instead of dealing with isolated cases in this way it would be better to have a general law providing that the widow and children of any man who loses his life in the performance of his duty shall be properly rewarded.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not wish to offer any objection to the Bill, but I might remind the House and the leader of the Government that the Minister of Justice is more generous than the Postmaster General. Three years ago a mail carrier perished in trying to save the mails during a storm on lake of Two Mountains, between Ottawa and Montreal. He left a widow and five or six children. The case was brought to the notice of the House by the hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier). He begged the Government to do something for the widow and children, but the minister refused. More than that, the people of Oka petitioned the Postmaster General to transfer the mail contract, formerly held by her husband to the widow of this man. The petition was turned down, the widow has received nothing, and there she is to-day.

Mr. McKENZIE: I certainly concur in what the minister has said, but there is just one thing I would like to ask, and that is whether any provision is made for the administration of this money. It is quite possible that while this money is voted by Parliament it may not be properly administered, and I would like to bring to the notice of the minister the desirability of having the money put in the hands of a proper person so that it will be spent in a proper way, and perform the functions we hope it to do in the way of looking after this woman and her children.

Mr. DOHERTY: I quite realize the force of what has been said by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition as to the desirability of making some general provision for cases of this kind. We shall probably have to deal with the subject of these institutions very shortly, and I shall bear my right hon. friend's suggestion in mind. This is the method that has been adopted in the past; for instance, in the case of Laviolette, who was warden of St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary. The present case calls for immediate action and justifies our dealing with it by itself, pending the adoption of a general system. I am not in a position to give any information in regard to the case put before the House by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). With regard to the suggestion of the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), I may say that we did consider the matter from that point of view, but on reflection it was thought that as our purpose after all was to give this money to this woman—not to constitute her a ward of the State—we thought we would allow the woman to enjoy in her own way the money that we feel has been honourably and fairly earned. There is no reason to apprehend that she will not make good use of it. The amount of $500 a year goes to the woman herself, and we are obviating the complications that might arise from the appointment of a trustee; and possibly it might be difficult to find a trustee to act gratuitously. The woman appears to us to be competent to be entrusted with this amount, and we feel that we can safely grant the money to her to be used in her own way. We are giving it not as a gratuity, but in recognition, not of course of a legal right, but of a most justifiable claim on the part of this woman, and as payment of a debt of gratitude to the unfortunate man who gave his life in the performance of his duty, and for whom all we can do is to make this modest provision for his widow.

Mr. McKENZIE: Suppose this woman gets married, what then?

Mr. DOHERTY: Even in that case, the fact will remain that her deceased husband deserves this recognition. This is not done merely because the woman is in want. If she were not in want, I think it would be a proper thing to do. I may instance the fact that under the Militia Act the widows of those officers who die while still in office are granted an allowance of an amount similar to this, and all that is required of them in order to be entitled to this amount is that they shall not be wealthy. In this particular case the money is not intended as a mere dole of charity to an indigent person; it is intended as the recognition of a service that I think may be not unfittingly characterized as heroic, at all events as regards the manner in which the act was performed.

Mr. NESBITT: How are the payments to be made? Does the woman get the money annually in a lump sum?

Mr. DOHERTY: The proposition is that the allowance should be paid monthly.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I agree with the minister in everything he has said, but I would strongly recommend to him the case brought to his attention by the hon. member for Rouville. It is not in his department, I know, but the circumstances are very much the same. Here is a man who lost his life in the performance of his duty. The circumstances may not have been heroic, but, after all, the case is deserving of attention from the State, which has benefited by the performance of this man's duty. If the hon. minister could prevail on his neighbour, the Postmaster General, to do the same for this man's widow, he would win the gratitude not only of the widow but of every member in this House.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be very glad to call his attention to what has been said.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Calling his attention to it will not accomplish much.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. DOHERTY thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 183, to provide for the payment of a yearly allowance to Mrs. Alice Joynson, widow of the late J.

H. Joynson, a guard in the British Columbia penitentiary.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPREME COURT ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Mr. Doherty, Bill No. 175, to amend the Supreme Court Act, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the Minister of Justice please explain this Bill?

Mr. DOHERTY: Last year an amendment to the Supreme Court Act was passed, the purpose of which was to remedy a condition existing with regard to appeals in certain cases. The difficulty that called for remedy was that it was held, under the Supreme Court Act as it stood previous to that amendment, that under the definition of a 'final judgment' there was no appeal from a judgment which did not ultimately dispose of the case, even though it might finally determine some substantial right. The result of this holding was that there being no appeal from what in Quebec we would call an interlocutory judgment, a judgment which did not finally terminate the suit though it decided a substantial right, the parties going on after the rendering of that judgment to a final judgment, and having taken an appeal from the final judgment, were in the position that the judgment which had settled the substantial right was not appealable by itself, and that their appeal from the final judgment did not bring up that judgment. They found themselves with an appeal merely from the ultimate or final judgment, which was possibly the necessary consequence of the preceding judgment from which they had no appeal. The amendment of last year so modified the law as to make any judgment which in whole or in part decided any substantial right of the parties to be considered a final judgment for the purposes of the Act. This further amendment is now proposed for the purpose of making the amendment of last year applicable to pending cases begun before the enactment of that amendment, as well as to cases begun after it was enacted. The Supreme Court has held that that amendment was without application to cases instituted before the amendment of last year. It is considered that the provision, granting the right to appeal, should be made applicable to all pending cases without distinction between those which were begun before the passing of the amendment and those which were begun subsequently. The judges in a particular case seem to have held this amendment inapplicable, not by reason of any opinion on their part that it should not properly apply, but merely because they considered themselves bound by judgments that had been rendered in previous cases with regard to analogous situations. One of the judges expressed himself that he would be inclined to treat the amendment of last year as applicable, were it not for these judgments. From the point of view of what is desirable, I think this amendment ought to be recognized as applicable to pending cases. There is an addition which I think ought to be made to the Bill as printed. The Bill is made applicable to all cases, as well those begun before as those begun since the amendment, and I think there should be an addition made to reserve the right of the court to adjudicate as regards costs.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Will you require an enactment for that?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not clear that it is absolutely necessary, but I think it might be wise.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think the provision itself is a very wise one, but I do not think there is necessity for putting it in the statute.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am disposed to agree that it is really not necessary, but I think it may be wise to preclude any possiblity that because the parties proceeding under this amendment succeeded as a matter of law, they ought as a matter of right, to be entitled to the costs. I move that the Bill be amended by adding a second section as follows:

> The costs of any appeal instituted before the passing of this Act in any such action, suit, case, matter, or other judicial proceeding, to which the said paragraph (e) of subsection 2 of the Supreme Court Act, would not, save for the enactment of this Act have been applicable, shall be in the discretion of the court.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EXPORT OF PETROLEUM.

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 84, to amend the Export Act.—Mr. Reid. Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

Mr. BORDEN: When this Bill was under consideration some time ago, it was suggested that there should be some amendment which would give the House of Commons control at the then next session in respect of any regulations that might be made by the Governor in Council under the provisions of the Bill. I have prepared an amendment which is taken ipsissimis verbis from the Dominion Lands Act in respect to similar powers conferred on the Governor in Council by the provisions of that Act to make regulations in regard to important matters. It seems to me it would be proper to amend this Bill by a similar section, and therefore I move:

That section 7 as proposed be amended by adding thereto sub section 2 in the following words:

2. Every regulation made by the Governor in Council in virtue of this Act shall have force and effect only after it has been published for four consecutive weeks in the Canada Gazette, and every such regulation shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament within the first fifteen days of the session next after the date thereof, and such regulation shall remain in force until the day immediately succeeding the date of prorogation of that session of Parliament and no longer unless during that session it is approved by resolution of both Houses of Parliament.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not think that this amendment, if I remember correctly, touches the point that was in my mind when I raised the question on a former occasion. Section 7 provides:

The Governor in Council may by regulation prohibit the exportation from Canada of petroleum, in its crude or partly manufactured state.

My objection to this section as it stands is that the parties who are to-day proposing to invest in the development of petroleum fields in Canada may be deterred from making such investments by this unlimited, unconditional authority given by Parliament to the Governor in Council to prohibit the export of petroleum, if produced. I am not in any degree objecting to Parliament giving the Governor in Council the right to prohibit the export of petroleum; but I am pointing out the very detrimental effect that the giving of that right unconditionally and without limit must necessarily have on the minds of those whose money is necessary to secure the development of petroleum production. What I urged before was that the exercise of this authority should be made conditional on the existence of specific contingencies, so that the prospective investors would know exactly under what circumstances they would be limited, as this section will give the Governor in Council authority to limit them. Perhaps I do not need to repeat what I said before. We think we are, or hope we are, on the eve of very large and important petroleum developments in Alberta; but those developments have not yet taken place. They may come as the result of a comparatively small investment of capital, or it may be that they will come only after the investment of a very large amount of capital. At the present time capital is being attracted towards those possible oil fields; and I think it will be very unfortunate if, by an Act of Parliament, we tend to deter the investment of capital, as I am sure the terms of the Bill put before the House will do. I again ask the Government to take into consideration the propriety of making the exercise of this authority conditional.

Mr. BORDEN: I remember distinctly the occasion when my hon. friend put forward the reason which he has just now suggested. I found this difficulty in meeting his views as fully as I would have desired, that it is extremely difficult to express conditions in such a way that the section will be effective without leaving matters very much as they are at present. It might be suggested that we could insert in this Bill some such expression as that found in the Militia Act or in the Naval Service Act.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, I think so.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not think it would be desirable to do that, and I will explain my reasons to my hon. friend. Conditions might arise which, in the opinion of the Government, after consultation with the proper authorities, would justify some such action as this, and it might be undesirable, in the interest of Canada and of the whole empire, that the particular action of the Government should be publicly based upon the consideration which would thus be set forth in the Bill. An explanation has been given in this House of the policy upon which the Government will exercise the powers conferred by this Bill; and, inasmuch as the Government renders itself amenable, with the least possible delay, to have its action in that regard considered by Parliament, I think that on the whole the proposed terms of the Bill ought not to deter persons proposing to invest. I agree with my hon. friend in what he has said in regard to oil development, with a certain qualification. I would go a little further than he would go, in this respect, that, so far as my limited knowledge leads me to have any opinion on the subject, it would not seem to me possible that any very extensive oil development could take place in Alberta or in any other province of Canada except by means of the investment of large amounts of capital. A discovery of oil may be possible with the expenditure of a moderate amount of capital, if the discoverer happens to have exceedingly good luck; but the prosecution of the discovery of oil, as I understand it from persons with whom I have conversed on the subject on many occasions during the past summer, is proceeded with on thoroughly scientific lines—on geological surveys, and on the consideration of the elements which are usually found where oil is discovered in large quantities. Even when you find from the surveys all the geological indications that oil is present in large quantities, it is nevertheless possible that you may not find it. Now, the prosecution of the search for oil involves a very considerable investment of capital, and, if oil be found, the carrying on of the business of production, as I understand it, involves the investment of further large amounts of capital. A proposal such as this was discussed with some persons who purported to represent, and who, I am credibly informed do represent, large amounts of capital, and I did not find that they were deterred by the proposal that the Governor in Council should be invested with such powers as are set forth in the Bill. That was my experience, and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche), who had even more experience in that regard than I had, derived the same impression from his conversation with these persons. My hon. friend from Edmonton and I have precisely the same object in view. It seemed to me that, for the reasons I have indicated, it would be reasonable that we should meet his views, as provided in this amendment; for no government would for a moment think of placing itself in a position to take action of this kind except for the gravest possible reasons. There is another consideration that I may mention: no government would undertake to exercise powers such as these unless there was need of that particular product for very important purposes. It seems to me that that consideration should be a re-assuring one to those who might be disposed to invest their capital in such enterprises. That itself is a further guarantee. Then, the Government exercising extreme powers of this kind must have regard to private interests which, if affected prejudicially, would be affected for the common good of the whole country.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The amendment proposed by my right hon. friend certainly minimizes in great degree the objection we on this side had to the Bill. It does not wholly remove that objection. Our difficulty in the case of this legislation is that it is impossible to conceive why the export of oil should be prohibited. Oil is a commodity that is coming more and more in use, and at the present time, as suggested by my hon. friend from Edmonton, the development is commencing to be more general. New fields have been found in Alberta. These will probably be found profitable; but no doubt with a blanket of this kind on the statute book men may think twice before they invest their capital in these fields; the question will be asked at once by all investors: Why does Parliament contemplate prohibiting the export of oil? As I say, not sufficient reason has been given why such a thing should be contemplated. We have had the resolution debated, we have had the second reading of the Bill and are now in committee upon it, yet nobody has been able to tell us why the Government thought of this measure contemplating the possible prevention of the export of oil. There must be a reason, but what it is I do not know. The only thing stated by my right hon. friend on a previous occasion, was that possibly circumstances might arise that would make it advisable to prevent this export. That is a very vague reason, and the circumstances alluded to seem very, very remote. If that is all, it seems to me the Government is taking a large power in advance of time and for contingencies which may never arise. As I have said, for my part, though I object to the Bill, yet the amendment proposed will minimize my objection. For, if the Government exercise the powers given them by the Bill to prevent the export of oil, their action cannot go beyond the summoning of Parliament, and then the matter must be before Parliament and the entire subject will come up for review. That is a safeguard which ought to be effective.

Mr. BORDEN: Perhaps if the Bill should be reported and allowed to stand over for a third reading, I would be pleased to give further consideration to the views of my hon. friend from Edmonton, to ascertain as far as I can whether there is any danger that persons otherwise disposed to invest capital in oil fields would be deterred from doing so by this legislation, and I shall also consider whether qualifications such as have been suggested might be inserted.

Mr. MARCIL: I read in a newspaper some weeks ago that the possible reason for this legislation was the prospective use of petroleum in connection with defence. The British navy, it was said, is going in for warships with oil-burning engines, and the taking of this power is suggested in case difficulty should arise. In the county of Gaspé several efforts have been made to discover oil, and the discovery has been made. Last week I received a letter from one of my constituents saying that oil had been discovered in that part of the country at Port Daniel. I referred the matter to the Department of Mines to investigate, but I have not yet received an answer. Should legislation of this kind injuriously affect the development it would be unfortunate. Beyond doubt, oil exists in the Gaspé peninsula. The Geological Survey has so reported, and the latest discovery to which I have referred adds interest to the subject. Considerable money has already been expended in this matter. The reason for the legislation to which I have referred was only in a newspaper paragraph and may or may not be true.

Mr. BORDEN: I gave such explanation as seemed desirable when I had the opportunity to discuss the Bill before. And I do not know that it is desirable that I should say anything further upon the subject. I said that oil, so far as it might be produced in Canada, might be required for special national purposes, and that representations had been made to us from very important quarters in that regard. Oil has been discovered in more than one province in Canada. It has been discovered in my own province, in the island of Cape Breton, but up to the present time, I believe, not in paying quantities. In Alberta there is strong prospect that it will be discovered in very large quantities. I hope it may be so. On consultation with my colleague, the Minister of the Interior, he corroborates my view that the persons who were here last year and who represent, as we understand and believe, very large amounts of capital were not disposed at all to object to the insertion of a provision of this kind, and will not be deterred from investing capital by the conferring of such powers upon the Governor in Council.

Mr. PARDEE: No doubt the Prime Minister is aware of the fact that nearly all the crude oil that is to-day manufactured into the finished product in Canada comes from the United States. This legislation is being enacted at a time when, so far as the section to which reference has been made is concerned, it is not known whether there is a producing field or not.

It would appear to me, therefore, that this kind of legislation is not desirable, because, if the United States were to retaliate with the same class of legislation and put it into effect, it would cut off the Dominion of Canada very largely from a supply of crude oil. The Canadian oil fields are now falling off so rapidly that they are reduced almost to a minimum, and we are wholly dependent upon the United States for our crude oil supply.

Mr. BORDEN: It is not proposed to exercise this power by way of retaliation, nor except under very grave circumstances which would be supposed to affect the public interest. The legislation was not introduced in this general form at first. It arose out of the fact that certain new regulations were made by the Minister of the Interior in respect of prospecting for oil in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. In the course of the debate, the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) pointed out, what was absolutely true, that the reasons were of a general character, and that the resolution should be in a more general form. This legislation had its origin in the fact that the Minister of the Interior, in the regulations lately established for Alberta and Saskatchewan Dominion lands, inserted a provision of this kind with the full concurrence of persons who desired to invest large amounts of capital. But it was found that the powers conferred upon him by the Dominion Lands Act and other statutes did not go this far, and so we are obliged to come to Parliament in order to make effective the regulations already established by the Department of the Interior.

Mr. OLIVER: I appreciate everything that the Prime Minister has said, but of course he will admit that there is an Alberta point of view as well as an Imperial point of view, and in any further consideration he gives to this measure I would like him to recognize that so far as Alberta is concerned there is a condition of emergency at this moment—that we are on the eve of great expectations and are very timorous as to the possible non-realization of those expectations. I would urge that, unless the empire is going to go completely to smash for lack of oil within the year, the Prime Minister should hold his hand until we see whether or not we shall strike oil in Alberta.

Mr. BORDEN: We will let it stand for a third reading in the meantime.

Bill reported.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice) Bill No. 178, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

Mr. DOHERTY: The entire purpose of this Bill is to substitute the word 'Truro' for the word 'Halifax' as the location of the reformatory in Nova Scotia.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FALSE ADVERTISEMENTS.

On motion of Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice) Bill No. 149, to amend the Criminal Code, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

Mr. DOHERTY: The purpose of this Bill is to constitute false statements, knowingly made in advertisements, an offence where the statement is of a nature to enhance or misrepresent the price or value of any property of any description or any interest in it. The occasion which has led us to think it was desirable that this Bill should be submitted to the House for adoption is that there appears to have grown up a very widespread abuse in connection with the advertising of properties for sale. Of course, every one understands that persons advertising will make the very best of the things they have to sell, and we do not propose to restrict a man's good opinion of his own goods or his right to express it. But the Act proposes to make it a criminal offence for a man knowingly to make a false statement of a nature to deceive people as regards the value of the thing that he has to offer. I have had representations from all parts of the country, and I think more especially from the western provinces, that there was really a system of deception carried on in the advertising of properties for sale, such as townsites. A person under the law as it exists at present is of course liable for obtaining money under false pretences, and I would not undertake to say that if you can connect the actual obtaining of money with the false statements in an advertisement, you could not convict under that law. I would be disposed to think you could. The purpose here is to make it a criminal offence to publish as actually existing facts things that do not exist.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I suppose that would cover the case of a man who advertised his goods as all wool when they were not, or the case of a man who advertised his shoes as the best in the town when such was not the fact.

Mr. DOHERTY: I should think not. Whether his shoes are the best in the town is necessarily a matter of opinion, it is hardly a question of fact. People's opinions differ as to the respective qualities of goods. In the other case mentioned by my hon. friend if a man obtained money by saying that his goods were all wool when really they were not, I think he could be convicted under the law for obtaining money under false pretences.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend mentioned real estate. Every one knows that many people—perhaps I am one of them—buy property without seeing it. It is well known that many of my hon. friend's friends have invested in real estate in the West, having been induced to do so by the prospectuses or advertisements issued, or on the representations of the agents. Is it necessary to pass special legislation to protect people who will go blind into buying town lots in the far West without seeing them? Does not the minister think he is protecting a little too much those who ought to protect themselves? Is it not a fact that those who deal in real estate do so more for speculative purposes than for any other? A man will invest money in town lots in the West with the expectation of a rise in value. Does my hon. friend mean to say that this legislation is made to protect those who, for purely speculative purposes, invest their money in such real estate transactions with the hope of a rise in value in two, three, or four years, as the case may be? I want to be set right on this point, because I have several actions to take under this amendment.

Mr. DOHERTY: The object is not to protect people from going blind into real estate speculation, but to punish the liar who absolutely misstates the facts.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That would apply to a very large section of the community.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not saying that a very large proportion of the community do that; but if they do they ought to be punished.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does this amendment apply to selling anything whatever?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. The man we want to get at is the man who deliberately lies. If they have no fear of the Lord, we want to put into them a little terror of the law.

Mr. MARCIL: It would apply to patent medicines and things of that kind?

Mr. DOHERTY: It applies to deliberate misstatements of existing facts with regard to any goods.

Mr. MARCIL: I called the attention of the Government a week or so ago to a clear case of swindling in Montreal. A gold-mining company, incorporated by the Dominion Government, published advertisements in Montreal and Quebec about a gold-mining proposition. They held a guessing competition, offering to anybody who paid five cents, and sent in a proper solution of the guess contained in the advertisement, 100 shares in a gold-mining company in Quebec. The person who informed me of this told me on good authority that the first day after the publication of the advertisement 2,000 answers were received at the Montreal post office, the next day 3,000, the next day 4,000, and so on. Two or three weeks afterwards I saw the same advertisement in Quebec papers. This is a case of sheer swindling, such as some papers will not handle. A certain number of patent medicine proprietors would pay almost any price to a newspaper that would publish their advertisements. Would the case I have mentioned come under this Act?

Mr. DOHERTY: I should think it is a clear case of obtaining money by false pretenses, that is, if there is no gold mine in existence and the facts have been deliberately misstated. I am not certain that such a case would not come under the law as it exists at present; it verges very closely on a gambling transaction, but I could not pronounce definitely on that without looking into it. The new law we are proposing would certainly cover the case mentioned by the hon. gentleman if the advertisement contained any false statements as to existing facts.

Mr. MARCIL: The distribution of circulars would not be covered by this?

Mr. DOHERTY: I take it that the distribution of circulars is one method of advertising.

Mr. MARCIL: I would like to read for the benefit of the minister, who is a good French scholar, a copy of a circular sent to me by friends in Montreal to show to what use the Montreal post office is being put:

Firmness-Audacity. Success-Happiness.
French Scientific Bureau.

P.O. Box 169, Hochelaga, Montreal, Canada.
Audaces fortuna juvat.

Montreal, Canada.

Madam,—In going over our books we find that nine only out of the hundreds of people who had written to us, have deferred ordering our marvellous home treatment against self-consciousness, bashfulness and self-diffidence.

You are one of them, and as we have as yet no one in your locality or in that neighbourhood who has been in a position to experience the happy results ensured by our treatment, the Bureau has decided to let you have the benefit of our treatment at a loss, for the sole purpose of advertising it. We shall send you our twelve lessons in 'Auto-Suggestion' with fifty three of our tablets 'Anti-Gêno', the full treatment for one dollar ($1), under the express understanding that you will refrain from imparting this information to any one.

Now then, if you are a sufferer from the thousand inconveniences inflicted by shyness, if you find that you are beaten in the race by your neighbour, though she may not be more clever than yourself, if in love, as well as in business matters you do not attain that measure of success which your sterling qualities would seem to warrant, you alone will be to blame for it. As for us, we have done all that it was in the power of human beings to do.

Please accept our best compliments,

Bureau Scientifique Français.

P.S.—Please address all letters to P.O. Box 169, Hochelaga, Montreal, Canada. All correspondence is considered being strictly confidential.

Order Form.

Bureau Scientifique Français, P.O. Box 169, Hochelaga, Montreal, Canada.

Gentlemen,—You will find herewith $1 for your full home treatment against self-consciousness, bashfulness and self-diffidence (including twelve lessons in 'Auto-Suggestion' and fifty three tablet 'Anti-Gêno' as described in your pamphlet intituled 'The Road to Success'. I agree, moreover, to spread as much as I can a knowledge of your treatment among my friends and acquaintances, when cured.

. . . . . .

Name. . . . . .

. . . . . .

Address. . . . . .

I have reasons to believe that this circular has been distributed by thousands in the working centres of Montreal and as it is a pure case of swindling, I thought it my duty to call the attention of the Government and especially the Postmaster General to it. I would ask the Postmaster General to put an end to the use of the mails for this purpose. I hope that the Minister of Justice will see that the law is applied to a case of this kind. I would like to have an answer from the minister, because I believe that this swindle is going on very extensively in the city of Montreal.

Mr. DOHERTY: You cannot expect me to say offhand what provision of the Criminal Code already in existence is applicable to a case of that kind. I am disposed to think that if on the statement made money was obtained, under the law as it stands now there might be a conviction for obtaining money under false pretenses. In so far as this circular might be said to contain a statement of something as being a fact which is not a fact, I think it would come under this Act. I do not know that it is humanly possible to make legislation that will prevent people exaggerating the qualities of the goods which they offer to sell provided they keep within the limits of an expression of opinion and provided they do not undertake directly and knowingly to misrepresent the facts. I do not know that I could say very much more in regard to that circular. I shall be glad to call the attention of my hon. friend the Postmaster General to what the hon. member has said.

Mr. MARCIL: I thought it my duty to read this circular, because the gentleman who sent it to me takes a great interest in protecting the working classes and the innocent girls who are being swindled.

Mr. DOHERTY: We passed some legislation last session in regard to advertisements of certain medical preparations, and I am inclined to think that a careful examination of the document would show that it came within the provisions of that legislation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the provisions of this Bill apply to those who make false representations during political campaigns?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Not unless they sell their services.

Mr. LEMIEUX: During the election in Chateauguay—my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Sévigny) was there—a promise was made solemnly that a bridge would be built by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) from Caughnawaga to Lachine. As a result of that, of course, the hon. member for Chateauguay secured a large number of votes. I must say to the credit of the hon. Minister of Public Works that when the question was put the other day by my hon. friend from Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Lanctot), he said that he had never heard about it before. What would happen if this legislation should pass? Could we use it against the member for Chateauguay who made that promise?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am afraid there are several reasons obvious to my hon. friend why this could not be done.

Mr. GERMAN: I think the Bill of the Minister of Justice is quite right, but I think that one word should be added to it. It says, 'or any interest therein, containing any false statement.' The false statement is a statement in words. The greatest falsity, as far as my observation goes, has been not so much in words as in pictorial advertisements. We have had a considerable boom in real estate in the county and town of Welland and if there was any swindling, as to which I hope there was none, it was in advertising and picturing conditions that did not exist. There are many people in the section of country from which I come who were perhaps not swindled, but who invested money in lands in the Northwest, not by reason of the statements that were made, but by reason of pictorial advertisements. I think that if the section read, 'any false statement or representation,' it would meet the case. The word 'representation' would cover a photograph, for instance, showing a large number of factories, railway trains running in a certain locality, or street cars miles away from the centre of the town. If the hon. gentleman's Bill is to be effective, it should contain not only the words 'false statement,' but the word 'representation.'

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I had occasion to bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Justice, at the instance of the advertising clubs which have recently been formed in Edmonton and Calgary. These clubs represent the best newspaper men of western Canada, and they concluded that the use that had been made of their papers had had a very bad effect upon that western country. False statements had been made touching the value of real estate particularly, as the hon. member (Mr. (German) has just said, with the result that many people are suffering very great hardships by reason of investing small sums of money in real estate on highly coloured representations, pictorial and otherwise. The Bill that had been passed by several of the states of the American Union was sent to me, but it went further than we could go in this country by reason of the divided jurisdiction between the provincial legislatures and the federal Parliament. The Bill that has been prepared goes as far as it is possible to go, having regard to the fact that expressions of opinion should not in any event be called criminal.

Mr. EMMERSON: Is the newspaper held responsible?

Mr. BENNETT: This Bill aims only at persons who knowingly publish false statements.

Mr. MARCIL: Do you not think that a newspaper proprietor should use some judgment as to the propriety of the advertisements that are published in his paper?

Mr. BENNETT: It is a rather difficult thing to say that a respectable newspaper man should be held criminally responsible in relation to every advertisement that, in the ordinary course of business, is handed over the counter and paid for. This Bill says:

> Every person who knowingly publishes or causes to be published any advertisement for either directly or indirectly promoting the sale or disposal of any real or personal movable or immovable property, or any interest therein, containing any false statement——is liable. I think that will meet the difficulty we have experienced in the West. It gives me much pleasure to say that this Bill has been promoted by the gentlemen who have charge of advertising matters in western Canada—not by any person interested otherwise, but by the press itself. I think the suggestion made by my hon. friend from Welland is a most admirable one, and if the Code, as it now stands, does not cover the point, it should be embodied in the Bill. I am not sure, speaking offhand, whether a pictorial representation would be regarded by the judge as an advertisement. The crux of the offence now constituted is misrepresentation as to real or personal or movable or immovable property by way of advertisement. I think that a picture would be regarded as a part of the advertisement. That view does not quite agree with what the hon. member for Welland has said, but in any event I think we should make provision to meet that case. What he says is certainly true in western Canada. I have seen advertisements sent down to eastern papers containing representations of new towns in which great industrial activity is shown, when, in fact, there was not a single smokestack there.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would be quite willing to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Welland. I have no doubt that a representation made by a picture should be treated in the same way as an actual statement in words, and even if it be possible that some other disposition might protect us in that regard, there can be no harm in inserting it here. I understand that the suggestion is that the section should be amended by inserting the words 'or representation' after the word 'statement.'

Mr. GERMAN: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not anxious that newspapers publishing advertisements should be relieved from any fair measure of responsibility, and I understand that the word 'knowingly' is introduced for their protection, but will the minister give some idea to the committee as to how far that word carries protection? A newspaper is an organization for the publication of news, and for giving business publicity, and the individuals who constitute a newspaper organization may have personal knowledge of the falsity of statements contained in an advertisement. How far would that knowledge of the falsity of the advertisement, on the part of one of the men connected with the newspaper, render the newspaper itself liable?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand the hon. gentleman has in mind some company or organization that publishes a newspaper?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think an enactment of this kind is intended to reach a corporate body, but I do think that any individual participating in the publication, with knowledge that a statement was false, would be liable under this article.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Does not the word 'corporation' include any person, under the Criminal Code.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not prepared to say offhand. If you want to get a corporation convicted for knowingly doing a thing, you must prove that the corporation, in its corporate capacity, knew it. We are dealing with a very special case. The purpose of this law is to get at a person who knowingly publishes a false advertisement, and I do not believe it would be found in the working out, that the newspaper would be so much brought under this provision as the person who advertised. What it says is: Any one who publishes or causes to be published any advertisement. There is a sense in which a newspaper publishes an advertisement, and if you could get any individual who participated in the publication, with knowledge of its falsity, I think he would be liable under the section, and I think he ought to be. If you could charge the corporation with knowledge as a corporation, and prove it, I do not know that you could not get at the corporation.

Mr. OLIVER: It is not directed primarily against newspapers; it is not intended to place restrictions on newspapers.

Mr. KNOWLES: Under this a man is liable before he has had any results from his false advertisement. I think this is very dangerous legislation, and for the reason that there are a great many such clauses in the Criminal Code which are used by speculators and by people who rue their bargains. In my own practice I have defended quite a number of people who have been accused when the purchaser has rued his bargain and is not ready to stand by his speculation. In such cases, the purchaser endeavours to have the vendor restore the money by threatening criminal proceedings, and eventually in some cases criminal proceedings are taken. I went this year to British Columbia to defend a citizen of my own town who was arrested, though innocent, as innocent as could be, on a charge of obtaining money under false pretenses. It is next to impossible to succeed afterwards in an action for malicious prosecution. When you come to take action against a person for malicious prosecution you are met with such hazy conditions that it is impossible to drive your case home. I do not know if my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett) happens to have had that experience in his very much larger legal practice, but I sincerely believe it is dangerous legislation and liable to be misused by persons who have had the bad end of a deal. There is always a remedy under the civil law if a man makes a false statement, but irresponsible people will grasp at a provision like this to have a person arrested and perhaps committed for trial, when there is not the slightest foundation for the charge. Grave injury is often done.

Mr. DOHERTY: My hon. friend is suggesting a case where a bargain has been effectively carried out. If there has been a bargain effectively carried out and one of the parties contends that he was led into the bargain and induced to part with his goods or his money by false representation, he may to-day prosecute before the criminal courts. What we are doing here is merely making it an offence for a man to publicly and deliberately lie, and scatter his lies broadcast in an endeavour to inveigle people into investing in worthless things, whether he succeeds or does not succeed: The evil that is sought to be stopped is an evil which in its effects reaches a large number of small investors, none of whom will be sufficiently interested, even if he has the means, to bring criminal prosecution, if you leave the law in a condition where the transaction must have been actually carried out before there is any criminal responsibility. What we want to try to do, if it can be done, is to suppress the lying advertisement without regard to whether the liar succeeds in getting something or not.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: With what my hon. friend from Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) has said, I desire to associate myself, because his experience is a common experience in legal practice. But the hon. gentleman has, I think, overlooked one line in the section which says that the advertisement 'must be of a character likely to, or is intended to enhance the price and value of such property or any interest therein.'

The mere false representation is not sufficient; it must be of a character likely or intended to enhance the value of the property. That, it seems to me, puts it into the hands of a judge, in the case of any prosecutions under this section to determine that there has been a misrepresentation which in fact has enhanced the value of the property or is likely to enhance it. That is the essence of the offence—not a false representation or a false pretense, but a statement of something which is intended or likely to enhance the value of the property.

Mr. MARCIL: The hon. member for Calgary has referred to a newspaper club in the West. I might say that the rural parts of eastern Quebec, last year or the year before, were overrun by agents offering town sites and lots of all kinds in Regina, Calgary, Edmonton and Saskatchewan. Each one made representations that the town in which he was interested was the great town of the future, and so on. In my own riding to my certain knowledge, these agents drew considerable money from the people through these representations, without any further guarantee. I suppose those who have invested in those lots have had no returns so far

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, they will have to pay the taxes.

Mr. MARCIL. The minister has said that these are the smaller investors. He can not expect them to take a trip to the West to lay a complaint, and therefore those people who have been swindled out of their money have no recourse.

Mr. KNOWLES: Practically all the misrepresentations made to these eastern people have been made by eastern agents.

Mr. MARCIL: They are western syndicates.

Mr. KNOWLES: It happens that it is our land about which they are talking; but the liars are, generally speaking, eastern liars.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Bill does not endeavour to locate the liars.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would like to bring to the notice of the minister one thing in regard to this amendment. If this action is to be made a crime, then the minister is creating a new crime. It might possibly be a crime at common law, but it is now by this Bill to be crystallized into a crime under the Code. It is the same kind of a crime as obtaining goods under false pretenses. The minister, I think, stated that it might even be covered by the section of the Code dealing with that. My memory of the section is that the punishment meted out or the manner of procedure in regard to obtaining goods under false pretenses is not the same as is provided here. I would suggest to the minister that, if he is making this a crime, the mode of punishment should be exactly the same as for obtaining goods under false pretenses. If this is to be a crime at all, it is a very serious one. The court should be the same and the procedure also should be the same. This Bill, as it stands, is placing too much responsibility upon a mere magistrate's court, because summary proceedings are provided. A crime of such a serious character should be dealt with by a Superior Court; at least, a man coming under this provision should be allowed to go before a superior court if he desires to do so.

Mr. DOHERTY: What I said in comparing the two offences was that, I thought, as we had now a very well defined doctrine as to what was a false pretense in the case of obtaining goods under false pretenses, that doctrine would find its natural application in the determination of what is a false statement or representation under this Bill. The difference between the two things, it seems to me, is this, that the obtaining of goods by false pretenses deals with an offence that is consummated and carried to its ultimate conclusion, and whereby somebody is actually fradulently deprived of goods or money, whereas, here we are limiting ourselves to the attempt to do that. A man is to be punished here for his advertisement, even though he never makes a dollar out of it. As I think I said before, I am not quite clear that, if to-day an advertisement could be traced as being the direct and immediate cause or the means whereby the person advertising obtained property from another individual, and if the statement upon which he obtained the property could be proven to be false, he could not be prosecuted under the law as it now stands. I am inclined to believe that he could. The purpose of this Bill is to make the false advertising, in itself and by itself, without regard to its successful or unsuccessful results, an offence. Therefore I think we may fairly differentiate between what after all is an attempt fraudulently to obtain from somebody goods or money and what is an actual accomplished obtaining of somebody's goods or money.

Mr. McKAY: I am in favour of what the hon. minister says with regard to this section creating an offence, but I am afraid that the method of procedure to enforce the penalty, if adopted, is rather dangerous legislation. Following out what the hon. member from Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) has just stated, namely, that a person who may feel that he has got the worst end of the bargain may take advantage of this section, I notice that it says that the man 'shall be liable upon summary conviction.' If we bear in mind what the procedure with regard to summary convictions is, we see how it adds to the opportunity for getting even with a person who may feel that he has been wronged. In my province—and the same thing holds good in the other provinces, according to my recollection—the procedure is this: If a magistrate has made a conviction and we think the conviction should not stand, the method of appeal is that the informant as well as the convicting magistrate has to be served with a notice of appeal within ten days. It may be that some person from one of the adjoining provinces is the informant. He comes West, lays an information, and, as soon as he gets a conviction, goes back East. If the person desiring to appeal cannot locate him, he cannot serve him within the ten days; consequently he loses his right to appeal; the conviction stands against him, and he goes to jail. It is true, he has a remedy by way of certiorari, but frequently it is very difficult to get a conviction set aside.

Mr. McKENZIE: He is limited by the regulations.

Mr. McKAY: Yes, he cannot go into the merits by way of certiorari; and, by the mere technicality of not being able to find the informant and serve him within the time fixed by the code, he loses his remedy.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Service on an agent will do.

Mr. McKAY: The statute says personal service upon the informant as well as upon the magistrate.

Mr. BENNETT: Service on the agent.

Mr. McKAY: I think the statute does not say that service on the agent is sufficient—speaking from memory. If the statute says there shall be service on the informant, I think it would be well for the minister to consider that portion of the procedure and whether he could not be proceeded against in the usual way by summary or speedy trial, going before the county or district court.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The object is to make it as simple as possible.

Mr. McKAY: But there is danger of simplifying to the extent of causing a man to lose his right to appeal. In my limited practice I have had a case of that kind. The man was certainly innocent, yet the only remedy he had was by way of certiorari.

Mr. DOHERTY: If I correctly grasp the objection of the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. McKay), that objection would be met if we made some amendment of general application with regard to the delay within which the notice of appeal must be served. With regard to the objection of the hon. member for Cape Breton, there is no doubt it is somewhat difficult to lay down any principle by which you shall determine what shall be an indictable offence and what shall be an offence punishable upon summary conviction. If we went through the code to-day, I do not think the method in which the distinction is made would indicate any principle. As is said by the hon. member for Calgary, the desire is to simplify the procedure, not to make this a heinous offence with extremely severe penalty, but to make it a matter of prosecution before a Criminal Court and provide what is a relatively mild punishment, enforcable in a proper, and we hope, effectual way.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: It is as a deterrent.

Mr. DOHERTY: As the hon. member suggests, I think that what most of us look to in this measure is its deterrent effect—bringing it home to people that they must not recklessly say anything and everything in an advertisement, but that in their statements of fact they must keep within the limits of the truth—that they must not, in their desire to laud their goods or property, overstep the limits in statements of fact. Of course, there would be a wide field left of exaggeration of their appreciation of the value or advantages of the goods or property they have to offer.

Mr. CARVELL: Once you admit the principle of the amendment I do not see very much objection in the manner of working it out; for the penalty is not very great. I do not see why you cannot trust the ordinary police magistrate—and most cases of this kind will come before police magistrates—to settle the question whether misrepresentation was made as well as a jury. I would as soon have the decision of an ordinary police magistrate as that of a jury in such a matter. As to the objections of the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. McKay), that difficulty will be thrown in the way of appeals, I think the policy should be to discourage appeals. The object, as the minister says, is to provide a deterrent of false statement. I think the Bill is nearly all right.

Mr. KNOWLES: I desire to ask a question. It is a very common thing to advertise a fire sale which is not a fire sale at all but is merely so-called in order to draw the crowd.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Not without some fire.

Mr. KNOWLES: No fire whatever—simply open up a store, put in a brand new stock of goods, and advertise a 'fire sale.'

Mr. SEXSMITH: That is among western people, not eastern people.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is not a compliment to the morals of eastern people; if they do not do it, it is only because they are slow. But is anybody hurt by such a thing? The people go there and get better goods than if there had been a fire. Yet, the seller has made a false statement to 'promote a sale,' which is forbidden under the Bill. It is not to 'enhance value' but to 'promote a sale.' But though he is not doing any harm, he would be in violation of this proposed law.

Mr. DOHERTY: Is there any section of the people who would rather have goods that have been through a fire?

Mr. KNOWLES: They think they get better bargains, and so go to the store. The sale is promoted in that way.

Mr. DOHERTY: I had not conceived of the existence of such a thing.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: You do not want to put a premium upon lying.

At six o'clock the House resumed and then took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

WESTERN DOMINION RAILWAY.

The House in committee on Bill No. 165, respecting the Western Dominion Railway Company and the Alberta Pacific Railway Company, Mr. Blondin in the chair.

Mr. WARNOCK: At the last meeting of the Railway Committee I gave notice that I would ask for information in regard to the financing of this road, and also whether Mr. Edward Bath, of London, England, and Mr. Wm. Peter, of New York, were co-operating in financing the road.

Hon. J. D. REID (Acting Minister of Railways): A telegram was shown me today stating that the contract has been signed and that arrangements have been made for the financing of the road in England. If I remember rightly, Mr. Bath has no connection with the road. The other gentleman has.

Mr. WARNOCK: It has been reported that Mr. Bath was associated with Mr. Peter, the original promoter. As far as the minister knows, Mr. Bath is not associated.

Mr. REID: As far as I know, Mr. Bath is not associated.

Mr. WARNOCK: Has the minister any information as to when they are likely to commence construction?

Mr. REID: No, I have not.

Mr. WARNOCK: Last year it was announced on two or three occasions that the tenders had been let, but what I understood from the statement of the company's agent the other day in the committee was that they were prepared to ask for tenders, but the tenders had not been let. Last year the facts were misrepresented.

Mr. REID: I would think there was every likelihood of their starting almost immediately, because they have arrangements made for the financing of the road, and, having a subsidy which lapses next August, it is altogether likely they will proceed at once in order to be able to hold the subsidy.

Mr. WARNOCK: We have been told so often that financial arrangements have been made. I was asked to oppose the granting of an extension of the charter by a number of settlers located along the proposed road between Calgary and the international boundary; but I am not opposed to the road, we want the road and now that they have been given a year's extension of time I sincerely hope that they will proceed to construct.

Mr. REID: That information was given to me and I shall urge that they proceed with the work at once. A telegram having been shown me to-day I shall communicate immediately with them and ask them to carry out the promise they have made in their telegram. Perhaps that will have a little effect in inducing them to proceed.

Mr. OLIVER: For what length of road was it said the finances had been arranged for, and what section of the road is it proposed to build?

Mr. REID: The telegram did not go into details; it just said: 'have made financial arrangements for the building of the road.'

Mr. WARNOCK: I think they are bound to commence on the first hundred miles south. That is what the subsidy was given for last year.

Mr. REID: They will commence where the subsidy is given, there is no doubt about that.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

THE W. C. EDWARDS COMPANY.

The House in Committee on Bill No. 132, respecting W. C. Edwards and Company, Limited.—Mr. Fripp. Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

Mr. BOYS: In the absence of the Chairman of the Private Bills Committee and at his request I have been asked to explain the situation of this Bill. When it was before the Private Bills Committee, there was a very considerable discussion. Mr. Pope, secretary of the Hydro-Electric Commission, was there and also the Mayor of Ottawa, Senator Edwards and his solicitor. After a considerable amount of discussion certain amendments were agreed to, and it was finally left to the chairman to put the amendments in shape with the parties interested. But it appears after further consideration, that what was intended by the committee has not been accomplished by the amendment. In so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, the Bill is now made subject to all provincial laws and municipal regulations existing and it was intended that the company should also be made subject to laws existing in other provinces. But it has been found that there are no such laws in some of the other provinces. In submitting that amendment, first the provisions of paragraph 5a were amended and this language was struck out 'and subject to the provisions of section 247 of the Railway Act.' Under that section it is necessary to secure the consent of the municipal council by by-law. That feature has entirely been wiped out in the belief, as the committee had thought, that the language that was inserted, namely, that the exercise of the right should be subject to provincial authority and municipal regulations, would meet the case. But I understand there are no such regulations in some of the provinces. For that reason the company now can go upon the highways of any municipality in any province, except Ontario, and without even the consent of the municipal council, to say nothing of a vote of the people, string a line of poles and distribute electric current for light, heat and power. The promoters of the Bill made no objection to its being referred back to the committee for further consideration, and I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Fisher, that the committee rise and report progress. I understand that later on I will have an opportunity of moving that the Bill be referred back to the committee for further consideration.

Mr. DEVLIN: Have those who appeared for the W. C. Edwards Company before the Private Bills Committee had notice of the intention of my hon. friend and are they agreeable to it?

Mr. BOYS: I am informed by the clerk of the Private Bills Committee that Mr. Green, the solicitor who appeared before the committee, is quite satisfied that this course should be taken.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the purpose of this Bill? I am surprised to hear about stringing wires.

Mr. BOYS: The purpose of the Bill is this: The W. C. Edwards Company, who were incorporated in 1892, principally as a lumber company, desire to distribute electricity for light and power, and the committee thought that, this power being foreign to the original purpose of the company, should be governed by the existing provisions in letters patent in which, I understand there is a standard clause which brings all companies getting letters patent within provincial laws and municipal regulations. That is the difficulty and therefore it is necessary to send this Bill back to the committee in order that the matter may be put right.

Mr. DEVLIN: I was present at the committee when this Bill was before it for consideration. As I understand, any objection that was brought to this Bill was brought by the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario. The W. C. Edwards Company tried, as far as they were able, to agree to the terms and conditions imposed by the Hydro-Electric Commission. It is a good commission, I have no doubt. I know very little about the commission except what has been explained, but I do think that in matters of industry, where companies come before this Parliament for charters, this Parliament ought to have the right to give a charter without having to submit to provincial laws. I would like to place myself on record on this matter. I do not want to make any objection to the motion of my hon. friend, but I do not think this Parliament ought to be altogether subject to the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario. It is a very bad precedent.

Mr. BURNHAM: As one who took a certain amount of active interest in this matter when it was before the committee, let me say that the question is of the utmost importance to the province of Ontario, for which, however, I do not pretend to speak. But I do speak for the electoral district from which I come. That fact was recognized. The Hydro-Electric Commission were communicated with, and they appeared on the scene at once and maintained stoutly their objection to the general character of the legislation. If there is any likelihood of this Parliament enacting legislation which will conflict seriously with the interests of the people of the province of Ontario, certainly that likelihood ought to be removed if possible. It is a very serious thing for Ontario, and especially for the district from which I come. We are very anxious to safeguard the public interests. They all come to the surface in this Bill. The objections to the Bill that were urged by the Hydro-Electric Commission were finally admitted and the suggested amendments agreed to by the Edwards Company, but, notwithstanding that, it more or less leaves the question open. As to what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Devlin) says, I do not know how far this matter may be settled. There is a question of interprovincial relations; there are legal relations existing between the provinces and the Dominion, but I can say that something ought to be done, if there is any possibility of a risk being run in this particular by which the Dominion regulations, as embodied in statutes, may conflict with the public interests of the people of Ontario.

Mr. BOYS: Just one word in reply to my hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin).

Mr. DEVLIN: I am not objecting.

Mr. BOYS: I do not think that the hon. gentleman understands the situation as it exists at the present time. In view of the conditions in the province of Quebec, this company would not even have to get a by-law through a local municipal council, and I am sure that my hon. friend does not want any such condition of affairs. The proviso in paragraph 5a has been entirely struck out, and the Bill now reads:

> Provided that nothing in this subsection shall authorize the company to construct or operate any lines for the purpose of distributing electricity for lighting, heating or motor purposes, or disposing of surplus power generated by the company's works and not required for the undertaking of the company, upon, along or across any highway or public place, without first obtaining the consent expressed by by-law of the municipality having jurisdiction over such highway or public place.

I am sure my hon. friend does not want to give this, or any other company, power in Quebec or elsewhere to use the highways of any municipality without first getting the consent of the local council. It was thought that the introduction of the words contained in the standard clause, put in letters patent, would protect not only Ontario but other provinces; but owing to a want of similar regulations and statutory authority in other provinces, it is found that they are not protected, and it is merely to protect them that I am asking for the Bill to be sent back to the committee for further consideration.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it usual to grant powers to an industrial company without reference to where the company is going to operate? I have always been under the impression that the field of activity was mentioned in the incorporation of any company of this character. If the activities of this company are confined to Ontario and Quebec, the question of the protection of the rights of municipalities in other provinces does not arise; but certainly if its field of operation is throughout the Dominion, it is in every way desirable that the municipal rights existing in other provinces should be protected, and where they do not exist—and they do not exist in many parts of the western provinces—the powers of the provincial authorities should certainly be safeguarded.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Boys, Bill No. 132, respecting W. C. Edwards & Company, Limited, was discharged from the Order Paper and referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills for further consideration.

TORONTO, NIAGARA AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 59, respecting the Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Currie. Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

On section 3—limitation:

Mr. CARROLL: An amendment was moved to this by the Chairman of the Railway Committee, and it was held over until the member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) could be here. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) is opposing this Bill, but as he is unable to be here to-night, I would like the Bill to stand over.

Mr. MACDONELL: Although I am not authorized to speak for the hon. member for South Wellington, I may say that he told me on two occasions, on Tuesday and again to-day, that he had no desire to participate further in the discussion.

Mr. CARROLL: He did not speak to me to-day about it. There is a very important principle involved in the Bill, and this being Friday night and not more than one-third of the members of the committee being present, I think the Bill should stand over. If there were not an important principle involved the Chairman of the Railway Committee would not have moved the amendment he did.

Mr. MACDONELL: This Bill was three times before the Railway Committee and twice before the Standing Orders Committee, and no Bill this session has received so much discussion and consideration as it has. The Bill passed the Railway Committee by a vote of twenty-five to fourteen, and not later than this evening the promoter of the Bill told me he was quite satisfied to take the Bill with the amendments.

Mr. CARROLL: The fact that the promoters of this Bill assent to its going through as amended does not mean that it is good legislation. I am not pressing that the Bill should stand, but I think it is worthy of further consideration.

Mr. NESBITT: I was one of the twenty-five who voted for the Bill in committee, but I had not then seen clause 7 which says that the railway shall cross only above or below a highway and that in case of dispute between the engineers of the railway and the city, the matter shall be referred to the Railway Board. This clause restricts the Board of Railway Commissioners to putting the railway either over or under the highway, and they have no room to use their judgment.

Mr. CURRIE: The Railway Board has already given a ruling that the railway must go over the highway.

Mr. NESBITT: I was not addressing myself to the hon. member, who we all know knows more than the Railway Board; I was drawing the attention of the hon. member for South Toronto to the fact that the Board of Railway Commissioners are confined to ordering the railway to go over or to go under the highway, while in my opinion the matter should be left to their judgment without restriction.

Mr. MACDONELL: My hon. friend is right in his appreciation of what the Bill means, and that point was discussed ad nauseam in the Railway Committee. The object is that level crossings shall be put an end to in Toronto. The city is now contributing over four million dollars to aid the railways in elevating or depressing their tracks, and when the work now undertaken in Toronto is completed there will be no such thing as a level crossing in that city. The cost to the city, to the railways, and to the Toronto Terminals Company, when the works are completed, will aggregate between twelve million and fifteen million dollars.

Mr. NESBITT: Would any of that money be applied in connection with this railway if it came into the city?

Mr. MACDONELL: I do not think it would but I cannot say offhand. The idea is that there shall be no level crossings in the congested area of the city of Toronto. This line passes over twenty-four streets in the two and a half miles it has already acquired as right-of-way. The intention is that this railway will be compelled to go over or under the highways. If the engineers of the city and of the railway company cannot agree as to the method of crossing, then the Railway Board is to settle how the railway shall go over or under.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) is always fair and reasonable, and I wish to call his attention to that point.

Mr. MACDONELL: The best testimony I can give as to this proposal being fair and reasonable is that the railway company have accepted it.

Mr. OLIVER: We agreed to take up this Bill on the understanding that it was not contentious, and it has been found to be contentious, and as it will interfere with passing the other Bills on the Order Paper, I think my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonell) should postpone the consideration of it until Monday.

Mr. MACDONELL: I thought the discussion on the Bill was pretty well finished.

Mr. CARROLL: As I understand it, the Railway Board has already made an order with regard to the entrance of this road into the city of Toronto.

Mr. MACDONELL: They have made an order for the first two and a half miles of this road after it enters the city of Toronto, but that is only half the distance it will travel through the city. It enters at the extreme west, some five miles from the centre of the city, and they have acquired a right-of-way and have had their plans approved by the Railway Board for two and a half miles. That was in 1909 and they have not done anything since. They will doubtless ask for further approval of plans, and, it is only asked that this company be put upon the same basis as all the other railways which have been granted charters to come into the city of Toronto in recent years.

Mr. CARROLL: I understand that it is one of the functions of the Railway Commission to deal with crossings of all kinds. On January 28, 1910, in reference to this very railroad, the Board of Railway Commissioners made the following order:

> That if the tracks of the Canadian Pacific railway are at any time elevated, then the tracks of the applicant shall be likewise elevated along the course of the line where the rights of way lie adjacent to each other, upon such terms as the board may direct; protection to be approved at such crossings as the engineer of the board may require before the road is open for traffic, and if protection is recommended at a crossing any other road is interested in, then the proportion of the cost of such protection is reserved.

Section 7 of the Bill says:

> The railway of the company may be constructed across any such highway, or along any easement acquired for public works in the said city, but only above or below such highway or easement.

The order of the Board of Railway Commissioners distinctly says that, where the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have been compelled to elevate their road in the city of Toronto, this road must do likewise.

Mr. BRISTOL: Is the hon. member aware that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have now been compelled to raise their tracks in the place of which the hon. member is speaking?

Mr. CARROLL: The Board of Railway Commissioners have not seen fit up to the present time to compel the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to do that.

Mr. BRISTOL: I think my hon. friend is misinformed. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company are elevating their tracks.

Mr. CARROLL: If they are, this railway will be compelled to elevate their tracks, so far as they are running along the Canadian Pacific railway. The order goes further and says:

> That protection is to be provided at such crossings as the chief engineer of the board may direct.

Is it not more proper to have as the judge the chief engineer of the Board of Railway Commissioners, who, I presume, would be an unbiased judge, rather than the engineer of the city of Toronto, who would have a personal interest and prejudice in the matter? If we are going to bring in legislation which will virtually be an appeal from decisions of the Board of Railway Commissioners and render void an order of that board, I am inclined to think that the board will be worthless. The city of Toronto cannot be more impartially looked after than under the order made by the Board of Railway Commissioners on the 28th of January, 1910. The board are very specific. They say that wherever they have compelled the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to elevate their tracks, this road shall do likewise. They say that, where there is more protection asked for at a crossing, the chief engineer of the Board of Railway Commissioners shall be the judge as to whether that protection is necessary or not. I think we are going a long way to render worthless that order. In this case I am looking at the principle involved. I understand that the railway company is willing that section 7 should stand, but that does not do away with my opposition to the section, because there should be some clear, well-defined distinction as to when we should interfere with the decisions of the Board of Railway Commissioners. I think that is something which hon. members should consider before they adopt section 7.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the hon. member allow the Bill to stand and let us go on with the others?

Mr. MACDONELL: I would like to get the Bill through; but as it is requested that the Bill be allowed to stand, I will certainly agree to that.

THE PRUDENTIAL LIFE OF CANADA.

The House in Committee on Bill 150, to incorporate the Prudential Life of Canada.—Mr. Nickle. Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

On section 1—incorporation:

Mr. OLIVER: What is the purpose of this Bill? Is it a new incorporation or an amending incorporation?

Mr. NICKLE: The object of the Bill is to give Dominion incorporation to a company hitherto incorporated in the province of Manitoba.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—continuance of officers and by-laws:

Mr. GUTHRIE: From statements made when this Bill was before the committee, and more particularly from statements made by the promoter of the Bill, who said that he would take no responsibility whatever for the financial standing of the company, also from statements appearing in insurance reports in Manitoba, I think the Minister of Finance should look into the affairs of this company rather carefully before any license is issued, because the statements made and the figures given show that this company is as near dissolution and financial disaster as any company can well be. I have received one or two letters on the subject.

Mr. NICKLE: I have no knowledge as an accountant that would enable me to express an opinion that would carry any weight; but when I took charge of the Bill I asked that some evidence be produced to me to show that this company was solvent. Those interested gave me a telegram from Mr. Miles M. Dawson, an actuary of the American Government, who was employed by the Armstrong Commission when they made their inquiry and also by the Canadian Government Commission. That telegram reads as follows:

> I strongly recommend Dominion charter. Your company has ample resources to provide for all liabilities and a handsome surplus. It has secured a good volume of business with exceptionally low mortality and remunerative premiums, which are now sufficient to assure its success under a continuation of prudent and enterprising management.

I would deem it a favour if, before a Dominion license is granted to this company, the Finance Department would conduct the most rigorous examination. I think it only fair to the committee that I should explain that I have no knowledge of its finances except assurances from those in authority and from this actuary that the condition of the company is solvent.

Mr. W. T. WHITE: I think the request of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) is only reasonable in view of statements which were made before the Committee on Banking and Commerce when the Bill was under consideration. I have no knowledge whatever as to the standing of the company, because it has not hitherto had Dominion incorporation. It is a Manitoba company. The matter to which my hon. friend from South Wellington has referred was discussed at some length in the committee, and I there made a statement as to the course which would be pursued by the Finance Department before a license would be issued to this company. I think it only fair to say that nothing was proved, at least in my judgment, against the company before the committee. There were assertions and counter assertions but the committee had not the evidence before it of experts on which alone it could reach any conclusion as to the financial condition of the company. Prima facie, therefore, we are entitled to assume that the company's standing is satisfactory. But in view of the charges which have been made yesterday morning, I directed a letter to the superintendent of insurance which I shall now ask to be allowed to place on 'Hansard' because it bears directly upon the inquiry of the hon. member from South Wellington as to what steps the Finance Department would take, before a license was granted to this company. I did not understand the hon. member to make any specific charges with regard to the financial responsibility of the company, but to say that from information which came before him it would appear to be not overly strong. Yesterday I directed this letter to the superintendent of insurance:

Ottawa, May 7, 1914.

W. Fitzgerald, Esq.,
Superintendent of Insurance,
Ottawa.
Prudential Life of Canada.

Dear Sir,—The Bill respecting this company was passed by the Banking and Commerce Committee this morning. As you are aware certain allegations have been made to the committee calling in question the financial standing of the company whose assets and business are to be acquired by the new company, the Prudential Life of Canada. As minister I was asked to state what would be the requirements of the Insurance Department before a license would be granted to the company and I made the following reply as to the action which would be taken by the Insurance Department:

Re Prudential Life of Canada.

'If this company is incorporated by the Dominion Parliament it will have two years within which to get its license from this department. Before granting such a license the department will visit the head office of the company and make a thorough and complete examination of its affairs. It will make a complete actuarial valuation of all its liabilities, examine its assets, and satisfy itself that its assets exceed its liabilities, other than capital stock, of every kind, by at least $100,000, that is, that it shall show a wholly unimpaired capital of at least $100,000.

'From the assets above mentioned there will be excluded all shareholders' notes for capital or premium on capital as well as all capital or premium unpaid or in course of collection and any agents' balances and outstanding premiums believed by the department to be doubtful or bad. Such assets as these are not allowed according to the standard of this department.

'We will also require that a deposit of $50,000 in Government or municipal securities or other securities acceptable to the Treasury Board be made with the minister, and all the other requirements of the Insurance Act and of its Act of incorporation complied with.'

Please see that before a license is issued to the new company the requirements mentioned are strictly complied with, and in this connection, as the matter has been made the subject of public discussion, I would suggest the advisability of associating with your own officers an outside actuary of reputation and standing in his profession. Please inform the member or members of your staff who may have to make the examination referred to of this instruction on my part so that it may by no chance be overlooked during either your or my absence on vacation or otherwise.

Yours truly,
(Signed) W. T. White.

I think it is only fair to this company to say, as I stated before, that in my judgment nothing was established against them before the committee. The committee, of course, were not in a position to pass upon the financial strength of the company. They could only do that with the assistance of experts. I think that the matter is now in such shape that any one who has to deal with the company will be entitled to rely on the Insurance Department having seen that the terms of that letter are strictly complied with before a license is issued. With reference to one sentence in the letter, I think it entirely unnecessary that any expert assistance should be secured by the Insurance Department, because I have the greatest confidence in the staff of that department; but as the matter has been made the subject of so much discussion before the committee, I thought it would place it beyond all doubt if the course which I recommend were adopted.

9 p.m.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. NESBITT: I am very pleased, because, while I supported the Bill in the committee, I moved an amendment that they should have $100,000 over all liabilities. That amendment was voted down in the committee for certain reasons, and I therefore congratulate the minister on the precaution he has taken, and I am quite satisfied that he will act in the interests of the people.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not think that the House ought to depend altogether on a letter written by the Finance Minister to his department. That strikes me as a purely internal matter between the minister and his officers, with which we have nothing to do. We have responsibilities of our own to discharge, and the question in my mind was in regard to the construction of clause 10 of this Bill. In clause 10 it is provided that a new company shall not commence business until at least $100,000 has been paid up on its capital stock.

TORONTO TERMINALS RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. MACDONELL: With the permission of the House, and if it is not too late, I would like to mention the last order on the list of private Bills, Bill No. 172, respecting the Toronto Terminals Railway Company.

Mr. SPEAKER: The time for the consideration of private Bills has expired.

FALSE ADVERTISEMENTS.

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 179, to amend the Criminal Code.—Mr. Doherty. Mr. Blondin in the chair.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would suggest to the hon. minister that the offence referred to in section 404 is so closely allied to that provided for under this Bill that there should be no difference in the procedure and punishment.

Mr. CURRIE: Carried.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. gentleman may know something about making nails, but I should think he should leave the making of laws to those who know something about that profession. Section 405 of the Code provides for the procedure and punishment in the case of an offence defined in section 404. Under the new law there should be the same procedure and the same punishment.

Mr. DOHERTY: I pointed out before six o'clock the difference that I see between the two offences. Section 405 provides for the offence of obtaining goods by false pretenses. Section 404 merely defines what is a false pretense. The offence provided for in section 405 is committed when a person does by false pretense obtain money, goods or other valuable consideration. The offence that I am now dealing with goes no further than the attempt to do this. The offence which this Bill provides for is committed when a person falsely advertises with the view of promoting the sale or disposal of property. So, under this Bill a man may be guilty even though he does not succeed in gaining any advantage whatever. It seems to me that the difference between the offence provided for in this Bill and the offence under section 405 of the Code is clear. In one case a man must actually obtain something, he must get a benefit from his false representation. But in the case provided for in the Bill a man is guilty even though he may never succeed in gaining anything at all.

Mr. BURNHAM: Would the hon. minister mind my asking him if it is not the fact that the Criminal Code and the quasi criminal statutes deal with the details of the moral law? That is to say, would it not be practicable and advisable to lay down in a general way a statutory enactment endorsing the moral law which we all understand, or are supposed to understand, and enacting that one guilty of the infraction of the moral law shall be liable to a penalty, say of imprisonment for not less than ten days and not more than six months? This being provided for the magistrate or other judicial officer before whom the offender is brought may say: I can find nothing in the Code to apply to your case, but you have perpetrated a fraud or infringement of the moral law, and therefore I send you down for ten days. Carrying out that idea in detail, the crimes may be classed as of grade 1, 2, 3 or 4, and suitable penalties provided for each class just as in the Criminal Code, but, strange to say, though in this age we are getting down to first principles, even to defining primal matter, we have not yet got down to the necessity of enunciating first principles of law, at least so far as I am aware. The national law, the international law, the municipal law, and so on, all specify certain things. The criminal law in the same way specifies certain things, but I repeat that no penalty except what is laid down in the Scriptures is provided for an infraction of the moral law. I would ask the minister, therefore, whether he does not consider it possible and advisable to lay down a sort of open penalty which may be made use of when such a case arises for which there is no specified punishment. Many cases, we know, arise for which no punishment is prescribed. Men learned in the law will scratch their heads in vain, and turn up tomes and statutes galore looking for some remedy which they cannot find, all because the general principle itself has not been laid down, and a penalty provided in case of its infraction.

Mr. DOHERTY: The suggestion of the hon. member certainly opens up a very wide field for consideration. At the first glance, what strikes me as being the practical difficulty in applying the suggestion is that it involves the leaving to every magistrate the definition of what is the moral law, and what constitutes a violation. I am afraid we should find that different magistrates would take different views of what the moral law requires of the individual. I might be convicted of a violation of the moral law before one magistrate, and the hon. gentleman having the advantage of appearing before a different magistrate might be acquitted, although we had both done the same thing. It seems to me that is the danger that would attend on the adoption of the suggestion. However, as I said before, there is no doubt that the suggestion opens a very wide field for consideration and if the time should come when we shall deal in a general way with criminal law—and I may say that I think that time is perhaps very near at hand—the suggestion that the hon. member has made certainly will have the consideration that it deserves.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT.

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 114, to amend the Indian Act—Mr. Roche. Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

On section 1—power to establish industrial, etc., schools:

Mr. CARVELL: There was to be an amendment, I think, to that clause. I received a letter from the Minister of the Interior a week ago or more making a suggested amendment, but I have not got it in my desk just now.

Mr. BORDEN: We will let the clause stand. The minister happens to be detained this evening, and I am not very familiar with the Bill. I do not propose to go on with any clauses that are controversial.

Section stands.

On section 2—taking land for schools:

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to delay the Bill at all, but I think this is really a trivial reason for interfering with what should be considered the sacredness of the right of the Indian to his reserve. There are reasons why there should be such an amendment, but I think the reasons against it are much stronger. This is a provision whereby land on a reserve can be expropriated for school purposes. It is very desirable that there should be a school in certain places, but on the other hand it is very desirable that there should be no interference with the right of the Indian to his land.

Mr. BORDEN: Has the hon. gentleman made known his objections to the minister?

Mr. OLIVER: No, we did not come to that clause before.

Mr. BORDEN: Perhaps the hon. member will state his reasons as fully as he desires, and we will then let the clause stand.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not insisting that it should stand, but I simply wish to put on record my views in regard to it.

Mr. BORDEN: As the hon. gentleman has some consideration which he regards as cogent, I would prefer that the clause stand in order that his observations may receive the consideration of the minister.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I may say for the information of the right hon. gentleman that when this Bill came up the first time I took upon myself to read a communication from the chief of the Caughnawaga band, protesting most vehemently against any expropriation of that reserve. The Caughnawaga Indians have owned their reserve almost from time immemorial. It was given to them, if I mistake not, by Govenor Frontenac under the French regime. The Caughnawaga Indians consider that they should not be threatened with being removed from where they are. They are quite near Montreal and are practically white men. By referring to 'Hansard' when this Bill was first introduced my hon. friend will see the protest of their chief.

Mr. BORDEN: As I understand the object, it is to enable the department to provide facilities for establishing schools for the advantage of the Indians. I would not suppose that any very large area of land is required to be taken for the purpose.

Section stands.

On section 4—withdrawal from band:

Mr OLIVER: There is a feature in connection with section 4 that I am afraid the right hon. the Prime Minister does not realize. There has been a considerable traffic in half-breed scrip. I do not know whether that traffic still goes on. A half-breed has the right to the issue of 480 acres of scrip. At the price of land it is worth a considerable amount of money, and there have been a great many withdrawals from the Indian bands by members of the bands, who are really half-breeds, having white blood and getting this scrip as half-breeds. It should be understood that a very large proportion of the Indians of the West have an admixture of white blood, so that really they would be entitled to be dealt with as half-breeds but they had chosen to be regarded as Indians and as members of the Indian band, which they were in all particulars except in the mere matter of some admixture of white blood. But in case they had a small admixture of white blood they were entitled to scrip. Therefore, speculators would induce them to withdraw from the band with the result that the scrip would be given to them, then sold to the speculator and the profit would be made by the speculator rather than by the Indian. The effect of this amendment is that when that arrangement is made with the man it will also be effective with his wife, if I understand the meaning of it aright. When the man withdraws from the band the wife is automatically withdrawn. It seems to me that when the man withdraws from the band and is given scrip, the wife is thereby withdrawn under the authority of Parliament and she will almost automatically be entitled to the scrip as well thereby doubling up the advantage of the scrip speculators.

Mr. BORDEN: Are the wives of half-breeds, as well as half-breeds themselves, entitled to the scrip?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, properly speaking, unless the wife had white blood she would not be entitled to scrip but it seems to me that when you provide that, when her husband withdraws she must withdraw also, you are establishing a situation in which you would almost have to give her the same recognition as her husband. I am not saying that this is not right, I am not seriously objecting to it, but I am putting before the committee the information as to how far-reaching this provision is in a direction that possibly is not contemplated. It may be that under present conditions no scrip is issued. If the issue of scrip has ceased then the objection I see does not exist, but if the scrip is actually issued that condition would continue and I think it would raise considerable objection. It would be well for the minister to look into that side of it before he puts the section through.

Mr. BORDEN: It is quite possible that that particular consideration may have been overlooked. Apparently, as far as I can appreciate the object of the section, it is designed to ensure that the wife of an Indian when withdrawn from the band would have the same status as her husband.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, which is very proper.

Mr. BORDEN: Which is very proper—just as a wife acquires the domicile or national status of her husband. The considerations which the hon. gentleman has brought to my attention may have been overlooked. I shall ask that the section may be allowed in order that it may have the consideration of the minister.

Section stands.

Section 6 stands.

On section 8—selling, etc., of live stock:

Mr. BORDEN: Has my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) considered this section?

Mr. OLIVER: I think it is going very far, but I suppose the minister has considered it thoroughly. It prohibits the Indian from selling his live stock. My objection to it would be that it establishes too great a condition of paternalism. It does not give scope to the Indian to grow in his sense of proprietorship, of personal ownership, which is really essential to his progress and civilization. The sense of ownership, after all, is the very foundation of civilization. Ownership, selfishness, which is foreign to the mind of the Indian in his normal condition, is really the foundation of civilization.

Mr. BORDEN: The hon. gentleman considers that it tends to keep the Indians in a condition of tutelage?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. BORDEN: Well, I think we had better let it stand.

Mr. CARVELL: Would not this go so far as to extend to the Indian, say, in the Maritime provinces so that he would not be able to sell his live stock without the consent of the agent?

Mr. BORDEN: It is restricted to the four provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia.

Mr. CARVELL: It says:

No Indian or non-treaty Indian in the provinces of Manitoba, British Columbia, Saskatchewan or Alberta.

It might be construed to mean a non-treaty Indian in the four provinces and any Indian all over Canada.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not think it would be held to have that meaning.

Mr. CARVELL: It is a subject for consideration. I know that in the Maritime provinces there are some Indians who are trying to lead civilized lives and own property, and it would be a great hardship if these people were not allowed to dispose of their property.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not think it does mean what my hon. friend suggests, but in order to avoid any doubt it might be proper to transpose the words of the section so that it would read:

In the provinces of Manitoba, British Columbia, Saskatchewan or Alberta, no Indian—

Mr. CARVELL: That will make it all right.

Mr. OLIVER: This only applies to live stock that had been given them under treaty, and not to their private property?

Mr. BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: That is better, but it still carries the objection I have raised.

On section 9—restriction Indian dances, etc.:

Mr. OLIVER: As this section reads, it ostensibly is to prevent the engagement of Indians in public shows, except with consent, and I think that is proper, but if it is the intention of the department to prevent their assembling on different reserves for the purpose of participating in their festivals, religious or otherwise, that ought to be specifically stated, and this section ought not to be interpreted to prohibit that. The various bands visit each other on their reservations, to take part in ceremonies, religious or otherwise, but that is in a different class altogether from their participation in a public show for pay. I know there are many people who object to allowing the Indians to participate in their tribal festivals and ceremonies, but, personally, I think it would be an injustice and a wrong to make a statutory provision preventing them from engaging in these traditional customs, to which they are much attached.

Mr. CARVELL: An eastern man naturally wonders why an Indian should not be allowed to join a show and make a few dollars as well as a white man can. There must be some reason for this prohibition, and I would like my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) to explain.

Mr. OLIVER: The merit of the Indian is in the maintenance of his dignity, and when the Indian consents to join in a public show for money he degrades and demoralizes himself to an extent that would not be present in the case of a white man doing a similar thing. The Indian is either a gentleman or very much the reverse. As long as his dignity is maintained he is a gentleman and he is amenable to reason and argument and good influence, but when he loses his self-respect, and he certainly does lose his self-respect when he makes himself a public show, then he gets to a point where neither the Government nor anybody else can do very much with him or for him. There are exceptions of course, but I think those who are acquainted with the western Indians will agree that their participation in these public exhibitions has a degrading and demoralizing influence on them, whch is very much to their detriment and to the detriment of the Government that is doing the best it can for them. I am aware that very much of what I have said may be argued against permitting them to assemble in their tribal or national festivals, but in the celebration of these ceremonies, while they may look grotesque to us because we do not understand them, they have to the Indians a meaning, and they do not detract from their self-respect or from their dignity, and therefore do not demoralize them to the same degree.

Mr. CARVELL: What is the difference between their dances and tangoing?

Mr. OLIVER: The difference between the white man and the Indian is that the Indian is naturally a gentleman.

Mr. BRADBURY: I endorse what has been so well said by the hon. member for Edmonton. I suppose the intention of the clause must be not to prevent the Indian holding a festival on his own reserve.

Mr. OLIVER: Or going from one reserve to another.

Mr. BRADBURY: Yes. The clause, I suppose, is intended to prevent the Indians from taking part in these public exhibitions, and with that I agree, but if it should be interpreted to prohibit his national and tribal festivals, then I think it would be harsh and unfair to the Indians. I do not think we have any right to step in and prevent our wards from indulging in these immemorial customs of their race. In so far as it prevents persons from engaging Indians for these public shows, the clause is a good one. Many years ago I happened to be in Ottawa from the West, and the man who had charge of the Indians in one of these shows made a failure of it, and the Indians were stranded. They made their way from some town in Ontario to Ottawa, and I happened to meet them in the corridor and I knew them and they knew me, and they told me their plight. I took them to see the Big Chief, Mr. Dewdney, who was then Minister of the Interior, and he had to take charge of them and send them back to their reserves.

I think the intention of this Bill is to prevent things of that kind from occurring. I hope it is not intended to prevent the Indians from exercising their old customs and privileges on their own reserves or from visiting other reserves. I do not think it would be fair to do that.

Mr. KNOWLES: This Bill seems to prevent them from visiting other reserves. These people must have their pleasure, and if they are to be bound down so that they cannot visit brother and sister Indians on other reserves, they will be very apt to run away altogether. I suppose the department has in mind, for example, such festivals as those that occur at Banff. I have seen them and they are very harmless. I presume it will come within the discretion of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs to permit the Indians to visit other reserves. I think the Indians ought to be allowed to visit other reserves. These Indian dances are far ahead of the turkey trot and the tango that we have in Ottawa, and we permit these dances. If you go down to the Russell House and buy a cup of tea, you can see white people go through these so-called modern dances that are much inferior to the Indian dances, as far as my judgment goes. Of course, I am not going to say anything against the people who indulge in these dances, because I do not want to step on any one's toes. I would be glad to see preserved and protected the rights of the Indians in their innocent dances, because I think after all they are as good dances as the tango and the turkey trot.

Mr. BORDEN: Of course, those who participate in the turkey trot and the tango, as has been suggested, are not doing so outside of their own reserve.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the very point I had in mind. In the city of Ottawa people are employed on certain nights of the week—I do not know, because I do not go, but I have been so informed—to dance these dances in public in the restaurants.

Mr. BORDEN: I was regarding the city of Ottawa as a reserve. As far as the purpose of this Bill is concerned, it certainly prohibits an Indian from participating in any Indian dance outside the boundary of his own reserve, except with the consent of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, or his authorized agent. How far it may be desirable to go in that regard I am not prepared to say, not having very much knowledge of the evils which are intended to be prevented by this section. In addition to the reasons already adduced by hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the subject, it appears from the explanatory memorandum attached to this section that the preparation for an engagement in the exhibitions, stampedes and pageants alluded to, are very unsettling to the Indians; that the preparations for the celebration of these engagements very often occupies many days and, in some instances, weeks of the Indians' time, at a season of the year which should be spent in sowing or reaping their crops, and that there has been a systematic practice of utilizing the Indians for the profit of persons who are engaged in getting up such shows. The main object of the section, as I understand it, is to prevent that. I do not know to what extent it is desirable that the Indians should participate in ceremonial dances outside of their own reserves. I have no opinion on that whatever. Therefore I should prefer that this section should stand in order that the minister may make fuller explanation, as the subject seems to have engaged the attention of the minister and his officials In any case, the members of the committee will understand that there will be no difficulty at all about the Indians participating in these ceremonials upon their own reserves, and also that there will be no difficulty in their doing so outside of their own reserves with the consent of the Indian agent or of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs himself. Whether or not a provision of that kind goes too far, I will leave for the minister to determine and I ask that the section stand.

Section stands.

On section 10—French version of section 135 corrected:

Mr. BORDEN: It seems that there has been some omission in the French version which it is desired to correct.

Section agreed to.

IRRIGATION ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Right Hon. R. L. Borden (Prime Minister), Bill No. 138, to amend the Irrigation Act, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Blondin in the Chair.

Mr. BORDEN: I am not very familiar with this Bill, and I propose merely to run over it and examine the sections. Any that require discussion or are of a controversial character, I will ask to stand until the Minister of the Interior is here. Those to which my hon. friends opposite do not see any objection, if there be any such, may be allowed to pass.
