At an age when any ordinary baby might have been frightened iuto convulsions by the shriek of a locomotive Joe, securely fastened in his cab, would stare for hours through the great window, undisturbed by the incessant rush and roar of arriving and departing trains.

The clowd began to run along the track, some moved by that morbid curiosity which seeks to be 'in at the death.'

But look! Midway the long rise the speed of the runaway engine suddenly slackens.

What does it mean! She never could 'a' died out in that time!' shouled an old yardman.

Excitement winged their feet. When the foremost runners reached the place the smoking engine stood still on her track, quivering in every steel-clal nerve, her great wheels still whizzing round and round amid a flight of red sparks from beneath.
