Hon. Mr. GILLMOR, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (167) 'An Act to amend the Copyright Act.'—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

CHINESE IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of Bill (180) 'An Act respecting and restricting Chinese immigration,' as amended.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to know if it is the intention of the government to appoint a commission, and when the hon. gentleman became converted on this subject? I want to express the opinion that the appointment of a commission to investigate this Chinese question could only have been suggested for the purpose of leading the people of British Columbia to believe that some good was to result from it in the way of further restriction of Chinese immigration into that part of the country. There is nothing that that commission can find out and report to the government, or lay before the people of Canada, that they do not already know about the Chinese, their habits, their morals, their numbers and everything connected with them, and the commission which was issued by the late government, before we were fully acquainted with this question, is of such a character as to give all the information that they can possibly obtain under any circumstances. The census is to be taken this next year. There is a large amount in the estimates for that purpose. What is really required, and what may be necessary in dealing with this question further, is to ascertain the number of Chinese and Japanese in the country, to give those who desire to deal with the question knowledge as to whether that class of people are in sufficient numbers in Canada to be detrimental to the morals, or interfere with the labour of the people in this country. That is all that is necessary to be ascertained. The petition from the Chinese Board of Trade of Vancouver which has just been laid before parliament gives this information, of course, it is only in the petition—that there are only 17,000 Chinese in the whole country. The truth of that will be ascertained next year before we could possibly legislate any more on the subject. I do not hesitate to say it is simply a device to blind the people of British Columbia into the belief that something is to be done that will not be done, and it will be at the cost of a great many thousand dollars. Experience has taught me what these commissions cost. If I could see any possible good to result from the appointment of such a commission, if there is any information that could be obtained that we do not already possess in reference to the Mongolian race, both in this country and in the other colonies——

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—What information has this House as to the immigration of Japanese and Chinese into this country—as to the number that are in the country, and the possibility of the numbers coming to the country?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have already answered that. We have no accurate knowledge, but there is a vote of $100,000 for the census to find out such facts. What do you want a special commission for? Why does the government wish to appoint a special commission to ascertain a fact which will be found by the census commissioners, which must be much more accurate than anything done by a commission? How is a commission going to find it out? The whole thing is a fraud upon the face of it.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—If the hon. gentleman will permit me to interrupt again, I would submit that the information as to the number of Chinese in the country is the least important of the information that this commission will be supposed to collect. It is not a matter of much consequence to us whether there are 10,000 of 17,000 Chinese in the country. The numbers are there. It is the effect they have on the people of the country, on the social and industrial life of the country, and the interference with white labour. We want to obtain all the information possible, especially in reference to the Japanese and if hon. gentlemen will permit me——

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I rise to a question of order. It is quite sufficient for the government to expect hon. members of this House to remain here for nothing, but I do not think they have a right to starve us. We have a rule that the Speaker should leave the Chair at six o'clock if the debate be not finished, and as this question seems to be the subject of unlimited debate, we should call it six o'clock.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am very anxious to have this Bill read the third time to-day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will say no more.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned.

SUPPLY OF OIL FOR THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to Call the attention of the Senate to the violation of the tender system by the Minister of Railways and Canals in awarding contracts for oil for the Intercolonial Railway in the month of September, 1896, to the Galena Oil Company, to the improvidence of the said contracts and their continuation up to the present time without any call for tenders; and also to the laxity of the said Minister of Railways and Canals in failing to enforce the guarantee contained in the said contracts. And will inquire if it is the intention of the government to continue buying oils from the Galena Oil Company, or any other vendor of oils, without competition.

He said: In proposing to say a few words on this notice, I may remark that hon. gentlemen will no doubt recollect that I have, during the last year, or over a year, at various times made efforts to obtain information on the subject of this notice. Speaking in another place, the Minister of Railways has made the remark that I am not possessed of very much information in regard to the matter. I may say that if such be the case, he would probably be entitled to some credit for it, for I have had no small amount of labour and difficulty in getting information. Before I complete the statement which I am going to make to the House, it will be for hon. gentlemen to consider whether I am in possession of information or otherwise. On the 2nd day of May, 1896, tenders were called, under the late government, by the railway management at Moncton, N.B., for the supply of oil for the Intercolonial Railway in the same manner as tenders had been called in previous years. The call for tenders was based upon elaborate specifications detailing the character of the oil required, and all other particulars in connection with it, and the tenders received were the result of very full and extensive advertising through the press of the country. There were received by the department at Moncton at that time tenders from the following companies engaged in the oil trade: 1. The Galena Oil Company. 2. J. R. Hutchins. 3. Eastern Oil Company. 4. A. Holden & Company. 5. Imperial Oil Company. 6. The Bushnell Company. 7. Samuel Rogers & Son. 8. John McGoldrick. The Galena Oil Company were alleged to be of Toronto Junction, Can., but were really located in the state of Pennsylvania. Altogether, eight different companies engaged in the oil trade entered into the competition, and they were required by the advertisements and specifications to furnish samples of the oil to be analysed to enable the department to award the tenders, as well in view of the price demanded as of the quality of oil that was offered.

The oils called for were cylinder oils for all seasons—engine oils for summer and engine oils for wniter, car oil for summer and car oil for winter; coach oil for summer and coach oil for winter; signal hand-lamp oil for all seasons; petroleum per specification A and petroleum per specification B ; spindle oil for heavy machinery and dynamo oil—altogether twelve descriptions of oil for which tenders were invited. Samples of these oils were sent to Professor Ruttan, of McGill University, reputed to be one of the best, if not the best chemist in Canada. Full and elaborate reports on all the samples so submitted to him were laid before the department before tenders were awarded, and in full view of these analyses, and the prices contained in these tenders, the Department of Railways and Canals at Moncton, some time during the early part of July, awarded contracts upon all these oils. They awarded contracts at that time, for we know that notices were issued to different parties, some of them on July 11, and others on July 18, awarding contracts to them on the basis of these specifications and tenders, and the analyses that had been obtained, as shown by the following statement:

Kind of Oil.	—	Name of Party to whom Contracts was Awarded by Department, July 11 and 18.	Prices on which Contracts were Awarded, July 11 and 18.	Prices in Tender of Galena Oil Co., accepted by Mr. Blair.
			Cts.	Cts.
1. Cylinder oil	All seasons	Imperial Oil Co	30	63
2. Engine oil	Summer	"	20	39
3. "	Winter	Eastern Oil Co	21½	39
4. Car oil	Summer	Imperial Oil Co	8½	27
5. "	Winter	"	9½	27
6. Coach oil	"	Eastern Oil Co	21¼	45
7. "	Summer	Imperial Oil Co	19	45

10. " " " 'B'	..	Bushnell Co	22½

A careful inspection of the prices and the analyses of these oils and the specifications will convince any person, who chooses to take up the matter and look into it for himself, that these contracts were awarded in a businesslike way, according to prices and the quality of the oils. About the time these notices had been given, the Hon. Mr. Blair became Minister of Railways, and then other notices were issued to these tenderers that contracts would not be made with them. A gentleman from Pennsylvania by the name of Lichtenhein, appeared in New Brunswick about this time. He first made acquaintance with the people of New Brunswick during the Sunbury and Queen's election. This may be only the merest coincidence; nevertheless, the fact remains that Mr. Lichtenhein made the acquaintance of the people of New Brunswick for the first time in the counties of Sunbury and Queen's, where Mr. Blair was running the election for the House of Commons on his acceptance of the position of Minister of Railways. However that may be, Litchtenhein was agent of the Galena Oil Company, and he appears in these transactions from beginning to end. How it happened that he appeared in New Brunswick just at that particular time we will not discuss for the present. The Minister of Railways, in the answer which he no doubt authorized my hon. friend to give to me across the floor of this House about twelve months ago, said an order in council had been issued after the change of government, authorizing him to call in the notices to the successful tenderers and to award the contract to other parties. I put a notice on the Order paper shortly after that asking for the production of that order in council, by which Mr. Blair was so authorized to cancel the original awards and enter into a new contract, and the return which I received, in answer to my motion for an address, is 'There is no such order in council as above called for.' In the same statement which my hon. friend the Minister of Justice read to the House, and which he was no doubt authorized to read by the Minister of Railways, he said that a more favourable offer had been received from the Galena Oil Company, who were among the original tenderers, and that on the strength of that more favourable offer a new contract had been made with the Galena Oil Company. In my motion for papers I asked that this more favourable offer should be brought down, and in the return the note is 'there was no subsequent tender received from the Galena Oil Company, and no subsequent analyst's report.' Therefore, the matter stands entirely on the first offer made by the Galena Oil Company in May, 1896, and upon the report made on the samples submitted to Prof. Ruttan between May 27 and July 11, when the awards were made to the first named parties. On September 17, or a little over three weeks after the election of Mr. Blair to the House of Commons, a contract was made with the Galena Oil Company, through their agent, Mr. Lichtenhein, for the supply of oils for the Intercolonial Railway, including all the lubricating oils excepting two unimportant sections, dynamo and spindle oil. These contracts were made on prices enormously high as compared with the prices given in the contract that had already been awarded by the department early in July for these very same oils. The cylinder oil was awarded to the Galena Oil Company at 63 cents a gallon, instead of 30 cents a gallon, the price offered in the Imperal Oil Company's tender, an increase of over 100 per cent. I will read the report of Prof. Ruttan on the character of cylinder oils. He said, in speaking of the samples of cylinder oils :

The unusually large number of samples of excellent cylinder oils submitted this year makes the selection of the best a rather difficult task. There are certain oils, however, which may be excluded as being distinctly inferior to others, including the Galena Oil Works, Reference No. 2248, are decidedly inferior to the remaining oils. They are inferior in viscosity at the temperature at which they are used, and possess other undesirable properties; thus, the Bushnell and Hutchins oils contain considerable gritty sediment, which, of course, may be due to bad sampling. The Galena Oil Works (2248) submits a sample of mixed petroleum and fish oil, probably whale oil. This oil is sure to undergo a partial decomposition at high temperature, setting free fat acids, which in course of time will affect the cylinders in which they are used. I believe this to be true of all cylinder oils containing more than a minute portion of fat oils.

Here the report is that this sample submitted by the Galena Oil Company was along with one or two others out of a large number of offers, put aside as decidedly inferior. In the face of that fact, the contract is cancelled with the Imperial Oil Company, who had received a favourable recommendation from the analyst. The contract was cancelled with them at 30 cents a gallon, and given to the Galena Oil Company at 63 cents a gallon. With regard to this subject, in one of the answers which my hon. friend submitted to a question of mine, the Minister of Railways said the department was satisfied with the analyst's report on the Galena Oil Company's products, and yet in the face of that, we have this report by Prof. Ruttan that it was of such a character that is was sure to undergo decomposition at a high temperature, and that it could not be safely applied to axles for any length of time, and still the hon. Minister of Justice told us across the floor of the House, that the department was satisfied with that analysis. I will turn to engine oils (summer) and Prof. Ruttan reports as follows :—

The best oils among the ten samples submitted are the Bushnell Co. No. 2, Imperial Oil Co. No. 10, J. R. Hutchins (B), and A. Holden & Co., samples.

The Galena Oil Works submit No. 2272, which consists of a mixture of mineral oil, lead soap (or lead plaster) and fish oil, probably whale oil. It is difficult to predict exactly how such a mixture would work in actual practice. It possesses, however, an objectionable property of separating into a heavy sediment of sticky lead plaster and a light plaster and a light mixture of mineral oil and fish oil above, hence unless the container of the oil were well stirred in supplying cans the lubricator used would not be uniform. It is decidedly low in viscosity, as well as in fire test. I do not think this would be a safe oil to use unless by those experienced in its use.

The contract was originally given by the department, at 20 cents a gallon, to the Imperial Oil Company. That was cancelled and the contract awarded to the Galena Oil Company at 39 cents—nearly a hundred per cent higher. We will turn now to engine oil for winter use. The analyst reported as follows :

On the whole, the best samples of winter engine oil submitted are those from the Eastern Oil Co., No. 297, Reference No. 2276, and A. Holden & Co., sample, Reference No. 2281.

These possess a very fair degree of viscosity, combined with a moderately high ignition point, and low cold test. The sample submitted by the Galena Oil Works is a very light mineral oil, carrying a certain amount of fish oil with lead soap, the latter being present in much smaller quantities than in the summer engine oils. It is very low in viscosity, and possesses a very low flash and fire test. It has the great advantage, however, of having the lowest cold test of? any of the samples submitted and would probably make a very valuable winter coach oil.

The contract that had been awarded to the Eastern Oil Company at 21½ cents a gallon was cancelled, and the contract given to the Galena Oil Company at 39 cents, although the report of the analyst was infinitely more favourable to the product of the Eastern Oil Company than it was to that of the Galena Oil Company. We come now to car oil, summer, and car oil, winter. These may be discussed together, because in this case there were only two tenderers. Only the Imperial Oil Company and the Galena Oil Company put in tenders for this kind of oil. The tender of the Imperial Oil Company for summer oil was 8½ cents a gallon, and for winter, 9½. The Galena Oil Company's tender was 27 cents a gallon for both seasons, or two hundred per cent higher. In this case, however, the analyst's report is more favourable to the product of the Galena Oil Company. The report reads:

> The sample of freight car summer oil submitted by the Galena Oil Works, although much lighter and with a very much lower viscosity than that submitted by the Imperial Oil Company, is decidedly to be preferred. That submitted by the Imperial Oil Company being rather too thick and heavy, contains a very considerable percentage of suspended tar. The sample of Galena oil is composed of mineral lead and fish oil.

This is the report with regard to the car oil for summer use, and the report with reference to the car oil for winter use is equally favourable to the Galena Oil Company's product. Both of these were priced at 27 cents by the latter company, and the contract was made at that price, while the offer of the Imperial Oil Company was 8½ for summer and 9½ for winter. The officers at Moncton, when left to themselves, without any hesitation whatever accepted the offer of the latter company at the prices named. They had had ample experience of the quality of the Imperial Company's oil. Yet Mr. Blair agrees to pay 200 per cent more for the product of the Galena Oil Company than they had been paying for the product of the Imperial Company the previous year, and than they had an offer to supply it for the year that was then about to begin.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I do not quite understand the hon. gentleman. What was the price paid to the Galena Oil Company the year before?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—They were a new party. This was the first time they were known to supply oils to the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Their tender was 8½.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The tender of the Imperial Oil Company, which had previously supplied the oil, was 8½ and 9½, respectively for winter and summer use.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—What did they get?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The Galena Oil Company received this contract from Mr. Blair, Minister of Railways, at 27 cents a gallon. We come now to discuss the question of coach oil, winter. In this case there was no sample submitted by the Galena Oil Company, but samples were submitted by the Eastern Oil Company and by other companies, and the analyst reported that the product of the Eastern Oil Company was the best, that it was an excellent product indeed, and that there were two other excellent samples but slightly inferior to it. The department at Moncton awarded the contract at 21½ cents a gallon to the Eastern Oil Company, but Mr. Blair, when he came to deal with this question later, awarded the contract to the Galena Oil Company at 45 cents a gallon.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The same oil?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The same oil, notwithstanding that no sample had been submitted to the analyst. He let the contract with his eyes shut as to the quality of the Galena oil, and in the face of the fact that a most excellent report was obtained upon the Eastern Oil Company's product.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend speaks of contracts all along for those oils. Are there contracts made?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think when an offer is asked for, received and accepted that it is a contract.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is entirely wrong.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Among honest men it should be a contract.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not so.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In order that we may have no quarrel over such an unimportant point as that, we will say the successful tenderer. The contracts were not executed, but they were awarded. We are now dealing with what took place in the awarding of these contracts in the months of June and July, 1896. We are dealing with what happened at that time, when the Department of Railways was grappling with the question as to whom they should give these contracts. Let me remark here that all the tenderers did not tender for every kind of oil, but in some cases nearly all the parties I have named put in tenders and some put in several samples at different prices. There was not any great discrepancy between the highest and lowest of every tenderer except the Galena Oil Company which was uniformly from 60 to 200 per cent higher than the other offers—not merely of the successful tenderers, but of all the others who had made offers. In this case the contract was cancelled with the Eastern Oil Company at 21¼ cents a gallon, and it was awarded to the Galena Oil Company at 45 cents a gallon. That was for coach oil for winter use. Now we come to coach oil for summer use. In this case the Galena Oil Company supplied samples, and samples were supplied by all the other tenderers. The analyst finds that the only objectionable samples of summer oil are two, one by the Imperial Oil Company, No. 7, and the other by the Galena Oil Company. The former contained too much tar. Of the Galena Oil Company's sample the analyst says:

> The objection to the samples submitted by the Galena Oil Works is mentioned under the heading 'Summer Engine Oils,' this being practically similar in composition. Of the remaining oils, the three best are Bushnell & Co., No. 2, Imperal Oil Company, No. 6, J. R. Hutchins, B.
> The remaining three samples submitted are slightly inferior to these, as will be seen on reference to the table in viscosity and fire test, but show no objectionable properties.

Of all the samples offered there were only two that showed objectionable properties and one of those two was accepted by Mr. Blair at 45 cents a gallon. The award to the Imperial Oil Company at 22½ cents per gallon for a sample approved by the analyst, was recalled, and a contract was made with the Galena Oil Company for 45 cents a gallon. I am dealing now with lubricating oils. The Galena Oil Company put in no tender for spindle oil and dynamo oil. Tenders were made at reasonable figures by the Hutchins' Company, but on looking over the accounts I find no further reference to spindle or dynamo oils. It is probable that Mr. Hutchins, having received only two small contracts, did not care to go on with them, and dropped out, and later on the oils were supplied, probably, by the company that gobbled up all the important oil contracts at their own prices, but we cannot find out how those two oils were supplied from that time forward. I will not discuss at this stage the illuminating oils, because there were two contracts made, and those contracts deal with lubricating oils and the signal oils separately, and therefore, I will discuss the lubricating oils first and then deal with the question of illuminating oils. Let me say that the high prices that I have read to hon. gentlemen are the prices that are contained in the contract made on the 17th day of September, 1896, between the Department of Railways and the Galena Oil Company, and that there was no further analysis received as shown by the returns and that this contract was made at these extraordinary prices, and on these unfavourable reports of analysis without any further data upon which to base these contracts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—For what time?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The contract was made for one year, to date from the 1st of November, 1896. I have the contract in my hand, and this is the plea that has been put up in extenuation of these extraordinary transactions, and hon. gentlemen will agree with me that so far as I have stated them, these transactions are extraordinary and mysterious. I may state here that the Galena Oil Company did not tender on the specifications the same as the other contractors tendered, but upon a condition—upon a guarantee which they offered to put in the contract, and which was put in the contract, that their work was to be judged by results. They started on the proposition that a great deal of the oil on railways is wasted—that careless and extravagant hands waste it—and they said he will reduce the cost of lubrication of the railways to a science—we will send experts who will inspect the application of this oil to your railways as we do to the other railways where we have similar contracts. We ask you to allow those experts to do their work unimpeded, and without difficulty, to give them free transportation and assist them in insuring the proper working of the contract, and we guarantee that we will lubricate the road to your satisfaction, and that it will cost 10 per cent less than it cost the government for the twelve months previous to this contract. I will read the clauses of the contract which contain this guarantee, because they are very important, and will throw a great deal of light on what I am going to say further on in the discussion. Section 6 says:

That in the exclusive use of the above enumerated oils the contractors guarantee that the cost of lubrication per thousand miles run in locomotive, passenger and freight car service combined shall be 10 per cent less than the cost per thousand miles run for the same classes of service for the previous twelve months' term, ending October 31, 1896, and said cost shall be subject to the inspection and verification of the auditor of the department.

And Her Majesty, in consideration of the promises and of the covenants and conditions on the part of the contractors, hereby covenants with the contractors that they will be paid for and in respect of the said oils hereby contracted for at the prices enumerated in paragraphs 1 and 3, for all the oils furnished in accordance with the foregoing conditions, as per invoices rendered and approved of by the Department of Railways and Canals, with reasonable allowance for leakage, accident, &c., when these shall be shown to have occurred before the consignment reach its line, provided, however, that the said department may withhold payment of invoices covering shipments sufficient to secure it against any excess cost per thousand miles run as may be shown by monthly reports as hereinbefore provided until final settlement at the expiration of this contract, at which time the said contractors are to be allowed for all oils furnished at the prices hereinbefore named, and if the cost of the oils used in locomotive and car service does not exceed the cost per thousand miles as guaranteed, then the contractors are to be paid in full for all oils furnished. Should the cost exceed the guaranty under the conditions named, then the said department shall have the right to reduce from the payment of the contractors' invoices sufficient to cover such excess. The final settlement to be made at the expiration of this contract, and shall be based upon locomotive and car services combined.

Now hon. gentlemen clearly understand the proposition: it was that the result of this contract was to be that the company was to secure the lubrication of the road at 10 per cent less than had been paid in the previous twelve months. I have some figures and information with regard to that subject which I desire to lay before the House, which will show how far this guarantee has been implemented, and how far it has been respected by the Minister of Railways. I have here in my hand, taken from the report of the Department of Railways and Canals, the train mileage, the locomotive mileage and the car mileage for each of the years to which those transactions refer. I have them for the complete year ending 30th June, 1896, and for each of the three complete years following. It is not possible to make an exact comparison, for this reason, that this contract commences on the 1st of November and terminates 31st of October, while the regular term with the Department of Railways commenced the 1st of July, and ends the 30th of June, hence the figures which I submit will not be the figures exactly for the year of this contract, but for the railway financial year, but they will be amply sufficient to give us, I will not say an absolutely exact comparison, but an approximate comparison which must be almost correct. The only way in which this comparison can be out at all will be in favour of the Galena Oil Company, because in comparing the first financial year in which they lubricated the railway, they only lubricated the road for eight months, while the lubrication of the other four months belonged entirely to the contracts of the previous year, and would be at the same rate as the tender of the previous year. The cost would come out to be the same as for the previous financial year for the four months that the old contract had been extended, and, therefore, the difference in excess of the previous cost which will be found in 1897, must belong altogether to the eight months of that year, when the oil was supplied by the Galena Oil Company. The figures for that year, bad as they are, would have been much worse if the year had been a complete year in which the Galena Oil Company had been supplying the railway. The result is, however, for every thousand miles of train mileage for the twelve months preceding the entering into this contract with the Galena Oil Company, the cost was $3.90. The average cost for the three years that followed has been just 12 per cent more than that. I will compare it year by year. The cost is $3.90 per thousand miles of train mileage for the year previous to this contract, and $6.10 per thousand miles for the year that immediately followed, and, as I have already remarked, only eight months of that year the oil was supplied by the Galena Oil Company, and as explained, the cost of oil has been governed by the prices of oil in the previous year. The conclusion therefore is inevitable that, bad as this showing is, it would have been worse had the Galena Oil Company supplied the oils for the whole year. We now come to the locomotive mileage, and here we find that for the last year under the old contract it was $3.20 per thousand miles, and for the first year under the new contract it was $4.90 per thousand miles of locomotive mileage. We now come to cars. For the last year, under the previous contract it was 30 cents per thousand miles, while the first year under the new contract it went up to 50 cents, an increase of about 66 per cent. Taking the year 1898, we find that the figures are higher than they were under the last year of the old contract. We find that for train mileage where it had cost $3.90 under the old contract it cost $4.30 under the new. That for locomotive mileage, where it had cost $3.20 under the old contract, it cost $3.50 under the new one, and that in the case of cars where it had cost 30 cents before, it cost 40 cents under the new contract. We will not deal with the last year for which we have the figures, and here we have altogether a different story. I believe this is really the worst part of the whole thing. We find that the train mileage, which had been $6.10 per thousand miles in the first year of this contract, comes down to $2.70 in the third year. Locomotive mileage, which was $4.90 in the first year, comes down to $2.20 in the third year, and the car mileage, which was 50 cents in the first year, comes down to 25 cents, and the Minister of Railways and Canals, speaking elsewhere, said: 'Here is the result of this contract we have made with the Galena Oil Company. We have now struck rock bottom, and in some cases we have come down 50 per cent. I told the contractor that I would not be satisfied with a reduction of 10 per cent in the cost, that I wanted a reduction of 15 per cent, and we have got more than that. Here is a great and substantial advantage gained by this contract, and the gentleman who has been talking on this subject in another place does not know as much as he thinks he does.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It may turn out that I know more than he thinks I do. In response to the various addresses which I secured the passage of in this House, I have got information as to the purchase of oil from the Galena Oil Company, and I have information also as to the deduction that was made from the Galena Oil Company's account in the carrying out of this guarantee under the contract. I know all about it now, as well as does the Minister of Railways himself. I find that in the year 1896, by the returns brought down to this House—I am speaking now of the exact year corresponding with the year for which this contract runs. These figures are obtained, not from the departmental report, but from returns prepared by the Department of Railways, and they cover the twelve months immediately preceding the coming into effect of this contract, and each of the years in which this contract has been in operation. I find that the Department of Railways paid for lubricating oils the year immediately before this contract went into effect, $33,377.75. The first year after the contract went into effect they paid $43,174.09, an increase of over 33 per cent in the cost to the government in the purchase of oil for that year over the preceding year, notwithstanding that the car mileage on the road had dropped about three millions, that the locomotive mileage had dropped about a hundred thousand, and that the snow-plough mileage had dropped twenty-five thousand miles. Notwithstanding that the car mileage, the locomotive mileage and the plough mileage had fallen during that year, the Department of Railways paid nearly 30 per cent more in the aggregate to the Galena Oil Company than they had paid their predecessors, and notwithstanding this guarantee that there should be a saving of 10 per cent on the old rates. The next year, $40,266.12 was paid, which is 20 per cent more than was paid in the last year of the old contract, though the train mileage was less. We have now dealt with two years, and come to the third year, and the purchase of oil for lubricating purposes has gone up to $82,536.14 for that year, being an increase of over 100 per cent above what was paid for oil in the year immediately preceding the going into effect of this contract.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suppose the mileage has doubled.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The mileage has increased a little. The last year was the year of expansion, but the mileage would have to increase 50 per cent to account for these figures. The car mileage increased from forty-three millions under the old contract, to fifty-three millions under the new contract, an increase of about 24 per cent. Then the locomotive mileage increased from 4,713,000 miles to 5,974,000 miles, about 20 per cent, and the car and plough mileage increased very little, from 67,000 to 73,000 miles. The increase in the car mileage, the locomotive mileage, and plough mileage was, on the whole, less than 12 per cent—I am now speaking roughly—the amount paid for oil went up from $33,000 to $82,500 in the same period. It is possible that there is some duplication of figures in the various returns, and that some of the oil was held in store. From the returns that I have received, and which are in the possession of this House, it appears that $99,426.41 was the amount paid for oil to the Galena Oil Company after making deductions up to July 1, 1899, or for the first three complete years—or thirty-two months, to speak accurately. It appears that for the last entire year up to October 31, $82,536.14 was paid for oil. Taking this in connection with the returns for the previous years, it seems, if there are no overlappings in the returns, that some time within the four months after the termination of the year for which we have this report of June 30, 1899, the government of Canada bought oil for lubricating purposes on the Intercolonial Railway to the amount of $66,549.94, all of which, with the exception of about two or three hundred dollars worth, was bought from the Galena Oil Company. I notice that hon. gentlemen have put up a faint 'Hear, hear' when I referred to the deductions which had been made. It seemed as if a gleam of light passed over their countenances when I spoke of the guarantee in the contract, although hon. gentlemen will see by this time, taking the matter on the surface, that this guarantee has not amounted to much. We were larger purchasers of oil in all the years than we were under the old contract, notwithstanding the guarantee. One question I asked was, to get the dates and the amounts that had been deducted from the Galena Oil Company in order to fulfil the guarantee under this contract. I asked for a Statement of amounts deducted, with dates of such deduction from the accounts of the Galena Oil Company, to cover the guaranty in the contract.

Here is the answer which I received on March 11, last:

Amount deducted on May 8, 1899, from the accounts of the Galena Oil Company to cover the guarantee on the contract, $23,067.13.

Although the contract called for a monthly adjustment under this guarantee—although it called for a final settlement between the government and the company at the end of the year, the hon. Minister of Railways allowed two years to pass over his head and a third year to advance nearly seven months before he called for any deduction on account of this guarantee, and it was not until this question was discussed in the Conservative press and brought up in parliament and talked of all over the country that the Minister of Railways and Canals, as shown by his own return, called for a deduction to be made in the accounts of the Galena Oil Company. And here let me explain to hon. gentlemen—for the explanation is not obvious—what was meant by the Minister of Railways and Canals when he talked of getting down to rock bottom this last year and spoke of having reduced the cost of lubricating the Intercolonial Railway in accordance with the terms of the contract, when he claimed he had done all this he was quoting from his own published accounts for the year ending 1899, and he was quoting accounts that were deliberately prepared and made up, the whole of this deduction that I have spoken of being taken out of the work of last year, and thus presenting a most misleading set of figures before parliament and before the people of this country. He says we have got the matter down to rock bottom and gives these figures, whereas, if he knew anything at all about his department he must have known when he was uttering these words, and should have known when he was presenting the fallacious report, that he was not presenting the facts to the people of this country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But, on the contrary, he had deducted the whole amount of $23,000 from the accounts of last year, and then he turns round and asks parliament to look at the amazing reductions which he had made. Let me just show what this reveals. It reveals that the increase in cost of train mileage for the first year under this contract was 56 per cent, that in the next year it was 10 per cent over the total amount of the previous year, and it shows that in the last year there was a 30 per cent saving, but it was saved by deducting this large sum of $23,000 that I have read to the House, out of the expenditure of last year instead of apportioning it to the years to which it belonged. In that way a most fallacious statement was made, but notwithstanding all that, notwithstanding the fallacious character of this report, such is the laxity that is evident in the manner of enforcing this guarantee in the contract, that the result is that the average cost of lubrication of these three services of train mileage, locomotive mileage and the ploughs and cars, is very much larger than during the year that immediately preceded and on which this contract is based, and, notwithstanding this reduction of $23,000, there is not an approximation to a reduction such as was guaranteed in this contract and of which so much has been said. We find the increased cost in train mileage per thousand miles is just a little more than 12 per cent greater in these three years on an average than the year immediately preceding. We find the locomotive mileage is just 10 per cent higher than it was, and the cost of ploughs and cars just 26 per cent higher. We have the whole transaction before us. We have the cancelling of the oil contract based on the honest tenders that were given by the oil manufacturers of this country and the United States. We have the Galena Oil Company coming in and saying 'take us at our prices, and we will give you good oil.' and the Minister of Railways said last year that the oil was of a superior quality. I wonder if he ever read the analysis which I have read to the House. I think if he did, even the Minister of Railways would hesitate to claim the oil was of very good quality. We have the facts remaining that, after three years' experience, and after deducting this $23,000 from the transactions of the third year, the average cost for lubricating is 12 per cent for train mileage, 10 per cent for locomotive mileage, and 26 per cent for cars and ploughs, higher than it was under the previous contract. These figures are based on the departmental figures as given in the report of the Minister of Railways. I will have something more to say on this point before I bring my remarks to a close, but I want to say a word or two on the matter of illuminating oils. The Galena Oil Company only tendered for one of these oils—hand lamp signal oil. This is an oil that is generally dearer than ordinary illuminating oil, and there were samples submitted by Hutchins of Montreal, the Eastern Oil Company, Samuel Rogers & Co. of Toronto, the Imperial Oil Company, the Bushnell Company, and the Galena Oil Company, and this is the report of the analysis of Prof. Ruttan. I will read it in full. It is as follows :—

The samples of signal or hand lamp oil submitted by the Eastern Oil Company, No. 291, possesses such properties and composition as would justify its being placed at the head of the list. It has the best average in all respects. The Samuel Rogers oil gives a bright light, and has the lowest cold test, but contains too much light petroleum, and has too much free fat acid to recommend it as being a safe light to use. The signal oil submitted by the Galena Oil Works, Reference No. 2306, contains a very high percentage of heavy lard oil, giving it high cold test for this climate. It also burns with less brilliancy than many of the other samples, although the light is steady and even. The remaining samples are superior to the two just mentioned, and but slightly inferior to the samples submitted by the Eastern Oil Company, and are of about equal value among themselves.

The Department of Railways, when awarding all other contracts in July, gave this contract to the Imperial Company at 37½ cents a gallon, whose oil the analyst had found to be but slightly inferior to the Eastern Oil Company's oil, which had been offered at 40 cents a gallon. That is the condition in which Mr. Blair found things, but he withdrew that notice to the Imperial Oil Company and awarded the contract to the Galena Oil Company, whose oil was declared to be inferior and objectionable at 46 2-10 per gallon, being nearly 9 cents per gallon or 25 per cent above the tender of the Imperial Oil Company, and let me here tell hon. gentlemen that there was no pretext in this case to cover up the deal by saying: 'Oh, we have a guarantee in the contract.' There is no guarantee in the contract, and no saving of any kind assured, and yet the Minister of Railways most flagrantly violates the tender system by giving the nigh price of 46 2-10 cents per gallon to the Galena Oil Company for this oil which was found to be inferior in quality, and cancels the award that had been made to the Imperial Oil Company at 37½ cents a gallon for a superior article. In this case there can be no contention that Mr. Blair was misled by some guarantee in the contract that there would be a saving of 10 per cent in using these oils. He had the unfavourable report of the product of the Galena Oil Company, and a favourable report in the other case, and he gives 46 2-10 a gallon to the Galena Oil Company for the inferior oil and rejects the contract of the Imperial Oil Company, where 9 cents would be saved on the contract, besides getting a better oil. I will say a word or two with regard to petroleums. I am speaking of straight kerosene oil, of which there is a good deal consumed on the Intercolonial Railway. Tenders were called, as was usual, under the late government and samples were furnished, and analysis had upon them, and contracts were awarded to the Imperial Oil Company for one of these oils according to specification A, and the Bushnell Company for the oil under specification B. These contracts were so let, and then they were cancelled, and from that time to the present there has been no public call for tenders and no analysis of oil. There has been no public competition, in fact, for the supply of this oil, and the papers that have been brought down which only may be partial show that Mr. Blair and the Department of Railways have bought over 2,000 barrels of kerosene oil since 1896, and have issued no specifications. In one case, in asking for a hundred barrels they asked that they should be according to specification B, which was a specification of the late government, but in all other cases they furnish no specifications. The only description was in one or two cases where they asked tenders to state whether it was Canadian or American, but they have been going on buying these oils without competition. The only competition is that a few men, most of them friends of the government—I think all of them are——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Members of the government ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Friends of the government. The Department of Railways, no doubt acting under instructions, used to do all this by public tender and specifications under the former administration, but that is all changed. Now, we have a system introduced of sending circulars to parties, no doubt friends of the government, and asking them to tender and state what they would supply the best kerosene oil for. The names are :

John J. Barry, St. John.
Charles McDonald, St. John.
The A. B. MacLean Company, St. John.
The Eastern Oil Company, St. John.
The Imperial Oil Company, St. John.
F. D. Walsh, Halifax,
Austen Brothers, Halifax.
Shatford Brothers, Halifax.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Are the Eastern Oil Company and the Imperial Company friends of the government ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Very likely. My hon. friend had better ask the Minister of Railways and he can perhaps give the reason of the friendship too.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman said friends of the government.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am not sure that they were all friends of the government, but it was a very friendly act of the government to select these people, and say 'give us an offer,' and not to allow the public to come in and compete. There was some friendship on one side at any rate, and surely they would be ungrateful if they did not reciprocate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is speaking of his own experience.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Speaking from knowledge.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I point out that the fact that the government selected them for the purpose of buying oil from them shows that they regarded them as their friends.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It simply shows that they had tendered before. They were among the men who had put in tenders before.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend will do better not to interrupt, because whenever he opens his mouth he puts his foot in it. If the hon. gentleman will look at these names he will find that those to whom these invitations were sent in the early months of 1896-7 were parties that had not been known to supply oil to the Intercolonial Railway before. Take John J. Barry, Chas. McDonald, the A. B. MacLean Company, Austen Bros., Halifax. Those parties had not figured in oil contracts before. He speaks of the Imperial Oil Company. It was not notified about oil in the early days of these operations. It was not until it belonged to the Standard Oil Trust, until it became a first cousin of the Galena Oil Company, until it became one of the hydra heads of the Standard Oil Company. Up to that time its tender was refused, and no contract would be made with them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But after the Imperial Oil Company became a part of the Standard Oil Trust of the United States, and became a first cousin of the Galena Oil Company, then it was put upon this list. I am not finding fault with the prices that were given for this oil. I am not a judge. They do not appear exorbitant. That is the price paid for kerosene oil, and in inviting friends to tender, I am not complaining of that except that it should be done by competition and on specifications, as was the practice of the late government, and the oil should have been analysed in order that the department should know whether they were getting good or bad oils. All this was ignored by the Minister of Railways, and he took this way of buying kerosene oil. I am treating the question of kerosene oil separate from lubricating oil, and, also, separate from the signal oil for which a contract was made with the Galena Oil Company at the exorbitant rate of 46 2-10 cents a gallon, whereas there were offers of an excellent oil, far better by analysis than the Galena Oil Company's product, at 37½. It has been claimed by the Minister of Railways, not only speaking elsewhere, but in answers to questions in this House, and in the press supporting the minister, that a similar contract to the one which he made with the Galena Oil Company has been made with a very large proportion, I think the minister says as many as 95 per cent of the railways of the United States and Canada, that contracts on a similar basis have been made, and have given entire satisfaction. From what we know this guarantee in their contract is worth—and in that respect I do not blame them half as much as I do the Minister of Railways, because he did not invoke the guarantee thoroughly—from what we know of the company we would want more than their statement that they were the universal oil suppliers of railways. But if it should prove to be true, even if the result were as bad as with us, it would not surprise me much to know that the Galena Oil Company being a part of the Standard Oil Trust of the United States, that it is the branch of that trust that deals in lubricating oils, and knowing the way they are manipulating the railways and people all over the continent, it would not surprise me to know they were making contracts with the railways of the United States as bad as this one, and even if they are making contracts on the same terms with the other railways, we should hesitate before we endorse the contract for that reason. The points which stand out most prominently are these: The oil supplied by the Galena Oil Company was generally bad on analysis. The price was monstrously high. The result has been unsatisfactory. The tender system was violated, in the first instance, in awarding this contract to the Galena Oil Company on this basis of a guarantee which was not open to other suppliers of oil to come in and compete on equal terms. If the government intended to make the contract in this way without looking as much to the price as to the results, they should have allowed other oil companies to come in and compete on equal terms. Even if this system of letting a contract was a good one, there should have been competition about it. Then comes another point, and this is the point with which this House and the people of this country have most to do, and should earnestly consider, and that is—I will not use a stronger word, although hon. gentlemen may perhaps come to the conclusion that a stronger word is necessary—the extreme laxity of the Minister of Railways in enforcing this guarantee that was to provide that an adjustment was to take place every month, and that at the end of the contract, which was for one year, a determination should be had of the results and that a deduction should be made equal to the guarantee in the contract. All that was violated in this transaction. The Minister of Railways failed to invoke that guarantee fully and on time. He allowed one year to close and he paid this monstrous price to the Galena Oil Company and went on and allowed another year to close, and it was not until attention was called to this question in the press, and the matter had, I think, been raised in the Senate, that the Minister of Railways invoked that condition of the contract, and, according to their own return brought down in this House, it was on the 8th May, 1899, or two years and a half after the contract had been commenced, before there was any deduction made and the deduction was insufficient. Instead of bringing it down to the guarantee in the contract, it still leaves a further deduction of about 22 per cent necessary in order to make good the guarantee. Then we have the misleading statements. I have a list of the misstatements that are now proved, by the report of the department and by the returns which have been brought down. Some of these I have already referred to and I will now pass them over. But, we have this glaring misstatement which is found in the report of the Minister of Railways, wherein it shows that a most favourable result has been obtained in the last year, without disclosing the fact that should not have been kept back, that that result was obtained by making the entire deductions for the three years fall into the closing month or two, and in that way showing results entirely misleading. And then we have the scandal, for which there is no justification whatever, no pretext suggested of a 10 per cent deduction, of awarding the contract for signal hand-lamp oil to the Galena Oil Company, although their tender was nine cents higher, and although their oil was pronounced to be inferior to that of the Imperial Oil Company. I have now gone over the whole ground and touched upon the main points in this case, and I submit to hon. gentlemen, that the facts and figures that I have disclosed to this House, drawn from the public reports of the Railway Department and the returns submitted to this House, and the answers to questions which we have received in this House, disclose a scandal such as, I am glad to say, we have not had many of in this country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—One would have supposed if the hon. senator wished to bring forward a motion of this sort, that he would have brought it forward at an earlier period of the session.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If the hon. gentleman had brought down the information as I wanted it, I would have done so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We had for a considerable time, no business sent up to this House from the House of Commons. We adjourned very frequently after an hour's sitting, and we adjourned sometimes for several days together, and my hon. friend could have, if he were disposed to bring forward a motion of this sort, ample opportunity to do so; but he brings it forward when every hon. gentleman, both in this House and in the other, must be anxious to bring the session to a close, and he has taken up two-thirds, nearly, of the time that we will have this afternoon to make his speech on his motion, leaving us scarcely any time whatever for the consideration of the business on the Orders of the Day. The hon. gentleman has brought serious accusations against the Minister of Railways. The hon. gentleman never speaks without attributing some mean motive, some dishonourable conduct, some base act either to the Minister of Railways or to some other minister. There has never been a speech made by the hon. gentleman of any length in this House in which he has not vilified and traduced those who stand in opposition to him. That has been the policy of the hon. gentleman, and his speeches in this House would receive more consideration from both sides if he were more disposed to be moderate and fair. The hon. gentleman has made great complaint that Mr. Blair, when he came into office, cancelled the contracts that had been made with various oil companies for the supplying of oil on the Intercolonial Railway. He mentioned that an award was made upon these various tenders in July, 1896. What was that period? The general election, if I remember rightly, was on June 23. At the time this award was made a government was in power that had been defeated at the election, and had not yet retired, and they undertook to make provisions for various parties under these tenders, and I might say that I think Mr. Blair was perfectly justified in undertaking to clear the ground, I know in my own department tenders were let for the supply of cloth for five years, that would cover the entire period the administration would be in office, before we came in, and although the government succeeded to office on July 13, if I remember rightly, there was already a supply of cloth under this tender sufficient to meet the wants of the penitentiaries for a period of three years. Now, the hon. gentleman expects that sort of thing to be allowed and to be justified, and his whole complaint here to-day is, that Mr. Blair, when he came into office, did not ratify the awards that had been made under this very expeditious mode of transacting business.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not so understand the hon. gentleman, what I understood him to say was, that tenders had been asked for by the late government, that the contracts and agreements were made by the officers of the department after the elections had taken place, and after the resignation of the late government, and that the hon. gentleman's ministry cancelled those contracts which had been made by the officers of the department upon the tenders which had been received prior to the resignation of the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The statement made by the hon. gentleman was, that the department had awarded the contracts early in July after the elections.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I gave the exact dates of awarding them. There was one contract dated on the 11th, and the balance on July 17, and after the resignation of the government——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—All made on instructions received from the late government. My hon. friend knows that a new government coming to office could not have given instructions on July 11, as they did not come into office until, if I remember rightly, two days later, July 13. The same observations are applicable to the contract let on July 17.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Mr. Blair did not come in until afterwards.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman says it so happened that Lichtenhein, the manager of the Galena Oil Company, was in the province of New Brunswick in September—that Mr. Blair's election was in September—that this arrangement made between Mr. Blair and Mr. Lichtenhein was made in September, and what is the suggestion that the hon. gentleman wishes to make with regard to Mr. Blair? What is the inference he wishes the House to draw from his statement? If the hon. gentleman thinks Mr. Blair made a corrupt bargain with Mr. Lichtenhein to furnish Mr. Blair funds for his election—if that is the insinuation—if he wishes it to be understood by the House that Mr. Blair made a corrupt contract with this man and obtained money from him—that he cancelled the contract with other parties to give the contract to this man in consequence of that, why does he not move for a committee? Why does he not say he is ready to establish those charges which he insinuates, and which if true, would show that Mr. Blair was utterly unfit to be in public life, and which charges he has not the courage to make? So I say that the hon. gentleman deals in mean insinuations against those who are politically opposed to him. That is his practice in this House, and he has never, since I have been here, made a speech of any length in which he has not indulged in remarks calculated to traduce the character of those who are politically opposed to him. I deny that there is any foundation for the statements which the hon. gentleman makes. He read about the price to be paid for oil, but he knows that the governing provision of that contract is, that the expenditure for oil should, during the first year, be 10 per cent less than it was the previous year for the same service, and that for the succeeding two years it was to be 15 per cent less. There is the test by which the value of the service is to be ascertained, and it is absolutely impossible, under the terms of that contract, that there could be payment of a larger sum for the services than the cost was before. Let me call the attention of the House to Mr. Blair's own statement with regard to that matter. He says that the locomotive service cost for oil $3.72 per mile under the old contract in force prior to October, 1896. Ten per cent off that would be 37 cents less than that, and 15 per cent off would be half more. What does Mr. Blair say the present cost is? That for locomotives per thousand miles there is $2.72 paid at the present time instead of $3.72 for oil; that for passenger cars 80 cents per thousand miles was the charge under the old arrangement. At the present time it costs 22 cents; that under the old arrangement the flat cars were 20 cents, and we have got the expense down from 20 cents to 12 cents. There is a clear statement. The hon. gentleman questions the accuracy of it, but if he wishes to question the accuracy of that statement, why did he not move for a committee? Mr. Blair made these statements on June 27, in the House of Commons. There was Mr. Haggart sitting there. Mr. Haggart discussed Mr. Blair's views on various questions, but on this he did not say one word.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will the hon. gentleman just read those figures again while I compare them with the report of the department?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will do so by-and-by.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I pointed out that the figures which he asserts come from Mr. Blair are not correct. I have the blue-book in my hand.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Mr. Powell was there. Mr. Powell is a political opponent of Mr. Blair's. Mr. Powell made an elaborate speech in the House of Commons criticising the views expressed by Mr. Blair, and there is not a member of the opposition in that House, either Mr. Haggart, who is thoroughly familiar with the whole subject, nor Mr. Powell, who lives in the district and who knows what the facts are, nor Mr. Foster, the late Finance Minister, who is also a resident of the province of New Brunswick, and a keen opponent of Mr. Blair—there was not one of them that called in question these statements, and if my hon. friend opposite wanted an investigation of this subject, wanted to probe it to the bottom, why did he not call the attention of some of his friends in the House of Commons to it, and have them, where Mr. Blair sits, where he has an opportunity of, face to face, meeting those who are disposed to question the accuracy of his statements—I say why did he not do that and have this question threshed out in the presence of the minister? I daresay he did. I daresay he was told then that there was nothing in the views he expressed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Has the hon. member any authority for that statement?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have simply the exercise of my reason.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Has the hon. gentleman any authority for the statement that I was told by members of the House of Commons that there was nothing in this statement?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I say it was a natural conclusion.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is what you say now.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was what I said at the beginning, if there was any foundation for the statements he has made, he would have asked some member of the House of Commons to enter into a controversy with Mr. Blair on the subject. The hon. gentleman has not brought this matter forward now for the first time. Some time ago in the session, he moved a resolution, and on that occasion made a vigorous attack on Mr. Blair. He went over very much the same ground he has gone over to-day. All the facts he has given to-day on that subject he gave some time ago, and Mr. Blair answered the observations which the hon. gentleman made in his speech in the House of Commons on the subject. He says:

> There is a gentleman in another place who has attacked, with a good deal of violence, the action of the department in respect to its award of contracts for the supply of lubricating oils. It is very evident to me that the gentleman who has taken this subject up with such energy, has not acquainted himself with the facts, and that he has not really known much about the matter that he was discussing. When I came into the department tenders had been received by the late government's department for the supply of oils for the Intercolonial Railway. I think I can say that the contract had been awarded. The contract had not been executed, but it had been awarded to what I considered the company making the most favourable offer. It was awarded very much along the same lines that the contracts had been in previous years, and as far as I could gather, or form a judgment myself upon the subject, there had not been satisfaction in the working out of these contracts, as we had a right to expect.

From whom did Mr. Blair get the information that the contracts had not worked satisfactorily? Why, from his officers?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—From whom?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—From his officers.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Does he say so?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I know from whom he got the information.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He does not say so, but you profess to know ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. Mr. Blair continues :

Among the many tenderers at that time was a company known as the Galena Oil Company. This is a company which had been organized, which was not then in Canada, but which was an American institution. They tendered upon a new basis for the supply of oils for the Intercolonial Railway. They offered to guarantee to the Intercolonial Railway authorities that the cost of lubricating the road for a year would not amount to as much per thousand miles during the continuance of their contract, as it had during previous years, by 10 per cent.

Now, that was their declaration, and that declaration is embodied in their contract. Mr. Blair continues :

Or, in other words, they said : We are prepared to furnish oil at a cost of 10 per cent less than oil has cost you hitherto. It looked to me like a very favourable offer, and when I became aware that 90 odd per cent of the railways in America were being supplied by this company with their oil, and were operating under a contract of the same character as, I have reason to believe, I felt that it was an experiment that the Intercolonial Railway might very well make, instead of continuing along on the old groove and getting unsatisfactory service. I thought it would be well to try the Galena Oil Company, and see how their contract would work out. The conditions under which the contract was made, are these : The oils which they supply are charged for at a fixed rate. I state at once, and this is where the gentleman who has been making the criticisms upon this matter has been labouring under a misapprehension, that the prices of the oil they furnish are high, and they claim they are high class oils, but the prices which are charged against the Intercolonial Railway are identical in every particular with the prices that are paid by all the other railway companies. I took pains to satisfy myself that the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway Companies pay exactly the same prices for the oils furnished them that this company charge us. But the question of the price of the oil was not a very material consideration, because I had the condition guaranteed that no matter what quantity of oil we used, and no matter what the price they charged, when we came to wind up the transactions of the year our bill should be 10 per cent less than it had been in any previous year. We therefore stood to win to the extent of 10 per cent in any case. The Galena Oil Company proceed upon the supposition that a good deal of oil is wasted, and so they have experts of their own upon the railway to instruct the enginemen and drivers to be as economical as possible, and they watch them and complain of them if there is any waste. They have therefore an interest to keep down the consumption, because the less the consumption the less they lose under the arrangement they made with us.

Hon. gentlemen will see, no matter what price is put on the oil or how much of it is used, the sum paid the company is 10 per cent less than the government paid before for this service.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It ought to be that, but it is not that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, it is that.

Under these circumstances, I presented the case to the government, and my colleagues cancelled the award of contract that was made, and authorized the entering into this contract, and it has been continued down to the present time. The service has been eminently satisfactory. The officers of the road, from the general manager down, are assured that the results have been much more favourable in every way than under the previous system of contracting.

Now, the hon. gentleman will see how I know it. Mr. Blair continues :

After the first contract expired, I thought I would perhaps press the point a little further, and I said : You have guaranteed us 10 per cent saving, but we will only renew the contract upon the condition that you will guarantee us 15 per cent. Rather than not get the contract—and I suppose even at that rate it was profitable to them—they guaranteed that the cost per 1,000 miles would be 15 per cent less than it had been prior to the time they contracted with us. Now, we have this arrangement recently entered into. We find that the expense of oils on the Intercolonial Railway has been, year by year, coming down, until we are justified in forming the opinion that we have pretty nearly struck rock bottom. Under the operation of the old contracts, it cost to oil an Intercolonial Railway locomotive per thousand miles $3.72, to oil a passenger 80 cents per thousand miles, and to oil a freight car 22 cents. Now we have got down to the point that we have a fixed contract with them that for locomotives we will not pay more than $2.72 per thousand miles, which is a saving of $1 per thousand miles for each locomotive; and instead of paying 80 cents for a passenger car, as under the old system, we have got it down to 20 cents, and we have got the freight cars down from 22 cents to 12 cents. We are, therefore, actually saving under this contract $10,000 a year and upwards in the cost of oils for the Intercolonial Railway. Yet this gentleman denounces this government in all the moods and tenses because we have made this contract. We are paying the same price that every railway company in America is paying.

Now, that is the statement of the hon. Minister of Railways in the House of Commons. That statement was made in the presence of Mr. Haggart, who took part in the discussion, and who subsequently criticised the speech of which that is a part. He makes no comment upon this portion of the speech. He was criticised by Mr. Powell, who is an active and vigorous opponent, and Mr. Powell makes no comment upon this part of Mr. Blair's speech, and I take it that the speech of the Minister of Railways is perfectly consistent with the facts. If there is any foundation at all for the statement which the hon. gentleman has made here to-day, it would simply mean this, not that the bargain was a bad one, not that the bargain was not in the interests of the community, but that it had not been strictly enforced by the Minister of Railways. I need not enter into that discussion. If it has not been strictly enforced, undoubtedly the opponents of Mr. Blair in the House of Commons will look after that. Mr. Blair is not in a position, standing upon the terms of this contract, maintaining and defending himself on the provisions which the contract contains—he is in no position to pay, nor does he undertake to pay more than under the contract would be warranted. If the company have received more money than the locomotive mileage will entitle them to, they will receive less in the case of a future payment. Whether a demand is made to settle up strictly every month or not I do not know. I have not inquired into the matter, but I have read to the House the defence of Mr. Blair. In my opinion it is full and satisfactory. If there has been payment in excess of what the contract provides for, that would be a good reason for saying to Mr. Blair, or anybody else, when you make a further payment you must pay a less sum, because these parties have received, in what you have already paid them, more than they are entitled to under their contract. Whether they have been paid more than they should receive, I do not know. I do not attach a very great deal of importance to the statement of the hon. gentleman. I have found him on so many occasions making representations with regard to the facts he submits to this House that are not always borne out upon further investigation, that I decline to take any statement he may make here on a question of this sort in opposition to the opinion and views expressed by my colleague, the Minister of Railways. The hon. gentleman told us, that he knew, of his own personal knowledge, that certain things were so at an earlier period of the session, and it turned out that he did not know of his knowledge —that he did not know at all—that, in fact, the statement was a calumny.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I call the hon. gentleman to order. I deny emphatically that I did anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I say the hon. gentleman did.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman is always abusive. He tries to misrepresent me and he is not satisfied with doing this, but he invokes his little newspaper in London to do the same thing.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman has not made a speech this session without attacking the character of public men.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do that on public grounds, but the hon. gentleman attacks me personally.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I say the hon. gentleman's observations are totally unwarranted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What was the calumny to which the hon. gentleman referred ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman made an insinuation here to-day——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman said that in the early part of the session the hon. gentleman from Marshfield had made an unwarranted charge against members of the government. What was the calumny ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That members of the government had bought Pineau, and that he knew it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I call the hon. gentleman to order. I never made the statement that members of the government had bought Pineau. The hon. gentleman has made an assertion that is not warranted by the facts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is the inference to be drawn from the gentleman's statement.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is only on a par with what the hon. gentleman has been saying. He thinks scolding will be accepted in this House, as discussion of public questions.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island is out of order, as he always is when he addresses the House. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman says that I charged members of the government with having bought Pineau.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You insinuated it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then when I denied his statement, he went on and said further that it was the inference to be drawn from my remarks, but his first statement was that I had deliberately said so. I deny it emphatically. You might infer it from the facts if you like, but I never made that statement in this House or anywhere else. I call for the ruling of the Chair. I deny emphatically that I ever made that statement.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is a question of fact.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a question of order.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I say the hon. gentleman has not submitted to this House a question of order, I made a statement and I am prepared to confirm that statement, and, therefore, I am perfectly in order.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. member said that Mr. Pineau had met certain members of the government and had left the city with Mr. Tarte, that he had been appointed by the government to go to Paris, that he in fact, had been bribed—that he had been elected as a Conservative, and that he was bribed by this government to desert his standard, and that he was on his way to Paris with the hon. Minister of Public Works.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The rules of parliament are laid down so clearly that the point does not require much discussion. You made a distinct statement——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Order. The hon. gentleman should not address me personally.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is quite right. The hon. the Minister of Justice alleged that the hon. senator from Marshfield stated positively that the government had purchased Pineau. The member from Marshfield gets up and denies it. Now, I say whether the hon. gentleman is right or wrong, the duty of a member making a charge against another while in the House, when that charge is denied is bound to accept that denial. I have been placed in that position two or three times myself in the other House—I do not know that I have here, and the Speaker always rules that if a charge be made against a member of the House and he denies it, the charge cannot be reasserted under the rules which govern debates in parliament. The very moment that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield denied positively that he had made that statement, the duty of the Minister of Justice was to withdraw it; that is a ruling that is made every day in the other House. Fortunately for us, we have not been placed in the position, nor has our Speaker been called upon to rule under such circumstances, but as the question has arisen it is just as well we should have a ruling on the subject.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. leader of the opposition is perfectly right in saying that the statement of an hon. member with respect to a personal matter is to be accepted, but I think I shall show that this is not an ordinary case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is an extraordinary case.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman. I think the practice by which the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition interrupts speakers on this side is objectionable. In the first place, I listened carefully to what the hon. Minister of Justice said. He did not say that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield had positively stated that the government were a party to the Pineau transaction. He said that the hon. gentleman had insinuated that (cries of No. No.) Well, I am giving my recollection. Then the minister went on to say that the hon. gentleman had stated something else positively, and the hon. leader of the opposition raised a question of order.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is wrong. I say I did not raise the question of order. It was raised by my hon. friend on my right (Hon. Mr. Ferguson.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—The question of order has been raised. The hon. leader of the opposition did raise this point that the statement made by the hon. member was to be accepted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I want to know whether, admitting all that, the statement of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield now is to be accepted, or the statement made on the 22nd of March? I turn to the Debates of the 22nd March and I find the Hon. Mr. Ferguson (there is no other Mr. Ferguson in the House, I believe) after remarking that Pineau was here, in Ottawa, said:

> He was here until about the day Mr. Tarte left for Paris, and it is believed, and not only believed but thoroughly understood, that he was engaged to represent the provincial government or the federal government at the Paris Exposition, and that he was employed and bargained for to act in that capacity. . . . . I am not in a position to say whether it has been done in the interests of or by the agents of the provincial or federal governments. I have not said by whom it was done. Very likely it has been worked out in collusion between the two. But I make the charge that this man has been approached and seduced from his duty to his constituents.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. Minister of Justice asked 'by whom'? and the hon. gentleman from Marshfield replied:

> By the federal or the Dominion government, or their agents, and that he is now on his way to Paris. I make these statements on good authority, and I have very good reason for believing it is true; and that being so, it is not a surprise to me to find that my question was not answered yes or no, when all the other questions were answered directly.

The hon. gentleman made that statement on the 22nd of March in this House, according to the official report.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Might I ask whether this question has anything to do with the matter before the House? It seems to me it is inadvisable to refer back to it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have a right to speak to this question of order. The hon. Minister of Justice indulged for nearly half an hour in attacks upon me personally. He did not deal with the statements that I made on public questions, but made personal attacks upon myself, questioning my veracity generally in this House. That was the trend of his remarks from the time he rose until he was called up on the point of order and he said I had accused this government of buying Pineau, and that I knew it. What I did was to present to this House evidence that Pineau had been seduced from his allegiance, and I did not draw any strong inference on the subject, yet I believe almost every independent member drew from those statements what inferences could be drawn from them. That is a different thing from saying that the government bought Pineau, and that I knew it, and the hon. gentleman from Halifax who went wandering over the debate, trying to help the Minister of Justice out of this difficulty, does not show a great amount of ingenousness. The hon. gentleman from Halifax, in respect to the telegram from Sir Charles Tupper——

Hon. Mr. POWER—What has that to do with the question?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—And what has the extract the hon. gentleman from Halifax read to do with the question? He said something was of his own knowledge and he knew it, and he had to admit he was wrong. The only part of my statement on the 22nd of March that was not borne out to the letter was the statement that Pineau had gone to Paris. I made that statement the same as the hon. gentleman from Halifax made the statement with regard to Sir Charles Tupper sending the telegram to Sir Wilfrid Laurier to the Star. I made it under a misapprehension, but I put the whole evidence before this House later, and showed every hon. member in this House that I was perfectly honest in making the statement, and I had at least as good reason for making it as the hon. gentleman from Halifax had for saying that he knew Sir Charles Tupper had sent his telegram to the Star for publication instead of direct to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, although it turned out in both cases we were not absolutely right. The hon. Minister of Justice is not content to violate one rule of this House, but he violates several rules. He read page after page of Mr. Blair's statement in the House of Commons. He referred to past debates and he made this statement referring to a past debate, and charged me with saying what I had never said. This practice cannot go on interminably. The hon. gentleman, instead of rising in the House and defending his colleagues, indulges in a tirade of abuse, attacking the veracity of members on this side and telling the House he is not prepared to believe their statements. There might be a good deal of reciprocity on this side of the Chamber, but we have better manners than to return these compliments. We have more regard for parliamentary usage than to do it, but when he makes misstatements we will deal with them and show where they are wrong. My complaint in this matter and the point of order that I raise is that the hon. gentleman charged me with saying that the government had bought Pineau. I deny it. That might be inferred from the affidavit and information I placed before the House, but I did not make that statement.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman said the government of Prince Edward Island or the Dominion had done so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Done what ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What is meant by seducing him from his allegiance and appointing him commissioner to Paris, at a salary of $5 a day. Is that buying ? Does the hon. gentleman think that is buying ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Indirectly.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Well, it is buying, and so my statement was completely borne out by what the hon. gentleman said.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is quite evident the expression seducing a man from his allegiance is not construed usually into a purchase.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And accepting an office at $5 per day.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is it to be inferred that every gentleman who changes sides in politics and goes to the other side is bought? We may say he has been seduced, but not that he has been bought.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The statement was that he was bought and paid $5 a day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Everybody knows Pineau was bought. We know that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And the hon. gentleman said it was by one government or the other.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the hon. gentleman from Halifax tell the Minister of Justice not to interrupt. He is the custodian of order in the House. Apply the same rule to the hon. Minister of Justice as he applied to me. We have had instances in this House where gentlemen have changed from one side to the other and gentlemen have been elected to support one side and have passed over to the other. They may have had conscientious convictions one way or the other, but it is not improper to say they have been seduced. Would it not be improper for the hon. Secretary of State, when he was elected to serve in the House on the opposition side, to turn round and accept a Speakership from Mr. Blake. It might be done conscientiously, and you might apply the same reasoning to this. I very much regret that this controversy has sprung up. We all use expressions in the heat of debate which should not be used, but these attacks are not conducive to the dignity of the House I frankly confess, and I say, in all sincerity, that I do not know any member of this House who indulges in that positive kind of contradiction more than the hon. Minister of Justice himself.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is another contradiction. If hon. gentlemen look at the records they will find what I state is correct. How often, when I have been speaking, has the hon. gentleman said I was not correct. I am not going to argue that question at all, but I reaffirm what I stated before, that when the denial of a statement attributed to another is made, the duty of the member is to withdraw the statement at once, and it is for the Speaker to say whether that should be the rule to guide us in future.

The SPEAKER—I do not believe there is any difference of opinion among the members of this House as to the question of order raised. When an hon. member is charged with having made a statement, and he denies the statement, there is no doubt the members of the House must accept his denial. In this case the hon. Minister of Justice said that he did not make the charge that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield had said that the government had bought Pineau, but that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield had insinuated that. If the hon. gentleman from Marshfield says he did not make such an insinuation, the hon. minister must accept his denial. I do not believe there is any difference of opinion on the question of order that the denial by a member of having made a statement must be accepted. It remains for the House to appreciate the words used in the debate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then we will take it for granted that the hon. minister withdraws it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the hon. gentleman says he made no such statement.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not make that statement.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Made no such statement ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Not that statement.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the hon. gentleman wishes to deserve the charge——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think we had better leave this matter until we see whether the Minister of Justice acts in accordance with the ruling of the Chair. We do not propose to go on with any business in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I accept the ruling.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I wish to take exception to one or two remarks made by the hon. Minister of Justice. He complains that the senator from Marshfield did not bring this subject before the Senate at an earlier period, and he also said that it should be brought up in the Commons, where the Minister of Railways could answer any charges that were made. Perhaps it would be better that it should be brought up in the House of Commons, if any member of that House thought proper to deal with it. If they do not bring it up there, it does not follow that members of this House should not bring the matter before parliament in order to expose what they believe to be a wrong. What are the two ministers here for but to answer for the government? The hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. Secretary of State have seats in this House for that special purpose, and during a late administration, when there was no minister in the Senate to represent the government, some hon. gentleman was selected for that purpose, and when questions were put upon the paper that require answers from the government, the government furnished him with the answers, and he gave them, and when charges were made against any of the ministers, the gentleman in that position, although not a minister, always assumed the responsibility of answering for the minister, and yet we have two ministers who, when we bring anything before the Senate which we think is in the public interest, are constantly telling us that it should not be brought here, but in the other House. In reference to the complaint made by the hon. Minister of Justice that this question was not brought before parliament at an early date, the hon. senator for Marshfield has been for two years trying to get these very returns upon which to base the motion and the remarks which he has made, and it is only a week or two ago that the last information on which he sought to make the charge against the Minister of Railways was laid upon the Table, and yet the Minister of Justice tells us it is unfair to the government that he did not bring the question before us five months ago. I regret very much that parliament is not sitting longer——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No. I do not mean that. But I regret that we did not have this information at an earlier period in order to enable the hon. gentleman from Marshfield to move for that very committee to which he refers, when we would have been enabled to get at the actual truth and ascertain which was correct, whether these public documents from which the hon. senator from Marshfield quoted and the official report from the department, or the statements made by Mr. Blair, in the other House, are correct. There is one point that the hon. Minister of Justice did not refer to on which I should like him to inform the House if he can. The hon. senator from Marshfield made this distinct statement, and to my mind a very serious statement and a serious charge against the department, that while the contract provides for a deduction of 10 per cent from the account for the oil used should it fail to be less by that amount than it had cost the government under the previous contracts, the reduction was only made, so far as the public documents show, this year, the 8th May, 1899, and that deduction was made covering, so far as we can judge, the whole term during which this contract has been running, and it is credited to the expenditure for this year, and does not cover the three years as it should if we had honest book-keeping. That is the point.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—A 40 per cent discount.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to ascertain whether that statement, which has been made by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, based upon the documentary evidence in his hands, is correct; because if it be correct, then we have a positive instance of cooking the books and giving a credit to one year which should be distributed over three years. If that be the case, how much dependence is this House, or the country, to place in other statements made by the gentleman who keeps books in such a way and presents such a statement to the House? That is a serious question and that is about the only point to which I desire to call the attention of the House. To my mind, the hon. gentleman from Marshfield has made a statement which deserves the serious consideration, not only of the government, but of this country. He has shown that contracts were given at exorbitant rates as compared with the offers made by others. He has established that, by documentary evidence laid before the House. He read from a contract which made certain provisions. Those provisions were not complied with. They were to be investigated once every month, and it was not done, nor was any deduction made, or any investigation as to the cost, until the third year after the running of the contract. Is that correct, or is it not? If it is correct, then why were not the terms of the contract carried out? That is the point we want to know, and we should know whether the deduction made, in order to bring it below what they pledged themselves to bring it, so far as the other contract was concerned, was credited to the one year's expenditure instead of to the three years, which enabled the minister to say that our expenditure this year has been so much less than it was in 1896. The hon. senator from Marshfield also established this fact, from the documents which are before him, that instead of being 10 per cent less, it was more than 12 per cent in excess of the cost of oil prior to the entering into the present contract. That is another point we would like to have explained before we can accept the dictum of the Minister of Railways as implicitly as his colleague does. I am not finding fault with him for accepting the minister's statement, because he is bound to do so, or go out, and I never supposed he would do that. He will take the word of his colleague until it is proven positively incorrect. If we live till next year, I think it would not be a bad step for the hon. senator from Marshfield to accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman and move for a committee at the earliest possible moment after the House meets, and have a thorough examination into the whole matter, and see who tells the truth and what little manipulations have taken place. As to the political part, we take it for granted that the agent of the Galena Oil Company appeared in Queen's County purely accidentally. What he was doing there we do not know. If it was summer, we might suppose he went there to take up a summer residence.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It was in August.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We will give him the credit of going there, as to a health resort, and not with reference to elections.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Did it never occur to hon. gentlemen that the agent of an extensive oil company, making contracts with the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway and other railway companies in Canada, would go to New Brunswick to ascertain what chance there was to make similar arrangements with the Intercolonial Railway? That would not be a remarkable thing.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not at all. We accept that explanation at once without any cavilling at all, but it strikes me very forcibly that a man doing a large business would go to the head-quarters and not to a country district. He would go to the city of St. John if he wanted to deal with the railroad officials, or he might go to Moncton. If he were going to make a bargain in Ottawa, he would not go out to the town of Renfrew or Arnprior.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But supposing——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will not suppose anything about it. I take the facts. This gentleman was there, and I intimated that he went there for the benefit of his health, and then after he had spent a little time in recreation and make a bargain with the Canadian Pacific Railway. No doubt about that. It is, of course, a mere incident in the oil transaction. There we will leave it, and I hope the hon. gentleman will answer my question, if he knows whether this amount was credited to the expenditure of last year, or whether it was to cover the whole three years.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—All I can say to the hon. gentleman is that there is a contract, the terms of which the hon. gentleman beside him has read. The terms of the contract are that the Intercolonial Railway shall be supplied with oil at 15 per cent less than the previous year. The terms are perfectly simple, and I assume that the hon. Minister of Railways has conformed to the terms. The hon. gentleman says he has not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I said that on the authority of the Department of Railways.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is a fair subject for inquiry for those who have no confidence in the ministers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The statement he took out of the official returns laid before parliament.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am sorry that a personal altercation arose over this matter, and I appeal to the House in the observations that I addressed to it on the subject that I discussed the matter without any personal attack on any person, unless the stating of the fact which has been reported to me by very many witnesses, that Mr. Lichtenhein appeared in New Brunswick during the election in Mr. Blair's constituency be regarded as a personal charge. He made the contract on September 17 and beyond that and what inference might be drawn from it, I made no personal attack on any person. In addition to that, I very much regret that the session is so far advanced that I am not able to go into an investigation of the subject now. I am perfectly willing to go into it if the House could give the time and attention to it. If I live to be here another year, I will move for a committee of inquiry and have the subject investigated to the bottom. In the meantime, however, the duty devolves upon the Minister of Justice to reply to these statements clearly and fully. The country will expect to find some justification for awarding this contract at the exorbitant prices contained in the tender of this company. They will expect that members of the government will answer the points that have been raised. That is, were these deductions faithfully made in the terms of this contract? They will not be satisfied with the presumption of my hon. friend or the presumption of the Minister of Railways, or of anybody. They will require a clear and distinct showing that these deductions were faithfully made month by month, and year by year, since this contract was entered into, and they will also have to show that a sufficient amount has been deducted. I am making my statement on the authority of the returns brought down by the leader of the House himself from the Department of Railways. When I asked for the detailed statement of deductions it was shown the deduction was made on the 8th of May, 1899. I make that statement on that authority, and that that deduction was all taken out of the operations of one year, and that it was the result of that unfair deduction from the year ending 30th June, 1899, that the hon. gentleman read to the House from the statement of the Minister of Railways. I made the further statement that, after that deduction, it still did not reduce the cost of the lubrication of the road below the amount paid in 1896; that it is still, taking the three divisions of the service together, 12 per cent higher than it was that year, instead of being 10 per cent lower. I make these statements, and if correct, it shows extraordinary laxity in the enforcing of this contract, and is calculated to throw a great deal of doubt and suspicion on the whole transaction from beginning to end.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—There has been no answer to the inquiry.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Certainly we have a right to a reply.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is a contract existing, and I have no doubt the Minister of Railways will live up to the terms of the contract. The hon. gentleman has the contract before him.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is no contract. The contract made in 1896 was for one year.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It runs from year to year.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (189) 'An Act to amend the Act respecting the Judges of Provincial Courts.'

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the Bill be read the second time on Monday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This Bill relates to the North-west Territories and the Yukon.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. I carried through a short Bill here providing that one of the judges of the North-west should be a chief justice. There were five puisné judges before that. There is no change in the number, but there is a provision that one of them shall be a chief justice, and the Bill provides that the salary of that chief justice shall be one thousand dollars more than the salary of the other judges.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Have the government appointed a chief justice for the North-west Territories ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, we cannot, until the salary is fixed.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Will the hon. gentleman say when they will appoint a chief justice ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot say.

The motion was agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (156) 'An Act to amend the Civil Service Act.'

(In the Committee.)

On clause 2.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the case of writers, or extra clerks as already existing, this clause makes provision for junior second-class clerks.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—What is the meaning of that ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You cannot appoint a man now to the public service unless you appoint him at four hundred dollars or eleven hundred dollars. Some years ago the second-class clerks were abolished. You could not get a capable clerk for four hundred dollars. This authorizes the appointment of junior second-class clerks at $600.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Will these second-class clerks occupy the position of third-class clerks ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is a clause in this Bill which says that third-class clerks shall become junior second-class clerks.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I)—This is reverting to the principle we had in the original Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Under another name.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—It just shows the mistake the government made in doing away with the provision. We are now reverting to it. I believe the former Act was good and serviceable, and was satisfactory to the country and to the civil service. I believe the government made a mistake when they changed it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, although I was partially responsible for it. Experience has taught us that that restriction cannot be well worked out in practice. I have always thought it was a mistake to restrict the salary to four hundred dollars. As the Secretary of State has said very properly, if you get a clerk that is fit for the position you must pay him a fair salary. For some positions $400 is enough, but it is not enough for others. I am fully in accord with the principle of the Bill.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 6,

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I hope that this provision will be carried out strictly. There was a statutory allowance under the old Civil Service Act by which civil servants were entitled to an increase of $50 a year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If approved of.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is for each optional subject. It has nothing to do with a statutory increase. In the original Civil Service Act, as it is in the Revised Statutes, there is this same provision with respect to third-class clerks, and it is replacing the law as it was before.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Was it ever carried out?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I never understood that it was.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has been the law for a great many years. If a young gentleman who has been appointed a third-class clerk, passes two or three optional subjects—that is subjects not embraced in the examination papers necessary to give him the appointment, he was allowed fifty dollars for each.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That was in the old Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—And was it carried out?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, I carried it out myself.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 8,

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I want an explanation of this.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When Sir Oliver Mowat was Minister of Justice, he gave it as his opinion that the increase of $50 did not follow as a matter of course, but only when recommended by the deputy and approved by the minister—that it was not a matter of contract.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I believe other legal opinions had been had to show that it was compulsory—that it was a contract entered into with these parties when they entered the service, and the government had no power to restrict it. I know there is a contrary opinion, and I should like the thing to be thoroughly understood. If these men entered the service with the condition that the $50 a year increase should be paid, the increase should be granted. I do not believe in paying one and refusing to pay another. It should not be discretionary with the minister of any department to say 'We will pay A and will not pay B.' I want to see full justice done to the civil service employees. They are entitled to it. If it was a contract under the statute, it should be carried out. I know it has been carried out in some instances. Some have received more than $50 a year increase, while others have not received a cent. Was that the understanding when this law was passed some years ago? The old government carried it out in its entirety. If a man is not fit for the service, discharge him, but I believe in carrying out the conditions of the agreement on which he entered the service so long as he is retained in it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As a rule it was carried out by the late government, but in some cases it was not carried out.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—For reasons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The law requires that a report shall be made and signed by the deputy minister. He must report, under the law, to the minister that the clerk is worthy of that $50 increase. I somewhat agree with the hon. gentleman when he says, if the clerk is not worthy of the increase he should be dismissed. There are some cases where the conduct of a clerk is such that the government are justified in withholding the $50 increase. I had some cases of the kind in my own department. When I called the attention of the deputy minister to their conduct he refused to make the recommendation, and the minister had no authority or power, under the law, to make it. All I could do was, either to dismiss the man and throw him upon the world, or punish him for that year by withholding the $50, and I think it is a very good provision. The old law says 'may do it,' and this Bill says 'may.' I know we always practiced it in the government of which I was a member for some seventeen years. If the ministers are honest and do not wish to punish a man for his political views, and only punish a man when his conduct deserves it, it is better to withhold the increase than to throw him on the world to find a living for his family in some other way.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The lawyers differ on the subject. Some say the increase is optional, others that it is obligatory ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—It is optional. This only applies, as I understand it, to clerks in the inside service, not to employees in the outside service.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 13,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When this Bill was introduced it was thought it would have received the royal assent before the 1st of July. It will not now, of course, and it is necessary to amend the clause so that the salaries of second-class clerks shall date from the 1st of July. Therefore, I propose to amend this clause to that effect.

The clause was amended and agreed to.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

The Bill was read the third time and passed under a suspension of the rule.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONSIDERED.

Consideration of the Message from the House of Commons disagreeing to the amendment made by the Senate to (Bill K) 'An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills).

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I move :

That the Senate do not insist on their disagreement to the 3rd and 5th amendment to the said Bill, but concur in the said amendment.

I prefer taking that course rather than lose the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I object to that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think we should delay the consideration of this matter, because there will be some discussion and it will take some time. Speaking for myself, I do not propose to vote for that motion. I should prefer voting for a motion declaring that we insist on our amendments, and give some reasons.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I take the same ground as the hon. leader of the opposition. This is a matter peculiarly pertaining to the department of the Minister of Justice, and we should insist on our amendments. I do not understand on what principle the House of Commons interfered with a matter of that sort peculiarly devolving on the department of the Minister of Justice. I take strong grounds on that matter, and I intend to vote against concurrence in these amendments submitted to us by the Commons.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (11) 'An Act to amend the Pilotage Act.'—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (182) 'An Act respecting the construction of a branch railway from Charlottetown to Murray Harbour.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

Bill (167) 'An Act to amend the Copyright Act.'—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

J. W. ANDERSON RELIEF BILL.

The Order of the Day being called :

Consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills to (Bill 108) 'An Act to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of J. W. Anderson.'—(Hon. Mr. DeBoucherville.)

Hon. Mr. McKAY moved the concurrence in the amendments.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was then read the third time, as amended, and passed.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Saturday, July 7, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE DISMISSAL OF LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR McINNES.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg to lay on the Table the correspondence asked for in reference to the dismissal of Lieutenant-Governor McInnes. I may say here that a return was brought down at the end of last session which gave all the correspondence in relation to the dismissal of Mr. Turner's administration. It has been printed by order of the committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman did not duplicate that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When that motion was made by the hon. leader of the opposition, particular reference was made to myself. The hon. gentleman read, I presume, from a British Columbia newspaper, or some paper that had copied the article from a British Columbia paper, in which it was intimated that if the Lieutenant-Governor had made a mistake he had been advised improperly by the Secretary of State, that the Secretary of State had marked his letters 'confidential,' and that therefore they could not be produced. At the same time he quoted several paragraphs from confidential communications, and intimated that there was a difference in the advice given him on one occasion from the advice given him on another, under absolutely similar conditions. It is only proper under these circumstances in laying those papers on the Table, that I should be permitted, to make a very short statement, as my name has been so prominently connected with this matter. I may say that after this statement was read by the hon. gentleman in this House, I sent the following telegram to Lieutenant-Governor McInnes:

Hon. T. R. McInnes, Victoria, B.C.

You have referred so fully to our private confidential correspondence, and published extracts from it, there is no longer any reason for regarding it as private. Your statements referring to my private suggestions were read in the Senate and I was asked for an explanation, which I must now give, by bringing down all private letters and telegrams.

That was sent on July 4. I received no answer to it, but I understand additional extracts, copied from my letters, have been, in the meantime, published by Lieutenant-Governor McInnes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They were published in full, judging from the telegram from Victoria which I read this morning in the press.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hon. gentlemen who were in the Chamber when Lieutenant-Governor McInnes was here know my relations with him. He and I were acting in friendly co-operation, and when he became Lieutenant-Governor, he commenced to write me occasional letters marked 'private and confidential.' I was only too glad to give him any suggestion that might be of use to him, not by way of advice, but simply as one friend would write to another. In any of my private and confidential letters to him they were not written at the inspiration of the government, nor were they shown to my colleagues, and some of my colleagues have expressed very great surprise at the announcement made in the press, as it was the first intimation they had received of those letters. My hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, only saw the correspondence on the morning of the day on which reference was made to it here. However, the letters written by myself, and off my own bat, as the saying is, are not in any sense as representing the views of the government. I think on only one occasion have I written a letter, and marked it 'private and confidential' to Mr. McInnes, that was not an answer to a previous communication from him. I shall draw attention to that in a moment. The House probably will remember that a general election took place in British Columbia, in July, 1898. The Turner government were dismissed in August, 1898, before the returns were all in, and in the same month Mr. Semlin was called on to form a government. Less than three months after the election, Mr. McInnes sent me this communication: I do not know that it was marked 'confidential.' However, I did not put it on file, as I thought it was not a question which ought to be made public. The letter is dated Victoria, October 21, 1898. I read this in order that the House and the public will understand that my communications with Mr. McInnes were not voluntary on my part in any sense, but, as a rule, were answers to requests from him to me. This, it will be remembered, was less than three months from the general election, before the House had been called together. I do not know that the telegram was even in cypher:

Victoria, Oct. 21, 1898.

Lieut.-Governor to R. W. Scott.

Can I consitutionally grant request for dissolution before new legislature was formally convened?

Please wire reply.

T. R. McINNES.

That communication was sent shortly after the general election. The new government wanted to have another election. My answer was this :

While technically you might have the right to grant dissolution on advice of your ministers, yet the exercise of that power under existing circumstances would be regarded as extraordinary and unprecedented, and I would advise against its exercise. Confidential.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that in this correspondence ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, I put it there. The first letter I wrote of my own mere motion to Mr. McInnes was in August, 1899. It will be remembered that the legislature there meets in the month of January, and usually prorogues in February. In 1898, the House had prorogued at the ordinary time, I think on February 27. It was reported that Mr. McInnes was forcing his government either to call a meeting of the legislature or to dissolve the House. It must be remembered the election was only in the preceding year—that the members of the Semlin government had met the House—had carried through their measures successfully and the House had adjourned in the usual way, yet in the month of July or August it was reported that pressure was brought to bear on his ministers in order that they might be brought to act. This is the only letter I wrote :

August 30, 1899.

(Confidental.)

My dear McInnes,—Since Martin left the government rumours have been afloat that he intended 'carrying the war into Africa,' and to accomplish that feat his friends were pressing for an earlier meeting of the legislature that he might make his attack.

I presume that the members of your government have no intention of giving Martin the opportunity he would like by calling the legislature before the usual time of meeting, and your ministers are the proper judges of the time to summon the assembly—keeping, of course, within the year's limit.

I was glad to observe that the charges made against you by the Turner government fell flat, and outside of the newspaper discussion your action did not evoke much criticism in parliament. Still it must be admitted that the course you took in getting rid of the Turner government was a little more drastic than that usually adopted under similar conditions. I should not, however, like to see you repeat so dashing a method of changing your advisers. It is always better to leave to the representatives of the people in the assembly the delicate question of deciding whether the advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor have the confidence of the country.

I was glad to get your report on the Atlin district. It is likely to prove a rich field for the miner. I note that it is stated that the Alien Act has rather retarded than helped the development of the district, and that it is in contemplation to repeal the Act next session. Its repeal would remove one of the grievances now being developed at Washington, and one which is likely to be brought before the Joint Commission when they meet again.

Hoping you are well and enjoying your position.

I remain, yours very truly,

R. W. SCOTT.

The Honourable T. R. McInnes,
Lieutenant-Governor British Columbia,
Victoria, B.C.

Then he writes me on September 12, a letter in which he acknowledges that, and he quotes my letter. It is a long letter in which he says I am mistaken, that Martin is not the one, but there are other parties who are pressing for a dissolution, or for an early meeting. He says :

Victoria, B.C., September 12, 1899.

(Confidential.)

The Hon. R. W. Scott,
Secretary of State,
Ottawa, Canada.

My dear Scott,—Your letter of the 30th ultimo received and contents carefully considered. You say : 'Since Martin left the government rumours have been afloat that he intended carrying the war into Africa, and that to accomplish that feat his friends were pressing for an earlier meeting of the legislature that he might make his attack.' That is hardly correct. I have neither spoken with nor seen Martin for the last six months, and have no idea of what his plans may be, but, judging from his past record doubtless he will be inclined to 'carry the war into Africa.' But it is not Martin's friends who are clamouring for an early session, but Martin's bitterest enemies—parties represented by such papers as the Victoria 'Colonist' Victoria 'Globe,' Nelson 'Miner,' Kamloops 'Standard,' &c. These parties expect that an early session would result not exactly in the restoration of the Turner government, but in the installation of a government in sympathy and in line with the old government. Personally, I am of opinion that an early session should be held, altogether irrespective of the question of the government being sustained, or of this or that party coming into power. For permit me to say that without being in the province you can hardly realize the feeling of unrest and uncertainty existing as a result of the present political situation. Business interests, particularly in the matter of mining development, are rather seriously affected by it. And I have been urging upon my ministers that under the circumstances they should meet the legislature by the end of October, or appeal to the electorate. In obedience, however, to your suggestion that my ministers should be allowed to fix the date of the meeting of the legislature, as they think most advisable, keeping within the year's limit, and also giving consideration to the reasons urged by them against a session before January, I have withdrawn my request for an October session, asking however that early notice be given of a meeting of the legislature for January 4—the date suggested by themselves, and only one day earlier than the meeting of the legislature last year. I inclose editorial from the 'Globe' from which you will learn that petitions are to be circulated throughout the province asking for my dismissal on the ground chiefly that I have not dismissed the present government, or insisted upon an early session. I merely mention this, not that I feel at all concerned by the said petitions, but as an evidence of the strong demand existing among the people for an early opportunity to pronounce upon the present political situation. However, as above indicated, I will follow your advice in the matter, and await a session in January. You express a hope that I am enjoying my present position. I cannot say that I have found it to be any particular sinecure so far, and I may tell you frankly that I seriously contemplate giving it up at an early date, and re-entering Dominion politics. There are some matters that I do not care to treat of in a letter, but had I the opportunity of an hour's conversation with you, I might enlighten you somewhat as to the actual state of affairs in this province—particularly from a Dominion party standpoint. I fear that the government has relied over much upon the advice of inexperienced politicians as far as this province is concerned—upon the representations of those who cry 'all is well' where all is not well. Remember, my dear senator, that I am far from saying this in any spirit of hostility or captiousness, but from a desire that you should be informed as to the true state of affairs here.

By the way, the letter you sent me about the beginning of my term with directions as to the use of Slater's Code, was burned in the government House fire, but as I remember it the sender was to add four hundred to the code word, the receiver to substract—and so, unless otherwise instructed I will interpret any cipher messages you may have occasion to send me.

Believe me, yours very sincerely,
(Sd.) THOMAS R. McINNES.

He inclosed some editorials from newspapers advertising that there should be an earlier session. The next communication was before the formation of the Martin government. I was wrong in stating that I had not written a second communication except as an answer. In February, after the dismissal of the Semlin government, I wrote:

Ottawa, February 27, 1900.

Lieutenant-Governor McInnes,
Victoria, B.C.

I understand your government is being materially strengthened by accession of several members from opposition ranks. Think you should give them a little time rather than force dissolution or a change.

(Sd.) R. W. SCOTT.

He answers:

Hon. R. W. Scott,
Ottawa.

Several hours before receiving telegram I called other advisers. Will write full details which will justify my action.

(Sd.) THOMAS R. McINNES.

The communications that I am reading of course are all in the returns. The next is a letter of March 3, in which he gives reasons for Mr. Semlin's dismissal, I do not know that I need read it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We will read it at our leisure. It is a very long letter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He writes to me justifying his course. I did not answer that letter. On March 4, he wrote me another confidential letter, which I did not answer, on the same subject, justifying his dismissal of the Semlin government. Then by advice of the government, as Secretary of State, I did send an official communication on March 15 by wire:

The government desire to know whether you have completed your Executive Council, and how soon you expect your advisers to receive the approval of the people or their representatives. Please report fully.

Then there is correspondence in which he announced that three ministers had been sworn in. Then there was a very considerable gap before other ministers were sworn in. I need not bother the House with it; I suppose hon. gentlemen will see it in the public press. At the instance of the government, telegrams were sent to him from time to time, pressing him to either dissolve the House or call the legislature together, or take some action. On April 9, there is an important telegram. It will be remembered that Mr. McInnes formed a new government on February 27. On April 9, this telegram was sent, after we had received his report:

Your report received. After giving it and all the circumstances every consideration, the Privy Council is of opinion that the existing legislature should either be immediately summoned to meet or immediately dissolved, and an appeal made without delay to the people. Postponement of such a meeting or appeal cannot, in the opinion of the Privy Council, be justified.

He had formed his government and he had taken six weeks to do it and the government was being carried on without the representatives of the people having any seats in the legislature and wholly in defiance of the principle of responsible government. I may say here that one member of the government, Mr. Spencer Ridout, was sworn in on April 3, as Finance Minister. He held office for a month. He did not go to the people, and on May 4, he resigned, and another gentleman was named Finance Minister in his place, so that there is the unprecedented principle of a man being Finance Minister of an important province for a month who had never been in the legislature, who was not in the legislature at the time, and who, I believe, now has not been elected in the new House. In communications to me Mr. McInnes endeavoured to make explanations, stating that it was important that they should wait for a new list. That was really the argument he used later on, and finally, when he delayed so long, he stated the law would not allow them to have an election until some time in the month of June. It should be remembered that in February the change took place, and in the meantime the members of the government held office without any recognition by the people. Hon. gentlemen will also remember the scene that took place when the House was prorogued, that the members on both sides of the House got up and left the Chamber, Mr. Martin, who had himself of course resigned and taken the oath of office, being the only one who had been a member of the legislature that attended in the Chamber when the Lieutenant-Governor addressed the vacant benches and prorogued the legislature.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The Speaker was there.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am reminded that the Speaker was there. Then there was a letter which was marked 'strictly confidential,' of April 13.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is where the hon. gentleman tells him that he thinks it is unconstitutional to allow so long a time to elapse before completing the personnel of the government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The letter reads :

Ottawa, April 13, 1900.

(Strictly confidential.)

My dear McInnes,—Personally I fully appreciate all the difficulties you have had to encounter in the formation of a stable government, but the judgment expressed here is that with a legislature so recently elected you should have endeavoured to form a government out of the material in the House. Provincial legislatures do not necessarily divide on party lines, and a coalition seemed possible. Then there is a very strong opinion here that it was unconstitutional to permit so long a time to elapse before completing the personnel of the government and appealing to the electors, particularly as so many of your advisers are new and untried men.

At the instance of the Privy Council I have wired for an explanation of the delay in dissolving and in calling the new House. As the lists were revised last fall, it seemed indefensible to postpone the elections for new lists.

The communications passing between the government and yourself are sure to be called for, and, therefore, they must not be addressed to me confidentialy as any letter marked private or confidential does not go on file, and this letter, of course, must be treated as confidential and destroyed.

Yours truly,

(Sd.) R. W. SCOTT.

Hon. T. R. McInnes,
Victoria, B.C.

It has not, however, been destroyed. He quoted from it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is quite evident the hon. gentleman put it on record.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I fortunately kept a copy of it. I did not put it on record. Then in another letter he complains that I gave different advice in my letter of May 15, to the advice I gave him on August 30—that seems to be the offence I have committed ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Which is that ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That the letter of May 15, which I am now about to read, gives him different advice from that given in the letter of September 12, where I advised him to be governed by his ministers, his ministers at that time having prorogued the House with a fair majority and having all been members who had been elected by the people. The letter reads :

(Confidential.)

Victoria, B.C., May 15, 1900.

My dear Scott,—I fully appreciate the expression of sympathy conveyed in your confidential letter of the 13th ultimo, respecting the difficulties with which I have had to contend in endeavouring to secure a stable government. Frankly, however, while I shall always be glad to receive a confidential letter from you, I do not quite appreciate the way in which you have conveyed official directions and instructions in the form of confidential communications. And I will tell you why. Your letter to me of August 30 last, although marked 'confidential,' and so excluded from the list of documents that may be laid before parliament, yet contained definite and specific instructions restraining me from bringing pressure upon my ministers to either call a session of the legislature, or bring on a general election at an early date.

I never did that. My letters were only suggestions and were always marked so. However, I am perfectly willing to stand by the advice I did give him. It will be remembered that in August it was a new House. They had only been elected the year before, and they were not bound to call the legislature together until the ordinary time. There was no special reason for it, and I did advise him to be guided by his ministers. He goes on to say—that the advice given by Mr. Martin and the gentlemen who had been named by him ought to be as readily followed as the advice of the Semlin government who had been sustained by the legislature and who held seats in the House. The letter proceeds :

And now, in your letter under reply, also one that cannot be laid before parliament, I am in effect censured for not having brought pressure to bear upon my present constitutional advisers to compel them to bring on an early session of the legislature, or a general election before the date already fixed. You end your letter by saying :

'Any letter marked private or confidential does not go on file, and this letter, of course, must be treated as confidential and destroyed.'

Neither he nor I destroyed the letters.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is quite evident that the hon. gentleman and Mr. McInnes had no great confidence in each other.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I thought it was better to exercise caution.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. Secretary of State had been his intimate friend and knew how to appreciate him.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The letter continues :

I may tell you that no one but my secretary and myself has seen anything of these confidential letters from you, and I do not think that there need be any occasion for taking them from the obscurity of a private file, but I would point out to you that you now apparently find my course blameworthy, through having acted in strict compliance with the directions given in your letter of August 30, reading :

'Your ministers are the proper judges of the time to summon the assembly, keeping of course within the year's limit.' Certain portions of that letter are quoted in my report to the Privy Council of March 27 last. But those portions I could hardly avoid quoting, in justice to myself. I think it is done in such a way, however, as to make further reference to the said letters unnecessary. I certainly should have preferred an official notification from the Privy Council if they considered that I had left untouched or unexplained any relevant phase of my action throughout the present crisis. Not having received one, however, I have undertaken to forward to His Excellency in Council a supplementary report of this date, dealing with the criticisms upon my conduct subsequent to the dismissal of the Semlin government, as far as I could gather them from the Ottawa press despaches, and your letter under reply. I have stated fully all I have to say touching the points you refer to, without in any way referring to your letter itself. I am not setting up for a constitutional lawyer, but I do say that I have sought to discharge my duties faithfully, under probably as trying circumstances as a Lieutenant-Governor has yet been placed in in Canada. But the attitude taken towards me by some of my old friends and colleagues in Ottawa, at least as represented by the press and private report, has been a genuine surprise to me, and I cannot help thinking that they have been grossly misinformed and misled. Some of the provincial press contain references, and extracts from Ottawa letters, like the following taken from the Greenwood 'Times' of the 27th ultimo :

'A prominent Liberal member writes under date of April 11, as follows :—

'We hear to-day that the House is dissolved, and that elections will be held June 9. Well, I would not give much for McInnes's scalp if Martin is turned down.'

Another Liberal who is in close touch with Sir Wilfrid says :

'Blame the Lieutenant-Governor, I know the view of our friends here, and it is very hostile to McInnes. These views fairly express Sir Wilfrid's position.'

Very well, let them 'blame the Lieutenant-Governor' if they will. But it may prove to be no wiser course than it was for Mr. Duncan Ross, the editor of the above-mentioned paper, who for doing that very thing, was expelled from the Liberal Association of Greenwood. And here in Victoria, at the annual election of officers of the Liberal Association, every officer—with the exception of Mr. Drury, who has taken a perfectly neutral stand—was turned out, and others elected in their places, in consequence of having taken a somewhat similar attitude to that of Mr. Ross.

In conclusion let me say that I am, and always have been ready to acknowledge the authority of advice and directions given by you respecting my official duties and prerogatives, but I do not propose to be swayed from what appears to be my line of duty by the hostility of a certain section of the press, or their contributors—let the outcome be what it may.

Yours very truly,

(Sd.) THOS. R. McINNES.

The last letter I wrote him was in answer to that communication, and is as follows:

(Confidential.)

Ottawa, June 2, 1900.

My dear McInnes,—Referring to your letter of May 15, commenting on our correspondence.

My letter of August 30 was not intended 'to convey official directions and instructions in the form of a confidential communication,' but was only a suggestion due to a report that I had heard you were bringing pressure to bear on your government to call the legislature before they were ready to meet it, and the advice was certainly sound, as I consider it would have been indefensible for a Governor General or Lieutenant-Governor to force his government to call the legislature under the circumstances then existing.

You seem to think that the advice subsequently given as to the Martin government was inconsistent with the suggestion in my letter of August 30. I do not so regard it. The two cases have no parallel ; there is no analogy between the two cases. In the one there was a responsible government whose members had been endorsed by the people, in the latter case not a single member of the existing government had then or even has up to the present time received the approval of the people. Only one of them had ever been a member of the legislature, and he had no following ; and I think it is without a parallel in the history of constitutional government that a body of men, five-sixths of whom had never been members of the legislature, should be permitted to carry on a government for three months without any public sanction or approval. It is useless now to comment on it. I was sorry at the line taken, and as you must have observed by the public press all over the Dominion, the propriety of the action taken has been very severely criticised. I have always recognized that the conditions existing in British Columbia during the last eighteen months, made your position a most difficult one —the bitter personal feeling shown between the rivals for place and power intensified the embarrassment as the rivals were so nearly equal in numbers—you certainly have not had an easy task in your efforts to guide the ship of state.

Yours truly,

(Sd.) R. W. SCOTT.

The Honourable T. R. McInnes,
Government House, Victoria, B.C.

That ends the correspondence and embraces, I believe, all that can be in any way regarded as confidential. The letters are produced in the file I laid on the Table together with the official communications, so that hon. gentlemen will have an opportunity to peruse them. It was rather regrettable that any necessity should arise to make public private and confidential communications of that kind between gentlemen. They were written by me simply as one friend to another—not in any sense as the Secretary of State nor at the suggestion of the Privy Council, but solely with a view of giving him the benefit of my judgment, if it was worth anything. He was not bound to follow it. He spoke of it in the original communications as suggestions only—and in subsequent letters as directions. They were not directions. They were advice which I think was sound, and had he followed it there would have been no crisis in British Columbia.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is a very unusual course to pursue.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is in answer to my hon. friend's request.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Under the circumstances, the hon. gentleman is justified in the course he has pursued. I am of the opinion still that he has reason to thank me for bringing this matter before the House and country. This is not the time and occasion to discuss the question. That I shall reserve for some future time. I have simply to say this, that in looking through the correspondence, I do not see that there is any difference in the manner in which the letters have been signed by the Secretary of State. While Mr. McInnes has in many cases signed his 'T. R. McInnes, Lieutenant-Governor,' in each case the Secretary of State has simply signed his own name, without putting 'Secretary of State' to it. Some of these documents, the hon. gentleman admits, were official, and that he spoke on behalf of his colleagues. If I were in the position of Mr. McInnes, whatever his faults may be, I should assume that all those letters were written at the instance of the government, from the fact that they are all signed in the same way, and some of them the Secretary of State says were official, and some of the telegrams were sent at the instance of his colleagues. Taking one with another, without arguing the question any further on the constitutional aspect, of the interference of the Dominion government with the local government, that we can leave to some other time, but whatever my opinion of Mr. McInnes may be, I certainly would come to the conclusion, if I were in his place, that these letters were all of an official character. Otherwise it would have been so stated. I see a gentleman in the Senate to-day who, from a telegram published in this morning's paper, seems to have been made the ambassador of the government. Whether he was their plenipotentiary extraordinary or not, I do not know, but he is here to answer for himself. Governor McInnes is reported this morning to have stated that he was waited on by Senator Cox, and Mr. Jaffrey, of Toronto, who urged upon him the impropriety of calling upon Mr. Martin. I am glad my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Cox) is here, because I cannot conceive he acted except as a private individual, and the country is interested in knowing whether, like the Secretary of State, he acted as a private individual and gave the Governor private advice, or whether he went there as a plenipotentiary and ambassador from the government at Ottawa, to direct the Governor as to what he should do. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman will give us the information in his own defence, and also in explanation of the statement made, whether true or false. I can scarcely believe it is true myself, although I would not like to question the veracity of a gentleman who has filled so important and responsible a position as that of Lieutenant-Governor. But I have learned this from the correspondence and what has taken place, that these two intimate friends, the Secretary of State and the late Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia, had very little confidence in each other, and were prepared, in all their correspondence, to put it on such a basis as to destroy it so that no evidence could be produced in future. I commend the Secretary of State for his caution.

Hon. Mr. COX—I am very glad to have an opportunity to make an explanation. There is no truth whatever in the statement, directly or indirectly. I gave no such advice to the Lieutenant-Governor, either as a private individual or as a representative of the government. I did call upon Senator McInnes when I was in Victoria. It was a friendly call only, and I had no conversation with him on the subject whatever. The Semlin government was in power at the time, and so far as was then known, or understood, there was no probability of a change. At any rate, to answer the hon. gentleman's question, unqualifiedly and unconditionally, I gave no advice either as a private individual or as a representative of the government.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Evidently this question is susceptible of further discussion, and it is my intention to place a notice on the Order paper that it be taken up on Wednesday next, so that the constitutional side of the question can be considered. It is not by any means exhausted yet.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It is rather unfortunate that such an important question as this should be introduced in this House at such a late period in the session. It appears to me that the correspondence shows the impropriety, to say the least of it, of ministers of the Crown and lieutenant-governors holding private and confidential correspondence on public business. There is no reason why this private correspondence should not take place as to their family and business affairs, but where a minister of the Crown and the Lieutenant-Governor of a province undertake a private and confidential correspondence, the disclosure of which proves it should have been neither private nor confidential, it is another matter. The Secretary of State writes the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia and asks him to destroy the letters as soon as read. The fact that on receiving that letter he does not comply with the request, and that the gentleman who wrote it does not destroy his own copy of it, shows that there was no confidence on either side. It illustrates the danger and the trouble brought about by writing private and confidential communications on public affairs when they should not be private or confidential. I am sorry this discussion has been forced on the House in a one-sided way. I have no particular interest in the case of the late Governor of British Columbia, but as a British subject, and a lover of British fair-play, when a discussion of this kind takes place, I claim the Lieutenant-Governor should have an opportunity to answer for himself. We have had the correspondence read us by the Secretary of State and his comments on it. We see in the newspapers that the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Cox) has been brought into this matter. He denies some newspaper reports that we see published. We have heard the hon. senator's denial, but we have not heard the other side of the question.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN—Does the hon. gentleman not accept his denial ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Under the rules of the House we are bound to accept the hon. gentleman's statement.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—That is true. I do not know whether the word of a senator stands any higher in public estimation than the word of an ex-senator and the word of a Lieutenant-Governor.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That depends on the standing and reputation of the two.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I move that this correspondence be printed for the use of the Senate immediately. In regard to the observations made by the hon. senator from Prince Edward Island, my hon. friend opposite can tell him that a large part of the correspondence that passes between His Excellency and the Colonial Secretary, who stand to each other in precisely the same relation that my hon. friend stands to the Lieutenant-Governor of a province, is confidential, and it is public at the same time.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Then it would not be ordered to be burned or destroyed..

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, because it is public although confidential.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But when letters from the Colonial Secretary are written 'confidential' you are never permitted to use them without his consent.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quite so. The rule as to the colonial office does not apply to this case, because these are not public letters in any sense. My hon. friend was writing in his unofficial capacity, and he had a right to ask the Lieutenant-Governor to destroy the letters if he thought proper. That was his own business.

The motion was agreed to.

BANKING ACT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS introduced Bill (Y) 'An Act to amend the Banking Act.' He said: I may say to hon. gentlemen that this amendment is in substitution for section 40 in the law as it now stands. That section provides for the amalgamation of banks. As it now stands, the restriction of the previous section of the Act operated from the time the agreement was entered into, which would make it impossible that the circulation could be greater than that of the purchasing bank. I understand there are two millions of dollars being added to the capital of the Bank of Commerce by an arrangement that the Bank of Commerce is making with the Bank of British Columbia, and in order that that arrangement may be carried out, it is necessary to amend the section as it now stands, because it contains no provision for dealing with a circulation larger than that of the purchasing bank.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman might have added, there would be an interregnum between the purchase and the completion of it, during which there would be a large circulation of bills for which there would be no sanction, and that would subject the bank to penalties. This is in order to remove that difficulty so as to enable the Bank of Commerce, in purchasing the Bank of British Columbia, to complete their transaction without subjecting themselves to any penalties, and, as I understand it, the Bank of Commerce will be prepared to put up the two million dollars, if necessary, in the hands of the Finance Department in order to cover any loss that might occur, if such were possible, and in order to keep themselves within the law.

The Bill was read the first time.

The House was adjourned during pleasure.

BILLS ASSENTED TO.

The Honourable Mr. Justice Taschereau acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, being seated on the Throne.

The Honourable the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House:

It is the Deputy Governor's desire that they attend him immediately in this House.

Who, being come with their Speaker,

The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery read the Titles of the Bills to be passed, as follow:

To these Bills the Royal Assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the Senate in the following words:

In Her Majesty's name, His Honour the Deputy Governor of His Excellency the Governor General doth assent to these Bills.

Then the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons I present to Your Honour the following Bill:—'An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the public service, for the financial year ending June 30, 1900;' to which Bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

Then after the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery had read the title of the Bill,

The Clerk of the Senate, by His Honour's command, did thereupon say:

In Her Majesty's name, His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General thanks Her loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this Bill.

After which His Honour the Deputy Governor was pleased to retire, and

The House of Commons withdrew.

After some time the House was resumed.

PILOTAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (11) 'An Act to amend the Pilotage Act.'

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—For some years there has been a good deal of friction between the pilots and and Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, and the only way of solving the difficulty and having matters run smoothly seems to be by the creation of a pilot's court, to consist of a commissioner who shall be an advocate of the province of Quebec of not less than seven years standing, appointed by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who must be sworn in, and two persons who are regarded as assessors, one appointed by the pilots and the other by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The clauses of the Bill provide for the referring of disputes that arise as to the qualification of pilots and cases where they have been guilty of errors and mistakes, and charges have been brought against them for running vessels out of the channel on the rocks, in order that the case may be tried summarily before a board of this kind. The owner has heretofore been in the Montreal Harbour Commissioners and it is only affecting the pilots so far as the city of Montreal is concerned. The fees that are derived from this will be amply sufficient to meet any charges.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. minister anticipates that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, there is no doubt about it. The commissioner is only paid while he is trying the case. He is paid ten dollars a day, and the two assessors five dollars a day each.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I see, casually running my eyes over the clauses, that it has simply reference to the establishment of the court to settle disputes which have heretofore been settled by the Board of Harbour Commissioners.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Bill has been materially changed since its introduction, and I would ask the chairman to read the clauses. I know the attempts that were made in the past and I know the attempts that were made in the Commons to give most extraordinary powers to pilots which the Senate rejected. This has nothing whatever to do with that branch of the subject, has it ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I think not.

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is one remark which I should like to make on this clause. Clause 2 says :

> The court shall consist of a commissioner, who shall be an advocate of the province of Quebec of not less than seven years' standing, and who shall be appointed by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and sworn in before a judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec.

And the next clause of the Bill provides as follows :

> The court shall, in the hearing and determination of any charge or complaint against any pilot, and also in any inquiry in connection with any accident or damage happening to or caused by a vessel in charge of any pilot, have power to call in the aid of one or more assessors appointed as hereinafter provided.

It occurs to me that clause 3 should provide that if an assessor selected by one of the parties is called in, there should also be an assessor selected by the other party. The judge may call in an assessor appointed by the pilots, and he may or may not call in an assessor appointed by the pilotage authorities, or vice versa. I think, as a matter of fair-play and equity, that if there is an assessor representing one, there should be an assessor representing the other.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The difficulty at the present time is that the pilots complain that the present mode of proceeding before the harbour commissioners does not deal with them fairly, and so the object of giving the pilot or the pilotage authorities an assessor is in order that the case of the pilot may be fairly heard, and that was the whole complaint on the part of the pilots. This arrangement is one that will continue in force until there is a judge of the Maritime Court who will take charge of the business.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He has power under this to appoint one or more.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it is all right.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It will be all right until it comes to be tested. It is well known that although the interest of the pilots is a considerable one, the interest represented by the Montreal pilotage authorities, the harbour commissioners, is a much more important one ; and if for instance some question arises with respect to the pilotage of one of those large steamships coming from Europe : supposing it is charged that the pilot has made a mistake, it seems to me that we should have two assessors, the assessor who represents the pilots and the assessor who represents the port of Montreal. It is desirable to try and provide as far as possible that these difficulties shall not arise in the future. The sympathies of the gentleman who is appointed a commissioner may be with the pilots ; and that gentleman may call in a pilot as an assessor, and may refrain from calling in a representative of the mercantile interests.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And then we have this case tried practically before two judges whose sympathies would be one way, and there would be no one to represent the more important interest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They must call in two.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The clause says that the court shall be required to call in the aid of one or more assessors.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Sometimes a case happens in which the pilotage authorities have not the slightest interest and it does not concern them at all and in such an event it would be altogether unnecessary to insist upon a representative of the pilotage authorities being present. Sometimes they are interested, and when they are interested, under the provisions of this Bill they will undoubtedly be represented. There is not an attempt to enter into detail, because that would be difficult.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—In all cases it is the complaint against the pilot, and I think there is a great deal of force in the what the hon. gentleman from Halifax has said, that if there is a complaint against the pilot, and other parties are interested in the complaint, say for instance, the steamship companies, it is only fair that there should be two representatives.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—Are these assesors to be judges ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. They are advisers of the court of commission.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not see any case that could possibly arise in which the party mentioned by the Minister of Justice would not be interested. This is a court especially to settle disputes between pilots and the mercantile interests of that section of the St. Lawrence near Montreal, and as intimated by my hon. friend to my left (Hon. Mr. Allan), every case that comes before this commission must be to settle difficulties that have arisen between mercantile interests and the pilots, and when we reflect upon the actions of pilots in the past and the difficulties which have arisen, it strikes me that there is very much force in what the hon. gentleman from Halifax, says : I do not say that the commissioner would be partial, but his sympathies might be with one or the other. They might be with the mercantile community and against the pilot, and the pilot might be in the right, and still the party to be the assessor between them would be a party wholly interested in the mercantile community, or vice versa. If the Minister of Justice will think of it a moment, he will come to the conclusion that the suggestion is a good one. It would do no harm and would place the court in a position to deal impartially with every question that came before it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The assessors are only advisers. They do not take part in the adjudication of the case at all. The commissioner is the person who is charged with adjudicating on the complaint, whatever it may be, and he has the power to call in one or more assessors that have been named by the two authorities that are referred to in the clause 4. The licensed pilots appoint one or more qualified pilots, and the Montreal pilot authorities appoint one or more. It is assumed the commissioner would act fairly. He is in the position of a judge. When we appoint a judge we do not limit his powers.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The very fact that this additional party is to be called in to give his advice makes it more necessary that that advice should not be biassed in any way, and that it should be advice which could be relied upon.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there any clause in the Bill which defines what the duties of the assessor are ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—An assessor to a court is a party who can advise the court, without the power of giving judgment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He might be an assessor for the purpose of declaring what damage has occurred to the vessel through the negligence of the pilot, and then the question would arise as to whether the pilot was guilty or not.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The object of assessors is to give to the judge professional or technical information, and in the admiralty courts assessors are frequently called in to give information of that kind, and I fancy that the gentleman who sits as judge, or commissioner, after evidence has been taken, consults with the assessors as to the effect of that evidence, as to what it means and all that, and it does seem to me, that if one of the objects is to have an assessor who is to consult with the gentleman who acts as judge, there should be some one who acts for the other party to put the other side of the case before the judge also. The probabilities are that this lawyer may not be a man very familar with navigation, or with trade and commerce, and I think a few words might be added to the third clause to this effect :

Provided, that if the aid of any assessor is called in there shall be an even number of such assessors, selected equally by each of the bodies mentioned in the next succeeding section.

That is, that there shall be two, or four, as the case may be, and that they shall be selected equally by the harbour commissioners and the pilots.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—How would it do to add to clause 4 :

And the assessor so appointed, or selected, shall, with the commissioner, constitute the court.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are not part of the court ; they are assessors. I discussed this matter with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the fact is there are a very considerable number of cases in which the pilots as a board are interested. Of course, they are interested in defending their own order if the pilot has conformed to the law, and they are assessors as professional men, that is, men having a skilled knowledge for the purpose of informing the commissioner with regard to the conduct of the pilot which is called in question. That may be a matter in which, what is called here the pilotage authority, may not be interested at all. It may be a matter between the pilots as a body and the particular pilot, and it may be a matter between the owner of the vessel, or some one on board the vessel, and the pilotage authority should be called in in every case where their special interests are affected and where their representatives possess skilled knowledge which it is important should be made known to the commissioner, but in every case the interest of the pilot is involved, but not in every case is the interest of the pilotage authority involved, and that, I have no doubt, is the reason for the Bill being framed in this form. That clause might be allowed to stand.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If that is necessary, then the whole Pilotage Act should be amended, because it is defined how the Quebec Pilot Commissioners and also the Halifax Pilot Commissioners should deal with those questions.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is giving to the commissioners the same aid as the judge gets.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I think we might amend it by striking out the words 'or more' and it would read that the court appoint one and the licensed pilots one, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries one, so that there would not be more than one.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The case might not be one involving twenty dollars, and we are creating a body that would cost twenty dollars every day they sat, if that suggestion were adopted.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—The greater the number of assessors you appoint, the greater the expense.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We might have a man appointed and he might be a hundred miles away.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—If the Act is to be effective it would be required to have a commissioner on the spot, and one great object of the Bill is to do away with the delay which must necessarily occur where the cases are referred to the harbour commissioners, where there are a large number of people concerned.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They appoint one or more assessors, but the pilot they appoint does not necessarily leave his occupation. If he happens to be in Montreal, he will take the case, but if not, somebody else is selected. His duties are not to be interfered with, and he is not to be paid any sum unless he acts. It will be necessary to have two or three appointed, because one may be away. It is not contemplated to have a permanent court.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I understand that it is intended to appoint one for each case. A man is not appointed an assessor to hold office as long as he lives.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is confined to Montreal. That limits its operations to that district. What I am at a loss to know is, what is the power of one or more assessors. If you look at the 13th clause and the proviso it would seem as if the assessors had more authority and power than mere assessors. The clause reads:

> Provided always, that in the hearing and determination of any matter brought before him such judge shall have power to call in the aid of one or more specially qualified assessors, and hear and determine such matter either wholly or partially with the assistance of such assessor or assessors; and that such judge shall have power to make all necessary rules——

Are these assessors to be merely advisers or partial judges?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Merely advisers.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They give skilled information with regard to their profession. However, we might let this clause stand.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 7,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the meaning of that word 'branch'—'the fault of any branch pilot?'

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I believe it means a licensed pilot—one who is licensed to guide the ship into the harbour.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 12,

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is important that this court should be constituted with great care, because the decision in the court is final.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The person must be an advocate of seven years' standing.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 3,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If clause 3, which has been allowed to stand, is amended it will be necessary to amend some other clauses. I might mention that I asked a member of the House of Commons, who spoke to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as to the meaning of the word 'assessor,' and his explanation is somewhat similar to the one the hon. minister has given here. It really means bringing in an assessor and asking him to give the commissioner professional information.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We all know what a strong feeling there is between the pilots and the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal. Here is a ship coming up the river which is worth, perhaps, three-quarters of a million. She is damaged through want of skill on the part of the pilot, and then there is an inquiry; and in the first place, with regard to this lawyer of seven years' standing, there are a number of such advocates who do not know much about navigation and whose opinions upon almost any subject are not of great value, and he may sit there with the pilot as assessor and no one else. The feelings of that assessor are in favour of the pilot. He wants to get his friend clear, and there may be no representative of the people who own the ship, who have suffered the loss. The question comes up as to what order the pilot should have given at a certain stage. There is no one to tell the judge when there is a mistake made, but if there is some one representing the shipowner the commissioner would have the information from both sides. I speak now as a friend of the government. I think they should be particularly careful not to pass any legislation that the shipping interest of Montreal is likely to be dissatisfied with, and my suggestion is to add to clause 3 some language such as this:

Provided, that if such aid is called in in any case, there shall be an even number of such assessors, selected equally by each of the bodies mentioned in the next succeeding section.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That gives them a quasi judicial position.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Supposing it does. You entail a little expense, but the property may be worth a million dollars.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend makes a suggestion. I am not prepared to accept it, because I have reserved the clause and we will have an opportunity of consulting the minister who is specially interested in it. This Bill has been the subject of a very considerable amount of discussion. My hon. friend knows that some years ago the English government handed over the Admiralty jurisdiction within the Dominion of Canada to the Canadian government. It is under the control of the Canadian authorities. There is an Admiralty judge in each province, and there has been a complaint made that sometimes it is inconvenient to consult the Admiralty, and that there ought to be some further provision made for dealing with matters of minor importance. In the early portion of this session I introduced a Bill for the amendment of the procedure in admiralty courts and providing for the creation of divisions in the district. For instance, the whole of Ontario is one district, and the whole of Quebec is a district, and the judge in Admiralty of Quebec resides in Montreal, and there are a good many in Quebec who are very anxious to have an Admiralty judge at Quebec, and in Montreal they desire an Admiralty Court there. There is not work to occupy the time of one judge, and in that Bill we provided that the Admiralty judge might hold court in Montreal. We might create Montreal a division for that purpose, but the Minister of Marine and Fisheries thought there were a large number of inferior cases, cases of very little consequence, involving small sums, and that it might be desirable that the commissioner should have, to a limited extent, admiralty jurisdiction to hold court for the purpose of dealing with these cases, and that he should be aided by an assessor, or by assessors, as the case might be, the same as the Admiralty judge is. If the Admiralty judge were holding a court and the Admiralty judge would be aided, if he came to Montreal, in an important case for the purpose of holding an admiralty court, so that it is only with the inferior cases of controversies that this commissioner will be called upon to deal.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman looks at clause 6 he will see that he is slightly in error.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly the Montreal pilotage authority has no longer any power to hold court, and what was complained of was that it was practically putting the power of holding the court into the hands of one of the parties that was interested. That was the complaint made by the pilots. Now, it is put in the hands of the commissioner. The commissioner is the judge and the assessor is not. In all the courts the assessor is one who is there to give advice. In England the judges are called in as assessors in parliament, in order to aid the law lords in coming to a conclusion. They are assessors in their own sphere, and relating to their own duties in those matters with which they are particularly acquainted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not finding fault with the minister. He agreed to let this clause stand, but I was trying to emphasize the importance of making some amendment.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I do not agree with the objections made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. He appears to consider that the interests of the shipowners might be jeopardized by the Act going into force as it now stands. The shipowner must be notified before any action can be taken, and there is no doubt he will look out for his own interests and see that an assessor is appointed in the court.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The commissioner has to summon the assessor.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—He cannot personally appoint an assessor, but his interest is in seeing that his own side is provided for before the commissioners.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am contending that he should have a chance to do that.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—And he will take good care to make application to have an assessor appointed in his own interest to look into it and see that it is properly guarded in the court.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I understand the clause is reserved for the present.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, it is reserved.

Hon. Mr. COX, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill and asked leave to sit again on Monday next.

CHARLOTTETOWN AND MURRAY HARBOUR RAILWAY BILL.

POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Committee of the Whole House on (Bill 182) An Act respecting the construction of a branch railway from Charlottetown to Murray Harbour. —(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have asked for some returns in reference to this matter. I do not think they have been brought down and I should like to have them brought down before this measure is proceeded with.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think my hon. friend brought down the returns three or four weeks ago.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That could not be, because it is not three or four weeks ago that I made the motion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What were the returns?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Asking for correspondence with the provincial authorities bearing upon the construction of the bridge. I made the motion about a week or ten days ago, and I call my hon. friend's attention to the importance of having these returns brought down before we proceed with the Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, July 9, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THIRD READING.

Bill (176) 'An Act to incorporate the South Shore Line Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Gillmor.)

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (189) 'An Act to amend the Act respecting the judges of Provincial Courts.' He said: Hon. gentlemen will see that the only thing new in the Bill is the substitution of the word seventeen for fourteen, which is mentioned in the first section.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is in Quebec?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In Quebec. In the case of clause 2, we carried through in the early portion of the session a Bill to provide for the payment of a chief justice in the North-west Territories, and clause 2 is a provision for the purpose of giving effect to that Bill. Hon. gentlemen will know that in the superior courts of all the provinces, the chief justice is paid one thousand dollars more than his associates, the puisné judges. In the North-west Territories there are five judges. They are all puisné judges of equal rank, receiving a salary of $4,000 each. That is a somewhat anomalous position. The Territories have grown in population, the judicial work has increased, and it was represented to me—and I think properly so represented—that it was desirable that one of the judges should be made a chief justice and the Supreme Court of the Territories organized the same as the superior courts or the supreme courts are in the provinces. That, I think, is a reasonable provision, and this clause 2 is simply carrying into effect what was there already determined upon by the adoption of the Bill to which I have referred. Then the third clause is, in fact, no alteration of the law as it now stands. In the first instance we made provision for the appointment of judges in the North-west Territories and Yukon country. We, in the first instance, took only an appropriation for the salary of one judge, but last year we took an appropriation for the salaries of two judges, and it was only recently that a second judge was appointed. We required first to get information as to the amount of business that was being done, and as to the condition of things in the territory, and we found that the amount of litigation was very large in proportion to the population, owing to the nature of the business that was being done, and that one judge was wholly unable to overtake the work. There was some difficulty in inducing a competent man to go there, and become a High Court judge in that distant country. However, in the end Mr. Craig, of Renfrew, was persuaded to go. He is a very competent man, and I have no doubt will prove an efficient judge. The only matter in the Bill about which perhaps I need say anything is with regard to the first clause. Before the session that preceded this, the government and legislature of Quebec had provided for the appointment of three additional judges in the Montreal district. The number of judges there engaged in the work was found unequal to the amount of litigation that had arisen in the district, and so the appointment of additional judges became necessary. Immediate action was not taken by the government here, because we thought that it might be that the local government, by reorganizing their judicial districts, might be able to enlarge some of the districts and to transfer some of the judges from other districts to the Montreal district; but that was found impossible, or at all events, in the estimation of the Quebec government and legislature undesirable. Hon. gentlemen can well understand that, in a country like Quebec, a portion of which is sparsely populated, there is a desire sometimes to have a judge where it may be the case that there is not a very great deal of work for him to do, but when the necessity arises, it is important that the judge should be accessible in order that urgent work might be immediately performed. That is the condition not only in the province of Quebec, but in some other sections of the Dominion of Canada, and the responsibility of deciding what shall be the constitution of the courts is, under the British North America Act, remitted entirely to the provincial legislatures and governments, and all we have to do in the matter is to give due time for the consideration of the question after the plan is adopted. The legislature and government of Quebec, feeling that the plan which they had adopted was the one best in the public interests of the population of the province, there was nothing then but to acquiesce in that arrangement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend says 'not necessarily,' but I remember very well, in the case of British Columbia, Sir John Macdonald held a different view. There is no coercive power conferred upon us with a view of forcing the local legislature to depart from that plan which they believe the best. The responsibility of deciding how the court shall be constituted rests with them, not with us. The only power that we possess in the matter is that which simple reason bestows. It would be highly improper on our part to undertake to exercise any coercive authority over the legislature with a view to compelling them to adopt a different plan of organization to that which commends itself to their judgment. Now, so far as the existing districts in the province of Quebec are concerned, they were not adopted under our regime. They existed before. They have been in existence for a great many years. In the Montreal district the amount of work has increased until the judges that are at present assigned to the performance of judicial duty in that district, until this amendment to the law took place, were unequal to the work that devolved upon them. That being so, when the scheme, or plan, was presented to us for increasing the number of judges in the district of Montreal and it was shown that these additional judges were required in that district, it was no part of our duty to undertake to coerce the province of Quebec, or the legislature of Quebec, to alter the constitution of all the other judicial districts. There is at least as much work to perform in those districts now as there was years and years ago, when those districts were differently situated, and that being so, and the work having grown up in the district of Montreal, and additional judges there being required, we proposed to ask parliament to make provision for the three additional judges that are deemed necessary.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the second reading of the Bill, it is just as well to discuss at least its merits and the effect that it will have upon the revenue of the country. We all readily admit what the provisions of the constitution are. Whether the doctrine laid down by the hon. Minister of Justice is correct is a question that is debatable. I have heard it discussed repeatedly in the House of Commons when this question of increasing the number of judges for the different provinces has been brought under the notice of parliament. While the framers of the British North America Act made a provision that the constitution of the courts in the different provinces should be left with the provincial governments and the provincial legislatures, it provided also, that the appointment of the judges and the payment of their salaries should rest with the Dominion. Whether that was done for the purpose of keeping a check upon the action of the local legislatures, is a question of which we have no knowledge, but the presumption is, that when they gave the power to so arrange the courts in the different provinces to the local legislatures, that the reason for reserving the right of appointment and the payment of the judges to the Dominion was that it should be a check on the action of the legislature. What are the facts in connection with the courts in the province of Quebec ? I am speaking, as most hon. gentlemen know, as a layman, but what I intend to say will be dealing with facts as they exist. It has been known for a long time to the statesmen of that province that the system that prevailed for so long a time, and to which the hon. Minister of Justice called the attention of the House, is defective in this particular respect, that the location in which the different judges are compelled to reside—although, by the by, they have not lived in accordance with the provisions of the law in many respects.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not hold the present government responsible for that any more than the late government, but we know that that provision of the law has been violated to a very great extent.

Judges who have been appointed, and whose residence should be in the districts below the city of Quebec, and probably to the north of Quebec, have taken up their residence in the city of Quebec and remained there in defiance of the law. An attempt was made in the legislature some few years ago by the present member for Montmorency, then Attorney General for the province of Quebec, to change the whole system so as to utilize the judges in the different sections of that province very much in the manner in which they are utilized in the province of Ontario, so that each judge would be enabled to perform a reasonable amount of work at least, and not throw the whole responsibility and weight of administering the law upon the judges who are centred in the city of Montreal. As pointed out by the hon. Minister of Justice, it is quite correct that the mass of business is done in that city, while a very small amount of work is performed by the judges living in the different districts. It is strange that while the Attorney General in the province of Quebec in the Conservative administration desired to make this change, for some reason or other he was unable to do it, and what is still more singular, you are unable to carry out a great reform of that kind, although both parties agree as to the necessity of it. In recent debates which have taken place on this subject, the Solicitor General and also the Premier of the province agreed with the proposition made by Mr. Casgrain, then Attorney General for the province of Quebec, and acquiesced in the proposition which he had made, but they asserted at the same time that it was impossible to do so, on account of the prejudices which existed among the people against any change, or, to use the word of the Premier himself, the system which prevails may be antiquated but they were not prepared to interfere even with the prejudices of the people, even though it would be in the interests of the whole population. The only conclusion that one can arrive at, after studying the question is, that in certain districts they have had the advantage of having had a resident judge, and any system which would interfere with the taking away the resident judge from that district, though he might have little or nothing to do, was an infringement of that antiquated right. I am using the word antiquated, because it was the word which was used by the Premier himself. It is his own word. One can scarcely conceive, living in a province like the one in which I reside, where a great reform is considered necessary, particularly in dealing with the judicature of the province, that that idea should be allowed to interfere. Supposing a system similar to that in Ontario was inaugurated in the province of Quebec they would then have the resident judge in the shape of a county court judge, and the Superior Court work moved to the city of Montreal. In the city of Montreal we find they have ten judges, and there is a judge also who lives in the city of Montreal whose work more particularly is in the district of Terrebonne. That makes eleven. In Quebec, there are four judges, and in the rural districts, sixteen judges, making thirty-one altogether. The chief justice receives $1,000 more than the puisné judges, which I think is quite correct. The chief justice receives $6,000, while the others receive $5,000. Then there is a provision also in the Bill for increasing the salary of the judge of Saguenay and Chicoutimi.

Now, what do the statistics show in reference to the work of these judges? I read them for the purpose of emphasizing what I have already pointed out—a necessity for reforming the system which exisits in the province of Quebec at the present time. It may be considered presumption on the part of a representative from another province, particularly a layman, to talk on a question of this kind, but when we consider it is a matter of common sense, rather than a legal question, it is something we may all deal with, and on which every man may form an opinion. In considering the figures which I propose to give to the House, you will come to the conclusion at once, that more than half the judicial work in the whole province of Quebec has to be performed by the Montreal judges. Hence the necessity for more judges in that district. I do not think any one who studies the question will dispute this fact, which is a very important one, and that the judges of the district of Montreal are overworked and that it is absolutely necessary, if they are to keep up with the work and perform it properly, to give them assistance, and that is why at present, the government propose to appoint three new judges instead of doing as the ex-Attorney General of the province of Quebec, Mr. Casgrain, attempted to do and to which the present Solicitor General, and the present Premier, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, agreed. It is evident they are not as great reformers as they would like the people to believe they are. There is something in name, and there is something in practice, and in this case it is quite evident the name is adored rather than putting the reform into practice. In Arthabaska last year—I am quoting from the statistics laid before parliament:

In Arthabaska last year there were thirty-nine contested cases and twenty-four judgments in the Superior Court; in Beauharnois, twenty contested cases and twenty-five judgments; in Chicoutimi, forty-seven contested cases and thirty-three judgments; in Gaspé, nineteen contested cases and ten judgments; in Iberville, thirty-one contested cases and thirty-two judgments; in Kamouraska, forty-five contested cases and forty-two judgments; in Richelieu, eighteen contested cases and twenty-eight judgments; in Rimouski, fifteen contested cases and seventeen judgments. An analysis of these figures shows that the judges had not enough work to employ them usefully for two months in the year.

While the judges in Montreal were constantly employed. In discussing this question in the lower House it was stated that Mr. Justice Cimon, of Kamouraska, said that he had not work enough to occupy him for one month, when he would much prefer having more work to do and less leisure. Surely, under the circumstances, would it not have been better to remove that judge to the city of Montreal and adopt some system by which the judicial necessities of the district of Kamouraska could be performed by some other person. I am quite sure if the Minister of Justice had a free hand he could so arrange the judiciary of the province of Quebec as to obviate the necessity of this extra expense. The appointment of these three judges is adding to the expenditure of the Dominion no less a sum than $15,000 a year. It may not be much, but it represents, at 3 per cent, half a million of dollars. So that, if that could be saved, there would be that much to the good, at least. The Solicitor General, in discussing the question, used this language:

He agreed with Mr. Casgrain that there were a sufficient number of judges in the province. The fact was that a system existed in Quebec over which the House of Commons had no control, and which they could not remedy.

That is an admitted fact, under the constitution, so far as the constitution of the courts is concerned. But if the province will do that which is not necessary—if they will declare that they will not change a system which has prevailed for a number of years in order that these economies might be affected, should not the Dominion step in and say, from the facts and the records we have indubitable evidence that additional judges are not required if you will only rearrange the constitution of your courts, and until you do that we refuse to make the appointments or provide an appropriation. I find the Premier used language of almost a similar character in discussing this question. He said: He would have supported Mr. Casgrain were he in the legislature at the time—that is, in the reform which he then proposed to make, being evidence of the correctness of what I said at the commencement of my remarks, that they are all in accord with the idea. He said:

He would have supported Mr. Casgrain were he in the legislature at the time, not because that body provided for an increase in the number of judges, but because it proposed to reform the system. He would have been quite favourable to the system Mr. Casgrain proposed, but it did not meet with approval. There was no province in America where the people were more tenacious of their laws than in Quebec, even when they were antiquated.

No one can blame the people for being jealous of interference in their laws, their religion, their race or their rights. But this is not a question affecting their laws or their rights. It is a question of reforming a system which interferes with neither the one nor the other, and though there are many things in other provinces which we may call antiquated, still neither party would hesitate to step in and make a reform if they considered it necessary, particularly where both parties were agreed. They do not stop to inquire if the people are in favour of a change under such circumstances. Sir Wilfrid said that 'on the whole he was inclined to regard it as a wholesome trait'—that is a wholesome trait of character in a people to be antiquated and refuse to have any reform in their province. Our Premier at the present day may be a democrat to the hilt, but it is quite evident that he is in favour of antiquated ideas, and is not very much of a reformer in practice. He said:

Public opinion would not sanction the change. They were wedded to their system, and public opinion would not countenance the changes proposed by Mr. Casgrain.

I have read sufficient to show that both parties in the province of Quebec—the leaders of both parties, are in favour of this reform, and the only way, it appears to me, that it can be accomplished is by the Dominion government stepping in and saying: 'You have sufficient judges in the province to perform the work if you will only place them in a position to do it, and alter the constitution of your court.' I can readily understand it to be a responsible position for any government to take, but no great reform is accomplished in any country unless the government of the day is prepared to assume the responsibilty and say to the people: 'You are to be better served by the reform which we propose than by adhering strictly to your antiquated ideas.' Speaking for myself, I do not feel inclined at present to assume the responsibility of saying to the Senate 'Reject this Bill.' I am quite willing, after having placed on record what I think should be done, to leave the responsibility with the government. The gentlemen from Quebec, who understand this question much better than I could possibly understand it—who understand its workings and defects and benefits, are the gentlemen who should deal with it rather than a layman like myself from another province. While I say that, though they are another province, we have all to bear equally the responsibility of paying the taxes of the country, and if we unnecessarily add this amount to the annual expenditure which represents, as I have already pointed out, without taking into consideration the increased salary to the other judge, of which I do not complain, we are to assume our responsibility and have to meet the expenses which are incurred. I should like very much, if I could, to hear the opinions of some gentlemen from the province of Quebec, but I felt it my duty to point out that we are adding an unnecessary expenditure. I have taken this opportunity to make these remarks as the details of the Bill are not such as require any great amount of discussion in committee. Do I understand, with reference to the Bill that was introduced by the Minister of Justice in the early part of the session, dealing with the judges in the North-west, that that Bill has been dropped in the lower House?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the Bill before us is the Bill introduced and passed by this House with these additional amendments.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not at all. This is another Bill. The Bill that I carried through the House was a Bill amending the North-west Territories Act, providing for the appointment of a chief justice, altering the constitution of that court. That Bill has become law. This is merely to provide the salary.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am not going to make any observations on the first clause of this Bill, which has been discussed so fully by my hon. friend, but I want to say a word or two with regard to the clause referring to the Yukon territorial judges. I can very well understand what the hon. leader of the House has said, that it was a matter of difficulty to get a really good man to accept a judgeship in the Yukon territory in view of the salary offered, $4,000. We know the expense of living in Dawson is very high, and I am surprised that it was possible to get a good man to go to that place, and undertake the duties of the position at $4,000 a year, unless there is provision made for living expenses, of which I have no knowledge. I am glad to hear that a good man has consented to go. I hope he will turn out to be as good as he has been described. Unfortunately, our experience of that country is that men do not always turn out there to be as good as was expected they would be when they went. I am happy, however, to say that I have had a good deal of correspondence with acquaintances and friends living in the Yukon country, and while condemning the conduct of many others, the testimony in favour of Judge Dugas has been strong, and the statement made by the Minister of Justice that he would be utterly unable to deal with all the litigation in the Yukon country is strictly correct. We can form no conception in the older parts of Canada of the amount of litigation, and the amounts at issue in the litigation arising in a mining country such as the Yukon. My correspondents, before this Bill was heard of, had pressed on me very strongly, the important character of the suits and the amounts involved, such as would not be found amongst the same number of population in the older parts of Canada. Probably it will turn out, as the Minister of Justice has said, that a good man has been induced to go in there who will give satisfaction, but I cannot help expressing the opinion that the amount provided as salary, unless living expenses are given in some other way, is inadequate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to call the attention of the government to an observation made by the present Attorney General in the province of Quebec. Answering a speech made by the Hon. Mr. Chapais in the legislative council of Quebec, Mr. Archambault, the present Attorney General said :

> He may rest assured that I urged the federal authorities to apply the law of the last session, but I have become aware that instead of applying it, they have done nothing but prevent its operation by the provisions of the statute they passed at the last session of the federal parliament. We have, in this matter, two powers face to face, but they must come to an understanding. The provincial legislature makes known its needs, to Ottawa belongs the task of applying a remedy. I have been unable to obtain the desired remedy, so I have taken another means. In presence of the statute which I propose to pass, the federal government will see that the remedy lies either in the law passed last year and in the provisions tending towards the same end, or in the law of this year ; it will then decide ; as far as I am concerned, my responsibility will be covered.

It seems from this utterance that the principal difficulty in the way of the Attorney General was in the attitude by the federal government, and being unable to overcome that difficulty, the Attorney General of Quebec then came with this new legislation which, as a matter of course, asks for an additional number of judges and an additional salary to be voted by this parliament. We never heard in the province of Quebec that any demand was being forwarded for an increase in the number of judges. I should be very jealous of the privileges of our province, and it would be with very great reluctance that I would consent to an interference on the part of the federal power—in fact I would oppose it, but in this instance I merely take the legislation proposed here, not as legislation in the interests of the province of Quebec, but as legislation entirely in the interests of the Liberal party of the province of Quebec. That is the whole scope of this legislation. We do not need additional judges in the province of Quebec. I will cite only two cases that are in evidence in the city of Quebec. We have in the city of Quebec a judge named Judge Pelletier, who is judge for the district of Beauce and for the district of Montmagny.

The law in general imposes the duty on judges of residing in their own districts. Should, in this instance, the judge I have named reside in the district of Montmagny, the people of Beauce would complain. They would say 'we want the judge in our precincts, but we cannot get him, because he is residing in Montmagny. Should he reside in Beauce, the same objection would be raised by the people of Montmagny. To meet that objection the judge's place of residence was fixed in Quebec so that he is residing there. When his duties call him to Montmagny, he goes there, and when his duties call him to Beauce he goes there. In fact he never resides amongst the people over whom he has been appointed judge. He always resides in Quebec. That judge in Quebec could render very valuable assistance if the first scheme of the late Attorney General had been adopted, and if the suggestions made to this parliament had been carried out. Take another judge, a judge who has been appointed by the present administration. I am speaking of Mr. Choquette, who has been appointed for Arthabaska. Is he living in his district ? Not at all. He is building a house actually in Quebec. He intends to live and die in Quebec. He could render very valuable assistance in the city of Quebec, acting as judge in review, or in the first instance for the Superior Court for the city of Quebec, as he is residing there. It would not entail on him any additional expense to leave his house and go to the court to administer justice. But what is done by this law is to appoint three other judges, and pay their salaries, and for what purpose ? Just to meet the exigencies of the situation which could be met entirely, not by appointing new judges, but by utilizing those already appointed in a different way and with no more expense to the community. With these few remarks I think it is my duty to register my vote against this proposition, and I shall do it. I have had no time to look into all the details of the law, and for that reason I will not oppose its second reading ; but I think on the motion for the third reading, if the government cannot answer those objections made by the present Attorney General of the province of Quebec, we should take steps to remove this legislation which, I repeat, is not for the benefit of the province of Quebec but for the benefit of the Liberal party in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman who has just spoken will see that his observations are directed, not against the Bill, but against a particular clause of the Bill. That is that particular clause relating to the province of Quebec. It does not relate to the second or third clauses. I have a few words to say with regard to the objections made by the hon. leader of the opposition. I remember many years ago that Mr. Blake suggested and went into a very full discussion of this question in the House of Commons, recommending the province of Quebec to adopt a judicial organization similar to that of the province of Ontario. That proposition did not meet with any favour with the government of the day. Sir John Macdonald was, I think, at that time, Prime Minister, and Sir Hector Langevin, Sir John Abbott and other gentlemen of prominence were connected with the government from the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—When was that ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was somewhere between 1880 and 1890.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—It was since confederation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. But it was shown then by members from the province of Quebec, who were defending the then administration, that the cost of the administration of justice in proportion to the population was less in Quebec than in Ontario. Let me call my hon. friend's attention to this : He suggests—and it is the only other suggestion that could be made to meet the local requirements in the administration of justice in the province—that you do away with the present organization in the province of Quebec, and adopt a county court system having a very limited jurisdiction and placing a judge in every county. If you were to adopt that, and so diminish the number of the Superior Court judges—and they would be diminished, no doubt, in the province of Quebec—would you diminish the cost of the administration of justice ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, but the proposition was to increase the jurisdiction of those judges, and that would meet the difficulty the hon. gentleman refers to.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If you did increase the work of the local organization, I say if you were to adopt the county court system, that from the point of economy there would be no saving in the administration of justice in the province of Quebec. I understand at the present time there are two judges in the province of Quebec who do not reside in their judicial districts.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—More than that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There are nine or ten.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The law requires them to reside in their respective districts, and it is in the power of the local government at any time to insist that a man shall reside in the district for which he has been appointed, so that the fact that he does not reside there is not against the present judicial organization. It is against the manner in which it is carried into effect. Let me say, further, my attention has, on several occasions, been drawn to the administration of justice in the province of Quebec. You have the power to call in a judge from one of the outside districts, in the Superior Court, and I think also in the court of Queen's Bench. You pay him a certain sum when he comes in to cover his expenses. So that the attempt to supplement the work of the judges in their own districts is itself a source of very considerable expense in the province, and you would enormously increase the expense if you were to undertake to do the work in the Montreal district by bringing in the judges from distant portions of the province where there is less work devolving upon them than there is in the district of Montreal.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But that is done.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I say it is done to a limited extent, but you do not bring judges from Chicoutimi or Saguenay up to Montreal to assist——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But they are brought in from the adjoining districts and the expense to which the hon. gentleman refers is added to their salary.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, and it does not work satisfactorily and does not enable the court to overtake the work. This question was before every government with which my hon. friend was associated. It was before the government with which I was associated some years ago, and it is before the present government. No federal government has ever yet undertaken to seize hold of the work of the organization of the courts in the province of Quebec, and take it out of the hands of the local authorities. It would be an unconstitutional proceeding, and it would be also an unconstitutional proceeding for the federal government now, as it has been in all times past, to undertake to refuse to carry into effect the law which the government of Quebec may adopt, even though we may regard that law more nearly approaching a point of impracticability.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If you could do it for one year you could do it for three. You did it last year.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We waited until we saw whether the government of Quebec would be disposed to modify their system. My hon. friend has read from the views of the Attorney General: what he complains of is that we did not make the appointment of the judges sooner. That is the whole point in his observations. We have delayed with a view of seeing whether the government of Quebec thought they could adopt any improvement in the present system, and the result is that, having made up their minds that the proposed increase in the number of Supreme Court judges in the district of Montreal was the most satisfactory way of meeting the present requirements, it becomes our duty to undertake to provide for the appointment of those judges in order to meet that situation. I think there is no alternative open to us. It is the only proper course to take. It is the duty of the federal government, if they think any improvement could be made, where the burden falls upon the federal government, to suggest what modification, in their opinion, might have been adopted. It would certainly by a very high-handed act on out part to undertake to override the wishes of that legislature and government, for no one can doubt that in this respect that legislature and government, as all their predecessors have done, represent public opinion in the province of Quebec.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing the province of Ontario so arranged their judicial districts and demanded the appointment of a dozen or twenty more judges, according to the hon. minister's argument they would be compelled to carry it out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Of course we can suppose a revolutionary state of things, but our whole constitutional system is based on the fact that the people are able to govern themselves. It is the right of the people, because it is upon them the burden falls. We, as a Dominion, do not represent a distinct community from what the various provinces represent. We are simply representing them in another and different capacity, and the intention of the law is that we shall work in harmony, as far as possible, that we shall not undertake to override their judgment, that we shall leave them free to exercise their judgment in conformity with what they believe to be best in the public interest, and in conformity with the opinion of the representative assembly that stands behind them, and that being so, that the constitution of the courts of justice rests with them and not with us. Look at what the position of things is. I am not a resident of the province of Quebec. The majority of my colleagues are not residents of the province of Quebec and are not supported by the people from the other provinces to override the judgment of the legislature of Quebec upon the subject of the constitution of the courts which the British North America Act has left to the local legislature, and the local government that enjoys the confidence of that legislature. It would be a monstrous proceeding, and would be altogether at variance with the spirit and principles of our constitutional system, and my hon. friend sitting opposite knows that just as well as I do. He has had a longer experience in government than I have had. He has been associated with the government under Sir John Macdonald, under Sir John Thompson, under Sir John Abbott, and he was at the head of a government himself. Not one of these governments ever undertook to override the judgment of the legislature of Quebec in a matter of that sort. All they undertook to do was to carry that into effect, and the same was true of the legislatures of other provinces of the Dominion, and in this matter all we can do is to endeavour to meet the situation which the legislature and government of Quebec have created. That the number of judges in the Montreal district are not adequate to the performance of the work is known to every one who has looked into the situation, and to meet that requirement, the legislature of the province of Quebec provided for the appointment of three additional judges. My hon. friend sitting opposite said this was done in the interests of the Liberal party. He might say that with regard to any matter that was carried when the present administration was in power, and we might have said the same thing when my hon. friend opposite and those associated with him were in power, but that is not the proper way of looking at these things. Somebody must make provision for the constitution of the court in a way adequate to meet the requirements of the province. Somebody must provide for the appointment and payment of the judges that are to take their places in that court for the purposes for which the court is created. That duty devolves upon us at the present time, but if this change had been made, as changes were made when my hon. friend opposite was in office, the duty would have devolved upon him. He would, in all probability, have sought from his own party, members of the bar, the persons to occupy those places.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not always.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But generally. I do not think my hon. friend will find anybody in the province of Quebec that was appointed of the opposite party.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There were in Ontario and in Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There was in Ontario I know.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Mr. Boyd was a Liberal, Mr. McLennan was a Liberal, Mr. Samuel Blake was a Liberal, and in Winnipeg Mr. Killam. These gentlemen were appointed by the Conservative party.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—By whom was Mr. Killam appointed?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not sure, but think it was by Sir John Macdonald. Certainly the others were appointed by the Conservatives.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am speaking of the province of Quebec, and my hon. friend will see that even if we were to appoint these three men and they were all Liberals, the Liberals of the province of Quebec would form but a very small fraction of the judiciary. My hon. friend referred to changes that Mr. Casgrain suggested. While they were not in the line of a radical change in the system, it was an alteration no doubt, but it contemplated the appointment of forty-one judges—seven judges more.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But the expenditure would be less.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know whether the hon. gentleman thinks so, but I am speaking from the records and figures, because the salaries would be similar to those in the province of Quebec, $2,250 instead of $4,000.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The salaries of the judges would be less, but the cost of administration of justice under that system is not proportionately less than in Quebec under that system.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Litigation is greater in Ontario than in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If litigation is greater, some of the courts are receiving larger fees in Ontario than in Quebec. Take, for instance, the Court of Probate. It is paid by fees altogether.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not finding fault at all. I do not think the Superior Court judges are paid enough.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not saying whether the system of the organization of the courts in the province of Quebec is a good or bad system; that question is one to be decided by the government and the legislature of Quebec, subject to their responsibilities to the people of Quebec. There is where the responsibility rests. There is where the constitution puts it.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—There is a distinction to be made. While the constitution of the province of Quebec is all right, in this case the federal government interfere and we are in the position that after the law is adopted we cannot change it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are not interfering.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The government are interfering by providing for new judges. The government are passing a law by which new judges are paid by the federal government. How can the province of Quebec, if it thought proper under Mr. Casgrain's Bill, reduce the expenses? They could not say we are going to save $15.000. They could not do that. But I do not rise for that. I rose to say this: I rather agree with what the hon. gentleman from Stadacona said about the first clause, but I could not vote against the Bill in its entirety, because I approve of the second and third clauses. My objection to the first clause is this: We are going to give to the province of Quebec $15,000 more than the province of Quebec has at present. As a representative of Quebec, I might not object to that clause, but there is one danger, and I must come to something that was said by the hon. Minister of Justice just now, with which I do not agree. The hon. gentleman said, if I understood him right, that Mr. Blake and Sir John Macdonald, arguing this question of changing the administration of justice in the province of Quebec, declared that the province of Quebec cost more for its administration in proportion than the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say that. I said that when Mr. Blake was arguing in favour of the Ontario system, some supporters of the government from the province of Quebec, and I think some of the ministers maintained that the cost of administration in Quebec was less in proportion to population than it was in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I differ from those hon. gentlemen. I think the cost in proportion to population is exactly the same. I had occasion some years ago—I thought the province of Ontario had more than its share—to compare the expenditure in both—I am speaking of the money paid in Ontario and Quebec by the federal government. I found that the proportion was not larger in Ontario. It was exactly the same as in Quebec. If that is the case—if the expenditure in both provinces is equal in proportion to population, if you add $15,000 to the expenditure in the province of Quebec, you are changing that proportion, and what will prevent you to-morrow changing it again and giving a larger sum to Ontario? I think it is safer, and in the interest of every province, especially those that are not rapidly increasing, as much as the North-west and British Columbia, to continue that same proportion in the payment of our judges. We are changing that proportion by this Bill. If you change it to-day, there is nothing to prevent you changing it to-morrow, and I consider it a dangerous policy.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are not changing it.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—You are adding $15,000 in the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The province of Quebec create a certain judicial system. They provide their own organization of courts and we appoint the judges. What the effect of the system is I cannot say. There is no regulation that there shall be an exact amount for the administration of justice in the different provinces. In British Columbia, until very recently, it was very much higher than anywhere else, because the cost of living was higher.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—In the old provinces,—not the new, where the increase in population is more rapid than in our own—the policy of the Conservative government and of the former Liberal government has always been to maintain the proportion between the old provinces. The hon. gentleman does not deny that, I suppose. If that is the case, are we not endangering that very good policy by adding $15,000 in one case, and, therefore, opening the door to giving perhaps $50,000 or $60,000 more to another province?

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read a second time.

CRIMINAL CODE, 1892, AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF COMMONS MESSAGE.

The Order of the Day having been called:

Consideration of the Message from the House of Commons disagreeing to the amendment made by the Senate to (Bill K) 'An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS said: I have already mentioned to the House that in respect to these proposed changes to the Criminal Code, hon. gentlemen will remember that the first amendment was with regard to the time at which the Act was to come into operation. The House of Commons provided it should come into operation on the first of January next, and we provided for the first of September. Seeing the way the session has been lengthened, that might not, perhaps, be an early period. The House of Commons did not agree to our amendment as fixing the time for the Act to come into operation. Then there was a further provision that related to fraud committed by persons misrepresenting the circumstances under which they obtained credit. That was considered here and was not agreed to, and it was inserted in the House of Commons. Then the third amendment related to the industrial organizations, that the provisions of the Act should not apply to these labour organizations which might be established for the protection of labour. There is a provision in the Act relating to labour which exempts them from the operation of the general law in that particular.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the title of that Act?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Trades Union Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am inclined to think that the amendment made to the Criminal Code was of a sufficiently sweeping and comprehensive character to repeal that provision of the Trades Union Act. The provision that was struck out of the Act and was restored in the House of Commons relating to the subject of organized labour, is broader than that provision in the Trades Unions Act in this regard, that it would apply not only to trade unions, but to every volunteer organization, which seemed to me most desirable. My own view was in favour of this amendment. It was in the Bill originally, but was struck out here. It was restored in the House of Commons, and we propose to strike it out again, and they have refused to recede from their position, and so I propose to acquiesce in their decision in the three cases. This measure has been three times before the Senate. It has been three times carried through the Senate. This is the first time that it has gone through the House of Commons. Many of the provisions contained in these amendments are those which have been suggested by judges and prosecutors on behalf of the Crown, and are very necessary to the improvement of the code, making it more effective and more suitable. I think these amendments which have been made by the House of Commons are of far less consequence than the passage of the Bill; so I would greatly deprecate the insistence by this House upon its views with regard to these particular provisions which might have the effect of preventing the passage of the Bill during the present session.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he, himself, was in favour of the clause relating to labour unions which the House of Commons struck out?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I was very strongly in favour of that clause.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—You would rather see it struck out?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was struck out here. I had it in the Bill originally, and it was struck out in this House. I think it is essential, in order to prevent it being a substition for that section in the Trades Union Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would suggest to the hon. gentleman the propriety of separating his amendments and testing the sense of the Senate on the three separately. The Senate might feel inclined to insist on some of their amendments, and might probably not object to others. Speaking for myself, I should like to see the Senate insist on two of them. If the hon. gentleman would accede to this request and make a motion for his first amendment, then we can test each one upon its merits. My reason for it is this: some members of the Senate might feel inclined to vote, for instance, on one amendment, and might not have any feeling at all in reference to another, and might be willing to accede to the request of the House of Commons. The way the hon. gentleman has put it, he compels a vote upon the whole three.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have no objection to their being put separately if my hon. friend desires it; but with regard to the first amendment, of course, I feel that a good portion of the year has gone by, and a very short time will put an end to that amendment. In the first amendment, there will be no difference between one view and the other. I, therefore, move that the Senate do not insist upon the first amendment substituting the first of January for the first of September.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We have affirmed, by this amendment to the Criminal Code, the iniquity of the lotteries. We amended the House of Commons Bill by declaring that it shall come into force on the 1st of September instead of the 1st of January, and we did so on the ground that if the lottery system, which has been carried on in the province of Quebec particularly, is wrong, the sooner it is put a stop to the better. Now, what is the reason given for disagreeing with our third amendment? The House of Commons say they disagree with the third amendment—that is the one creating a new crime—obtaining goods under false pretenses. That system of obtaining credit and getting goods has not been regarded as a crime until it is made a crime by this amendment to the code. The Senate objected to that on the ground that it might lead to a good deal of abuse, and my hon. friend from Brandon took very strong grounds on this subject. He was supported by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, and the reason for rejecting that amendment is as follows:

(a) The proposed section 359a would offer great inducements to perjury on the part of vendors;
(b) It would give a creditor, who claimed or asserted that there had been a false pretense on the part of the purchaser, an opportunity to practically coerce such purchaser into giving such creditor an undue preference over his other creditors;
(c) It would injuriously interfere with the ordinary and long-established methods of conducting business between vendors and purchasers;
(d) No act should be declared a statutory crime where there is a substantial doubt as to the desirability of such declaration.

That comes into force immediately after the sanction of this Act by the Governor General. Now, if the system which exists of obtaining goods in the manner pointed out by the law be a fraud, then it is in the interests of the country that it should be stopped at once. If one is a fraud, the other is a fraud also and the sooner we put a stop to it the better. To show the length to which the authorities in the province of Quebec, particularly in Montreal, are going to put a stop to this system of fraud, I quote from the Star, of Saturday, the following:

Chief Benoit is determined to stamp out gambling and kindred evils among the firemen. Now that he has banished the lottery agents from the stations, he is after the card players, and yesterday caused the following notice to be posted in a prominent place in each station:

'It is strictly forbidden for all members of the fire brigade, and also all persons not connected with the fire department, to play at any game for any stakes of any kind whatsoever in the fire stations, or any part thereof, under the control of the fire and light committee.

'The captains of the stations will be held reponsible for the proper observance of this order.'

So far has this lottery system been carried on in the city of Montreal that the chief of the fire brigade has found it incumbent on him in the performance of his duties to prevent any further sale of lottery tickets in the fire station. If it be so bad as is indicated by that very act itself, is it not in the interests of morality and in the interests of the people, that this evil should be put a stop to promptly? It seems to me that it is a fair and reasonable proposition. Most laws come into force as soon as they are passed by parliament and sanctioned, and I cannot understand why a law which provides for the punishment of a crime should be allowed to remain in abeyance for a certain length of time in order that those who are perpetrating the crime and breaking the laws should have five or six months more to continue their swindling operations. Under the circumstances, I regret very much that the House of Commons have not accepted our proposition. I should be inclined to vote 'No' on the motion made by the Minister of Justice and say that we should insist on our amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Would it be better to lose the Bill, or have it go into operation on the 1st of January?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think that is a proper way to put it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the attitude of the other House. I certainly would rather the law came into force at once. But I do not like to see a good Bill endangered by taking a stand that the House of Commons will not agree to.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What are the reasons given by the House of Commons for taking that stand?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The House of Commons had a perfect right to do that if they thought proper.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Have we not the same right ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The consequence of insisting on our amendment will be to throw out the Bill. The House of Commons say we do not think the Bill should go into operation until the first of January. We say it should go into operation the first of September. If they refuse, the Bill drops, and we lose the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that a government measure ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it is a government measure.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then the government can have it passed in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are near the end of the session, and if this Bill were to go down to the House of Commons, and that House refused to acquiesce in our view, that would be the end of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I was one of the first who strongly advocated the passage of this clause to prevent lotteries, and I should prefer that the Bill should go into operation the day that it is sanctioned than either the first of September or the first of January. At the same time, I should prefer to have it go into operation on the first of January rather than to lose it completely. The House of Commons has certainly as much right to say that the law shall be put in operation on the first of January as we have to say on the first of September. I regret their stand very much, but as I am afraid that our insistence would endanger the passing of the Bill, and as I am very anxious that the Bill should pass, even though it comes into operation on the first of January only, I prefer to let the amendment pass.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I sympathize with the hon. gentleman who preceded me in regretting that the House of Commons should have taken the action they have taken in respect to this measure. The hon. Minister of Justice referred to the fact that three Bills to amend the criminal law have been passed by the Senate during the present parliament. We passed one in 1897, another in 1899; and finally this one. The House of Commons did not consider either of the previous Bills. They have considered this one, or at least have gone through the form of considering it, and they send it back to us with fourteen amendments, to eleven of which we have agreed. Three of their amendments we declined to agree to, and we gave what I think were substantial reasons for not concurring in those three amendments. With respect to this amendment now before the House we said :

2. That the Senate hath amended the first amendment of the House of Commons by striking out 'the first day of January, 1901,' and inserting in lieu thereof 'the 1st day of September, 1900.'

Because it is desirable that the improvements made in the criminal law by this Act shall go into operation at the earliest possible date consistent with the due publication of its provisions.

The general rule as two hon. gentlemen have stated is, that an Act goes into operation as soon as it is assented to by the Governor General, and there was really no substantial reason why this Bill should not have been dealt with in that way. The House of Commons adopted the unusual course of providing that the Bill should not go into operation until the first of January. It was stated when the amendments came from the Commons—I think it was stated publicly in the House—I know it was stated in conversation—that that action was due to the influence of persons connected with those lotteries in Montreal, who wish to continue their operations for another six months, so there is really no merit in this proposition to wait until the first of January. The laws are published in the first Gazettes which are issued after prorogation, and the parties interested in this particular matter would know the very moment that the Governor General assented to the Bill, all about it. So that on the merits of the case I think we really should not concur in the amendment. On the other hand, although yesterday I should have voted not to concur in the amendment, there is a great deal of force in what the hon. gentleman from Beauce (Hon. Mr. Bolduc) has said. If we do not agree to any amendment made by the House of Commons, I assume that the Bill will be lost altogether, and it would be better to have this law in operation from the first of January than not to get it at all. We might undertake to pass another measure next year, but we do not know what the fate of it would be. I think that, on the whole, the balance is in favour of our not insisting in the case of this particular amendment. It is not of a vital character. It is a highly objectionable amendment, and one which should not have been made, but it might possibly be contended in another place that we were showing obstinacy and want of willingness to meet them half way, and it might prejudice our action with respect to the other amendments? With respect to the other amendments, I shall be inclined to vote that we do not concur; but this does not affect the substance of the Bill, but merely postpones its operation for four months longer than we proposed, and I am disposed to agree on that ground.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It seems to me that those who are responsible for making this change in the Bill, that it shall not go into effect until the first of January, are very much less desirous of putting a stop to these gambling operations than the members of this House are, but the Senate should be careful that in grasping at the shadow we are not losing the substance, and that by refusing concurrence we are not really giving full scope to the desires of those who want to perpetuate those lotteries. That would be the effect if the Bill was lost—that instead of going into operation at the end of the year, it could not be effective for another year. I shall support the motion to concur in the amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This Bill, as has been stated, is a government measure. It was introduced by the Minister of Justice. This amendment was suggested by the minister himself when it came before this House. When the month of January had been fixed by the House of Commons, the amendment was adopted in this House, at the suggestion of the Minister of Justice, making it the first of September. If the government are not able to carry this measure through the House of Commons, then they should resign. If they are beaten on that measure, that is the only recourse I think the government should take a stand, and when the Minister of Justice has himself fixed the first of September as the day for the coming into operation of this law, the government should carry their measure through.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The hon. gentleman from Halifax told us that he thought he must agree with the proposition of the hon. gentleman from Lauzon (Mr. Bolduc). That opinion was that we should not reject any of the amendments, because we might lose the whole Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, this amendment.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—The hon. gentleman says he agrees with the hon. member, but he is going to insist on another amendment. I do not see how the matter can be reconciled. And then we might be accused of not going half way. I think we might go more than half way. We might agree with all the other amendments, but not agree to this amendment which was proposed by the hon. Minister of Justice, and there is a danger if it is rejected, which I had not thought of, which is that the lottery companies in Montreal will take advantage of it to swindle the people of Montreal as much as they can by their lottery scheme. Therefore I think we should agree to all the amendments.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I do not understand what the hon. Minister of Justice intended to convey to us when he said that our not agreeing to all these amendments would imperil the Bill in the House of Commons. If we disagree to one of the amendments of the House of Commons and agree with the others, what will the effect be? Will the Bill in that case be lost? For my part, I thought the objection to this particular clause was one which we could urge with greater force and would be one more likely to be acquiesced in by the House of Commons than any of the other amendments, particularly the one with regard to the labour unions; but if I am to understand that there is no doubt that, if we make amendments at all, the Bill will be rejected, we have no choice, but must either vote for agreeing to all the amendments of the Commons or against them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am speaking without any knowledge of what the House of Commons will do, any more than the knowledge hon. gentlemen possess. I feel that we will imperil the Bill if we insist upon our position on these amendments.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—With respect to any of them ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is my own view. If that were not my view I would have insisted upon declining to acquiesce in some of them. My hon. friends know this Bill was twice before the House of Commons and not even moved in the House of Commons, and now that it has been acquiesced in by the House of Commons it is most desirable to get it through, and to fight with the House of Commons upon these amendments, and perhaps upon some methods relating to criminal legislation on another occasion. We have agreed to everything else contained in the Bill, and I think it is most desirable we should get the Bill through in the present form.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It seems strange the the government, with such a majority, could not carry their own issue in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It seems to me the government is desirous of extending the time four months that these people can ply their nefarious occupations. That is something I cannot assent to. This Bill has been before the Senate three or four times and received no consideration from the House of Commons, and I think we should place ourselves in a most favourable position if we accede to the demands of the House of Commons. The hon. Minister of Justice should understand the subject better than the House of Commons or any committee of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—One of these amendments restores a provision I had in the Bill, which was struck out here.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The sooner we put a stop to this lottery business the better. The papers have been agitating this subject for years, and we should bring it into force as soon as possible. Therefore we should insist that the Act come into force the 1st of October and not the 1st of January.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We will discuss the other amendments when they are proposed. We are in this position, that if the Senate thinks it is in the interests of the country that a certain amendment be made, all the Commons has to do is to say no, and hold the rod in terrorem over the Senate, and say to us 'If you do not accept this you will get nothing,' or like Davy Crocket, when he points his gun at a coon, the coon says 'Don't shoot, I'll come down.' That is just exactly our position. I agree with the Minister of Justice when he says that if we were to act upon the principle of fear—because it is nothing but that—that this Act will not become law, then we are bound to accept the amendments. I think the objection to the other amendment could be overcome by the addition of a few words. It is simply a question whether the Commons is to say to us that we must accept the amendments or imperil the Bill. They have rejected other amendments, and we must give way, and it is little use for the Senate to occupy hours and hours in discussing this question—I do not say it direspectfully to the House of Commons—with more deliberation and more thought upon the effect it will have upon the people than it is given it in the other House. We are here as an independent body dealing with questions affecting the vital interests of the country without regard to the electorate. I am speaking of the lower order of politics, not politics in the higher sense, and the fact of saying to us 'unless you accept it, the Commons will reject it,—well, I would let them reject it and take the responsibility.

The SPEAKER—I think I would have the right to vote now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Certainly.

The SPEAKER—The motion is carried.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The whole three amendments are not carried ?

The SPEAKER—I put the motion and asked if it was the intention to carry the motion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not understand that.

The SPEAKER—I waited a few seconds and declared it carried.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am making no objection to its being reconsidered.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The question is as to whether the vote was upon the first clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Speaker put the three together and I was pointing out to the House that I did not hear it put in that way.

The SPEAKER—Then it is moved now that the Senate do not insist on their third amendment to the Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We sent down to the House of Commons the following reasons :

That the Senate hath disagreed to the third amendment for the following reasons:
(a) The proposed section 359a would offer great inducements to perjury on the part of vendors;
(b) It would give a creditor who claimed or asserted that there had been a false pretense on the part of the purchaser an opportunity to practically coerce such purchaser into giving such creditor an undue preference over his other creditors;
(c) It would injuriously interfere with the ordinary and long-established methods of conducting business between vendors and purchasers;
(d) No act should be declared a statutory crime where there is a substantial doubt as to the desirability of such declaration.

Hon. gentlemen will admit that there is some force in these reasons. What is the answer of the House of Commons to that amendment ? They insist on their third and fifth amendments to the said Bill for the following reasons :

Third amendment : Because it would be in the public interest to punish and prevent a form of fraud which is becoming of frequent occurrence.

They do not meet the reasons we sent down at all. This is not like the other amendment. It is not a question whether it is to come into operation on the 1st September or the 1st January, but it is a question whether the law is to contain this provision or not. We were satisfied that it was an objectionable provision when the amendment was before us, and I am still so satisfied ; but I think we might be prepared to go this far to meet the views of the Commons : we might be prepared to agree to the amendment if it were provided that those false representations should be in writing. If the vendor gets credit by false representations which have been reduced to writing, there may be something said in favour of making that a statutory offence ; but to say that a representation made in the course of conversation, where misunderstandings are so likely to occur and where an unscrupulous man may swear that a representation was made where it was not, is an indictable offence I think would be wrong ; but with that modification, if we amend the Commons amendment providing that if the representation is in writing it shall be an offence, I should be prepared to vote for it, otherwise I shall vote against it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it is a pity we should not discuss this. I have not the amendment which came from the Commons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The only object in that would be to prevent dispute as to what was really said.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This amendment was suggested to me by some parties in Toronto. I did not embrace it in the Bill, because I did not think it was desirable. The reasons which my hon. friend behind me has stated, were those that occurred to me, that a man who had trusted on representations made would perhaps stretch those representations unconsciously, so as to bring the party within the purview of the criminal law. I think if the amendment suggested by my hon. friend were adopted, that where the representation is in writing prosecution might take place, it would remove the objection.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And it would not jeopardize the Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not say about that. Perhaps the Commons might accept it.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Is it not an offence already to obtain money under false pretenses ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, it is against the law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The principal argument was about people getting board at hotels and other places and running away and not paying for it. Putting it in writing would place the matter beyond doubt. If it is mere verbal conversation between the parties, then there might be a dispute as to what was said. That is the object the hon. gentleman from Halifax has in view, but a man might even then put in writing a statement 'I will pay you at a certain time,' and circumstances might transpire that he could not. Is that a fraud ?

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Supposing it was one of those agents who sell machines in the country, the men in the country cannot read or write, and are you going to give that man a writing to sell ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We are making crimes of business transactions. I shall read the amendment of the House of Commons.

By inserting immediately after section 359 the following section:

'359a. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who, in incurring any debt or liability, has obtained credit by means of false pretenses or by means of any other fraud.'

I should strike out the words: 'or by means of any other fraud' and insert in lieu thereof the words: 'have been reduced to writing.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This is bad legislation and I do not think it will work satisfactorily, but at the same time I have the feeling that the members of the House of Commons have a very faint appreciation of the labour that has been bestowed upon this Bill in the Senate last year, and again this year. It received a very great amount of consideration, and I do not think it is worth while to imperil the Bill for the sake of two or three points that are, after all, only comparatively unimportant upon which there is a difference. The members of the House of Commons, having a limited appreciation of the labour that has been bestowed upon this Bill may make a stubborn stand and the country will lose for another year, and perhaps longer, the benefit of the very many wholesome provisions that are contained in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I do not consider that this amendment is of such great importance that we ought to jeopardize the passage of the whole Bill on account of it, and therefore I shall give my support to the amendment ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the minister says there is no use in amending we can refuse to concur. The Minister of Justice said he was prepared to accept an amendment, and now I understand the Secretary of State to say he will not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I do not think there is anything left but for us to let the Bill pass through and let the government take the responsibility. There was only one amendment which I thought, if this House did not occur in, that in all probability the Commons would throw out the Bill rather than consent to it, and that is with regard to the labour unions, and I base my opinion of that upon the fact that the Minister of Justice, the member of the government who has charge of the Billl, is in favour of that, and of course whatever influence the government might have in the other House, would be in support of the amendment made by the House of Commons. Therefore, if we persist in striking that out, in all probability the Bill will be lost in the House of Commons, but what I should like to have seen is this: If we could have the candid opinion of the members of the government here, as to those other two points—the one as to the extension of time to the 1st of January, and this one which the hon. gentleman from Halifax is now engaged in amending—whether these would not be considered equally important, politically or otherwise, and therefore, if we made those amendments, it would not in all probability imperil the Bill. It is on the strength of what the Minister of Justice said, that any amendment would imperil the Bill, that I refrained from voting against his motion. Perhaps the two amendments which the Minister of Justice himself is not opposed to would be assented to in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As far as the first amendment is concerned, I think it was very desirable, in order to get the support of the majority of the House of Commons to the Bill, to extend the time to the first of January. With regard to the clause relating to labour unions, that was in the Bill, I thought it was desirable and necessary, in order to maintain the law as it is. With regard to this clause that my hon. friend has been endeavouring to amend, I was opposed to it. I still think that it will give rise to a very great deal of litigation, under which persons may be unjustly punished. That is my opinion. If I did not fear, looking at the action of the House of Commons upon the subject of the Bill during the two previous sessions, the loss of the Bill this year, I should certainly favour disagreeing with this third amendment. But I would very much rather accept all three amendments than imperil the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The principal reason the hon. gentleman has given now is that he thought it was better to accept the first amendment. That is a declaration in favour of allowing these gambling operations to go on six months longer.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say that. My hon. friend entirely misaprehended my statement. I did not say that, I approved of the first amendment, but that I felt quite convinced, from my conversation with members, that the Bill would be imperilled if that postponement were not agreed to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And the hon. gentleman accepts the influence which was brought against the Bill by lobbyists to continue a system of lotteries which he declared the other day to be gambling, rather than lose the Bill. When I asked for an explanation the other day as to the meaning of these different amendments, the hon. genteman replied as follows :

> Yes, they object to the three amendments, the one relating to frauds committed by parties obtaining goods under false pretenses, the second relating to trades unions, or the protection of labourers, and the third as to the date when the Act shall come into operation. They give six months more to the gamblers to carry on their operations.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not going to waste time in discussing the point. We have the hon. Minister of Justice telling the House that the postponing of bringing this Act into operation is to give the gamblers, the parties we have been trying to suppress, six months more in which to carry on their operations, and for fear of losing the Bill, we allow the gamblers to go on, and that is at the instance of lobbying by agents of the gamblers which has been going on during the last three months,—and they have had sufficient influence over the Commons to get this six months additional time. I do not look upon the second clause as so important, but if he persists in it, I shall vote for it on the ground that the reasons given for it would be in the interests of trade and preventing perjury, if the law goes on the statute-book. The hon. Minister of Justice said, as to the third amendment, he thought they would accept that. Now, he retraces his steps for fear of losing the Bill. There are half a dozen very important Bills coming up this session yet—one of some two hundred clauses, the election Bill—and I suppose we will have the same statement made to us. If we are not allowed to consider that Bill, all we have to do is to accept it and say nothing more about it. There is no use asking the committee to go through 3 or 400 clauses. I object in toto to the principle that has been laid down. If we think it is right to insist on our amendments, let us take the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No doubt both parties think they are right, and where there is a disagreement somebody must give way. My hon. friend lays down a rule on which no government can act. What I say is that in this matter I am anxious to acquiesce in the House of Commons amendments as far as possible, in order to preserve my Bill. I do not want to see it left over for another year. With regard to the first amendment in which we have acquiesced, by the casting vote of Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen will see that the Bill will come into operation on the first of January. If it does become law, the gamblers will be suppressed, and it is just a question of time, and I would rather they would be suppressed on the first of January than to give them an additional twelve months.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman knows very well that the constitution provides how difficulties of that kind are to be surmounted. If there are difficulties the constitution provides for a conference between the two Houses. That was done at the time of the Franchise Bill, when members of the government consulted this House, and each side made mutual concessions, and the Bill went through. If we had not had that conference, the Bill would have been lost.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This particular amendment stands on an entirely different plan from any other. This amendment was not in the original Bill drawn up by the Minister of Justice. I do not know myself who suggested it; I think it is the introduction of a very dangerous principle, and one that will be regretted if placed on the statute-book. It gives extraordinary powers to one man over another. A man may be justified, under the proposed statute, to issue a warrant against a person who may have inadvertently promised to pay, and on that he may be imprisoned. With regard to this particular clause, I should prefer to have a conference between the members of the two Houses. I do not know at whose instance it was introduced. It was not in the government Bill as was proposed. All I can say is, it is an exceedingly dangerous innovation on the criminal law.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Why not have a conference on the whole of the amendment? That would be very much better. Surely it might be well this year not to be in haste. I feel very strongly indeed on that first clause, and I only abstained from voting simply on the assurance of the hon. Minister of Justice that it would end, not in a mere deferring of this matter until the 1st of January, but in the loss of the Bill altogether. Now, if there is any possible chance, upon a conference, of that clause also being reconsidered, surely it is well worth while to suggest a reference on both points?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My own impression is that in the case of the other amendment to which the hon. gentleman has referred, the difficulty might be got over. What I was going to suggest was, instead of exempting trades unions from the operations of the clause against combines, there should be a special proviso exempting trades unions, so far as it affects their rights and privileges in the Act which incorporates them. What has been contended is, that the clause would nullify the privileges which the trades unions, and workmen now enjoy under the law upon the statute-books. The hon. gentleman from Halifax, as well as myself, when we discussed this, disavowed any intention of interfering with any existing right, and what I intended to propose was to add to that clause a proviso that nothing in the clause should be construed to interfere with any rights or privileges enjoyed by working men and labourers under such and such statutes, which could be pointed out. That would meet the objections which some of us took when we struck out that exemption. Whether right or wrong, our argument was that if you make the committing of an act a crime by one person, it certainly could not be a virtue in another, and if it interferes at all with the right of workingmen, as defined by the Act, now upon the statute-book, called the Trades Union Act, and another Act, let us reserve all the rights and privileges they enjoy under those Acts, but do not leave the law in such a position as to convey the impression to any class of people if they commit a certain act it is a crime, though in another it is a virtue.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not agree with the view expressed by the hon. leader of the opposition, and I expressed my dissent from that view when the subject was under discussion before. My hon. friend will see that there is no just ground for putting labourers within a trades union on a better footing than he would put a volunteer association. You would simply compel labourers to join the unions of the country under the protective clause of that Act; but under the clause as it stands, every voluntary organization of labourers would be equally protected, and that is a matter of very great consequence, and you do not drive men into unions who are anxious to remain outside of them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It would seem, from the way this discussion has been carried on, it is possible that mutual ground may be found on all three amendments. It is possible a conference might settle the difficulty. A compromise date may be agreed on. The hon. gentleman from Halifax has suggested an amendment relating to the paragraph dealing with obtaining credit on false statements, and my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, has suggested what might be a solution of the other. Would it not be better to have a conference between the two Houses in place of this House giving away its strong convictions for fear of risking the Bill ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The better way would be to let the hon. minister who is in charge of the Bill postpone the consideration of it until to-morrow. Meanwhile he can consult with his colleagues, and we may come to some understanding. We cannot be any worse off then than we are now, and we may be a good deal better.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am quite agreeable to postpone the further consideration of these amendments until to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. Minister of Justice has carried one motion by the casting vote of the Speaker. Is that to remain as carried and are the other portions only to be considered ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am perfectly satisfied as to the first and fifth amendments it would be utterly useless to alter the existing condition of things. The only one I have any hope of is the third. However, the third and fifth will stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I, for one, feel very much more strongly on that first amendment than on either of the others, and I do not see, if it is possible in any way to influence the judgment of the House of Commons, why those of us who feel strongly on that point should not have an opportunity to press it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The reason I speak with such confidence on that first amendment, is that I have had a good deal of discussion with a view to fixing an earlier date for the law to go into operation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The reason I asked is because it was carried, and there might be a misapprehension.

The further consideration of the amendments was postponed until to-morrow.

PILOTAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (11) 'An Act to amend the Pilotage Act.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Bill was all carried except clause number 3, which stood over, I move the adoption of that clause.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I took exception to this section and wanted to amend it. I am not satisfied yet that it would not be better to amend it in the direction I have recommended, but I have ascertained that the representatives of the harbour board and pilots were both satisfied with the wording of the Bill as it is, and under these circumstances it would not be altogether proper to insist on the amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I accidentally saw a strong petition protesting against it from the merchants and shipowners of Montreal. I believe it was presented to-day. I do not know what the contents of it are.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I suppose the third reading will stand till to-morrow and if that petition is here we can deal with it.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

MURRAY HARBOUR RAILWAY BILL.

POSTPONED.

The Orders of the Day being called,

Committee of the Whole House on (Bill 182) 'An Act respecting the construction of a branch railway from Charlottetown to Murray Harbour.' —(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before this matter is entered upon I would like to inquire of the government about the information for which I moved with regard to this subject —the correspondence, specifications, plans and other papers bearing upon this bridge. It is important that we, who are interested in it, should know these particulars.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have had an officer of the department till a few minutes ago, and he left.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The motion for these papers was passed on the 14th of June, page 507 of the Minutes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That relates to a bridge.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, and that is what this Bill is for. This Bill is to legalize a contract made with the provincial government relating to this bridge.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it is a branch railway from Charlottetown to Murray Harbour.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If my hon. friend will read the Bill he will find it is to legalize a contract entered into between the local and the federal governments with regard to the construction of the bridge, which is built by the governments jointly, and I am interested in having this correspondence and other information relating to the bridge before we discuss it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no correspondence.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We want to know the cost, because there is a portion of it borne by the provincial government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are no letters or papers. It was a verbal agreement between the parties. There was a Bill carried through last year for the purpose of constructing this bridge, and the amount allotted to the local government under that Bill of last year was $12,000, and under this it is $9,700. There has been that modification in favour of the province, in the arrangement that was made. The Bill as introduced last year is chapter 4 of the statutes of 1899, and relates to this same subject, and this Bill is to give effect to an agreeement for a modification of the arrangements made and intended to be carried into effect by that statute. If my hon. friend will look at the statutes of last year, chapter 4, he will find this subject dealt with.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understand all that perfectly. The Bill of last year was to authorize the government of Canada to enter into contracts for the construction of this bridge on the condition that the provincial government should pay a sum not less than $12,000 in perpetuity, and they were allowed, on that ground, to enter into a contract with the provincial government regarding it, as well as to enter into a contract for the construction of the bridge. Now, we have a contract made between the provincial government and the federal government by which the rights of both parties are more or less defined, with regard to the use of the bridge and the maintenance of the bridge and also the sum which the provincial government is to contribute, $9,780, and it is contemplated that the cost of the bridge will be less than the sum fixed upon previously. I am aware that there are plans and specifications of this bridge, and it is a subject of great importance to the province to know what facilities are to be furnished for horses and carriages and foot traffic and the width of the bridge, and in order to have all that before us and to enable myself and other gentlemen in this House to discuss it intelligently, we wanted to obtain this information. I think this information was furnished to the House of Commons. The plan was there at any rate, and, I think, the specifications also, and I do not see why we should be treated differently.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no disposition to treat the senators differently. An officer was here a good while with the plans and specifications, but has gone away.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We had better postpone it until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It will be sufficient if the plans are left here during the discussion and they can be returned to the department.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That will be sufficient.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—A casual glance at the plans during the committee stage would hardly be sufficient, but those of us who are interested could probably have an earlier opportunity of consideration.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

COPYRIGHT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (167) 'An Act to amend the Copyright Act.'

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Bill is supported by the publishers and authors, not only in Canada, but also Great Britain, which is rather an unsual thing, because heretofore there has been a great deal of friction in the working out of the copyright law, as hon. gentlemen who have given the matter any attention know. Our powers and rights under the British North America Act have been somewhat questioned. However, that point does not arise in this case. The necessity for this legislation is due to the fact, that when an author, say in Great Britain, sells to a Canadian publisher the right to publish his book in Canada, he also sells the right, probably, to Australia and other colonies, to some one in the Empire. It so happens that the trade buy books that were intended for circulation in Great Britain or in the colonies, and more particularly those editions that are known as colonial editions, and the publisher in Canada who has secured the right to publish here at the instance of the author, finds that the colonial editions that were originally published for circulation in Australia, having been bought by the book-trade in Great Britain, are sold to Canadian buyers and in that way the Canadian publisher is defrauded.

Hon. Sir. MACKENZIE BOWELL—The colonial edition published in England is imported by other Canadian publishers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, and the Canadian publisher who secured the right to publish is defrauded of the rights he supposed he had acquired. It is very well known that the publishing trade in Canada now are publishing good editions of the English authors, both cheap editions, and editions of a higher class, and there is no reason why the arrangements made between the author and the Canadian publisher should be disturbed by outsiders. This is the result of a conference between the British authors, the gentlemen sent over on their behalf, and the Canadian publishers, and I am not aware that there is any opposition to it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that the only provision in the Bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand that is the only one. When the license is taken out here, no other colonial edition or edition published in England will be permitted here. The Canadian edition will have the exclusive right of the Canadian market.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has been very difficult in the past to secure the co-operation of English authors to any amendment to the Act. I read the Bill very hastily this morning. If I understand the position it is this: formerly a colonial edition was printed in England of a cheaper character and sold in the colonies, the publisher in Canada who had purchased the right of the patent, if I may so term it, in Canada, was handicapped by the colonial edition being sent into the country to compete with the work that he would publish here. That was the former Act, and this Act, as I understand it, is to abolish that anomaly.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It prohibits it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or in other words, the English author, when he publishes his work, would in the future publish no colonial edition for the Dominion of Canada, if he had sold the right to publish his work in the Dominion. That is as I understand it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So that the purchaser of the copyright in Canada would have the sole right of the Canadian market.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Practically.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is an important point gained, and I am very glad that both parties have acceded to this request, because there was constant conflict, and it has been one of the troublesome and vexatious questions that have agitated the country for a great many years. Every government that has been in existence since Confederation have had this difficulty to contend with, and any one who has read that very able paper, by the late Sir John Thompson, upon this question, will understand at once the constitutional point that was raised the other day by the hon. Minister of Justice in reference to certain rights of self government in the colonies. I am glad to know that even this concession has been made, and I hope it will go still further by-and-by, and Canada will be allowed to reap all the advantages of copyrights obtained by Canadian authors, so that they cannot be interfered with in any other part of the Empire. That is what we have been trying to accomplish for a long time. This is one step in the right direction, and the others may follow by-and-by.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has expressed the correct view, but there is a wider view. The Canadian author is also handicapped. The Canadian author whose book is published in England has no power to prevent the English publisher sending his book into Canada, which is a very much greater hardship, nor has the English author the control, because when he sells for the Empire excluding Canada, that gives the publisher here the right to send the book all over the British Empire except Canada, but when the book passes into the hands of other book publishers, they sell to the Canadian buyer, and in that way, not only the English author but the Canadian author is cut out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is to prevent that ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. WATSON, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (132) 'An Act to amend the Railway Act.'

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. minister propose to consider that Bill in committee of this House, or to refer it to the Railway Committee ? It is usual to consider government Bills by Committees of the Whole House. There are exceptional cases in which they are referred to the Railway Committee, where large bodies or corporations are interested, because there we can hear the objections to a Bill or the approval of a Bill by those who are most affected by it, and I would ask the hon. minister to consider that question before to-morrow. It was considered by the Railway Committee of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are not many amendments ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But they are very important. There are clauses in the Bill as introduced which give the power to the Minister of Railways and the government of the day to compel railway companies to place stations wherever they may think best in the interests of the country. Then there are certain sequestration powers—powers to take certain railways from the parties who are supposed to own them.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (187) 'An Act to aid in the Prevention and Settlement of Trade disputes and to provide for the publication of statistical industrial information.'—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (190) 'An Act respecting the preservation of game in the Yukon Territory.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (133) 'an Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of members of the House of Commons.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the Bill be read the second time on Wednesday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not object to the motion for the second reading on Wednesday next, but I do not think that hon. gentlemen can be expected to study 133 pages and understand them thoroughly by that time. I asked a member of the government the other day how long they had been considering this Bill. He said about three months. I intimated that if we took another two months he would not object. I suppose we can consider a Bill fairly in two months which would take the Commons three months. His answer was that he had no objection to our taking our time from the fact that if the Senate kept the Commons here, we would be here also, so that misery liking company, he would have no objection. We have been in session five months and a half, and we have four of the most important Bills that could possibly be brought before any legislature to consider. That question of arbitration is one that has been agitating all countries for years past. This Copyright Bill was a move in the right direction, but a very important one, and now we have the Election Bill and the Yukon Game Law which does not amount to much. The first Bill, however, is an important one, and I am quite sure that unless we adopt the doctrine laid down here to-day, that if we dare to amend this it will jeopardize the passing of the Bill, we will have to be here a week or a fortnight yet if we consider the Bills intelligently.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This Bill is a consolidation of the law, and there are but very few amendments ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are some amendments. The larger number of them are improving the phraseology of the Acts without altering the intent of the law. The sections that were new in the original Bill were printed with an asterisk before each section, and I see they are left out of this Bill. Hon. gentlemen will be able to see from that what there is that is new, so that there will be very little difficulty in considering the new portions, and the new parts do not constitute a very large portion of the Bill ; on the contrary, it is but a very meager portion of the Bill. The particular object aimed at in taking the various statutes upon this subject and consolidating them into one was to make it more convenient when the period of election came, and my hon. friend will see that there are very few substantive changes in the law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There was another object which parliament had in view in making the consolidation, and that was to make such provisions as might be deemed in the interests of purity of elections ; to prevent, if possible, the frauds which have taken place in the past. There are a number of amendments of that kind. There are amendments which unless they had been made, I should feel inclined to press upon the House in the same direction. I could give instances, but I will not do it now, because it will be proper to do it in committee. Then there is another important point the hon. gentleman is omitting. He remembers the difficulty we had with the voters' lists in Prince Edward Island, during the discussions on the Franchise Bill. A conference was held between the Solicitor General and one or two others and we agreed upon certain points providing they would not insist on rejecting one or two amendments that were considered to be absolutely in the interests of an honest election in Prince Edward Island. They agreed to that. That has been dropped out of this Bill. That may create some little discussion, and probably the same amendment might be made again. However, that is for the hon. gentlemen representing Prince Edward Island to deal with ; and there are one or two points I shall, when in committee, call attention to so far as they affect my province.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, July 10, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

PILOTAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of Bill (11) 'An Act to amend the Pilotage Act.' He said: This Bill was held over, as it was announced that the Montreal shipping interest had sent a petition to the House asking that the Bill be rejected. The rejection of the Bill would not in any way serve the views of the large shipowners who have petitioned against the Bill, inasmuch as the present system of pilotage would remain as it is in force not only in Montreal, but in Quebec, and all the other ports of the Dominion. Of course, it is a large subject, to throw open the pilotage of the Dominion, and to alter the policy which has prevailed as long as I can remember, and it was not contemplated in the present Bill to in any way disturb the relations which exist between the pilots and those who employ them The Bill was simply for the purpose of making it easier to hear the complaints that might be made, either by the pilotage or shipowners, establishing a different court for the hearing of the complaint. At the present Montreal Harbour Commissioners, as the commissioners at all other ports, have the power of hearing complaints arising from time to time between pilots and those who employ them. The desire of those interested was the establishment of an admiralty court. As they have had an admiralty court in the city of Quebec, it did not seem to be justifiable to establish another court at Montreal, and the next best alternative was to appoint a member of the legal profession who would not take the rank or position, or be entitled to the emoluments, that a judge in admiralty would be, to hear those complaints, and the Bill had simply that object in view, which I think is fully covered by the provisions that it contains.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I regret not being here and not having heard the hon. Secretary of State's remarks. I am not aware whether he referred to a petition which has been sent protesting against the passage of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or whether it has been read. With the permission of the House I beg to present the petition. As it comes from the whole shipping interests in Montreal, I think it deserves some consideration.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It has not been read.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it is in the hands of every hon. gentleman. A printed copy was sent to each hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It has not been read in the House yet.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am aware of that, and I was asking permission of the House to present it, in order that we may be informed as to their views, and having presented it, I move:

That the petition of Frederick Leyland and others concerned in the shipping interests of the city of Montreal be now received and read at length.

The petition was then read as follows:

Petition from the Shipping Interests of Montreal.

To the Honourable the Senate of the Dominion of Canada, in Parliament Assembled:

Humbly Sheweth,—That the attention of your petitioners has been directed to Bill now before your Honourable House, entitled 'An Act to amend the Pilotage Act';

That this Bill in nowise remedies any of the evils presently resting on the pilotage, but, on the contrary, provides further taxation on an already over-burdened interest; moreover, it is of partial application, being limited to the service between Montreal and Quebec, leaving the service between Quebec and the sea untouched;

That the amendments which your petitioners have long desired, and urgently prayed for, are:

(a) That the pilotage services from Montreal to the sea be thrown open to all qualified candidates possessing the necessary qualifications, preference being given to those having several years' experience of ocean navigation as master or mate;

(b) That compulsory payment of pilotage fees be abolished on trans-Atlantic tonnage, thereby placing such tonnage on an equality in this respect with vessels trading with the lower provinces and with Newfoundland;

(c) That complaints by or against pilots on the two St. Lawrence services be taken before the Vice-Admiralty Court (the judge sitting with nautical assessors in the usual way), whose decisions are to be unappealable and final;

Wherefore, your petitioners do earnestly pray your Honourable House to withhold your assent from said Bill entitled 'An Act to amend the Pilotage Act.'

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

President.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I am not in favour of the passage of the Bill in its present shape, when we take into consideration the appeal which has been read from the shipping interest of Montreal. The shipping interest is, perhaps, the most important connected with the St. Lawrence River. The statements that they make in the petition which has just been received and read, so far as respects this Bill, are such as must commend themselves to the attention of the Senate. It appeared to me, before this petition was presented, when the Bill was under consideration, that in some respects it was objectionable, although I did not make any decided objection to it; but it appeared to me that it was putting in the hands of the pilots of Montreal the sole control of the interests of the shipping that came into any trouble between the harbour of Montreal and the harbour of Quebec, and that in the case of a pilot running a ship ashore, or being the cause of a collision, between his ship and another ship,—it was putting the control of the decision very much in the hands of the pilots themselves. Therefore, I did not think it was a desirable Bill on that account. In the petition which has been presented, there are other statements made, which I think militate very much against this Bill. The petitioners state that the shipping interests are already overburdened by taxation. That is a matter which, I think, deserve the attention of the Senate. It has been the endeavour for some time past to lessen the taxation on shipping as much as possible entering the harbour of Montreal, and it is desirable that this matter should now be well considered, not to put any further burden on the shipping interest there. In the matter of pilotage I do not see why a person who is qualified as a pilot by experience up and down the St. Lawrence River, if he is a master or mate of a ship, is not in all respects as well qualified to act as a pilot as those who receive certificates from the pilotage commission in Montreal. The petitioners also object to the compulsory payment of pilotage fees on transatlantic vessels. We know that vessels from the lower provinces and Newfoundland coming into the St. Lawrence are exempt from such pilotage and where vessels such as come to Montreal once a month during the summer season, as many of these steamers do, that are on the route, where they have to pay this tax every time they enter and leave the harbour, it is a very serious charge indeed on them, and they may have persons on board as masters or mates of the vessels who are just as competent to take charge of the vessel as the regular pilots. Then the petitioners pray that complaints against pilots be taken before the Vice-Admiralty Court. It appears there is a court in the city of Quebec by which these complaints might be tried, and I do not see why it is necessary that an additional court should be constituted in the harbour of Montreal. In the other provinces there is only one admiralty court in each province and cases may be brought before that court either at Halifax, Charlottetown or St. John, and the parties would have to travel a greater distance than between Montreal and Quebec. For these reasons, I am not disposed to favour the third reading of the Bill. We also see that the Montreal Board of Trade have objections to the Bill very similar to those I have referred to. The Montreal Corn Exchange also does not approve of the Bill in its present shape, and therefore, I shall oppose the third reading of the measure.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I do not propose to transgress the rule which restricts the discussion of the principle of a Bill to the second reading, but since the second reading this petition has come to hand, and when we consider the source from which the statements contained in it emanate, I think we shall all agree that the parties, whose signatures are attached, are those who are the most deeply interested in the matter, and who are likely to be best informed—very much more so than we can be expected to be under the circumstances. In the first place, the petition and the accompanying memoranda express the views of the large shipping interest of Montreal, the harbour commissioners of Montreal, the Montreal Board of Trade and the Corn Exchange, and the statement is made in the memorandum from the Montreal Board of Trade.

1. That the court provided by the Bill is objectionable and unnecessary; objectionable because the interests of shippers and the marine underwriters might not be properly represented thereon, unnecessary because the government can at once establish a Vice-Admiralty Court in Montreal where charges against pilots could be properly dealt with, which court is greatly to be preferred to the pilotage court proposed in the said Bill.

And in the memo. of the Corn Exchange there appears this contention:

2. Until the Vice-Admiralty Court is established here the committee desires that the trial of pilots shall continue to be vested in the present pilotage authority, viz., the Montreal Harbour Commissioners.

With this additional information, I cannot do otherwise than vote against the third reading of the Bill, and I express the hope that, under the new light that has come to us in the documents to which I have referred, this House will not agree to the third reading. The parties who present this petition are by far the best informed as to the needs of the case.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Any hon. gentleman who will read this petition and read the Bill will see that the petition is scarcely relevant to this Bill. What the petitioners have in their mind in something altogether different from what the Bill deals with. It is perfectly clear that the petitioners desire to abolish the present pilotage system. The commissioners also suggest that the matters that are to be tried by this commission, with the assessors, should be tried by the vice-admiralty court. The vice-admiralty court has jurisdiction, and the vice-admiralty court of Quebec, which is for the whole province of Quebec, will deal with all important matters. It was thought by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, after conferring with various parties in the province of Quebec, that it would not be advisable to bring the judge in admiralty from Quebec to Montreal to deal with every little matter which would necessarily come before the vice-admiralty court, and so this commissioner is practically a commissioner having, for certain purposes mentioned in the Bill, admiralty or vice-admiralty jurisdiction. He deals with a certain class of cases in the city of Montreal which are not supposed to be of sufficient importance, and sometimes involving very small amounts, to bring the vice-admiralty judge from the city of Quebec up to Montreal to try them. The provisions of the Bill are upon exactly the same lines as the jurisdiction of the vice-admiralty court. The mode of exercising the jurisdiction is the same. The aid which he received in the exercise of that jurisdiction is the same, and it is here suggested in the petition that the 'complaints by or against pilots on the St. Lawrence service be taken before the vice-admiralty court.' Practically that is the case, because the judge who exercises the jurisdiction as commissioner will, in effect, be the vice-admiralty judge. I know that there are many gentlemen of the profession in Montreal and elsewhere that would like to see a vice-admiralty court established there, but the experience in the vice-admiralty court all over the Dominion is, that there is no more work in any one province than can be discharged by the vice-admiralty judge in that province, and that the government would not be warranted in establishing a second vice-admiralty court in the province of Quebec. What is done in this case is to confer, by this Bill, vice-admiralty jurisdiction with the vice-admiralty appliances, on a commissioner who, in these petty cases, will have an opportunity of dealing with them upon exactly the same lines.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Are we to understand, from the provisions of this Bill, that there is an appeal from the decisions rendered by that tribunal to the vice-admiralty court ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The amounts are too small.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We might meet the difficulty by giving an appeal to the vice-admiralty court. I think in Quebec, the judgments rendered by the Quebec Harbour Commissioners are subject to appeal—in fact I know they are subject to appeal, and there is a guarantee in that appeal which the people of Montreal might accept in the same way as it is done in Quebec. It is a guarantee given to all interests, the shipping interests, the pilots' interests—to all the interested parties in fact. I do not see why we should have a different law in Montreal from the law in Quebec, where the interests are the same.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The law is the same.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In Quebec there is an appeal.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no appeal from the vice-admiralty court. This commission is practically a vice-admiralty court with inferior jurisdiction, and so there is no difference in what there is being done in Montreal and Quebec. If questions are large and important, the vice-admiralty judge from the city of Quebec will come up to Montreal to try them.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In Quebec there is an appeal from the harbour commissioners to the vice-admiralty court. The hon. minister says that this commissioner in Montreal is, in fact, a vice-admiralty court, but with inferior jurisdiction. Could there not be an appeal from this inferior jurisdiction to a higher jurisdiction, putting it on the same footing as in Quebec ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then we would have to bring a vice-admiralty judge from Quebec to Montreal for the purpose of hearing an appeal where the amount involved may not be ten dollars, and we would be creating the very evil that is intended to be got rid of by the establishment of this commission, because, if an appeal were to be given, we might as well let the vice-admiralty judge come up and try the case in the first instance.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—Is there an appeal in the case of the vice-admiralty court ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—This shows the unfortunate position in which we are placed. Here is an important measure thrust upon us the last days of the session. This petition only reached me to-day. How can they expect that this can receive proper attention from hon. members of this House. I take strong ground in this matter, because it has been a chronic complaint that all the important measures are sent to us at the close of the session and it is impossible for us to give them the attention they deserve. Has this communication ever been submitted to the House of Commons, or to the Senate? I do not know whether it has or not. These people who are interested in the question, should have been heard, and should have an opportunity of expressing their dissent from the measure now proposed to be passed by the Senate. But there is no opportunity now. We are in the last days of the session. Is that treating us fairly ? I do not think it is. I think it is a monstrous thing that these men, who are so deeply interested in this subject, should be treated with supreme contempt. Therefore, it would be perfectly right, under the circumstances, without going into the details, to say that, inasmuch as we have not had time to consider the statements made by these people, we will not give our consent to the third reading of the Bill. We have said, year after year, that these measures should have been brought down earlier in order to give us ample opportunity to study them. But it is impossible now; we cannot do it. This petition is sent before us at the last hour. It may be right or it may be wrong. I offer no opinion on that, but I think, in common justice to these people, they should be heard. If their position is not tenable, then we would pass the Bill, but it is a most unjustifiable act on the part of the government to ignore these people.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear !

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The hon. gentleman admits I am right in principle.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Is it the fact that people cannot come here and give their reasons against a measure—that the government can pass Bills right or wrong without consulting the parties ? I do not submit to a proposition of that kind at any rate, and I think we would be doing nothing but right to say to these gentlemen, until you have an opportunity to be heard we will not pass the Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was introduced on the ninth of February.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That may be so, but I knew nothing of it. I did not know of the objections that were raised by these men, who should have an opportunity of explaining themselves. If they have stated what is not true in this petition, then ignore it. But if they can substantiate it, they should be heard. I want to hear every person who has a right to be heard, and after he has been heard, we can determine whether we shall grant his request or not. It is a monstrous thing that these important Bills should be brought down at the end of the session and we should be expected to vote upon them without having an opportunity of judging whether they are right or wrong. Those are my objections to the Bill. I think the Senate will be perfectly justified in postponing the consideration of the Bill and giving these people an opportunity of being heard. I do not care how it is done, whether by committee or otherwise, but give them common fair-play. Every man should have an opportunity of being heard in a matter in which he is interested.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—I had put a question to the hon. Minister of Justice and was waiting for an answer when the hon. gentleman for Rideau rose to speak. I asked the hon. gentleman if there was an appeal from the judgment of the judge of the Admiralty Court of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My impression is that there is an appeal to the judge of the Exchequer Court.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—Why is there not an appeal in this case ? This commissioner will be in the same position as the judge in Quebec, and there will be no appeal from this commissioner.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—These are all very minor matters.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—With the permission of the House, and in explanation, I should like to say a few words in regard to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Rideau. I think that probably the explanation of the present position is, that this Bill, as has been remarked by the hon. Minister of Justice, came before the lower House some time in February, but was not passed upon finally until a few days ago, and I am informed by members of the Lower House interested in the business of Montreal that amendments were made to the original Bill in the lower House. It is not possible that the gentlemen whose interests are represented here, and who have presented this petition, should have been in a position to present this petition until they saw the character of the amendments which were made to the original Bill in the lower House. This may account for the position of matters, and after all the responsibility should be placed upon the right shoulders. They could not take this action until the lower House had finally passed upon the Bill and made their amendments.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—Coming from the city of Montreal, a point which is very much interested in this particular Bill, and having read the petition which has been presented I wish to say a few words with regard to the claim made by some hon. members of this House, that this petition is only now before us, I may say that this Pilotage Act has been discussed over and over again in Montreal for years and years past. It is not a new question at all, and the Senate is not taken by surprise. We all know perfectly well that the gentlemen who signed this petition have been always in favour of abolishing pilotage dues in the city of Montreal. The gentlemen who are discussing this Bill perhaps did not study this question as fully as they might.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear !

Hon Mr. CASGRAIN—In the first place, there are two distinct corporations of pilots. The pilots from Father Point to the city of Quebec comprise one body, and their district covers 180 miles. Then there are the branch pilots from Quebec to the city of Montreal. The system of pilotage is altogether different in those two districts, and one might be an excellent pilot below Quebec, who would be no use whatever between Quebec and Montreal. If I were not afraid to take up the time of the House, I could explain the difference between the systems.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Go on. We have lots of time.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—In the first place, the pilotage from Father Point to Quebec is done somewhat as at sea. That is to say, in certain times they have to use the compass ; they have to go by their bearings, and use the log and look for harbours, whilst from Quebec to Montreal it is quite a different system. The pilots themselves have been in apprenticeship for years and years, and I wish the Senate to know that it takes years of study to learn the business. A man must be employed on smaller craft on the river before he can be allowed to come in and act as a pilot, and yet they say the pilots between Montreal and Quebec are making too much money, and these companies are not willing to pay them so much money and they claim that their captains and mates are able to perform the work. I must confess that, before I was better informed on this subject, I was of opinion that we could have one class of men who could navigate the ocean and pilot the ship from Father Point to Quebec and from Quebec to Montreal. I thought the thing was possible, but I made a special study of it, and after I got information about it I came to the conclusion that it was quite impossible, and I found an unwillingness on the part of sea captains to take the responsibility. You could not get them to do it. Between Montreal and Quebec in places there will be only a foot of water under the kneel of the vessel, and in many instances the channel is not dredged parallel to the current. If I had the chart I could indicate where the current runs at an angle with the artificial channel which has been made. Consequently, a ship must come up along this channel, always heading against this current, come up sideways, and the currents are varying. In one part of the St. Lawrence, there is a change of currents with the tide, and no sea captain would undertake to pilot his ship. This country has spent very much money on the development of the St. Lawrence route, million after millions as we all know, some sixty million dollars having been expended on the St. Lawence. The very key to the St. Lawrence is in the hands of the pilots from Father Point to Quebec and from Quebec to Montreal, and if an accident should arise there, the whole system of the St. Lawrence would suffer. You have heard the petition read before this House, signed by the men who employ the pilots. They say they represent the shipping interest, but they are not sailors or pilots. They represent the shipping interest so far as they make money out of the shipping coming into Montreal. The shipping of Montreal has been kept back immensely by these very same men who have signed that petition. The port of Montreal has been trammelled by those men, and if it had not been for them, the port of Montreal would have been much better developed than it is to-day. The port of Montreal has been in the hands of a select few, and those are the men who petition against the passage of this Bill at the eleventh hour. I claim that this Bill, such as it is—it may not be a perfect Bill—will remedy the evil to some extent. This Bill takes away from the harbour commissioners the trying of pilots. The harbour commissioners of Montreal, for whom I have great respect are not pilots or navigators. The whole tendency of the Bill is to have these matters dealt with by men qualified to act by their knowledge and experience, instead of having merchants or professional men, who are not interested in navigation and know little about navigation. They do not pretend to know about navigation, and yet they are called upon to try a pilot for some mistake in navigation. Could any body possibly entertain the rejection of a Bill which would tend to put in the hands of competent persons the trying of pilots ? I do not see how the Senate can hesitate for a moment. Under this Bill you have a lawyer who is supposed to conduct the case according to legal practice, and he has the right to call in two assessors. These assessors are named every year by the pilots. The pilots will appoint one, or two of them, as the case may be to sit on this court and advised generally as to what has taken place. If you, hon. gentlemen, are not experienced navigators or sailors, you would say how difficult it is to place the responsibility for a collision. When you are standing on the deck of a ship and another ship comes against you, you do not know which ship has struck the other. You have instances of that peculiar illusion every day. If you are on a train and another passing, you do not know which is moving, the one you are on or the other. These trials should be in the hands of competent people. I have received letters from the province of Quebec advocating the passage of this Bill, not that they consider it perfect, but because it is a step in the right direction. No doubt, further on, when business will warrant it, the establishment of an admiralty court in Montreal will be desirable, but under the present circumstances it is not advisable. The judge sitting in the admiralty court in Quebec, tries not only under the Pilotage Act, but also under other marine Acts outside of the pilotage jurisdiction. This is simply to apply to the pilots between Montreal and Quebec. As I said before, if this Bill is allowed to pass, it will fill a long-felt want, and I shall be happy indeed to give any further information on the subject that hon. gentlemen may ask for.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me that many of us misapprehend the petition which has been read to-day to the Senate. I could not well understand why the Minister of Justice should have said the petition was not relevant to the subject before the House. He complained that these gentlemen had not taken action before. It is quite evident, from the documents which have been laid before the House, that they took action as soon as the amendments were made in the House of Commons to the Pilotage Act as it was introduced, and then, the moment they saw what amendments were made, they framed this petition, and sent in their protest against the passage of the Bill. If you look at the letter signed by David Seath, secretary of the Harbour Commissioners, you will find he says:

Harbour Commissioners of Montreal,
Secretary's Office,
Montreal, May 30, 1900.

Sir,—I am directed to send you (herewith inclosed) a copy of Bill No. 11, An Act to amend the Pilotage Act (Montreal pilots' court), reprinted as amended in Committee of the Whole, for suggestions by the Montreal Board of Trade, and to say that if any are made they will be considered by the commissioners at their meeting on June 4 prox., and a report thereon forwarded to the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) DAVID SEATH,
Secretary.

George Hadrill, Esq.,
Secretary Montreal Board of Trade,
Montreal.

Then they ask, in addition to this, that the Senate do not pass the Bill, for the reasons which are given in the petition and for other reasons which are set forth in a letter signed by George Hadrill, secretary of the Board of Trade. The fact is, they object to this Bill, and claim that if the system of pilotage is to be revised, or there is to be any power or court to try delinquincies on the part of pilots, or any differences that may arise on the route between the ports of Montreal and Quebec, that it shall be through the authority of the admiralty court. They appear to have an objection to the system that is being adopted by the Bill now before parliament, and which we are asked to pass to-day. They go on to say:

1. That the establishment of a Vice-Admiralty Court appears to the committee to be the only means for providing a satisfactory tribunal for the trial of pilots, and that the Dominion government should take the necessary steps during the present session of parliament for such establishment.

They claim that if pilots are to be tried for any dereliction of duty, it should be by a properly constituted admiralty court.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is practically establishing that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand that is the hon. gentleman's argument without the power and control of the admiralty court. This Bill, as I understand it, and as it was explained yesterday, is to provide a means to deal with minor offences, but not to deal with the greater offences which may occur. The question is whether the gentleman who has intimated to us that the petitioners know nothing as to what is required for the commercial interests of Montreal really knows what they do want. If we are to understand the arguments of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) you must take it for granted that the Board of Trade, and the Corn Exchange, which endorse this petition, and the Harbour Commissioners, are so ignorant of the requirements of the city of Montreal that they really do not know what they want.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—They do not want to pay the pilots.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I can understand that very well. There has been a difficulty, and the remarks of the hon. gentleman might lead us into a discussion of the whole pilotage system of the River St. Lawrence. The great difficulty in the past has been—particularly for that section of the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec, but I might extend it further than Quebec, —the attempt in the past to place the whole navigation of the river in the hands of, and under the control and management and dictation of the pilots. I have been fighting that question ever since I have been in parliament. The hon. gentleman is quite right in saying this is a vexed question. What the shipping of Montreal say is: 'We have captains who have been navigating our ships through the St. Lawrence for a quarter of a century, who are just as capable of navigating a ship from Montreal to Quebec as any pilot whose duty it is to navigate the St. Lawrence. They go further. Under the Pilotage Act they are obliged to employ, if I understand it correctly, a pilot belonging to the Pilots' Association, and then they are obliged to take them in rotation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was shown in the inquiry before a committee of this House that certain steamship companies retained certain pilots and paid them extra.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They have a right, as I understand it, to retain a pilot for the season.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—For the whole season.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know the question was discussed some years ago, when the Senate rejected a Bill from the Lower House, which was considered by the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, on the ground of the restrictions which were placed on shipowners and maritime people in connection with the employment of pilots, and that was the concession which was afterwards made. Formerly they were obliged to take the pilots in rotation, but that was changed because the complaint was that, however inefficient a pilot might be, they had no choice of selection; but in a later law that was changed and they were enabled to retain one pilot for the season. I agree with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken with regard to this question. I have come to this conclusion, after a good deal of study of the question—I know this opinion is not in accordance with that of gentlemen who have the interests of the pilots at heart—the great trouble with the navigation of the St. Lawrence, and which has tended in a large measure to ruin it, is not the action of the shipowners, and the mercantile people of the city of Montreal, but the control, influence and power that have been placed in the hands of the pilots. I believe the whole system, when you get at the bottom of it, is radically wrong, and that if we had less pilotage charges and less dues, it would be better for the city of Montreal. I should like to see, as a Canadian, that port made the cheapest in the world, but we never can do that while we have power placed in the hands of men who obtain their whole living out of the shipping in the St. Lawrence. Let us make our harbour dues as low as possible; let us make navigation under the Pilotage Act just as cheap as it possibly can be made. At the same time, pay the pilots well for what they do, and when we accomplish that, we will have done more to encourage the trade of the St. Lawrence than we will by these continued restrictions. The only question for the Senate to consider is whether this Bill should pass its third reading in the face of this petition from every important interest in Montreal or whether they should comply with the request of these people by the establishment of an admiralty court in the city of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We do give them an admiralty court.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a limited one. I was a little surprised to hear the remark made by the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière (Mr. Casgrain) in reference to the shipping interests of this country. I was under the impression that Montreal was the mercantile metropolis of this Dominion, and not to be spoken of in the derogatory manner in which the hon. gentleman has referred to it. I admit that Quebec was, fifty or sixty years ago, as a shipping port, much more important than the city of Montreal, but the expenditure of millions of dollars in deepening the St. Lawrence has brought the western terminus of ocean navigation to the city of Montreal. It is really the western terminus of the ocean trade now, and if we cans possibly encourage the trade through the St. Lawrence, I care not whether it be by this Bill or otherwise, the better for the country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We should treat the petition which has been submitted to the House with all possible consideration, but I think that some of the reflections made by some hon. gentlemen with respect to this petition are not called for. Let us give the substance of the petition due consideration; at the same time we should not say that the rights of the people who sent this petition here have been outraged. This Bill was introduced almost at the opening of the session, on February 9. Unless my information is altogether wrong, the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, and all these other interests have been engaged in negotiating with respect to the form which the Bill was to take.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. POWER—And the Bill, as it comes to us, is the result, not of the first intentions of the government, although before the government introduced the Bill they had had conferences with all these different parties—but this is the Bill as it was finally passed by the House of Commons, after hearing the representatives of the Board of Trade and these other bodies. The petition before us is not a perfectly new thing, because I find the letter of the secretary of the Harbour Commissioners is dated May 30, and he incloses a copy of this Bill with the amendments made to it by the House of Commons committee. That is six weeks ago nearly. That my hon. friend from Rideau will see disposes of his charge.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That does not apply to our case.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman was talking a little while ago of the unfairness of dealing with the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal without giving them notice. The truth is that these interests were informed all along of what was being done, so this House should not give any consideration to this plea that these parties have not had notice. The reasonable and business-like way is to look at the petition and see what weight there is in its allegations. The hon. Minister of Justice was correct in saying that the petitioners misapprehend the object of the Bill. The wording of the petition shows that they do. It begins:

That this Bill in nowise remedies any of the evils presently resting on the pilotage, but, on the contrary, provides further taxation on an already over-burdened interest; moreover, it is of partial application, being limited to the service between Montreal and Quebec, leaving the service between Quebec and the sea untouched.

This Bill does not undertake to alter the law with respect to pilotage at all, and it would be a pretty bold government and parliament that would undertake to revolutionize the law respecting pilotage in the St. Lawrence. The government of which the hon. gentleman was a distinguished member, and which he led afterwards, never undertook to do so. The difficulty had been found in connection with the disputes between the pilots and the shipping interest. The pilots complained that the decision of these disputes was left with the other side to the dispute that the Montreal Harbour Board were the judges and at the same time parties, and there is no doubt a great deal of force in that view, and I can readily understand how the pilots feel about it. I can speak freely on this matter, because, when the Bill to which the hon. leader of the opposition referred, constituting the pilots between Montreal and Quebec into a close corporation, was before our committee, I voted against the passing of the Bill. I thought it was undesirable to give the pilots too much control of the shipping interests. But the object of this Bill is totally different. It is simply to provide that when disputes arise between pilots and the shipping interest, there shall be a competent and fairly impartial tribunal to decide those questions, and it seems to me that this Bill provides for a tribunal which will not be an expensive one. Any one who knows anything about the admiralty court is aware that, in addition to the cost of constituting a separate court at Montreal, which would be very considerable, a cost which would come out of the pockets of the people of the country, the costs in the admiralty court are very heavy. The costs in the admiralty court would be very much higher than the costs before this commission. I do not know that these petitioners have misapprehended the object of the measure, but they seem to have done so. They say:

(a) That the pilotage services from Montreal to the sea be thrown open to all qualified candidates possessing the necessary qualifications, preference being given to those having several years' experience of ocean navigation as master or mate.

That, as the hon. Minister of Justice says, is irrelevant to the measure before us. This Bill does not propose to make any change in the pilotage service. It leaves that service as it is. Then, paragraph (b) asks:

That compulsory payment of pilotage fees be abolished on trans-Atlantic tonnage, thereby placing such tonnage on an equality in this respect with vessels trading with the lower provinces and with Newfoundland.

That also is irrelevant to this Bill, and I think it is exceedingly unreasonable of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal to make a request of the kind. As the hon. gentleman from Delanaudière has very properly said, a great many millions of dollars have been spent by the people of this country for the purpose of making Montreal the port of the St. Lawrence instead of Quebec, which Providence had made the port of that river; and I think it is very unreasonable of the shipowners of Montreal to expect that after all that great expenditure on the part of this country, we should also pay the fees of the pilots, and that they should not pay them. I think the least they can do, in return for all the country has done for them, is to pay reasonable pilotage fees. Then this answers a question asked by the leader of the opposition as to the next paragraph :

(c) That complaints by or against pilots on the two St. Lawrence services be taken before the Vice-Admiralty Court (the judge sitting with nautical assessors in the usual way), whose decisions are to be inappealable and final.

So that if we had the admiralty court, constituted as the petitioners desire, there would be no appeal any more than there is under this Bill. This Bill represents an honest attempt to find a way out of a very difficult and unsatisfactory position, and unless some stronger reason is shown to this Senate, than those in the petition, which I think are quite irrelevant to the Bill, we should not take the responsibility of throwing out the measure. The gentlemen who represent the district of Montreal were present in the other House and had an opportunity to have their say about this question, and the Bill, as it has come up to us, is the result of their careful consideration. I do not think that we would be justified, at this stage, in rejecting the Bill and leaving things in the unsatisfactory condition in which they have been for so many years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is it correct that the pilotage service from Montreal to the sea is now open to all candidates who possess the necessary qualifications ? If the statement made here by gentlemen who were interested in shipping is correct, pilotage is compulsory.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have compulsory pilotage in Halifax and everywhere else.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was not asking that. This petition asks that the compulsory fee be abolished on the trans-Atlantic tonnage, thereby placing such tonnage on an equality in this respect with vessels plying between Montreal and the lower provinces and Newfoundland. The same dangers exist between Montreal and Quebec, and Quebec and Newfoundland as are to be found on the trans-Atlantic voyage, because after you pass Newfoundland, you are in the open sea and pilots are not required.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This exemption of vessels plying within the Dominion is not confined to the port of Montreal. It exists as respects other ports too, and Newfoundland has been thrown in with Canada ; but the hon. gentleman will see that if vessels trading across the Atlantic are exempted, there will be practically no payment of pilotage fees at all. This paragraph (b) of the petition is a request on the part of the shipping interests of Montreal that pilotage shall be abolished.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why should there be a distinction between a trans-Atlantic voyage and a voyage to Newfoundland ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The distinction was made by the government of which the hon. gentleman was a member.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman himself ought to be able to answer that question, because it was during the period he was in office and responsible for the legislation that these provisions were inserted in the law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They have been in the law since the hon. gentleman was a boy.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—All this has grown out of the improvement in the lower St.Lawrence, and while the vessels from Europe, with their valuable cargoes, may endure a considerable charge, local vessels with their cargoes would not. I think that was the reason. But my hon. friend will see that every one of these discussions is beside this Bill. We are simply providing by the Bill a mode of trying certain disputes. We are not touching the law of pilotage generally.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The hon. gentleman from Halifax says this is practically the abolition of the pilotage system.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I said the pilotage fees at Montreal.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—It just amounts to this, that shipowners and those interested in shipping, who know that their masters and mates are competent to pilot their ships up to these cities, should have the privilege of doing so if they wish, especially when they assume the responsibility themselves, and the fact that these gentlemen from the lower provinces and Newfoundland do navigate the St. Lawrence from Quebec to Montreal without sustaining any great loss, is proof that they are perfectly competent to do it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are certain exceptions in the Act, the exceptions are :

Ships belonging to Her Majesty's service, ships employed in trading from port to port in the same province, or between any of the provinces, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, ships of not more than eighty tons; any ship of which the master or mate has a certificate granted under the provisions of this Act, and then in force authorizing him to pilot such vessel within the limits within which he is then navigating.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the third time on a division and passed.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (189) 'An Act to amend the Act respecting judges of provincial courts.'

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I renew the objection I made yesterday and I hope the Minister of Justice will be in a position to give further explanations. The answer he gave yesterday does not apply to the objection I made. I read yesterday a remark made by the Attorney General of Quebec. The hon. Minister of Justice said that the remark was more of a censure addressed to the federal government because they did not act quickly enough—because they were not acting. That is not the idea the words conveyed. He said, answering Hon. Mr. Chapais :

He may rest assured that I urged the federal authorities to apply the law of the last session, but I have become aware that instead of applying it, they have done nothing but prevent its operation by the provisions of the statute they passed at the last session of the federal parliament.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The Attorney General proceeds :

We have in this matter two powers face to face, but they must come to an understanding. The provincial legislature makes known its needs, to Ottawa belongs the task of applying a remedy. I have been unable to obtain the desired remedy, so I have taken other means. In presence of the statute which I propose to pass, the federal government will see that the remedy lies either in law passed last year, and in the provisions tending towards the same end, or in the law of this year.

So it is the law of the year 1898, that the federal government refused to consider. I say that the local legislature passed certain enactments and that an obstruction to their operation came from the federal parliament. Through this opposition a new law has been passed by the legislature of the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What is that ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Creating three judges.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not a new law.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is a law that was passed that could come into operation only by proclamation of the lieutenant-governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would the hon. gentleman state what he is reading from ? Is it from a debate in the House of Assembly in Quebec of this session or last session ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In 1899. So it appears by the speech of the Attorney General of the province of Quebec, that the first law was set aside, and they were obliged to pass a new law, in 1899.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What law was set aside ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is the information I was asking yesterday of the hon. Minister of Justice, and the hon. Minister of Justice, in place of giving me the information, asked me what law it was. That is a curious way to answer a question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I answered the hon. gentleman that the legislature of Quebec, under the advice and direction of the government of Quebec, undertook to provide for what they regarded as wants in the administration of justice, by making a provision for the appointment of three more judges for the court, and I take it that that is the fact to which the hon. Attorney General alluded when he said that we had failed to give effect to their legislation. Hon. gentlemen know that this is not the measure of last year. Last year we might have asked an appropriation from parliament to have made the appointment. The question that was being considered was whether this was the most desirable and efficient way of making provision, and the government of Quebec and the legislature of Quebec are of opinion that it was, and I am not disposed to call in question the accuracy of their conclusion, because hon. gentlemen will see, in looking at the expenditure, that the bringing in of outside aid last year from the district courts to assist in the administration of justice in Montreal cost $16,000. That is a thousand dollars more than the cost would be by the appointment of these three judges. I think that I answered the hon. gentleman's question yesterday, and I now repeat to him the answer I gave to him then. He put a different construction on the words of the Attorney General to my construction of the language. I tell him I think the Attorney General refers to the fact that we did not make the appointment, as they, perhaps, thought we would immediately upon the Bill being passed.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—It may be possible the Attorney General referred to the statute that was passed by the legislature of Quebec, seeking to utilize the judicial power of the judges of Quebec by bringing in country judges to sit in review. They amended the statute so that the judges for the court of review could be taken from any part of the province, and, a few months afterwards, the Dominion parliament passed a statute by which it was provided that no travelling allowances should be made to those judges unless upon the certificate of the chief justice that the attendance of such judges was necessary, and it is said those judges standing upon their dignity and feeling there was a loss of dignity in parliament demanding that a certificate should be given on their behalf, as on behalf of school boys, held aloof, and it appears to me that it must have been to the failure of that legislation that the Attorney General referred. There was ample provision for utilizing the judicial power of the province of Quebec which everybody admits, friend and foe alike, is amply sufficient to meet every demand that can be made upon it. There was ample provision made for utilizing existing judicial power, but because the parliament of Canada, in its wisdom, had declared that no travelling allowances should be made to these judges unless the chief justice certified that it was necessary that they should be brought into the city of Montreal, and the judges resented that, the Act was held to be inoperative, whereupon the Quebec legislature declared that the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec should consist of three more judges. Nobody justifies it. Nobody can justify it. The judicial power of the province of Quebec is amply sufficient to meet every demand that can possibly be made upon it, and if the parliament of Canada would stand upon its dignity—and in doing so they would play different roll from the roll that was played by these judges who refused to go into the court of review—if the parliament of Canada would stand upon its dignity and refuse to pay out the people's money unnecessarily, I will not say unjustly, some method would be found by which the judicial power of the province of Quebec, which everybody admits to be most ample, could be used. This is a question that deeply concerns the organization of the courts. It is a question that is thrust upon parliament in the last hours of the session. For my own part, I confess that I am at a disadvantage. I have not had an opportunity to look into the Bill, to study the attitude of these parties who are clamoring for the appointment of more judges, and I would ask that the committee rise and report progress.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We will strike out that clause.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—It can be passed over in the meantime. Let the first clause stand, and the other clauses can be adopted, because I should like to look into these statistics. It is all very fine to cite statistics, but nothing can be more misleading than to say there has been an immense number of contested cases. Everybody who knows anything about it knows that nine-tenths of the cases which come before the courts are actions upon promissory notes, bills of exchange and cases where the deliberation does not take the judge any length of time. All he has to do, if he has not confidence in the officers of the court, is to verify the correctness of the service and to see that the exhibits are properly filed. A man who has any aptitude for business, who is fit to be a judge, who could earn the scanty salary each judge enjoys in the province of Quebec, could dispose of a hundred of those cases in a day. It is perfect nonsense, if I may be permitted to use such a word on the floor of this House, to contend that the judges are overworked. Overworked indeed. Overworked! Five men who had aptitude for their business could do the whole work these eleven men are called upon to do in the city of Montreal. It is—well, Mr. Chairman I will not characterize this proposition in the terms in which I think it ought to be characterized. The judicial power of the province of Quebec now is perfectly overwhelming, and the parties who are responsible for the administration of justice in the province of Quebec ought to be compelled, by the force of parliamentary opinion to utilize the power they have before they seek from parliament the appointment of more judges. I will not go the length of suggesting that the clause be struck out, but I suggest that it be allowed to stand in the meantime, and that the other clauses be passed in committee, because there is no objection to them.

The SPEAKER—Being a member of the Bar of the province of Quebec, I think it is my duty not to let the Bill pass through committee without expressing my opinion. It has been suggested that the number of judges in Quebec is amply sufficient for the administration of justice. I would not go so far as to say that if the distribution of the judges in the province of Quebec was made over again they might not be sufficient; as it is now, I think I may say that this Bill is absolutely necessary. In the district of Quebec we do not want any more judges. We have four judges in the city of Quebec, and there are judges of the outside districts residing in the city, who are always willing, without extra pay, to help the judges for the district of Quebec, and so we do not complain. But in the district of Montreal it is now the desire to create new judges. The whole bar of Montreal, with a few exceptions, say that this Bill is absolutely necessary. The administration of justice in Montreal is certainly inadequate to the requirements of the district. They have done it for years past by calling the judges from the rural districts to help the judges of the city of Montreal, and it has been found very unsatisfactory, and, as the hon. Minister of Justice has just mentioned, it is not at all economical, because last year bringing the judges from outside districts to Montreal cost $16,000, while the expenses entail by this bill will be only $15,000, and the administration of justice would be dependent on judges residing there and always ready at the call of the chief justice, but now the chief justice is obliged to call the judges from the different districts to come daily and help the judges in Montreal. This causes great expense on account of the travelling and the mileage and the amount of money allowed to the judges for their absence from home. This Bill is to obtain additional judges only for the one district of Montreal. We do not want any more judges in the city and district of Quebec. The whole Bar of Montreal requests the passage of this Bill, because the administration of justice is delayed a good deal. There is no desire for political reward in this matter, as has been suggested. I hope this House would not think for a moment that the government would appoint three judges merely for the purpose of helping their friends. This has been asked for by the whole Bar of Montreal, irrespective of party. It is known in the city of Montreal that the administration of justice is not done as it should be, and for this reason it is required that three additional judges be appointed to administer justice. This will obviate the calling of the judges from the districts at a cost exceeding the salaries of the three judges to be appointed under this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The only answer to make to the last speaker is to ask the hon. senator, who is not now acting as Speaker, if any of the judges, either of the court of appeal or the court of review, or any court at all in the district of Montreal have asked for this legislation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They are behind with their work.

The SPEAKER—I may say the judges would not take upon themselves to make a public demand of that kind, but I have seen several of them, and they all said it was required; but the hon. gentleman ought to know that the judges would not make that request.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have not the honour to belong to the bar, but sometimes I may approach a judge and ask him if he thinks that such a measure is needed, and all the judges I have approached have told me that it is not needed.

The SPEAKER—That is not the view expressed by those I have seen myself.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then we did not see the same judges. I am thankful to the hon. senator who sits on my left (Hon. Mr. Baker) for all the information he has given us. I could not extract it from the government, or the hon. Minister of Justice, who is supposed to know all about it, but it appears to me we have more light on this side of the House than they have. That may not be the opinion of the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I had intended moving that the first clause be struck out, but as my hon. friend wants more light, not from the Minister of Justice, but from his own study of the measure, I am content to let this clause stand and proceed with the rest of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—I am not going to be drawn into any controversy as to the political aspect of this question, but it is an open secret in the province of Quebec, and has been for months, that this measure is intended for the purpose of shelving at least two of the ministers of the province of Quebec, and the gentlemen who are to benefit by it would not have the slightest hesitation to acknowledge that. But, I am not going to be drawn into that phase of the controversy. The true remedy for the state of congestion in the courts of the city of Montreal is to enlarge the salaries of the judges. My hon friend says he is not a member of the bar. I am a member of the bar of the province of Quebec, and have been so for forty years, and I know, and everybody else who is connected with the administration of justice in the province of Quebec knows, that it has been a scandal for years that judges have been compelled to supplement their salaries by engaging in literary work, some acting as executors of estates, and some compiling reports. It has been a scandal that the parliament of Canada has neglected to do justice to the judiciary of the province of Quebec. Their salaries were fixed at a time when the cost of living was not half what it is to-day. For years and years the judges of the province of Quebec have laboured under what amounts to a disability. If the parliament of Canada would have the fortitude to do justice to them and increase their salaries, so as to enable them to give their undivided attention to their duties as judges, if there is any congestion of business it would soon disappear. I do not believe that any member of the bar who knows the labour that members of the bar impose on themselves —I do not believe any member of the bar in the province of Quebec who stands in the foremost rank could be brought forward to say that, in his opinion, there is any necessity for a further addition to the judiciary of the city of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I am neither a lawyer nor a doctor, but I have listened to the remarks of hon. gentlemen and I find there is no difference of opinion as to the fact that the present judges in Quebec are able to discharge all the duties of their office. In some districts there are too many judges, and in Montreal too few. Better re-apportion them than appoint more judges. Then, with regard to their pay, I always find there are a number of lawyers ready to take position on the bench, though they know what the pay is. From what the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Baker) says, there are two members of Quebec government who are anxious for positions on the bench, and they are ready to take those positions at the present salaries. I think they are as well paid as any men in the country for the work they do. If the government would redistribute the judges that would be a better way to solve the difficulty. Otherwise, I do not feel inclined to vote for an increase in the judges when the present number can do the work.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We have nothing to do with making the districts or constituting the courts. That is in the hands of the legislature.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Let them find their own remedy.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not the constitutional view. They are responsible to the people of Quebec, they are not responsible to the people of the Dominion in the constitution of courts and determining the boundaries of their respective districts. Quebec has acted. The hon. gentleman for years supported the government that made the districts of Quebec what they are at this moment, and when they were asked to consider the subject of revision, no revision took place. Why, the hon. gentleman has never been heard in this House, or in the other House, on the subject of the re-organization of the courts of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—They reorganize them in the Quebec legislature. We do not reorganize the courts here.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So I contend, but the hon. gentleman has spoken here to-day as if we were reorganizing them here. He says there are plenty of judges, but they are not in their proper places—that the districts should be made different from what they are. We have not the power to make the districts different, and the parties who are the best judges of what the districts should be, are those elected by the electors of the province of Quebec to the local legislature with that function imposed upon them. Now, what have they done ? They have provided for the establishment of three additional judges. What has the hon. gentleman insinuated here to-day ? Why, that the judges that my hon. friend assisted in putting on the bench do not discharge their duties—they do not do their work—they are looking for commissions—they are seeking to supplement their salaries——

Hon. Mr. BAKER—I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understood the hon. gentleman to say that.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—I will try to explain when the hon. gentleman is through.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman stated if they were paid better the work would be done. He admits the work is not done. He knows—no one in this House could know better, because he is a resident of the district of Montreal—that the judges of Montreal are in arrears with their work—that they have had that outside service which he says would be sufficient, and that they are still in arrears, and that that outside assistance has cost more than would three additional judges. There can be no doubt with regard to that; it is perfectly clear. I venture to say this: we have had a reconsideration of this question before—years ago. The hon. gentleman was a member of this House at that time. The hon. gentleman did not then favour the destruction of the system which prevails in Quebec and the establishment of a different system in its place. Neither did the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Bowell) who was a member of the government at that time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was not proposed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Why ? Because every man from the province of Quebec opposed it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That was their business, not ours.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not our business to-day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is our business to say what the number of judges should be.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Did the hon. gentleman take that position before ? I know when the hon. gentleman said there were more judges in British Columbia than there should be, the leader of the House of Commons at that time said that the legislature of the province of British Columbia had decided there should be a certain number of judges, and they were responsible to the people of the country, and it is our business to appoint the judges required under that system which they had established.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is our prerogative to appoint.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, and our duty. We are not at fault if the organization is not as perfect as it might be. It is the people of the province who elect the men to parliament who constitute the courts in that particular way that are to blame, and the hon. gentleman assumes that we, in this parliament, have the right to substitute our judgment for the judgment of the electors on a matter within the control of the local legislature. I say that that is not so.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—You ought not to assent to that Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Act was within the jurisdiction of the local legislature. The Act was an Act for which they were responsible to the people. We have certain duties marked out for us by our constitutional system. There are certain duties marked out to the local legislatures under the same constitution, and the men who go to the people go there stating the policy that is within their jurisdiction, elected upon that, legislate upon the policy to which they have so committed themselves, and which has had the approval of the electors, and if it was within their jurisdiction, I deny that there is any right, no matter what may be our personal opinion, to over-ride the judgment of the local legislature on a matter within their jurisdiction, and which in no way conflicts with powers entrusted to us. Our duty is to give effect to that legislation. Our duty is to appoint the judges.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—And pay them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, and pay them.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—No matter how many. Suppose instead of three they had decreed thirty ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We cannot assume here, any more than we can assume elsewhere, that our constitutional system is going to be disregarded by those to whom the working out of the constitution has been entrusted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Except in Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Nor in Manitoba. Last year the service that was obtained from without for the purpose of assisting the judges in the city of Montreal cost sixteen thousand dollars. The appointment of three additional judges would cost $15,000. In point of economy the cost, under this system, is less than under the other, and the hon. gentleman says there is no politics in this. There was not, so far as we are concerned, but there certainly is, so far as those gentlemen are concerned who are offering us active opposition. I venture to say that if the government of the side of the hon. gentleman was here in power he would take a different course.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Do not impute motives.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not imputing motives. I am expressing an opinion. I am making a prediction, and I say if the hon. gentleman's friends were here, and were proposing this Bill, that then I do not think there would be opposition to it.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—How does the hon. gentleman know ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I infer from what has been done heretofore. I draw the inference from an experience extending over thirty years, and I find that that system, which all these hon. gentlemen now say is wrong, radically wrong, is one that had their sanction under the greatest leader they ever had, Sir John Macdonald, during the whole period of his parliamentary career, and under the leadership of the very distinguished man who was connected with him for so many years, Sir George Cartier.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Where is the prediction ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That if their friends proposed a measure of this sort, they would be ready to give it their support and assistance, and I conclude that from what they have hitherto done, for this is the first time there has been an outcry against the system in Quebec in a period of thirty-four years.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What the hon. minister meant to be a prediction is, that as soon as we attain power we may do such and such a thing, but as he put his phrase it was a supposition. If the hon. gentleman is not able to distinguish between a supposition and a prediction, I am not astonished that he could not answer my question just now. The hon. gentleman says, that it belongs to the province to reorganize its administration of justice, I accept that theory. The province has done something, but the Act of the province was checked by this government here. What Mr. Archambault says is this :

> I proposed a law during the session of 1898 by which I empowered the judges of the rural districts to sit in review, thereby, as I thought, relieving the judges of Montreal and Quebec of the work which bears so heavily upon them, and at the same time giving the rural judges more work to do, but, he says, after I passed that law the Federal parliament passed another law which renders my law inoperative, in that it imposes upon the judges who come to sit in review certain restrictions and certain conditions which they will not accept.

So, this parliament bound, as the Minister of Justice says it was, to aid the province in the reorganization of its courts, did quite the contrary. Objections were raised and obstacles were thrown in the way of the operation of the law of the province of Quebec, and it is for that reason the Attorney General says:

I have been unable to obtain the desired remedy, so I have taken other means. In presence of the Statute which I propose to pass the Federal government will see that the remedy lies either in the law passed last year and in the provisions tending towards the same end, or in the law of this year.

I contend that if the province has the power to enact the law reorganizing their courts, the Minister of Justice has no right to say here that he did not prevent, by the legislation which this parliament passed, the operation of the provincial law, and it is because he prevented the operation of the provincial law that he comes to-day with a new Bill asking us to create three new judges and pay their salaries. Nothing of the kind has been asked by the province of Quebec, and the legislation which it passed, in 1899, was merely an enactment passed because obstacles were thrown in the way by the federal government. More than that, the last provincial law contained a proviso saying that the law would come into operation only by the proclamation of the lieutenant-governor in council, the ministers in the province of Quebec expecting in the meantime that the federal government would comply with the first law, so that the second one should not be needed at all, and it is because the government of the day refused any aid to the province that a certain law was enacted and came into operation by a proclamation of the governor in council.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he thinks it would have been better from the federal government to have adopted the course indicated by the first legislation of the province of Quebec? The hon. gentleman from Missisquoi (Hon. Mr. Baker) has explained why that law did not become operative. The federal parliament decided that these judges who were called in should not sit, and should not send any claims for indemnity to the federal government unless there was a certificate from the chief justice to the effect that the presence of any particular judge was necessary. Does the hon. gentleman think, that it would have been better for the federal parliament not to have imposed any conditions of that sort, and to have left the door open for all the outside judges to come in?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly, because they do not come in themselves. They come in when asked by the chief justice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman is mistaken. That is just the point, and the clause was inserted in the Bill, in order to prevent the abuse.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman contend that a rural judge in the province of Quebec will come into the city and step on the bench without being asked by the chief justice?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I pretend to say this, that all the amendment of which the hon. gentleman complains is that a person could only come when invited by the chief justice. Now, that is what the law required, and the hon. gentleman says that the law ought not to have required that, but should have left it to the parties themselves.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. minister does not answer my question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do answer it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He thinks, I suppose, that a prediction is the same thing as a supposition, and that is the way he answers it. I say to the hon. minister that no judge in the province of Quebec in the rural districts can come up and sit in the court of review without having been previously asked by the presiding judge.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Under the law as it is he could not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Enacting a law to force the chief justice to give, in addition to his demand, a certificate that the thing is necessary is throwing on the chief justice the imputation that he asked those judges when it was not necessary.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I know precisely what was done, and why it was done. I think I had some correspondence on the subject and I know this, that the clause was inserted in the Bill at the instance of a very distinguished member of the bench.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I thought the judges would not interfere.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The judges interfere?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, they do not interfere.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Since a great many years I have had the advantage of sitting under the precepts of the hon. Minister of Justice. From time almost immemorial, I have heard him discuss constitutional questions, and it gives me pleasure, to say he has always done it with singular ability. It is only when he comes to apply his constitutional principles that he finds himself so far afield. There is no question about the inherent right of the local legislature to organize, to constitute, and to equip, so far as the machinery of the administration of justice is concerned, civil and criminal courts, and there can be no less doubt that the duty is imposed by the British North America Act on the Governor General in Council to appoint the judges, and upon the parliament of Canada to provide for the payment of their salaries; but surely that constitutional doctrine, which everybody accepts, is to be accepted with limitations. Where would it lead us to if a blind adherence to a fixed law is to be our only guide? Are we to say nothing, are we to submit in silence no matter what may be done? Is the parliament of Canada, empowered by the constitution to deal with the people's money, bound to put its hand to the public treasury and pay these judges no matter how many are to be appointed? I say such a proposition has only to be stated in order to carry its own refutation. The hon. Minister of Justice sought to discuss the judicial system of the province of Quebec. The right hon. Premier discussed that system and declared it to be antiquated. Without going the full length that the leader of the government went in the other House, I may say that when that system was devised, the condition of the country was widely different from what it is to-day. The rural districts were not as accessible as they are to-day. It required in every case a days' journey to reach them, and in many cases many days' journey to reach them, and under the circumstances the system of decentralization was adopted by Sir George Cartier, whose memory remains in the province of Quebec as fresh to-day as it was immediately after his decease. That system was then satisfactory to the wants and requirements of the population of the province of Quebec, but everything has changed. Times change, and men change with them, and the judicial system might fairly be expected to change to meet the new conditions. Now, instead of being remote, they are brought within a few hours of the city of Montreal. Montreal is more accessible from the chef-lieux of the rural districts than the residences of some of the judges who are assigned to duty in those rural districts. But we are not discussing the system in the province of Quebec. The question to-day is, whether we can fairly be asked to give our assent to the proposition before parliament. The legislature of the province of Quebec provided a means to utilize the judicial power of the province. They recognized the fact that there was sufficient power already created and in existence, and they devised a means for utilizing it. I am indebted to my hon. friend (Mr. Landry) for reading the remarks of the Attorney General which referred to the fact that the legislature had made that provision in providing that the judges could not be brought in from the rural districts to sit in the court of review. That Act was assented to in the month of January, 1898, and a few weeks after, parliament passed a statute here declaring that these rural judges should not be entitled to their allowance except upon a certificate by the chief justice that their services were necessary. It is no use to shut our eyes to the fact. It was stated fairly and fully by the hon. Minister of Justice when he said that that statute was passed for the purpose of correcting abuses. Abuses had sprung up, and shown themselves in the payment of the travelling allowances of the judges. I do not know myself, and if I did know I would not mention the names of the judges who were held, by common consent, to have given too liberal an interpretation to their privileges in drawing their allowances, and as the hon. Minister of Justice has said, that statute was passed for the purpose of correcting the abuse. It is still on the statute-book. They have a practical method of utilizing the judicial power in the province of Quebec, and I say that we are violating no constitutional principle if the parliament of Canada asks them to pause and let this matter stand in abeyance for another year, if the parliament of Canada should ask them to see whether the provision already made by the legislature of the province of Quebec and of the parliament of Canada will not prove effective. I said a little while ago that I asked that this clause be permitted to stand over, and I am still of opinion it would be better, but if I were forced to action upon it this instant, I should vote for expunging the first section from the Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend would do that at any rate, unless he carried the election.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—I did not hear that remark.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend would do that at any rate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Unless what ?

Hon. Mr. BAKER—The hon. member said I would do that at any rate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to explain ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend said he would favour delay in the consideration of the clause, and if he could not have it delayed he would vote for expunging the clause.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—The hon. gentleman has no right to say that. The hon. member has no right to judge me by his inner consciousness, and to say that I would do that anyway. The hon. gentleman has no right to say it, and I do not say that to-morrow I shall vote for it or not. I ask that it be permitted to stand, and I shall look up the statutes and examine the statistics, and get what information I can, and I shall do whatever I think proper, and I shall not be intimidated by any insinuation from the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I wish to call attention to some remarks made by the hon. speaker and by the Minister of Justice. If we are to accept the statements which have been made, the judges are much more sensitive in Quebec than in some of the other provinces. My recollection of changes which have been made in the different laws, affecting not only the criminal, but civil law, is that on many occasions these suggestions have come from the judges themselves and I think I heard the Minister of Justice state to this House that such and such suggestions were made by chief justices of different sections of the province. Many of us remember also that there was a judge appointed in Manitoba a short time ago, without any law having been passed providing for his salary. The answer given to the objections then made in the Senate by the then Minister of Justice, now lieutenant-governor of Ontario, was that he was appointed upon the strong recommendation of the judges of that province who required further assistance. That is my recollection. The hon. gentleman was present at the time, so that, speaking of the judges, like my hon. friend from Stadacona, I am not a lawyer, but I have had conversations, both with the members of the bar from the province of Quebec, and also with some of the judges, and there is but one opinion that has ever been expressed, so far as I know, and that is that there are judges in the province of Quebec ample to perform all the duties that fall to the lot of the judges of the city of Montreal, if anything like a re-arrangement is made. That is the evidence, and that has been the assertion, not only of the bar but of the judges, and the judges, to my mind, are best able to speak as to what is required to enable them to perform their duties. There are some members of the judiciary of Montreal, as I have read in the newspapers, who are a long way behind with their work, There were others again, against whom great complaints were made when they were appointed, who have kept well up with their work, and it is because they are industrious and attend to their work. The simple question as to whether the parliament of Canada is compelled, under the constitution, to do that which the hon. Minister of Justice says we are bound to do. My own opinion of the constitution is that which was laid down by the hon. gentleman from Missisquoi (Hon. Mr. Baker). If the theory which has been enunciated by the Minister of Justice were put in practice, the constitution, so far as the courts of this country are concerned—that is so far as the parliament of Canada is concerned—would be an utter nullity. The hon. minister is giving that a kind of contradiction. If the parliament of Canada have no power other than to acquiesce in any demand made upon it by the local legislatures, I will not say of Quebec, but by the local legislatures, in reference to the appointment of judges, then the constitution so far as Canada is concerned, is a nullity. The Confederation Act points out that the constitution of the courts shall be with the local legislatures. Then it says that the appointment of the judges, and the providing of the salary shall be with the Dominion parliament. There are two branches of authority. One is to arrange the constitution of the court, and the other is to furnish the means. If it were intended that there should be no option and discretionary power in the Dominion parliament, why in the world was there any distinction drawn between the two? Either the Dominion parliament should have the power of arranging the constitution of the courts of the different provinces, and the appointment of the judges, and the payment of the salaries; or the provincial courts, having the power to do the one, should also have the power to do the other. All we have to do, according the theory laid down by the hon. Minister of Justice, is to acquiesce in any demand which may be made by the local legislatures, no matter of what province. As the hon. gentleman from Missisquoi says; supposing they come and say: 'We want ten judges,' according to the hon. gentleman's theory we are bound to provide the salaries of the ten judges.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the doctrine laid down. If the theory that we must furnish the salary for one is correct, then the only logical conclusion is that we must provide salaries for fifty if they demand it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—Certainly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. member had better settle that question with his leader, the Minister of Justice. I acquiesce in the doctrine that the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière accepts, and I am glad to know that there is one hon. gentleman at least, who takes that position, either the one thing or the other, we have the power or we have not, and the constitution gives us the power to say yea or nay to this very clause, and if we say nay it is for the legislature of the province of Quebec to say whether it is in the interests of the judiciary to take such steps in the reorganization of their courts, as to enable them to utilize the judges they have without appointing any others. I am rather pleased to see a little opposition to the hon. Minister of Justice, because he gets his blood up and speaks with a little more energy and vim; but he is apt to attribute to others motives which they probably never entertained. The hon. gentleman says: 'When you were over here you did not do so and so.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. member is worse in his practice than the leader of the government who says the usages and practice of the province of Quebec are antiquated. If you would take the theory of the hon Minister of Justice, he is the most antiquated old Tory in Canada. Because these things existed a long time ago, and because another party did not takes means to reform them, when it was not so much demanded as it is to-day, ergo you must let them alone. That is the decision of the Minister of Justice. I venture the assertion that the hon. gentleman himself holds opinions upon many questions which agitate the country to-day which he did not entertain thirty or forty years ago when he came into parliament. I frankly admit that the circumstances have changed. The requirements of the country are different from what they were twenty-five years ago, and the necessities of the people demand this change, and the man who is not prepared to advance with the advancing age must be designated an antiquated old fogy. Conservative as I am, I do not profess to hold views that were held so far back in antiquity as to follow the hon. gentleman in the theory he has laid down. The simple question we have to decide to-day is as to whether we shall compel—I may justly use that word—the province of Quebec to adopt a system by which this expense need not be incurred, or whether we should allow things to remain just as they are, and vote these salaries for the extra three judges. That is a simple question, and I believe, from what I have learned, both from judges and the bar of Quebec that these additional judges are not required, that all that is required is to rearrange and re-adjust the constitution of the courts, that the difficulty can be avoided and a much better service performed. The reason given by the hon. gentleman from Missisquoi (Hon. Mr. Baker) is convincing—must be so to every man who knows the circumstances of this country before the construction of railways and other improved means of conveyance—that which was required in the older days of the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario is not required to-day. There were many rural districts which it would take a week to reach, which can be reached now in as many hours, and consequently it becomes a duty in this advancing age, in that legislature as well as others, to take steps to utilize the legal talent they have in the performance of the work which is necessary to do, without adding to the expense of the country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The language of the constitution is plain, and I do not think it requires a legal mind to interpret it. Section 92 of the British North America Act reads :

Exclusive powers of provincial legislatures.—In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:

The administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts, both civil and criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts.

I do not think there is any ambiguity about that language.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What does the hon. minister understand by 'maintenance.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand it perfectly well, and I think the hon. gentleman understands it. It says the constitution, 'maintenance and organization.' The clause 'Judicature,' reads as follows :—

The Governor General shall appoint the judges of the superior, district and county courts in each province, except those of the courts of probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

There is no alternative there. It is not 'may appoint.' It is a rare case in which the word 'shall' is used. There it is positively imperative. The words are that the Governor General shall appoint. When there is to be a judge appointed under the organization of one of the provincial statutes, it is the duty of the Governor General to make the appointment. If it is his duty to appoint, and it is the duty of parliament to find the means. Parliament can, in an indirect way, say 'we will not permit the spirit of the Act to be carried out, but we will insist on the change in the organization of the courts of a particular province. If the province will not make the change, then we will decline to appoint the judges, and to pay them.' That is the simple point before the House.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Is it 'shall appoint and pay'?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes, there is no question on that point.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is the appointment made ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It depends on the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The appointment is not made until the salary is provided.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I thought the minister read a part of the constitution which said 'the government shall appoint.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It does say so.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The judges have not been appointed yet.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He shall appoint, but he shall appoint in conformity with the law, and in conformity with the law the salary must first be provided for. It is perfectly clear that there is no superintending or controlling given, or intended to be given, to the parliament of Canada. The constitution, maintenance and organization of the court is exclusively in the province. My hon. friend thought that he made a very strong point when he followed the hon. gentleman from Missisquoi, and said 'If there is no limitation upon the power then there might be forty or fifty judges appointed.' Permit me to say that, in my opinion, that is not a very strong argument. Our whole constitutional system rests upon the basis that we are qualified for self government. The controlling influence, both over the parliament of Canada, and over the local legislatures, is the electorate of the province, in the one case, and the electorate of the whole Dominion in the other. It is the electorate of the province to whom the legislature is responsible. If the legislature were to say there should be so many judges, the electorate of the province would call them to account, if it was an improper appointment, and there is just the same possibility of abuse here as there is in the local legislature. and if the hon. gentleman undertakes, or if this House were to undertake, to prevent appointments being made by refusing the necessary appropriation, they would be abusing their powers just as essentially as if the local legislature were to provide for the appointment of twice as many judges as were necessary. The assumption in both cases is that parliament will act in conformity with public opinion. On those general questions which affect the entire Dominion, we are responsible to the whole electorate of the country, and they to the electorate of the province within whose jurisdiction they act. If these gentlemen undertake to establish an improper system, they are responsible to the electorate of Quebec. If we undertake to disregard our duty, we are responsible to the electorate of all Canada, and that is the only difference between us in this regard. What my hon. friends opposite insist upon doing is to undertake to exercise a superintending control over the legislature of Quebec and over the electorate of Quebec that the law in no way gives them —which it in no case confers upon them. The people of Quebec have elected the local legislature upon whom this power is conferred, and it is to that people the legislature is responsible, and not to us.

Hon. Mr. GILLMOR—It may be presumption on my part to speak upon this constitutional question, but it appears to me the legislature of Quebec has just as much right to dictate a change of constitution towards this parliament, as we have to dictate towards that legislature, and the supposition is that some absurd, ridiculous thing will be done in Quebec, that therefore we have not to carry out the constitution.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. GILLMOR—We are bound by the constitution the same as they are, and in order to carry out the constitution they have a right to organize this judiciary, and the constitution declares that the Dominion government shall provide the means to pay for it. I have listened to the argument and been quite interested in it, and it appears to me that the constitution is fixed with regard to Quebec, and that our friends here claim the right to alter the constitution in this particular case. I do not think they have any right to alter it. I think the constitution is plain and our duty is plain. I suppose they might appoint a hundred, but that is supposing something simply ridiculous, and the people of Quebec would be ashamed of a government that would do such a thing, and would reject them at the next election.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—We have often heard, and I suppose the saying is not unfamiliar, that facts are stubborn things. We associate often times facts and figures together. There is, however, an important essential difference between figures and facts. It is said that nothing can lie like figures when they are properly manipulated. That can never be asserted of a fact. A fact can never lie. No amount of declamation, or of assertion, can override a fact. No deluge of verbiage, however copious, can drown out a fact. It seems to me the duty of this House, and the object set before us, to get down to rock bottom facts in this case. Those who are in a position to know, who are at the place, who have knowledge of all the facts, make a certain statement, and, coming from these parties, I, at least, am bound to accept these statements as facts. In regard to these judges, they say that in one district in the province of Quebec a judge will, perhaps, in the course of one month, deal only with two or three or four cases, whereas his fellow-judge in another district will, in the currency of one month, deal with as many cases as the other judge in the currency of a year. If this is really the fact, it appears to me that the question is not, shall we have more judges ? Because under these circumstances, there is no necessity for any more judges ; but cannot the work of these judges be so equalized that in the busiest district it can be easily accomplished by the present judges ? That is the matter that we have to deal with, and it seems to me that that is not at all impossible. Under the present circumstances, and the facts being as I am led to believe they are, it seems to me that the country is being called upon to pay for judges to do work which the judges at present should be able to do, and ought to do, without being at all overworked.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is objectionable, I know, for me to rise to say anything more about the subject at this hour, but I venture to do it. The government of Quebec provided two means of settling this difficulty. It appears from experience that the judicial work in the city of Montreal is not done promptly or satisfactorily. It is the duty of the legislature of Quebec to get out of that difficulty. They provided for a system under which the judges of the outlying districts should be called in to the city of Montreal and hear cases, and this parliament in the year 1898, passed this enactment to which attention has already been called. It is in section 8 of chapter 52, of the Acts of 1898, dealing with the allowances of these judges. It reads as follows :

But no travelling allowance shall be granted to any judge requested to sit in review under section 1 of chapter 20 of the statutes of 1898 of the legislature of Quebec, unless it is certified by the chief justice or judge discharging the duties of chief justice in the district, that the attendance of such judge was, in his opinion, necessary.

I do not remember that there was any objection taken to the passing of that enactment in this Chamber. I think it is not an unreasonable enactment. We have to pay for the attendance of these judges, and it was only right that it should be seen that we were paying for no judges whose services were not called for. The motive which influences hon. gentlemen opposite now in opposing the clause before the committee is just that of saving money. The same motive actuated this parliament, I suppose, when they inserted that provision in the Act of 1898 ; consequently, one means taken by the legislature of Quebec to get over this difficulty with respect to Montreal failed, when those judges refused, as the hon. gentleman from Missisquoi tells us, to come in, because the certificate was required. Of course, we might undertake to provide that if any judge refused to come in, his place should become vacant, but I think, probably that, even the hon. gentleman from Stadacona would think that was rather a radical measure.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman does not know what I think.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not saying that I do.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman says what he does not know, we are not astonished.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I simply conjecture. This is a free country, and I can conjecture. The hon. gentleman from Stadacona often conjectures as to what is in the mind of the government. This measure failed to become operative, through the action of this parliament. Then the legislature of Quebec come in and say that, in order to relieve the congestion in legal business in Montreal, we shall provide for the appointment of three additional judges for Montreal. It has been shown here that last year the expense of bringing in outside judges amounted to as much as the salaries of these three judges would be. The legislature of Quebec were acting within their own jurisdiction, and, as I understand, the government did not act upon that. They did not move last year. They thought there might still be found some means by which the necessity for appointing the judges should be got over. No means have been found. The legislature of Quebec did not do anything last year. The question which we must consider is, whether when the Commons, which has to do with the expenditure of money, which has charge of the public purse—a thing which we are not supposed to have anything to do with—when the Commons has voted the money to carry out this enactment of the province of Quebec, we shall oppose it and say that it shall not be done. It is not our duty to decide what is the right thing to be done in the province of Quebec. If there was any enormous iniquity being perpetrated, it would be our duty, perhaps, to intervene ; but this is not a very serious matter ; and I do not think, as members of a chamber like this, which has not to go to the people, that we are justified in rejecting this enactment.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—I move that the further consideration of this clause be postponed till the next sitting of the committee.

The committee divided on the amendment, which was defeated on the following division :

Yeas, 17 ; nays, 18.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I wish to draw attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman from London rose as the names were being counted.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman voted.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—He was not counted.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And the hon. gentleman from Rideau division was counted twice.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This motion which was lost was simply to allow the consideration of the clause to stand till to-morrow, but if we have the vote on the clause to-day, and it is a tie, then the clause will be lost. That is not what the hon. minister desires. I think the clause had better stand.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We took a vote, and the proposition that the clause should stand over was lost.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I think there is some mistake with regard to the vote. In addition to what has been said by the hon. leader of the opposition, many of us do not wish to strike out that clause, and I should like to have time to look over it.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I counted 18 to 18.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then it is lost.

The committee divided on the first clause, which was rejected, contents 17, non-contents, 21.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No politics in this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I know there is no tact.

Hon. Mr. McKAY from the committee, reported the Bill with an amendment.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT ACT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (Y) 'An Act to amend the Bank Act Amendment Act, 1900.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is a non-contentious Bill, and it is very important it should pass to enable the banks interested to carry out agreements which have been made, and I would suggest, after the second reading, that the hon. gentleman move to have the rules suspended and pass it and send it to the other House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is what I propose to do. When we go into committee I propose to insert in the 30th line, after the word 'Bank' the words 'but without interest,' so that when a bank puts up money with the Receiver General for the purpose of complying with the provisions of this law, it being put up in the interest of the bank itself, and to facilitate it in carrying out this arrangement, the government shall not be charged with interest while the money is in its possession.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am quite sure that suggestion was not made by the hon. gentleman opposite (hon. Mr. Cox). However, I am glad to see this new departure. We are advancing.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN from the committee reported the Bill with an amendment, which was concurred in.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

TRADE DISPUTES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (187) 'An Act to aid in the prevention and settlement of trade disputes, and to provide for the publication of statistical industrial information.' He said: The object of this Bill is to provide for aiding in the settlement of trade disputes between employers and their workmen. It authorizes the establishment of boards of conciliation. It is a purely voluntary Act. There is no compulsion about it. It also provides for the publication of a trades gazette. I will explain the details in committee.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is just the part of the Bill that my hon. friend referred to as he sat down that I propose to make a few remarks on—that is the publication of this gazette and compilation of statistics. It really contemplates the establishment of a department of labour, but there will be ample opportunity to discuss that in committee; therefore I forego the discussion of it now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not a contentious Bill. It does not amount to anything, and consequently cannot do much harm or much good to the labourer or to the employers. What the result of gathering statistical information may be, I cannot say, but it is a step in the right direction and has been in contemplation for many years. A good deal will depend on the selection to be made of the man who compiles the statistics and publishes the Gazette. If any improper appointment should be made, it will be within the control of parliament.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (132) 'An Act to amend the Railway Act.' He said: There is only one novelty in this Bill. All the clauses except two are in substitution of clauses which already exist in the Railway Act, and can be more conveniently considered in committee. The departure to which I refer is giving the Railway Committee power to locate stations under certain circumstances, and authorizing the closing up and sale of a railway which is already bankrupt. That power already exists in some of the provinces, certainly in Ontario, and this Bill gives the same power over railways so far as the jurisdiction of this parliament is concerned.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Without pronouncing an opinion for or against this Bill, I think any one who will take the trouble to read it will find that, although it is a short Bill, it is not unimportant in any sense. It introduces new features which have never been recognized in this country before. It gives power to the Minister of Railways, through the Governor in Council, to compel the location of a station. When it was first introduced, I understood it to apply to railways that had received government subsidies, but if my memory serves me right, it gives power to the Governor in Council to supervise the location of stations in one clause, and in another gives the power to direct where they shall be built. That is a matter that might receive a good deal of consideration pro and con. There are cases, no doubt, which might justify it. However, it is giving extraordinary power to a government to interfere with railways.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Railway Committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has to be approved of by the Governor in Council as well as the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. The Railway Committee is only a creature of the government. This is a new provision altogether. It has not existed in the past. Whether they should have that power where a company constructs a road with its own money is very questionable. It is a question whether the power should be given, even where a subsidy has been granted. It places an extraordinary power in the hands of the government of the day, which might be used properly or improperly, as the case might be. They propose to control this particular branch of railway enterprise where they have given a subsidy, but if they propose to buy a railway which they have largely subsidized, they pay full value for it still, where they have purchased in the past, they did not take that into consideration. I do not know that the Senate will object to the principle laid down in the Bill, or whether individuals may object or not, but I object, speaking for myself to placing arbitrary power in the hands of any government which can be used for political or personal purposes. I do not say that it would be used improperly, but it could be used improperly, and it is a question whether such power should be given. The House of Commons has, however, given that power by a very considerable majority. The bill is materially changed from what it was when first introduced by the Minister of Railways and Canals. Might I repeat the question which I asked yesterday, whether it is the intention of the government, after the second reading, to move to have the Bill referred to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, as was done in the Lower House, or do they propose simply to refer it to a Committee of the Whole House ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think we would prefer to refer it to a Committee of the Whole House. My hon. friend knows that a good many of the members of the Railway Committee are away, and there are many members of the House who are not members of the Railway Committee, who might want to take part in discussing the clauses of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think there is any doubt of getting a quorum. If the members are away, it is no fault of those who are here. The reason for not sending it to the committee is, that the Bill has been kept so long in the House of Commons.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, July 11, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE TEMAGAMI RAILWAY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have had placed in my hands three affidavits in reference to the resolution which was read in this House, alleged to have been passed by the council of Sturgeon Falls, reflecting on the character of Father Paradis. I stated to the parties that I would comply with their wishes by laying these affidavits on the Table. In justice to Father Paradis I think they should be read. He produces affidavits of three out of the six of the councillors of the village of Sturgeon Falls, in which they state that no such resolution was ever passed by that council as was read here the other day against the change of the route from Sturgeon Falls to Vernon. He also states in these letters that the mayor of the town acknowledges that he signed it under a misapprehension, not knowing its contents. He adds that this statement made by the mayor was in the presence of his solicitor, and would have made a declaration to the effect that he signed it under a misapprehension, if Father Paradis would have consented to forgo any prosecution for slander, which he refused to do. Father Paradis also states that, of the other three councillors who have not made declarations, one acknowledged the truth of the statements made in the affidavit, but refused to sign a declaration. The other was away from the place and could not be seen. The sixth was the son of the mayor, and he did not think he would be justified in asking that gentleman to make any declaration on the subject. I make this statement, in justice to a gentleman who was certainly vilified by the petition which was read here—that is, vilified if the statements contained in that petition were untrue. I do so for the purpose of bringing under the notice of the Senate the care which should be exercised in dealing with petitions presented here. I could not, nor could any one, blame any senator for reading a petition which had been placed in his hands, containing the name of the mayor of the town from which it purported to emanate, and also the clerk of the municipality, together with the corporate seal, and yet I hold in my hand these three affidavits to which I have referred, declaring that no such resolution was ever passed by the council, or that the subject came before the council. I might add that there is another statement here, signed by a number of gentlemen of the town of Sturgeon Falls, among them barristers, merchants and others, declaring that the imputations cast on the character of Father Paradis are untrue and unfounded, and that he enjoys a reputable and unimpeachable character. I shall not waste the time of the Senate by reading these. I have given a fair synopsis of what they contain, and as an act of justice to the reverend gentleman who has been so maligned in the petition, purporting to come from the corporation—that is, if the statements I have read to the House are true. None of us would like to be maligned as Father Paradis was by that petition, under the seal of the corporation, which these gentlemen whose affidavits I have here declares to be a forgery.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was not present when my hon. friend commenced his remarks on this subject, but I gather from what he has said that his object is to put right a gentleman who has been very much vilified by the reading of a petition in this House some days ago. When it was being read, I confess it shocked me very much. I knew something of the locality and of the gentleman himself, and I turned around and suggested to the senior member from Halifax that he should not proceed with it. Acting on that advice, he did suppress the last two pages of it. I recognize the fact that a document, presented under such circumstances was manifestly unfair, and that it should not be read, because it was got up in an improper way, and at a time when the town of Sturgeon Falls was very much excited over this matter and were opposing a proposition in which they did not concur. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has brought up the matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The letter is addressed to me. If it had been addressed to the Senate, I should have presented it, and asked that it be read. I would advise the hon. gentleman to read the document.

ELECTION LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (133) 'An Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of Members of the House of Commons.' He said: The changes in this Bill are not numerous, so far as the general principles of the law are concerned, and I will ask the House to give the Bill a second reading, as I apprehend there is no objection to the principle, and we can consider each clause of the Bill when it is referred to committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is the Bill published in French?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot tell my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then I object.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If my hon. friend objects, that is a reason for not going on. If the House consents to the second reading of the Bill, then we could consider every detail when we go into committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend from Stadacona understands English better than some of us do, and I hope he will not press his objection, although the Bill should be printed in the two languages.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is not because I do not understand English, but it is a question of right. If there is not to be a discussion now, all right, I shall not press my opinion; but if there is a discussion, I shall object.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Under the circumstances, I shall forego the remarks I intended to make until we go into committee.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There are one or two amendments that I think will be required to be made to this Bill, and whether it would be desirable that notice of them should be given, or whether they should be left for consideration until we reach that part of the Bill is a question. They are amendments, which were considered in the other House. If the hon. gentleman who has the Bill in charge thinks it desirable that notice should be given, that might be done to-day. I thought, probably, there would be some discussion to-day, and in the course of that discussion, these amendments, which are not very many, and I do not think would be considered serious at all, could be brought out in the discussion, and that it would not be necessary to put a notice on the Order paper. In fact, I do not know that a notice would be necessary in any case.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

GAME PRESERVATION IN YUKON TERRITORY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (190) 'An Act respecting the preservation of game in the Yukon.' He said: This is a very short Bill. It consists of one clause, and confers upon the commissioner and council of the North-west Territories the power to make regulations for the preservation of game in that part of the country. Hon. gentlemen will see that it is a proper provision in order that the game may not be exterminated there.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS BILL.

THIRD READING.

The Order of the Day being called :

Consideration of the amendments made in Committee of he Whole House to (Bill 189) 'An Act to amend the Act respecting the judges of provincial courts.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS—With the consent of the House I move that the House go back into committee for the purpose of reconsidering the propriety of restoring the section which was struck out yesterday. I hope this will meet with the approbation of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Can that be done without notice ? When in committee a clause was struck out of the Bill, and the proposition now is to refer the Bill back to committee for the purpose of restoring that clause. I ask, as a matter of practice, whether that can be done without giving notice in order that those who may hold views different from the views of the hon. gentleman, or who may change their views, should be present.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that we are considering the report of the committee, and in the consideration of that report we may ask the House to go into committee for the purpose of making any alteration, amendment or restoration, because, in doing so we are considering the report, and I would not think that, when the notice on the Order paper is the consideration of the report, that any further notice is required to consider it from this point of view.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—As I understand this matter, the other day the hon. Minister of Justice moved that the order be discharged.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I do not think we are gaining anything by this motion. It is not an ordinary motion. Supposing the motion of the hon. Minister of Justice is lost, where would we be ? We will be in a position to decide, if we adopt that report or do not adopt it, and why not do that at once ? If the majority of the House are in favour of adopting the report, there is no use putting the other motion. If the majority is against it, then comes the time to refer it back to committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a very common motion, when the report of a committee is before the House, that the report be not now received, but that it be referred back to committee with instructions to alter, amend, change, or restore a clause in the Bill. Of course the sense of the House is taken on that. If there is a majority of the House against reconsidering the subject, that of course puts an end to that particular clause. The hon. Minister of Justice cannot move that the House concur in a principle he was opposed to, and he therefore asks to get the opinion of the House that the proposal of the chairman of the committee to the House be not concurred in, but that it be an instruction to go back into committee and restore the clause. The sense of the House can be taken on that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The words are 'consideration of the amendments,' and the amendment was that the clause should be struck out, and in the consideration of that I am asking that the House go back into committee for the purposes of reconsideration.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is force in what the hon. gentleman from Montarville has said, and also, in part, in the remarks made by the hon. Secretary of State, but when he says that the Minister of Justice could not move the adoption of these amendments because he does not concur in them, that is laying down the principle that when amendments are made to any Bill, with which amendments the party who introduced it does not concur, he should let it drop and not move concurrence. If he desired to have the Bill go through as amended, he would simply move concurrence and thereby affirm the principle of the Bill itself. Upon reflection, I am not sure that the hon. gentleman is not right, but the motion should be that the amendments be not concurred in, but that the Bill be referred back to the committee to reconsider it, and then if the majority of the House say No, it will be for the Minister of Justice to say whether he will drop his Bill altogether, or whether he will move concurrence in the amendment. If not, some one else will do it, and then the Bill could be passed so far as it affects the judges of the North-west and the Yukon districts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will make the motion in that way.

The House divided on the motion which was lost on the following division.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the amendments be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In order to have the record correct, it will be necessary to suspend a rule, because there is an amendment, and being a public Bill, it could not be read without the suspension of the rule.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The House went into committee and the amendment was made yesterday.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But we can only proceed one stage to-day. I think I am correct in that position.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The rule is that a public Bill shall not be read a third time on the same day on which it is reported from committee when any amendment has been made in committee, but this Bill came from committee yesterday, so that this rule does not apply.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will not push the matter further, if it is going to interfere at all with the passage of the Bill, but the senior member for Halifax knows as well as any hon. member in this House, that the object of that rule is to prevent a Bill taking two stages in one day under certain circumstances. The report was made yesterday, and the stage was taken to-day, of the adoption of it, and it is clear that the next stage would be the third reading.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Rule 41 says :

No Bill shall be read the third time the same day that the Bill is reported from committee, when any amendments have been made in committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That does not apply to this. The rule reads :

No Bill shall be read twice the same day; no Committee of the Whole House shall proceed on any Bill the same day the Bill is read a second time, and no Bill shall be read the third time the same day that the Bill is reported from the committee when any amendments have been made in the committee.

Now, if I had moved yesterday for the third reading of the Bill, it would be necessary to suspend the rule, but no Bill shall be read the third time the same day. It does not say that no Bill shall be read the third time the same day that the report is considered. That would be a different proposition.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—But are we not to consider the report to-day ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly, but it is not the same day that the report is presented.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

THE CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

MESSAGE FROM HOUSE OF COMMONS CONSIDERED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Further consideration of the Message from the House of Commons disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the amendments made by the House of Commons to (Bill K) 'An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the Senate insist on their disagreement to the third amendment made by the House of Commons to the said Bill. He said: That is the amendment which makes it a new crime to get credit under false pretenses. That seemed to me a dangerous power to put in the hands of a creditor who was trusting a party, and who would be tempted to construe the words used by him, if he failed to get his pay, in the way most favourable to himself, and that where there was a verbal understanding or conversation between the parties, it would be an unusual power to put in the hands of a creditor.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Minister of Justice having taken that ground, of course it is not for those who voted for that amendment before to object to the course he is pursuing, but I should like to ask him whether he thinks this is going to jeopardize the existence of the whole Bill? Because we were led to believe—not only that, but the House was covertly threatened the last time we had the Bill under discussion, that if we insisted upon our amendments, there was great danger of losing the Bill. I suppose the Minister of Justice can give us some explanation which will ease the consciences of those who voted with him before.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This amendment was not put before. We only put the first one. In this case, I might say, upon inquiry I find that there is a division of opinion in the House of Commons on the subject, and I have reason to think that if we insist upon the rejection of this amendment it will not be pressed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for telling me that this was not the motion which was put before, as I might have been labouring under a misapprehension. The only question I asked him was whether our insisting on this amendment would jeopardize the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand a number of lawyers in the other House think it an exceedingly improper thing to create a new offence, an offence which may be a very dangerous one in the community.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am glad they have learned something.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You place a man, who has made a verbal declaration to obtaining goods, in the hands of his creditor. He may be arrested and put in jail, and before his statement of it could be given very serious injury might be done.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I should like to remark that in voting on another amendment we were told that if we did not accept the first amendment from the other House, we should endanger the whole Bill, and some members may have been influenced by that threat not to vote as they would otherwise have voted. Let us examine the vote we gave the other day. We passed a resolution by which we agreed to the amendment made by the House of Commons—that is, that the law shall go into operation only on the first of January. I did not hear the Speaker declare that a message should be sent to the House of Commons to inform them that we had agreed to that amendment?

The SPEAKER—I remember particularly stating that it should be sent.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has it been sent? I have just made that inquiry whether a message has been sent to the House of Commons acquainting that House that the Senate did not insist upon the first amendment, and I am informed that it has not been, and that the clerk was waiting, I think very properly, until the whole of the amendments were disposed of, so that it is still in the hands of the House.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—If it is still in the hands of the House, I do not see exactly how we could recall the motion, although I think I have established that some of us voted under a misapprehension that if we insisted on our amendment we would kill the Bill, but we can do this: supposing what I said at first is correct, it is a resolution which we have passed. We can rescind a resolution, but we have not the right to bring up the same resolution again. If I understand the position, it is this: there are in Montreal—perhaps it is so in other cities also—a number of people running lotteries, in which more particularly poor servant girls and young people put their money. I am sure the Minister of Justice is in favour of suppressing those lotteries, and I suppose a majority in the House of Commons are also in favour of suppressing them. If the law were to come into operation on the first of September, these lotteries would be soon stopped. If it does not become law until the first January, they will have four months more in which to continue their swindling operations. But, as I said before, although we may rescind a resolution, we cannot move the same motion again. We can, however, move another motion, and I should think the Minister of Justice would agree to this: Why not say the Bill shall come into operation on the first January, except that part relating to lotteries, which shall come into force on the first of September. The hon. gentleman seems not to approve of that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—At the present time we have this second proposition before us, and would it not be well to dispose of this and the next one, and then take the first amendment?

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understand there can be only one message to the House of Commons, and that our agreement or disagreement would not be reported piecemeal. I move:

That the Senate do not insist on their agreement to the fifth amendment made by the House of Commons to the said Bill, but concur in the said amendment.

That is the amendment relating to the labour clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I took pretty strong grounds, from my own standpoint, against this amendment when it was discussed before. If I understand the position of the Minister of Justice in reference to this matter, it is that he is of opinion that unless this exemption be made, it will interfere with the rights and privileges of the working men and employees who have combines under the Trades Unions Act. Am I correct in assuming that was one of the principal reasons? Let me repeat it: The hon. gentleman, and those who took sides with him, were fearful that unless this exemption be made to this clause, it would interfere with the rights now enjoyed by working men under the Trades Unions Act, or some other Acts under which they are organized.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I think that it is highly probable that that would be the effect, but this clause goes further than that in this respect, that that is confined to those who are organized under the Trades Unions Act, while this would embrace any voluntarily organization—that is persons who are not in the trades unions. If they choose to form voluntarily organizations for the protection of labour, they would have the same rights as the trades unions?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If that be the interpretation, it simply means this, that any body of men who think proper to enter into a combination of working men for the purpose of doing that which this clause makes a crime in another class of men, they would be exempt from the penalty. Let us read it and see what it says:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding $4,000 and not less than $200, or to two years' imprisonment, or, if a corporation, is liable to a penalty not exceeding $10,000 and not less than $1,000, who conspires, combines, agrees or arranges with any other person, or with any railway, steamship, steamboat or transportation company—

(a) to unduly limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce;

Any person committing that offence shall be subject to a penalty. All that would have to be done, under this exception, would be for a certain class or number of men to organize themselves into a combine of working men, and then perpetrate the very Act which this clause is intended to punish. Then you go on to subclause b:

(b) To restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any such article or commodity;

The same combination of men under similar circumstances could place themselves in a position, under the law—if the interpretation put on the clause by the Minister of Justice be correct—to violate this section of the law which imposes a penalty of $10,000 as a minimum.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is in the case of a corporation?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes. The heavier penalty applies to corporations. However, that does not affect my argument. The third offence is:

(c) To unduly prevent, limit or lessen the manufacture or production of any such article or commodity, or to unreasonably enhance the price thereof;

If a combination of manufacturers violate this clause, they are subject to heavy penalties. If it is done by a combination of working men, who may combine for the very purpose of violating it, they are not liable to any penalties. Or in other words that which is a crime in one class or corporation becomes a virtue in another. Whether that is correct legislation or not is for the Senate to say. Then there is sub-clause d as follows :

To unduly prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation or supply of any such article or commodity, or in the price of insurance upon person or property.

This goes so far as to bring within its scope and meaning an insurance company—insurance of property against fire, or life assurance. If there is combination to put up the price of insurance by the companies, then they are subject to heavy penalties, as high as ten thousand dollars, and of being sent to jail. If, however, it is done by a combination of workmen, it would not be a crime. The question would at once arise, what constitutes workmen. Would not a number of clerks in an insurance office be workmen just as well as a number of men who are employed in a workshop ? Work does not consist altogether in manual labour, as we generally speak of it. I venture the assertion that the hon. Minister of Justice works more hours and more assiduously than any mechanic in this town, and has done so to his own injury. That is just as much work as if he laboured at a bench. I have worked at the bench and I have worked at the case in a printing office, and I have worked as many hours I think as any man of my age. I have worked in the editorial room and worked attempting to legislate in the interests of my country. It is all work, and can I not be classed as a workman ? If a number of us get together and combine, if we are manufacturers, we subject ourselves to a penalty. If, however, we are a combination of individuals, then we do not subject ourselves to a penalty, under the exception to the clause. That is the great objection I have to it. At the same time, I wish it distinctly understood,—and I think I am not only voicing my own opinion, but voicing the opinions of the senior member from Halifax, because he expressed them here, and I also think I am voicing the opinion of those who have taken somewhat the same view of this question that I have—that we have no desire notwithstanding the attacks which have been made upon us by government organs, to interfere with the rights of workmen in their combinations and trade unions. I repudiated that, but some journals, among them the leading government organ in Ontario, never can find a kindly word to say of the Senate, and when they speak of the Senate, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred they misrepresent us, and, to use a short and terse Anglo-Saxon word, they lie, as they did in connection with this matter, though we expressed our views very strongly upon this question. In order to put on record my views on this subject I move an amendment reserving to workmen and trades unions all the rights and privileges they now enjoy.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear !

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no desire to interfere with them. I sympathize with workmen much more than those who are ever prating about them. They should have their rights and privileges, but no more rights than any other of Her Majesty's subjects, and I do hope the hon. Minister of Justice will accept this amendment. It will answer the purpose he has in view, and will meet the views, I think, of the members of the House of Commons who insisted on the retention of this clause. The amendment which the Commons asks us to adopt reads as follows :—

Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

I move in amendment that we do not concur in this amendment but that we suggest a provision of this kind :

Provided, that nothing in the foregoing clause shall be construed to apply to any rights now enjoyed by combinations of workmen or employees under the law as now existing.

That reserves to them all the rights and privileges that they enjoy under the law, and, at the same time, it does not exempt individuals entering into combinations to do that which this law makes a very severe crime. Whether the hon. gentleman will accept that or not, I cannot say. That is my view.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have already indicated my objection and why I was so very persistent when this question was before the House, because it was a part of the original Bill, and that is, that this reservation is simply a reservation to trades unions and not to anybody else. Those are the only persons that are specially protected by that provision in the Bill. My hon. friend confines the protection to these parties who are protected now. This amendment says:

> Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection.

It does not go beyond that. It is what is for their reasonable protection. If they acted improperly, if they used unreasonable means to protect themselves, they would bring themselves within the provisions of the law, but the court must hold that what they do is necessary for their reasonable protection in order that they may enjoy the immunity intended to be secured to them, and I know no reason why men who are ordinary labourers, and who are not within the trades unions, should be placed upon an inferior footing. It is because they are labourers, and because they are workmen, that I think a reasonable protection ought to be given them, and I should be very sorry myself to include a provision in the criminal law that would compel persons to join a particular union that otherwise would not go into it at all. So that my hon. friend will see why I differ from the view he has expressed. That resolution, if carried, would simply protect those that are provided for under the trades union law. I think when you undertake to give protection to men and to except them out of a class that may be punished, you should make it broad enough to include all those who are in like pursuits, and who require protection of the same kind, and so I should prefer the provision in the Bill instead of the suggestion made by the hon. leader of the opposition.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I may say, in reply to what has fallen from the hon. Minister of Justice, that I do not think the word 'reasonable' is very much protection to the public, because if a combination of workmen is alleged to have offended against the law, and the matter comes up for trial and it is tried before a jury, it would be probably almost impossible to secure a conviction if the word 'reasonable' is allowed to remain there. Anything a workingman could do would be held by a great many jurors to be reasonable. So that I do not think that word counts for much. While there is a good deal of force in what the hon. Minister of Justice has said on the subject of combinations of workmen outside the union, I do not think that there is as much force in it as might appear at first sight, because nearly all the difficulties which have arisen between workmen and employers have arisen between trades unions and employers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Altogether.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not between unorganized workmen, and the amendment proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition does not exempt the trades unions from the operation of section 520.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no objection to putting that word in.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It says they will have the protection of the Trades Union Act, which reads:

> The purposes of any trade union shall not, by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, be deemed to be unlawful so as to render any member of such trade union liable to criminal prosecution, or otherwise, so as to render void or voidable any agreement or trust.

And this amendment says that that enactment, which was made deliberately, shall remain in force as to trades unions, and that is as much as the workingman can reasonably expect. It does not seem to say that any combination of workmen should be allowed to do the things which are forbidden by section 520, any more than any other men; and then, as the hon. leader of the opposition pointed out, this exemption is not confined to workmen strictly so called: it says employees. That means that the employees of a railway company can conspire together for the purpose of preventing the running of trains, and they would not come under the operation of this Bill if it is amended in this way—at least they would have to satisfy the jury that their conduct was reasonable. The reasons which we sent down to the House of Commons why we should not agree to this amendment are good and substantial, because the Trades Union Act, chapter 131, of the revised statutes, gives the necessary protection to combinations of workmen, and because there does not appear to be any substantial reason why any class of persons should be exempted from the operation of section 520, of the Criminal Code. The only reasonable objection taken to that resolution was that taken by the hon Minister of Justice to the effect that it did not apply to unorganized workmen. What was the answer of the House of Commons to that resolution of ours? They said:

> Because this amendment seems to be essential to combinations of workmen for the legitimate protection of their rights.

And they did not point out how it was necessary for the legitimate protection of workmen that they should unduly limit the facilities for transporting and manufacturing, and so on. It is clear, on the face of it, that the reason given by the Commons is not a substantial reason. There is no necessity for this exemption for the working man at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The proposal of the hon. leader of the opposition, if carried out would have the effect of forcing all bodies of men into the unions. We know very well now that there are many employers of labour who will not employ union men. I know what I see every day. I read constantly of employers of labour saying: 'You may remain in my service, but you must not become a union man.' There is great objection on the part of employers to the men forming into a union. It is not fair that the men who are not permitted to go into the union should not be permitted to unite for their own protection. The policy should not be to drive men into the union, which would be the result of the carrying out of the proposal of the hon. leader of the opposition. I think that is a policy we should not favour, because, as I said before, there are very considerable bodies of men who are not in the union. They are outside of the union because their employers object to the union. They think the union exercises a tyrannical power over them, and they keep them out, but if they are kept out of the union, they should be allowed to unite among themselves.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend from Halifax thinks everything is unreasonable except what he himself has favoured.

Hon. Mr. POWER.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend from Halifax succeeded, with the aid of the hon. leader of the opposition in having this clause struck out of the Bill. What did they propose? They proposed that, as far as the trades union is concerned, the members of that union shall enjoy this privilege, which they say the labouring classes outside of the unions should not enjoy. That is the proposition. It is to make an exception to this provision of the law, section 520, to exempt from the operation of that law all those who are protected now, under the Trades Union Act. I am not prepared to support discriminating legislation and to confer on one class of workmen protection that I would not extend to another. The only effect of that is, in order that a man may have protection, to compel him to join a trade union. If people choose voluntarily to go into a trade union, it is their right to do so, but if they remain outside, it is their right to remain outside, and you are not going to help the position of the man to exercise his individual independence by undertaking to crush him between a provision of the criminal law and the power of a strong labour organization. I think it is perfectly clear that all the labouring classes should enjoy equal protection for a like reason. This provision reads:

> Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

They are entitled to undertake to organize so far as such organization is necessary for their own protection. They are entitled to act so far as that may be necessary, and if my hon. friend's amendment, which is supported by the hon. senior member for Halifax, was carried, every member of the trade union would have all the protection we propose to give by this provision of the Bill, but no other workingman would. Now, I say that that is a distinction that ought not to exist. I am perfectly sure of this, that the rejection of this provision will defeat the Bill. It seems to me that there is no reason whatever assigned. My hon. friend behind me has mentioned that it is important to give to the unorganized labourers the same protection that you give to those within those organized bodies, and my hon. friend says that is an assumption that this will have that effect. I do not think it is an assumption at all; but if it is, it will do no mischief even from their point of view. It seems to me a reasonable provision. The hon. gentleman argued, when the Bill was up in the first instance, that you did not need to exempt any body of organized labour or unorganized labour. That is an intelligible proposition. You say precisely on what grounds the parties are proceeding, but it has been felt for a great many years in the United Kingdom, and in this country, that in order that the labourer may protect himself adequately against capital—especially those employed in ordinary skilled pursuits—they require a power which the mere capitalist does not require, which he himself possesses in another form, for the maintenance of his right. In doing this, it seems to me that we are simply acting upon the lines of that legislation which gave protection to trades unions; and we are giving to all the labouring classes, in so far as they choose to organize themselves, whether by voluntary association or otherwise the same protection. That is reasonable, and the declaration is not that there shall be protection for certain organizations, and not for others, but they are exempt for the reasonable protection of workmen, and of that the jury are to be the judges.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the distinction attempted to be drawn by the Minister of Justice between trades people and labourers—if he is trying to draw that distinction—is well founded. A combination of labourers is a trade union, as well as a combination of mechanics. The Act provides :

> 2. In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires the expression 'Trade Union' means such combination, whether temporary or permanent, for regulating the relations between workmen and masters, or for imposing restrictive conditions on the conduct of any trade or business, as would, but for this Act, have been deemed to be an unlawful combination by reason of some one or more of its purposes being in restraint of trade.

Now, this law which produces, as the hon. Minister of Justice says, such an unsatisfactory condition of things has been in operation since 1872.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What law ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—This Trades Union Act. The hon. gentleman claims that it makes a distinction, but that law has been in operation since 1872.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman to explain to the House what there is in this clause as it stands that he objects to, or thinks inferior to the section of the Act which he has read.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Well, if the provision in the existing law is quite equivalent to this, this is surplusage, and why should it be enacted ?

Hon. Mr MILLS—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has to take one horn of the dilemma or the other. I say it means more than the paragraph in the Trades Union Act. If it means more, we object to it; if it does not mean more, it is surplusage, because we have the law already.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, we are repealing it, and my hon. friend is making a proposition to restore the law which we are about to repeal.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not understand that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I adhere to the opinion that I expressed before when the matter was under consideration, and the hon. Minister of Justice has paid me the compliment of saying it is a consistent principle. I do not think any law should be put on the statute-book that favours one man more than another, so far as the commission of a crime is concerned. There may be circumstances under which concessions are made to individuals when they have rights under patent laws or copyrights, but when you make a crime, the question must necessarily arise as to whether it can possibly be a virtue in me if I commit it, and a crime in my neighbour to commit the same act. That is the principle I laid down, and in order to meet the objections taken to the position that we had assumed when the question was first under consideration, that if those provisions of the Trades Union Act, or any other Act on the statute-book, which made concessions to a certain class of people were to be interfered with by this Bill, then I was willing to meet that, though I hold strongly to the other view. It does not follow because one holds strong views on a question, that one should not yield when he wants to make a law as perfect as possible. The position of the Secretary of State is this: if we confine those rights to the trades unions, it drives into the unions people who would not otherwise go there, and in order to enable those other individuals to do that which is made a penal offence if a manufacturer commits it, or if an unorganized body of workmen commit it, that they can do it with impunity by going into a trades union. Hence, I say if there is any force in his argument or in that of the hon. Minister of Justice, it follows that we should reject it altogether and make no compromise. The Trades Union Act was placed on the statute-book properly to protect workingmen as against, he says, capital—although I have not the strong views he holds on that question. I think capital and labour will find their own level if they are let alone, and it is a question for the House to consider whether these combines have been in the interests of workingmen themselves or in the interests of trade and commerce. I have a copy of the Globe in my hand here, which furnishes another illustration of how they deal with subjects of this kind. They give a full column dealing with the question of strikes and the interference with trade. There is a detailed account of what the result has been in St. Louis, in the United States. The depredations and crimes committed there are described, but it takes precious good care not to condemn one single Act, although some of those Acts were the stripping of females naked to their waists and tarring and feathering them, because they dared to ride on a street car. Is that right or wrong? If we are to pass a law to allow these combinations of workingmen and labourers outside of these associations, you ought to repeal the clause altogether.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that this clause would protect proceedings of that sort?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This clause gives power to certain workingmen to do certain acts and these acts are defined in subclauses a, b, c and d of that clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, no.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What does it mean then? It defines what are crimes in clauses a, b, c and d, and then it says that it shall not apply, to combinations of workingmen or employees. The presumption is, that trades union people have a right to do it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then it goes on to say they have the right, and that the outside workingmen who do not belong to these combines shall also be exempt from the penalties. That is the argument of the hon. gentleman, as clear as he can make it. I am not going to argue the question any further. I have always held strong views on this kind of legislation. What I believe to be right I would try to enforce, and I lay down this general principle again, and I do not propose to go beyond it, that what is a crime in John is equally a crime in Sam, and that which is a virtue in the one cannot be a crime in the other. You lay down four distinct propositions in this Bill, that certain things are wrong, and subject those who commit them to heavy penalties; and then you immediately say it shall not apply to certain classes of the community. That is what I object to, and if I had my way I should strike it out altogether. I am not in favour of combines. The law provides against them; but to carry it to the length we propose to carry it, I think is vicious legislation, and will do a great deal of harm to trade and commerce, and to the individuals who engage in them.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I do not see this matter in the same light the hon. leader of the opposition does. The clause provides that certain combines shall be an offence. Another class, that is those who combine for their own reasonable protection, shall not be subject to those penalties. That is the way I understand that clause.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—Now, it would be unreasonable to say that those who combine for their own reasonable protection should be subject to these penalties. It is quite right and proper that those who unduly combine to commit this offence should be punished, but where workingmen combine for their own reasonable protection, I think they should be allowed to do so without coming under a criminal Act in any shape or form. Entertaining that opinion, I have not seen any reason to depart from it, and I am in favour of the clause as it stands.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then why should not the exemption apply to manufacturers as well as to those people ? Because if they do not do it unduly, they are in precisely the same position as the workman.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—If they combine for their own reasonable protection, they should not be subject to a penalty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Cannot manufacturers do the same ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—If they combine for certain purposes mentioned in the clause, they are liable to the penalty, but if they only combine for their own reasonable protection they do not incur any penalty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does that apply equally to the manufacturer ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would that apply equally to a canning factory, or a lobster factory,—if they unduly combine they are subject to a penalty, but if workingmen unduly combine there is no penalty. If they do it unduly why should any class be exempt from the penalty ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I do not see that it exempts any except those who combine reasonably for their own protection as workmen or employees. That is quite consistent with the first part of the clause, which imposes penalties on certain parties for what should be offences punishable under the law, but I cannot see that there is any contradiction between that and the provision that persons should be exempt from penalty who only reasonably combine for their own protection as such workmen and employees.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But you exempt certain classes of people from those penalties. That is what I object to.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—It exempts them all if they do not contravene the law.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Is there any probability of the House of Commons accepting this amendment ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The rejection of our amendment by the House settles the matter. Then it goes back to the House of Commons with only one of our amendments adhered to. If, however, this amendment which I have moved should be carried, the Minister of Justice has intimated that the House of Commons will not accept it. If they send word to us to that effect, then a conference might be held, but I am not prepared to carry it to that extreme.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—One wants to vote with some sort of consistency on those amendments. We were told, in the first instance when objections were raised to the amendments of the House of Commons, and we were disposed to insist on our original amendment, that if we did so the Bill would be lost. I, myself, in consequence of the strong representations made by the Minister of Justice, abstained from voting for the refusal to agree to the amendment of the House of Commons, and insisting upon our own amendment, with regard to the question of lotteries, as I was told by the hon. gentleman, not only here in the House, but in conversation afterwards, that he had reason to believe very strongly that that our amendment would not be agreed to in the House of Commons. Now, the second amendment the hon. gentleman himself has asked us to insist upon, and, as I understand, has ascertained that it would not be liable to miscarry in the House of Commons, but would be accepted by them. But we are told equally strongly that if we do not agree to the third amendment of the Commons—if, for instance, my hon. friend's (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell's) amendment were to pass here, the Bill would be thrown out in the Commons. I do not want to have the Bill thrown out, but I am really at a loss to know what course to take.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The House will remember we deferred pressing the consideration of this subject in order that I might have time to consult some of my colleagues in the other House, and other hon. gentlemen, and I have found that, so far as the first amendment was concerned, my representation here was strictly accurate, that it would certainly endanger the Bill. Hon. gentlemen will remember that for several years there were certain art unions excepted out of the law, and the parties conducting them claimed that they were entitled to have a reasonable time to close up those institutions that have existed under the law. Then, with regard to the second amendment, in which we have persisted in the course that we took, I ascertained that there was a division of opinion in the House upon that question, and that there was no strong disposition to insist upon the amendment which the majority there had favoured. But with regard to this third amendment, to which so large a number of the labouring classes throughout the country attach great importance, certainly it would endanger the Bill to alter it as suggested here. In fact, I am quite certain that would defeat the Bill altogether.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—All you have to do is to come here in future and say: 'You must not touch this legislation, because the House of Commons will object.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not at all. It is quite reasonable that the House should say: 'We want certain things in a Bill and if we do not have them in the Bill, we will not proceed with it this session.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—The members of the House of Commons were probably under the impression that we proposed not to make any such amendment to our original clause as would allow the trades unions to come in. The hon. Minister of Justice had declared in his place in this House that he believed the striking out of that paragraph in clause 520 by this House, left the trades unions without any protection—that as this enactment was subsequent to the Trades Unions Act, it repealed the Trades Unions Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is what he said.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I say so now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Now the Trades Unions Act applies to all organizations, whether temporary or permanent, of working people. We say by this amendment, moved by the leader of the opposition, that clause 520 shall not apply to any combination or organization which comes under the Trades Union Act, and if the House of Commons, under these circumstances, choose to say that they are prepared to wreck this Bill, rather than accept this amendment, and we are not to insist upon what we believe is right, for fear they may act in that way, then I think the independence of this House has gone.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I ask the hon. gentleman to read this clause——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman is going to re-open this question we will keep at it all day.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman has spoken more than once himself.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So has the hon. Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then we should have a conference to see who should speak again. I want to call the attention of the House to this fact: My hon. friend behind me (Hon. Mr. Power) talks of wrecking the Bill on what is practically no difference in this regard, and he reads a clause from the Trades Unions Act, which, without a similar clause in this Bill, would be repealed:

> Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combines of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen and employees.

Will the hon. gentleman venture to say what there is in this except that an hon. gentleman in this House of eighty members wants to force another House of upwards of two hundred and the government and a number of senators to accept his own particular phraseology? Now, I say that that is preposterous. He ought not to insist on doing anything of the sort, and so I stand by the clause of the Bill as it is.

The Senate divided on the amendment, which was adopted on the following division:

Macdonald (P.E.I.),

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—We have passed amendments to this Bill. An amendment has been passed accepting the first of January as the date for the Act to come into operation. I wish to read from May as to the rules of parliament. The extract is as follows :

It is a rule of both Houses not to permit any question or Bill to be offered which is substantially the same as one on which their judgment has already been expressed in the current session. This is necessary in order to avoid contradictory decisions, to prevent surprises and to afford proper opportunities for determining the several questions as they arise. If the same questions could be proposed again and again, a session would have no end, or only questions could be determined; and it would be resolved first in the affirmative and then in the negative, according to the incident to which all voting is liable.

But however wise the general principle of this rule may be, if it were too strictly applied the discretion of parliament would be confined, and its votes be subject to irrevocable error. A resolution may, therefore, be rescinded, and an order of the House be discharged, notwithstanding a rule urged, 'That a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again, but it must stand as a judgment of the House.' Technically, indeed, the rescinding of a vote is the matter of a new question, the form being to read the resolution to the House and to move that it be rescinded, and thus the same question which has been resolved in the affirmative is not again offered, although its effect is annulled.

To rescind a negative vote, except in the different stages of Bills, is a proceeding of greater difficulty, because the same questions would have to be offered again. The only means, therefore, by which a negative vote can be revoked is by proposing another question, similar in its general purport to that which had been rejected, but with sufficient variance to constitute a new question.

I think this shows that the resolution can be rescinded.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The hon. Secretary of State thinks this does not apply.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, certainly not.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—If it can be rescinded, the amendment must not be exactly the same as the first amendment—that is to refuse it pure and simple—there must be a difference in the amendment proposed, and I would propose the following amendment :

That this House agrees to the Bill coming into operation on the 1st January, provided that the clause which applies to the lotteries becomes law on the 1st September.

The great question is the question of lotteries, against which every religious institution and every respectable class of society are arrayed. The hon. Minister of Justice told us just now that they had conferred with their friends in the other House and that the Bill would be killed if we did not accept the first of January as the date.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is killed now.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—That is another question. The reason why the law, as we passed it in the Senate, was changed in the House of Commons, I was told, was that it did not give time to people to understand the new clauses in the criminal code, and therefore might expose them to prosecution for infringing the law. That is a very good reason, but nobody wants these lottery companies to continue in existence if we can stop them at once, and if this amendment was carried, and if the House of Commons accepted it, the effect would be to stop these lotteries. I would like to hear the opinion of the hon. Minister of Justice in regard to that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a clear cut question. The House of Commons carried an amendment that the Bill should come into operation on the first of January. After debate this House concurred in the proposal that the first of January should be the date. Now, my hon. friend proposes, in some other way, to get rid of that vote and to negative the proposition which this House concurred in a short time ago. It would be revoking a deliberate vote of this House, and it would be absolutely impossible. It is a question for the other House now. They adopted an amendment and we concurred in it, and I do not think there is any way of getting rid of it.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I resumed my seat thinking the hon. Minister of Justice would answer the question which I put. The hon. Secretary of State has spoken, and when I was reading from May he said it did not apply. What I read says that a resolution can be rescinded. We accepted the amendment of the House of Commons and that resolution can be rescinded. We accepted the amendment of the House of Commons and that resolution can be rescinded, if I understand what I read from May. The hon. gentleman did not speak of that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He is giving his usual answer.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I am convinced the hon. Minister of Justice is against those lotteries in Montreal. If anything depends upon him, he will certainly take means to stop them at once.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I stated to the hon. gentleman before that the undertaking to bring the Bill into immediate operation would imperil the Bill, and I also stated that to strike out the fifth amendment would also have a like effect. The House has disregarded my view on that question. The hon. gentleman has asked my opinion, but the majority of the House are not disposed to attach much importance to it, and under the circumstances, it would be quite improper for me to express any opinion. Hon. gentlemen see what has been done. I warned them as to what would be the consequences of the vote, and they, notwithstanding that statement, amended it in a way and amended it with regard to a particular clause that could have no other effect than to be personally offensive to myself who was in charge of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the question raised by the hon. gentleman from Montarville, as a matter of procedure, I think there may be such a thing as the rescinding of a resolution, but as far as my memory goes, I have never known a case where the House solemnly adopted a course of action upon a Bill and the next day without any cause shown, rescinded that action. There should be some notice, but at any rate, as the matter now stands, I think the House ought to bear in mind its own position. The Senate have acted in connection with this matter in a perfectly reasonable way, and I think that the statements made and the reflections cast by the hon. Minister of Justice on myself and some other members of the House are not called for and not deserved.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. POWER—This Bill went down from this House in a certain shape. It had been considered carefully by this House. The House of Commons made fourteen amendments to the Bill. The Bill came back with fourteen amendments. We agreed to eleven and disagreed to three. As to the first amendment, we did not disagree absolutely. We met them half way. The Bill would naturally come into operation upon receiving the assent of the Governor General, and the Commons amended it so as to provide that it should come into operation on the first of January. We said 'the first of September is a reasonable date. It will give every one time to become familiar with the provisions of the Bill' and that was partially agreeing with the amendment. Then the House of Commons declined to consider the reasons that we gave, because the reasons which they sent back here for adhering to their amendment are not reasons at all.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They are not reasons which show that any serious consideration had been given to our action. We agree to their amendment with respect to the date. We agree to twelve out of fourteen amendments. As to the other two, we say as to one of them, we do not agree, and it was an amendment which we are told they did not set much store by. As to the other amendment, we meet them half way. We say 'We agree to your amendments with a modification,' and that modification is one which the hon. Minister of Justice has told us is substantially the same as their amendment. If, under these circumstances, the House of Commons, the majority of which is supposed to follow the government, persist in rejecting this Bill because we have not gone the whole distance with them as to these amendments, then I think the responsibility is on the House of Commons and ought to stay there. I understand that the art unions and other associations have made a very persistent and vigorous canvas of the House of Commons against the coming into operation of the Bill before the 1st of January because their drawings are held every six months and it would cut the business off at once—the business not of the mischievous lotteries, but of the art unions as well. Therefore I think, in order to show that we are not unreasonable, and that we are prepared to give and take with the Commons, it would be better not to meddle with our decision of yesterday. It may or may not have been right, but we had better let it stand. There is no use in raising a further difficulty and spending more time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The amendment adopted by the Senate does not make any sense.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. minister says the amendment adopted by this House does not make any sense. The hon. leader of the opposition moved that this amendment be inserted. It has to be inserted in place of the clause the Commons sent up. We all understand that. It will be remembered, when these amendments were under consideration the other day, that some days were taken to allow the clerk to put our reasons and the resolution into shape, and I do not think the Minister of Justice would be justified in taking advantage of a mere technicality of that kind—that it was not worded properly. The hon. leader of the opposition proposed to substitute that amendment for the amendment sent up by the Commons.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I moved that the Senate did not insist on their disagreement to the fifth amendment made by the House of Commons to the said Bill, but that the Senate concurred in the said amendment. The hon. leader of the opposition moved in amendment the following:

> Provided that nothing in the foregoing clause shall be construed to apply——

That is a proviso added to the clause as it now stands. The amendment went on to say:

> Shall be construed to apply to any right now enjoyed by combinations of workmen or employees under the law now existing.

That will be an addition to section 520 as it stands. It was carried by the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was unfortunately out of the House and did not hear the objection taken, but from the remarks which have been made, I should judge the hon. Minister of Justice has taken exception to the form of the amendment, and it should be remembered that I stated that it would have to be placed as an amendment and that we did not accept the amendment of the Commons. The motion should have been made in that way and I intimated that that would be the motion—the substance of what the motion should be, that it should read in this way:

> That the Senate does not insist upon its amendment to the criminal section so and so, but that the following be substituted in lieu thereof:

That is what I said when I made my remarks, and that is what I proposed in my introduction of that motion. I admit the irregularity, and if the hon. gentleman persists in not allowing it to be amended in that way, I shall take an opportunity that the following be added or be the prelude or introduction to it. It was drawn up in a hurry and I knew it was not strictly in accordance with the rule or the manner in which it should be put, but I explained that in my introductory remarks, and I never supposed for a moment that a technical objection would be taken to frustrate the will of the Senate. If the hon. gentleman persists in that, I shall ask the permission of the House at the proper time, before it is sent down to the Commons, to move that the Senate does not insist upon its amendment but that the following be substituted in lieu thereof——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman proposes to put another motion?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly this must be reconsidered before that is done.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The House has voted upon the motion, and it is a completed and final act, as much as any other motion that has been put. After the motion has been put and carried, I submit it is not susceptible of amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I admit the full force of the objection made by the hon. minister, and had I not supposed it would have been accepted when I made that explanation at the beginning of it, I would have taken good care to have it so worded. I admit the irregularity and I promise the hon. gentleman he will never catch me again in that way.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not catching the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would ask whether the House would consent to have it put in the regular form.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Better move for the leader of the House to do it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is sugested by the hon. Minister of Justice that the matter stand until to-morrow. I am quite willing that it should.

The further consideration of the amendment was postponed until to-morrow.

CHARLOTTETOWN AND MURRAY HARBOUR RAILWAY BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (182) 'An Act respecting the construction of a branch railway from Charlottetown to Murray Harbour.'

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is simply a Bill confirming an agreement entered into with the provincial government. The hon. gentleman will remember that there was a Bill carried through the House last year, and in that Bill it was provided that the local government of Prince Edward Island should contribute annually towards the construction and maintenance of this bridge a sum of $12,000. Two members of the local government met the Minister of Railways here and considered the matter, and the Minister of Railways and the local government agreed that $9,700 should be the amount with which the government of Prince Edward Island should be charged, instead of $12,000. So that under the terms of this Bill the provincial government is being charged for this structure $2,300 less than the amount mentioned in the Bill of last year.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When we had the bridge Bill before us last session, it provided for a contract to be entered into for the construction of the bridge jointly with the provincial government, the local government to contribute $12,000 towards the construction of the bridge in perpetuity. It was then estimated that the bridge was to be a very expensive structure, much more expensive than it is now estimated it should be. I am aware that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, during some of the discussions that took place in the province in the autumn of last year, submitted a plan which he said was to be the plan of the bridge, and which he said he had worked over three very hard days at Moncton in completing. It was in an election contest, and at a public meeting that he made this statement. I am very well acquainted with the hon. gentleman's handwriting, and I looked carefully over the plan to see if I could find any evidence of his work on it, but I failed to discover that he had put any work on that plan. However, I think this is not the plan he submitted. At that meeting he submitted a plan and told the people that a very complete or perfect structure was to be erected to supply the wants of the province for ordinary traffic as well as a railway bridge, that it was to be of sufficient width for vehicles as well as for railway trains. It turns out now from the plan we have, that a very much cheaper structure is being proposed. I am not going to say that the bridge that is now proposed to be built is not adequate. I think, in view of the railway traffic that will be carried over that structure, and considering also the passenger traffic, that the bridge as proposed, will be found to be ample for both purposes; but the point I wish to take is this, that when the government decided on building quite a narrow bridge, and one which admitted only one passage for cars and vehicles, and giving only the right for vehicular traffic when railway trains were not running, of course closing the bridge to horses and carriages when trains were due or expected, and if they happened to be late shutting up traffic for a very considerable period in each day, or two or three times in a day—when I come to consider that that is all that is going to be done, I must say I think that a lesser contribution than $9,780 should have been required from the province. There is another point which has agitated public opinion in Prince Edward Island a good deal with regard to the site of the bridge. It was the desire of the people, and of the provincial government, that the bridge should terminate at the foot of Cumberland Street, on the Charlottetown side, and one of the strong reasons set forth in favour of that terminus of the bridge instead of the old shipyard point, a very considerable distance out of the town, was this: the tolls that the provincial government will be entitled to collect on the vehicular and foot traffic will be diminished very considerably by starting from Shipyard Point. It will cut down the passenger traffic to a small amount, because the bridge does not touch at the little town of South Port, nor come directly into Charlottetown, but connects Shipyard Point with Mutch's Point, and while it will answer quite as well for horses and carriages, and perhaps better for railway purposes, it will have the effect of cutting away to a very small point altogether the tolls that will be collected by the provincial government for passenger traffic upon the bridge. Taking all these things into consideration, that the provincial government are obliged to keep the platform of the bridge planked, and keep the bridge lighted for their own purposes, which will serve for the railway also, although the railway is bound to keep it lighted when trains are passing—putting all these things together, the cheapened character of the bridge, the diminished cost to the federal government in building the bridge, the landing of the bridge at both sides, especially the Charlottetown side, at an inconvenient point for provincial purposes.—it seems to me that a very hard bargain has been made with the provincial government in calling upon them to pay so large a sum as $9,780 annually. I think a fair estimate of the different services to be drawn from the bridge by both parties—the location of the bridge and its adaptability for railway purposes, and its adaptability for pedestrian traffic, the fact of the bridge being made narrower, so that horses can use it only when it is not wanted for trains—putting all these together, the province should not have been called upon to give so large a contribution. I am of the opinion that, on account of the erection of this bridge as it is, so far up the river, the provincial government will have to incur expenses still for a ferry between the city and South Port. That being so, it puts the matter in a different position from a year ago. Although the amount the provincial government had to pay was larger, there was a better service for the province.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The bridge is estimated to cost $837,000. I do not know how many railway trains run over it in a day. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell me now?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is no railway there now.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman knows the bridge would not be occupied twenty minutes out of the twenty-four hours by the railway.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Trains sometimes are delayed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Delayed or not delayed, the fact is an immense sum is charged against the treasury of the Dominion, considering the use that will be made of the bridge for railway purposes, as compared with the use that will be made of it for pedestrians and ordinary vehicular traffic. I think that the Department of Railways has gone a long way in consideration of the revenues of the province in the arrangement which has been made.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield respecting this bridge. The only observation I desire to make is on all fours with what he has said, that the federal government has made a very hard bargain with Prince Edward Island in the charge they are making for the limited use which the people of the island will make, outside of the use that the railway makes, of that bridge. If the bridge had been placed where it was originally proposed, directly from the city across to the town on the opposite side, it would have been but reasonable to have charged what was proposed in the original scheme, but now, since it is removed to a less convenient place and is made smaller, it is a serious tax on the people of Prince Edward Island to pay for all time. It is true they have a right to collect tolls on the bridge, but we know very well what has been the result of all toll bridges, or nearly all toll bridges in Canada. In a short time an agitation is got up to drop the tolls, and they have to forego them. I have no doubt that will come to be the case with the bridge at Charlottetown, and when we take into consideration the large claim which Prince Edward Island has against the federal government, I think it would have been but reasonable if the federal government had striken out any charge against the provincial government for the use of that bridge for vehicular traffic, considering the limited resources of the province, and the large claims it has against the federal government.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière), from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

TRADE DISPUTES CONCILIATION BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (187) 'An Act to aid in the prevention and settlement of trade disputes, and to provide for the publication of statistical industrial information.'

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Bill is a purely voluntarily one on the part of all interested in it, and I presume it would not be regarded as a contentious measure in any sense. It is copied from the English Act, of 1896, which has been found to work fairly well. Two objects are in view—the establishing of a board of conciliation and the publication of a labour gazette, which is also non-contentious. In this labour gazette it is proposed simply to record the incidents that are of interest to the labour community, the wages paid in various parts of the country, the number of men employed in the various industries, and subjects of that kind.

On subsection 2 of clause 3.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I see that boards are to be registered, but it does not say what means are to be taken to establish a board.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are purely voluntary boards that may be established from time to time in any locality where they have a sympathy with the men, and in order to avoid strikes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is the number determined ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. They can be formed anywhere and on any occasion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How many people form the board ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no limit to the board. There may be three or more ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Or a thousand.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not likely. The object is a very good one, as every hon. gentleman will admit. It is well recognized that when disputes arise between large bodies of men and employers, each side becomes aggressive, and it is impossible, unless some third person intervenes and suggests some proposition for a settlement, for a settlement to take place. We know disputes go on from week to week and month to month and get worse, and only through the influence of other persons with tact and diplomacy are they settled. We had an illustration of that in British Columbia recently. The men went out and remained out. We selected a gentleman who was known to have very strong sympathy with working men, a barrister in Toronto, Mr. Clute, and after he had been there a short time he induced them to come to an arrangement. It is on that principle it is proposed to establish these boards of conciliation. They are found to be very valuable in England, and it is to be hoped they will prove equally valuable in this country. Another instance which is probably in the recollection of hon. gentlemen : a few years ago a big strike took place in London—a very serious strike affecting the shipping of that port. The dock labourers had hung out for a long time. Finally Cardinal Manning was asked to intervene, and simply by making representations to one side and to the other, he finally got them to agree to a settlement. It is found by experience that where men are diplomatic and conciliatory in their tone, they effect settlements of that kind. It is to be hoped that by invoking boards of a similar nature in this country we may be able to settle strikes. They do not often occur, I am glad to say, in Canada, but it is well to be forearmed in case they do occur.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It is purely a voluntary matter ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no sanction at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, the board is registered by a minister of the government who is particularly charged with carrying it out, and there is a gazette published in connection with it, which simply records the rate of wages paid in the different parts of the country and the number of men employed in the different lines—information that is useful to the labouring classes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose when two of these contesting parties apply to the minister, the minister appoints the arbitrators ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He appoints one.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And an investigation goes on and a settlement is arrived at ; but supposing one of the parties refuses to be bound ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That ends the matter.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no compulsion about it ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It is to be a government institution ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Under the control of the government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, as far as making returns to the government is concerned.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Is there any way of forming rules and regulations and by-laws ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They make their own rules and regulations for it.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Is it only for boards already established ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Or which may be established.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Will they all join together and make a general conciliation board ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are none yet formed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I should like one point explained. The Bill provides for the selection of a minister who shall have charge of conciliation matters generally, as provided for in the Bill, and he may appoint a conciliator or conciliation board, but I notice that section 3 applies to any boards established, either before or after the passing of this Act. That must refer to recognizing some boards that are now in existence.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If there are any.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Are there any boards answering this description ? I thought we were really creating some machinery for effecting harmony between workmen and their employers, but we are recognizing something which is already in existence.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There may be in different parts of Canada boards which take a special interest in avoiding strikes and who makes it their duty to see the workmen and the employers in order to prevent the strikes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There must be some idea that there are such boards in existence.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no restraining of them, and they are not recognized.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is it not rather irregular to be proposing to legislate that some persons may set up a claim to be authorized in this capacity ? Would it not be better that the power should start with this Bill to create a board, and not have contentions come in from people throughout the country that they have some organization already ? I do not quite understand why we should do that. If there is no such thing in existence, why should we recognize the possibility of there being such an organization, and if parties can come up and claim to act under the authority of the minister without being appointed by him, it would be irregular.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If there are any volunteer associations of that kind to come under this Bill, they will send to the minister their constitution and by-laws and they become registered under this Act. You would not shut out any associations now if there are any.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We have in the province of Quebec a conciliatory board, or tribunal, formed by law. We have a law which constitutes a provincial board of conciliation.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is what is meant.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not know if the question of provincial rights arises in that matter. Are we to have two laws, one by the Dominion and one by the province ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If there is any provincial law, this does not in any way interefere with it. If you have any body of men organized as a conciliation board, and they choose to come in under the statute, they may do so, and if not, they need not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In the province of Quebec it is compulsory. No man can sue in the courts now for an amount over a certain figure without taking the first steps in the way of conciliation before those boards, and if conciliation cannot be reached by these boards, then he is at liberty to sue before the ordinary courts ; but in the Bill presented to-day, suppose two parties are willing to try conciliation, if they do not succeed, if one refuses, what then ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then they are just where they were before.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no sanction at all ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Supposing two parties, between whom there had been some dispute, agree to refer the dispute to this conciliatory board, or conciliator, whichever it is, and the whole case is gone into and they sign the memorandum of agreement, then does the hon. minister mean to say that, if all that is done, the whole case gone into and the conciliatory board give their decision, that the parties are not bound by it, that they can accept it or reject it as they please ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If they have signed any agreement, it will be for the law to take cognizance of that agreement. Then it is outside of this Bill altogether.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—If a settlement of the difficulties is effected, either by conciliation or by arbitration, a memorandum of the terms thereof shall be drawn up and signed by the parties or their representatives and a copy thereof shall be delivered to and kept by the minister. Supposing one party backs out, is there any means of enforcing it ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No other means than under the laws of the particular provinces.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 4,

Hon. Mr. POWER—What are these clauses taken from ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—From the British Act of 1896, and the only difference is that the word 'minister' is substituted for the expression 'board of trade.'

The clause was adopted.

On clause 7,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Under this clause they would have power to take evidence under oath.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—It gives a further power to appoint commissioners to hold inquiry apart altogether from the conciliation board.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, but all parties have acquiesced in it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—It authorized the appointment of a commission for the purposes of this Act apart from the conciliation board.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Where all parties request it and communicate in writing to the minister that they desire it and where they want to inquire into fact and circumstances.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—It may be only where they require it, but I rather think this measure is giving a good deal of power, and it may entail a good deal of expense on the government to carry it out. The Secretary of State referred, during the consideration of one of the first clauses of the Bill, to an inquiry which had been made in British Columbia a short time ago and which I observe by the papers cost some several thousand dollars. It is just possible that under this section a similar inquiry might be instituted which would cost an equal amount of money.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would be money well spent.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—If people were dissatisfied with the wages they were getting in any place, and they made an application to the government, the government is authorized to appoint a commission and hold a further inquiry, and it means also the expenditure of a very large sum of money possibly to carry it out. It may be it will have a good effect, but I think it is a clause which should be closely looked into.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I venture to say, in reference to the strike in British Columbia, that there was a million dollars lost. Some mining stock went down 50 per cent.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the hon. Secretary of State would communicate to the committee the clause of the English Act of which clause 7 is a copy.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Parts of that clause could not be in the English Act. It is not a clause that there could be any objection to. It is only where both parties desire it. They apply to the minister for the issue of the commission in order that those facts and circumstances may be inquired into. Nothing can be more reasonable. Then our Act steps in and a commission of that kind can be issued and the commissioners can be authorized to take evidence under oath.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Supposing a trumped up claim is made.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is for the commissioners.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The government is proposing to provide a commission spending a large sum of money where possibly the party may be in error and should not have asked for the commission at all. I think there should be some penalty where a man makes a false statement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is only where both parties agree.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—They might trump up a claim. I think there should be a provision, where a claim is set up without cause, that some party should be made liable.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Who appoints the conciliatory board ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The minister.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is to be hoped that we will not be told that we are doing an outrageous thing if we criticise this measure. I think clause 7 is open to some criticism and that is the reason I asked to see the section of the English Act of which this is a copy.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That section could not be a copy of any clause of the English Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not an exact copy. Clause 7 reads :

> If, before a settlement is effected, and while the difference is under the consideration of a conciliator or conciliation board, such conciliator or conciliation board is of opinion that some misunderstanding or disagreement appears to exist between the parties as to the causes or circumstances of the difference, and, with a view to the removal of such misunderstanding or disagreement, desires an inquiry under oath into such causes and circumstances, and, in writing signed by such conciliator or the members of the conciliation board, as the case may be, communicates to the minister such desire for inquiry.

I call attention to the fact that this originates with the conciliator who has been appointed by the minister. The clause continues :

> —and if the parties to the difference or their representatives, in writing consent thereto, then, on his recommendation, the Governor in Council may appoint such conciliator or members of the conciliation board, or some other person or persons, a commissioner or commissioners, as the case may be, under the provisions of the Act respecting inquiries concerning public matters, to conduct such inquiry, and, for that purpose, may confer upon him or them the powers which under the said Act may be conferred upon commissioners.

That clause is open to a certain danger. This conciliator is appointed to try and make a settlement, and he finds that there is a difference, some misunderstanding, and he thinks it would be a good thing to issue a commission. Apparently the commission would be issued, in all probability would be issued to the conciliator, because he is the first person mentioned. And the conciliator, who may not have any regular occupation, thereby creates a job for himself. He is appointed as commissioner under this Bill, to inquire into a certain matter, and he receives fees for doing so. Perhaps there is that provision in the English Act, but I should like to be quite sure there was before we sanction it here. If the parties ask for an inquiry of that kind, it is well enough, but the conciliator is the man who originates it and obtains the consent of the parties.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—If the conciliatory board is to be of any benefit to the people who have differed, their decision should be final.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—It should not be necessary then that they should appoint any commission to settle the matter. If there is a conciliation board and both parties are represented on that board, and there is a conciliator appointed by the minister their decision should be final without the appointment of a further commission on their application.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They choose their own tribunal. Let them accept its decision.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have the English Act here, and I do see a clause in it corresponding to clause 7. There are a number of Acts referred to in the English Act. 'The Council of Conciliation Act.' and the 'Arbitration of Masters and Workmen Act.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is a difference between the English law and this law. This is on the lines of the English law, but in the English law all legislative power is vested in parliament, and they can confer whatever powers are necessary. Here property and civil rights are under the control of the local legislature, and there is no coercive power bestowed by this parliament in respect of such matters at all. Where boards of conciliation are established; they act simply as friendly intermediaries between the disputants. They cannot exercise any coercive power whatever. It is not intended that they should possess such powers.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then this Act is quite useless.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not useless, because recently we appointed a commission and sent men to British Columbia, and we were immensely successful there, although we conferred no coercive power upon the commissioners. The result was, their minds were open and terms of agreement were arrived at between the mine-owners and the miners, and the result is all the mines are in operation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman think the government or parliament has a right to send a conciliator to one of the provinces where there is already a similar existing law?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If there is a similar existing law under the jurisdiction of the province, the probability is it would be unnecessary to send any one.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not the question. I am asking if the government have a right to send a man to these provinces. Of course, the minister might not exercise his right because he thinks it is not necessary, but I wish to know whether the minister has a right to send a conciliator to a province where a similar law is in existence?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If we choose we may do so.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—Why should not the board of conciliation take this evidence and hear both sides of the case? There is a commissioner appointed under a previous clause of the Bill, who is to act with the board, and I do not see why in that case, it is necessary to appoint a further commission in order to hear and decide a case.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to clause 7.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is an objection to the whole Bill.

Hon. Mr. COX—I should not like to accept this clause without understanding it better than I do at present. It appears to me it might work a great hardship. I should think if that clause were left out of the Bill it would accomplish what it was intended to accomplish. The word 'conciliation' means getting the parties together and adjusting their differences. That is all the power conferred by this measure. There is nothing compulsory. If clause 7 were adopted, and a commissioner were appointed to make inquiry under oath, then what could they do ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Nothing at all.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They would only have the power to gain the money.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does seem to me that, if the conciliator is an intelligent man, and he finds there is a misunderstanding, he can explain that misunderstanding without having to issue a commission to take evidence under oath.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is only where the parties themselves disagree as to the circumstances. If the commissioner takes evidence under oath the parties can accept the evidence just as a judge accepts it. It cannot be enforced in any sense. It is simply for the information of the parties who are differing about it. It cannot possibly do any harm.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They are not bound to accept it ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If they do not accept it ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then it drops.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—Why should not the minister be empowered to take the evidence under oath instead of appointing a further commission ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We had better pass that clause over. The Bill has been drawn by the Postmaster General, who has taken a good deal of interest it, and I will see him with reference to it.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 11,

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What are the expenses referred to in this clause ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand the House of Commons has voted $10,000, for the year for the carrying out the provisions of clause 11. There is the printing of the labour gazette, which gives statistics of labour.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—These expenses relate to the printing ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There will be other expenses, no doubt. We had to pay Mr. Clute's expenses to British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Do I understand the provision that is made for carrying the law into effect is $10,000, in the estimates ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have heard gentlemen say it was a harmless Bill, and I fully agree with that remark if that is all that is intended to be spent in carrying it out, because if clause 10 is carried out, $10,000 would be a mere bagatelle. We require agricultural statistics, and we have long been crying out for them, but we could not get the Minister of Agriculture to move for them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand there is a bureau of statistics to be established, principally under the control and management of the Minister of Customs and that he is to carry out this idea. This is a subject which has been under the consideration of the government of Canada for the last ten years—the congregating together of all the statistical clerks in the different customs departments in all parts of the province, and have the statistics compiled here. That would apply only, I take it, to the trade and commerce of the country, and in order to enable the minister to compile his annual reports, this labour bureau to obtain the statistics in relation to labour would have to be a special provision, and it would be well, when inquiring about clause 7, to inquire what department they propose to establish, because it would cost more than ten thousand dollars unless it was done much cheaper than governmental matters are generally carried out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is nothing in this regard to establishing bureau statistics. The $10,000 is for the collection of labour statistics in the publication of a labour gazette similar to that in England.

Hon. Mr. YEO, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill and asked leave to sit again.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (171) 'An Act respecting the Central Vermont Railway Company.' (Foreign.)

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, July 12, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at 11 a.m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

CENTRAL VERMONT RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McKAY, from the Committee on Standing Orders, to whom was referred Bill (171) 'An Act respecting the Central Vermont Railway Company (Foreign),' reported that sufficient cause had been shown why the usual notices had not been given in respect to this Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved that the 54th rule of the Senate be dispensed with in so far as it related to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—The Committee on Standing Orders have found that, during the present session, there has been great laxity in complying with the rules of the Senate with regard to bills coming before this House, and more particularly with regard to petitions being presented to the House. The promoters of Bills appear to think that all they have to do is to come and apologize to the committee and they will get anything through.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—That has been done generally this session, but the committee have expressed a determination that in future the parties promoting bills will have to comply with the rules strictly or else they will suffer the consequences.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the majority of the House will concur with the remarks of the Chairman. There has been a good deal of laxity in carrying bills through the House, without insisting upon compliance with the rules. The present case, however, is somewhat exceptional. The object which this company have in view is the amalgamation of certain railways in the province of Quebec, and this Act is necessary in order to enable them to carry it out. But the agreement between the Vermont Central, the Grand Trunk and others interested was not completed until a very short time ago, and consequently they were not in a position to present their petition at an earlier date. I have no doubt these were the facts which were placed before the Committee on Standing Orders, that induced them to make this report. I move that this Bill be placed on the Orders of the Day and read the second time presently.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

THE DISMISSAL OF LIEUT.-GOVERNOR McINNES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN rose to Call the attention of the Senate to the correspondence laid on the Table which has taken place between the Premier, Secretary of State or any other member of the government and the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia, having reference to the dismissal of Premiers Turner and Semlin by the said Lieutenant-Governor, and the calling upon Mr. Robert Beaven, Mr. Joseph Martin, or any other person to form a cabinet; together with all reports, orders in council or other documents referring to the said dismissals and formation of such cabinets. And inquire if there is any further correspondence on the said dismissals?

He said: It is not my intention to make any remarks in reference to this notice of motion which I have placed on the Order Paper, but it was rather my desire to elicit from the hon. Minister of Justice his view and the views of the government on the constitutional question that is involved. The question is a very important one, and I am sure the House and the country desire to hear the views of the hon. Minister of Justice on this matter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The inquiry of the hon. senator is quite proper under the circumstances. The removal of the representative of the Crown from the government of the province, under the authority conferred by the British North America Act, is an important step which ought not to be taken without full consideration, and the reasons for which it is necessary, under the law, to communicate to both Houses of parliament. The reasons for the removal, which should be laid on the Table of each House, have already been submitted to parliament in the way the law requires. The statement is brief, but accurate, and one which comes strictly within the spirit and intention of the statute. Since His Honour Lieut.-Governor McInnes has been removed from his official position in British Columbia, he has made complaint that a meddlesome oversight was exercised by the federal government, which led to all the difficulties which have arisen in British Columbia, which seriously interfered with his liberty of action, and which will account for the political unrest that prevails within that province. The statements call for careful consideration, and I think the House will come to the conclusion that they are altogether without foundation. The federal government did not in any way interfere with Lieut.-Governor McInnes. The Hon. Secretary of State, upon his own responsibility and unofficially, did write to the Lieut.-Governor of British Columbia, pointing out to him the dangerous path upon which he had entered, and warning him as to the consequences which might flow from the unconstitutional course which he was inclined to take. I need not say anything further upon that subject, as my hon. friend and colleague has already laid before the House the private and confidential correspondence which he has had with Lieutenant-Governor McInnes.

Let me bring under the attention of the Senate what His Honour did since he has been Governor of British Columbia. He has had no fewer than five prime ministers. Four of these have succeeded in forming cabinets, and all this has happened within the very brief period for which he was Lieutenant-Governor. When he entered upon his duties as Lieutenant-Governor, he found a government already in existence, of which Mr. Turner was the head. That government went to the country shortly after Mr. McInnes became Lieutenant-Governor; and after the elections were over, and without waiting for a meeting of the legislature, he dismissed his ministers. This was certainly a high-handed proceeding under the circumstances, for, at the time, the supporters and opponents of the government were very nearly equally balanced, and it would have been a reasonable thing to have complied with the request of His Honour's advisers and to have permitted them to meet the legislature and to have allowed the legislature to decide whether they were entitled to the continuance of public confidence or not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—May I ask if the first Turner administration were not dismissed from office, before the result of all the elections were known?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think there were two members that had not been returned. That is my recollection. The modern practice is for the Crown to leave the question of making or unmaking an administration to the legislature upon whom those ministers are depending, and in which they are supposed to have seats. The Turner government, I think, were entitled, when they said they believed they had a majority in the legislature, to retain office until that legislature could be called together. The legislature should, however, have had an opportunity of pronouncing an opinion of confidence or non-confidence in that administration. It is true, the practice has grown up in recent times, both in England and in this country, for a government that has been decisively defeated at the polls to retire from office, without waiting for the meeting of the legislature; but this is in every instance, both in the United Kingdom and in this country, the act of the advisers of the Crown themselves, and not the act of the Crown. And if the government of Mr. Turner desired to meet the legislature before retiring from office, it was its constitutional right to do so. It was open to His Honour to have insisted upon an early meeting, if he believed the government to have been defeated at the polls; so that the legislature itself, might decide whether it had confidence in that administration or not. But His Honour did not give the legislature an opportunity of expressing any opinion upon that government, but upon his own motion, and his own responsibility, he dismissed them from office.

The next step of His Honour was to call upon Mr. Robert Beaven, who was not a member of the legislature at all, to form an administration. Beaven undertook this task, and signally failed, and was compelled to resign into Mr. McInnes' hands the duties with which he had been entrusted, and which his failure shows ought never to have been committed to him. This assembly had just been returned, and it was a most extraordinary course, for the Lieutenant-Governor to take, to seek for a Prime Minister wholly outside of the provincial legislature which had just returned from the people, in which all of the ministry whom he had recently dismissed had seats.

In the third place, Lieutenant-Governor McInnes called upon Mr. Semlin to form an administration. Mr. Semlin, in forming his government, embraced prominent men of both parties, who had agreed upon a certain line of policy for the province, and who commanded, for the time being, a majority in the legislature. And by this act the mistakes which had been made in the dismissal of the Turner government, and in calling upon Mr. Beaven, were perhaps, obliterated. Afterwards, a dispute arose between the members of Mr. Semlin's administration, which led to the dismissal of Mr. Martin, who was Attorney General in that government. This, to some extent, weakened the administration, and led, during the following session, to the defeat of the government of Mr. Semlin by a majority of one. I understand negotiations at once took place between Mr. Semlin and some of those who had voted against him on this motion, and as the result of their discussion of public matters, they agreed to give him their support, and in fact they did sustain him subsequent to his defeat by a majority of seven. Mr. Semlin, as the result of this understanding, communicated to the Lieutenant-Governor the fact that he was able to carry on the government with the sanction of the legislature, as it then existed; but before the meeting of the House, on the day to which it stood adjourned, Mr. McInnes dismissed the Semlin ministry, and called upon Mr. Martin, who had not a supporter in the legislature at the time, to form an administration. The action of the House, and its reception of the Lieutenant-Governor, upon learning what had transpired, show what its judgment was upon the cabinet of the Lieutenant-Governor.

His Honour complains that the province has, for a period of ten months been in a condition of political unrest, and that this condition was due to the political uncertainty which had been brought about by federal interference. He complains that the federal government, by an unwarranted exercise of its power, against which he had protested, forbade him to interfere at the time when his ministry was about to summon a meeting of the legislature, and that the advice that was given him from Ottawa, at one time, was contradictory of that which had been given to him at another. He complains that, at one time he is told to follow the advice of his ministers, and at another he is told to take a different course. The federal government never interfered with him, never advised him in respect to the matters about which he makes complaint. It was no doubt His Honour's duty to follow the advice of his ministers when he had an administration having seats in the legislature and enjoying its confidence. The Secretary of State wrote to him unofficially, and as a friend, to warn him against taking an unconstitutional course. When the Lieutenant-Governor sought to compel his ministers to dissolve a legislature just elected, or to call a meeting of that legislature in midsummer, after it had its session in January, contrary to the wishes of his ministers, and when no public business was ready for its consideration, his action was, to say the least, unusual. What was the object? Upon whose advice was the Lieutenant-Governor proceeding in thus undertaking to force his ministers to choose between dissolving the House, calling a meeting of the legislature in midsummer, or retiring from office? Then, again, when His Honour proposed, at the instance of his advisers, five of whom had never sat in parliament, to delay the elections to a much later period than that at which it was possible to hold them, he complains that the Secretary of State advised him to insist upon an immediate election. Did he see no difference between accepting the advice of men who had a legislative body behind them, of which they were all members, and the advice of men, but one of whom was a member of the legislature, and the remaining five never having had seats in the legislature at all, who were carrying on the executive government without any responsibility to the legislature, and who were advising him to protract this state of things? It surely was of the first consequence that elections should be had, and that when he assumed to go outside of the legislature to find advisers, he should see that they found seats as soon as possible, and that the usual relations between his constitutional advisers and the legislative body of the province, was at the earliest possible moment established.

From what I have stated, it will be seen that had Lieutenant-Governor McInnes followed constitutional usage, he would, under the circumstances, have allowed the Turner government to meet the legislature, and to have given the legislature the opportunity of pronounncing upon the fate of that government, the more especially as the legislature was fresh from the people, and must have then been held to be a fair representative of the public opinion at the time. His calling upon a man who was without a seat in the legislature at the time, and who utterly failed to induce any parties in it to join him, was a reflection upon his own political sagacity, and judgment; and in denying to the government of Mr. Semlin, when he was informed that it could command a majority of the legislature, the opportunity of going on with the public business, and unnecessarily forcing a new election upon the country, without any of those indications which usually guide the chief magistrate under our constitutional system in coming to a conclusion, as to whether public opinion has or has not withdrawn its confidence from his constitutional advisers, was a most improper proceeding.

Let me here briefly invite the attention of the House to the principles of the unwritten constitution in respect to the relation subsisting between the advisers of the Crown and the Crown's representatives in a province or dependency of the empire. In principle, there is no difference in the relations which subsist between the advisers of the Crown and His Excellency here at Ottawa, and the advisers of the Crown and the Lieutenant-Governor in each of the provinces. There may be a great difference in the degree of importance of the places which they hold, and in the importance of the matters with which they are called upon to deal, but the principles which settle the relations that subsist between the Crown and its advisers in each, are precisely the same. This is shown by several decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. In the case of the Queen vs. Burah, in the case of Powell vs. Appollo Candle Company, and in the case of the Queen vs. Hodge, you find the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council laying down precisely the same doctrines. The first is a case from India; the second is a case from Australia; and the third is a case arising in the province of Ontario. And in each of these the doctrine laid down by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is, that the powers possessed by neither are delegated powers, but are inherent sovereign powers. The Crown in each is the fountain of executive authority, and wherever parliamentary government is established that authority must be exercised according to the principles which govern in every dependency of the empire where parliamentary government has been introduced. The relation between the Crown and the legislature is the same in a province of this confederation, as in the United Kingdom, and must find expression in the same way.

Now, since 1834, no instance has arisen in which the Crown has ventured to dismiss a ministry, in the United Kingdom, and no instance exists in this country since the establishment of our union, in which the representative of the Crown here at Ottawa has dismissed his advisers. The Crown has for more than sixty years acted upon the assumption that the work of making and unmaking ministries should be left to parliament. There are several instances in which the Crown may constitutionally dissolve the House of Commons or the legislature. In the first place, when the ministry gradually loses its support in the House, until the majority of the members of the House are found voting against it. Then the Crown may either accept the resignation of the ministry, if such resignation is tendered, or it may dissolve the legislature upon their advice, and leave the question of difference between the legislature and the ministry to the decision of the electorate. Now, which of these courses shall be taken in a given case, will depend on circumstances. If there have been a number of by-elections held during the life of parliament, and it becomes obvious that the current of public feeling is running against the administration, so that constituencies which formerly returned supporters are beginning to return opponents, the Crown may assume that public opinion is not favourable to the administration, and, so it may be, that an appeal should be made to the electorate who constitute the political sovereignty of the country, to determine whether it desires the advisers of His Excellency longer to continue in office. The Crown may, perhaps, without a very serious departure from modern usage, dismiss a ministry which still has a majority in the legislature if it insists upon the exercise, through parliament, of conventional powers of legislation, upon matters in respect to which there is manifested a strong feeling of popular opposition. The Crown may, in that event, offer to ministers the opportunity of abandoning their policy or of going to the country upon it. So that the constitutional legislation proposed may have the sanction of the country if it is to be adhered to. This is an appeal from the legal to the political sovereignty for authority, in respect to legislation of great consequence. A dissolution may be a proper constitutional proceeding where a difference has arisen between the two Houses of Parliament upon a question on which the electorate of the country has never been called upon to pronounce. But this would be going, at least, as far as the modern constitution would warrant; but they fall very far short of affording any basis for the course which the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia ventured to take. Mr. Bagehot, who may be held to represent the advanced view of writers upon our constitutional system, says:

No monarch should dissolve parliament against the will and the interests of the ministry which is in power. No doubt the King can dismiss such a ministry, and replace it by another administration, whose advice to dissolve parliament he could take; but, even with this precaution, to act thus towards a ministry, which had a strong majority in parliament, would be to strike a blow which it is almost impossible to suppose. We do not believe that Queen Victoria herself, in spite of the popularity and respect with which she is surrounded, would even have recourse to such a measure. No Englishman can dream even of a catastrophe of this nature, but it, to him, appears to belong to the phenomena of a world altogether different from that which he inhabits. In practice, in England, the Sovereign considers himself obliged to follow the advice of the ministry which the House of Commons desires to maintain in power. All prerogatives at variance with this principle have fallen into disuse. To strike from behind, so to speak, and strangle by means of an appeal to the country a ministry sustained by parliament, would be an event which no longer enters into the calculation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What a complete justification that is of Lord Head when he refused to dissolve.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think my hon. friend is mistaken. He further adds:

The Queen can hardly now refuse a defeated ministry a chance of a dissolution any more than she can dissolve in the time of an undefeated one, and without its consent.

That applies to what my hon. friend said.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That was a defeated ministry.

Hon. Mr. MILLS.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Mr. Brown's was a defeated ministry. He was defeated in both Houses, and claimed he was entitled to an appeal, which he did not get. His Excellency Sir Edmund Head was not obliged to call upon Mr. Brown to form a ministry. He assigned as a reason for not giving a dissolution that the late ministry enjoyed the confidence of parliament. If that was the doctrine he acted upon—and he might have acted upon it—he ought not to have accepted the resignation of that ministry and should not have called upon Mr. Brown to form an administration, but when he did accept their resignation and called upon the leader of the minority he was bound on constitutional grounds to give him the right to appeal to the country and not to call upon anybody else.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the extract is to be applicable in all cases—well, the hon. member had better go on. I am sorry I interrupted.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is the duty of a Governor to leave the business of making and unmaking ministries to the people's representatives, and to recognize the rule that he must choose his advisers according to their wishes.

The constitution of our day makes it impossible for a sovereign to retain a ministry to which the House of Commons is hostile, and it is equally impossible to remove from office a ministry of which the House of Commons approves. Now, if we judge of Mr. McInnes' conduct by this principle, we will find that it is without any constitutional support. He had, as his advisers, the Turner government. They went to the country. They did not tender, of their own accord, to him, their resignations, because they believed that the opinion expressed by the country had not been adverse to them. Holding the views they did, they were entitled to meet the legislature, but this opportunity was denied them. His Honour succeeded in forming an administration, with Mr. Semlin at the head, which did enjoy the confidence of that body, and so the unsual course which he took, of dismissing his ministers, was protected for the time being by that result. The true doctrine of the relation between the representative of the Crown and his advisers, was well stated by Lord Dufferin, in a speech at Halifax in 1873. He said:

My only guiding star in the conduct and maintenance of my official relations with your public men is the parliament of Canada. I believe in parliament, no matter which way it votes; and to those men alone whom the deliberate will of the confederate parliament of Canada may assign to me as my responsible advisers can I give my confidence. Whether they are heads of this party or of that party, must be a matter of indifference to the Governor General. So long as they are maintained, he is bound to give them his unreserved confidence, to defer to their advice, and to loyally assist them with his counsels.

After Lord Dufferin returned to England, speaking at a dinner given to him at the Reform Club, he said:

If anything satisfactory to this country has occurred during the course of my administration, it is to be attributed to the patriotism, to the elevated spirit, and to the loyalty of the Canadian people themselves; and, my lords and gentlemen, I freely confess that I should not consider it a compliment to the head of any self-governing community, if he were credited with the exhibition of any personally invented policy, or any independent initiative of his own.

These observations are sound constitutional doctrines, but they were not observed by Governor McInnes. He did not make the opinion of his legislature his guiding star. When he learned that the Semlin government commanded a majority of that legislature, he dismissed them; he dissolved the legislature; he put the government in the hands of men who did not command the confidence of the legislature. They were not of it. And nothing had transpired during the life of that legislature to show that it had ceased to represent the country. It was carrying his constitutional discretion very far indeed, when the Lieutenant-Governor made his political life to depend upon the success which might attend upon the arbitrary course whch he had taken. If his last advisers, under Mr. Martin, had succeeded in obtaining a majority, he might perhaps have been permitted to remain at the head of affairs while they enjoyed the confidence of the House—though this is not the rule of the Colonial Office—but what would have been his position in case the Martin government failed, and those were called upon to form a government whom he had expelled from office, and from whom he had withheld the ordinary rights of constitutional advisers of the Crown? He was then precisely in the position in which Sir Charles Darling placed himself while Governor of one of the Australian colonies. Mr. Cardwell, who was Secretary of State for the Colonies at the time, said, in parliament:

It has been my painful duty to recommend that the Governor of Victoria shall be removed from his duties. My honourable friend, who has just sat down, truly stated that the reason of this is to be found, not in any error I considered he had fallen into in the difficult circumstances in which, I admit, he was placed, during the contest between the two branches of the legislature. It appeared to me that the proposal he conveyed to me that the members of the former Executive Council should be deprived of the distinction they enjoyed, because they presented a petition to the Sovereign, praying for the redress of grievances, which I thought they were justly entitled to do, was couched in terms which render it impossible that the Governor who employed that language and adopted that course, can be a safe guide to the colony, or an impartial arbitrator of difficulties in the circumstances in which the colony was placed.

Sir Edward Cardwell, in a despatch to Sir Charles Darling, in 1866, says:

It is one of the first duties of the Queen's representative to keep himself, as far as possible, aloof from, and above, all personal conflicts. He should always so conduct himself as not to be precluded from acting freely with those whom the course of parliamentary proceedings might present to him as his confidential advisers. While, on the one hand, it is his duty to afford to his actual advisers all fair and just support, consistently with the observance of the law, he ought, on the other hand, to be perfectly free to give the same support to any other ministers whom it may be necessary for him at any future time to call to his councils. The colony is entitled to know that the Governor gives this support to his ministers, for the time being, and that he is able and willing, if the occasion shall arise, to give the same support to others. I regret to say that in the present instance you have rendered this impossible. It must be evident to yourself that you occupy a position of personal antagonism towards almost all those whose antecedents point them out as most likely to be available to you in the event of any change of ministry. This has resulted, as I think, entirely from your own acts, your adoption of a course of conduct which cannot be justified in law, and your strong denunciation, in which I am wholly unable to concur, of those who have objected to that course. It is impossible, I much regret to say, that, after this, you can, with advantage, continue to conduct the government of the colony.

Looking to your long services, and sincerely desirous to make every allowance for the difficulties of your position, I have been most reluctant to arrive at the decision which, nevertheless, I have been obliged to adopt. I am compelled to advise Her Majesty that you should be relieved of your duties, and the government of the colony be placed in other hands.

The doctrine of this despatch is most important. It points out that, under our parliamentary system, it is the duty of a governor to so stand towards all parties as to make it possible for him to call upon the leaders of any party who can command a majority in the House of Commons, or the legislature, to form an administration. It will be seen that Governor Darling had made the disputes between his ministers and their political opponents his own. He had, in fact, entered into the political arena as a fighting politician, as the champion of a political party, and this was considered to be altogether inconsistent with the duties which pertained to his office.

Now, look at the case of Lieutenant-Governor McInnes. See the feeling in the province, which he has provoked in the minds of those whom he had ignominiously dismissed, and of all those who are friendly to them. At an informal meeting of the members of the legislature, embracing even those whom he had called upon to form a government, a vote of censure upon him was adopted. And this was due to the fact that he had, in all that he did, in making and unmaking ministries, departed from the settled usage of our constitution. This was not at all surprising. He bow-stringed public public men whom he called to his councils, right and left, with as little regard to the public interest, or to what was due them, as ever Sultan strangled and threw into the Bosphorus ministers of whom he had grown tired.

The doctrine which I have stated, and which is so clearly enunciated by Mr. Cardwell in the speech and in the despatch to which I have alluded, and from which I have quoted, was also, at an earlier period, clearly set forth by Lord Grey, who may be regarded as the initiator of the system of parliamentary government in the British colonies. In the instructions which he addressed to Lord Elgin, at the time when that distinguished statesman was appointed Governor General of Canada, he said :

> The object with which I recommend to you this course is that of making it apparent that any transfer which may take place, of political power from the hands of one party in the province to those of another, is the result not of an act of yours. To this I attach great importance. I have, therefore, to instruct you to abstain from changing your Executive Council, until it shall become perfectly clear that they are unable with such fair support from yourself as they have a right to expect, to carry on the government of the province, satisfactorily, and command the confidence of the legislature.

This doctrine Mr. McInnes has not observed, this instruction he has not followed, and his non-observance of it has largely contributed to the political unrest which has prevailed in the local politics of the province of British Columbia, and which has awakened a strong personal feeling against him, and which made his continuance in the position of lieutenant-governor most undesirable in the public interest. Let me here say upon another point that I very cordially subscribe to the doctrine stated by Mr. Cardwell, when he said in the House of Commons :

> I do earnestly hope that we are not about to constitute ourselves into a court of appeal with regard to colonial matters. When the question is whether you shall require a governor to observe the law, you have no alternative but to insist on its observance in the colony ; but when it is the question of the automatic action of the colony I can conceive nothing more calculated to sever the tie between the colony and the mother country, than that there should be in this House any disposition to constitute ourselves the judges of their rights, the guardians of their interests or the interpreter of their policy and their wishes. We have deliberately determined to leave these matters to themselves, and I earnestly and sincerely hope that we shall not by any discussion that occurs here, give rise to an opinion that we regret the course we have taken in that respect.

These observations must not be forgotten by the Senate and House of Commons in a case like the present.

I thought when the case of Mr. Letellier was under discussion in the House of Commons in 1879, that the resolution moved in that House was a most irregular proceeding. The appointment of the Lieutenant-Governor is an executive act. The removal of the Lieutenant-Governor is also the act of the executive government, and it is as open to this parliament to criticise the conduct of the govenment in respect to such a proceeding, as it is open to them to criticise the conduct of the advisers of the Crown on every other act done or neglected upon their advice ; but if the House of Commons, or the Senate, thought that a Lieutenant-Governor ought to have been removed from office who was not removed, it was their business to proceed by censuring the government for neglecting to do its duty, and not by calling upon His Excellency, directly, to remove the Lieutenant-Governor from office. Under our constitution, the Lieutenant-Governor of a province is removable by the Governor General for cause shown, and the immediate advisers of His Excellency are the ministers for the time being. As advisers of His Excellency in this case, we do not undertake to decide who the advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor shall be—whether they shall be Conservative or Reformer, or whether made up of a coalition of parties, but they should be composed of men who enjoy the confidence of the legislature. Their continuance in office should be dependent upon the continued confidence of the legislature. To use the words of Lord Dufferin, the guiding star in the conduct and maintenance of his official relations with his ministers should be the confidence which a legislature reposes in them ; and no matter what may be the views of the legislature on public questions, an efficient executive should always be kept as near as may be in harmony with it. And so a Lieutenant-Governor must always look to the provincial legislature for advice in respect to those whom he may select as his counsellors in the discharge of his executive functions. This, it is clear, the late Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia did not do. But he substituted his personal will, in the selection of his ministry, for the will of the majority of those whom the people returned, and he dissolved a legislature that he had no constitutional ground for assuming had ceased to accurately reflect public opinion, because he had for five out of six of his ministers gone outside of the legislature for them. Looking dispassionately at the course pursued by His Honour, I can come to but one conclusion —that from first to last, he never rightly grasped either the spirit or the principles of our system of government, so far as it related to the functions of the representative of the sovereign in a province of this Dominion.

Lieutenant-Governor McInnes mistook constitutional history for constitutional law, and he assumed that he could follow the practices of George III. as readily as those of Her Majesty. I greatly regret the course which he took ; I regret that he failed to realize that he was invading the province of the legislature in dismissing a ministry that continued to enjoy their confidence ; that he forgot that the advisers of the Crown, under our modern constitution, have rights not less certain than those which pertain to the representative of the Crown, and that those rights, in the course which he adopted, he wholly disregarded.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to call attention of the hon. member to the fact that he has not answered the latter part of the question, whether there is any further correspondence on the said dismissal ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may just say, with regard to that, I understand there is no further correspondence. Of course if there was it would come to my hon. friend the Secretary of State.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am sure every one in the House has listened with a great deal of interest and attention to this exposition of the principles of constitutional government, not only in England but also in Canada. I have listened myself with more than ordinary interest to the speech the hon. gentleman has made, and I think we are all grateful at the clear and explicit manner in which he has laid down the constitution which governs, not only England, but this country, that while the modern system exists to which he has referred, he has not in his remarks denied the inherent right of the Crown to take any position that it may think proper. But under the present advanced system of government, and as we understand responsible government, it would be a very great stretch of the authority of the Crown to take any other course than that which he has indicated, unless under very extraordinary circumstances. I may say that while I listened with a great deal of interest, and while we have all learned a good deal from the remarks which the hon. gentleman has made, I must express some little regret that he referred to a controversial subject in Canada, in regard to which he and I and the vast majority of the people will not agree. The case of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier was somewhat similar to that of the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia. Mr. Letellier dismissed a ministry that had a large majority in both Houses at the time of the dismissal. Mr. McInnes dismissed the Semlin ministry after a vote of confidence in that ministry had been passed by the legislature. In that respect, there is no difference. I do not propose to discuss the question further than to point out that Mr. Letellier took a step which, according to the doctrines laid down by the hon. Minister of Justice, he had no right to take, hence the government of that day were justified in dismissing him from the position which he held.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Just as we to-day, who approved of the dismissal of Mr. Letellier, justify the action of the present government in dismissing Mr. McInnes, he having violated the constitution as explained by the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not refer to Mr. Letellier's case in any way except for this point: I spoke, not as to whether he ought or ought not to have been removed, but to show that, instead of condemning the government, if they thought he ought to have been removed, for not having taken action, parliament advised the government on the subject.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the dismissal of Letellier, under the constitution, was wrong.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I said nothing on that point at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I may be permitted, though a layman, to take issue with the hon. gentleman in reference to the statement he has just made as to the powers of parliament. If parliament thinks proper to advise the ministry, and the ministry take the responsibility of carrying out that advice, I do not understand that to be an infringement of the constitution. We have had many cases of that kind. We had the case of the New Brunswick school question, in which parliament passed a resolution advising a certain course to be taken, and the government took that course, and sent the question which was then at issue, to the law lords of the Privy Council in England, who decided it. In the case of Letellier, very much the same course was pursued, and the government of that day took the responsibility. They were responsible to parliament and to the people, and it was not an infringement of the constitution for the parliament of Canada to say to the government of the day: 'We are of opinion that such a course should be taken.' It is for the government of the day to decide whether they will assume the responsibility of acting on such advice. Hon. gentlemen will remember, also, that on this very New Brunswick school question a motion moved by the hon. gentleman, Mr. Costigan, was carried in the House of Commons, expressing an opinion as to what the government should do. Sir John Macdonald, then leading the government, dissented from that, and did not act in accordance with the instructions given by parliament. He assumed the responsibility of setting that resolution, which expressed the opinion that they should take a certain course, at defiance and parliament afterwards justified the course he took, and the people also sanctioned it. I could dwell upon that at very great length, but I do not propose to do so. Parliament has a right to express any opinion it pleases: it is for the government of the day to say whether they will act upon it or not. I regretted afterwards calling the attention of the hon. gentleman to the case of Sir Edmund Head on the formation of the Brown administration. However, the Minister of Justice declared that Sir Edmund Head, under the circumstances, was not justified. The facts are clear to the minds of all who have any recollection of what was then termed the double-shuffle, when the government of Sir John Macdonald was defeated by a small majority on the vote appropriating fifty thousand pounds for the commencement of the construction of these buildings. He resigned on the ground that parliament had delegated the selection of the capital for united Canada to the Queen. When we use the word 'Queen,' of course we mean the government. The Imperial authorities, or the Queen, decided upon Ottawa. When he asked for an appropriation of fifty thousand pounds to commence these buildings, he was defeated in the House. The sectional interest, were so great that they voted against it. The Quebec interest, the Montreal interest, the Toronto interest and the Kingston interest, all combined to defeat any action, and Sir John Macdonald resigned. Sir Edmund Head called upon Hon. George Brown to form an administration. Mr. Brown, in the course of the negotiations, as the documentary evidence will show, asked for a dissolution before he had formed his government. He was told distinctly by Sir Edmund Head that no dissolution would be allowed him, and the grounds upon which he made that statement and took that position were that they had just returned from the people. It was only a few months—I think it was the first meeting of parliament—after the election, and then, after the government was formed, the present Sir Hector Langevin, then a young member of the House of Assembly, in the city of Toronto, moved a vote of want of confidence in the Brown-Dorion administration, which was carried by 35 of a majority in a small House—only the two Canadas then.—and Mr. Brown, having been told before the formation of the government that a dissolution would not be allowed, that large majority voting want of confidence in his administration, justified the Lieutenant-Governor in the course that he had pursued. According to the doctrines laid down and read from that eminent author, I believe one of the best authors that has ever written on the constitution of England, Bagehot, Sir Edmund Head was fully justified. There was another part of the hon. gentleman's speech that was peculiarly gratifying to myself. When he quoted from Lord Dufferin in justification of the course that he had taken in not dismissing, at the demand of the Liberal party of that time, Sir John Macdonald's government from power on account of what was then termed the Pacific scandal. Though I was not in the government at that time, I felt gratified, because I had taken the same view as the leaders of the party with which I was then connected. Many of us remember the vilification, the condemnation, and the demand for Lord Dufferin's removal because he took the position that my hon. friend now cites with approval. My hon. friend, who was one of the opposition party at the time, now comes forward and justifies the course that Lord Dufferin pursued on that occasion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said nothing about it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Nothing about what?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Lord Dufferin's course.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman said nothing about Lord Dufferin's course, but he quoted from Lord Dufferin's utterances in Halifax and in England in justification of the course which he had taken at the time of the Pacific scandal, and adopted it as the true constitutional course to be taken in difficulties of this kind between the government of the day and his ministry. He laid down the doctrine, plainly and distinctly, that he could consider no other advice than that which was tendered to him by the ministry that was given to him by the people through the parliament of Canada, and if that were true—and I compliment the hon. gentleman on the quotations which he made to prove that it is true—it shows that Lord Dufferin was correct in the course that he took. The hon. gentleman quoted from authorities to show that Lieutenant Governor McInnes had overstepped the bounds of the constitutional position which he held as lieutenant-governor, in justification of his dismissal. I freely admit the hon. gentleman, perhaps, may not have thought there was any one here who knew anything about these transactions. I might take the opportunity to compliment him on his conversion on that point as well as upon many others. As I said to my hon. friend on my right, if I had shut my eyes and did not know the voice, I would almost imagine that it was my hon. friend, Sir John Macdonald, laying down the constitutional doctrine which guided him during the nearly half a century in which he governed this country. I have heard him make almost similar speeches. There were even extracts which the hon. gentleman read from Bagehot, which Sir John Macdonald cited in the Letellier case in the House of Commons when he was condemning the course which the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec had taken. The doctrines which the hon. Minister of Justice has expounded today are the doctrines laid down by that great leader, who was one of the best authorities on constitutional questions that Canada ever had. I was delighted beyond measure to hear the hon. gentleman enunciate the very same views and the same opinions, in almost the same words of Sir John Macdonald, we might say it was the hand of Esau, but certainly it was the voice of Jacob that uttered those sentiments, and I congratulate him heartily, and I thank the hon. member from British Columbia (Hon. Mr. Templeman) for having made this motion in order to bring out the speech which has been delivered, and which will be a guide in the future to those who take the extreme views which have characterized the Liberal party in the past. I am glad that they have arrived at the same conclusions that Sir John Macdonald laid down in the parliament of Canada, for our future guidance. The morning has been well spent, and when the speech of the hon. Minister of Justice is sent forth to the people of Canada, they will have a more distinct idea of how this country should be governed. I can only regret that lieutenant-governors should ever put themselves in a position to compel an administration to dismiss them. Under the administration of which I was a very humble member, we dismissed one, and I think we did right. These hon. gentlemen have followed in our wake in that, as in many other things; they dismissed one and I think they did right. I hope no future government will be placed in a position to dismiss lieutenant-governors for infraction of their duty as such.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—To complete the interesting lecture given to us by the hon. Minister of Justice, I should lay before the House the opinion given by one of our constitutional authorities, on a constitutional question brought up lately in this House, and upon which the hon. Minister of Justice expressed certain views which were in contradiction of that authority. Before touching that question, however, I wish to point out an objection. If the views of the hon. Minister of Justice are correct, the prerogative of dissolution belongs to the Crown, and the hon. minister has given instances in which that power could be used—namely if the by-elections happened to be in a certain direction showing that the government of the day had not the confidence of the people; then the Crown could dissolve the legislature. If a public question of great interest was pressed in parliament, on which the views of the people have not been asked, or are not known, then a dissolution could take place. In the face of those declarations, I should like to know what authority the Prime Minister has to-day to promise another session? Why should the Prime Minister have the authority to promise another session without due regard to the constitutional powers which give to the Crown itself the power of dissolution? Such a promise is never sure to be fulfilled, but it might go with the other promises of the Prime Minister. I want to prove that the Prime Minister, in this instance, is acting against the spirit of the constitution. I come now to the point to which I wish to call the attention of the leader of this House In discussing the other day the act of the late Governor Angers, the hon. Minister of Justice said there was one point in his action which was clearly unconstitutional—that he had dissolved parliament when the British North America Act obliged the legislature of the province to meet once in twelve months. The clause is the 86th section of the British North America Act, which reads as follows:

There shall be a session of the legislature of Ontario, and that of Quebec once at least in every year, so that twelve months shall not intervene between the last sitting of the legislature in each province in one session, and its first sitting in the next session.

That question was discussed at the time, but I had forgotten that a very well known authority had give an opinion on that point—that is Bourinot, and to give my hon. friend an opportunity to throw on a future occasion more light on the subject—not of his own, but of those constitutional authorities—I shall quote what Bourinot said on the matter. It is in a letter dated from Ottawa, December 23, 1891:

My consideration of important and novel questions involved in dissolution of Quebec legislature leads me to conclusion that Crown as represented by Lieutenant-Governor, has right to exercise prerogative of dissolution, under law and constitution. Eighty-sixth section is simply directory, and no legal or constitutional rights can be prejudicially affected so far as I can see at present, but in my opinion, section does not take away from constitutional prerogative of Crown.

I think that settles the whole matter. It answers the only objection the hon. minister had to the act of the late lieutenant-governor, and this answer given by Mr. Bourinot may cause his conscience to be relieved, and his information on constitutional questions to be enlarged.

DEATH SENTENCES OF CAZES AND DUBE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellecny will be pleased to cause to be laid before the Senate:

1. Copies of all telegrams, letters and petitions addressed to the government, and of all communications whatsoever exchanged between any of the members of the present administration and any person whomsoever, relating to the reprieve, to the commutation of, and to the execution of the sentence of death pronounced upon certain individuals named Cazes and Dubé.

2. Copies of the reports prepared and sent to the Minister of Justice by the judge who pronounced sentence of death upon Cazes and Dubé.

3. Copies of the orders in council granting Cazes a commutation of the sentence of death and refusing Dubé any such clemency.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—A motion similar to this, I think, has been adopted in the House of Commons. If the papers come down in the House of Commons—so far as they can be brought down at all—I do not know if the hon. gentleman desires they should be brought down here also.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If there is no difference I do not want them twice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, there will be no difference. The only papers not called for in the House of Commons are those mentioned in the second proposition, copies of reports prepared and sent to the minister by the judges who tried the cases. That is contrary to practice. These are considered confidential and are not brought down without the consent of the judge.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Do I understand they could be brought down with the judge's consent ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They might be brought down with the judge's consent.

The motion was dropped.

REFORM OF THE SENATE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Whether it is the intention of the government to put into execution the promise contained in the programme set forth by the Liberal convention held at Ottawa, in June, 1893, in so far as the reform of the Senate is concerned?
Whether the government intends to begin this reform of the Senate by giving this House a number of representatives in the cabinet equal to that which the former administration had granted?
Whether the government thinks it can continue this reform by ceasing to recruit from one province only the members of the Senate which it takes into the cabinet ?
Whether it is the intention of the government not to stop in the way of reforms, but to continue its work by giving, as the preceding government had done, a French representative among the number of senators forming part of the cabinet?
When will the government begin these reforms?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Providence is engaged in the work of reform at the present time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has nothing to do with the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is mistaken. I would say to the hon. gentleman that the subject of Senate reform will be considered in due time. I hope that that will be satisfactory to my hon. friend. Then he asks whether the government intends to give representation equal to that which the former administration granted. I don't know how many the former administration granted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, the hon. gentleman was not here at the time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I was not here.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose we have equality now ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not aware that for several years there has been a French representative here, and if there is not a French representative, there is one more French representative in the House of Commons than there would be if there was a French member of the cabinet here. My hon. friend will see that the province of Quebec is very adequately and very fully represented in the government and the question of representing the province in this body would necessitate, my hon. friend knows right well, the appointment of seven representatives in this House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. minister is under the impression, apparently, that Hon. Mr. Geoffrion is still living, but he died and was replaced by Mr. Sutherland.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Is that so ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is so. I see the hon. gentleman is not mourning.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (191) 'An Act to amend the Post Office Act.'—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

THE PARLIAMENT GROUNDS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN rose to :

Call the attention of the government to the condition of the grounds surrounding the parliament buildings, and especially of that part of them extending along the face of the cliff overlooking the Ottawa River. And inquire if it is the intention of the government to protect them from further injury?

He said : Just a year ago, I brought before the Senate the conditions of the grounds surrounding these buildings, and especially that part of them along the face of the cliff overlooking the river. I pointed out, on that occasion, the utter neglect of any precautions to prevent the destruction of the trees and shrubs on the slope above and below the Lovers' Walk by the disintegration of the rock, and washing away of the earth. I also drew attention to the fact that, if the beauty of the two groups of trees on either side of this building, east and west is to be preserved, proper and judicious thinning out was absolutely necessary. In answer to these representations, the hon. Minister of Justice certainly gave the House to understand, on that occasion, that steps would be taken without delay to remedy the matters complained of, and I may be perhaps permitted to say also that since that time I have personally urged these views upon two members of the government who at different times have represented the public works, and have received promises, at all events from one of them, that immediate steps would be taken to remedy the defects that I have alluded to. Within the last week or two I believe men have been set to work to rake up the dead leaves and debris of newspapers and dirty papers which disfigure the slope, and the dead branches which have been lying about. In doing so they have done very often much more mischief than good, for I see some of them not only vigorously employed in removing the papers, but raking away the earth from the face of the rock in many places, still further uncovering the roots of the shrubs and trees.

Beyond that, absolutely nothing has ever been done, and as I stated last year, the result will be that a great deal of the beauty of the cliff upon which the parliament buildings stand will be destroyed by the gradual dying out of the trees. The grounds also in every direction indicate want of proper attention. Take, for example, the beautiful hedge which runs round the top of the cliff—in many places there are great gaps which have never been replanted. On the east side there are at least half a dozen of these gaps which are made still worse by an endeavour to save trouble and labour on the part of the men who are employed in raking up the grass and in gathering up rubbish, and who use these gaps for throwing rubbish down the bank below. I half apologized last year for bringing this subject before the House, which, not being political, might not be thought to be of much consequence, but I maintain that the beauty of these buildings and their surroundings is a matter of very considerable importance as it concerns not only the people of Ottawa, but the people of the whole Dominion. We hear it is the intention of the government to commence sundry improvements, making, amongst other things, a drive from the opposite side of the Rideau to the Experimental Farm. It seems to me that while it may be an excellent thing to carry out further improvements of that kind, to beautify the city of Ottawa and its neighbourhood, it is scarcely right that these grounds should be utterly neglected in the way they have been. Any hon. gentleman walking round the cliff will see that in many places the steps leading down the face of the cliff are by no means sound and the railings are broken, and altogether there is an air of neglect and shabbiness that no gentleman would have about his own grounds, and I think, in the case of the ground owned by the government of the country, we should have something better. There is another suggestion which I would venture to make—although it would be a very difficult thing to repair what, I think, is almost an irreparable mischief which has been done to Nepean Point by the construction of the Interprovincial Railway, yet something may be done to render it a less disfiguring object in the landscape, if the company, whose road is now being subsidized, would do something towards covering up portions of the cliff now looking very much like a deserted stone quarry, with sufficient earth to cover the bare rocks so that it could be planted with small shrubs and creepers. It would, to some extent, render that point a less disfiguring object than it is at present. I venture another suggestion. Why should not the care of these grounds be transferred to Dr. Saunders and the authorities of the experimental farm? We would then have it in the hands of somebody who knows something about these matters. I feel strongly that unless the persons employed have some knowledge of arboriculture and landscape gardening, infinitely more mischief would be done than good by the mere pottering about of any of the gardeners who have been employed in the ground up to the present. The assistance of gentlemen like Dr. Saunders and those connected with the experimental farm, who have shown by their work there that they have some knowledge of these matters should be secured. I think if the care of the whole of these grounds were transferred to them instead of being under the charge of the board of works, we might possibly have an improved state of things. I feel half inclined to apologize to the House for bringing this subject forward, because it is one which does not excite any very general interest, but I confess I feel strongly about it, and I feel sorry to see what ought to be a source of pride to the whole Dominion so far neglected that one feels rather ashamed to come here and view the condition of things as they exist at present.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I entirely sympathise with the views which the hon. gentleman has expressed as to the desirability of putting these grounds in proper condition and maintaining that condition. The shrubbery going round the cliff on which this building stands has been cleaned out——

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The cleaning out did more mischief than good.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And it may be as the hon. gentleman has suggested that the workmen have disturbed the soil as well as removed the papers and rubbish collected there. With regard to the other cliff and Nepean Point, it will be difficult to undertake to make æsthetic improvements there while the work is going on and the retaining wall is being erected, but as soon as that work is completed, which no doubt will be at a pretty early day, it seems to me that steps should be taken to put the whole of that cliff in a proper condition. I understand that Mr. Beemer, whose railway is being brought in there, has agreed to do that, and of course it will be the duty of the Minister of Public Works to see that it is properly carried out. I will bring under the attention of my colleague who has charge of that department the observations the hon. gentleman has addressed to the House, and also the suggestions which he has made with regard to putting the care of the work in the hands of the manager of the experimental farm. If a good landscape gardener could be secured to take care of the grounds, there would be occupation for him for some time to come. I entirely sympathize with the view which the hon. gentleman has expressed and I do think that it is of great importance that the natural beauty of this location should be, not only preserved, but improved so far as we can improve it.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—We could hardly make a park of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not necessary to make a park out of it, but as it is a beautiful location, and as the prospect from it is as fine as from any building in Canada, we can do something to prevent it being disfigured and to see that violation is not done to one's æsthetic sensibilities by having it in a state of disrepair.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I am glad to hear what has fallen from the hon. Minister of Justice, and I should like to impress that one point, that whatever is done really ought to be done by some one who has knowledge of that kind of thing.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I am thankful to the hon. gentleman from Toronto for bringing up this matter. He has been persistently urging the case, but I hardly think it is a fair time now, when Mr. Beemer is constructing his work, to call upon him for any improvement. If we allow a short time to expire, we will find that all the improvements will be made.

Hon. Mr. POWER—On the other side.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—All through. I have often thought of the difficulties which the people of the city experience with reference to this park and other parks. There is the Lover's Walk, a beautiful walk, as all hon. gentlemen know. I do not understand why the piles of wood have been left there. They have been there for years, and are a menace to the city; but I hope, now that the city have adopted a course with respect to the fire by-law, that they will insist that no lumber be piled near these buildings. Hon. gentlemen will remember the trouble we had in regard to the Ottawa River and the sawdust. It is as bad now as it ever was and perhaps worse, and still the government do not take the first step towards remedying it. I have brought the matter before the House and have been told that the Act is there, and it is for the people to enforce it. I dissent from that proposition. It is ostensibly in the hands of the government, and they should take steps to prevent that sawdust nuisance. It is still there; everybody knows it, notwithstanding the Act of parliament. What is the use of an Act of parliament if it is being disobeyed in this way? I hope the government will see that the Lover's Walk and all these approaches are not filled up with paper and material of an inflammable character. I did hear that the contract existing with the mill-men with reference to piling lumber back of the buildings had been rescinded. I hope it has been. We want to avert any such catastrophe as happened two months ago. The government will be criminally negligent if they do not perform their duty in a way to reduce the danger from fire occurring. They have been notified time and again, and I hope this will be the last time that it will be necessary to bring the matter under the notice of the House to urge them to prevent this sawdust nuisance. I am informed that the sawdust impeded the speed of the boat to some extent on the trip to Grenville the other day. Should that be so? It is a river under government control, and they should exercise some supervision to prevent this nuisance. All this sawdust will have to be taken out of the river at some time at great expense. It has been a great expense for years and years. I thought last year that it was ended, and that there would be no further trouble. Will the government take the necessary steps to prevent the sawdust nuisance in the future, or do they intend to allow private individuals to become informers and take the steps which should be taken by the government?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is on the statute-book and anybody can take advantage of it.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Yes, but would the hon. minister like to be an informer? Is it not under the Dominion government? Should they not take the necessary measures? They have the appliances. They can put the machinery in motion and no one will say one word, but if a private individual undertook to do it, he would find it difficult to live in the city.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman wants the government to do it.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I want a man to perform his duty. If any duty is cast upon me, I feel the necessity of discharging it, but as an individual I do not want voluntarily to do what other men are paid to do.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It may be brought before the conciliatory board.

Hon. Mr. KERR—When this matter was brought before the House last session I felt personally a very deep interest in it, as other hon. gentlemen no doubt did. I felt that the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Allan) who brought this matter before us had rendered a good service, not only to this House and the governement, but to the whole country, and I am sure that it requires no apology when he repeats and emphasizes it again this year. I look upon these buildings and grounds as perfectly beautiful, and we ought to do everything in our power not only to preserve their natural beauty, but to add to the beauty of the whole situation, including the buildings, grounds and river. They are perfectly unique, and one can scarcely ever look at them without being involuntarily reminded of the words of the poet that 'A thing of beauty is a joy for ever.' Another point in connection with this subject—I do not recollect whether the hon. senator referred to it or not—is the necessity of a railing, or protection around the walk on the river bank. It struck me in walking there that unless one walked very correctly he would be in some jeopardy of tumbling over the precipice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is a walk for sober men.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It is a straight and narrow path.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I felt that is was necessary that some precaution should be taken. I am exceedingly pleased that this subject has been referred to again. People get their impressions, not only of Ottawa, but their impressions of the entire Dominion from this centre of light and leading. And it ought to be so. I feel it is to me a liberal education in itself to contemplate these buildings and grounds, and I hope that the timely and appropriate observations of the hon. senator who has brought up this matter will bear good fruit, and bear that fruit at an early day.

The Senate adjourned.

SECOND SITTING.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Routine proceedings.

THE EMERGENCY RATION INVESTIGATION.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the government a question which I think is of some considerable interest to the people in all parts of Canada, and that is, whether after the investigation which has gone on in the other branch of parliament with reference to the emergency food ration supplied by Mr. Devlin, it is the intention of the government, owing to the evidence disclosed to take any action for prosecuting Dr. Devlin for the fraud he practised on them, giving a worthless article instead of a good article. It is a matter of some concern to the people of Canada, in times of war, when our young men have freely volunteered to go and fight the battles of the empire, to know if they are again called upon that they will be supplied with a ration fit for them in case of emergency. I think, on the evidence given before that committee, the government would be justified in punishing a man who imposed on them as Dr. Devlin did. I do not say it is possible to avoid frauds being perpetrated upon the government, but they should make a fair investigation and find out if a fraud was perpetrated, and, if so, the guilty party should be brought to speedy justice. I should like to know if the government propose to take any action in reference to prosecuting Dr. Devlin if he is found guilty.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have had no discussion with the Minister of Militia upon the subject. I do not know what action he has taken. My hon. friend refers to an investigation had by the committee. I have not myself, being so much occupied, read over that evidence with any degree of care, nor have I noticed whether it covers the whole ground. As far as I remember, the evidence showed that the food purchased was nutritious, that it was not an unwholesome food, but that it was not an emergency food properly so called; that is, that the percentage of nutriment in it was less than there ought to be in food which is intended as an emergency food. Whether Dr. Devlin has in what he has done rendered himself liable to any law in force, I cannot say, because I do not know what are the terms of agreement with the minister, nor am I in a position to express any opinion either upon the majority report or the minority report. If the matter is referred to me on legal grounds, I shall be obliged to consider the contract and the circumstances under which the food was purchased. The impression I got from the evidence was, that a fraud had been practised upon the department in the sale, but I am not in a position to say more than that. It may be the minister intends making a thorough investigation himself. That I think is right, if he feels that there is anything to investigate beyond what appears in the committee's report, and when he seeks advice from my department, I shall be prepared to give it, but that has not been sought from me up to the present moment, nor could I expect it would be during the closing days of the session, when every minister has his time fully occupied.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think hon. gentlemen will admit that the reply of the hon. minister has been a careful one, and almost entirely non-committal, with regard to the subject. It shows at least that the matter is undergoing serious consideration. There is just one point that the hon. minister made where it seems to me he is labouring under a misapprehension. He has called attention to the fact, which I think has been fully established, that this food contained some nutrition, but not enough to entitle it to be regarded as an emergency ration. My hon. friend will remember that under the Adulteration Act it is not necessary to prove that food is non-nutritious or unwholesome in order to pronounce it adulterated. It may be adulterated if it falls short of what is claimed for it either on its label or in its description. In this respect, the food has fallen short, and it may be found that it will have to be regarded as adulterated under the Adulteration Act. I just mention that, because it seems that the hon. gentleman was under the impression that nothing could be seriously wrong if it was not proved to be entirely non-nutritious, although it might fall short of being an emergency ration. Under the Adulteration Act, food which is entirely wholesome may, nevertheless, be declared to be adulterated, and the vendor liable to criminal prosecution.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman knows that food containing more than a certain amount of nutrition is possibly injurious. There may be cases of too great concentration. The human stomach does not differ from the stomach of some other animals in that too high a degree of concentration is injurious.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not a high price.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is another matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not the complaint in regard to the emergency food. The complaint was that they bought an article purporting to contain 60 per cent of nutritious matter, whereas it only contained 16 on analysis, as shown by the report of the government analyst in Ottawa. I do not think anybody complained of its being too nutritious or too strong so as to injure the health of any person. It is a serious question, apart altogether from the culpability of the minister, or those connected with the department. I do not propose to discuss the subject now. It is simply a question whether an article purporting to be an emergency food was palmed off on the government with 35 to 40 per cent less strength than was agreed upon, and whether Devlin did, as the evidence shows, adulterate it, or whether he obtained a certificate or put a label upon it purporting to state what it was, and whether he obtained a label similar to that used, I suppose, by the inventor of the food and by that means palm it off upon the government. It is singular how little things lead to great discoveries. The old adage that murder will out is very well illustrated in this case. Dr. Devlin got his labels printed at the Montreal Herald Office and the printing department of that office, having printed the labels supposing them to be for the proprietor of the true food, sent the account to him and he repudiated it, as he had given no such order. Then that led to the discovery of Dr. Devlin's little trick of imposing upon the government an article for two dollars a pound which he entered at the customs at a value sworn to as being worth thirty cents a pound. That is what the government have to look into, and if they do their duty they will prosecute Devlin for the imposition upon them. It is not for us to discuss whether the government were deceived through their own negligence or not. The simple fact brought out in evidence, and the government analysis, apart from anything else, are sufficient justification to prosecute the man who committed the fraud, and if he can show he did not commit a fraud, then he will disabuse the minds of the people who have read the evidence and will stand well before the public.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—The leader of the opposition, I am sure, knows Dr. Rodier, of Montreal, very well. He is a very good friend of my hon. friend's own party and he told me himself—and when I say that, I know well the responsibility I take in saying anything in this House—that vitaline food stronger than that furnished by Dr. Devlin would be injurious, that he is daily in the habit of buying this stuff for his patients and using it all the time. I declare this solemnly on the floor of this House, knowing full well the responsibility if I said something which was not true. Dr. Rodier offered to come here and declare that under oath. He is a son of Dr. Rodier who was for many years a member of this House. He told me it would be the same as drinking whisky over proof. The same thing would apply to the food. If it were more concentrated than that, and given to a healthy person it would be injurious.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That is to invalids—to his patients—to the sick people. We can understand that concentrated food would be injurious to sick people while in this case we were sending food to soldiers which would be used as an emergency food when they could not get anything on which they could live for a few days. It was sworn to at that investigation that they could not live upon this food except, perhaps, part of a day and the whole question is in a nutshell, could they live on the food or could they not? The evidence brought forward as to Dr. Rodier amounts to nothing. That is only with reference to people getting over an attack of sickness.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Did Dr. Rodier tell the hon. gentleman anything about the price, or that that vitaline contained 14 per cent of proteid and it was sold at two dollars a pound ? A bushel of pease, 66 pounds, gives about 22 per cent proteid. Every farmer in the country would then be in a position if the same government remained in power, to sell their pease to the government at $181.50 a bushel. What is the opinion of Dr. Rodier on that ? I do not see what Dr. Rodier had to do with it. If he was such a valuable witness, why did he not appear and give his evidence and be cross-examined ? But we are not in a position to cross-examine him or the hon. gentleman who speaks for him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not the question. The question is whether Dr. Devlin sold an article to the government purporting to contain 60 per cent of nutritious matter when it only contained 14. The analogy of whisky does not apply at all. It would be just exactly the same as if you purchased highwines, or spirits purporting to be 60 per cent above proof, and it contained but 25 per cent. The question is whether he committed a fraud or not, and if the emergency food were too strong, he could treat it precisely as my hon. friend would treat the whisky—he could put more water in it and it would not do him so much harm.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It was out of kindness to the poor soldiers that Dr. Devlin reduced the percentage so much.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (132) 'An Act to amend the Railway Act.'

(In the Committee.)

On the third clause,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Under the law as it has heretofore stood in filing plans there was a deviation of one mile allowed. Several clauses of this Bill propose to take away from railway companies that latitude, compelling them to file a plan showing exactly where the line is to be constructed, and section a refers to where the railway crosses street railways. Section a reads as follows :

Street railways and tramways, while hereby expressly declared to be subject to such of the provisions of this Act as are referred to in section 4, shall not by reason only of the fact of crossing or connecting with one or other of the lines of railway mentioned in section 306 be taken or considered to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

It brings them within the Act, and it also, so far as street railways and tramways are concerned, includes the tramway built along the Niagara River, which runs from Queenston to Chippewa.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not rise for the purpose of finding any fault with the clause, except that I think the latter point of it is not wide enough. I submit to the minister that this exception should be wide enough to include any electric tramway built in any other part of the country. It should not be confined to the Niagara district. I do not know whether it is the practice in Canada generally, although I believe it is in Ontario, that these electric railways run out several miles into the country. There are electric railways of that kind in Toronto, and they should be excepted in the same way as the street railways in the Niagara district.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no exception.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The first subsection of the clause applies to street railways and tramways.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That takes in everything all over Canada, except the Niagara Falls road.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Are not the railways in the Niagara Falls Park tramways just the same ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is thought better to bring it in so that it would not be regarded as an exception.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Clause 2 refers to the drainage question. In some of the provinces, I know in Ontario, there is a provincial law which governs the construction of drains on railway lands or across railway lands, and this clause is for the purpose of enabling the parties, where they are entitled under the provincial Act, to apply for the building of a drain through the railway lands. They are entitled to apply to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, who will consider the question and take evidence on it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am very glad to see this provision. This question has been before the House on various occasions. It was brought up by the hon. gentleman from Monck, I think, three different occasions, and Bills were passed by this House twice. This provision is not identical with the provisions of the Bill of the hon. gentleman from Monck, but it brings about the same result in a somewhat different way, and I am glad to see something has been done about it.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The substitution is removing from the original clause the right to go over the lands of a person as shown on a plan anywhere within one mile. All through the Railway Act there is a deviation allowed. In filing plans the railway companies are not obliged to adhere to the line as located. They may deflect a little without filing a plan. This proposes to take away from them that latitude. If they want to change the location, they must file a new plan so far as that section is concerned, showing where they do cross a man's land.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 4,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This clause does away with the one-mile deflection altogether. If they propose to deflect in any way, they must file a new plan.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Have any abuses arisen under the law as it stands, permitting a mile deviation ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend will see it is open to a very grave objection. In crossing a man's farm, a railway company may on the plan show the line a mile from the man's barn, and may after all locate the line close to the barn. The same way, it may show the line passing through the woods on a farm, and afterwards it may be located through a field. In the early days of railway building, when plans were not so accurately made, the mile deviation was not considered such a great deflection, but in recent years, in the more thickly cultivated parts of the country, it has been found to be attended with very great hardship.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am quite in accord with the amendment proposed. I only asked whether the hon. gentleman was aware of any abuses having arisen under the existing law ? I can readily understand how abuses could arise. Some abuse, I suppose, must have arisen under the law as it stands ; otherwise this step would not be taken to amend the law.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 8,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing you have a road of one or two hundred miles, can they commence the work under this clause before the plans and specifications and location are completed and filed with the department ? And then, after they have been filed, should it be found necessary to make a deviation of the line, could they go on with that until they submit other plans and profiles to the department ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, but it would only be at the place of deviation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The first part of my question I think is most important. I am not sure but it would be a good provision to prevent charter mongers from dealing in railway charters of this kind if they are not permitted to commence work until the line has been fully surveyed and the plans deposited. Is that the meaning really of this clause ? Referring to charters which we have granted this year, running from Quebec to Lake Winnipeg or somewhere up there, could they possibly commence that line until it was fully surveyed and the plans and specifications filed with the department here ? Would not this clause restrict them to that ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the department under this could insist on the filing of the whole line of survey, but I know that this has not been the practice of the department. They are permitted to go by sections. I presume we would have to leave that somewhat to the discretion of the department, depending on the circumstances. The minister may enforce it if he thinks proper

The clause was adopted.

On clause 10,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This clause authorizes the government to force a railway company that has been incorporated after the first of June, 1899, to locate its station at a point where, in the opinion of the Railway Committee, a station ought to be placed

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Hear, hear; that is a good law.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It is pretty arbitrary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Looking at it from an abstract point of view we would say that a railway company ought to be permitted to place stations where they please.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Suppose a railway which comes within the purview of this clause submits to the Committee of the Privy Council a plan showing the selection of some spot for a station, and the Railway Committee say no, that is not the place for it, we will not approve of it, can they then go to work and locate a station? The Railway Committee say you must put it somewhere else. The railway company say no. There is nothing in this clause to compel them to accept the conclusion of the Railway Committee.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—It is provided for in the location plan filed in the department. The plans indicate where the stations should be.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Under the present law you may file the plans and show where you propose to make stations, but you can change them where you please. This provides that you cannot establish a station until you receive the sanction of the government through the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—It is that way in fact, because you must have extra right of way for a station, and that is shown on the location plan. That plan must be approved, and so the government control it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The government have never interfered in a matter of that kind. If you want to change the location of a station, you have only to purchase the land for it. But you cannot do that under this Bill unless you receive the sanction of the Railway Committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The object of the clause is to give the Railway Committee control over the location of stations. It has been found that railway companies often buy land outside of a town and locate their station and lay out lots. The town or village feel it a great hardship that they have to drive to that place instead of having the station located in the village. This is to give the Railway Committee control where such a thing is attempted.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—We know railways has been forced to go a little distance outside of towns and villages because people ask immense prices for their lands.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is quite true. The Railway Committee would deal fairly with such a case. If they found anything like an attempt to tax the railway unduly, they would say 'you can go outside.' We can always trust the Railway Committee to do what is fair between a railway company and a town.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—Supposing a railway wants to pass through a village, and the village is a mile in length, if the government decide that a station shall be put in such a place, the proprietor of that place will be at liberty to ask any price for his land. Why not give some latitude in the location, so that they can make better terms?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have a latitude. This does not fix any particular spot. The point must be approved of. If the Railway Committee consider that an exorbitant price is being asked for the land at a particular spot, they would not compel the railway company to put a station there. Those conditions will come out before the Railway Committee.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It virtually places the location of all the stations in the hands of the government and takes it out of the hands of the railway companies.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—That is about a synopsis of the position.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—If the government say 'we think this is a proper locality,' although the railway company may have advantages by going a few miles one way or the other, they must adopt the location selected by the government. In a good many cases it may subject a company to exorbitant charges. We all know when a railway company wants land, the price goes up. If this is the case, would not this place the railway company in a very unfavourable position to compel them to accept any site selected by the government, irrespective of their own opinion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You can trust the Railway Committee.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I don't want to trust anybody.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The railway company select the site in the first instance, and submit their selection to the government. Then, if there is any substantial reason why the site selected should not be the site for the station, the government would not approve. The only criticism I have to make on the clause is one not of very much consequence it is, that this right of the government to interfere should be limited to railways which receive assistance from the public. But inasmuch as every railway built in Canada receives that assistance, it does not matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There are railways, or portions of railways, in Ontario, that have never received any assistance either from the Ontario government or this government. There is one some sixty or seventy miles in length running into my own county that has never received any aid. The extension northward, however, is receiving aid by the railway bonuses now being granted, but until that was done, that portion of the road running from Trenton out to Coe's Hill, did not receive either governmental or municipal aid. This clause, where exorbitant prices might be asked, has two sides to it. The railway would leave the place which would be most convenient to the population and go a little beyond that in order to enhance the value of property which they might own themselves. If the road was built out of the money of the stockholders exclusively, without any government aid, there is no reason or right why the government should step in and say, you shall build the station at such a place. but in this case it does not give them that power. The only power it gives them is to approve or disapprove, and if they disapprove then there would be no station built at that particular point. or it would be built at the place where the government suggested it ought to be. We know cases where people have bought up large quantities of land, and asked exorbitant prices for it, and the railways have been driven away from the place because they would not pay the price. We know other cases again where the railways have intimated their intention to locate their stations. Properties have been bought in those localities and settlers have gone there, and then, for their own benefit—yes, for their own benefit, although they did not change the route—they moved it somewhere else. As an illustration of what I am saying, when the Grand Trunk was built in my own town they wanted to put the station at a place more convenient than where it is now to Belleville, but the people wanted £400 an acre for their land, and that land has since been sold for taxes. The company had to put the railway some distance off, where they could get land at a reasonable rate. Those are difficulties occurring all the time. This clause does very little good or very little harm. It provides simply for an approval or disapproval, but it might be used to the disadvantage of some people, and it might be corruptly used to the disadvantage of other people. Friends of the government might be interested in property—I am not saying it is possible, but I am putting a hypothetical case,—and they might influence the Railway Committee of the Privy Council to compel the railway to go to that place and increase the value of their property, and they might have an interest in it themselves or they might not. They might be perfectly honest, but human nature is human nature, and as the hon. gentleman from Rideau says, in matters of this kind they should be made so plain that the most dishonest man or the biggest rogue could not take advantage of it. It is a good plan upon which to deal with public matters, not leaving it to the discretion of any particular individual to do wrong if he felt inclined.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I do not think we should interfere too much with the railway companies. They have undertaken a great work in the country and performed the work well, and now it is sought to put other restrictions upon them. I do not know what the effect will be. It may have a good effect or a bad effect. In their own interests they will do what is right. They will obtain the land they require as cheaply as they can, and I do not think the government should take this excessive power. I do not know what power they have now with regard to the location of a railway station. I suppose they have the right to change the location according to the profiles and plans.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The legislation on the subject of railways is practically progressive legislation, and it has been altered and amended from time to time as experience has shown changes to be necessary. We give to railway companies the powers of expropriation,—of taking other people's land. It is the sovereign power. It is the right of domain that belongs to the Crown as an absolute proprietor. You confer that power upon the company upon what ground? Upon the ground that the company is quasi a public body, and the expropriation is not given in the interests of the company alone, but in the interests of the public, the road being to serve the public, and when a company comes and asks for incorporation and for those extensive powers, the public have a right to attach what conditions they please. Those conditions have from time to time been of a character that can only be exercised through the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. For instance, you want a crossing. The terms upon which that crossing will be given to a town or village is determined by that body. You do not leave the matter to the railway company. You do not say that the party will be absolutely at the mercy of the railway, but you constitute a public body for the purpose of determining between the public and the railway company what shall be done and upon what condition it shall be done. Now, you are doing the same thing with regard to the crossing. A village requires a crossing, and you state whether it shall be underground or overhead. You give the power of determining that to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. You are simply extending that power, giving them a little further power with a view of exercising that authority in the public interests as between the public and the railway company or it may be in the interests of the company as against unreasonable demands by the public.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 11,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is precisely the same in principle, only applying to railways holding their charters from provinces but receiving aid from the federal chest. The condition of the subsidy shall be their agreeing to come in under that clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This goes a good deal further than the other clause. There is a difference between the wording of this clause and the one we have just passed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The object is just the same.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, but the power given to the government it greater. I think it should be just the same. The clause says:

> The company for the time being owing or operating such railway shall when thereto directed by order of the Railway Committee, confirmed by the Governor in Council, erect, maintain and operate a station, with such accommodation or facilities in connection therewith as are defined by the committee, at such point or points on the railway as are designated in such order.

Those are railways who are not under the legislative control of Canada except in so far as they receive subsidies. They are railways incorporated by the provincial legislature, but which receive subsidies from parliament, and I think that the provision should be the same as with respect to railways under our legislative control, that the company should submit the location for the approval of the committee. Here the company have nothing to say in the matter. The committee of the Privy Council, whose report will almost, as a matter of course, be confirmed by the Governor in Council, have the right to say absolutely where the stations should be, and I think it would be better to say that the provisions of the 10th section shall also apply in the case of railways which are not subject to the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada but are subsidized.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But that does not deal with subsidized railways.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I can assure my hon. friend the power of the Railway Committee over the companies chartered by parliament is so strong that there is no danger. Look at the last line which says : 'The company shall erect and maintain a station, &c.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—The difference is that under section 10 the railway company come in and submit a location for approval by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. The initiative is with the company. Under clause 11 the initiative rests with the railway company. I think they should be the same.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Practically they are the same. We must assume they are worked out intelligently.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—It appears to me it gives unlimited powers to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council and very little power to the railway companies : whether it is right or not I cannot say.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The only thing in this clause is that, if a railway company think proper to accept their subsidy under these conditions, they know what they are doing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You make provision for railways exclusively provincial as well as those that come under the Railway Act and exist under a Dominion charter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If they choose to accept the subsidy, their stations are subject to the approval of the railway company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand, but it applies only to railways that are to be subsidized afterwards. You direct where station houses shall be erected on all railways that shall receive a subsidy hereafter, whether they be exclusively provincial or Dominion. That is what the clause provides for.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It applies only to companies holding provincial charters.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why not make it apply to those which have been, or may hereafter be subsidized ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We thought we would not make it retroactive. It would not be quite fair.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 12,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In Ontario we have power given to our courts to sequestrate and sell by order of the Court of Chancery a railway that has gone into liquidation, practically, under a mortgage and the provincial statutes, of course only affecting charters that are granted by the province. This clause proposes to give to the province the power to sequestrate the road under similar conditions, although the charter may have been granted by the parliament of Canada.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—I think the great objection to this clause is that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council will divest themselves and hand over power to the provincial legislature.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—That is precisely what the Bill provides for.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. Clause 12 reads :

89a. Whenever there is in force in any province a law under which a railway which is situate wholly within the limits of such province and subject to its legislative jurisdiction, and in aid of which or any part of which the government of such province has previously granted and paid a subsidy, may be sequestrated or sold for any cause, then, on application by the attorney general of such province, and on good course shown, the Governor in Council may order that any railway similarly situate and subsidized, but subject to the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, may be sequestrated or sold in accordance with the provisions of such provincial law, and all proceedings for that purpose may be validly taken in the same manner and with the same effect as if such last mentioned railway had been before such order, and continued to be thereafter, within the legislative jurisdiction of the said province.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—You allow the province to take proceedings to sequestrate or sell that property. Would it not be much better if that was reserved to the Privy Council of the federal parliament ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the Minister of Justice, for my own information, what power has the Dominion government over railways which are exclusively under the control of the provincial legislature, or what interest ? If they become bankrupt and the laws of the province in which they are situated have the power to sequestrate and sell, why should they apply to the Attorney General of the Dominion asking permission to do that which they have power under their own law to do ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They would not have the power to proceed where the company holds a charter from the Dominion of Canada. They would have power to proceed against a company holding a provincial charter where the company is sequestrated. When they cannot proceed against it on account of the provincial charter, then, on the authority of the Attorney General, this clause authorizes sequestration under the laws of the province.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand that. But how far does that interfere with what are termed, in the constitution, civil rights and property ? Has not the railway when exclusively within the province, though it may have been subsidized by the Dominion government, and built under a Dominion charter, just as much the civil right to hold property as if it were built by an individual ; and if not, in what respect is it removed from that clause of the constitution governing property and civil rights ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What particular provision has the hon. gentleman in view ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Clause 12, where, under certain circumstances, the Dominion government give the power to the local government to deal with private property. Because a railway is as much private property as any other property I would call attention to the objection which is made to this clause. The idea prevails in the minds of some people that this Bill is being introduced for a special purpose, to sequestrate and throw into bankruptcy a certain railway, and thereby deprive creditors of their rights. I hold in my hand a telegram from Toronto, from Mr. G. R. K. Cockburn, president of the Ontario Bank, in which he says :

The last section of Blair's Act to amend the Railway Act, which has gone up to the Senate, is aimed directly at the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, and intended to wipe our claim out. I hope you will see that we are protected in this.

Then here is a similar one sent to my hon. friend from York, from Mr. Barwick, solicitor of the Bank of Ontario :

The last section of Commons Railway Act before Senate to-day has been drawn with apparent intention of enabling local government to sell Baie des Chaleurs and wipe out the claim of McFarlane estate, established by Senate in 1891. Hope this clause will not be allowed to pass.

Then here is a telegram sent to my hon. friend from Missisquoi (Hon. Mr. Baker) :

The last section of Commons Railway Act before Senate to-day has been drawn with apparent intention of enabling local government to sell Baie des Chaleurs Railway and wipe out the claim of McFarlane estate established by Senate in 1891. Hope this clause will not be allowed to pass.

If that be the effect of the passage of this Bill, it would be rather a serious matter for the Ontario Bank, and one can scarcely conceive that such is the intention.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We will let it stand until the next sitting and make inquiry.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman. The bank is deeply interested in claims which it has upon the parties connected with that road. Whether it be against Macfarlane, the original contractor, or whether it be against the road itself, I do not know. I only speak from what has been placed in my hands, and we all know the difficulties which have arisen in connection with that road in the past. The examination before the Senate committee exposed a good many things which are not what we call strictly honest or right, and it would be a great pity that a clause of this kind should pass which would wipe out of existence claims which a bank, or a contractor, or any individual has. If some provision could be made by which these claims should be protected in case of sale, to the extent of the amount, I daresay those people would have no objection.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think that this clause is intended to have the effect indicated by the first telegram which the hon. leader of the opposition read. The hon. gentleman from Rideau will remember that in the case of the North-west Central Railway, there was very great difficulty in securing the sale of that road, just on account of the want of some such provision as this.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—And several other roads.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The creditors of a railway company, who have a lien on the road should have some means of enforcing it, and that is the object of this clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Of course, in this Bill, the prior rights would not in any way be disturbed. The actions would be in the courts of the province. Just now they have no jurisdiction. This proposes to give them jurisdiction. It is very desirable in the case of several bankrupt roads in the Dominion that they should change hands, but in doing so the priority rights of creditors must be preserved. Of course the courts would take congnizance of that, I think we can trust them to do so. We could not, of course arrange that particular parties should have special rights. It would be outside of our jurisdiction. Probably there are mortgages. The mortgages would stand first. There may be second mortgages, and unsecured creditors. You could not give unsecured creditors priority over mortgages. However, we will let it stand until to-morrow, and inquire into it.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—There is a large amount due for wages from them claimed.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—The same objections raised by the Messrs. Macfarlane I would say, apply to other creditors. The object should be to protect the creditors. The hon. senior member for Halifax says he can see no intention in this Bill to wipe out any claims, but if he would refer to the original Bill presented to the House of Commons, he would see it was clearly the intention of parties who had no particular interest in this property, to obtain possession of it at a forced sale, which would be injurious to all the creditors, and I must say I think the legislation is very bad, and that even as amended at present, to hand over to the local authorities the right to sell private property is a step in the wrong direction, and that the legislation would be very dangerous.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I hope the hon. Minister of Justice will look at the point I have raised. One would think, reading this clause closely, that it was an indirect way of accomplishing what was attempted to be done by a private Bill which passed the House of Commons and was rejected by the Senate committee—to get possession of these properties in Gaspé. The Senate committee rejected that Bill because they believed it was interfering with private rights. They did not stop to ask who was connected with it, or whether the man was reputable or disreputable, but rejected it on that ground. One would be led to infer, knowing the other facts, that this clause was intended to accomplish in another way that which the same parties attempted to secure by a private Bill. I would ask the Minister of Justice, when considering this clause, to see whether that is not the intention of this Bill if it should become law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Supposing there was a private Bill introduced in the House to accomplish this same object and it failed, that would be no evidence that this was not proper legislation. My hon. friend knows that when we undertake to act in any province, we act in conformity with the law of the province. For instance, you expropriate lands for railways, but when you come to require a conveyance to be made, it must be in conformity with the law of the province in which that portion of the road is situated, and all that this clause does is this: the railway may be financially embarrassed; that is no reason why it should be allowed to remain for ever in that condition. There may be bonds issued. There may be a mortgage lien on the road. There may be a lien for work by workmen. Now, the order in which these charges are made, I have no doubt, will be in conformity with rights of the province in which the road is situated. The private rights of the parties, whether it be in a railway or some other property, will be in conformity with the law of the province where the right lies. All I see that this clause proposes to do is, if a road were to go into liquidation, if it passes into other hands, it does not take away the right of any private party. It leaves the right of the private party, who had a lien upon the line of railway before to share in the proceeds, in the same order in which their rights existed before. I do not see that that in any way affects the right of a party, because if a road is financially embarrassed, there is no reason why it should remain for ever in that position. You must provide some means by which it may get free of its embarrassment, and that whatever the road is worth, whatever it may bring, will go towards the payment of the claims of those who have claims against it, in the order of their priority. Those who have the first claim would, of course, be the first paid, and so on in their order, until the funds would be exhausted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could the hon. gentleman tell us what induced the government to make this change in the general law?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no change in the general law.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then why is this Bill brought in ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Because the provincial powers could not sell through their courts, in that summary way the property of a company that holds its charter from the parliament of Canada. It is to enable the province, if necessary, to sell or sequestrate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—At the request of what province is it introduced ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The province in which the line happens to be situated.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not what I am asking. I am asking, at the request of what province is this legislation brought in ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At the request of the particular province interested. I do not know that there was any particular case in view.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If this was a provincial corporation, this legislation would not be necessary, but being a Dominion corporation, the enabling power is necessary in order that it may be dealt with in conformity with the law of the province where it is situated.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I remember we had a private Bill dealing with the Baie des Chaleurs railway this session. That Bill gave a new company the right to acquire the existing Baie des Chaleurs road, and also power to parallel that road. If I remember right, those were the principal provisions of that measure, and I know there was a very strong demonstration from the counties of Bonaventure and Gaspé against that Bill, and it was rejected by the Railway Committee of this House. It would seem to me, from the recollection I have of the object and scope of that private railway Bill, that this clause is a part of the same general plan. That legislation aimed at paralleling the road, and in that way forcing the sale, and giving power to this other company to buy it. This Bill would give power to the Attorney General of Quebec to force the sale. It seems to me as if this legislation was intended to fit exactly into that private legislation that was sought for, but which the Railway committee of the Senate refused to give.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The question is this: is it better that when a railroad becomes bankrupt, it should be lying useless there, going to decay or that it be sold and bought in by somebody and revived. Heretofore on different occasions the parliament of Canada has ordered the sale of a road. One of the first I remember was the sale of the railway running from Ottawa to Prescott, and I think the road running to Brockville, by the Court of Chancery. Then I think we authorized the sale of the North-west Central. When a railway becomes tied up by a number of mortgages, claims and liens, in the interests of the public it should be put on a different basis. I do not know what condition the Baie des Chaleurs road is in, but I do not think it has been running very regularly.

The clause was allowed to stand.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill and asked leave to sit again.

BRITISH AMERICA PULP AND PAPER COMPANY'S BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved concurrence in the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (U) 'An Act to incorporate the British America Pulp and Paper Company.'

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTION LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on Bill (133) 'An Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of members of the House of Commons.'

(In the Committee.)

On clause 6, subsection 2,

2. If a member of a provincial legislature, notwithstanding his disqualification as in the next preceding section mentioned, receives a majority of votes at an election, such majority of votes shall be thrown away, and the returning officer shall return the person having the next greatest number of votes, provided he is otherwise eligible.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—What is to prevent a candidate putting up a job of that kind for the purpose of defeating an opponent and securing the election of a third candidate ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The rule is well settled in England, and has been ever since the day of Wilkes, and that rule has been recognized in this country, that if the public knowingly vote for a man who is not eligible for election, they throw away their votes. If a member of a provincial legislature, notwithstanding his disqualifications, received a majority of votes, such majority of votes shall be thrown away, because it is presumed and assumed that everybody knows who the members of local legislatures are. There can be no mistake.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why does not that subclause apply also to members of the council in the North-west Territories ? Do they not occupy a similar position to members of local legislatures ? Members of local legislatures were disfranchised in order to do away with what is called dual representation. It is needless for me to say, I have always been opposed to that : I believe the people should be at liberty to choose as their representatives the men that suit them best. The members of the North-west Council occupy, to the Dominion parliament, precisely the same position as the members of the local legislature, and why should they be allowed to be elected to a seat in the House of Commons, while the members of local legislatures are disqualified.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I suppose members of the North-west Council are excluded by the North-west Territories Act. If they are not, we would have to deal with the subject of the North-west Territories if my hon. friend thinks it desirable.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not particular about it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think we are only dealing in this Bill with the provinces.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, because the law applies to the North-west Territories just as much as it applies to any province. There may be exceptional clauses, but the representatives representing constituencies in the North-west Territories have to come within the provisions of this law just the same as the gentlemen who represent the local legislatures in the provinces.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could the hon. minister point out what would take place in a case like this : a member of the provincial legislature sends his resignation to the Speaker of the House to which he belongs but he does not send it in the proper form. The public are under the impression that he is no longer a member of the legislature. Will their votes be thrown away ?

The CHAIRMAN—There is no form required.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend (hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) will see it is all right. The interpretation Act provides that the word 'provincial' shall include the representative of the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I was putting a question to the hon. minister. A local member sends in his resignation. There is something defective in the form, or the letter does not reach the Speaker in time and he formally remains a member of the local legislature, but the public at large believe that he has ceased to be a member. What would happen if he received a majority of the votes ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If he is still a member of the local legislature, he would be disqualified.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then the distinction made just now has no foundation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What distinction ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the people know or do not know.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not in his case, but that distinction may apply to other disqualifications. A man may have committed some crime which disqualified him under the law. He might have given or accepted a bribe at an election which disqualifies him for any office at any time, and while that may not be known to the public, the votes given to him are not thrown away, but they go to defeat his opponent.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 8,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no difference in this ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the decisions have been that it is not unlawful for a candidate to employ canvassers, but if the canvasser receives money, that disqualifies the agent who has been canvassing for the candidate from voting?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the only penalty?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And that remains as it was?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 12,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is supposed that the Privy Councillors are not fit for the position of a returning officer, deputy returning officer, election clerk or poll clerk. This is the point to which I called attention a few moments ago. It speaks of 'members of the legislature of any province.' Why are not the members of the North-west council disqualified as well?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have just stated that the interpretation clause provides that members of the North-west council are included with members of the legislative assembly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why not mention it?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Because the word 'legislative assembly' is broad enough to include it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The interpretation clause reads:

The expression legislative council or legislative assembly includes the lieutenant-governor in council, also the legislative assembly of the North-west Territories.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 20,

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—With regard to the penalty provided in this clause, for neglect of duty by election officers, while the amount is large enough it does not appear to me that the scope of this section would apply to some difficulty we would have of a local character in the province of Prince Edward Island. There we come to the point that hon. gentlemen will bear in mind that we have open voting, and that there are no lists, and it is provided in the local law that the returning officer shall be subject to a penalty if he should protract the voting or in any way interfere with the progress of the election so as to prevent votes from being recorded, by allowing unnecessary questions to be asked, and there is a penalty fixed for that. I am afraid this section would hardly reach it, and there is another section in the local law where a returning officer is held liable to a penalty if he allows a mob to control the poll, and it is doubtful if section 19 would cover such a case. A word or two would make it clear. If we added in the third line, after the word 'Act' the following:

Or the provincial Act.

Possibly, as there are some other clauses dealing with a kindred subject, it might be allowed to stand, but I raise the point at this stage.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think this is sufficient as it is, but I will let it stand, and if my hon. friend wishes to go back with a view to reconsidering afterwards I will not object.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 21,

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why are the words 'if there are any' inserted in this clause?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Because in the North-west and in Prince Edward Island there are no voters lists prepared at all.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose the lists of this year are not ready yet?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it is not that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It might be construed in that way.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In most of the provinces there are voters' lists. In some provinces there are none. In Prince Edward Island there are none, and therefore we have inserted 'if there are any,' because you cannot provide for voters' lists in provinces where there are none.

The first subclause was adopted.

On subclause 2,

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I suggest a small amendment to this clause. It deals with oaths. It reads as follows:

The instructions referred to in subsection one of this section shall contain forms of the oaths referred to in sections 65, 66 and 68 of this Act, and in the case of returning officers in the province of Prince Edward Island.

Then I propose to insert after the word 'Act':

Having been made applicable to the election being held.

It will be remembered that in the Dominion Elections Franchise Act in 1898, the closing section provided that it shall be lawful for the Governor in Council to issue as schedules to that Act the provincial forms of oath, having made them applicable to the election being held. That is repealed by this Bill, but that provision is included in section 66, but does not do it as effectually as it was done in the Franchise Act. The object is to provide that the Governor in Council, in issuing the instructions shall make these oaths applicable, that the deputy returning officer would not have anything to do with it, but he should have the oaths made applicable and sent to him in that way. If it were left to the deputy returning officers, they might wilfully or ignorantly present a different oath to the different men. If this were put in, it would settle it, and there would be no possibility of any trouble at the poll.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not like the wording of my hon. friend's suggested amendment. I think the effect of the clause as it is meets the objection of my hon. friend. His amendment is very awkwardly framed. It would read better in this way:

Having been made applicable to the election when held.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It cannot be applicable at any other time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think it amounts to the same thing.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—That provision should come in after the reference to Prince Edward Island, because putting it in where the hon. member suggests makes it refer to those sections of the Dominion law

Hon. Mr. MILLS.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No. The oaths referred to in sections 65, 66 and 68 are oaths that belong to Prince Edward Island, and therefore it is unnecessary to make it any more specific than it is.

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It was my intention to move another amendment but, on close examination, I see it is not necessary in the form which I proposed. I was going to suggest that after the word 'provincial law' the following words be added 'and Franchise Act of 1898.' There is no voters' lists in Prince Edward Island, and the officers have to make their lists on election days, and it would be necessary that they should have a copy of the Franchise Act, but, on looking over the Franchise Act, I think it essential that it should be furnished to all the returning officers in Canada. It deals with cases where there are voters' lists, and says so little about cases were there are none, that it would be of little use in Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is furnished invariably along with the Election Act?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is not so provided in this Act.

The subclause was adopted.

On subsection 3 of clause 22,

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice the meaning of the word 'or of any part thereof.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In some places they would not need a full list. In some cases the lists are made out to the provinces, and would take in an area that would probably only take in a part of the federal list.

The subclause was adopted.

On clause 41, subsection 'e':

On a poll being granted, the returning officer shall * * * * * * (e.) Furnish each deputy returning officer with a sufficient number of ballot papers (all being of the same description and as nearly as possible alike), to supply the number of voters on the list of such polling district, and with the necessary materials for voters to mark their ballot papers,—every ballot paper so furnished by the returning officer being stamped by him with a stamp furnished to him for that purpose by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, the stamp being so placed on the ballot paper that when the latter is folded by a voter the stamp can be seen without the ballot paper being opened.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—It seems to me the stamp should be in the custody of some other person than the returning officer, and the returning officer should have the ballot stamped by such other person. For instance, I would suggest that the stamp be sent under seal to the county judge, and let the returning officer go there and get his ballots stamped by the judge, because, as I know, in some of the late elections in Ontario the returning officer appointed persons as deputies who were not known to him and under fictitious names, and a great many other things of that kind occurred. It might happen, during the time the returning officer is stamping these ballots, that he might unintentionally turn to look out of the window for a moment, and a person use the stamp upon bogus ballots and carry away some of them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That cannot be.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—I have been a returning officer very frequently. I contend that some person outside of the returning officer should have the custody of the stamp. I would not object to the ballots being furnished from the department here, to each constituency if they were stamped by the clerk of the Crown here before they were sent. They could not then be duplicated, because each deputy returning officer has to give a receipt for the number of ballots he receives, and has to account for them. But that is not the question. There may be ballots outside of that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The paper is sent from Ottawa. They cannot procure the paper otherwise.

Hon. M. McKINDSEY—If the stamp is to be at all a security against frauds of that kind, it should be in the custody of some person outside of the machinery of the election. I think myself that the best prevention of frauds in election would be for the authorized scrutineers, who are permitted to go into the polling booths by each of the parties, should, with the returning officer, put their initial on the ballot papers. Then there would be no possible chance for frauds of that kind. That would be the best prevention. If not, I think the stamp should be sent to some other person and let the returning ocffier go there and get his ballots stamped.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—What will be on the stamp ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Bill does not provide except the name of the constituency. We do not want to make the law so stringent that we cannot hold an election.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I think we have a perfect law in the province of Quebec, but there is this danger : when an elector comes to vote, the deputy returning officer, or the returning officer himself, signs his name on the counterfoil. The elector puts on his cross, folds the ballot up and hands it back to the returning officer, who tears off the counterfoil. There is one danger, if the returning officer, or deputy, is not honest, he may beforehand have one of these ballots marked and change it afterwards. But this might be prevented by requiring the representatives of the candidates to sign the ballots at the same time as the deputy returning officer. Then they could not change them. I think the proposal was made, but the objection was raised that it would take too much time. That is no valid objection, because if each of the representatives had a stamp, it would not take more than a second for both to put on their stamps.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is the returning officer who stamps, and the deputy returning officer receives the stamped ballot. The initials on the ballot are initials of the deputy returning officers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Bill makes provision that the ballot paper shall be provided at the Bureau ; that it shall be waterlined paper—paper that cannot be obtained anywhere else in Canada. The proposal first was to print the ballots here, but it was found to be impracticable, because we would have to know the names of the candidates, and they would have to be sent to remote distances. The printer who prints will have to account for all the paper he receives and delivers over, so that there will be a check on all the ballots. The returning officer must return all unused ballots. All the ballots have to be numbered, and they are to be in packages of 25, 50 and 100, and the unused ones must be returned, so that it would be quite impossible for other ballots to be substituted.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—What is the object of having the stamp on ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is an additional protection.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—It is a protection all right enough, if put in proper hands. I only submit the suggestion. I know how these things have been manipulated before. I think if a stamp is to be used as a matter of precaution, it should be in the hands of somebody else besides the returning officer. If the Minister of Justice would come to the conclusion to allow the scrutineers to endorse the ballots before the voters receive them, there will be no necessity for any further precaution to be taken. That would be really settling the whole question: if they were allowed, in counting the ballots afterwards, to see the ballots, and see that they are right, then there could be no possible substitution of false ballots.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—These matters were very fully discussed when this Bill was prepared. One of the reasons for not adopting the system which the hon. gentleman suggests was, we thought that too much time might be consumed, and that if the ballots were received already stamped, and the deputy returning officer initialled them before they were given out to be marked by the voters, and had to account for the total number that he received, the security was as complete as it was really necessary it should be.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—That is all right enough, but if it is necessary to have precaution at all, let us use our best endeavours to make it perfect, and if it is necessary to have these ballots initialled in the morning, let it be understood that these two scrutineers shall appear before the deputy an hour before the polls open, and initial the ballots. If that is going to remedy an evil that has existed before, let us make the proper provision. My opinion is that the stamp will not be of any use, as intended to be used in this clause. I cannot see any reason why the scrutineers, who are authorized to be in the polling booths, should not initial these ballots with the returning officer.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The less machinery you have about these elections the better.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—That is not machinery.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Excuse me, it is machinery. The stamp shows that the ballot comes from the returning officer. The remedy suggested by the hon. gentleman from Halton (Hon. Mr. McKindsey) is that in order to secure greater certainty that nothing is wrong, the scrutineer should come an hour beforehand. Every hon. gentleman knows that frequently there is a scrutineer for only one party present.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Sometimes none at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And sometimes no scrutineer, and it would involve a great deal of additional trouble, and as far as I can see would not give additional security. The fact that the stamp is on the ballot shows that it is a ballot which has come from the returning officer, and that is all you need to know.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—If the scrutineers are there, I should think they ought to have the right to initial those ballots if they want to, so as to identify them when they are counted. The fact of the matter is, the stamping of these ballots does not prevent fraud. There is no reason why that stamp could not, in a fraudulent way, be put on duplicate ballots printed for the purpose of fraud and the original ones destroyed, and the fraudulent ones used, which it is well known has been done. If they can get the stamp on fraudulent ballots, it is no protection. But if you place the stamp in the hands of the County Judge, and the returning officer has to go to him to get the ballots stamped, then the fraudulent ballots cannot have that stamp on them; but if that is not done, there is no protection. If the candidates do not choose to put scrutineers in the booth, they must suffer the consequences of their neglect.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The hon. senator from Halifax seems to think there is too much machinery about this. The object of the hon. gentleman from Halton (Hon. Mr. McKindsey) is to prevent the use of 'The Machine.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman's idea is sound if he can carry it out in practice. The object of the Bill is to prevent frauds such as have been practised in the past, and if any one can obtain a stamped ballot by any means at all, he can practice the same frauds that have been practised in the past, and which have been exposed lately, by what they call 'switching ballots,' and when we come to that clause, I shall make a suggestion in order to avoid that kind of fraud as much as possible. One of these clauses provides that the ballot shall be held in the hands of the returning officer when it is handed to him, and torn off in the presence of the voter, and also of the agent, but there is nothing to compel the returning officer to expose that ballot after he has torn off the counterfoil, so that by switching, that we have heard of lately, a man might have a false ballot up his sleeve, and put the wrong ballot in the box.

I think a few words will obviate that difficulty. This is all in connection with this question now before the House, and another thing I shall propose to the minister when we reach the clause, in order to preserve the purity of elections, as far as possible, is to have the ballot-box so placed that the candidates, the agent, or any one on behalf of the candidates, or the voter, shall see that the ballot is put in the box. I will give an illustration when we reach it, and give my reasons for it. If the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Halton (Mr. McKindsey) should be carried out, that the ballots should be stamped by the judge of the district and sent to the returning officer already stamped, it would prevent to a very great extent improper acts being done by the returning officer. It may be all very well to say returning officers will not do that. We know cases where the returning officers have actually lent themselves, whether designedly or not, I am not going to say, to the appointment of deputy returning officers who were not known, and without taking the oath perpetrated these frauds. I know in my own county an attempt was made with the sheriff, when he had the writ in his hands, to appoint strangers he did not know, and whom nobody else knew, but they were sent there for a purpose. That was at the last election. He is a strong partisan of my hon. friend opposite, but I believe he is an honest man. As soon as he heard, accidentally in a bar-room where he happened to be, that these things were to be perpetrated, he refused to allow the papers to go out of his hands, and he made the appointments himself. If he had done what some other sheriffs have done, he would have placed the papers in the hands of dishonest men, and the result would have been the same as we have heard of in other elections. If the judge had the stamping of these, and not allow the stamp to go out of his hands, and then hand them to the returning officer, these little ballot-boxes containing 250 in each division, they would be stamped by the sheriff, and no one else would have the stamp, and I think it would be a good provision, but you would have to alter one or two clauses to meet that case.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—If the hon. minister think it is not practicable to adopt that suggestion there is no use in having them stamped.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It might be practicable in Ontario where they have the county judges, but I do not think it would do in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Take British Columbia or the North-west Territories, where there are several thousand square miles and not half a dozen judges, supposing the judge was away on leave of absence at the time, while your election is being held, it could not be worked.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The distance would not affect it, because if they were sent to the judge of the Caribou district, he would stamp them and hand then to the returning officers. They have to be sent from here in any event.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The judge might be three hundred miles away.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Extra precautions are being taken for the protection of the ballot. In section 48 we have the description of the ballot-paper. It has to be furnished by the Queen's Printer, bound in certain form, and the printer's name has to be on each ballot, and then there is the printer's affidavit setting forth the description on the number of the ballots, and the fact that no other ballots have been supplied by him to any one else. Those are precautions which prevent any extra ballots being printed for the operations suggested by the hon. leader of the opposition.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I admire the hon. gentleman's simplicity.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I suffered from the ballot switching process myself long before I came to this House. In fact, I think the first place the ballot switching was discovered was in Macdonald, where I lived.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, we have plenty of it in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—And the operation was not by holding it up the sleeve, but by switching it on the table. I know there are additional precautions taken here, because formerly the printer furnished his own paper and kept no particular trace of it.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—Supposing the question of stamping the ballots is not approved of, what is the objection to the scrutineers, who are always on hand, putting their initials to the ballot ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Supposing they are not there ?

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—But if they are there ? If one or the other party choose to have a scrutineer, what is the objection to having the scrutineer initialling the ballot ? There could not be substitution then.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There cannot be any substitution under this arrangement. If my hon. friend will allow the Bill to go to a certain stage, he will see that there can be no substitution.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to scrutineers, in Nova Scotia at any rate, in a great many cases, where a deputy returning officer is known to be an upright, honest man, the two parties trust to him and do not put in scrutineers at all.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—They suffer, that is all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Ontarions must be immoral ; they are always suspecting evil.

The subclause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I propose to add to clause 41 the following as subclause 2 :

The stamp referred to in paragraph 'E' of this section shall be specially designed and made for the purpose of each election, and shall be forwarded by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to the returning officer so as to reach him on or about the day of the nomination of candidates. It shall show the names of the electoral district and the year of the election, and shall be of such design that an impression made from it shall be readily recognizable.

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 45,

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I move to strike out the words 'screens, &c.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They only cost five cents.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, more than that. They could be folded and put in the ballot-box.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They are just pieces of cotton.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is provided in another part that they shall be put in charge of the postmaster, or some other official.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—At the end of five years it is suggested that they should be put in the hands of some postmaster, who shall be accountable for them at the next general election.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Somebody might.

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause, as amended, was adopted.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill and asked leave to sit again.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (155) 'An Act to amend the Militia Act.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

THE DECENNIAL CENSUS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is it the intention of the government to bring down a Census Act this year ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not aware that it is. That is an administrative matter. I I have not spoken to the Minister of Agriculture.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The only reason for asking that question is to ascertain whether the same system is to be adopted in taking the census next year, that was adopted under the late government.

The hon. gentleman will remember that there was a great difference of opinion as to whether it should be de facto or de jure. The system adopted I know was condemned by the opposition at the time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And will be condemned by the hon. gentleman himself.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like the hon. gentleman not to judge others by himself because it is very unsafe. I do not think the opposition in this House—I am not saying anything about the other House—have objected to anything which they have once advocated. It is a fair question and the hon. minister might answer it to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will answer to-morrow.

The Senate adjourned.

DOMINION ELECTIONS BILL.

HOUSE AGAIN IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved in Committee of the Whole in consideration of Bill (133) 'An Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of members to the House of Commons.'

(In the Committee.)

On clause 48,

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I propose to make some verbal changes in this section. At the top of the next page after the word 'counterfoil' I propose to add the words 'and a stub.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I notice that it says, 'shall also be provided with a blank counterfoil and a stub,' in form P. Turning to form P, I see it shows where the counterfoil is to be, but not the stub. Therefore, form P would have to be amended in order to show where the stub is to be.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We can consider that when we come to form P.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This has reference to the ballot paper. I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen to another form of ballot. I do not know whether the government has had it under consideration or not. It was put in my hand yesterday. I do not know whether it is too late to adopt it. This ballot is patented by some reverend gentleman in Cornwall, or somewhere in Glengarry.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We had that before us and considered it when the Bill was being prepared.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to be a system by which the intention of the voter would be better assured than under the proposed system. If the government have decided against it, then it is not necessary for me to discuss it. The principle of this ballot is described in a letter which I have here. On these ballots it would make no difference where the mark was made, so long as it was made anywhere on that part of the paper where the candidate's name appears, and there is no other place unless you put it on the top of another candidate's name. Then every ballot paper would have a number on it, number 2, or 22, and when it is selected by the returning officer to hand to the voter, it would be taken indiscriminately from the box—they would all be thrown in. Then you tear off the number 22 when the voter returns with his ballot folded. Then if you see it is 22 like the counterfoil which the returning officer retains, you know it is the original ballot, and it is put in the ballot box. It might be said that you could print these just the same as another ballot, but the fact of your selecting the ballot indiscriminately, no one knows, not even the returning officer until he takes it out of the box, what number is to be given to this voter. So that if you had a quantity of them numbered, he would never know whether it was 22 or 522 he was going to get. It seems to me to be a good protection. I bring it under the notice of the government because, having looked at it casually and for a short time, I think there is a great deal of merit in it, and it is the best system to ensure the purity of the ballot. I bring it under the notice of the government and it is for them to say whether they should adopt it or not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This has been considered by the members of the government, and it has also been considered by the House of Commons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Was it discussed in the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. I thought very highly of it myself, and endeavoured to get it adopted. At one time we thought we could have adopted it and have it put in an ordinary Bill, and have the ballots numbered in the Printing Bureau. It was represented that they could not number them in the country printing offices, the numbers being too high, and the only way was to have them printed in the Printing Bureau. That was found not to be possible, in consequence of the wide distances between the constituencies. It would be impossible to get within seven days the names of the candidates and have them printed, and the ballots sent out. And it was said the higher number could not be printed in a country printing office.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Whoever said that, did not know anything about it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was said that they had not the numbering machines to do it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not require number machines. You put the ballots through the press.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I tried to have it adopted and the House of Commons said it was impossible.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not necessarily require a numbering machine.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Who was the inventor of the one that has been adopted?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has grown out of the discussions on the subject.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—It appears to me the ballot the government have adopted is the result of patented ballots.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it was suggested by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in 1896.

The clause as amended was adopted.

Subsection 3 of clause 48,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would call attention to the weight of the paper. This subsection reads:

3. The ballot shall be printed upon thick writing paper of the following weight: if foolscap paper is used, it shall be of a weight of not less than seventeen pounds to the ream; if large post paper is used, it shall be of a weight of not less than twenty-nine pounds to the ream.

Now, whether the large post is meant or whether it should be royal or some other size that would justify the 29 pounds is not clear. Octavo weighs 8 pounds to the ream, that is called post, I asked Mr. Young of the Stationery Department to bring me these samples and to give me the weights. If this post paper is of the size now exhibited, and is to weigh 29 pounds, it would be equal to pasteboard. If, however, you take foolscap, which is to be 17 pounds, you have a much larger size and a much lighter paper.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I would make a suggestion, if it is practicable; all the paper furnished should have a slight tint of colour. It would be a greater protection than anything else.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It has to be water lined.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Why would it not be an additional advantage to give it a shade colour?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was going to suggest this to the hon. gentleman if he would accept the amendment to-day:

All ballots to be printed upon the same weight, colour and quality of paper.

This would prevent the possibility of having a recurrence of what took place in the West Huron case. It was shown before the committee that the ballots which were supposed to be bogus, and which were bogus if we believe the evidence, were printed on a different quality and shade of paper, and as the government will have to furnish this paper, it would be well that it should be of one weight, one quality and one colour.

The subclause was allowed to stand.

On clause 48,

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I propose to strike out subclause 5, of clause 48, and substitute the following :

The ballot papers shall be numbered on the stub and shall be bound or stitched in books, containing 25, 50 or 100 ballots as may be most suitable for supplying the polling districts proportionately to the number of voters in each.

That is to prevent a great deal of waste that would take place in the way of unused ballots if there were 250 in every book.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I think there is no objection to that. Sometimes a ballot is spoiled.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There will be plenty of ballots sent.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why not say : 'or 250 as the case may be' ? Because then you would only want one book in a division where the full number resided.

The amendment was adopted.

On subclause 6,

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That word 'printer' is too loose an expression. He is the man who sets the type. I think it would be better to insert the name of the office, say the Freeholder, or the Glengarrian.

Hon. Mr. POWER—How could the Glengarrian file an affidavit ?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The proprietor could, but the printer may be only a boy with no stake in the country, and he would not be particular in what he declared. There would be no guarantee about it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not simply a guarantee, but he becomes the party who takes the affidavit, and if any difficulty arises he may be summoned as a witness.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—He may be in the United States or South Africa at the time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How would you meet a case where it is done at a job office ? There are those offices in every town and city.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Some one is head of the establishment.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—It says that no other ballot shall be supplied to any one else, but he could supply one an hour afterwards to some one else.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We might say : 'or that he has printed no more than he has supplied.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is this difficulty about it. He may be printing a thousand ballots and may spoil some of them. We might say : 'And that he had printed no more, and those that were spoiled were destroyed.' I know that I gave positive instructions that every spoiled sheet that went through the press must be destroyed instantly, burned, so that there would not be a possibilitiy of it getting out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—All the paper must be accounted for, and if there is any spoiled ballot, it would have to be returned with the residue of the paper.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would suggest to the minister that there may be a little difficulty with respect to subclause 7, which reads as follows :

7. The printer shall, upon delivering the ballot papers to the returning officer, file in his hands an affidavit setting forth the description of the ballot papers so printed by him, the number of ballot papers supplied to such returning officer, and the fact that no other ballot papers have been supplied by him to any one else.

I think that some such word as 'similar' should be inserted before the words 'ballot papers,' because the printer may print ballots for two or three counties, and the printer cannot make an affidavit that he has not supplied any ballot papers to any one else.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, he could.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In Halifax one office will print the ballot papers for four or five counties.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—They would not be the same ballots in the different counties.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He is only swearing with reference to that county.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The names of the candidates would be different.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think there is some force in this. A printing office in Toronto may print ballots for the four divisions of the city of Toronto, and print ballots for all the polling subdivisions in York east and York west.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think that that would make any difference.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The intention is good.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He is swearing with reference to each constituency.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the hon. minister not adopt the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from New Brunswick and add: 'And the fact that no other ballot paper has been supplied by him or will be.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not the practice to swear prospectively as to what you are going to do.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, yes. You swear that you will not do so and so.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—If he were a dishonest man he might print further ballots and give them to the returning officer himself. We might strike out the words, 'or any one else.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think it is necessary.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Suppose the printer is called upon to print the ballots for West Toronto, and he prints them: if the suggestion of the hon. gentleman is adopted, he would swear he would not print any other ballots, and that would hinder the same printing office from printing ballots for Centre Toronto.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—He does not swear he will not print them, but that he will not deliver any.

The subclause was adopted.

On clause 49,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to know if there is any provision in this Bill for the case of the Printing Bureau being burned. It is a possible contingency, and there should be some provision made for supplying the ballot papers in case the Government Printing Office was destroyed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, no. The Act does not provide that they shall be printed at the office on Nepean Point. If that office should be burned, the Government Printing Office might be located in some other place.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The government could constitute any office a government printing office.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 67,

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—There is no reason why the clerk of the candidate should not act as agent.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You might as well allow the candidate himself to act, as allow his clerk.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 64, subsection 3,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to point out a difficulty which will arise in cities and towns where there is a list of registered voters. I have already called the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to it; whether he takes the view I desire to have embodied in this clause, I do not know. Subsection 3 reads as follows:

3. If the elector's name is found on the list of voters for the polling district of the polling station, he shall, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, be entitled to vote.

That is the embodiment of the principle of the whole Bill—that is, that every elector shall have an opportunity to vote. There are certain regulations and restrictions which govern that. If you turn to clause 65, you will find that an elector may be required to take the oath of qualification. Take the city of Toronto, which has four divisions—I think what I am pointing out will only affect cities and towns that have a list of voters on the principle of registration. Bear in mind, our present law provides that in the city of Toronto, or any town where a registration has to take place, if the voters' list be not over one year old, it shall be used for the purposes of the election. The Ontario law provides that before a general election a registration shall take place at least ten days before the polling. When the oath is to be administered to the voter, it compels him to swear that he is a resident of the division in which his name appears on the voters' list. Now, supposing a Dominion election takes place and the voters' list is eleven months old, or eleven months and twenty-nine days, that would be the list of voters that would have to be used for the Dominion election. There is another provision, however, in the Ontario Act which recognizes the position of the leader of the opposition—something unusual I admit in legislation. The provision is of this character, that if the Premier of the province and the leader of the opposition think that voters' list is too old, and that there have been many changes in the different divisions, they can jointly, if they agree, ask for another registration, but that must take place before the ten days.

The principle of this Bill and the principle of the Franchise Act is that every man shall have a vote. In the city of Toronto if a man moves across Dufferin Street, which divides the two electoral districts, after the registration has taken place, if he goes from the north to the south side of the street, he is deprived of his vote. That cannot be the intention of the law, particularly when you read subsection 3, of section 64, where it declares that the elector's name shall appear on the list of voters for the polling district of the subdivision, he shall, subject to the provisions of the law, vote in the district. I want to add an amendment to the law so that any voter who moves from one division to another would not be deprived of his vote. The amendment I suggest would be that he must continue to be a resident of the city or town in which he is to cast his vote. In another clause it makes a special provision for changing the oaths to meet the particular circumstances that may arise, particularly in Prince Edward Island, so that the elector shall not be deprived of his vote. I hope that I have made the point sufficiently clear, that what I fear is that this would deprive electors of their votes in a large city like Toronto—it would not apply to Montreal, because there the principle of registration of manhood suffrage does not exist.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would apply to all the county towns in Ontario.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It applies only to Ontario, because the Ontario law provides for the registration of voters in cities and towns, but now in the counties. I have reason to believe, from what I have heard, that this amendment would not be objectionable to the gentleman who introduced this Act in the House of Commons, but that they did not wish to deal with it owing to lack of time and that it might be dealt with in the Senate. I propose to add to section 64 the following:

(6) If the name of any person is found on the voters' list to be used at any polling subdivision of an electoral district situated wholly or partially within the limits of a city or incorporated town, and if, between the time when such list came into force for the purpose of a Dominion election and the polling had at such election such person has changed his residence from one part of such city or town to another part thereof, then, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the provincial law as applicable under the Election Franchise Act of 1898, or under the Act to such election, such person shall be not disqualified from voting in such polling division.

(7) From any oath which any such person offering his vote at such election may be required to take, there will be omitted any statements as to residence which he cannot, by reason of such change of residence mentioned in the next preceding subsection, truthfully make, and instead of such statement the following paragraph may be added to such oath:

That you are now actually a resident of and domiciled in the city or town as the case may be.

I point out again that while subsection 3 gives the elector the right to vote, clause 65 provides that a certain oath be administered to the voter, and he could not truthfully take that oath if he had moved from one division into the other. I have reason to believe that this is not objectionable to the gentlemen in the House of Commons who have the matter in charge. It will preserve to hundreds their right to vote. I am told in a large city like Toronto it may preserve the vote of perhaps a thousand young men. There is a law in Ontario that they should have the right, and I do not think we should do anything to deprive them of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would say to the hon. gentleman that of course it is strictly true of the provincial law with regard to residential qualification. A party lives in one part of a city and his name is entered on the voters' list in that electoral division. Before the period for election comes he moves into another division. The hon. gentleman says it is unfair that he should be deprived of the right to vote, notwithstanding his having gone elsewhere and gone into another division. It seems to me the logical amendment would be to see that his name is put on the list if there was some provision in the law of the province by which his name could go on the list of the district into which he has moved. I think that would be a better amendment than the one suggested by the hon. gentleman. But there is a further difficulty. Supposing a man is living in the city of Toronto and he moves from one side to another side of a street which is the dividing line between two electoral divisions, he ceases to be a resident and so ceases to be qualified to vote, under the provincial law, in the district in which he was registered. But my hon. friend does not propose that, if he goes into the township of York, outside, that he should be entitled to vote, and yet why should the one man be disqualified permanently any more than the other, if it is necessary that his name should be on the list? Then, take another case, which is not an uncommon thing among those engaged in labouring, and who are income voters on the voters' list. Here is a county divided into two electoral divisions. He is a resident of one at the time the voters' list was prepared. He ceases to be a resident of that division and moves into another electoral division of the same county. My hon. friend does not propose to give him a vote, although on the principle my hon. friend suggests, he would be as much entitled to a vote as the one for whom he does undertake to provide. But the case to which my hon. friend refers, and for which he wishes to make special provision, could not arise in the coming general election, because there is no voters' list, so far as I know, in any one of the county towns, or in the cities, that would be enforced or upon which a vote would be taken. A new list will be absolutely necessary in all those cases, so that the grievance for which my hon. friend undertakes to make provision is not a grievance which could arise at the general election which is before us, because in all these cases it would be absolutely necessary, under the law as it stands, to make a proper provision, to prepare a list so far as the manhood suffrage vote is concerned to which my hon. friend refers. I hope the hon. gentleman will not press the amendment at this moment. If he desires to press it, I would ask him to let it stand till the afternoon session so as to give me an opportunity of discussing it with some of my colleagues in the House of Commons. The Senate will bear in mind the fact that this is a measure relating to the constitution of the House of Commons, and in which, of course, the House of Commons are chiefly interested. The amendments we have been making have been amendments not to alter the principle of the Bill, but for the purpose of making its provisions more clear. My hon. friend makes a motion which will, to some extent, alter the principle of the law and if he desires to press it I will let this clause stand till the afternoon.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no objection to accede to the request of the hon. gentleman. Probably he has not had time to consult his colleagues.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I have not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But if I were to enter into the objections which he has taken, I would object to the whole Franchise Act in the province of Ontario. I do not believe, and I never did believe, in the propriety of the one man one vote principle, and I would go further and say that I believe a man ought to have a substantial interest in the country to give him a vote.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then my hon. friend should not press this amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The fundamental principle of this Bill is to carry out the intentions of the law as it stands upon the statute-book in the different provinces. There is no question about that. Then what is the principle that guides and actuates the statesmen in the province of Ontario? Every man who is of age shall have a vote. They restrict him to residence in the electoral district, and my amendment would provide that a man shall not be deprived of his vote if he happens to move across the street. It does not apply to electoral districts outside of cities or towns. Nor can the difficulties arise in counties or townships. If a man moves from one township to another, or one lot to another, he may live in the first concession of a division, or the tenth concession, but still he retains his vote.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not if he gets into another division.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman need not have told me that,

I did not say that. The hon. gentleman instanced moving about a township. I said the cases were not analagous, for the reason that there is not a registered voters' list in any county or riding. It is only confined to cities and towns, consequently the difficulties I have pointed out in a city like Toronto could not by any possibility arise. The hon. gentleman says we are interfering with the Franchise Acts of the provinces. Why this very law interferes with them. Take the Dominion Franchise Act, a copy of which I hold in my hand; there are a number of changes in the Franchise Act placed on the statute-book by the Dominion parliament, interfering with and changing the Franchise Act of the different provinces. The province of Prince Edward Island is a notable case. There are many people disfranchised in Prince Edward Island that are specially given votes under this Act. In Nova Scotia we have precisely the same thing, and in British Columbia, where a certain class of people in the service of Her Majesty are deprived of their votes, the Dominion parliament did not consider that was just or equitable, and they make a provision in this very measure to give the franchise to the electors resident in these provinces to whom I have called attention, who would be disfranchised if they were not exempt under this law. And this is only a slight departure, but while it is a slight departure, it is not an interference with the principle laid down by the legislature of the province of Ontario of giving a vote to every man who is of age and a resident of the city. I will let the clause stand.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Has the hon. gentleman in view the manhood suffrage vote?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I just wish to point out that it would not do in the shape in which it appears, because under the Ontario law the manhood suffrage vote is applicable only to cerain county towns and to Niagara Falls and the places that are specified. The amendment speaks of incorporated towns. It would not do, because it is not applicable to all incorporated towns.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think my hon. friend is right. This was drawn by the law clerk.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There would have to be a manhood suffrage list formed specially. It would be unnecessary, of course, when the manhood suffrage vote is taken up, because the Ontario statute names a board that would have to pass upon this subject, and the government would be obliged to name that board, the board of the province, and they make up the list.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This has one simple object in view, and that is what I desire the hon. gentleman to keep in view: the object is not to deprive a man, who has moved from one ward to another, of his vote. It compels him to vote in the division in which his name appears on the voters' list.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is perfectly clear, but my hon. friend has undertaken to make provision for one man, while another who stands in exactly the same position has no remedy at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would like to go the whole length, but I dare not go so far as that. I frankly admit the principle. If I thought the Commons would accept it, I would not deprive any man of his vote whose name was upon the list if he had moved from one county to another, or from one province to another.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 69,

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I want to raise the question which I raised yesterday about the penalties provided under the Act. The two last clauses we have just agreed to provide for two things. Sixty-seven provides that when a voter has complied with all the provisions of this Act and the provincial law, and has been willing to take the oaths that he shall be given the ballot-paper and be entitled to vote, and section 68 provides that when he does not so comply, he shall not be allowed to vote, I think the law is lame in this respect, that should the returning officer, in disregard of these sections, refuse the ballot-paper to a man who has complied with the law, the penalty in section 19 would not cover it. I think the Solicitor General expressed himself to that effect elsewhere. In Prince Edward Island, arrange it as you will, the deputy returning officer will have some right to say whether a man has complied with the provisions of the law and to say whether he gets a ballot or not, and that being so, it would give the deputy returning officers the power to reject the vote of a qualified voter, without his being subject to a penalty, and the only right would be for the voter to sue him for damages. Turning to clauses 19 and 20, I think that was admitted by the Sollicitor General in discussing it elsewhere, and I think that neither of these sections would reach the case of a deputy returning officer refusing a ballot, or a right to vote to a qualified voter, or giving a ballot to a man who had not complied with the requirements of this law, or the provincial law, and my suggestion is that we should, immediately following section 68, enact a subsection which should read in this way:

68 (a). In Prince Edward Island if the deputy returning officer refuses a ballot and the right to vote to any person who is willing to take the oaths prescribed by this Act and the provincial law, and has otherwise complied with the requirements of the law, or gives a ballot to and allows to vote any person who refuses to take such oaths or to otherwise comply with the requirements of the law, he shall, for such offence, be liable, to any person who may sue for the same, to a penalty of two hundred dollars.

If he violates clause 68 or 67 he shall be liable to this penalty. I think it is perfectly reasonable. There is a strong doubt whether the penalties provided in sections 19 and 20 would meet this case, and this is simply providing this penalty for the violation of the provisions of sections 67 and 68, on the one hand, if he refuses a ballot to a man who has complied with all the conditions of the law; or, on the other hand, if he gives a ballot to a man who has not so complied.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There not being a voters' list, I suppose the deputy returning officer will have to exercise a discretion.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There will have to be some discretion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And where he honestly exercises that discretion, you could hardly punish him for it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who is to be the judge of that?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman's proposal is that in Prince Edward Island, if the deputy returning officer refuses a ballot and the right to vote to any person who is willing to take the oaths prescribed by this Act and the provincial law, and who has otherwise complied with the requirements of the law, or gives a ballot and allows to vote any person who refuses to take such oaths, or otherwise refuses to comply with the requirements of the law, he shall be liable to anybody who may sue for the penalty of $200. Is that precisely the same?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is the same. He would only be liable for the penalty on a person suing him and showing he had violated the law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Has this amendment been proposed in the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is not the same. It broadens it out somewhat. It contained these words in the fourth line:

'And has otherwise complied with the requirements of the law.'

These words which were inserted in the House of Commons, section 67, have been put into this amendment so as to make it fit in with what would be a violation of 67.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We will let it stand and consider it this afternoon. I do not like to give my consent to an amendment which the House of Commons considered and rejected.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then, in connection with this subject, there is another point. There are two sections in the provincial law that provide penalties. Where there is an open vote dangers arise in two directions: first, where there would be a very strong influence in favour of one party the scrutineers might be overawed and intimidated and afraid to apply the rules. In such cases, it is provided that the deputy returning officer should take the matter in his own hand, and that he should put the oaths himself, but if a condition of violence prevailed, and he refused to submit the remedy, he should be liable to a penalty. Then there is a penalty if he should put factious and useless questions to voters and delay and prevent them casting their votes. There is a small penalty of $32, provided for each of these offences. I do not think as this Bill stands that there is any provision for either of these sets of circumstances which might arise, I have provided no amendment for these cases, although I think 19 and 20 might be amended so as to cover these two cases. I think it would be sufficient if section 20 were amended, after the word 'Act' insert 'or the provincial law.' The provincial law provides that he shall prevent the factious and needless asking of questions. If that were inserted, it would answer the purpose. It will come up with the whole question of penalties after the minister has consulted his colleagues. My hon. friend will notice that this amendment which I have submitted is not the amendment rejected by the House of Commons, but is a provision which brings it entirely in harmony with the 67th section which has been approved by the House of Commons.

Mr. POWER—Would it not be better to put it as a subclause to clause 67, which deals with Prince Edward Island alone?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, because there are two sections. One provides what the returning officer shall do where a man has complied with the requirements of the law, and section 68 says what he shall do when he refuses to comply. My amendment provides a remedy for one or the other, and therefore it should follow 68.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would it not be met by making the change in clause 20?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, it would not meet it.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 69,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would it not be well to add after the words 'South Africa' the following:

Or any other war waged against Her Britannique Majesty.

In view of what is going on in China, it is just possible some of our volunteers may be sent there. The clause provides for retaining the franchise of any volunteers who are now in South Africa should they return in time to record their vote. I know of no reason why it should not apply to any other war which may occur hereafter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We might add 'or elsewhere.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That would not do, because it would not apply to the present war. I want to provide for any war.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then we would be making provision in conformity with an abstract proposition, whereas in this Bill we are dealing with an existing fact. There is a war in South Africa, and voters are away serving in that war and we make provision that that service shall not be to their detriment on the voters' list. Is it necessary to go further?

Hon. Sr MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no other war.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The English Franchise Act makes special provision for the recording of the votes of soldiers, not volunteers, and under the amendment proposed by the Imperial parliament lately, there is special provision made for officers and soldiers who are abroad to retain their vote, and I was very glad to see that the government did not attempt to enforce the clause which was originally in this Bill disfranchising the volunteers in this country. In England they go further. They make a special provision for the permanent soldiers in England to be marched from the barracks under an officer to the polling division, but they make a provision also that he shall not remain there, in order to keep themselves out of difficulties, and I do not see why they should be objected to.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I was thinking, when the hon. gentleman was speaking, whether our volunteers in the garrison at Halifax, would be disqualified from outside of their own particular districts?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I hope not, but they will be under the law as it exists.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am speaking of whether it does so under the law as it stands. We might make this clause read:

While serving or attached to any corps dispatched whether for service in Canada or abroad.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think that is a good amendment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will let it stand and put it in proper shape.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 70,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has been suggested so as to prevent the possibility of switching ballots, that one of the agents of each candidate, if any such be present, put his initials on the ballots.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That would be too cumbersome ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think so myself.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We might have four or five candidates.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—One is all that would be necessary.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 72,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is nothing in this law which directs where the ballot box should be placed. I would suggest that a provision be made that the ballot box shall be set upon a table, in view of all who are present.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is what it says.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not say where the ballot box shall be placed. I suggest that the following words be added :

Which box shall be placed on a table in full view of those present.

I know a case in my own county, where the returning officer insisted on placing the ballot box on the floor, right along side of him by the table. He had a long pair of boots on, and when he took the ballots, it was not known whether he put them in the box or in his boots—well it was known afterwards, because in that division they knew how every one was voting, and the Liberal candidate was declared to have a majority. The candidate with the minority of votes, obtained an affidavit from every man who had voted for him in that division, and showed a good round majority in his favour.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Those words may be added.

The clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 73,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does this clause give sufficient protection ? I would suggest that it be made to read in this way :

In such manner that it cannot be conveniently used shall, after defacing the ballot by marking out the names of the candidates, deliver it to the returing officer.

It might be destroyed to a certain extent, but afterwards put in the box, and the object is to prevent all iniquities of this character.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We will make it read this way :

Shall on returning it to the deputy officer, who shall deface it, obtain another ballot paper in its place.

The amendment was adopted.

The Senate adjourned.

SECOND SITTING.

The Speaker took the Chair at three o'clock.

Routine proceedings.

ELECTION LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

AGAIN IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole, consideration of Bill (133) 'An Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of members of the House of Commons.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 79,

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Does this clause imply that if a man who has been found guilty of any of these crimes, pays his fine, he is not amenable to imprisonment besides? The latter part of the clause reads :

Is guilty of an indictable offence, and shall be liable, if he is a returning officer, deputy returning officer or other officer engaged at the election, to a fine not less than three hundred dollars and not exceeding one thousand dollars, or to imprisonment for any term not less than one year and not exceeding five years, with or without hard labour, in default of paying such fine,—and if he is any other person, to a fine not less than one hundred dollars and not exceeding five hundred dollars, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years and not less than six months, with or without hard labour, in default of paying such fine.

Has he the option of paying the fine ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is an alternative.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I should think that there should be imprisonment and hard labour whatever the fine is, in the case of some of those offences.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He cannot be imprisoned if he pays the fine.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is that enough ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is what the House of Commons, the body to be affected by this, have decided, and I do not feel disposed to interfere.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Would it not be open to proceed on a charge of forgery against him, independent of the penalty in this clause ? If the crime is forgery would he be amenable to the Criminal Code in addition to this.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is an alternative proposition as it stands in the law, and the law is not altered in that regard.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I know it is not altered, but we are dealing with different circumstances. Men with money might commit this offence, and think nothing of paying the fine if detected. I should like to know if those parties are open to prosecution, under the criminal law, apart from this penalty altogether ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would require to look at the provisions of the code to see whether the definition of forgery in the code is sufficiently broad to cover this, but my impression is that the punishment imposed here is the specific punishment for this offence.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—And the point is whether it should not be imprisonment without option. It is alternative as it is now. The man who commits the offence, and has the money to pay the fine need not be imprisoned.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think it is sufficiently severe to meet the requirement. No one has been prosecuted under this provision of the law up to the present time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, unfortunately.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will the hon. gentleman let it stand and inquire into it ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is nothing to inquire into. The question is whether there should be an alternative. The House of Commons having discussed it and having come to a conclusion——

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Was this point raised in the House of Commons ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know. I have no objection to looking into it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Let it pass with the understanding that we can look into it again.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 83, subclause 4,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This subclause provides that the ballot box shall be locked and sealed with the seal of the deputy returning officer, and shall be delivered forthwith, but it is not stated by whom it shall be sealed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Nobody else would have the seal but the deputy returning officer.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The deputy returning officer's clerk would seal it up.

The subclause was adopted.

On clause 89,

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause reads :

89. After the close of the election the returning officer shall cause to be deposited in the custody of the sheriff or of the registrar of deeds in the county or registration division, or of the postmaster in the locality, in which the nomination was held, the ballot boxes used at the election; and the sheriff or registrar shall, at the next ensuing election, deliver such ballot boxes to the returning officer named for such election.

But it does not provide in the latter part of the clause, where they are given to the postmaster. We should make it read : " Sheriff, registrar or postmaster, as the case may be."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The postmaster does not give such a guarantee as the deputy returning officer. Let the deputy take care of it. Sometimes the postmaster is a mistress, and may be living alone in the house.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The postmistress could take care of an empty box as well as any one else.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The chairman suggests substituting the clerk of the municipality, who is always a responsible person. But then sometimes you have not a municipality.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I think that is a good idea, because the boxes are used afterwards at the municipal elections. If they were left with the postmaster, you would have to travel and get them. They would be easily reached if they were left with the clerk of the municipality.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The number of cases where the postmaster would take care of the boxes would be very few, and there are counties where the registrar does not reside in the division. An electoral division may consist of parts of two or three counties. If you were to say that it was to be deposited with the sheriff, one part of the ballot boxes would have to go to one county and one to another, but in a case of that sort, you could deposit it with the postmaster in the place where the election is held. We will add the words 'or postmaster' in this section.

The clause as amended, was adopted.

On clause 90.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have an amendment to propose to clause 90. It is one amendment, although there will have to be changes made in different parts of the section. They are all intended to carry out one idea. We have provided in the earlier clauses of the Bill, that in Prince Edward Island, where there is no voters' list, and where the work of making up the voters' lists has to be practically proceeded with on the day of election, we have provided that where a person offers to vote, whose vote is thought to be bad, by the candidate against whom it is being polled, he may take objection to it, and that objection is entered on the poll book, and the ballot is initialled and numbered, and put, at the close of the poll, into a separate envelope, all of which leads to an investigation at some later period, as to whether this vote is good or whether it is bad. In all the other provinces where there are voters' lists, this investigation is held at the making up of the lists. As we have no lists in Prince Edward Island, the object is to get a judicial investigation into these votes after the election, just simply trying to effect, after the election, what is done in the other provinces before the election. We have provided for the objection being taken, and for the initialling of the ballot, and the corresponding number on the poll book, and for the ballot being placed in a separate envelope, and for its being counted for the candidate for whom it is cast. The point comes, how is it to be settled whether those men have good votes or whether they have not? There is no provision in this Bill for deciding that. Two years ago, when the Franchise Act was going through, the Senate made some amendments to it, which allowed the initialling and numbering of the ballot, and all that, by which it was aimed to get a simple summary inquiry before the county court judge at the time of the recount. That was the aim of parliament two years ago. Hon. gentlemen may be told that it is doubtful whether parliament did at that time what it thought it did—that is, whether it gave full jurisdiction to the county court judge, as we all thought we had given. It is doubtful whether that was done. However, these provisions that were then enacted in the Franchise Act are repealed, and there is no corresponding provision made for the purpose of investigating these objected votes. The amendments I propose will work out in this way: on the demanding of a recount, there are four grounds on which that recount may be demanded in the affidavit. We propose to add another ground of a recount, and that is that the candidate who has lost the election, or some person in his interest, may, as one of the grounds of a recount, object that persons have voted who were not qualified to vote: that that shall be the ground of a recount, or investigation, or whatever you like to call it. It might be the only ground, and the investigation might turn on that point, or it might be one with other grounds. When this legislation was effected two years ago, it was left open to the person proceeding with the objection to have investigated at the recount all the votes that might be objected to on the day of the election, and I know my hon. friend the hon. Minister of Justice took strong objection on the ground, that heated agents, or those who had not very good judgment, might object to a very large number of votes, and that, as a consequence, the inquiry might be made unnecessarily broad. It is proposed in the amendment that when a defeated candidate, or his agent, or any credible witness, demands a recount, he shall then specify in this demand the votes that he intends to challenge before the judge. As he is amenable to costs, he would not wantonly proceed, and it is likely that the list would be very much reduced, and that he would only proceed with the names of those he thought he could prove to be bad. As this inquiry is a wider one and involves more expense than an ordinary recount, we propose to provide as follows :

And when the application is made on this ground, that the deposit should be $300.

The ordinary deposit in other parts of Canada will not be disturbed, nor in Prince Edward Island when the object is a mere ordinary recount, the $100 will stand, but where this particular ground is to be taken, then the deposit should be put up to correspond with the nature of the inquiry. A week intervenes between the election and the declaration. Four days afterwards, under the law, a recount may be demanded. Four days further elapse before the recount is commenced. It is provided in the amendments that I am submitting that a copy of the affidavit under which the recount is demanded shall be furnished to the opposite side immediately by the judge, and that is a notice to them of the identical votes that are going to be objected to. They have then their notice. It is proposed to provide that the other side may then put in another affidavit at the opening of the recount, and it will be open to the other side then to allege that bad votes have also been recorded against them, and they are required to put up a deposit, just exactly the same as the other side put up, but they are only allowed to come in with these objections to answer any case where a recount has been demanded on this particular ground of objection, and then we propose to give the county court judge jurisdiction to deal with all these votes that may be objected to by both sides, to hear witnesses on both sides, and to finally decide whether each particular vote is good or bad. We propose to provide that the identity of a voter shall not be disclosed during the investigation. A ballot shall not be turned to discover what the number is, or to identify it with the name of the person whose vote is being objected to, until the vote has been declared bad. If the vote is declared good, it having been already counted, there is no cause to investigate as to how the man voted, but if it is declared to be bad, the judge shall then go to the envelope and trace this particular vote and discover for which candidate it was polled, and then it will be taken from the count of the man in whose favour it was given. Thus there will be no disclosure of how a man voted, until it is found that the vote is bad. When that point is reached, that vote shall be taken from the number of votes counted for the candidate in whose favour it had been cast. I think that this will prove to be a very simple and inexpensive remedy. Hon. gentlemen will agree with me that it is very desirable, apart from all other considerations, that the man who has the majority of good votes should be the man counted in. In all the other provinces of Canada, the declaration by the deputy returning officer, or the county court judge, if a recount is demanded, is a declaration that the man who has the majority of votes, has a majority of good votes. It is only to put the province of Prince Edward Island in the same position as all the other provinces with regard to this subject that I propose these amendments. I would certainly regard the provisions that we have inserted in the Franchise Act of two years ago, and which are all introduced in this Bill again for initialling and marking these votes, as a blemish on the law unless we provide a judicial settlement at the end, because there can be no doubt in the world that the initialling and numbering of ballots, if it does not furnish a clue as to how a man votes, at least intimidates him and makes him fear that there are some means of getting at his vote ; and if he happens to be in any position in which he feels himself in any particular danger from the fact of how he has voted being disclosed, it will have a deterrent effect on him. It is a blemish in the law unless you have some good purpose in it, and I fear there will be no good purpose served in initialling these votes unless you have a means of ascertaining whether they are good or not. It may be said that all that can be settled by the Controverted Elections Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If my hon. friend looks into it he will see how useless that would be. A man is counted out by twenty or thirty votes, and it is only when the vote is close that this will be implemented at all. If it is decisive, nobody will be foolish enough to incur this expense. A man is counted out by a small number of votes. If there is no other remedy, he is forced to file a petition under the Controverted Elections Act. He puts up a thousand dollars and he claims the seat. He must claim the seat. As soon as he claims the seat, it is open for his opponent, under the Controverted Elections Act, without putting up any deposit whatever, to attack him upon all grounds. He can not only attack him, but set up that some of his agents have been guilty of corrupt practices, or that some irregularity has occurred in the elections, and it will be open for the other side to open up the whole arena of investigation under the Controverted Elections Act, without putting up any deposit, and the consequences will be that the man who was counted out by these bad votes will have to submit, because the moment he asks, under the Controverted Elections Act, to have an investigation and puts up this money, everything is at issue and the other side can meet him at once with all kinds of litigation and without having to put up any deposit whatever. My hon. friend will see that, unless some such provision as this is made, there is no use, and possibly a good deal of harm in loading the Bill with the provisions it contains for initialling and numbering the ballot; because it is certain that no inquiry under the Controverted Elections Act can be had. When hon. gentlemen consider the case of Prince Edward Island, they will see the feasibility of this remedy. It is a small country and thickly peopled, and none of the districts are very extensive. Good travelling exists everywhere. A week intervenes before declaration, and four days more before the recount is demanded, and another four days before commencing the recount; there is ample time for a party who feels he has lost his seat by bad votes being recorded against him, there is ample time for him to make out a list of these and put in his objection. Of course, when this is in the air the other side must know it. They know the situation is close and critical, and they will be looking up what grounds they may have for the purpose of meeting these objections by putting in other objections, so that nobody will be taken short. While the party who made the objection is proving his case, the other side have ample time to bring up their witnesses and make good their objection. It is a simple matter, and I think it would provide an efficacious way of dealing with the question. My hon. friend may say that this amendment was proposed in the House of Commons and rejected.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In the main it was proposed, but the details differ considerably from those of the amendment offered in the House of Commons. A discussion went on, and it was found how it could be improved, and now, with better light, I propose this remedy. Two years ago this principle was accepted by parliament on an amendment to a Bill in this House, and I am very sorry that the weaknesses that belonged to the legislation of that year were not corrected and the principle retained. I know that on that occasion the gentleman who had charge of this Bill in the House of Commons this year expressed himself as favourable to these provisions. I know he did so to myself, and in the presence of my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, and he said he thought that they were very fair provisions and they were agreed to on a conference held between members of both Houses. I may say I watched the course of this Bill in the other House very closely and carefully, and I feel bound to say that the Solicitor General showed great tact and fairness in dealing with it, and I do not at all despair of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice and of the Solicitor General, who has naturally given this Bill more care than any other of his colleagues, having had charge of it through the House of Commons, and I am not at all unwilling to hope that these gentlemen will see that these amendments that I propose are reasonable and fair and that they will work well in practice, and are necessary in order to carry out the other provisions of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I could not agree to the amendments which my hon. friend proposes to this section. The law provides for a scrutiny by the ordinary methods in controverted elections. That may be a good or a bad system, but it is the system that has been provided universally, and I know of no reason why a different rule should be adopted in Prince Edward Island from that which is adopted elsewhere. What is the objection of the hon. gentleman to applying the principle of the Controverted Elections Act? He says if you propose to have a scrutiny, there may be all sorts of objections. Why should there not be? Supposing a man who undertakes to claim a seat under a scrutiny has been guilty of bribery, has bought, perhaps, the very votes that he is seeking to have kept upon the list; why should not that question be tried along with the other in Prince Edward Island, the same as it is anywhere else? My hon. friend wants a scrutiny for a recount. The hon. gentleman can have a recount under the law. Under the law there is no matter of controversy under a recount such as there would be under a scrutiny, and the law provides the method by which the scrutiny shall be conducted. The matter shall be tried before a Superior Court Judge, and the parties have an opportunity there of mutually attacking the ballots involved in the case. They may bring forward any question provided for by the objection that may affect the validity of the seat, supposing a man has won the election. But he knows right well that his opponent has undertaken to bribe the electors, and his opponent asked for a scrutiny. He cannot defend himself without entering a second suit under the Controverted Elections Act for the purpose of having that matter inquired into.

Now, I say that where the seat of a member returned is attacked, all those grounds of contesting the validity of the election, or the validity of the grounds on which a seat may be claimed, ought to be open to him the moment that his right to hold the seat is brought in question, I see no reason in the world why the question of a scrutiny should be raised on a recount for the purpose of ascertaining which of two candidates is returned, if a vote is received, whether it is good or bad, and if it is counted, then the party who is returned ought to be open to have his seat attacked by his opponent, under the provisions of the Controverted Elections Act, which enables him to do so. I am perfectly certain that the majority in the House of Commons will never agree to the propositions which the hon. gentleman has submitted. All these questions were before the House. They were brought forward there by some gentlemen from Prince Edward Island; they were considered and rejected. It does not matter whether the precise words used in the hon. gentleman's proposition are the words that were used in the House of Commons. We have to look behind the particular words employed to see what is sought to be accomplished by the amendment, and what the hon. gentleman aims at accomplishing by the amendments he proposes to this section 20 were sought to be accomplised by others in the House of Commons, and that House, after full and careful consideration of those proposed amendments, did not agree to them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I desire to call the hon. gentleman's attention to two points on which he failed to appreciate my argument. He says that he sees no reason whatever why this matter of the scrutiny of votes should not be dealt with before a superior judge in Prince Edward Island, the same as in the other provinces of Canada, along with questions that arise under the Controverted Elections Act. My hon. friend will see that in no other province but Prince Edward Island can such a state of things as this exist, because these is no provision for contesting the qualifications of votes except in Prince Edward Island, and therefore they cannot come up in the other provinces. It is only in Prince Edward Island where you have this particular difficulty, and therefore you can find no possible similarity between Prince Edward Island and the other provinces. I am surprised to hear my hon. friend say that he can see nothing wrong, when a candidate demands an inquiry to ascertain whether votes are good or bad, that it should be open for his opponent to come in under that inquiry and raise questions of corrupt practice against him.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Where a man personates, say, in Ontario or Quebec, or accepts a bribe, and so has disqualified himself to vote in the election, whether there is any provision in either provinces that there may be a recount before a proper officer, and whether he may go into an inquiry——

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—These are matters which come up properly under the Controverted Elections Act. This does not. The Act provides that the objected vote shall be marked and initialled, so that a judge can inquire into it. The candidate puts up his deposit of one thousand dollars under the Controverted Elections Act in order to have that settled, and claims the seat. His opponent, without putting up any deposit, can come in and hunt for some corrupt practice on the part not merely of the candidate, but of his agents. He has put up his money and runs all the risk without his opponent putting up any deposit.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is under the Controverted Elections Act.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is so when a man under the Controverted Elections Act puts up a thousand dollars if he claims the seat, but it is not necessary under the Controverted Elections Act to claim the seat; the demand may be to unseat his opponent. But in this investigation, it is a necessary ingredient of the case that he claim the seat. Why are you trying to count out those bad votes, but to get the majority you are lawfully entitled to, and in that case your opponent can enter the court and bring up all possible questions and defeat you. Hon. gentlemen can see at once that it is impossible to get an inquiry into these objected votes under the Controverted Elections Act. No sane man would put up his thousand dollars and start that inquiry, when he makes himself thereby liable to have his opponent attack him on every ground he can possibly raise. The other side are not deprived of their remedy. If afterwards it is found that this man, who has applied for this recount, has a majority of good votes, it is open for the other side to come on him for corrupt practice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Two suits.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman need not trouble his mind about that. The first question is who has the majority of good votes, and that man should have the seat. The man who is willing to take the responsibility of proving who has the majority of good votes is required to put up the money, while the other side is not required to put up any. I think the House will see that the amendment I am proposing is a good one; and further than that, the Solicitor General was of that opinion two years ago. I have looked over the discussions in another place, and I do not find that he has put anything on record to show he has changed his mind. I cannot find that the Solicitor General has pronounced himself as opposed to the principle of this amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there anything in the Controverted Elections Act which would enable the court to ascertain if the man gave a good vote or not?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If you could not tell how he voted, what difference would it make?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Under a scrutiny.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is a scrutiny under the Ontario law. They are able to carry on a scrutiny there, because they have the number on the counterfoil and on the ballot that is cast, and if you object to the vote you can refer to the counterfoil and ballot, which correspond with the number on the poll-book. That is what we object to in Ontario, because many are afraid to vote, or they vote differently to what they otherwise would vote, for fear of it being traced. Under our law there is no means of ascertaining how a man votes and the proposition made by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, where voting as they do, without a voters' list——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Which they ought to remedy themselves on the island.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that the doctrine? That is precisely the position we took on the Quebec judges question. What is sauce for the goose ought to be sauce for the gander?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So it is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman took a contrary position to that yesterday in the other matter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, no.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman says, let the people of Prince Edward Island change the law. I agree with the hon. gentleman. They ought to have some means by which they could first scrutinize whether a man has a right to vote. But that is not the case, and we are dealing with facts as they exist—dealing with the laws as they are, and we make exceptions for different provinces to meet their laws, or, where we think they are wrong, we have provisions in this Act to depart from them. That is all the hon. gentleman from Marshfield asks. This proposition was acceded to by members of the government, when the Franchise Act was amended in this House, on condition that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield would not propose other amendments which he contemplated. My hon. friend thought this was the most important, and said he was willing to give way on the others. If it was a good amendment then, I do not see why it should be considered bad now.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If the hon. gentleman will not consent, I shall have to move my amendments. I therefore move that the following words be inserted in section 90, subsection 1, after '4':

That in Prince Edward Island any person not qualified to vote in such electoral district has voted, stating the name, designation and residence of such person, and also the name and number of the polling division in which he has voted, or (5)——

The committee divided on the amendment, which was adopted: contents, 16; non-contents, 11.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved to amend subsection 1, line 23, by inserting the following:

Or in Prince Edward Island $300, if the application is made in relation to the fourth ground of application.

If the ground of application in Prince Edward Island is that bad votes have been cast, it will involve more expense than an ordinary recount, and therefore, the person making the application should put up $300 instead of $100; but if in Prince Edward Island the ordinary recount is called for, it should be $100.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This proposition, like the other, will enable a man who may have bribed at an election to escape a contest.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It necessitates, in every case where there has been bribery, two suits.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, because there is this question of recount, which is one, in which case each party is obliged to deposit $300; and if the other candidate is confident that his opponent has bribed at the election, he must enter a suit under the Controverted Elections Act, being a second suit.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is under the presumption they are going to contest the whole election. This proposition is simply to ascertain whether a sufficient number of persons voted who had no votes to change the final result. It is simply enlarging the power for recounting.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But a man who accepts a bribe has no vote, even though his name is on the voters' list. A man who is an alien has no vote, although his name may be on the list, and a man who personates has no vote, and yet in every other place in the Dominion there must be a scrutiny, and a scrutiny under the Controverted Elections Act, and my hon. friends are undertaking to except Prince Edward Island from the general law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The reason is, because the province of Prince Edward Island is an exception. It is not governed by the same rules and laws that govern the other provinces, there being no voters' list.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But my hon. friend will see there is exactly the same principle. If a man personates you have to file a petition in order to get quit of his vote.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But the greatest difference in the world exists, and I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should fail to see it. If a man personates, the consequences fall on the candidate or himself. The candidate may lose his seat because of the act of personation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He may know nothing about it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But he can be unseated. In this case, it is merely to settle who have good or bad votes, and the hon. gentleman need not try to mystify it. It is simply doing in Prince Edward Island after the election what was done in all the other provinces before the election. The law does not contemplate an objection at the poll on the ground of personation. It must be dealt with in another way. The personator in Prince Edward Island is dealt with the same as in the other provinces, but there being no voters' list in that province, and it being possible for men wholly disqualified to go and record their votes, the case is exceptional, and this is a simple remedy, which leaves the other parties all the remedy they had before.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In the North-west Territories there are no voters' lists.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am surprised, because there was a provision in the North-west Territories Election Act for an investigation after an election, somewhat similar to what we propose. Gentlemen in the government proposed, in the first instance, to include the North-west Territories in this Bill, but when they struck this difficulty in the Territories, they dropped all reference to the North-west Territories out of the Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—How does the hon. gentleman know that ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think I know.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I know that is not so.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I accept the hon. gentleman's statement if he says that is not the reason.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I never heard that was the reason before, and I ought to know, because I had something to do with the matter.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When this came up first, it included the Territories, and we felt in Prince Edward Island our position was much stronger because we would have the support of the Territories, and that the government would have to provide, as they were making law for the Territories, some provision similar to this for the Territories and Prince Edward Island, but they dropped the North-west Territories out—whether that was the cause of it or not, the effect was all the same—it would not have been possible to pass an Act dealing with the Territories, without having some such provision as this incorporated in the law.

The amendment was agreed to on a division.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—These amendments are all simply carrying out the one idea, and it is necessary to have several small amendments to make the general provision. I, therefore, move to amend section 90, line 30, by inserting the following after the word 'application':

Or decide whether any person not qualified to vote has voted, if the said application is made on the fourth ground of application.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am opposed to this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to on a division.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I now move to amend subsection 2, line 37 by inserting the following after the word 'be':

Together with a copy of the affidavit aforesaid.

This is providing that a notice shall be sent to the other side with a list of the names that are to be objected to.

The amendment was agreed to on a division.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I now move to amend subsection 4, of section 90 by inserting the following as subsection a.

At the time and place appointed and before proceeding to recount the votes, the judge may receive an affidavit from the candidate, or his agent, against whose return the affidavit mentioned in subsection 1 of this section has been directed, declaring that any other person, not qualified to vote has voted, giving the name, designation and residence of such person and also the name and number of the polling division in which he has voted; provided always, that the affidavit authorized by this subsection shall not be received by the judge unless the applicant has deposited with the clerk of the county court in the aforesaid judicial district the sum of $300 in legal tender or the bills of any chartered bank doing business in Canada as security for the costs in connection with the recount, or final addition, of the candidate appearing by the addition to be elected; and further provided, that the affidavit authorized by this subsection shall not be received by the judge except when the recount has been demanded on the fourth ground of application.

The amendment was agreed to on division.

On subclause 5,

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I call attention to the words at the close of this subclause 'and no other ballot-papers,' I think that these words are of no use. They are taken from the old Franchise Act which had provision for ballot-papers in undecided appeals. Unless we have created in the meantime some new distinction to which this will apply, I do not see the use of these words.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will not disturb that, because it cannot do any harm. At most it will be surplusage.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It might do harm. If there are other ballot-papers not to be opened, it is necessary. I have no objection, but the danger I apprehended from it is that there is provision for the opening of the used ballots which have been counted and the rejected ballot-papers, and the spoiled ballot-papers. We have provided in this Bill for another set of ballots, and that is those which have been numbered and initialled in Prince Edward Island. They have been opened and should be counted under the first section. But supposing the returning officer took it into his head he should not open those, what would happen ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is the used ballot-papers.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If there is no use for these words, and if they are inherited from the old Franchise Act which had a provision for ballot-papers in undecided appeals, there is no use in having them in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, but you send perhaps 300 ballots to a certain division. There are fifty people who do not vote, and you have a lot of blank ballots, and it is not necessary that these should be opened.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is it provided that these shall be put in an envelope and sealed. It is a dangerous thing to leave words in a law that have no right to be in, because the courts will attach some meaning to every word in the section.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—There is a provision in another section for putting unused ballots in an envelope.

The subclause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved that the following be inserted as subclause 5a :

5. (a) In Prince Edward Island the judge when recounting the votes, shall decide the qualification of all voters whose ballot papers were numbered and initialled under section 67 of this Act as having been objected to on the ground of the want of qualification, and who have been described in the affidavits provided for in this section, and for the purposes of such decision he shall hear the candidates or their agents and may examine on oath the person whose vote has been objected to, or any person. Both candidates may be represented by counsel, and the judge shall ascertain the facts and may take such other evidence as he thinks necessary, and is able to obtain, and may require the attendance of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence, and shall for all purposes of such decision have all the powers of a county court judge in Prince Edward Island exercising his ordinary jurisdiction in civil cases.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The $300 would cover no such expense.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is a deposit of three hundred dollars by each side.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That would not begin to do it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think it would.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Law is cheap in Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have had some experience of these investigations, and we have learned that it is utter folly to go into them unless the majority is very small. They will only be implemented in cases of very small majorities. Where there is no remedy for a wrong, people will commit the wrong, but if there is a remedy they will not resort to it. The investigations we have had were not expensive.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Supposing a man is attacked and obliged to put up $300, in consequence of the scrutiny, and he is maintained in his seat, under the hon. gentleman's arrangement he proposes that the expense, so far as he is personally concerned, shall be charged against him and not against the unsuccessful man.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The candidate who is found ultimately to have the majority of good votes, is to be indemnified.

The subclause was adopted on a division.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved that the following be added as subclause b :

(b) In determining the qualification of the voters aforesaid the judge shall not identify, nor allow to be identified, any ballot paper, until it has been decided that the person casting it was not legally entitled to vote, in which case he shall identify the said ballot paper and deduct the vote or votes marked thereon, from the total number of votes received by the candidate or candidates in whose favour it has been marked.

The amendment was agreed to on a division.

On clause 92,

Hon. Mr. BAKER—I have been asked to propose an amendment which is based on an amendment which should be made to clause

41, and I will submit it to the committee. The object of this Bill is to prevent all possible fraud, and especially, I may say, the switching of ballot papers, and it is suggested in subsection 'e' of the 41st section, which heads as follows :

On a poll being granted, the returning officer shall furnish the deputy returning officer with a sufficient number of ballot papers (all being of the same description, and as nearly as possible alike) to supply the number of voters on the list of such polling district.

I wish to add the words :

And a certificate of the number of such ballot papers.

It is to make an authentic record of what is done in sending out these ballot papers. I would add also :

And that he should keep a record of the ballot papers so furnished.

The object of this proposed amendment is to impose upon the returning officer the duty of sending out these ballot papers in making a record that shall be transmissible later on to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, by which there shall be authentic evidence of the number of ballot papers. I think there can be no possible objection to the insertion of that amendment in clause 41.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That clause stands.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—If we go back to 41 and provide for the granting of that certificate, then it would be necessary to amend subsection 3 of clause 92, and make the returning officer transmit to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery the records provided in clause 41, subsection 'e'—that is the certificate and the record that the certificate has been granted. This is merely adding an additional safeguard to secure the honest carrying out of the law. He sends a sufficient number of ballots to the deputy and makes a certificate showing the numbers sent to the polling divisions.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Our object is, of course, one, but it seems to me that to require the returning officer to return this certificate would, perhaps, defeat the hon. gentleman's object.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—In what way ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I shall explain. This provision is, that the returning officer shall, immediately after the sixth day make his return. Any defeated candidate or elector may petition against the election, and these certificates, which the hon. gentleman proposes shall be returned to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, would probably be required as evidence in case there were a petition, and it does not seem to me they should be papers that would come to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery until the thirty days had expired.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—There are six days for a recount, and the deputy returning officer does not return the ballots until after the expiration of that delay.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not think the ballots were returned until after the expiration of the time for the petition.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—They are returned after the sixth day. It will be necessary to provide that this certificate be returned with the stamp and the ballot papers.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that his amendment should be made to clause 41. The word 'documents' in this subsection would then cover it.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 96, subsection 5,

5. No candidate, officer, clerk, agent or other person shall communicate at any time to any person any information as to the number on the back of the ballot paper given to any voter at a polling station, or attempt to ascertain at the counting of votes the number on the back of any ballot paper; but this provision shall not apply to ballots marked in accordance with sections 67 or 74 of this Act.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Why should this exception be made ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You could not get on without it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Subclause 6 protects the voter in Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Why should the officer be at liberty to know how the voter has voted ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We will meet the hon. gentleman's wishes if we stop at the words 'ballot paper,' and strike out the last two lines which contain the exception.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the exception must stand in clause 74. It applies to where a man comes to vote, and finds his name has been taken by another party. You must have something to identify him, because there are two votes given for the same name, and the second vote might be a bogus vote, and it must be known for whom it was cast.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am not sure about clause 74, but I think the reference to clause 67 should be struck out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Clause 67 applies to Prince Edward Island, and my hon. friend thinks all should not be known there.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It prevents secrecy. The number is only to be utilized by the judge, after he finds the vote to be bad.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does this go further than that ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The fact is, the ballots could not be marked that way under this clause, unless the returning officer ascertains how the voter voted. If the hon. gentleman would take the trouble to read subclause 6, he will find that secrecy is fully provided for there.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is clear nobody at the counting of the votes, has the right to ascertain the number on the ballot paper, but is simply allowing them to do that in order to carry away information that will lead to the discovery of how the vote was polled. The same objection applied to clause 74. At the close of the poll no officer has a right to inquire into that number.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We will take those two lines out.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If those lines are struck out how could that information be got in case of a controverted election ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—As far as clause 74 is concerned, it may not be possible to get it, but I know as far as 67 is concerned, my amendments provide how the judge shall get at it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am speaking of clause 74 : how could the judge reach those ballot papers ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He could, at the trial of the election.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I agree to let those two lines go for this reason, that if subsection 5 does not apply to 67 and 74, there are no other sections of the Act to which it does apply. Instead of those two lines I propose to insert after the words 'balloting station' the following : 'Except to a court or judge, lawfully requiring him so to do.'

The subclause was amended and adopted.

On clause 108,

108. The following persons are guilty of bribery and shall be punishable accordingly :

(a) Every person who, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, gives, lends or agrees to give or lend, or offers or promises any money or valuable consideration, or promises to procure, or to endeavour to procure, any money or valuable consideration, to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any person, in order to induce any voter to vote, or refrain from voting, or corruptly does any such act on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What about public speeches, when candidates promise public works ? When a candidate or minister of the Crown tells the people that unless they vote in a certain way they will receive cold justice, and in case they vote another way that a bridge or a railway will be built. A minister goes to a constituency and says, unless you elect such and such a man, you will not get that railway or bridge built. It might do for gentlemen in opposition to say that, because they have not the power, but if a minister should make such a statement, I would disqualify him. What does the Minister of Justice think of an amendment of this kind : after the word 'or' in the 20th line insert :

Every person who directly or indirectly, himself or by any other person on his behalf, makes him any gift, loan, offer, promise or agreement as aforesaid, or who, by public speech or otherwise, holds out directly any advantage which would accrue to the individual voter or to the constituency in which the election is being held in order to induce such person to procure, or endeavour to procure, the return of any person to serve in the House of Commons or the vote of any voter at any election.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the hon. gentleman would make it retroactive for the past ten years it would be better.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That might be a good idea, for we would have some of the ministers in trouble.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—It should be relegated to Prince Edward Island politics.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would make this apply to Prince Edward Island. Is it not one of the grossest abuses of public speech on the part of gentlemen who occupy ministerial positions? A minister goes into a constituency and holds out inducements and tells the people plainly and distinctly, as some of them have done—that is if they are reported correctly in the newspapers—that such and such a public work shall stop, or that he shall not carry out that which has been promised by previous administrations and which he intended to have carried out, unless they act in accordance with the wishes of the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It seems to me I remember a Prime Minister some few years ago—and I am not speaking ill of the dead—who proposed the construction of the Trent Valley Canal upon the condition that the people living along that line returned members to support that government. Let me mention another case. In my own constituency for several years we undertook to get the River Sydenham dredged. I put the question expressly to the Minister of Public Works on the floor of parliament whether the work would be undertaken. It was promised, but for at least three general elections my opponent said to the people 'unless you return a supporter of the government you cannot expect any of these improvements made.' That was the doctrine preached regularly. I think it is wrong. I do not know that it is particularly relevant to the discussion of this Bill, but my hon. friend opposite has mentioned the matter as though it were a novel thing and done by the present administration for the first time—a sort of new invention. I think my hon. friend was one of the greatest sinners in Christendom in that regard.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I accept the admonition and castigation of the hon. gentleman, and so far as I am individually concerned, in reply to him, I defy him to find any instance in which he can apply the charge to myself. The Premier to whom he refers—it is not necessary to mention a name—never, to my knowledge, made any such promise. The Trent Valley Canal and the Murray Canal have been a plank in the platform of every party since I was a boy. If these errors and iniquities to which he refers existed in the past and continue to exist let us reform and put a stop to them. My hon. friend speaks of the River Sydenham. I remember distinctly that every session we had that question up as to the improvement of the River Sydenham. That was an old story.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And it was promised.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Very likely, and so was the Trent Valley Canal and the Murray Harbour. If the hon. gentleman will look at the records he will find that the agitation began in 1812 or 1813, and ever since I remember, for fifty years, I have heard those things discussed at every election, but I question whether we had as palpable a case as when the hon. gentleman was in office, when he sent Mr. Kingsford up to the Goderich Harbour and told them what they should have in the way of the extension of their pier and breakwaters if they would only vote for Mr. Cameron, a supporter of the hon. gentleman, and it is only lately that we had the present Minister of Customs, when he was seeking a constituency, after being defeated in his own constituency, making promises to the people. What did he promise them? What did Mr. Hardy, the Premier of Ontario, promise them? He said 'if you do not want cold justice, you had better vote for Mr. Paterson.' That is the kind of thing I want to put a stop to. If our party have done it, let us stop it, because I anticipate we are soon coming back to power; but let us stop it. I think some of the hon. gentleman's friends do not hesitate to do it, for we have the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who made himself very officious at a local election; and the Minister of Railways went down and told them what he would do in reference to the construction of a railway, and actually appointed men to value the right of way while the elections were going on, and before they knew where they were going to put the road. I could cite a number of other cases. It might fill a volume if it is of any interest to the hon. gentleman. Since he has referred to two or three instances in the section of country from which I come, I may say that I advocated through the newspapers, ever since I had anything to do with politics, the construction of the Murray Canal, and I am glad we had it dug although I do not know that it is of as great importance now, as it would have been some years ago. It connects Lake Ontario with the Bay of Quinte. If you make it an issue at an election it is excusable. If you want to build a railway from Quebec through the northern part of the country, if they like to make that an issue between the parties when you go to an election, that is a matter that might be fairly discussed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So I think.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But if you say to them 'you shall not have $25,000 to deepen the harbour unless you vote for me,' it is wrong.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Should there not be a provision in the criminal code ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend from Marshfield lost a local election lately in the province of Prince Edward Island by over 300 votes on account of having some tons of his speeches sent into the constituency.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If some of my hon. friend's speeches had been sent down there we would have got the election by acclamation. If some of his observations were circulated down there, no candidate of his politics would show his face in the constituency. If my hon. friend's amendment, or suggestion, should be carried into law, and it would be made an indictable offence or corrupt practice for ministers to promise public works to constituencies, as far as I know the constituencies and the men in the government, the art of eloquence with them would be entirely extinguished, and the newspapers would have no speeches to report. Their eloquence would completely dry up, because this is their whole theme—the improvements they are giving to the constituencies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Under the circumstances, I will not press my amendment.

The subclause was adopted.

On clause 114,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to see subsection b of this clause amended. It provides :

> Every person who at an election
> (b) having voted once at any such election, applies at the same election for a ballot paper in his own name—> is guilty of personation and liable to a penalty not exceeding $200 and to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years.

I should like that clause made positive. It is all very well to have these permissive Acts, but I think it should read : 'Not less than six months or more than two years. There are certain magistrates, when these offenders are brought before them, who treat them very lightly. I could give illustrations which would almost surprise hon. gentlemen. In one province a grand jury made a presentment to court condemning the government for prosecuting the merchants who employed a pilot to do the smuggling, on the ground that we should have punished the pilot who did the smuggling. I know of another case in Ontario where a man was caught attempting to bribe another, and the law said the penalty should be not more than so and so, under the Audit Act, which was positive. He fined this man 25 cents and sent him to goal for ten minutes. He complied with the law. This system of personation has been practiced to such an enormous extent in the large cities that until you make a signal example by a positive punishment, you will never put a stop to it. I would make a penalty of $200 and imprisonment for a term not less than three months or more than two years.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Two hundred dollars is too much.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—It cannot be too much.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We know in the large cities they go round and change their clothes and vote eight or ten times.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say that what the hon. gentleman says is perfectly true of a certain class of men, who engage in personation, but there are some simple minded men who are put up to do it by others, and in punishing them you are not punishing the most guilty party.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Punish both.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We might put it, 'not exceeding $200, and not less than $50, and imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years and not less than two months.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That will do.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have this remark to make with respect to this paragraph, that I think one of the results of the change is likely to be that persons will not be convicted. If you make the penalty so heavy the ordinary magistrates throughout the country and the jury will not find a man guilty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A judge will be obliged to instruct the jury if the evidence is positive, and if the evidence were not positive he would not be found guilty.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The experience of prosecuting under the liquor license law is about the same thing as this, that if you state that it shall not be less than three months and not more than two years, very often you will find the magistrate would be quite willing to inflict a penalty of $50 or thirty days in jail, but he would say: 'I won't put that man in jail three months. There is some one more guilty than he is. He is a poor fellow and I will simply dismiss him.'

If you make the penalty too high, you find a great many people who ought to be punished escape. Take the ballot box stuffing in Manitoba. In every case that was tried there, the chief justice of the province of Manitoba charged strongly against the prisoners. The jury acquitted them . Why ? Because it was a criminal proceeding. If it had been a civil action, every one of them would be fined and would have paid their fine. There was no doubt about their guilt, but they were acquitted because the punishment was too severe.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You might apply it to any crime in the calendar.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It is practised wholesale in the cities, and we should inflict some fine by which we could get at the people and have them convicted. I think the election trials at Macdonald were a farce. In every one of those cases the judge would have sent the men to penitentiary for stealing the ballots.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—If they were simple minded men, there would be something in the objection, but from what I know takes place in Toronto, there are many people who are not simple, but who are dishonest. They have no moral sense of what is right or wrong, not merely in political elections, but otherwise. Take the case of the running of street cars on Sunday; there were numbers of people who came up and voted for other parties, and who knew perfectly well what they were doing. They were not so simple, but they had the sense of what was right and moral. I think it is possible that if you inflict a very heavy penalty you may defeat the object of the Bill, but if some of these men could be sent to jail it would stop the thing quicker than anything else.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I am in favour of a minimum fine of $50. If you make it not less than three months, a good many might escape, because if you leave it optional with the judge to fix the limit of not more than two years, the judge who tries the case can judge of the character of the man found guilty and let him exercise his discretion. It might be some man who did not know what the law is. There are a number of cases such as the hon. gentleman describes, but there are a number of others who are more entitled to charity than to blame for what they have done.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We should impose a heavier penalty to punish the man who induces the other to personate.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—That is right.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That would be a good law. The man who would commit the offence would say: 'So and so asked me to do it' and I would say: 'Punish him doubly.'

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. minister might consider the propriety of making another subclause there for personation. There is a personation for balloting, but I think there is another kind of personation which has been brought forward lately—persons who take false names to act as agents. A case happened in Gaspé lately where a man named Lemieux acted under the name of Lamoureux. Has the hon. minister any suggestion to make about that ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

The clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 72,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to call attention to clause 72. I was otherwise engaged when it went through. I think we could make it plainer and better. The 8th line of this clause reads :

That it is the same which he furnished to the elector, and shall then, in full view of those present, including the elector, remove the counterfoil.

I want to add : 'And destroy the same.' That would prevent him slipping the counterfoil into his pocket for the purpose of ascertaining how the man voted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He could not tell by that.

At Six o'clock the committee rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS.

The committee was resumed.

On clause 127,

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is a part of this clause that I have never been able to understand. The clause reads as follows :

If, on the trial of an election petition, the court decides that a candidate at such election was guilty, by his agent or agents, of any offence that would render his election void, and the court further finds—

(a) That no corrupt practice was committed at such election by the candidate personally, and that the offences mentioned were committed contrary to the order and without the sanction or connivance of such candidate.

I have never been able to understand how a candidate could give an order to prevent the commission of an offence he knew nothing about.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Well, he does constantly.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It must only be a general order of instructions.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—A general order.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is the view I took of it, but I know the court did not hold that view in one case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know candidates who make a general declaration that nothing shall be done in contravention of the law, and then, in order to avoid personal responsibility, the candidates ignore all committees, have nothing to do with them—never go near them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And further than that, the candidate must not invite the people at a public meeting to give him their support and work for his election, and so on, because if he does, and any of the people do wrong, they are held to be his agents.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They are construed to be his agents. It is a pretty strained interpretation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was adopted in England by the courts, and followed in this country.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The same wording ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The same principle of agency.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It appears to me that there is some clashing between subsections a and b, or something which is not clearly logical. The candidate must, according to a, be able to show that the offence mentioned—that is, the offence which the judge finds to be committed by some agent—was committed contrary to his order, and without his sanction or connivance. He must also show that he took all reasonable means for preventing the commission of corrupt practices at such election. That would be warning his friends and using his own personal influence to promote a pure election. I can easily understand that, but how he could have given an order to prevent the commission of some special offence that he could not have foreseen, I do not understand.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If he gives a general order, it includes everything. Every offence must be a special one.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The gneral order is what is referred to in subsection b, but subsection a must mean a special order that would be directed against a particular offence.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

On clause 140.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There are certain penalties in reference to summonses and disobeying summonses. There is no penalty provided for witnesses who have been served with subpœnas or summonses for not attending. We have had a great deal of that ; I was going to suggest that we should add a paragraph in the following words :

Any person evading the service of a subpœna, or failing to appear after a subpœna has been served, unless a reasonable excuse has been given, the judge to be arbiter in such case, shall incur a penalty of ($).

That provides for imposing a penalty on a witness who is required to attend before an election court if he evades the service of the summons by leaving the country, or if he goes out of the country after it has been served. We have had lately a great many instances of this kind. Just as soon as an election is contested, and it is known that corrupt practices have taken place during the election, and who the witnesses are who can prove that, they go to the neighbouring republic and remain there until the trial has been finished. Trials have taken place and the cases been dismissed when it was well known that if these witnesses could have been put in the box, they could establish the charges against the candidates in many cases, and voided the elections.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no clause needed, because the power of the court to punish for contempt is the power that deals with all cases of that sort.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That may be, but that contempt consists in not obeying. If the man evades the subpœna, as we know has been the case, no punishment is provided. I know plenty of such cases. In Kingston they boasted of it afterwards. When asked : 'How in the world did you get clear and have the protest set aside' ? the answer was : 'Why the witnesses were all over in Cape Vincent.' We know what has taken place in western Ontario. They go over to Detroit and remain there, and it is known that they go there for the purpose of evading the service of the summons.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Like Mr. Foster when he was elected in King's, when he kept out of the way to avoid a recount.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—The late Finance Minister ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I never heard of the case to which the hon. gentleman refers. If he were guilty, punish him. All frauds of that kind ought to be prevented, if possible, by fine and imprisonment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You cannot punish a man unless you serve him with a subpœna. You cannot assume, because a man goes out of the country, that he goes away on that account.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—All convictions are based upon proof, and if you could prove that a man left the country for that purpose, you should punish him. If you cannot prove it, then he goes free. I should like to see a clause of that character, but I do not want to press anything which would jeopardize the passage of this Bill, because I want to see it become law.

Hon. Mr. KERR—The subpœna itself is sufficient legal machinery, if he comes back into the country and they follow it up.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the good of it ?

Hon. Mr. KERR—I do not know.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understood the hon. minister to introduce Mr. Foster's name in the category of those my hon. friend referred to as having gone out of the country for the purpose of evading giving evidence in election trials. I think my hon. friend has made a statement which is unwarranted and incorrect. The Act is not changed. We are not changing the Act with regard to the notice of a recount. The clause with reference to recount reads :—

And the judge may, at the time of the application or afterwards, direct that service of the notice upon the candidates or their agents may be substitutional, or may be made by mail or by posting, or in such other manner as he thinks fit.

Therefore it was not possible that Mr. Foster could evade a notice of a recount by keeping out of the way. I am surprised that my hon. friend should introduce Mr. Foster's name in connection with the names of persons who had been guilty of corrupt practices and gone to the United States. He introduces the name of a prominent and respected public man, which I think is highly improper, and my hon. friend has done wrong.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not see that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend's statement could not be correct, because no person could keep out of the way of a recount. The law provides that the notice may be substitutional and may be done by posting and so on.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Apologize.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—To whom ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—To the late Finance Minister.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—When I see him.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I should like to ask my hon. friend who has charge of the Bill with reference to subsection 5 of clause 140. It seems to me it should receive more consideration than we gave it as we went over it. The subsection reads as follows :—

No fine or penalty shall be imposed under this section if it appears to the court or judge that the person has already been sued with respect to the same offence, nor shall any such fine or penalty be imposed for any offence proved only by the evidence or admission of the person committing it.

I think that section furnishes a means by which any culprit could escape. All he has to do is to get some friend to sue him, and then the case might be tried and protracted and never go to trial, and the ends of justice be defeated. He could get a friend to issue a summons in all haste, before those who were after his scalp could act, and then their hands would be tied and nothing could be done. The second part of this section also requires some explanation, because I hardly see why a man, who was convicted on his own evidence, should not be punished.

The CHAIRMAN—It is in the old Act.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the hon. Minister of Justice will see that there is a possibility of defeating the ends of justice. A party who has committed a serious offence may get an accomplice, or a friend, to sue him and then the matter is tied up.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon. friend suppose that a man may be fined as often as he is brought up for the same offence ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There should be some provision that unless the party suing him proceeds with his case, some other parties might intervene. I have pointed out the weakness of the section and the loophole there is in it. I do not pretend to say that I have any remedy at hand, but I think some remedy should be provided.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Really the meaning of this clause is that where he has been sued and penalties imposed as provided in this Act, then, under certain circumstances, he should not be again tried and punished, but unfortunately, as has been pointed out by my hon. friend to my right, if he is sued, no matter what the result is, he cannot be tried under this clause.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We might add after the words 'has been sued' the following, 'to judgment or acquitted.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would that carry the penalty ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The last words of this clause 'Nor shall any such fine or penalty be imposed for any offence proved only by the evidence or admission of the person committing it.' With those clauses all a man need do, if he was going to be sued and punished, would be to go to court and admit that he committed an offence, and under that clause he would be acquitted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then what does it mean ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Somebody else would have to corroborate him. We want corroborative evidence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You cannot under this clause punish a man who acknowledges he has done wrong—that is, upon his own evidence or admission. He turns Queen's evidence against himself, and he goes clear. That is the meaning of the clause, is it not ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that intended?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, if you have no further evidence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then all I have to do, if I commit an offence against the election law, is to go and confess it, and I escape punishment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The law is as you made it. We are not changing it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is not the meaning of that clause this: when a man is examined as a witness, if he makes admissions when giving his evidence, he cannot be punished for it?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He would not be called on to criminate himself.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a case of this kind: if a man steals a horse and confesses his crime to the magistrate, if this was the law affecting a case of that kind, and no other corroborative evidence could be got, he would go clear. That is, a man is not to be committed on his own admission or evidence.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I move the adoption of subclause 6, of which I gave notice this morning.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot consent to that. My hon. friend will have to carry it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am sorry for that. I would ask my hon. friend if he would accept it. It is a departure, I admit, from the law as it stands upon the statute-book governing elections in Ontario, but we have changed the practice and the law in other provinces, and why not in this province, where we know that it will affect so many voters. I promise the hon. gentleman, speaking for myself, that if he will allow this amendment to go in, if the Commons reject it I will not fight the Bill on that account.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot consent to it. I am not objecting.

The subclause was adopted on a division.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I move the adoption of subclause 7, of which I gave notice this morning.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I suggest to the hon. gentleman that it will be desirable to insert here 'Under the preceding subsection.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know how that would affect it. This is the draft of the law clerk, after studying the matter for four hours.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Why not state that he had been a resident of that particular district for six months, or a certain time?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That would complicate it still more. The representatives of Toronto are anxious about this.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—His name will not appear on the list the deputy returning officer will have.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, that is the list he will be on. He lives in No. 1 division, and he moves to No. 2, and he can go into No. 1 and record his vote.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You might add after 'town or city' the words 'of which this polling division is a part.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, I will add those words.

The subclause was agreed to on a division.

On clause 68,

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This is the section which I wish to amend by adding clause 68*a* of which I have given notice. The hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill undertook to look into the matter and see whether that amendment, of which I gave notice this morning, will be acceptable. It is imposing a penalty on the returning officer if he violates either of the preceding sections. It reads as follows:

68 (a). In Prince Edward Island if the deputy returning officer refuses a ballot and the right to vote to any person who is willing to take the oaths prescribed by this Act and the provincial law, and has otherwise complied with the requirements of the law, or gives a ballot to and allows to vote any person who refuses to take oaths or to otherwise comply with the requirements of the law, he shall, for such offence, be liable, to any person who may sue for the same, to a penalty of two hundred dollars.

It simply provides that if the deputy returning officer violates either section 67 or 68—that is, refuses a ballot paper to the voter who complies in every respect with the law, or on the other hand, gives a ballot paper and allows a man to vote who refuses to comply with the law—he shall be liable to a fine of $200.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will ask the committee to rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. I want to further consider in what form any change in clause 69 shall be put.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 22, subclause 3,

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. minister will allow me to call attention to subclause 3 of clause 22, which reads as follows:

3. The legal custodian of any voters' list shall deliver certified copies thereof, or of any part thereof, as last revised and corrected, to any person applying therefor, on payment therefor of a fee not exceeding the fee (if any) allowed by the provincial law in the like case, and not exceeding in any case ten cents for a printed list and one cent for every two names in writing if the list or part of the list is written.

I would call attention to the discrepancy which exists between the cost of lists of the different provinces. I have a list here of the province of Nova Scotia. It is in manuscript form, and the rate is 50 cents per hundred names, and the names are given—only the names. No residence is given, or anything of that kind. If the hon. minister will compare this with the list of the province of Quebec, he will see quite a difference. In Qubeec they give the name, occupation, residence, whether the party is proprietor or owner, and the cadastral number, and the parish in which it is situated. In Quebec there are fifteen words to each name, compared with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, where there are only three words per name, counting the number. In Nova Scotia they receive 50 cents per hundred. I think it might be better to insert:

On payment of a fee not exceeding in any case ten cents for a printed list and one cent for five or six or seven or eight words.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, no. Two names a cent.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have a tariff in each province. That is not disturbed. The Crown pays the tariff which exists in the particular province.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In British Columbia they pay 25 cents per folio of 100 words, and in Quebec we have a certificate that contains over 100 words. In the other provinces those lists are not certified. I think we should adopt a tariff of so much per 100 words.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Did the hon. minister consider this question?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, in the preparation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We pay the tariff, whatever it is, in Nova Scotia, and in Quebec we pay the tariff.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is all right. I thought the tariff was fixed here.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No. This is only where there is not a fixed tariff.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again.

Bill (190) 'An Act respecting the Preservation of Game in the Yukon Territory.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENTS POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Further consideration of the message from the House of Commons disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the amendments made by the House of Commons to (Bill K) 'An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. minister might let that stand. I want to make further inquiry as to the practice in the case to which he called my attention the other day. The hon. minister said that the course that had been taken was not strictly in accordance with parliamentary practice, and I have not had time to look into the question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In order to proceed regularly, we will have to move that the House rescind the motion and move again.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I propose to do that. I propose to move for the rescinding of the motion, which was carried the other day, and to declare that we do not insist upon our amendment, but that we suggest such-and-such an amendment. I want to look into the authorities.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I was going to ask my hon. friend, seeing that his motion of proposed amendment approached very nearly the provision of the Bill as it now stands, that he should not insist on it, because my hon. friend will see that it would be scarcely fair to the House of Commons or to myself, to insist upon amending a Bill by the substitution of another clause which meant very nearly the same thing, unless the hon. gentleman could point out very clearly that there were objections to the form of expression to which his suggestion was directed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If I thought for a moment that it would be an act of unfairness to the hon. gentleman I would accept his suggestion at once, but I do not know that I am to consider whether it is in accordance with the feelings or wishes of the House of Commons. We have been five months and a half in session here, and the most important Bills have been kept to the last week, and I am not of the opinion, nor do I think there is any argument that would convince me, that we should pay any undue deference to the House of Commons on a matter upon which we have very strong opinions. My reason for moving this amendment is that I have no desire to interfere with any rights which existing corporations hold, but I have a distinct objection to extending it to any one else.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

TRADES DISPUTES CONCILIATION BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (No. 187) 'An Act to aid in the prevention and settlement of trade disputes, and to provide for the publication of statistical industrial information.'

(In the Committee.)

On clause 7,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Mulock, who has given a great deal of time and attention to this Bill, considers clause 7 very essential. It is only a clause enabling an officer to make inquiry into the facts. They recognize inquiries of that kind under chapter 114 of the Revised Statutes, and, where a quarrel exists, it may be as to the rate of wages paid elsewhere, each party may be satisfied when the facts are ascertained, and there is no reason why this clause should not pass.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This Bill is based on an English Act, I understand. I have not the English Act in my possession, and I was only anxious to find out if there was any provision in the English law similar to this clause. The explanation of the Secretary of State is exceedingly lucid, I must say.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is simply to ascertain the facts. The men may say such and such wages are paid at such and such a place, and information obtained on oath might satisfy the men.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It means that the commissioner is to send and get evidence under oath on the subject. I dare say a telegram would get the information just the same.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 10,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The proposed gazette is to be a record of the different trades in the country, the wages paid at different points, &c., simply matters of information.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that to be published by the government?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, and sold at a nominal price.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that to be in English and in French?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suppose so.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It struck me, on reading this clause casually, that it would involve a very considerable expenditure.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend says 'No,' and I think he informed the committee that about $10,000 was being put in the estimates this year in order to meet the expenditure which might arise in the establishment of this gazette. I am quite aware that the English Board of Trade, which, we know, is a department of the British government, issue a monthly bulletin, and I can very well understand that it is a very estimable thing to do; but it would be perfectly useless, unless there is a considerable amount of expenditure behind it in order to do it well. To collect these statistics and compile them in a thoroughly reliable manner, and distribute them will all mean money. In that connection, I may mention what I did before, when we were in committee on this Bill, that I have been calling the attention of this House to the necessity and importance of collecting and distributing agricultural statistics. Agriculture is the leading industry in this country, and we stand alone among the agricultural countries in not procuring and distributing agricultural information. I am well aware that the present Minister of Agriculture, like all his predecessors, has very strong views on that question. I know my hon. friend from London (Sir John Carling), when Minister of Agriculture, put his views on record when he called attention to the great necessity for collecting statistics relating to agriculture and distributing them. Though more interested in agriculture than in other industries, I would not raise the slightest opposition to getting information for the industrial population of the country; and, in making these observations, I am not finding any fault with this measure, only I hope that the government will place a larger sum than $10,000 in the estimates in order that, when they undertake to do it, they will do it well; and I have no doubt it will be found to be of great benefit and advantage to the industrial population of Canada.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is confining his observations to the Agricultural Department here, because, in Ontario bulletins are sent out every month containing not only information as to the crops, but as to labourers' wages and other information which is exceedingly useful. Ontario, at all events, is not wholly behind in that matter.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I know my hon. friend is right. Ontario has been doing a good deal of useful work in that way, but Ontario, though a very large and important part of the Dominion, is not the whole Dominion. We have a very large country, and there are absolutely no agricultural statistics collected and distributed in the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia and the territories. Something has been done in the province of Manitoba, but not very much, and it would not be necessary to duplicate the work that is being done in Ontario. Wherever a provincial government is doing work, it would be easy for the federal government to utilize the result and co-operate with them. Any province might turn in and assist in collecting statistics, but the effect of making it a Dominion work would be this: When foreigners, or people who belong to other parts of the empire, want to get agricultural information regarding Canada apply to the Department of Agriculture in Ottawa. It will be found in the report of the department year after year, there is a standing paragraph that a vast amount of inquiry is coming to the department, for agricultural statistics, which they are not able to supply. It is very desirable that it should be done. The present Minister of Agriculture mentioned a year ago that he had in view some plan by which co-operation might be obtained with the provinces in this matter of getting agricultural statistics and distributing them. I only hope that it will come forward and that it will not be too long until this whole matter wil be consummated. I mention this, not with a view to opposing the Bill before us, but to express the hope that the government may not be content to confine themselves to collecting and publishing this information for the benefit of the industrial population of the country, but will also give us what is so much required, agricultural statistics.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not object to collecting statistical information, and the publication of it, but I submit to the hon. Secretary of State whether it would not be desirable to modify the language of the clause. It is liable to lead to misapprehension. It says the minister shall establish and have charge of the department of labour. When you use such language in an Act in this country, immediately there rises before one visions of a department with a deputy head and staff of clerks. It seems to me that some more fortunate expression might have been used than 'a department.' I do not suppose the government intend to add a fourteenth department to those which already exist. I do not think it is necessary. We have too many departments already, but as regards the collection and publication of this information, it is a desirable thing, and might be put under some existing minister.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—So it will.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The point is this: I object to the expression 'a department of labour.' Cannot the minister compass his end without using that language? We might as well undertake that there shall be a department of dry goods, or something of that sort. The better way is to provide for the work, but do not call it a department.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman will see by the second clause that the word 'minister' is defined. The Governor in Council can allot the work of carrying out this branch to any of the ministers. There is the same provision in the Chinese Act. However, there is a good deal of force in what the hon. gentleman from Halifax says. My own impression is that all the provisions of this Act should be carried out without the appointment of an editor which makes an additional expense, for if you appoint an additional official you would have to pay a good deal of money—by placing it all under the charge of the government statistician of the Agricultural Department this expense could be saved. There is where, it seems to me, the work ought to be done. He has a staff of officers now for preparing certain statistics. It will require, no doubt, the addition of a practical man who is in the habit of consulting all the journals placed in his hands for the purpose of obtaining information from all parts of the world. What is more particularly required is statistics affecting our own country, but it is equally important that, while you obtain statistics showing the output of every industry in the country, that you should also ascertain the requirements of other countries, in order to enable the manufacturer to select a country to which he could send the surplus products of his factory. The work could be carried out just as well by placing it under Mr. Geo. Johnson, and with much less cost than it will to employ an extra staff, just exactly as the Chinese Act was carried out without any cost to the country, by placing it under the management of the Minister of Customs. However, there is the provision, and I have no doubt Mr. Mulock, the Postmaster General will have it placed under his charge, if so, he will require a special staff to take care of it. If it is placed under the charge of the Minister of Agriculture, he has a staff ready.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the intention of the minister is to have that publication in the two languages, it should be so stated in the Bill?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is not that in the constitution?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All official documents are published in the two languages.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Confederation Act provides for that.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. YEO, from the committee reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (191) 'An Act to amend the Post Office Act.' He said: This Bill consists of one short clause and proposes to reduce the present tariff on the carriage of newspapers from one-fourth of a cent to one-eighth of a cent. That is the only change.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, no. However, we will not trouble the hon. Secretary of State with it now. We will have the debate in committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the important element in it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I may say if the hon. gentleman will confine the Bill to his explanation there will be no opposition to it.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (155) 'An Act to amend the Militia Act.' He said: I suppose hon. gentlemen have the Bill before them.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It provides for amending sections 41, 45, and 47 of the Militia Act. It substitutes for section 41 the following:

41. In and for each of the twelve military districts hereinbefore mentioned there shall be appointed an officer, who shall have rank not below that of lieutenant-colonel, and who shall command the militia in his district, and he shall be paid at the rate of twelve hundred dollars per annum.

2. There shall also be appointed in each of the military districts aforesaid such staff officers and such other officers as are necessary, and the salaries of such staff officers shall be fixed by the Governor in Council.

3. If any two or more districts are amalgamated for administrative purposes, one such officer only shall be appointed to command the militia in the districts so amalgamated.

4. Her Majesty may adopt such designation or name of office as Her Majesty thinks proper for the officer who commands the militia in any district, and may, from time to time, change such designation or name of office.

In substitution for section 45 the Bill provides the following:

45. Officers holding commissions in the militia may be placed on the retired list with honorary rank not exceeding that of colonel, or without honorary rank, and officers now on the retired list holding commissions as lieutenant-colonel may be promoted to the rank of colonel, under regulations approved by the Governor in Council.

2. Officers from the retired list may be re-appointed to the active list or such other list as is from time to time authorized; but no officer so re-appointed shall be compelled to serve in a lower rank than that with which he retired.

Section 47 is amended and the following section substituted therefor:

47. In time of peace no person except the officer commanding the militia shall hold higher rank in the militia than that of colonel; but Her Majesty may, whenever the militia is called out for active service in the field, appoint therein other officers of rank superior to that of colonel, but not higher in any case than that of major general.

These are the provisions of the three substituted sections which this Bill is intended to provide.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is materially changed from the Bill as first introduced, but we will discuss it in committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS BILL.

RETURNED FROM THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (189), 'An Act to amend the Act respecting the judges of Provincial Courts,' and to acquaint the Senate that the Commons cannot agree with the amendments made by the Senate for the following reasons:

1. Because by section 92 of the British North America Act, it is provided that in each province, the legislature will have exclusive power to make laws concerning 'the administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction and including procedure in civil matters in those courts';

2. Because by section 96 of the same Act, it is provided that the Governor General shall appoint the judges of all courts organized by provincial legislatures (except those of the courts of Probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick);

3. Because by an Act of the legislature of the province of Quebec, passed in 1899, viz., 62 Vic., ch. 29, it was provided that the constitution of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec should be amended, and that the said court should be composed of thirty-four judges, the object being to give three additional judges to the district of Montreal;

4. Because the object of the first section of the present Bill, which was rejected by the Senate, is to comply with the duty imposed upon the federal government and parliament by the aforesaid section 96 of the British North America Act, in so far as the above action of the legislature of Quebec is concerned;

5. Because the act of the Senate in rejecting the said section of this Bill is an infringement of the principle of provincial autonomy secured in the British North America Act.

Ordered, that the Clerk of the House do carry the said message to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the message from the House of Commons be taken into consideration to-morrow at the first sitting.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I think it is necessary that we should have a little longer time to consider the objections that have been made to the amendment, and I should like to read the debates which have taken place to acquaint myself with the reasons advanced to justify the course taken by the Commons, and as it is not a matter of paramount importance to consider that to-morrow, it might be taken up on Monday.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know what will be coming up to-morrow. We will take up the other business first, and if it is necessary to postpone it to Monday it will be done. We are not going to press it against my hon. friend's wishes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—With that understanding I will not oppose the hon. gentleman's motion.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I should like to inquire of the government if it is the intention to prorogue on Saturday or on Monday.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot inform my hon. friend as to that, because if the hon. leader of the opposition wants till Monday to consider this Bill, of course we cannot adjourn until we get through with the business which has been brought before us, and the Supply Bill—I do not know whether we will get that to-morrow or not. I have no idea of the state of progress in public business in the House of Commons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They are not through yet.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I propose that we shall meet to-morrow at 11 a.m.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is impossible to prorogue to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or on Monday.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In that case we do not want two sittings to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, yes. We want to get through the business.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is agreed that this Bill will not come up to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not agreed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If not I will object to the motion to sit to-morrow morning.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman can not object.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Where is the 24 hours' notice? I can object. I want it to be understood this matter will not come up to-morrow. We are willing to do all the other business, but that matter is too important to bring up to-morrow when we have not had time to study it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. minister, in reply to my request to fix the Bill for Monday, said that if we were not prepared to go on with it to-morrow, at our request he would postpone it till Monday.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Any hon. senator stating he is not prepared can have it postponed till Monday.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, if the hon. gentleman is not prepared I will make the request.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the House adjourns, I wish to call the attention of the ministers to some two returns that I moved for some time ago, one of them having reference to the Paris Exposition, and the expenses connected with it, and the other to orcharding experiments in Prince Edward Island. They were both moved for in June. I wish to call attention to them in order that they may be brought down.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman will get them next session.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, these are small matters, and there should be no trouble in getting them before prorogation. Will the hon. minister see that they are brought down?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have a return here of a statement showing in detail the work undertaken and the expenditure incurred and the results obtained in the experimental operations carried on in the last year in regard to orcharding in Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is one of them, and the other is in regard to the expenditure incurred in reference to the Paris Exposition.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will inquire from Mr. Fisher.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. minister would look in his desk, perhaps he would find a couple of answers to my inquiries, which are missing.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Saturday, July 14, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at Eleven o'clock a.m.

ELECTION LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (133) 'An Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to members of the House of Commons.'

(In the Committee.)

On clause 68,

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I move that clause 68 be adopted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I gave notice that I would propose an amendment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—With regard to that amendment, I have to say that I could only consent to it going in the Bill upon condition that the words 'entitled to vote and is' are put at the end of the second line. The motion reads at present:

In Prince Edward Island, if the deputy returning officer refuses a ballot and the right to vote to any person who is entitled to vote and is willing to take the oath prescribed by this Act and the provincial law, and has otherwise complied with the requirements of the law, or gives a ballot and allows to vote any person who refuses to take such oaths, or otherwise comply with the requirements of the law, he shall, for such offence, be liable to any person who may sue for the same to a penalty of $200.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have no objection.

The motion was adopted as amended.

On clause 69,

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This clause is satisfactory as it stands, as far as I am concerned, but with a view of getting an expression of opinion here, which seemed to be the opinion of the majority, I propose to substitute a section for the one that is in the Bill. There is very little change. The proposed clause reads as follows:

69. Notwithstanding anything contained in any Act of parliament or in any Act of a provincial legislature, no person otherwise qualified to vote at an election of a member to serve in the House of Commons shall be incompetent to vote at such election by reason only of his having been absent from the electoral district in which such election is held, and in which he would otherwise be entitled to vote by reason of his serving with or being attached to any corps despatched from Canada for military service, or performing military service in Canada, whether as an officer, non-commissioned officer or private, or in any other capacity, or while serving Her Majesty in any military capacity or acting as a war correspondent in connection with any war in which the Canadian contingent is serving.

2. From which oath any such person tendering his vote at such an election may be required to take, there shall, in the case of any person within the meaning of subsection 1 of this section, be omitted any statements as to residence which such person cannot, by reason of such absence as aforesaid, truthfully make, there may be added to any such oath the following paragraph:

That you served with or were attached to the corps known as ———— as an officer, non-commissioned officer or private, or otherwise, as the case may be; or that you served Her Majesty in connection with ———— war in a military capacity as ———— or in connection with ————, or as a war correspondent.

Making the oath correspond to the change.

Hon. Mr. MILLS— My hon. friend proposes to make an amendment to clause 20.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—On further reflection, I do not propose to make any change, though strong representations were made to me on the subject. There are two penalties proposed by the provincial law which it was thought would not be applicable under this law, but it refers to cases where the polls would be congested. That does not occur now, where the electoral district is divided up into so many small polls. When they used to poll 500 or 600 votes at a poll, there was a danger. Now there is none, and I do not see any necessity for making the change.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the last line of schedule number 3, hon. gentlemen will notice these words, 'section 9, so far as it applies to Manitoba.' Section 9 of the Franchise Act declares:

9. Where under the laws of a province the voters' lists for any provincial electoral district or division or any of them are prepared, not at regular intervals, but at such times as are fixed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, or some other provincial or local authority, or only from time to time for the purpose of a general or other election in immediate contemplation, the last preceding voters' lists so prepared shall be used for the purpose of any Dominion election in the territory comprised in such provincial electoral district or division, or the parts thereof for use in which they were prepared if such lists have been prepared not more than one year before the date of the writ for such Dominion election; otherwise, new voters' lists shall be prepared, and for the purpose of preparing and giving effect to such voters' lists the Governor in Council may appoint all necessary officers and confer upon them all necessary powers, and in the preparation and revision and bringing into force of such new voters' lists the provisions of the laws of the province regulating the preparation and revision and bringing into force of the provincial voters' lists in such cases shall, as far as possible, be observed and followed.

Now, in Manitoba, as hon. gentlemen are aware, the lists in the past have only been prepared just before a general election last year, when it became necessary to hold an election there, we appointed officers to revise the lists. Before we had proceeded far, the provincial officers prepared a list in view of the general election, and so ours was cancelled. There are three cities in Quebec in the same position, Montreal, Quebec and Three Rivers, and therefore section 9 ought to be repealed in toto, because it only refers to constituencies where the revision of the lists does not take place each year. In the House of Commons they repealed it so far as Manitoba was concerned. That seemed to be the only case that was brought to their notice, whereas it affects these three cities in the province of Quebec. I propose to repeal the whole of section 9 of the Franchise Act, so that the last revised lists, which were prepared lately in those three cities, may be used. Because, I see by the Quebec Act, except in the case of Montreal, Quebec and Three Rivers, a list is prepared yearly by the secretary treasurer, of each municipality. The lists for Montreal, Quebec and Three Rivers are prepared under special provisions. Under the Manhood Suffrage Act in Ontario, the lists can only be made up after the writ of election has issued. Section 9 was drawn up to govern just such cases as Manitoba, and without having any other constituencies in view.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If clause 9 is repealed what will regulate the preparation of the lists in Quebec ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Their last official list, whatever it is.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is done by the ninth section.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is a very important suggestion which has been made by the Secretary of State, and certainly requires some consideration. Speaking for myself, I have not had time to look into the effect that the repealing of this section would have, I remember distinctly that when this Franchise Act was passed, there was a good deal of discussion in the lower House upon the principle contained in this very clause. I remember that these difficulties were suggested then. The hon. Secretary of State has spoken of the province of Quebec. As I understand, from the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, the lists are revised there every two years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Except in those three places I have mentioned, they are revised every year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the difficulty would not arise. The contention on the part of the representatives of the cities in Ontario was, that in case of a by-election the lists might be so old as to disfranchise a large section of the residents of the city, more particularly of the young men. That would be after the adoption of Manhood Suffrage, and it was argued that in case a voters' list was a year old, or even six months old, even then it would disfranchise a great many, and the concession was made to the representatives of the city of Toronto in particular. I remember Mr. Clark calling attention to it and arguing the question for some time. He asked to have a new list in case of a by-election, or any election, if the list was over six months old. A compromise was arrived at that the expense of a new list should not be incurred unless the existing voters' lists was a year old. And that is the reason why I moved that amendment yesterday, so as to preserve the rights of the younger men, or of older men who might move from one part of the city to the other. Will not the repeal of this 9th clause of the Franchise Act completely nullify the objects that the representatives of the city had when they insisted upon having this clause placed on the statute-book ? It may or may not. Not having had time to look at it, I am not prepared to say whether I am correct or not, but that is the view that suggested itself to me.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The general principle of of the Franchise Act is that we must adopt the provincial franchise. We are obliged to do that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Except as otherwise provided.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Any person entitled to vote at a provincial election is entitled to vote at a parliamentary election. Under the Ontario statute, what is called the manhood suffrage vote is a vote made up at the very last moment after the writ of election has issued.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is speaking of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, exclusively. It is made up, and there is a board named in the statutes. They are certain officials. It applies to the cities and the county towns. The only place outside the county towns which is included is the town of Niagara.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, I understand that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Under the statute that list is made up after the writ of election has issued, and it can only be completed, therefore, just a few days before the actual polling takes place. The officers are named in the statute in different places; the county officials from what is called the registration board. They issue a notice and all young men who are on the list, and who claim to be permitted to vote under the manhood suffrage vote, call and have their names registered. They must be three months resident in the electoral district. That is the proper qualification. That vote will have to be taken under the law as I read it in the province of Ontario in the next general election, and the authorities that are charged with the making up of that list will have to be the authorities that the federal government must appoint to prepare that list. As I read section 9, outside of that altogether if there are any localities where the lists are not made up annually, then a new list would have to be devised, as in the case of Manitoba. In the province of Quebec, as I have said, in all parts of the province except the three cities I have named, the city of Quebec, the city of Montreal and Three Rivers, the lists are made up regularly. They are all now received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. Unless section 9 is repealed, the lists for Montreal, Quebec and Three Rivers, if more than one year old, would have to be revised by a special commission, and I do not think that is desirable.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the very principle of this clause. The hon. gentleman has not answered my question, or perhaps I did not put it clearly. Take the city of Toronto at present: there is a vacancy caused by the unfortunate death of the member for Centre Toronto, Mr. Bertram. Supposing a writ were issued for an election now, it would be the last voters' list upon which that election would be held. As I understand it the voters' list is over twelve months old—nearly two years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no. I have the list here.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Well, I will put a suppositious case. Supposing it is over a year old, and you repeal this clause upon what voters' list would you go to the electors?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The last one received. Under the Franchise Act, there is a heavy penalty on the officers if they fail to send them. In Ontario the lists, as a rule, are not really completed till December or January. The list for 1899, only began to come in in December. The majority of them came in January and February. As hon. gentlemen know, in Ontario, after the return of the assessment roll, and the making up of the list, there is an appeal to the court of revision.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But the hon. gentleman is not dealing with the Franchise Act as it affect every consttuency outside of the cities and towns. I take the city of Toronto. I think the last revised list received by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery was in December or January, perhaps a little later. I can find out the exact date. Before January next there will be another list.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. minister is speaking of the list compiled from the assessment roll.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am referring to the registration of voters.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Manhood suffrage.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Supposing we ordered an election in the city of Toronto, after the writ was issued we would have to appoint the same board that are designated under the Ontario Act, to make up a list of the manhood suffrage vote in the city of Toronto.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Even with this clause?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is all I want to get at.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You would have to interpret the Franchise Act in its most liberal sense or you would be disfranchising persons entitled to vote at the Dominion election unless you did so, and I will give an illustration. Since this Act has been passed, wherever an election has been held, in a town or city affected by it, that commission was issued.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand all that, but I want to know what the effect would be if we repealed this clause which gives the power——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not under that. It is under the Ontario Statute.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where do you get the power to appoint the board ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand the matter in this way : if we were to repeal this clause, the manhood suffrage that we would have would be the last one prepared by the local legislature for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Ontario Act gives us power to prepare a list. It does not provide a list for us at all. It is by our own legislation that we make their list ours. This section reads :

> Where under the laws of a province the voters' lists for any provincial electoral district or division, or any of them, are prepared, not at regular intervals, but at such times as are fixed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, this Act shall operate.

If they are prepared at regular intervals, although those intervals may be more than a year, I take it that there would be no power of revision, and for that reason, I think the lists prepared in the cities of Montreal, Three Rivers, and Quebec, although only biennial lists, would not be affected by this provision, because they are prepared at regular intervals.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But at such times as are fixed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council. Where does the Lieutenant Governor in Council fix periods for revising the list? The Lieutenant Governor in Council does so in the province of Ontario so far as it relates to certain towns and cities, and therefore this clause applies to those towns and cities. The clause proceeds :

> Or some other provincial or local authority, or only from time to time for the purpose of a general or other election in immediate contemplation, the last preceding voters' lists so prepared shall be used for the purpose of any Dominion election in the territory comprised in such provincial list or division, or the parts thereof, for use in which they were prepared, if such lists have been prepared not more than one year before the date.

Hon Sir. MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There may be lists prepared more than a year before date, but if they are prepared at regular intervals, they do not come under the provisions of this Act, but those that are prepared not at regular intervals, but at such times as the Lieutenant Governor in Council thought proper to order their preparation, then such list, if not more than a year old, may be used and a new list must be prepared, and so this was intended to provide for the case in the city of London. There is a list there three years old now, so far as the manhood suffrage vote is concerned.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL. That is the registration ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. That list could not be used because it is more than a year old and a new list would become necessary, so far as that manhood suffrage vote was concerned.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is under clause 9.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. Then the same power is given to the Governor in Council to appoint officers to prepare a manhood suffrage Dominion list in conformity with the law of Ontario, the men having the same qualifications that the Ontario law gives, for preparing the manhood suffrage list for Dominion purposes. Supposing you had in Ontario a government that would refuse to prepare a list and would say 'our statute authorizes us to prepare the list for provincial purposes, and when a writ by the lieutenant-governor has been issued, but we have nothing to do with your Dominion election, and having nothing to do with your Dominion election, we do not propose to provide for the constitution of the board, or do any one of those things which our law requires for our own purpose, then this was intended to confer upon the Governor in Council to do in the province of Ontario precisely the same thing that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may do after the issue of a provincial writ for the holding of a provincial election, and from that point of view, I think if we were to repeal this clause it would be impossible in the province of Ontario to prepare a manhood suffrage list in the towns and cities.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is precisely the view I took of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think if we take that out, that will be the result.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am very much afraid that if we repeal that law, after the explanation given by the hon. Minister of Justice, which accorded with my own view, as a layman, that we may compel a by-election to be held in the city of Toronto, at any time on a list which may be one, or two or three years old. Supposing Mr. Beatty were to vacate the seat in London by death or in any other way, and the government should issue a writ, with this clause repealed you would be obliged to go to the vote in the city of London on a voters' list three years old, and I want to point out that if the hon. gentleman wants this Bill passed, I am afraid he will find there will be a good deal of discussion and objection to taking away from the Dominion government the power which they now hold under this clause, for the reason which I have given. There is another law which has been passed since that in the Ontario consolidated statutes from which the Secretary of State has read, which gives the power to the Premier of Ontario and the leader of the opposition, if they jointly desire it, to have a new registration in the case of an election or by-election taking place for the local legislature.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But that is for provincial purposes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, that is what I am pointing out, and if that new registration of voters took place a month before the by-election for the Dominion, you would have to use that list.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If this clause is repealed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Whether it is repealed or not, because that would be the last revised list of voters for the city, and you would take that without going to the expense of empowering the board, which is constituted under the local law, for having another registration. There would be no necessity for it. The hon. Minister of Justice has taken precisely the same view that I have taken. It is not necessary to argue how the voters' lists are constituted in the rural districts of the country. That has been in force for a number of years. I am not going to oppose the repeal of this section if the government think it is necessary, but the hon. minister will find some difficulty in getting it through the Commons at this stage, particularly with the view which the Toronto members hold.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not in the slightest degree considered the possibility of any government ignoring the manhood suffrage vote, because I believe the law giving the voter the right to vote in so general and so large. It reads :

> The qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote thereat shall be those established by the laws of that province to entitle such person to vote in the same manner as at a provincial election.

I have laways construed that to mean that under that the government were bound, in holding an election in any locality where the manhood suffrage came in, to adopt the machinery of the provincial authorities. It was not necessary to get the consent of the provincial authorities. That board is an existing board. It is made up of the county judge, the county registrar and certain officials. I am not going to press the point. If the opinion of the House is that it is so clear, I do not desire to press my own view, only I considered that the ruling principle in section 9 was that no list should be more than one year old. Where you say that it does not apply when the lists are made up at regular periods, the lists may be only made up every three or four years, and it would be a monstrous proposition to say that a list four years old should be used. Under my proposition the lists could not be more than a year old—absolutely impossible, and the manhood suffrage vote must, under any circumstances, be made after the writs have been issued. However, I am not going to press my view.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. Minister of Justice has just told us that in the city in which he lives the list is three years old. The hon. gentleman has got beside the question. No one accused the government of desiring to interfere with the manhood suffrage. All we wanted to know was what effect this would have on the election in cities and towns, if this were repealed. The hon. gentleman has given an explanation with which I am fully in accord. If the hon. minister takes the responsibility of throwing difficulties in the way, I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—What is the clause for repealing section 9, so far as it applies to Manitoba ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In Manitoba they are making up a list now, I understand. They had a list made up, as the hon. gentleman knows, at a late period last year, and under the law passed at the recent meeting of the legislature, they proposed making up their lists annually. At least, I am so advised.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE—I have an amendment, or an addition, with reference to the electoral districts of New Brunswick. In that province we have not the one-man-one-vote provision. I wish we had.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am glad that they have not.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE—But we have a great many non-residents not residing in the polling districts in which their property is situated. Most of them reside in the cities, in St. John and in other parts of the province, and the law as it stands here will compel them to go to their distant polling places in order to cast their vote on election day. In New Brunswick it was found so necessary that they made a provision that the non-resident voter may, by signifying his wish, have his name transferred from the district in which his property is situated to some district which would be on a railway station, or some district where it would be convenient for him to vote. In constituencies which I know of, there are about 500 non-resident votes, and a large proportion, about one-half of those, is generally got to the poll. It is a good deal of trouble and causes delay to the voters themselves to get to the polling district. The local House of Assembly passed a provision which I propose moving to insert in this Bill. It reads as follows :

That in such cases a written request signed by the elector shall be delivered to the returning officer stating the polling district in which the elector's name is registered, and the district to which he wishes his name transferred, and the signature of the elector shall be verified on oath by some person, a witness of the same, and the ratification thereof, with a written request, shall be filed by the returning officer, and be open to the inspection of any elector upon request.

I wish to have this inserted in the Bill so that it would prevent a great deal of trouble and expense in the non-residents getting to their respective polling booths. The fact is that many of these non-residents own property and it is generally situated in distant districts, and it would entail a good deal of trouble to get to those districts to vote. In the county of Sunbury there are eight polling places and only three polling places supplied by railway accommodation, and the usual practice in New Brunswick is to transfer those names to some polling district on a railway line, to which place they can go and return again quickly. It may take days to get to the polling district, and it will only take a few hours to go to the place where they would likely be transferred.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Subsection f, of section 5, of the Franchise Act reads as follows :

(f) The provisions of the law of the province as to places where non-resident electors shall vote shall apply 'mutatis mutandis' to such Dominion election, and the returning officer at such election shall have the powers and be charged with the duties of the sheriff or returning officer under those provisions; but nothing herein shall enable any person to vote by schedule or otherwise than by appearing personally.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is acted on in the province of British Columbia, I know, because there they vote in the way the hon. gentleman proposes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is completely covered.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand that the provincial law of New Brunswick enables a rural voter to vote at the nearest polling place, but it must be within the constituency ?

Hon. Mr. BURPEE—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I know under that clause they vote at the poll that is most convenient.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In that province it is evident they recognize a property qualification, which we do not in Ontario. I wish it were so all over.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It may be that some verbal changes will be required in the schedules to make them conform to the Bill. If so, I suppose there will be no objection to amending the schedules ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They can be amended in time for the third reading.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

THE POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed, in Committee of the Whole, consideration of Bill (191) 'An Act to amend the Post Office Act.'

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Bill consists of one clause which is as follows :

1. The section substituted, by section 3 of chapter 20 of the statutes of 1898, for section 26 of the Post Office Act is amended by inserting after the word 'weight' in the twenty-second line, the following words: 'for transmission beyond the province or territory wherein they are published, and at the rate of one-eighth of 1 cent for each pound weight or any fraction of a pound weight, for transmission within such province or territory.'

I have section 26 referred to here. It is as follows :

On and after the 1st day of January, 1899, newspapers and periodicals published in Canada, mailed by the publisher in the post office at the place where they are published and addressed to regular subscribers or news-dealers in Canada, resident elsewhere than in the place of publication, shall be transmitted by mail to their respective addresses as follows: If they are required to be transmitted by mail a distance within twenty miles from the place of publication, or within a circular area of a diameter not exceeding forty miles, and if their publication is of no greater frequency than once a week, they shall be so transmitted free of postage within one or other of such areas, to be selected by the publisher in accordance with regulations in that behalf to be established by the Postmaster General.

That is what is called the free zone which affects weekly newspapers. The remainder of the section has to be particularly noted :

If they are required to be transmitted a greater distance, or if their publication is of greater frequency than once a week, then in either of such cases postage thereon shall be paid on and after the said 1st day of January and until and inclusive the 30th day of June next following, at the rate of one-quarter of 1 cent and thereafter at the rate of one-half of 1 cent, for each pound weight or any fraction of a pound weight, which shall be prepaid by postage stamps or otherwise.

It is proposed to reduce the rate there to one-eighth of a cent for transmission beyond the province or territory wherein they are published. The general reduction is half of what it was before. It is alleged that some newspapers are placed at a disadvantage—those that have a circulation outside of the province. It is quite impossible to frame a clause that would meet all cases, because the character of the circulation is not at all alike and, therefore, it is thought by reducing the charge one-half of what it had been, that that would be the most reasonable concession that could be made. Hon. gentlemen are aware that many of the newspapers—those with a large circulation—cost the Post Office Department a very considerable sum to transmit them. The rate charged does not pay the cost. There are occassions when, I am told, it takes two cars to carry the issue of a single newspaper—the Saturday issue. That is carried at a large expense to the country. Of course the rate fixed here does not at all cover the cost, but it is something on account. Where the circulation of a newspaper has swollen to fifty or 75,000 copies, it costs a very considerable sum to carry it through the mails. There is no reason why newspapers should go free and letters be charged. Newspapers embrace a very much larger volume than letters, and the proposal seems reasonable, although it may not affect all equally.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It is difficult to meet all cases, but in this case if the government were to remove the distinction between one province and another, I think it would meet all objections.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We have had during the present parliament most extraordinary propositions in legislation. The principle of our confederation is the closest possible intercourse between the provinces, and also between sister colonies. To-day every party is advocating what is called the United Empire. The very principle of the confederation is to bring together all the provinces, and that the intercourse between those provinces should be as unrestricted as possible in every particular. Yet we have here this extraordinary proposition laid before parliament that a tax shall be imposed on a newspaper if it passes from one province to another. The Secretary of State just told us that it was unfair to the revenue to carry a large quantity of newspapers through the country, as it costs them so much more than to carry letters. You can send a letter from Ottawa to Vancouver for two cents, or you can send a letter from Vancouver to Hull for two cents, but under the proposed law a publisher in Ottawa, if they want to send a newspaper from Ottawa to Rat Portage and beyond that until they strike the boundary line of Manitoba they send it under this Act for an eighth of one cent per pound. But if he has a pound of newspaper matter that he wants to send across the Ottawa to Hull, a distance of less than two miles, the charge would be five mills, and the Postmaster General tells us that this is based upon an equitable principle of paying for the distances you carry the commodity. I do not wish to be disrespectful, but a more violent attack upon the very principles of confederation could not by any possibility be suggested to parliament. What reason is there in this? Why should we be asked to perpetrate an Act of this kind unless it is to gratify some—what shall I call it? spite—No, I will not say that—but to gratify a morbid sense of what they consider duty to the country, and to injure the publshers of certain newspapers. I am glad to see that even the most servile of the ministerial press, are entering their protest against a proposition of this kind. They enter the protest because it is unfair in principle; it is in opposition, I repeat, to all the theories and opinions we have ever had. These gentlemen are going back to the middle ages on the question of postage. I can remember when a young man, when I sent a letter from Belleville to Kingston it cost 4½ pence, to Cornwall 9 pence, and to England 1s. 4½d. Now, you can send all over the world from Canada a letter for two cents, but the unfortunate newspaper is to be restricted for cheap postage, to the province in which it is published. Why not carry the principle further? Why not restrict it to the city or town in which it is published? The principle is precisely the same. If you post a newspaper in the province of Ontario to be delivered in the city of Montreal, or the city of Ottawa, the man goes and gets it, or the letter carrier delivers it to him. Why not put a smaller tax upon that than you would if you sent it from Montreal to Vancouver? For the life of me I cannot understand it unless there is something behind it that we do not know. I find that the Montreal Herald —and no one will accuse that paper of ever publishing anything against the government—deals with this in the following fashion:

> Mr. Mulock proposes an amendment to the law relating to the payment of postage on newspapers which will have the effect of reducing the burden borne by provincial papers, but will leave the existing rate to be paid by publishers of papers circulating outside the province in which they are printed. The change implies discrimination, in addition to that which prevails under the law as it stands, and which has been an objectionable feature of that law.

That is precisely the principle which appears to actuate these gentlemen, and the doctrine on which they are legislating during the last four or five years. I can call attention to several cases: The Stewart case, a case where they attemped to take away the rights of the owner of property by ex post facto legislation—a number of such cases which parliament rejected, as I hope they will reject this Bill on the principle I have laid down. The Herald article continues:

> At present, newspapers are entitled to free carriage through the mails within a zone immediately surrounding the place of publication, beyond that zone postage at the rate of half a cent a pound having to be paid. Obviously, this is discrimination in favour of one particular class of publications—the local weeklies. Now it is proposed to establish another favoured class, embracing the publications that are purely provincial in their circulation. These are to be carried at one-eighth of a cent a pound, while the half cent rate continues to be applied on all papers passing beyond the provincial boundary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been reduced to one-eighth cent.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am reading from the Herald. Whether the rate is one-eigth or one-half a cent, the principle is the same. The Herald continues:

> Equality of taxation, equality of charge for equality of service, is a fundamental principle of government which appears to be ignored in the proposition now before the House. It does not cost the Post Office Department more to carry papers from one province into another than from one part of a province to another, although, as the department pays the railways according to space occupied per train mile, those publishers whose circulation is the most widely distributed will impose a heavier burden on the department for each pound of mail carried than will the publishers with a more concentrated circulation. But this increased cost bears no relation to provincial boundaries. An Ottawa paper with a large circulation in western Ontario would put the department to heavier expense than a Montreal paper circulating in eastern Ontario. Mr. Mulock is, no doubt, seeking to make publishers pay according to the service they receive, and he perhaps feels that the provincial zone system will provide a fair, if somewhat rough, measure of justice. A fairer and more equitable system, and one free from complications of any kind, is that adopted in dealing with the carriage of letters—an absolutely equal charge for equality of weight, no matter what the distance. What is now proposed is that the publishers who have enterprise enough to push the circulation of their journals beyond the confines of one province, or who are located in a city near a boundary line, must bear a heavier proportion of the expenses of the Post Office Department than their less enterprising or more fortunately situated brethren.

The zone system, either in the limited degree in which it is now applied, or in the wider exemplification of it to which we are to be treated, is unwise and unjust, inasmuch as it is distinctly discriminatory in its character. In postal matters, as in all others, there should be but one law for all.

What a picture this presents to the world of having a reform administration legislating as thus described by one of their own supporters, in favour of a favoured class, a system and a doctrine that they have been repudiating for the last fifty years. It only shows they are getting back to antiquated days and want to re-establish a a principle that existed half a century ago Then, the Ottawa Free Press—and no one will accuse that paper of saying much against the present administration——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, not much.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Free Press gives utterance to these sentiments in yesterday's issue:

The Montreal 'Witness' strongly deprecates the provincial boundary system in connection with newspaper postage. The Montreal 'Witness' probably voices the opinion of the majority of publishers, and probably readers also.

Now, I could easily understand why the Witness should take such strong grounds against this measure. The Witness circulates largely in the province of Ontario, and because it has a circulation outside of its own province, it is to be taxed double the amount that it would have to pay if circulated in its own province. There are other newspapers in precisely the same category. Now, the Montreal Witness, is declared to be a very independent paper, but its independence consists in always supporting the government, though it may occasionally denounce candidates in the city of Montreal. When it come to any issue, it falls into line, and votes according to the instructions of its own party or its own inclinations. The Witness deals with the question as follows:

The Postmaster General's new Bill reducing to almost nothing the postage on newspapers within the province of publication, far from mending the deliberate injustice of his former measure, of placing a distinctive tax upon city publications, while giving preferential privileges to country newspapers, is a serious aggravation of that tyrannical injustice.

That is not bad language for one Liberal to apply to another, but it is so truthful I could not help placing it on record. The article continues:

Why Mr. Mulock, of all people, desires to develop provincialism in the newspapers of Canada, and keep one province from intercourse with another, it is hard to conceive. He has been talked of as an expectant knight for the breadth of his policy in breaking down the lines of demarkation between one British country and another, and for that feat he certainly deserves the honour. Yet here he sets up distinctions between the provinces of Canada such as enormously favour his own province and give him effective vengeance on the Montreal papers, which so vigorously condemned him. How can he and Sir Wilfrid Laurier now face each other—Sir Wilfrid who went into such rhapsodies of patriotism against the iniquity of giving one province a deliverance from drink-selling that another did not have, and the prospective Sir William, who deliberately fines newspapers for going beyond their own provinces or out of the country. This new Bill is little else than a special tax and handicap on certain Montreal newspapers, which are the only ones which have the bulk of their circulation outside of their province. We have always favoured newspaper postage, but we are not favourable to its being collected off a few papers, and thus making them pay for the carriage of their rivals.

That is a fair exposition of the Bill which is now before us, and the policy of the Postmaster General, with the sanction, of course, of his colleagues unless we are to have another inroad upon the principles of responsible government. We have been told in the past that each minister is to suggest such changes in the laws, and to govern his department upon his own responsibility, irrespective of the responsibility devolving upon the whole cabinet, and it is just possible the Postmaster General may have introduced this Bill 'off his own bat,' as the saying is, without the knowledge or consent of his colleagues, and one would suppose so on looking at the debates which have taken place on this Bill in the House of Commons. We find even the Premier objecting to the principle of the Bill. Whether he is the master or the servant of the Postmaster General, the country must decide. He says, in discussing this matter, that newspapers are as much entitled to pay postage as letters.

Although, I have been in the newspaper business all my life, when acting as a minister of the Crown, I have always advocated that. Although, I was a member of the government that took the postage off newspapers, still I had always grave doubts as to the correctness of that policy, and being interested in a newspaper now, I would a thousand times rather see the law remain as it is and have double the tax, if thought advisable, than to have a law put upon the Statute-book making a discrimination in favour of one province against another. We have enough race, creed and religious cries in this country, and this is only intensifying it in a secular manner. Sir Wilfrid goes on to say :

As to the restriction of the reduction to provincial limits, there might be something in the objection to it; indeed in conversation with the postmaster general he had suggested geographical rather than political, or provincial boundaries.

But, though he made that suggestion, which was a much more sensible one, but which should not be adopted in this country, the Postmaster General evidently had his own way, showing that he was master of the situation no matter what the views or opinions of his Premier might be. Mr. Bergeron, in his remarks against this Bill, pointed out that it had every appearance of being framed to get after papers in Montreal. Well, perhaps it had. I do not know, but it looked very much like it. Mr. Bergeron proceeds :

The 'Star' and 'Witness' circulated generally in Canada, while 'La Presse' circulated extensively among the expatriated French Canadians in the United States.

From which he argued that a Canadian paper with Canadian sentiments, and with love of its country circulating among the expatriated French Canadians, who are very numerous in the eastern sections of the United States, might induce them to return to their own country, but if any literature of that kind is sent among them, you must tax the publisher and the man who sends it four and one-half times more than what you charge him if he circulated it in his own province. I do not wish to repeat the charge which Mr. Wallace made against the Postmaster General of being interested in newspapers, and that he was doing this for his own benefit, but what surprised me was that, a charge of that kind being made, it was not repudiated by the Postmaster General, because one can scarcely conceive, whatever he might do for political reasons, that he would do it for his own pecuniary benefit. I should be very sorry to attribue that to the Postmaster General, or to any other minister, but I do not hesitate to attribute the motive to him of putting a tax upon a class of papers which circulated largely in other provinces than that in which they are published, because he thinks the political influence which is exercised by those papers, is inimical to the interests which he, as a politician on behalf of his party, possesses. He could not hit these papers that he desires to hit, without striking some of his own, and he little thought, I fancy, that he was striking a blow at papers like the Montreal Herald which, thanks to the energy and enterprise of a young Ontario man who has taken hold of the paper which had always been a failure for fifteen or twenty years before, is now becoming a success. Speaking politically, I am sorry it is gaining ground and circulating very largely in Ontario. The Postmaster General could not hit other papers that he wants to suppress without striking his friends, and it is for the House to say whether, under the circumstances, they will sanction a Bill of this kind. I have no objection to a reduction of postage to one-eighth of a cent, if it is considered in the interest of the public, in the education of the people, that the reduction should be made and to apply uniformly all over the country ; but if it is to be accompanied with a discriminating tax upon the publishers in one province when they send their papers into another, then I say I would much rather see the law remain as it stands upon the Statute-book, and whether the government and the Postmaster General would accept an amendment of that kind, striking out that discriminatory portion of his Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is a revenue Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then we will defeat the Bill if we can. The minister says it is a revenue Bill, which is a gentle hint that we have no right to change it. In that respect I differ from him again, if he will permit me to say so. I know that the Commons of Canada have the right to make any motion for the reduction of a tax, while they have no power to make a motion to increase a tax, and if you strike out that portion of the Bill which imposes a discriminatory tax and a higher tax, it would be lowering the tax on the people and not increasing it. However, if the interpretation of the constitution is such that we have no right to amend a money Bill, I am very much inclined to think that the only alternative for those who disapprove of the Bill is to vote against it. For the reasons I have given. I certainly would not hesitate a moment to vote against it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have only to repeat my opinion of the utter absurdity of the proposition. You take 100 pounds of newspapers and send it from Ottawa, 2,000 miles until you reach the border of Manitoba or Keewatin, and you send it there for 12½ cents. If you send the same parcel across to Hull, two miles, you pay fifty cents. Is there any reason or sense that such a law should be placed upon the statute-book? But a still greater objection I have is the placing upon the statute-book a law which imposes a tax upon any commodity that goes from one province to another. Supposing you put a discriminatory tax upon a crate of cabbage. It is something that is shipped every day. I mention that because I do not suppose there is a place in America that produces a better quality of that vegetable than the district of Montreal, and we know that it is shipped all over the Dominion. Suppose you were to put an extra tax on cabbage so that a man who sends it from there will pay more than the man who sends cabbages in any part of Ontario or the lower provinces.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It cannot be done.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know precisely what my hon. friend is going to say: he will say: 'Oh, that is your system of protection. Why do you impose a tax on goods going from one country to another'?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The difference to my mind is this: we want to consolidate the British part of this continent under one government with the freest possible intercourse between every portion of it, in trade and commerce and in friendly feelings altogether. That is not to be done if you are going to put upon the statute-book a law which taxes one part of the country for carrying an article from which you relieve another, and the inequality of it is so great that any man, unless he is swayed by the strongest partisan feeling and will vote against his own conscientious convictions, should vote against this Bill.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—The hon. Secretary of State, in referring to the matter, spoke of the present tax as a quarter of a cent a pound. Looking over the law, I scarcely think he read far enough in the section. The 26th section, to which this Bill refers, goes on to say respecting newspapers:

> If they are required to be transmitted by mail a distance within twenty miles from the place of publication or, within a circular area or a diameter not exceeding forty miles, and if their publication is of no greater frequency than once a week, they shall be transmitted free of postage within one or other of such areas, to be selected by the publisher, in accordance with regulations in that behalf to be established by the postmaster general. If they are required to be transmitted a greater distance, or if their publication is of greater frequency than once a week, then, in every such case, postage thereon shall be paid on and after the first day of January and inclusive of the 30th day of June next following, at the rate of one quarter of one cent, and thereafter at the rate of one cent for each pound of weight, or fraction of pound of weight, which shall be prepaid by postage stamps, or as the postmaster may from time to time direct, etc.

I look upon this as a tax which does not amount to a great deal of money, but it is an onerous one, and it is in a great measure a tax upon knowledge and upon the distribution of literature throughout the country by means of newspapers. Taking that view, I think it is a tax that should not be imposed. It was at one time imposed by a former government, and after a time it was found to be so objectionable that it was done away with. We have again placed that same tax on the statute-book, and we had better do away with it as was done with the former tax. The hon. Secretary of State referred to the weight of papers which had to be carried from some of the larger cities, as a couple of car-loads going daily from certain offices. If those papers went by carload they would probably go as freight, and it would be for the benefit of the railway, if they are going in such quantities, that they should be carried in that way. Then, if they were paying a tax of half a cent a pound, the amount paid on a couple of carloads would reach a considerable sum of money. I see that the amount collected from newspaper postage last year was somewhere about $85,000. That was at a quarter of a cent a pound. The quarter of a cent rate prevailed up to the 30th of June last. The other rate came in since that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The 30th of June 1899.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—Yes, since the 30th of June 1899. If the whole amount collected under that rate was a little over $80,000, the amount that would be collected under the reduced rates, if it prevailed all over the same area, would be only one quarter of that or only about $20,000.

Is it worth the while of any government, desirous of distributing education throughout the country, to impoese a tax amounting to $20,000, upon the distribution of newspapers in the Dominion ? With respect to the law as it is proposed now, it is going to act very prejudicially, in my opinion, to a newspaper published in a small province, especially in a province like Prince Edward Island, where its principal circulation is within the province itself. It has not a great circulation abroad, whereas it has to pay the same amount for circulating the paper within the small province of Prince Edward Island that it would have to pay if it had a large circulation over the Dominion or Continent. Taking these things into consideration, viewing the Bill as I do, that it is not one which it is desirable to pass, I am quite prepared to give my vote against it.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Will the hon. Secretary of State tell the House how much money the government is losing in carrying the newspapers through the country ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot say ; I have no statement of it. It is a very considerable amount. I know cases where they have to use a second and even a third car for a weekly newspaper.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Does the Post Office Department make any money carrying letters all over the world.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, there is a deficit. The ordinary deficit used to be about $600,000. Mr. Mulock thinks he has reduced that, or hopes to reduce it, by the introduction of the penny postage, but there is still a very considerable deficit. The Post Office Department make a charge on the public revenue over and above their receipts of a sum varying from $300,000 to $600,000.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—If there was a loss of $600,000 a year, and it is now only $300,000, what is the proportion of that loss attributable to newspapers ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I could not tell. I have no opinion about it.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Perhaps the hon. minister could tell how many tons of newspapers are carried through the country during the year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have heard. I did not keep the figures. It is a very large volume. There have been times when they have had to put on a third car to carry the issue of a single paper.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that the Globe ?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I do not think the hon. minister has given any reason why we should pass such an iniquitous law. He says it is not fair that the government should carry such an amount of freight for a low rate, and the government says that the newspapers of the country should pay for that. The government prides itself on having a surplus of $8,000,000. Why does not the government apply a part of that surplus as a bonus to carry the newspapers through, so as to educate our people ? I think the country will look with pleasure at the government trying to educate them by carrying such knowledge through the post office free.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Would it not be equally fair to reduce the duty on goods ?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—But the government will not do it. Instead of spending that money all through the country bonusing railways which do not exist and never will exist——

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Hear, hear !

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I think if the government were spending some of that money to help the circulation of the newspapers through the country it would be very much better.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—There is no doubt that the deficiency of the Post Office Department has to be borne by the whole of the people, whereas the people who receive newspapers comparatively speaking receive no benefit from the reduction of postage. A very large portion of the deficit of the Post Office Department necessarily falls on those people. The Post Office Department have a variety of ways to collect revenue from the people. They charge one cent for each newspaper sent from one individual to another, which must amount to a large sum of money during the year. There can be no question about that. If the cost of transporting papers only amounts to $70,000 a year it is hardly worth while to bother with it, although in principle the government is perfectly justified in saying we should charge something for the amount of money we are obliged to spend to be in a position to transport the papers of this country from one end of the Dominion to the other, but what is found fault with is the discrimination. Make one price general for the whole Dominion, and then there will not be a word said. If the department think it is necessary for revenue purposes to increase the rate, let them do it on a scale that will not be discriminating against one province or the other. It is perfectly fair that the government should charge for newspaper postage. All the people have to pay their quota of the extra amount required for the purpose of transporting these papers, and they receive very little benefit, but they are obliged to pay a proportion of the amount of deficit, whatever it may be, in carrying papers and letters just the same as the majority of people. The merchants of this country have derived the benefit from the reduction of postage, and, therefore, if it could fall on this class of people, it would be all right enough, but unfortunately it falls upon the poor people in the country, who receive no advantage whatever from the reduction of the postage.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My attention has been called to the fact that we have no power to amend this Bill. I wish to read from May the following extract:

> By the practice and usage based upon that resolution the Lords are excluded not only from the power of initiating or amending bills, dealing with public expenditure or revenue, but also from initiating public bills which would create a charge upon the people by the imposition of local and other rates.

So that, instead of attempting an amendment to this, we must either allow it to carry or defeat it, and it will be for those who are opposed to the principle of the Bill, when the motion is put, to vote against it. I notice that clause 121, of the Confederation Act, declares as follows:

> All articles of the growth, produce or manufacture of any one of the provinces shall, from and after the union, be admitted free into each of the other provinces.

The answer to that will be that the imposing of a tax for carrying the mail is not a tax in the sense of this clause, but the principle is precisely the same. You could not levy a duty under this clause upon an article coming from one province to another, but by this Bill you impose a tax upon the product of a certain industry passing from one province to another, under the pretense that you do it as compensation for the carrying of the article, while at the same time you take another article, and carry it all over the Dominion for the same price. Then you are told you cannot afford to do the one, but you can afford to do the other. If there is any praise which the Postmaster General has secured from the public, both in England and in this country, it has been by the adoption of penny postage for the whole world. Mr. Henniker, the originator, has been advocating that for years, and if there is any praise due to Mr. Mulock for following his lead in this respect, certainly he ought not to try and pass a discriminatory Bill by which he is going to favour one portion of the Dominion at the expense of the other.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I dare say many hon. gentlemen remember very well when the principle of zones was applied to the carriage of letters, when letters carried a short distance were charged a very much less figure than those carried further. That system of zones for letters was abolished in the United States a great many years ago, when a uniform postage of three cents was at first adopted upon letters all over the republic, and we a little later followed their example and did away with the system of letter zones, and provided for a uniform postage over the entire Dominion. The penny postage systems is an extension of that principle, still further, so far as letter carriage is concerned, and we have introduced into this country, so far as newspapers are concerned, the zone system which formerly applied to letters; but we have in the Bill before us undertaken to mark the zone system a certain distance from the place where the paper was published and a further zone to the extent of the limit of the province. My hon. friend has read section 121 of the British North America Act. That, of course, prevents any tax being imposed by one province against the products of another coming within the territory, as a protective duty,and it prevents this Bill imposing any tax of that kind. The question might arise whether the spirit of that article is violated in undertaking to make provincial zones. That is what my hon. friend opposite suggested. and if this were a tax there would be a great deal of force in that proposition. We are treating it, to some extent, as a revenue, and my hon. friend. reading a paragraph from May, is treating it as a revenue. Properly speaking, it is not such. It is a payment for services performed. It stands exactly in the same position as if those services were performed by somebody else.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman suggested it was a revenue tax.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I suggested it, and I am pointing out that it is not a revenue Bill in the same sense as a Bill imposing a duty upon imports, or excise duties upon products that are produced in the country, because, in those cases, the object of your law is the raising of revenue. In this case, your object is to obtain compensation for services performed. It is not adequate compensation : it is but partial compensation. It does not cover the cost you have incurred, and you have always charged the loss sustained in accommodating the public by the discharge of this duty on their behalf against the revenues of the country, and so far there is a charge upon the revenue in consequence of the service you performed, but the question of the amount of charge imposed upon newspapers is interesting from a revenue standpoint only by virtue of the protection that your charge gives to the revenue against a still larger charge. If you were to adopt a lower rate of duty, whether the introduction of a system of zone limits corresponding with the boundary of the provinces is or is not a fair way, I need not discuss at this moment. The Postmaster General seemed to think it was a convenient way of drawing the limiting line, because you may have papers published at fifty different centres, and if you adopt the distance limitory line marking the zone, each newspaper will be obliged to determine when it passed that zone for itself, ascertaining whether it was being unduly charged upon its circulation or not. In the province, as a zone, the limitory line is easily ascertained, and there is no difficulty in saying that the paper that you are publishing has gone abroad when it has gone beyond that line, and so perhaps it is the most convenient line that could be taken. My hon. friend has read extracts from the Montreal Herald, and Montreal Witness, in opposition to a provincial zone line being adopted, because Montreal is in the province of Quebec and very near its western boundary, and so far as those newspapers are concerned, and the Star, they circulate largely amongst the English speaking population beyond the limit of the province of Quebec, and so they are affected to a larger extent than would be a paper published, say, at Halifax, or at Toronto or at Winnipeg. Whether this suggestion ought to override the idea of convenience hon. gentlemen will determine for themselves. There is no doubt whatever that, if there is to be a zone limit at all beyond that which was marked in the law as it now stands, the provincial zone is a very convenient one, for the reason which I have stated. Every newspaper, no matter where it may be published, can always ascertain that without difficulty, and it knows precisely how many of its newspapers are circulating beyond that limit. If you were to say a zone limit of 200 or 300 miles, every newspaper that is published would have to count that distance from the place of publication, which is very much more confusing than the limit that is already suggested by this Bill.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If I understand my hon. friend correctly, he drew a distinction between a Bill providing a tax and a Bill for services rendered, and that this was not a tax but a charge for services rendered. Was that the point the hon. minister made ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I stated that I was not undertaking to make a distinction for the purpose of applying the provision explained in May. We have applied the rule so long in the parliament of this country to Bills of this sort, as well as to revenue Bills, properly so called, that I do not think we can now raise the question of distinction. I am simply pointing out that a distinction exists.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If there is a distinction, it would possibly be proper for this House to amend this Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If my hon. friend takes the ground that we cannot amend it, I see no course but to vote against the Bill, because certainly it is a retrograde step and grossly unfair to go back and establish the provincial zone. We want to do away with provincialism as far as we possibly can do so, but by this measure it is proposed to revive it. Some of the provincial papers may feel competition coming from the large papers, but people living in the remote provinces appreciate the value of being able to get the large, and consequently the more valuable, papers at reasonable rates, and I think that a measure that would, by a tax, exclude the leading papers from the provinces is a bad measure and one which I could not support.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice how the railways and steamboats are paid for the carrying of mail? As I understand it, the railways are paid per mile, no matter what amount the car may contain. If the car has 100 pounds of mail matter, the railway company receive just as much as if it had 500 or 1,000 pounds. The steamers running from Montreal to Hamilton, carry mail and receive so much for carrying the mails, a lump sum, no matter how much mail there is. You may have a ton of mail matter, or ten tons, but if that mail matter is going from Montreal to Ontario by the steamer, the publisher is taxed more than double what he would be if it were taken from Montreal to Chicoutimi, which is double the distance. The mode and manner of paying is such that the expenditure is not of that character.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It involves a considerable staff of clerks.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If this Bill could be amended, I would very readily make the motion, because it would be in the interest of all the newspaper publishers, and more particularly the country newspapers that have a smaller circulation. I know some of the Montreal papers that come into the city in which I live, circulate every day between 300 and 400 papers, and it is a very strong competition against the local paper, but that would not justify my voting for a Bill containing what my hon. friend has designated just now as a most iniquitious principle.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Up to 1896 when the papers were carried free, the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company had a subsidy of $8,500 a year for carrying the mails. Afterwards, when the charge of half a cent was imposed, the subsidy was reduced to $4,500.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why not take the vote? It will not take five minutes.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I move that the committee rise. Will the hon. minister give us more information this afternoon?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We may.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Then I withdraw my motion.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill and asked leave to sit again.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (193) 'An Act to authorize the granting of subsidies in aid of the construction of lines of railways therein mentioned.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

The Senate adjourned.

SECOND SITTING.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock p.m.

Routine proceedings.

POST OFFICE AMENDMENT BILL.

DEFEATED.

The House resumed into a Committee of the Whole in further consideration of Bill (191) 'An Act to amend the Post Office Act.'

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I suppose all that is necessary is, that the committee rise and report the Bill without amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We do not propose to rise and report it without amendment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understand my hon. friend wants to move for the rejection of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I did not propose to move that. Looking at this Bill, I do not think it comes within the category of what might be termed revenue Bills. It is simply changing the mode of collecting postage, and it is, as the hon. Minister of Justice said, not a tax, but a charge for a service rendered. That being the case, it would not come within the meaning of the prohibitory clause of the constitution which declares that we shall not amend a revenue Bill. I therefore move :

That all the words after 'by' in the first line of the said section be struck out, and the following inserted in lieu thereof : striking out the words 'one-half' in the twentieth and twenty-first lines of section 3 of chapter 20 of the Statutes of 1898 (Post Office Act), and substituting therefore the words 'one-eighth'.

This substitutes one-eighth for one-half. That is the proposal made by the Postmaster General in his Bill, leaving out all that which has reference to provincial lines, and simply reducing the rate on newspapers from one-half to one-fouth of one cent. That would be the effect if this amendment be adopted. We discussed for some little time the effect of the reduction at ¼ per cent, and unintentionally the hon. Secretary of State made the statement and we all fell into it. It was originally one-quarter cent, and last July it rose under the law to one-half cent, so that really we were discussing the question of one-half cent per pound as the law exists now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I made the correction, but my hon. friend did not hear it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I had all my calculations based on the half cent, and when the hon. gentleman said one-quarter I thought I must have been mistaken, and so changed it. The point is that, if you take a pound of newspapers from here to Hull it costs, under the proposed law more than twice as much as to take it from here to Rat Portage, 2,000 miles. This is the effect of the present law. As the Postmaster General is desirous of reducing the tax on newspapers, we are prepared to meet him that far, and it is a compromise which I hope will be accepted.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman says this is not a revenue Bill. He did not say on what grounds he based that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I based it on the hon. gentleman's statement. I understood the hon. gentleman to say to the hon. member from Marshfield that this was not strictly a revenue Bill, as provided for in the constitutional Act, but that it was a charge for a service rendered.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Like a toll collected at a turnpike.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Precisely the same, so if you charge for carrying an article from one point to another, the motion is simply to reduce the charge four-fifths, and basing the reasoning on business principles, it would not be a revenue Bill in the sense we understand it. I thought at first it was until I heard the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is a revenue Bill in the sense it yields a certain amount of revenue.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We have no evidence that it is going to raise any more revenue. On the contrary, if the newspapers which are sent now from one province to another are decreased in number under this Bill, the revenue must decrease, and you increase the tax on the provincial newspapers four-eighths of a cent.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The revenues derived from this are part of the revenues of the country, and they are in the sense that this is embraced along with the ordinary revenues of the country in the payment of postage and the expense incurred by the post office, and if the effect is that we get less revenue, than we had under the law prior to the change, then this House is practically altering a revenue Bill. I thought my hon. friend, when I saw him last, proposed to consult an authority on the subject.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have been trying to find the authority, but I cannot.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—The hon. gentleman accepts the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not at all. I stated that while there was the logical distinction that I mentioned, the practice of this House had been, ever since confederation, to treat charges of this sort as revenue.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If that reasoning be correct, is it not equally applicable to the Judges Bill that we rejected? Now, in the reasons assigned for not accepting our amendments in the House of Commons, the constitutional ground that it would affect the revenue is not taken.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—To my mind, the distinction is between what is a tax on the subject and a charge for services rendered. This is a charge for services rendered, but it is not a tax on the subject, and I think that would be a fair and reasonable way to draw the distinction.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, but my hon. friend will see that if the result of the amendment proposed to-day is, that you diminish the compensation that is to be received in this way, the difference is made up by taking moneys out of the public revenue, and so you make a charge even against the ordinary revenues.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Has this Bill the recommendation of His Excellency?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I could not tell my hon. friend, but all government Bills are supposed to have the sanction of His Excellency.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—But this is a money Bill, I understand?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Rule 46 provides that:

> The Senate will not proceed upon a Bill appropriating public money that shall not, within the knowledge of the Senate, have been recommended by the Queen's representative.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But this is not appropriating it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is taking away from the revenue.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—It could only be considered by the Senate if recommended by the Queen's representative. The hon. gentleman says he does not know that it has that recommendation, and we do not know either.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The point is well taken.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—As a layman, I think this is a portion of the revenue of the country, included in the fifty-one millions of dollars that I believe we are to raise this year. Therefore, being a portion of the revenue I feel we have no right here to interfere with a money Bill. I do not pretend to be a lawyer or a statesman.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, yes, you are.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It seems to me it is a portion of the revenue of this Dominion, and therefore we cannot amend the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Can the hon. gentleman point out in the $51,000,000 of revenue we are going to vote, the precise item which is covered by this Bill?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The hon. gentleman can find the post office items every time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is confounding the public accounts with the estimates.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The rule is against taking into consideration this Bill which the hon. Minister of Justice has declared to be a money Bill. I have quoted the 46th rule of the House. We are told by the hon. minister that he does not know if the Queen's representative has sanctioned this Bill, and therefore we cannot proceed with it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—All government measures are assumed to have the sanction of His Excellency. There was an exception to that in the province of Quebec, and that is what brought the hon. gentleman and the representative of the Crown into collision.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I did not think the hon. gentleman would bring up that question here, but if he would look at the records he would see this, that the Governor was away from Quebec. I was Prime Minister at that time. I wrote to him stating that I wanted to present such-and-such a Bill. He sent me a telegram saying 'you have carte blanche.' I relied upon that. If my hon. friend has any doubt on the subject, he should read the book published by the hon. Mr. Casgrain, father of our hon. colleague from De Lanaudière.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Bourinot says :

If any Bills are sent down from the Senate with clauses involving public expenditure or public taxation the Commons cannot accept them. Such Bills may be ordered to be laid aside. The same practice is also strictly carried out in the case of amendments made by the Senate to Common Bills. Laterly, however, it is not always usual to lay such Bills immediately aside but to send them back to the Senate with reasons for disagreeing to such amendments, so that the Upper House may have an opportunity of withdrawing the amendments. As an illustration of the strictness with which the Commons adhere to their constitutional privileges in this respect, it may be mentioned that on the 23rd of May, 1874, a Bill was returned from the Senate, with an amendment providing for an increase in the quantity of land, granted to certain settlers in the North-west. The Premier and others doubted the right of the Senate to increase a grant of land—the public lands, being in the opinion of the House in the same position as the public revenue. The amendment was only adopted with an entry in the journals that the Commons did not think in 'necessary at that late period of the session to insist on its privileges in respect thereto, but that the waiver of the said privileges was not to be drawn into a precedent.' Many other entries will also be found in the House accepting Senate amendments rather than delay the passage of the Bill at an advanced period of the session.

Now, the proposition here is, to make a certain charge which experience shows is not at all adequate to pay for the service performed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not set forth in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, but I am stating a fact. If my hon. friend can cut it down, he could abolish it ; he could move that newspapers should be free. There is no difference between saying that a charge shall be reduced and that it shall be removed. Because if you take off three-eighths of a cent you can take off the remaining one-eighth. My hon. friend will see that that is so, and certainly his amendment is one which must have the effect of affecting the public revenue, and increasing the charge upon that revenue.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Will the hon. gentleman tell us what increased charges the government has been put to since this law has been in operation ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not remember, but I know the Postmaster General said that the effect of the general reduction was, that there was about $80,000 derived from this source, and that the charge is very much beyond that, because the weight carried is far in excess of the weight of the letters.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—I understand that since the law, which this Bill is to amend, has come into operation, the revenue derived from it is $80,000, and the hon. gentleman does not know what the service costs to earn that $80,000. The hon. gentleman should be prepared to furnish information on the subject of what amount the country is going to lose by this reduction. The hon. gentleman asks us to vote for the Bill and cannot give us reasons for doing so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I mentioned in my opening remarks that the first year of which we have any record, it was about $85,000.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—What was the cost of the service ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is quite impossible to tell that.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Why not ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Because we carry letters at the same time.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—The letters do not go in the same bag. Then you say you must have extra cars. The charge is by the mileage. Has the mileage increased since 1898, and, if so, how much ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The increased cost has been in engaging a larger number of cars than anticipated, and the employment of a much larger staff.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—To what amount ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot tell what amount.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I really do not see how there can be any question as to this being a revenue Bill. The revenues of the country are derived from the customs, excise and post office. This Bill deals with the revenue which comes from the post office, and I cannot see that this House has any more right to amend this Bill than it would have to amend a Bill which relates to the excise or customs. They all deal with the public revenue.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—But we have a right to inquire whether this Bill is benefiting the country. The ministers should be prepared to say, that by passing this Bill, the government will profit to such an extent, or sustain a loss to such an extent. I do not want to amend the Bill, but I want to know why it is introduced. Is it to get more revenue or to lessen the expenses of running the Post Office Department, and if so to what extent? Then I will be able to tell whether I should vote for this Bill or not. If the country requires money and would derive a large benefit from the Bill, it might be another question, but they are bringing up a Bill to us to pass, and they give no reasons why we should pass it. They propose to amend the law so as to establish what might be called provincial zones. Would the hon. gentleman allow the Intercolonial Railway to discriminate on freight as the post office does in this Bill on postage? If you send a thousand pounds of papers 500 miles away from here, and 500 pounds more only ten miles, would you charge less for the greater distance than for the shorter distance ? That would not be allowed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly not.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Then why do it in the case of newspapers ? It is freight and nothing else. The hon. gentleman said so himself, that more cars were required to carry so much.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The government has recently taken action to prevent just such discrimination in carrying oil.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the hon. gentleman considers newspapers as freight and nothing more, he should insist that the rates be the same as on other freight. But the hon. gentleman himself makes a distinction. He practically suggests there should be no charge at all. If you were carrying a cargo of cotton he would not say that.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Certainly not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then there is some reason in the hon. gentleman's mind which leads him to put newspapers on a different footing ?

Hon. Mr. FORGET—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly, the hon. gentleman would not ask the government to accommodate the cotton manufacturers to carry their cotton for nothing. So in the hon. gentleman's own mind he makes a distinction between newspapers and freight of any other kind. What he does the government do also. They have the same reasons for doing it that the hon. gentleman has. Newspapers are, to a certain extent, an educating force in the country. The government recognize that. Parliament has never charged the newspaper men of the country the full value of the services rendered in carrying their papers from point to point. But they did a few years ago undertake, when it was proposed to impose some charge upon the newspapers for the service performed on their behalf, propose to exempt local newspapers from the operation of the provision within certain area. That has been done. This Bill carries it a little further, that is all.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Suppose I were a publisher at Ottawa. I send a ton of newspapers to Toronto on which I will have to pay $2.50 to the Post Office Department. If I sent the same quantity of papers to Hull, I would pay ten dollars. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that in sending a ton on any kind of freight I should pay in that way ? Why discriminate between Hull and Toronto in newspapers any more than in goods ? You would not do that in carrying a ton of cotton. You would not take it from Ottawa to Toronto for $2.50, and charge $10 to take it from Ottawa to Hull. I think it applies in the same way to newspapers, because after they are wrapped up in parcels, they are merchandise, so many tons, requiring so many cars to carry it. There should be no discrimination. The rates, should be the same all through the country, or they should be carried free.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not the rule.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I presume the objection of the hon. gentleman is to have it recorded that his objection to the Bill is not the reduction in the charge, but these peculiar features which have been pointed out. The hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Forget) has just shown the utter absurdity of the proposed arrangement, and I presume if the amendment is placed on record and ruled out of order, we will be quite satisfied and then be disposed to try and throw out the Bill altogether.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Of course we should have to get the Speaker in the Chair to rule on the point of order. The hon. gentleman on my left (Mr. Forget) has made a very pointed illustration. The government has just been asked to prevent discriminating rates being charged on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and Grand Trunk Railway on oils. Why ? Because the railways have been charging a cheaper rate for a long haul than for a short haul, thereby discriminating against Canadian oil. In this case they proposed to put on a discriminating rate on newspapers. I should like very much if the Senate would adopt this amendment. It does not interfere with the proposition made by the Postmaster General to reduce the postage : it applies that reduction to the whole country, to every publisher in every section of the country. My object is to remove from the Bill, so that it will not appear on the statute-book, a clause which creates discrimination in carrying an article between one province and another. If the statement made by the Minister of Justice be correct, as to the carrying of newspapers, apply the same principle to letters. Letters, are not public educators, and consequently the low rate of postage is for the special private advantage of commercial men and others who correspond with each other. The information contained in the letter is for the special advantage of those who write. A newspaper is for the purpose of disseminating news and whatever opinions it may advocate, whether they be right or wrong. If the hon. gentleman wants to make the postage a quarter or half a cent all round, we could understand it. The hon. gentleman from Sarnia has voiced my reasons for making this proposition to amend the Bill, to show that while we have no objection to the reduction of postage on newspapers, we object to any discriminating rates between provinces. I do not ask that the rate of postage on newspapers be reduced from one-quarter to one-eighth. That is the proposition of the government. I have been in favour of postage on newspapers. It is a debatable question, I admit, and I should like very much to have the amendment go down to the House of Commons, and if we have overstepped our rights under the constitution, let them say so. They have abused us already, and there is no reason why they should not amuse themselves in the same way again. I do not know how others feel about it : I feel like the big Englishman whose little wife thrashed him, his excuse for submitting to it was that it amused her and didn't hurt him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I find the revenue from the post office, last year was over four millions of dollars. This certainly is legislation affecting the postal revenue.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It will facilitate the matter if the committee is allowed to report the Bill and the hon. gentleman could let this amendment be a notice that on the third reading he will move it. That will place it on record.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN, from the committee, reported the Bill with a proposed amendment to which the hon. Minister of Justice objected as being out of order.

The SPEAKER—If I understand the point of order, it is that an amendment proposed before the committee is out of order because the Bill before the House affects the revenue of the Dominion. I cannot consider otherwise than that the Bill before the House is a Bill affecting the revenue of the Dominion, and any amendment which would tend to increase or diminish the revenue is certainly out of order and cannot be moved in the Senate. I therefore rule that the point of order is well taken.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman from Montarville raised another point of order. This Bill has been declared a money Bill. He raised the point of order that it has not been introduced on a message from His Excellency.

The SPEAKER—That is a question of fact which I cannot ascertain. I am not in a position to decide the point.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—This is the point of order. I understood the hon. Minister of Justice to say that this Bill was a money Bill, and I say that as a money Bill we cannot consider it here, because the hon. Minister of Justice has told us that he did not know if the Queen's representative had sanctioned it. I have quoted the 46th rule of the Senate under which I contend we are not in a position to deal with this Bill.

The SPEAKER—If the hon. Minister of Justice has said that he does not know whether the Bill has been sanctioned by His Excellency, I am not in a position to ascertain the fact.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—We cannot proceed with the Bill unless some minister is in a position to tell us whether it is based on a message from the Governor General.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A message from His Excellency is needed only when money is to be appropriated for the public service. In this case parliament is taking away a certain amount of revenue.

The further consideration of the Bill was resumed in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—This being a question that affects the revenue of the country I shall keep myself on the safe side by voting not to reject the Bill. I would prefer the government took all the postage off, and as this is a step in the right direction, I am willing to take all the reduction I can in the postage on newspapers.

The committee divided on the motion to adopt the first clause which was rejected.

Contents, 10 ; non-contents, 17.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN, from the committee, reported that the Bill had not been adopted.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (155) 'An Act to amend the Militia Act.'

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What effect has this clause ? Is it providing for the appointment of a new officer ? The section of the Act which this repeals reads as follows :

In and for each of the twelve military districts hereinbefore mentioned, there shall be appointed one Deputy Adjutant General of militia, who shall have the rank of a Lieutenant-Colonel, and who shall command the militia in his district and who shall be paid at the rate of $1,200 per annum.

The clause of the Bill before us reads as follows :

41. In and for each of the twelve military districts hereinbefore mentioned there shall be appointed an officer, who shall have rank not below that of Lieutenant-Colonel and who shall command the militia in his district, and he shall be paid at the rate of twelve hundred dollars per annum.

In the clause before us hon. gentlemen will notice that the only change is the addition of the words : 'who shall not have rank below,' instead of the phrase : 'who shall be of the rank.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is it the intention to dispense with the service of a deputy adjutant general who now performs the same duties that are to be performed by this new officer ? If so, what becomes of the deputy adjutant General ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He is a district officer commanding.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does he become an officer and lose the name of deputy adjutant general ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not understand so. The expression is : 'who shall have the rank of lieutenant-colonel.' The deputy adjutant general has that rank under the law as it stands, and he cannot have a higher rank. Under the Bill he cannot have a rank below that, but he can have a higher rank.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. minister is mistaken. If he reads the law he will find that as the law stands the commanding officer in his district is termed : 'the deputy adjutant general.' That is done away with and an officer is substituted in the present Bill, so that the Bill as it reads now does not speak of any deputy adjutant general of militia at all. It is an officer who becomes a district officer commanding of the district.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It seems to me the only change which this Bill makes as regards this particular section of the Militia Act is that indicated by the Minister of Justice. It provides that the officer shall not necessarily be a lieutenant-colonel. He may be a colonel. If the committee will look at the fourth subclause of this clause, they will see what I mean. The clause reads as follows :

4. Her Majesty may adopt such designation or name of office as Her Majesty thinks proper for the officer who commands the militia in any district, and may, from time to time, change such designation or name of office.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If hon. gentlemen look at the section which we are repealing, it reads :

Her Majesty may, whenever it is expedient, change the designation or name of office of the officer who commands the militia in any district.

As a matter of fact the designation of the officer was changed under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, and he is now known as the district officer commanding, and has been known in that way for years, so that the only change provided is that an officer holding the rank of colonel may be a district officer commanding, as well as lieutenant-colonel.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That information is conveyed on the face of it, and the question I ask is: are the deputy adjutant generals to remain in command of the districts, and is this to be an additional officer?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It cannot possibly be the intention to reduce the deputy adjutant general to the rank indicated in this Bill, because they receive $2,500 a year.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, $1,200.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It strikes me the intention is, under another name, to provide an officer that the parliament and country dispensed with years ago, that is the brigade major. They dispensed with those officers, on the ground that the deputy adjutant general was quite able to perform all the duties necessary to both offices. You do not resuscitate the brigade major, but you appoint an officer to do his work.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The brigade major has been replaced by an officer called the district staff officer. The abolition is only in name.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—How many officers are there in receipt of this salary of $1,200 a year? There are those officers commanding and district staff officers, and this is providing that there shall be an officer who shall rank not below that of lieutenant-colonel. These officers certainly held higher rank than the officer who would be below the rank of lieutenant-colonel. It appears to me it is providing for an additional office.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The only change is the one I indicated.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The only change is the addition of the words: 'shall have rank not below that of lieutenant-colonel.'

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—What has become of the district officer commanding?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They continue. This Bill puts nobody out.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—Are there twelve men of that rank appointed?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are twelve men in the service, and these men retire when they get a certain age, and when they retire others take their place, but until that change takes place, they continue in office.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Does this section provide that the officer below the grade of lieutenant-colonel may have this position?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly not. It says not below, and it must be above.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am at a loss to know why this change is made. The old law says: 'Who shall have the rank of lieutenant-colonel.' The present law says: 'An officer shall be appointed who shall have rank not below that of lieutenant-colonel.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly not below. He may be above. If a man who is a colonel were to accept the position of commading officer in a district, he would only have the rank of lieutenant-colonel although he was entitled to a higher rank. You are not going to degrade him in his rank in order to put him in this office.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is this for the purpose of appointing any officer they think proper to this position, and giving the rank, whether he is entitled to it or not? It says he shall not have a rank lower than that. Under the old law, if you read it technically, I think you cannot appoint anybody but a person having the rank of lieutenant-colonel. Under the new law you can appoint anybody you please, giving him that rank.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So you could in both cases.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They could give him the rank before the appointment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They could always do that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not see the difference, unless you might appoint a colonel to this position at $1,200.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Under the old law you could not ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is an interpretation of the law which I do not think the hon. Minister of Justice would give. The greater would include the less. There are a great many men in the volunteer force who hold commissions who are now serving as privates and officers. It says 'shall have the rank of lieutenant-colonel.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He is only lieutenant colonel under the statute as it stands.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not see the force of it myself.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that the clause creating civilian colonels ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—By what law were the civilians created colonels ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That was struck out.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—By virtue of what law has it been done ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It has not been done.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, it has been done. We have Lieutenant-colonel Laurier.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There was a statutory innovation to confer upon a man an office of honour, and when you make a military office an honorary office, that is prerogative that belongs to the Crown, and unless there was an express inhibition in the statute the Crown could always do it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the theory advanced in the lower House, and that was the practice in England. What necessity is there for this Act? It is the prerogative of the Crown ? It has been in regulations appointing honorary colonel and honorary lieutenant-colonel to the battalions, and that is really what this clause is for.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to know where the clause is in this Bill that gives the power to appoint honorary colonels if this is not the one ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think there is any such clause in the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This was framed for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And it was struck out in the Commons.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let me read the old law : It is as follows :

Officers holding commissions in the militia may be placed on the retired list with honorary rank not exceeding that of lieutenant-colonel, or to that honorary rank according and under regulations approved by the Governor in Council.

That is the law as it stands.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But that is not this law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman was asking me where was the clause conferring upon persons honorary rank. This clause is the same as the other. The honorary rank is conferred upon persons who are entitled to military rank. A civilian is not taken up under this law, or under the old law under this particular division, and military rank conferred upon him. What is done here is to confer a higher rank upon those who are already entitled to a military rank.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—By the old law a man serving in the active militia could retire, retaining his rank.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He could not be named to a superior position on the retired list ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, he could here under the law now, so long as he did not go beyond lieutenant-colonel.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend misunderstood me. My question was not as to retiring from the volunteer office with the honorary rank. That I know is the case. It is the case with myself. I was in the force some fifteen or seventeen years, and when I retired I retired with a rank higher than I held in the militia force.

That is the point my hon. friend has explained. I was asking where the power was under this law to appoint a person to the honorary rank of colonel of a battalion to which he did not belong. That is what I meant. The discussion took place for hours in the lower House, some opposing it very strongly for the reason that it was conferred on non-military men, men who had never been in the service.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—That has been taken out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And you can only appoint a man now to the honorary rank of colonel or lieutenant-colonel of a battalion if he has been in the service, and I did not agree with some of my old volunteer friends in the lower House who took very strong ground against the promotion of gentlemen to that honorary position, because it is nothing more nor less, and while upon that subject I will give an illustration which leads to that conclusion. It does seem rather incongruous, I admit, to take a civilian and make him an honorary colonel, or a lieutenant-colonel in a battalion, where he would rank if he were in active service over the other men, but he does not do that. He only occupies an honorary position. In the 15th battalion in Belleville, Lord Lorne was offered and accepted an honorary colonelcy. It was in the Argyle Light Infantry. That is the reason he accepted it, he was an Argyle man himself, and it has given a status to that battalion it had not before. The Princess Louise has sent out presents, and so on to the battalion. They are very proud of that, and he has that position of honorary rank. In London, through political dissensions, and animosities, a very fine battalion went all to pieces, and they got together and said 'We will make the hon. Sir John Carling, who has never been in the force, an honorary colonel.' Everybody liked him and everybody was willing to act under him if he would only accept the position. All he had to do was to go and take the chair. They have now a good battalion under him. There is another reason why I would not object to civilians receiving these appointments, because anybody who knows anything about a volunteer force knows that it is a continual drain upon his pocket for which he receives no return, and if you can find a wealthy man who will associate himself with the force——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You can bleed him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I will not say that. That implies what I do not mean. But from the fact of being connected with it, he will assist the officers of the battalion to keep it up and subscribe liberally. The view, however, taken by the majority of the House of Commons is different from that, and this law is now confined to military men. It does seem, perhaps, a little absurd when we dub some one lieutenant-colonel, honorary colonel, who is scarcely able to walk. I do not object, and I do not suppose any one else would object, to the Premier having the honour of being called a lieutenant-colonel, although he says himself the only service he ever performed was that of an ensign. He says:

> I would mention of my own case. I did not pride myself very much about my military career. I know my military career affords a good many arguments for hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and that when I said I was willing to defend the minority that had been deprived of their rights, hon. gentlemen based some arguments upon it.

It was necessary, I have no doubt, for the Premier to justify his declaration that he was willing to shoulder his musket to shoot down the volunteers in the North-west on the banks of the Saskatchewan, on the ground that rights had been interfered with. No rights had been interfered with at that time. I have been reminded that when a man is prepared to fight a whole regiment, he ought to get credit for it, and should have been made a lieutenant-colonel. The only question is whether the power can be abused. It cannot be under this clause, as it could have been under the original provision. I have no objection to the clause being passed.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (193) 'An Act to authorize the granting of subsidies in aid of the construction of the lines of railway therein mentioned.'

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I have the same objection to the present Bill that I have urged against similar Bills in former sessions. For a number of years past those Bills come in at the very close of the session when we have no time to examine them and see the claims of various roads which receive those subsidies from the government. I understand that in the present Bill there are as many as forty roads which are to receive subsidies. We do not know anything about many of the roads, and on other occasions, when similar Bills of this kind were introduced by this government, and I may say the same was the case with the previous government—Bills came in at the very close of the session, when there was no time to examine and criticise them, I raised my protest against the practices. It is true, the Senate has not the power to amend or alter any item in these Bills, but it is well we should know something about the reasons for the votes we give, even if we have not the power to alter or amend the measures. A Bill may come in on some occasion when it would be the duty of the Senate to reject it in toto, I am not going to say it is the case with the present Bill, but I am quite satisfied that there are many items in this Bill, from what I have heard about it, that would scarcely be justified by many of us without further information than we have been able to obtain up to the present time.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called. 'House again in Committee of the Whole on Bill (132) 'An Act to amend the Railway Act.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said: I am not prepared to go on with this Bill owing to the absence of Mr. Barwick, who objects to the sequestration clause. The Minister of Railways thinks it will not interfere with the lien of the Ontario Bank in any way. I do not profess to know enough of the laws of the province of Quebec to really give an opinion upon it. I therefore move that the Order of the Day be discharged, and that it be fixed for Monday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have taken some little pains to look into the history of this case, and I find it to be of this character: I make the statement now, because I intended to make it in committee. The Macfarlane estate has a claim against the railway. Whatever claim that is, belonged to the banks not to the Ontario Bank alone, but the Eastern Townships Bank as well. They not only have a claim for money advanced, but they have spent $20,000 in law costs in contesting this question since 1891. It was only in February last that a decision was rendered by which they could place the property of the railway in the hands of the sheriff for sale. Now, that is all this law wants to do, and it would have been sold on the 19th day of this month were it not that those who are the directors of the railway have thrown some difficulties in the way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Filed an opposition.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They have filed an opposition, and it is awaiting now the decision of the courts as to whether that opposition is valid or not. If it is not valid, then the object which this Bill contemplates will be attained, because the Macfarlane estate will be enabled to sell all the interests of the present owners, or pretended owners, who have control of it, in the railway, and whatever sum is realized from the sale of the railway will, after paying the costs incurred by the Ontario Bank and the Eastern Townships Bank, be divided pro rata among the creditors, after the lien of the Macfarlane estate has been paid. An Act was placed upon the statute-book in 1891, giving the claim of Henry Macfarlane, or his legal representatives, a priority over all the other creditors. That is chapter 97, of 54-55 Victoria, so that if the railway be sold and fall into the hands of any one else, the claims of the Macfarlane estate have to be paid under this law before the other creditors receive anything.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I introduced a statute last year in this House, and I introduced a short one afterwards postponing the time when it was to come into operation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is right, and this is the principal part in which the bank is interested. I take this opportunity to make the statement and show shortly how the affair stands. It is much more far-reaching than that, but the House will understand it. This Act is objectionable from many standpoints. The law of Ontario now gives the power of sequestration of railways, and so does the law of Quebec. Here is a railway that is in difficulties—that has not paid its debts. There is a special law on the statute-book showing who shall have priority of claim. They have sued in the courts. It is now before the courts, and the new Bill, which we are asked to consider is simply to legislate this whole question out of the court. That is a kind of legislation which I do not think we ought to adopt, and I am very glad indeed to hear the Secretary of State say that he wanted to delay it in order to obtain more information, notwithstanding his colleague, the Minister of Railways and Canals, is desirous to have it placed on the statute-book.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Minister of Railways says he does not think it will at all disturb the priority of the Ontario Bank.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is very true, but the interested parties, who want to get this railway, want power given to the Attorney General of the province of Quebec, to come to the Dominion government and ask for authority to sequestrate a railway, part of the property that is now under the jurisdiction of the Dominion, in order to accomplish that which the Senate refused to allow them to accomplish when they rejected the Bill which was before them about a month ago, and it is simply another attempt to legislate people out of the courts in favour of interested parties, and destroy, to a certain extent, and ruin the interest of those who have, under the law, a priority.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is discussing the Bill, but the question is not before us.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The question is before us. The hon. gentleman moved to discharge the order, and put it off until Monday. We surely have a right to discuss it on that motion, if we think proper.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I saw in the papers yesterday, or the day before, that this railway has been sold. Does the government know anything about it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. I think not. It would be sold by the sheriff first.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I venture to suggest that the difficulty might be got over by adding a few words to the twelfth clause of this Bill to provide that nothing herein shall prejudicially affect the interest of Macfarlane or his representative.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Bill is general. It does not affect the Baie des Chaleurs road alone.

The motion was agreed to, and the Order of the Day was discharged and fixed for Monday next.

ELECTION LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that Bill (133) 'An Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of members, House of Commons,' be referred back to the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In parts of Quebec and other sections of the Dominion, there are unorganized districts, where no voters' lists are prepared, and where, without some such provision as this, the parties would not be entitled to vote at the next election. I therefore, propose the following amendment for the consideration of the committee:

23a. In any unorganized district where at the time of the issuing of the writ of election there is no list of voters in force under the provincial law and no provision exists for the making of such lists, the lists used at the last Dominion in such unorganized district shall be the legal list for such unorganized district and shall be forwarded to the returning officer by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery together with the writ, and the returning officer shall make all necessary and proper provision with respect to polling divisions and polls in such district to enable the voters on such list to poll their votes.

2. This section shall not apply to Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY (P.E.I). I think that clause should not be accepted. In Quebec the last election was that of 1896, and would the hon. gentleman use the list that was used for the election ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the absence of any other list.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why does not the province pass legislation necessary to enable those parties to vote in their own elections ? You have legislated for the use of provincial lists ; now you want a Dominion list. If you want Dominion lists, let us have them for the whole Dominion, and not for a portion of a province.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The cost of having elections in those unorganized districts would be very great.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understand in the province of Quebec there are some parishes in which no voters' lists have been prepared.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—According to the municipal law, when a parish is not organized, there are certain proceedings taken to annex that locality to one already organized. If they do not do that themselves, I do not see why we should do their work here.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—You might as well copy the names from the tombstones as use the old lists. In 1894 this list was made, and now you are going to search for names in a wild unorganized part of the country. It would be no practical use whatever ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understand in one constituency there are about 500 parties who live in an unorganized district, and in another constituency a very considerable number—I could not say how many.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Where ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In the province of Quebec.

Mr. LANDRY—Where in the province of Quebec ?

The SPEAKER—In the unorganized portion of Kamouraska.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How many are there on the list ?

The SPEAKER—There never was any list made.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then we cannot refer back to a list, and this would not apply.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Under the principle the hon. gentleman from Stadacona lays down, we would disfranchise the whole province of Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We might as well provide lists in Prince Edward Island, as to do this. The province must surely have made provision for the provincial elections, and why not avail ourselves of whatever provision the province has made ?

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—It seems to me, the government having adopted the principle of taking the local lists, we ought not to interfere with what is done in the province. It may be that it is necessary to have this provision. The people may be so far away that they could not take part in an election. There are some people living near the northern line of the province of Quebec, and it would cost hundreds of dollars to get lists of them.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The government has decided to do away with Dominion lists and take the local lists. Let them take the local lists with all their disadvantages.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The proposition is made on the ground that it is most undesirable to disfranchise anybody. If the provincial legislature does not make any provision for the making of lists in an unorganized district, and such lists have been made heretofore, those parties found on that list in that district shall be entitled to vote.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In the unorganized districts, wherever they voted before and the provision made for the appointment of officers there and the holding of elections there, the same as in the organized districts.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who is to make the lists ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The lists are the old Dominion lists.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Made six years ago ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If they are not there, they will not vote.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—According to that principle, all those who have acquired their rights during the last five or six years, and were not on the list seven years ago, are excluded. That amendment is not a proper one.

The CHAIRMAN—How will they vote if they do not vote on that list ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They would not vote at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me the adoption of that resolution is going to put very dangerous powers in the hands of somebody in those unorganized districts. I venture the assertion that any person running for a seat in parliament, with that power in the law, could carry it—that is, if they are anything at all like the agents that we have read of lately. The most objectionable feature in the clause is the point raised by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona. If he understood the Minister of Justice right, this only applied to electoral lists that exist under the old Franchise Act of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, because there are no others.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Just what I was going to say : there are no others. Then it would only give the right of the franchise to persons who resided in the unorganized districts prior to, or at the time of the registration of the voters under the old lists.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And that was in 1894. In these unorganized districts, take it for granted, the population is much larger now than it was in 1894. If I am to compare the unorganized districts of the province of Quebec with those in Ontario, the settlements must be much greater in those districts than they were seven years ago ? The hon. gentleman shakes his head. It may not be the case in the province of Quebec. I do not speak of that, because I do not know ; but I do know in Ontario, in the unorganized districts that existed a few years ago. After the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, the country was filling up rapidly, and that there are villages and towns—important towns, and industries springing up in those districts which were unorganized, and they are numerous to-day. That is one of the advantages of the construction of the road. It has opened up new territory altogether. There may be districts in the province of Quebec which have been developed by the building of railways. I should hope so. They may be organized, and they may not. If there are any districts which are unorganized, the proposition should be, if you want to have anything like an equitable amendment to the election law, to have a new list to cover all the inhabitants that are now in that district. There may be hundreds of men who were working in these districts, in 1894, that are off in different parts of the country now. There is no provision to prevent them going into the province of Quebec and voting. You might take hundreds from the city of Quebec into the unorganized districts. Such things have occurred in the past, and there is no reason why they may not occur in the future.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Unless the hon. gentleman thinks the original list was a fraudulent list, you could not take people from Quebec. Those districts are on the Lower St. Lawrence, I believe. There are no railways there, and I think the population has been stationary there for the past forty years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I dissent in toto from the inference the hon. gentleman has drawn from my remarks. Neither by implication nor directly did I say the lists were fraudulent. The lists, might be honestly made, but what I say is, lists which existed six years ago are not the lists that should be adopted for an election at this time—perhaps a year or six months hence. In the very law that we have been discussing, the Franchise Act, provision is made for preparing a new list in cities and towns if the list be a year old. Why ? Because there are so many changes. The movements of population in those centres is so great that it would not be fair or equitable to hold an election even this year on an old list. That principle has been recognized by the law. The Secretary of State, it is true, tried to repeal it to-day, but when he found the effect it was going to have he, did not persist in it, and I would seriously recommend my hon. friend not to insist on this amendment, unless he is prepared to go further—and I would argue the same as I did to-day in reference to the non-disfranchisement of any elector. If you are to have a list for the unorganized districts, let us have a new one and know who is there. It is a dangerous proposition to make and I hope the Minister of Justice will not push it to a vote.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This amendment will extend not simply to the province of Quebec, but also, I understand, to some unorganized parts of Ontario, the North-west Territories and to British Columbia. I presume in all the provinces excepting Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, there will be territories to which this will apply. The Minister of Justice made the statement that there were as many as 500 in one part of the unorganized sections of the province of Quebec. It is not unlikely, but there may be a good many in the unorganized districts of Ontario, British Columbia and the Territories. It seems a remarkable thing that the government, who have been dealing with this question so long, having this measure before the other branch of parliament for nearly three months, perhaps more than three months, and here we are just on the eve of prorogation with a proposition of this kind before us for the first time. It is a very serious thing if the people of all those unorganized districts are not protected ; but the kind of protection proposed in this amendment is not, I submit, of any value. We might as well go back to the tombstones, as I said before, to get our list of names in remote unsettled parts of the country, as to go to the voters' list of 1894. A great many men would be away, many dead, and a vast number of new-comers would appear upon the scene. It would not be a representation of the people of that part of the country, and surely there is some provision for the conducting of elections for provincial purposes in those places. As the principle has been adopted by this parliament of using the provincial lists and franchise, why not, in those districts as in the rest, fall back upon what the provinces are doing and what the law in the province is ? It is a deplorable thing that we should have reached the end of the session and almost completed the consideration of this Bill without having discovered during all this time that the franchise of those people has not been considered until now, and we are asked at the last moment to adopt this amendment which is altogether inadequate to give representation to the people who are in those unorganized territories and which opens the door for all kinds of wrongdoing in those territories.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is a new machine.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understand there are two districts in the Lower St. Lawrence, Saguenay, for instance, in which there is no list. It simply means, if you are to depend wholly upon the provincial statute, that there will be no opportunity of recording the vote. I am willing to let the Bill stand until Monday to consider the question as to whether we may do in that district the same as we are doing in Prince Edward Island or in the North-west Territories, letting the parties who are qualified under the law come forward at the time of voting, or come forward as in the North-west Territories before, and prepare a list, if a list is thought necessary.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That is right.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In the province of Prince Edward Island we have not insisted on that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is a general system there.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It does not matter. For this Dominion election you allow people to vote whose names are not on the voters' list.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Because there is no voters' list in Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is none in these territories.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There are voters' lists in the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I shall ask the committee to rise and consider this amendment further, but am not prepared to disfranchise a large population in a district simply because there is no municipal list, no municipal organization, and no provincial machinery with which a list is to be prepared. If my hon. friend is willing to have applied to his own province, on account of the failure of the province to prepare a list, the rule that he wants to apply to the counties to which I refer, then we can consider that question.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not know what the hon. member means by proposing a different rule for my own province. I have made no suggestion such as that. If the hon. gentleman wanted to treat Prince Edward Island the same as he is treating these parts of the province of Quebec, he would have provided lists in some way. He is here providing a list, the very list he said all the time he would not provide in the case of Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I am not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I may tell my hon. friend, the province of Prince Edward Island feels under no particular obligation to the government for the way they are dealing with this Bill. They were fairly well satisfied with the Dominion Franchise Act, under which they were able to conduct the elections very well. They are perfectly well satisfied with their own laws, under which they have open voting in provincial elections, but the present government are attempting to graft a ballot system upon a condition of things where there was no voters' list, and hence all the difficulties have been of their own creating, because they attempted to do this incongruous thing. The province did not demand it. It is because these gentlemen adopted a principle they find very difficult to carry out, and the difficulty is all of their own creation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. minister must not forget that we had a Dominion list and a Dominion franchise; the present government did away with all that, and laid it down as a principle to accept the local lists.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Let him accept the local lists. In the Saguenay district he said there were no electoral lists. I deny that. They have a list.

The SPEAKER—They have no list for provincial elections——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is there any list at Tadousac?

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman might let me finish.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I had the floor. Tadousac has lists. L'Anse St. Jean has lists. Bersimis has lists, and different places near the Saguenay River are all provided with lists; but I suppose, in the far east, on the Labrador coast, there may be no lists. Those portions of that county are unorganized, but in our municipal organization we have the means to provide for all those unorganized places, when they are adjacent to parishes which are organized, to have all the advantages which the organized parishes have. If the Dominion government are making their own choice in taking the electoral lists of the province to substitute them for the federal lists, let them take them.

The SPEAKER—I want to tell the committee that I know, personally, in a great many places along the St. Lawrence, on the north shore, where there are 1,000 electors, they were voting under the Franchise Act at the last election, but since the Franchise Act has been done away with, they would have no voters' list. They never had any municipality organized: they never had any lists except for the federal elections. If the amendment now before the committee is not passed, all those electors will have no list to vote upon, and will be disfranchised.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How did these parties obtain the right to vote at the last election, held in 1896? Because the Franchise Act had been repealed some time before that. No, perhaps I am mistaken.

The SPEAKER—They all voted at the last election, and could not vote now.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Were they disfranchised in the provincial elections?

The SPEAKER—It is an unorganized district, along the St. Lawrence, where there are no municipalities.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—They voted in the local election?

The SPEAKER—They voted under the Dominion Franchise Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not suppose any of us want to disfranchise people. The Minister of Justice has moved to report progress, with a view to providing a means for those hundreds of electors to vote. Whatever scheme is reported will be submitted to the committee when we meet again, and I do not see any object in discussing the matter now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We are obliged for the lecture the hon. gentleman has read us.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have not read any lecture. I object.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not care whether the hon. gentleman objects or not. The condition which has arisen upon this information which the hon. Speaker has just given this House is something of which most of us probably were not aware. He has given us information in regard to the unorganized districts and the manner in which they have voted in the past, and the desire to give them a franchise in the future. I venture the assertion, that no one in the House, except those directly acquainted with the subject, had that information. I know I had not, and it might be the means of changing my opinion, and that is what we are here for, to discuss questions of this kind, instead of being read lectures. We are not in the habit of swallowing everything holus bolus. When I read this clause, I thought it was a dangerous thing, but the information given by His Honour the Speaker has modified my views, and if this is changed, I might consent to it; but I do not think the Senate would consent to an arrangement to record votes on a list five years old. Does His Honour the Speaker tell us that there is no organization, municipal or otherwise, in these places, and no law which controls these people?

The SPEAKER—They are hundreds of miles apart, and it is impossible to have any municipality regulating them with so much distance between them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It appears it was possible for the government of 1894 to provide a list, and it seems most remarkable that the provincial legislature having lists for the whole province, did not provide a list for these districts. I think my hon. friend the Speaker said that the elections for the province in 1897 were held on the Dominion list of 1894, and these people all voted on this list if their names appeared on it.

The SPEAKER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It was not so very bad as it will be on in 1900 or 1901, but it certainly seems poor data to work upon, a list of that date.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a most extraordinary statement to make, that an inhabited, but unorganized district voted under the law which gave them no power to vote, because under the Dominion franchise they could only vote for a Dominion member, and my hon. friend said they actually voted in the local election on the Dominion list, which had no force, as far as they were concerned, in the province of Quebec, unless the legislature adopted the Dominion lists for that particular district.

The SPEAKER—That was the way it was done.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—By law?

The SPEAKER—Yes, it could not be done otherwise.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon. friend object to this clause?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, certainly.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will ask the committee to rise and report progress, and discuss the question with my colleagues. It may be that it will be found the best way will be to allow the persons to vote without this, because it will be very expensive work to prepare a list extending over some hundreds of miles with very difficult means of communication.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How will this affect the inhabitants of Anticosti?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think it will affect them. There were a few there, but they were driven out.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again on Monday.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENTS POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Further consideration of the message from the House of Commons disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the amendments made by the House of Commons to (Bill K) 'An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would prefer to have this item stand. It is a contentious item, and will take some time, unless the hon. minister is prepared to accept the amendment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not prepared to accept the amendment, but I expect the hon. gentleman will have his way. I was anxious to get rid of it and have it go to the House of Commons. Unless we deal with the matter to-day, the probability is the Bill will never reach the House of Commons. The House of Commons are expecting to rise on Tuesday.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know what they may expect. We have not had a great deal to do here, and I think as they have kept us waiting, we will have to keep them waiting until we can intelligently consider the measure sent to us.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—They have kept us five months and a half.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It would not be unfair for us to keep them for a month.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If my hon. friend is very desirous, I will not press it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It will not take twenty minutes to say whether they will accept it or not, and I am inclined to think they will, from what I have learned, because it does not deprive them of all they desired, and it is a compromise between the opinion this House has expressed in the former Bill and what they want. I think if they are reasonable they will accept it.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—That is another matter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will agree to the proposition to let it stand over to Monday, but I will say to my hon. friend at the same time that to propose such an amendment as he proposes, and which he is going now to bring before us again, which differs so very little from what is already in the Bill, can hardly be considered as resting upon any particular principle.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If it differs so very little, as the hon. gentleman says, there can be no objection to accepting it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, July 16, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

DOMINION ELECTIONS BILL.

HOUSE AGAIN IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (133) 'An Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of members of the House of Commons.'

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—It was understood that any opposed orders would be taken up this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I understood there was some opposition to this.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This is simply with reference to a new proposition the hon. minister was introducing with regard to unorganized districts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. I suggested an amendment and I have put it in the following shape:

In any division of any electoral district in the province of Quebec in which there is no voters' list, parties who are qualified under the franchise law of the province of Quebec to have their names placed upon such voters' lists, shall be entitled to vote at such polling division on taking the oath in the form ————.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Is not that provided for by the Quebec law? Perhaps the minister would tell us if he has looked into the Quebec law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have not looked into it personally, but the Solicitor General has, and he has reported to me, and so I drew this clause this morning, and asked him to prepare a form of affidavit meeting the requirements in the province.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—He told the hon. minister there was no provision in the Quebec law about it ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I suppose this might go through committee and we could take the third reading this afternoon ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. I would say to hon. gentlemen that in accordance with the understanding we had, the clerk, Mr. Fraser, went over the schedule and at the same time went over the Act, and I wish to make some verbal changes such as he has pointed out to make the Act uniformly consistent throughout. In section 41, I propose to strike out the word 'district' and substitute 'division.'

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Will the word 'division' apply to all the provinces ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Unless the hon. minister is perfectly certain, it may happen that in some of the provinces the word 'district' is used, and in others 'division.' Why not put 'division or district.' ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is in reference to our own divisions that we are making provision.

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then all that is left is the amendment of which I have given notice.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I asked the hon. gentleman to let it stand till this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. The only thing is, the House of Commons has to concur in all this. If they object to our amendments, it means further delay.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I understood that any controversial matter was to be left over till this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Take a man in an unorganized district, say Labrador, will he vote ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The unorganized will be divided the same as the organized territory and he will vote in the polling division in which he resides.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Who will make the division ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The returning officer, where there is no division made. That is provided for in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—In a district of ten miles there might be only one resident. Will the Bill provide for him ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The returning officer will exercise his judgment.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—There are places north of Quebec, to the limits of the province of Quebec, where there are no settlers at all for an immense number of miles.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They are not in any polling division. The hon. gentleman misapprehends what is being done. I understand that in some counties in the lower St. Lawrence there is no municipal organization. There are portions of some of the electoral divisions as they now exist. We are not disturbing any electoral division ; we are dealing with those electoral divisions as they now exist. There is some portion of them in which there is no voters' lists prepared. Those parties who reside there that would be qualified under the old law to have their names placed on the voters' list, and so vote after the name is on the list, will, under this proposed clause, be enabled to come forward at the poll established within their district and vote, although their names are not on the voters' lists, just precisely as they do in the North-west Territories. That is all that is intended. It is not intended to embrace territory not in an electoral district, but it is intended to enable everybody, who is otherwise qualified, to vote, although his name may not be on the list. If he resides in an organized district, where there is a voters' list, it will not enable him to vote, but it will where there is no list.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The amendment will provide for that ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And the amendment will be complete when the form is added to it ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—So we must wait for the form. Will it be ready this afternoon ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. But it will add nothing. It is to give effect.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Did I understand the hon. minister to say that some such system prevailed in the North-west Territories ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are no lists there.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But there is ample provision for a revision, something such as we have introduced in this law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is exactly the same in principle as the provision in the territories. In the territories there is a voters' list prepared after the lists are issued, but it may be that a man's name is not found on that list, and he may come forward on the day of voting, and swear that he is a qualified elector and possesses the necessary qualification, and on taking the oath he is entitled to vote.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He is entitled to vote undoubtedly. But my hon. friend stopped there and did not say what follows. Immediately on his voting, an objection can be put in, and he is summoned to appear before a revising board some days after, and there is an appeal from the rivising board to a judge. All that is provided for in the territorial law. There is nothing of that kind proposed here. It seems to me it would open the door for bad votes being put in.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is intended for that.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I understand it perfectly. Supposing there is a settlement at the other end of the county of Beauce, which is not organized as a municipality, where they have no lists ; those men can take advantage of the amendment?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—But if they are living in a place unorganized and not belonging to any county——

Hon. Mr. WATSON—They have no vote.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I am not asking the hon. gentleman, I am asking the hon. Minister of Justice. They are living in a place which does not belong to any county. Will they take advantage of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They cannot.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—It would be necessary to put it clearly in the amendment, because there are some places that do not belong to any county.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is clear as it is.

The CHAIRMAN—The clause reads :

In any polling division of any electoral district of the province of Quebec.

Therefore the voter must be in some district already established.

The amendment was allowed to stand.

On clause 140,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When clause 140 was under consideration the other day, I called attention to what I thought a very extraordinary provision in this clause, which provides for the non fining nor punishing people who committed a wrong at an election. The clause reads :

No fine or penalty shall be imposed under this section if it appears to the judge or jury that the person has already been sued——

The CHAIRMAN—We have added the words 'to judgment or acquittal.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not the point to which I desire to call attention. The next three lines read as follows :

—nor shall any fine or penalty be imposed for any offence proved only by the evidence or admission of the person committing it.

That is, a man may have committed the grossest violations of the law at an election, and if he admits it himself, and there is no other witness before the court, he is to be acquitted. Have not the judges in the province of Ontario, who have just made a report in the Elgin case, based their report upon the provisions of a law similar to this clause? We have the candidate in that clause who contested the election, Mr. McNish, who was defeated, making an extraordinary confession, signed by his own hand in order to prevent an investigation of the court, in case it went into court to contest his right to hold a seat. We have also the confessions of some of the parties who committed the grossest of frauds, and there was no other evidence brought before the judges and before that court to sustain the contentions which had been made by these parties, and yet the judges report, and properly so, under such a clause of the election law that no wrong had been committed by anybody, or rather that there was no evidence to convict them. There was no evidence brought before that court, owing to the manner in which it was constituted—which perhaps it is not necessary for me to discuss just now. Owing to the manner in which it was constituted by the Ontario government, no evidence was brought forward to sustain the contentions of these men who left the country, some of them, nor to sustain the confession of the candidate himself. Of so gross a character were they that, rather than go into court, the candidate made a general confession over his own signature, of the wrongs which had been perpetrated. Well, individually I know the reason he did that, but it is not necessary for me to repeat that here in order to intensify the objections which I have to this clause. I think it is an extraordinary provision, unless we are to lay down the principle that every man who commits a fraud at an election, can turn Queen's evidence and go clear. There would be no difficulty in perpetrating any amount of villainy at an election by a man who has no scruples of right or wrong. He could perpetrate all the offences that are attempted to be committed under the election law, and afterwards make a full confession of the whole thing and he could not be convicted of it unless you have other evidence to corroborate his confession. I hope the minister will consider that clause before the meeting this afternoon. I am not prepared to accept the theory, or argument, because it has been the law in the past that it should remain there. There are a number of provisions in this Bill which never existed before. We made a change in one of those clauses which provided a penalty. They were optional. It was discretionary with the judge to say whether there should be a penalty imposed or not. In one or two of these we have made it imperative, if the crime be proved, that the culprit must be fined a minimum or a maximum sum, and then he must go to jail for having done it, for a minimum or maximum time.

As we want to make this law as perfect as possible, we should leave no loophole for a man to escape punishment if he commits wrong. Let us have a fair expression of opinion from the people if we can, and whatever that opinion will be, the minority are bound, under our system of government, to accept it until public opinion changes. I look upon this feature of the law as very dangerous—all the more dangerous from facts that have transpired lately, and I dare say we shall have more of it, very likely, in the Brockville and West Huron cases particularly. In view of what transpired in the committee investigating these cases in the House of Commons, let us remove all chance of escape if we possibly can.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would not see such an objection to this if it were confined to cases where the witness became evidence for the Crown. We know that principle is recognized in criminal cases, and that a man who becomes Queen's evidence is allowed to escape with a small punishment. I think the distinction ought to be drawn.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I had no reference whatever to Queen's evidence. I do not propose to interfere with that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This has been in the statutes for a good many years. It was revised and inserted again in precisely the same words in the revised statutes, and certainly those who inserted it in the first place, and those who continued it, must have had a reason, and a reason which they regarded as adequate. I would not be prepared, myself, to strike this out, unless there was some adequate reason for it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Let it stand over.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have seen affidavits published alluding to some person that I feel perfectly confident, on a question of moral certainty, that the person who made these affidavits did not tell the truth. Supposing you had a very close election, and had an inquiry, and testimony of this sort were admitted, a man might be bribed to testify against himself with a view of affecting the election. I should be very sorry indeed to place the return of a man who had attempted to conduct his election honestly, at the mere mercy of one who would make an affidavit of this sort against himself. This matter was fully discussed at the time by Sir A. A. Dorion, Mr. Blake, Sir John Macdonald, John Hillyard Cameron and others, and the conclusion they reached and embodied in the law I should be very sorry to set aside upon some abstract theory. In my opinion, the effect of repealing this clause would be to enable a party not merely to testify against himself, but if this testimony was accepted, to affect the seat of the successful candidate, who had conducted his election honestly. I think the law is safer as it is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I confess I do not understand the argument of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—This clause may possibly be amended to carry out the intention, and remove any objection, by requiring corroborative evidence.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is the case now.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I understand a man gives his evidence in an election case, and the law, as it stands, says that the member sued will not lose his seat or be punished on account of this man's testimony: but does it prevent the man who gives the evidence from being punished?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Of course this evidence will not go against the member who is sued, but will it not go against the man who gives the evidence himself?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is upon the trial of an election petition that this law applies. It applies to all parties.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The witness himself cannot be punished.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not upon his own testimony.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If this principle is to be carried out, there is no reason why it should not apply to an investigation which takes place when a candidate has been cited before the court to hold what is called an examination for discovery. A candidate is brought in Ontario, and I suppose in the other provinces, before a judge, to discover what has been done. He is put under oath and subjected to all sorts of cross-examination. If he admits, under that examination, that he has violated the law, is he to go free in that case, or only when he comes before a court for an election trial? If a man is guilty of stealing, and he is brought up before a magistrate and confesses that he stole a horse, the magistrate does not set him free. It may be a mitigation of the offence, I admit. The jury would have to find him guilty, and it would be for the judge to say what punishment should be administered, and he would take the circumstances into consideration as to whether it should be a few months in jail or he should go to the penitentiary. Here is a law under which if you prove that a man has carried an election by the grossest fraud, and if there is no evidence to convict him but his own admission the only penalty is the voiding of the election.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The costs will fall on him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That would depend altogether on the judges. But that puts the other candidate, who might otherwise have been elected, and it puts the country to the expense of another contest. I should like to see that put beyond a doubt. My hon. friend says it might prevent a man confessing. They do not often confess. What are you going to do with a man who is put in the witness box during an election trial. The candidate himself is often subjected to cross-examination of the severest possible kind by the best legal talent obtainable. He is compelled, during the cross-examination, to admit violations of the law which he would not have admitted voluntarily, or under any other circumstances, but rather than perjure himself, he makes the confession. Now, if there is no other evidence to show that he did commit that breach of the law, you cannot punish him under this law. Is that right ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, unfortunately it is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then it is utterly absurd to put a man in the witness box at all to try and discover whether he has done wrong. I know there is no provision of the law which says a man is obliged to convict himself and subject himself to a penalty, but we have had cases where cross-examination proved beyond a peradventure that a crime was committed, and the man was allowed to go free, and the Minister of Justice says that is right.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, that is right.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend and I generally agree in matters of this kind, but in this case, we are diametrically opposed to each other. Where you can drag the facts out of a witness, he ought to be punished, or if he perjures himself, and you prove it, you should punish him.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that, without this cause, there would be strong temptation to prevent a man telling all he knew. You have an election trial and the man makes a statement, and is called as a witness. He says : 'I have received a bribe from a certain party.' If you could prove that by another witness, you could punish him but if you were going to punish him for every confession he makes with regard to his own wrong conduct, you would simply hold out every possible motive to him not to come forward and tell what he knows. I remember very well this matter was thoroughly thrashed out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I confess I do not remember it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There was a general agreement on the subject. It was felt that in an election trial, almost every man who could give evidence would be a man who would be liable to punishment if the facts about which he is called upon to give evidence could be established by other parties, and so, in order that he may testify freely, the intention is to allow him to testify with the full knowledge before him that he is not going to be punished for the admission or confession which he makes.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill and asked leave to sit again.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

AGAIN IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole in consideration of Bill (132) 'An Act to amend the Railway Act.'

(In the Committee.)

On the last clause,

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would suggest that this clause be allowed to stand until the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have an amendment here which may remove the objections which have been raised to the clause. The Minister of Railways is of opinion that this would not interfere with the claim of the Ontario Bank and the McFarlane estate. The amendment which I propose is as follows :

Provided always that nothing in this section contained shall affect or interfere with any judgment now existing against any railway company upon which final process may have issued authorizing the sale of the said railway, but such sale may proceed in accordance with the law of the province authorizing the same.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The hon. gentleman stated on Saturday that he was communicating with Mr. Barwick.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have done so, and have just received the answer. The Minister of Railways thought this clause in its present shape did not in any way interfere with any existing judgment, or any process that was now in course of operation against any railway company, and I asked Mr. Barwick to say whether he agreed or consented to this. He answered :

I dissent from that view. The clause, as I learned on Saturday, is intended to meet the case of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway. There is no necessity for it. The provincial law makes provision for sale.

The amendment I proposed meets the case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a mystery to a layman what necessity there is for this law at all. There is but one railway in the whole Dominion that it would apply to.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are other railways. The Minister of Railways mentioned one in New Brunswick which was embarrassed in the same way.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We know what this Bill was intended for, because it has been stated. I cannot understand what necessity there is for making a general law to meet a special case. The railway is bankrupt, as this clause implies it is, but the whole case is before the court now, and the road ready to be sold to any one who may desire to buy it. If any one buys the road and afterwards it becomes bankrupt, then this law might step it, but what we are attempting to do is to place it in the power of the attorney general of any province to apply to the Dominion government for permission to do that which the law of the province permits him to do now; but, the argument is, it being a Dominion railway, the local law does not apply. In this case, the road it is intended to strike is one that is now under the hammer, and is to be sold in the interest of those who have claims against it. It is like a good deal of other legislation, we have had, to meet a particular case and particular circumstances, where a local government desire to get rid of one class of men and put the enterprise in the hands of another. That is what the Bill provided for that was rejected a short time ago by a committee of the Senate this session. That attempt having failed, this Bill is introduced to accomplish that which was formerly rejected. The Secretary of State has made a declaration as to the opinion of the Minister of Railways and Canals. We have the law officer of the Crown, and it is his opinion on matters of this kind that should guide us, if we are to be guided at all by it. If it becomes a question of law that divides the House, the law officer is the gentleman who should give his opinion, and not the Minister of Railways. The Minister of Railways introduced this Bill for a purpose, and his opinion would be in accordance with the idea paramount in his mind, and he would so give it. Has this matter been submitted to the hon. Minister of Justice, as the legal adviser of the Crown, and what is his opinion of the clause, and what would be the effect of passing the amendment? First of all, I should like to know whether this has been submitted to the Department of Justice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not that I am aware of.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Just what I anticipated. We have had cases of the kind before, where clauses have been introduced affecting the titles to lands, in the North-west Territories, which this House objected in the interests of the North-west, and had it materially amended, and when the question was put to the hon. Minister of Justice, he had never seen it and knew nothing about it. The majority in the House concurred in the view we took when it went back to the House of Commons with amendments. So palpable was the attempt to do that which should not have been done by any legislature, that the House of Commons not only accepted our amendment, but actually improved it, and made it still stronger. Here is a similar case. I am not arguing in favour of the individuals, but here is a similar case, in which civil rights are attempted to be interfered with by legislation. Perhaps the hon. gentleman who has just come in will tell us whether he approves of this kind of legislation or not. However, as it is not to be passed until the afternoon, I shall say nothing further about it at present.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think that some such clause as this is necessary. As it is now, if a railway is within the provincial jurisdiction, then the provincial courts cannot deal with it. If a railway gets into debt, the creditors can make their claims good under the provincial law, but if a railway is situated within the province, and that railway has been declared by statute to be for the general benefit of Canada, so that it comes within the jurisdiction of this parliament, then the legal authorities, as I understand, cannot deal with it without further legislation by this parliament. Now, what does this clause propose to do? It proposes simply that where a railway is altogether within the limits of the province, the courts of the province which are the only courts, I think, which have a right to deal with it, shall have the right to deal with it effectually. It seems to me that is a reasonable proposition. The courts shall not have the right to deal with it unless the officer of the province makes application to the Governor in Council for an order to allow the railway to be dealt with. I do not know enough about the merits of the case to which the hon. leader of the opposition refers, to discuss it, but if such a proviso was added to this clause as would make it clear that it was not to affect that particular case, the clause in itself, as a general clause, is a good one, even though in this particular instance the leader of the opposition may think it would work mischievously. But if a proviso were added to it, providing that it should not apply to this particular case, then the clause is one which I think we should have on the statute-book.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At this stage of the session it seems unreasonable to allow a number of Bills to stand over.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not our fault.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I moved an amendment in accordance with the view of my hon. friend opposite: we are most anxious that no proceedings of ours should interfere with cases pending in courts, and my amendment was to exempt cases now in court from the operation of this clause. Nothing could be more in that line than the method in which we are legislating. Where a case is subjudice, we exempt it from the operations of the statute.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Did I understand, from the reading of this telegram, that this amendment has been submitted to the solicitor who was acting on behalf of the bank?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I drew it this morning.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He only dissents from the view taken by Mr. Blair.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I telegraphed that the Minister of Railways thought it would not affect the case Mr. Barwick is interested in, and I said: 'If you think otherwise wire me,' and he wired me and I prepared an amendment which will exempt it from the operation of the clause.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If my hon. friend is right about that, it will not take much time to consider it after luncheon.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All right.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress and asked leave to sit again.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES BILL.

THIRD READING.

The Order of the Day being called:

Committee of the Whole House on (Bill 193) An Act to authorize the granting of subsidies in aid of the construction of the lines of railway therein mentioned.—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the third reading of the Bill. He said: we do not go into committee on a Bill of this sort.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Perhaps the hon. gentleman may be able to tell us how much these subsidies amount to in the aggregate. I know there is a sliding scale relating to some of them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Something less than three and a half million. I think it is $3,400,000.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is, without counting anything for the sliding scale by which they can go up to $6,400 per mile in special cases.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And without considering the extra provision for Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—These are all new. These are not subsidies which have been granted hitherto and not expended.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Some of them are revotes and some of them are the extension of existing lines, and there will be in some of these further extensions hereafter. The appropriations do not cover the whole length of line contemplated, but what may be reasonably expected to be undertaken during the present year. Hon. gentlemen know that a number of these roads, in Northern Ontario, for instance, are due to the development of the mines and to the establishment of the pulp business. The construction is necessary to enable the material to be got out in the one case and in the other, and with regard to the North-west Territories, the construction of some additional railways, for the purpose of meeting the requirements of new settlers, persons going into the country who will have no railway facilities owing to the districts which they are occupying being at some considerable distance from the railroads already constructed. Then there are roads, to a limited extent, undertaken in the maritime provinces and also in the province of Quebec. The principle adopted in the subsidies,—and of course they embrace the very limited number of the roads requiring subsidies—has been to take the population of the provinces roughly as the basis of the railway appropriation, so that each province will have an appropriation for the roads which have been projected and which are contemplated as necessary to construct in proportion to its population—in other words, in proportion to its contribution to the public revenue. It would be scarcely fair to push certain roads in one province to the exclusion of railway construction altogether in another province, and that seems to be the fairest rule that could be adopted. Certain railways which have been projected in almost all the provinces will stand over after this, because when making a very large charge beyond what it would be possible to undertake in the year all the demands for aid could not be acceded to, but those that were regarded of greatest urgency, the construction of which would be most advantageous to the public and to certain large enterprises, some of which have been projected and some of them completed, the system adopted on the whole is a fair one. In British Columbia, I think, there is but one road aided this year. There was another spoken of in the northern part of Vancouver Island, the extension of the road that is constructed as far as Nanaimo to the northern part of the island. That was omitted simply because the friends were not pressing it for the present season. Perhaps they are not anxious to go on with it at once, but, no doubt, a good deal of advantage will accrue to the country when it is constructed, and the fact that it was not upon the list of railways to be aided is no indication that it is not regarded as a work of merit.

Hon. Mr. MILLS.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would ask my hon. friend whether in former Bills for granting subsidies it has not been stated in the Bill in each item whether it happened to be a revote, I can find nothing of that kind in this Bill, and therefore it was not a revote except in one or two cases in lieu of a former vote, where they were making it larger. I think there were only one or two cases of that kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think my hon. friend will find it in the estimates brought down, but not in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask the hon. Minister of Justice to give me some information. I see in the 16th paragraph of section 2, that there is a grant to be given to the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada of $270,000 to make up the grant in aid of the undertaking to $500,000 upon condition that the tolls upon the bridge for passengers and vehicular traffic shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, a sum not exceding $200,000. Is that condition imposed by the government? Was the approval of the tolls of the bridge by the Governor in Council a condition that could be imposed on every bridge?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is with some.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What I want to know is, could that condition be imposed upon a subsidy provided for by chapter 7, clause 10 of the Act, referring to the subsidy for the bridge over the St. Lawrence at Quebec? I merely ask if such condition as is imposed upon the Grand Trunk in the public interest could be similarly imposed upon another? Perhaps the hon. minister might avoid making any search for the purpose of answering the question if he could say whether the Senate could alter the present Bill so as to impose that condition on the Quebec Bridge Company?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, we cannot make any amendment to this Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know how it is with other hon. gentlemen, but if this Bill is to be discussed at all, we should have an opportunity of reading it. I understood the hon. minister in moving the third reading to say that the subsidies are principally for the opening up and developing of unsettled and new sections of the country. So far as the principle of subsidizing railways for the purpose he has indicated is concerned, I think we would all approve of it, but we find in this, as in other subsidies which have been granted of late, they have not been confined to that object. In the last subsidies that were voted by this House, there was one for the sixty-sixth part of a mile. I wonder if that was for the development of the unsettled portions of the country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Which is that ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not in the Bill this year. I am speaking of the past. I find in some of these before us now, having looked at them casually, that there is some seven miles of a railway from Caradoc Station on the Canadian Pacific Railway to the town of Strathroy. I was under the impression that that was one of the best settled portions of Ontario. It may be necessary to have it in the interests of the people who live there, but it certainly does not come within the category of developing a new section of the country. No. 3 is really for the purpose of development. That is a railway running from Bancroft northward twenty miles to connect with the Pembroke Southern Railway, or what is known as the Booth road. That would give them not only an outlet for all settlers, and for those going west and east, but it would also open up a new section of country entirely. This is not open now except by the colonization road which those who have travelled in that section of the country know is very difficult to travel by. No. 5 is of the same character, but here are some roads going through the best settled portions of the country. It is almost unnecessary to discuss these matters. Here is a subsidy for four miles, another for seven miles, and a variety of others. I should like to ask an explanation about item 27, a road from Farnham to Frelighsburgh and International boundary line, not exceeding twenty-one miles. Is that not the road that has become, I might say, defunct ? It has been subsidized in the past by the local government ; whether it has been aided by this government or not I do not know. It has gone into disuse, and the rails have been taken up and now we are to subsidize it again in order to enable a new enterprise to take hold of it and lay some more rails. Is that the fact with reference to it ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am unable to answer.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am sorry the Minister of Railways has not furnished us with the reason for this—that is, if this House has a right to know what we are called upon to do.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understand it is a new enterprise.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand that this road was subsidized formerly and that rails were laid. Since then the rails have been taken up, the scheme abandoned, and the subsidy pocketed by somebody, whether for their individual benefit or whether they spent it in buying the rails which they afterwards sold, I do not know. Now we are going to subsidize it again, or is it for the purpose of enabling the Grand Trunk to build this road to connect with the United States or other systems ? If it is, I could understand it, and it might be defensible, but I want more particularly to call the attention of the committee to the sixth clause. This clause is just about of the same character as the Alien Labour Law, which was placed upon the statute-book, and the Chinese Act which we have just enacted, and, what is still more pertinent to this point, what is termed the Conciliation Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would have thought that that was a clause above all others which the hon. leader of the opposition would have admired.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman had only been patient for a moment he would have had my opinion of the clause. The principle involved in the clause is quite correct; but it is vicious and in every respect vile if the utterances of the two hon. gentlemen who sit before me, the hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. Secretary of State, are to be taken as guides in matters of this kind. I have, upon previous occasions, read the utterances of these gentlemen in reference to bonuses, the principle of protection, and various other things. Here is one of the strongest evidences in condemnation of the utterances of these gentlemen for the last eighteen or twenty years; but while approving, in the abstract, of the principle laid down in this clause, what I was pointing out when interrupted was, that it is of the same character as the laws which have been placed upon the statute-book to which I have already called attention. Those who were in the Senate at the time the late Minister of Justice introduced the Alien Labour Law, reserving the exclusive right to the Minister of Justice, or rather, the Attorney General of the Dominion, to say when the prosecution should take place, I, with others in the Senate, pointed out that, under the law, no action would ever be taken until some circumstance arose which would induce them to take action if there were an election pending on, and they wanted the labour vote. That prediction made by the Senate, although prophets are never appreciated at home, has been literally carried out. Numbers of people have been imported from the United States during the last four years, to which the labour organizations, for which my hon. friend has such admiration, and with whom he does not wish to interfere in the least, complained to the Minister of Justice—I do not know whether the present Minister of Justice or not—and asked that the law be put into force. In not a single instance, until the other day, has the law been put into force. Some Italians who crossed the Niagara border and commenced to work, have been sent out of the country. If there were reasons existing for refusing to put the law in force in the past, they exist to-day, but there is an election approaching, and these Italians were sent out of the country. With regard to the pledge of the ministers in reference to the Chinese Act, all they have got is the increased capitation tax, while the law has been extended for the admission of this Mongolian race into the country to a limited extent I admit; under a former law British Columbia had one-fourth of the gross receipts. They get now only one-fourth of the net receipts. I hope that satisfies the British Columbia member, whose interests he is supposed to look after. What have we here? This is precisely of the same character. The idea of putting a clause of this kind in the law, the Governor in Council may make it a condition of the subsidy hereby granted or of any heretofore granted by any Act of parliament as to which the contract has not yet been entered into between Her Majesty and a company for the construction of the railway, that the company shall lay its road with new rails made in Canada. If it stopped there it would be all right. Then it would meet my views precisely. When the hon. gentleman made that interpolation I was saying that, so far as protecting Canadian interests, I am prepared as an individual, to go any length. The clause proceeds:

> Shall be made in Canada, if such rails are procurable in Canada of suitable quality, upon terms as favourable as other rails can be obtained upon, of which the Minister of Railways and Canals shall be the judge.

If that is not a deceptive clause, I should like to know what you could call it. First, the rails are to be made in Canada if such rails are procurable in Canada.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—At the same price.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes. It goes on to say they must be of the same quality and must be as cheap as they could be got in any market.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It says of a suitable quality.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The rails must be of a certain quality, whether steel or iron, &c., and of which forsooth the Minister of Railways is to be the judge. I am sorry to say I have not the same confidence in the Minister of Railways that some gentlemen have.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And from what has taken place lately, I am afraid what little confidence I had and what little confidence the public had has been weakened. The idea of putting a discretion of this kind in the hands of the present Minister of Railways or any other Minister of Railways, is not only an absurdity, but a fraud upon the face of it. I do not know that I could use stronger language—if I could find it I would have no objection to using it—in this case, but I compliment the free traders who have advanced so rapidly in the line of protection that they are prepared to make the provision that the rails must be made in Canada. If they had made that provision absolute they would have my support. But, depend upon it, this clause will have no more effect than if it were not there. The railway companies will get rails wherever they like.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the 'hear, hear' of a free trader. I have great respect for a man who has an honest opinion and adheres to it; more particularly an opinion upon the question of political economy such as this. But, who would suppose for a moment that a rail would be purchased in Canada when there are the great factories in the States and the great works in England to produce them? The very moment a railway was being constructed, the agent of a company would be here, and they could turn out these rails at a less rate than they could possibly be obtained in Canada. If the intention of the government is to help and encourage the establishment of steel rail factories in this country, let them put a duty upon steel rails at once—a sufficient duty to justify the investment of large sums of money which it would be necessary to expend to start such factories. I believe the iron industry, under the tariff that exists, and under the increased bonuses which these gentlemen have given, contrary to all their professions in political life—and if they would go a little further we would have these articles manufactured in Canada and sold in the market as cheap as anywhere else. Experience has shown that to be the result of the manufacture of iron in this country, and it is more than shown in agricultural implements and other articles. Where there has been a legitimate and fair protection given to them, they have given employment to the artizans and labourers of the country, and these machines can be purchased now in Canada just as cheaply as they can be purchased in the States or England. Even the principle has been adopted which they condemned so vehemently, of a drawback on articles that went into the construction of these machines in this country. Where the articles that went into the construction of any article and exported a drawback of the duties paid, this government has increased it to 99 per cent. I do not find fault with that, though the one per cent may not cover the cost of warehousing and going through other forms necessary to send the machines out of the country. I thought it was a good policy, and now they have gone so far as to put upon the statute-book another affirmation of the principles on which the late government acted so long in the protection of industry. That is the only point which strikes me in looking at this clause. There may be others equally inconsistent. A subsidy is granted for two miles here, and for a mile and a half in my own county. A subsidy is granted in the eastern townships for the sixty-sixth part of a mile and there is a provision put in the law that there shall be deducted from that whatever it will cost to the extent of three per cent of the subsidy for carrying mails. These clauses are delusive in character. I do not hesitate to say that they are put there for the purpose of deceiving.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Order.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—All those who have not given the attention and thought to this question that those having to deal with it in this House have to do cannot but come to the conclusion that it is a useless provision. My hon. friend shakes his head knowingly and wisely. He would never admit—I would not expect him to admit—that this was put in for the purpose of deceiving, but the probabilities are my hon. friend was not consulted in this matter. It is just as likely that he had as little to do with this absurd provision—for such it is—as he had to do with the Railway Act which is before us in which a question of law is dealt with. And we are asked to take the opinion of a member of the House of Commons on a measure which has never been submitted to the legitimate source from which we should receive our instructions affecting any questions of a legal character. It is just as well that those who have thoughts upon this subject should advance them. I hope my hon. friend from British Columbia is satisfied. His province is amply looked after in this, and why that subsidy is not given for an extension of the line from Nanaimo northward to the coal fields, to the northwest of Nanaimo, and to open up a certain section of country which could be opened up for settlement, I do not know. I suppose that meets the approval of the people from British Columbia, for we do not hear so much talk about the rights of British Columbia as we used to when I was on that side of the House, and if they are satisfied I do not know why I should complain, except upon the principle that every province should be treated alike.

The further consideration of the Bill was postponed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (173) 'An Act respecting the Quebec Harbour Commissioners.'

The Senate adjourned.

SECOND SITTING.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock p.m.

Routine proceedings.

THE CASE OF AVELIN BOURASSA.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to an item that has appeared in the newspapers to the effect that the Department of Justice has named a commission to inquire into the mental condition of a man named Avelin Bourassa, who was condemned to death lately in the city of Montreal. If the government is in a position to do so, I should like to be informed if such a commission has been appointed for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The papers in the case of Bourassa were forwarded to my department some days ago, but I have not considered this case nor shall I have the opportunity to consider it until parliament rises. I have not appointed any commission, nor do I yet know whether a commission will be necessary or not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have called attention to it because the papers had mentioned it, and it was looked upon that a commission was not necessary, as the minister says, because the mental condition of Bourassa now may be different to what it was at the time of the commission of the crime, and it would be only reopening the case, I do not know what was the report of the judge in that case.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have not taken the case up, and whether a commission will be necessary or not, I do not know. The department has never acted on the assumption that a commission is unnecessary because the present condition of a condemned man may not be what it was when the act for which he was condemned was committed. Therefore, commissions are frequently appointed to make inquiry, and always have been. This man's case, as reported to me, was that he had been in a lunatic asylum. The statement is that he woke up in the night and immediately strangled his wife.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (193) 'An Act to authorize the granting of subsidies in aid of the construction of the lines of railway therein mentioned.'

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I find in this Bill the following items:

38. Towards the construction of a railway bridge over the St. Francis River, in lieu of the grant under chapter 7 of 1899, at St. François du Lac, on the condition that the bridge, with approaches, be built so as to allow the municipalities to make use thereof, to establish and maintain a suitable roadway for the free passage of foot passengers, vehicles and animals, to be approved by the Minister of Railways and Canals, $50,000.

39. Towards the construction of a railway bridge over the Nicolet River at Nicolet, in lieu of the grant under chapter 7 of 1899, $15,000.

These works are in the counties of Yamaska and Nicolet, and form part of what is called the South Shore Railway. I wish to call the attention of the government and the public to this fact, that the South Shore Railway extends from Sorel to Lévis, and a part of the road that was subsidized last year extends from Sorel to Lotbinière, a distance of 82 miles. That was a revote. There is a revote for the line from Yamaska to Sorel, a distance of 11 miles. That portion is to receive the ordinary subsidy of $3,200 per mile, but it must be observed that that part has already been subsidized by the federal government, so that is the second time that the 11 mile section has been subsidized by this government. I also call the attention of the House to the fact that last January, Mr. Beauchemin, acting in the name of the South Shore Railway, acquired that part of the South Shore road from the Canadian Pacific Railway, that is to say, that line from Sorel to Yamaska, for the sum of $25,000. The railway has been constructed twenty-five years, and that part has already been subsidized by the federal government and by the provincial government to the extent of $4,000 per mile, and by the town of Sorel to the extent of $40,000, and by the county of Drummond to the amount of $250,000, as forming part of the South-Eastern. These two last subsidies of $40,000 and $250,000 were voted for the South-Eastern Railway, so that that part of the South Shore road forming part of the South-Eastern received its share in that subsidy. More than that, from Yamaska to St. François on the South Shore Railway, just where the bridge is to be constructed, for which a subsidy is granted in this Bill, there is a distance of six and one-half miles of railway which already has received a subsidy from the federal government of $3,200 per mile, and from the local government of $4,000 per mile. It was built in 1887. From Nicolet to St. Gregoire, the distance is about nine miles, and that part of the railway which formed part of the Great Eastern, also received a federal subsidy as well as a local subsidy—the federal subsidy being $3,200 a mile, and the local subsidy, $4,000 a mile—so, on the whole, you have on that road of 81 miles from Sorel to Lotbinière, a distance of 26½ miles which has been already subsidized by the federal government, apart from the subsidies they obtained from the local government, and the town of Sorel and the county of Drummond. I call attention to these facts so that the government, if they feel inclined, will be able to give those subsidies to the other end of the line, and not subsidize the same parts twice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They are not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is the bridges only.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am calling attention to the matter to explain that from Lotbinière to Lévis there is a part that has not been subsidized yet, and I ask that the parts the government have already subsidized be not subsidized again. They might use the subsidy voted to help the parts that need money. Such a distribution would further benefit the interest of the whole line.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the hon. gentleman will look at a subsidy Act of last year, he will find both items in that Act. They are revotes, not new votes. 'Towards the construction of a bridge across the Nicolet, $15,000; towards the construction of a bridge across the St. Francis river, $50,000.' These two amounts are the same as those mentioned last year. The only change is that the amount of $50,000, instead of being an estimate upon 15 per cent, is made an absolute sum in the appropriation of this year, and that is because the bridge, I understand, is a very long one, and will cost a very considerable sum of money, and they propose putting up a free passage for foot-passengers along the side, and the sum was made absolute on that account. But that is not a new vote, or a second vote to the same railway. It is a revote.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not my contention either. What I wanted to point out to the hon. minister is this, that the bridges for which a subsidy is granted form part of the general scheme comprised in the South Shore Railway. I am calling attention to the fact that if the subsidies of last year are not paid already on that road, the government should not forget that in the eighty-one miles subsidized last year, there are 26 miles which have been already subsidized once by the federal parliament, and they might in consequence devote the money appropriated for that part to another part which needs it, and which has not yet been subsidized, that is from Lotbinière to Lévis.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I shall call the attention of the Minister of Railways to the statements made by the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The observations made by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona show how impossible it is for the Senate to consider a Bill of this magnitude at so late a period of the session. As I have said on previous occasions, it is a pernicious principle to bring down those important Bills at a time when it is utterly impossible to give them the consideration they deserve. We cannot criticise this Bill. We have no time to cover three or four pages of these subsidies, or make any calculation as to the need of these projected lines in localities where they are situated. However, the government have been very liberal with these subsidies. I shall be glad to know whether there has been a fair distribution.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I think so.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I am not going to criticise the Bill, because it is utterly impossible to undertake a criticism on such short notice, and even if we did, we have no power to alter or amend the Bill. That is why we should have this information before us early, so that we could form an intelligent opinion on the subject. We are debarred from that at the present time, and only for the few observations made by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona we would not have been in possession of facts which, to some extent, have been explained by the hon. Minister of Justice. However, the government have taken this responsibility on their shoulders, and no one will accuse them of being any way remiss in granting public moneys in the way of railway bonuses. When they were in opposition, they railed at the government of that day for spending some thirty or thirty-five millions of dollars. Now, they spend 60,000,000 without saying a word.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, nonsense.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—There is no doubt about the fact. The sooner the country understands it the better it will be for this government or any other government. I am not saying whether the money has been wisely expended or not. Here they bring in an immense volume of accounts late in the session, and we cannot criticise them. I find, on casually looking over them, that a great many appropriations were made which were not made before. Whether they have been judiciously made it is utterly impossible for us, in this House, to give an intelligent judgment upon them; the government must assume the responsibility. I agree in toto with the sixth resolution giving the advantages to manufacturers of steel rails in this country to furnish the steel rails required for the construction of the railways. Three or four Bills were passed this session, incorporating companies with large capital for this particular work. I hope they will go into operation. This condition making it optional with the Minister of Railways to enforce the law, is pernicious. No such power should be given to any minister. Everything should be done by statute, and if these large concerns are to be stimulated, that one in Welland particularly, and also one in the county of Ottawa, the law should be unconditional. We have vast deposits of iron ore north of this city, and all that is needed to develop them is capital. I was told the capital was secured, and the mills were in course of construction. If that is the case, and steel rails can be manufactured in this country, the railway companies receiving bonuses from the government should be compelled to procure their supply of rails from these Canadian establishments on the conditions mentioned. The general principle is right, and cannot be controverted. If you want to stimulate those large manufacturing establishments, you must give them every facility in your power by creating a demand, and realize for them the benefit that such undertakings deserve. I want to draw special attention to the fact that the government have not thought proper to grant any subsidy or assistance towards the construction of the Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal. I look upon it as the most important public work in this country. That is generally acknowledged. When we look at what happened at the Welland Canal last spring, we must all admit the sooner the Ottawa Canal is built the better it will be for the Dominion.

This canal can be built, and it will answer all the purposes of transporting the surplus products of the North-west to the seaboard better and cheaper than they could be transported by any other route. An endeavour was made to incorporate a company to build a railway from Toronto to Collingwood, to connect with large steamers, to obtain a portion of this trade. I do not find fault with that, I believe we have sufficient trade in the country to employ all the facilities we can create by rail or water. But the Georgian Bay Canal is a project by which the produce of the country could be transported cheaper, more beneficially and better than by any undertaking which has been suggested. But the government have not come down with any appropriation in aid of the project. The people in England are in earnest in this matter. They have raised $35,000,000, but the government have turned a deaf ear to it. They would not accede to the proposition by guaranteeing two and a half per cent after the completion of the work and after the $35,000,000 have been expended in this country. I consider that the expenditure of that money alone would be a boon to this Dominion. During the five or six years which would be occupied in the construction of that canal the benefit to the country would be so great that we could afford to pay 2½ per cent on the investment for a long time to come. But everything savouring of the character of an Ottawa enterprise has been side-tracked. We have been side-tracked for thirty years. I think it is a great wrong perpetrated against this section of the country that ought to be benefited above all others. It is true we are all making the country what it ought to be, but we could utilize all our minerals in that vast region of country. We could utilize our water power by the construction of this canal better than by any other means. There is another matter which deserves some attention. We have been told from year to year that it was desirable to make Ottawa the Washington of the North. We were told that we were to get a large appropriation for the building of a geological museum. Parties waited on the government this session and we were told it would be attended to this year, but nothing has been done. They still leave the valuable museum in the place where it is, and the government could not replace it if it were destroyed. They come down with a long list of subsidies to various railways through the country, varying in length from two miles upward. They may be all right, or they may be all wrong ; but, if they are right, how much in the interests of the country can a small road of two miles be ? The government have not acted as they should have acted with reference to giving some assistance or subsidy to the people in England who are ready to undertake the construction of the Ottawa Canal and to bring this large amount of money out to this country for the general benefit of Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask the hon. minister if the subsidies to which the hon. gentleman from Stadacona called attention, are in aid of portions of the South Shore Railway ? I do not ask that question in opposition to the grant. I ask it for information.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The subsidies are for the two bridges mentioned.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Which form part of that road.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, but it was granted last year. The bridges were separate items.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They always are.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And so they are in this Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there a subsidy in this for the Quebec bridge ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, that is by statute, granted last year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This clause with reference to the South Shore, for the completion of a line which has been partly built, is a provision with which I do not think the country would find any particular fault, because that is the line which ought to have been selected when the Drummond County Railway was purchased. But it is another evidence that the Premier has to a certain extent, in this case fulfilled his pledge. He pledged himself at the Nicolet election that certain subsidies should be given, and although it has taken two years to get them, yet it will be a gratification to those interested in the road to know that the pledges have been fulfilled at last.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—These bills for granting subsidies to railways I think are objectionable measures. They are carried by a species of log rolling. People make an application to parliament for a charter to enable them to build a road in some section where they suppose they can obtain some assistance from parliament. They say that a road in the eastern section of the Dominion is required. They find another person from the west that wants a road under similar circumstances. They find another to the north, and another to the south, and by combining their forces they compel their representatives from the different sections to support such a measure in parliament and to get them a subsidy for a road which perhaps, under other circumstances, would not deserve a subsidy at all. That is the mode in which those subsidies are forced upon one government after another, and I believe it would be in the interests of the country if a Bill similar to this were thrown out by the Senate of Canada. It would put the system that is now in force on a much better footing than it is at present. We have now granted perhaps some fifty millions of money, between forty and fifty millions of money since the power was given to the government of granting subsidies to railways. That is a very large sum of money, and I doubt very much whether the benefit to the country has been equivalent to the expenditure. We know that many of these roads are not built in the general interests of the country, but that they are sectional. They are such roads as should be bonused by a particular locality; they are not deserving of subsidies from the Dominion government. It is, I think, a very vicious principle also that is embodied in this Bill, that if a road costs more than $15,000 a mile it is to receive $6,400 a mile, whereas the general amount allowed as a subsidy is $3,200 per mile. There is an inducement in that for parties to increase the cost of the road beyond what is probably a reasonable amount for building a road in many localities in this country, and I do not think that it is a wise provision either. Then we are told that there is a charge made of 3 per cent against these companies and that that is taken off only when the government send mails or employ the road for any purpose. It must be evident to hon. gentlemen that on many of these roads mails will never be sent. They are not localities where mails would travel by such roads. They are in some places where they parallel existing lines, and it is unreasonable to suppose that the government would require to send mails on two roads which run parallel from the same point, and terminate at the same point. That, I think, is an improvident provision in this Bill, as it has been in many others. We know that there has been an immense amount of money invested in railroads in this country, that the amount contributed to railways through the parliament of Canada, through local grants and by the provincial legislatures amounts to $200,000,000 up to the present time. It is an immense sum of money, and it is a question whether the benefits conferred by those railways are at all equivalent to the amount that has been advanced for the purpose of building them. Some of those roads do not pay the promoters in any shape or form. Some have been abandoned, and some are not able to maintain trains running over them, and I think that when applications are made to parliament for subsidies for railways we should have in each one of those cases before us a report, showing the requirements of that section of the country in which it is proposed to build the road, showing whether it is going to be any benefit after it is built, so that we would be able to vote intelligently on the different items that are contained in the Bill, even if we cannot amend the bill by striking out any one of them. We might find that so many of them were objectionable that it would be advisable to throw out the Bill altogether.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed on a division.

DOMINION ELECTION LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

HOUSE AGAIN IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committtee of the Whole, consideration of Bill (133) 'An Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to elections of members of the House of Commons.'

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I move that the following be added as clause 23a:

In any polling division, or any electoral district in the province of Quebec, in which there is no voters' list, any person qualified under the franchise law of the province of Quebec to have his name placed on such voters' list, were there such a list, shall be entitled to vote in such polling division upon taking the oath in the form U in the first schedule to this Act.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that the introduction of a judicial system where a man is made judge, jury and witness?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I hope the hon. minister will not persist in that motion. The more I think of it, the more I am inclined to think that it would open the door to fraud which it would be impossible to prevent. If it were to be adopted it ought to be adopted with all the safeguards which surround the voters' list in the province of Prince Edward Island. There exceptional legislation is necessary in order to meet the case of no voters' lists. If it is to be enacted at all, it should not apply exclusively to one province. It should be equally applicable to all provinces, and if you provide for that, then you give the franchise to a large class of people that are now disfranchised and have no representation in this House. Take, for instance, the Klondike; there are thousands of people there who belong to the different provinces. They are deprived of their franchise. There is a section of the country which pays into the revenue, if we are to accept the statement of the Minister of Finance, between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 annually, without representation or the right to vote. If that section of the country had been given the right of representation in parliament, or if provision had been made to give them the representation in parliament at the next election, or if there had been any provision to enable them to record their votes, there might be some reason for this, but here is a special clause, for a special purpose, and for an individual province. If there are unorganized districts—and I think there are not so many as there used to be—in the province of Ontario, it should apply there also. The Nipissing district, as far as my recollection serves me, includes the unorganized portions of that part of Ontario which was not embraced in any constituency prior to the last distribution of seats, and whether that applies to the whole of that district termed new Ontario—that is the Rainy River district, and the whole of that portion of western Ontario—I am not sure. I have another reason: I am very anxious to see this Act go into force. I think it is a very great improvement on the old law. It remedies many defects in the other, and I would not like to see anything put in the Bill at this stage which might endanger its being carried, but I think they will find a very strong and long opposition to this clause.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My information is to the contrary. It may not be from the ministerial side, many of whom have an object in having that placed upon the statute-book, but there are others who take decided objections to it, and I think it is exceedingly dangerous if this House is going to carry it. If it is carried, it should be surrounded with all the safeguards for investigation afterwards and for inquiry as in the case of Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is assuming that the Prince Edward Island amendment is carried. The Prince Edward Island provisions are, in my opinion, extremely objectionable, because they provide for a scrutiny without the security that the law intended to give those who contested the elections. They are absolutely without security, and, so far as this is concerned, there will be the same opportunity for calling in question the votes that there would be on a scrutiny in any other portion of the Dominion. We are making exactly the same provision that was made in the North-west Territories. Here are certain districts that are without municipal organization in the North-west. In the unorganized districts of Ontario, provision is made for the preparation of a provincial voters' list, and so they are on the list, but in certain portions of Quebec they are not on the list. They have the necessary qualifications. They ought to be permitted to vote, and we are taking all the necessary precautions that can be had in a district of that sort, and that is requiring a party to take the oath that he possesses the qualifications under the provincial law if he were upon the list to vote.

That, I think, is a proper provision. In the North-west Territories Act it is provided that, the deputy returning officer shall, while the poll is open, if required by an elector, whose name is not on the list, administer to such elector the oath prescribed in the Act, and the name is then added to the voters' list. They have a list, but one which does not contain all the names. Now, we propose to take, in the province of Quebec, exactly the same security that is taken there. There is no difference whatever between the provision in the North-west Territories and that in the province of Quebec. I understand in one electoral division in the province of Quebec, there are at least 500 persons, who, without this provision, would be disqualified.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is half the number mentioned on Saturday?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am giving the number in one division, I did not say one division on Saturday.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Another hon. gentleman did. He said there were a thousand.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He spoke about that number being on the north of the St. Lawrence River, but he did not say in one division.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will the hon. gentleman kindly tell us when the North-west Territories Act to which he has alluded was passed?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In 1886. It will be found in the revised statutes, chap. 7.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is more recent legislation in the Territories than that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not with respect to the voters' lists. The voters' lists are prepared after the writ issues, and in some cases the names of parties may be omitted, but they are not disqualified because they were omitted. They are entitled to come to the poll and take the oath. In some districts of the province of Quebec we are giving to parties in those constituencies, who would be entitled to have their names on the voters' lists if there was any voters' lists, the privilege of voting as an elector may do in the North-west Territories—come forward take the oath, swear in his vote, and then have his vote recorded. If upon a scrutiny, or a contested election, it is found that these persons were not entitled to vote, then of course, they would be struck off the list of voters.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend was reading, I understand, the federal law for the representation of the Territories.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, section 44.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What we are dealing with owing to the policy of my hon. friend and his colleagues, is the provincial law, I thought when this government came in we were doing away with the federal law establishing a franchise.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are not establishing a franchise under this.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I thought we were falling back on the provincial laws.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So we are.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend says what we are proposing to do in this case is exactly what is done in the Territories. I have not had time to refer to the federal law of the Territories, but I know in the territorial law for the conducting of elections—and I apprehend a good deal of that Act was applicable to the federal elections as well—when a man presented himself at the poll and offered to vote, if his name was not on the list, (and I think even if it was on the list), he proferred his name to be put on the list, and it was then open to objection. When the ballot was handed to him and he returned with it after marking, notice was served on him to appear before the board of revisers if the vote was objected to. All those safeguards are in the territorial Act. I looked them over very carefully, and I know what I am speaking about, because I studied the question very carefully in the early part of the session. When I found some provisions were introduced in the other House by the Solicitor General providing where no voters' lists were that such-and-such things should be done, and that I understood was to be applied to the Territories and unorganized parts of the provinces. I accordingly took up the territorial law of the North-west, and there I found that they have a system almost identical with what we are introducing in the federal law relating to Prince Edward Island. A man comes up and votes. If his vote is objected to, he is served with a notice, and the ballot is initialled and placed in an envelope, and he is served with a notice to appear before the board of revisers, consisting of the deputy returning officer and a magistrate, and if it is thought this board does not do justice, there is an appeal to a judge. All these provisions are in the territorial law—I am speaking of the law in a provincial sense, and what this government adopted as their guide is the provincial franchise. Now, the government are falling back on the federal law in the North-west Territories as their guide for what they are to do in the province of Quebec. When the Franchise Act was introduced two years ago it provided for Prince Edward Island what is proposed here, that a man could go to the polls, and if he took a certain oath, or oaths, a ballot was given to him, and that ballot went into the box, and there was an end of it; it was counted whether right or wrong. I was simply appalled at that proposition. I knew the danger that would arise in Prince Edward Island, and if there was danger in Prince Edward Island from such a proposal as that, how much greater would the danger be in unorganized districts, in very remote parts, where very unsettled conditions prevailed, where there are no municipalities, and it is very hard to exercise a proper and legitimate control. Under this amendment now proposed, plainly the government of the day can appoint a returning officer. He may be a good man or he may not. We have heard of Duncan Boles.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have heard of a good many other toughs besides Boles.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then the greater danger if these characters are more common than I thought they were. A returning officer, whether he is good or bad, is sent there, with almost unlimited authority. There is no law so far as I know to control him. A party comes up and takes the oath and he comes back with votes enough from that part of the country to swamp the vote in the old established parts of the constituencies. I am supposing an extreme case, and we know from our experience in other parts of Canada that we are not speaking of an impossible case. With no remedy, or possibility of scrutinizing whether those men have votes, and no safeguard but their own willingness to take the oaths, you are able to go to these unsettled districts of the country and gather in votes to swamp the vote of the older parts of the country. I do not think we are called on to do this at such a late hour of the session. The government could not have been oblivious of the fact that there were unorganized districts without municipal government in the early part of the session, and it was their duty to have put in the Bill some provision, and they did not do it; but here, at the very last moment, when we have not the time required to carefully study it out, we are asked to adopt this provision. Our friends of the government claimed that they are adopting the provincial franchise. The province of Quebec has not, it appears, thought proper to take the vote of those unorganized districts, and those votes, as a fact, were not counted or recorded in 1897, and I cannot see why we should now, at this late moment of the session, without being able to provide the necessary safeguards, do what the province of Quebec in its wisdom did not deem fit to do, with regard to the votes of these people; and as the leader of the opposition remarked, I do not see why we should have more solicitude about these people in the unorganized districts of Quebec than we have about the people of the Yukon. I called attention early in the session, to the fact that the British subjects who would be entitled to vote in that country were being denied the franchise, that there was no provision made to give that important part of the Dominion representation in parliament. I called my hon. friend's attention to it, and at a more recent period we saw the Toronto Globe took the question up and pointed out that there were over twelve hundred British subjects who would be entitled to vote, within the environs of Dawson alone. Some consideration should have been given to these people.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not the point before us just now. Mr. Chairman, the question is this amendment.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am dealing with this amendment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am pointing out by way of analogy that if the hon. gentleman is so solicitous to gather in the unorganized votes in Quebec he should have shown the same solicitude for the inhabitants of the Yukon who are more numerous, and occupy a much more important part of the country in the way of producing revenue, giving employment and creating wealth. I claim that there should have been provision made for its representation, certainly, before we propose doing such an extraordinary thing as we are asked to do by the government in this Bill now before us. If my hon. friend was prepared to throw all the safeguards around that vote, that we have been able to throw round the vote in Prince Edward Island, well and good. If he is prepared to take the matter up in that way he will have my support, even if I have to stay here some days, but I think, at the same time, he should take the Yukon into consideration, and if he is going to take care that all the people of this country are to be represented, he should see that the people of the Yukon are represented at the same time. If he will do that, I, for one, am prepared to remain for days if we can give those people the right to vote, and throw the necessary safeguards around our action. But I cannot see how we can do so at this late period of the session—certainly not under this proposal—a bald proposition, that these deputy returning officers, appointed, as we know they will be, under the influence of the government of the day, can go into that unorganized territory and hold polls in any way that may seem fit and right to them, and give ballots to every one who comes up and takes the oath. They are away beyond the reach of law, I may say, and as I have already said, all conceivable danger lies in such a step as that. The government of the day and the deputy returning officers will have everything in their own hands, and there can be no doubt the effect will be most serious. I fail to see that this committee will be justified in adopting such an extraordinary proposition as this, so late in the session, and without having an opportunity of knowing what they are doing.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I fail to see this in the way the hon. gentleman does. I gather from his speech that he is prepared to accept a proposition of this kind if applied to the Yukon.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not say so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to know what proposition the hon. gentleman was prepared to make for the Yukon ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My proposition was made early in the session, that the government should give representation to the Yukon and bring it in under the law the same as the rest of the country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I cannot see how it would be practicable to provide a scheme to give representation to the Yukon. In the first place, the region is almost inaccessible at the present time. The great bulk of the population in the Yukon are not British subjects. It may be true——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it was maintained that the hon. gentleman to whom I am replying was in order. It must be borne in mind that twelve hundred voters do not constitute a unit for the purpose of representation. You have to throw the Yukon, I suppose into British Columbia, and that would be rather an impracticable thing. Then, again, you have in the Yukon a very considerable foreign population who would be very likely to attempt frauds upon the election law, and until things become more settled there, I think we had better wait. With respect to unorganized districts in the older provinces, it is altogether different. The population who will be disfranchised, if some such amendment as this is not made, are not foreigners—they are not adventurers, but farmers and fishermen, who have been living on the north shore of the St. Lawrence River for generations—they and their ancestors—and the hon. gentlemen from the province of Quebec as I understand it now, are prepared to vote that these men shall be disfranchised—decent, honest, truthful men as a rule. If one of these men comes up to vote, and is prepared to swear that he is qualified, the hon. gentleman from Marshfield thinks that he should not be allowed to vote. The hon. gentleman did not think so in 1886, as the Minister of Justice has pointed out. In that year the Conservative government made a provision for the North-west Territories, where there was more of a floating population than there is in the lower St. Lawrence, where there is no floating population. Section 44 provides :

> The deputy returning officer shall, while the poll is open, if required by any elector whose name is not on the voters' list, administer to such elector oath number one in the said form P, and such oath having been taken, the deputy returning officer shall at once cause the elector's name to be added to the voters' list, with the word 'sworn' written thereafter.

Form 'P' is not nearly as elaborate a form as the one prescribed by the amendment moved by the hon. Minister of Justice. The form is simply this :

> You do swear that you are a bona fide male resident and householder within this polling division of this electoral district, that you are of the full age of twenty-one years, that you are not an alien or an Indian, and that you have resided in this electoral district for at least twelve months immediately preceding the date of the issue of the writ for this election : So help your God.

Upon taking that oath the man was allowed to vote. I do not see why we should treat the lower St. Lawrence any worse than the North-west Territories were treated.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—About all that need be said has been said on this question. The hon. member from Marshfield has stated what the local law in the North-west Territories is, but the local law of the North-west Territories is not the law on which the people have voted for the return of members to the Dominion parliament. The hon. gentleman was in parliament when the federal statute was adopted, and when it was continued in force. That is the only protection, and he says now in the province of Quebec, the population of the lower St. Lawrence are such rascals that they cannot be trusted, that they will perjure themselves, and that all sorts of frauds will be committed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I said the door was open.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, and the hon. gentleman voted to open the door. The hon. gentleman supported this law for the North-west Territories that I propose shall be applied to those portions of the electoral districts of the province of Quebec that have not, under their local law, any voters' list. The hon. gentleman says we are proposing to depart from the provincial franchise. We are not. We are adopting the provincial franchise, and we are requiring a voter to take the oath when he comes forward to vote, that he is qualified, under the provincial law, to vote after his name is on the list.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—You are making the law for the province.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, because there are none made. But, there were none in the North-west for those who were to come and swear in their votes. There was provision to put their names on the list when they swore. There is no need for that in the province of Quebec, because the poll-book will constitute such a list. It is unnecessary to state anything further. I am proposing nothing further in regard to the Bill, and I ask now that the committee adopt the amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think the hon. Minister of Justice did justice to the gentleman who preceded him. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield made no charge or insinuation against the individuals who would be asked to vote. What he did say, and I fully concur, is that power might be given to parties who, after taking their votes, would induce them to do that kind of thing—I am not speaking of one part of the country more than another—if you thought you could carry a constituency by a little sharp practice of that kind, I doubt not there are men belonging to both parties who would do it. The position we took, and the position that I took in the first place, was that we should try to frame a Bill to meet all cases, to stop fraud by both parties. I am dealing with the general question. I think the proposal in this Bill is a very dangerous proposition. It only shows another difficulty arising in trying to graft upon the Dominion franchise law all the different Acts that existed in the different provinces. It would be very easy to get over all these difficulties if we just had a franchise Act of our own. That the government has decided against. After the repeal of the Dominion Act, what I supposed was going to be done, would be to put the Dominion law in precisely the same position it was prior to the adoption of the Dominion Franchise Act, and that was, after confederation, there was a provision in the law that the voters' lists which could be used at the different elections should be those which were used in the province. All we had to do then, when an election took place, was to take the lists as we found them, and we knew when we were supervising those lists that we were doing it for the Dominion parliament as well as for the local, and there was no interference with them. We took them exactly as the provinces had them. That would remove all these difficulties. I think the whole principle on which we are acting is wrong. A body like ours should have a distinct and positive franchise for themselves, but that not being the case, let us have the least troublesome and the least expensive one possible; and in that way we avoid all these extra clauses to deal with exceptional cases. The people whose case we are discussing now, have no vote. That occurs in other parts of the country as well as in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to a few facts which might change his mind. The first one is, that he is taking a great deal more interest in making electors in the province of Quebec than is taken by the province of Quebec itself. He wants quite a number of new electors to secure the counties of Saguenay and Chicoutimi at the general elections, and for that purpose he is trying to make a few more votes. But does he know what happened in the past? There was a list made for that division, in 1896, when the Dominion electoral list was in force. Parties in that part of the country were put on that electoral list, and what occurred? I have here the report of the last general election, and what do we see? From Shelldrake and Magpie, two settlements of that unorganized territory no report was received as we may see by the following remarks of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery:—

No statement of polls received from the deputy returning officer of these two polling divisions. With the consent of the candidates and their representatives, the addition of the votes cast at the election was made regardless of those two missing divisions, as they could not affect the final result of the election.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—What was the result of the election? What was the majority of the Liberal candidate?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The majority was 1,086. I do not see that a man who has such a majority as that need go to such a length to try and get a few more votes. Will the hon. gentleman, who is so well posted, answer this question: Are those part of the country in the county of Saguenay or in the county of Chicoutimi?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—In the county of Saguenay.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will the Speaker assert to-day that those people voted on the Dominion list in the last general election?

The SPEAKER—I wish to correct the statement I made last Saturday. I was under the impression they had voted, but immediately after the sitting I informed the leader of the opposition that I had made an incorrect statement, that I have been misinformed, that they did not vote in the local election, because there was no organized municipality.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière (Mr. Casgrain) says that these unorganized territories are in the county of Saguenay.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I understood they were.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why did the hon. gentleman say they were? Are they in the county of Saguenay or where?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Either Chicoutimi or Saguenay. The two counties are united for electoral purposes. There are no other counties east, so that Chicoutimi and Saguenay take the whole of that territory. Saguenay extends as far east as the province of Quebec goes, and the unorganized districts are in either of those counties.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I agree with the hon. gentleman, but what is the question now? Are they unorganized territories? Here is the municipal code of the province of Quebec, and what does it say? It says:

Every territory erected into a county, at or after the time when this code comes into force, for the purpose of parliamentary representation in the legislative assembly of the province, constitutes by itself a county municipality, under the name of 'The Municipality of the county of'—

So what they call unorganized territories, are embraced in an electoral division, in a municipal county. Further on the code provides:

The inhabitants and ratepayers of such territory so governed by the county council and its officers are alone subject to all municipal obligations arising either from the law or from the municipal acts in force therein, in the same manner as if such territory was organized into a municipal corporation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That does not touch the question whether they have a voters' list or not?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They are bound to have it, based upon an assessment roll, made by the county officers—does the hon. minister say no? He dare not say no.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, yes, he dare say what he likes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY. Well, let the hon. gentleman say no. The hon. minister, in talking of the province of Quebec and its municipal organization, does not know all the facts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Neither does the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What one do I not know ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Many. They are too numerous to mention.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What one ? Mention one. Section 43 of the code is as follows :

The members and officers of the council of the municipality to which a territory has been annexed, in office at the time of the annexation, remain in office, and form the municipal council, or are the officers of the whole municipality as constituted after the annexation.

This regards annexed territories which are taken from the unorganized territories. Such officers act under the jurisdiction of the county council, and that council has all the proper officers to make an assessment roll and prepare the municipal lists and the provincial lists, and that duty is imposed on them. More than that, and this is a fact to which I call the attention of the hon. minister—a Bill was presented during this parliament in the House of Commons by one of the supporters and closest friends of the government of the day, Mr. Carroll, and what was this Bill :

An Act to amend the Franchise Act, 1898.

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows :—

1. Section 9 of the The Electoral Franchise Act, 1898, is amended by adding thereto the following subsection :—

'2. Where, in the province of Quebec, the voters' lists for a territory not as yet organized as a municipality have not been prepared and revised under provincial or local authority, the Governor in Council may appoint all necessary officers and confer upon them all necessary powers for the purpose of preparing and giving effect to the voters' lists in such unorganized territory; and in the preparation and revision of such lists such officers shall be governed by the law regulating the franchise in the said province in reference to the qualification of voters; such qualification shall be based on the assessment roll or any other information at their disposal; and such officers shall, on receiving notice of their appointment, take the oath of office and proceed forthwith to the preparation and revision of the said lists, by posting up eight days at least before so proceeding, a public notice of the day, place and hour for such preparation and revision; and a copy of the list so prepared and revised shall be posted up during eight clear days, at the expiration whereof it shall go into force, unless appealed from as provided by the franchise laws of the said province.'

By this Bill provision was made to obtain lists where lists were wanted. Why did not this Bill go through ? Why did not the government take up this Bill when the electoral law was discussed in the House of Commons ? It was thrown aside, though containing much better provisions than the one suggested here. At the last day,—in the expiring hours of this session, here is an amendment, drawn in such a way that the minister could not say what it meant, and those provisions are pressed on us and we are asked to do what ? To enable the government to create, he says, five hundred electors in one county to retain the present member in his seat in parliament. The electors in that part of Saguenay have never voted, not even in the last election. They are scattered over a distance of more than 600 miles in length, and it is quite impossible to record the votes of those people. The only thing that could be done, and what the government are trying to do, is to have the people vote without qualification at all, and find out after the election what votes shall be struck out and what shall remain. That would undoubtedly bring on a controverted election. It cannot be otherwise if the proposition of the hon. Minister of Justice is acceptel. There is a difference between Prince Edward Island and the province of Quebec. Prince Edward Island has no electoral lists at all, and, if I understand aright, has manhood suffrage, so every person living in certain parts of Prince Edward Island has a right to vote. It is not the same thing in our province. We are not under manhood suffrage, but under the franchise of the province of Quebec, and if those people come up, they will be their own witness, their own jury and their own judge. They will do the whole thing themselves, and there will be no one to contradict them. A man will say 'I am an elector. I judge I have the proper qualification, I decide that I have, and I record my vote. That is the way they are going to be dealt with in the province of Quebec. I think this legislation is an infringement upon our provincial rights. You have no right to come and qualify those people when the province itself does not interfere and does not think proper to give them the proper qualifications to vote for even the local legislature. When they are qualified to vote for the provincial elections, then you might take their vote for the Dominion, but as long as the province itself does not think proper to take the means to give those people the right to vote, I do not see why the Dominion should come with this legislation and open the door to all possible and probable frauds ?

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I have not seen this amendment. Is it printed ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I thought that this amendment had met with the approval of my hon. friend opposite.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I cannot agree to that amendment for reasons which I will give. I voted with the Conservatives when the late government brought in a Bill by which the franchise was to be decided by the local government. I thought in each province the government would understand better what were the reasons why a man should have a vote, and it has been shown that in Prince Edward Island, the conditions are not the same as in Quebec, and they are not the same in British Columbia as in Quebec, and so on. Therefore I think I am consistent with the vote I gave then, believing that the local government ought to be the judge of the qualifications of the electors, and that seemed to be at the same time the opinion of the government when they brought in their Bill. What are they doing now ? This amendment means simply that the local government is not fit, or is not willing to do what they ought to do. We are taking their place after declaring that the local government is the government to decide upon the qualifications of voters.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Certainly. The government of Quebec has not found it necessary to give a right to those people that live in unorganized parts of the country to vote, and they ought to be the judge. The federal government ought not to interfere ; after the provincial legisture has decided we ought to accept their decision.

The committee divided on the amendment, which was lost on the following division :

Contents, 13 ; non-contents, 17.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the committee rises I should like to bring up a matter on which I may have been misinformed ; I was given to understand that the hon. gentleman from Brockville had paired and now he has voted.

Hon. Mr. FULFORD—I had paired with Mr. McLaren up to to-day. He offered to pair and I wrote a letter some time ago accepting it. I suggested to him to make the pair good for the balance of the session, and he wrote back and said no, that he had promised to be here on Monday.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I received the telegram to-day from the Hon. Senator McLaren that he had paired with Mr. J. T. Fulford.

Hon. Mr. FULFORD—The pair was till Monday.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—To-day is Monday.

Hon. Mr. FULFORD—Until to-day, but not including to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does it not include it ?

Hon. Mr. FULFORD—It was not Senator McLaren's intention at all, because he telegraphed back declining to include to-day. He answered : ' I cannot pair for the balance of the session, because I promised to be in Ottawa on Monday.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is well to have the explanation, because it was understood the pair had been made. The Hon. Senator McLaren came to me and said business required his presence in North Carolina in connection with some mining operations he had there and he said : ' Will it be all right if I pair with Mr. Fulford ?' and I said all right, because I thought neither of the hon. gentlemen would be here.

Hon. Mr. FULFORD—His telegram stated until Monday. He could not accept it for the balance of the session, because he had promised to be here to-day.

On clause 41,

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Before the committee rises, with the permission of the hon. Minister of Justice, I desire to return to the consideration of subsection e of clause 41 with respect to which a suggestion was made, and practically acquiesced in, but owing to an accident when the clause was reconsidered it was not inserted. It was to insert after the word district in the 28th line, ' and a certificate of the number of ballot papers so furnished.' It is for the purpose of better securing against the danger of switching ballots. The effect of it will be to promote a greater efficiency and prevent as far as possible the perpetration of any fraud. It will not complicate matters in the least.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I thought it was inserted before. It will do no harm.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the committee, reported the Bill with several amendments, which were concurred in.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed under a suspension of the rules.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (132) 'An Act to amend the Railway Act.'

On clause 12,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All the clauses except clause 12 have been carried, and I propose the following amendment to clause 12:

Provided always that nothing in this section contained shall interfere with any judgment now existing against any railway company upon which final process may have issued authorizing the sale of said railway.

That would not interfere with the suit said to be proceeding against the Baie des Chaleurs Railway.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—I must object most strenuously to this clause and the amendment. This is a clause specially directed against one railway in Quebec, and the province of Quebec does not want any interference by Mr. Blair or any other Minister of Railways. When it comes to the third reading, I shall decidedly object.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand there is a second railway in the eastern townships that requires this legislation.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—That is the sequel of the intrigues in the House of Commons. The government will not pass that Bill as long as I am here.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to know from the hon. Secretary of State what is the other railway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was a railway in the eastern townships.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I thought the hon. gentleman first said New Brunswick. This morning it was New Brunswick and now in the eastern townships, and to-morrow it will be in the Pacific Ocean.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I asked the Minister of Railways what other railways were affected by it. I believe the Baie des Chaleurs Railway was affected. He said there was another railway in the province of Quebec. Whether this railway enters the province of New Brunswick I am unable to say. I asked the minister where the railway was situated. He said in the province of Quebec. I have only his word for it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps it is the one to which I called attention when the government was subsidizing again.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE BOWELL—I object to the clause because it is sectional. I do not think we ought to legislate in that way.

The committee divided on the amendment, which was lost on the following division:

Contents, 13; non-contents, 15.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The whole clause is gone now.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD, from the committee, reported the Bill with an amendment, which was concurred in.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS BILL.

AMENDMENT INSISTED ON.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I move that the Senate do not insist on the amendments made by them to Bill (189) 'An Act to amend the Act respecting the judges of the provincial courts.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The motion put by the hon. minister would be tantamount to the rescinding of the motion which was carried, striking out the clause providing the salaries for the Quebec judges. I confess for some little time I was somewhat in a quandary to know whether we had done right or not, considering the opinions expressed by members in the lower House, but upon reading very carefully the whole of the debate in the House of Commons, and also looking at precedents to which I will call the attention of the House before I resume my seat, I have come to the conclusion that the course pursued by the Senate is strictly in accord with past precedents, and that we are justified in what we did, as the Senate was justified by rejecting such proposals in the past as have been introduced here during this session in the Bill which we are now considering. Apart from that, there is one thing that probably might have induced us to accept the suggestions of the Commons, did we consider the courteous manner in which the question is treated by the ministers and their followers. A question of this kind, of a constitutional character, should be approached with some little degree of moderation, without appealing to the passions of any race or any section of the country. Unfortunately, that has not been the case in connection with this measure. The first compliment paid to the Senate, in moving the rejection of the amendment made by the Senate, was by the first lieutenant of the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General. I find in the report of his speech some very interesting statements; among some of them was one referring to this body in the following language:

> I would almost say it is the duty of the Senate, constituted as the present Senate is, that institution which is the haven of rest for the rejected of the people, that they should be deaf to the people.

I do not know why a statement of that kind should be made by a gentleman who occupies the second position to that of my hon. friend opposite, more particularly when we consider his chief is one of the defeated, whom his sub sneers at.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is highly irregular to discuss in this House the debates of another House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then I shall not refer to the debates in the other House. I will speak of what I see in the public newspapers. My hon. friend is strictly correct, but we have not been in the habit of confining ourselves to this rule.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are a lawless body.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman. I only wish our Speaker had the same power that the Speaker of the other House has, to call us to order when we transgress the rules. We would get through with business more quickly. Here we find it publicly stated that the Solicitor General denounces this House because he thinks it a refuge for the defeated of the people. When I look at the number who have been brought to this House since the present government came into power, I could not help regarding it as an astounding denunciation by a subordinate of the leader of the Senate and many of his supporters. The hon. gentleman may retort that we did the same thing. We did, and I approve of it. Take a gentleman like the hon. leader of the House, who has had twenty or thirty years' experience: if when removed from the turmoils of the political atmosphere that surrounds the House of Commons, why should he not be translated to this Chamber, with his judicial mind and ripe experience, it would be a benefit to the country, and it seems strange that the Solicitor General should rise in the House of Commons and denounce the Senate as a refuge of those who have been defeated. When you come to consider it, you will find that a large proportion of the hon. gentlemen who have been made senators since the present government came into power are gentlemen who have been rejected by the people. We will begin first with the Hon. David Mills, of Bothwell. I have already said what I think of that gentleman. Let me say a little more; I have reason to believe that he never sought this position. I believe the position sought him, and for this reason, the government of the day thought they wanted somebody with brains in this House. They treated the hon. Secretary of State in a manner that I should not like to treat a colleague of mine; they thought it necessary first to bring in Sir Oliver Mowat. He had not been defeated. Then they brought in the present hon. Minister of Justice, a gentleman of whom the House might be proud. We find the next gentleman is the Hon. George A. Cox. I do not know whether any of you know his political career. I have a recollection that he was defeated—it is true only by one of a majority; still, he was rejected. Then Hon. Mr. King, who was taken from the House of Commons, had been previously defeated. Hon. Mr. Lovitt is, I believe, not in the category of the defeated. Hon. Mr.

Dandurand I think was not, but Hon. Mr. Fiset occupies the same position as Hon. Mr. King—he formerly represented Rimouski in the House of Commons, but was defeated, and then appointed to this Chamber. The Hon. Mr. Templeman is among those who lost the confidence of the people in British Columbia. The Hon. Mr. Carmichael was defeated in Pictou. I do not think Mr. Yeo was ever defeated. He is here, like myself, coming from the House of Commons, without having sustained a defeat. My hon. friend from Cobourg had the honour of losing the confidence of his constituency on one occasion.

Hon. Mr. KERR—And my hon. friend was wise enough to anticipate that fate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, I think I anticipated it at the time, and if I could have done anything to assist in the defeat of the hon. gentleman I would have done it with great pleasure, not because of any personal animosity towards the hon. gentleman, because we have been the best of friends for forty years, and I hope will continue to be, though we never meet on any political question without disagreeing with each other, and I am inclined to think, from the exhibition we have had of him here, we will continue to disagree. Then, Hon. Mr. McSweeney, and Hon. Mr. Fulford, I think, were not defeated; but our venerable friend opposite, Hon. Mr. Burpee, had the honour of meeting the same fate as the majority. I am not aware that Mr. Casgrain (de Lanaudière) ever ran, consequently he is not one of the defeated. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will state if he ever ran?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I never was defeated.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then our two venerable friends—well, not venerable, they are active and experienced parliamentarians. The hon. gentleman from Marquette (Mr. Watson), and our friend from de Lorraine (Mr. Young), were both defeated at the last election. If they had not, they would not have the honour of occupying seats in this House. Then we have the last, but not least, our venerable friend Mr. Gillmor. Take all those gentlemen who have been defeated, and I ask if there could be any objection, from a party standpoint, to selecting them to occupy seats in a legislative body that is expected to revise, re-model, consider, and amend the election laws.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—None whatever.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am glad to hear a Conservative say that, because that is the principle on which we have acted in the past. That being so, it comes with very ill grace from the Solicitor General to attack his chief as he has done. He seems to have a good deal worse opinion of the leader of the House than I have.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the chief gave him an example some time ago.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes. The chief, when he was a good deal younger man than he is now, used different expressions altogether with reference to this body. My recollection is refreshed by looking at an old scrap-book where I took care to preserve his record, I heard the then gentleman of the House of Commons say the Senate was 'a Magdalen asylum—a refuge for political prostitutes seduced by the government of the day.' However, that is a matter of very little consequence. Then we find another hon. gentleman, who is reported to have referred to the defective brains of the members of the Senate and their want of ability, or something of that kind. However, he says they are deficient in brains and in legs. I do not think that is an expression that should fall from any man. If age and infirmity overtake us as we advance in years, and we lose the power of locomotion as we had it in our younger days, it is not a fit subject of ridicule for a member of parliament, speaking of a body of men as intelligent and respectable as himself. I was pained to hear an expression used by the hon. Minister of Justice a few days ago in reply to the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, because I was in hopes that a sentiment of that kind could only be used by a man with as little heart and feeling for his fellowmen as the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That gentleman boasted at a meeting in Toronto, where he delivered a speech, when asked almost a similar question to that put by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona in this House—when were they going to reform the Senate—his reply in cold blood was 'Providence is doing that.' I was surprised to hear the hon. Minister of Justice say the same thing, because I do not think he intended to convey the same meaning when replying to the hon. gentleman from Stadacona. Providence will take care of the whole of us, and death may meet the supporters of the hon. gentleman opposite just as soon as it may meet the supporters of those who do not support the administration.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—These were expressions which, to my mind, should not have fallen from any senator at least, and certainly they fell with very bad grace from even a member of the other House. It is not our fault that we are getting old. We would all, I have no doubt, remain young as long as possible. We will submit to the will of Providence, as my hon. friend, with the rest of us, will have to do. But a reform of this body should not be looked for by any man who has any kindly feeling for his fellowman, through the intervention of Providence in order to wipe us out of existence. I have taken this opportunity to refer to these matters, because I think that they are not at all consonant with the dignity of either House of parliament. We have next the argument advanced by the lower House that we are trenching on the rights and autonomy of the province of Quebec. That is the issue which they seek to lay before the people of this country at the present moment. These gentlemen, assisted by the Secretary of State, whose vote and speech were in the same direction as those we are now uttering thought nothing of the autonomy of the province of Nova Scotia, nor of the autonomy of British Columbia, when they rejected Bills of an exactly similar character to that which we are discussing to-day, as I will show before I sit down from the record. What in the world has the autonomy of the province to do with a question of this kind? The Solicitor General laid down the doctrine that the province of Quebec had the exclusive right to deal with their courts and the manner in which they should be constituted. No one denies that. So has every other province. Then he said, immediately afterwards, that it was the duty of the Dominion parliament and government to acquiesce in their demands, unless there were extraordinary circumstances or good reasons for departing from them. Who is to be the judge of the reasons that are to govern us? Is it to be confined to the Solicitor General, and to the party that happens to be in power at the present moment? Are we not just as capable of judging the requirements of a province as these gentlemen are? As an illustration, to show that the position we have taken is a correct one, and somewhat similar to the position taken by the Secretary of State, in 1879 and 1891, the Solicitor General told the House of Commons, in giving the reason why extra judges should be appointed:

> I may say, en passant, that one judge, whose district is in St. Hyacinthe, sat 222 days in the last year in Montreal out of 250 working days.

So that, if this be correct, and I have no reason to doubt the statement made by the Solicitor General, the judge of the district of St. Hyacinthe had but twenty-eight days' work in his own district.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—For his own district?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, and that he sat 222 days in the city of Montreal. What does that mean? Does it mean he had nothing to do in his own district?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Minister of Justice says no. Then who did the work if there was any? That is an easy way of answering the argument. I take the statement made by the Solicitor General. He tells us that out of 250 working days the judge of the district of St. Hyacinthe sat 222 days in a district not his own, and consequently he would not be dealing with the litigation that would take place in his own district, and that leaves 28 days to do the work of the district for which he was appointed. Now, let us accept that declaration, and where do we find ourselves? A judge receiving full pay for 250 working days, is only occupied 28 days in his own district, provided always that he had work to do all those 28 days; and the other 222 days are given to the district of Montreal. There, I say, is the strongest possible argument of the correctness of the position taken by those who opposed the passage of the clause in the Act providing salaries for three extra judges. Then, I find that another gentleman who spoke long and rather energetically on this subject, Mr. Fortin, made this declaration in the House, that during the Conservative administration nothing of that kind had ever occurred. I find also that another gentleman, Mr. Monet, said that the Senate had the right to reduce the salary of the judges, and I find that the Solicitor General asked the question whether any precedent existed under the Conservative administration, leading the House to believe, by insinuation that there were no such precedents that could be cited; yet these are the gentlemen who are teaching us what constitutional law is. Then the position taken by the Premier was an extraordinary one. His position was, that this branch of the legislature had no power to differ from the opinion expressed by a local legislature in matters affecting the courts. Then he went on to say that this was a direct infringement, an invasion of the prerogatives and autonomy of the province of Quebec; and, not satisfied with that he appealed, as he constantly appeals, when addressing the House of Commons and the people, to race prejudice. He said, and other members of the House who support him said, that their opponents are continually attacking the province of Quebec. Then he boasted that he is French. He is quite right to be proud of his origin, but what would be thought of me if every time I rose in this House to speak, I boasted that I am an Englishman, and felt proud of it? I am a British subject, and I am proud of it, and so should every British subject, no matter of what race or creed, be proud of his country. On almost every occasion when that hon. gentleman and some of those who surround him speak in the House of Commons, they appeal to their nationality? There are members in this House from the province of Quebec who have strong opinions on this subject, and just as good a right to speak for their provinces as Sir Wilfrid Laurier, or those who surround him, but they do not appeal to race prejudice. It was by such appeals that the hon. gentleman succeeded in securing his majority last time, and he hopes in that way to succeed again. I say it is one of the most vicious of all practices that can possibly be resorted to by any public man. We live in a country inhabited by men from all parts of the world. We have the two important races, the Anglo-Saxon and the French and Celtic races, and we should learn to live together in peace and harmony, and if we only carry out the principles which actuated Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Cartier and statesmen of that kind, we would not have those cursed cries of race by which some men seek to arraign one portion of the people against another. Having said that much on the general principle, I shall now refer to another point: it is said that the legislature and the bar of Quebec are unanimously in favour of this increase of judges. The Senate, when it passed their resolution took the ground that they had reason to believe that by a proper rearrangement of the work of the staff of judges now on the bench, there would be no necessity for incurring this extra expense and the evidence given by the Solicitor General himself, where he says one judge occupied 222 days of his judicial year in Montreal, is the best argument in favour of the position we take. Another reason assigned was this, that Mr. Casgrain the late Attorney General of the province of Quebec, was in favour of this change, and that he had introduced a measure to that effect in the legislature at Quebec. The Premier himself in discussing the question, when it was originally proposed, said he was fully in accord with Mr. Casgrain. The Solicitor General said also that he was in favour of it, so we find that both the leaders of the two parties were in favour of some kind of reform by which this additional expenditure would be saved. I stated, when I addressed the Senate on this subject a short time ago, that I had had information from and conversation with some of the judges in the province of Quebec, on this very subject. Since that time I find that in January, 1899, at a banquet given in the city of Montreal to the bar, the chief Justice, Sir Alexander Lacoste, gave utterance to the same sentiment. I am not guilty of any breach of confidence in reading an extract from what he said, because it was published in the newspapers. The learned judge said:

In our province we have enough judges for the Superior Court. What we need is a more equitable distribution of the work. Certain rural district judges have only a few weeks' work during the whole year. Why, the Montreal judges sit nearly twenty-five days per month.

I know that other judges hold the same view, because I am speaking from conversations I have had, though I do not wish to mention names. Is it unreasonable therefore, that the Senate should under such circumstances, take the more moderate course, and allow them time to make this reform in the province? Oh, says the Premier, the people of our province will not submit to any such change. What reason did he give for it? Because, he says, their ideas are antiquated. If I had used an expression, or if any English speaking senator had spoken of the French Canadians as antiques who wanted to adhere to antiquated usages, we would have been attacked at once as having insulted the French race, so that when I use that word, I use it, not as my own, but as one uttered by the Premier himself. Now, let me look at the authorities and see what they say upon this question—that is as to the rights of the Senate, and after I have called attention to these references, I shall then call attention to the position which was taken in the House of Commons and in this House upon exactly similar subjects, and I think I shall be able to show that the members for British Columbia objected to the increase—I shall be able to show from the record that the late Mr. Mackenzie, afterwards Premier, took precisely the same position that we do, and I will quote very strong reasons and arguments advanced by my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, in favour of the very course which we are pursuing, and will go a little further and show how he voted on that occasion. Bourinot says in his parliamentary Procedure and Practice, pages 472 and 473:

The number of Bills of public importance rejected by the Senate since confederation is very small compared with the large number coming under their review every session. In the latter part of the session of 1868 they refused to consider certain measures assimilating and revising the laws relating to criminal justice, on the ground that it was impossible at that late period of the session to give such measures that careful deliberation and examination their importance demanded.

That was in 1868 just after confederation. And that is a reason why the Senate might fairly object, at the present moment, to considering a number of important Bills brought down the last few days of the session. The extract proceeds:

In 1874 the Senate threw out a Bill respecting Tuckersmith, altering the electoral divisions of a county. In 1875 Bills respecting the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway and county court judges in Nova Scotia; in 1877, a Bill respecting the auditing of public accounts; in 1878 a Bill creating the office of attorney general; in 1879 a Bill respecting two additional judges in British Columbia. In all these cases the Senate differed from the majority in the Commons on grounds of public policy and public necessity.

And I may add that in none of these cases did the House of Commons take the position which has been taken by the House of Commons to-day in reference to this question. We heard nothing of the autonomy of Nova Scotia and the infringement and the invasion of the rights and autonomy of British Columbia when this House rejected the Bill providing for the salaries of two judges in British Columbia and of Nova Scotia. In 1875, I find, on looking at the records, that Mr. Miller made a motion, that was during the administration of the late Hon. Mr. Mackenzie—and I will read from the debates as follows:

Mr. Scott moved a Bill to enable the government to place the salaries of the county court judges on the same basis as those existing in the province of Ontario, in giving the six county court judges $1,200, and in the county of Halifax $2,500. Mr. Miller moved the three months' hoist to that Bill, and it was carried on a division of 34 to 17.

So that that Bill affecting the judges of that court was thrown out on a motion of Mr. Miller on a vote of thirty-four to seventeen. But that is not so close nor so pertinent to the question under consideration as the one to which I shall now call attention. On May 6, 1879, the Hon. Mr. Campbell, afterwards Sir Alexander Campbell, moved the second reading of an Act to provide for the salaries of two additional judges of the Supreme Court of British Columbia. That is an exactly analogous case to the one we are considering. In discussing that question, I find that Mr. Cornwall who was then a senator as many hon. gentlemen will remember, used this language in opposition to the Bill:

The question now is as to the appointment of two extra judges; but we might go further, and suppose that the local government thought fit that five additional Supreme Court judges should be appointed. Would the hon. gentleman then have come forward and said that it was necessary, because this Act had been passed by the local legislature it should be supported by the government and should be given effect to by both Houses of parliament. It is only a question of degree.

That is precisely the same argument that was used by many senators a few days ago. The extract continues :

And the argument that the hon. gentleman has used will not, when looked at in that light, have the weight or consideration which he attempts to place upon it when he brings the matter before the notice of the House.

Then I find, on turning to another page, a speech by a gentleman named Scott, the Hon. Mr. Scott I presume; we had no other here, so that it must be the present hon. Secretary of State, who used the following language in reference to this question :

It has always struck me that the administration of justice, particularly on the mainland, where the legal functions consist mainly of the collection of very small debts and breaches of the peace and misdeameanours of various kinds, would be most fitly carried out by judges of the character called into existence by the condition of affairs before the union ; that is, county court judges who had little judicial knowledge, but a wide knowledge of the circumstances of the country.

That view was intensified by the arguments of the Hon. Mr. Macdonald, our present colleague in this House, who pointed out that many of that character of judges had been on the bench administering justice in the rural districts for some fifteen or twenty years, and that they were quite able to perform the duties as long as the population remained in the state in which it was at that time. I may say, however, that as the province increased in population, as the necessities for other and more learned judges was made apparent to the government and parliament of Canada, they acquiesced in the demand for those two judges, and passed a law in the lower House granting the salaries, which was confirmed and agreed to by this House. That is precisely the same position we take in reference to the Quebec matter at the present time. If, after mature consideration, it is shown that the services of the judges in the rural districts cannot be utilized and that no reform can possibly take place, and that there is reaffirmation of their demands, I do not pretend to say, whatever our individual opinions might be, that we should not acquiesce in the demand made by the local legislature and by the Commons of Canada. Mr. Scott went on to say :

Now it does seem to me that the government is yielding to local prejudices.

Precisely what the Premier said in the House the other day. The extract continues :

In this particular case to the fact that the legislature of British Columbia passed this Act and sought to change the system, and they have yielded, I think, rather too lightly in the face of the large expenditure which has been entailed on the country in the administration of justice in that province.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is pretty strong language and it is precisely in accord with the argument which we have advanced in this Chamber for rejecting this clause—that the House of Commons yielded to the prejudice, if I may so term it, or their love, as the Premier would term it, of antiquity, in acceding to the request of the local legislature. Then Mr. Macdonald, who is a British Columbian, used the same argument and language that are used by the French Canadian gentleman who opposed this Bill in this House. He said :

We have plenty of judges to conduct the administration of justice efficiently. I think that it would not be a wise rule to lay down in this House that all the Acts of local legislatures should be given effect to by this parliament.

And we know they are not, because during the existence of the present government and, I think, during the administration of the Justice Department of the hon. gentleman opposite me, that he has disallowed a number of Acts which were passed by the local legislatures, a right to do which no one questioned, but he did it upon grounds of public policy.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know that any Act was disallowed on other grounds than the ground of being ultra vires. If the hon. leader of the opposition can name one, I shall be glad to hear it.

Hon. Sir. MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps I am mistaken. Was it ultra vires for the province of British Columbia to pass a law restricting the immigration of Chinese and Japanese into that province ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If it were ultra vires, then the hon. gentleman did right in disallowing it. But there were many other Acts I should like to call his attention to that are considered ultra vires by the hon. Minister of Justice and the government of the day, but they say to the province that they will allow them to go into operation, and let the parties who are interested in them fight them out in the courts of law.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I always understood that disallowance was a remedy to be applied when an Act was not ultra vires. If it were ultra vires the courts could throw it out themselves.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is just what I said, only in other language. Mr. Macdonald goes on to say :

> In this case I believe that it is nothing more or less than caprice on the part of provincial government simply because the county court judges are not lawyers. These judges have been in office for sixteen or seventeen years ; they have a knowledge of their work, and a knowledge of the country, and I hope the House will agree with us that it is not in the interest of British Columbia or of the Dominion that this Bill should pass.

Then Mr. Dickey refers to the question, in reference to Nova Scotia, and when we come to the vote we find that it is carried. The motion was made by Mr. Cornwall for the three or six months' hoist, and I am going to read the names for the reason, that it was laid down, as a fundamental principle of the Liberal party by the Solicitor General and the Premier and others who spoke upon this question, that it was the policy of the Liberal party and had been from all time not to interfere with what they termed provincial autonomy. If we are interfering with provincial autonomy now, they were equally interfering with provincial autonomy in 1879, when they rejected the British Columbia Bill, and yet we find all the following Liberals voting for the three months' hoist. The first is Mr. Baillargeon.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He was a Liberal.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And Mr. Brouse, an Ontario man, and Mr. Brown.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He was a Liberal.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Mr. Bureau, Mr. Christie, Mr. Cormier, Mr. Fabre, Mr. Grant, Mr. Haythorne, Mr. Hope, Mr. Leonard, Mr. Paquet, Mr. Pelletier. I presume that is His Honor the Speaker. If not I will look for some other Pelletier, but I have no recollection of any other Pelletier in the House. Then there were Mr. Penny and Mr. Power.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Oh.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He will vote the other way to-day. Then Mr. Poser, Mr. Reesor, Mr. Scott, Mr. Simpson, Mr. Stevens, Mr. Thibaudeau,

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Mr. Trudeau and our venerable friend Mr. Wark. All those are Liberals that affirmed the same principle and acted upon the same doctrine precisely that the Senate has acted upon to-day. So much for the Senate upon these questions. Let us look at what they did and said in the House of Commons. In the House of Commons, when the Bill went back with an amendment similar to that which we have made to this Bill, we find that a discussion took place of this character : Mr. Macdonald of Pictou, who was then Minister of Justice and Attorney General, moved a resolution that whereas by an Act passed by the legislative assembly of the province of British Columbia in the year 1878 and known as the 'Better Administration of Justice Act, 1878' provision is made for the appointment of two judges now authorized to be appointed to that court. 'It is expedient to make provision for the salary of two judges,' &c., and then the next clause is providing for a $4,000 salary for the judges. Mr. Mackenzie, in reply, said he desired to know if the government considered this demand of the legislature of British Columbia a reasonable one. Of course, the reply to that was that they must have considered it a reasonable one or they would not have introduced the resolution providing for their salary. Then he went on to say :

> He did not think that because the local government had the power to create courts that we had nothing to do but fill these courts as soon as created.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We have had so short a time to consider this question that I have not had time to look at the utterances of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, who always had a lively time looking after the interests of the country. But we find the leader of the government, the leader of the Liberal party, the gentleman who occupied the position for five years of Premier, gave an opinion precisely in accord with that which we have given by saying that he did not think because the local government had the power to create courts, that we had nothing to do but to fill them when created. Then he added :

The Nova Scotia government passed an Act establishing county courts in that province, which was brought to this House and passed by this House, and he did not think the Act was an unreasonable one but it created such a divergence of opinion, and the Bill was defeated in the Upper House, though it subsequently became law.

It subsequently became law in the same manner and for the reasons given for bringing the British Columbia Act into force. Then he adds these significant words :

This House should not agree to a proposition of this sort, merely because the local government of British Columbia thought it necessary to have two more judges appointed to act in that province.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What is the date of that?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is on the 17th of April, 1879. It will be found on page 1288 of the second volume of the Debates in the House of Commons for 1879.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman will find what Sir John Macdonald said in that same debate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have an extract to read from Sir John Macdonald's speech, on which I was going to comment when interrupted by the Minister of Justice.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When the House rose at six o'clock, I had just completed a quotation from the speech of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. The hon. Minister of Justice interposed with a remark as to what Sir John Macdonald had said. I was about quoting the remarks of Sir John Macdonald upon this very question, when interrupted by the hon. Minister of Justice——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not interrupted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.—I will withdraw the word 'interrupted,' and say : when my attention was called by the hon. Minister of Justice to the remarks of the Hon. Sir John Macdonald. The Hon. Sir John Macdonald, in reply to Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, said :

This argument has been taken when this question arose shortly after confederation.

That would be the time that the question was brought before parliament when Nova Scotia asked for increased judges or increased salaries. Then he says :

Mr. Blake, he believed, then took the ground that it was not a matter of necessity that the Dominion parliament should sanction the legislation of every province with respect to the increase of judges, and the consequent expense to the administration of justice.

I should have liked to have had more time to consult the record on that point and learn for my own satisfaction what Mr. Blake had really said upon the subject ; but Sir John Macdonald, it will be seen, says that Mr. Blake took the view which Mr. Mackenzie and the hon. Secretary of State had taken, not mentioning their names, when discussing this question. Then he says :

That was assented to as a general principle.

That is, the principle that it was not a contravention of the constitution for the Senate, or the House of Commons either, to disagree with those who argued that the provincial demand should be acceded to. Then he goes on to say :

But it was argued, and he had argued it so himself, that when the whole responsibility of the administration of justice rested on the local governments and legislatures, it would be a very grave responsibility for the Dominion government to take to oppose a solemn Act of the local legislature declaring that additional judges were required, unless it was clearly proved that any local government making this demand had unjustly exercised its power and would throw needless expense on the Dominion government. We ought as a general rule, to accept the solemn professions of a local legislature that it required additional judges as being correct.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—While he states very clearly, and lays down the principle, that it is a grave responsibility to assume to reject the demands of a local legislature, he does not, in any utterance which he has made, declare that it is an infringement of the autonomy of a province, or that the Senate has not the power, as has been declared by those who have discussed the question in the Lower House, to deal with this question, and he says, further, that it should not be done, nor should parliament assume the grave responsibility of taking that step, unless for good reasons. The question is whether we have good reasons to-day or not. I am of opinion, and so are many others who have studied this question, from the facts which I have already laid before this House, that we have good grounds upon which to base a rejection of this Bill. I may add that Sir John Macdonald went further in his remarks, which were very short—I wish to put the strongest part of his remarks before the Senate—and made the following statement :—

We should make a clear case against any province before objecting to its claims in this respect.

Now, the point is, whether they have made a clear case against the province in their demands for three extra judges. If we think they have, and we reject their demands, then we are acting strictly in accordance with the opinions and sentiments expressed by Sir John Macdonald, whose opinions have been quoted by those who take the opposite view. My hon. friend will say, no doubt: 'You were a member of that administration that proposed that legislation in 1879.' That is quite true, but when the Senate rejected that proposition, neither Sir John Macdonald nor his cabinet insisted upon the Commons rejecting the will and the decision of this House. They accepted it, and we have heard nothing from Sir John Macdonald, or those of his government of that time, against the right and the privilege of the Senate to act in this matter, and the very fact that they respected the decision of the Senate is shown by the fact that they took no such step as has been taken in the Lower House on this occasion. There was no cry about provincial autonomy, no cry about infringing the rights of the people.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There probably would have been, if there had been a Liberal majority in the Senate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is strange that the rejection of that measure was carried by a combination of Liberals, of which the hon. member for Halifax was one, and the Conservatives. A certain portion of the Conservatives and a very few Liberals voted with the government at that time, but it was the whole body—with the exception of one or two, and I am not sure if there was even that—of the Liberal party, together with a contingent of the Conservative party, when the Conservatives had a majority of 40 or 50 in this House, that defeated that government measure. And, notwithstanding that fact, Sir John Macdonald did not ask the House of Commons to reject the decision of the Senate upon that occasion, neither did he do so upon the defeat of the Nova Scotia Bill. The imputation thrown out by the hon. senior member for Halifax is unworthy of him.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is out of order.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I say that it is not out of order. It is neither improper nor unparliamentary for me to say that, because I have a sufficiently good opinion of that hon. gentleman to believe that, upon a moment's reflection, he would not have said it, because it implies dishonesty on the part of the Premier of that day and those who were supporting him, and the government of that day. He says, had there been a Liberal majority in this House, the probabilities are that Sir John Macdonald and his cabinet would have insisted upon the rejection of the decision of the Senate simply because the Bill had been rejected by a Liberal majority. It was rejected by a Liberal majority. If the Conservatives had voted straight upon that question, the government would have been sustained. If the hon. gentleman holds the same opinions now as he did then, and if he will vote now as he did then upon an exactly similar proposition, he will vote with us upon this question, and denounce, by his vote to-day, the decision at which the Liberal party in the Lower House has arrived. Then we find, going a little further, that Mr. Anglin spoke upon this question, and everybody knows that Mr. Anglin possessed a great deal more than ordinary ability. Although not a lawyer, he was perhaps one of the best debaters and one of the best constitutional authorities, and certainly was one of the clearest men intellectually that ever occupied the Chair as Speaker of the House of Commons. In discussing this question, he said, in reply to Sir John Macdonald :

He thought that if the doctrine laid down by the right hon. gentleman was accepted, they might look for a very large increase of the judiciary.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is precisely what we said the other day, and the reply of the hon. Minister of Justice to me was that it was an absurd proposition, that no one should make such a proposition. He compliments Mr. Anglin for having given utterance to language which implies precisely the same idea which we advance and which the hon. gentleman now ridicules.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That was not my point.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know what the hon. gentleman's point is.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He has no point.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That 'Hear, hear,' might have been a derisive hear, hear, or a hear, hear of approval. I do not know which it was, but I took it for the latter, and upon that I based my remarks.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I mean to say that Sir John Macdonald, in Mr. Anglin's estimation, held the doctrine a good deal more positively than the extracts which my hon. friend has just read would seem to indicate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no doubt that my hon. friend, with his legal and intellectual abilities, will put some other construction upon it, but I think I have put a very fair construction on it, and there is no language of Sir John Macdonald's which lays down the principle which has been advocated and laid down by the government of which he is a member, and by those whom he supported in parliament. Let me get back to Mr. Anglin. He said:

> He thought that if the doctrine laid down by the hon. gentleman was accepted, they might look for a very large increase of the judiciary. If the legislatures of the provinces were to have the absolute right of creating any number of new judges they chose, or thought necessary, and throw the burden on the Dominion treasury, such an increase would certainly be made.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a stronger declaration against the provincial governments than any of us have made. He continues:

> He was not at all disposed to accept that doctrine, and he contended that before they consented to provide the salaries, they should be satisfied of the necessity that existed for the additional judges. He did not think they ought to be satisfied merely with the statements made by the local authorities to make the provision, because the local legislature created the office.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is pretty strong language, and that is language from a gentleman who always had the confidence of the Liberal party in the House of Commons. I do not propose to pursue this portion of the subject any further, and I apologize to the House for having spoken so long upon the question, nor should I have done so had it not been for the remarks made in the Lower Chamber. It is now for the Senate to consider whether a sufficient case has been made out for us to pursue the same policy that the opposition pursued when a similar question was before them during the time of Sir John Macdonald's administration, and whether sufficient has been advanced to show that the demands made by the local legislature of the province of Quebec should be acceded to.

I have shown in the first place, that the Senate rejected the Nova Scotia Bill, of a somewhat similar character, that it rejected the British Columbia Bill, of exactly the same character, and that the leaders of the Conservative party, whatever their opinions may have been at that time, did not ask the House of Commons to reject the amendments made by the Senate. I have shown from the remark of Mr. Casgrain, the late Attorney General for Lower Canada, that these extra judges were not required. I have quoted from the language of Mr. Fitzpatrick, the Solicitor General, and from Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself, that he agreed with Mr. Casgrain. I have stated from my knowledge that many judges of the province of Quebec hold precisely the same opinion. I have read from the declaration of Sir Alexander Lacoste, the Chief Justice of Quebec, at a public banquet, that no more judges are required, and when he says that, we are forced to admit he knows what he is talking about. I have shown from the language of the Solicitor General, that in one district alone, out of 250 working days, 222 of those days were spent in the administration of justice in Montreal, leaving only 28 days for the work of his own district, showing conclusively that he had nothing to do, and not having any thing to do there that occupied more than a month of his time, it could be utilized in the interests of the country which pays him $4,000 per annum, where there was work for him to perform. I have shown, by statements made in the other House, that Mr. Cimon, a judge in one of the other districts, declared that he had not a month's work in the whole year to do, and that he wanted more. I have quoted from Mr. Mackenzie's declaration showing that he held precisely the same opinion on this question that we are now advocating. I have read Sir John Macdonald's remarks that Mr. Blake held precisely the same opinion. Mr. Anglin also enunciated the same opinion. The present Secretary of State not only enunciated those views and principles, but emphasized them by recording his vote in condemnation of the increase of the judges. I have shown, further, that Sir John Macdonald, in neither case took the same position that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his followers have taken, by appealing to the race feelings of the people of Quebec in attacking members from Ontario and other parts of the Dominion who occupy seats in this House, because they dared to hold opinions different from those held by some of the people of Quebec. I was of the opinion that when I came to the Senate, my duty was, to the best of my judgment, to legislate for the whole Dominion, and that when I thought a proposition was made which affected Ontario, or any other province, it was my duty, as it is the duty of every senator, to express our opinion in language and by vote in the line of what we believe to be right. I have also shown clearly that the language of Sir John Macdonald is such that while he thought, unless it was under grave circumstances, we should not reject the wishes and desires of the local legislature, he never denied the right of the Senate to reject any measure nor did he appeal to the House of Commons to reject the opinion of the Senate expressed by their action. I have shown also that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) declared in his speech in discussing this question, that unless and excepting on one ground, and that is where we are convinced by incontrovertible evidence that the provincial authorities are improvidently exceeding their rights, we ought not to object to this proposition. Whether that has been established by the facts which I have laid before the House, is for the Senate to decide. No matter which way this matter may be settled, my principal reason for speaking at such length this evening is to show, first, that the Liberal party, when the Conservatives laid a similar proposition before parliament, rejected it on the same grounds on which we ask the Senate to reject it to-day. I have also shown that when the Senate did reject it, the House of Commons did not attempt to interfere with the decision of this House. Whether the Senate be made up of refugees who have been defeated by the people, or whether, as Mr. Monet declared, there was a certain softness in the Senate, in their brains as well as their legs, is a question for us to decide. For my own part, these personal allusions to the members of the Senate have very little weight. I would freely concede to that hon. gentleman all the ability of the Liberal party, were it not that in his language he showed a lamentable ignorance of the constitution when he told the country we had certain powers, which any child who has read the constitution knows we have not, If it be an argument why they should reject the opinions expressed by the Senate because we are weak in the legs, it is for those who have strong legs to decide. That does not apply to all of us. However, brainless we may be, our legs are all right in case we require to bring them into action. I hope that the Senate will show its independence in this matter, and put upon record the fact that they have the right to reject or accept any proposition which may be made to them coming from the lower House. In this case, as in the case of British Columbia, and in the case of Nova Scotia, after sufficient time has expired to enable those who are most interested in this question to consider it fully, if after the elections it is shown that the will of the people—that is the best way to put it—is in that direction, the Senate, I am sure, in this case, as the House of Lords in England have always done, will yield to the will of the people.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Up to this date we have had no evidence to the contrary. We know this, and it is suggested by the 'hear, hear' from the hon. Minister of Justice that the House of Lords have rejected important proposals which have been laid before them, passed in the House of Commons with a very large majority, and the people upheld them on these very questions, condemning the judgment of the House of Commons by the largest majority ever given by the people of England. The Senate in the past has acted on that principle, and acted judiciously, and however weak they may be in brains, they understand the functions and duties of the Senate, being analogous to, as far as can be under our system, those of the House of Lords. They will always yield to the will of the people, when it is expressed through their representatives after the question has been submitted to them. I have been led to this argument by the hon. gentleman's derisive 'hear, hear.' It has been argued and very properly argued, that the will of the people is expressed through their representatives in the House of Commons. That is the general theory, but the House of Commons very often place upon record sentiments, by resolution and acts of parliament, which were never laid before the people, and on which, consequently, they have never had an opportunity of expressing an opinion. It is upon those questions that the House of Lords have opposed the will of the House of Commons for the time being, on the very ground which I have intimated, that the people had no opportunity to express an opinion on the issue. That is precisely the case here. I am sure those of us who understand the principles of responsible government and the duty and functions of the House of Lords, of which this House is a miniature, and certainly as far as practicable based upon the same principles, will do as they have done, when the opportunity offers.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have listened with not a little interest to the speech of my hon. friend. It was a long speech, and further protracted because my hon. friend was not altogether satisfied with his argument, and he seemed seeking for something that he did not succeed in bringing before the House. Sir Walter Scott says of an individual who had been condemned to be hanged :—

He adjusted the rope, he traversed the cart,
He often took lease and seemed loath to depart.

My hon. friend seemed very loath to bring to an end the speech which he was engaged in making ; I am not going to follow the hon. gentleman in all his devious ways in the address which he has just delivered to the House. My hon. friend said that the opposition to him—that is the government side of the House here—consisted mostly of defeated candidates for the House of Commons. I tell my hon. friend I do not think I was defeated.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do not open that question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I was cheated. Open it ! Why ! The hon. gentleman devoted nearly half an hour's speech to discussing it. What happened me in 1896, happened a good many gentlemen on our side of the House in 1887 and in 1891. I am not going into a discussion of that question, but I believe had there been an honest return of the votes as they were polled by the electors in 1887, and again in 1891, the majority who sat in the House of Commons on both occasions would have been men returned by the Liberal electors of Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a very violent assumption.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think it is an assumption.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is in my opinion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And in that I differ from the hon. gentleman as I do with many of the opinions he has expressed this evening. Several newspapers supporting the hon. gentleman said that the Senate were anxious to support this Bill—anxious that it should become law, but that it was owing to the tactics of myself that it was rejected when it was under consideration a few days ago. The hon. gentleman from the district of Bedford (Hon. Mr. Baker) asked for delay in the consideration of this Bill, but he made that request after he had delivered a very violent speech against the Bill. That left no doubt on my mind, as I am sure he did not leave any doubt on the minds of many hon. members of this House, that so far as he was concerned, he could not consistently do otherwise than offer to this first clause of the Bill, relating to judges, his most determined opposition. Let me read some extracts from the speech which the hon. gentleman on that occasion addressed to the House, and the Senate will see that, if he were speaking for himself, and I assume that it was for himself he was speaking, when asking for delay, he had already made up his mind, and nothing that could be disclosed would in any degree alter the opinion which the hon. gentleman had expressed. The hon. gentleman said:

> There was ample provision for utilizing the judicial power of the province of Quebec which everybody admits, friend and foe alike, is amply sufficient to meet every demand that can be made upon it. There was ample provision made for them, but because the parliament of Canada, in its wisdom, had declared that no travelling allowances should be made to these judges unless the chief justice certified that it was necessary that they should be brought into the city of Montreal, and the judges resented that, the Act was held to be inoperative, whereupon the Quebec legislature declared that the Superior Court of the province of Quebec should consist of three more judges. Nobody justifies it. Nobody can justify it. The judicial power of the province of Quebec is amply sufficient to meet every demand that can possibly be made upon it, and if the parliament of Canada would stand upon its dignity and in doing so they would play different roll from the roll that was played by these judges who refused to go into the court of review.

Now, it is perfectly clear what the hon. gentleman's view was and is, and it is absurd to suppose that any new light that I could furnish the hon. gentleman, or that any papers in our possession could furnish him, could alter his opinion. His mind was made up. Then, again, he says:

> A man who has any aptitude for business, who is fit to be a judge, who could earn the scanty salary each judge enjoys in the province of Quebec, could dispose of a hundred of those cases in a day.

Well, if he could do so he would do at least fifty times as much as any one of the judges in that court does. Let me read another extract from the speech. The hon. gentleman says:

> For years and years the judges of the province of Quebec have laboured under what amounts to a disability. If the parliament of Canada would have the fortitude to do justice to them and increase their salaries, so as to enable them to give their undivided attention to their duties as judges, if there is any congestion of business it will soon disappear. I do not believe that any member of the bar who knows the labour that members of the bar impose on themselves—I do not believe any member of the bar in the province of Quebec who stands in the foremost rank could be brought forward to say that, in his opinion, there is any necessity for a further addition to the judiciary of the city of Montreal.

And the hon. gentleman intimates that the reason the judges do not get along better, is because, in order to live, they are obliged to go outside and seek employment, and so they occupy their time, which should be devoted to the administration of justice, to other and different pursuits. That is the position which the hon. gentleman took, and it seems to me preposterous either for the hon. gentleman, or any newspaper on his behalf, to pretend that the defeat of this first clause was due to the fact that I was disposed not to grant delay. I believed then, and what happened the next day showed the accuracy of the view I entertained, that the hon. gentleman, and others on that side of the House, were anxious to have time to assemble their forces. They wanted to defeat this Bill with a more decisive majority than they could on that day when the question came up, and so, on the next day, we find when the question was brought up again there were at least five more members on that side of the House ready to vote against my proposition than there had been the day before. Then the hon. leader of the opposition refers to the speech made by Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick. In that speech Mr. Fitzpatrick points out that the judge in the district of St. Hyacinthe devoted 222 days out of 250 working days to judicial work in the city of Montreal instead of in his own district, and from that draws the inference that he devoted only 28 days to his own district, and that he had little to do. I say that does not follow at all. It only shows this, that in all probability his judicial duties in his own district were in a large measure neglected, because of the pressing necessity for his services in the district of Montreal. There is nothing to warrant any other conclusion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Can the hon. gentleman prove that?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend asks can I prove it. I have no case to make out. My duty is clear. A measure carried by the government possessing the confidence of the majority of the people of Quebec declares that additional judges are necessary, and we in this House have the constitutional duty imposed upon us to make the appointment unless—taking the most favourable view of the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite,—it could be shown that there was no necessity for these appointments, that it was an abuse of authority on the part of the government and legislature of Quebec. I say no such abuse has been shown. The burden of proof is not upon us, but upon those who question the proceedings of the legislature of Quebec and of the House of Commons and the government. Unless they are prepared to show that the government is wrong in what is being done—to show that the House of Commons is wrong in what it has done—unless they are prepared to show that the legislature and government of Quebec are wrong in what they have done, I say the opposition have no right to resist this proposition upon their view of the situation, and that they have not shown, on the present occasion. What do the facts show? Why, that there were, at the last sittings of the court in Montreal, 317 new cases that had not been reached at all by the court and were sent over; that there were 383 cases entered in the Court of Review that had not been considered; that remanets, as we say in Ontario, occupied the court until its duties came to an end.

Hon. Mr. BAKER--How many cases in the Court of Review?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Three hundred and eighty-three.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—There are thirty-five standing on the roll, and only thirty-five.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Solicitor General says 383, and I must take his statement on this occasion as an accurate statement.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—And I will convince the hon. gentleman, if I have an opportunity, that the figures of the Solicitor General are not to be taken.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let me point to another fact; the hon. gentleman has undertaken to compare Quebec with Ontario. The hon. leader of the opposition intimated before, although he has passed the question by on the present occasion, that Quebec might adopt the Ontario system and have county judges, and so make the necessary provision for the local cases that arise. Every hon. gentleman knows that there are, in every province, local cases arising which require to be dealt with immediately, and which require a judge on the spot to deal with them. Although, it may be, in some districts of Quebec, as in some counties in Ontario, and I have no doubt in other provinces where the county system exists, there are judges who have no great amount of work to perform—an amount of work that does not begin to occupy the whole of their time, yet the public would suffer very great inconvenience if there were no judges at all in the district, and so it becomes necessary, although the amount of work may not be great, that there should be local judges in order to deal with those cases as they arise. If you were to change the Quebec system and adopt the Ontario system, it would not and could not diminish the expenses. Let us compare the Quebec system with the Ontario system. In Ontario last year, the expense was $264,000; in Quebec it was $196,000. That is $78,000 difference in a year in favour of Quebec. It is true Quebec has a smaller population than Ontario, but Quebec has adopted a different system, and I say, again, that if you were to adopt the system of Ontario in Quebec, it would not diminish the charge on the treasury, but increase it. Let us look at the provision of the British North America Act upon this question, and I think hon. gentlemen will see that, so far as the law is concerned, we have not the right to do what the hon. gentleman says. It is true this is a species of co-partnership. The local government create the courts, and we have a right to say to the local government we think it is abusing its authority by making the system unnecessarily expensive. We have a right to say to the local government, 'You ought to reconsider your proposition,' and we did say that. We waited for more than a year since this Act came into operation, and the local government have stood by their proposition. Remember this, you have no right to say to the government of Quebec, no matter what view you may take of the constitution, that they must change their whole judicial system. That system has been in operation for 34 years. It has, during the whole of that period, undergone no change; new judges have been occasionally appointed. What is the result under that system? That in the district of Montreal the amount of business has outgrown the bench that you provide, that in numbers the judges are not equal to the performance of that duty. Montreal has become a much greater commercial centre than it was when this system was first organized. It has more than doubled the population it then had. It has more than three times the amount of judicial business it then had, and what is now proposed by the government of Quebec, without altering the system or making any change in it, is to provide three additional judges in conformity with that system to meet the requirements that have arisen in the district of Montreal. Is that an extravagant provision? Look at the amount of business that is being done. Is it an extravagant provision that three additional judges should be appointed for the purpose of discharging the additional duties that devolve upon the court? Everybody will see that it is not, that the duties that devolve upon the court of Montreal are better met, with less disturbance of the system, by the proposal to appoint three additional judges than by undertaking to recast the whole system over the province of Quebec. Now, let us look at the words of the British North America Act. Subsection 14 of section 92 provides:

In each province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:—

14. The administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts.

Now, those are the powers that are exclusively conferred on the local legislature. You have no authority to interfere with those matters at all. They are not in any way referred to you.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Why do you challenge their action? You say you kept them waiting a year.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not challenging their action now.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—You waited more than a year.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let my hon. friend keep quiet. He will have an opportunity to make his speech. When I say that we waited a year, I say that we have the power to provide the salaries. We have the power of appointing the judges; therefore, there is a duty devolving upon us in this case. We waited, in the discharge of that duty, for the purpose of considering, along with the government of Quebec, whether they could devise any other system that would be a less burden upon the public treasury. We had a right to ask that. The burden that falls upon us imposes that duty, but the government of Quebec still adhered to their view, and I say there is no other course open to us than to comply with their wishes and make the appointments called for. That is the fair and proper construction of the constitution. Now, what are the words of the Act, so far as we are concerned?

The Governor General shall appoint the judges of superior, district, and county courts in each province.

Who advises whether there shall be a superior, a district or a county court? Who determines which of these courts shall exist? Is it the government or parliament here? Certainly not. It is the local legislature of each province that determines this question, a local legislature, led by a government, in each province, responsible to the majority of that legislature and responsible to the electorate of the province—I say responsible in their sphere, just as much as we are in ours. Our whole constitutional system recognizes the principle of political sovereignty in the electorate, not in parliament. And if the electorate acquiesce in what those who represent the electorate do, there the question must necessarily end. My hon. friend has referred to the cases of Nova Scotia, and the county judges, and the case of certain judges in the province of British Columbia. I need not enter into a discussion of the case in Nova Scotia. It was a new departure in their system, and it stood over; but they had their way in the end. It was ultimately adopted. In the case of British Columbia, the government of the day, of which the hon. gentleman was a member, proposed to add to the court. My hon. friend made a speech here of more than an hour in length, and in that speech referred to the opinions of the Secretary of State and of Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Anglin. But what were the hon. gentleman's own opinions at the time? What were the opinions of those who were associated with him in the government of the country at the time? That they would appoint judges for the purpose of giving effect to the views entertained by the legislature of British Columbia. That is what was decided upon, and upon that opinion they acted, and when my hon. friend quoted the views of Mr. Anglin, you see at once what the views of Sir John Macdonald were from the speech of Mr. Anglin. Mr. Anglin infers, from the speech made by Sir John Macdonald, that if you adopt that view—that is, the view put forward by Sir John Macdonald and the government—you had no check on the local legislature; they could make the court consist of as many judges as they thought proper. That is perfectly true; but there is no difficulty in it. That is true of every part of our organization. Under our parliamentary system, you assume that those entrusted with authority will act rightly. You assume that the local legislatures will properly discharge the duties with which they are entrusted, and that the government and parliament of Canada will do the same thing. The whole system is based on that theory. It may be that you think this Act on that account is wrong, but the theory of the constitution is that the people are capable of self-government, and those you entrust with authority will not abuse the authority with which they are entrusted. Why should they? I say the whole system is based on that assumption, and to that assumption I cordially subscribe. Those who do not concur in that view ought to undertake to change our constitutional system and adopt some other.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman had better wait until somebody advocates some other system.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has been advocating it for a good part of the afternoon.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman has referred to the functions and the duties of the Senate in this matter. I am most anxious to uphold the dignity and authority of the Senate. But I hold, if you want to make of the Senate a partisan body, with a view to frustrate the intentions and designs of the House of Commons, you will make this House an odious body, instead of making it an influential body. Its influence will depend upon the moderation and the fairness with which its duties are discharged, and they are discharged neither with moderation nor with fairness, when the Senate undertakes to set itself against what? Against the local legislature, against the government of a province, against the authority of the Queen as the head of the government of this country, against the House of Commons that has been returned by the people for the discharge of their duties. If this Bill is defeated, whose opinion is expressed by that defeat? Not that of the local legislature, for they ask for the appointment of three judges, and have provided for it by the law of their province; not the views of His Excellency the Governor General, because he acts upon the advice of his ministers, and those ministers regard those appointments as necessary and proper, and have introduced a Bill for that purpose; not in conformity with the views of the House of Commons, for they agree with the Crown, and they sanctioned a measure for the purpose of giving effect to that. But then, we expressed the opinions embodied in the vote of this House a few days ago, in which my hon. friend has indicated his determination to persist, of the majority of the Senate of Canada against the Crown, against the House of Commons in the federal body, and against the Crown and against the people in the legislature of the province of Quebec. That is the position which the hon. gentleman has taken, and to that position he has committed himself. My hon. friend has talked about appeals to race and religion. Nobody has appealed to race and religion. He says they did not do so in the case of British Columbia. They could not do so in that case. In this case, in the province of Quebec, you have set at naught the wishes of the legislature. So far as they are concerned, they have acted under the provision in the constitution which gives them exclusive power as to the constitution of that court, and you have utterly disregarded the power which they possess. The hon. gentleman has, in this matter, advocated another system, for some reason or other. Is it because it is cheaper and more efficient than the system adopted by the province of Quebec? I have pointed out that the payment of the judges' salaries in Ontario is $78,000 more than in the province of Quebec. So that that is not the reason. The judiciary of the province of Ontario cost, as I have already mentioned, $264,000, and of the province of Quebec, $186,000.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is about the proportion of the population.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend says that is about the proportion of the population. Then, Quebec is not worse than Ontario. If Quebec is not worse than the other provinces, what right have we to come here and attack the system of Quebec and say to the local legislature that unless they change that system we will not give effect to what they do? They have no power to appoint judges. The power is not entrusted to them of appointing men qualified to discharge the duties of judges, to properly carry on the work of administration of justice. There is a high trust committed to us in this regard, and that trust hon. gentlemen are about to say shall not be discharged. It is perfectly clear that the position taken by the hon. gentleman and those associated with him in this matter, who are undertaking to frustrate the wishes of the province of Quebec, is unwarranted by the constitution, and is having the effect of placing this House in antagonism to the legislature of the province, to the Crown and to the majority in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—My hon. friend who leads, or misleads, this Senate, according to the measure of his abilities, has made it necessary for me to make one or two observations. In the first place, may I be permitted to comment on the observations that he made which were so personal to himself? He referred to the circumstance that at the last election he was rejected at the polls. I am not acquainted with the facts connected with that rejection, but I know that his defeat was regretted throughout the length and breadth of Canada by men who differ from him in their political views as widely as the north is separated from the South Pole. I will do him the justice to say that when he formed a member of the Mackenzie administration, when he discharged the functions of Minister of the Interior, he filled that office in a way to commend his action to the electorate of the people of this Dominion, and when he was defeated it was felt that a strong man had gone down in the battle, and it was a matter of regret among those of his political adversaries who had watched his career, that the right hon. gentleman—he was not then the right hon. gentleman—Mr. Laurier, who was charged with the formation of a cabinet, did not treat him as he treated some of the members of the party who had been defeated at the polls and find a constituency for him. He was left out in the cold, but in the course of time he came into this Senate, and when he came here I confess I had high hopes for the hon. gentleman. He came into this Chamber, which he had ridiculed when he was a member of the Commons. He came into this Chamber with a reputation to lose, and I will do him the justice to say he promptly lost it. He came into the Chamber with a reputation to lose, and in the course of time he came into an official position and was installed as the leader of the government in this branch of the parliament of Canada. He came here, but he very soon lost that independence of character that had characterized him when he was a critic in opposition. He came here and he has degenerated into one of the most active partisans that will be found in the whole ranks of the Liberal party.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—There is no act of the government of which he is a member that he has not been ready to justify, although he has sometimes confessed that the acts of that government were not justifiable. However, I am not disposed to make this discussion one so purely personal to the hon. leader of the government, but he has made it necessary for me to refer to the circumstances in connection with the rejection of the first clause of the Bill that was presented to the Senate. At the time the House went into committee, I sat on one of those benches in conversation with his colleague, the hon. Solicitor General, and I was referring at the moment to the fact that I had noticed from the gallery that the Solicitor General had been mistaken in the figures which he submitted to the Commons, I heard the discussion that was going on, and that the hon. Minister of Justice was mistaken in the reference he made to some remarks that had been made in the legislative council at Quebec by the Attorney General. I came in without the slightest intention of taking part in this discussion. I know the measure was passed through the legislature of Quebec for a purpose, and everybody else who was in touch with political matters in the province of Quebec knows the main object of the legislation was to provide a seat on the bench for one of the members of the legislature. In conversation there is no secret about it. They confessed it, and so far as the cheaper kind of party politics was concerned, it would have been good party politics to have allowed it to pass. There are three judgeships, but there would have been thirty applicants—three men satisfied and twenty-seven sore-heads. That would have been the practical operation of it, and if I had looked at the question from a purely partisan point of view, I would have done everything in my power to facilitate the passage of the Bill, in order that this discord might arise in the ranks of the Liberal party. But now, I must apologize to the members of this House for having been drawn into such a phase of this discussion. We are here engaged in the consideration of this Bill. What has been the attitude of the hon. Minister of Justice? He has attempted to justify the reasons that were given in the Commons for refusing to consent to the amendment by the Senate. Let us see what those reasons are. The Solicitor General moved in the Commons on July 13 that this House do disagree with the Senate in the said amendment, for the following reasons:

First, because by section 92 of the British North America Act it is provided that in each province the legislature will have exclusive power to make laws concerning the administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts of both civil and criminal jurisdiction, including procedure in civil matters in those courts.

Then follows the 2nd subsection of the section of the British North America Act that has been so often quoted, and then we find in two subsections the following reasons:

Because the object of the present Bill which was rejected by the Senate is to comply with the duty imposed upon the federal government and parliament by the aforesaid section 96 of the British North America Act, in so far as the above action of the legislature is concerned.

The fifth reason is as follows:—

Because the act of the Senate in rejecting the said section of the Bill is an infringement of the principle of provincial autonomy secured in the British North America Act.

Now, the hon. Minister of Justice has made no attempt whatever to justify these reasons. He begs the whole question. He asserts, and nobody ever disputed it, nobody every attempted to deny it, that the organization and constitution of the courts is with the local legislature. Nobody quarrels with that. They have a right to their own system, though it has been denounced by the right hon. leader of the government; it is there and they have a right to it. It is the duty imposed on the parliament of Canada to appoint and to pay the judges for their courts. Nobody disputes that, but that is to be taken with limitations. The leader of the government in the House of Commons asserted that the duty was imperative, that it was imposed by the British North America Act, and that there was no discretion on the part of the parliament of Canada. That is not the doctrine that has been expounded by the Liberal party through its leaders from the time of confederation. That is not the doctrine that is propounded now by members of the government. That is not the doctrine that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries propounded on the floor of parliament. He said that the questions for parliament to determine was whether it was provident or improvident. I am not disposed to play upon words, but it was provident in the sense of providing for members of the party who were seeking for positions upon the bench, but it was most improvident so far as the parliament of Canada was concerned, in needlessly involving the payment of salaries. Then the last reason is one that was given by the leader of the government—that it is an attack upon provincial autonomy. That is a fine phrase, but the leader of the government has been always a man of phrases. There is no man in Canada, who can coin phrases more readily than the right hon. leader of the government, and there is no man in Canada who is less persistent than he is in upholding the principles that are enunciated in those phrases. Provincial autonomy, indeed! That will be rolled on the tongue of every election heeler in the province of Quebec in the coming elections. Provincial autonomy assailed, forsooth. In what way? The system of the province of Quebec is not attacked, and it is conceded that it is the duty of those who oppose the Bill to show that a case has not been made out. The hon. Minister of Justice says that he has no case to make out. Well, if he takes that view he has succeeded admirably for he has made no case. He has referred to the system. The system is not attacked. But he said also that the government had waited more than a year for the Quebec legislature to take action. What becomes of the doctrine propounded by the leader of the government that the parliament of Canada is bound to act upon the suggestion of the Quebec legislature.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Why did they wait? Why did they make a counter proposition? Why did they hesitate to bring down to parliament a proposition to provide the salaries of the three additional judges? If there was no objection, why hesitation? Why delay? To my mind it is perfectly absurd, if I may be permitted to use the expression, that parliament has nothing whatever to say about it, but to provide for any demand that may be made by the Quebec legislature. A quotation was made from a speech of the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald upon an occasion similar to the present one, and it is admitted that a clear case has to be made. Has not a clear case been made in this instance? Let us take the evidence of the Solicitor General himself. At page 9331 of the Commons Hansard, the Solicitor General himself, charged with the introduction of this Bill in the House of Commons, said:

I notice that the hon. member for Montmorency was content to speak of the judges in the province of Quebec, saying they were sufficient in number to perform all the duties assigned to them under our system.

Is not that an end of the argument? Is not that an end of the evidence, so far as making a clear case is concerned? What more do you want? The man who is proposing that Bill to the consideration of parliament admits that no necessity exists.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Who made the admission? I did not quite catch what the hon. gentleman said.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—For the benefit of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, I am most happy to repeat it, and I thank him for the opportunity he has given me of entering it a second time in debates. It is as follows:

I notice that the hon. member for Montmorency was content to speak of the judges in the province of Quebec, saying they were sufficient in number to perform all the duties assigned to them under our system. With that statement I have absolutely no quarrel.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman did not read that last sentence.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Can anything be more explicit? Can anything be more to the point? Is there another word to be said when the hon. gentleman introducing the Bill says he has nothing to quarrel with in the statement that more judges are not required? Why in the name of all that is reasonable and just and honourable and fair to the Dominion do they insist on forcing the measure on parliament in the face of the declaration of the Solicitor General that he has no quarrel with the statement that no more judges are required? I referred a moment ago to the fact that I was seated on the bench outside the bar of this Chamber, in conversation with the Solicitor General, when this Bill was taken up in committee here. I had been in the gallery in the Commons when this Bill was under discussion there, and I sat, as I often do, in the Senator's Gallery, overlooking the conflict going on below, and when he made the statement, referring to the cost of bringing judges into Montreal from the country districts to do duty there, in a moment of thoughtlessness, when I caught his eye, I elevated my eyebrows, as much as to say, 'What induces you to say that'? I was so much struck by it I could not refrain at the moment from expressing my surprise, and when the statement was repeated by the leader of the government in this House, which showed he had studied the question just as little as the Solicitor General, I came into my place, and in a moment, I will not say of thoughtlessness, but without having any previous intention, I entered into a discussion of the matter, and from one point I was drawn on to another, till it resulted as it did. The Solicitor General attempted to make, and he did make, a point in the other House, and he almost converted some of the members of this House by the statement that he made, that the bringing into Montreal of the judges from the country to do duty in the city had cost the country the sum of $12,000.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Sixteen thousand dollars.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—I think the hon. member for Hochelaga said it had cost the country $16,000. He was instantly corrected by the hon. member for Montmorency, who said about $3,000 or $4,000. Then the Solicitor General said :

We have in the estimates this year no less than $16,000 to provide for the travelling expenses of judges who go about from one district to another.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Into Montreal

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Take it outside of Montreal. I venture to say that outside of Montreal, with the exception of the members of the Queen's Bench, there is not $1,000 expended for travelling expenses.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Oh, yes, there is.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There cannot be.

There is the dictum of the Solicitor General. I do not by any means charge him with having intentionally misrepresented the matter, for I will say that I am always ready and disposed to speak justly, if not generously, of those opposed to me in politics. I will say that he has always, so far as I know, shown himself to be eminently just and fair-minded, and I was, therefore, the more surprised to hear him make that statement. I did not attribute to him any intention to mislead the House. I knew he was mistaken, and I went over to the bench, when I saw him, for the purpose of ascertaining the source of his information, and, if possible, correcting it, and I did it in the spirit of the greatest good-will, and from the personal friendship that I entertain for the Solicitor General, and without any intention to obstruct in any way the passage of this Bill. But however just his intentions may be, I appeal from his positive statement to the record. In the Auditor General's Report for the year ending 1900, I find, on page I—14, a statement of the different amounts paid to the judges in the province of Quebec for their travelling allowances, and I find that that amounts to a sum total of $15,182. That includes not only the travelling expenses of every judge of the Superior Court in the province of Quebec, but it includes the travelling expenses of the Court of Queen's Bench, which amount to $2,520. I have procured from the Auditor General's office a detailed statement of the travelling allowances that were paid to the judges from the rural districts who were doing duty in the city of Montreal, detailed from day to day and from month to month, and I find that, instead of amounting to the sum of $16,000, or even to the sum of $12,000, they amount to the sum of $4,220. That is the whole of it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—We divide the statement made by the Solicitor General, upon his responsibility as one of the responsible ministers of the Crown, and we reduce it 75 per cent. Now, I say—and I say it without intending offence—that the House of Commons was misled by the statement that was made on the floor of parliament by the Solicitor General. The record of the Auditor General's Department shows that he had no justification for that assertion. I can show by the estimates that the sum of $16,000, that he declared from his place in parliament was entered in the estimates to provide for the travelling allowances of the judges for the next year, provides for the travelling expenses of every judge in the province of Quebec, including the six judges who sit in the Court of Queen's Bench, and the whole 31 judges who exercise their functions in the city of Montreal and throughout the province. Is it right? Is it reasonable? Is it fair? Is it to be tolerated, that the parliament of Canada is to be misled by statements such as these? And then we find the Minister of Justice, the father of the Bill here, coming into this House without knowing a single thing about it, standing up and indulging in his positive assertions as to the volume of business and the way it is done. One would imagine, from the way he discusses the question from his place in this Senate, that he never had a case in court in his life. What I said about the 100 cases being disposed of in a single day, I will explain. It was cases about which there was no controversy, based upon promissory notes, bills of exchange, or obligations about which all the judge had to do, if he distrusted the correctness of the prothonotary or clerk of the court, or if he distrusted his ability, was to verify the service. All he had to do was to turn over the writ and read the return and see if the exhibits were filed. Talk about its being a serious labour to dispose of those cases! A man who was fit to be a judge could dispose of them as rapidly as he could pass them through his hands. I know there are cases which take a considerable time and impose an immense amount of labour on the judge who disposes of them. But judges are supposed to be trained men, and are supposed to have, and in the majority of cases do have, a profound knowledge of the law. They are assisted in the cases brought before them by counsel. All that is to be said is said on both sides. The authorities are cited, and to say that it imposes a month's labour for a man to go through the record, to examine the authorities for himself and draw his conclusions, is to cast discredit upon the ability and capacity of the man who has the work to do. I may have spoken too hurriedly the other day: I may have treated too lightly the pretense that the judges are overworked, but it is a matter of constant conversation among the judges themselves. They do not seriously pretend they are overworked, and I may say again, as I said the other day, that if parliament would do justice to the judiciary, if parliament would give the judges a salary that would be fair compensation for their full services and for the employment of their full time, I believe an effective and effectual remedy would be found for the congestion, as it is called, that is said to exist in Montreal.

I want to say one word about the statistics. I am a member of the profession. I know how things are managed. I have been a young lawyer myself; I remember the time when it was a gratification to me to see a long roll, and the same state of things exists in Montreal. The roll is congested, but the business is not obstructed. I have been in there myself, looking into the court room, and I have seen the rolls gone through in ten minutes. No one was ready. In many cases there were good reasons for the cases not being proceeded with, but in other cases they were put upon the roll for the purpose of making a good showing. Not two days ago one of the judges in Montreal admitted that such a state of things existed. The members of the bar of Montreal are more to blame for the state of congestion. As I said a little while ago, from a purely partisan point of view, I should be glad to see the government embarrassed by the responsibility that would fall upon them of filling three vacant judgeships. I know they have behind them on the back benches of the House of Commons more than two or three times three members of parliament who would be glad to take refuge on the bench to escape the storm that they feel is impending. I do not blame them. I am not of those who believe it is a mortal sin to appoint a member of the House of Commons to an important office. I am not of those who believe that it is a mortal sin politically or morally, for members of parliament to accept office. Why should they, of all other men, be debarred? It is only the men who have hypocritically pretended, for ten years in opposition, that it was a sin that it becomes so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—We have had the lecture read to us in the other House session after session about the enormity and iniquity of members sitting on the benches behind the government with the prospect of office before them. I know enough of politics and political men to know that members are not influenced by that. Members who belong to a party support their party through thick and thin. They do it in nine cases out of ten. The hon. Minister of Justice supported his party in a recent discussion when he announced here, from his place in parliament, that a fraud had been committed upon parliament.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I did not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He announced it; I heard it with my own ears.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is mistaken.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—I accept the hon. minister's statement.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said I had not read the evidence, but as far as one could judge from the evidence, a fraud had been committed; I had not the information to speak positively. I have been too much occupied with my own work.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—I am sure the hon. Minister of Justice could not have read the evidence in the election cases and sought to justify them from his place here. I quite agree with him that not only the appearance, but the evidence, indicated that a fraud was committed.

In the management of that matter, in my opinion, the government of this country showed the incapacity that has characterized them from start to what will soon be the finish of their career. Other men may pretend to believe, but I do not believe, that the Minister of Militia was bribed into giving that contract. I do not believe a word of it. I know too much of politics to believe it. He was induced to do it to satisfy a political supporter. He was induced to do it by the importunity of political friends, but having done it, why had he not the moral courage, why had not his associates in the government the moral courage, to say, as I understood the hon. leader of the government in the Senate to say the other day, that a fraud had been committed? Why did he not say: 'I admit it. Let us find the man who committed the fraud.'

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What has this to do with the question before the House?

Hon. Mr. BAKER—'And nail his ear to the post.' There is no Dr. Devlin or any one else of sufficient importance to the Liberal party, or any other party in this country, to induce them to condone an offence of that kind. I admit the force of the remark of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, whose beaming face smiles upon me now, that this is irrelevant to this question, and I apologize to my hon. friends around me for having taken so much of the time of this House, but the remarks of the hon. Minister of Justice left me no option. I was forced to say something, and I have discussed the matter, not in all its bearings, not in any of its more important bearings, because those were disposed of by the hon. leader of the opposition, the hon. gentleman from Hastings. Now, I want to say one parting word. It was more than insinuated; it was asserted, that the Senate was moved by partisan motives in rejecting this clause.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—It was so urged first of all, and the leader of the government in this House now assents to what I say by saying 'Hear, hear.' I can tell him if I know anything of human nature that this Senate is composed of men who will not be deterred from doing their duty by revilings.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Their duty is to turn out a Liberal government, as far as they can?

Hon. Mr. BAKER—No, that is the duty that will devolve upon the electorate of this country, and I am neither a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, but I venture to predict that when the electorate of this country get the opportunity they will not shrink from the performance of that duty. In the meantime, I can assure my hon. friend, on behalf of the members of this Senate, that they will not shrink from the duty that is imposed on them by the constitution of this country, though it may involve what Sir John Macdonald called a grave responsibility. They have more than once taken upon themselves the responsibility of such action, when Sir John Macdonald himself led the government. They more than once rejected government measures that had been introduced by Sir John Macdonald's government and since the present government came into power, they have exercised that power and that right to the eminent advantage of the people of this country. The hon. Minister of Justice shakes his head. Does he dissent from the statement that the Senate discharges a duty to the country and placed the country under obligation to the Senate when they rejected the Yukon Bill?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do. I consider it little short of treason.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—My hon. friend reminds me of a story that I heard about a man who took passage on one of the Mississippi boats some years ago when the tide of travel set in volume down the river to New Orleans. A great many went on that way in search of employment. It was very necessary that every one who went down should be fortified with certain recommendations as to character, that were called facetiously 'a character.' On one occasion it is reported that a woman was armed with this necessary voucher, but it got mislaid on the passage, and she went to the captain in a great state of excitement about it, and insisted, although it was beyond his ordinary duty, that she should be supplied with one. This woman said she had a character when she went on the boat, but she lost it going down the river.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Order.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Will the hon. gentleman state his point of order?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—There are ladies in the gallery.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—The hon. Minister of Justice came into this House with a character which he had won for himself by preaching constitutional doctrine and setting forth, in unmistakable terms, the duty of public men. But evil communications have evidently corrupted good manners, for he now after the lapse of so many months, in which his zeal in the matter has had time to cool, believes the Senate was not justified in rejecting the Yukon Bill, It is the universal sentiment of this country, from one end of it to the other, that a greater service was never rendered by the members of a deliberative body to the people of the country than was rendered by this body in the rejection of that measure.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Sir Charles Tupper has since pressed the government to go on with the road.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Not under the same conditions. However, that is beside the question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Even that would have been a mistake.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—That is beside the question. The people of this country and the members of the House of Commons have time and again, not once or twice, but in scores, expressed their satisfaction that the country was saved from the iniquity that was involved in that Yukon proposition.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The iniquity was practiced in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I had, a day or two ago, a vision of an early prorogation in my mental eye, but I regret to say the vision is fading away into the distance, and the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down has pushed it a little further back. At the same time, I rejoice in this discussion, because it has given us a chance to hear the hon. gentleman from Bedford. I do not remember that he has ever before made as long a speech in this Houser as he has made to-night. I had heard him when he was a member of the other Chamber, and I regretted that we did not hear him oftener here, I only regret on the present occasion that he had not spoken some weeks ago instead of now. He is a seductive sort of orator, is the hon. gentleman from Bedford, and is very likely to lead one astray unless one is very guarded; and I think we had better not listen to the voice of the charmer, but look at what we have really to do. I do not think that what was said by the Solicitor General in the House of Commons, or what was said by any other hon. member there, is a subject for discussion here. The House of Commons passed this Bill, and a majority of this House, in its wisdom, or as the hon. gentleman indicated with respect to the Minister of Justice, its want of wisdom, amended the Bill in a very important particular, and the question for us is, the House of Commons having, in the exercise of their constitutional right, declined to concur in our amendment, whether we should insist on the amendment.

I must say to the hon. gentleman that I do not think he has made out a very strong case in favour of our insisting on the amendment. The hon. gentleman said that the Minister of Justice had not dealt with the message of the House of Commons at all, that he had not shown any reason why we should agree with the House of Commons. Then the hon. gentleman took up the message from the House of Commons, and, dealing with the first paragraph, the one with respect to the fact that section 92 of the British North America Act gives the provincial legislature the exclusive power to make laws for the administration of justice, the hon. gentleman says, we all know that; paragraph 1 of the message did not need any argument on the part of the Minister of Justice. Paragraph 2 of the message reads as follows:—

2. Because by section 96 of the same Act, it is provided that the Governor General shall appoint the judges of all courts organized by provincial legislatures except those of courts of probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

The hon. gentleman did not deny the facts set forth in that paragraph. Nor did the hon. gentleman deny the facts stated in paragraph 3 of the message, which is as follows:—

3. Because by an Act of the legislature of the province of Quebec, passed in 1899, viz., 62 Vic., chap. 29, it was provided that the constitution of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec should be amended, and that the said court should be composed of thirty-four judges, the object being to give three additional judges to the district of Montreal.

The hon. gentleman did not deny the statement contained in the 4th paragraph.

4. Because the object of the first section of the present Bill, which was rejected by the Senate is to comply with the duty imposed upon the federal government and parliament by the aforesaid section 96 of the British North America Act, in so far as the above action of the legislature of Quebec is concerned.

Paragraph No. 5, I think the hon. gentleman probably did deny :

5. Because the act of the Senate in rejecting the said section of this Bill is an infringement of the principle of provincial autonomy secured in the British North America Act.

That is the only one of the five reasons sent by the House of Commons which the hon. gentleman undertakes to question. I think there is a good deal to be said on both sides of that. I do not think the hon. gentleman has made out a very clear case. I find that in 1879, in the case of the British Columbia judges, the hon. gentleman who then led the government, Sir John Macdonald, said this at page 1299 of the House of Commons Hansard :—

Unless it were clearly proved that a local government making this demand had unjustly exercised its powers, and would throw needless expense on the Dominion government, we ought to accept the decision of the local legislature.

That is an authority which the leader of the opposition and the hon. gentleman from Bedford division ought to be prepared to accept.

Hon. Sir. MACKENZIE BOWELL—I quoted that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman did, but he did not seem to lay as much stress on that as he did on the views entertained by Mr. Anglin and other gentlemen whom he has not been in the habit of endorsing or following. Having dissented somewhat from the line taken by the hon. gentleman from Bedford, it would hardly be fair to follow him into what I may call divagations. For instance, with respect to one member of the present government, the hon. member referred to the views which he had expressed when he was in opposition. Every hon. gentleman knows that the opposition is a sort of liberty hall.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Every member of the opposition is not bound to follow his leaders in everything. He does not make himself responsible. The government is in a different position. Each member of the government is responsible for what every other member of the government says. It happens that one or two hon. gentlemen, who are now members of the present administration, did when in opposition, make rather extreme statements. I know there are numbers of hon. gentlemen who are now in opposition who make very extreme statements that they would not wish to be bound by if they ever came into power, and it is absurd to hold the present government responsible, as a body, for statements which were made by one or two gentlemen when they were in opposition, and were not responsible for one another's sayings. I should be very sorry to be held responsible for the statements of all the Liberal members of parliament.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or by your own either.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman, I suppose, is going to refer to the fact that when this British Columbia Bill was before parliament, I voted with the opposition against the Bill. I was young and foolish at the time. Hon. gentlemen may notice that perhaps I am not as keen as I was some time ago, but if I were a young senator like the leader of the opposition, or quite a boy like the hon. gentleman from Bedford, I could get worked up and thump my desk and shake my hand and all that, but I am an old fellow, and look at things in a rather cold-blooded way.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—May you always be young.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Various authorities have been quoted by the leader of the opposition, and more of them by the hon. gentleman from Bedford. I propose to read from an authority whom I think every hon. gentleman here will be willing to accept. I turn to the Senate Debates for May 6th, 1879, page 469. This was during the discussion on the question of the British Columbia judges. On that occasion, Mr. Campbell (subsequently Sir Alexander Campbell) said :

Some one must speak for British Columbia, and it seems to me, that some one must be the legislator of the province. If it is necessary that it should have not only its own legislature to govern it, and to say what shall be done with its courts and how many judges there shall be, but that it must have a majority of its representatives in both Houses of the Dominion parliament in favour of any change that may be proposed, it will be impossible for the province to preserve its autonomy.

I direct the attention of the hon. gentleman from Bedford to this language :

If my hon. friend from Ashcroft had addressed those parts of his remarks which referred to the convenient and efficient administration of justice, to the legislature of British Columbia, he would have been quite right, and his reasoning which have been very strong and cogent, and for my own part, if I were a member of that legislature I should, I think, be disposed to be guided by him ; but here they come to us against the voice of the legislature of his province. Now it seems to me that we should deal with British Columbia as we would with Ontario, and those of us who represent this province in this House would feel it quite out of the question, I think, to set up our views against those of our local legislatures. Suppose the legislature of Ontario desired to concentrate the county courts, and have one where there are two now, to increase the number and have two where there is but one now, would any member of this Senate from Ontario rise and say that the decision of the provincial legislature was to be disregarded and his view adopted. They would submit to the decision of the legislature of their province. It is impossible for parliament to listen to more than one voice from any province. Take the legislature of Prince Edward Island, for instance. Suppose that it had a certain view with reference to the judiciary or the judicial districts of the island, and passed an Act to give effect to that view, and that law, not having been interfered with by the Governor General, were to go into operation, is it open for members from that province, in this House, to say that the legislature did not speak the views of the people ? If they thought it was a wrong course, they should endeavour to get the legislature of their province to come to a different opinion here against the views expressed by the legislature of the province. The suggestion thrown out by the hon. senator from Ashcroft, that this change is being made in the interest of certain individuals, may be true, but all that we know is, that the legislature of British Columbia desires the change, and this parliament ought not to withhold the money required to carry out that change—more particularly this House. If the arguments of my hon. friend on the financial question were addressed to the House of Commons they would be legitimate and proper, but I do not at all think that his remarks on the mode of administering justice in British Columbia would be proper consideration for either House, because you must have final authority for each province, and it must be, I think, the local legislature. The British North America Act defines what shall be done by the legislatures of the several provinces, and members are elected by the people for the purpose of performing the duties which the British North America Act charges them with. The members of this House are charged with various functions, but, amongst them is not that of deciding upon or being responsible for, or dealing with, the mode in which justice shall be administered. The constitution says that it shall be done by the local legislature, and that legislature has spoken. I am sure that we all respect the views of the hon. gentleman from British Columbia, and nobody is more gratified than I am, to see the high esteem in which they are held by this House, but, if we are to listen to their opinions, instead of those of the provincial legislature, we shall find ourselves in a dangerous position. It is the duty of this House not to listen to the voice of the hon. gentlemen, charm they never so much, but to the voice of the legislature of the province, which has spoken in the way that this Bill proposes to carry out.

* * * * * *

Then with regard to the calculation which has been made to the increased expense which this change will cause, the first reply is that the House of Commons has seen fit to vote that money, and it does not become us to gainsay what they do with reference to money matters.

* * * * * *

Whether the legislature have exercised a sound judgment in this matter, or whether the representatives of that province in this House exercise a wiser judgment, is not a question for us to decide. We must take the voice of the legislature as speaking for the province ; and, particularly as the House of Commons has voted this money, I trust that those who generally support the government will do so in this instance, because we feel strongly that it is very important to carry the Bill.

The hon. gentleman who made that speech was the Hon. Sir Alexander Campbell, at that time Minister of Justice, who led this House, who was as good a parliamentarian and as judicious a constitutional lawyer as I remember to have met; and I think there was no question about his being one of the ablest and most respected members whom the Conservative party in Canada ever produced.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Did Sir Alexander Campbell's speech convince my hon. friend at the time?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I said I was young and foolish. I was not trying to convince myself. I am now addressing the Quebec Conservative members in this House. There is no necessity to try and convert the Minister of Justice and the hon. gentleman from Toronto. They are all right. But I am giving hon. gentlemen who sit on the Conservative side of the House what I consider the very best authority that the Conservative party has ever produced in this country, as to the line of action to be taken with respect to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—And, notwithstanding that, the hon. gentleman voted against it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think, probably, we have heard nearly all the arguments that are available, either on one side or the other. I have not held strong opinions on this question from the time it was brought up in this House. I might say this, that if the Senate had been led with more moderation, and courtesy, and fairness, probably these different opinions would not have arisen.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I remember quite well, when a similar Bill was brought before this House with regard to Manitoba, I sat on the opposition side, as I do now, and the House was led by Sir Oliver Mowat on the other side. I took objection to the action of the government in creating an additional judge in the province of Manitoba, and there were circumstances connected with the case that made it a fair subject for discussion. I raised the point, and the matter engaged the attention of the House at several sittings. I must say that if I had been met as the hon. gentleman from Bedford was met on this occasion, there might have been a conflagration, and the result might have been the same as occurred on this Bill; but I was met by Sir Oliver Mowat in a conciliatory spirit, and with courtesy. He came over to this side of the House and talked the matter over in a friendly way and disarmed my opposition, and my friends took the cue from what was going on, and the result was the Bill was passed. I think that a mistake is being made, in magnifying little differences of this kind between the two Houses of Parliament, and making more of them than they are entitled to. I do not think this is a big question for the government. When the appointment of an additional judge for Manitoba was up, this House did not take drastic action, but in 1879, when the Conservatives were in power, this House did defeat a Bill of the Conservatives, to which reference has been made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, and, on another occasion, when Mr. Mackenzie's government was in power, a similar Bill, creating county court judges in Nova Scotia, was held over. No great harm was occasioned by those acts of this House. There was no cry of provincial autonomy being disregarded—no temper, no hectoring speeches, such as we have heard here to-night. Time was allowed to intervene, and the matter was smoothed over, and no harm was done. I do not know why there should be those hectoring speeches, and all this declamation in another place, and attempts made to set a province on fire on this question. It is over a year since the province of Quebec passed this legislation. We met in parliament after this legislation was passed. The government had it before them. They did not act. They thought a year would be no harm to intervene. Evidently, they came to the conclusion that it was not a matter of life and death, and they took a year to consider it, and, at the end of this session, they come down with their Bill. Why should it be a crime, on the part of this Senate, to take another year? Is it such a serious matter that this country is going to be rent assunder because the Senate say: 'We will take a year to consider this matter.' I am one of those who believe that the view of the province must ultimately prevail in a matter of this kind. But, in view of the contradictory statements that have reached our ears since this discussion has begun, with regard to judicial work in the province of Quebec, the fact that the Solicitor General admitted, as has been quoted by the hon. gentleman from Bedford, that he did not quarrel with the statement of the late Attorney General of the province of Quebec, Mr. Casgrain, in another place, that the judicial power of the province of Quebec was ample to do its work without the necessity of creating those new judges at the present time—I cannot see, for the life of me, why there should be any such excitement over this question. It only involves a little delay. If the legislature of Quebec adheres to its views, of course it must have its way after a time, but I cannot see what great interest is being affected more than there was a year ago, and why a little delay should be so outrageous now, when it was all right when the Minister of Justice took that time, a year ago, for the consideration of the question.

Hon. Mr. KERR—It was not my intention at this late stage of the session, and especially at this night session, to detain the Senate or trouble them with any remarks upon this Bill now under consideration; but I felt that I would be recreant to the trust reposed in me, as a citizen of Ontario, if I did not rise in my place and enter my solemn protest against the doctrine that has been propounded here, this evening, by the leader of the opposition in the Senate.

I call upon Ontario to take note of it. I call upon Quebec to take note of it, as she undoubtedly will, but I call upon the other provinces to take note of it. It is not simply the mere matter of appointing three judges. It is not merely the matter of the saving or the expenditure of a few thousand dollars. That seems to be the idea entertained by some hon. gentlemen who have opposed the passage of this Bill. To my mind, there underlies, in the opposition to this Bill, a very dangerous doctrine as propounded this evening. We all know, we have all been living witnesses of the fact, that the provinces of this country struggled long and hard to get control of their own local affairs, and if the doctrine propounded here to-night is to prevail the element of the federal principle in our constitution is gone.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, humbug!

Hon. Mr. KERR—And we might as well go back to a legislative union at once. Before I come directly to the point, I want to make one remark, and I will touch it as briefly and gently as I can. The hon. gentleman from Bedford, for whom I entertain a high opinion, as he knows, I thought was unhappy in the latter part of his allusion to the hon. leader of the Senate. He says that he felt pain and regret when he heard of his defeat. I am sure the whole province would sympathize with that, and trace it to its cause, going back as far as 1882, having considerable memory, but then he straightway destroys the good effect of that charitable and kindly expression by saying that the Minister of Justice straightway, almost immediately, fell into a state of bitter partisanship. I call upon this Senate, and I ask them one and all, take the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State, if they have not, as representing their government in this House, been moderate, temperate and, sometimes even forbearing, in the expression and advocacy of the policy of the government before this Senate? I fancy though that the cat has been let out of the bag by the last hon. gentleman who addressed this House. If I heard him correctly, he said that probably if a little more courtesy had been shown by the party supporting the government in the Senate this opposition to the Bill would not have shown itself or would not have been serious.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Now is that all there is between us? If that is the reason, I think we should know it, and the country should know, and that is really the only substantial reason for opposing this Bill. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition in this House impressed me in his speech with the idea that when this Bill was before the House on a former occasion and the first clause was struck out, the majority in this House had made a mistake and committed a serious blunder, and that his whole effort in his speech to-night was to justify, or at any rate to try to excuse the action of the majority in the Senate on that occasion. I ask hon. gentlemen to say that he lamentably failed. In this case there are just two points to be considered, as in every case, one a question of fact and the other a question of law. When my hon. friend the leader of the opposition was stating what he called facts, and also stating his legal propositions, I was reminded of an anecdote of that eccentric genius, Artemas Ward. He said when he was lecturing down south he had a very violent attack of cholera morbus. The cholera was bad enough, but when the morbus set in it was perfectly dreadful. The application I make of that is that the statement of alleged facts by the hon. leader of the opposition was bad enough, but his statement of the law was simply dreadful. I should like to have that argument made before the Supreme Court of this country. I speak now as one who has for thirty-three years been called upon, in examinations upon that statute as well as the other statute law of this country, to read every section, every line, every word of the British North America Act, and if the doctrine propounded and the interpretation put upon that Act to-night by the hon. leader of the opposition be the correct one, then I have been wrong in my teaching for thirty-three years. I am going to give the House a sample of the hon. gentleman's law, or to show that the hon. gentleman, not being a lawyer, does not cite correct precedents. I am not blaming him for not being a lawyer. He is better engaged. He is a newspaper man, and I think that is better than being a lawyer. At any rate, it is a good profession, but if he had been a lawyer he would not have cited some of the precedents that he has cited. Among others, he referred to the action of this House upon the Tuckersmith Bill. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman, and I ask him and other hon. gentlemen in this House, if there was one iota of constitutional principle involved in that Bill. That was a Bill that emanated from and passed through the other House, and it was quite within the province of this Senate to reject it, because there was no constitutional principle involved.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Then, also, with regard to the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Bill. That was a measure that emanated from the other House. I am not saying anything about the wisdom or unwisdom of the action of the Senate upon that Bill, but there was no constitutional principle involved in their action. So that I say those two precedents—and I take them just as a sample—have not the slightest bearing upon this question before us to-night. The Supreme Court would not listen for one minute to these citations as precedents having any bearing upon the case. If hon. gentlemen are going to be guided by that kind of thing, they will be labouring under a very great mistake. This matter came before us last week. I said before, in my opening remarks, that there were two questions involved, a question of fact and a question of law. Let us look at the question of fact, and there is no dispute about the fact in this case. What I take to be a fact is that the legislature of the province of Quebec have organized courts and provided machinery for three additional judges. That is a fact, about which there is no dispute. My argument, further, is that they had the constitutional right to do that, and that that was the only proper constitutional way of expressing their right to do it, and they have done it. We are agreed upon that point. Then that is not only endorsed by the parliament and the government of the province of Quebec, but it is endorsed by the bar of Montreal. We have had it stated here, I know, by the hon. gentleman from Bedford, very strongly, that there are judges enough in the province of Quebec, if the work was properly distributed, to do all the judicial work in that province. Very likely that is so, but we have nothing to do with that. We have had it from the lips of His Honour the Speaker, who knows as well as any man in this Chamber or out of it, what the volume of law business in the Montreal district is now and has been—that without the appointment of these three judges it is likely to continue to be in a congested and backward state. It is no argument to say that by the redistribution of work the pressure might be relieved. We have no right to look at that. That is my proposition, and I say, even if we had a right, we are not to set up our judgment in the face of the judgment of the representatives of the people in that province. They know their business better than we can possibly know it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Question.

Hon. Mr. KERR—We will get to the question quickly enough. Supposing that some people would say—and I have no doubt some pretty sensible people do say—that we could get along very well with half the number in this Chamber——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So we could.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, certainly, and without the hon. gentleman's speech.

Hon. Mr. KERR—And very likely without the speeches of the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, but that is not the question to be considered. The question to be considered is, has the legislature of the province of Quebec a right to organize courts?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly they have.

Hon. Mr. KERR—And have they organized courts?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly. No question.

Hon. Mr. KERR—And has the British North America Act imposed the duty upon the Governor in Council to appoint judges?

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Not absolutely.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I take issue with the hon. gentleman on that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We will discuss that to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. KERR—And does the British North America Act impose the obligation on this parliament to fix and provide for the salaries of judges ?

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Under certain limitations.

Hon. Mr. KERR—The statute says nothing about limitations. But supposing it should say something about limitations, is there anything we have heard to-day, or on a previous occasion, which would lead us to believe that there should be any limitations ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. KERR—The hon. gentleman that says 'certainly' in the face of what has transpired here, of course is not amenable to my argument.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the hon. gentleman is quite correct in that. That is the most truthful statement he has uttered to-night.

Hon. Mr. KERR—It is a difference of opinion and the issue is narrowed down to this fifth reason which reads :—

Because the act of the Senate in rejecting the said section of this Bill is an infringement of the principle of provincial autonomy secured in the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We do not admit that.

Hon. Mr. KERR—That is really the only point between us. I contend that it is an infringement and an infringement such as the province will not submit to. I know there was, not many years ago, creeping up in the provinces an agitation for power to appoint their own judges, and depend upon it, if this kind of thing is to be persisted in, the several provinces of this Dominion will make common cause, and will agitate until they get that right.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—All right.

Hon. Mr. KERR—The hon. gentleman says 'All right.' If he is prepared to force them to that position before they can get justice, on him must rest the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear. We will take it.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Is there, after all, any reason for opposing this Bill ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I have not heard one good substantial reason for opposing it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then the hon. gentleman is deaf.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I am not deaf. I suppose I am like the others——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, no.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Perhaps I am strongly partisan. I will admit that——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is another truth.

Hon. Mr. KERR—But I want to add to that. My hon. friends in the opposition may be partisans as they please, apparently, according to their view, but the moment a supporter of the government, or a Liberal on this side of the House ventures to express his opinions forcibly and fearlessly, that moment he is set down as a bitter partisan.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Quite true.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I have not heard a man who is opposing the government who does not take that position. To such I would commend the words of Robbie Burns, who says :

"O wad some power the giftie gie us
To see oursel's as ithers see us !
It wad frae monie a blunder free us
And foolish notion.'

I do not want to refer to this matter. We are all friends here, but I want just to say this, that if I were in a minority of one in this Chamber, and I conscientiously held strong views upon any subject, I would declare it as fearlessly and forcibly as I could, and I would say : 'If you want war, we will have war ; and if you want peace we will have peace.'

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KERR—We are pretty nearly levelled up now in numbers, and I wonder if that is what is the matter ; but I hope if we should be two to one in this House, that we shall be very careful how we veto legislation, let it come from what government it will. If the doctrine propounded by my hon. friend be true, this Senate can interfere in any provincial legislation on any question that they, in their wisdom, think not wise or provident. I deny that doctrine in toto. The word 'exclusively' in the 92nd section of the British North America Act assigning certain classes of subjects to the provinces, was not put there accidentally; it was put there on purpose. Exclusively, it says. It was intended as a provincial boundary line fence, strong enough to resist the assaults of every intruder, and it was intended to be high enough to prevent any one vaulting over it; even this Senate—which some naughty people consider to have breachy instincts. I hope the word exclusively will prevent us from vaulting over that fence and getting into the provinces.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Where is the stiffness in that?

Hon. Mr. KERR—The hon. gentleman will find that out. I wish to say in conclusion, that I do not think the people of Quebec are fools.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Neither do I.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I do not think their representatives are fools. I think they know what their business is, and I am bound to take the statement of the chief justice, but the chief justice did not say that the law business in the district of Montreal is not congested, but simply that there were judges enough if the work was properly distributed. Very likely that is so, and it may be that he will want redistribution all over, but this Senate is not the revising body for provincial legislation. It is not a court of review over them. But are not we in danger of falling into the habit and thinking that we can revise everything and anything that comes before us, right or wrong?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Did they not do it in the past?

Hon. Mr. KERR—I have been asked by sober minded, thinking people 'who runs this country? Who governs this country?' I have said that an irresponsible majority in the Senate at Ottawa practically have things their own way.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—The hon. gentleman was not in earnest when he said that.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I was in earnest, and what I have seen here has caused me to say that. I will not yield to any man in this Senate in my desire to uphold the dignity and efficiency of this body; but, so long as I occupy a place on the floor of this Chamber, I trust I shall never cease to advocate the doctrine of provincial rights. What is confederation but the principle of provincial rights, and I say that if this Bill is thrown out, it will be a direct assault and onslaught upon that principle. Supposing this Bill should carry, which I hope it will, I would not be vain enough, or foolish enough, to consider it a party triumph. In my opinion, it would be a triumph of justice and for the constitution. That is the kind of triumph we are working for, but the majority in this Senate are setting up their judgment, not only against the province of Quebec, not only against the government of the country, as stated by the hon. leader of the Senate, of the majority of the representatives of the people and a very large minority in this Chamber, if there be a minority, and yet we are asked, in the face of that consensus of opinion, in the face of that intelligent expression, to say that the people of Quebec do not know how to manage their own affairs. Are we to be told here that the province that produced such men as Lafontaine, Cartier, Chapleau, Dorion and Laurier do not know how to manage their business?

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Why does the hon. gentleman leave out Lacoste?

Hon. Mr. KERR—I thank the hon. gentleman: I want to include him. He says they could by proper management.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He is not the judge of that.

Hon. Mr. KERR—He is not the judge of that. I do not want to make any implication of reflection upon a man like Chief Justice Lacoste. He is an able judge and a splendid man. I have never heard anything but good of him, and my not mentioning his name was because he was not present to my mind; but will hon. gentlemen tell me that men of that stamp, or a province that can produce such men and others that I see around me from that province, on both sides of the House——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why is the hon. gentleman looking at me?

Hon. Mr. KERR—Will any one say that they do not know how to manage their own affairs, but that it is left for the majority in this Senate to tell them how they should manage their affairs? All I can say is: what may be Quebec's case to-day, may be Ontario's case to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Treat them in the same way, if the circumstances are the same.

Hon. Mr. KERR—If that doctrine is to prevail, the sooner we know it, the better. If that is the gauntlet thrown down by the opposition, that if Ontario does not distribute or establish courts according to the wish of the majority in this Senate, that province cannot have them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not the question.

Hon. Mr. KERR—That is the real question. I understand the question as well as my hon. friend, although I have not been so many years in parliament, but I am longer a student of the laws of this country, and I will not allow the hon. gentleman to dispute the soundness of my law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will do that easily enough.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Because I am quite willing to risk the opinion of the Supreme Court as to whether what is proposed to be done is not a violation of the constitution, or a failure to comply with the duty cast upon this parliament by the constitution.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A very good suggestion. I hope the government will act on it.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Hon. gentlemen may take whichever position they like. It may be a matter of fun and laughter and interruption, but I tell hon. gentlemen that the provinces are going to win in the long run, and they are not going to be dictated to by the irresponsible—shall I say oligarchy—in the Senate. I am talking plainly, and I feel strongly. I know the mind of the people on this question, and I intend, so far as I can interpret it, to declare it here so long as I have an opportunity.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear. Dispense.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I will occupy whatever time the Senate gives me.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has not more than two hours.

Hon. Mr. KERR—It is always a sign that somebody is hurt, when he squeals.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why does the hon. gentleman squeal so loudly?

Hon. Mr. KERR—What excuse can the man who votes against this clause give to the country? What satisfactory explanation? I would be ashamed to return home, if I voted against this measure. I would feel that I was an enemy, not only of the province of Quebec, but an enemy of provincial autonomy; but I do not say that those who vote against the clause will be enemies. I suppose I have a right to assume that they will vote according to their consciences, but if I were not here to enter my solemn protest and to correct some of the bad law enunciated by the hon. leader of the opposition in this Chamber, this afternoon and to-night, I would feel that I would have a violent attack of insomnia all night long. I have given hon. gentleman my views on this question. We must legislate in this Chamber, as I understand it, not for a temporary party triumph. We must legislate to carry out the constitution of this country, as we understand it. We must do as that Greek historian, Thucydides, did, when he wrote the history of the Peloponnesian War: 'I write this history as a perpetual possession, not as a prize task for the present hour.' This is not a task for the present hour; let us legislate in such a way that what we do will, in coming years, when others occupy these benches, when another Speaker adorns the Chair and other officers record the proceedings, when other skilled hands may be directing the swift pencil, be a beacon light, and a map, and a chart by which to steer the ship of state, so that she shall avoid all rocks and shoals and quicksands, in the years that are to come.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I think this question has been discussed in all its aspects by the members on this side of the Chamber, particularly by the hon leader of the opposition and the hon. senator from Bedford, and I have not heard any reason given against what has been advanced on this side of the House. But there is one point to which I wish to call attention, although

I have done so once already. The hon. Minister of Justice has told us that there was a difference of $78,000 between the expenses of the judges of Quebec and the judges of Ontario. Reading the speech of the Solicitor General, I thought it was $70,000, but it does not matter. If hon. gentlemen will examine those expenses and compare the population of Ontario and the population of Quebec, they will see that the proportion is the same, that we have in the province of Quebec, according to population, the same amount as they have in Ontario. This exists and has existed for a long time. I really thought, and I think still, that among our old legislators, Macdonald, Cartier, and some that have followed them, the intention was that, as we had the same subsidy coming from the federal government for the difference in proportion to our number, the same thing applied to the administration of justice, that we received in proportion the same amount, more particularly between Quebec and Ontario. I make the distinction that in the new provinces, British Columbia, Manitoba and the Territories, this will not apply, because those provinces are infant provinces. They are increasing much faster than the old provinces, and certainly we must give them more judges than their population at present warrants, because they require those judges. I think, for those who desire to keep up between the provinces a good feeling, it is dangerous to press any measure which might create a jealousy between the provinces. It is proposed to give to the province of Quebec $15,000 more. If, as I said just now, the proportion is at this moment equal between the two provinces, you are changing the proportion, and you are changing the proportion while we are still basing our actions on the census of 1891. We are going to have a new census in a year. Perhaps this census may change the proportion between the old provinces, more particularly between Ontario and Quebec. Why not wait before doing something which may create a bad feeling? The hon. gentleman who has just spoken says that what happens in Quebec may happen in Ontario. That is just one of the reasons why I think we ought to keep the old proportion, but there is one thing in which I agree with the hon. gentleman from Coburg, and that is that the great point before us to discuss is the reference to the paragraph which says that the act of the Senate in rejecting the said section of this Bill is an infringement of the principle of provincial autonomy secured in the British North America Act. With this I agree, and I think the discussion of this very interesting question has wandered a little from the point, but now, I would ask, it we reject the clause in the Bill giving three new judges to the province of Quebec, how are we interfering with the autonomy of the province?

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—What autonomy is given to each province? The province of Quebec has the power constituting the Superior Court. The British North America Act says:

> The legislature will have exclusive power to make laws concerning the administration of justice.

It does not touch that. The section proceeds:

> Including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in these courts.

We do not touch that. Therefore, how can any one say that we are infringing on the principle of autonomy? We are not interfering at all with that. We leave them the constitution and all the rest. But the judges are named and paid by the federal government. Then there is another point. It has been argued by some hon. gentlemen that it was obligatory on us to name and to pay the judges. If it is obligatory, what necessity was there for coming before parliament?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—If it is obligatory, let them pass an order in council and get it signed by the Governor. Certainly nobody thinks that we are obliged to do things without amending those Acts. If it is obligatory let them name the judges by an order in council. I venture to say they dare not do it. That is the only way they could do it, if it is obligatory upon them. But that is the only way that remains, because otherwise you admit that it is not obligatory. If it is not obligatory we can discuss the question. That is what we are doing, and in doing that, passing the amendment we passed, we are not infringing on the authority of the province.

The Senate divided on the motion which was rejected by the following vote :

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I ask that the names be read.

The names were read by the clerk.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I call the attention of the House to a fact—a very grave fact. The hon. member opposite may laugh, and think it is a sharp trick (cries of 'Order') I am in order.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has no right to make any comments. He must state what he has to state.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. member for LaSalle (Hon. Mr. Paquet) paired this afternoon with the hon. member for Repentigny (Hon. Mr. Armand) about a quarter to six, for the rest of the session. Mr. Armand then went away. After the departure of Mr. Armand, the hon. member for de Lanaudière interfered and annulled the pair.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He could not do that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He could not do that in honour. Before dinner I told Mr. Armand that he was paired, and that it was not necessary he should be here this evening. If the dictates of honour had been complied with, I would have been notified by the hon. member for de Lanaudière that the hon. member for LaSalle was still here and intended to vote, and then I would have had time to have Mr. Armand here. The hon. member for de Lanaudière kept the hon. gentleman from LaSalle in the background hidden somewhere. He has not been seen until the vote was called. I do not see that there is any great honour in that, but I call the attention of the House to these facts. Notwithstanding that, the motion put by the hon. minister was lost, so that kind of a trick, if trick it is, has failed.

Hon. Mr. PAQUET—I came to vote because I was not paired.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I call the Hon. Mr. DeBoucherville as a witness. I told Mr. DeBoucherville to go and see Mr. Paquet so as to make certain that there was a pair. He saw Mr. Paquet. After having seen Mr. Paquet he told Mr. Armand that he need not come here to-night. I appeal to the word of the Hon. Mr. DeBoucherville.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—As I am called upon to declare what I know, this is what I know : The hon. member for Stadacona told me that the Hon. Mr. Paquet had paired with Mr. Armand. He told me to ask Mr. Paquet himself. I went to Mr. Paquet and asked him if he was paired with Mr. Armand. He said : Yes. I board at the same place as Mr. Armand. After taking my supper, I went to see Mr. Armand at his rooms. He said : 'Do you know that two have come to see me to-night ?' I did not know what he meant. I knew people had been to him asking him to resign his seat, offering him something to do that. I said : 'What do you mean ?' He said : 'They wanted me to resign my pair. They told me they would give me a pair for the rest of the session if I would resign it to-night. I told them I had a pair to the end of the session. I asked him for the names of those who had seen him. He said one was Mr. Paquet. I said, to be sure before leaving, 'You have not broken your pair for to-night ?' He said : 'No, but to-morrow my pair will be broken.' I did not understand what the hon. member (Hon. Mr. Paquet) said just now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He said he was not paired.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The hon. member would not say that before me. Did I not ask the hon. member if he had paired, and he said he had paired.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—A statement has been brought forward by the Hon. Mr. DeBoucherville that some people had asked Mr. Armand for his seat. Mr. Armand's seat has never been asked for by anybody. It is the fact that Mr. Armand's people have tried to get outside parties to induce him to resign, but he has never been asked for his seat. Outside parties would be very loath to ask for Mr. Armand's seat, because Mr. Armand is a very respectable senator, and there is no reason why any one should ask to take his place.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps it would be well to delay that discussion.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU—I wanted to make that statement.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I am very glad that the hon. gentleman from Stadacona has called the attention of the House to this pair. Just as we were leaving the House at six o'clock, Senator Paquet informed me that the hon. member for Stadacona wanted to pair him off with the senator from Repentigny, and I said it was quite unfair to pair a healthy man against a man who is sick, and probably could not come this evening. However, I went myself with the senator from LaSalle to the hospital, to the sick room of Hon. Senator Armand, and there Hon. Senator Paquet told him that he had changed his mind and was not leaving to-night, and asked him to call off the pair, and told him to come and vote in the House if he wanted to this evening.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The hon. gentleman admits there was a pair.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—When the hon. member from Stadacona came to me and asked me if the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Paquet) had left the city. I said 'I will have nothing to say to you.'

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The hon. member has omitted this: that he went with the Hon. Mr. Paquet and asked Hon. Mr. Armand to break the pair.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Which was quite right.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I am surprised that the hon. member would make the statement that he had not paired.

Hon. Mr. PAQUET—I said 'I am not paired,' because I went to Mr. Armand and said 'I am not going to-night, I want to call off the pair.' He said 'with pleasure; if you want to vote to-night you can do so.'

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not see how, if a man has paired, he can undo it at his pleasure.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Because he changed his mind, which he had a perfect right to do.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But if he said he did not pair?

Hon. Mr. PAQUET—I said 'I am not paired.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understood the hon. gentleman said that when he voted he was not paired, and if we went to Senator Armand in time and told him he wished to call off his pair, he had a right to do so, and Senator Armand, if he was in a condition to come here and vote, was at liberty to do so. I understand Senator Forget expressed his desire to remain and vote for the Bill, but some hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House told him there would be no vote—that the amendment that had been made to the Bill in the Senate was not to be persisted in; consequently, he is not here for the purpose of voting with the government on this question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask the hon. Minister of Justice, who seems to be very well posted on these matters, if he thinks that man in honour, the Hon. Mr. Paquet, having through me paired with the Hon. Mr. Armand, should not have told me that the pair was broken?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I wish to say a word, as I have been entrusted with making some pairs on the government side of the House, that I regret very much that a gentleman who assumes the position of whip—the hon. member from Stadacona—should throw a doubt on the sincerity of men who make pairs. It will be recollected this afternoon that the hon. member for Brockville rose and voted. He was accused by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona of having paired for Monday simply because the hon. member for Perth was not here. I did not say anything about it this afternoon, but I knew something about that, because I was in communication with the hon. gentleman from Brockville, and he informed me that he tried to arrange the pair with the hon. member from Perth for the balance of the session, but he would not consent. The hon. member from Perth had stated, what the hon. gentleman from Brockville said this afternoon, that he intended to be here this afternoon to vote, and notwithstanding that, the hon. gentleman from Stadacona said he had a telegram that he could not be here this afternoon. The hon. gentleman raises a question of the same kind to-night again, notwithstanding the denial of the hon. senator, who is in his place, and another senator who went with him to see Mr. Armand. Still the hon. gentleman from Stadacona insists that the hon. gentleman broke the pair. It is very unfair.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is not unfair.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is another hon. gentleman present to-day who voted, Hon. Mr. Cox, who was paired with Mr. Kirchhoffer. Mr. Cox returned to the city to-day, bringing a note from the Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer, saying that they mutually withdrew the pair, and the hon. gentleman from Toronto was quite right in voting. When attention was called to the pair of Senator McLaren with Senator Fulford, the latter gentleman rose at once and said it was true, there had been a pair, but Mr. McLaren had wired him, and it was mutually withdrawn. Both of these votes were quite correct.

Hon. Mr. FULFORD—The pair of hon. Senator McLaren and myself was only until Monday. I suggested until the end of the session.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no misunderstanding about that. The moment the hon. gentleman made the explanation, no one objected to his voting. This case is quite different. I differ from the hon. leader of the House upon this point, and on the question of pairs. That there was a pair between the hon. gentleman from LaSalle and Senator Armand is beyond a doubt, because not only the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, but my hon. friend from Montarville (Hon. Mr. DeBoucherville), whose word no one would doubt, said there was a pair. The whip takes upon himself the responsibility of undertaking to break that pair. If Mr. Armand, who is ill, and probably did not want to come out, and the hon. gentleman from LaSalle had mutually agreed to break the pair, they would stand in the same position, but Senator Armand said, as I understand from the hon. gentleman on my right, 'no, my pair is made, and I intend to remain here until the end of the session.'

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The pair was to be broken to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But he declined to have it broken to-night. Because, had not that pair been made, I know there was arrangements made by the hon. gentleman for Senator Armand to dine here and remain to vote. I am not going to insist upon the hon. gentleman from LaSalle changing his vote. If he thinks, under the circumstances, that he had a right to vote, and that his conduct with Senator Armand is what one gentleman should be to another, that is for him to decide, not for me. It will not affect the result in the least, and putting it in that way, I should suggest to my hon. friend from Stadacona not to press this question any further. It will only be a lesson for the future, when elderly gentlemen like myself, who are infirm, whose legs are not so good as they used to be, want to remain away at night, to be very cautious with whom they pair. My elderly friend, as he styles himself, will accept my interpretation of it. I would give him this advice, when pairs are made, he had better get a mutual consent to have them broken, or let them alone; otherwise there should not be any pairs made in this House.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—There is another little incident about this division, and it refers to the hon. leader of the opposition in this House. Hon. Senator Forget told me he was in favour of the Bill. (Cries of 'Oh, oh!') I hope I shall be allowed to make my statement. He told me he was in favour of the Bill, and had pledged himself to vote for it, but that he had spoken to the leader of the opposition, who had told him he could go home in peace, that it was useless for him to return to Ottawa to vote, because there would be no vote on that question. Otherwise, I assure hon. gentlemen, I would, as whip, have telegraphed to Mr. Forget to come here and register his vote, in which case the division would have stood 17 to 17.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And it would have been lost, the same.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Senator Forget, in whom I have the most unbounded confidence, misunderstood me, if he ever gave utterance to that opinion, I could not have said it because I was determined after reading the debate in the Commons to push this matter to an issue, and it is not at all likely that I would have said to any member: 'Do not return, because there will be no vote,' when I had made up my mind to push it, whether I should lose or win. I do not desire to repeat conversation, but I was told by a gentleman that had had a conversation with Senator Forget at the club, and that Senator Forget had expressed opinions very similar to what the hon. gentleman has intimated, but, when he got the explanation, he changed his mind and would not come back. There is the difference in the statements, but to suppose that I, who intended to push this to an ultimate issue, would advise any of our friends not to come back, is something that I do not think anybody will attribute to me, for the reason that, it implies deception, and I do not think those who have known me for a number of years would believe I could be guilty of anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—The hon. Senator Forget also asked me not to mention this publicly as it was useless, but to mention it to the leader of the House, which I immediately did as soon as he left me at the door of the Senate.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS AGREED TO.

The Order of the Day being called.

Further consideration of the message from the House of Commons disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the amendments made by the House of Commons to (Bill K) 'An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL said: I gave notice of a motion in reference to this question. As the Minister of Justice said, there was very little difference between the law as it stands, and the proposal which I intended to make in opposition to it. I have expressed my opinion on the question very strongly in the past, and I have no desire to prolong the session in discussing it again. My views are upon record. I firmly believe that the object in reinserting that clause in the Bill was for political reasons of the lowest possible kind. I have made up my mind to allow the government to take the responsibility of what they have done, and whatever may follow in its wake. It is not necessary for me to say, I have been engaged in strikes and endeavoured to put them down. I have strong opposition to exempting persons from the consequences of what is a crime in others. The government can take the responsibility of what they are doing. I shall not make any motion, but content myself with voting against the proposition which has been made.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman, I understand, does not persist in his motion?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I move that the Senate concur in the amendment by the House of Commons to this Bill, which reads:

> Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to a combination of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

This clause was in the Bill as originally introduced, and was struck out in the Senate, but the House of Commons restored it.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I call for the yeas and nays.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Two members must call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. I allowed ample time for any hon. gentleman to call for the yeas and nays. If the House wishes to rescind the decision, well and good.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW. No, but I rose in time, I think, and called for the yeas and nays, and I do not like that kind of thing.

PRINTING COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

Hon. Sir JOHN CARLING moved the adoption of the 5th report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the printing of parliament.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I wish to make a remark upon one point in that report. It will be observed that there is a reference in the report to an application which was received by the Printing Committee from the Department of Customs with reference to the publication of monthly bulletins, or reports, which the department proposed to publish, containing statistics regarding the trade of the country. The Department of Customs, in making this application, recognized the point which I consider to be one of considerable importance, with regard to the printing and publication of reports and other documents from the departments. I understand that the Joint Committee on Printing of both Houses of parliament have absolute control, of the printing of all documents issued by this parliament, and by the different departments of the government of the country. The Department of Customs, in making this application, did what was right, and I assume that at some time or another the various authorities have applied for similar authority from the Joint Committee of Printing with regard to the various reports and documents issued by the departments, and I think it is well that we should clearly understand how we stand with regard to that matter. I have a document in my hand which has been issued from one of the departments of the government—the department of the government conducted by the hon. leader of this House, the hon. Minister of Justice. This is a document showing the action of the government in preference to the manufacture and sale of twine produced by convict labour, and the document is published for the information of members of parliament, and it is signed 'D. Mills, Minister of Justice.' The statement I have to make is that this document is nothing more nor less than a political pamphlet, a mere campaign sheet, dealing with political questions, and that it has been issued and charged to the accounts of the Committee of Printing without the authority of that committee. That is the statement that I have to make and I think that it is a very serious one.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Bring it up to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have no doubt the hon. Secretary of State will bear me out, when I say that the Committee on Printing of both Houses of parliament are the only authority to decide what documents shall be printed and what shall not be printed, whether they come from the parliament of Canada here, or whether they come from departments, in the first instance, the authority must have come from the Committee on Printing with regard to the publication of all those documents and that the appropriation for the printing of all parliamentary and public documents is under the control of the Committee on Printing, and I have therefore to complain to this House of the conduct of the hon. Minister of Justice in publishing a document which is purely and essentially a political document, pure campaign literature, and publishing that document at the expense and having it published under the authority of the government. To show that this document is of the character I have described, I will read one or two extracts from it. This is with reference to the management of the sale of binder twine. The extract is as follows:

> Four applications were received from Mr. Rees, Mr. Mucklestone, Mr. Chown, and Mr. Kelly, of Montreal. Mr. Rees wrote Mr. Geo. Taylor, the member for Leeds, asking for his support. Mr. Taylor forwarded this letter to Mr. Dickey, and accompanied it with a recommendation which stated that Mr. Rees was supported by the friends of the government in this locality. Mr. Mucklestone wrote Mr. Taylor and Mr. Taylor forwarded Mr. Mucklestone's letter to Mr. Dickey, the Minister of Justice, and he added a note at the bottom in which he informed the minister that he had written Mr. Mucklestone, and he told Mr. Mucklestone that in his communication to the Minister of Justice he had pronounced him a first-class man for the position. And so, Mr. Taylor persuaded both Mr. Rees and Mr. Mucklestone that he was actively supporting each of them, although he knew that the intention was to appoint but one agent.

Here is a statement that he, Mr. Taylor, was acting a double part. The whole pamphlet is nothing more nor less than a political campaign sheet and my complaint is that this document was issued from one of the departments of the government, the Department of Justice, that it has been charged to the Printing Committee of parliament without the authority of that committee, and in that way the duty and the rights of the Printing Committee have been invaded.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The document is not in itself a report in any sense of the word. It is a controversial document, a political sheet, intended to controvert some of the statements that Mr. Taylor and Mr. Sproule and some other gentlemen have made in the House of Commons. The document is not one that should have issued from any department of the government, and it should not have been charged to the Committee on Printing, or printed at the public expense. That is my complaint. That it should have been authorized by the Committee on Printing is clearly shown by the fact that in the report we have now before us, the Department of Customs intending to enlarge their work in the way of issuing bulletins containing statistical information of the working of the department from month to month, apply and apply properly to the Committee of Printing for authority to have these things printed and published and charged to the accounts of the Printing Department. If the Department of Customs did right in making that application, it is certain that the Department of Justice has done wrong in printing documents not authorized by the Committee on Printing, but it makes the case still worse if a document so printed and distributed and charged to the Printing Committee is a document of a character that should not be issued by any department in Canada. I have referred to some points of the document, and it will be seen that it is a reply to Mr. Clancy's statements in the House of Commons and also to Mr. Sproule's statements, it discusses this question with gentlemen in the House of Commons, matters that might be discussed very properly in this parliament by the hon. Minister of Justice, a member of this parliament, but it should not be put out in the shape of a public document, when the matter contained in the document is nothing more or less than political campaign literature.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know what the hon. gentleman calls it, but I published it within my official right, and I had no necessity to go to any Printing Committee for the purpose of issuing that to the public. The department of which I am head, so far as the manufacture of binder twine is concerned, was attacked and misrepresented in the House of Commons by Mr. Taylor and also by Dr. Sproule. I had a right to determine for myself in what way I would answer the attacks upon the department and upon myself as head of that department. I concluded, as I was not a member of the House of Commons where those attacks were made, that I would answer it by an official communication written over my own signature, and sent out from the department to which I belong. When the hon. gentleman says that I had no right to issue such a pamphlet from the department, then I say I entirely dissent from any such contention. I say that neither under law, nor reason, nor anything else can it be said that a minister may be attacked and misrepresented with regard to his administrative work in the department and that he is not at liberty, as a minister of the department, to answer those misrepresentations. There is not, from the beginning to the end of that document, a statement that is not a fact and not borne out by the facts. Mr. Taylor, for instance, stated that I had awarded a contract to Messrs. Bate & Son, of this city, and that they had put up no security : the fact is that they did put up a cheque of over $200,000, that the contract was awarded to them and that the money was paid the moment the twine was delivered, and there was no difficulty in that regard. So there were misrepresentations with reference to the other transactions. There was a statement that there was a combination, and the facts show that a combination was an impossibility. The facts were altogether against any possible combination between the Department of Justice in the manufacture of binder twine in connection with the Kingston penitentiary, and any other manufacture in any part of the country, I should like to know what the Printing Committee have to do with that matter. I say they have nothing whatever to do with it. The communication emanates from my department, and has been sent out from my department over my signature as Minister of Justice, and I am prepared, on a fitting opportunity, to defend every statement of fact in that communication. Every statement made there has been carefully considered, and when the hon. gentleman makes complaint of it at the last hour of the session, and says that I have no authority or right to publish that communication, then I say that he has no authority for any such statements.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not say the hon. gentleman had no right to publish it, but that it should not have been published at the public expense.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman has been occupying nearly half the session with his speeches and getting them carried through the mails all over Prince Edward Island. The result was that, on account of the tons of literature he sent there, his candidate was overwhelmingly defeated, but I do not make any complaint of the hon. gentleman doing that. Does it matter to the public what I write or state here in the House if reported at the public expense and sent abroad, or whether it is published in the blue-book from my department? Where is the difference? The hon. gentleman has been sending abroad his speeches the whole session, making speeches reported at the public expense, and carried to Prince Edward Island at the public expense, and he does not see any impropriety in that. I say there is no more impropriety in my defending myself and my department by the blue-book issued from the department than there is in the hon. gentleman undertaking to make a speech here and having it reported at the public expense and sent abroad at the public charge.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The difference between my hon. friend and myself is that when I make a speech here and think it is of such importance that I should distribute it among the residents of my province, I pay for it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman does not pay for the reporting.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. minister is entirely wrong.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman pays for the extra copies. I have issued no extra copies.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have not sent any of my speeches this session, notwithstanding all the hon. gentleman has been saying. I had no special edition published of my speech, and beyond half a dozen which I got from the distribution office, I have not circulated any of my speeches this session. But in other sessions I have distributed them, and I have paid as much as $80 or $100 a year for printing them. That is the difference between my hon. friend and myself. Instead of paying for printing them and sending them as I do, the hon. gentleman goes behind the back of the Printing Committee and gets the document printed at the public expense, and sends it all over the country, attacking his opponents for their statements in another place. I consider the hon. gentleman has done very wrong in that matter. He says he is prepared to stand by every word of this: perhaps he is. I do not say that he cannot, and if he had made that sppech in this House and circulated it as I have to circulate my speeches when I make them, it would be another matter altogether, but abusing his position as a minister, and going behind the back of the Printing Committee and ordering the printing of this document, and then circulating it and attacking gentlemen who have exercised their natural right in the House of Commons, of criticising the management of the binder twine industry in his department, he is taking an improper advantage of them which he should not have taken.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not at all. They took an improper advantage of me.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the difference between the two is that the hon. gentleman has his speeches reported at the public expense, just as my hon. friend beside me. We are all upon an equality in that respect. If he thinks proper to have an additional number of his speeches printed and pays for them, it is all right.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not issue an additional number.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was not talking about the hon. minister. If he will keep his temper I will speak about him later. The hon. gentleman has a right when he makes a speech of sufficient importance, either for his constituency or for the general public, to go to the Queen's Printer and say: 'I want a thousand copies of that speech' and get them printed specially and pay for them. When I was in the other House I did so, and I paid for them on every occasion. I exercised the right, as every member does, of franking them. We all stand upon an equality in that respect. What my hon. friend complains of is that the hon. gentleman, as Minister of Justice, deliberately writes out a speech——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps the hon. gentleman dictated it and somebody else wrote it. We will not quarrel about that. It is published in pamphlet form and sent broadcast as if it came from the Printing Committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not say that it is so, but I am drawing attention to the difference between them. What the hon. gentleman says is that that was written by the Minister of Justice, circulated and charged to the printing of parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, not charged to the printing of parliament.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not a fact.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is a fact. I have that from the secretary of the Printing Committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not a fact. They issued a blue-book from my department.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was coming to that department, I would not find fault even if the hon. gentleman did what no other minister had ever done under any circumstances—that is, write a campaign sheet and issue it by the department. If it was circulated and charged through the Printing Committee, as printing of parliament, then I say it was decidedly wrong.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I say it was not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman said that before. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield says he had it from the secretary of the Printing Committee that that document was paid for out of the appropriation for doing parliamentary printing. The hon. gentleman said it was not. I am not going to decide between the two, but I have a little dispute with the hon. gentleman which I will attend to in the proper time. I do not intend to permit myself to be placed in the position of trying to deceive a member of the House and allow myself to rest under any such imputation. However, I shall refer to that at the proper time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The pamphlet to which the hon. gentleman refers was written and sent out from my department. The usual number of any blue-book or departmental report was the number that was printed in that case, and if the hon. gentleman lays down the doctrine that a minister may be traduced in the House of which he is not a member, and his capacity as minister and in his departmental work, and he is not at liberty to answer it, then I entertain a view of the rights of a minister very different from those which are expressed by the hon. gentleman. Let me make another remark: The hon. gentleman says he always publishes his speeches at his own expense. Each member of this House, each member of the other House, receives two or three copies of the report which is made at the public expense, and printed at the public expense, every day. All the newspapers of the country receive copies, and all those are printed at the public expense, and the hon. gentleman will find that there is not a speech made in this House of which there is not as large a number printed and published at the public expense as there was of that blue-book issued from my department.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman made a statement a few moments ago that I had sent down to Prince Edward Island great bags of my speeches, and then he added the allegation that I was doing that at the public expense, but now the hon. gentleman narrows down his charge and says I am treated like every other member of the House in having my speech printed and a few copies furnished to me from the distribution office. That is all he has to go upon for the unwarranted statements he has made.

The motion was agreed to.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called.

Second reading (Bill 173) 'An Act respecting the Quebec Harbour Commissioners.'—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We had better let this stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Will we prorogue to-morrow ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am unable to answer. It all depends on the progress the public business makes in the two Houses. We will have the second reading of this Quebec Harbour Commissioners Bill to-morrow, and it cannot be completed till the afternoon. I will move that when the House adjourns to-night it do stand adjourned till 11 o'clock to-morrow—the usual motion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There has been no notice given of this motion, and we will meet at the regular hour.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understand that the House of Commons expected to get through the Supply Bill this evening, but the objection of the hon. gentleman prevents us getting through to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then we will remain a little longer. I object to the motion on the ground that the hon. gentleman has given no notice of it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At the end of the session it is not usual to stand on such strict rules. I was not aware that there was any opposition to this Bill, nor do I think there is, and it would facilitate business to allow it to go through.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps there would not be opposition under other circumstances. I intend to avail myself of all the privileges that pertain to a member of this House.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—It would be wise to drop such Bills coming in at this hour of the session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There never was a session during the whole eighteen years the Conservative government was in power in which Bills have come down with the same regularity as this session.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have under my hand the minutes of the session of 1895, when all the important Bills came down the day before prorogation. The Customs Act, the Dominion Elections Act, the Subsidy Bill, the Bounties on Iron and Steel Bill—all came in the very day before prorogation. Here we have had those important Bills on the paper for over a week or ten days and hon. gentlemen are not in a position to reproach us.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I never saw this Bill till to-day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is an unimportant Bill. It contains one clause. We passed it last year and they wanted to make some change in the agreement.

The Order of the Day was allowed to stand.

SENATOR FORGET'S VOTE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the House adjourns, I desire to make a further statement in reference to the matter mentioned by the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) I have no recollection of having had any conversation with Mr. Forget upon the question of the Provincial Judges Bill. I may have had a conversation with him on Saturday as to the vote, and it is just possible that I may have said to him that he might go and there would be no vote that day. That may be the case. I knew there would be no vote that day, for the reason that an arrangement had been entered into between the leader of the government and this side of the House, at the instance of the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, that no contentious matter should be discussed on Saturday, but would be postponed till Monday.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So that there may possibly be that misunderstanding. If the hon. Minister of Justice had spoken to me about it before, the probabilities are that I could have made that explanation, and I should not then be left under the imputation of having deceived a gentleman for whom I have so much respect as I have for Mr. Forget, and adopt that mean, contemptible manner of preventing him from voting. I leave the question with the leader of the gentleman who tells us that he was told by Mr. Forget not to mention to anybody the fact that he intended to vote for the Bill in this House, and who now informs the House of the statement of the hon. gentleman without having been asked and without any necessity for it. Mr. Forget will know now how to deal with men who move about in society and are considered gentlemen, and with whom it is supposed one can hold a private conversation without having it retailed, and more particularly when he is told not to do so. The hon. gentleman may think he was justified in mentioning the name and in mentioning the matter, from the fact that the leader of the government intimated that there was somebody in the Senate who had deceived Mr. Forget. I was going to ask him who had taken such an unwarrantable step with reference to any brother senator, but it never entered my mind that I was the person who was accused of doing it, until it was repeated by the hon. gentleman who has been selected as Whip on behalf of the government. I shall make an explanation to Hon. Mr. Forget, and very likely we may have another side to the story.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—All I have to say is that when I referred to it to-day I had quite forgotten who it was that my hon. friend said Mr. Forget had mentioned the matter to or had the conversation with, and when my hon. friend mentioned it to-night, it recalled to my mind the statement that he had made to me. All I wish to say, and all I intended to affirm, was that the hon. senator had mentioned the matter to me that Mr. Forget had said to some one—I had forgotten whom—on that side of the House, that he intended to vote for the clause relating to the appointment of the judges in Quebec.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He never told me that. I never had any conversation with him about it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not say that the hon. gentleman had. I accept his word for that. I am not imputing anything wrong to the hon. gentleman at all. I simply affirm the statement my hon. friend made. He said he had mentioned it to me, and I said that that was a fact, and when he mentioned it to me he mentioned the name of the leader of the opposition. I remembered then that it was the leader of the opposition, but I had quite forgotten that he said who it was Mr. Forget had had the conversation with. That is all I have to say with regard to that matter. I impute nothing to the hon. gentleman, and I do not question the hon. gentleman's word for a moment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not accuse the hon. gentleman of doing that. I said that when the hon. gentleman made that statement, my intention was to ask him who had taken upon himself the responsibility of deceiving Mr. Forget.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman partly said that and had his attention turned off to something else. I knew that the hon. gentleman intended to put the question to me, but I could not have answered it then. I had forgotten who it was, but when my hon. friend mentioned with whom Mr. Forget said he had the conversation, it recalled the statement he made to me.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have been over thirty years in parliament, and it is the first time that anybody has imputed to me so mean and contemptible an act. I will consider where it comes from.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—In this matter we have simply a tempest in a teapot. Mr. Forget simply made the statement to me——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And the hon. gentleman repeated it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—After he was told not to do it. He said so himself.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Allow me. This is a free country, and though the opposition have a majority in this House, we have some rights, and I wish to say that the Hon. Mr. Forget came to me and told me he was in favour of the Judges Bill, and that he had spoken to the hon. leader of the opposition in this House, and that the leader of the opposition had told him there would be no vote on that Bill, and he could go home, and he, the Hon. Mr. Forget, would not come back on Monday. These are his very words. And he said, 'Now, don't mention it, but you may go and tell Mr. Mills. Mr. Mills was just passing and I went and told him. That is all that took place. When the hon. leader of the opposition takes offence at that, it is simply a misunderstanding between them. The Hon. Mr. Forget did not want to influence other senators, I suppose, and before the vote was taken I would not have mentioned it, but now that the vote has been recorded it makes no difference. If he had been here, people could have seen on which side he was voting, and nobody could find any fault after the vote was taken for saying what took place, and I am glad to give the hon. leader of the opposition a chance to explain, because I must say that I have always held him in high esteem, and I thought it was a strange conversation, and I am glad it was brought out. But the matter was mentioned to me and I was somewhat surprised to hear a statement of that sort. I said I cannot understand it, and I am glad the matter has been ventilated. Now the hon. leader of the opposition can settle the matter with the Hon. Mr. Forget.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It is a most unfortunate thing that private conversations should be made public at any time. They should not be made public. Under no circumstances is a man justified in detailing a private conversation, I do not care whether before or after the vote. If it is a condition precedent to making the assertion that it should not be spoken of, and therefore I think it is highly objectionable to make it public.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What object could the hon. gentleman have in giving publicity to the statement that I had done a thing of that sort, unless to leave the impression on the mind of members of this House and the public that I had deceived Mr. Forget? What other object could the hon. member have had? He could have had no intention other than to show that I had practiced deception unworthy of the lowest type of politician.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I gave the hon. gentleman a chance to clear himself of any such imputation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If that is the hon. gentleman's idea of the conduct of one gentleman to another, I leave it to himself and his associates to settle.

The Senate adjourned.

OIL SUPPLIES FOR PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate statements regarding the lubrication of the Prince Edward Island Railway, as follows:

1. The dates at which the oils of the Galena Oil Company were first used.
2. The quantities and prices of each kind of oil furnished and charged to store account, with dates of such charge.
3. The quantities and prices of each kind of oil charged to locomotive and car services, with dates of such charge.
4. The actual consumption, in quantity and value, of lubricating oils for each year or part of year from the introduction of the Galena oils up to June 30, 1900.
5. The locomotive and car mileage for each year or part of year as in the next preceding paragraph.
6. All deductions from the accounts of the Galena Oil Company made up to June 30, 1900, in pursuance of the contract of September 17, 1896, between the said Galena Oil Company and the Minister of Railways and Canals.
7. Similar particulars to those mentioned in paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 of this motion regarding the last complete year before using the oils of the said Galena Oil Company.

Also a statement showing the number of gallons of signal hand lamp oil purchased for the Intercolonial Railway and the Prince Edward Island Railway from the Galena Oil Company, in pursuance of the contract dated September 23, 1896, and the price per gallon paid for the same.

The motion was agreed to.

THE CENSUS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to inquire from the hon. minister if the government has come to a decision respecting the next census—whether it will be taken on the basis de jure or de facto?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am unable to answer the hon. member. Nothing has been finally decided on that question. Whether there shall be a de jure census or de facto census, or whether the census shall combine both features, has not yet been determined upon by the government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the hon. gentleman should have said that he has not been informed of what the Minister of Agriculture intends doing in the matter, or what decision he has arrived at. It is another evidence, to my mind, of the departmental management of the affairs of this country by each individual minister without the knowledge of his colleagues. It was only last night the Minister of Agriculture told the House of Commons that the de jure system was to be continued, and if the hon. gentleman will look at the report of the debate in the House last night, he will find that that was the declaration made by his colleague, although it appears he had not informed him, a member of the cabinet, of what he intended to do.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would call the attention of the government to this fact, also, concerning the census: In the last census that was taken, the origin of the people was not mentioned. They were divided into two classes: English speaking and French speaking. I think it would be a more fair division if they made the census similar to the one in 1881, dividing the population according to its origin and not as has been done.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have heard what the hon. gentleman said, and I shall call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to it.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—If the census was divided by language, it would be better than by origin. There are people, for example, at Murray Bay, below Quebec, with Scotch names whose language is not English. They speak only French. There may be other places where people of French origin do not speak French at all, but English. I think it would be better by language.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—On the other hand, in the last census, every French Canadian who spoke English was registered as an Englishman.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think that ought to occur.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It was done.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—What did you do with Frenchmen who spoke Gaelic?

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (173) 'An Act respecting the Quebec Harbour Commissioners.' He said: In the session of 1899 a Bill was passed authorizing the Quebec Harbour Commissioners to make an agreement with the Great Northern Railway Company for the erection of an elevator. The terms of the agreement were set forth in the schedule. One of the terms was, that the work was to be commenced before the 31st of December, 1899, and it was to be finished on the first of May, 1900. Some doubt exists as to whether they did begin then. This Bill ratifies thé work, whatever was done, as coming within the terms of the original agreement, and extends the time for three or four months for the completion of the work. It also alters the terms of the guarantee. The guarantee was 6 per cent interest on the $200,000, and under that the elevator company were to deposit $6,000 a year to meet the interest. The guarantee was interest at 3 per cent. This agreement contemplates a change from that. It authorizes only $100,000, $75,000 to be guaranteed for the elevator and $25,000 to be guaranteed for the continuation of the marine tower. It is purely a domestic matter between the harbour commissioners and the Great Northern Railway Company for the building of this elevator at Quebec.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. COX—Will this in any way affect the interest on the outstanding bonds of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They guarantee the interest at 3 per cent on the bonds of the Great Northern Railway so far as the Quebec grain elevator is concerned. They have a lien on that for the $200,000, as well as the interest, and the hon. gentleman will see that they are to make a deposit in the bank.

The second paragraph of the agreement reads as follows :

2. The second paragraph of the seventh clause of the contract of June 30, 1899, above referred to, beginning with the words 'it is also agreed if the said earnings aggregate an amount exceeding 6 per cent,' &c., and ending with the words 'shall be used to pay such interest as may be due on the bonds,' is hereby abrogated and eliminated from the contract, and the following substituted therefor: The said company shall, out of the first surplus earnings, deposit in a bank to the joint order of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners and the company, a sum of $12,000, to be applied to the payment of the interest on the bonds guaranteed by the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, and shall maintain the said sum of $12,000, provided, however, that such deposit shall not be required if the elevator be leased to the Great Northern Railway Company, on condition that the railway company shall pay a rental sufficient to pay the interest on all bonds guaranteed by the Quebec Harbour Commissioners and a sinking fund for such bonds.

Hon. Mr. COX—The point I was anxious about was whether entering into this guarantee would make it a prior claim upon the revenue of the harbour to the interest on their outstanding bonds. I do not know whether there is any hon. gentleman who could give that information.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think this is a first preference under the Act passed in 1898. I think it is part of an amount of $365,000 that the Quebec Harbour Commissioners were authorized to issue under a statute some years ago and which stands before the government lien. It is a first lien. I do not suppose it would supersede any charge outside the government lien.

Hon. Mr. COX—If this were a prior charge to the interest on the $365,000, bond——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is part of that.

Hon. Mr. COX—I do not then understand how that can be. These bonds are held in Toronto and if this was a prior charge to the interest on the bonds to which I refer, I do not think it ought to pass in that way without some consideration and explanation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This supersedes the Act passed in 1889. In that Act of 1899 the provision is :

All amounts payable by the corporation under a guarantee provided for by the said agreement shall be a charge upon the revenues of the corporation, and shall have the same priority of payment as the interest on the debentures or bonds which the corporation is authorized hereafter to issue under an Act passed during the present session of parliament, entitled 'An Act to amend and Consolidate the Act relating to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners.'

Hon. Mr. COX—That refers to the bonds of the railway company. I am speaking of the bonds of the harbour commissioners.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is what I read : it is a charge upon the harbour. When were the bonds issued to which the hon. gentleman refers ?

Hon. Mr. COX—I do not know. It was an issue of $865,000, but they were a first charge prior to the government charge.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then this does not supersede it in any way ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is the point. We had two Bills last year on the subject. The first was a consolidation of existing statutes, a complete and perfect consolidation. I remember going into that matter very closely at that time, and we were perfectly satisfied that the government's position with regard to the harbour commissioners was not affected. It was only consolidating existing statutes. Then we had a short Bill towards the end of the session on the subject, and I think we satisfied ourselves on that occasion that we were not putting the government in an inferior position as far as their claim on the harbour commissioners stood from what it occupied before.

Hon. Mr. COX—What is the effect of this section ? Does it make the bonds referred to here rank differently from what they did in the Bill of last year ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I see in section 2, a provision that the guarantee of interest mentioned in the said agreement and memorandum of agreement shall be a preferential charge upon the revenues of the commissioners, after the expenses provided for in paragraphs 1 and 2 of section 36 of chapter 34 of the Statutes of 1889, and after the capital and interest of the bonds authorized by chapter 48 of the statutes of 1898, and by section 35 of chapter 34 of the statutes of 1899.

I do not think there is any difference in the ranking of these bonds.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will read the ranking fixed by the statute to which the hon. gentleman has referred. It is as follows :

The lawful charges upon the revenue of the corporation arising from all sources whatever shall be as follows, and shall be paid in the following order:

(1) All necessary expenses incurred in collecting said revenue and the indispensable expenses of management.

(2) Necessary expenses attendant on keeping the wharfs and other works and property of the corporation in a thorough state of repair.

(3) The principal and interest on all debentures and bonds issued by the corporation under the provisions of chapter 48 of the statutes of 1898, or of this Act.

The bonds referred to by the hon. gentleman were under one or the other.

Hon. Mr. COX—Yes, under the statutes of 1898.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—And they came in before the government claim and the government came next.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The ranking of the bonds is not affected by this ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not an issue directly. They take security on the elevator. They have the double security. They have the security of the elevator company and the security of the Great Northern Railway Company, for whom the elevator was built, and I notice by the agreement that the elevator was to be insured and they guaranteed the interest on it. I assume the property is worth what it represents. I do not think the status of the bonds will be affected.

Hon. Mr. COX—I wanted to make sure of that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The bonds are referred to in the next item.

Hon. Mr. COX—Yes, those are the bonds.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment. The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (195) 'An Act further to amend the Act respecting the judges of provincial courts.'

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This Bill consists of a single section. It has reference to the courts of the Montreal district. In the circuit court of Montreal there are three judges. The senior judge has hitherto been paid the same salary as the others, and this Bill contains the proposition to pay the senior judge $600 more than is paid to either of his colleagues. It will make his salary $3,600, instead of $3,000.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—What justifies the introduction of a Bill increasing the salary of one of the judges in the courts of one of the districts of Montreal without taking into consideration at the same time the necessity for increasing the salaries of the other judges ? What emergency has arisen?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear !

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No emergency has arisen at all, but the court has been treated the same, I suppose, as a chief justice would be treated in the other courts. In the other courts there is the court en banc, and the presiding judge is absolutely necessary when the court sits in that capacity. In the circuit court of Montreal the judges discharge their duties as separate judges. They do not sit en banc, and so the salary of the senior judge is not raised quite to the position of that of a chief justice.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—But if they do not sit en banc, what reason, what necessity, what excuse can be given for increasing the salary and creating this disparity in the salaries of judges who have concurrent status and concurrent power in the circuit court of Montreal ? It appears to me such a Bill as this is inopportune at least on the very last day of the session. Very strong reasons should exist for such a Bill, and I am certain the hon. Minister of Justice will not persist in urging that Bill upon the attention of the Senate at this stage of the session and under the circumstances, no necessity existing for creating this distinction. I am sure the hon. Minister of Justice will allow the Bill to drop.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the 41st rule of the Senate be suspended in so far as the same relates to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I object.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the hon. minister should be prepared to accede to the request of the hon. gentleman from Missisquoi. In a case of this kind, where it is proposed to increase the salary of a judge, or any one else, some reason should be given. The only reason the hon. Minister of Justice has given is that he, being the senior, should be placed in the same position in regard to that court that the chief justice occupies in regard to the other court. What may be the necessity for that I do not know, and the hon. member from Missisquoi has asked a very proper and legitimate question, and I think, at this late stage in the session, that the government should not introduce a Bill affecting the judges when we know that all the judges in the whole Dominion have been clamoring for years for an increase of salary. There was an increase proposed and provided for in the Bill which we had before us the other day, and that clause which was rejected was the clause creating three new judges. But there was an increase given to some other judge of an inferior rank to that of a judge of the Queen's Bench or the other courts, and in this case we are simply asked to increase the salary of one judge without any explanation further than the fact that he is senior to the other. The lawyers must be the best judges of whether that is a good reason.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We recognize that in Ontario. The senior judge of the county court receives $2,400, and the junior judge $2,000, but his salary gradually increases until it reaches $2,400. So that practically their jurisdiction is quite as distinct and separate as the jurisdiction of the circuit judges referred to in the Bill. There is that principle that seniority always counts for something. It gives increase; in time the other two judges will get their increase.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In Ontario we have a senior county court judge and a junior, and when the junior county court judge is appointed, his salary is lower than that paid to the senior judge. Then the Secretary of State says that that salary is gradually increased until it is the same as the salary of the senior judge. I was not aware of that before, unless it is done by special vote. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that there is a law upon the statute-book which guarantees to the junior judge an annual increase?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know whether the increase is annual, but in time it reaches $2,400.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then I am correct that he is not entitled to an increase unless it is specially provided by a vote in parliament.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No. Under the law formerly the junior judge got $2,000. I think it now begins at $2,000 and runs up to $2,400.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In Toronto and Hamilton I think they are paid more.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Last year I carried through a Bill putting the junior judges on exactly the same footing as the others. They received $2,000 for the first two years and the third year they received $2,400, the same as the senior judges.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As far as the labour is concerned, the junior judges generally do the most of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then the senior judges have the probate duties to discharge and they receive, according to the amount of probate business to be done in the different counties, a salary for the discharge of their probate duties which adds sometimes as much as a thousand dollars to their salary.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Bill has been read the first time and the hon. member from Stadacona objects to the suspension of the rules, so that there is nothing before the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the Bill be read a second time to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTION LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—May I ask the leader of the House if there is any prospect of prorogation soon?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The two Bills that we have sent back have yet to be considered by the House of Commons, and we have yet to know what their action will be—whether they will accept the amendments of the Senate, or drop the Bills for the present session.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should regret very much if the House of Commons were to drop the Election Bill on account of the numerous amendments.

Nineteen-twentieths of them were proposed by the hon. Minister of Justice himself, and all the amendments were accepted by the government except two, one relating to Prince Edward Island, and the other to the franchise in the city of Toronto. It would be a great misfortune if we are to have another election, and all the doors are to be left open that existed in the past, for frauds because the House of Commons might not be in accord with these amendments. I am quite sure that, however anxious we may be to have these amendments adopted, the Senate will be quite prepared to go any length almost in order to obtain an election law which would, as far as at all practicable, secure a correct and much more pure election than we have had in the past. These are the only two important amendments of which I have any recollection. All the others were accepted by the government except those two. I understood they have run against a snag, and I am not at all surprised. The numerous amendments made to the Bill may possibly have introduced some incongruities of a minor character in working it out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I hope not, because the hon. gentleman gave a great deal of attention to it and tried to bring each clause into harmony with the others, but it appears there is a defect in the clause relating to soldiers, especially to those in garrisons. If the House of Commons thought that necessary to be amended, the Senate would not object to it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think there is any incongruity in that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—One of the ministers told my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) that he had run across a snag in connection with it. A few words will set that right, and I sincerely hope they will not reject the Bill altogether on account of the amendments. Let us have consideration of it again, and perhaps by conference and mutual concessions we can arrive at a decision which will be beneficial to the country and an improvement to the Bill itself.

The Senate rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS.

PROGRESS OF BUSINESS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have made inquiries as to the progress of business in the House of Commons, and ascertained that nothing will be sent up to us this evening. The Election Bill has been disposed of, and will be ready to submit to the Senate in the morning at ten o'clock. The Supply Bill is at present before the House of Commons, and will be passed to-night, and will also be submitted to us to-morrow morning. I was told by Sir John Bourinot, clerk of the House of Commons, that there would be no delay—that all these measures will be before us promptly at ten o'clock to-morrow. I therefore move:

That when the Senate adjourns this day it do stand adjourned until to-morrow, and there be three distinct sittings on that day, the first of such sittings to be at ten o'clock in the forenoon, and to continue until one o'clock in the afternoon, unless the Senate be sooner adjourned; the second of such sittings to begin at three o'clock in the afternoon and continue until six o'clock, unless the Senate be sooner adjourned; and the third of such sittings to begin at eight o'clock until such time as the Senate adjourns.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Could the Minister of Justice inform us, or has he any idea, what the Commons has done in reference to accepting or rejecting the amendments which were made in the Senate to the Election Bill? I understand that all the amendments made by the Senate have been adopted by the Commons except those relating to Prince Edward Island, and also the amendment moved by the hon. minister himself in reference to the North-west Territories. If those are the only amendments the members of the Senate would be better able to judge what course to take to-morrow when the Bill comes before us.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know of any others.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

DOMINION ELECTIONS BILL.

AMENDMENTS NOT INSISTED ON.

A message was received from the House of Commons to return Bill (133), 'An Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of members to the House of Commons,' and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Commons agreed to the 1st and 3rd to 45th inclusive, and 54th to 87th inclusive of the amendments made by the Senate to he said Bill, and that they disagreed to the others, as follows :

To the 2nd amendment to the said Bill for the following reason :

'That it is unnecessary and would render the working of the North-west Territories Representation Act cumbersome.'

And to the 46th, 47th, 48th, 49th, 50th, 51st, 52nd and 53rd amendments to the said Bill for the following reasons :

1. Because the Controverted Elections Act already makes ample and proper provision for the scrutiny before two judges of the Supreme Court of all objected votes polled in Prince Edward Island under conditions which assure to all interested parties, electors and candidates, the amplest guarantees that the rights of the voters will be examined into and determined on after proper notices given.

2. Because the addition to the powers of the county court judge of holding a scrutiny in conjunction with the recount will prolong the proceedings to an undesirable length, and will raise serious question of conflict of jurisdiction between the county court judge under this Act, and the judges of the Supreme Court under the Controverted Elections Act.

3. Because the addition of a scrutiny to a recount is inadvisable and takes away from the parties who may consider themselves aggrieved, any right of appeal from the decision of the county court judge.

4. Because the provisions in the amendment for a scrutiny are inadequate and do not provide for the giving of proper notices to the parties interested, of the votes to be attacked, and because it is difficult if not impossible, to make provision within the time in which a recount should be held for the giving of such notices and procuring the necessary evidence against or in support of such votes, and the expenses of such an election scrutiny would be largely in excess of the suggested deposit.

5. Because the acceptance of the amendment leaves it open for the same questions to be adjudicated upon first by the county court judge and afterwards under the Controverted Elections Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I move that the Senate do not insist upon the amendments to which the House of Commons have taken exception.

Hon. Mr. MILLS.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I thought there was only one amendment that they did not accept.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are several—all those relating to Prince Edward Island and the amendments relating to the North-west Territories. I am sorry that they have not concurred in the amendments relating to the North-west Territories, because the reason shows that they are labouring under a misapprehension.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are not in any way, by that amendment, interfering with the provisions made in the North-west Territories Act in respect to elections. There is one provision in the North-west Territories Act which we, by the Bill, undertake to amend, and that is one which says that section 67 in the old Act, paragraphs a, b and h of section 2, subsection 1 of section 20, and sections 66, 67, 73 to 88 both inclusive, and 90 to 99 both inclusive, 100 and 101 and others mentioned here, which are parts of the Dominion Elections Act, shall be incorporated into the North-west Territories Act. The whole of that Act has been repealed. We have substituted this Bill, if it becomes law, for it. The order of the sections is altogether changed. Therefore, what we did in the section which we added to the Act was to substitute it for this provision of the North-west Territories Act, making no change whatever, but naming the new sections which are not in the order in which they stand in the old Bill. So that I will not say at this moment how they are going to carry out the North-west Territories Act when this most important provision which incorporates the old law has practically been repealed. There will be great inconvenience, even if it continues law for the purpose of the North-west Territories, to look up the provisions of the new Act. They are somewhat modified and the numbers of the sections are altogether different, and it was a matter of convenience that it should have been in.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That section is repealed, is it ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is struck out. I acquiesce in that provision. Of course it affects the other House and not this House and therefore they must ultimately be the judges of what is best in their own interests. I therefore move that the Senate do not insist upon those amendments to which the Commons have taken exception.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman from Marshfield has not yet arrived, and I would ask the hon. minister if he would move concurrence in the first amendment to which the Commons object, and postpone the second of those amendments affecting Prince Edward Island, as the hon. gentleman from Marshfield desires to say something upon the subject. While on my feet I may say I was strongly reminded, when I heard the speech of the hon. Minister of Justice, of that trite and correct saying of the Psalmist, 'Behold how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity.' We have the Minister of Justice contending in the most solemn way that his proposed amendment to the Election law affecting the North-west Territories is right and proper. In the House of Commons last night his first lieutenant, the Solicitor General——

Hon. Mr. BAKER—His running mate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—His running mate—no, I should judge he was the off-ox and a balky one at that. When his attention was called to the fact that the amendment was proposed by his chief, the Minister of Justice, his reply was: 'I don't care who did it; I am responsible for this Bill.' It is another happy illustration of that unity under responsible government that prevails among the gentlemen who control the destinies of Canada at the present moment. We have had exhibitions of this kind over and over again, and, as I have had some little experience in the past of having colleagues bucking against one another, he will know how deeply I sympathize with him in his present situation; but when an underling directs and controls and sets at defiance the will, the opinion and the ripe judgment of his master, why, of course, we on this side of the House, and those who like to see unity of action, cannot view it without regret. I speak feelingly on that point, as the hon. gentleman can readily understand. Had I not gone through the same mill, I probably would not have had such deep sympathy with the hon. gentleman, but under the circumstances, whatever may have occurred, I have no recollection of any other illustration, during the long time which both of us have been in parliament, of ministers in the same government, if not in the same cabinet, running amuck against each other almost every day. However, that is a matter within the family. I have no desire to enter into the little disagreements among them in their family circles, but let me hope, for the sake of the dignity of the position held by the hon. Minister of Justice, that he will in future teach his underlings not to throw out insinuations and insults of the character of those thrown out two or three times during the present session.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do no object to deferring the further consideration of this Bill. I may say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that I have no doubt he speaks feelingly, but we have no family quarrels as he had. My hon. friend had a serious quarrel in the family, but I am not disposed to express any opinion upon it. I remember on one occasion hearing an old gentleman tell how he undertook to put an end to the quarrel between a man and his wife, and he got struck over the head with a pan and his head went through, and he had to walk five miles to a blacksmith shop to get it cut off—but we have no quarrel.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman can have no personal quarrel with the cabinet council simply for the reason that they never consult each other. Their difficulties arise from each one acting his own part and playing off his own bat. I am very glad to hear that the hon. gentleman has no quarrel; I hope that he will continue to live in harmony and peace. I do not propose to put myself in the position of the man who got thrashed for interfering in the quarrel between man and wife. The members of the cabinet can go on and quarrel till doomsday, and I will not interfere, but will congratulate them on the unanimity of feeling which exists, and has existed all along, if we are to judge from the utterances of ministers in the lower House and in this House.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—I am not disposed to offer a single word to intensify the awkward situation which is disclosed by the remarks which have fallen from the Minister of Justice, but I think it is a pity that such a state of things should be disclosed. The hon. gentleman who leads the government in this House is the responsible head of the department, and it is a pity that he did not offer the very substantial argument to his colleagues that he used in this House. I say that it is a pity that such a state of things should be disclosed in a matter emanating from the office of which the hon. gentleman is the head and that his amendment should have met with such a singular rebuff. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that I believe the Minister of Justice is right, and that his opinion ought to prevail in the cabinet and in the House of Commons. Of course, there is nothing more to be said about it. After submitting his argument he has moved that it be overridden. I do not wish to intensify the awkwardness of the situation, but I think it is a pity that such a situation should have been disclosed in this House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to.

THE DISCHARGE OF COL. HUGHES.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called, would the hon. minister inform us if there is any reason assigned for the dispensing with the services of Col. Hughes in South Africa ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not a word.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I noticed the Premier stated last night that he had no official knowledge, but it is stated in this morning's Citizen that a conversation took place afterwards between him and the gentleman who asked the question, thereby leaving the impression that he knew something that was not official. We are all interested, of course, in our own volunteers in South Africa, and it would be a matter of satisfaction to the people if we could have any information on the subject.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, there is nothing.

THE DEATH OF LIEUT. BORDEN.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to take this opportunity to express for myself, and I think for all of us in the Senate, our deep sympathy with the hon. Minister of Militia in the loss of his son. Of course we all know what may follow from war: It is either the grave or victory. In this case, one of our bright young officers has been called to his long home in a recent battle, in which he displayed a bravery characteristic of his race. I do not wish to say more than to express my own deep sympathy with the hon. Minister of Militia and his wife, in the loss they have sustained, a sentiment which I am sure will be echoed by every one in Canada.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I thank my hon. friend for his kind words of sympathy for a colleague. Every one who knew Lieut. Borden speaks very highly of him. He certainly made a very good impression on every one with whom he came in contact. Kind and conciliatory in disposition and courageous, as a young man he was an ideal officer, and I am sure every one in the country will regret that his career should be so suddenly brought to an end, and feel all the keener sympathy for the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence when he remembers that it is his only son who has thus been sacrificed.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State if he has at last found the documents he was searching for with such activity and interest on the Manitoba school question. There were two or three documents laid aside one day on the table of the Privy Council. It was intimated that they were lost, but they happened to fall under the eye of the hon. Secretary of State another day. They had never been brought before this House in answer to the address to His Excellency, adopted by the Senate for the bringing down of these documents. I should be happy if, before we part, he would leave us those documents as a souvenir. They might be useful in future days, if only to show that the hon. minister is always disposed to do what the House asks him to do. He cannot refuse such production on the ground that such documents are of a confidential character, because I happened to see, in a few documents which have been produced to this House, that confidential letters of his own were published. I would ask that the same rule apply to these. If his own confidential correspondence with the ex-Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia could be published, I should think he would not refuse the House the satsifaction of perusing the letters I refer to, be they confidential or not, since they have reached, in an official way, the government of the country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am sorry that I am unable to gratify my hon. friend, but I think if I did bring down every document that might be in the Privy Council, or the office of the hon. Secretary of State, or in any other office, there is not a particle that is new in any of them. The last documents were brought down last session. There was one document addressed to His Excellency, or the Premier, which I was going to bring down, but the Premier said to me that he had received a letter from the authority who sent him this document that it was not intended to be made public. The document I may say, however, for the information of my hon. friend, did not contain anything new. I myself think it has already been published. All the letters connected with it went to the press in Manitoba and have been published from time to time, and there is really nothing recent, or even, if I could bring anything down, that would throw additional light on the subject. The last petitions were brought down the end of last session—petitions from some parties disapproving of the law and from others approving of the law.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, we received those petitions.

THE DEATH SENTENCES OF DUBE AND CAZES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The other day I asked in this House for the correspondence exchanged between the Department of Justice and parties outside in relation to the execution of Dubé, and the reprieve of Cazes, and I asked particularly for the reports of the judges in these two cases. I was answered by the hon. Minister of Justice that the report of the judges could not fairly be laid before the House. At the same time, while I was asking that question, the Quebec press was publishing the report of the judge in the Dubé matter. I claim that the Senate should be favoured as well as the public in general, and that we should get these reports in an official way from the Department of Justice. I know the reports in the Dubé and Cazes cases did not come from the Minister of Justice, but as they are now before the public, I should like that the address voted by the House of Commons be supplemented by that part of the address for which I moved in this House, and that we should be put in possession of the reports on the two cases.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I shall communicate with the judge, and if he consents, seeing that the reports have been made public, I will have no objection to bringing them down, although I think it is very unfortunate that a judge's report should be published, for this reason, that if we once commence publishing confidential reports which the judges make, we will get very much less frank and full information from them. What I understand the Quebec press published was, not the judge's report, but the judge's reference to his charge to the jury in his report. What he said he had charged the jury was given, and that is all. Usually we get the charge of the judge to the jury, accompanying the papers, but in these cases, they did not accompany the papers, and that quotation from the report as to what he said in his charge to the jury was the only thing, so far as I know, that was given to the press. If his charge had been given, of course, it might have been published. There is nothing to communicate to the public, therefore, more than the judge himself communicated in his charge.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. gentleman did not see what I saw published in the Quebec press. It is not the charge to the jury, but the report made by the judge to the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—An extract?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The whole report.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have not seen that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am stating the fact. It was the whole report made by the judge in the case written to the Minister of Justice that was published. It was not an extract, nor was it the charge to the jury, but the whole report. I concur in the remarks made by the Minister of Justice as to the advisability of not publishing the reports, because it might in the future prevent the government from having full reports, perhaps, on matters of the kind, and in the public interest, those reports should not be published, but I am asking for the production of what has already been published, and I am only asking that this House be put on the same footing as the public in general. If anybody should know anything about the matter, it is the parliament of Canada, and it is because the public have that report, I am asking for it. That is my only reason.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I shall communicate with the judge, and if he assents, I will produce it. Notwithstanding what has been published, I would not, myself, take the responsibility of bringing down a confidential report without the sanction of the judge who made it.

POST OFFICE, MONTMAGNY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I shall now address myself to the colleague of the Minister of Justice. An address was voted some time ago, in the month of March, I think, calling for the production of all the documents and correspondence relating to the post office at Montmagny. The site has been secured, and the different title deeds have been ordered to be produced. In answer to that address I have a number of documents, but, as I have remarked to the hon. Secretary of State, there are some important papers missing. He promised to look into the matter. I suppose the amount of work this session has prevented him from doing so, but now that we are going to give him a little leisure, I hope he will have time to find out those titles to the property, and that he will be good enough to have them produced here in order that the return may be completed. It is in relation to the sale by parties in Montmagny to the government of a site for a public building.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If it rests with me, the hon. gentleman may be assured that the documents will be brought down. Certainly there can be no object in withholding documents relating to the title. The department furnished all they had at the time. It is possible that the title deeds would be with the notary who prepared the abstract.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I know there is a copy in the Public Works Department.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall be glad to make further inquiry.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I share in the joy of the hon. minister.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS BILL.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (195) 'An Act further to amend the Act respecting the judges of provincial courts.'

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I object to this item. The Bill is not printed in French.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the hon. gentleman persists in his point of order, I regret very much the Bill cannot be proceeded with. The responsibility will rest with the hon. gentleman of having defeated the measure.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I take that responsibility, but the hon. minister will be good enough to share it. If the Bill is not printed in French, it is not my fault. If I defend my rights I take that responsibility, and I maintain my objection.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the long experience I have had in the Senate, it is the first time I have heard at the end of the session an objection taken on the point that a Bill is not printed in French.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—A Bill of seven lines.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If my hon. friend really required to understand the Bill in the mother language, I could appreciate his motives, but he understands it quite as well in the language in which it is printed, as if it were in French, and, therefore, he simply takes advantage of a technical point to defeat the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do take advantage of it. It is my right. I do not want to shelter myself behind any ignorance of the English language, but I take the position boldly that I object to the Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—All right, next order.

ELECTION LAW AMENDMENT BILL—SENATE INSISTS ON ITS AMENDMENTS.

The House resumed consideration of the Senate amendment to section 90 of Bill (133) 'An Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of members of the House of Commons.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I wish to submit some reasons to the House why we should insist on our amendment to section 90 of this Bill. It is essential to the proper working out of the Act in Prince Edward Island that these amendments should be agreed to, and I think I shall be able to show hon. gentlemen that they should form part of the Bill. This amendment is simply to put Prince Edward Island in the same position with regard to judicial inquiry into votes as all other provinces of Canada. When the list is made up, there is a judicial settlement of the right of parties to vote. That is the mode which prevails in all the other parts of Canada. In Prince Edward Island, there is no list; there is open voting for provincial purposes, and it works well. There is no feeling in the province to change it. You could not induce the legislature of the province to change it. Lists were used at one time, and after two or three years' experience they were abolished. But the difficulty with which we are concerned in this matter arises out of the policy of the present government in adopting a provincial franchise for federal purposes. In doing that in Prince Edward Island, they are attempting to do a very difficult thing, an almost incongruous thing, and that is, connecting a condition of things where there is no voters' lists with the ballot. Hon. gentlemen can see, in discussing the proposition about the unorganized districts of the province of Quebec, that when the making of the list is practically settled on the polling day, there is no provision for objecting, and afterwards scrutinizing, the bad votes that may be offered. The ballot box might be filled, in some cases, with bad votes. When the government introduced the Franchise Bill in 1898, I pointed that out in this House, and the reasons I advanced were sufficiently strong to convince the government and both branches of parliament that some remedy was necessary. It was agreed to that where a vote offered that way was objected to, the objection would be entered on the poll book, the ballot paper would be numbered, and the corresponding number put on the poll book—that the ballot papers would find their way into separate envelopes, and it was provided that a demand might be made for an investigation of these votes at the recount. That was the provision inserted in the Franchise Act of 1898 to meet the position of Prince Edward Island. The government, in consolidating the Election Act, repeal the Franchise Act of 1898, and fail to introduce in the Bill this year the all-important provision, that an appeal should be had to the county court judge for an inquiry into those votes after the election. I have shown the House the necessity that exists for this provision, and I have shown hon. gentlemen that this principle was conceded two years ago, and has been conceded all through the Act this year, in the marking and initialling of a ballot, and leading up to an investigation later on.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is the law now.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, until this law is passed. It is true we did not, possibly, effect all we aimed at in the Act of 1898. The amendments were put in, for reasons which need not be recounted to-day, in a hurry, and it is doubtful, more than doubtful, whether we gave the county court jurisdiction to do that, but it was the intention of parliament to give that jurisdiction. The crucial amendment here is the Act of 1898, that is, that one of the grounds for a recount should be, in Prince Edward Island, that where persons not qualified to vote, had voted——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Where is the Franchise Act repealed?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—All these clauses are repealed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Franchise Act is not repealed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON. Every one of these provisions is repealed in the Bill before us, from section 11 to the end—all relating to Prince Edward Island fall to the ground, and it is only proposed to re-enact part of them, and those are the sections relating to the initialling and marking of ballots. We are met now with this argument: Oh, it is not necessary to give the county court jurisdiction, because it can be dealt with by the Supreme Court under the Controverted Elections Act. I want hon. gentlemen to follow me on this point. I submit it cannot be so dealt with, because if a candidate is counted out, with a small number of bad votes against him, and it is necessary to proceed under the Controverted Elections Act, he must claim the seat. It is a proceeding to get the seat which he believes he was rightly elected to by a majority of good votes. He must put up a thousand dollars. The moment he claims that seat, his opponent can take advantage of the Controverted Elections Act, to raise any other questions he pleases, without putting up any deposits.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman says 'hear, hear.' Perhaps it is useless to appeal to my hon. friend, but I am sure it is not useless to appeal to the House as a whole. Would any man put up his thousand dollars and proceed in that way, if he simply laid the foundation for his opponent to attack him on every ground, without putting up a deposit ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He does that in every contest.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would ask my hon. friend to look into this question a little, and know something about it before he makes those inconsequential remarks. This is a different contest from the rest. The contest rises over these rejected votes, and bears no analogy or resemblance to petitions in ordinary cases.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I want to ask the hon. gentleman a question for information. I should like to know whether, in the provincial law, there is any provision of this kind—whether, if a man goes up to vote and his vote is objected to, there is any provision that that question shall be tried out when the votes are counted, or if there is any method of going over the result of the polling, as the hon. gentleman now proposes he should have under the law ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I shall reach that point later on, but just to clear the mind of the hon. gentleman, I will leave the question I was discussing, and settle the point with my hon. friend, before I proceed any further.

There are all necessary provisions in the provincial law for objecting to votes. Hon. gentlemen will see this difference at once. There are no lists, and consequently everything is open as the day, and these votes are scrutinized and objected to, and a man knows exactly how the election is going, whether the vote is against him or whether it is not. All that is apparent as it goes along, and that being the case in the provincial law, there is a remedy as you go along which is not provided in this Bill, where you are connecting incongruous things—that is a condition of things where there is no voters' lists with a ballot. Then, further on, I may say in reply to my hon. friend, there is a scrutiny provided before the sheriff under the provincial law. It is a very partial and a very inefficient one I admit, and it not before a judge, but we propose now, when we make a scrutiny, that we will make it efficient, and that we shall make it before a judge, and there is no reason, because the local law is faulty, why we should follow its faults, and when we provide for one we provide for one before a judicial authority, and even if there were the provisions for a scrutiny in a provincial law, the cases are not analogous, because the Provincial Controverted Elections Act is not framed on the same lines as the Dominion Controverted Elections Act. It does not provide for putting up any cash. You put in security for $600. Altogether there are no analogies between the cases. I have made this point clear, I think, to every member of this House, that it is a perfect absurdity to put all these provisions into the Act calling for the initialling and numbering of ballots, and the keeping of them in separate envelopes, and it is really a blemish in the Act having that put in, unless some good purpose can be served in the way of having an investigation, and I submit, as I have shown hon. gentlemen that there can be no investigation, it should end under these provisions. Let me say here that I am not divulging anything private or confidential, because my friend the Solicitor General referred to the circumstance that I am now going to speak of in another place, and he referred to it properly. I have no fault to find with the statement he made. The point I made is freely conceded by the Solicitor General and by the Minister of Fisheries, that by putting up his deposit and claiming his seat, the petitioner is simply doing the work of the other side, and preparing for his own defeat, and a great amount of cost, and cannot accomplish his purpose. As a remedy for this, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has suggested to me that he might amend the Controverted Elections Act by a very short amendment, which would have the effect of making that Act apply, thus doing away with the difficulty I have referred to; and I may say further, that Sir Lous Davies sent me a copy of the Bill that he drafted with that object in view. On looking over the Bill I saw at once that it created another difficulty even greater than the one that it was intended to remove. It provided for a limited inquiry, so that the person who is counted out on these objected votes could file a petition for an investigation on these votes, and these votes only, and the court could not go beyond that. On the face of it, that entirely met my objections, but the effect of it would be, that the candidate who was returned would be deprived of his right of petition on general grounds. He would have no right to file a petition against his own return. His opponent files a petition on the last day, and he would be unable to file a petition in reply, and it would be fought out on these grounds alone. The returned member would be debarred from filing a petition under the Controverted Elections Act to bring up the question of corrupt practices and all other questions. It is inherent to the proper solution of it that both should have their rights, that the man who is counted out by a few bad votes should have a simple and feasible way of getting that question settled without putting up a thousand dollars deposit and furnishing the ground for the other side to attack him without putting up anything at all, and it is equally necessary that the rights of the returned member should be secured to him. The provision which was proposed to remedy the difficulty created another one quite as serious as the original difficulty. It became painfully evident to any one who would look into it that you could not make the Controverted Elections Act suit that case without a considerable amount of time to consider the necessary provisions and without a pretty elaborate law. The very fact that the Solicitor General and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries suggested an amendment such as I have indicated to the House shows conclusively that they see the difficulty and admit the full force of the objection that I have been offering. I may say, further, before I leave it, that the Solicitor General, as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition may remember very well, and Sir Louis Davies, when we held an informal conference in his room in 1898, when the Franchise Act was under consideration, the Solicitor General then told the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that in his opinion this proposition was a very reasonable one and should be acceded to, and that advice was followed and the amendment was accepted. That is the amendment we are now proposing and elaborating, removing many of the objections offered against it at that time. In the conversation I had with the Solicitor General, he said to me that if the Minister of Marine and Fisheries withdrew his objection to this amendment, he would be quite willing to accept it, and he gave me authority to say that to Sir Louis Davies. I want to point out that the Controverted Elections Act was never designed to deal with such a case as this.

It could not have been designed to deal with it, because in the whole Dominion of Canada at the passing of that Act up to this moment—until the Dominion Franchise Act was passed—no condition could arise in which the qualification of the voter could be assailed under the Controverted Elections Act. Therefore, the framers of the Controverted Elections Act never had in their minds any such idea that that Act could apply to a case like this. That Act has nothing to do with it, unless the amendments we are now making, would make it so, of which I have some doubt. Unless these amendments would do it, they would have no right to enter into the qualification of any voter in Canada under the Controverted Elections Act. There is only one case in which the name of a voter can come up at all, and that is on a charge of personation. A man comes into a poll and says he is John Smith, and he is given a ballot and votes. Subsequently the real John Smith comes in and takes the oath, and that ballot is initialled and numbered. That question would come up under the Controverted Elections Act, but the only question would be, whether it was the real John Smith. The question whether he was qualified to vote was settled when the list was made. Assuming under this Bill we are passing, and the Franchise Act of 1898, that the Controverted Elections Act would have application to such cases as this, I want to point out, as I have pointed out, that the remedy that it would apply, would be no remedy at all, that the man would be defeated in his application, from the fact that he would have to claim the seat as a necessary ingredient to the charge of bad votes being recorded against him, and by putting up the deposit he would be doing his opponent's work, and no man with any brains would do that, and consequently there is no remedy unless we pass the amendments I propose. I will offer some further objections. Admitting for argument's sake, that the Controverted Elections Act would apply to this case, what have we got? We have a great deal of delay. The question as to who has the majority of good votes is an unsettled question. A petition is being filed, and it is being fought out under the Controverted Elections Act. We have all this fighting going on about preliminary objections, and it might occupy weeks and weeks going over that. There would be filing particulars and fixing day of trial, and making rules of court. All this we know is a magnificent machine for lawyers, out of which they make large fees, and despoil poor, unfortunate candidates who get into the clutches of the law. All that would be involved in settling the simple question, whether John Smith was a qualified voter or not, which I say is settled in all the other provinces in Canada in a summary way when the list is made up, before the county court judge, and which we now say should be settled in the province of Prince Edward Island in a summary way in regard to these disputed votes after the election is over. Some strange reasons have been given by the House of Commons for disagreeing to the amendments. The first reason I have fully dealt with in my remarks. It is as follows:

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.

1. Because the 'Controverted Elections Act' already makes ample and proper provision for the scrutiny before two judges of the Supreme Court of all objected votes polled in Prince Edward Island under conditions which assure to all interested parties, electors and candidates, the amplest guarantees that the rights of the voters will be examined into and determined on after proper notices given.

The remarks I have already made entirely disprove that statement. The second reason reads:

2. Because the addition to the powers of the county court judge of holding a scrutiny in conjunction with the recount will prolong the proceedings to an undesirable length, and will raise serious questions of conflict of jurisdiction between the county court judge under this Act, and the judges of the Supreme Court under the 'Controverted Elections Act.'

I ask hon. gentlemen to consider, for a moment, whether the proceedings are more likely to be prolonged under the Controverted Elections Act, with a battle going on between lawyers on preliminary objections and rules of court, and fixing date of trial, and filing affidavits for months; or whether the matter is more likely to be prolonged by a simple inquiry, which is to be taken fifteen days after the election, and continued until it is through, which would not be more than two or three days altogether—whether the matter is more likely to be prolonged in that way, than by waiting before you proceed at all, to see if the Controverted Elections Act can be invoked—and I think it is impossible to invoke it—and then go on and fight a battle for months and months as we know is the practice. I am surprised to hear the other point raised, that it raises a serious question of conflict between the jurisdiction of the county court judge, and the judges of the Supreme Court under the Controverted Elections Act. The fact that that statement was made convinces me that the gentlemen who framed these reasons have not looked into the question seriously.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is imposible that that reason could be given if the gentlemen had looked into it. Everything we are providing to be done by the county court judge is done before the return is made. My hon. friend from Bedford (Mr. Baker) knows that you cannot start a petition until you have a return to petition against. How can there be a conflict of jurisdiction between the two courts when what the one has to do must be completed before the jurisdiction of the other begins?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not necessarily at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If the hon. Minister of Justice would consult the Solicitor General and ask him to look at the Bill and look at the dates, he will find it is so exactly. Everything the county court judge has to do under this he must do before there is a return. Anything done by the Supreme Court judges cannot be undertaken before there is a return; consequently the conflict of jurisdiction between the two is absolutely out of the question. The third reason is as follows:

3. Because the addition of a security to a recount is inadvisable and takes away from parties who may consider themselves aggrieved, any right of appeal from the decision of the county court judge.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If that is so, what we are doing now does not take that away, and there may not be an appeal from the county court judge, which I think would not be desirable at all. If the contention of these gentlemen is right, the courts could be invoked later on, and they can go over the ground, but I altogether differ from them. Practically, you cannot get before the election court, and that being the case, while theoretically it may be all right, practically you cannot have it. If the gentlemen who gave these reasons are right and you can have a trial before a superior judge, you have what is much better than an appeal. You have an independent revision of the work of the county court judge at a later period. That being so, what is there in this argument that there is no appeal? While the Controverted Elections Act never contemplated the deciding on a qualification, there being no Election law that called for that in Canada at the time the Controverted Elections Act was passed, it did provide in contested elections that you could produce the ballots and go over the work that the county court judge did in regard to the rejection or acceptance of ballots. Hon. gentlemen seem to think that is all right. Here is a duplication of work. The county court judge does that work. There is no appeal from the county court, but there is an independent decision later on, and for that purpose the Act provided for it, and there is no doubt there would be, and I submit that in both cases it is an advantage that the county court judge should know that somebody may revise his work later on, because it would make him very much more careful than he would be if he knew there was no appeal. When there is a possibility, under the Controverted Elections Act, of a case coming before the Superior Court judge, it would make the county court judge more careful, and the effect would be that we would have better decisions in the first instance. I feel that I have gone over all these points and I think I have convinced hon. gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, certainly not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman says not. The Secretary of State is generally very reasonable, but in this case, it is as one says so say all, although the hon. gentlemen do not always act on that maxim. They often get at loggerheads and contradict each other, but I think I have convinced hon. gentlemen that this amendment is essential to the working out of the provisions of the law in Prince Edward Island, and if you do not pass this amendment and provide for a judicial investigation of the votes, it would be infinitely better if every provision about initialling and marking votes were out of the law from beginning to end, because if you cannot get a judicial decision on these votes—which I think you cannot get under the Controverted Elections Act—there is a practical difficulty in the way which would prevent any man coming in and demanding an investigation on that ground alone, and that being so, we ought to go over every clause of this Bill, if this amendment is not made part of it, with regard to initialling and objecting to votes. The hon. gentlemen in the government seem to be willing to put all that in the Bill, but are not willing to give us a measure which will provide a remedy and lead up to a judicial investigation into those votes. I admit frankly that that provision would not often be invoked. No candidate would be foolish enough to invoke it except where he was sure of his ground, but the fact of having this provision under which a man who believes he was counted out by bad votes can go before the county court judge and get the question settled as to who has the majority of good votes, would have a deterrent effect upon candidates and upon their agents and upon voters at the poll, because they would know that even if they put in bad votes, there was a chance of the whole thing being undone, and the bad votes expunged. We ask that this provision shall be made perfect by adding this amendment to section 90. If that is done, we will have a good wholesome election law for Prince Edward Island, as I hope the law is for every part of Canada. I am confident the government, when they look at this matter, as they will have to look into it before they finally decide this question, will see the entire reasonableness of this amendment. They will see that there is no remedy as the Bill stands. They have admitted that by trying to amend the Controverted Elections Act to get over the difficulty. Knowing that is the case, that they have put all these provisions for initialling and numbering the ballots into the law, and that there is no practical way of ever getting it tried afterwards on its merits, I am convinced that the government will see the practical character of these amendments and accept them, having in 1898 accepted the same principle. I, therefore, move in amendment :

That the Senate doth insist on its 46th, 47th, 48th, 49th, 52nd and 53rd amendments, for the following reasons :—

1. Because it is desirable that in Prince Edward Island as in all the other provinces of Canada the candidate declared to be elected should have a majority of votes of qualified electors.

2. Because these amendments provide a simple, effective, timely and speedy mode of determining the qualification of persons whose right to vote is objected to, including all necessary provisions for notice to parties concerned, and giving ample time for taking the proceedings.

3. Because such a mode of determination is analogous to the mode adopted for all the other provinces of Canada. In those provinces the qualification of a voter is determined by the fact of the person's name being found on the list of voters and cannot be questioned in proceedings under the Controverted Elections Act. It is desirable that in Prince Edward Island also, where there are no voters' lists, the qualification or disqualification should be determined before the return is made, leaving to the operation of the Controverted Elections Act, only the decision of those questions which may properly be dealt with thereunder. A scrutiny had under that Act deals only with the validity of the ballot papers polled, not with the qualifications of the voters polling them.

4. Because the Controverted Elections Act was designed and enacted as an integral part of the election laws of Canada before the radical change made in those laws by the Franchise Act, 1898, and therefore had not, and has not now, within its purview the determination of any question as to the qualification of a voter, and, if at all, it is only by a strained construction thereof that it can be made applicable to the case which the said amendments provide for. Moreover, it lacks necessary provisions for the determination of such questions.

5. Because, even admitting that the Controverted Elections Act provides a remedy for the evils which the said amendments are intended to obviate, and this the Senate denies, nevertheless such remedy is objectionable on the following grounds :—

(a). It involves delay and is much more troublesome and expensive than the procedure proposed by the amendments.

(b). The candidate petitioning under the Controverted Elections Act for a judicial investigation of votes objected to would necessarily claim the seat, and by doing so and providing the necessary deposit he would open the door for the member returned to raise all other questions without making any deposit, and in this way the object of the petitioner would be defeated.

6. Because, even admitting that the amendments would lead to conflicts of jurisdiction between the county court judge and the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island sitting to try election petitions, and this is denied by the Senate, it is practicable, by a simple amendment to section 90 of the Bill, to provide that the decision of the county court judge as to the qualification of any person whose vote is objected to shall be final and unquestionable in any proceedings under the Controverted Elections Act.

7. Because, even admitting that the result of the said amendments would be to create a double course of procedure, and this is denied by the Senate, this result, so far from being disadvantageous, would conduce to the exercise of care and discretion by the county court judge in the discharge of the duties devolving upon him, and would greatly discourage any attempt to reverse his decision by proceedings under the Controverted Elections Act.

8. Because there can be no conflict of jurisdiction between the county court judge acting under these amendments and the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island acting under the Controverted Elections Act, inasmuch as there can be no return made until the former has discharged his duties, and the action of the Supreme Court under that Act cannot be invoked until there has been a return made.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not going to detain the House more than a few minutes in discussing these questions. We have discussed this question fully before. My hon. friend said this was agreed to before. Yes, rather than lose the Franchise Act it was agreed to, but nearly everybody in the House of Commons felt it was an unreasonable and improper provision, and I have no doubt it is upon that subject. There is in every part of this Dominion the power of recounting, but what is that power? It is to recount every vote that has been polled. That is a proper proceeding if you want a scrutiny—if you want to contest the election—if you deny that the number of votes polled is the number of legal votes. Then, there is another process that is provided for, and it is as applicable to Prince Edward Island as to any other part of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—That is the recount.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is a recount with the scrutiny added. There are other places where they have a recount, and they can have it in Prince Edward Island. My hon. friend wants a recount and a scrutiny as well.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not a proper proceeding, as I propose to show. Prince Edward Island does not stand in a different position in this regard from other parts of the Dominion. In Ontario, although a man may have his name on the voters' list, he has not the privilege of voting, if he moves from the constituency and become a resident elesewhere ; he may vote, and there may be a scrutiny to remove his name. Then there may be personation. It does not matter how a name comes in the list, if it is not legally there. In Prince Edward Island, if a man votes improperly, once his vote is polled he stands exactly in the same position as the man who has given an improper vote anywhere else. There is the same remedy in Prince Edward Island that there is elsewhere. This amendment is an improper provision. If my hon. friend wants greater security in Prince Edward Island than he has got, he ought to labour there for the purpose of inducing them to have a proper voters' list prepared. That is their remedy, if they desire greater security. What does the hon. gentleman propose ? He says that one man may have 500 votes, and another 490. There is a difference of ten that some of his agents have bought votes, demands a recount, and a scrutiny. What is the object of the scrutiny ? For the purpose of ascertaining whether any of these 500 votes are improperly recorded. The principle of our law, like the principle of the English law, is that a man who has the majority of votes shall be returned.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Good votes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He shall be returned. The question whether they are all good votes or not is to be determined after the return, and not before. You return the man the majority of the people voted for, and if his seat is to be attacked, it must be attacked by showing that he has bought votes, or that some of his agents have bought votes. or people have voted for him who were not entitled to vote. All this may be inquired into by a petition before the court. What does the hon. gentleman's proposal mean ? It means that a man who has been returned must first fight a demand for a scrutiny, and if he is unseated, he then must file an election petition in order to maintain his rights.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to explain the difference between the voters' lists of the province to which the hon. gentleman is referring and Prince Edward Island. In Ontario, the right to vote is indicated by the voters' list laid before the returning officer. In Prince Edward Island there is no such thing. That is the difference.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, that is not the difference. Once a vote is polled, even if there be a voters' list, the vote is counted. Supposing a man is an alien, and his name is on the voters' list. Supposing he has been guilty of corrupt practices, and his name is on the voters' list, you have a right to strike off his name.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If you strike off his name, you never know for whom he votes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The rule is, under a Dominion election petition, to strike off every bad vote, and if the number of bad votes exceeds the majority, the election is off.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to show us, under the Controverted Elections Act, how you can deal with the qualification of voters ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman has spoken for about an hour, and he understands the law. A bad vote recorded in Prince Edward Island does not differ from a bad vote recorded anywhere else. The hon. gentleman wants a remedy in Prince Edward Island that does not exist anywhere else. That is preposterous. This is a measure relating to the constitution of the House of Commons. It has been discussed and considered there. If there is anybody in the House of Commons who entertains my hon. friend's view he has had an opportunity of stating it, yet here is one member undertaking to set up his own peculiar views on this question against the views of the whole House of Commons, and against the views of the vast majority of this House, because no one here from Quebec, or Manitoba, or Ontario, or elsewhere is asking to have incorporated in the law, in order to protect a defeated candidate, the provision that the hon. gentleman seeks to have incorporated for Prince Edward Island. Certainly the House of Commons can never agree to the proposition of the hon. gentleman, and the concurrence in that amendment will have the effect of defeating the Bill.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman has no right to throw out such a threat.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not making a threat. I am stating a fact. The House of Commons has refused to accept this proposition. His Excellency will be here at three o'clock to prorogue parliament.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON. We know that bluff.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman calls it a bluff. I have listened to him for the past hour undertaking to force his views upon the House of Commons. He is not an elected member. He has not to go before the electors, and he is undertaking to force his views upon the whole parliament on this question. I say that the proposition is a most unreasonable one. If a man records his vote improperly in Prince Edward Island, his vote can be struck off the list just the same as in other parts of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Does not this amendment exist in the Prince Edward Island law as it is now ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, the hon. gentleman undertook to force this provision upon the House, but it was utterly unworkable.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I am speaking of the law as it is.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So am I. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) undertook to amend the Franchise Act, and the government acquiesced in his amendments rather than have the measure defeated, but they agreed to his amendments under protest. They are in a form to render the Act unworkable, and the hon. gentleman himself admits that. I am not prepared to agree to this pernicious provision, and certainly the pressing of it simply means the defeat of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The very argument my hon. friend is——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman has no right to make another speech.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Certainly I have. I am making a substantive motion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, the hon. gentleman is not making a substantive motion. The substantive motion was made by myself.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What was the hon. gentleman's motion ? I did not hear it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot help that. The hon. gentleman was not here. We delayed some time to give him an opportunity to get here. My hon. friend has made a speech, and that is the end, so far as he is concerned.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the House will see that the hon. gentleman is enforcing the rule very unfairly now. I was not in the House——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman has made his speech, and I raise the question of order.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If the hon. gentleman is going to invoke the rule harshly, it will show he is convinced of the weakness of his argument. It was not altogether courteous or decorous that the hon. member should proceed with this Bill while I was not in the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Minister of Justice did not proceed with the Bill. When his attention was called to the absence of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield he waited until the hon. gentleman came in.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I want to submit some reasons——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have heard all the reasons.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON. I move an amendment to the hon. gentleman's motion. I suppose my hon. friend has observed that the House of Commons has included in the amendment relating to Prince Edward Island, two other amendments that do not belong to them.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I understand the question, it may be crystallized in this way: If the Bill now before the House is dropped by the House of Commons, it will revive the law passed in 1898, which gives to Prince Edward Island what the hon. member asks to-day. What he asks is, that the Bill before us shall contain what the existing law contains, but what the government put out of it. So, if the Bill to-day is withdrawn by the government, the hon, gentleman will get what he asks for in the negative way. I do not think the government, under the circumstances, san say: 'We will drop the Bill,' because if they do so, the hon. gentleman will gain his point. For these reasons, I shall vote for the amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The question before the House is a very simple one. The election law, which we have gone over with a great deal of care here, is generally considered to be a great improvement on the law as it at present exists. It is on the whole a better and fairer law. I understand a great many members supporting the present administration are not anxious that the Bill should become law, and it is a question for the Senate to say, whether they will have the law as it stands to-day, with its imperfections, or whether we shall have a law embodied in the Bill which is now before us, without the amendments proposed by the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island. That is the simple question—a practical question, as I understand it. I do not undertake to question the superiority of the amendment, evolved out of his mental interior by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield. I have always felt, since that hon. gentleman came here, that he knew more, not only than any one person in parliament, but than all the rest of parliament together, and I am ready to admit that this amendment of his makes a vast improvement in the law, but unfortunately these obstinate members of the House of Commons decline to be governed by his superior wisdom, and it is for us to say whether we are to insist on being governed by the House of Commons or by the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will the hon. gentleman make one exception?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has no right to interrupt me.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will the hon. gentleman except the hon. gentleman from Halifax?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am giving the hon. gentleman all the credit that even he would ask, and I do not see why he should find fault. We had that hon. gentleman, if I am not mistaken, and other hon. gentlemen, the other day, when there was some question with respect to the right to vote, of a number of persons in the province of Quebec, to tell us——

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is referring to a past debate, and I call him to order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have sinned, but if I have, pretty nearly every member in the House has sinned in the same way.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman is such a stickler for order, I thought I would call attention to his own transgression.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the dying hours of the session, the hon. gentleman should try to maintain peace and harmony in the House. I took the opportunity to interrupt the hon. gentleman once to ask a pertinent question, and that is whether there was in the local law of Prince Edward Island any provision for such a correction and revision as the hon. gentleman's amendment proposes to make, and he was obliged to admit there was not. He said, however, they have open voting in the province of Prince Edward Island, and consequently, as I understood him, there is no necessity for this provision.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I understood the hon. gentleman to say that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I made an explanation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman said the circumstances were different, that they had open voting down there, and he went on to say that the parties interested can tell, as the polling goes on, how the electors are voting. The hon. gentleman's desire was not that nobody should vote who had not the right to vote, but that nobody should vote against a candidate who has not the right to vote. Why is it less objectionable that a man should vote, under open voting, who has no right to vote, than that a man should vote under the ballot who has no right to vote ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the whole point.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In Prince Edward Island men may vote, under open voting, who have no right to vote. Is not that just as objectionable as that a man should vote under the ballot, who has no right to vote ? And in Prince Edward Island, the local legislature has made no provision for striking out such votes, why should we undertake to provide means for striking out the vote of a man who has no right to vote ? I did not mean to say anything to wound the hon. gentleman's feelings. If I have done so I am sorry, but I say the question for us now is, not whether the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman is an improvement on the law or not, but what the effect of having it will be. Are we prepared to throw away the present election law or not ? This amendment, at any rate, only affects three or four constituencies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The only remark I propose to make on this question is in reference to the statement which has just fallen from the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I must confess I was surprised to hear it. He said he understood that a large number of the supporters of the present government in the lower House were anxious that this Bill should not pass.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not say that. I said they were not anxious that this Bill should pass.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL. I think that implies that they do not want it to pass. That is an extraordinary position for any member of the House of Commons to take in reference to a Bill which has for its object, professedly at least, purity of elections. I am not at all surprised that some gentlemen sitting in another place, who, as we know from evidence that has been produced, obtained their seats through a species of fraud, disapprove of the introduction of this Bill. Speaking for those with whom I act, and for the opposition in the House of Commons, they are most anxious that this Bill should become law. Their experience in the past has been such as to justify a demand that some amendments should be made in order to prevent the rascalities which we know have been perpetrated in the past ; and for a gentleman to urge as a reason why this Bill should become law, that supporters of the government are not anxious that it should be, is certainly a grave imputation on these gentlemen, but as he is one of the party, I presume he knows more of them than we do, and I take his statement as correct. But, it is a lamentable fact that any member of parliament in either House, should desire to see a Bill, which has for its object the purity of elections, rejected.

The SPEAKER—The question is on the amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should like——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact : The moment the Speaker rises and puts the question, no more debate can take place. I do not rise for the purpose of taking exception on this occasion, but to call attention to this constant violation of the rule.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was waiting until the hon. gentleman finished.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman had risen before the motion was put, he would have been quite correct. But, if the motion was put by the Speaker before he rose, he is not in order. I do not insist on the objection on this occasion, but I think it is time we put a stop to it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—An hon. gentleman opposite said this amendment is the law now. It is the law, because the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island took advantage of the last hours of the session to force certain clauses in the Franchise Act when it was impossible for the House of Commons either to drop the Bill or reject them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman is not correct when he says it was the last hours of the session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will read from the Journals of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is the hon. gentleman reading from the book, 'It was the last hours of the session'?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am reading from the Journals of this House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman rose after the Speaker rose to put the motion. We must have some reciprocity in these matters. I allowed the hon. member from Halifax to interrupt me, and the moment he rose he would not allow me to ask him a question. I want reciprocity in this matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is not giving reciprocity. I want to have an opportunity to say a word. The hon. gentleman has no right to monopolize all the time of this Chamber. The Bill was postponed for the hon. gentleman. Attention was called to the fact that he was not present in his seat, and the Minister of Justice very courteously allowed the Bill to stand until he came.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON. It is usual for hon. members to allow interruptions so long as they are relevant and polite. That is all I wanted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—On Friday, the 10th of June:

The Order of the Day being read for the consideration of the message from the House of Commons disagreeing to the amendments made by the Senate to the Bill (16) intituled An Act to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act.

The Hon. Mr. FERGUSON in further amendment, moved, seconded by the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

That the Senate do insist upon the 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th of the amendments made by them to the Bill from the House of Commons (No. 16) further to amend the Dominion Elections Act, for the following reason:

'Because the said amendments are necessary to adapt the Dominion Elections Act, as modified by the said Bill, to the conditions of Prince Edward Island where there are no voters' lists, and to provide adequate means for recording and determining in a manner similar to that provided by the provincial law, objections to the votes of any person whose qualification to vote is questioned.'

The question of concurrence being put thereon, the same was resolved in the affirmative.

The business was finished on Saturday, and this was on Friday, the 10th of June, and the House was prorogued on Monday.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We had a satisfactory conference on that occasion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. Saturday was the 11th of June and business was practically closed, and the House of Commons consented to accept it at the last moment rather than to lose the Bill. The hon. gentleman takes the position, 'You must accept my amendments or drop the Bill.' Any person who exercises fair judgment will see that there cannot be the slightest objection to a man voting viva voce, or by ballot. The objections can be taken whether he votes openly or by ballot. What difference does it make whether the vote is marked down for Mr. Brown in the poll-book, or whether he drops the ballot into the box. You object before the ballot goes in, and you object before the vote is recorded, and the hon. gentleman never can convince anybody, who gives a fair judgment upon that, that there can be the slightest difficulty. The hon. gentleman seeks to force his judgment on the House of Commons in a measure which affects them exclusively.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If I understand the hon. gentleman, that was carried because it was on the last day, or in the last hours of the session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is a precedent, and there is another precedent—there was a conference between the two Houses.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, there was no conference on that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There was an informal conference on that question in 1898.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I say there was.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Solicitor General waited upon my friend on my right and myself, and we came to a mutual understanding, speaking for those who voted not to accept the amendment, as to how far they would accede to the wishes of the Commons, and the Solicitor General went back to the Commons and agreed to those portions which we insisted upon, and we accepted other of their amendments after a mutual conference. It was not properly a conference contemplated under the constitution.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, there is no note of it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was a friendly conference.

The House divided on the amendment, which was carried on the following division :

Contents :

Hon. Messrs.

Scott,

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I want to call attention to an error on the part of the Commons, that they included in their reasons and in the amendment which they rejected, Nos. 50 and 51, which were amendments put in by my hon. friend himself. Evidently it has been an error to include 50 and 51 with my amendments to section 90, because I think it will be an extraordinary thing if, through an inadvertence of that kind, necessary amendments made by my hon. friend should be struck out. It was simply the removal of surplusage which had reference to the old Franchise Act, and which my hon. friend, by an amendment, struck out. But the House of Commons having included these among the Prince Edward Island amendments, the effect would be that these amendments would fall to the ground, if we do not insist on them. I want to ask the hon. leader of the House whether he proposes to do anything in the matter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Senate has killed the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If the hon. leader of the House does not propose to do anything to carry out his own amendments, I think it devolves upon the House to do it, because it is essential that these amendments should be sustained. I would therefore move that the Senate doth insist on the 50th and 51st amendments for the following reasons :

(a) Because the reasons given by the House of Commons for disagreeing thereto are not applicable to these amendments.

(b) Because the 50th amendment is merely a verbal change to preserve uniformity of language.

(c) Because the 51st amendment corrects a manifest error in section 90, caused apparently by copying from the original source of the section words which have no application since the repeal of ' The Electoral Franchise Act.'

The motion was agreed to on a division.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that his motion provided for non-insistence on any amendments which had been made, and that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield moved an amendment to that, which applied only to Prince Edward Island, though technically it has wiped out the original motion altogether ; still the question for the Senate and the Minister of Justice to consider is, whether he desires to say that we do not insist on the amendment he himself moved affecting the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I am not insisting upon it. I believe the amendment was a proper one, but a different view was taken in the House of Commons, and I am not going to press my view against theirs.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But we have not carried out the hon. minister's motion. Has not the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield wiped out the whole motion ? If my hon. friend had moved an amendment that all after certain words be struck out, it would have been different.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That arose from the fact that I did not hear the motion. I thought the motion was that the House do not insist on the Prince Edward Island amendments, and, therefore, I moved that we should insist on them, and gave the reasons. I did not know any other amendment was included in the motion, though that was settled before I came in. There must be some answer given to the Commons.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill is the one to say what will be done with the Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, but the House has taken it out of my hands.

THE SUPPLY BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (196) 'An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the public service, for the financial year ending respectively the 30th June, 1900, and the 30th June, 1901, and for other purposes relating to the public service.'

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was going to ask the hon. Minister of Justice if he could tell us what the total amount of this year's estimates is ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot tell the hon. gentleman. I think, if I remember rightly, it is something in the neighbourhood of $43,000,000.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This shows $36,000,000.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, this shows $36,000,000 odd. I do not find that it is added up anywhere. It has gone out of my mind.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I notice the Intercolonial Railway asks for $4,222,000. What is that for ? Is it for new stock, or part of the extension that was to do so much for the country ? I do not see, however, any appropriation for the vigorous prosecution of what is termed the Trent Valley Canal. Are we to understand from that that the goverment is abandoning the work ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, the work is going on.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there a sufficient appropriation from last year unexpended ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I think there is a revote for that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I looked at it hastily, and did not see it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I know, as a matter of fact, that the work is going on.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know there is $11,300 in the estimates, but that is not for the prosecution of the canal proper. That is for repairs and for various expenditures in connection with the portion of the canal which has been constructed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know what the amount is, but I know there is enough.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If it is there, I am under a misapprehension. I looked hurriedly through Ontario canals, and did not see it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is an item of $320,000, and an item of $300,000—$620,000 altogether.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I had overlooked that. I do not desire to waste time in discussing these estimates, but there are one or two items I should like to call attention to, but I do not desire to be understood as opposing them. I see for Brockville there is $10,000 for drill hall ; in the same item there is another $9,000, making a total sum for drill hall in the town of Brockville of $19,000. I do not object to the expenditure of money for the construction of drill halls ; on the contrary, I am very glad to see that they are adopting this principle, but what I object to is that one locality should be favoured at the expense of others. In the city of Belleville we have a drill hall that has cost the officers and men and people of the city from $25,000 to $30,000. All the government appropriation which has ever been received for it was $10,000. There have been a few thousand dollars spent since in repairing out of the general vote. I cannot see why any town or city should have $19,000 or $20,000 given to it for this purpose, which is purely patriotic in its character, and to which I have already said I do not object, while others have to pay for the construction of these halls out of their own pockets. That is what I object to. There is one battalion in Brockville, and I have reason to believe it is a very good one. We have had one battalion and part of another in Belleville, some part of the force has been in existence ever since 1857, when we used to have to uniform ourselves. All that was received from the government was the rifles, nothing more. That is what we used to get in my early days of volunteering, and while I do not object to these appropriations, I think, as they are all Dominion in character, the government should assist and pay the expense. I cannot understand why one should receive so great an advantage over another. Then there is another point, which has been discussed over and over again almost every session of parliament since confederation, and I am surprised—no, I am not surprised, because nothing surprises me nowadays—in view of the stand taken by members of the present administration against Rideau Hall expenditure, it is rather strange to see the appropriation for Rideau Hall repairs $17,000, and for some other purpose $8,000. I think that would be for lighting and heating and repairs, $11,000, making a total of $36,000 for Government House. I think Government House should be palatial in its character. I do not object to any reasonable expenditure, but has not the time arrived, if we have to have an appropriation of this kind every year, to pull down the building and erect one that would be a credit to the capital of the country ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Here is $36,000. Take off the $8,000 for heating and lighting, because that would be necessary in any case, and we have an outlay of $30,000 on that old rattletrap.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not blaming the present government more than the late government, but I should like to see them take that responsibility. I believe they would be sustained in asking for an appropriation sufficient to build a modern dwelling for our Governor General with all the modern improvements, and I am quite sure that the interest which would be saved annually would pay for the outlay to a very great extent.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I entirely agree with the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was staggered at the $36,000, and that suggested to me the propriety of saying that I wished they would take the responsibility and the initiative, if they remain in power much longer, and erect a suitable residence for the Govenor General. I do not propose to discuss this further than to say that we are increasing the public expenditure very rapidly, and the boasts which were made prior to the advent of the Liberal administration have not been realized to any extent, so far as the expenditure of the government is concerned. My hon. friend told us that out of thirty-six or thirty-eight millions of dollars, if he once got hold of the purse-strings, he would save three or four millions of dollars, and reduce the annual outlay to thirty-four or thirty-five millions. Instead of that, the expenditure has run up to between fifty and sixty millions of dollars.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Last year it was fifty-one millions of dollars.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is including capital expenditure.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is quite right, and let us hope capital expenditure will soon decrease.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I was rather staggered at the amount the Minister of Justice stated as being the amount of expenditure this year. I was under the impression it was about $60,000,000, instead of $46,000,000.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So it is, if you include capital account.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I entirely agree with the hon. gentleman respecting Rideau Hall. If the amount of money spent on improvements and repairs since confederation had been properly expended, we would have had a building worthy of the Washington of the North, and I only regret that some steps were not taken originally to make a separate district here, like the District of Columbia. By this time we would have had a Government House worthy of the country, and advantages far above and beyond what we can expect under the present system. There is, as we all know, a large amount of money being expended now, under an appropriation from the federal government, for a roadway from Rideau Hall through the city of Ottawa, intended more for the benefit of the Rideau Hall people than for the citizens of Ottawa. That may appear a bold assertion, but I make it knowing the circumstances perfectly well. The selection of the route was injudicious, and the money expended upon it is entirely unjustified. It is, however, under the control of commissioners named by the government, and we must submit. I always expected, when the Liberal government came to power, we would have a reduced expenditure—that they would reduce the expenditure to somewhere between $35,000,000 and $38,000,000, and we were told, from one end of the country to the other, that the controllable expenditure would be reduced by four or five millions of dollars a year. But, in place of that it has been increasing annually, and will increase, I believe, in the future. We were told last year, when there was some discussion of the subject, 'Wait till you see us next year.' The words have been prophetic; the government have carried out their predictions to an alarming extent. I have not had an opportunity of going into the figures. It is one of the unfortunate positions in which we are placed, that we have not an opportunity of examining those expenditures in the dying hours of the session. It is said we have nothing to do with it—that the House of Commons is responsible and, therefore, the responsibility must rest on their shoulders. I regret exceedingly that while all this profuse expenditure is being made, no step has been taken to provide a Geological Museum suitable for the invaluable collection now in the building in Lower Town. It is in a very perilous situation. If a fire should take place and that building be consumed, no money would replace the contents of that museum. The government have not discharged their duty in not having made provision for a fireproof building to preserve this valuable collection. I have brought up this subject several times, and I hope next session some efforts will be made towards providing a new building, and also for the construction of the Ottawa Canal.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You will defeat it here if we do.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—No, we would not. There would not be one dissentient voice. The people of this country now realize the importance of having a capital equal to the position Canada occupies in the world. For some reason or other, I suppose, gentlemen have not the same good feeling towards this section of Canada that they have towards the west. They have been very prodigal in granting subsidies and making allowances to the western country. I do not find fault with that, or with the expenditure of public money when it is judiciously expended, but I do find fault with giving contracts without tender at an enormous price and not getting value for the money. I have found fault with that on every occasion, and I shall continue to do so to the end of the chapter. Let the government, if they wish to give contracts, give them in open daylight and by tender.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—So we do.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That is not the policy of the government. We all know their motto is 'Business is business,' and the party supports it. The principle is wrong. It should be discouraged and should not be permitted in the future. I hope the government will take all these matters into consideration, and make provision at as early a date as possible for the construction of the Geological Museum, and for the preservation of its valuable collection.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It ought to be done.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Then why do the government not do it?

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I wish to call the attention of the government to a point that was discussed last year. The Geological Museum contains some very precious specimens. Everybody admits that there is danger of fire on account of the situation of the museum, as it is surrounded by houses which endanger it. I agree with the hon. gentleman from Rideau, that Ottawa should have a museum worthy of the resources of the country, but it seems to me that before we vote for the erection of such a museum as we ought to have, the city of Ottawa and surrounding territory should not belong to one province, but to the whole Dominion—that is to say, it should be a district as Washington.

Hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—That idea was brought before the House last year, and the Minister of Justice did not object to it. He even thought it was a good thing, if I remember rightly. I do not think we can get people to consent to these large expenditures that are necessary, unless the capital is made an independent district, in which when we come out from other provinces, we shall be at home. There is a very simple thing which can be done—I call attention to it now, though it may be too late in the year—for a very small sum, that the museum might be isolated. Some of the specimens are not as precious as others. Those that could not be replaced at any price, ought to be put in a fire-proof building. That can easily be done by purchasing two houses adjoining the museum. I have inquired as to the value of property on Sussex Street, and I find that large buildings containing two or three stories, can be had for $3,000 or $4,000. Adjoining the museum, there is a house that I understood is rented for $300 a year. The other rents for about the same price. It would not cost much to buy two houses, and isolate the museum. If in a few years after the capital should be formed into a district, and the government decided to build a museum worthy of the importance of Canada, these properties could be sold at a higher price than they would cost now. For a trifle the government might do that, and it should be done as a matter of urgency, although no money has been voted for it.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill passed through all its stages under a suspension of the rule.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS BILL.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—A Bill, further to amend Bill (195) 'An Act further to amend the Act respecting the judges of provincial courts.' came to us some little time ago. I move the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I call attention to the fact that there is no quorum.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There was a quorum this morning, and we can take it for granted that there is a quorum now.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I withdraw the objection.

The order was postponed.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I may be excused, if I call the attention of the Senate to what I may say is, to a certain extent, a personal matter. It will be remembered that the hon. gentleman from DeLanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) made a statement here the other night, that I had informed the Hon. Mr. Forget, that there would be no vote upon the Judges Bill, and that he might go home in peace, and for that reason that hon. gentleman went home; otherwise he would have been here to record his vote. I need not repeat the statement, that I made in the Senate when that remark was made, but I might call attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman first made the statement distinctly, that I had so advised the hon. senator, but that he was enjoined by Senator Forget not to mention it. He subsequently informed the Senate that he had permission to inform his leader, the hon. Minister of Justice; and afterwards he said that I ought to be thankful that he had called the attention of the Senate to the fact, to enable me to set myself right, as it was talked about by the different members of the Senate. How it could have been talked about by members of the Senate, unless the hon. gentleman had given them the information, I leave him to explain. Immediately after the Senate rose that night, I wrote to the Hon. Mr. Forget, informing him of what had taken place in the Senate, and the statement which had been made by the hon. gentleman from DeLanaudière, asking him as to the correctness of such statement. My letter did not reach him in Montreal, for the reason he was then at his country residence. I then wired him yesterday, and asked him if he had received my letter, and, if so, kindly to reply, as I desired to set myself right before the Senate, not wishing to lie under imputation of having deliberately deceived him in order to prevent him voting upon an important question. I received a wire from Mr. Forget yesterday, dated Ste. Anne, in which he said:

Letter not received; likely receive it in the morning, and will wire you.

This morning I received the following telegram:

Sir Mackenzie Bowell,
Senate, Ottawa, Ont.

I understood from you Saturday at one o'clock that you thought it would perhaps be better not to insist on the judges' clause, and I told you that, in my opinion, it was better not to insist. I told Casgrain, coming out of the Chamber, my opinion was that you would not insist, but at the same time he had better keep it to himself. Tuesday morning I received a telegram from Senator Casgrain asking if you had promised not to take a vote. My answer was, 'Sir Mackenzie's speech Monday night is my answer.' He had no right to use this private conversation. Will write you more fully.

(Sgd.) FORGET.

That conversation was one similar to that which I had, probably, in the presence of most hon. senators, in my hearing, and my opening remarks in my speech were strictly in accord with that statement. I was in a quandary as to what course we should take on that important question, and it was not until I had carefully read the speeches delivered in the lower House that I made up my mind to take the course that I did. It will be seen by the answer that there is no affirmation of the statement made by the hon. member for DeLanaudière that I had told Senator Forget that no vote would be taken upon the question. I frankly admit that I was in doubt for some time as to what course should be taken by the Senate and so expressed myself to those with whom I act. I scarcely think there is a gentleman in the Senate to-day, sitting on this side of the House, with whom I had any conversation and to whom I did not express precisely the same view, generally winding up with the assertion, 'We will have to wait and see what course ought to be pursued after the action of the lower House.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—And that is in accord with the hon. gentleman's speeches.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes. I trust the Senate will excuse me for bringing a personal matter before it, but if the statement made by the hon. gentleman in this House were believed, it could have no other construction than that I had deliberately misled Senator Forget in order that he would not be here to cast his vote. That is the only conversation I had with Mr. Forget, with whom, as I said the other day, I was on the most friendly terms, and I should be very sorry if anybody believed that I could be guilty of so base and disreputable an act. It is only a lesson, however, to every senator to bear in mind conversations he has with people who do not appear to have any sense of what constitutes right and wrong in the conduct of one gentleman towards another.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS BILL.

REJECTED.

Hon. Mr. MILLS renewed his motion for the second reading of Bill (195), an Act further to amend the Act respecting the judges of provincial courts. He said: This Bill provides for increasing the salary of the circuit judge of the Montreal district from $3,000 to $3,600. An Act passed on the 23rd of March, 1900, provides that the senior judge shall have over such court and the judges and officers thereof all the powers mutatus mutandis which the chief justice of the court has over such court, its judges and its officers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. minister would accept a suggestion from me, he would not push this Bill at this late moment. It is scarcely fair to a legislative body that it should have Bills brought down affecting the salary of one of the judges within a couple of hours of prorogation. If the judge is deserving of this amount of money he can afford to wait just a little longer and have the matter brought down next session, when probably we would have a better opportunity to inquire into the requirements of the court and the propriety of passing such a Bill. I know the hon. gentleman realizes the impropriety of asking us to deal with money Bills of this kind at the closing moments of the session.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman presses the Bill, we will have to ask for a division.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the general feeling is against it we will not press it.

The motion was lost on a division.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to know what becomes of the Bill. Has it been withdrawn?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was lost on a division.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. minister said he would not press it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said that evidently the sentiment was against it, and it was lost on a division.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 2 p.m. the House was resumed.

ELECTION LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understand that the House of Commons will withdraw their report on the Election Bill that they sent here, and we are to withdraw our report to them, and a new report will be made upon that Bill. I therefore move that the proceedings at a former sitting of this House with reference to the Election Bill be rescinded.

The motion was agreed to.

DOMINION CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (197), 'An Act to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act.'

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I simply desire to remark that this is a Bill to meet substantially the objections taken by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield. It is not all that he asks, but it meets the material points that he desired to have embodied in the Electoral Bill. Under the circumstances I think the mutual concession made by the Commons and by the Senate will be accepted and I hope prove satisfactory on the whole. Of course, with the adoption of this Bill the amendments which were moved by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield will not be concurred in by the other House, and the opinion of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, as well as those who acted with him, is that this will meet, to a certain extent, that which he desired to have made law.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that a resolution be sent to the House of Commons by one of the Masters in Chancery to acquaint that House that the Senate hath rescinded its decision to-day with respect to the 46th, 47th, 48th, 49th, 52nd and 53rd amendments to Bill (133), 'an Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of members of the House of Commons,' and doth not insist upon the said amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate was adjourned during pleasure.

THE PROROGATION.

This day, at Three o'clock p.m., His Excellency the Governor General proceeded in state to the Senate Chamber, in the Parliament Buildings, and took his seat upon the Throne. The members of the Senate being assembled, His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and that House being present, the following Bills were assented to, in Her Majesty's name, by His Excellency the Governor General, viz.:

An Act respecting the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company.

An Act to incorporate the South Shore Line Railway Company.

An Act to amend the Copyright Act.

An Act to amend the Civil Service Act.

An Act respecting and restricting Chinese Immigration.

An Act to amend the Pilotage Act.

An Act to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of J. W. Anderson.

An Act respecting the construction of a branch railway from Charlottetown to Murray Harbour.

An Act to incorporate the British America Pulp, Paper and Railway Company.

An Act respecting the Central Vermont Railway Company (foreign).

An Act respecting the preservation of Game in the Yukon territory.

An Act to aid in the prevention and settlement of trade disputes and to provide for the publication of statistical industrial information.

An Act to amend the Militia Act.

An Act to amend the Bank Act Amendment Act, 1900.

An Act to authorize the granting of subsidies in aid of the construction of the lines of railway therein mentioned.

An Act to amend the Railway Act.

An Act respecting the Quebec Harbour Commissioners.

An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.

An Act to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act.

An Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of members of the House of Commons.

To these Bills the Royal assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the Senate in the words following:

In Her Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor General doth assent to the Bills.

Then the honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it Please Your Excellency:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain Supplies required to enable the government to defray the expenses of the Public Service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Excellency the following Bill:—

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the public service, for the financial years ending respectively the 30th June, 1900 and the 30th June, 1901, and for other purposes relating to the public service, to which Bill I humbly request Your Excellency's assent.

To this Bill the Clerk of the Senate, by His Excellency's command, did thereupon say:

In Her Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor General thanks Her Loyal Subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this Bill.

After which His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to close the fifth session of the eighth parliament of the Dominion with the following

SPEECH:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In relieving you from further attendance in parliament, I desire to thank you for the diligent attention which you have given to the labours of an exceptionally protracted session.

When parliament opened in the month of February last, the thoughts of the whole empire were centred on the war which was then raging in South Africa.

The marked successes which have since attended the British arms, and in which our Canadian volunteer soldiers have taken a conspicuous and glorious part, justify the hope that peace will be soon restored in that distant land.

The large number of private Bills with industrial objects considered and passed is a good indication of the great expansion of the business of the country.

I desire to congratulate you on the buoyant state of the revenue. The large receipts have enabled my government to provide liberally for the public service, and to maintain Canada's strong financial position.

A marked feature of the session has been the adoption of many important measures which must beneficially affect the future of the Dominion.

The improvements in the Act relating to banks will tend to perfect a system of banking of which Canada has reason to feel proud.

The extension of the British preference in our tariff will tend to reduce the burden of taxation, and stimulate the growth of our trade with the mother country.

The measure you have passed respecting the admission of Canadian inscribed stock to the list of securities in which trustees in Great Britain may invest, is being followed by similar legislation in the Imperial parliament, which will, in due course, consummate this very important improvement in the financial affairs of the Dominion.

There is reason to believe that the legislation of this session will have important and favourable results. I particularly congratulate you upon the passing of the Conciliation Act, which, it is confidently hoped, will not only improve the condition of the industrial classes, but will also better promote the relations which ought to exist between capital and labour.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the liberal provision which you have made for the public service.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

It affords me much pleasure to observe that the prosperity of Canada continues unabated, and I pray that Divine Providence may continue to look with favour upon this Dominion.

The Speaker of the Senate then said:

It is His Excellency the Governor General's will and pleasure, that this Parliament be prorogued until Saturday, the first day September next, to be here held, and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued until the first day of September next.
