THE DEBATES

OF THE

SENATE OF CANADA

IN THE

FIFTH SESSION OF THE EIGHTH PARLIAMENT OF CANADA, APPOINTED TO MEET FOR DESPATCH OF BUSINESS ON THURSDAY, THE FIRST DAY OF FEBRUARY, IN THE SIXTY-THIRD YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, February 1, 1900.

The Senate met at 2.30 p.m.

PRAYERS.

THE CLERK OF THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER informed the Senate that a commission under the Great Seal had been granted to Samuel Edmour St. Onge Chapleau, appointing him the Clerk of the Senate.

The Commission to the Clerk was then read.

Mr. Chapleau, having taken the oath of office, took his place.

NEW SENATORS.

The following newly-appointed Senators were introduced and took their seats :—

Hon. GEORGE TAYLOR FULFORD, of Brockville, Ont., vice the Hon. W. E. Sanford, deceased.

Hon. CHARLES BURPEE, of Sheffield, N.B., vice the Hon. Thos. Temple, deceased.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

This day, at Three o'clock p.m., His Excellency the Governor General proceeded in state in the Senate Chamber in the Parliament Buildings, and took his seat upon the Throne. The Members of the Senate being assembled, His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and that House being present, His Excellency was pleased to open the Fifth Session of the Eighth Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, with the following speech :—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons

It is again my pleasing duty to congratulate you on the continued prosperity of the Dominion and on the remarkable increase in the general volume of the revenue and of the exports and imports of the country.

Hostilities having unfortunately broken out during the recess between Great Britain and the South African Republic, it appeared to my ministers expedient to anticipate the action of parliament by equipping and forwarding two contingents of volunteers to the seat of war as a practical evidence of the profound devotion and loyalty of the entire people of Canada to the Sovereign and institutions of the British Empire.

In this connection it is a matter of pride and gratification to the people of this Dominion that, in addition to the contingents sent by the government, another Canadian force is being organized and despatched at the personal expense of the High Commissioner of Canada. This generous and patriotic action upon the part of Lord Strathcona reflects high honour on him and on the Dominion he represents.

I have been instructed to convey to you Her Majesty's high appreciation of the loyalty and patriotism thus displayed, which, following the preference granted under the present tariff to articles of British manufacture, has had the happiest effect in cementing and intensifying the cordial relations subsisting between Canada and the mother country.

A Bill will be submitted for your approval making provision for the cost of equipping and paying the Canadian contingents.

The measures which have been taken from time to time to facilitate the safe transportation of food stuffs to European markets have resulted in a large increase in the exportation of several important articles of produce, and it may become necessary in the interest of this very important branch of industry to require a more careful inspection than has been customary for the purpose of maintaining that high standard of excellence heretofore secured and which is absolutely indispensible if the people of Canada are to increase their large and profitable trade with other countries in these commodities.

I am glad to observe that the returns from the Post Office Department afford good ground for believing that the temporary loss of revenue caused by the great reduction recently made in letter postage, will speedily be made good by the increased correspondence consequent thereon.

Negotiations are now in progress with several of our sister colonies in the West Indies which it is hoped may result in increasing and developing our trade with those islands, and possibly with certain portions of the adjacent continent of South America.

It gives me great pleasure to observe that, in pursuance of the policy which was defined at the last session of parliament, a carefully devised body of regulations has been adopted, applicable to all railways and public works within the federal jurisdiction, making adequate provision for the sanitary protection and medical care of workingmen.

The attention of the government has been called to the conflicts which occasionally arise between workmen and their employers. While it may not be possible to wholly prevent such difficulties by legislation, my government think that many of the disputes might be averted if better provisions could be made for the friendly intervention of boards of conciliation, the conclusions of which, while not legally binding would have much weight with both sides and be useful in bringing an intelligent public opinion to bear on these complicated subjects. You will be invited to consider whether the provincial legislation in this matter may not be usefully supplemented by an enactment providing for the establishment of a Dominion tribunal for assisting in the settlement of such questions.

I am happy to observe that the number of settlers who have taken up lands in Manitoba and in the North-west Territories is larger than in any previous year, and affords conclusive evidence of the success which has attended the efforts of my government to promote immigration, and I have no doubt that the greatly increased production of the West will henceforth add materially to the growth of the trade of the whole Dominion. While the efforts made to secure increased population for the West have thus been successful, much attention has also been devoted to the repatriation of Canadians who in less prosperous times have left Canada. You will be pleased to learn that this work has been attended with satisfactory results.

My government, during the recess, has been giving its attention to the subject of a railway commission. Valuable information has been and is still being collected, which when completed will be submitted to you, and will, no doubt, receive at your hands the earnest consideration which the importance of the subject requires.

I am pleased to say that our canal system, connecting the great lakes with the Atlantic seaboard, has been completed so as to allow vessels having a draft of 14 feet to pass from the head of Lake Superior to the sea. The vigorous and successful prosecution of these works by my Government has already attracted the attention of those interested in western transportation, and there are good grounds for the hope that, when the necessary facilities for the quick and inexpensive handling of ocean traffic are provided and which are now in progress, Canadian ports will control a much larger share of the traffic of the West.

Measures will be introduced to renew and amend the existing banking laws, to regulate the rate of interest payable upon judgments recovered in courts of law, to provide for the taking of the next decennial census, for the better arrangement of the electoral districts, to amend the Criminal Code and the laws relating to other important subjects.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The public accounts will be laid before you, and also the estimates for the coming year, which have been prepared with due regard to economy and the rapid growth of the Dominion.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I commend to your consideration the subjects I have mentioned, confiding in your patriotism and judgment.

THE ADDRESS.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved :

That the Senate do take into consideration the speech of His Excellency the Governor General on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then ajourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, February 5, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATOR.

Hon. JOSEPH PHILIPPE BABY-CASGRAIN, representing the electoral division of De Lanaudière, vice Hon. Joseph H. Bellerose, deceased, was introduced and took his seat.

THE ADDRESS.

The Order of the Day being read:

Consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the Fifth Session of the Eighth Parliament.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (De Lanaudière) said (in French) : Called upon for the first time to address this legislative body where sit the wise and the aged of the nation, before this areopagus of our political world, before princes of finance, before, above all, men who have devoted the best of their lives to the service of the State, I feel under the influence of the deepest anxiety and the most natural emotions. Why should I try to conceal them in appearing before you, who know well the timidity of a novice in parliamentary career, knowing the great responsibility which attaches to the quasi-official words which I am invited to discuss under the grave and painful circumstances which surround the British Empire at this time. I have accepted with joy, hon. gentlemen of the Senate, the invitation which the government of my country has extended to me to move the adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the Throne, because I find therein, on the occasion of my entering for the first time this Chamber, an opportunity of expressing on my own behalf and for the province in which I was born, our sincere sentiments of loyalty towards our Gracious Sovereign. The other day his honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec with that appropriateness of expression which distinguishes him, wishing God speed to the Canadian officers who had put their swords and their lives at the service of the empire, on the occasion of their departure from the ancient city of Champlain, eloquently developed this thought, in recalling two immortal pages from our own history which in certain places people appear to leave in oblivion. Fifteen years had barely passed after the cession of Canada, when, as the Marquis of Montcalm had predicted long before the loss of Canada, already a tempest of revolt in nearly all the British colonies of America extinguished the peaceable fires on the hearths and rebellious hands carried triumphantly the incendiary torches of civil war in the fertile fields of the new world. The great majority of the sons of Albion on American soil raised the standard of revolt, and threatened to wrest from England the last of its colonies on this continent. Emissaries of the partisans of independence were sent to Canada to lead the Canadians into rebellion. They were prodigal of captious promises. Messrs. Franklin, Chase and Carroll passed weeks and weeks in Montreal trying to sow sedition there. Certainly the temptation was great, but our ancestors listening only to the voice of duty and the wise counsels of the Roman Catholic clergy, remained true to their sworn allegiance, and I am proud to be able to proclaim that Canada remains in the British Empire to-day, thanks to the loyalty of the descendants of France to the British Crown. Our great Canadian sculptor, Hebert, who immortalizes to-day in bronze the memory of that good man, of that great citizen, of that honest Prime Minister, who was Alexander Mackenzie, whose statue will adorn for ever the avenue leading to these legislative halls, erected several years ago on the historic shores of the Chambly River, another monument to remind future generations of the glory of that great patriot, the conqueror of Chateauguay, Colonel Salaberry. Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise herself unveiled his statue. For the second time under British rule our territory was invaded. The very existence of the colony was endangered. A patriotic union of the whole population was necessary to repulse the enemy. It was on the morning of the 26th October, 1813, Salaberry, commander-in-chief of the troops on that memorable day, presented his forces as a living rampart against the American invasion and won the glorious victory of Chateauguay. With 300 or 400 brave men, after a free fight of four hours' duration, he routed General Hampton and 7,000 United States soldiers. The fidelity and the courage of Canadians for the second time saved the colony and secured Canada to the empire for ever. In the presence of these undeniable historical facts, corroborated by all the English authors, is there an intelligent and sincere man who will say that England cannot count on the loyalty and devotion of the Canadian people to the utmost ?

The first paragraph of the speech from the Throne congratulates parliament on the new era of prosperity which reigns from the Atlantic to the Pacific. You know better than I do, hon. gentlemen, that Canada for the last three years has been striding forward with the pace of a giant in the path of progress. The development of our mineral resources is the marvel of the world. The icy regions of the Klondike and the Yukon, rival in richness the gold and silver mines of that land of eternal spring—British Columbia. Thanks to the enlightened and progressive administration of the Department of Agriculture, the products of the Canadian farm, which Providence has bountifully lavished upon us, are placed on the markets of Europe to-day in all their freshness and meet with success the competition of similar products coming from much nearer countries. The consul at Liverpool of the great republic, our neighbour, in an official report addressed to his government, admits that the effective and practical aid furnished by the Minister of Agriculture to the farmers of Canada, gives the Canadian products an immense advantage on the English market. The lumber trade, which was depressed for a number of years and which has been for a long time, with agriculture, one of the most fruitful sources of wealth to this country, has taken a new lease of life. The price of timber limits has doubled within a short time, and even those which had been considered of little use for years have acquired to-day a great value, for they serve now to supply the immense establishments where they make pulp, with which we shall soon supply the world. Near one of these establishments, as under the magic wand of a good fairy, the town of Grand Mère sprang up from the virgin forest with a population of 3,000 souls. What shall I say of the Falls of Shawenigan and of their marvellous development ? But time does not permit me to dwell upon them and I must pass on rapidly. New industries are born every day. Old industries double the capacity of their machines, increasing their factories and demanding of the people to furnish them the necessary hands. The artisans are all working full or overtime. All find remunerative work, bringing them happiness and ease in their humble homes.

Providence has dowered Canada with the finest commercial artery in the world. From the head of ocean navigation to the sources of the St. Lawrence at the extreme western end of Lake Superior, we have 1,400 miles of navigation, interrupted in some places by insurmountable cataracts. Without cultivation, the most fertile soil will yield nothing. Thus the work of man must second the work of the Creator and overcome the obstructions which God in his wisdom has placed on that incomparable route to prevent the too easy flow of the waters of the great lakes. In the course of a great number of years Canada has expended enormous sums to improve the St. Lawrence route. As the weakness of one link in a chain is the measure of its entire strength, so one shallow place is sufficient to interrupt the navigation of a great river. The Soulanges Canal had not yet been constructed. When the present administration took office a most important problem presented itself for consideration to the commercial world. The railways had attained such a high degree of perfection, the facilities for transportation had been so beautifully improved, by reducing grades and augmenting the capacity of the cars and the power of the locomotives, that the question was raised whether it might not be as well to abandon the further deepening of the canals and let the transport of grain go entirely to the railways. The government seriously studied the question, and after a most thorough inquiry on the matter, came to the conclusion, after consultation with engineers, that transport by water was still more advantageous. The rapids between the counties of Beauharnois and Soulanges were the last obstacles to be removed. The works were pushed with a vigour without parallel in the history of public works in this country, and under the able direction of that eminent engineer, Mr. Thomas Munro, the Soulanges Canal was opened last year for navigation. The engineer supplemented the work of nature, and from these inland seas which we call the great lakes, ships drawing fourteen feet of water are able to carry to the shores of the Atlantic the wheat grown on the immense plains of the west. With the deepening of Port Colborne opposite the city of Buffalo, and the carrying out of modern improvements at the port of Montreal, the national port of Canada, not only shall we transport our own Canadian wheat, of which the greater part at present takes the United States route, but we shall secure a large portion of the traffic from the western states. At the present hour, while I am addressing the hon. gentlemen of this Chamber, a syndicate is at work in the port of Montreal which has undertaken to transport as much grain as the total export of that port last year.

Hon. gentlemen of the Senate, I approve entirely of the sending of the Canadian contingents to Africa by the present government. For more than sixty years Canada has enjoyed profound peace. I have searched in vain in the pages of history down to the most recent times without finding in any part of the world another people of four or five millions who wished to develop its resources, which has become wealthy and powerful, without having to pay in money or in men for the protection or defence of its territory. Under the democratic institutions which have been given us, and which England has confirmed to us, we have enjoyed every constitutional liberty. Every creed and nationality has stood on an equal footing and enjoyed equal liberty on Canadian soil. We are all proud of possessing equal rights. We collect our own revenues and the people, at their free will, expend them through their representatives in the House of Commons. The gracious sovereign through whose royal munificence we have received all these benefits has incontestable claims upon our gratitude. So when the hour of danger sounded, when her territory was invaded, in all the provinces of the confederation, hundreds and thousands of men volunteered to sacrifice their lives on the battle field of Africa in defence of the empire. In the presence of that grand manifestation of patriotism the course of the government was plainly traced. Ignoring for the moment the letter of the constitution, and listening only to the voice of gratitude and the dictates of the heart, the ministry entered upon a new policy without assembling the representatives of the people and spent the public money anticipating the approval of the Commons. I do not believe, hon. gentlemen, that the government will be condemned for that action by Her Majesty's loyal Canadian subjects. In addition to these two contingents, the High Commissioner of Canada in London, Lord Strathcona, with the munificence of which he has given proofs on so many occasions in Canada—witness his donation of nearly a million dollars to the Royal Victoria Hospital and his endowment of over two millions to McGill University—has undertaken at his own expense to equip a contingent of five hundred men furnishing them with arms and mounts complete. He is sending them to South Africa in steamships expressly fitted for that purpose, transforming them into veritable military transports. I hope that the government of this country, with the entire population, on the approaching return of Lord Strathcona to Canada will testify to him by an immense demonstration their appreciation of his generosity, which surpasses aught that has ever been done in the United Kingdom by any one citizen whether noble or plebeian. The ministers themselves have paid their tribute in blood, and the sons of three of them are now facing the enemy on the soil of South Africa. The only son of the Speaker of this House, Col. Oscar Pelletier, parting from his wife and children, bidding adieu to the banks of the St. Lawrence, confiding to the care of his country all that is most dear to him in the world, is now opposing his breast to the fire of the enemy in defence of the British flag. Let us pray God, the God of battles, that he will protect our sons and our brothers, and return them to their homes covered with glory after having aided in achieving victory for the British arms on the soil of Africa, restored the sovereignty of the Queen in the Transvaal and hoisted the British flag triumphant over Pretoria. I have the honour to move the adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the Throne.

Hon. Mr. BURPEE—In rising to second the motion of the hon. gentleman who has preceded me, I think I can claim consideration in any remarks that I may make, as I am a new member of the Senate, and I know that the policy of this honourable body is to always extend a certain consideration to new members. I have not the pleasure of understanding the language in which the hon. mover has addressed the House. I am sorry that my education is deficient in that respect. I have no doubt that he has dealt with the important measures that are foreshadowed in the speech in a very exhaustive and able manner, and if I could interpret all that he has said, I have no doubt I would be inclined to let well enough alone, and resume my seat after having seconded the address. But, hon. gentlemen, if you will bear with me for a short time, I will allude to some of the important measures that are foreshadowed in the speech from the Throne. The first paragraph refers to the prosperity of this country as evidenced by its increased importation and exportation. I need not dwell upon the fact that this Dominion of ours is enjoying a high degree of prosperity. That cannot be disputed when we see by the papers that the volume of trade has increased eighty-two and a half million, in round numbers, for the last three years, making for each year, an average of twenty-seven and a half millions. This certainly is a gratifying statement, and proves conclusively that the Dominion is in a very prosperous condition. Not only is that so, but it is a fact that within the last six months of the fiscal year our volume of trade amounted to two hundred and three million dollars. The trade returns of corresponding six months of previous year was only one hundred and seventy-seven millions dollars, being an increase of twenty-six million dollars. The subject that is commanding most attention in this country at this time is the unfortunate war which Great Britain is now waging against the Orange Free State and the Transvaal. Great Britain no doubt has been driven into this war against her inclination. The fact is that the misgovernment of the Transvaal, and the manner in which the Boer government has persecuted the Uitlanders of all creeds and nationalities, is a grievance which could not be overlooked in view of the number of British subjects residing in that country. She remonstrated and negotiations were carried on with a view to ameliorating or lessening the grievances of the Uitlanders, but they all failed. Instead of meeting the British government in a proper spirit, the negotiations culminated in the Boer government sending the British government an impertinent demand to at once cease sending troops and munitions of war into her own colonies. Hardly had the negotiations terminated, when the Boer armies invaded British territory, compelling the British government to take up arms in defence of her own colonies and to redress the grievances of her subjects and others in the Transvaal, and in the interest of good government and fair dealing with all classes and all denominations in the South African Republic. It is with pride that we recall the prompt manner in which the government and people of Canada volunteered to take up arms in defence of their Queen and empire. From one end of the country to the other, a spirit of loyalty prevailed in every household, and the people came forward nobly with men and means to assist the Imperial government in their struggle for right, for justice and good government.

I believe that before many decades it will be demonstrated that the Boers are now fighting against their own material interest. I believe that they will be subdued and that they will be given a constitution similar to ours as soon as they are capable and willing to accept and carry it out. I believe they will be given such a degree of self government as will enable them to become greater and more influential in the world than they are now. The fact is, if they had a government such as ours, capital and emigration would flow in there, and the country would develop by leaps and bounds. The government of Canada is the freest and best in the world. In testimony of this I will just for a moment revert to an incident which occurred in the year 1865, when a gentleman from Montreal, who was a public man with large experience in different countries and under different governments—I refer to the Hon. D'Arcy McGee—gave a lecture in the city of St. John at the Mechanics' Institute on the subject of Irish affairs. In the course of that lecture he told his hearers that he had lived in Ireland, that he was born in Ireland, and that he had great sympathy for his native land, that he believed they had grievances, some of which he recited. He had lived in England a number of years, and he understood the government of England pretty well. He then said he had lived in the United States some four or five years, and as a journalist he understood pretty well the system of government there. He had lived in Canada a few years, and he said 'gentlemen, when in Ireland I was called an Irish rebel. Under similar circumstances I would be so again, but in Canada I claim to be as good and loyal a British subject as there is in the Dominion, and for the reason that we have the freest constitution and best governed country in the world.' I think that goes to show why we are happy in our government. We are free under the rule of Great Britain, and we are proud to belong to an empire on which the sun never sets, and which is able to defend herself and her subjects no matter what part of the world they are in. I wish to mention briefly some of the other measures alluded to in the address. Reference is made in the speech from the Throne to the trade relations of the country, and to preferential trade with England, and it is gratifying to note that the trade with England has been increasing for the last two years at least. In the year 1898 it increased three millions under the twelve and a half per cent reduction of tariff. In the following year, with twenty-five per cent reduction of tariff, it increased four and a half million dollars; so that it is increasing from year to year. I think that is something to be commended. The agriculture of the Dominion is alluded to. The government and the Minister of Agriculture deserve credit for the manner in which they have facilitated the export of agricultural products by providing cheap and expeditious transportation and cold storage, which preserves many of the articles in a proper state for sale in England. The address also refers to the necessity for proper inspection. That is a matter which should be looked after very sharply because it is a fact, as stated by the journals of the day, that a large quantity of inferior United States goods are put upon the market in England as Canadian goods. This should be checked. The reduction in postage rates is a great boon to the people, and I am pleased to see that it is expected that the loss caused by the reduction of one cent on letters and other postal matters, will be overcome by the extra amount of postage which will be received. With regard to another subject, the expansion of our markets to the West Indies and to South America, it is important that we should take every advantages of markets outside the Dominion for our surplus products. And it is a fact that we are in a great measure excluded from the markets of our neighbours to the south by a very high and restrictive tariff, The nearest market outside of the United States is the English market, and of course being the second nearest to us, would be the second best, and if we cannot obtain fair trade relations with the United States, we must look elsewhere. I hope the government will be successful in its effort to secure freer trade relations with the West Indies and South America. Another matter to which I will allude which perhaps is not strictly included in any of the subjects mentioned in the speech, is the fact that in the United States the press and a number of the public men advocate a high tariff, a Chinese commercial wall in order that they may drive Canada into their arms. In view of the operation of the preferential tariff, and the ebullition of loyalty which has aroused Canada from one end to the other, the United States will no longer entertain the idea that they can, by any high tariff, or by excluding our commodities from their markets drive us into annexation, their restrictive legislation has had the very opposite effect. If we cannot obtain fair reciprocal trade relations with other countries, Canada is quite able to paddle her own canoe. Then I may say that the immigration in the North-west is very gratifying. It is said that fifty thousand immigrants entered that country last year, and that fifteen thousand which number came from the United States which is an advance over any previous year. There is just one other point with which I will trouble this honourable House to-day, and that is with reference to the expansion of our trade by the opening up of our canals, the extension of our railways and the facilities given for cheap transportation to the seaports of the Dominion. We have in the province of New Brunswick, in St. John, expended a large amount of money in facilitating the exportation of western goods to England. We are prepared to do a large amount of that export trade, and I do hope that hereafter, as is indicated in the speech from the Throne, a larger proportion of western trade will be exported through our own Canadian seaports.

NEW SENATORS.

The following newly appointed Senators were introduced and took their seats :

Hon. ROBERT WATSON, of Portage la Prairie, Man., vice Hon. John Sutherland, deceased.

Hon. FINLAY M. YOUNG, of Killarney, Man., vice Hon. C. A. Boulton, deceased.

THE ADDRESS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL resumed the debate. He said : I may be permitted to congratulate the House on the acquisition to its debating talent, after having listened to the hon. gentleman who moved the address in answer to the speech from the Throne. I frankly admit that my knowledge of the French language is not such as to fully appreciate his remarks, but from what I could glean from them, they breathe that spirit of patriotism and loyalty to the Crown which I am quite sure actuated his ancestors, and I am glad to know that they are the views of a vast majority of the people of this country, irrespective of their nationality. I had the pleasure for a good many years of sitting opposite my friend (Hon. Mr. Burpee), who is well on in years like myself, in the House of Commons, and I could not help smiling when he asked the indulgence of the House for a young member. True he is a young member in the Senate, but like myself he is rather an old experienced legislator. He had, with myself, the honour, for such I may deem it, of occupying a seat in the House of Commons for a number of years, and it has always been my pleasure to be on the opposite side from him. We have smiled at each other occasionally across the floor, and I hope for many years to come we may be able to occupy similar positions. Before dealing with the subjects mentioned in the address, I should like to ask the leader of the government why the Senate has not been treated with the same courtesy which was extended to the House of Commons in the matter of the correspondence between the Imperial government and this government, and all other correspondence relating to the sending of the contingents from Canada to South Africa. Those of us who have had a little experience in parliamentary practice were rather amused, if not surprised, at the little, shall I say dodge—perhaps that would be unparliamentary—but the little by-play between the Premier and the gentleman who resigned his seat in the House of Commons in protestation of the course pursued by the Premier in asking for the enrolment of 1,000 volunteers to send to the Transvaal without calling parliament together. When the motion was put for the debate on the address, the right hon. gentleman, the leader of the lower House, turned around, indicating that there was an understanding between these two gentlemen, who agree so admirably upon the course which he had pursued, to ask for an adjournment. The adjournment was asked for, and he condescendingly consented to give it. During my 30 years of parliamentary experience, I have no recollection of ever having witnessed a scene of that kind, or seen a course of that character pursued. I have often heard the leader of the opposition demand from the government of the day the production of certain papers before proceeding with the address. But I never yet saw my old and venerated leader, Sir John Macdonald, accede to such a proposition, the constitutional practice and principle being that on all occasions the address from the Governor should be answered before any documents are laid on the table, for two reasons: first, courtesy to the Crown, and, second, as an indication of the approval of the representatives of the people of the government of the day. That is the position he took, and I repeat that he always refused to accede to any request of the kind. Perhaps this precedent, to which some members of the government object very strongly, may be looked forward to in the future as a guide to what we should have, or what we may demand before we proceed with the consideration of the speech from the Throne. Let me again ask the leader of the House, why, if it were deemed advisable and expedient to postpone the consideration of the address from Thursday until the following Monday, in order that this correspondence should be placed in the hands of the members of the House of Commons, that that same courtesy has not been extended to us. If that correspondence was necessary to debate the address and consider it intelligently, in the House of Commons, is it not equally important that it should be supplied to this House in order that we might know how to discuss a matter involving such momentous consequences? It may possibly be that the government think that the Senate is not of sufficient importance, or even that it is not an integral part of the government of this country. They may be of the same impression as the Minister of Public Works, who said, in a speech recently delivered in Montreal, that while there are very able and talented men in the House of Commons, a large proportion of the senators are not worth the rope that would be sufficient to hang them. Or they may think that we are in the position in which Sir Richard Cartwright, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, placed us in his speech in the city of Toronto: When asked the question, 'What about the Senate'? he said, 'We will leave the Senate to Providence to get rid of that incubus.' My hon. friend beside me (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) suggests that even that is better than the hangman. However, judging from the youthful appearance of some of those who have been admitted to seats in the Senate to-day, I am of the impression that it will be a long time before Providence removes them from the Upper Chamber. To withhold necessary information is an indignity to this House. We should have been treated as the House of Commons has been treated, and if we should be led astray in debating the question, the error may be attributed to the fact that we have not been supplied with necessary information. I leave it to the senators to judge whether the demand which I have made is relevant or improper under the circumstances. The hon. gentleman who moved the address spoke in eloquent terms of the loyalty of the people of Canada to the Crown, and of the progress which the country is making. He informed us of the great benefits which the farmers had derived from the information furnished them by the Minister of Agriculture, which he considered a means of opening up the markets of Europe for the products of our farms. Well, I am not prepared to say that the advance in our trade with the mother country has not been the result of that policy, but it is amusing to those who know something of the past to hear hon. gentlemen attribute all that benefit to the action of the present Minister of Agriculture. He has not taken one single step which was not first inaugurated by the late government. I commend him for the course that he has pursued. The policy which was laid down for cold storage, the opening up of the markets of Europe and furnishing information which would help the people of this country, has been followed up by the present government, but it was inaugurated and was being carried out to its fullest extent by the late government. In that particular to the trade of this country, I say absolutely and de facto that they did not depart and have not yet deviated to any great extent from the policy of the late government as regards the protection given the country, by Sir Leonard Tilley as long ago as 1869, up to the present time. My hon. friend opposite spoke about preferential trade and said that under it trade has increased. So it has, but the trade of the country under the policy that has been adopted, which is termed preferential trade, has increased to a much larger extent between the United States and this country than between England and Canada. And more than that, when hon. gentlemen speak of the reduction of the tariff, if hon. gentlemen look at the tariff as it stands to-day and compare it with the tariff as it existed prior to their advent to office, and make the calculation, after the reduction in the tariff including the free and dutiable goods, with all the preferential tariffs given to free trade countries, you will find that it amounts to the enormous sum of about one seventieth of one hundred per cent. You may go further: instead of being a free trade policy, which my venerable friend in front of me was always very fond of, hon. gentlemen will find that some of the articles even under the preferential tariff are higher to-day than they were under the old protective tariff. Hon. gentlemen may say that that is a bold statement, but I ask them to take the tariff of twenty-five per cent under the old Act, and add the ten per cent, which they did prior to the reduction of twenty-five per cent, and they will find that we have a twenty-six and a quarter per cent tariff, or 1¼ per cent more under the preferential clause and ten per cent more under the general clause of the new tariff than under the old arrangement. Is it any wonder, under such circumstances, that our various manufactures are increasing and are prosperous to-day? I venture the assertion, and I say it with full deliberation, that if the pledges made by the members of the present government to the people of this country had been carried out in their entirety, the same prosperous conditions would not exist to-day. I see before me two or three hon. friends from the North-west and Manitoba who complained of the ruinous protection given to the manufacturers of agricultural implements, which they contended was weighing down the energies of the farmer. Did the present government take off any duties which would affect the manufacturing interest that existed in this country upon these particular articles? It is true that they reduced some specific duties and made them ad valorem. It is quite true also that they reduced the duties upon some of the minor articles, such as spades and that kind of thing, but they did not reduce the duties upon those articles which cost the most and which was represented to the farmers as being ruinous to them—I mean the duty upon reapers, treshing machines, &c. Take the agricultural implements manufactured to-day, threshers and reapers; they were twenty per cent under the reduction which was made by the late government. That duty has not been lowered. I will tell hon. gentlemen what they did, as every hon. gentleman who is listening to me knows. They gave a stronger grade of protection to the manufacturer by leaving the duty as it was and reducing the duty upon the raw material out of which an article was made. They encouraged the manufacturer by increasing the protection, so that if he was a robber before he must be a superlative robber now. He is taking more out of the farmers of the North-west at the present time than was taken out of them by that protective tariff, when Sir Richard Cartwright said that the manufacturers were 'robbers great and robbers small.' My hon. friend suggests that there are some articles which they did put upon the free list. They put barbed wire on the free list; it is dearer to-day than when it had the duty on. They put binder twine on the free list; and by the manipulations of the government with their friends the contractors, when they sold the binder twine to them at about four and a half cents, I think it was, or at any rate at a very small rate per pound, and refused to let the country know, when they were asked in this House and in the House of Commons the rate at which they had disposed of it to these favoured contractors. They refused to give it the information, and why? Because they said it would interfere with their trade and their selling it to the farmers at such a remunerative rate as they were entitled to under the circumstances. That was the reason given. They sold to the farmers in the North-west at a price ranging from ten to thirteen cents per pound. That is one of the effects of free trade.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Seventeen cents now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There may be a reson for that. The reason given by the hon. Minister of Justice in this House may have some force, but it had no force then. When I pointed out that fact to the Senate last session, I was told the increased price had been caused by the war in the Philippine Islands, that the manila which was imported from that part of the world and out of which the binder twine was made, had risen so enormously that these people had to sell at a higher rate. That story and that explanation might do for those who knew no better. We all know that the manila out of which the binder twine was manufactured was imported into Canada before the war in the Philippine Islands took place, and could not by any means have affected the price of the raw material out of which the binder twine was made. Since that time there has been a war, and the industry of that country has fallen off to a very great extent, and there may be a reason this year why it is higher than it was last year, but that reason did not exist at the time this explanation was given, and consequently the government enabled the favoured contractors to put a large amount of money—from sixty to a hundred thousands dollars of actual profit it is said—in their own pockets at the expense of those down-trodden farmers of whom we heard so much before these gentlemen came into power. I must admit, and I congratulate my hon. friend opposite on the fact, that the roasting, if I may use that expression, which the leader of the government got last year for the manner in which they disposed of binder twine manufactured in the penitentiary, has led him to adopt another plan this year, namely, advertising throughout the whole country for applications to be made for the purchase of the output of the penitentiary. That is the course that should be pursued upon all occasions, and when the twine is sold there is no reason why this country should not know the price obtained for it. This is a question which I might continue to discuss and elaborate for hours, but I shall confine myself more particularly to some other portions of the address which is before me. I must express my great gratification at the ultimate decision come to by the government in reference to the Transvaal difficulty, but if any precedent for the course that has been pursued can be found in history, I should be very glad to have this Senate informed of it by the hon. gentleman who leads this House, the hon. Minister of Justice, who is a recognized authority on historical questions. In the first place when hostilities broke out, the leader of the opposition in the Commons addressed the Prime Minister of this country and pledged his party to support the government if they would take steps to render assistance to the mother country. Instead of meeting that offer in a proper spirit, the proposition having been made by the leader of the opposition in a patriotic manner, in a manner that should receive the commendation of every loyal subject in this country, he was snubbed, and I do think that I am not using too strong language when I say that the Premier's reply to him was not of that dignified character which should characterize the utterances of the Prime Minister of this country. Without telling him what he thought he could not do, he volunteered the expression that he was not to be expected to be more loyal than the Queen herself. I cannot possibly conceive why an answer of that kind should have been given. Then we find, immediately afterwards, the Premier, we have reason to believe, seeking an interview with the reporter of a leading ministerial journal giving his views as to why he should not act upon the suggestion which had been made by Sir Charles Tupper, and he tells him that he had studied the militia law—he had looked through its provisions, and that they had no power whatever to send people out of the country, and that they had no authority other than that which could be given by parliament to expend money for any such purpose. The constitutional point raised by the Premier at the time no one would dispute in theory, but there are periods in the history of all countries when the government, and particularly a responsible government, take upon themselves the responsibility of acting, trusting to the good sense and loyalty of the people's representatives in the parliament to pass either an Act of Indemnity or to sustain the government in the course which they had taken. Then we find them some little time afterwards, after a despatch had been received from the Imperial government, authorizing the enrolment of 1,000 volunteers. Upon that, one of his most intimate friends, personally and politically, resigned his position in the House of Commons in condemnation of the course which the Liberal government had pursued. We find another gentleman, the representative of Laprairie (Mr. Monet) declaring that he was opposed to the enrolment. I have an extract from his speech under my hand—that he was opposed to the enrolment of any volunteers. He was opposed to the expenditure of one cent in aid of England in her difficulty, or to cement—I think that is the word he used—the union which exists between the two countries. Then we find, in addition to that, the Minister of Public Works taking strong objection to the sending of this contingent and boasting upon the platform at public meetings that he had taken good care it should not be made a precedent in the future. Whether the first contingent is to be considered a precedent, followed by the other two, I must leave to others better acquainted with the English language than I am to decide. Then we had that unique exhibition the other day in the House of Commons of seeing a gentleman introduced after his election to a seat in the House of Commons between the Minister of Public Works and a gentleman who had declared his opposition to the expenditure of one dollar to aid England in her difficulties. Why the gentleman resigned his position in the House of Commons in condemnation of the course which the government had pursued, for which the Minister of Public Works was just as responsible under our system as the Premier himself, introduced into the House of Commons by that gentleman and another gentleman who threatened to resign, and declared in the strongest possible language his condemnation of the course which the government had pursued? Yet he takes this gentleman by the arm and walks with him into the House of Commons and introduces him, which implies that he was in accord with their sentiment and their policy. It was an exhibition of gross hypocrisy which I trust will never be repeated in this country. Now, what is our position at this moment? I have outlined the course which has been pursued by the government of the day. Does Canada stand to-day in an enviable position as compared with the other colonies? Is it not a humiliating fact that no step was taken by the first colony of Great Britain in the direction of aiding the mother country in the present difficulty until all the other colonies had telegraphed to the Home government their wilingness to render assistance. Although the government did not deem the Senate of sufficient importance to lay the correspondence before us, treating us in this manner as in others, with disrespect, there is an Imperial document which was printed and laid before the Imperial parliament which I hold in my hands, and which gives us the information which gentlemen opposite took precious good care to withhold from us.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. Minister of Justice says hear, hear. Has he laid it before us, or does he deem it unnecessary that the House should have it when they deem necessary to adjourn the other House for two or three days, contrary to all precedent and usage, in order that the gentlemen who had been protesting against their actions might have those documents in their hands. That may be their idea of right and wrong. It is not my idea of what this House deserves at their hands or at the hands of any government. I find on referring to these documents correspondence relating to the sending of the contingent to South Africa, printed by command and laid on the table of the House of Commons in England, the following facts: Queensland made its first offer on July 11, 1899. Victoria followed on July 12. Even the little Malay States offered a certain contingent on July 17. Lagos made its offer by telegraph on July 18, New South Wales made its offer on July 21. Hong Kong—not a large contingent, I admit, but for the size of the island it was important, offered 300 equipped men for service in the Transvaal. That was on September 21. New Zealand followed in the same line on the 22nd. West Australia's offer was made on October 5. Tasmania's offer was on October 9. South Australia's offer was on October 13 and this Canada of ours came in afterwards on October 14; not, mark you, until the document which I am about to read was received by the government of this country. So you can easily understand the declarations at different public meetings by the Minister of Public Works, that they had made no offer to send any men from this country, and I ask the Senate, those who have not had the privilege of reading this paper to mark well the language which is used by Mr. Chamberlain. The Hon.

Mr. Chamberlain wrote to the Governor General, the Earl of Minto, and it was sent at 5.15 p.m., October 3, 1899, this telegram—bear in mind—bears date October 3, and also bear in mind, when I am reading it, the reference that I made to the interview with the Globe which was on October 4, the day after the telegram was despatched from England to Lord Minto. The Colonial Secretary telegraphs as follows:

Secretary of State for War and Commander-in-Chief desire to express high appreciation of signal exhibition of patriotic spirit of people of Canada shown by offers to serve in South Africa, and to furnish following information to assist organization of force offered into units suitable for military requirements. Firstly, units should consist of about 125 men ; secondly, may be infantry, mounted infantry, or cavalry ; in view of numbers already available infantry most, cavalry least serviceable ; thirdly, all should be armed with ·303 rifles or carbines, which can be supplied by Imperial government if necessary ; fourthly, all must provide own equipment, and mounted troops own horses ; fifthly, not more than one captain and three subalterns each unit. Whole force may be commanded by officer not higher than major. In considering numbers which can be employed, Secretary of State for War guided by nature of offers, by desire that each colony should be fairly represented, and limits necessary if force is to be fully utilized by available staff as integral portion of Imperial forces; would gladly accept four units. Conditions as follows :—Troops to be disembarked at port of landing, South Africa, fully equipped at cost of Colonial government or volunteers. From date of embarkation Imperial government will provide pay at Imperial rates, supplies, and ammunition, and will defray expenses of transport back to Canada, and pay wound pensions and compassionate allowances at Imperial rates. Troops to embark not later than 31st October, proceeding direct to Cape Town for orders. Inform accordingly all who have offered to raise volunteers.

Now, that despatch shows this, in as clear language as it is possible to be, that the government of Canada never made any offer to the Imperial authorities to assist them in the present war, because the Colonial Secretary asks the Governor General to express high appreciation of the signal exhibition of patriotic spirit of the people of Canada shown by offers to serve in South Africa, and to furnish the following information to assist the organization of the forces offered into units suitable for military requirements. Now, that was sent on October 3. The Premier gave expression to his own view that there was no law, or authority to enable the government to do it, on the 4th of the same month; but after the indignation which had been exhibited from one end of the Dominion to the other at the inaction of the government of the day in not following the example set them by the different colonies all over the empire, they attempted to act, and, as Sir Wilfrid Laurier said in his speech at Sherbrooke the other day—I am not using the exact words—the feeling of the country was such that they yielded to it, and they permitted the enrolling and organization of 1,000 men to assist in the defence of their own country, because Canada is an integral part of the British empire and a blow struck at the Crown or institutions of England is a blow at Canada just as much as it is at England, Ireland or Scotland. I was delighted to hear the expressions of opinion from the hon. gentleman who moved this address, showing that he holds the same view that I express on this question, and that he could speak for his own people, those with whom he is best acquainted, that they hold similar views. I believe the sentiments expressed by Mr. Préfontaine, the mayor of Montreal, is the view of his countrymen of all classes, that they enjoy in Canada to-day greater liberties in religion and institutions than they would if they had remained under the French crown. That is the spirit which I hope to see prevail in this country. It has been in the past a common thing to say that Canada has no history. But the history of the empire is the history of Canada, and the man who is born in the motherland, whether in England, Ireland or Scotland, coming to this country, is only moving from one part of that great empire to another. He does not surrender one iota of the rights and privileges he enjoyed at home. I am English-born. My father brought me to this country, but he never surrendered one title of the rights he enjoyed in England, when he came to this country, and my son, although born of a Canadian mother, and born in Canada, has all the rights and privileges of a British subject that I have, though I happened to be born in England, and that is the spirit, I hold, which should actuate every Canadian, whether of French, English, or any other extraction. I regretted to see the expression made use of by the Premier of this country, in one of his speeches, that he could not expect the French Canadians to hold the same sentimental ideas that Engglishmen held. Why not? Is not my hon. friend who spoke to-day, as much of a British subject as my son, who happens to be of English and Dutch extraction? You may as well say that if England was in difficulty with Denmark, that I who sprung from the Danes when they invaded Britain, should not be interested! Suppose difficulties should arise between Britain and Denmark, why should I say my sympathies are not with my native country because I am descended from the Danes? It is not the spirit which should actuate any man, and more particularly a public man who controls the destinies of the country at a serious period in our history. It will be interesting to read his order in council which was passed, and of which, no doubt, my hon. friend opposite could let us know the secret history—but he cannot do that because of the oath of office he has taken—but I should have liked very much to have been behind the scenes and heard the discussions between the different ministers and the Minister of Public Works on this question of precedent and what should be done. Take this order in council which was passed on the report of the Prime Minister, and you will come to the conclusion that, like some other portions of the address now before us, would lead one to suppose that there is a good deal of truth in what Talleyrand said, that language is given to hide men's thoughts. Here is this order in council.

The Committee of the Privy Council have under consideration a despatch dated 3rd October, 1899, from the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain.

That is the despatch which I read a few moments ago, giving information to those who had volunteered to serve in South Africa. The order in council continues:

The Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, to whom the said despatch was referred, observes that the Colonial Secretary, in answer to the offers which have been sent to him from different parts of Canada expressing the willingness and anxiety of Canadians to serve Her Majesty's government in the war which for a long time has been threatening with the Transvaal Republic and which, unfortunately, has actually commenced, enunciates the conditions under which such offers may be accepted by the Imperial authorities. Those conditions may be practically summed up in the statement that a certain number of volunteers by units of 125 men, with a few officers, will be accepted to serve in the British army now operating in South Africa, the moment they reach the coast, provided the expenses of their equipment and transportation to South Africa, are defrayed either by themselves or by the colonial government.

The Prime Minister, in view of the well-known desire of a great many Canadians, who are ready to take service under such conditions, is of opinion that the moderate expenditure which would thus be involved for the equipment and transportation of such volunteers may readily be undertaken by the government of Canada without summoning parliament, especially as such an expenditure under such circumstances cannot be regarded as a departure from the well-known principles of constitutional government and colonial practice, nor construed as a precedent for future action.

Already, under similar conditions, New Zealand has sent two companies, Queensland is about to send 250 men, and West Australia and Tasmania are sending 125 men each.

The Prime Minister, therefore, recommends that out of the stores now available in the Militia Department, the government undertake to equip a certain number of volunteers, not to exceed 1,000 men, and to provide for their transportation from this country to South Africa, and that the Minister of Militia make all necessary arrangements to the above effect.

The committee advise that Your Excellency be moved to forward a certified copy of this minute to the Right Hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

All of which is respectfully submitted for Your Excellency's approval.

JOHN J. McGEE,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What is the date of that?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—October 5.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, October 14, some eleven or twelve days after the receipt of the despatch. Now, compare that language with the language of the Prime Minister which is quoted by Mr. Bourassa in his letter to the Prime Minister, and see how the one contradicts the other. On October 4, the day after the receipt of the Colonial Secretary's despatch the right hon. Premier of this country had an interview with the Globe reporter, and this is the language which he used:

There exists a great deal of misconception in the country regarding the powers of the government in the present case, said Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as I understand the Militia Act, and I may say that I have given it some study of late—our volunteers are enrolled to be used in the defence of the Dominion. They are Canadian troops to be used to fight for Canada's defence. Perhaps the most widespread misapprehension is that they cannot be sent out of Canada. To my mind it is clear that cases might arise when they might be sent to a foreign land to fight. Spain has or had a navy and that navy might be got ready to assail Canada as part of the empire. Sometimes the best methods of defending one's self is to attack, and in that case Canadian soldiers might certainly be sent to Spain, and it is quite certain that they might be so despatched to the Iberian Peninsula. The case of the South African Republic is not analogous.

That is because the South African Republic has no navy. It will puzzle, I think, some of us to understand this reasoning and this kind of logic. He proceeds :

There is no menace to Canada, and although we may be willing to contribute troops, I do not see how we can do so. Then, again, how could we do so, without parliament granting us the money. We simply could not do anything. In other words, we should have to summon parliament. The government of Canada is restricted in its power. It is responsible to parliament, and it can do very little without the permission of parliament. There is no doubt as to the attitude of the government on all questions that mean menace to British interests, but in this present case, our limitations are very clearly defined, and so it is that we have not offered a Canadian contingent to the home authorities. The Militia Department duly transmitted individual offers to the Imperial government and the reply from the war office, as published in Saturday's 'Globe,' shows their attitude on the question. As to Canada furnishing a contingent the Government has not discussed the question.

Hon. gentlemen will remember precisely what I said, that this interview was after the receipt of that despatch from the Colonial Office.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—By His Excellency. As I understand that interview which my hon. friend had, professed to be on the 4th. The despatch was at five o'clock on the 3rd.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Precisely what I said.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend goes further and says what he does not know, that the despatch was in the hands of the Prime Minister.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not say that, as I do not know whether it was or not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understood the hon. gentleman to say so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I said his interview was on the 4th and the despatch was sent on the 3rd, and I say further without any reflection upon the Governor General, that when I was in the government, an important despatch of that kind being received by the Governor General would have been immediately sent to the Prime Minister of the country, and I cannot conceive it possible that any head of the government of this country would withhold from the Prime Minister a despatch of that importance, and I draw the inference from that, that the Premier must have known the contents of that despatch, because he says it was published, and therefore he must have known it. He says distinctly 'As conveyed in the despatch which has been published;' which is clear evidence that he knew what he was talking about. I will not say that it is a quibble on the part of my hon. friend, because I do not think it would be courteous to say so; but I say it is an endeavour to evade the real point at issue, and which I do not think at all necessary under the circumstances. He says further :

As to Canada furnishing a contingent, the government has not discussed the question for the reasons I have stated, reasons which I think must be easily understood by every one who understands the constitution and laws on the question. The statement of the 'Military Gazette' published this morning——

What statement was that, I should like to know other than that to which I have referred, the official telegram which I have read, which was sent to Lord Minto.

Far from possessing any foundation in fact, it is wholly original.

Then we find the hon. gentleman after making that positive declaration as to the constitutional practice and the powers which he possesed in this report to the council on October 14, stating that it is a case in which the government might encroach on the constitutional practice and usage. With that I am fully in accord. It is very often the case that under constitutional government these things must occur, and they would be justified, because he was told by the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons that he would receive no condemnation, but on the contrary would receive the support of every one who was following him in any course that he might pursue in reason. Then the next statement is pertinent to the point I am now discussing. He says :

A Bill will be submitted for your approval, making provision for the cost of equipping and paying the Canadian contingent.

What does that mean ? Does it mean the transport to South Africa alone, or does it mean that the government are prepared to introduce a Bill to pay the whole expenditure of that contingent ? Let me express the hope that the latter interpretation is the one which should be given to it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps the Minister of Justice or the hon. Secretary of State will give that information when he rises to reply. I can assure the House from my knowledge of the feeling of the people in this country that they occupy a position to-day such as they did not occupy twenty or thirty years ago. They consider themselves as much a part of the British Empire as the men who live in Great Britain itself, and having received the protection of that empire since our existence they are prepared to put their hands in their pockets and pay the full expenditure attending that contingent, and I only hope that the government may change their minds and that they may set a precedent and ask parliament to pay every cent in connection with that contingent and their maintenance during the war.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And the proportion of the arms, equipment and expenses attending the campaign?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Everything attending it. I go the full length, I put myself in the position of a son defending his own father's fireside, and that son is not worthy of the parent if he is not prepared at any moment to assist in defending his father not only with physical force, but with every means at his disposal. I went as far as I deemed it advisable when I seconded the motion at the last session of parliament moved by the hon. Minister of Justice, in which this House unanimously expressed its approval of the policy of Great Britain in protecting the civil and religious rights of British subjects and foreigners in the Transvaal. At that time I used this language:

> While it is not our province in this Chamber to even suggest an appropriation of money or the raising of money to assist in carrying on a war, should a war unfortunately occur, we can at least say that any appropriation that will be asked for by the Commons, no matter who might be in power at the time, would be readily voted by the Senate for that purpose.

I am still of that opinion, and I hope that as the government changed its opinion in reference to sending the contingent, that they may also change their opinion upon this question of expenditure. I know that it has been said by the Minister of Public Works in defence of the course which he has pursued, that Sir John Macdonald never offered to send any contingent to assist Great Britain in her difficulties. My answer to that is that no necessity existed in the past similar to the one that exists to-day.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend the Minister of Justice says 'Hear, hear!' Is there any comparison between the position Canada occupies towards the British Crown at the present time and the position it occupied at the time of confederation? At that time we were looked upon as mere colonists and treated as such. We had not the status, which we have to-day in the British Empire. And even, had it been required at that time it would have been given just as readily as at present. The Minister of Public Works went further, and stated that Sir John Macdonald always looked with suspicion on the question of Imperial federation because it might involve Canada in the wars which might take place between England and some foreign power. Let me read one little extract from Sir John Macdonald's speech in the confederation debates, and it will show that he saw in the future what was coming, and that he prophesied exactly what has taken place to-day, and instead of holding the opinion that the Minister of Public Works has attributed to him, he held precisely the contrary view. Speaking of the growth and strength to the empire by the federation of the different provinces that then existed, Sir John Macdonald pointed out that through the influences of the provinces we would become one of the strong arms of the empire. He said:

> It will be year by year less a case of dependence on our part and of overruling protection on the part of the mother country, and more a case of healthy and cordial alliance. Instead of looking on as a merely dependent colony, England will have in us a friendly nation to stand by her in North America in peace as in war. The people of Australia will be such another nation, and England will have this advantage if her colonies progress under the new colonial system, as I believe they will, that though at war with all the rest of the world, she will be able to look to the nations in alliance with her and owing allegiance to the same sovereign who will assist in enabling her again to meet the whole world in arms as she has done before.

Does that sound like the utterance of a statesman who was opposed to rendering aid to the mother country in her difficulties ? He realized what might take place. The cementing together of the different colonies was to form the strong arm of the empire in a time of need, and he goes so far as to say that when the empire is at war with all the other nations, Canada, Australia, and the confederated provinces in different parts of the world, which owed their allegiance to the Crown, would be ready to assist the mother country in any difficulty in which she might be found. I have read that to the House in order that it may be brought again to the minds of the senators, and in reply to the charge which has been made against that hon. gentleman. I could go on to show that the present Premier in the debates which took place not many years ago, when the late D'Alton McCarthy was advocating the principle of Imperial federation, that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then in opposition, denounced the theory of Imperial federation, and gave as a reason why he was opposed to it, that the time might come when Canada would be called upon to enter into the wars in which England was constantly engaged. Do we see that unity of action—not only unity of action but that unity of sentiment and of opinion prevailing in the present government to which I referred a moment ago as to the sending of contingents that should exist ? The Minister of Public Works, upon a number of occasions—and only the other day in Toronto, declared strongly in favour of Imperial federation—that he hoped the time would come when Canadian representatives would be found sitting at Westminster, and that they would then have something to say in the management of Imperial affairs. The Premier said, and I have not heard or read an utterance from him in which he has departed from that sentiment, that he is totally opposed to Imperial federation for the reason which I have given. This question is one on which I have occupied a considerable time, but there is much more I could say on the subject but defer it. There are one or two other things in this address which require consideration. Those who have had something to do with, and have some little recollection of the votes of the past are not a little surprised at the statements which have been made in reference to the carrying trade of this country. Let any one read the speeches made by the premier and those who form his government—I except my hon. friend opposite (Hon. Mr. Mills) because I have not seen any utterance of his of the character to which I have referred—and one would readily think that this government had inaugurated and carried out the canal system of the country, and this address indicates the very same idea, because it goes on to point out what 'my' government (of course the Governor did not write this) has done in opening up waterways to develop the trade of the Great West. And Sir Wilfrid, a short time ago in Toronto, spoke of the immense amount of money that had been expended by the government. My government has done this, and my government has done that in order to develop the great resources of this country, is the contant cry. A reference to the Public Accounts will show that before these gentlemen had the responsibility of office upon their shoulders, and before they arrogated to themselves the formation of this contingent as well as the canals and waterways, you will find that the late government—that is the government of Sir John Macdonald, immediately after confederation, the government which followed it under the Hon. Alex. Mackenzie, and for 17 years afterwards, had very nearly completed these canals, when the present government took charge of them. They now claim for themselves the credit of all that was done by their predecessors. The Sault Ste. Marie Canal was suggested and carried out and completed and paid for to the extent of $3,448,961 before the advent of these gentlemen to office. It is true they spent $222,056 afterwards in order to round it up and to thoroughly complete it. It is not necessary I should inform this House why that expenditure was made. Up to 1896 the government had expended on the Welland Canal $24,158,786. The present government have expended in the completion of the Welland Canal system $59,368 and for which they claim the credit of making the canal fourteen feet deep. The Murray Canal had cost $1,278,700, and that was completed before these gentlemen came into office. The Cornwall Canal had had $6,037,936 expended on it up to 1896, and the present government in order to complete it, up to the time these figures could be reached had spent half a million dollars.

On the Williamsburg Canal there had been expended up to 1896 $4,257,911 before these gentlemen came into office. The Soulanges Canal was begun in 1892, yet the credit for it was taken by my hon. friend for this government. The change was made from Beauharnois to the north side and the Soulanges Canal was commenced, contracts were let and it was under construction and had over two and a quarter millions of money spent on it before these gentlemen came into power; but because they completed the work which had been commenced before they came into office they claim all the credit for it. The Lachine Canal is in the same position. On that canal up to 1896 there had been expended $10,361,271 before these gentlemen came into power. So with the harbour of Montreal, the late government assumed the debt of that harbour; that is, the portion below the harbour proper. The Harbour Commissioners were relieved of the expenditure. We have also in the speech a congratulation on the administration of the Post Office Department. Look at the Public Accounts. They say that the government have reduced the postage and have carried on the service satisfactorily. They took the total receipts and expenditures as an evidence of that fact. You will find that the expenditure in the Post Office Department is greater now than it was under the late government, but the receipts have run up owing to the influx of people into the country and the increased amount of correspondence. They claim credit for the reduction of the deficit as a magnificent example of their administrative policy. Had the receipts continued as they were, the deficit caused by increased expenditure would have been greater than it was under the late government. As to the increase of settlers I shall leave that for the gentlemen from the West to discuss. Whether the settlers they have received there, to a great extent a pauper element, is the character of immigration that country requires—whether it is advisable that such an element should be brought into this country at the public expense, is for the people to consider. I know when I was in the late government we had constant complaints—condemnation after condemnation from all the industrial associations of the country—from the opposition in particular against the introduction of what was termed 'pauper immigrants' into this country. This government has brought in thousands of them and to that is attributable greatly the increase of population in the North-west. I congratulate the country on the prevailing prosperity, but I deny that it is the policy of this government that has produced it. It is the policy that was in force before they came into power and which is continued to-day that is the cause of that prosperity, and I repeat what I stated at the beginning of my remarks, that had the government carried out their promises as indicated in their pre-election campaign, this country instead of being prosperous to-day would be worse off than it ever was. In the latter clause of this address we have an intimation that:

These are points on which honourable gentlemen know it is absolutely necessary that legislation should take place, because the charters of all the banks expire this year. What the law is to be to regulate the rate of interest payable to creditors, I do not know nor did the mover or seconder of the address inform the House whether we are to have another usury law or not we are left in the dark. If it is simply to be a measure to regulate the rate of interest to be paid after judgment, it will be no improvement on what exists at the present. If one obtains a judgment at present, it bears 6 per cent interest if I am correctly informed. Any lawyer in the Senate will know whether that statement is correct or not. We are also promised a law to provide for the taking of the next decennial census and also for the better arrangement of the electoral districts. That is, next year we are to have the census taken upon which, under the constitution, the government of the day will be obliged to readjust the representation of the provinces; but these gentlemen propose, in the face of the taking of the census, within a few months—it cannot be a great while for it must be done next year—to readjust the constituencies, in order, I suppose, to affect the elections which must take place prior to the readjustment of the representation. Whether parliament will pass a law of that kind will be known in the future. This is a point to which I shall call the attention of the House at a very early date and will ask for the papers submitted to these eminent lawyers in England when the question was asked as to the power of the Senate to deal with a question of this kind. We have the reports from the London papers stating what did take place. When I asked the question last year, my hon. friend opposite was unable to tell me because he said he did not know. It did not pass through his department. Whether he has allowed himself to be again treated in that cavalier way by a non-member of the government, the Solicitor General, since that period I am not in a position to state. That rests with himself, but I do say this, that if a case was submitted to any lawyer, eminent or not, particularly in Great Britain, it should have emanated from the office of the Minister of Justice in this country, and I am quite satisfied that the Minister of Justice would to save his own reputation, have put the question fairly and properly before these gentlemen when asking their opinion. If the opinion was asked as is indicated by the telegrams which have been sent from England to this country, then the question submitted to the eminent legal authorities to whom I have referred—I say it advisedly—is not in accordance with the facts, and consequently the opinion given under such circumstances is of no value and should have no force in this country. However, that is a point I shall refer to in the future, when I ask for the papers, and I have no doubt my hon. friend will be then in a position to tell us what was done in the matter and to give us a copy of the question asked of Mr. Blake and Mr. Russell and other gentlemen whose opinions were read in this House during the last session. I repeat, before I sit down, my congratulations to the government for having changed their opinions on the matter of the contingents, on the question of setting a precedent. Just as much and as freely and as honestly do I congratulate them on having changed their opinion, or if they have not changed their opinion, on having acted in direct contravention to the promises they made the electors in 1896, by continuing the policy of the late government almost in its entirety, under which this country has prospered and is prospering. Unless they do what they have promised to do, cut down the protective policy that prosperity will continue. Let them go on in the footsteps of their predecessors and the country will prosper, but I am not prepared to admit as Mr. Paterson, the Minister of Customs, claimed in Winnipeg a short time ago, that if they are carrying out the policy of the late government so far as protection is concerned why not leave them to do it. Men who profess one thing, and do the opposite in order to retain office, are not fit to govern. Those who inaugurated the policy should take charge of it and administer the affairs of the country in the manner in which it was administered for 18 years, and prosperity will continue.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should like to make an explanation to my hon. friend opposite with reference to the papers which were not laid on the table. My hon. friend has a considerable advantage over us. We did not have them. I only saw them on Saturday, and they were at once sent to the printing bureau, and the printer promised faithfully to have them in time for the sitting to-day. When the hon. gentleman made reference to it I went out and telephoned to ascertain why they had not been on the table. It appears they were sent to the Privy Council for the proofs to be corrected and were detained there, to my great annoyance. Otherwise hon. members would have had the papers on the table of the House this afternoon. They were ordered to be printed the moment they got them.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Will they be on the table to-morrow ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. They were promised faithfully to be here at five o'clock to-day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does my hon. friend refer to the document I have been quoting from ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This has been in the Library for a long time. I sent to the Library and inquired for it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—These documents come to the Library; they do not come to us. The moment I saw this document I ordered five hundred copies to be printed, and we shall have them on the table to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE BUBONIC PLAGUE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) rose to Call the attention of the Government to the immediate necessity for steps being taken to ascertain whether it is necessary for the preservation of health, that persons of Japanese birth, and the products of Japan, should be excluded from the Dominion of Canada, until such time as the infected ports of Japan shall be declared free of the bubonic plague.

He said: I have to ask the House to accept this short notice on account of the importance of the question to which the motion refers. It is quite possible the government have already taken steps in this very important matter. We know that in India for a long time this bubonic plague has been raging and has been spreading to Japan and the Sandwich Islands. With these countries we have communication continually. There are about four steamers of different lines coming into British Columbia ports, one steamer, or perhaps two steamers, arriving each week. These steamers carry products with them such as silks, cotton and fabrics of that kind, and fruit, and no one can tell how these products are put up, or whether they are put up by infected persons or in infected houses. Take oranges: how are they to be disinfected at the quarantine station? It is an impossibility. These oranges are eaten largely by the people of this country, and the skins of the oranges might contain the germs of the plague; and so with silks and other fabrics. I thought it my duty to call the attention of the government to this very serious matter. If that plague once found its way into this country, we would probably never get rid of it again. It would be a very drastic measure, of course, to stop the importation of all kinds of products from Japan and to stop immigration; but it would be far better to do that and to take every precaution than to have the plague coming into the country. I think that the government should at once, if they have not done so already, get their most expert quarantine men to look into this matter and see what can be done. I am of the opinion that silks and fabrics of that kind, and fruit cannot be properly disinfected.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My attention has not been called to this matter except by the paragraphs in the newspapers. I did not receive the impression that the bubonic plague prevailed in Japan to any extent. It has been, of course, a prevalent disease in India for the last two or three years, but I have not learned that it existed in Japan. I will make inquiries. This matter, of course, is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture and he, no doubt, would direct his attention to it if he became aware that it prevailed in that country. I will make inquiry of him and let my hon. friend know whether any action will be taken, or whether, in fact, the plague prevails to such an extent as to warrant the government taking action.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being called—

Resuming the debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech on the opening of the Fifth Session of the Eighth Parliament.

Hon. Mr. MILLS said: It is my duty, in the first instance, to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne on their very interesting and instructive speeches. It is my duty also to congratulate my hon. friend who made this motion on the patriotic and eloquent remarks which he addressed to the House upon the subject of the war in South Africa. My hon. friend by his speech has done not a little to show that although there may be different nationalities in Canada, there is but one sentiment with regard to the integrity of the Empire. I might say that, in my opinion, the present occasion is, in many respects, a great occasion. There are periods in our history in which the public sentiment of the country undergoes a sudden transformation. It moves on for a series of years in conformity with the new departure until some further step in national progress becomes necessary and forces itself upon the attention of the community. There can be little doubt in the minds of thoughtful Canadians that since the year of the diamond jubilee, since a large number of persons from all parts of the empire were congregated together in London, the empire has taken a new departure—that old things are passing away and that a new phase of Imperial life is presenting itself to the community for its consideration. The times, under these circumstances, demand from the people a feeling of patriotic devotion, and it seems to me, hon. gentlemen, that my hon. friend opposite in criticising the policy of the administration and the conduct of the government in respect to some important matters to which I shall refer later, did not fully appreciate the present position of affairs. Instead of taking a broad and patriotic view of the situation, my hon. friend took a very strong party view and one which seemed to me, however suitable it might have been a few years ago, was out of keeping with the present condition of affairs. My hon. friend also complained of want of courtesy to this House in the conduct of the administration, not specially with reference to anything that had been done generally, but with respect to some incidents or events that transpired in the other House of which we are not supposed to take cognizance here. My hon. friend said that a motion had been made for papers in the House of Commons before the reply to the Speech from the Throne had been adopted. He also questioned the right of the hon. member to make the motion. He said that the adjournment had been promised in the midst of a debate which, in his opinion, was irregular, and the remark was that it had been done before the speech was answered. Now let me call the attention of the House to the rule in this matter. In the first place, upon the assembling of parliament in any session, a report of the judges, if there have been controverted elections, is presented usually before the speech from the Throne is answered. If the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery has received reports of returns of elections that have transpired since the close of the previous session, it is his duty to submit them to parliament, and they are presented before the speech from the Throne is answered. Then it is the invariable practice in both Houses to introduce a bill and move that it be read the first time, and that is done for the purpose of vindicating the right of each House to independent authority in respect to all business that comes before them. There is seldom more than one bill presented pro forma, but when hon. gentlemen consider the reason for taking that step they will see that the assertion of a right, which is intended by the submission of a bill of that kind, is one without limitation, and it would be in the power of the House to take into consideration any matter which was urgent—any matter which was important, even though the speech from the Throne had not been answered. Now, let me call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the practice in England in this regard. It is sometimes the practice in England to put questions before there is an answer to the speech from the Throne, and these questions are answered by the member of the government having charge of the matter to which the question relates. It is the practice sometimes to move an address for papers precisely as was done in the case of which the hon. gentleman complains, and very often motions are made for papers, and those papers are sometimes brought down before the answer to the speech is concluded. When the debate is prolonged upon the speech from the Throne, public bills have been introduced and discussed on a motion for leave before the address has been agreed to. Hon. gentlemen will remember that in the session of 1882, there was a discussion on Mr. Bradlaugh's taking of the oath at the bar of the House. That discussion was interrupted. The proceedings on the debate in answer to the speech from the Throne were suspended, and a division took place. There was a division upon the motion made in that case, although the debate on the address had not been concluded. Mr. Gladstone, also, on that occasion presented resolutions to the House before the speech had been answered. There was further, a discussion on the arrest of Mr. Parnell and others The correspondence on the subject of that arrest was produced, and there was also a motion and discussion on Mr. Errington's mission to the Vatican. Now, all these proceedings in a single session show that the hon. gentleman opposite was entirely mistaken when he made the statements that he did in respect to the motion of the hon. member in the other House for certain papers. Then, my hon. friend in discussing that subject complained that the motion was irregular. The proceeding, if I correctly remember what he said, was unprecedented. and yet, my hon. friend said that the government were guilty of discourtesy because we did not bring down those papers which were called for in the other House, which my hon. friend said ought not to have been moved for. If he was correct in his first position, then it would have been improper to have brought down those papers or laid them on the table until the speech from the Throne was answered. But my hon. friend beside me told the hon. leader of the opposition why these papers were not submitted, not because we agreed with his view that the submission of these documents before the speech from the Throne had been answered would have been irregular, but because they had not been printed with the expedition that we desired. My hon. friend complained that a member of the House of Commons, a supporter of the administration, had resigned because a contingent had been sent to Africa, and that he had been again elected and was still a supporter of the administration. I need not here enter into a discussion of what the views of that hon. gentleman are. I may call the attention of the House to that later on in this discussion. I may say this, however, that many members no doubt are of opinion that before we assume the responsibilities of contributing in a military way towards the maintenance of the empire, the relation between Canada and the mother country in this regard ought to be settled—that our rights in that regard ought to be known, and these may have been the views of the hon. member to whom my hon. friend referred. I might say this, however, that this in my opinion is an academic view. I think the course taken was the right, proper and constitutional course, and I shall not say anything further on that subject at this moment. Then my hon. friend referred to the progress of agriculture. He admitted that the country had progressed. that the farmers were more prosperous than they had been a few years ago, but the hon. gentleman says that this is not due to the government. There may be a difference of opinion on that subject. It may not be wholly due to the government. The government do not bring the rain or cultivate the soil, but if the government furnish the facilities for transportation— if they open up wider markets than previously existed, they hold out a motive for greater industry—they create stronger hopes, and the products of industry are increased in proportion. But, I remember the time when my hon. friend maintained that everything was due to the administration. My hon. friend was on this side of the House ; he was then a member of the administration and although for a number of years the hon. leader of the Opposition claimed that great progress had been made in the country,—that the industrial resources had been rapidly developed—that all those improvements that had taken place were due to the wisdom and statesmanship of the administration, yet my hon. friend after a time found that the country was stationary. There was no increase in the population. The natural increase was neutralized by expatriations from the country. And that census showed a diminution in the value of real estate in every portion of the country. Let me say that there has been a change. My hon. friend does not deny that there is a change, that that change is for the better, that the people are more hopeful, that the immigration into the country is very much larger than formerly, and that property, instead of diminishing, is increasing in value. Then my hon. friend referred to the manufacture of binder-twine. I may say to the hon. gentleman that I am not going to detain the House by a discussion of the subject, as a more fitting opportunity will occur hereafter. The hon. gentleman said that I was roasted last year on the subject, and that the roasting I got had induced me to adopt a different policy this year, one more in conformity with the public interest. I do not think that in this House, it was a subject of discussion. It was a subject of discussion in the Commons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh !

Hon. Mr. MILLS—At all events not in my presence. Let me say further that the government had not granted favours. We advertised for tenders. Our advertisements were circulated in every part of the country. We accepted the highest tender, and when hon. gentlemen compare those prices and the names of the firms which sold in different parts of the country, it will be found that we obtained a fair price. We do not go into the manufacture of this twine for the purpose of underselling other manufactures. We do not go into the manufacture for the purpose of ruining or bankrupting those who are engaged in similar pursuits. We engage in the business for the purpose of giving employment to the convicts we find in our penitentiaries, and to enable us to sustain them there with as little burden to the public as possible. We seek to make the convict population, as far as possible, self-sustaining, and when we manufacture only about one-seventh of the binder-twine that is consumed in Canada, it is easy to see that we could not undertake to sell at extremely low or unprofitable rates, without doing very serious injury to the manufacturers of the other six-sevenths of the twine consumed by the farming population. My hon. friend said he did not know what was meant by that paragraph in the speech relating to interest on judgments. Let me say that the rate of interest has fallen very greatly within the last ten or fifteen years. Six per cent is a very high rate now. It is beyond the market value of money, and it is not unreasonable to fix on judgments obtained in courts of justice a somewhat more moderate rate than was a fair rate some years ago. Further than that, the Crown at the present time, except in certain special cases, is not called upon to pay interest upon its judgments, and there are in my opinion, good reasons for putting judgments obtained against the Crown in this regard upon the same footing as judgments obtained against private parties. My hon. friend opposite has spoken about pauper immigration, I may say to the hon. gentleman that I do not know of any pauper immigration. I do not know of any immigration into this country that is a burden upon the great mass of the people of Canada. We have not invited people to come into Canada with a view of making them a charge upon the industry and property of other portions of the community. What people have been invited to come here for is to take possession of the waste lands, the unoccupied territories of the country, which are out of all proportion greater than the territories that are occupied, in order that they may establish for themselves comfortable homes, in order that they may become useful citizens, and may contribute to the commerce and to the revenue of the country. That object is being accomplished. My hon. friend, in using the words 'pauper immigration,' has used two words that will wound a great many thousand people settled in Canada. During the past year we have had an immigration into Manitoba and the North-west Territories alone of about 50,000 people. Those people are not paupers. They may have had but little wealth, but they are industrious. I do not know how the farming population of the North-west would have succeeded in properly caring for their harvests without their aid. They have been contributors to the construction of the railways that are at present in process of being built. They are found to be industrious people, ready to work, and they obtain by their work in the harvest season among the farmers and on the railways the means of supporting their families during the winter season without charge upon any portion of the population. They will be able to begin the next year under favourable circumstances. They are anxious to become Canadians. They have no literature, no devotion to a nationality attaching them elsewhere. They have no disposition to perpetuate the story or history of the country of their origin. Their inclination is to become Canadians as soon as possible. I observed that many of their children, some of whom have not been six months in the country, were able to speak the English language sufficiently well to make themselves intelligible. Can any one doubt that they will, in a remarkably short time, become Canadians, that they will speak English or French, or whatever language may be spoken in the part of the country in which they settle? English, no doubt, will be the language in the North-west Territories, for it is the language of the population, and their children will have the same interest in the country as those who are of Canadian birth. I say that the settlement of these people in the country is of immense consequence to us. I saw it stated in the papers of the North-west Territories,—and I have no doubt that it is a correct statement—that during the past autumn there have been 400,000 more acres turned over with the plough than in the previous year. That will represent this year a yield of 12,000,000 bushels of grain in addition to the crop of last year, if it should be an average yield. Does any man doubt that it is of immense consequence to those farmers who are engaged in this work to have aid of the population coming into the country? They can mutually benefit each other. It will contribute to the commerce of the country. It contributes to make the railways a profitable investment to those who have put their moneys into them, and it will contribute to the revenues of the country, and I say that it is of very great importance to the country that this immigration should not be impeded, hindered or discouraged. There were a few men in the North-west Territories who for a time spoke against the immigration of the Galicians, the Doukhobors and others. What was their business? They were ranchers. They did not want the country occupied near them. It interfered with their ranching operations. It was their interest that the country should remain unsettled, as it was unsettled under the jurisdiction of the Hudson's Bay Company before we went there at all. But that is not our interest, and I say it is of immense consequence to us, now that our opportunity has come for filling up the country, that we should, in every possible way, encourage its settlement. The United States, between the years 1830 and 1860 had an immense immigration from the continent of Europe and from the British islands of persons who were poor, many of them absolutely penniless, who had nothing except their inclination to labour to bring to the country, and they became a prosperous people. Their descendants today are as thoroughly American as any other portion of the population. They are devoted to the cultivation of the soil, and numerous states in the valley of the Mississippi became settled and occupied during those thirty years that have enormously contributed to the prosperity of the republic. Now, our opportunity has come, we have such a territory now for settlement for an agricultural population as they had during the period that I have mentioned, and it would be indeed a great misfortune, a calamity to this country, if we did anything to turn away that tide of immigration, to misrepresent the population and discourage men who are industrious and anxious to work and to acquire a knowledge of our language and to become like ourselves. To discourage those people by describing them as paupers, or using any other phrase that is calculated to turn away the tide of immigration from us to the neighbouring republic would indeed be a very great misfortune to this country. Canada has been some time spoken of a species of fishing rod. The provinces are joined to each other by the ends, and they are stretched across the continent, having immense length but little depth. That might fairly represent Canada as it was thirty years ago. That does not represent Canada as it is becoming. Take our territories : begin at the 49th parallel, at the United States boundary, and you will find the settlement extending northward now for several hundred miles. This is no doubt as it should be. That will give us a sufficient depth to make this country perfectly capable of defending itself against any who might be disposed to adopt an aggressive policy towards us. What does our recent investigation show ? That when you cross the height of land north of the lakes and north of the Ottawa and the Saint Lawrence, you get into a fertile region again. We have, it is said by our geologists, both in Ontario and in Quebec, 30,000 square miles in each capable of being settled by an agricultural population. In fact the two provinces may be occupied and settled all the way northward to James Bay. That being so, it is of immense consequence, not merely that steps should be taken to secure a settlement of the North-west Territories, our prairie lands, but even where we have amongst our agricultural population people without a very great deal of means beyond the farms which they occupy, capable by their industry of living in comparative comfort, we have an opportunity for expansion by giving them lands in the newer districts of the two provinces which I have mentioned, which will enable those provinces to very largely increase their population, increase it perhaps within a comparatively early period to twice their present number of inhabitants. I might refer to the maritime provinces. Take Nova Scotia. That province to-day is having millions of dollars invested in its rich mines. The province of Nova Scotia is taking a new departure for the first time in its history since it entered confederation. There is every prospect that those who have gone abroad for the purpose of obtaining employment from that province during the past quarter of a century will find their way back to Nova Scotia again. The hopes of the people have been awakened. They have confidence in their own future which they did not possess to anything like the same extent a few years ago, and that being so, I say that everywhere the outlook of Canada is better than it has been at any time since confederation, and that the progress which has been made during the past three or four years is greater than it made during four or five times the same number of years previously. I shall not undertake to-day the discussion of the canal improvements to which my hon. friend has referred, and to say to what government belongs most credit for their construction. That is not necessary, more especially as there will be ample opportunities for considering that subject again; but I wish to refer to another subject which is uppermost in the public mind to-day, and that is the support which the government and people of Canada have given to the Imperial authorities in the war that is at present being waged in the Transvaal. I need not remind hon. gentlemen of the discussion which we had on this subject last session. The views which I entertained as to the merits of that question I expressed to the House then. I am not going to repeat them to-day. I think that the British government were entirely in the right, and without the abdication of their position as an empire in South Africa, it was utterly impossible for them to have avoided the conflict which exists. My hon. friend complained that the government was dilatory—that they did not send troops as soon as they ought to have done so—that they did not make the offer to the Imperial government at as early a period as they should have done, and my hon. friend read a despatch of October 13, as if it were of October 14, stating the day on which that despatch was received in London at 8.20 in the morning, and as the corresponding hour here would have been 3 o'clock in the morning, my hon. friend knew right well that the despatch was not sent on the 14th.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.—What I said was the despatch which was sent to Lord Minto was dated the 3rd of the month at 5.30 p.m., and according to the time which I did not mention at the time, but will now, if it had been sent immediately it would have been here at one o'clock in the afternoon. That is what I said.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is what the hon. gentleman said of the despatch of the third, but I am speaking of what the hon. gentleman said of the despatch of the 13th. He read the date of the reception, the 14th. It was sent on the 13th and the receipt was on the 14th, and it was on the 14th at 8.20 in the morning. It is the proposal of the government here to give aid to the British government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman must have misunderstood what I said with reference to the dates. I read the communication from the Colonial Secretary to the Governor General of Canada, and the order in council passed by the Canadian government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman referred to the despatch, and let me refer to the communication on page 19, in which he says:

> Her Majesty the Queen desires to thank the people of her Dominion of Canada for their striking manifestation of loyalty and patriotism in their voluntary offer to send troops to co-operate with Her Majesty's Imperial Forces in maintaining her position and the rights of British subjects in South Africa. She wishes the troops God-speed and a safe return.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What date was that?

Hon. Mr. MILLS.—October 24.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have not that. I have the Imperial return here.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hon. gentlemen know right well that the expenditure for military, as for other purposes, is under the control of parliament, not under the control of the administration. There were two things that presented themselves to the minds of the administration at the time. One was to call parliament together and obtain its sanction for a proposition to send troops to South Africa. The other was to await such a development of public opinion as would justify them in undertaking to send the contingent, and to send a second contingent, which we did as soon as public opinion was sufficiently expressed. I say we required one or the other as our justification—either the approval of parliament or the general sanction of the political sovereignty of this country from which parliament derives its existence. Now, there was such an expression of opinion in this country as to justify the government in the course which they took. We knew well that the government had no legal authority to propose to send a contingent or propose meeting the expenses of the contingent otherwise than it felt sure that by a bill of indemnity parliament would hold it harmless from all expenditure which might be so incurred, and so we adopted a rule, which had been adopted in emergencies in England, and that is the constitutional rule of seeking the support of public opinion in anticipation of the approval which will be subsequently given by parliament. Now, the hon. gentleman complained that the government of Canada was the eleventh colonial government to agree to send a contingent to South Africa. Look at the facts. In every one of the Australian Colonies, as I remember, the legislature was in session at the time. Their governments had no difficulty. They obtained the sanction of the legislatures, although in one case, I forget at this moment which colony it was, there was a majority of only one in the legislature in favour of sending a contingent at all. The hon. gentleman speaks on this matter as though we had been guilty of something little less than treason because we did not act sooner than public opinion showed that it was ready to sustain us in what we were desirous of doing. Now, let me call the attention of the House to another case—because this is not the first opportunity on which the people and the parliament of Canada have had a chance of going to the assistance of the empire—let me call the attention of the House to what transpired in 1884-5. There were colonies then in Australia offering contingents to the support of the mother country. There were men in Canada, notably General Laurie and Colonel Williams, since deceased, that were ready to undertake to raise regiments for the purpose of giving support to the mother country. What was the position of the prime minister on that occasion ? The hon. gentleman has quoted the opinion of Sir John Macdonald as spoken academically—spoken some years earlier than the period to which I refer. But here was an opportunity to do something of a practical nature. The British government required assistance. They had the active opposition of France in the valley of the Nile. They had the opposition of Russia on the border, in Abyssinia. Some Australian colonies did what they have done now—sent a contingent and the contingent was accepted. What did the hon. gentleman's leader do on that occasion? Sir John Macdonald held to the doctrines that Canada's legislative power extended only to her borders, to the extent of a marine league from the shore—that she had no legal authority to send a soldier out of the country—that that was an Imperial act over which Canada had no jurisdiction, and that while the government were ready to permit the Imperial government to enlist in Canada if it saw proper to do so, the government of Canada were not prepared to expend a dollar on the enterprise. Let me read here a few of the telegrams that passed on that occasion and they will show that the patriotism of the hon. gentleman at that time, when he was in power, and when he had an opportunity of acting was a different type of patriotism from that with which he glows on the present occasion. Let me read a few of these. Lord Derby was the Colonial Secretary at the time, and he says in a communication to Lord Lansdowne :

Downing Street, January 1, 1885.

My Lord,—I communicated to the Secretary of State for War a copy of your despatch of the 25th of November last, with the letter which accompanied it from Major-General Laurie addressed to your Lordship, expressing his desire for military employment in connection with any Canadian force which might be organized for Imperial service, and I transmit to you herewith a copy of a letter which has been received from the War Office in regard to this application.

I have, &c.,
(Signed) DERBY.

The Marquis of Lansdowne.

And the war office answered that they might avail themselves hereafter of the liberty given them by the Canadian government to enlist troops if it were necessary. Now, the privilege to enlist was as far as the government of Canada at that time went. The War Office addressed the following letter to the Colonial Office :

Central Department,
War Office, February 14, 1885.

Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 13th instant, relative to the offer of the government of New South Wales of two batteries of field artillery and a battalion of infantry for service in the Soudan, I am directed to acquaint you that the Marquis of Hartington considers that this offer should be accepted with much satisfaction, but that it should be understood that the force must be placed absolutely under the orders of the General Officer Commanding as to the duties on which it will be employed.

Now, there was a statement of the acceptance of the offer of New South Wales. Why ? Because New South Wales equipped the men and sent them forward at their own expense to the point of destination, while the Canadian government offered the Imperial government the privilege of enlisting men in Canada. Let me read how the War Office replied, because it is very frank, and it shows the difference in their estimate of the two offers :

War Office, February 16, 1885.

Sir,—I have laid before the Secretary of State for War your letters of the 9th and 13th instant, and in reply I am directed by the Marquis of Hartington to inform you that he highly appreciates the feeling which has prompted the government of the Dominion of Canada to offer facilities for raising a force for Imperial service at this juncture of affairs, but that the time which must necessarily elapse before such a force could be raised, organized and equipped, renders it undesirable to take advantage of the offer at the present time.

The offer of the government of New South Wales, which has been accepted by Her Majesty's government, was to provide an organized force fully equipped and ready for immediate service, and the government of the Dominion will, no doubt, fully appreciate the difference between the two offers as regards the use which could be made of them by Her Majesty's government, and will not, Lord Hartington feels sure, consider that in declining their patriotic offer for the present, any undue preference has been given to the colony of New South Wales.

The colony of New South Wales made an offer such as we have made recently, and it was accepted, and the hon. gentlemen who sit opposite were members of the government which offered to the Imperial government the privilege of enlisting men in Canada for service in South Africa, and that offer was declined. There is a change in the political situation. There is a change in the view which the people of the empire take, and in so far as that change of public sentiment has occurred, I recognize the difference, but, I say to the hon. gentleman that it was as open to him then to undertake the work as it has been open to us now, and it would have been accepted by the Imperial government if the offer had been in proper form then, as is shown by the fact that they accepted the offer of the government of New South Wales. I say, then, it does not rest with my hon. friend opposite to charge the government with dilatoriness or want of patriotism. The hon. gentleman is himself open to that charge in the course which the government of which he was a member pursued ; and what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said in the interview which my hon. friend read yesterday to this House, was said by Sir John Macdonald himself and his colleagues when this very subject was under discussion. Having said this much, I need not pursue the subject further. In my opinion we are having gradually—maybe unsystematically—but we are gradually having developed within the British Empire an Imperial constitution. The British government has not governed the United Kingdom as a domestic parliament, as we govern Canada, and it has in addition to that the power of an Imperial government and an Imperial assembly. That is gradually undergoing a change. Everybody sees that. In 1887, when the Imperial government asked the government of Canada to name a commissioner to settle the difficulties between Canada and the United States, they were giving this country a position in an Imperial commission and an office in the settlement of an Imperial question, and so, recently, when there was an attempt made to settle the difficulties between this country and the United States, the Imperial government named four Canadian commissioners and one nobleman from the United Kingdom, an eminent jurist, to sit as a commission representing Great Britain—no, not Great Britain only, but the British Empire, and so we had a voice in determining a question which might be one of peace or war. No man in his senses would undertake to frame for the British Empire a constitution and say it should be governed by one or two legislative bodies, or a political body, or what its powers should be. It is only by the voluntary action and good sense and co-operation of the government of the United Kingdom and the governments of the different dependencies that you can gradually develop an Imperial constitution suited to the requirements of an empire such as ours. The Imperial government trust us in these questions, and they trust us for the purpose of settling difficulties of an international character, and we can trust her in determining what is just and fair and right between the British people of South Africa and the people of the Transvaal. She trusted us, we trust her, and this empire is an empire governed by mutual trust and confidence of the people who inhabit its different portions. No doubt, in time, an Imperial constitution will grow up just as the constitution of Great Britain has grown up out of the exigencies of the people and the requirements of the Imperial service, and I have no fault to find with men who perhaps have not reached or do not occupy the same standpoint as we do. My hon. friend ten years ago, or a little more than ten years ago, was not willing to spend a dollar on a matter of this sort. He said you can go up the Nile, but you go voluntarily.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Ten years ago ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Fifteen years ago. I am finding no fault, but I am teaching him and his friends a lesson of charity, and I say if there are men in Canada who think that we ought to have an understanding with the Imperial government and ought to have a sort of Imperial constitution, in skeleton form at the outset, I do not quarrel with them. I differ from them. My opinion is that it is not in that way an Imperial constitution will grow up. I think it will be formed out of the exigencies of the situation and the demands of the public interests of the nation. However that may be, this much is perfectly clear, that my hon. friends opposite did not have their patriotism oozing out at their fingers' ends on that occasion as the patriotism seemed to ooze out of my hon. friend here yesterday when he was discussing this subject. I shall not trespass further on the indulgence of the House in reference to this matter. I have brought under the attention of hon. gentlemen the situation. The government are supporting the Imperial government by the contingents that have been sent. The government are anxious to see the Imperial arms—and I am not saying merely those of the United Kingdom, but the arms of the British Empire—triumphant in this contest. We believe that justice will be done and that the people will be treated fairly. We know this, that the Boers in 1881 and the English people who were settled in that country were upon a footing of political equality. We know that every Englishman settling there had a right to vote. We know that that was the condition upon which local self-government was conferred upon them and we know that after the convention of 1884, when they thought they could do so without risk, the Boers disqualified every Englishman in the country who was not there prior to 1881, depriving them of all political rights and putting them in a position of distinct political inferiority. The men so treated were called out to do the fighting ; they were called on to pay the bill ; they were denied the use of their own language in the schools, they were compelled to pay heavy taxes. They were not allowed the ordinary municipal rights which we in many places confer upon men who have not taken the oath of allegiance, and it was impossible that the condition of things that they established could continue without the British government assuming a position of distinct inferiority throughout the whole of South Africa, a position that I apprehend no one desires to see them take. Having said this much, I regret exceedingly that my hon. friend did not take a broader, fairer view of the situation when it was perfectly obvious to my mind that the great mass of the people of Canada are united upon this question. My hon. friend wished to characterize the government as indifferent. If parliament had been in session there would have been a chance for immediate action. When parliament was not in session, then we had a right to expect, and we did not look in vain for such a demand on the part of the people of this country as would justify us in acting out of parliament.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before proceeding to discuss the questions opened up in the speech from the Throne, allow me to congratulate the new members of this House who have been entrusted with the somewhat delicate task of presenting the programme of the government to this honourable House, on the manner in which the task has been performed. Although the mover of the address spoke in a language with which I am not familiar, yet it was evident that he has a graceful command of his mother tongue; and unless I am much mistaken I predict that the hon. gentleman will, as time passes, give undoubted evidence of his ability to participate in our discussions in the English language. In the case of the seconder, it was to be expected that his long experience in public life would enable him to import much wisdom into the discussion of the questions of the day. In view of the large number of vacancies which have recently occurred in this House, there is much consolation in the reflection that a very considerable voice in the choice of new members must necessarily rest with the hon. Minister of Justice, who is well known to have long established and definite views regarding the qualifications requisite to merit a call to the Senate. Turning to the Commons Hansard of 1875, page 405, I find the hon. gentleman using the following words:

> Who are you likely to find composing the second Chamber? Is it the artisan: the agriculturist: the lawyer of good standing? No: You get none of these. You find a few wealthy merchants and retired bankers and defeated politicians and when you go beyond this list you get nothing.

I have not the pleasure of personal acquaintance with any of the gentlemen recently called to this honourable House, but appreciating the scientific loyalty to principle which guides the action of the hon. minister, we may take it for granted that no wealthy merchant, no retired banker, and no defeated politician is found amongst them, and that they are all eminent agriculturists or artisans or lawyers of good standing. I am far from expressing opinions adversely to the fitness for seats in this House of wealthy merchants, retired bankers and defeated politicians. On the other hand, I acknowledge a fellow feeling for a defeated politician, having gone through the mill myself. I merely desire to point out to hon. members the great advantage of having a minister who, we are sure, is guided by so high a standard in choosing members of the Senate. There is another point in which the Minister of Justice has had very well defined views. In 1875, the hon. gentleman said:

> It was said by a gentleman who when appointed to the Senate found himself among gentlemen very much his senior in years, that he expected to be with those who lived two or three generations ago, but to his surprise he found himself with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob when he took his seat in that Chamber.

In view, therefore, of the well known consistency of the Minister of Justice, I hope that when the mover of the address, makes a reconnaissance of the House he will not be guilty of the unpardonable indiscretion of classifying such blooming youngsters as the hon. Minister of Justice and the seconder of the address as representatives, in this House, of the patriarchal dispensation. The same consideration will, I trust, enable the whole of us to divest ourselves of the idea that the voice of the hon. gentleman from Sunbury (Mr. Burpee) has reached us from the place of spirits of departed politicians.

In considering the address with which this session has been opened, for the convenience of discussion it might not be amiss to group these various sections in such a way as would prevent many repetitions, and I find therefore that the first, sixth, seventh, eleventh and thirteenth sections of this speech from the Throne may be described as the prosperity clauses. Papers supporting the government, when speaking of this subject, talk of the Laurier prosperity. I have no doubt that there is a good deal of prosperity within the ranks of the Cabinet, but it is going a little too far to attribute whatever degree there is of prosperity in the country to the premier and name it after the premier of the country. The first of the clauses refers to the remarkable increase of the volume of trade, and the exports and imports. This is a point which has been dwelt on by my hon. friend who seconded the address at some considerable length, and he presented some figures to the House which are certainly a subject of congratulation to the whole of us. There is no question about it that we are in the midst of a season of very general and widespread prosperity, but we are not going to take the view that a countryman of my own did when his potatoes were destroyed with the ravages of disease. He lamented his losses, but he thanked God that his neighbour's losses were as heavy as his own. So that we are not going to shut of view in connection with this subject the fact that Great Britain and other countries situated as we are at the present moment are also enjoying a season of great prosperity. I might say in passing, that I have myself very strong convictions that the trade of the country has been greatly facilitated from the fact that gentlemen on the other side of the House paid so little attention to their pre-election pledges, and that they allowed wise measures that were instituted by their predecessors to continue in operation and did little to prevent the prosperity of the country under the operation of the National Policy and other measures that were inaugurated by the late government. Then a reference is made to the improvement in ocean transportation. I have no particular fault to find with that, because in the wording of that clause no direct claim is made for the work by the present government. It refers to the improvement in ocean transportation, which assists and facilitates the development of the trade of our country at the present time, and it is followed by the suggestion that a measure with regard to the inspection of products going out of our country will be submitted to parliament during the present session. Then there is another clause that refers to the post offices, and here again the government is in a prophetic mood. The speech assures us that in a very short time the revenues of the post office will show such an ample increase as will make up for any present losses occasioned by the diminished rate of postage. On that subject it may be that the increased prosperity of the country will help the post office, and that these predictions will be fulfilled, but unfortunately we are not in a position to take the assurances of the government, even when they put these assurances in a speech from the Throne, as being something that we can absolutely rely upon, for we remember very well that last year a statement was placed in the mouth of His Excellency to the effect that the exodus of the people of Canada going to the United States had been entirely stopped, that it had ceased, and there is a reference in the same direction even in the present speech. We knew at that time, and every person knew, that there was no foundation of truth in the statement put in the mouth of His Excellency, and it may possibly be that this assurance with regard to the returns from the post office may also be found to be unworthy of very great credence. We must bear in mind that we have had assurances of the same kind with regard to the earnings of the Intercolonial Railway. My hon. friend, the Secretary of State, when we were discussing questions in connection with that railway last year, speaking from his place across the floor of this House, said that there was to be net receipts on the Intercolonial, for the year that was then almost drawing to a close, greater than all the net receipts on the Intercolonial during all the preceding years of its history. I find that the Minister of Agriculture, in speaking on this subject during the recent campaign in Sherbrooke, said that a very good result had been obtained, that the net receipts were between five and six thousand dollars. I have inquired, and I find that the report of the Minister of Railways has not yet been submitted to the public and we are not quite sure even about five or six thousand dollars, notwithstanding the high promises and assurances that were given to this House last year by my hon. friend the Secretary of State, and notwithstanding this election speech of the Minister of Agriculture during the campaign in Sherbrooke. Gentlemen in the government are referring with a good deal of satisfaction to the increased settlement in the North-west. There is no doubt that there is a very considerable accession in numbers, and whether the quality of the incomers as settlers and citizens of this country is of the first order or not, I am not going to discuss very closely. There are serious doubts upon that point—doubts that are specially entertained by the old settlers in the North-west Territories, who my hon. friend the Minister of Justice has said profited by this immigration in the labour that was brought into the country. Nevertheless I know that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction with the class of immigration brought into that country, and as to the extent of that settlement and the qualification for citizenship in this country possessed by those who are coming, we will leave the future to decide. I am by no means certain that the progress which has been made there will be as advantageous to the country in the end as the accession of other classes of population would be even in less numbers. The speech contains a paragraph with reference to the canals upon which I do not find it necessary to say more than two or three words. It is the self-glorification of this government with regard to the deepening and widening of the great canals. As my hon. friend the leader of the opposition pointed out to the House by the clearest array of figures, against which nothing can be said, which cannot be gainsaid, a vast proportion of that work was done by the late administration, and that the present administration had done very little more than to see after the completion of contracts which were let before they came into office, and at best was merely putting, as it were, the last touch upon plans upon which their predecessors had long and faithfully worked out.

There are three or four sections, as hon. gentlemen will have noticed, in this speech that relate entirely to the war in South Africa. Let me remark, in the first place, that hon. gentlemen in the government appear to have been under a somewhat mistaken impression. They say that during the recess hostilities have unfortunately broken out between Great Britain and the South African Republic. In my innocence I thought that Great Britain was in a state of war with the Orange Free State as well, but Her Majesty's government in Canada appear to realize only the fact that we are at war with the Transvaal alone. I suppose it is possible we have all been in error on this subject, and that the government are right. With regard to that war and the causes which led up to the conflict, it is not necessary that we should discuss them very much on the present occasion. It is enough, as has been stated by some leading public men of Canada, to know that the British Empire is engaged in a very severe struggle in which its prestige is at peril, and that being so, it is our duty to hasten to the defence of the empire; but as intelligent citizens, it is important that we should not allow our people for a moment to lose sight of the great and important fact that this war has not in any respect whatever been forced on the republics of South Africa by the British government. A careful perusal of the documents that have been issued on this question will convince every person that this is not a war that Great Britain has sought, that, on the contrary, every possible care was taken by the government of Great Britain to prevent any legitimate or reasonable cause for war. To my mind, this great struggle—all this expenditure and this loss of blood and whatever humiliation is involved in recent British disasters, and whatever risk or danger there may be at this moment to British prestige—I have no hesitation in saying that all this is due to the surrender in 1881 by Gladstone's government, when they withdrew from their occupation of the Transvaal. They created a deplorable impression in the minds of the Boers that they were able to defeat the British, to such an extent that from that day forward there has been a growing idea in the minds of the Dutch population of South Africa in the direction of overthrowing British power in that part of the world. I have not the slightest doubt that that is the case, and although it may be enough for us to know that our cause is right in this matter and that our country is in peril and without inquiring too much into the cause we know very well the truth that lies in the words of our greatest poet, that he is 'thrice armed who hath his quarrel just.' We know that our quarrel with the South African republic is right, and that fact strengthens the arms of our soldiers and the councils of our country, and will ultimately help to bring victory to the British arms. In 1877, the British government, I think I am right in saying, on the invitation of the people of the Transvaal, sent Sir Theophilus Shepstone into that country. At all events, it was no invasion of that country. He had less than a score of a staff with him on that occasion, and the people received him with acclaim—at all events without any strong expression of dissent. They allowed British arms to be used to protect them against the natives, with whom they were waging an ineffective war. They accepted salaries from the British government, amongst the salaried officers being Kruger himself, and after all this, when the natives had been subjugated, and when the country was recovering from the condition in which it was found when Sir Theophilus Shepstone entered it, the Boers treacherously, and with the greatest ingratitude, shot down the British soldiers without warning, and when they could not be prepared to properly defend themselves The act was one of the basest ingratitude, and there should have been no retrocession until victory was achieved, and had the protests of Sir Evelyn Wood been acceded to at that time no convention would have been signed until some distinct advantage had been gained by the British arms. I have no hesitation in saying, from an examination of the public documents bearing on this question, that during the whole period from that time down to the present moment, there has been no act of wrong or harshness on the part of the British government. I will even go so far—although my views may not be entirely concurred in—as to say that the Jamieson raid itself, unauthorized as it was by the British government, clumsily executed as it was, was not without justification, for at that time the government of the Transvaal had entered into contracts, and were making arrangements for placing guns on the hills looking down on the town of Johannesburg, which was an act of hostility, and was, in a great measure, the cause which led to the conspiracy, or whatever you may call it, of the Uitlanders, and of the organization of the Jamieson raid. The very fact that the British government found itself, in the month of September last, when that audacious ultimatum was presented to them, in a state of utter unpreparedness for war, will be the answer which history will make to the charge that the British provoked a war in South Africa. All through the correspondence it will be found that Sir Alfred Milner and all others engaged on the British side were intent upon a peaceful solution of the difficulty. They appreciated the fact that the British government could not possibly turn a deaf ear to the petition of 21,000 British inhabitants of the Transvaal, who complained that both in their persons and their property they had been injured and were being wronged. It was possible that the British government could turn a deaf ear to such complaints from their citizens, and they pressed, as the correspondence will show, in a reasonable and amicable way through all the days that were occupied in the Bloemfontein conference, and also in all the correspondence between the two governments, for a peaceful solution of the difficulty between the British government and the South African republic. It is a matter of pleasure and pride to every British subject to know, notwithstanding that the British arms have suffered some deplorable reverses in the field, yet the military traditions of the country, coming down through generations, and the reputation that history has given the British soldier for bravery and endurance in the field, have been honorably maintained. Nothing has occurred to tarnish the glorious reputation of the British soldier in the battles which have already take place, and notwithstanding errors, as we think, on the part of those who are leading them, and on which we have no right just now to express an opinion of condemnation—notwithstanding all this, nothing has transpired to tarnish the glorious reputation that British soldiers and generals enjoy, and we have no doubt that these noble qualities are maintained by them at this time, and will triumph over their opponents in the end. It is a source of great pleasure and pride to the whole of us that the United Kingdom, as well as the colonies, have made a display of power and developed a possession of resources for military operations during this war which, at this moment, is astonishing the world, and that notwithstanding these checks and these disasters that the British forces have met in South Africa there is but one determination in the British Empire, at home and in all the colonies, animating the breasts, I believe, of all of Her Majesty's subjects in every part of the world, that this war should be pressed to a conclusion satisfactory to the British people. While this is the feeling, and while we all—I think I may say all—have the same feeling, or should have the same feeling with regard to loyalty to the Empire, and an earnest desire to assist, I cannot help saying that I think it is a matter of regret that the government of Canada did not move with greater cordiality and alacrity to offer assistance of the British government at this crisis. My hon. friend, the Minister of Justice drew a distinction between our case and that of the Australian colonies—that at the time the measure of urgency appeared to be required to be taken the parliaments of the Australian colonies were in session. If my observations as to the date is of any value, our parliament was also in session at the time the parliaments of some of the Australian colonies passed those resolutions. It is a fact that the parliament of Canada did not prorogue until August 10, while the action on the part of some of the colonies whose parliaments were then in session was taken before that time. Therefore, this point which the Minister of Justice has raised does not help in the slightest degree the position of the Canadian government in respect to this matter.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I suppose the hon. gentleman called the attention of the government last session to the omission in not making that provision ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Perhaps my hon. friend thinks I ought to feel about myself as he probably feels about himself, that no attention was called to it because he did not do it. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition called the attention of the government to it, and pointed out, as he read to the House yesterday, the action which he would recommend in the matter, which was to offer assistance.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And pay for it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The government were not without receiving the suggestion. I do my share of talking here, and it is not necessary that the senior member for Halifax or myself should say anything in order to admit that it was said. It stands fully recorded in the blue-books that have been brought down, that are now in our possession, that during all these months, when these difficulties in South Africa were becoming more and more sharp—I speak now for the month of September and up to the early part of October—when almost every other colony in the empire, self-governing as well as crown colonies, had made propositions of assistance—the government of Canada did not move, and I think that the government of Canada was in an excellent position to move—a better position to move than some of the Australian colonies were, because, as my hon. friend has pointed out to this House, in some of the Australian colonies the motion to assist was only carried by very small majorities—in one instance, by a majority of only one, whereas in the Dominion of Canada an expression of sympathy with the Outlanders and support to the government of Great Britain in wrestling with the South African question was unanimously passed by both Houses of Parliament. Notwithstanding all that, one after another of the colonies proffered their assistance. On July 11 Queensland made its offer. On the 26th, New Zealand's and other offers followed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There were no hostilities at that time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Hostilities had not broken out in July, at the date of some of these offers, but there was talk then of hostilities breaking out, and the government of Canada, all this time, did not move, but whatever the government did in the way of putting inself on record was decidedly unfavourable to any action by the government of Canada. My hon. friend shakes his head. I am quite sure he gave no expression himself to weaken the position of Canada in the empire, but his leader did, and a very influential member of the administration, the Minister of Public Works, was going up and down the country giving utterance to the very strongest possible objections and opposition to any assistance being offered by Canada; and in the paper which he publishes, the objections and opposition were being incessantly put forward. I do not suppose it is necessary that I should refer very much in detail to the utterances of these gentlemen, but one utterance of the Premier, and that is the famous interview with the Toronto Globe, must certainly not be allowed to pass without some attention. That interview took place on the afternoon of October 3, and appears in the Globe on the following day. It was stated in the Globe at the time that the correspondent had waited on the premier the afternoon of October 3, and my hon. friend rather insisted, when the leader of the opposition here was speaking, that the premier of the country was not aware at the time he gave that interview to the Globe correspondent, of the contents, or had not received the despatch from the British government of the date of October 3, laying down certain rules upon which volunteers would be accepted from Canada. It is possible that this despatch had not reached the premier at the time he made this statement when he was interviewed by the Toronto Globe, but the Minister of Public Works addressed a meeting in Toronto only three or four days ago, when he made the announcement that he had seen this despatch cabled in the English papers before it had been received in Canada by the government officially, and he made it a complaint and a point of etiquette between the government of Canada and Mr. Chamberlain that this despatch had been published in the British papers, and had been cabled and brought under the eye of members of the government of Canada in that way before they had received it officially from the British government. It was, therefore, evident, if Mr. Tarte is to be believed—and I suppose we have to believe him, for he is an hon. gentleman—that he, at least, knew of the contents of this despatch of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain before the time the premier gave this interview in the Toronto Globe.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He could not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Mr. Tarte says he did. This is certain that the premier, if he did not know it in the afternoon of October 3, must have known it not many hours later, for it was transmitted after five o'clock from London, and making allowance for the difference in time, it was in Ottawa early in the afternoon of October 3, and we are very sure the Governor General would be reached by an important despatch of that nature, no matter where he was, as fast as a telegram could be sent to him, and we all know too much about the care and exactness with which British statesmen do their work to believe that he kept that despatch back one moment longer than necessary from his prime minister. Therefore, it is very hard to understand that the prime minister did not have this despatch in his possession when he gave this interview to the Toronto Globe. He had a good means of knowing what was in the cable from the newspapers as the Minister of Public Works had. It does not say much for the solidarity of the government that one member of the cabinet would have information of that character which he would keep for a moment from his premier. It is evident that some members of the government, at all events, knew of this despatch before the interview was given to the Toronto Globe. It is certain one member of the government knew it, and it is likely it was known to other members of the administration, and yet in the face of that the premier says :

There exists a great deal of misconception in the country regarding the powers of the government in the present case,' said Sir Wilfrid. As I understand the Militia Act, and I may say that I have given it some study of late, our volunteers are enrolled to be used in the defense of the Dominion. They are Canadian troops to be used to fight for Canada's defense. Perhaps the most widespread misapprehension is that they cannot be sent out of Canada. To my mind it is clear that cases might arise when they might be sent to a foreign land to fight. To postulate a case :—Suppose that Spain should declare war upon Great Britain. Spain has, or had, a navy, and that navy might be got ready to assail Canada as part of the empire. Sometimes the best method of defending oneself is to attack, and in that case Canadian soldiers might certainly be sent to Spain, and it is quite certain that they legally might be so dispatched to the Iberian Peninsula. The case of the South African Republic is not analogous. There is no menace to Canada, and, although we may be willing to contribute troops, I do not see how we can do so. Then again, how could we do so, without parliament granting us money ? We simply could not do anything. In other words we should have to summon parliament. The government of Canada is restricted in its powers. It is responsible to parliament and it can do very little without the permision of parliament. There is no doubt as to the attitude of the government on all questions that mean menace to British interests, but in this present case our limitations are very clearly defined. And so it is that we have not offered a Canadian contingent to the Home authorities. The Militia Department duly transmitted individual offers to the Imperial government, and the reply from the War Office as published in Saturday's 'Globe' shows their attiude on the question. As to Canada furnishing a contingent, the government has not discussed the question, for the reasons which I have stated—reasons which I think must be easily understood by every one who understands the constitutional law on the question. The statement in the 'Military Gazette', published this morning, is a pure invention. Far from possessing any foundation, in fact it is wholly imaginative.

Then Mr. Tarte, at St. Vincent de Paul, puts himself on record as follows:—

But in the order in council, which I hold in my hand, and which will be published one of these days, it is said that what we have just done shall not be a precedent.

What I objected to—and I say it again, and I cannot say it often enough—is the creation of a precedent which would have permitted the Secretary of State for the Colonies to-morrow, the day after to-morrow, in a year, two years, to send us a message saying 'I should like some troops.'

But I do not wish that the operation be repeated on the next occasion.

Here was the premier declaring on October 3, that the war was not one in which Canada could be said to be interested—that it might be interested if it were at war with Spain, which had a navy, but as the South African republic had no navy, there appeared to be no cause for our engaging in this war. That was the view taken at that moment. The government also take another view. They say, 'We were not quite sure what public opinion would warrant at that time; we waited until we were sure that public opinion would warrant such a strong step as that involved.' That was the premier's defence, in another place speaking not long since. He said, 'we waited until we could discover what public opinion was, and we would not be justified in acting in advance of what was clearly the public opinion of Canada.' All hon. gentlemen in the government take this ground, but if the premier had waited and had not put himself on record and some of his colleagues had not put themselves on record in a very opposite direction, trying to make public opinion in that direction, there might be something in their contention that the government were waiting for the development of public opinion, but having tried to mould public opinion in the very opposite direction, they are not in a position to set up that defence. ,The action of the premier of Canada reminds me a little of a western orator of whom I have read, who, seeking a public position, undertook to place his views very fully before the parties who had votes in the election forthcoming. After descanting very fully on all the great public questions of the time he said, 'these are my sentiments, I hold them very strongly. They are very dear to me, but if you do not approve of them, I am ready to change them at any time and take up any other set of opinions that you prefer.' Now, that was the position of the premier and some of his colleagues with regard to sending troops to South Africa.

Another minister of the government was still more open mouthed at that moment in exhibiting his hostility and objections to assisting the mother country at that juncture. I refer to the Commissioner of Public Works. I am not going to refer just now to any of the speeches or writings of the hon. gentleman, except the one read. Hon. gentlemen are familiar with them. After the action was taken—and taken as far as some gentlemen were concerned with a very bad grace—the Minister of Public Works went to a meeting at Saint Vincent de Paul and claiming to hold a document in his hand, which at that time as a privy councillor he had no right to take out of the records of the privy council office, and shaking it before the meeting he said: 'It is true we have agreed to send a contingent; we have sent that contingent and we have carefully guarded ourselves so that it shall not be taken as a precedent. It shall not involve this country in any future struggle of this kind. It is finally and carefully guarded in the document itself that it is not to be regarded as a precedent.' The Minister of Public Works evidently thought that he was playing a trump card about this precedent business, but I do not think—even at that time—and certainly not at this moment—that very much importance was attached to his declarations with regard to the precedent matter. And if a full and complete answer to the Minister of Public Works was required, we have it from the Minister of Justice across the floor of the House in the address which he has delivered to-day. He spoke of the way the British constitution had grown, and he said it would be madness for any person to profess to form a constitution for the British Empire on paper and lay it down by rule; that the relation of the colonies to the empire must grow out of cases just like this one with which we have been dealing. That was the view of the Minister of Justice and I agree with him, but if the view propounded by the Minister of Public Works is a correct one, this, the most important incident in the history of this empire, one of the most important incidents in the history, I might say, of the world, the colonies stepping to the front, and offering assistance and taking part in the wars of the empire is to have no significance. I entirely and completely agree with the view presented by the hon. Minister of Justice to this House. It is a most important turning point in the affairs of this empire of ours. Some years ago I was appealed to by some gentlemen in Montreal to take an interest in organizing a branch of the Imperial Federation league in my own province. Although in full sympathy always with the closer bringing together of the colonies with the empire, for reasons which I then stated I declined to take the initiative in promoting such an organization. One of the reasons was that I was at that time too actively engaged in politics to be the medium of bringing the best men of both sides together for united action on a question of that kind, which ought to be the result of combined action of men of both political parties. I gave another reason, and I remember my words very well—I had thought them over very carefully—and that was that it would be difficult to make great progress with the question of Imperial Federation in a time of peace. But I said in my letter to Mr. McGoun at that time that the first gun that was fired in a great war by Britain would bring the colonies together like the leaves of a closed book. The views I then expressed have been amply verified by what has happened in this present war. There has been a great deal of discussion which I think would have been infinitely better left out, with regard to the attitude of races and so forth towards the empire during this war. I lay the blame for all this discussion at the door of the Minister of Public Works, and to some extent to the Premier of Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I say they are entirely to blame for all this unseemly discussion. I believe that when a great question arises affecting the welfare and prestige of this empire of ours, under which we all enjoy equal and glorious liberties, the great heart of the people of Canada, irrespective of race or descent, whether of Norman, Saxon, Celtic, or, like my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, of Scandinavian origin, is of one mind. I believe that is the case, and notwithstanding appearances of differences which have been given to the discussion, it will be found in the end that we are almost entierly of one heart and mind on this question. Speaking of the French Canadian people, who form so very large a part of the population, I know a little of them in my own native province, and I have no hesitation in saying that a more loyal, devoted and true hearted people to the empire under which we live than the French Canadians of Prince Edward Island we do not possess.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—And when the call was made by the British government for assistance in South Africa, our Acadian friends contributed their quota. There was no question about it, and they sent their full proportion of the men from our province, and I rejoice to know that it is not only in my own province that such a state of feeling exists. I recognize it in the fact that the dear son of the head of this House has gone forward to fight in battle. That is the best recognition of it. We have also an additional evidence of the loyalty and of the enthusiasm of the French race in Canada to the British Crown in addition to all that we have had, and history had given it to us in the past, in the valuable services rendered to the British government in the Soudan, and we have evidence of it again in the departure for South Africa of the son of a distinguished citizen of Montreal. And to the bottom of my heart I deprecate the discussion of this question from the standpoint of race or creed. There are a few general provisions in the address, but on an occasion of this kind, when the mind of almost everybody is fixed upon some one great central question, which dominates our feelings we are apt almost for the time to lose sight of subjects which ordinarily are regarded as of considerable importance. We notice that there is a paragraph in this speech which calls attention to negotiations which are going on with our sister colonies in the West Indies for the enlargement of trade in that direction, and it is also added that some hopes are entertained of the same advantages in the way of enlargement of the trade being obtained with some of the countries of South America. It certainly is a little remarkable in connection with this subject, the mention of negotiations for reciprocal trade or enlarged trade with the West Indies and with South America, that not a word is said about enlarged trade with 'the continent to which we belong' about which we used to hear so much, not a word about reciprocity, not a word about negotiations with the United States about bringing about more full trade relations, which gentlemen opposite regarded as the apple of their eye in days not long gone by. There are some other sections of the Speech which refer to legislation of last year, and labour troubles and railway commissions which we will discuss when the papers come down. There is no urgency on these subjects. We may also deal with the banking law and rate of interest in the same way. We are promised a measure for taking the census, and almost in the same sentence a measure is promised for the better arrangement of the electoral districts. As the leader of the opposition remarked, it is certainly a most amusing thing to find a government proposing these measures to the same parliament at the same time. They are proposing to pass a law for taking a census next year which involves a readjustment of representation in all the provinces probably. We will certainly have, under the constitution, to take up the question a little more than a year from the present time, and yet they propose to go on and deal with it now in perfect ignorance of what the census may reveal, or without knowledge of the circumstances under which that redistribution will have to be made. It is a ridiculous proposition to propose a general measure—for I presume that is what is meant—for the rearrangement of the constituencies when we are just proceeding to the act of taking a census which calls for a redistribution immediately afterwards. We are also promised a measure on the criminal code. I hope that my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, who bestowed a great deal of labour on this question during the last session of parliament, and who received all the assistance that this House was able to give him in order to make good and satisfactory amendments to the criminal code, will be a little more successful this year, either that he will be a little more active himself and bring the bill down earlier to this House and have it sent to the other House in good time to secure its passage, or that he will have a little more influence with his colleagues in the other branch of parliament so that we will reach the conclusion of the measure and see it passed into law, and that it will not pass away in the slaughter of the innocents as it did last year at the close of the session. While, however, there are a great many subjects referred to in the Address, there are old acquaintances that we miss a reference to. There is no statement about that famous Yukon Railway.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That great tramway from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake, that great measure in which the destinies of the country hung in suspense two years ago, such an important measure that the government hastened to bring it down—in fact it was brought down—in the other House before we had completed the debate on the address in this Chamber, and it was regarded as of great importance to be carried into law and it was a measure in reference to which the vials of wrath had been poured on this House for not having faithfully carried out the will of the government in regard to it. It is strange that the government have not seen fit to reintroduce it in some shape since that time. We must regard it as an old acquaintance that will return no more. Then there is no allusion in the Speech from the Throne to a measure that was regarded as of very great importance, but which only took the position of the famous sword over the head of Damocles but which did not come down—I refer to the measure of Senate Reform. There is no reference to that unless it is proposed to include it among some other measures that are referred to in a general way. Then there is another very important measure that we have not heard about recently which seems somewhat remarkable. It was introduced in the parliament of 1896 by a very important member of the present administration, I refer to the Postmaster General. We have all heard about Mr. Mulock's bill for the better preservation of the independence of parliament, a bill by which it was proposed to provide that no member of parliament should accept any office of emolument until he had ceased being a member of parliament for twelve months. I have before me a report of the speech made on that occasion by the Postmaster General, which I think should not be lost sight of, and I will read an extract from it to show the great importance he attached to the subject on that occasion. He said:

If the government of the day can dangle public offices before their followers and induce a few and perhaps an increasing number——

He was a bit of a prophet at that time.

—to aspire to those positions they become mere parasites on the administration.....

not only to do that, sir, but moving among their colleagues they become as it were corrupting agencies amongst their own ranks. And so a small percentage of persons in that position are likely to impair the independence of the whole body. So it has become more in my opinion a very crying abuse, and parliament is cast down from its high position and not only is the will of the people interfered with but all through the country the electorate, noticing these things, are coming to the conclusion that the highest aim a man can have in seeking public life is that he may, through parliament, find his way into a comfortable position for life.

This was the view of the Postmaster General when that bill was introduced, and it is worthy of remark, too, that a gentleman then a member of parliament, Mr. Lister, rose in his place very seriously, after Mr. Mulock had made the speech, and said that it was a very great and crying evil and that some measure should be passed to remedy it. It has happened that this same gentleman has fallen a victim to this very evil that he so greatly deplored at that time, and not only he, but twelve or thirteen of his colleagues in this parliament have accepted offices of emolument from the government of the day and from the hands of the Postmaster General, as a member of that government, who regarded these transactions as such very great abominations. It is certainly a matter of surprise that the members of this government, knowing as they do that this evil exists, and, as Mr. Mulock prophesied in 1896, that it is increasing—it is rather remarkable that no promise is made in the Speech from the Throne that the government will bring down a bill in reference to it. As this is the latter end of the administration it would be timely to do so. Day by day they are losing hope, I believe, of coming back again as a government, and if they were not able to correct the transgressions of their own friends, they might have the satisfaction of curing in advance acts of this kind on the part of their successors. Then there is no mention in the Speech from the Throne of commercial union. Who would have thought in the years 1887 and 1888, that it would ever happen that a Liberal government would be in power and bring down a Speech from the Throne and not propose a policy of commercial union with the United States? Then there is nothing about reciprocity. Those of us who were in the contest of 1891 recollect how strongly they regarded that subject. It has not been obtained yet, and is not mentioned in the Speech. There is no reference to free trade in any form or, as they have it in England. It is true my hon. friend the seconder of the address made some references to free trade, but when I heard my hon. friend refer to that subject in this House I was reminded of the story of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus who had wandered into an unknown and desolate cave not far from the city and after partaking of some curious liquors had fallen asleep in the cave and had not wakened up till a new king had arisen in Ephesus. When I heard the hon. gentleman from Sunbury refer to free trade I thought he was one of the Seven Sleepers. He had come up here with the solemn consciousness that he was still a Liberal of the old school, and being a Liberal of that school, that he was talking of something which was appropriate to the Liberals of the country. All that is past and gone. The name of free trade, like that of the old King of Ephesus, is only appropriate on a tombstone. But apart from all these subjects in this very long Speech, there is one thing to which no reference has been made and it is very hard to understand why it has been omitted. I refer to the Alaskan Boundary. A very great friend of mine, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, has been engaged nearly all the period since parliament rose in aiding by-elections, in which he was not eminently successful, in Prince Edward Island and in the other provinces as well; besides what little time he could spare from the management and conduct of provincial elections he has been giving very faithful attention to this question of the Alaskan Boundary. It is certainly a remarkable thing that no reference has been made to the result of all these great efforts on the part of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I have gone over some subjects in the speech and some not in it, but which certainly the House will be entitled to some explanation on, if not now, later on, as to why they are not mentioned.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I notice in the Speech from the Throne a paragraph with reference to immigration into the North-west Territories, a question that concerns the people of that part of the country to some considerable extent, and I may say that I am not prepared to find fault with the policy of the government in bringing emigrants into the country. The North-west is dependent on immigration to fill it up and to make settlement and bring prosperity, and we are prepared to accept almost any class of immigrants that the government in their wisdom may think it advisable to send us. There has been considerable fault found by some portions of the community with the class of immigrants brought in. This has not originated recently, because years ago, when the conservative party was in power, resolutions were passed at Fort Qu'Appelle complaining of the class of immigrants being brought into the country, people who had not their pockets full of money and a bank account besides. They were classed as paupers who should not be brought into the country. My impression is that a good class of labouring population is one of the best that could be brought in, especially in the west where we till the soil and engage mainly in agriculture. But the government have brought in a considerable number of immigrants the last two years many of whom are said to be men without means. I do not find fault with that class of people. Of course any government could bring in population if they helped them when they come into the country ; but I am under the impression that the Doukhobors represent a good, industrious class of people and perhaps being vegetarians they will be able to live at less expense and get on better than those who require a more expensive bill of fare. The point I want to raise is this, that we in the Territories have no means of raising a revenue to carry on the government of our country. We are dependent entirely on the grants we receive from time to time from the federal government, and I may say from the very earliest history of the country—I speak of the time I was a member of the North-west Council—the Dominion government has given us large sums of money, quite sufficient to meet the requirements of the people to educate their children and build roads and bridges for the convenience of the settlers. We required to have roads and bridges built to enable the farmers to haul their produce to the market. We must have good roads and bridges, because where produce is hauled a considerable distance, large loads cannot be taken if the roads are not good. From the early history of the country the government at Ottawa has been called on to contribute considerable sums of money to enable us to keep up an efficient school system, and I say with some considerable pride that, thanks to the federal government, both parties up to the present time have made liberal grants so that we have been able to maintain in the North-west Territories a class of schools which will compare favourably with those in any part of Canada. The government has been liberal in the administration of that particular fund. Then our roads and bridges have been kept in a very fair state of repair. The Doukhobors and Galicians have settled in a far off corner of the north-eastern part of Assiniboia. There is a district which requires more money to keep the roads and bridges in an efficient condition than the very southern portion, which is a prairie section. In this northern part of the country there is more water and creeks are more numerous, and it is more difficult to make roads there than further south where there are fewer natural obstructions in the way of bluffs, sloughs, &c. Our Prime Minister, Mr. Haultain, came down here last year, and Mr. Ross also, one a conservative and the other a reformer, and you would think they would be able to reach both parties. They came and could get no increased grant. Premier Haultain said in two speeches which were reported in propounding his new policy that they had reached the end of their tether, the jumping-off point—that they could get no more money from the government at Ottawa and had to resort to direct taxation or do with less funds for schools and roads and bridges. Under our system of government we have received from time to time increased power, so that to-day we have all the powers of a province proper with the exception of being able to issue debentures, charter railways or raise money. We have power to establish municipal organizations and other requirements in that country, but we have not the power to get money. We have not the lands, the timber, or the mineral resources—in fact, we have no resources from which we can get a dollar of money except that raised from licenses for hotels and billiard tables and other petty sources of revenue. The balance of the funds to meet our requirements has to come from the Federal government, who control all the resources of that western country. What I am stating now is with a view to giving this government some information as to the requirements of the west. Premier Haultain delivered a speech at Yorkton in the early part of the present session, in which he said we are going to hold an election after the present session and will provide a policy to go to the country on, and that policy is the organization of provincial government. He said that course was forced upon him by the fact that the government at Ottawa had refused to give him any more money—that he had to get to the end of his tether, the jumping-off point, and must either have more money from Ottawa, or increased powers by which we can tax people or curtail our grants to the schools and stop building roads and bridges. This is the statement of the Prime Minister in a set speech at Yorkton, and in another speech at Oxbow. That is a deplorable state of affairs. In a short time we will have a general election, and it might be my best policy, as a Conservative, not to mention these things because it would help us to defeat the government. It would be a most deplorable thing for this government to have it said throughout the North-west that they had all the resources of the country, that they will not give us money to carry on our local affairs ; that they settle immigrants in places where we have to build roads and bridges and maintain schools for them, and yet refuse to provide the money. I am a patriot first, a party man second. My advice to the government is to save us from that position, because the majority of us do not want to be obliged to take on the full responsibility of self-government and be liable to direct taxation, as propounded by Mr. Haultain. The farmers do not wish it, and what I think they will do—because I have always given this government credit that if a matter is properly represented to them they will do what is fair—is to come to the rescue and give the North-west government a sufficient sum of money for their local purposes, especially as it will benefit the new settlers that are going in there. You are bringing in a class of immigrants who are reported to have little money but are said to be industrious and in that way an acquisition to the country. It is the man who can labour and toil who will develop the resources of the country. These men consume the goods manufactured in the east and we have to buy from eastern Canada as well as import goods, and consequently have to pay a larger share of the customs duties than any other portion of Canada in proportion to our population, and it would be a very wise policy on the part of the Federal government to see that the North-west government are prevented from going to the country on a question such as they have suggested, because it will redound to the discredit of the Ottawa government and they will not get a man in that part of the country to support them. These remarks are full of meaning if the hon. gentlemen will only be guided by them. It should be the first consideration of the government, even from a party standpoint, to listen to what I have said. We do not want anything that is unjust or unfair. We want a fair proportion of the revenue of the country, to which we are entitled, to maintain public roads and bridges and schools that are necessary for the rapidly increasing population. We do not want to be in a position to mortgage our country and put ourselves in debt as some of the other provinces are.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, Feb. 7, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW SENATOR.

Hon. JOSEPH SHEHYN, of the city of Quebec, representing the Division of Laurentides, vice Hon. E. J. Price, deceased, was introduced and took his seat.

SENATE REFORM.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The Ottawa Citizen of Saturday, 23rd instant, has the following passage as part of its editorial :

He (the Hon. Mr. Tarte) has just told the people of Toronto that the reason why Mr. Chapleau has been chosen (to the Clerkship of the Senate) is because the government has made up its mind to reform the Senate.

I desire to ask the leader of the government in this House if the Minister of Public Works has made this official declaration ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I had not noticed the inquiry of the hon. senator on the motion paper. I do not know what the hon. Minister of Public Works said at Toronto, but I desire the hon. gentleman to bear in mind that he has stated as a fact here what an hon. member of the government is reported to have said elsewhere, which I am inclined to dispute, and therefore I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a proper question to place on the order paper, and not one on which the hon. gentleman can call for an answer.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The hon. gentleman will take notice that I have declared no positive fact whatever ; I am simply citing what the Ottawa Citizen said in its editorial, and I ask whether that is a fact or not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The hon. gentleman is free not to answer if he wishes, or if he thinks the answer might commit himself or some member of the government. The question is fairly put. I state no fact, but simply quote from a newspaper, and ask if such statement, made publicly in a speech at Toronto, is true.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know that any such statement was made in Toronto. I was not present at the meeting. But I say that an appointment has been made in this House that the public opinion of the country will approve of. That is my opinion, and as a member of this administration I am prepared to assume the full responsibility for that appointment, believing the gentleman who has been appointed to the position of chief clerk of this Senate is thoroughly competent to discharge the duties of the office, and will discharge them in a manner which will be satisfactory to the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not the question.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the answer he has just given is beside the question altogether. I do not question the propriety of the appointment, or whether the reasons for appointing Mr. Chapleau to this House were good or bad. I believe he is competent to fill the position as well, possibly, as Mr. Langevin. But that is not the question. I simply asked whether it is true that the Hon. Mr. Tarte, who has used his own paper for months and months to deliberately insult this House, has gone to the province of Ontario, and made a statement that is not worthy of a member of this government or of any other government. I would add more, if it was parliamentary for me to use the expression that I have on the tip of my tongue, but I will ask the hon. leader of the government, if he takes the trouble to rise again, to consider the question and not depart from the meaning of the inquiry and from the meaning which I had in my mind when I placed the notice on the order paper, and not to question the competence or ability of our clerk. I simply draw the attention of the government to this—I was going to say flippant, but I will not use the word because it is unparliamentary—to this declaration made by a colleague of the hon. leader of this House in Toronto.

THE ADDRESS.

THE DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Orders of the Day having been called—

Resuming the adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech on the opening of the Fifth Session of the Eighth Parliament.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—In the few remarks I shall address to this House, I do not intend to make what my hon. friend from Richmond calls a scrap book speech. I have been a good deal in parliament and I think I know the promises and the performances of the present government, and to that subject I propose to address myself. We are congratulated on the prosperity of the country. We are all glad to know that the country is prosperous, but it naturally occurs to me to ask what has this government done to promote that prosperity ? Has it done anything ? Hon. gentlemen used to say, before they attained power, that they would get reciprocity with the United States for the Dominion, and secure markets for the farmers of Canada where they could sell their products advantageously. They even went so far as to propose commercial union with the United States. We do not hear anything about commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity now. It is very desirable, in the interests of the people of this country, that our export trade should increase. Now, what has this government done to help to give markets to the farmers of Canada ? Their promises have been loud ; their performances have been nil, as far as my observation goes. We had the promise of a fast Atlantic service, to facilitate the transport of agricultural products to the European markets. Have they done anything in that direction ? I believe we have the model of a bottle-necked ship, and that is about as far as the government have gone. They told the people of this country, when they were in opposition, that if they turned out the men in power—turned out these rascally Tories—they would obtain for the country reciprocity with the United States. Do we hear anything about it now ? Have they carried out any promise that they made to the people of this country ? Not one. A paragraph in the Speech refers to the war in South Africa. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice, did not tell us yesterday how much of the expenditure of the expedition was going to be paid by the government. I consider that the action of the government has belittled this country in the eyes of the world. They have sent men to South Africa—delivered them there, leaving the British government to feed them—sent them there C. O. D. We ought to be ashamed of ourselves to ask the spinners and weavers of Great Britain to assume an expense which we should pay ourselves. We have had the advantage all our lives of being British subjects. Do we appreciate what we enjoy ? If we sail from sea to sea, from clime to clime, we have the protection of the mother country and the British flag—a flag which, wherever it floats, is the symbol of freedom to the slave and honour to the brave. Yet we are led to believe that the government will not pay our men after they land them in South Africa. They blame a certain member of the government for this. I contend they are all equally to blame. If the cabinet permit themselves to be bullied by one member, they are unfit for their position. They are all as responsible as the Minister of Public Works for the position he has taken. The paragraph in the speech is very ambiguous. The government do not say if they are going to pay the whole expense of our own forces, or how much of it. The people of Canada look for information on the subject, and the government misrepresent the feeling of Canadians if they expect the British government to pay our men who have volunteered to serve in South Africa. We are told that the sending of these troops is not to be considered as a precedent. The government was not to send more than the first contingent ; but they had to change their mind—the people of the country forced them to send a second, and the government deserve no credit for what they have done. If they had not sent more troops they would have forfeited their positions as representatives of the people. They had to be driven to do what was right and honest in the interest of the empire. While gentlemen on the other side were in opposition they promised us preferential trade within the empire. I believe we could have got it had we looked for it and made a proper effort to secure it. I know that a speech delivered by the premier in 1896, in London, Ontario, was in favour of preferential trade. He was then as much in favour of it as even Sir Charles Tupper was. He said what a benefit it would have been to the farmers of Canada if they only had a preference in the British market, but when he went to England what did he say ? Did he say he wanted preferential trade ? On the contrary, he said no, that free trade was a better policy for England and better for Canada also, and he came back to Canada wearing the Cobden medal. The people of Canada have not forgotten that, and will not forget it, but will take the first opportunity to express their condemnation of the course that the hon. gentleman pursued. This trade question is a very important one. The government tell us they are constructing canals and one would suppose from the language in the speech that they had made all these improvements. They have merely finished up the work that the former government commenced and carried on for years. The government claim that recent immigration into the Northwest is desirable. I take their word for it, though I have my doubts as to the characters of a portion of the immigration that has gone in there of late years. However, if the policy that the members of the present government advocated when they were in opposition had been carried out, there would be no settlement there at all. If the people in the North-west are prosperous no thanks to the government. I remember when the Liberal party said that the Canadian Pacific Railway, if built, would not earn enough to pay for the grease to lubricate the axles of their trains. One would think, to hear these hon. gentlemen speak now, that all the prosperity of the North-west was due to their policy, whereas the fact is prosperity has come in spite of them. Now, let us look at their blunders. Vessels engaged in trade in the inland waters of this country could not get freight enough to load from one Canadian port to another, yet what did this government do? They allowed United States vessels to participate in the coasting trade of Canada. They soon found they had made a blunder and cancelled the arrangement. But they are always blundering, and I hope they will soon come to their end, because the government made blunders or worse in their manner of sending troops to South Africa. It may come all right. As far as the Minister of Public Works is concerned, his opposition was a benefit to the country. Conan Doyle says we ought to erect a monument as high as Saint Paul's to Kruger because he has done more than any one else to unite the empire. Mr. Tarte has done the same for Canada—he has united the people of the Dominion. I believe that our people are loyal to British institutions.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—Except Mr. Tarte.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Yes, I will except him, because he has not acted as he should have done. He misrepresents the feelings of the French Canadian people. From all I have seen, and from what I know of their history, the French Canadians are loyal to the British Crown and to the institutions that give freedom to everybody, no matter what his creed, nationality or colour. I am satisfied that the mass of the French Canadians are loyal to the British Crown. Mr. Tarte's action has been dictated by political exigencies. He thinks he can hold the French Canadians together in that way. If he wishes to raise a race cry, he is welcome, but I have no feeling but one of kindness in my heart for the French Canadians. They are kindly and courteous as a race, and bear their share of the burdens of the country, and I believe they are ready to shoulder their rifles and fight for the honour of the empire, when necessity calls for it, but not to show their interest, as my hon. friend the Prime Minister did, when he told the House of Commons that if he were on the banks of the Saskatchewan, he would shoulder his musket and shoot down the Queen's friends. The government are one day advocating one thing and the next day another. What had they done for this country in the way of obtaining reciprocity with the United States? The first thing they did was to take the duty off corn, the very thing they could use more than anything else to obtain an advantage for this country. The Minister of Justice says it is a grand stroke of business, that by allowing free corn to come in, Canadian farmers could buy it at 12½ cents a bushel. They took the duty off binder-twine and they manufactured it in the penitentiaries. What is manufactured in penitentiaries they sell to their friends, who combine and sell to the farmers at a high price. The Minister of Justice said the object was to give employment to the prisoners in the penitentiaries. I believe he is desirous that they should be employed, but the government should see that we obtain a fair price for the products.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear; we do.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The government obtain 3½ cents for it, and their friends sell it to the farmers for 10 and 12 cents. Is that a fair price? It is a strange thing, in reference to the sending of this contingent to South Africa, that the Prime Minister and his government changed their minds about it. In the first place, they said not a man, not a dollar. But how they have changed. The people drove them to do something, but they have not told us exactly what they are going to do yet. We know, however, that the Prime Minister, in an interview with the Toronto Globe, said:

As I understand the Militia Act—and I may say that I have given it some study of late—our Canadian volunteers are enrolled to be used in the defence of this Dominion. They are Canadian troops, to be used to fight for Canada's defence.

That is a nice thing, if that is all they are for. We are to have all the benefit of the protection of the mother country, and all we have to do is to defend ourselves. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice said yesterday that our Dominion was growing wider, and he told us last session that we had more country and wanted more ministers of the Crown to govern the country. That is the excuse for having so many ministers. They say now that the country is getting so large that they require seventeen ministers, not to govern this country, but to play at government. The Premier further says :

The case of the South African Republic is not analogous. There is no menace to Canada, and although we may be willing to contribute, I do not see how we can do so. Then, again, how could we do it without parliament granting us the money ? We simply could do nothing.

I do not think the government should wait for legislation. Men do not wait for legislation when their houses are on fire. They put out the fire first and consider the cost afterwards. The government knew well enough that parliament would indemnify them. If the government run short of money at any time, they issue a warrant and raise the money, and parliament always sanctions their action. They might feel sure that the country would indemnify them against any expenditure in reason to assist the mother country in South Africa. The Premier then said :

In this present instance our limitations are clearly defined, and so it is that we have not offered a Canadian contingent to the home authorities.

This was the premier's opinion at the outset. But the government to-day are divided ; they are not a unit on this question. Perhaps I have no right to refer to the conduct of a member of the other House, but I am a British Canadian, and I think that I have a right to speak of what took place in my country and condemn what I do not believe in, and to applaud what I think is right. We know that a member of the Commons resigned his position on account of the action of the government in sending troops to South Africa and paying them, but he returns to parliament, and although he resigned intending to oppose the government, he proceeds to the Chamber linking arms with a minister of the Crown. That is not the only instance. There are other instances of that kind to-day. I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but I can foresee that the people of this country will not endorse such conduct. We have thirteen ministers of the Crown. Our Saviour had twelve disciples, but one of them turned out very bad. It is a strange thing now that this one minister should bully the other members of the cabinet and have his own way. I hope that Mr. Tarte will forgive me for naming him, but what was the duty of the government when they found that Mr. Tarte controlled the ministry? Here are the ministers, my hon. friend the Secretary of State, the Minister of Justice, the Postmaster General, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Customs and a number of others sitting at the board with Mr. Tarte dictating to them and controlling them. He was well named the controller of the administration, or the boss, as they call it, of the administration. They sat at the board with him, and are all equally guilty with Mr. Tarte. Why did they not say to the Premier : 'If you want to support the Minister of Public Works in this matter, you can run your own show'? I speak as an individual, and I say that I believe Canada has not yet done her duty. She will not do her duty until she pays these two contingents. That is not all. We should drill men in this country and be prepared for war. There are a number of young and able men, and many of them well drilled, who are ready and anxious to go to South Africa. I receive letters from day to day from men who desire to go and fight the battles of the empire. But the government is the clog on the wheel. We are not doing our duty. Out of this trouble, when the war is over, will come preferential trade within the empire. It is bound to come. It cannot be kept back now. It is an important point, as I look at it, in the history of this country, and we should do what is right and proper in supporting the mother country in South Africa. We have lots of material and it would not cost us very much. Even now subscriptions are being raised throughout the country for the benefit of our soldiers. People put their hands in their pockets quite freely, and the government should come down quite handsomely in this matter. Even supposing we had to borrow a little money to support our soldiers in South Africa, what of it? We think nothing of spending millions here and there to carry out the idea of the Minister of Public Works in some frog-pond, but supposing we borrow a certain amount of money now and have the payments extended over a length of time, we will not feel it. Let us do our duty by the mother country. She has done more than her duty for us all, and is doing her duty to-day. I know that during the Fenian raid some of the British army were out here. Did the Imperial government ask us to pay their expenses? No. I was at Fort Erie at the time, and I know the morning that the battery arrived we were all very glad. I tell the government that if they fall short of doing their duty on this question—which is the question of all questions just now—the people of this country will never forgive them. Of course, in the matter of the tariff they stole our clothes. But I forgive them many of these blunders—and they are many—if they will only act properly and rightly in the interests of the soldiers sent out to South Africa, and prepare to send others in case they are required. We are not obliged to send them, and if they are gotten ready, the money is not lost.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is generally no difficulty at all in knowing where the hon. gentleman from Monck stands. He speaks distinctly and expresses his views clearly. He has been, perhaps, rather more vigorous than usual to-day. But I was very much pleased, indeed, to hear the sentiment with which he closed his speech. There was a good deal of the old pre-christian spirit in the early part of the speech, but he wound up by promising to forgive the government their sins if they did their duty to the empire.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Many of their sins—not all of them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am sorry that my hon. friend is not as forgiving as I thought he was. I shall try, in the course of my observations, to answer some of the points made by the hon. gentleman from Monck, but I shall not follow him immediately. The better way is to take up the speech with which His Excellency opened parliament, and consider it clause by clause. It is hardly necessary to add my congratulations to those of hon. gentlemen who have preceded me to the gentlemen who moved and seconded the address, on the speeches they made. The hon. gentleman who moved the address in reply to the speech, made an admirable and patriotic speech, one which was a fine specimen of the oratory for which his countrymen are famous. I regret in a way that that speech should have been delivered in a language with which a great many members of this House are not familiar. I can only say the hon. gentleman will fill quite worthily, or more than worthily, the place of the hon. gentleman who represented the district of Delanaudière in this House for so many years, and who was, during all those years, a prominent and much respected member of the Senate. The speech of the hon. gentleman from Sunbury was characterized by that sound common sense which we all know him to possess; and his long experience in public life will be, no doubt, of great value to the House. The first paragraph of the speech congratulates parliament on the continued prosperity of the Dominion, and on the remarkable increase in the general volume of trade reflected in the exports and imports of the country. My hon. friend from Monck (Mr. McCallum) seems to think that almost improper—that the government were claiming credit for that prosperity—but the speech does not say so; it simply congratulates the members of the House, and, through them, the country, on the fact that Canada is prosperous. Does the hon. gentleman from Monck deny that the country is prosperous? The speech does not say that the prosperity is due to the government. There is no question about the prosperity. From Cape Breton to British Columbia the country is experiencing an unusual degree of prosperity, and the statement with respect to the general volume of revenue, and the imports and exports of the country, is more than fully borne out by the figures. In 1896, the last year before this administration came in, the total volume of trade was a fraction over $239,000,000. Last year, three years later, that volume of trade had increased to over $306,000,000, an increase of some $67,000,000, and the figures for the last half year show that this increase continues. It is a gratifying circumstance, apart altogether from the fact that it is a good thing for the country to be prosperous, that that prosperity continues, that the revenue has been increasing and trade has been increasing during the last three years. Hon. gentlemen will remember that for a long time it was apparently supposed that there was some sort of secret understanding between Providence and the leaders of the Conservative party ; that it was only when the Conservatives were in power that the sun shone and the rain fell at the proper seasons. It is a comfort to think that now, while the Conservatives have been out of power for nearly four years, the sun shines and the rain falls as effectively as during any previous years. It is one of those myths that it is well to get rid of. The fact is we see now that the crops have been abundant for several years ; business of every kind has been prosperous ; the manufacturers have prospered ; the markets for our products are good, and generally there has been a greater degree of prosperity during the Liberal administration than at any time before in the history of the country. I do not claim all the credit of that for the Liberal government, but I say it is satisfactory to feel that no one party has a monopoly of the blessings of Providence. As to the tariff, I do not think that the imposition of duties has as much effect in the way of improving the condition of the country as some hon. gentlemen suppose. The imposition of high duties may interfere with and prevent the development of the prosperity of the country, but cannot improve it. It will be remembered that this country prospered under the old revenue tariff. That tariff was in operation from 1867 to 1879. During one portion of that period the country was exceedingly prosperous. In the year 1873 the country had reached a high state of prosperity. The trade of the country for that year was substantially as large as it was for any subsequent year until the Liberal government came into power in 1896. The tariff remained the same, but the country grew more prosperous, and then afterwards the country grew less prosperous. The fact is that Providence and the conditions which exist in other countries have a great deal more to do with prosperity than anything in the way of the imposition of duties. There was, I say, between 1867 and 1879 a change, more than one change, in the times, without a change of tariff. The National Policy so-called, which was adopted in 1879, has been credited with a great deal of the prosperity for which it deserved no credit at all. All the prosperity would have come, as the hard times came, and from reasons of a similar character, if the tariff had not been changed at all ; and the only effect of the increase of the duties, or the principal effect, was to prevent natural causes from operating as fully as they might. Under the tariff which was adopted in 1897, a tariff which is less protective than the one which immediately preceded it, the country has prospered. Trade has developed to a wonderful extent, as shown by the figures which I quoted at the beginning ; and as I said the figures for the last half year show that that improvement continues. I do not say that the tariff of the present day is perfect. I think it would bear considerable reduction yet before it would be quite perfect ; but as far as the changes have gone, they have been chiefly in the right direction. The hon. leader of the opposition stated in his speech the other day that the tariff of to-day is the tariff of the Conservative régime. I do not wish to say anything discourteous of him ; but my impression is that he made that statement because the country was prosperous. If the country had not been prosperous—if times were much worse than they were four years ago, the hon. gentleman would have attributed the bad condition of affairs to the mutilation of the tariff by the blundering Grits. Of course, my hon. friend from Monck would have applauded that sentiment to the echo.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman is guessing now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There has been a good deal of guessing done. The hon. gentleman guessed a great deal as to what was done in the cabinet, and all the guessing should not be on the one side. The statements of the hon. leader of the opposition in this House to-day do not agree with the statements made by his leaders in another place. In the discussion on the tariff in 1897, if any hon. gentleman will look at the speeches delivered by the hon. gentleman who was formerly Minister of Finance and the hon. leader of the opposition, they will see that they prophesied the direst results from the mutilation of the tariff, but those results have not come. Hon. gentlemen will find by referring to columns 1214 and 1291 of the Commons Hansard of 1897, the opinions expressed by the representatives of the Conservative party on financial questions. If prosperity had not come, the hon. leader of the opposition would have blamed the change on the tariff, and as it has come he does not give the tariff any credit. It is a sort of heads I win, tails you lose, policy.

The second clause of the speech, which deals with the difficulty in South Africa, has received more attention than any other. I think it is very much to be regretted that on a question of this kind, where the sentiment of this country is practically unanimous, so much party feeling should have been introduced. It is a fact that Canadians are all practically agreed on the matter. Substantially, Canadians all approve of the action taken by the government. Let us consider the facts solely. I do not think it is dignified or right for us here, in our places in the Senate, to frame pictures of scenes which might have taken place in the executive council of the country, or of things which might have taken place in the editorial rooms of newspapers—or things of that kind. We have to look at the facts—what we know to be facts; and we are not justified in speculating as to what the opinions of different people may have been. Let us look at the facts, hon. gentlemen. In August last a resolution was adopted by both Houses of parliament, adopted without any division in this House, and I think without any division in the other House. I may say that there were two or three hon. gentlemen in this House who did not altogether approve of the resolutions, but they did not put themselves on record as voting against them, and those hon. gentlemen were not members of the Liberal party. We then expressed our sympathy with the mother country in her difficulty with the Transvaal Republic, and intimated our readiness to support her. I do not understand that at that time any hon. gentleman claimed that we should do more, and I ventured to ask the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) why he had not suggested getting up a contingent at that time. I am sorry that I should have addressed the hon. gentleman directly. When I said 'Why didn't you do so?' I did not refer to the hon. gentleman individually so much as to that side of the House, because my remembrance was that the hon. gentleman had not spoken in the discussion, as I believe he had not. Then the hon. gentleman told me that the government ought to get up a contingent. I did not remember that the hon. leader of the opposition had said anything of that kind. I have since read the speech of the hon. leader of the opposition delivered in this House on the resolution moved by the hon. Minister of Justice and seconded by the hon. leader of the opposition. I shall read what the hon. leader of the opposition said on this subject. At page 1010 of the Senate Debates of last year I find this language:

> While it is not our province, in this Chamber, to even suggest an appropriation of money, or the raising of money, to assist in carrying on a war, should a war unfortunately occur, we can at least say that any appropriation that will be asked for by the Commons, no matter who might be in power at the time, would readily be voted by the Senate for that purpose.

Now, that did not mean that the government would be justified in the recess of parliament in taking a large sum of money for the purpose of assisting in this war. It simply said that 'if a war should unfortunately occur,' and the hon. gentleman did not expect it any more than most of us expected that war would occur—and all he said was that if war should occur any appropriation made by the House of Commons would be concurred in here. It will be seen that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, who is generally fairly accurate, was accurate in this case. Whilst speaking of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, I may say that he made some reference to what was in my mind. I know that the hon. gentleman is a very industrious and accomplished gentleman—a gentleman who knows a great many things, but I did not know that in addition to his other qualifications, he possessed the faculty of mind-reading. What was the position? We took this action in August. It was not generally expected at that time that there would be a war. Then the next step was a despatch from the Colonial Secretary dated October 3. At that time war was certain. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield stated that. He stated, what we all know, that England refrained from sending troops to South Africa simply because she did not wish to provoke war. If England did not send troops to South Africa herself, why should we have sent them? Why should we have raised a contingent then, when nobody knew whether war was to break out or not, and when the mother country herself had not ventured to send troops to South Africa for fear of provoking war.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—No one expected anything of the kind then.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But the hon. leader of the opposition blamed the government for not having acted immediately on receipt of Mr. Chamberlain's despatch.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. That is the fact. Supposing the government had acted, as the opposition leader thinks they should have acted, on October 3 or 4—supposing they had set machinery in motion to collect a large body of troops at Ottawa or Quebec, to send to South Africa, and suppose war had not broken out, what would hon. gentlemen opposite have said to the government under such circumstances? They would have denounced them for having needlessly squandered the public money and for having leaped before coming to the stile. Hon. gentlemen in this House should be a little moderate and reasonable and look at the facts. It may be said, and the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition in this House said so, that Sir Charles Tupper had guaranteed to the leader of the government the support of the opposition. That is the fact, although there were some rather peculiar circumstances about the offer. It is a rather singular thing that the despatch which the hon. leader of the opposition sent from Nova Scotia to the premier was published in the Montreal Star some days before the premier received it. That is not the way in which gentlemen usually deal with each other either in public or private life; and it is quite clear the object of the leader of the opposition was rather to gain credit for himself and to damage the government than to assure the government of his support.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Was not that caused by a fault of the telegraph company?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not know, but there is the fact that the hon. leader of the opposition did not send his despatch to the premier first.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He did.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Excuse me. I understand that it is alleged that the despatches were sent simultaneously; one reached the Montreal Star, and the other did not reach the Premier. The leader of the opposition might have sent his telegram to the Premier first and afterwards informed the Star.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Where was the Premier at the time?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In Ottawa, I believe.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The leader of the opposition made a public statement at a public meeting at Yarmouth and the reporters sent it to the Montreal Star.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was addressed to the Montreal Star by the hon. leader of the opposition. I know whereof I speak.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I do not understand it that way.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is a matter to which, perhaps, I should not have referred, but it is one of the things which indicate the spirit in which the offer was made; but the same leader of the same opposition had pledged his support and the support of the Conservative party to the measure which this government proposed to introduce for the construction of a railway from Teslin Lake to the Stikeen River, and he was not able to implement the promise. When parliament met, the hon. gentleman was not only not able to induce his followers to make good his pledge, but he did not carry it out himself, and he opposed the scheme which he had promised to support. One could readily understand that the Premier would not feel himself justified in trusting to the pledge of one who occupied such a position—who did not appear to command the obedience of his followers.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to give the reasons for the change of view?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No. Is the hon. gentleman a mind reader also, like the hon. gentleman from Marshfield? If the hon. gentleman knows the reasons which influence the present leader of the opposition in his actions, he is a wiser man than I take him to be.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I know one.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The action of the Premier in connection with this matter, as set out in the correspondence submitted to parliament, was just the proper attitude; as I shall try to show. What was the attitude taken by the Premier? The despatch of the Colonial Secretary was the first step in the history of this contingent question. The next is an extract from the report of the Committee of the Privy Council approved by His Excellency on October 14, 1899, which is to be found in the correspondence laid before the House. It will be observed that this report followed almost immediately on the declaration of war by the Transvaal. That declaration of war was on October 11 or 12, and this report was adopted on the 14th, about the day on which the Boers crossed the border. The first paragraph of this report of the Premier's simply refers to the way in which the Colonial Secretary thought the troops should be sent, if sent at all. The report goes on:

> The prime minister, in view of the well known desire of a great many Canadians who are ready to take service under such conditions, is of opinion that the moderate expenditure which would thus be involved for the equipment and transportation of such volunteers may readily be undertaken by the government of Canada without summoning Parliament, especially as such an expenditure, under such circumstances, cannot be regarded as a departure from the well known principles of constitutional government and colonial practice, nor construed as a precedent for future action.

It has been stated that the Premier should have taken much stronger ground than that, and should have professed himself willing to spend a great deal of money and send existing military units out to South Africa. I think the Premier was very well advised in the action he took. The next paragraph is one which refers to the Australian colonies:

> Already, under similar conditions, New Zealand has sent two companies, Queensland is about to send 250 men, and West Australia and Tasmania are sending 125 men each.
> The prime minister therefore recommends that out of the stores now available in the Militia Department, the government undertake to equip a certain number of volunteers, not to exceed 1,000 men, and to provide for their transportation from this country to South Africa, and that the Minister of Militia make all necessary arrangements to the above effect.

It will be observed that the Prime Minister speaks of volunteers, and I think that in that he was very wise. It would never have done, without the authority of parliament, to have taken any of the existing military units and sent them out. What the government did was to allow any citizen of Canada who was anxious to serve the mother country in South Africa to go, and the government would furnish him with uniform and equipment and transportation to South Africa.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Without the sanction of parliament?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yet, it was not a very serious matter. The expense was not very great. It did not infringe on the militia law. It might have been an infringement of the militia law to have sent one of the existing units, but this plan was not, and it met the views of the Imperial authorities. It has been stated that we did not act as the Australasian colonies did. I have taken the trouble to go over the despatches which are contained in this pamphlet, and I find that in every one of the Australian colonies, in the whole six, the consent of parliament was obtained for the action taken.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The legislature of every colony appears to have been in session when the difficulty arose, except that of New South Wales, and the legislature of New South Wales met later; and I wish to direct attention to the fact that the governor of New South Wales, Earl Beauchamp, said that what was done was subject to the approval of the legislature when it met, and that no final action could be taken until the meeting of the people's representatives. So that our brothers in the Australian colonies felt that they would not be justified in sending troops to South Africa without the consent of parliament.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—That is an inference.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is a fact. The legislature was sitting in every colony except New South Wales, and the Governor of New South Wales said that what his colony did was to be subject to the approval of parliament, which was afterwards obtained.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I should like to put a question to the hon. gentleman. Had the circumstances in these colonies which he has cited been the same as they are in Canada when these circumstances occurred, does he suppose that the action of the Australian colonies would have been different from what it has been because of the mere fact that the legislature was in session ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—That hon. gentleman knows as much about that as I do. That is a conundrum. Perhaps it may be as well to read the despatches. Here is despatch No. 24, Governor Earl Beauchamp to Mr. Chamberlain :

Referring to your telegram of October 3, government New South Wales approve of Lancers, Aldershot, volunteering for service in South Africa, but matter subject to approval of parliament, which meets on October 17; definite instructions will wait them on arrival at the Cape.

Further on there is another despatch, No. 39, on page 12 : Governor Earl Beauchamp to Mr. Chamberlain, October 13 :

New South Wales offers, subject to approval of parliament, Army Medical Staff Corps unit, half bearer company, and one field hospital fifty beds on war establishment; civilian personnel, ambulance horses, ambulance wagons, and cart transport, eighty-seven of all ranks, forty horses, five ambulance wagons, six carts, two water carts; would start ten days if accepted.

The conclusion which I draw is that if the legislatures had not been in session in those colonies the governments would not have undertaken to send the troops.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is only surmise.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Under these circumstances the premier of this country was quite right in not taking any more decided action than he did on October 14, and in waiting until he saw that the sentiment of the country was such that it would approve of the action which the government might take. That was common sense and common prudence.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Rideau division seems not to concur altogether. Compare the action of the premier of the day with the action of the premier in 1885, as set out in the English blue book, cited by the hon. Minister of Justice yesterday. That was when England was rather in a tight place too, when, in the language of Rudyard Kipling, "Fussy-wuzzy broke a bloomin' British square," and England seemingly needed troops more than she did in South Africa on October 14 last. It appears at least to me to be so, and you will find that the British government refused the offers of batteries and troops from more than one colony about the last mentioned date. The right hon. gentleman, who was looked upon as a model of loyalty, and who is now looked up to as a sort of saint by the Conservative party, Sir John A. Macdonald, did not send any troops, and yet the hon. gentleman from Monck denounces the present government for their meanness in connection with these contingents, the meanness of this county in not paying the whole expense of the troops while in South Africa. It will be remembered that at that time, in addition to giving permission to the Imperial government to enlist troops for their own regiments in Canada, they were allowed to take some voyageurs to the Nile, but those voyageurs did not go at the expense of Canada. They were paid by the Imperial government. I think when the hon. gentleman denounce the present government they should remember the kind of things that have happened in the past. The conduct of the present government compares most favourably with the conduct of the government in 1885, when the Conservative party ruled this country, led by the man whom they are all proud to claim as their leader. It is greatly to be regretted that this question has been made a party question. When the government of Canada determined to act, they acted promptly. They determined to act on October 14, and on October 30, a thousand and fifteen men sailed from Quebec. Although Canada did not make her offer as early as the other colonies did, the Canadian troops sailed from Quebec on the same day on which the troops sailed from Australia. Some of the troops sailed from Australia on the 30th, and the Queensland troops did not leave until November 2. Some of the troops left Sydney, I think on October 28, but they had to go round to Western Australia, so that they did not leave Australia till November 30. Our troops were in South Africa immediately after the Australian troops, and our government did the work in a little more than a fortnight. As a Canadian, I feel proud of the way in which the Department of Militia did its work. I have not heard a single complimentary word with reference to the Minister of Militia for the manner in which he despatched the contingent. Considering that we are not a people who have engaged in wars, and have never had to send troops abroad, I think that it is a remarkable thing.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Highly recommendable.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is a remarkable thing that the troops should have been sent away in such a short time.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—We agree with the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And there has not been a single word of generous praise to the Minister of Militia for the work that he did, or to the department. I do not think it is a credit to us that that should be so. If hon. gentlemen will look at the correspondence they will see what was thought in England of the action of our government. Here is a despatch from Mr. Chamberlain to the Governor General, dated October 30. Lord Minto had announced to him that the contingent would sail that day. The despatch reads :

> Referring to your telegram of October 29, Her Majesty's government offer hearty congratulations to Canadian government and military authorities on rapid organization and embarkation of contingent. Enthusiasm displayed by people of Dominion source of much gratification here.

We have not heard from a single member of the opposition anything so strong as that. When they are so ready to condemn, they should give a little praise where it is deserved.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is time enough yet for that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was going to say something with respect to the hon. leader of the opposition, but in his absence perhaps I had better not. It was simply that the hon. leader of the opposition has been a member of an administration himself ; he was Minister of Militia for some time, and there was no one in this House who was in a better position to know how creditable an achievement it was, the getting away of that contingent in such a short time, and I was surprised that nothing fell from him to indicate that he realized that. Hon. gentleman have talked about what the people think, but the impression which I get is that the people of this country as a rule, are satisfied that those Canadian contingents were got off in a very satisfactory way and that the government did their duty in getting them off. Of course we are all satisfied that in the places where they are and where they are going they will do credit to the country that sent them. Then there is another circumstance. I feel, and I think the course that has been adopted since the beginning of September, has shown that the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons had one object in view and he kept that steadily in view. He thought that out of this trouble in South Africa might come an opportunity to oust the present government from their position.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The hon. gentleman is a mind-reader.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, but I take the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is not worthy of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In my opinion, South Africa and the empire were no more to the hon. leader than Hecuba was to the player in Hamlet. I do not profess to be in the secrets of the opposition, but the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition, in the other House is supposed to be the leader of that party. He may or may not be, but it is supposed that he is. That is the general impression. It is a somewhat singular circumstance that just at the time when that hon. gentleman began to make trouble over the contingent, the press which supports that hon. gentleman, from the Mail and Empire of Toronto down to the Mail and Herald of Halifax, began to discover that the French population of this country were a bad lot.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—No, no.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—The Herald and Mail never did anything of the kind. It is now the word of the junior member from Halifax against the word of the senior. I am willing to be tried with him on that issue.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I read it in the Halifax Evening Mail.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Read it now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not carry conservative papers with me. I have something else to do besides carrying conservative papers. Hon. gentlemen know that what I am stating is correct. Hon. gentlemen from Ontario know that the Mail and Empire started in on an anti-French crusade.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I do not think the hon. gentleman is stating the facts correctly. I do not approve at all, never did and never shall, of efforts to create race hatred in our country. But while I am bound to say that there may have been articles in the Mail and Empire of which I would not approve, the articles were directed against publications in French papers, such as La Patrie and others, commenting upon their utterances, and I think several articles will be found in the Mail and Empire in which they express their regret that there should be any such feeling.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I read the Halifax Herald, and I may say that it pursued a similar course to that of the Toronto Mail and Empire. Never in the course of my reading of that paper for years has it sanctioned or endorsed race prejudice in this country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Each hon. gentleman must judge for himself. I am in the judgment of the House and the public outside. Perhaps it is not to my credit, but I may say that I read the evening edition of the Halifax Herald when I am at home, and I saw certainly not less than two or three articles at a certain juncture which pointed in that direction which clearly indicated that that was the policy which they were about to adopt. There was a sudden change of face. It was found that that policy was not going to work and it was abandoned.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman said that these papers had concurred in saying that the French in Canada were a bad lot.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Well, substantially that. There was an indication that the French people were not as loyal as they ought to be.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have no doubt that they said Mr. Tarte was not loyal.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With reference to the Minister of Public Works, it has been stated by hon. gentlemen here that he had given utterance to disloyal sentiments. No hon. gentleman has produced any such utterance, and no hon. gentleman can produce it. The hon. Minister of Public Works declared that he was opposed to sending a contingent without the authority of parliament. That is a very different thing. There are a great many loyal men in England who disapprove of the war altogether. I am satisfied that the gentlemen who pretend to almost a monopoly of the patriotism, although their pretensions are not as strong that way as they were some years ago, were prepared if they thought the action would have the effect of bringing them back to power, to light the fires of race hatred in this country, to set three millions of English speaking people against two millions of French speaking people. and it was only when they found that the majority of the people would not endorse them that they stopped.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—No, no.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I may inform the House that the other day in a public train there was an attack made on the French people in their presence, which the French people should resist if they were in a position to do so. People have no business to mix language and religion in politics.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have the floor.

Several hon. MEMBERS—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—No man, I do not care who he is, should utter such sentiments. We are looking for immigrants all over the world.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Order, order, order.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I call the hon. gentleman himself to order. These people are not going to take charge of this country. Loyalty comes by conviction not by coercion, and we are going to have loyalty in this country, and I want hon. gentlemen to understand that.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the loyalty of the French Canadians, it is not necessary to say much. A few weeks ago it might have been necessary, but it is not necessary now. The hon. gentleman who moved the address in reply to His Excellency's speech referred to that matter in a most effective way. He told us what was perfectly true, that if the French Canadians had not been loyal to Great Britain at the time of the Revolutionary War of 1775, and the following years, Canada would have been lost to British Empire. He spoke of the action of the French contingent at Chateauguay, probably the most remarkable victory which was gained in Canada during the war of 1812 and the hon. gentleman referred to the fact that the son of our Speaker was proving his loyalty in South Africa; and I may add that the son of the hon. gentleman from the Gulf division is also serving his country in South Africa. Another circumstance to which attention has not been directed is that during the North-west Rebellion of 1885, two French battalions went out, the 65th and 9th, I think, and served their country as well as any other battalion, although the people of their own blood and language. After that, any man who undertakes to question the loyalty of a French Canadian does so without any justification. I think it was Lord Dufferin who said that the last shot that should be fired—

Some hon. MEMBERS—No, Taché.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I thought it was Lord Dufferin. It is a fact, however, that there are no people more true to the British Crown than French Canadians.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Tell us about the musket and Saskatchewan Valley.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is just one other point to which I desire to direct attention before I leave this question. I know I am devoting an unconscionable time to this matter, but this is a subject to which almost the whole attention of this House, and of the other House also, has been directed and it is an important subject. I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen to a despatch which appears in this pamphlet. I am surprised, however, that I have not heard any Conservative gentlemen call attention to it, though I understand them to say they are willing to give the government credit for anything they have done. No. 83, from Lord Minto to Mr. Chamberlain, is as follows:

> Deep emotion has been caused in Canada by reports of reverses in South Africa, but a strong hope is felt everywhere that no cause exists for alarm. My Ministers are, however, prepared to act on your previous despatch, and send another contingent at once, if Her Majesty's government deem it advisable.

It is a singular thing that no reference has been made to the fact that when it appeared that the trouble was serious the government here offered to send a second contigent. There was no pressure brought to bear on them to do it; they did it voluntarily. If one can rely on reports which appear in the newspapers, the Minister of Public Works stated in Toronto that he was in favour of sending the second contingent. I think it is very much to the credit of Canada that, when it looked as if it was not going to be a picnic in South Africa, a great many more men offered their services to go on the second contingent than offered to go on the first. They are not holiday soldiers. I am not going to ask hon. gentlemen to compare what has happened now with what happened in 1885, during the Egyptian campaign, but I say that the record of the government in this matter—the things that they have done are creditable to Canada, and that they are so regarded in Canada, and in England, and all over the British empire, and it is only in this country that we hear the miserable fault finding and attempts to pick flaws in their conduct which we have heard. Having said so much on this warlike subject I pass on. There is a well-deserved compliment in the Speech to the high commissioner for his generous act. In offering to furnish a contingent at his own expense, Lord Strathcona has done more than any private individual in the whole empire, and though we cannot claim Lord Strathcona as a native Canadian, he has lived here all his life and represents Canada at home, and there is no doubt that his conduct reflects credit on himself and on the Dominion which he represents. His Excellency says:

I have been instructed to convey to you Her Majesty's high appreciation of the loyalty and patriotism thus displayed.

It appears that everywhere, except on the opposition side of parliament the action of the government of the country is appreciated. The fifth paragraph says:

A Bill will be submitted for your approval making provision for the cost of equipping and paying the Canadian contingents.

There has been a good deal said about this matter and the hon. gentleman from Monck made some reference to it. He spoke of the niggardliness of the government in allowing this contingent to be paid for, while on active service in South Africa, by the mother country; but the hon. gentleman apparently had not read this correspondence, or if he had read it he would have found that when one of the colonies, New Zealand, expressed a desire to pay for her troops while on service, the Imperial government declined the offer, stating that all the colonies should be put on the same footing, and that the Imperial government would pay the troops while on service. The hon. gentleman said that we expected the spinners and weavers of England to pay our men while they are in South Africa. The hon. gentleman cannot be familiar with the system of taxation which exists in England, or he would know that practically the spinners and weavers do not pay any taxes at all, and that England, the wealthiest country in the world, does not mind paying the money but that she is anxious to have the men. Hon. gentlemen should bear this in mind. I have no official information, but I understand that the hon. gentleman who seconded the Address in the House of Commons stated that it was the intenton of the government, while allowing the Imperial government to have their way in the matter, to contribute enough to bring the pay of the men on service in South Africa up to the regular pay of the members of the permanent force in Canada, 50 cents a day —that that money was to be paid to their families if here, or if they had no families, to be paid to the men on their return. I think that is a reasonable and satisfactory proposition. Although Canada is prosperous to-day, we may not always be as rich as we are now, and we are making a precedent. The probabilities are that hereafter, whenever England becomes involved in any serious war, Canada will be expected to contribute, and will contribute soldiers to help the mother country, and we shoud not be carried away by anything in the nature of hysterical enthusiasm. England has the money and wants the men, and we have not the money in very great abundance. I think that the arrangement proposed by the government is a very equitable and satisfactory one. The sixth paragraph of he speech is one to which a good deal of attention was devoted by the hon. leader of the opposition:

The measures which have been taken from time to time to facilitate the safe transportation of food stuffs to European markets have resulted in a large increase in the exportation of several important articles of produce.

It will be observed that the Speech does not say that these measures were taken exclusively by the present government—in fact it does not say by whom they were taken. It says the measures which have been taken from time to time. The hon. leader of the opposition uses language—I did not take it down in shorthand, but what he said was substantially this: not a single step has been taken by the present Minister of Agriculture which had not been taken by the late government. I wish to call attention to certain facts in connection with this matter which do not bear out the hon. gentleman. In 1895, Prof. Robertson, a government officer who served well and faithfully under the previous administration as well as under the present government, asked for some money to put in a cold storage plant. He was given a small amount, twenty thousand dollars, and with part of that amount he fitted out two or three steamers with insulated chambers to be cooled by ice. This was found unsatisfactory, although it was better than nothing. The next year he asked for more money, but was not given any more. That was the last year of the late administration. At that time and before, the Australasians and the Americans had been using a thorough equipment of mechanical cold storage. As a result of this Australasian equipment, Australasian butter was outselling Canadian butter in the English market by from 10 to 12 shillings per hundred; and our butter did not then make any appreciable advance on the Australasian.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Does the hon. gentleman say that the late government, in 1896, refused money for cold storage?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What did the hon. gentleman say?

Hon. Mr. POWER—They allowed the amount to remain the same. They did not increase it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend is entirely wrong.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Will the hon. gentleman furnish evidence that I am wrong?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The estimates were not put through the House in 1896, for reasons which I need not explain here, but I know that much larger sums were contemplated in 1896.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There was a good deal of difference of opinion about those estimates. I know that the hon. gentleman who was Minister of Finance in the late administration repudiated some of those estimates.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. member can have no possible authority for saying that the government, in 1896, refused to increase that amount beyond $5,000.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The money was not given, I know. Then there was a change of government in 1896, and a different sort of equipment was put into operation. Prof. Robertson's original proposition had been only for insulated chambers on a few ships and some refrigerator cars on some railroad lines. The new Minister of Agriculture put mechanical cold storage of the most approved class, which has not yet been improved upon, anywhere, into seventeen steamers the first year, now increased to twenty-five or twenty-six; induced the putting of refrigerator cars of an improved class on all the railroad lines converging to the ports; offered a bonus to refrigerator companies at the points of shipment to Europe; and by a system of bonuses brought about the establishment of refrigerator chambers at the creameries. By this system our butter was kept cool from the moment it was made until it reached the English retailers; and the result was an immediate advance in the reputation and price of our butter, starting in 1897 and continuing still more in 1898 and 1899; the result being that the last season our butter averaged fully eight shillings a hundred more than the Australasian butter in the same market, while the price to the Canadian producer at the creamery here has this last year been fully 2 cents a pound more than it has been in twenty years; and we have sent $4,000,000 worth of butter to Great Britain in the year 1899. The difference between the last government's dealing with this matter and ours is that they worked it on a very timid and small scale, not giving the necessary funds to the department to carry it out successfully. The present minister boldly asked his colleagues to give him $100,000 a year for three years, and got it from them, with the result that the farmers of the country have been millions of dollars in pocket. This shows that the hon. leader of the opposition was not fully informed about the steps taken by the present government. I shall not confine myself to a statement of that kind without authority, but one can go to the blue books. Taking the quantity and value of butter and cheese exported from Canada during the years ending June 30, 1894 to 1899, the following statement will prove interesting:

STATEMENT of the Quantity and Value of Butter and Cheese (Domestic Produce) Exported from Canada during the Years ended June 30, 1894-9.

YEARS.	BUTTER.		CHEESE.
	Quantity.	Value.	Quantity.	Value.
	Lbs.	$	Lbs.	$
1894	5,534,621	1,095,588	154,977,480	15,488,191
1895	3,650,258	697,476	146,004,650	14,255,002
1896	5,889,241	1,052,089	164,689,123	13,956,571
1897	11,453,351	2,089,173	164,220,699	14,676,239
1898	11,253,787	2,046,686	196,703,323	17,572,763
1899	20,139,195	3,700,873	189,827,839	16,776,765

At the same time the export of cheese and the value of cheese exported increased, although not in the same ratio. Canadian cheese had made a reputation before, but butter has the same high standing now.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that cheese showed a larger exportation in 1899 than in 1896 and 1897 ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have the figures from 1894 to 1899. The value of the cheese exported in 1898 was $17,572,000.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What about 1899 ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The quantity is 189,827,000 pounds, and the value was $16,776,765.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—A decrease of over $1,000,000.

Hon. Mr. POWER—About three-quarters of a million. Prices will go up and down. They do not go up steadily to the extent I have indicated, but I wish to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield to the fact that in the two last years of the late government in 1895 and 1896, the export of cheese was considerably less than in 1894. In 1894 the quantity was 154,977,000 pounds, and the value was $15,488,000. In 1895 it was 146,000,000 pounds, and the value $14,253,000. The next year the value was still less. I think that the hon. leader of the opposition was in error when he stated that not a single step had been taken which was not taken by the late government.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It was simply carrying out what the late government inaugurated.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Carrying out what they had intended to do. Intentions are very good things, but they do not, as a rule, count for much in this wicked world .

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—You followed in the footsteps of your illustrious predecessors.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I had some statistics here to show how Canadian has advanced in value upon Danish butter. Canadian butter has gained within the last three years, ten shillings on the Danish. It was very much more behind Danish than it is now. We do not attribute all the prosperity to the government, but the government can help it along. We find that in February, 1897, as a result of a visit made by the Minister of Agriculture to Washington, the embargo was taken off Canadian cattle in the United States, and the figures are somewhat interesting. Take the three years 1890, 1891 and 1892, the number of cattle exported to the United States was 11,154, worth $152,925. In February, 1893, the United States set up a quarantine against Canadian cattle, and during the four years and a half before the end of the official year in 1896, the total number of Canadian cattle exported to the United States was 3,762, value at $52,600. In the two years and six months after the quarantine was taken off, as the result of the efforts of the Minister of Agriculture, the exports of Canadian cattle amounted to 213,735, valued at $3,012,000. I think the Minister of Agriculture, at any rate, can claim that he has done something for the Canadian farmer.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In removing that quarantine.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon Mr. FERGUSON—Does not the hon. gentleman know the history of that quarantine?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman could present a history of the quarantine which would take away all credit from the Minister of Agriculture.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If the hon. gentleman does not know, every farmer in this country knows that the quarantine was made at the instance of the British government to remove what was a still greater consideration to us, the embargo of our cattle in the British market.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am stating the facts. I trust something may come of the negotiations with the West Indies. Naturally there should be a good deal of trade with them, and I trust that some substantial result may come of the negotiations. Referring to the last paragraph of the speech it says :

Measures will be introduced to renew and amend the existing banking laws, to regulate the rate of interest payable upon judgments recovered in courts of law, to provide for the taking of the next decennial census, for the better arrangement of the electoral districts, to amend the Criminal Code and the laws relating to other important subjects.

May I venture to hope that when these banking laws have been amended the amendments will not be radical, because we have now the best existing banking law. I am not questioning the right of the Dominion parliament to legislate as to the rate of interest payable upon judgments recovered in courts of law, but I wish to say this that in the provinces—speaking for my own province—the question of interest on a judgment is dealt with as being incidental to the judgment itself, and the provincial legislature has said that judgment shall carry, as a necessary consequence, interest at what they mention as the legal rate. It is doubtful perhaps whether a province has a right to legislate that way, but it would be well if the Dominion legislated so as to remove the doubt. I do not mean to say that the Dominion parliament would not be right in legislating, but I only call attention to a fact which has to be considered. With respect to the amendment to the criminal code, I may express the hope that this year something definite will be done in connection with that measure. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Marshfield. We passed a bill to amend the criminal code in 1897 ; we passed a similar one last session, and I think it is now time the lower House passed it and sent it up to this House.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I am sure the House will deprecate very much the allusion made in this House by the hon. gentleman for Halifax to loyalty or disloyalty. None of the members who have spoken on this side have accused any one of disloyalty, and that an hon. member should bring up scraps of newspapers to disturb the harmony of this House is much to be deprecated. We have one gentleman almost going mad on this subject, and he deserves the censure of the House for the way he has disturbed the harmony of this Chamber. It is well known that the best feeling prevails between all classes in this country, and there has been no accusation of disloyalty even against the Minister of Public Works or against the premier, although they have been tardy in moving in the matter of sending a contingent to assist the British troops in South Africa. That is all we say, and I am sorry that my hon. friend, who has made a very good speech, especially the first part of it, should have brought up that question at all. For my own part, I have never, for a moment thought any section of the people of this country were disloyal. The hon. gentleman asked my hon. friend (for Marshfield) why did not he propose last session to raise a contingent. That is an absurd question. No one dreamed of war then, and even when the war commenced at the end of October—every body thought, the people of England and the people of this country—that the British forces would sweep the Boers off in two or three weeks, and the war would be over and there would be no occasion for this country or any other colony to go to the help of the mother country. The hon. gentleman alluded to what Sir John Macdonald said in 1885. But the conditions have entirely changed since then. At that time England was at war with an unwarlike, poor people in Egypt, and was not in need of men from any quarter. She ended that war, without a single reverse, in a short time. At that time we had on our hands the rebellion in the North-west and we had all we could do at home. Then the hon. gentleman alluded to Sir Charles Tupper's action on the Teslin and Stikine Railway question. That hon. gentleman and others, myself amongst the number, were strongly in favour of the Stikine and Teslin Railway, until we saw the price to be given for it. The day I arrived here from British Columbia, when that measure was before us, I went to Sir Charles Tupper and asked his opinion about the government proposal. I said I am opposed to it: I can never agree to give nearly 4,000,000 acres of land for the road and he said: 'I fully agree with you.' He did not change his mind, but was not willing to give that enormous price for it. The first paragraph in the Speech from the Throne calls for no difference of opinion, for we are all pleased to agree, and think that our country is prosperous. That the progressive measures, and above all a tariff adapted to different branches of industry and the establishment of confidence conducive to the safe, and remunerative investment of capital have continued from 1878 to the present day. Here I approve the action of the government for continuing the Conservative policy the Liberal leaders and Liberal press and party so strongly condemned for eighteen years. They have acted wisely in letting well alone, and adhering to the successful trade policy established by their predecessors. This, together with the latent wealth in the bowels of the earth now being developed, and the increased foreign demand for products of the country, such as breadstuffs, timber, coal, fish and precious metals, has made the prosperity of the country what it is. The construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the facilities given by it and other lines of communication have conduced greatly to the prosperity of the country. Passengers and freight between Europe, China and Japan now pass as freely over our railways and steamships, as they do within the Dominion. All of which conduces to the prosperity of the country. The second paragraph refers to the unfortunate war in South Africa, in connection with the part the colonies of the empire should take in support of the mother country. The government of this colony cuts a sorry and humiliating figure. No lead taken, no spontaneity, no enthusiastic patriotic action. No responsibility taken; on the contrary an unwillingness, a holding back, an indifference, and lack of grasp of the situation—so different from the colonies of Australia, and New Zealand, which offered their quota of troops early, and spontaneously. They did not hesitate, or wait to be pushed into action. Supposing the country to be in danger of attack or invasion by any other power, to whom would Canada look for aid and protection from the invader? What could those who have been so tardy and unwilling to aid the empire do? What could the Minister of Public Works, and the member for Labelle, and those who think with them do? Simply nothing—unless to whine and cry for British protection.

In such a case, to Great Britain alone could we look for aid, and what do we find now? We find her soldiers and her ships on the east, and west shores of our Dominion ready to protect and assist us free of charge. And, in the face of this knowledge, and experience, some members of the government, hesitate to offer aid until forced to act by public opinion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—It is evident if the Premier and Minister of Public Works had their way that not a man would have been sent to the Transvaal. It is only the overwhelming loyal, and patriotic sentiment of the country which spurred the government to action. The Premier in his speech, two nights ago, admitted that he did not move until he had the strong feeling of the country at his back. In previous interviews and speeches he gave as his reason for not taking action, the unconstitutionality of acting, without the sanction of parliament. If that was a good reason then, it still is, and the voice of the country, however patriotic and loyal, did not make unconstitutional acts constitutional—the House will see the weakness of the reasons for not acting promptly.

Having said this much on the tardiness of the government, I have much pleasure in commending the excellent manner in which the Minister of Militia, and his department, after authority was given, have conducted the enrolment, mobilization, equipment and transportation for South Africa. I am sure all of us hope for a glorious victory for the empire, an early end of the war, and the complete obliteration of the Transvaal and Orange Free Republics as independent States, and that the British flag may before long float triumphantly from Khartoum to Cape Town. The whole Dominion turns with pride to the munificent offer of Lord Strathcona, which should be emphasized, and heralded from Cape Town to Vancouver Island. Although this is not a convivial meeting, I think the House might adjourn for five minutes in order that we may wish Lord Strathcona long life, happiness and prosperity with three British cheers. There is an important question not alluded to in the speech from the Throne—that is the condition, and administration of the Yukon country. I am fully convinced that the country is immensely rich, and will prove to be so for many years to come, and it deserves at the hands of the government every care and encouragement for its development. I was informed by an American lady, who had resided at Dawson for a year, that we had no conception of the country we possessed and its resources. Very good vegetables were now being raised, land was being cleared, and this branch of agricultural industry would be a great boom to the miners and pay handsomely. But the administration of the district was not what it should be, and should be subjected to a searching investigation. This is not a party question in any degree, and the government should, for its own sake, and for the good name of the Dominion take steps to ascertain if the officials are doing their duty honestly, free from all pernicious influence. I believe men who have grievances will not testify in an open tribunal, afraid of the displeasure of officials. A trustworthy detective service would no doubt ferret out crooked work, if there is any, and put the government in possession of information it should have.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I have only a few words to say, and nothing in regard to the Speech from the Throne. That has already been threshed out. I am not in the habit of shooting the dead Indian. But I wish to refer to a portion of the speech from the senior member for Halifax—that firebrand which he threw on the floor of the House. He accused the Conservatives of his native country of endeavouring to incite racial feelings against the French, and said that the Mail and Herald had articles inducing that, and those are the organs of the Conservatives in Halifax. I will not use any language to characterize that statement, but if the Hon. Wm. McDougall's word is good for anything, his statement is not correct. There was another thing that offended me, but I cannot say that I was astonished at it. I refer to the language used with regard to Sir Charles Tupper. He stated that he had acted in a way no gentleman could act. He said he had written a telegram to the premier and published it in a paper. I do not like to hear one hon. gentleman speak of another as 'no gentleman' when he is not present—to tell him behind his back that he is no gentleman. I do not like to hear that statement made among friends of Sir Charles Tupper, when we know that it is not correct. It reminds me of the fable of the viper and the file. A viper, surcharged with venom, enter a carpenter's shop, and, seizing the first thing that came in his way, commenced to gnaw it with his venomous fangs. The carpenter, hearing a noise among his tools, rushed in, but when he saw the reptile was knawing a well-seasoned file, he smiled contemptuously and said: 'Go ahead, viper; do what you can; you are knawing a file.' The ineffectual attempt of the hon. senior member for Halifax to injure the character of Sir Charles Tupper as a gentleman and politician, brought this fable of the viper into my mind.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The circumstances under which we have this year assembled are such as to fill the heart of every British subject with anxiety and his mind with a feeling of responsibility that can hardly be expressed. It is only two years that we were in this House rejoicing at the number of years that Providence has been so good as to give to Her Majesty and at the prosperity and peace that had adorned the long reign of our Gracious Sovereign. To-day, however, instead of that peace, England and her colonies are entangled in a war, the first result of which has been full of surprise and sorrow. It is some consolation, however, to be able to refer with pride to the gallantry of our troops. Errors may have been committed. As to that, however, we should be very reticent, because we are not in a position to pass any judgment. What we see clearly is the bravery and gallantry of every man bearing the uniform of Her Majesty's soldiers. In his remarks with regard to the subject, the mover of the address has referred to the loyalty of that group of the nation to which we both belong. No doubt he had in his mind some outside utterances which have been, to say the least, very ungenerous. I must join with the hon. gentleman to vindicate the loyalty of the French Canadians. Indeed, to say the least, it is very annoying to have, after a century and a half of conspicuous loyalty and of good services to the Crown, to undertake a demonstration of our loyalty. Why, hon. gentlemen, few years had hardly elapsed after the surrender of Canada to England when we showed our loyalty. At the time of the American rebellion, who were the disloyal people, French Canada or the English colonies south of us? Then there was a noble generation still living which had seen the French flag floating over the Quebec citadel. Many hearts were still bleeding at the remembrance of the disaster which had brought the change. At that time also appeals were made to them. Those appeals sounded like the trumpet of liberty, and liberty from men having the same blood running into their veins. For it is well known that Lafayette and Rochambeau themselves sent invitations to the French Canadians to join the battle of the thirteen colonies. Nevertheless on that occasion as on subsequent occasions, our people remained loyal to the British flag—our militia went to the front and secured thereby Canada to England. For it cannot be denied that if French Canadians had cast their lot with the Americans, Canada was lost to England. England could not have then saved Canada more than she has saved the other thirteen colonies. And since then nothing has taken place to impair the situation in that respect. To-day, if a plebiscite was to be held to ascertain whether any desire for a return to French allegiance exists amongst us, so general would be the negative answer that we may say that the whole population would vote for the statu quo.

There are reasons for that which I need not refer to at present. I may mention, however, the fact that notwithstanding any friction that may from time to time arise here and there, we have been enjoying for a long time such an amount of liberty under the British flag that there is everywhere a general satisfaction as to the lot that good Providence has bestowed upon us. We are enjoying to a full extent the advantages of a self-governing people, and we hope that nothing in the future will happen to alter that position.

I have just made an allusion to some friction which arises some times amongst ourselves. Everybody must have understood that I was referring to the position in which the minority of Manitoba has been placed.

The hon. Minister of Justice in giving some of the reasons which seem to him to be a justification of the present war, has pointed out the fact that the Uitlanders were denied the privilege of teaching their own language in the schools; yet these Uitlanders had no positive right to that privilege under the Transvaal constitution. They could only claim that privilege by virtue of the polity of nations.

But nearer home there is a small group of population the ancestors of which have been the pioneers of the country. There is a minority which has positive rights under the constitution of their country, yet the privilege which is claimed for the Uitlanders, and which is held so important as to be made a reason for going to war, that same privilege is denied to the minority in Manitoba. Does it not strike everybody that if we are going to redress the grievances that our fellow subjects may have in the various parts of the world, that we should begin at home? This brings me to the school question. The government has refrained systematically to make any reference to these matters in the Speech from the Throne for the last two or three years. It is sought to submerge that question in the ocean of oblivion, in dungeons of death. But, let nobody be deceived. That question is not settled nor dead. The minority will make it an issue at every favourable occasion, and until it is fairly settled, the people of Canada will hear of it. Although the circumstances seem at present to be unfavourable to the claims of the minority, there is sufficient vitality left into that minority to have its privileges upheld wherever and whenever required. It is well to explain what is the present situation. I maintain that parliament has still jurisdiction in this matter, and have the duty of interfering, unless the province itself goes to work and does what is right. The jurisdiction of parliament remains until the province has complied the remedial order of 1895. On the other hand, as parliament has not yet taken action, the province can also of its own motion take action in the matter. As the matter stands, its jurisdiction still lies, by the fact that parliament has not taken action. There has been of late quite an exhibition of loyalty. I am sorry to say that in so far as this question is concerned we find our province and the Dominion in a condition which savours a good deal like disloyalty. What is the refusal of Canada to obey the command of Her Majesty and the decisions of her tribunals, if not disloyalty in disguise? Surely the time must be near when all this should be righted, and then contentment to its full extent will reign again over all the Dominion, bringing with it new expression of devotion to our political institutions, to the British rule, and to the empire.

The Speech from the Throne makes reference, and very properly so, to the action of Lord Strathcona coming forward and undertaking to send at his own expense, a large contingent of troops to the Transvaal. Everybody will join with the government in this matter of regret that no reference had been made to our soldiers. Surely the generosity of Lord Strathcona is commendable. But the man who leaves his country, goes valiantly to the front, and offers his life for the sake of his country is worthy of recognition from his government and from the nation.

We have here in this Senate fellow members whose hearts are beating with pride and with fear on account of the dangers that are now in store for their sons on that distant battlefield. Let us express to them our sympathies. Let us say to them : 'May God spare the lives of your beloved sons and thereby spare to yourselves all the anxieties consequent on such sacrifice.'

I desire to give some consideration to a remark which has fallen from the hon. Minister of Justice, and which must have been of great interest to every member of this House. The hon. Minister of Justice said, in speaking of the Imperialist movement, that it must be evident to everybody that the elaboration of a new constitution—he called it an Imperial constitution—was going on. Truly we are in the presence of much that is unusual. There is much which seems to be agreeable to many; there is much which gives alarms to others. An imperial constitution, what is that? Nobody as yet has perhaps a clear idea of this new-born project. It may be that improvements may be made in our relations with the mother country, and if any real improvements are adopted, nobody will be more satisfied than I. But hon. gentlemen, we must remember that the time is not distant when we were engaged in a very hard struggle to get self-government. Now we have it. Shall we be persuaded that self-government is no more the political ideal that we thought it to be? If we cast our eyes elsewhere, if we study the history of other nations having colonies, or having had colonies, what do we find? No one has been so successful in the administration of their colonies as Great Britain. Most of them have either failed to give satisfaction to their colonial settlers, to get from them what they expected, or have lost their colonies, while England has seen her colonies growing yearly in population, in prosperity, in devotion to the empire. Why is that? Because England has been wise enough to concede to her colonies self-government, and because the colonies have found full liberty under their own political institutions. Canada has been a wonder to all foreigners and to all students of national or social evolutions. The colonial system of England is a wonder to everybody and a pride both for the mother country and for the colonies themselves. Let us indeed find some improvement to that condition, if there is any to be found, but at the same time let us not forget that self-government has been the object of our struggles in the past and must be retained by all means, with all its privileges.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

THE STANDING COMMITTEES MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—With the consent of the House I beg to move that, pursuant to rule 79, the following senators be appointed a committee of selection to nominate the senators to serve on the different committees:—Hon. Messrs. Scott, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Bolduc, Lougheed, Miller, Macdonald (B.C.), King, Power, and the mover, and to report with all convenient speed the names of senators so nominated. The committee is precisely the same as last year with the exception of the substitution of Mr. Bolduc for Mr. De Boncherville, which was done at his request.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I wish to call the attention of the mover of the resolution to the omission of any representative from Prince Edward Island on that committee. I have had to refer to this matter on several precious occasions. It is an invidious distinction and an unfair exclusion that the province of Prince Edward Island should not be represented on that committee; the result in former years has been that Prince Edward Island has never been represented on certains committees at all, while on other committees two or three members out of the four have served, and if there had been a member of the Island on this committee such an anomoly would not have occurred. I am not disposed to offer any amendment, but I merely suggest the propriety of adding one name to that committee, and I would mention that of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I should be pleased to meet the wish of the hon. gentleman if it could be conveniently done. I took the same committee that was appointed last year, and as the number is limited to nine under the rule we would have to remove some name that is now on the list; and if we adopted the rule of having every province represented, we would have to make an appointment for Manitoba, because there is no member from Manitoba on the committee.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—There used to be one.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There are three from Ontario.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, Mr. Scott, Sir Mackenzie Bowell and myself. It is the usual practise in this House, as well as the other House, to select the leader of the opposition. I do not very well see how we can alter it. Our duties are to appoint the committees, and we are then functis officio, and I think every member will feel disposed to see that ample justice is done to Prince Edward Island and Manitoba, which are not represented on the committee.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think there could be any change made just now. The committee is the same as last year, but I really think it would be well to amend the rule so that Manitoba and Prince Edward Island could be represented on the committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS— I do not object to that at all.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I desire to ask the leader of the House—I think it was on him the matter devolved last year—if certain returns which I moved for somewhat early last session relating to the supply of oil to the Intercolonial Railway will be furnished immediately, or at an early day?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will make inquiry. My impression was that the returns were brought down to meet the hon. gentleman's wishes in respect to the motion, but I will make inquiries.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I made certain inquiries to which answers were furnished, but it was pointed out by my hon. friend that some of these inquiries would require a motion for elaborate returns, which I made immediately. These are the returns which I am anxious to have brought down.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY— I should like to inquire from the Minister of Justice or the hon. Secretary of State, if it is the intention to bring down an answer to a return passed about two years ago.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The statue of limitations might apply.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not know whether the war has caused them to forget this matter, but it was in relation to the expenses of ministers going abroad. I have not yet received the return.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will make inquiries.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Perhaps, if it is a matter of fact, I will not receive an answer.

The Senate adjourned.

SENATE.

Ottawa, February 8, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

Prayers and Routine Proceedings.

THE STANDING COMMITTEES.

REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. MILLS, from the Committee of Selection appointed to nominate the Standing Committees of the Senate, presented their report. He said: With the permission of the Senate I beg to move the adoption of this report. I do so in order that the various committees might meet to-morrow and appoint their chairmen. If that is done I think I might very well give notice this afternoon that when we adjourn to-morrow evening we stand adjourned until two weeks from Tuesday next, to meet at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not know why this disregard of the usages and rules of the House should necessarily take place in regard to this report. The whole proceeding in connection with the striking of these committees, if not irregular, is something approaching very near to irregularity. Yesterday, the motion was carried without any notice, and it was by accident that I received my notice to attend the committee this morning. Having appointments outside, however, I was not able to be present, and therefore did not know, until just immediately preceding the meeting of the House, what changes had been made on the various committees. I see no necessity for haste in connection with this business, and I think there is another objection to it. It is true it may not be unparliamentary to make this motion and strike the committees at the present time, but it is well understood that it is a matter of courtesy to the Governor General that no business should be transacted in the House until the address in reply to the speech from the Throne has been passed. I say that it is not, strictly speaking, an irregular course to transact this or any other business before the address is passed, because we have a right to do any business, and we assert that right on the opening of parliament by the introduction of a Bill pro forma, which is laid on the table, and never goes further than the first reading. Except in cases of emergency it is considered disrespectful to the Crown to do any business of any kind—and this is very important business—before the speech from the Throne has been replied to. I did intend to prevent this report from being read to-day, but as the hon. Secretary of State had the courtesy to send me a copy of the changes made in the various committees, I do not intend to do so, but if I had not been informed before the House met of the changes in the committees, I certainly should have not have allowed the report to be read to-day. This haste, I understand, is due to the fact that there is to be an adjournment. It is quite apparent that the government is very anxious to have an adjournment, and it is equally apparent that there is no work ready for parliament, and an adjournment would be a convenient thing for the government just now, but I should like to ask why there is no business ready for submission to the House immediately. For instance, there is the Criminal Code—business connected with the department of the Minister of Justice—which might be very well considered now. The subject is a very important one, requiring a great deal of patience and attention from the House, and no better time for the transaction of that business could possibly be selected than the first few weeks after the opening of the session. Then there is another important question which must come before us this session, the Banking Bill, and although the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce are not members of this House, it is peculiarly a measure which should be considered in the Senate before going to the House of Commons. In fact, I see a great many advantages in introducing the Bill here. We have more time to discuss it and better opportunities to consult with persons who are interested in banking from outside. These are two important measures which should be introduced at the present time, and I can only express my regret that the Minister of Justice is not prepared to introduce them instead of asking the House for an adjournment. I do not intend to oppose the motion, but I do not think the minister can have any justification whatever for not being prepared to introduce the Criminal Code immediately for the consideration of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As far as irregularity is concerned, I concur in the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Richmond, but there is a mode of getting over that difficulty by declaring that it shall not be a 'precedent.' The hon. gentleman elucidated very strongly the objection that I took to the course pursued in the other House. I make the suggestion, in order that it may go on record, that hereafter it is to be understood by this House that this is not to be considered a 'precedent' for future action. I concur also in the suggestion which the hon. gentleman made about introducing measures here. I had a short conversation with the Minister of Justice, upon, not only the propriety of introducing the Criminal Code Bill into this House at a very early date, but if it were possible, that he should have it printed as soon as possible, and have it sent to each member during the vacation in order that a Bill of so much importance may be thoroughly considered—particularly the new provisions it is proposed to make. The minister very courteously said he was making some changes as to which it was necessary to consult some persons interested in certain clauses, but that he would have it printed and circulated at the earliest possible moment. I shall be very glad, for one, if it can be distributed among all the members, because if we have it at home during the vacation, there are persons, such as magistrates, whose duty it is to administer the laws, with whom one might have a consultation as to the result of the proposed amendments. That is the suggestion I made to the hon. gentleman, and he very courteously said he would do so at the earliest possible moment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not quite agree with what my hon. friend opposite says as to the irregularity of the proceedings. I have already stated my view of that question to the House. The very object of introducing a Bill in each House at the beginning of the session is for the purpose of asserting our rights to proceed with public business irrespective of the speech altogether. Otherwise it might be assumed that the House was called to deal only with the subjects mentioned in the speech from the Throne. That is not the rule of practise with regard to the power of either branch of parliament. I have pointed out that in England, very often, where the debate on the address is not concluded on the same day that it was begun, the ordinary business of the country is proceeded with, and I gave instances of various sorts being submitted in the British House of Commons in 1882 before the address was adopted, so it is hardly accurate to speak of the proceeding being irregular.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I did not call it irregular.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman says he did not call it irregular. I think the expression was used by my hon. friend opposite. My hon. friend having spoken before me, I was replying to what he said as well as to the observations addressed to the House by the hon. member for Richmond, who is very confident of his views of the rules and proceedings of the House, but not always accurate, in my opinion, and upon that question of course we will differ. When my hon. friend opposite says that this shall not be drawn into a precedent, I suppose he means this early adjournment. I thought in proposing an early adjournment——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not mean anything of the kind. I meant the point to which my hon. friend from Richmond took objection. I did not say anything about the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Because I was going to say in either case after the committees have been constituted, I believe in this House there has been an adjournment of a longer or shorter period of time. Last session our adjournment was for a very short period of time, and then we had a further adjournment; and it seems to me that after the expression of the opinion of this House at the last session it would be better if we had an adjournment for a fortnight, when the legislative business from the other House would be before us in addition to the business we would be prepared to deal with ourselves. It would be more convenient than to proceed directly until the close of the session with the business before this House. The Criminal Code Bill is no doubt a very important matter, but that subject has been discussed on a number of occasions in this House without any action having been taken in the House of Commons. There are perhaps a few changes, not any that are at all important, to be made in the Bill as it was submitted last year. The Bill is at the present time in the printer's hands. When it is received from the printer, I intend to discuss it with my colleagues who are members of the legal profession, with a view to revision, and then submit it to this House as revised. I do not apprehend it would lead to a great deal of discussion, because it has already been discussed in this House. We gave it very careful consideration last year, and I do not apprehend that members will dissent very much from the opinions that we then expressed, and it did seem to me to bring that Bill down, as we might do in a day or two, would hardly justify us detaining this House for any considerable period when perhaps the consideration of the Bill would occupy but a very short period. We would not be facilitating public business, and we might be inconveniencing members by keeping them here from day to day without having, in the first instance, very much business before them to be transacted. It was with a view of meeting the convenience of members and anticipating their wishes that I suggested, when the committees were struck, this House might adjourn for a fortnight from Tuesday to next week.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I think the reasons given by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice for pressing this motion, are to me satisfactory—namely, appointing the committees and organizing them before the House adjourns—but I may add, as a sort of contribution to the discussion, following up what the hon. gentleman opposite said on the subject, I think it will be found in the reports of the Senate, that upon one occasion, when Sir John Abbott was leader of the House, and he had been so for a very short time, he introduced some Bill before the address was disposed of, objection was taken to it. I do not know whether, it went so far as to say it was irregular, but it was stated that it was contrary to the customs of this House, and Sir John Abbott withdrew the measure.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have looked at the discussion, and my impression is that the English practice had not been brought under the attention of the House at that time, or in all probability that rule would not have been adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no desire to continue the discussion further than to take exception, as I should have done yesterday, to what my hon. friend calls precedents. The hon. gentleman referred to the same thing again to-day. He did not draw the distinction between the position that I took yesterday and that which he himself elucidated. My objection was as to the practice, that no business was transacted in the lower House before the address was adopted. My hon. friend's precedents showed that motions were made. You can put as many motions as you please, but no business should be transacted. The precedents which the hon. gentleman gave yesterday, were, a good many of them, not relevant to the question, because some of them related to privileges of the House. If there were a member of this House who had done something that rendered him unfit to associate with gentlemen, and it was thought that he should be expelled, it is the prerogative of any member at any moment to rise and call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that there is an unworthy member in the House ; that is a question of privilege, which takes precedence of everything. That is the distinction which I draw. I take advantage of this opportunity to direct the attention of the Senate to the fact, that the precedents which the hon. gentleman gave were not all relevant to the position and objection which I took.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not wish to prolong the discussion upon this, what I may term academic question, but I do not wish to seem to subscribe to some views which have been expressed with reference to the alleged irregularity of the proceedings taken yesterday in reference to the nomination of members to act upon the selection committee. I therefore would make sufficiently free with the House to read, perhaps at a little length, Bourinot upon this particular question, and I fancy it will disabuse all our minds of any difference of opinion which we may hold in reference to this particular point which, if my recollection serves me right, has arisen session after session and yet appears cloudy. I refer to page 281 of Bourinot, where there is a short resume of the authorities upon this particular subject as follows :—

When the speech has been ordered to be taken into consideration on a future day, it is the practice to move the formal resolution providing for the appointment of the Select Standing Committees of the House, and to lay before the House the report of the librarian and other papers.

I might say to hon. gentleman that this was what was done yesterday, and in pursuance of that motion the committee of selection met this morning and have submitted their report which we are now considering. I would not wish the House to infer that the hon. gentleman from Richmond has taken an opposite view, as I understand he has not. But the other view has been rather concurred in by my hon. friend from Hastings, who seems to be of the opinion that it was absolutely irregular. Bourinot proceeds :

It has not been deemed courteous to the Crown in the Canadian Houses to discuss any matters of public policy before considering the speech.

Hon. gentleman will observe that there is a limitation placed upon the consideration of a subject involving the discussion of public policy. I do not think any hon. gentleman present will say that the appointment of the selection committee involves any discussion of that nature.

In 1878 Mr. Barthe introduced a Bill with reference to insolvency, but withdrew it in deference to the wishes of the House, until the address was adopted. Of course, circumstances may arise when the House may consider it necessary to act otherwise. It is not an unusual practice in the English Commons to ask questions, to move addresses for papers, and to present petitions while the address is under consideration, and in a session when the debate has been prolonged, public Bills have been introduced and discussed on the motion for leave before the address has been agreed to.

And with reference to the matter alluded to by the hon. gentleman from Toronto, I might say in a note upon page 282 of Bourinot, it seems the Hon. Mr. Abbott, in 1889, before the address was passed, introduced no less than three government Bills. They were not withdrawn by the hon. gentleman on that occasion, but were placed upon the order paper for consideration subsequent to the address. I do not think that under the circumstances, any great violence has been done to parliamentary procedure, and I fancy after this little ventilation which the point has received, there may be found to be no very great difference after all amongst us.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The report has not been read in full and I think that should be done.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The clerk of the House started to read the report, and hon. gentlemen said 'dispense,' and that was the reason it was not read.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I did not understand it that way. I understood the question was raised by the hon. gentleman from Richmond to dispense with the reading because it was not the time for reading it, and there was no necessity for it, because no motion had been made for the suspension of the rule. I understood that the motion was that the rule be suspended so that the report might be read at the table. I do not think the hon. gentleman from Richmond intended that the reading of the report should be dispensed with entirely until a motion was made to make it regular.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The Minister of Justice refers to me when he says that some hon. gentleman said 'dispense.' I admit he is correct but it was under these circumstances : the motion went up to the chair, apparently, and the chair was going to read it, and I reminded the House that the report should be presented at the table and if read at all should be read by the clerk, but having raised the objection, and necessitating the reading of the report by the clerk, I was willing to dispense with the further reading, because a copy had been sent to me of the alterations made in the various committees, and I was quite satisfied, as far as I was personally concerned, with this alteration. I gave that information distinctly to the House, and it was therefor for any other hon. member who did not have the same opportunity that I had, and who wish to know what changes were made, to insist upon the reading of the report, as he would have right to do. Had any other hon. gentleman insisted upon the full reading of the report, of course it would have been read at the table. I did not require that, and I did not as far as I was personally concerned, wish to put the clerk to the trouble of reading it. It just shows how unfair this proceeding is, as far as the bulk of the House is concerned. The great majority of the House does not know what changes have been made in the various committees, and we are asked to take them on faith. The usual course would be to have the report presented and laid on the table, and it would appear in the minutes to-morrow, so that every member could see the changes. The trouble all results from the irregularity in the first instance.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The practice in the past has been to read the names of the members of each committee to the House and the chairman moved the adoption. Then objection could be taken as each committee was being considered. I think we should adhere to that practice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I expected that would be so when I heard that cry 'dispense,' and I did not press the reading of the report.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Even if the report had been read at the table, without any opportunity of examination and comparison with last year's report, hon. gentlemen would have no opportunity of judging of the changes.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—And the report of the library committee has been read and passed by the House. Would it not shorten the matter if the Speaker read the names on each committee to the House ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

The Speaker read the names of the members selected for the different committees, and the report was adopted by the House without change.

DISALLOWANCE OF PROVINCIAL ACTS.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL gave notice—

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid upon the Table of the Senate, copies of all orders in council disallowing Acts which had been passed by any of the legislatures of the provinces of the Dominion, or by the legislative assembly of the North-west Territory, since the first day of August, 1896, together with all correspondence in relation thereto ; also, copies of any and all correspondence between the federal and any of the provincial governments relating to any suggestions of changes or amendments to any local Act which may have been passed by such local legislature, and the action taken thereon.

He said : It very often occurs that there are objectionable features in local Bills that have been passed, but they are not considered of sufficient importance to justify the disallowance of the Act, and suggestions are made by the Minister of Justice to the local authorities asking them to change them. That is why I put in the latter portion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—How far back does the motion cover ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not go beyond the first of August, 1896, because returns have been laid before the House previous to that, but if my hon. friend thinks we should take an early period, I am willing.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think so at all. The returns will be very voluminous. I have no objection to the notice.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am glad to hear it, because I did not think the government which owed its existence to a cry against the disallowance of provincial Acts, could possibly have a voluminous return in a matter of this kind.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called—

Resuming the adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the fifth session of the eighth parliament.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The hon. senior member for Halifax, in the course of his remarks in regard to the speech from the Throne, in reference to the first clause of the speech, said that the government did not claim any credit for the prosperity which Canada is at present enjoying. That is absolutely true. No one can controvert the statement of the hon. gentleman, but it is equally true that from far Vancouver to Cape Breton the press of the Liberal party has under double-leaded head-lines, flying flags and crowing roosters, claimed all the credit of that prosperity.

The claim is so absolutely absurd that it cannot be entertained by any gentlemen who claim an average share of intelligence in Canada. The real fact is simply this, that it is a time of prosperity amongst all nations the world over. We who have attained to years of maturity, and perhaps a little more, know perfectly well that there seems to be a system of cycles of prosperity and of depression, which return at well recognized intervals, and it is my opinion that we are at present within the scope of one of these cycles of prosperity. In regard to the second clause, the hon. gentleman asks what he evidently thinks to be a very pertinent and unanswerable question: what would the Conservatives say had the government sent a contingent and no war had occurred? In reply to that, I would simply say that no man, claiming any degree of foresight or of prescience as a statesman, in Canada or elsewhere, could fail to see that the prospect of war was so imminent that it was a wise thing in Canada and in the mother country to be prepared for the ultimate issue that has come upon us, and I, for one, can assure the hon. gentleman that I think I know the feeling of the Liberal Conservative party well enough to say that not a man of us would raise his voice against Canada taking a most active part under the circumstances. What was the actual state of matters in regard to the government's disposition to send a contingent? It seems to me that they did not even, so to speak, tighten the traces of the government go-cart until the sharp goad of an incensed public opinion pierced between the interstices of a rather thick cuticle and compelled them to realize, as did a very misguided man in days of old, that it was hard for them to kick against the pricks, and so they woke up. They woke up a little too late, it is true, in the order of time, and they hastened to retrieve the mistake, but only in time to place Canada, the first-born, the brightest gem in the British Crown, not where she ought to be, at the head of all the other colonies, but away down at the bottom. What a fall was there! By the action of the government she forfeited her place of honour at the front. The hon. gentleman laid great stress on the fact that the legislatures of almost all the other colonies were in session at the critical time, and that therefore they were in a position to receive at once the authorization of their different legislatures. The hon. gentleman must think we have very short memories in this Chamber. It is not so very long ago that the government of this country at a period antecedent only by some five days or something of that kind to the meeting of parliament, made an appropriation of the wealth and assets of Canada under an Order in Council for a sum, which I think I am justified in saying would far exceed the expense of the contingent we are sending to the war—for what? For the construction of a tramway from nowhere to nowhere in the Yukon Territory, and which would certainly have been carried out had it not been for the intervention of this House. No, the reluctance of the government to send a contingent to the assistance of the mother country must be looked for in other quarters, and other reasons must be assigned for it—reasons which now are perfectly well known to every Canadian, and which I do not say anything more about. It is far more attributable to that than to the want of sanction of the parliament of Canada. Now I come to another matter, and if I speak in somewhat stronger terms than might perhaps be deemed, I shall say proper, you will have to excuse me. I shall try and not commit any breach of the rules of the House in what I have to say. The hon. gentleman took occasion, in the course of his speech of yesterday, to indulge in a piece of most uncalled for and unjustifiable invective against the leader of the opposition. Well, I have had the pleasure and the privilege—I esteem it both a pleasure and a privilege, in the highest sense of these terms, to have known that hon. gentleman intimately since 1843, and when Sir Charles Tupper, then simply Charles Tupper, M.D., had just completed his curriculum as a medical student. All through the intervening years I have had most intimate associations with that gentleman, and I claim to be here and now in a better position by far than ever was or ever will be the hon. senior member for Halifax to know something of the motives which actuate that gentleman in his course through life. I do not know what prompted the hon. gentleman to make the unwarranted attack of yesterday unless it be indeed that, being in some sort somewhat of a classic, he did not forget the old Roman adage, 'he that would shoot high must aim at the sun,' and so, from his low level, so much below the level of the high mark at which he aimed, he twanged his little bow and sped his vemon pointed shaft at his noble quarry, a man whose fame as a statesman is world-wide, and who among Canadian statesmen, how eminent soe'er they may be, is easily 'the noblest Roman of them all.' He towers so far in mental equipment, statesmanship and valuable services to Canada during the course of a long public life above the mediocrities on the government benches, that it is little wonder that the lesser lights in the Liberal firmament have to resort to the ignoble course of baseless defamation and calumnious criticism adopted by the senior member for Halifax. The hon. gentleman had two principal counts in his bill of indictment: first, that Sir Charles Tupper's action in reference to urging the sending of a contingent to South Africa was prompted by a desire to make party capital, and, secondly, that Sir Charles Tupper was and always had been an abettor and promoter of racial and religious animosity.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Yes, very much that. I am in the sense of the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not say anything of that kind. I said that in the present instance, in connection with these contingents, he had been, but I did not say always.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I accept the explanation willingly. In that case I must say that I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. How utterly baseless and base as they are baseless these allegations are I shall try to show. In support of his first allegation he cited the instance of the sending of Sir Charles Tupper's telegram to the Montreal Star. In regard to that matter he said, and he iterated and re-iterated the statement, 'I know all about this telegram.' Well there are two of us. I know all about this telegram. Perhaps I know more than the hon. member from Halifax does, because I have the facts from the gentleman who sent the telegram. The telegram was sent by Sir Charles Tupper on the 5th October last. It reached the hands of the Premier on the 12th of October. In the interim between these two dates, Sir Charles Tupper saw in an issue of the Globe, the date of which I do not recollect at the moment, that the Premier of the country had come to a decision not to send a contingent. Then and not until then did Sir Charles Tupper make his telegram public. I quote now from an item in the Ottawa Citizen of this morning, purporting to give a report of the speech of the hon. senior member for Halifax.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, a nice report. I hope the hon. gentleman will not consider that a report of my speech.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Will the hon. gentleman raise his objections to it as I go along.

He charged Sir Charles Tupper with having sent his despatch offering to support the government to the Montreal 'Star' before it reached the Premier.

Is that incorrect?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I said that.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I shall place before the House circumstances as they occurred, as given to me not many hours ago by Sir Charles Tupper himself, and the House will decide which is the best authority. The hon. gentleman from Halifax said in his remarks that this was 'not the way gentlemen did.' There are other cases in which gentlemen do not act exactly as gentlemen should act, and perhaps it would be well for the hon. gentleman to take that to heart. The report continues:

On its being pointed out that the delay was due to the telegraph company, Mr. Power said he knew what he was talking about, and that the despatches were handed in together.

Here comes the question, now did the hon. gentleman from Halifax obtain that information? I make no charge. I desire to make no imputation of any kind, but it is clear to an outsider conversant with business methods, that it could only be through an operator in the Halifax office. I wish to say in the first instance the Premier got this message on the 12th, and on inquiry within an hour afterwards, the message was handed to him, and an explanation was made that some mistake had occurred in the Halifax office. Again I refer to the question—how did the hon. senior member from Halifax get his information ? To an outsider, and at the same time a man who knows something of business principles, it would seem that there could be but one source, that is the operator at Halifax, and the hon. gentleman got this information there, that operator was violating the oath he took when he gave that information.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it only fair to the operator to say that I did not get the information from him.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I suppose the hon. gentleman will not be so candid as to tell us where he did get it ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—That would be too much to expect. We have two representatives from Halifax in parliament, the senior representative from Halifax a Liberal in this House and the senior representative from Halifax, a Liberal, in the Lower House. I hold in my hand a report of what was said by the Liberal representative from Halifax in the other House and I shall read it, and hon. gentlemen can make their selection between Dr. Russell and Senator Power. It is a case of Halifax versus Halifax. The Doctor, at a very large meeting in Halifax—I rather think it was in connection with the Provincial Exhibition, but I am not sure—about the 16th or 17th of January last, expressed himself in this way :

He personally had taken the stand, in private conversation nearly a year ago at Ottawa, when the idea of parliament adopting a resolution upholding the claims of the Uitlanders for redress of their grievances that any expression of opinion of this kind by Canada should be backed up by a subsidy or a contingent.

It was not thought then that Kruger would actually go to war, but the unexpected happened, and the crisis was upon us. He was glad Canada was unanimous in backing up her loyalty in a substantial manner. It was the opportunity and the privilege of the leader of the opposition——

Not the leader of the government whose duty it was.

I would to God it had been the privilege of the leader of the government. Now, coming to the second count in the hon. gentleman's indictment the racial and religious cry, how utterly unwarranted such a charge is ! I am amazed that the hon. the senior member from Halifax, a citizen of the capital of the province from which he comes, should have the temerity to make such a charge, being cognizant as he must have been of events which transpired in Halifax somewhere about 1857, when the government of the province took the stand that Roman Catholics were to be excluded from positions in the government. Sir Charles Tupper was the man who set his face like a flint against any such proposition as that. He was the man who set his foot down and said this shall not be. He was the man that with giant strokes smote the panels and burst in the lock of the door of exclusion, so that it has never swung upon its hinges since, and there is now ready access to any position, however high, for Roman Catholic and Protestant alike. To-day, we have an example of what I mean, an eminent and shining example of the result of the action of Sir Charles Tupper in those days, in the able, the eminently able and cultured gentleman who graces the gubernatorial chair of Nova Scotia to-day, Sir Malachi Daly, a Roman Catholic. The Morning Chronicle, the beloved of the senior member for Halifax, took the ground from 1857 to 1859 inclusive, that no Roman Catholic should have a seat in the government. Sir Charles intervened, and then, as I say, by his intervention and as a result of that manly intervention, the way was opened for Roman Catholics and Protestants alike to the highest offices in the gift of the government to which their abilities would entitle them. This is the man who to-day is said to be a bigotted abettor of religious and race prejudice. Another charge was made against the Conservative press by the hon. gentleman, which I repudiate in toto, that they in their articles have persistently and constantly advocated the keeping up of racial and religious animosity in this Canada of ours. If the hon. gentleman wants any samples of that I would direct him to La Patrie, La Semaine Religieuse, Le Soleil and other Liberal papers. He will find in these no scarcity of material on which to vent his pent up wrath. In clause No. 3 of the speech we find the following reference to the offer of Lord Strathcona :

In this connection, it is a matter of pride and gratification to the people of this Dominion that, in addition to the contingents sent by the government, another Canadian force is being organized and despatched at the personal expense of the High Commissioner of Canada. This generous and patriotic action upon the part of Lord Strathcona reflects high honour on him and on the Dominion he represents.

All honour to him for his large hearted and princely munificence and liberality, which is only giving us some little idea of the extent of his patriotism. The next paragraph in the speech says :

I have been instructed to convey to you Her Majesty's high appreciation of the loyalty and patriotism thus displayed, which, following the preference granted under the present tariff to articles of British manufacture, has had the happiest effect in cementing and intensifying the cordial relations subsisting between Canada and the mother country.

What a collection—what a juxtaposition! What under heaven has the tariff to do with the loyalty and patriotism displayed by Lord Strathcona? What under heaven had they to do one with the other? Nothing in the world ; but I have this to say about this preference for which so much is claimed, that it undoubtedly is, and is recognized to be a tariff much more in the interests of the United States than it is of Great Britain, as is abundantly and incontrovertibly proved by the fact that the trade between the United States and Canada is immensely greater than that between Great Britain and Canada. I admit that the trade between Great Britain and Canada has increased to some extent, but nothing like in the same ratio as the trade between the United States and Canada, showing that the tariff gives a very decided advantage to the United States. Next comes a Delphian oracle sentence—

A Bill will be submitted for your approval making provision for the cost of equipping and paying the Canadian contingents.

What would any hon. gentleman infer from that? Would you not infer that the total expense of the contingent was to be borne by this Canada of ours ? Ninety-nine Canadians out of a hundred would take that impression from it. The proposition, as I understand it, is that the government is prepared to make up the difference as between the Imperial pay and what our troops have been accustomed to get, and so our poor boys, after all, go out to this war in which they may lose their lives or be maimed for life, under a C.O.D. stamp—mercenaries, after all. The speech continues:

The measures which have been taken from time to time to facilitate the safe transportation of food stuffs to European markets have resulted in a large increase in the exportation of several important articles of produce, and it may become necessary in the interest of this very important branch of industry to require a more careful inspection than has been customary for the purpose of maintaining that high standard of excellence heretofore secured and which is absolutely indispensable if the people of Canada are to increase their large and profitable trade with other countries in these commodities.

Who initiated that ? This government ? Echo answers who ? No, they did not. It was initiated and well under way before this government came into power at all, and they have only been following the lines laid down in regard to this matter, as in many other matters, by the previous government. The next paragraph refers to the post office:

I am glad to observe that the returns from the Post Office Department afford good ground for believing that the temporary loss of revenue caused by the great reduction recently made in letter postage, will speedily be made good by the increased correspondence consequent thereon.

I should hope so too, but there has been a reduction in the revenue of the post office, that I do not think is very creditable to the members of this cabinet. I am informed that the Minister of Agriculture in the recent election campaign in Sherbrooke, sent free through the mails, under the imprimatur of his stamp as Minister of Agriculture, quite a cart load of brochures of campaign literature to promote the interests of the Liberal party in that contest, and again, on a certain occasion when Sir Richard Cartwright made what he considered a very admirable speech, I suppose, in Massey Hall, Toronto, he had his speech by the thousand scattered throughout the country, and poor Canadians have to bear the cost of it. That is a way of decreasing the revenue of the post office that I do not think is very commendable.

Negotiations are now in progress with several of our sister colonies in the West Indies which it is hoped may result in increasing and developing our trade with those islands, and possibly with certain portions of the adjacent continent of South America.

It seems to me that I hear an echo from a far distance, years behind us, when in another House action was taken by the Conservative government to make this business connection with the West Indies, when it was pronounced by the Liberals to be perfectly ridiculous to look for such distant connections as that. Canada, we were told, would never benefit by it. Why not cultivate and coddle the market of 50,000,000 to the south of us. Now, here are the same gentlemen claiming as a great piece of merit that they are cultivating trade with the West Indies.

I am happy to observe that the number of settlers who have taken up lands in Manitoba and in the North-west Territories is larger than in any previous year, and affords conclusive evidence of the success which has attended the efforts of my government to promote immigration.

I do not think so at all. I do not think there is any reason to conclude that this immigration is satisfactory to Canada at large, and it is less so in the immediate neighbourhood where these people have settled than in parts of Canada more distant. There is one thing against which I think we ought specially to guard in connection with this matter of immigration, and that is that we do not fall in to the same cardinal mistake and error that the United States government have fallen into, in promoting in their country the immigration of an uneducated and a poor class of immigrants, who at no time and under no circumstances can be of great advantage to the country in which they settle.

I am pleased to say that our canal system, connecting the great lakes with the Atlantic seaboard, has been completed so as to allow vessels having a draft of fourteen feet to pass from the head of Lake Superior to the sea. The vigorous and successful prosecution of these works by my government has already attracted the attention of those interested in western transportation, and there are good grounds for the hope that, when the necessary facilities for the quick and inexpensive handling of ocean traffic are provided, and which are now in progress, Canadian ports will control a much larger share of the traffic of the west.

We have struck something new, it would appear. One would imagine, to read that clause, that we had stumbled upon some new enterprise, whereas we are well aware that this matter was under the management of the previous government, and was well under way, and that the present government have merely followed in their footsteps in completing the work their predecessors had begun.

Then, we come to the last paragraph, the allusion to the taking of the next decennial census, and in conjunction with that, the better arrangement of the electoral districts I hardly know what it means, or what it implies, but it seems to me a curious conjunction of two ideas—that taking of the next decennial census and a measure for the better arrangement of the electoral districts almost immediately before the census is taken I do not see why there is any necessity for rearranging the constituencies, when the next general census is so very near at hand. The subject to which all others in the speech are subordinate, and justly so, is that of the war in Africa, a war forced upon Great Britain by the circumstances, a war to do away with and abolish the wretchedly cruel slavery of the native races at the hands of the Boers, a war to place British subjects on a footing of equality with others, not in the condition in which they were when this war was initiated, deprived of the rights and privileges of free men, denied representation and taxed for the principal part of the revenues of the country. We all know that the Uitlanders are very much more numerous than are the Boers. We all know that the contributions of the Boers have been infinitesimal in comparison with the contributions of the Uitlanders to the revenue, and yet they, being British subjects, have been deprived of representation. The absolute necessity that was laid upon Great Britain to enter upon this war strictly in her own interest must be evident, I think, to every one. I say it was an absolute necessity that Great Britain should hold South Africa, in the light of the position which South Africa occupies, being a half-way house between Great Britain and her Indian possessions; so that, in that light, it would never have done to have allowed the Boers to control the affairs of that country. In time, let us hope for the establishment of a government modelled upon the plan of the British government, under whose benign sway every man can sit under his own vine and fig-tree, none daring to make him afraid, where every citizen will enjoy all the privileges and immunities possessed by the residents of the British Islands themselves; and, after a few years' experience of that position, I am sanguine enough to hope that even the Boers themselves will after realizing what it is to enjoy the privileges of British citizens, be even willing to risk life and limb in the defence of that glorious flag which has done so much for the world in the days that are gone, which, in whatever part of the world the breezes of Heaven kiss its glorious folds, is the emblem and the forerunner of Christianity, civilization and commerce.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I seldom take part in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the Throne, and although on the present occasion subjects of an exceptional character claim the attention of the parliament of Canada, I would follow my usual course, and await the submission to the Senate of the subjects referred to in His Excellency's speech to express my opinion regarding them, were it not for the attack of the hon. member from Halifax on the distinguished leader of the opposition, an attack, as my hon. friend from Pictou has said, alike bitter, uncalled for, and devoid of truth. But as the hon. gentleman has brought me to my feet I feel inclined to contribute some general remarks to the discussion.

The year that has just closed has witnessed a new departure—a new era in the history of this Dominion, which, whatever may be their serious aspects, must be viewed with feelings of gratification and pride by every loyal and right-thinking Canadian. We have seen our country assume the position of an ally of the motherland on the battle field—realizing the vision of the fathers of confederation of a united empire in war as well as in peace, and presenting to the world an object-lesson, which has been contemplated, even by the enemies of Britain, with surprise and admiration. Whatever, I repeat, may be the sad features of the bloody struggle in South Africa, no one can doubt that it has proved the most potent factor of modern times in promoting the unity and future federation of the British Empire. There could be no better proof of the justice, freedom and happiness of British rule, wherever its enlightened methods prevail, than the spontaneous offers of assistance to the empire, in the hour of need and peril—as exemplified in the wave of loyalty and patriotism that has swept the outlying portions of the empire—notably, India, Australasia and Canada. Let its enemies predict as they please, the decadence and fall of the British Empire, never in its history did it present to the world so grand a spectacle of Imperial unity and strength, on land and sea, as it does at the present hour. The best and noblest blood of the nation is being freely spilled in the cause of liberty and civilization in a war forced upon it by injustice, tyranny and barbarism. It must not be forgotten, that England is not the aggressor in this wicked war, but that she has been insultingly challenged to the conflict, and that her power and prestige are involved in the issue. Jealous of her proud position, it cannot be denied that many of the nations of Europe, whose liberties she has so often fought for and preserved, are exulting to-day over any reverse she suffers, in war or in diplomacy, throughout her world-wide dominions. There, therefore, never was a time when it more behooved the great colonies she has planted in both hemispheres, and nurtured and protected in their infancy to show their gratitude for past care and kindness, as well as their appreciation of the free institutions bestowed upon them, without distinction of race or creed or colour under the glorious folds of the British flag—the symbol, as has been truly said, of justice and liberty in every quarter of the globe in which it flutters to the breeze. This spirit of Imperial justice and liberty has nowhere been more conspicuous than in this Great Dominion, where we enjoy the most absolute self-government consistent with our allegiance to the Crown; and we all felt proud of the prominent position of Canada in the celebration of the Queen's Jubilee as the premier dependency of the empire in all the elements of colonial strength and greatness. However much we may and do deplore the reverses so far sustained by the British forces in South Africa, the blood of the heroes who have met an untimely grave in the cause of the empire will only stimulate the courage of the nation to pursue undaunted the bitter struggle to a successful termination. But one feeling must animate Britons in every quarter of the empire, and Canada will do its duty and vindicate its affection and loyalty in this great emergency, however hampered she may be by sinister and unpatriotic influences where they should least be expected to exist. The patriotic ardour of our people cannot be trammelled by the half-hearted language of 'permission' to our volunteers to enlist as soldiers of our gracious Queen, in the defence of the honour and integrity of the empire.

Under all the circumstances—to use the mildest language—it was very regrettable—it was even very exasperating, that when the occasion presented itself of proving by our acts our loyalty to the motherland, Canada did not take the lead, which was her place in the hour of danger as it was in the procession of honour, and set an example to the other colonies by offering all the assistance, both in men and money, that her means and resources would justify. But if this was not done—and we know it was not done—it was not the fault of the people of Canada. The loyalty of the people of Canada was unmistakably exhibited from the beginning of the Transvaal difficulty; it had found emphatic expression in both Houses of parliament, and Canadians every where were clamouring to go to the assistance of the empire in South Africa. Whose then was the fault—whose the delinquency, at that critical moment? Chiefly—I am sorry to say—but the facts are undeniable—they are matters of record that can not be blotted out—the fault—the delinquency—the recreancy to his high trust and duty, rested on the Prime Minister of Canada—overloaded though he was with the honours of his Sovereign, through the accident of office dishonestly obtained; drilled or inspired—if he needed any drilling or inspiration in that direction, which I doubt—by the distinguished statesman, who is so well known as the Tory master of a Liberal administration—a gentleman who I perceive has lately become almost as exhuberant in his professions of loyalty as he was very recently in his tirades of disaffection and hostility, in the vain endeavour, as at Toronto, to allay public indignation at his previous unpatriotic, if not seditious utterances.

The refusal of the premier in the beginning to respond to the wishes of the people—his evident intention not to send any assistance to the Imperial forces in South Africa, on the pretext that Canada had no quarrel with the Boers; that he had no legal authority to do so; that he could not, and would not, take a dollar from the public treasury for such a purpose, supplemented by the hostile stand taken by the Minister of Public Works, with the object of exciting racial antagonism, aroused all loyal Canadians, and both these high functionaries saw the wisdom of averting the gathering storm that threatened to sweep them to their doom. In thorough harmony with their inconsistency on nearly all grave questions of public policy, they changed their tactics, and called for volunteers for the Transvaal—or, in Sir Wilfrid Laurier's own words, they 'permitted' volunteers for enlistment in the British army in South Africa. But Mr. Tarte boasted that the Order in Council calling for volunteers contained a declaration that the action of the cabinet was not to be taken as a precedent, and that not one dollar of Canadian money was to be spent in maintaining them at the seat of war.

We must all blush to think that such an Order in Council will remain forever among the archives of the Dominion—an indelible disgrace to Canada.

The government and its friends talk as if the attitude of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works was due to their apprehension of constitutional difficulties that stood in their way, and not to any hostility to the patriotic wave that was passing over every part of the Queen's dominions, and which frightened them into a sense of their duty. The excuse of being unable to use the public funds without the sanction of parliament has well been called a quibble, for the same men did not hesitate, as one of their first acts as a government, to draw large sums from the treasury, with only questionable justification of their action. If ever there was an unforseen emergency—when they could rely on the approval of parliament for putting their hands as deeply as they pleased into the pockets of the people—an emergency clearly within the scope and meaning of our constitutional practice—this was certainly such an unforseen emergency, in which our honour, and loyalty, and patriotism were all involved. They had nothing to fear, and they knew it, from the people of Canada to prevent them from doing their simple and manifest duty. Their unpardonable hesitation and their worthless excuses at the critical moment spoke stronger than words that the pulse of the government did not beat in unison with the great part of the people, and the thought of their delinquency—their evident design to check popular enthusiasm, is now the night-mare of the Liberal party.

We must all be proud that when the loyal people of the Dominion were 'permitted' by their rulers to volunteer for service under the flag of the empire in South Africa, more brave Canadians than could be accepted readily offered their services, and if a dozen contingents had been asked for, instead of one or two, the patriotism of our people, it was clear, would prove equal to the demand. That the sturdy men we have sent to the seat of war will do honour to themselves and their country, we all have the most unbounded confidence.

Although events in South Africa have not, so far, afforded us much reason for rejoicing—but indeed quite contrary—there can be no doubt that a change will in due course of time take place for the better; and that victory in the end will perch on the banners of the empire, we all firmly believe. England's struggle is in a just cause; she is fighting—in a fight, it must never be forgotten—for equal rights to all, against a cruel and barbarous tyranny, which should not be allowed any longer to retard the civilization and enlightenment of some of the most valuable regions of the dark continent —where white men and black men are now alike victims of Boer oppression and cruelty.

I do not think it necessary to go further into details or quote dates and public papers in order to substantiate my assertions, because I know these figures and documents are as familiar to hon. gentlemen as they are to myself, and I do not wish to weary the House by reading them.

I said in my opening remarks that I would have followed my usual course, and not have spoken in this debate, as I consider it more in accordance with British practice that the various subjects in the speech from the Throne should be discussed as they are presented to the Senate, with full information, during the session of parliament. I admit there are times when a contrary course is quite justifiable.

Had it not been for the unwarranted attack of the hon. member from Halifax yesterday on the distinguished leader of the great Conservative party in this country, I would have maintained my customary silence. I am, I regret to say, an older man than the hon. senior member from Halifax, and have from experience a more full and accurate recollection of the stirring scenes and incidents of political life in my native province during the last half century than he perhaps can personally remember, although, as a diligent student of history, I am aware he is very well informed.

With regard to any charges of racial or religious bigotry or intolerance, wherever made against Sir Charles Tupper, I am in a position to say that such charges are destitute of the slightest foundation in truth. No public man in this country to-day has a prouder record for liberality and broadmindedness, no man who has figured in the public life of Canada during the last half century has been less open to the charge of religious bigotry or racial prejudice than the venerable leader of the opposition. His voice has always been for equal rights to all classes and creeds, and favouritism to none, and if there is a phase of his political career to which he can look back with unalloyed pride and pleasure, this is that feature of it. Sir Charles Tupper entered public life in Nova Scotia about the year 1854. In 1857 a dispute arose which separated the Roman Catholics of that province from the Liberal party and drove them into the ranks of the Conservative opposition. Immediately a cry of proscription was started against them by the Liberal party and their organs. That unscrupulous organ of the Liberal party today in Nova Scotia, the Halifax Chronicle, then edited and owned by Mr. William Annand, a thoroughpaced bigot and proscriptionist, teemed with the vilest abuse of Roman Catholics and their religion. A 'no popery' howl was started throughout the province, which raged for years. That foul cry brought the Liberal party back to power in 1859, with a very slim majority. The Liberal organ declared that it would be a long day before any Roman Catholic would again occupy a seat in the government of Nova Scotia. I myself, then a law student, was present in one of the outlying districts of Halifax County at the departmental election of Annand as Financial Secretary, and I heard him on that occasion, before a purely Protestant audience chiefly composed of illiterate farmers, declare that he hoped never again to see a Papist pollute a seat at the council board of Nova Scotia.

These were the sentiments of the Liberal party at that time shortly after Sir Charles Tupper appeared in the political arena, and with a courage, ability, eloquence and energy that have always distinguished him, battled against those principles of proscription; he crushed the head of the viper of religious bigotry and intolerance under his feet, and carried the elections of 1863 with an immense majority. It was due to the herculean efforts of the young, able and brilliant politician at that memorable period that religious proscription received its deathblow in Nova Scotia forever. Up to that time, the respected father of the member from Halifax, whom I well knew, and of whom I would only speak with sentiments of the highest esteem for his memory, was a staunch and influential supporter of the Liberal party, but he then forsook his political associates and became a supporter of Dr. Tupper, whom he followed for the next ten years when the question of confederation in 1865 broke up all the old party affiliations in that province. During the period of the 'no popery' howl the Halifax Chronicle teemed with the foulest abuse of the clergy and the rites of the Church of Rome, and everything that its adherents held dear. I say, and I know whereof I speak, it was the ability of Sir Charles Tupper, who was usually then alluded to in the Chronicle as the hero of the 'red stockings' government, in insulting connection with the footgear of certain dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church, that frustrated the Liberal campaign of religious intolerance and sectarian strife, and the effect of it is visible to this day.

But beyond all this, the public career of Sir Charles Tupper is full of incidents of liberality and justice towards Roman Catholics. Perhaps there was no man in Canada, when we omit the names of Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Cartier, who was better entitled to a seat in the first cabinet of the Dominion than Sir Charles Tupper. Why was he not there? He was not there because of racial troubles and difficulties, for which he was not responsible, but to appease which he voluntarily sacrificed his great claims. In order to overcome this racial and religious difficulty, he, one of the most prominent men in Canada in connection with the passage of confederation, sacrificed himself that an Irishman and a Catholic, as representative of the Irish race and Catholic body, should get a seat in the first cabinet of the Dominion. It was an instance of the greatest magnanimity, when it is remembered that the gentleman for whom he gave way had personally no great claim to the position to which he was appointed, but was simply a very respectable Irish Roman Catholic—the late Sir Edward Kenny. I repeat, that if there is a man in this country whose record will bear inspection in connection with racial and religious questions that person is Sir Charles Tupper, and it is only fair and manly that this record should stand him in good stead when he is slandered and misrepresented by his opponents at the present time. But the last man in Canada to trump up against him a charge of religious bigotry or racial prejudice should be an Irish Roman Catholic, or the son of an Irish Roman Catholic.

What has been the history of Sir Charles Tupper as an influential Conservative statesman since confederation, as well as the history of the Liberal-Conservative party in Canada, in regard to racial and religious questions in this Dominion? Need I remind hon. gentlemen that the Liberal-Conservative party, all the time they held power in this country, with the consent and approval, and often at the instance of the present leader of the opposition, gave due representation to the Roman Catholic minority in the maritime provinces in the Dominion cabinet. The Hon. Hugh Macdonald followed Sir Edward Kenny, and the Hon. John Costigan and Sir John Thompson followed Mr. Macdonald, recognizing that that minority was entitled to representation in the government of Canada. What has been the conduct of the Liberal party at any time they have held power during the last thirty years? When the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie formed his cabinet, in 1874, he gave five seats to the maritime provinces, but no Roman Catholic occupied one of them. When the Hon. Mr. Laurier came to power, he gave four portfolios to the Atlantic provinces, but no thought had he of giving representation to the powerful Roman Catholic minority—fully one-third of the population of these provinces, nor has he done so to this day. The Protestant minority of Quebec is relatively to numbers much less entitled to representation in the cabinet, but what Prime Minister would think of ignoring it in the formation of an administration? Let us suppose that the Protestant minority of Quebec was fully one-third of the population of that province, and any party had attempted to form a government without giving it representation, how long would any such government exist?

More than all this, no Roman Catholic ever sat on the judicial bench in the maritime provinces, until the Liberal-Conservative party, then largely guided by Sir Charles Tupper, placed the lamented Judge McDonald on the Supreme Court bench of Nova Scotia. Subsequently the Conservative party placed Sir John Thompson and Judge Meagher on the same bench. In Prince Edward Island, never did a Roman Catholic sit on the Supreme Court Bench until the present able and accomplished Chief Justice was elevated to that position by a Conservative government. In New Brunswick, no Roman Catholic occupied a seat on the Supreme Court Bench until the worthy Judge Landry—a French Acadian—was elevated to that position by a Conservative administration. There was no more potent factor in securing these acts of justice than Sir Charles Tupper. He led the way and showed what ought to be done in Nova Scotia and the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island followed suit. During the Mackenzie regime, seven county court judges had to be appointed in the province of Nova Scotia; there was not a Catholic among them, and not until a vacancy occurred in the Antigonish district, was a Roman Catholic appointed to a county court judgeship—and then by a Conservative government. It is true, the position was offered to one or two men whom they had no reason to suppose would accept it, but there were plenty of others to whom they could have given the coveted office, if they had been actuated by motives of justice and gratitude to their party followers.

With regard to the cabinet, I do not know whether the hon. member from Halifax is satisfied with the want of representation of his co-religionists since the advent to power of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but I have reason to think that he is anything but happy or contented. Is it, then, due to want of cabinet timber among the minority in the lower provinces that it has no representative in the Laurier cabinet? Surely, that cannot be truthfully affirmed. There is my hon. friend from Halifax—a man of undoubted ability, experience and services to his party. There are, besides, two able professional men from the two great Catholic counties of Antigonish and Inverness—Mr. McIsaac and Dr. McLellan—who, in respect to ability and education, are as well fitted for cabinet rank as some who hold seats in the government of to-day. If the same sense of justice and liberality animated Sir Wilfrid Laurier as actuated Sir Charles Tupper, when he was in power, some one of the gentlemen I have named would now hold a seat in the government of Canada.

I do not stand here as the champion of Roman Catholic rights in the provinces of the east. I make no pretensions to such a position—in fact, it is proper, perhaps, that I should disclaim any such pretensions to-day—but I am giving utterance now only to sentiments that might be freely expressed by any liberal-minded Protestant. It is perhaps unfortunate that racial, religious or sectional distinctions have to be taken into consideration in the formation of governments in this country, but until we have outgrown our present prejudices and the narrow ideas of our national infancy, this must be done. It is the condition of our term of tutelage as a nation that we cannot ignore just yet these distinctions; but I trust the day is approaching when we will be able to do so, without destroying the harmony that should prevail among all classes and all sections.

I did not intend to occupy the time of the House as long as I have done. I do not purpose to go over the different subjects in the speech, which have already been so ably discussed from the opposition benches by the hon. senators who have preceded me. The prosperity of the country is admitted; it is a source of pleasure to every one of us. We know the cause of it, at least in a great degree, is that the hon. gentlemen who now hold the reins of power did not fulfil the pledges they made to the people by abolishing the protective policy of their predecessors, and that, with a few trifling amendments, they have left the tariff of the Conservative party nearly as they found it when Sir Charles Tupper went out of power in 1896. During the period of the Mackenzie regime the present Minister of Trade and Commerce used to freely say that governments could do nothing to promote the prosperity of the people—that the then government was nothing more than 'a fly on the wheel' in that connection, and this is pretty much what the Liberal government is to-day, only a worse sort of fly. I think it can be safely said, however, that there never was in any British colony with representative institutions a government that made such pledges on all questions, and afterwards proved themselves so faithless in the performance of their promises, as the party now in power in this Dominion. And they also have done so many things that they promised they would not do. What could be a more striking instance in point than that referred to by my hon. friend from Marsfield with regard to the appointment to office of members of the House of Commons? What could be more indecent than the inconsistency of the government on that question? It has simply been a scandal, the scramble for office in the popular branch since the present government came into power. Rest assured, the electors of this country have taken stock of all these things. I could keep the Senate in session till midnight, if I could depend on its patience, enumerating the promises the government have made and broken, as well as the general inconsistencies and tergiversations that have marked their advent to power. I have reason to believe that the government intended to go to the country in January, but they realized that if they did so, they would be swept from power. They know that the electorate is simply waiting—that the people of Canada are impatiently waiting—for the opportunity to say to the government, as Cromwell said to the Long Parliament: 'Get you gone; give place to better men; the Lord has done with you.'

Hon. Mr. DEVER—After the oratory to which we have listened it may be regarded as presumption on my part to make a few remarks. But before doing so I wish the Senate to understand that I stand here as a friend of the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, and I look on Sir Charles Tupper as my friend, an old acquaintance who did many things for me and some of my family that bind me to him for perhaps the balance of his life. That is as a social citizen of Canada, but when I come to speak of Sir Charles Tupper in the position he has held since he assumed the leadership of the Conservative party, then I take issue with him as a politician and statesman. I have no intention to say that Sir Charles Tupper is a bigot; on the contrary, I believe he is a liberal-minded man. He is a gentleman, and a gentleman you will never find to be a religious bigot. I was much pleased with the speech of the gentleman who moved and seconded this address. They spoke in the most kindly spirit without accusing any one of disloyalty. Such accusations are, in my opinion, very harsh and uncalled for in this Canada of ours, because all classes are loyal in Canada. My experience leads me to believe that there is not enough disloyalty in Canada to kill a mouse. All parties have a voice in the government of the country and they have an interest in the government of the country, and why should they be disloyal? The thing is so absurd that I am surprised that men who profess to be statesmen should undertake to raise such an issue.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Who has raised it?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The Conservative party has raised it. I ask this House and this country if they can find a single word in the Liberal newspapers of Canada that is calculated to excite bigotry or racial feeling. Is it so with the Conservative press? Is there a Conservative paper that is not issuing forth in the most unblushing manner almost every day something offensive and intended to excite race bigotry? I do not wish to say anything that might attach it to Sir Charles Tupper. I believe anything that has been imputed to him by those papers as emanating from him, has been in mistake, because those who know him best will not accuse him of religious bigotry. It is well-known that loyalty is like religion, it comes by conviction, not by coercion. Why should parties in this country be coerced to speak and act as certain classes speak and act? Under the British system of government it is well-known that freedom of speech and freedom of discussion are looked on as almost a religious duty. I am very much displeased to see a certain class of men strain every nerve for political purposes, to brand their opponents with disloyalty and other crimes in this Dominion at present. This may succeed for a time, but it is poor statesmanship in a country like ours where we desire our people to remain and encourage others to come amongst us. There is another consideration it is well to bear in mind, and that is, that under British law, where freedom of speech and discussion is authorized, certain men claim all this freedom for themselves and attempt to dictate to others what they shall say and think in discussing public questions. Is this not true? Do we not find that certain parties in the present cabinet are assailed and pronounced disloyal because they happen to have individual opinions upon political questions? Why should not men have that liberty in this country that the British government give to all their subjects, freedom of opinion and the right to public discussion? We may differ in opinion on details and still unite on one grand object, and in this case it is to support the mother country in her difficulties. It has been claimed by some that the government did not act promptly in offering assistance in sending a contingent. In St. John I think we were to the front as soon as there was a declaration of war against Britain. Our mayor called a meeting of citizens at which all rallied and a contribution was made and a guarantee given to our first contingent, that for six months—because at that time we thought the war was going to be a picnic, and that no serious fighting would take place and that our men would be back in six months—we guaranteed that each one of them should receive fifty cents a day. That is what we did as citizens. I mention this to show that there is loyalty everywhere in this country. All our people are loyal. I do not think it is fair to accuse any one of disloyalty. It is comtemptible to raise such a cry against an opponent that you are unfit to meet in any other way, thus forgetting what a gerat authority once said of such cheap loyalty. 'Loyalty! loyalty!' he said, 'the last refuge of political scoundrels.' Try those men and where is their loyalty. I know many of them have been running round the country with this loyalty cry in their mouths, but they would not enlist to go to the front. Their loyalty consists in their loud talk. I do not hope that we debate our subjects for the benefit of the country and do to others as we would have others do to us. This calling of hard names generates hatred that true patriots shudder at, because they believe that a house, or a country divided against itself will come to grief. We want no hatred in this Dominion. We want to be a united people, to feel that we are all Canadians, true to our flag and true to our country, and whilst those hatreds are fostered for political purposes we will never have that true loyalty and confidence in our future that people in this new country should have and will have if we are only guided by such statesmen as will put their foot down on such meanness—because, after all, if there is anything mean it is exciting religious bigotry. Gentlemen who are educated never think of exciting bigotry; it is only a class of men whom I might call an inferior class —men who pander to societies and little cliques. Our present government is a different class of men. I say that a certain gentleman laboured to make it appear that Catholics are not represented. I do not claim to be a religious man, and do not speak for any church or denomination, but I know that if the Catholics felt aggrieved, I would have heard it. I never heard a complaining voice. I believe, on the contrary, the Catholics are well pleased. They are not unreasonable. It does not follow that because a few demagogues who want positions are dissatisfied, that the rest of the Catholics are.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman refer to himself?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I do not want a position in the cabinet. If I had desired such a position, I could have gone into my hon. friend's cabinet. Let us put down bigotry and all these petty means of obtaining notoriety among classes, and let us pull together. There is plenty of room in Canada for everybody, except for the disturbers of the peace, and these are not wanted in Canada, nor in any other country, in the light of our present civilization. With reference to the trade and business of the country, it is hard to please some gentlemen who seem to think that they ought to own the country and drive everybody else out of it, only their puppets and those who think and speak as they think and speak. These gentlemen declare that all prosperity was created by them.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—By whom ?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—By the hon. gentleman's party and their policy ; and yet they were always floundering in deficits when they were in office.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—To whom does the hon. gentleman refer ?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The hon. gentleman and his associates. They were always floundering in deficits of three or four millions, and now their cry is that the duties are higher, although the government has largely taken off the duty on raw material. They say the manufacturers are the only persons who receive the benefit, and that prices are higher, instead of lower, after the duty is taken off the raw material. That is not very logical. They conceal the fact that prices of goods have advanced from 10 to 40 per cent in England and the United States, especially cordage, iron, &c., whilst business of all descriptions is booming in Canada. May I not say, with a large measure of gratitude, that much of the latter is caused by our wise government, which is looked upon by the people as being anxious for the peace and prosperity of all classes in Canada ? I make this statement in contrast with the declarations I have heard so often, that this government have done nothing since they came into power. I answer : Have they not finished the canals ? Have they not extended the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal ? Have they not built elevators for grain at Halifax ?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—And at St. John ? And have they not built public improvements, and have they not placed Montreal to-day on the highway of becoming a great competitor with New York ?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière) —Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—That is a bitter pill for some hon. gentlemen. The fact is that the government have done everything that men could do, and have placed Canada, in the estimation of the world, as a rising nation, not a petty province, such as it had been under a form of government which recognized no higher policy than that of putting people against each other in every section of the country.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. gentleman refer to the Mackenzie government ?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—We have the hon. gentlemen in the right place now, and we will keep them there.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman's place would be better on the other side.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Another hon. gentleman had the audacity to say that the government were very slow in sending the contingent. I say that good statesmen should proceed cautiously in such a matter. The people can see plainly that, instead of being a despotic government, taking the people by the throat and compelling them to do things without due consideration, they did as statesmen should do, and waited until they saw that the country was ripe for the sending of a contingent to South Africa. They also waited with patience, notwithstanding the taunts, and I might say, impertinence, of their enemies, until they were apprised by the mother country of the proper time and condition under which that contingent should be sent, and when they did act, they had a full knowledge of all the surrounding circumstances, and they had the country at their back, there being a general feeling of loyalty all over this country, so that they had the country to sustain them in this action, which they had not a legal right to take, from the best information I can get. They felt they had the confidence of the country, and, as statesmen, they carried the will of the people into execution. This is the trouble now with hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. They are sorry that the government did not make a great mistake, and sorry that they did not act as despots, and take the people by the throat, doing whatever they elected to do because they felt that they were a government and that nobody dare oppose them afterwards. The fact is that they did the right thing, and sent the contingent at the proper time. It is my opinion that the country is satisfied, and my hon. friends know it. They may hark, and bark, and talk, but the fact now is that they are left behind.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—We have had several declarations in this House. Some hon. gentlemen took the trouble of speaking very smoothly and kindly, apparently, suggesting that they were the last people in the world to have the slightest racial feeling. As a senator, I must accept that statement. I am sorry to see this, though; notwithstanding that declaration in this House, they have not shut down their newspapers. We know very well that the newspapers would not continue to publish such rubbish if they had not an audience that were satisfied with their editorials. They are not at all disposed to avail themselves of religious or sectional feeling, which seems very fair, but it would be only reasonable to expect that they should let their leaders know this. It is well known that two members of the government are being assailed almost daily. And for what reason? Would they dare attack other members of the government? Mr. Tarte is made the scapegoat.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And what about Mr. Fitzpatrick?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Mr. Tarte is attacked because he is a Frenchman.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—No, but because he was unwilling and very slow in acting. That is the reason.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—What else should he be but a Frenchman? Could he call himself a Scotchman?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I hope not.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—We have two or three Scotchmen, but we have no cause to look upon them as disloyal, because they class themselves as Scotchmen. Mr. Tarte is not a Dutchman. It would be a falsehood for him to state that he was an Englishman. The whole British element is composed of aggregations of nationalities. We have Irish, Scotch and English. We have India now, and we are going to have South Africa. But that does not disqualify these different nationalities from being loyal men. Why should it disqualify Mr. Tarte?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He is not disqualified.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It is all very well to talk, but I do not think there is any particular hatred of Mr. Tarte. They think Mr. Tarte is unpopular, and that by assailing him they are going to injure this government. They can not do that. This government stands too well with the people of this country.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The injury is made by Mr. Tarte himself.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—They say that Mr. Tarte is not all that Canada might expect. For my part, I do not know much about Mr. Tarte.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We can see that.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Better leave him alone.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It is no sign that he is not an honourable man, because the hon. gentleman from Montmagny is opposed to him, and even if all that is said against Mr. Tarte is correct, does anybody think that Sir Richard Cartwright, the Minister of Finance, the Postmaster General, our leaders in this House and the Hon. Mr. Blair would sit in a cabinet with a man notoriously disloyal, a man who was bulldozing other members of the cabinet into his views and methods?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—He is a Scotchman.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I have no objection to Scotchmen. I look upon these attacks as an effort to injure the cabinet—a cabinet which has the confidence of the country, because the country believes they are honest men, anxious to promote the well-being of people of all classes, without distinction of creed. Therefore, I think it behooves every man who looks upon our ministers as men of that class, not to allow false accusations to go abroad, but to put their veto on them, and to denounce the men who are making the accusations. I felt it was my duty to express my views on this occasion. I am aware that senators have probably made up their minds, and what I have said may not amount to much, but it is better that we should let the country know that certain parties who raise these racial feelings are not liked, and are not going to run this country.

Hon. Mr. KERR moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to and the Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, February 9, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (A) 'An Act for the relief of Edwin James Cox.'—(Mr. Lougheed).

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved :

That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned until the 27th instant at eight o'clock in the evening.

He said : It did not occur to me that the Wednesday following the day on which we would meet after this adjournment is Ash Wednesday, and therefore a legal holiday. With the consent of the House I would ask to be permitted to substitute Thursday the first day of March for the date mentioned in my motion and we could meet at three o'clock. The only time we will lose will be Tuesday evening after eight o'clock.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It appears to me that it is premature to pass a resolution on this question before the reply to the speech from the Throne is disposed of, and the government are taking upon themselves rather an arbitrary proceeding in dictating to the House how long the debate shall continue.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Of course there would not be an adjournment until the debate was concluded.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—According to this motion the Senate must adjourn, if the motion is carried, to meet in three weeks time, and that in my opinion is dictating to this House that we shall not proceed with the discussion of the speech from the Throne later than to-day. We have only had some four or five speeches made on the address. I have no intention to speak myself, but the government assume too much when they say that sixty or seventy members of this House must confine their observations to a short space of time to-day.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I ask leave to have the motion stand until the debate on the address is concluded.

The motion was allowed to stand.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before the orders of the day are called, I ask permission to make a personal explanation. On looking at the report of the speech which I made in the House the other day, I find that I used the following language :

It is a rather singular thing that the despatch which the hon. leader of the opposition sent from Nova Scotia to the Premier was published in the Montreal 'Star' some days before the Premier received it. That is not the way in which gentlemen deal with each other either in public or in private life.

Then in reply to another hon. gentleman I said :

Excuse me, I understand that the despatches were sent simultaneously. One reached the Montreal 'Star' and the other did not reach the Premier. The leader of the opposition might have sent the telegram to the Premier first and afterwards informed the Montreal 'Star.'

And then in reply to the hon. gentleman from Marshfield I said :

It was addressed to the Montreal 'Star' by the hon. leader of the opposition. I know whereof I speak.

Now, hon. gentlemen if I had not used these last words I should not trouble the House with this explanation. It appears that I did not know exactly the whole whereof I spoke, although I thought I did, and for that reason I ask to be allowed to explain and correct. The hon. leader of the opposition made a speech in Yarmouth, N.S., in which he used this language :

I am going to tell you a secret, that is except that it is known to the telegraph operator: I to-day took the responsibility, with full knowledge of what that responsibility means, of telegraphing to the Premier of Canada the hope that he would offer to send to South Africa a body of volunteers, and assuring him that such a project would not only have my support, but I believed that of the people of all parts of Canada.

I read from the Montreal Star of the 6th of October. It became known shortly afterwards that this despatch had not reached the Premier of Canada, and some people in Halifax were uncharitable enough to say that such a despatch had not been sent to the Premier. I met a gentleman who gave me to understand that he knew from the best authority—he did not give me the authority, but I gathered from the way he spoke that he had it from some one about the telegraph office—that Sir Charles Tupper had sent a despatch to the Premier at the same time that he sent the despatch to the Star; and he spoke, not in an unfriendly spirit to Sir Charles Tupper, but to show that the feeling which existed amongst certain persons in Halifax, that no despatch had been sent to Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not well founded; and consequently he was speaking rather as a friend of Sir Charles Tupper. I gave the statement as it was made to me by that gentleman. I have every reason to believe that he spoke with authority. Consequently, I spoke in that sense. Now I find that the despatch does not appear in so many words in the Star, but appears in a report of the speech; and I think that it is only right that I should make this explanation. Of course my reflection 'that is not the way in which gentlemen deal with each other either in public or private life,' would not apply if the despatch was sent by the correspondent of the Star, as it would now appear. I think it only right that having found that I had made a mistake I should correct that mistake. It is not a matter of very much consequence. I think that those members of the House who have known me for many years feel that I would not knowingly and wilfully misrepresent the most bitter political opponent I might have; and I make this explanation, partly for the benefit of hon. gentlemen who have not been long in the Senate, and partly in order to put the facts before the public.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I may say that was the view I tried to put before the House when the hon. gentleman was speaking. I was in Nova Scotia at the time.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I have a matter which I wish to bring to the notice of the Senate before proceeding with the order of the day. It is now a well-known fact that the Senate is likely to adjourn for several days, and I may not be able to bring up the matter before the estimates are brought down in the House of Commons. I therefore bring the matter of the administration of justice in the North-west Territories before the notice of the government as represented in the Senate. I do not desire any particular notoriety about this matter, and therefore I have not put any notice upon the order paper; but I desire to call attention to the facts as they exist and bring them to the notice of the government. It is a well-known fact that Eastern Assiniboia is a very important district. It extends about 120 miles east and west along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway and from the international boundary to Saskatchewan. This district is settled almost all over, and in every section of it there are settlements of farmers or ranchers. It is one of the most important agricultural districts represented in parliament. It is a district that has some large rivers in it. There is the Souris River and Moose Mountain Creek in the south. It is also difficult to build bridges across these streams. Then we have Qu'Appelle River, White Sand River, together with many tributaries of these important streams all requiring some considerable expenditure on roads and bridges. The statement I am going to make is one which will startle members, and even the ministers themselves, and that is, that the gentleman who has represented that district in the House of Commons during the past four sessions who has had that distinguished honour, has never obtained from the government, has not seen fit to give him one single dollar for his district—I might go further to say not one dime has be received in aid of a public work in that whole district. The district would be as well off without any representative whatever. I am sure if the government knew the conditions existing there, they would not treat us in that way. Apart from the moneys which he should have obtained for important bridges and roads, it is a large judicial district, and there are only two court-houses in the whole of it,—one at Moosomin and the other at Wolseley. In North Eastern Assiniboia, Yorkton is the terminus of the Manitoba and North-western Railway. I do not hesitate to say that it is one of the most important towns in the North-west Territories. It is one of the finest grazing districts and the largest number of cattle are shipped from that district with the exception of Calgary.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Six thousand head last year.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I am glad that the hon. Minister of Justice realizes the fact that it is a very large cattle-exporting district. The people in that district having become satisfied that the country is going to be a success, are investing their money in solid structures. We have fine stores and hotels constructed of brick, finished with all the modern improvements necessary to carry on the affairs of the town and district, but we have no place to hold court. The surroundings of the court and the manner of administering justice have much to do with the respect that is entertained for the law. We have to hold court as circumstances permit. It is very desirable that there should be a court-house and jail built at that place. We have in Wolseley a court-house with two cells where prisoners are locked up. Before we had it, we did not realize the importance of it, because prisoners were sent to Regina. Except in Wolseley and Moosomin, when a person is drunk and disorderly, the question is what are we to do with him? Such offenders have often to be let go, whereas if there was a jail or place to confine them in, they would be punished. When a crime of a serious character is committed, the offender is taken to Regina. To bring a prisoner from Yorkton round by railway to Regina and back again to Yorkton to be tried, is very expensive; therefore I hope that when the estimates come down, the hon. minister will see that there is a sufficient sum provided to build a good court-house at Yorkton. The town is becoming a very important centre. Then again, take the southern portion of East Assiniboia, where there are half a dozen very important towns. The court is now held at Oxbow. It has to be held in the school-house or a public hall, and the same difficulty occurs in the prosecution of criminals there. An offender has to be taken to Regina and kept there until the court meets, when he is brought back to Oxbow. Therefore, it is equally important that a court-house should be built in the southern section. I do not say where, but in one of the principal towns would be a proper point. Then, we have Whitewood, halfway between Wolseley and Moosomin. It is a very important part of the western country. A large section is tributary to Whitewood. Cases are tried there, but there is no place to hold court but the school-house. A court-house should have been built years ago. Then, we have the two Qu'Appelle's and Indian Head, at one of which places a court-house should be provided. I say that it is, to my mind, a gross injustice to the member representing the district that such a state of things should exist, because he has been a faithful supporter of the government, and I do not think the government have treated him as he deserved. They have not given him a farthing towards any public building or to assist the people in any way whatever. There was a little revote of money that had been voted in the last parliament for the repairing of the court-house in Moosomin, but what was revoted during the first session of the present parliament. That is all the money that has been expended in that district. I hope, before parliament meets again, there will be a sufficient sum in the estimates to provide the conveniences I have described; if not, it will militate against the government very much indeed. I do not desire to make any political capital out of this. If I did, I would have put a notice on the paper, but I thought it my duty to call the attention of the government to it in this way, because I believe they have a desire to do fairly to all districts, when matters are brought properly to their attention.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The question of establishing further court-houses in the North-west Territories has not escaped my attention, nor of many parties in the North-west Territories, for they bring the matter under my notice. With regard to the court-house at Yorkton, I think that the settlement of the country has made such progress as to indicate that point in all probability as the preferable location for a court-house in that section of the country, and I think there is no longer room to doubt that the progress of the settlement of the country round Edmonton warrants improvements in that direction as well as at Yorkton, and so in the direction of Fort Macleod. One of the difficulties with regard to the territory is that it is very extensive and the settlement somewhat sparse, and to avoid mistakes we have to wait such progress and settlement in the country, as to know which of the village communities which have sprung up is likely to prove the centre of a very considerable population, and, as fast as the progress of settlement indicates that, I have no doubt that the requirements of the public will be met. Of course, it is not usual, nor can I now indicate what may be done, in anticipation of what may appear in the estimates, but I am not indifferent, as being connected with the administration of justice, to some extent, in the Territories, to the convenience of the population and the public requirements in that direction.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to call the attention of my hon. friend to returns which were promised early in the session of last year; particularly to the one referring to the sale of school lands in the province of Manitoba and in the North-west Territories. A partial return was brought down, and I asked to have it completed to the latest possible period, which was promised at that time, but it has not yet been brought down.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman remember the exact date when the motion was carried?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The motion was made early in the session and a very voluminous return was brought down, and I called the attention of the hon. member to the fact that there was a great deal of extraneous matter in it, and that if he would complete the return which gave the sales of lands, the amounts collected and the amounts due in interest up to a certain period, it would be all that I required. My hon. friend will understand I am anxious to have that return for the reason that the question may possibly come up again this session. I do not know what the intention of the government is, of course, but I judge from what I have been reading in the Manitoba newspapers and the position taken by the public men in that province during the last election. Then there was another return which was brought down and I called attention to the fact that is was a very unsatisfactory return. The Secretary of State admitted the reasonableness of my objections, and took it back, as I understood, and referred it to the Department of Railways and Canals, in reference to dismissals. My hon. friend will remember that the return covered a number of pages and simply said that the men were dismissed, and my motion was to get the reason for the dismissals. The last time I called the attention of the Secretary of State to this return, he informed me that I should have it before the next election. Whether the government intend to have another session or not, I do not know, but so long as the return is furnished during the present session I should be satisfied. I should like to have it at the earliest possible moment, so that it can be filed with the other documents. My hon. friend from Marshfield calls my attention to the fact that there were three or four departments from which there were no return. I should like to have them complete, and as they were promised, I presume they will be brought down some time or other.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to direct the attention of the hon. leader of the House again to this question of returns called for last year with regard to the supply of oil for the Intercolonial. On July 12 last, I made certain inquiries of the government with regard to this oil question, and my hon. friend gave certain answers. To three of the most important of those inquiries, he gave us an answer that they were too voluminous, and could not be brought down without a motion for a return. Acting on that suggestion, I moved somewhat later, for all these papers, and although I made several applications during the remainder of the session for these papers, and pressed the government all I could to have them brought down, they were not forthcoming. I called my hon. friend's attention to it the other day, and knowing the urgency with which I regarded this matter during the last session, I am rather surprised that we have not the papers by this time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will make inquiries. As I understand, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition wants the return as to the sale of the school lands and the amounts due, and the dismissals on the Intercolonial Railway, and the reasons therefore, and the hon. gentleman from Marshfield desires a return as to the oil supplied to the Intercolonial Railway, with regard to its cost and so on, of which he gave notice.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not exclusively on the Intercolonial Railway, but all the departments. It was the Intercolonial Railway return that was incomplete, but there were no returns from some of the others.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE CONCLUDED.

The order of the day being called—

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the fifth session of the eighth parliament.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Having participated to a limited extent in the consideration and discussion of His Excellency's speech at the opening of the last parliament, it was not my intention to occupy the time and attention of this House with any remarks upon the similar motion now before the House, and I should have adhered to that resolution and perhaps the dictates of prudence would have caused me to do so were it not for the fact that during the course of the debate upon this address I have felt it my duty to refer to a few matters which seemed to me might profitably be presented for the consideration of the House before this debate closes. I should like the privilege of following those hon. senators who have congratulated the mover and the seconder of the motion for an address in reply to His Excellency's gracious speech, and to say that I very sincerely regret—it is one of the regrets of my life—that I was not able to follow the eloquent mover of the address, the language not being so familiar to me as my own vernacular. If there is anything I feel the lack of more than another it is that I have not the good fortune, to be able to speak or to have as good a knowledge of the French language as I would like. However, I have tried, in some measure, to remedy that deficiency by affording as much opportunity as possible for members of my own family, to acquire a knowledge of that language, and I am very proud that they are able not only to understand it but, in some instances, to speak it with some accuracy and fluency. The hon. mover of this address bears an honoured name in his own province. We had heard of him before he came here. He comes to this House adding additional lustre to an honourable namesake in this House, and I might say it gives me the very greatest possible pleasure to meet in this chamber, a friend of earlier days in the other House, the hon. seconder of the address. He, too, bears an honoured name in the great province of New Brunswick, and I trust that he will be spared for many years to give this chamber the benefit of his counsel and advice in all matters of state. The speech of His Excellency bristles with important subjects, any one of which should occupy, to do it anything like justice, the limits accorded to a speech of moderate length. I have been spared the necessity of attempting anything of that kind by the speeches of the mover and seconder of the address, followed by the able speeches of the leader of the opposition and the leader of the Senate, the hon. Minister of Justice, who, in discussing this address, has, as I think every hon. gentleman on both sides of the House will admit, discussed it in an able, fair and very wise manner. I have listened with great interest to other speeches that have followed, and I need hardly say, hon. gentlemen, that personally, I, as a rule, take more interest in a speech of an hon. senator whose sentiments and thoughts upon public questions are not entirely in accord with my own, because, I like to examine them. I like, in the words of scripture, to prove all things and to hold fast that which is good. What prompted me more particularly to say a few words and to ask your indulgence for a short time this afternoon was caused by some remarks of the hon. senator from Monck. I do not see him present. He is an old and warm personal friend of mine. Hon. gentlemen will recollect his speech on this address. What I say is said in all kindness, and it is because he is an honourable man and I highly respect him, that I feel called upon to give as much attention to his remarks, as I shall crave the privilege of doing this afternoon. That hon. senator, on rising, asked the question—I think he repeated it twice or thrice—what has the present government done for this country ? That question is a very serious one. But without giving the opportunity to some one who supposed the government had done something for this country, he assumed the responsibility of answering it himself. And what was his reply ? 'Nothing—absolutely nothing.' That is a pretty serious position for any hon. senator to take, but the seriousness of that answer did not rest with the hon. senator who gave it. I was particular to observe that his answer seemed to meet with the sympathy and approbation of a large number in this House. It occurred to me, therefore, that I might probably spend a few minutes, and I shall perhaps occupy that time in trying to answer that question. I am doing so upon my own responsibility, and of my own motion, because if the answer which he gave to his own question be true, I do not want to stay here another hour. No government has a right to hold power in this country which does nothing for the country. My position is that while it was the hon. gentlemen's privilege and the gates were his to open, they are not his to close, and I do not propose to allow the hon. gentleman to ask the question and answer it himself. I shall, in a feeble way, endeavour to give an answer to that question. I had supposed—and notwithstanding the speech of the hon. senator, I still suppose and believe—that this government has done a great deal for this country, and I shall be surprised if the majority of senators are not of that opinion. I am speaking now not as a supporter of the government, which I am proud to say I am, so far as my duties as an individual member in this Chamber will allow me, but I am speaking as a Canadian who tries to take an intelligent interest in public affairs. May I ask hon. gentlemen to follow me for a few minutes, and I will mention a few of the things that I think will be considered something which has been done for this country. I have merely jotted down the points that I wished to consider, not in any particular order, but as they occurred to me while the hon. gentleman was speaking and giving his negative answer. This government has given this country a great boon in preferential trade. The consequences of that preference will tell on this Dominion as long as the Dominion lasts, and I fear that we have not yet fully estimated the great boon that that will eventually—has already been and will be to this country. Not merely a boon in direct dollars and cents. We have got the attention, the sympathy and the good will, in a larger degree than we ever had before, of the British government and the British people. That is one of my answers to my hon. friend. I have heard it charged this session, and I heard it last session, that the government had not redeemed their pledges in the matter of protection. I wish to state here—and I do not do it solely on my own responsibility, but upon inquiry from bankers, from monetary institutions, from wholesale importers and from manufacturers—that on every hand they tell me that the tariff works better, and with fewer inequalities and more steadily than it did before it was readjusted by the present government.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—And nearly as protective.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I am not myself a high protectionist. I will admit, for the sake of argument, that protection may be a good thing, to a limited extent, but I rather subscribe to the doctrine that the fewer artificial barriers that are placed in the way of trade the better for the people of any country. But the present government found a protective tariff, and if they have not repealed it, it shows their prudence, their caution, and their wisdom in not wishing to destroy vested rights and vested interests. Why blame them for it ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is for their broken promises we blame them.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I never knew that the present government promised to ruin anybody. They have not done it at any rate. I am looking at the consequences of what they have done. I do not pretend to know all their promises. So far as my memory serves me, they have substantially redeemed the pledges which they gave to the people of this country at the polls, and on which the people endorsed them and sent them into power. Now, there is first the preferential tariff; second there is the readjustment of the tariff relieving the burden where the gall of high protection made the shoulder sore, and mitigated any severities which might have existed. All honour to them for that. Another point to which I shall invite the attention of the House is the great reduction which was made in the letter postage between this country and the mother country and in our own Dominion. That has been attended with the very best results, and the government, particularly the Postmaster General, are entitled to the thanks of the people, and are receiving the thanks of the British public for that wise and judicious step. Is not that something? In regard to all these things I am told sometimes that that is nothing—that they could be easily done. Yes, they could be easily done, but they never were done until the present administration did them. A great many thought it was a very easy thing to discover America, and it was simple, because Columbus discovered it first. There are a great many of that kind of people in this honourable Senate. Following the preferential tariff, and almost next in order, this government sent their talented Prime Minister as the head of a delegation from this great colony to Her Majesty's jubilee, and I think it is universally conceded that he acquitted himself well upon that occasion, and that every Canadian was proud of the noble and dignified and able manner in which he upheld the dignity and name of this Dominion. I do not think it is disparaging any one in public life to-day to say that no other man in this Dominion could have attracted the British public and done so much for this colony in Great Britain as was done by that delegation, led by the hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I have mentioned four things this government have done. My belief is that by these three things alone the preferential tariff, the reduction in letter postage, and the sending of our Premier on that occasion to the jubilee, considering the results that followed, have done more to bring this Dominion before the British public than all that was done by all the governments in the last twenty-five years. I do not wish to make an extravagant statement, but I believe that that is a fact. If it is not a fact, I do not wish it to be recorded as a statement of fact.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Have it withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. KERR—No, I shall not withdraw it. I have mentioned four things. Then I think the government are entitled to the thanks of the people of this country for substantially settling the Manitoba school question which was distracting the minds of the people of this country and was an irritating subject calculated to work irreparable mischief as it was being dealt with before it was taken up by the present government.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It is not a settlement; it is a surrender.

Hon. Mr. KERR—The hon. gentleman will remember I used the expression 'substantial settlement.' I do not suppose there ever was a question yet—I do not suppose there ever will be in your day or in mine any question on which there are opposing opinions settled to the perfect satisfaction of both sides. There cannot be. It is not in the nature of things. Both sides must concede a little for the public good, and that is what has been done in the settlement of this Manitoba school question. That is the fifth answer to my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—There is no settlement at all.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I know the hon. gentleman says so. Another question to which I shall invite attention, and for which I claim credit for the present government, is that they have, during their tenure of office, brought about a better state of feeling between all the provinces of this Dominion. Will hon. gentlemen think that over? I claim that for them—that they have, by the course which they have pursued, been instrumental in bringing about a better state of things between the different provinces of this Dominion, and if they have, they are entitled to great credit for it, and I believe a large majority of the people of this Dominion think as I do on this question. I know this at any rate, that if I had thought that that was not one of their aims, they would not have had my support, for if I have any mission in this world, it is to teach the doctrine that man is man's brother. I was early taught a creed which has been a blessing to me through life; in the first place to love God, and I say it with the profoundest veneration and respect, to honour my Queen and to love my neighbour, and that is the course that I want the present government to pursue and the course which I think they have substantially pursued. But the wave of good will which they have largely been instrumental in setting in motion has not embraced the several provinces only—I claim that by the course they have pursued, the present government have given substantial aid to the British government and the British people in bringing about a more friendly sentiment between Canada and Great Britain and the United States. The government is taunted with not getting reciprocity with the United States, and that much abused word is spoken of as though it were a disgrace to use it. Why hon. gentlemen I am a thorough believer in reciprocity.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And prohibition too.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Yes, at the proper time. I am a thorough believer in reciprocity and this country never was so prosperous, except to-day, as when we had reciprocity, but I would not have reciprocity at the expense of any compromise of principle or interest which we hold, and we all know that the reason why that question was not settled was that other and more important questions which the commission or delegates properly considered the first question to be settled—that is the Alaskan boundary, and that that was a question which must be first settled as a condition precedent to taking up the other questions, and on that I think the Canadian people endorse their action. Not only has the circle of that wave widened and taken in the whole of our provinces and the United States, but it has also widened and taken in the British Empire itself, so that in that regard the government is entitled to the gratitude of this House, and these are some of my answers to the questions propounded and answered by my hon. friend, who does not happen to be present. There is another point on which I claim credit for the present administration. They have given us what we have not always had—I emphasize it—in my opinion four years of wise, honest, and salutary administration of public affairs.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Honest!

Hon. Mr. KERR—Yes, honest; I repeat it, honest administration of our affairs. Now that is a very important matter. Hon. gentlemen may think that these are only the views of a tryo in this House, I admit the charge, but I will yield to no man in this House, or out of it, in my devotion to the best interests of this Dominion and my attention to public affairs. Whether a Conservative or Liberal administration is in power, that is what we want, a practical, honest and wise administration, and I claim that for the last four years we have had that. These are only a few of many answers that I might give to my hon. friend's question. I ask him in all fairness, in fairness to his own intelligence, in fairness to the government, in fairness to the country, to consider these things, and pronounce an unbiassed judgment upon them. I want to call the attention of this Senate, with emphasis if I can, to the fact that at no period in the history of Canada was there a greater degree of happiness and prosperity than at the present moment. But you say the present government is not entitled to a particle of credit for that. I do not know whether they are or not. If they have acted honestly and done their business well, that is all anybody can do; but if you will not give them credit for the good times, I will ask you, if the times should become bad, not to charge it to them. I never took any stock in that silly way of talking, giving the Conservatives or Liberal administration credit for making good times or making bad times; but I will go this far that any government, whether Liberal or Conservative, can by wise legislation and wise administration do a great deal to help good times or to hinder them, and that is what I claim for the present government. What is the state of our country to-day? Ask any man who is in business,—do not confine yourself to a man of one particular stripe of politics. I have asked men on both sides, being a professional man and not understanding the laws and operation of trade, and I have yet during the last three years to find one man who seems to be dissatisfied with the present state of things. Prosperity prevails everywhere except in the imagination of some of my hon. friends here. This country has, so to speak, reached clearly the high-water mark of prosperity, and I trust we are all sufficiently grateful for it, because my theory is that while puny men can do a little, it is only an overruling and a wise Providence that can send us, in all its fulness, the great blessings of a bountiful harvest, and of the financial results that flow from it. Why, hon. gentlemen, what is the state of things at present? At this moment, while we are assembled in this chamber, there swells from the broad bosom of this Dominion an epic more sublime than Odyssey of Homer and sweeter than the Æneid of Virgil, set to the sweet music of happiness and peace, it is sung by the busy hum of the Atlantic cities, it is chanted by the loud whistle of the proud iron horse and the gay boat song of the St. Lawrence, it is caught up in volume and in glory by that province which is growing up to the west of Ontario, and which is ultimately destined to be, in my view, the central province of this Dominion, and it is re-echoed over beyond the Rocky Mountains by the colony that is growing up upon the shores of the broad Pacific. That is what I think of Canada to-day. The words come to me just at the moment, can I not truthfully say with the poet that:

Every prospect pleases and only man is vile.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Liberal man or Conservative man?

Hon. Mr. KERR—Both. And everybody seems to be contented except the hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not like to call any hon. gentleman in opposition. I would like to have you all on one side. I am of a kindly, sensitive and sympathetic nature, and the object of my speech will be obtained if I can get you all to think as I do, but I am confronted by that other thing that 'a man convinced against his will is of the same opinion still.' I have no doubt that will be verified in what will result after I have resumed my seat. My friends of the opposition, I am sorry for you if you will not be happy. Everybody else is happy.

Hon. Mr. KERR.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The next election will change your feelings.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Some of my friends in the opposition remind me of Rachael weeping for her children and refusing to be comforted. Although you have in a sense lost your children for a time, you have lost office, and you have lost offices, I almost feel good natured enough, not quite, to come to your rescue, but I could not give you back office, or offices, if I would. I do not know, but I rather think not if I could, at present.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or any other time.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Your case is one that I have at heart, and I am sure I wish you all well. There is one thing about it, you will have to make up your minds to I am afraid: you will have to act upon that text of scripture which has been of comfort to many a wayfaring man and weary soul on his journey forward—learn in whatever state you are therewith to be content. I would commend that as a good sentiment—a sentiment that I know has been practised by the Liberal party for eighteen years. I commend that sweet poem to you 'The Psalm of Life.' It is beautiful reading too, and that sentiment seems to fit exactly your case. You would get a great deal of comfort from it. I know for the last eighteen years it was a great comfort to me to learn to labour and to wait. I should expect that if the present government continued to, as the farmer said about his sons, behave as well in future as they have in the past, that they will have a pretty long lease of power. I think we had better all make up our minds to that. I should be glad if I could hold out a ray of hope, but I am sorry to say that I cannot hold out one ray, so that after all it just comes back to this, you will have therewith to be content. Your time will come. All things come to those who wait, if they wait long enough. I now come to the overshadowing part of the speech from the Throne. I will be brief upon that point, because the leaders in this House, and others have made very able speeches upon it, and I could not hope to add anything that would interest or be of profit to you, except one thing, the great credit that I am going to give now, the overshadowing credit to this government that they have been instrumental in sending two noble contingents to the aid of the mother country when she is in a mighty struggle with her enemy in South Africa. And they are giving their sympathy and active aid and support to the raising and sending of a third contingent, and I would just like to say in regard to that third contingent, raised and equipped and the expense borne by a private individual is greater than I can really estimate. I do not know—some hon. gentleman may know, but I know nothing in ancient or modern history that will compare with the action of Lord Strathcona in that matter.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Was he appointed by the Conservatives or by the Liberals as High Commissioner ?

Hon. Mr. KERR—I come now to the crucial point of the case. I am told, suppose the government had done fairly well up to the present, their conduct in regard to the sending of the Canadian contingents is censurable. By their laches and delays and want of alacrity they have not shown themselves the right men in the right place.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—That is where the Liberals have learned to labour and to wait.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I was struck with the boldness of the utterance of my very esteemed friend the senator from Victoria, an hon. gentleman whom I highly esteem, an hon. senator with whom I have had the privilege of being acquainted for a great number of years. There is one thing about the opposition in this House, they certainly are pretty bold in their statements, and my hon. friend from Victoria was no exception to that. He made this broad, sweeping statement, that he did not believe the Premier or Mr. Tarte would have sent these contingents unless they were forced by public opinion.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Do you think they would?

Hon. Mr. KERR—My answer to that is this : they had no right to send a contingent until public opinion was sufficiently developed to take the place of the authority of parliament.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We are agreed on that point.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Then, I will not argue any more, if we are agreed. I do not know —perhaps it would not be proper—the leader of the opposition will tell me whether it is proper, and if I follow his example, I would not be censurable, but there is no part of the administration that I would be more happy to defend before the electorate of this country than their course in this matter. I am not as old a parliamentarian as some hon. gentlemen, but I claim that I am a deligent student of constitutional and monarchical institutions, the best in my opinion, that the human mind has been able to evolve from the wisdom of ages, and I read that no government is authorized to take such an important step. the expenditure of so large an amount of money, without the authority of parliament, or the authority of the people clearly and unmistakably put forth, and I contend that. as soon as that was given, they acted, and if they had acted one minute before they were satisfied on the point, they would have acted prematurely. I am satisfied that if Sir John Macdonald, of whom I was a lifelong admirer, though differing from him in his political views, had been the leader of the government at that time, that he would not have acted earlier than the present government did. I believe, if my hon. friend, who has led the government of this country, and who, for ought I know, may lead it again, had been at the head of that government, knowing his prudence, knowing his caution, he would have taken care not to have acted hastily ; he would have acted on the advice given by that great English commoner who said that any statesman, any man having the responsibilities of office upon his shoulders, must think wisely and well, must think not only for the present, but for the years that are to come. I contend that that is the course the present government has taken. I wish to repeat, that if the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, who perhaps, taken all in all, was the greatest Canadian of his day, were at the head of the government, he would not have acted otherwise. I venture to say that if the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House were in power at the time, they would not have acted otherwise than the present government did in the way of moving cautiously and slowly, and in accordance with the opinions of the British government, which they are bound to consult. It appears that the opposition in this House and a few people in the country seem to take a different view, but I am glad to know that in my part of the country the great bulk of the people, not only Liberals, but Conservatives, think that the government acted as soon as public opinion was sufficiently developed to entitle them to act, and they need have no fear of that nightmare of which my hon. friend spoke so eloquently yesterday. I am a member of the Liberal party. That nightmare has not visited me yet. A great deal is endeavoured to be made out of these despatches. I never in a court of law, or this higher court of parliament, shall waste my time and energies, so to speak, in tweedle-de-dum or tweedle-de-dee. I shall take the situation substantially and deal with it. Perhaps the order of these despatches is very important, perhaps it is vital to the proper decision of the question. I do not know whether it is or not. I have had them on my desk, but I have not felt that that was a crucial point. The crucial point is, did the government honestly wait for the development of public opinion? We have no reason to think that they did not. They have acted and shown that in regard to the militia of this great Dominion, they were in a state of preparedness that astonished the people of Great Britain? In many respects they were ahead of Great Britain itself. But I want to bring this matter to the attention of the Senate. The British people, having the weighty responsibility of this war on their hands, are thoroughly satisfied, not only with the loyalty of Canada, about which there can be no question, and their responding with alacrity to the call, but they are satisfied with the conduct of the government in this whole matter, and have said so through their Colonial Secretary. However much I might desire to have some hon. gentlemen in this Chamber satisfied, they will not think me unkind or uncharitable or invidious, if I say that I would prefer to have the British government and the British people satisfied with what the administration of this Dominion have done in this matter, than to have the endorsation and approval of some of my hon. friends. I think it is more important and the best endorsement they can have. The British Empire is at war with the Boer republics in South Africa. We had this matter before us last session, I think in the early part of August or the latter part of July, but I do not suppose any hon. senator thought then of anything but a happy and peaceful solution of the trouble. They declared their sympathy with the British government, but still hoped for a peaceful solution. If there is one person upon the face of the globe whom I would have liked to have seen spared this war, it is Her Majesty Queen Victoria, in the sixty-third year of her reign, a reign the like of which has never blessed the world and a reign the equal of which we can scarcely ever hope for again. This parliament was prorogued on August 12, and in about two months and a half from that date the government had a contingent ploughing the waters of the Atlantic going to the assistance of the British flag. I should have liked—and I am sure the omission was not intentional—to have heard the hon. leader of the opposition—because no one could have done it with better grace and more propriety than he in his admirable speech, give the Minister of Militia (Dr. Borden) even a faint expression of praise, commendation and admiration for what he has done. In my opinion, he deserves all the praise that can be given. He has shown that he can rise superior to party politics, because I am advised—and I believe the information is correct—that of the officers selected, there was only one qualification that guided him, and that was fitness for the position, quite regardless of what their political views were. I say in that matter that the Minister of Militia has raised a monument to himself which will last long after this war is over. I am not blaming the leader of the opposition for not having referred to the matter, but it would have been a graceful thing if he had done so. Great Britain is at war. Whether any hon. gentleman had doubts as to the merits of that war in August last, I do not know, but subsequent developments have removed entirely such doubts, if any existed. My own impression, after reading carefully the history of the course of events, is that no terms would have satisfied the Transvaal Republic except the entire withdrawal of British authority from that part of the country. As was eloquently said in the House of Commons the other night, there is something worse than war, and it would have been a greater calamity to Great Britain than this terrible war, if they had taken one step backward. I am slow to believe that there is anything that will justify war, but I consider this war to be a justifiable and a righteous war, and a war that will result in a blessing to mankind, improving the unfortunate Boers themselves. When that shot was fired, so to speak, at the British flag, what did it mean? It meant not only a shot at the British flag to menace it, but it meant a shot at Canada. It meant a shot at every colony of Britain. It meant a shot against liberty and equality among mankind. It is too late in the Christian era for slaves or even serfs to exist in any part of the British empire. I believe that even that dark continent will yet be made the home of teeming happy millions, as the result of this war. I deplore the state of affairs. I have, however, never had the slightest doubt as to the result of this war. It has been said by the great Napoleon that Providence is on the side of the heaviest battalion. Probably that will be so in this case, but I believe also that Providence is on the side of right, and on the side of justice and freedom, though we near-sighted mortals may not see it, and I believe that out of this great calamity will come peace, happiness and prosperity to that dark continent, and that it will yet be made to bloom and blossom as the rose, where every man, no matter what his creed or colour may be, will be able to worship his Maker under his own vine and fig-tree, and have his equal liberties, none daring to make him afraid. Although even at this hour the state of matters looks gloomy, I do not feel depressed in the slightest degree. I deplore, as any right-thinking Canadian must deplore, the fact that so many of our noble sons have gone on to that field, some of them never to return, but their blood will cement the fabric of the British Empire, so that it will stand against the assaults of all the ages. This war touches us very nearly. We find the son, and an only son, of the hon. gentleman who presides over this House with so much dignity and ability, is in distant Africa defending the mother country. We find perhaps others in this House who have sons there, and we know some members of the government have sons in South Africa. My prayer is that a kind angel may spread its wings over them, and, if it be the will of Providence, bring them back in safety to their parents. They have done as the Spartan mother said to her son when he was starting to war, 'Bear this shield back or be borne back upon it.' That seems to be the spirit in which our young men have gone to war. Their faith has been equal in some instances to that of Abraham, who was prepared to sacrifice his only son, so great was his faith. I think I see in the near future an early and a glorious termination of that war, and that Great Britain will conquer, and that the blessings of British institutions will be early planted in that country. I think that the poor Boer rifleman feels it already—that the beginning of the end is coming. His song is :

But now from snow-swept Canada, from India's torrid plains,
From lone Australian outposts hither led,
Obeying their commando, as they heard the bugle's strains,
The men in brown have joined the men in red.

They come to find the colours at Majuba left and lost,
They come to pay us back the debt they owed;
And I hear new voices lifted, and I see strange colours tossed,
'Mid the rooi-baatje (red coats) singing on the road.

The poor, unfortunate Boer meets the victorious march of the British and Canadian heroes, and he says :

The old, old faiths must falter, the old, old creeds must fail—
I hear it in that distant murmur low—
The old, old order changes and 'tis vain for us to rail.
The great world does not want us—we must go.

And veldt, and spruit, and kopje to the stranger will belong,
No more to trek before him we shall load.
Too well, too well I know it, for I hear it in the song
Of the rooi-baatje singing on the road.

I was to-day very seriously impressed by the question : Will other nations interfere in this great struggle before it closes? I pray not. I hope not, but should that come, and may a wise Providence avert it, I should like those who may be in the slightest degree instrumental in producing that terrible state of things of other nations interfering—I should like to remind them of Great Britain's sea-power :

In the world there be many nations, and there gathers round every throne
The strength of earth-born armies, but the Sea is England's own.

As she ruled, she still shall rule, from Plymouth to Esquimalt;
As long as the winds are tameless—as long as the waves are salt.
This may be our Armageddon—seas may purple with blood and flame,
As we go to our rest forever, leaving the world a name.
What matter? there have been none like us, nor any to tame our pride.
If we fall, we shall fall as they fell, die as our fathers died.
What better? The seas that bred us shall rock us to rest at last,
If we sink with the Jack still floating, nailed to the nation's mast.

Hon. gentlemen, thanking you for your kind attention, and with these few observations, I have very great pleasure in supporting the address in reply to the gracious speech with which His Excellency was pleased to open the fifth session of the eighth parliament of the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the debate closes I should like to make some observations on a subject which has been very prominent in this debate, and to correct misstatements that have been made by honourable gentlemen who have spoken on that subject, misstatements which, I am quite sure, have been made inadvertently without proper inquiry into the facts, and they have formed a basis for a very unfair and unjustifiable charge against the administration. It is alleged that the administration has not responded to the public sentiment of Canada with the alacrity which the loyalty of the people of Canada fairly demanded. My hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Miller) spoke very strongly in denunciation of the administration. In the early part of his speech I listened with very great pleasure, as I am sure every hon. gentleman did, to his eloquent dissertation on the great advantage of Imperial unity. Instead of giving any credit to the administration for having favoured that sentiment, the hon. gentleman, on the contrary, found fault with the course they had taken and with, I may say, every act of the present administration. Now, I claim that this government is largely entitled to credit for the sentiment of Imperial unity. Imperial federation was started about fifteen years ago in Canada and in England by a few enthusiastic men on both sides of the Atlantic. Mr. McNeill, in the other House, was one of the prominent figures in Canada, with the late D'Alton McCarthy and others, and they usually had a banquet once a year in which they exchanged compliments with their friends on the other side of the Atlantic, but nothing whatever came of it. It died of inanition about three or four years ago, before the change of government took place. The stimulus which created new life in the Imperial unity sentiment occurred in the month of June, 1897, when the Premier of this country appeared in the Queen's procession on the occasion of her jubilee. The presence there of the French Canadian Premier gratified the pride of the British people. They regarded it with intense gratification that a French Canadian should be the Premier of so important an appendage of the British Crown as the Dominion of Canada. Another advance was made in Imperial unity when the present government passed the law giving a preference of 25 per cent to all importations of British goods. I am quite aware that it is the policy of the opposition to belittle that offer, but the British public do not so regard it. They consider it as the only substantial evidence that has ever been given by any part of the empire in the direction of Imperial unity. That preference stands, and is there to stay. If a change of government took place to-morrow, it would not be removed. The only changes that ever will be made in it will be to increase it from time to time until free trade within the empire is reached. That may be a distant day. It is not for me to foreshadow or name the time. It depends entirely on circumstances that I need not now discuss, but no one who is conversant with the British public sentiment, can question the fact that a very great stimulus has been given to the cause of Imperial unity. Then, I maintain that Canada's attitude in sending 2,000 men to assist the empire in South Africa has further aided in the development of the feeling in favour of Imperial unity, and so far from Canada having been backward in raising and sending out a contingent, I say that the Dominion took an advance step, far beyond any other part of the empire. Canada is the only part of the British Empire that has taken the responsibility, through its government, of sending a force there without the authority of parliament. Even in Great Britain, although the British government are to-day very strong, commanding a very large majority of the House of Commons, and although there was a strong British sentiment when it was felt that the war was really going to be a very serious one, yet Lord Salisbury did not undertake to increase the British forces or take money from the public treasury to largely increase the Imperial army without the authority of parliament, and so parliament was called on October 17, to obtain the sanction of the representatives of the people for the prosecution of the war. Before that date, as hon. gentlemen who have read the newspapers and followed the course of events will remember, it was not believed that the war would last many months. It was supposed that President Kruger would have given way to the reasonable request for an enlargement of the franchise.

It was generally thought by those persons who closely followed the correspondence during the months of July, August and September, that some settlement would have been reached, and hon. gentlemen are aware that there was a division of opinion in an important element of the British people who differed from the policy adopted in forcing the President of the Transvaal to agree to the demands made at that time. That element embraced public men who on other questions held widely different views; several of them were Privy Councillors, among those who criticised and dissented from the action taken by Lord Salisbury's government were Right Hon. Mr. Bryce, Mr. Leonard Courtney, a Liberal-Unionist; Sir Edward Clarke, a leading Conservative; Sir William Harcourt, and while I do not agree with the sentiments expressed by those gentlemen, believing as I do that it was only a matter of time when the crisis had to come, and the sooner the better, yet when such distinguished members of the British House of Commons opposed the war should not those of us who boast of our Anglo-Saxon or Celtic origin be more tolerant and considerate in our judgment of the opinions of Mr. Bourassa and others who think that the authority of parliament should have been obtained before raising troops for service abroad?

Reference has been made to the papers to which I have called the attention of this House. They will show that the British government never dreamed, even ten days before the war began, that it was likely to culminate in the manner it did, nor did they in any way appreciate the magnitude and strength of the Boer position. When Sir Alfred Milner, a month or two before, asked for additional troops, the British government sent 2,000 men, and when a further appeal for more troops was made in September, they ordered 5,000 men to be sent from India, showing an absolute want of appreciation of the condition of things in South Africa, and when the circulars of October 3 and 5 were sent to the colonies, what did they suggest—only that each colony should be fairly represented, 'but if the force is to be fully utilized it must be limited to units which were to form part of Imperial forces. The apportionment was as follows:

From Queensland	250
From New Zealand	200
From New South Wales	250
From Victoria	250
From South Australia	125

Those units were to be absorbed into British regiments on arrival at the Cape. The British government said in their despatches that 'infantry will be accepted,' ignoring the greater suitability of cavalry and artillery. The proposal to receive a certain proportion of volunteers from the different colonies was limited to a comparatively small force. Canada's limit was 500 men, the largest of any of the colonies. What was our reply to the suggestion for four units of 125 men each? We said: No, we decline to send units; we will send a regiment. We will double the number. Instead of 500 men we offered 1,000, and as we wanted to preserve the identity of Canada in the force sent over we insisted on furnishing a Canadian regiment. Finally the British government agreed, and we sent a regiment—not as originally intended, but with the usual staff officers. At first it was stipulated that only a major was to be sent. We insisted on having a commanding officer, having surgeons, nurses and chaplains, and equipping our contingent as a regiment of the line. In none of the other colonies was that done. In view of those facts, how little justification there is in the charges made for political purposes by the Tory press that the government acted in a half-hearted way in responding to the circular despatch of October 4. In no other part of the empire was equal earnestness shown in promptly sending forward substantial aid to the British forces in South Africa, and our action has been warmly appreciated by Her Majesty and the Imperial cabinet.

The other colonies sent their volunteers on the terms of the circular despatch which has been in the hands of hon. gentlemen. They sent units to be absorbed into the British regiments at the Cape. They were in a very different position from Canada. Not only was it necessary to call the British parliament together in order to secure the authority to send additional troops to Africa and to draw on the public treasury, but in all the Australasian colonies they did not dare to move until they got the opinion of the people through their representatives. Canada was the only part of the empire that acted through its government without parliamentary sanction. My hon. friend opposite, the leader of the opposition, read from the despatches and took the first offer on the list, the offer from Queensland. It reads : ' Should hostilities against the Transvaal break out, Queensland offers 250 mounted infantry with machine guns.' The reply of the War Office was : 'Referring to your telegram, Her Majesty highly appreciates your offer, but hopes the occasion will not arise.' If hon. gentlemen will trace the history of Queensland's offer they will find that public opinion at once arose in Queensland and condemned the administration for having made that offer without the authority of parliament, and we find nothing more was done in Queensland for some time. The offer was made in July by the government. The next step was an inquiry made by Queensland on October 10. All that period went by, and not a step was taken towards raising a volunteer force or equipping it or making any preparation. On October 10 they sent an inquiry to know whether machine guns would be accepted. (See No. 27 in correspondence relating to contingents.) The answer on October 12 was that they would be accepted, on condition that the personnel of each unit did not exceed the number fixed. (See No. 33 of correspondence.) The Queensland parliament met on October 14. They sent a communication to the British government, No. 42 in this return, as follows :

Referring to your telegram of October 12 and our telegram of same date, motion for parliamentary sanction has been anticipated by proposed vote of censure, which will probably be disposed of on Tuesday.

That was the position in Queensland, which the hon. gentleman commends as having made a generous offer, and which it was said was prepared to send a contingent at once to the front. What do we find ? A vote came up. I do not know how long the debate lasted, but it ended on October 19, and the motion was only carried by a majority of 9. The vote stood : yeas, 38 ; nays, 29. (See No. 56 in correspondence.) That is what Queensland did. That government was obliged to get the approval of parliament before they undertook any expenditure of that kind, even for the small force they proposed to send. That contingent only sailed on November 2, when our contingent was well under way. Then, take the case of New South Wales. The offers were made on July 21, not by the government of New South Wales, but just in the same way that the offers of Canada were made, by individuals ; but it so happened that in New South Wales the offers were made through the government, and so they appear in the blue-book. It is well known that offers were made from Canada in August and September—probably early in July. These offers were answered with a polite acknowledgment, stating that they were not required, but if they should be required, they would be notified. The Colonial Office had a very vivid recollection of a former occasion when volunteers were invited from the colonies, at the time of the Soudan trouble, and they did not propose to be placed in the position that they were then by practically getting a snub from the government of Canada, and so they were exceedingly cautious in answering those offers from Canada. For the information of honourable gentlemen who are criticising the conduct of the present government, I will quote Canada's offer :

Governor General the Most Hon. the Marquis of Lansdowne, G.C.M.G., to the Right Hon. the Earl of Derby, K.G.

(Received .)

Telegraphic.

February 12, 1885.—Government ready to sanction recruiting by Canada for service in Egypt or elsewhere. Force should be specially enrolled from different parts of local battalions under Imperial Army Discipline Act. Laurie preferable to Williams. I would suggest brigade of three battalions (five hundred), each from marine provinces, Old Canada and North-west. Laurie might command brigade and Williams one battalion. Melgund would like to serve as brigade-major; entire cost would fall on Imperial Exchequer.

And what was the courteous reply of the War Office:

The offer of the government of New South Wales, which has been accepted by Her Majesty's government, was to provide an organized force fully equipped and ready for immediate service, and the government of the Dominion will, no doubt, fully appreciate the difference between the two offers as regards the use which could be made of them by Her Majesty's government, and will not, Lord Hartington feels sure, consider that in declining their patriotic offer for the present, any undue preference has been given to the colony of New South Wales.

The contrast between our action in October and the action of the very loyal Tory government on a former, but similar occasion, is too marked to need comment.

One of the offers for service in South Africa was from Col. Hughes; it was sent to the War Office through His Excellency the Governor General; no offers went through the government. A number of offers went from the different provinces from individuals, and they all got the same answer that their services were not required, because up to the month of October the British government did not propose to accept any of the offers, not considering such aid was at all necessary. In the first place, they underestimated the strength of the Boer position, and, in the second place, there was a further strong opinion that there would be no war. Taking New South Wales, as I have said, offers from individuals were made in July. They were simply placed on record. It may be remembered that there was at Aldershot a small detachment, some 25 men, Lancers belonging to New South Wales. On October 7, they offered their services to the British government as volunteers to join one of the British cavalry regiments to go to South Africa. The premier of New South Wales was communicated with, and what was his answer? He would be very glad, but he could not give his consent for the volunteers then in England without getting the approval of parliament. I refer hon. gentlemen to despatch No. 24, dated October 7. Then, on October 11, before they got the authority, they said they thought they could offer a battery if they got consent, but the British government refused it. See Nos. 29 and 50 of the correspondence. The government so little appreciated the magnitude of the war, even at that late day they said they wanted infantry only. Of course, a few days after that they discovered that cavalry or mounted infantry was of the most value to the army, one to be on the same place as the Boers in order that they might move about as rapidly as the Boers did. In New South Wales, before they could do anything, they had to get a vote of parliament, and the vote was carried by 78 to 10.

I am quite sure, if this question had come before the Canadian parliament, it would have been a unanimous vote—there would not have been a single man in either House who would have hesitated for a moment to support it, and that is the record of Canada as compared with the Australasian colonies, which have been quoted as showing a much more loyal spirit than Canada manifested, and whose governments have been lauded to the skies for their action as in marked contrast to the course taken by the government of Canada. In Queensland, before it was carried even by 38 to 29, they had a three days' debate over it, so you can scarcely say that the feeling in that colony, at all events, was anything like the feeling that prevailed in Canada. The New South Wales contingent were to leave on October 30—I do not know whether they got away on that date. In New Zealand the House was in session on September 28, and they sent a proposal to forward a unit. On October 3 they got the same circular which Canada got, and accepted it. There was, I believe, some debate in the House—I do not know whether there was a division—and the contingent sailed nine days before the Canadian contingent got off. The Canadian contingent was the second to go, New Zealand's being the first. Hon. gentlemen will find in No. 60 the date of the sailing. Now, coming to Western Australia, parliament was in session there in October, and on October 5 they passed a resolution expressive of loyalty and devotion, and sent the resolution to the Imperial government. A reply was received on October 6, saying they would accept a unit. However, there was another body which was to be consulted—the other Chamber, and that Chamber, I do not know for what cause, did not pass the resolution until October 17, although it had passed the Lower House on October 15. It passed, however, finally on the 17th, and their contingent embarked on November 5, just six days after the Canadian contingent. Tasmania offered on October 9 ; the offer was accepted on the 10th, and the contingent sailed on November 5. Victoria's offers were from volunteers in the first instance, just as Col. Hughes and other Canadian officers volunteered. The answer was in the usual formal way, that, if required, their services would be availed of. On July 9, public meetings were held in Victoria, and resolutions were adopted, much in the same spirit as the resolutions which were offered in other colonies, expressing loyalty to the empire, but without making any specific offer. On October 11, a resolution was carried in both Houses to agree to the terms suggested in the circular despatch and send a contingent, and a contingent sailed on November 5. The Victoria, Tasmania, New South Wales and West Australia contingents all sailed on November 5. In South Australia the proposal was only approved in the House on October 13, the same day that Canada sent its announcement that we would forward a contingent. The vote in the legislative assembly stood 18 to 9 ; in the legislative council it was a tie, and was only carried in South Australia by the casting vote of the president. That contingent sailed on November 5. I think hon. gentlemen who have made the statement that Canada has disgraced itself, or that the government of this country has not creditably performed its duty, ought to withdraw the charge, because the Australasian governments were taken as the standard of loyalty and patriotism in their offers to aid the empire. Now, what are the facts in reference to this despatch? Some hon. gentlemen more than hinted that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when he gave that interview to the Globe, was aware of the despatch to which I have referred. I have the original despatch here myself, which any hon. gentleman can see. It is addressed to the Administrator. His Excellency the Governor General had left for New York on the 30th, having accepted an invitation from Sir Thomas Lipton to attend the races there, and he had one or two other invitations, I believe, from the governor of the state of New York. He left here on the 30th. He did not return until Sunday, the 8th of the following month, so he could not be seen until Monday, November 9. In the meantime, under the regulations, Lord Seymour would be the Administrator. Perhaps hon. gentlemen are aware that very often, when the Governor is to be absent for only a few days, the Administrator does not come to Ottawa to be sworn in, but remains in Halifax. In this case he came to Quebec, and Mr. McGee was sent down to swear him, after which the Administrator returned to Halifax ; so that practically all that week there was an interregnum. Hon. gentlemen may also remember that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had been invited to attend a great banquet at Chicago to meet President McKinley. There was to be some celebration there, the opening of some public building, and he had accepted an invitation to be there on the Sunday and the Monday—that would be the 8th, 9th and 10th—in Chicago, where he delivered a very eloquent speech, as he always does. That despatch was not seen by any minister, at all events, before the 5th. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice was in British Columbia. The Minister of Militia was also absent, I think in the lower provinces. Sir Richard Cartwright was not here. It is usual, being senior privy councillor, that the duties, under such circumstances, devolve on me. I did not see the despatch before the 5th. It is marked from the Governor General's Office, addressed to the Administrator, telegram, October 4, and was marked 'Sent to the Minister of Militia.' I do not know when it was sent to the Minister of Militia.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Imperial despatch says it is dated 3rd.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I find it is dated 5.30 p. m.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, on the 3rd of the month.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suppose it went to the Administrator ; it was directed to him—at all events, there was some considerable delay. It was perhaps a little unfortunate that the members of the government and His Excellency should have been absent at that particular time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This would imply that it was received and sent to the Minister of Militia.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Minister of Militia was not in town and the Major-General was away also.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a copy, and I should judge that this copy was made on the fourth, the original having been received on the third, I do not think it makes much difference. If the explanation of the hon. gentleman be correct, and I have no right to dispute it, it would relieve the Premier of the responsibility which I had attached to him.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no doubt, the Premier had no knowledge of the despatch at the interview referred to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The only thing is the ministers were all out of town at a very important time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We had no reason to suppose it was an important time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Ministers ought to be here on matters important to this country, but nobody would suppose they were responsible for Imperial matters.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Even as late as the end of September the official reports will show that the British government did not themselves appreciate the importance of the position, and that despatch is the first intimation they gave anybody outside that they were prepared to receive aid or assistance, and then it was to be more a sentimental affair, as you can see, this asking only for units to be absorbed in British regiments. I found that one of the despatches was not printed in that English return. I do not know why it was omitted, but as soon as I found its absence I sent my hon. friend two copies of it. The despatch was published at the time in the newspapers. It is dated at the War Office, October 2. In it, Lord Lansdowne submits for transmission, through the Colonial Secretary, instructions to be given to those colonies that desired to send volunteers. He says:

> The governments of two colonies, Queensland and New Zealand, have offered respectively, &c.

They were the only two that up to that date had offered through their governments to furnish any contingent. I have given you the history of Queensland, and how they carried out their offer. Lord Lansdowne says: 'So far there have been no offers from the governments of any of the other colonies' That was sent with the despatch dated October 5.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There seems to be some distinction there between the Crown and the self-governing colonies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They did not accept aid from Crown colonies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman will bear in mind I was quoting from the document laid before the Imperial parliament. We had nothing before us that was received by this government. That return shows just the contrary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I gave my hon. friend two copies of it. The day he was absent I inclosed them in an envelope.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That was after I had spoken.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I had not discovered them before. I supposed that return was complete or else I could have had them printed. This was published at the time in the newspapers. All the British government would accept were from Queensland 250, New Zealand 200, New South Wales 250, Victoria 250, South Australia 125 and Canada 500 men. All the others except Canada conformed to the proposal and accepted the conditions. New Zealand offered to pay the men. The Imperial government said 'No, we think that all should be on the same plane.' We knew the terms on which the contingent would be accepted, and it seemed rather a singular position if we had said to the Imperial government: 'We insist upon the men getting double the pay of all the other men who are serving under the British flag in South Africa.' Here was an army of 145,000 men; 143,000 were being paid on one basis and 2,000 men on another basis. 'We insist upon our men getting double pay.' That, of course, would have destroyed the esprit de corps which ought to exist in an army. It would have created a spirit of jealousy. It would have been productive of anything but satisfactory good feeling between all parts of the army, and therefore what we said was, 'We will make it up when the men come back.' They go in as part of the British army. We do not desire that there should be any distinction while they are serving there, but we will increase the pay to the level of the Canadian rates paid to the mounted police and the cavalry regiments and the artillery, which is double the pay of the Imperial corps. We thought that was the fairest and most reasonable view to take of it, and was most satisfactory to the Imperial government. When the agitation was got up in Canada that we were doing the shabby thing in not paying, we telegraphed over to know if any of the colonies were departing from the rule laid down by the War Office as to the pay, and we were advised that they were not. They were all on the same plane. It would seem rather bumptious on our part to say, 'Oh, well, we will not allow our men to go there on a shilling a day. We are not satisfied with English pay and will give Canadian pay.' It seemed destructive of the good feeling that ought to prevail in the army there. We propose to make up to the men, or to their families in this country, the additional amount to make their pay equal to the Canadian pay. I think I have shown pretty clearly that Canada does not occupy the position in which some hon. gentlemen have been disposed to place her in order to have a shot at the present government, but we have acted really more promptly than any other part of the empire. Canada is the only part of the empire where the government have felt that they were justified in acting on public opinion. I have shown how the government of one of the colonies that I have mentioned made the offer, based on public opinion, and the opposition in the legislature said they had no right to make the offer, and it had to be debated from day to day, and they had to send the humiliating answer that they could not give the Imperial government a reply at once.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is in striking contrast to the conduct of the opposition in Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is the best compliment the hon. gentleman could pay us.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said from the beginning that I was sure there was not a man in either House who would object. The feeling in Canada is loyal. Canada recognizes the high position she holds, and is not going to do anything to demean it. If hon. gentlemen will look at the thanks sent by the Imperial government and published in the state papers, they will see that the language used to Canada is very different from that used to other colonies. It is much more heartfelt and earnest. There are several messages from Mr. Chamberlain, messages from the government and from the Queen herself. There is an air of sincerity in all the messages of thanks that have been cabled to Canada, showing that Canada occupies an exceptionally good position. Canada's action was prompt. Hon. gentlemen say that we hesitated. Surely men ought to be judged by what they did and not by what was said about them.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Or what they say themselves.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Probably some hon. gentlemen, under irritation, or when they are prodded, will say things that ought not fairly to be charged against them.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Did not the hon. Premier say to the Globe correspondent?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I betray no secrets of council, but I say there was not a man in the council who did not approve of everything that was done, and after the first contingent was sent I had a conversation with Mr. Tarte, and of his own mere motion he said: 'Why should we not send another contingent?' and we offered our second contingent before the first contingent had left Halifax. That offer first came from Mr. Tarte. He said: 'Why should we not send a second contingent? The war is beginning to look serious.' In the early part of October it did not look serious. Nobody dreamed that Great Britain would have the severe task she has had. With the modern system of gunnery and fortifications a very small number of men are able to keep a large army at bay, as we have seen illustrated at Ladysmith, Mafeking and Kimberley. The Boers have been unable to take those citadels. It was the same way with Spion Kop. Part of General Buller's army made a grand dash at the Boer's guns, but the difficulty was that they could not get men enough in the narrow gorge to meet the array of rifles facing them, and they were shot down, and I fear that many more will be shot down before we can accomplish very much. The first line will be decimated, the second line will be broken, and the third line will lose to a large extent. That is the condition resulting from the use of modern inventions. If, at the time of the Crimean War, Sebastopol had been guarded as the trenches are being guarded in South Africa now, does anybody suppose that the French and British could have taken it? It would have been impracticable. At the present time we have the deadly implements, the lyddite shells. and the guns that will drop a shell five miles off, and smokeless powder. In the early days you could have some notion where the fire came from, but to-day, with the smokeless powder, it is all a clear sky and therefore we must not be surprised at the difficulty in overcoming the Boers. I think that a very great change will be made in the system that will prevail hereafter. It may have the effect of preserving to a great extent the peace of the world where earth fortifications, such as engineers can build to-day, are protected by modern guns, making these fortifications impregnable. I do not see the hon. gentleman from Monck, and I will not trouble the House with answering his statements. I feel that I am obliged to cut my observations short and leave unsaid a great deal that I should like to have communicated to the House, as I think it is the desire of members not to return to-night.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman from Northumberland is here.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman from Monck charged the government with suspending the coasting laws and doing a great deal of harm to shipping. In the month of October, the grain men of Winnipeg sent in an application to the government to allow United States vessels to take the wheat from Fort William. It was alleged that Canadian bottoms were short and the rates were rising, and the grain would have to go into the United States unless some change took place. The Corn Exchange of Montreal also sent a remonstrance. They had sent one last year and the year before complaining that the grain of Manitoba was being diverted in consequence of a scarcity of vessels to ship it, and an Order in Council was passed in October allowing United States vessels to carry the grain between Canadian ports. The object was to divert it from Buffalo to Owen Sound or Parry Sound.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Which Order in Council was in direct opposition to the law of the land. The government had no authority or power to do it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite aware of that, but there are times when representations of that sort are made, and they have to be considered. It was important that the Canadian grain, which was said to be superior to the United States grain, should not be all diverted to the south, and there mixed with the inferior grain and the standard destroyed. However, the evidence was given, and I have it here under my hand if it is questioned, that in the month of October the Canadian shippers, feeling that they had a good thing, doubled their rates. The rates in October, 1899, were more than double those of 1898, and I heard, as an actual fact, that one vessel had paid her whole capital account that year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am glad of it, but that was no justification for the government violating the law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When I think good can be accomplished, I do not hesitate to break the law; I do not stick at things of that kind. The grain men of Winnipeg and the grain men of Montreal were complaining that the grain was being diverted to foreign ports.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That has been the complaint for the last ten years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I dare say this year it will stimulate the shippers. It was only for about six weeks, and it was under great pressure that it was done, and it is asserted that only two United States vessels——

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Only one.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That only one carried any grain.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And that shows that the representations which were made were improper, because there were sufficient British bottoms to do the work.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, but the United States carrying trade was not equal to what was offered. The demand for iron ore was so great that vessels refused to take the grain. They refused to take a return cargo of coal in order to save a few hours and get back for another load of iron ore, which paid them more than double, and the reason of it was the great demand for iron in the States.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We will forgive the hon. gentleman because the Premier apologized.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I probably was the sinner, because I made a report in favour of it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—During the long period I had charge of the Customs Department, there never was a year that the same applications were not made, and we always refused, because it was not legal.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman may have been right, but I think the pressure was greater this year, and it did not hurt anybody, because only one vessel load was taken. Some hon. member has stated that we deserved no credit for having forced the canals through. I think we deserved credit for that. For many years the Conservative party had been allowing the contracts to be carried on as if they never intended to finish the canals.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I sent over to the Department of Railways and Canals to know when the contracts were given out for the increased depth of the Welland Canal. I find the increased depth to 13 feet was given out when Alex. Mackenzie was Minister of Public Works.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There were contracts given before Sir Alexander Mackenzie came into power, and he cancelled them and advertised for others.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The contracts for the cutting of the Welland Canal to the depth of 13 feet ran from April 6 to August 31, 1874. To the late Mr. Mackenzie is due the credit of increasing the depth of the canal system to 14 feet. The contracts for deepening the Welland Canal to 14 feet were given out between September 25 and October 29, 1877. What was the use of deepening the Welland Canal unless we had a corresponding deepening of the St. Lawrence canals? The first contract on the St. Lawrence canals was on September 24, 1892. That was fifteen years after. All that time the Welland Canal was useful only to the United States vessels. They could go through with 14 feet draught, but few Canadian vessels went through, because they could not get to Montreal. The contracts for the Soulanges Canal were given out from September, 1891, to May, 1892. When the change of government took place it was found that more than half the sections on the Soulanges Canal were at a standstill, and the government had to take out of the hands of the contractors about six or seven sections. Two of those sections belonged to Mr. Stewart. He maintained that the government did not want to go on. The time had passed for the completion, and it was argued that in consequence of some case decided in court that the contractors were not bound to finish them except at their leisure, and if I am not mistaken Stewart stated, either in evidence or in giving an explanation of why he had no rushed the work, that the Minister of Railways and Canals was not anxious to push it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In answer to that, I can say—and I say it from my own personal knowledge—that the instructions given by the government of the day, before I left the government, was for the completion of those canals, at as rapid a rate as possible. I know those were the instructions given by Mr. Haggart. What took place afterwards I do not know.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We had to cancel the contracts on seven sections.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Mr. Osler put the question to Mr. Haggart, 'Well, how did you put it to him?' and the answer was 'I told him that if it was any advantage to him to go slowly that he could do so.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Here is the best evidence. I find in the years 1894-5-6 the government expenditure was $7,738,000, and in the years 1897-8-9 the expenditure was $9,455,000, nearly two millions more, expended in the way of forcing the completion of the canals in those years. As it is six o'clock I will have to bring my observations to a close. After the explanation I have given I hope that the government will be relieved at least of the charge of showing any disloyalty to the empire. I think that we deserve special credit, and had we not been making preparations in advance of the time that circular letter was received, it would have been absolutely impossible to have got together the thousand men. There is no parallel to it in any of the colonies. We did it quickly, because we knew the people of Canada were behind us ; all political parties approve of it. I think with that acknowledgment the opposition ought to be reasonably fair and not seek to deprecate our action. We claim no credit ; we merely discharged a duty, but we ought not to be accused of disloyalty because we did what we thought was our duty and did it as rapidly as possible.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who charged the government with disloyalty?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will not go into the newspaper articles. I do not keep a scrap book.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have extracts from a great many newspapers upon that question, and I deny that charge altogether.

It being six o'clock, the Senate rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I regret exceedingly if I have been the instrument by which our hon. Speaker has been prevented from leaving the city this evening. Had I known he desired to leave, I should not have attempted to interpose to prevent him. With reference to the speech from the Throne, so much has already been said upon this subject that little remains for me upon this occasion. I take exception to some paragraphs of the speech, but as a whole, and upon very many points, I certainly concur with the sentiments therein expressed. With respect to the prosperity of the country, we all know that the Dominion is prosperous and has been prosperous. We have been preaching that doctrine for a great many years, and I am glad to find the Liberal party at last concurring in that opinion. The revenue of the country has increased also proportionately with the business, a very natural result, and I only hope that the large expansion of revenue may go to decrease our national debt. That would be a source of satisfaction to the citizens of this country. Hitherto, unfortunately, we have not had an opportunity of reducing that debt to any appreciable extent, but now, with a large excess of revenue over expenditure, it is nothing but right to expect that there shall be a similar reduction in the aggregate amount of the public debt, unless the extravagance of the government during the past year has more than offset the increased revenue. The balance sheet at the end of the financial year will show all these facts, and we will be able to discover whether the amount received over and above the expenditure has been properly applied to reducing the general debt of the country. With reference to the prevailing prosperity, these gentlemen seem to take credit for everything that has occurred, but in my opinion facts wil prove that a great deal of it is due to the National Policy which they have been obliged to continue, knowing it is the only policy under which the prosperity of the country could be continued. Therefore, they ought to divide the credit between the Conservative and the Liberal parties. My hon. friend, the member for Cobourg (Hon. Mr. Kerr) to-day, as is his custom, seemed to think that everything was due to the rule of the present government. He is entitled, of course, to his opinion upon that point, but he ought to have some consideration for the opinions of other gentlemen who may differ from him very materially in respect to this matter. He thinks, and very properly, from his standpoint, that this is the best government that ever ruled the destinies of Canada. That may or may not be, but in a very short time the electorate will have an opportunity of deciding that question, and I mistake very much the sentiment of the country if they do not disapprove of very many acts of the present government during their four years tenure of office. However, that remains to be seen. Coming in contact, as I do, with a great many of the people of this country, I find there is a wide feeling of dissatisfaction which certainly will nullify the opinion of the gentlemen on the goverment benches that we, on this side, are to remain in the cold shades of opposition for the next eighteen years. It makes very little difference to me whether one party or another is in power as long as they administer the affairs of the country in a manner that will conduce to the best interests of the country, and therefore, in my humble judgment, the Dominion will be better governed, and has been better governed by the Conservative party than it possibly can be by the Liberal party. It is true the Reform government can expend money to any extent; that has been their stock-in-trade, which may possibly enable them to carry a certain number of constituencies in the future; but the great mass of the people of this country have been crying out against the extravagant expenditures of the present government. The day of reckoning will shortly come, and my predictions will be verified. The government also take credit for the construction and completion of the canals. That is an absurd proposition. The canals were constructed a great many years ago, and the work on the enlargement of the canals which has been in progress for years, has been completed this year. This government did not initiate that policy. The work on the canals was well advanced when the change of government took place, and this government had to complete the canals when they came into office, to make them of any use to the country. With 14 feet of navigation in St. Lawrence canals, I hope there will be a large increase of trade. The people of the United States are alarmed at what we are doing in this country in improving our waterways. They fear that we will necessarily absorb a large portion of the transport trade which formerly went through United States channels. Practically that will be the result of these improvements. The country has expended a large amount in the deepening of the canals, and it ought to be a source of congratulation to the people of this Dominion to know whether it has been a wise expenditure, and that the deeper waterway is sufficient to suit the demands of trade. I am sorry the government did not think it necessary or obligatory to take into consideration the great project which has been before this country for several years—I allude to the Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal. In my humble judgment, this canal would do more for the future general prosperity of the country than any undertaking of any kind that has been accomplished in the past—I will not except even the Canadian Pacific Railway, although we all know that the Canadian Pacific Railway has been the means of making this country what it is. I believe, however, that the Georgian Bay Canal, with all the advantages which it possesses will be of the greatest utility and benefit to the country. The whole community, with few exceptions, is in favour of it, and I did hope that the government would have made some allusion to this project in the speech from the Throne.

The promoters of the project, or some of them, are in the city, and I believe they intend to have a conference with the government to ascertain if they will give them aid to carry out the work. It is going to shorten the distance between the upper lakes and the seaboard very much, and with the increasing breadth of cultivated land in the North-west, we will require all the facilities we can obtain for the purpose of exporting the great products of the country. I do not dissent from the plan of the government in encouraging immigration. I think it is desirable, and I hope they will carry it out so that it will be a material benefit to that section of the country. We all know the vast extent of the North-west. With the land unsettled it is perfectly useless, and the sooner the government bring in settlers to make that land what it ought to be, the better it will be for the country. Whether the immigrants who have recently been brought into the country are the proper class or not, it is not for me to say. I have heard them favourably spoken of, and I hope they will turn out to be the proper class of people. We cannot expect any great increase in the immigration from the British Isles, and we must look to foreign countries for population. The government are entitled to great credit for encouraging increased settlement in Canada, and I hope they will continue with their system of immigration on a large scale. I have touched on the principal points in the speech which require our consideration. With respect to the preferential tariff, it is rather unfortunate that during this last year, notwithstanding the preference to British goods, our imports from the United States have been largely in excess of those from the British Islands. I did think that this preferential tariff would have had the effect of increasing the trade with Great Britain and decreasing the trade with the United States. It may have this effect in future years. Our trade with the West Indies should be encouraged as much as possible. The only other subject which has been agitating the public mind for some time is in reference to the war in South Africa. In my opinion, the government have not acted in this matter in the manner which the importance of the subject demands. They certainly did not act as speedily as the circumstances would seem to require. They have tried very vigorously to defend their course. The Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State have tried to make us believe that Canada did more than any other colony in the empire. It seems extraordinary that one solitary hour should be lost in finding out whether any constitutional difficulty could arise in the matter. It seems to me very extraordinary that the organ of the Minister of Public Works declared in his paper in Montreal at that time that not a dollar and not a man should be sent to South Africa. How do they reconcile that with what the Minister of Justice has stated? By his special pleading he seemed to indicate that there was this difficulty, and it required some time to consider it, shielding himself under the supposition that in 1885 Sir John Macdonald found the same trouble in regard to the war on the Nile, and could not approve of sending a contingent to assist in that war. The circumstances are not analogous. The Minister of Justice last session delivered a masterly speech in reference to the difficulties in South Africa. He convinced me at that time that war was inevitable. Knowing as he must have known, that it was sure to take place, should he not have made the necessary alterations in the Militia Act, if it required any alterations, to meet the emergency? That has not been explained. The Minister of Public Works had determined, as far as he could, to throw some discredit upon the loyal men of this country, according to my view. Whether it was done in a moment of weakness or not, I am not prepared to say. We know that the Minister of Public Works has a hostile feeling towards a class of this community who have been known as men loyal to the backbone, and he thought, if he could do any injury to that class of people, he was doing credit to his own countrymen, whereas the contrary was the fact, because his own people will repudiate any feeling that might have existed in reference to their position as men loyal to the empire. Therefore, I think he has counted without his host, and that the people of this country will never forget the desire of that hon. gentleman to make political capital for the purpose of injuring the class of men for whom he had an utter detestation for many years. I attribute it to that cause and that alone. I may be wrong, but it all points in that direction. I am told that in the council it was necessary, before they arrived at a conclusion, to visit Rideau Hall. Whether that is a fact or not, I do not know.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That was currently reported in the city.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is absolutely untrue.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I think the Minister of Justice will corroborate what I say, that there was a very strong feeling of mistrust in the minds of the people, when that attitude was taken.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I was on the Pacific coast at the time, and the whole matter was arranged before I returned.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I want to avoid any personality in this matter, I do not want to say that any man was guilty. But I believe the Minister of Public Works was the cause of the trouble. I have a very strong opinion on the matter, and nothing will eradicate from my mind the impression that he has caused all the trouble. I do not wish to detract from the Premier, remembering the position he took at the Queen's Jubilee. I think he discharged his duty in an admirable manner, and I give him credit for what he did on that occasion to vindicate the honour of Canada. He did what any man would do in performing his duties in a dignified and satisfactory manner, and therefore it would be wrong to impute wrong motives to him.

Something was said as to no allusion being made to the exertions of the Militia Department in sending the contingents. That may be true, but there is one general feeling in this country that the Minister of Militia and his department did all they could do for the purpose of accelerating the departure of the volunteers. But at the same time, while we must give Dr. Borden every possible praise, we are also under a deep debt of gratitude to those men who came forward voluntarily and offered themselves, leaving their homes and firesides for the purpose of serving their Queen and their country. Could anything be more patriotic, could anything be more in unison with the feelings of the people of this country to show that we are loyal, and that it is a libel of the worst kind to try by any side wind to throw discredit on the people of this country ? I do not think it lies in the mouth of any man to say that these men do not deserve the greatest praise from us. Nearly three thousand men have been enrolled, but I believe if it were necessary we could enrol 20,000 men in this country to serve in any emergency in which Great Britain might be involved. We are part and parcel of the empire, and it is our duty to assist in every possible way in maintaining the integrity of the empire. On many occasions Britain has rendered aid to us. They never hesitated about sending troops to this country when they were needed. They never asked whether this country would pay for them, or whether the country was prepared to receive them, but acted voluntarily and promptly. I believe that the people of the country will concur with me in saying that in return we are willing to assist them in any measure to maintain their rights. We regret the necessity for this war. We all regret the loss of life and the enormous expenditure, but principally the loss of life. It has cut off the flower of England, but we may depend upon it that although it may be disastrous at the present time, the result will be useful in the future. It will show Great Britain that it is necessary to maintain a sufficient force to repel any action that may be taken against them. Heretofore that fad of peace at any price has been acted upon, but it will no longer continue in the minds of the British people. They should keep on hand a force of men sufficient to meet any emergency that may arise, and I hope it will have an effect in this country that we are necessarily required to maintain a force sufficient to meet any difficulty that might occur. It has been rumoured that there would be an attempted Fenian invasion, taking advantage of the difficulties in the Transvaal. I do not know whether it is true or not, but the government should take the matter into their serious consideration, and make arrangements to garrison some of our principal cities and towns. There is another matter of very great importance in connection with this subject. There is a question as to whether these men should be recompensed in a fair, honest and generous manner. My opinion is that they ought to be liberally recompensed. I do not know that we can do too much to show our appreciation of the course they have pursued. We ought to act promptly in this matter ; we should not be parsimonious or seek to restrict them to the pittance allowed by the Imperial government. Every man should be placed in a position equal to that which he occupied before he left. I believe that the commercial community generally have guaranteed that upon the return of these men from the Transvaal they shall occupy the positions they had when they left. That is a fair offer, and I hope that the government will act in the same way. Speaking of the munificent offer of Lord Strathcona, I think it deserves every commendation. Not only should there be a vote of this House and three cheers, as proposed by the hon. gentleman from Victoria, but there should be some public substantial recognition of this generous and noble action of Lord Strathcona. I hope that the government will do something to immortalize the memory of this man for all time to come. I do not know how that could be done, whether it would be by a life-sized oil painting of that distinguished gentleman, to be placed in every public building in the country and in the halls of the various local legislatures. I do not know the views of the government on this question, but if it were put to a vote, I do not think there would be one dissentient voice in the whole Dominion of Canada in the carrying out of a scheme of this kind for the purpose I have mentioned.

I merely throw out the suggestion, not knowing whether it will meet with favour or not. I rose this afternoon for the purpose of showing my dissent from the course pursued by the government in reference to the organization of the contingent. I do this as a loyal British subject and as a Canadian. I do not want my loyalty to be impugned. It is the worst stigma a man can have against his character that he is disloyal to Queen and country. Thank God we have heard enough to know that all men in this Dominion, with very few exceptions, are loyal. The speeches we have heard show me that the French Canadians, some of whom have been spoken of as being disloyal, have proved themselves to be, as I have always believed them to be, as loyal as any other people in this country. I am pleased that on second thoughts the ministers came to the conclusion that it was necessary to provide a second contingent, and that there was some mode by which they could act promptly. Certainly it was a somersault of a very agreeable kind to me, and was approved of throughout the country. If anything should be required in the future of the same kind, I do not think they ought to feel themselves under the necessity of applying to parliament. They may rest assured that the loyal people of this country will readily approve of any measure that might be undertaken by the government for the purpose of assisting the British government in such an emergency as they are involved in at the present time. I thought it was my duty, as a representative of this part of the country, to show our great appreciation of the efforts made by the people to render the assistance so greatly needed at the present time by the British government in South Africa. If they should be successful, as I have no doubt they will be, the effect will be that South Africa, under British rule, will become a prosperous country. It seems to me, as a citizen, to be a most extraordinary thing that all these preparations were going on from year to year in the Transvaal without England being aware of it. I do not wish to criticise the acts of British statesmen. It would be impertinence on my part to do so, but I cannot help feeling that it was a very strange thing that preparations on a scale of such magnitude could be made without the knowledge of the British government. However, we should do all we can to assist Great Britain in any difficulty that may arise as long as we are part and parcel of the empire, as I hope we shall be for all time to come. I hope to die a British subject, true and loyal to British connection. I hope the government will pay the men who have volunteered for service in South Africa fairly and liberally, and do all they can to show their approval of the course they have pursued in offering to fight for the empire. Some of these men may never return, but thanks to some private parties in this country, provision has been made in the way of insurance on their lives which will be some little compensation to the friends of any who may be killed in action. The country ought to provide insurance for every man who has gone to fight for this country. I do not think any man would dissent from it, and all would unite in supporting any such measure that may be introduced by the government. If any man comes forward and tries to persuade the people that our country is doing wrong in assisting the empire in this struggle, that man ought to be served as they served an agitator in Winnipeg the other day, when they pelted him with rotten eggs. I do not wish to impute any improper motives, but the government made a terrible mistake to have delayed one single moment in offering assistance to the home government. They claim that they required to know the opinion of the country. They could have obtained that opinion in three days. They had it last session when a resolution was passed in this parliament, and they could not have gone astray in any action they could have taken to render assistance in such an emergency. The government on several occasions tried to make it appear that there was no difference of opinion amongst us—that they were unanimous. That may be, but the evidence, to my mind, is contrary to that. The evidence was that there was a feeling by some parties that they would not be justified in making this expenditure without the approval of parliament. That may be all very well as a rule, but in a case of this extraordinary character, an extraordinary remedy was needed, and the people would have justified the government in doing what was simply their solemn duty in defence of the empire.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that when the Senate adjourns to-day it do stand adjourned until the 1st day of March at 3 o'clock.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the leader of the government if copies of government bills, to be introduced in this Senate, particularly of the Criminal Code, will be circulated to the members in advance. I have already stated the reasons why I think we should have it done, and I must express some little surprise that the minister, knowing that the law had not been passed last session and that it was the intention of the government to introduce it again, did not have it printed and laid before this House immediately after we assembled. Of course we know it has been the practice in past years, to attribute to the opposition, not so much in this House as in the other, factious opposition to measures of the government. There they were held responsible for the delays which had taken place in the transaction of business. Now, we have been here nine days. No business has been laid before this House, nor, as far as I know, has any measure been introduced in the other House, and for that reason I presume the Minister of Justice thought he was justified in asking the Senate to adjourn for some twenty days. I hope in future, whatever measures are intended to be introduced in the Senate for our consideration, that we may have them at the earliest possible moment and then, while political questions are being discussed in the other House, we can be considering the practical work of the session here. My experience is, and I am sure my hon. friend's experience must have been also, that measures of importance affecting either the Criminal Code or the commercial policy of the country, after having been duly weighed and considered by the Senate, have passed the lower House in a much shorter period than those which were introduced and considered first in the Commons. I say that, because my experience has taught me that that is not only in the interests of the country, but equally important that we should have Bills before us when we meet that they may be thoroughly considered before sending them to the other House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am quite ready to admit that if we were to do as my hon. friend suggests, it would be a new departure, and I am very far from saying it would not be an improvement, but the speech which my hon. friend addressed to us now, he addressed last year, and I can remember when my hon. friend sat on this side of the House, a similar speech used to be addressed to him by my hon. friend the Secretary of State.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend was not here, and does not know.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is mistaken in supposing that it is necessary to be a member of this House to know what transpires here. If my hon. friend is under any such opinion as that, it is a delusion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not a snare.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am quite ready to admit that, but it is the other thing which I have mentioned. With regard to the Criminal Code Bill, I have stated already that the measure has to be considered by myself and some of my colleagues. A measure of this sort, no matter how carefully you have considered it, will, during a period of twelve months, have some changes proposed by prosecuting attorneys, judges and other parties who are experienced in its administration. The measure was very carefully considered in this House last year—the subject of the Criminal Code. There may not be any changes of great importance, so far as I am able to state at this moment, made in the Bill as it will be submitted to this House again. If I had brought it down, it would be the only measure that would be brought down at the present moment. There are one or two other measures that I purpose bringing before this House, but they are very short. Last year I introduced the parole system as applied to certain convicts in penitentiaries. We found, when we came to work it out, that it would be very desirable to extend that power to persons confined in the Central Prison and in the jails as well, because at the present time the only way we can let a young man out of jail is by granting him a pardon, whereas it would be most desirable to exercise a surveillance over him by granting to him a reprieve by ticket-of-leave. Sometimes this has occurred during the past six months, since we have been operating the law. A number of young men become lawless, and they continue their lawlessness until they commit some criminal offence and are tried and convicted. One amongst them is a leader in the wrong-doing, and he gets three years in the penitentiary. The others, that are supposed to be led by him in the mischief, are sent to the Central Prison. Now, they are all offenders. There is a want of control over them, and they are not naturally of the criminal class. With a little care and some supervision they may form perhaps members of a law-abiding community and become industrious persons, that has occasionally occurred. We can grant parole to the one who has been sent to the penitentiary, but we cannot deal with the others, except, it may be, by pardon, and yet we do not feel altogether like pardoning, and the one who is in the penitentiary is let out on parole, and the others feel it a great hardship that he should be at large while they are in prison. So I propose to amend the law by two or three sentences extending that principle to these cases. My hon. friend will see that that will not require fifteen minutes' consideration, and so it seemed to me, looking at the fact that this House has nothing to do with the consideration of the estimates, and therefore requires less time for discharge of the duties devolving upon it than does the other Chamber, that I would be sufficiently meeting the wishes of the members of this House by submitting the measures proposed to be introduced. Now, so far as the criminal code is concerned, I purpose discussing that with my colleagues. My hon. friend can well understand that after the assembling of the government at the close of the summer vacation, a very considerable time is required for dealing with the special estimates of the departments, and on the present occasion we have had considerable addition to the work that devolves upon us in council, by the subject of these contingents. My hon. friend, having been for a great many years a member of the government, can understand that, but I promise him that if I can succeed in getting a Bill which is at present in the printer's hands reconsidered and reprinted before the House meets again, I shall be most happy to act upon the suggestion he makes, and put it in the hands of members of this House, and of the other House, and of a large number of the profession who are interested in it.

LIEUT.-COL. HUGHES' SERVICES.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid upon the Table of the Senate, copies of all communications which have passed between the government of Canada and the British government in reference to the offer of Lieutenant-Colonel Samuel Hughes, M.P., to raise in Canada a military corps for service in South Africa. Also, copies of all communications, telegrams and letters which have passed between the Dominion government, the Major General, or any officer or official in the public service, and Lieutenant-Colonel Samuel Hughes, in reference to the proposal of the latter to raise a corps in Canada for service in South Africa, or in connection with the appointment of Lieutenant-Colonel Hughes as an officer of the first, second or other special service battalion; together with a statement of the action taken thereon by the government or by the Major-General.

He said: My principal reason for moving this resolution is in order that the people of Canada may know really what the difficulties are that have existed between these two officers. A good deal of interest has been taken in the matter, and every one knows that Colonel Hughes is a very enthusiastic volunteer, and that he was one of the first who offered to raise a regiment to aid the Imperial forces in the war in South Africa. The interview between the Major-General and a newspaper reporter has intensified the feeling in the country as to the treatment which Colonel Hughes received. I do not desire to be understood as finding fault with either one or the other. I know the enthusiasm of the one, and I have the highest regard and respect for the Major-General as a soldier, but I think in matters of this kind, where a man has erred through enthusiasm on behalf of his country, even a little breach of military discipline might, if not overlooked, be treated less harshly probably than it has been treated in this instance. Of course I cannot give a positive opinion on that question, not knowing the facts, but having had a little difficulty on one occasion with the former Major-General, in which I was placed under the ban, I have some little sympathy for Colonel Hughes under the circumstances. Whether I transgressed to the extent that he did, I am not prepared to say just now, nor to defend my own conduct at the time, or his at the present time.

THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE REDISTRIBUTION BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before the Senate :—

1. A copy of the statement of the case submitted to English counsel for their opinion as to the competency of the Canadian parliament to alter, by legislation, the electoral divisions of the Dominion, except upon the recurring occasions of the decennial proportionate readjustment of the representation provided for by the British North America Act, 1867, after the taking of each census.

2. A copy of the opinion so given by such counsel.

3. A statement of the fees or emoluments paid or granted to such counsel for such opinion.

4. Copies of all correspondence by the government, or any member of the government, or any person on behalf of the government or any member thereof, with said counsel or either of them with reference to such statement of case, or the opinion founded thereon ; with copies of all messages, memoranda or documents made, had, submitted or taken with reference to said statement of case and said opinion.

5. The names of the counsel to whom application was made for such opinion, the date of such application, and the names of the parties by whom the application was made.

He said : I remember calling the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to this subject during the last session of parliament, and he at the time told us that he had no knowledge of any opinion having been asked from eminent counsel in England, and consequently he was not in a position to give the information which I now ask for in this motion. I have here an extract from an English paper purporting to give the case which was submitted to counsel in England. It is as follows :

The annexed Bill for altering some of the electoral divisions for the House of Commons for Canada, leaving unchanged the numbers of the members representing each province, was passed by the House of Commons of Canada in the session of 1899. It has been rejected by the Senate on the ground that it is not within the constitutional competence of the parliament of Canada to legislate altering the electoral divisions, save on the occasion of the decennial proportionate readjustment of the representation obligatory under the British North America Act, 1867, after each census.

Your opinion is asked whether it is competent to the Canadian parliament to legislate as proposed and independently of the decennial readjustment.

The counsel to whom the case was submitted were the Hon. Edward Blake, Q.C., M.P., Mr. R. B. Haldane, Q.C., M.P., Mr. H. H. Asquith, Q.C., M.P., Mr. Edward Carson, Q.C., M.P., and Lord Robert Cecil, and their opinion was in the affirmative.

As we have another Bill changing the electoral division promised in the speech from the Throne, and I see by the paper to-night, was to have been introduced to-day, and I believe of the exact character of the Bill of last year, it is well that we should have this information in our possession before we deal with the subject again.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has it now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What I want is the official statement. I am reading this as the basis on which I make the motion. I am not in a position to say that that is a correct version of what was submitted to counsel. If I were to say that and point out that it is not in accordance with the fact, my hon. friend would say that he is not responsible for a newspaper report. Hence I should like to have the exact wording of the submission which was made to these counsel. There can be no possible objection to that. We are entitled to it, for I presume these gentlemen did not give their opinion on so important a question without being paid for it, and we are entitled to know who submitted the question, and under what form it was submitted. What I want is the official document, the submission and the answer, and then we will know better how to deal with the question when it is brought before us.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have not officially submitted any such question for an opinion. I never had the slightest doubt in my own mind as to what our legal and constitutional rights were. If any of my other colleagues have, I will make inquiries, and if we have any such opinion from the parties I shall be ready to bring it down. I suppose the value of the opinion will depend upon the eminence of the counsel, and nobody denies that these are men standing in the very first rank of lawyers in the United Kingdom, and their opinion will be, if they have given an opinion, one the importance of which depends upon their rank, and not upon the party who may have made the inquiry. I suppose it will have just as much value if obtained by a private party as though obtained through an official channel in Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has put the case very fairly as far as he went, but it will not depend so much upon the eminence of the counsel who gave the opinion as on the submission made to them. If the submission was a false one, and they gave an opinion, then the opinion would be valueless. If the case given to these gentlemen were strictly in accordance with the facts, then the opinion would have been valuable otherwise it would not. If this extract which I have read gives the submission, then it is not correct.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Further, I think legal gentlemen are agreed that an opinion that is not reasoned is not as valuable as one that has been reasoned.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman states the fact that a reasoned opinion is more valuable than one that is not reasoned to the party who receives it, and who wants to form a judgment on the propriety of the opinion. I do not suppose my hon. friend will undertake to sit in judgment upon the opinion given by Mr. Asquith, or Mr. Blake, or Mr. Haldane, and if they give an opinion without the reasoning, it is not less authoritative than if it were accompanied by the reasons. If my hon. friend wanted, as a lawyer, to judge as to whether the opinion was a proper one or not, then he would undertake to examine into the reasons and try to ascertain whether he could answer it satisfactorily to himself or not. If not, he might acquiesce in it. It might convert him to their way of thinking, but the value of the opinion does not depend upon its being reasoned.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It depends upon it just so far as those who received the opinion will have evidence that these gentlemen went carefully into it; otherwise they might have gone off at half cock, as professional men are very apt to do, to my knowledge.

HILLSBORO RIVER RAILWAY AND TRAFFIC BRIDGE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a copy of an agreement between the government of Canada and the provincial government of Prince Edward Island in terms of the Acts of the Parliament of Canada, 62-63 Victoria, Chapter 4; and also, copies of all correspondence between the government of Canada, or any member or official thereof, and the provincial govenment of Prince Edward Island regarding the construction of a railway and general traffic bridge over the Hillsborough River at or near Charlottetown, P.E.I.

DREDGING OF NEW LONDON HARBOUR.

INQUIRY.

Hon Mr. FERGUSON rose to Inquire if it is the intention of the government to dredge the harbour of New London, P.E.I., during the coming summer?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that the answer to this will depend upon the return to the last motion.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is all the answer I may expect to get?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is all I can give until the evidence comes down.

The Senate adjourned.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (B) 'An Act to amend the Act to provide for the conditional liberation of penitentiary convicts.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills).

Bill (C) 'An Act respecting the Supreme Court of the North-west Territories.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

DISALLOWANCE OF PROVINCIAL ACTS.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid upon the Table of the Senate, copies of all Orders in Council disallowing Acts which had been passed by any of the legislatures of the provinces of the Dominion, or by the legislative assembly of the North-west Territory, since the first day of August, 1896, together with all correspondence in relation thereto ; also, copies of any and all correspondence between the federal and any of the provincial governments relating to any suggestions of changes or amendments to any local Act which may have been passed by such local legislature, and the action taken thereon.

He said : My reason for making this motion is because so much discussion has taken place on the subject of disallowance that I think that it is but right to make public the reasons why any of the Acts of the provincial legislatures have been disallowed, or, if any suggestions have been made by the Minister of Justice, or by any other member of the government as to the amending of provincial Acts which may be considered to be in contravention of the provisions of a federal Act or an encroachment on the rights of the Dominion parliament, the reasons for disallowance should be laid before the House in order that the public may know what has been done, and the reasons for disallowing Acts, or asking for amendments if anything of the kind has taken place.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have no objection whatever to the motion of my hon. friend opposite. It has been the practise every few years to publish the reports of the Minister of Justice on the subject of disallowance. Of course, the duty devolves upon the Minister of Justice, in this country, as it does upon the Colonial Secretary, upon the advice of the Law Officers in England, to deal with the subject of provincial legislation within the Dominion, and where a local legislature has exceeded its powers there are three courses that are adopted. One is the disallowance of the Act ; another is the amendment of the Act in the particulars in which it is objectionable; and, third, the Act is allowed to go into operation notwithstanding its objectionable features, leaving the law courts to determine the question of 'ultra vires.' I do not think there has been a case since I have been in the Department of Justice, nor do I think there was for several years before, in which the Minister of Justice advised disallowance without reference to the local authorities. Where there is time, the attention of the local authorities is always called to the objectionable features of the legislation, and they are asked to amend the Act, and where they consent to amend it within a period of twelve months, the power of disallowance is not exercised. That course has been always the policy of the department, and it is, of course, still adhered to. I have no objection to bring before the House the information which my hon. friend seeks by this motion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Of course my hon. friend will understand that if the correspondence and Orders in Council are published in his report there is no necessity for bringing them down on this motion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They are not published in the report. They are published in a volume, but they are not published annually. I shall bring down what my hon. friend asks for within the period of time he mentions.

The motion was agreed to.

A VICTIM OF A JUDICIAL ERROR.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to—Draw the attention of the government to the following extract published in the daily newspapers of the capital :

AN INNOCENT MAN.

For three years he was imprisoned in the St. Vincent de Paul. The Minister of Justice has ordered the liberation from St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary of a Greek named Vandel, who was sentenced three years ago on a charge of rape. It has been found that Vandel is innocent, and was the victim of a judicial error.

And inquired of the government :—

1. Are the facts mentioned hereinabove true ?
2. And if the answer is in the affirmative, what compensation does the government propose to offer to this victim of a judicial error ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We, of course, deprecate the discussion of the exercise of the power of pardon. I think the practise in England is, where there is any specific charge in any 'prima facie' case made out against the advice given, to bring the matter under the attention of parliament, and the Home Secretary has an opportunity of then vindicating his action; but it would lead to very great embarrassment in the administration of justice and in the exercise of the power of pardon if the subject was made on every occasion, or indeed, frequently made, the subject of parliamentary discussion or inquiry. It is a matter within the executive discretion and is only a proper subject for parliamentary inquiry where there has been a great error of judgment on the part of the minister advising the Crown, or where the facts given to the public are 'prima facie' evidence of such a case. In this instance no statement is made that there was wrong done in setting at large a guilty man, but that an innocent man has been discharged, and so this matter would not come within the rule of inquiry which is well settled in the mother country, and which my hon. friend puts here. But, I will say this with regard to the case of Vandel—the facts are not as stated in the question. The prisoner was found guilty of a charge of rape in March, 1897. The verdict was in accordance with the evidence given at the time, and was believed by the jury. The prisoner was sentenced to ten years in prison for the offence. It was subsequently established that the woman who laid the charge against Vandel had been previously unchaste—in fact, a notoriously loose character, and that she had since that, as before, upon the report of competent officers, been leading a very immoral life. These facts and the report of these officers were laid before the judge who tried the case, who made a report to the department. Those reports are always strictly confidential, as my hon. friend knows, and it would, in fact, lead to great hesitation on the part of a judge to make a full and frank report of his views, if those opinions were to be made public, and so, in England—and the rule has been followed here—the report of the judge has been always treated as strictly confidential; therefore, I am not at liberty to state what report the judge made, but upon the papers that were laid before me, upon information submitted by the police officers, and upon the report of the judge, I formed an opinion, and that opinion is that there might be great wrong done if this party was longer kept in the penitentiary, and so upon the information placed before me, I thought it my duty to recommend a pardon. Now, with regard to the second part of the hon. gentleman's question, there is no obligation, moral or otherwise, devolving upon the Dominion government to give compensation to a party who has been convicted, even though wrongly convicted. The court gives judgment in accordance with the evidence submitted. The party has a fair trial. The trial does not become unfair because the testimony submitted is perjured. There is no disposition on the part of the jury to go wrong. They must act upon the best evidence submitted, and then form an honest judgment or conclusion. If, unfortunately, there have been persons guilty of perjury, that does not entitle the accused to compensation, and that rule has been recognized again and again in the mother country.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—It is another Dreyfus affair, or like it.

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved—

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all correspondence not already brought down, that has taken place between the Imperial government and Canada, or between the High Commissioner for Canada in London and the government of Canada, relating to the proceedings of commissioners appointed to consider and proceed with the construction of the Pacific cable between Canada and the Australasian Colonies; together with any correspondence that may have taken place relating to concessions asked for by the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company from the Australian governments in re telegraphic extension.

He said: I notice that almost a similar motion has been made in the lower House, and if the papers are brought down there it will not be necessary to make a special return here, further than to let us have a copy of them. I simply make this motion: any remarks I may have to offer on the subject of the Pacific cable communication between Canada and Australia, I shall reserve for the next motion in my name on the paper.

The motion was agreed to.

THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to allude to a matter which is one of very great interest, I am sure, to every hon. gentleman present, and to the whole population of this country. When we adjourned early in February, not to meet again until to-day, there was a very great deal of anxiety felt at the prospect of British arms in South Africa at that time. There was an organization in South Africa —a military government pursuing a policy of aggression upon the British possessions in the southern portion of the African Continent. Every one believed that the contest would be one which ultimately could only result in one way, but we all felt that a courageous and active enemy, pursuing a policy that was defensive in its character, had the opportunity of inflicting very serious injury upon the British forces in South Africa. The British authorities have, I am pleased to say, risen equal to the occasion. I am sure, no one in this House, and no one in this country expected anything else. If we have met with reverses, they have afforded us an experience by which we may profit, and which only increase our determination, and the determination of the people of the United Kingdom, to put forth still more vigorous efforts to secure that triumph which at one time we supposed could be secured without so large an expenditure of money and of life. To-day, the prospect is indeed very much brighter. We know that General Cronje and his army have surrendered. We know that within the past few days Kimberley has been relieved. The siege to which it was long subjected has been raised, and the pleasing news has reached us within the past few hours that Ladysmith is also relieved. (Cheers.) And the force of General White, which has been shut up there for some months, is now at liberty to join with other portions of the British army to hasten the triumph which British arms are certain to secure. I am pleased to say that the people of Canada have taken a deep interest in this contest. We all know, who have given any attention to the matter, that the British government have exercised a very great deal of forbearance towards the Boer population of the Transvaal and of the Orange Free State. In no other place in the history of our country have the British people been subjected to such ignominy, such injustice as they have been called on to endure at the hands of the Boer government of the Transvaal. That endurance, in the estimation of a great many, was carried further even than it ought to have been, and before the contest was begun by the Boers it ought to have been begun by the British authorities on behalf of those who suffered such wrongs and such injustice at the hands of the Boer population. However, that may be, we know that the forbearance has only tended to bring into clearer light the wrong and injustice that was being done, and the disabilities that demanded remedy. When the call to arms was made, every portion of the British Empire responded. It was not merely the soldiers in the regular forces that marched at the call of the British government to put an end to the wrong that was inflicted upon the British people in South Africa. The Canadian people also responded. They took a deep interest in the conflict, not a greater interest than their interest in the United Kingdom and the empire rendered necessary; but I believe this, that the result of the conflict will be to establish an additional bond of unity between the United Kingdom and the dependencies of the empire. (Cheers.) I believe that the result of this conflict has tended to make the bonds of union immeasureably stronger than at any previous period in our history. (Hear, hear.) We feel that the responsibility of empire to some extent rests upon us, and I have no hesitation in saying that the expenditure which will be made by Canada on behalf of the empire is as profitable an investment as this country has ever made at any period of its existence. (Cheers.) I am pleased to see the Canadian people responding with so much promptness to the call of duty in this matter. I am pleased at the bravery which they have exhibited in the battle field. (Cheers.) And although some of them have lost their lives and will be seen on this side of the Atlantic no more, the influence which their sacrifice will exert on the history of this country will be of no little importance. I regretted to see that the son of our honoured Speaker was wounded in that contest, but, I may rejoice with him that his life was at all events spared. (Cheers.) And I am sure that we may all join with our honoured Speaker in hoping that Providence will spare him to return again to this country and receive from the people of this Dominion that mark of admiration and gratitude which such loyal and patriotic services entitled him to. (Cheers.) I thought that, when the current was running so strongly in our favour, I would not be doing my duty to this House if I failed to call its attention to the satisfactory progress attending British arms in Africa, and to give to our friends on both sides an opportunity of expressing their admiration and approval of the policy that is being pursued in that country, and I trust, as I am sure every hon. gentleman here does, that there will be no settlement which will recognize hereafter a menace to the paramount authority of British dominion in South Africa. (Cheers.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I need scarcely say that I rejoice, as I am sure most Canadians will, at the position which the hon. gentleman has taken to-day, and they will re-echo the sentiments which he has uttered with regard, not only to the difficulties which have occurred, but the causes which led to the war which unfortunately has been in progress for several months past. I rejoice more particularly in the victories which have taken place from the fact that those who represent this portion of the British Empire have played so important a part in accomplishing that for which they have been fighting so long—the surrender of a portion at least of the Boer forces. When the news was flashed across the ocean that 'the dashing rush of the Canadians brought about the final result,' the surrender of Cronje, it was a matter of deep congratulation and rejoicing for every man who loves his country in this whole Dominion. When the results which ought to follow are considered, I am quite sure that none of us will regret the part that Canada has taken in maintaining the suzerainty of Great Britain in South Africa. The amount of money which has been spent is but a very small consideration, even were we to quadruple it, but, while that is true, we cannot but mourn the loss of some of our bravest sons and at the same time, regret that many of them are now in hospital with the wounds which they have received. I sincerely hope with my hon. friend that those of the Canadians who have been wounded may recover, and if it is not their good luck, for such I deem it to be, to take part in the continuance of the war, that they may at least return to their native country covered with honours. I deeply sympathize with his Honour the Speaker. When matters of this kind are brought home to one they are felt more keenly. When, I read that one of the lads who belonged to the battalion in which I served when the Fenian Raids occurred, was wounded, it made me feel that this war was coming home to all of us, and I can only hope that our men will return to Canada in good health and that the result of this war may be such as the leader of the government has predicted—that there will be no settlement on the part of England with a race of people who know not what liberty is when they have the power to oppress foreigners, until they surrender unconditionally. While we mourn the loss of many of our brave Canadian boys, and regret that so many of them have been wounded, we rejoice that in laying down their lives in defence of the empire, they have shed a glorious lustre upon this northern part of the British Empire which history will never efface. In the language of a French Canadian journal, La Presse, published in Montreal in commenting on the surrender of Cronje, and the loss of life which had occurred among the Canadians in their dashing rush, 'let that confraternity of the last slumber in a distant land be a guarantee of joint existence on Canadian soil without the odious suspicions and reservations of yesterday.' Of course we can all understand what that means. That is a sentiment with which every Canadian, no matter what his race or creed, should re-echo, in sincerity and truth. I believe, with the hon. gentleman who has spoken, that the part which Canada has played in this unfortunate war will do much to cement British subjects of all classes and creeds in every part of the empire, and that we shall learn in future to consider ourselves as an integral part, and not as an offshoot and hanger on of that empire—that we are one and indivisible, and that we shall in the future, as at present, be ready on all occasions with all the men and money within our reach to aid in maintaining the dignity and power of Great Britain throughout the world. I say so because I believe that the maintenance of British power in the world is the maintenance of religious and civil freedom wherever the British flag floats. (Cheers.) I cordially reciprocate what has been said by my hon. friend and repeat that I deeply sympathize with those of my fellow citizens whose sons have fallen in this war, and I unite with the leader of the government in expressing the sincere hope that those who have been wounded may be spared to return to their families in health and with well merited honours. (Cheers.)

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I am sure that the sympathy we may have felt for His Honour the Speaker a while ago we can turn to hearty congratulation, first of all that his son has escaped with a slight wound, and that he his likely to return to Canada in good health. We congratulate him on the bravery shown by his son, fighting in the front for the glory of the empire. He, in common with his Canadian comrades, fought bravely and well. They won the admiration of their general, and of the whole British Empire, and I offer the Speaker my heartiest congratulations that things are as they are, which might have been otherwise. A short time ago the condition of affairs in South Africa looked rather dark for the empire. Of course we had no fear of the result, but we thought it would take a long time and involve great waste of blood and treasure; but to-day we rejoice in the glorious victories of the last few hours—the wonderful movement of Lord Roberts, who has shown great skill in forcing the surrender of that brave man Cronje, the Boer general, whose dauntless courage, we cannot help but admire. We all in this country must rejoice, at what has been achieved lately by Lord Roberts, and at the heroic defence of Ladysmith and Kimberley. We hope that the backbone of the war is broken, and that victory will be followed by victory until we triumph in the end. We, of course, feel extremely proud of our Canadian soldiers. To them is credited largely the surrender of Cronje at the last. Their gallant charge won the admiration of the whole empire.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It would seem hardly necessary to add anything to what has been said by the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, still the leader of the House held out an invitation to all of us to express the pride and gratification which we all feel as British subjects at the glorious news which has reached us within the last few days, and to that invitation I willingly respond. I would desire in the first place, however, to express my sympathy with His Honour the Speaker, whose son was wounded, and my gratification to hear that the wound may not be serious. We all I am sure join in the hope that he may live to win for himself public distinction as a brave and gallant soldier and that he may return here in safety to rejoice the hearts of those to whom he is dear and to receive the hearty and cordial welcome which I am sure will be accorded to him by his Canadian fellow subjects. There is no doubt that since the war in South Africa commenced that for a long time past there has been a feeling of great depression and anxiety prevailing, not only in England, but throughout the whole British Empire, and in no part of the empire to a greater degree than in Canada. The difficulties which the British troops met with arose from the peculiar nature of the country, treachery on the part of guides, and the spies by whom they were surrounded, who very often revealed the movements to the enemy while they were in progress. All these and other difficulties they had to contend with, and to fight repeatedly at great disadvantage before they won the brilliant successes of which we now so greatly rejoice. For although it has been said, that a great empire was fighting a comparatively small population, yet the Boers occupied such favourable positions for defending their lines, and the obstacles which the peculiar nature of the country interposed to the attacks of our forces were so great, that we can only rejoice that while we had to mourn the loss of so many brave men there was not a greater loss of life on the part of our troops. But while we all felt anxious, our hearts were warmed again and again by the accounts received of the splendid gallantry and self devotion of the troops in the various actions which took place. They were ready to follow their officers anywhere, and showed that the morale of British soldiers at all events had not degenerated, and it is a proud thing for us Canadians to feel that we can rejoice at our own men showing the same gallantry and the same pluck. While I am a Canadian, and yield to no one in my attachment to my own country, I have always felt that the very proudest heritage one could have was to be, not only a Canadian, but a British Canadian, and that all the glorious traditions of the British Empire were as much ours and belonged as much to us as to those born in the British Isles. We have this additional source of pride now, that we inherit not merely the traditions of the past in which Canadians have hitherto had the little share, but that henceforth Canada can look back with pride and satisfaction to the noble part which her sons have borne in fighting the battles of the empire. I am sure we all rejoice to know that these services have been so graciously appreciated by Her Majesty, by Lord Roberts, and also, I notice with great pleasure, by one who honoured Canada by her presence some years ago, Princess Louise. I heartily join in the congratulations to which we have listened, and hope that we are only at the commencement of still greater and more glorious successes. (Cheers.)

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (D) 'An Act respecting the Royal Trust Company.'—(Mr. Macdonald, B.C.)

GRAIN AND CATTLE SHIPMENTS FROM ST. JOHN, N.B.

INQUIRY.

The notice of inquiry being read :—

By the Hon. Mr. PERLEY :

That he will ask the government how many train-loads of cattle has been shipped from Montreal via the Drummond County Railway and the Intercolonial Railway, to St. John, N.B. Also, how many bushels of wheat have been shipped over the Drummond County Railway from Montreal, via Intercolonial Railway, to St. John, N.B.? Also, how many vessels have loaded cattle and grain at the government terminus of the Intercolonial Railway at St. John, N.B.? And also, how many bushels of grain is in the elevator for shipment at the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway ? And if any, where did it come from ?

He said : It will be remembered by hon. gentlemen that this is a notice I placed on the paper before the adjournment, and I had not the information which I now possess. During the adjournment I visited New Brunswick and the city of St. John, where I took the opportunity of examining the grain elevator and the wharfs and other accommodation there, and I dare say I am in quite as good a position to answer these questions as any member of the government would be. I might say that I did desire to drop this question, but the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Power) is very anxious that I should ask it for the purpose of exposing the wasteful expenditure of public money on buildings, wharfs and elevators in St. John, N.B. ; and I might say that, after having examined the situation, I am of the opinion that the government have made a very great mistake in building the elevator where it has been erected and going to the expense of constructing the wharfs and all business in connection with the same, that they had a very much better property at Reid's Point, or down near the exhibition grounds, where they had been exporting large quantities of hay for the Transvaal. It is a very nice harbour and there is a large area of wharfage, several acres almost entirely unoccupied, on which the elevator could have been built, and they would have room for cattle sheds and the various other warehouses incidental to the trade that might be carried on in that way. To my mind it is a wasteful and extravagant expenditure of money, and one which will never redound to the credit of Canada or benefit the treasury in the slightest degree. There is not sufficient room for cattle sheds. At the Canadian Pacific Railway terminus at Carleton they have large elevators and commodious warehouses for the accommodation of trade, where freight can be loaded in ships. I saw magnificent vessels floating in the harbour being loaded with cattle and cheese and various articles of produce going to the old country, and I am sure if the government had taken the same interest in expanding the facilities there for loading ships and carrying on the trade of the country, a very much greater benefit would have been done to St. John than that which is done by building the wharfs and elevator in the present locality. I am not disposed to say anything further in reference to this motion, and would have dropped it altogether had it not been for the desire of the hon. senior member for Halifax to have the matter ventilated.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I know it is out of order for me to say anything on this question, but the hon. gentleman who has just spoken evidently is not familiar with the subject. He says the government ought to have taken some other site for the elevator than the present one. Why, the former government bought that site and paid several prices too much for it. That is why the present government took hold of it and tried to make something out of a very bad bargain that was entered into by the friends of the hon. gentleman. They have built an elevator on it which is a credit, not only to St. John, but to the Dominion, and they have built it at a very reasonable price, and why he should, coming fresh from St. John, talk as he has, I cannot understand. He must be actuated by some small feeling, because the people of St. John almost universally, in fact, I might say universally, are in favour of the construction of that elevator where it is to-day. As for the wharfs, they are at present being constructed, and no one who knows anything about the question can expect grain to be placed in the elevator yet. It will take at least nine or twelve months longer to make the position for ships sufficiently deep, so that the largest vessels that trade between Canada and England, can find accommodation there.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—That is exactly what I am showing.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The hon. gentleman took advantage of the situation, thinking he was speaking in the presence of people who did not know anything about it. The city of St. John, not the Dominion government, spent nearly a million dollars in building wharfs, &c., on city property, and the government of Canada has nothing to do with them. They are on the Carleton side of the harbour. The present Dominion government has undertaken to do for St. John that which should have been done for the city twelve or fifteen years ago. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman, who is a native of New Brunswick, should be the first to belittle the improvement projected in that province, and which were due to that province from former governments, for the last fifteen years, though they did not seem to think it worth while to make them, notwithstanding the fact that they had advanced our tariff in many cases two or three hundred per cent higher than it was before the province came into the union. It is very strange that the hon. gentleman should speak as he has done. The people of St. John are not behind the age. If the hon. gentleman's information was correct the people would petition and set forth their grievance, but I am not aware of any merchant or number of merchants of any consequence in St. John who are not in full unison with the work which the present government are doing at the Port of St. John.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not rise to discuss this question, but I must take exception to the last remark which the hon. gentleman from St. John has made, that there is entire unanimity of opinion with regard to the usefulness of the work which has been referred to by my hon. friend from Assiniboia. I have heard very great difference of opinion expressed with regard to the value of this work, and so far as my own opinion goes, I concur with a great deal that has been said by the hon. member from Assiniboia. The government have in the city of St. John a large and valuable wharf property; they have large wharf accommodation, ample for the shipment of all the products of the maritime provinces.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It is not half sufficient; the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Its capacity has never been overtaxed yet. There has always been ample room there for all the vessels that could find business there. The export trade from the west, as the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Perley) has said, is done on the opposite side of the harbour, at Carleton. I venture to express the opinion, as I have already expressed it—I expressed it last session and the session before—that it would be found impracticable for the Intercolonial Railway to compete for this trade, and that the building of the elevator on the other side of the harbour, and the spending of some hundreds of thousands of dollars in the purchase and improvement of the property there will be found to be useless for that purpose. I think a fair statement of the case is this: that the accommodations there at the present time are sufficient for the local trade—that the export of grain cannot be done by the I.C.R. in the way in which it is proposed, and therefore any expenditure for that purpose will be found to be practically useless.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—That is child's talk.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not prepared to discuss the merits of this question to-day. I supposed that my hon. friend, in giving notice of inquiry, wanted information. I had that information before the House rose in my desk here, but the hon. gentleman was not present to ask the question, and it was allowed to stand over. I did not wish to submit the answers to these questions in absence of the hon. member, and he has brought it forward to-day. It seems to me the more proper course in this matter would have been to have allowed his question to be put and if he entertained the views which he has expressed, to have put to the House a resolution affirming what his views were with regard to the propriety of this expenditure, and then we could have discussed it. He would have had an opportunity of getting information from the Minister of Railways and Canals, who is largely responsible, primarily, for this expenditure, and I do not know why the hon. minister should desire to waste public money at the harbour of St. John. I understand that the harbour is not as deep as is required to accommodate seagoing vessels that might come there for the purpose of obtaining cargo, and that improvement in the harbour was required, and is to some extent at all events made. Now, this property, if I understand it rightly, was purchased from Mr. Justice McLeod.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It is known as the Harris job.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—No, it was bought from McLeod.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It is on the Harris property.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was purchased by our predecessors in office.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Only part of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The portion obtained from Judge McLeod and others was acquired since the present government came into office, but it was acquired, not from political friends, but from political opponents—men who could do the government no good, and to whom the government was under no obligation, and certainly if there was an error at all it was an error of judgment. I am not prepared to accept the statement of the hon. member from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Perley) with regard to the propriety of the work which has been undertaken. I have more confidence in the judgment of the minister who is responsible for this construction, who is interested in the progress of his province, which my hon. friend is not any longer, and certainly not to the same extent, even though he were a resident, and who no doubt is most anxious to undertake those public works which will contribute most largely to the commercial prosperity of the province in which he lives, and in which, as every hon. gentleman knows, he has a large influence and enjoys, perhaps to a greater extent than any gentleman who ever represented any portion of that province in parliament, the confidence of the entire population. That being so, I am not prepared to accept the statement of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Perley), even though it be supported by the hon. member from Westmoreland (Hon. Mr. Wood) who has the Hibernian quality of always being against the present administration.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That is hardly fair.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It would not be fair to say anything else.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I think if you will look back you will find I have supported you where you were right.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I remember my hon. friend's position on the Drummond County Railway and on a number of other matters, and it did not seem to me, even when cogent arguments were presented to him, that he was prepared in any degree to modify his view as to the impropriety of the course that the government had taken, and so if my hon. friend would mention a single instance in which he has coincided with the government in any public work or undertaking, I would be prepared to modify the general statement which I have made. As my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Perley) says that he has the information and no longer requires it, I do not know that it is necessary to say anything further on that subject, but if my friend really desires it, I shall read the answers which have been placed in my hand to these questions. They are all of a negative character, and I do not know that they will afford the hon. gentleman a great deal of information. They are as follows :

No train-loads of cattle were shipped from Montreal to St. John, N.B., via Drummond and Intercolonial Railways from June 30, 1898, up to the present time.

No wheat has been shipped from Montreal via the Intercolonial Railway over the Drummond County Railway to St. John, N.B., from June 30, 1898, up to the present time.

No vessels have loaded cattle or grain at the government terminus of the Intercolonial Railway at St. John, N.B., from June 30, 1898, up to the present time.

The terminus is not yet ready for business; there is no grain in the elevator.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That information is certainly of the character which the hon. gentleman described it—negative in every particular, but that is not what I desire to discuss. I must confess that I was a little amused at the castigation that the hon. gentleman gave my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) for what he termed his partisanship. I was reminded of the old adage that people very often judge others by themselves. Remembering the last nearly thirty years that the hon. Minister of Justice and I have been sitting opposite each other, I think he has described his own political character as well as anybody could. That is, he has always been against the government whenever a question arose affecting the government. I remember on one or two occasions when the hon. gentleman made a very constitutional and argumentative speech on a question with respect to which he approved of the action of the government, but just before he closed, like the balky cow, he kicked over the pail of milk, and declared that we were all wrong. However, it would be just as well in future for the hon. gentleman not to take any one to task for partisan observations. If it pleases him I do not think it hurts my hon. friend. I think there is a little confusion in this matter, and perhaps the hon. Secretary of State might give us some information. I should like to know when this property was purchased. I am under the impression that my hon. friend is not altogether correct in the statement he has made in reference to the purchase of the Harris property. I had something to do with that. I am not going to discuss the question as to whether it was a job, or whether we paid too much or too little, or what circumstances may have led to the purchase. I can tell my hon. friend that in that purchase we purchased no wharf property, neither did the property which was purchased extend to the harbour at any point. What has been acquired since that time was for the purpose of building these wharfs, and they had to make an additional purchase in order to reach the harbour. I am sure my hon. friend will remember that, if he will only tax his memory for a moment. It may be an extension of the Harris property for aught I know. If my memory serves me rightly—and I speak subject to correction because I did not impress it on my mind at the time—it was a purchase of a property extending to the wharf and a part of the fore shore, and I am not sure that Mr. McLeod and Mr. Pugsly may not have been interested, and one or two others. The whole question at issue is not so much who purchased the property, as whether the expenditure of money in the manner in which it has been expended will be of any benefit even to the city of St. John. I take exception to the statements made by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken in reference to what has been done for St. John by previous governments. That is a question upon which one might speak for some time. I know that St. John, like very many seaports, has made great claims. I know what was done when I was in the government towards improving the trade of St. John. The present Minister of Railways complimented me upon it, adding that it would redound to the credit of the government of which I was a member at the time, and that they would always be thankful for it. That gentleman has, it is said, much influence in that province and stands well with his fellow-citizens. We know he is hovering around at the present moment to try to get a seat at the next election, fearing to go back to his present constituency. Whether he occupies that prominent position in the minds of the people of his province, as indicated by the Minister of Justice, I am not going to dispute. That will be better told when they have another appeal to the people. We will then have a reply to the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Hon. Mr. Perley) as to whether the expenditure of that money has been in the interest of the country and whether it will ever pay even a moiety of the interest which will be required to be paid on the debt incurred, but we cannot answer that at the present moment. I can understand very well the statement of my hon. friend that it is not reasonable to suppose that you can have grain in an elevator until the elevator is prepared to receive it. Not until then will we be able to tell. There is plenty of water in St. John harbour if you go to the proper places. There may not be water enough where this elevator is located.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The government of which the hon. gentleman was a member certainly purchased the Harris property for some purpose or other.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And the otner property was purchased for a similar purpose, and both governments must have thought it was useful for the purpose for which it was purchased.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The late government purchased it for a specific purpose, to enlarge the station accommodation in the city of St. John. Anybody who has visited St. John knows very well that right alongside of the station buildings on the Harris property were wooden buildings, right alongside of the valuable property of the Intercolonial Railway. It was cramped for room and the danger was that if ever a fire took place in the foundry or works of the Harris property, it would destroy the Intercolonial Railway building. I visited St. John long before I had anything to do with the Railways and Canals Department, and when I came home I told my colleagues that the position of the station of St. John was very dangerous, because of being so close to these wooden buildings, and that if the trade of the Intercolonial Railway increased they would require more room, but it does not follow because more room was required for the accommodation of the station in St. John, that therefore you should have bought more property in order to build wharfs. The two things are totally distinct. It may have been, in the opinion of the Minister of Railways, necessary to purchase the property, but the one had nothing to do with the other because the object for which the late government purchased the Harris property had been accomplished.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In what way ?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—They purchased to widen the track, but the great bulk of the property is the property the elevator is now on.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But that is not on the harbour.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I beg pardon it is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have not been there since it was built. I learn now, for the first time, that the elevator has been built upon the property purchased by the late government. I admit there was more property purchased at that time than was then actually required. It was purchased simply because it lay in a block and it would be useless for anything else and might be of use to the government for warehouses or anything of that kind. But that is not on the seaboard at all, nor on the shores of the harbour. It is some distance from it. Have you not now to build some tramway or railway from the elevator to the wharfs in order to carry the grain ?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—A sluice overhead.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not going to argue the question. All I desired to set right was that the late government did not purchase that property to which my hon. friend is referring for the building of the wharf, because we did not go to the shore at all, and it was an additional purchase made for the purposes which have been indicated. Whether it is to be a benefit or not, time alone will tell.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I am out of order, as are all hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this question, but I claim I have a right to give an explanation to this House, because I have great respect for the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and naturally people will conceive that his statement is correct, and when it is in opposition to mine, I feel that I am justified in perhaps contradicting him, because evidently he is not as familiar with the circumstances as I am. He started off by saying that this was not the property purchased by the former government. I beg to say that it is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where the wharf is ?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The wharf is a circumstance of the purchase of the other property, which has been well known from that time until now as the 'Harris job property' for which two members of parliament representing St. John never could get their election since, from the fact that it was known that they had allowed about three prices too much for it. I was asked how much it was worth. I said if you had come to me before it was purchased I would have stated the value, but I did not propose to give an estimate then. I knew what I would give for it, and I think I am just as good a judge of property in the city of St. John as any one else. They paid some sixty or eighty thousand dollars for it, and it was not worth thirty. The railroad passes on through towards the harbour, and thus it would appear, after consideration by the present government, they came to the conclusion that, having paid so much for the property, they had better utilize it, and extend the conveyance of the grain from the elevator to the wharf. To obtain wharfage accommodation in connection with this elevator they had to engage with certain friends of a former government, who by some means or other anticipated that government would certainly require these lots——

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Give us the names.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—They are friends of mine and I do not want to say anything about it. It is not necessary to name them. Some of them are judges in the Supreme Court, but they supported the government and would again if they had a chance. They paid a certain amount for this property. I was about to purchase it myself, and I know what it was worth to a dollar. At all events, they got possession of it, and spent money on it, and when the present government wanted to get connections with the wharf, these men asked a certain price, a very large price, but the government said: 'We cannot give you the price; we will have to expropriate and arbitrate,' which they did.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—And the arbitrators awarded more than the parties asked for it?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Yes, but the government was not bound to give that to them, owing to a condition. The other is a piece of railway which was debated in this House last session, which took a certain direction to come into the St. John depot, and was rather in the way of connections with the elevator and wharf, and the consequence was they had to remove this railway in another direction at the expense of the government. The wharf property was simply taken at what the arbitrators said it was worth and the government are now improving it by proper engineering skill. It is on the eastern side of the harbour, a shipping facility for the eastern portion of the city of St. John, and it has no connection with the western side, or the side which is occupied by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Will ships be able to come alongside ?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—No, only half way.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—With reference to the harbour of St. John, I wish people who know nothing about it would keep quiet. It is one of the first harbours on the coast of North America. There is nothing to compete with it, only the harbour of Portland in the state of Maine.

An hon. MEMBER—What about Halifax ?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I am not going to say anything about Halifax. St. John is a harbour that is open the year round. That is well known to everybody who will tell the simple truth about it. As to the improvements that are going on at St. John, anybody that would visit them and state the facts founded on good judgment would say that there is not one dollar being laid out there which is not being spent most cautiously, and after due and proper consideration by the best authorities we have on wharf and elevator construction. In fact, there is no complaint of jobbery and no honest man can make such a complaint. These things are well known to the people of St. John, who, if they saw anything going on which was wrong, we would soon hear from them. There is no opposition in St. John to anything that has been done for the last two or three years. What has been done has been a necessity to make the Intercolonial Railway what it was intended to be, a road for the benefit of Canada, and in its former position it was simply a road from Halifax terminating in the woods. It did not carry out the idea we had at confederation, which was that it should be a commercial road, and how could it be a commercial road until it got into a commercial city like Montreal? I am sure we should be all proud to think we have gentlemen with such clear insight that when they got into power they went immediately to work to have that road placed in a position that it will bring shipments to our Atlantic seaports, and will, in my opinion, yet be extended to Winnipeg and become a national road. That is what we should expect, and I hope people will not be so narrow minded and prejudiced against gentlemen who happen to be capable of looking at this thing in an expansive and commercial light, but that they will appreciate what is being done for Canada. The Intercolonial Railway is being made a paying work, and Canada in future will not be losing 75 or 100 thousand dollars a year as she has been in the past. If the government had not made improvements it would be a losing game for all time to come, and as soon as the improvements can be utilized, it is my opinion and the opinion of clever men in this country, that the Intercolonial will not only be paying its working expenses, but will be paying a handsome margin, and that is the reason we are so anxious in St. John that these improvements should be completed, and why we are so grateful that we had a government which, instead of allowing that public work which cost fifty millions, to be worthless to this Canada of ours, are making it self-sustaining.

THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE REDISTRIBUTION BILL.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the House adjourns I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to a return laid before the House yesterday, in answer to a motion of mine, with regard to the submission to eminent counsel in England of the question as to the powers of the parliament to deal with the Redistribution Bill. I notice that there are two defects in this return. First, there is no answer to the question as to the amount of fees or emoluments granted to the counsel for their opinion. Of course, if it was paid for by the Solicitor General himself, I would not press it, because I would consider it a private matter. Then, it seems to me, the Solicitor General has gone out of his way, in answering the question put to him by the Minister of Justice, to comment upon the arguments made by my hon. friend from Marshfield. If this came from any other one than a high dignitary like the Solicitor General, I should be inclined to use strong language. He says:

> I have seen it stated that the opinion is not reasoned, and is not as valuable as one that has been reasoned.

Then he comments upon that as follows:

> Those who think that counsel of such eminence as Blake, Haldane, Asquith, Carson and Robert Cecil give lightly opinions on an important question such as that involved in the case submitted to them, know little of the ethics of the English Bar.

When this question comes up for discussion I think that evidence can be produced to show that my hon. friend from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) was correct in the statement that he made, and the evidence will be produced of some of the parties from whom he asked this opinion. Why the Solicitor General should take upon himself to inform this House that the gentlemen who made a statement of that kind in this House know very little of the ethics of the English Bar, I cannot very well understand. If he had made that statement to the Minister of Justice himself, that would be a matter between themselves, but for the Solicitor General, a member of the other House, to take us to task and tell us we know nothing about that of which we speak, is going just a little beyond his province. In future if they would answer the questions asked without throwing out insinuations as to the ignorance of those who ask them, it would be more in consonance with the dignity of this House and the position of the Solicitor General. I mention this for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that that remark of the Solicitor General has nothing whatever to do with the question I put on the paper, and that the portion of the answer which is important, at least from my standpoint, on which the country should be informed, more particularly as the question asked of English counsel, was asked without the consent or knowledge of the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to hon. gentleman that the Solicitor General had a perfect right to ask for the opinion of anybody he thought proper upon that question, and he did ask it on his own responsibility as an eminent lawyer, as he is himself, of men of eminence at the English Bar. I agree with the view expressed by the Solicitor General with regard to the character of the opinion. I am perfectly sure of this, that no one of eminence at any bar would state the law inaccurately in an unreasoned opinion which he would state correctly on a reasoned opinion. The object of getting the reasoning is to satisfy the mind of the person to whom it is addressed that the opinion is sound. A man who expects a reasoned opinion is one who wants to judge of the soundness in point of law of the opinion which he seeks, but so far as the statement of the law is concerned, whether it is stated in a reasoned opinion or stated badly, I do not for a moment suppose that any gentleman of eminence at the English Bar would give a different opinion in the one case from that which he would express in the other. In both cases he states the law as he understands it. Now, when an important question was referred to the law officers of the Crown in England from the government of this country, that is the one relating to the Jesuits' Estates Act. I remember saying to the Prime Minister myself on that occasion, (because he consulted me with regard to it) that the opinion would be far more satisfactorily given by the law officers of the Crown if it were a reasoned opinion—that is, more satisfactory, I mean, to the public at large—who would see the process by which the law officers of the Crown arrived at the conclusions which they expressed, but they did not give a reasoned opinion. They gave just the bald statement of their conclusions in law, and yet I do not think that any member of that government thought that he received an opinion from the law officers of the Crown of a different character from what it would have been if it had been a reasoned opinion. I think my hon. friend will not question that, and so whatever he may think of the manner in which the opinion is expressed, I think that the Solicitor General is accurate in saying that the ethical considerations which govern gentlemen of the Bar on the other side of the Atlantic are of such a character that they would not give a legal opinion which is not a reasoned one differing wholly in point of conclusion from that which would be expressed in a reasoned opinion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—About the expense ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This opinion was sought by the Solicitor General for his own satisfaction, and whatever expense was incurred was incurred by him. There was no bill submitted by him to the government for counsel's fees in the case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the hon. gentleman is not aware whether it is to be paid for or not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not aware. My impression—I will not say that I am accurate—is the Solicitor General said to me that he paid for the opinion himself, but I am not sure.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am quite in accord with my hon. friend in the way he has put the question. The point is this : was the case submitted to the judges accurately stated upon the facts and upon the law. The question submitted by the Solicitor General is not in accordance with the facts as they exist, nor is it in accordance with the sentiments expressed by myself and others who supported that resolution, nor is the question put to these eminent counsel true in so far as it relates to the resolution which was passed by this House. Had there been any person there to point out to these gentlemen that the manner in which the case was placed before them was not accurate, they might have given a different opinion. I do not say that the opinion is incorrect, because the opinion is in accord with the resolution which was passed. There is nothing in that resolution that declares that the parliament of Canada have not the power, under the constitution, to legislate; on the contrary, that is the point on which I think we have reason to complain of the Solicitor General who submitted it to the law officers of the Crown.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The position which the hon. gentleman took himself (although I think he went very close to the line) and which some other hon. gentlemen took, was the census not having been taken since the last readjustment took place, there ought not to be a readjustment. That is not a legal question at all; that is a question of policy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the position I took.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But there were gentlemen in this House who argued that we had not the power to readjust the seats of members of the House of Commons, except after the census, and that the readjustment being once done, it was final for a period of ten years. I did not agree with that view, and that I think is the legal question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the legal question, but he has attributed to the Senate that which they did not do. That is what I contend.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It does not matter whether it is attributed to the Senate or to a man outside. Is the legal proposition correctly stated, and if it is, then the answer to that proposition is a pertinent answer.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The intention in asking this question of the eminent lawyers in London was to obtain a condemnation of the Senate's action. That is plain. There is no use trying to quibble about it. That was the intention. I do not remember if any hon. gentleman took the position that it was beyond the power of parliament to legislate in the way it was intended; but the position taken by the Senate as a body was not that parliament had not the power to legislate, but that it was not in accordance with the spirit of our institutions to do it at that time. I personally took the ground that parliament had the power, and I distinctly stated it, and the hon. leader of the opposition took the same position, and more particularly referred to the statement I had made, thereby making it clear that the Senate did take the position that parliament had the power to legislate in the matter, but that it was not a proper policy to do it at that time, and when this question was put to counsel in England in the way it had been put, it was with the intention of misleading the people of Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The statement made by my hon. friend I think was strongly contended for by my hon. friend from Marshfield. He took a more extreme view than I did upon this question of power, and he fortified that by opinions which he had received from eminent lawyers. Those opinions he had on his desk, and I read them with a great deal of care; though being a layman they did not change my opinion. My hon. friend from Manitoba has put it plainly. He says that it is a question of law, and had the question been put—has the parliament of Canada power to alter, change and amend the different constituencies, and they had said yes, then it would have been right; but that is not what the Solicitor General stated. What he said was this: The Bill has been rejected by the Senate on the ground that it is not within the constitutional competency of the parliament of Canada to legislate to alter the electoral divisions, save on the occasion of the decennial census. Now, that is not a correct statement of facts, as my hon. friend will see on reading the resolution which I moved, and the remarks which I made. The resolution was in fact voted for by a number of gentlemen in this House for the reason it was so guarded—because they would not commit themselves to the statement that parliament has not the power—my hon. friend from de Boucherville voted against it, because he thought it inferentially implied that; my hon. friend beside me voted for it because he thought it was sufficiently guarded, and other hon. gentlemen voted for it on the same ground. The Solicitor General did not submit a correct statement of the position of the Senate, and that is what I object to.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understand the hon. gentleman's position now. Of course I can express no opinion on that at present, because I laid the papers on the Table without having read them; but that does not alter in the slightest degree the legal features of the case. It does not matter whether the view of the Senate was accurately or inaccurately represented. The question is this: has the Parliament of Canada power, except immediately after the decennial census, to legislate on the redistribution of seats. The opinion there expressed is that the Parliament of Canada has such power. It does not matter who may have stated it, or who may not have stated it. The Solicitor General may have been mistaken as to the position which the Senate took. It is an accurate representation of the position taken by some members of the Senate, but it is a matter of no consequence as to what position this or that senator took. The important thing is, has the Parliament of Canada the power to reconsider the question of the redistribution of seats except immediately after the census, and does that Act tie the hands of parliament until the census is taken again?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no dispute on that point either in the other House or in this. What necessity is there for asking it except for the purpose of deceiving the people?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It certainly was not asked for the purpose of deceiving. It was asked because some hon. gentlemen in this House questioned the power of parliament to pass the Bill. The hon. gentleman admits himself that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) took that position, if I remember correctly the hon. gentleman from Calgary took that position, and other hon. gentlemen also, and I think they were all wrong.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Senate did not do it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It does not matter to me whether John Thompson or Joe Smith or any one else took the position. The question is a question of law, and the answer is a legal answer, and the opinion of these eminent counsel is that the parliament of Canada has the power, and it would be monstrous, in my opinion, if it had not. It would be an extraordinary position of things. Take for instance a condition of affairs which might exist in the province of Quebec. You might have a few members given to the entire French population, and two-thirds of the representation of the province of Quebec given to the English. Does any member of the Senate say that if such a measure existed it would not be the duty of this parliament to remedy the wrong and correct the injustice? I have no doubt on the matter, and the position taken by the hon. gentlemen who are on this side of the House, and who represent the Liberal party in the other House, is that a great wrong was done when the boundaries of counties were obliterated and the gerrymander Bill was carried, and that is a wrong that ought to be remedied and that a full and fair representation cannot be had in the House of Commons until that is remedied, and that the remedy ought to take place at the earliest possible period without any reference to the question of taking the census. That is, and always has been, our position and that position is upheld by the opinion which my hon. friend has in his hands.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Was not this opinion asked for and retained apparently on the ground that the Senate, as a body, had resisted that position?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—And objected to the measure on that ground solely? Because if the Senate as a body did not do so, surely the opinions of individual members would not be a justification for this submission.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend would be perfectly right if there was an attempt to fasten that opinion on the Senate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If it did, it was a mistaken view, but let me say this—it does not matter whether that opinion was attributed to the Senate or somebody else, so far as the merit of the answer is concerned.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No one says that. Supposing I were to put to a lawyer or to a police magistrate this question: my hon. friend the Minister of Justice stole a horse, did he break the law? That would imply that he had stolen a horse?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If I were to put the question this way: Would it be a contravention of the criminal law to steal a horse? it would be right enough.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If my hon. friend will look at the speech he made last year, he will see that he came as near saying the Senate had not the power——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not say anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman did not go so far: he looked in the ditch, but he would not jump.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There never was a question that I brought before the House that I considered more carefully than that. I did not take that position.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend agrees with us as to the law, but he complains that the Solicitor General was in error as to what he considered the opinion of the Senate was.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He stated a positive untruth; that is what I complain of.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This discussion has been very interesting although slightly out of order. I could understand if the Minister of Justice, or any responsible member of the government had asked for this opinion, his action would be a fair subject of criticism; but what appears to have taken place is this: The Solicitor General happened to be in England about the time this resolution was adopted here, and asked for an opinion, and if the country is not asked to pay for the opinion, I do not see what objection could be raised.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—He had no right to attribute a wrong position to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Solicitor General had left this country before the matter was discussed in the Senate. My hon. friend will remember that not merely the papers in England, but the vast majority of the newspaper press in this country assumed that the Senate had rejected the measure on the ground that the statement was on that question, and what is more, there is no doubt whatever the Solicitor General took the question as being in accordance with what was represented in the telegrams from this side of the Atlantic as the views of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—We will give the hon. gentleman the benefit of the doubt.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would make a suggestion that, as head of the Department of Justice, the hon. gentleman should instruct his subordinates not to put statements before eminent counsel without knowing the facts. Then the government will not be held responsible for them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The government cannot be held responsible; there were no instructions.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman repudiates the action of the Solicitor General, I have nothing more to say.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Solicitor General had the right to act on his own behalf, as any hon. gentleman here might.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Certainly, if he paid for the opinion himself.

The Senate adjourned.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION TO CANADA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) rose to Call the attention of the government to the question of Asiatic immigration to the Dominion of Canada and more particularly to that portion of it from Japan; and inquire if the government, when considering the subject of imposing an additional tax on Chinese, will at the same time give consideration to the question of taxing Japanese coming to Canada in a similar manner?

He said: This being a question only, it is not my intention to make any lengthy remarks. Some hon. gentlemen may remember that a poll tax was placed by parliament some years ago on Chinamen entering the Dominion—out of deference to the wishes of the workingman. At the time this was done the labouring class of Japan had not commenced to come to the Dominion, and in no way entered into competition with white labour, but in the last seven years that condition of things has changed. As many Japanese as Chinamen come into the country. In my opinion, and from my own observation, the Japanese are fully as objectionable as the Chinese are, and constitute a very undesirable class of immigrant, who ought to be subject to the same restrictions as the Chinese are. Being Asiatics as much as Chinamen are, but having shown pugnacity, and superior fighting qualities to the Chinese, the one country being weak and badly governed, and the other stronger, and better governed, is no valid reason for discrimination in taxation, which would display a certain amount of cowardice in oppressing the weak, who cannot retaliate, and favouring the strong, who could retaliate in certain ways. The Prime Minister of the Dominion has, I believe, informed the government of British Columbia that some legislation on the Chinese question will be introduced this session. If this is the case, the advisability of taxing Japanese the same as Chinamen will, I hope, be considered by the government. At the same time I would not approve of increasing the tax on Chinese. The present tax exercises a moderate, but sufficient restriction on that class. I wish merely to ask the government whether they will consider the question of taxing Japanese coming into Canada in the same way as Chinese are taxed.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Has the hon. gentleman any objection to including Galicians and Doukhobors with the Chinese and Japanese? We are paying an immense sum of money to import those two races into this country, and I think they are just as bad immigrants as the Chinese or the Japanese. I would much rather have a couple of hundred Chinese or Japanese as washermen. They never get drunk and never interfere in politics in any way. It is true they do not stay in the country. The reason is you do not let them bring their wives with them. A man has to pay the same tax on his wife as on himself to get her into the country, and he has not the money to do that. I do not know that I have much influence with the present government, but I hope they will not adopt the policy that the hon. gentleman from Victoria has requested them to pursue. He is very well versed with the scriptures and should know that the second prophecy, made in the time of Noah, was that the children of Japhet should dwell together in the tents of Shem. I understand Japhet to be the ancestor of the Caucasian race and Shem of the Chinese and Japanese, and the hon. gentleman is proceeding against common sense and the Scriptures.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I confess to some surprise at the question put by my hon. friend from British Columbia. I supposed that my hon. friend was greatly in favour of British connection and unity of the empire. Now, on this question, as to the relation of other nations to Canada, we are under obligations, unless we claim the right to set the Imperial authority at defiance, to conform ourselves to the treaty obligations of the mother country, and whatever my hon. friend may think, and whatever others on the Pacific coast may think, it would not be in the interests of this country to adopt hostile legislation towards the Japanese. Their trade and commerce are of very considerable importance to us. They come here and enter into active competition with white labour. There can be no doubt about that. In some cases they engage in labour that it is very difficult to get white men to perform. But whatever may be the evil arising from that, to make Japan an enemy of England instead of her ally, and to make her hostile to this country in respect of commerce would, in my opinion, not be good policy. I think that is the general feeling of the vast majority of the people of this country on both sides of politics, so that I can hardly think my hon. friend is serious in asking us whether we are going to legislate in such a way as to exclude the Japanese from this country. A Chinaman is in a somewhat different position. My hon. friends opposite, when in power, legislated in the direction of imposing a tax on Chinamen coming into the country to the extent of fifty dollars per head. I understand that most Chinamen who come to this side of the Pacific do not pay that tax directly themselves, but the parties who import them charge it against their wages. So far the tax has not been a deterrent. The subject, I may say, is under the attention of the government at the present time. About two thousand Chinamen, sometimes two or three hundred more, sometimes one hundred or two hundred less, come across the Pacific and land at Victoria or Vancouver every year. Those Chinamen, to a very large extent, remain in this country. I suppose some of these in British Columbia leave and some of those who come in take their places, but I apprehend that the Chinese population of Canada will be found to-day very nearly what it was ten or twelve years ago. Most of them find their way eastward, and seek an opportunity of crossing the border. They are contraband goods landed in Canada that is capable of ambulating across our border into the United States. That I think has been the condition of things almost since the time when Chinamen first began to come to this country. I do not suppose that if we were to succeed in excluding them we would produce any appreciable difference in the commerce of this country at the moment. It is said by some, and my hon. friend perhaps will know what foundation there is for the statement that the Chinamen who have come to this side of the Pacific to some extent become habituated to the use of wheat and wheat flour instead of rice and rice flour, and that when they go back to China they consume wheat, especially the softer varieties that are grown on this side of the ocean, and that if there were less restriction in the way of immigration there would be gradually a large increase in the consumption of North American wheat and wheat flour in China. I believe the Canadian Pacific Railway steamers carry a good deal of flour to China now, for consumption in that country. What the actual amount is each year I have not looked up and cannot say, but I was told by a gentleman of prominence connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway that there is a growing consumption of wheat in China, largely the result of Chinamen having been on this side of the Pacific. Then there is a further consideration. I believe that the amount contributed by Chinamen as passengers to the Canadian Pacific Railway steamers is between one-fourth and half a million of dollars a year, and I suppose if we could, by our legislation, successfully prevent Chinamen from crossing the Pacific Ocean and landing at Vancouver, we would make an appreciable difference in the revenues of the Canadian Pacific Railway steamers. All these are matters that require serious consideration both by the government and by the two Houses of parliament when we deal with this question. I know how strong the feeling is in British Columbia against Chinamen, and it may be very important that legislation should be had ; but I at the same time cannot close my eyes to the fact that that legislation may not be wholly advantageous. There may be disadvantages connected with it as well.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman is quite right in two matters he has mentioned—that the Chinese have not increased in the country during the last ten or twelve years. They keep coming and going, as the hon. gentleman says. With regard to the consumption of wheat and flour, I believe the Chinese do use wheat flour to some extent, and there is a large trade between this country and Japan—larger than that with China—in wheat. The Japanese, with their usual energy and thrift, are now importing wheat and grinding their own flour so as to have the profit of manufacturing flour amongst themselves. With regard to Chinamen coming in whose tax is paid by their masters, that makes no difference whatever ; the deduction is made from their wages. The danger is that Japanese come in free, paying nothing to the revenue, and cause the same difficulty and compete with white labour as the Chinese do, and I thought it my duty to bring the matter before the government knowing what I do about the Japanese coming in and seeing how they conduct themselves, because they drink a good deal and gamble, and are not at all desirable immigrants.

THE LATE CLERK OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to make a motion which I think will meet with the general approbation of the House. I move, seconded by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition :

That in view of the long and faithful services of Mr. Edouard J. Langevin, the late Clerk of the Senate, he be continued an honorary officer of this House, and allowed the entrée of the Senate and a seat at the Table on occasions of ceremony.

This motion is exactly the same as that adopted some years ago upon the retirement of Mr. Langevin's predecessor.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I second the motion with a great deal of pleasure, and I do so because of the long services of Mr. Langevin, not only in this Chamber, but as Under Secretary of State and other capacities during the last 35 or 40 years. Everybody who knows that gentleman knows that he has been most conscientious in the performance of his duties : whether he has met with the approval of all is entirely outside the question and could not be expected. Those with whom he has been associated in the department of the Secretary of State, as well as those of us in this Chamber, know that he has been most conscientious and faithful in the performance of the duties which have fallen to his lot so far as in him lies, and in following the precedent set in 1884 in the retirement of Mr. Lemoine, I think we are only taking a step which is due to an old and faithful officer.

The motion was agreed to.

TICKET OF LEAVE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (B) 'An Act to amend an Act to provide for the conditional liberation of penitentiary convicts.'

He said : A Bill to provide for the conditional liberation of penitentiary convicts was introduced by me in this House last year. It was carried through parliament and is now acted upon in the administration of our penitentiaries. Under it those who have committed offences for the first time, after being confined for a portion of the time for which they are sentenced, and having been industrious and having conducted themselves properly, and being so reported by the officers of the penitentiary, we have granted tickets of leave, or license of parole, to such convicts and permitted them to go at large under a certain degree of surveillance. A good many during the past four or five months have been discharged from the penitentiary and are engaged in the ordinary pursuits of labour in different parts of the country. So far as I know at the present time there is but one of those who have been discharged who has shown a disposition to return to criminal pursuits. That party has been arrested and will be tried for the offence, and if convicted will be obliged to serve the time for which he is sentenced in the penitentiary, together with that portion of his prior term that has not expired. On the whole, I think the measure is working very satisfactorily here, as it is in the United Kingdom and in most of the states of the American Union where it has been tried. There are a good many young men who are sentenced for crime to the penitentiaries who are not naturally of the criminal class, men who have gone astray perhaps from the want of proper control or proper training, from bad association, and who continue in their lives or pursuits of lawlessness until they are brought up before some judge or administrator of justice and sentenced to imprisonment in the jails, the central prison, or the penitentiary, or some reformatory. Last year the Bill which I introduced to this House provided for the discharge on parole of convicts confined in the penitentiary. It did not extend to the jails, and it was not extended to the central prison, and so at the present time we can only shorten the sentence of those confined in the jails or central prison by an absolute pardon. Sometimes we find this to be the case : two or three young men commit some theft or other depredation. They may be mere boys. The leader amongst them is sentenced for over two years and therefore goes to the penitentiary. The others are sentenced for a shorter period of time and are sent to the central prison or to the common jail. Sometimes, upon representations being made and full inquiry had into the cases from the police in the district, or from the judge who tried the case, or both, we find it necessary, after the party has been in the penitentiary for a time, to grant him a parole. He is the chief offender. We think it is in his interest that he should be let out under the surveillance that is exercised over him, but we have no power under the law to release the less serious offender who is confined in the central prison or in the jail, and the only way that we can discharge him is by an absolute pardon, and so we lose all control over him. There is a great advantage in the surveillance that is exercised. It has a deterring influence. It prevents a young man going back to his old haunts and associating with his old companions. He has got into difficulty before and appreciates his liberty, and therefore he avoids associating with them lest he should again get into trouble. When he has been for the balance of his term of sentence, whatever it may be, enjoying his liberty under surveillance, new habits may be formed and the risk of reverting again to criminal pursuits may be gone altogether. Men are in a very large degree the creatures of habit. I remember reading an account of a man who lived in Edinburgh who had adopted the practice of touching every verandah post along the street as he passed, and it became so confirmed a habit with him that if he missed one he turned about and went back to touch it before he went on with his journey, even though he might be in a hurry. In the same way boys, who get in the habit of doing wrong and associating together, are influenced by that association, and the result of the action of each is the combined result of the disposition to do wrong of all put together, and in that respect our experience corresponds with the experience of other countries, that the discharge under surveillance has a good effect upon those who are enjoying their liberty upon condition. In order to carry out this policy fairly, if we find it safe to discharge on parole the more serious offenders, I think we shall find it equally safe to discharge upon parole those who are less serious offenders who have not been sent to the penitentiary, but have been confined for a time in the jail or sent to the central prison. And this is my object in introducing this very short measure. It practically consists of one section, which will read as a part of the Act and so we simply carry out the principle of the law adopted last year and which so far has worked very satisfactorily.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—In my opinion there is altogether too much sympathy extended towards the criminals of this country. The percentage of criminals in Canada is very small as compared to the entire population, and while we may be desirous of doing some good to the criminal class, we at the same time should take care that we do not disregard the rights and privileges of the great masses of the community. I can very easily understand that if this Bill is carried out in its present form it will result in almost a complete exodus from the different jails and reformatories of this country, and in a very short time we will have the country deluged with ticket of leave men. It will require a very great deal of consideration on the part of the Minister of Justice to maintain a proper regard to the feelings I have indicated, and to show at any rate that whatever is done will be done in the best interests of the country, and upon the best evidence that can be produced. I can very easily understand that from a humane sentiment the Minister of Justice wishes to procure this legislation, but I think we should go a little further and ascertain whether it is likely to have the desired effect. In my opinion, if we send a criminal to a jail or reformatory for a limited time without giving him a sufficient opportunity for reform, when he comes out the last state of that man will be worse than the first. We know from experience that hardened criminals generally look to the consequence of their acts. If they find that they can get relief through the aid of their friends, by petitions or otherwise, the result will be that a great many people will be turned loose upon society. If you merely confine a young man to a jail or prison for a limited time, he will return to his old haunts and the probability is that he will resume his former career. If the evidence is sufficient to justify the decision of the judge, let the decision be such that it is impossible to modify it except for very cogent reasons, but in this case the Minister of Justice will be encircled, to a very great extent, by people who are desirous of getting parties liberated from jail after a very few months' incarceration. I do not believe in that policy at all. When criminals know that excessive punishment will be inflicted for crime they will be less likely to commit crime.

Now, for instance, garotting was a very prevalent crime here some time ago; the very moment the law was changed and the lash was substituted for imprisonment as a punishment, that crime ceased. In cases where capital punishment has been done away with, crime has increased considerably. An these matters ought to be taken into consideration before coming to a decision to make a wholesale change of this nature. It is desirable that the facts should be looked into. The sending of a criminal to jail should be looked upon as a punishment, as a severe punishment, not merely as a temporary residence in a certain place. It should be continuous for the term of the sentence. I am brought to this conclusion by a most remarkable circumstance that took place in this city recently. A young man in the employ of the city council was tried and convicted on the charge of stealing money from his employers. Application was made to the Minister of Justice for the release of this young man. The Minister of Justice, under the circumstances, acting upon what he considered, I suppose, was right, was induced to liberate the prisoner. I shall read the report that has been circulated respecting this case. It will give a pretty good insight into what may be done if the Minister of Justice will listen to the seductive applications made for one purpose or another. I shall state the case as it was reported in the papers a few days ago. It is very pertinent to this bill and shows that a great deal of good judgment and discrimination will be required in carrying out this law in the future should it be placed on the statute book. I take the opportunity of saying that I acquit the Minister of Justice of consciously doing a wrong act. He has been sadly imposed on by a member of this community whose character is anything but what it ought to be. If the Minister had taken the trouble to look into the matter he would not have acted upon this man's representations without corroborative evidence. No credence should be placed on the allegations of this man who has been the cause of trouble in this city for some considerable time. I am very sorry that I am obliged to bring up a local matter in this way. I would not have thought of doing it but for the fact that this bill is now before us and this case furnishes an illustration of what may occur in the future if proper safeguards are not provided :

The case of Ollie Mann, the civic clerk convicted of embezzlement, sent to penitentiary, and soon pardoned by the Minister of Justice, has assumed a remarkable aspect, or rather series of aspects.

The first surprise the public received was the pardon.

The second surprise was the publication of a letter given by the Minister of Justice to Mann or his relatives stating why the pardon was granted. This letter Ald. W. D. Morris produced in the city council.

The third surprise was a statement from the Minister of Justice that his letter to Mann had been given on the understanding that it was not to be made public, nor used except to aid Mann to get a situation here or elsewhere.

The fourth surprise is the discovery just made that the pardon of Mann was due to the action of Ald. W. D. Morris, who had written a private letter to the Minister of Justice, signed 'Chairman of the (civic) Investigation Committee,' making certain statements.

The letter which the Minister of Justice gave to Mann reciting reasons for the pardon seemed peculiar enough. In effect it said that the Minister had looked into the evidence and found Mann to be little worse than some other people; also that the civic administration was unwarrantably loose; so the Department of Justice decided to let Mann off. It was a bit hard to understand the logic of this letter of the minister. Imagine a citizen murdered by a gang of roughs; one thug caught, convicted and sentenced to be hanged; then the Minister of Justice pardoning the murderer on the ground that the murderer was not much worse than others of the gang who had not been convicted. Most of us would fancy that a ruling of that kind by the Department of Justice tended to put our throats to undesirable risk. It would look as if a cut-throat, to practise his art with considerable margin of safety, would only have to secure a sufficient number of associates to render it likely that some would escape the police. If himself caught, he might hope to be pardoned because not much worse than his chums who got away, or because the administration of law was not strict enough to prevent them committing murder.

Or, taking the exact offence which Mann committed, any clerk in any business house in this city might hope to be pretty safe in stealing money if he could persuade all the other clerks in the place to steal too. With a sufficient number, some would be likely to escape prosecution or conviction: then the others might be pardoned because they were possibly not much worse, and because the business firm's administration must have been loose when so many clerks were able to steal.

The above seems somewhat of a parallel to the minister's view of the Mann case. The 'Journal' nevertheless did not comment on the pardon, supposing it to be granted for adequate legal reasons. Even after the letter came out, given by the Minister of Justice to Mann, it seemed best to make no comment. In the letter, the minister said that he had looked into the evidence on which Mann was convicted, the supposition was natural that he meant merely the evidence given in court, upon which the minister was much more likely to place a correct legal interpretation than a newspaper could.

But the revelation now that Ald. Morris had written privately to the Minister of Justice, and the nature of Ald. Morris' communication, which has just come to light, seem to have a very material bearing on the position. The nature and contents of the Morris communication, to be plain, raise a suspicion that the Minister of Justice acted wholly or chiefly upon 'evidence' of another kind than that given in court. It gives to the matter an aspect which justifies criticism.

Ald. Morris, it appears, sent to the Minister of Justice, in support of his claim for the pardon of Mann, simply a copy of Auditor Neff's report on civic finances, accompanied by a number of Ald. Morris' own views of what the report meant. No court testimony was quoted or inclosed by Ald. Morris. Is it possible that the Minister of Justice swallowed the private letter of Ald. Morris, without reference to other quarters? Is it possible Mann's pardon was based chiefly by the minister upon the opinions of Ald. Morris? It looks like it, from the fact that the minister's letter to Mann regarding the pardon embodies in part much the same words as Ald. Morris' prior letter to the minister. The suspicion is decidedly unpleasant that action by the Department of Justice in Canada can be influenced in this one-sided and secret way.

Of course, there is this to be said, that Ald. Morris signed the letter as chairman of the civic investigation committee. The minister had perhaps a right to assume that Ald. Morris spoke for the city council of Ottawa. Inasmuch as the council and investigation committee had no knowledge of Ald. Morris' action, it is difficult to see a justification for the signature the alderman used. As he was asking the pardon of a criminal who had stolen civic money, he should either have acted with the knowledge of the council, or should have been careful to specify to the minister that he did so purely as a private individual—particularly as he called in question the characters of other persons.

Really is not the whole business something quite out of the ordinary? And very different from what the public has a right to expect from either the Department of Justice or any self-respecting public representative.

This is, I believe, the whole truth, or pretty nearly so, as contained in the letter of Alderman Morris written on his own responsibility, without the consent of the city council. I look upon it as obtaining a letter on false pretenses, and I think this man ought to be indicted for such an action. If the Criminal Code does not provide a punishment for it, provision should be made to meet such cases. He had no more right to send that letter as emanating from the city council, whose servant he was, than I had. Therefore, it was reprehensible on the part of Alderman Morris and misleading to the Minister of Justice. I believe if the minister had known him, as I know him, he would never have granted this pardon or accepted the statements of Alderman Morris without having them supported. A great wrong has been done. What was the result of this? Immediately after the return of Mann to the city, the first thing he did was to combine with this man Morris for the purpose of trying to convict other men who had been employed with him in the city service. He did not show any contrition for his offence but actually went to work deliberately with this man Morris for the purpose of doing further evil to the people for whom he certainly should have had a different feeling. It is reprehensible on the part of Alderman Morris, and it shows how difficult it will be to carry out these pardons unless all the points of evidence are so studied as to be beyond all contradiction. I believe this man has been for some time trying his best to malign respectable citizens of Ottawa to an extent unequalled in the annals of any country. He adopted this step, not that he cared whether the prisoner was released or not, but that Mann would be an instrument to enable him to accomplish an object he had in view for a long time. As far as the young man is concerned, he very naturally told the Minister that he was anxious to get employment—that he did not want to remain here, and that he wanted some kind of certificate to show that, as far as the Minister was concerned, he had no objection. The Minister very kindly gave it to him. He indited the letter in this way I believe "To whom it may concern." It was taking advantage of the Minister's kindness, and they have done a great wrong. It is only right that this subject should come up in the Senate at this time, particularly when this measure is before us, because if it becomes law there will be many persons appealing to the Minister for the clemency that may be extended to them by this Act, and the Minister of Justice will have a great deal of trouble to discover in the future whether advantage has been taken of his good nature. It is essential, when these men are liberated for sufficient cause, that the sentence should be a deterrent to them and to all similar cases in the future. Criminals take every care to inquire into the character of the punishment to be inflicted on them should they be convicted, and in my judgment it should be perfectly understood that there will be no mitigation of the punishment except for good and sufficient cause. I am very sorry that it is necessary to bring this matter up, but it may have a bearing on the discussion of the measure before us. I have no desire to interfere with the Minister of Justice. He knows and has opportunities of knowing, better than I have, what has been the effect of these liberations in other countries, and probably he will give us statistics to show that this legislation is desirable. Another fact is worthy of attention, and that is these prisoners are sent to the reformatories and penitentiaries at great cost to the country. The majority of the convicts are better cared for and better fed at the expense of the country than in their own homes. It costs more, I believe, to support such men in the penitentiaries than most working men have to pay for the support of themselves and families. That is decidedly wrong. They should, of course, be properly fed and taken care of, but when we find that in many jails of this country the prisoners are provided for at the cost of six or eight cents a day, and the cost of maintaining convicts is far above this figure, I do not see any justification for it. There must be extravagance somewhere, or they are better taken care of than they should be. I know that the cost of supporting a man in a shanty, with all the expense of transportation, is fifteen cents to eighteen cents per day. If that is the case, why should it cost so much money to maintain these prisoners in the way they are maintained? I wish someone had taken up this matter who is better qualified to discuss it than I am. I simply state my views and it is for the House to decide, because it is a very important question. If we pass this bill as it is now, in a very short time jails will be emptied, and criminals will return to their old haunts, and instead of its being a benefit, it may be the reverse to the community generally. I acquit the Minister of Justice of any conscious wrong-doing in the case of Mann. He was imposed upon by parties who were interested in getting this prisoner released. I have nothing to say about the young man. He committed a grave crime, for which he was punished. He should have been allowed to remain in the penitentiary for a sufficient time to reform, so that when he came out he would be a better citizen and better able to do his duty here or elseewhere.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The arguments and illustrations that my hon. friend from Ottawa has brought against this Bill have really no applicability. The hon. gentleman has introduced into the discussion a matter that has been a source of agitation between members of the city council, rather from personal motives than anything else. I do not propose to go into a discussion of the question whether Mann was properly released or not. It has no applicability to this Bill. He was not released on ticket of leave, but was pardoned, and I believe there were sufficient reasons for his pardon. The reports were all favourable and the grounds upon which he was enlarged, although not made public, are, I believe, sufficient to justify the course of the Minister of Justice. My hon. friend is very much disturbed lest this country should be inundated with convicts under the present system of enlarging. Up to the present time, I think I am quite within the record when I say that of all the criminals of the whole Dominion—and they must number in the penitentiaries between two and three thousand—the number at present enlarged under license would not be more, probably, than forty or fifty. That average would be greater than the average that would extend over the whole year, for the reason that those whose cases might fairly be thought worthy of favourable consideration were considered when the Act came in force. The convicts in the penitentiaries that would probably be enlarged under this Bill would not probably exceed five of six per cent of the whole number, a very small fraction. This Bill simply extends to those who are confined in jails and special prisons—I believe there is only one special prison in the country,—the Central prison.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And the Reformatory at Penetanguishene.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Bill is simply enlarging a principle which has already been acquiesced in by the House, and which has been found to work satisfactorily wherever tried in the United States, England and Germany. As a rule, the parties who have been enlarged by these tickets of leave have reformed. They have come under happier auspices; they have repented of their offences and have become good members of society. It is very much better that that encouragement should be given to them—that a stimulus to better behaviour should be offered, and the experience of all countries is that the system has worked well, and therefore it is one that ought to be extended to Canada. But the proportion of those who can avail themselves of this privilege is very limited. It is only when the authorities are amply satisfied that it is in the best interests, not only of the culprit, but of society, from the evidence they have given during the term of their imprisonment that they have reformed their lives, that confidence may be reposed in allowing them to be at large. Mr. Mann's case, as I have said, is not one that is relevant to the question, and it is exceedingly unfortunate that it has been introduced in this debate. The prominence it has received is due entirely to the bickering of certain members of the city council. Mr. Mann, no doubt, has behaved very badly indeed in giving up this letter of the Minister of Justice to Ald. Morris to be used as a mode of stabbing at somebody else in the city council. The letter was given because it was supposed that Mann was going to seek employment elsewhere. It was a general letter, not addressed to any one in particular, indicating that his conduct was such as to create the belief that hereafter he would be worthy the confidence of those by whom he might be employed.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I said so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman knows that it was very improperly used by Mr. Morris. Mann acted very improperly in giving it up. It was never intended for any such purpose, but the feeling in the city council was so strong that Mr. Morris was able to get it for Mann for the purpose of making an attack on certain other persons employed in the office of the City Treasurer. The whole thing is exceedingly discreditable to those who have made an improper use of this letter, but it has no possible bearing on this case. Mann was pardoned on grounds that were considered amply sufficient to justify the action taken by the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not opposed to the principle of this Bill, so far as it relates to the extension. If there is any class of prisoners to whom it should apply, it is to those who have committed minor crimes. The objection would be to apply it to cases where criminals have been incarcerated for greater and more serious crimes ; hence I think that the position taken by the Minister of Justice in extending it to the ordinary jails and reformatories and Central prison is not objectionable, because the character of prisoners in these institutions is very often of that kind that has been graphically described by the minister himself, who have been led into crime without being really hardened criminals. The hardened criminals are generally those who go through two or three prisons. My hon. friend says the case cited by the hon. gentleman from Rideau Division is not applicable, because in that case an absolute pardon was granted and not a ticket of leave. So far, logically, the hon. gentleman is correct, but I do not think it was at all out of place that my hon. friend from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Clemow) should call attention to so grave a charge as is made in the article he has just read. Unless the Minister of Justice was imposed upon in this case, it is difficult to understand how he gave a letter of recommendation to the prisoner, which, as the paper says, was for the purpose of enabling him to get a situation with other people. Unless the minister from the evidence, was convinced that there was no criminal act on the part of Mann, I might humbly express the opinion that the letter ought not to have been given, and while I agree with the hon. Secretary of State that in the divulging of that letter by Ald. Morris he may have committed a gross breach of confidence. the great error to my mind was in the Minister of Justice giving such a letter—that is if the letter is of the character indicated in that published article, which of course I cannot vouch for, because I have not seen it. It must present itself to the mind of every one that when a criminal has been convicted by the courts and sent to jail, there must have been good evidence that he had transgressed the laws of the country and in this case I believe it was one of flagrant embezzlement of city funds. The clerk who embezzles his master's money cannot be held less guilty, it strikes me, than those who may have induced him to do it, and this article says that he was pardoned by the Minister of Justice for the reason that he was no worse than others, which seems to me scarcely a good reason for granting a pardon.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I can scarcely conceive it possible that the Minister of Justice would write such a letter, or grant a pardon for such a reason, but if he did grant a pardon for the reasons indicated in the article read by the hon. Senator from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Clemow), then I hesitate not to say that, in my opinion, the Minister of Justice did positively wrong. I do think that it is within the province of any one sitting in this House or the other House, to call the attention of the public to the reasons which may have been given by a Minister of Justice for granting a pardon or a ticket of leave. It is well that the public should know, if that power which is placed in the hands of the minister be abused, in order that there may be publicity of an act of that kind. It would do much to deter him from repeating the mistake. To say abuse would simply that that would be an intentional act on the part of the minister, but if it is done through error and by the misrepresentation of those with whom he has been in communication, why then the crime, if such I may term it, or the wrong done by the Minister of Justice is not as great if it were done designedly. So that any publicity that is given to a case of that kind, or any comment that may be made upon it, is quite within the province of any member of parliament, as it gives the minister an opportunity of making such explanations as may satisfy the public. That article must lead any one reading it, knowing nothing of the facts, to but one conclusion, namely that the minister had been imposed upon, and consequently that he had given a letter recommending a man who had been convicted of a crime, to enable him to go away and get a situation with others where he might repeat the crime. I must express the opinion again that I can scarcely think it possible that the hon. gentleman gave such an opinion. I think the hon. Minister of Justice, who has been attacked, ought to be thankful to the hon. gentleman from Rideau (Mr. Clemow) for bringing the matter before this body, in order that he can set himself right and disabuse the minds of the people who have read it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know that I can agree with everything which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has said respecting this matter. It is most undesirable that the perogative of the Crown that is exercised in respect to pardon should be made a matter of parliamentary discussion if it can be avoided. It is perhaps of all the duties that a minister has to discharge the most delicate, and that being so, the fact of constant parliamentary discussion of the exercise of the power of prerogative must lead to the practice of abstaining from advising its exercise altogether. For if a public man is to run the gauntlet of constant criticism and misrepresentation on the part of the press for the advice he gives His Excellency with regard to a matter of this sort, I think the effect would be that he would say that the responsibility rested with the judge who sentenced the party to the jail for a limited period of time, and that he declined to advise any interference on behalf of the Sovereign. The practise in England, as I mentioned here the other day, is that unless there is something coming to the knowledge of the minister in connection with the matter, in which he thinks there was an error of judgment or a failure of justice, that subject is not made a matter of parliamentary discussion, but is left entirely with the Secretary of State or the home department. In this matter, in order that the House might form a judgment with regard to the propriety of advising the pardon of Mann or not, let me say that it would be necessary to have all the papers before each member of the House that was before me when I was called upon to discharge that duty. There is, for instance, the report of the judge, to which my hon. friend did not refer, but to which very great importance is always attached. And yet that is not a communication that I can bring down to parliament, because it is always confidential, as the report of my deputy is which I am called upon to present to His Excellency, and if we were to permit the report of the judges to be brought down to parliament and made the subject of adverse criticism, as they would be if they were made the subject of critisism at all, the deterring effect upon the judge would be like the deterring effect that would practically reach the minister : the judge would give you the baldest possible report and abstain from anything which would expose him to adverse criticism in either House of parliament. Then there is another consideration. Sometimes prisoners have their sentences commuted simply because the surgeon of the institution says that some great critical calamity will overtake them if they are kept there, that a man is in danger of dying unless he is discharged. My hon. friend will remember a case in the city of Quebec where the Minister of Justice discharged a party and pardoned him, not because he merited pardon himself, but simply because practically the sentence pronounced upon him and the punishment would become the punishment of death, instead of being a confinement for a certain period of time, and in all these cases the minister, upon such a report being made, has to assume the responsibility of giving advice. There was such a report in this case, as my hon. friend would have seen if he had called upon me, as I would have shown him the papers. With regard to the letter I gave Mr. Mann, and which was most improperly used, I may say, in the first place, that the letter was asked by the young man's mother from me because she said her son was discontented here, felt that he ought to go away, and he wanted to join Lord Strathcona's Horse. He had gone to Colonel Steele and told him that he wished to join the force. I believe he was rather an efficient member of the force here, had had a good deal of drill, was a good horseman, and Colonel Steele was disposed to accept his offer, but he said to Colonel Steele, 'I cannot join the force without telling you that I was a convict sentenced to the penitentiary and have been released.' Colonel Steele wanted to know something about the circumstances. I do not know Colonel Steele personally. I had never met him and had no acquaintance with him, and I said to Mrs. Mann, 'I will write a letter to your son and he can call for it at five o'clock in the afternoon.' I dictated the letter to my secretary after he came there, and it was handed to him. It was addressed 'To whom it may concern,' simply because I did not know Colonel Steele. It was not intended to reach any other party, and that was thoroughly understood by the young man's mother when I told her I would give her that communication. It was to be used for one purpose, namely to obtain employment. It was to enable him to join the force, where he might be efficient, and to go to another country where, if he desired to remain, he would have an opportunity of beginning life again. Those are the circumstances. There may have been an error of judgment, but I did not think so, and I do not think so yet. I wished to give him an opportunity in life, if he desired it, without doing anybody wrong and without concealing anything, I didn't go into a discussion of the case. I did not say how far the report of the surgeon had influenced me in the conclusions I had reached. I did not say how far the communication of the judge had influenced me. I assumed the responsibility of these matters, but I did state that the business of the office of the treasurer had been very loosely conducted, that it had been open to a number of persons, as well as to this young man, to take money from the till, that the practice had been to put in their I O U's for the money taken out, but whether the I O U's correctly represented that sum or not was not known, and there was a great deal connected with the case, without saying whether any one intended to be dishonest or not, which showed a very great deal of looseness. My hon. friend from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Clemow) thinks that everybody ought to be in the penitentiary who has been sentenced to go there. I do not take that view. There are some young men who are a good deal better out, as long as they are under surveillance, because they are removed from the most hardened class, the wicked and lawless class of people, the old offenders in the penitentiary. One man wrote to me a few days ago, and I have his letter in my possession at present, in which he says 'I was discharged from the penitentiary. I have been four times employed since my discharge. I have been four times dismissed from the service of those in whose employment I was, not because I did any wrong, but simply because it was known that I had been in the penitentiary.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that the Holden case ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it is another case, which occurred very recently. This man wrote to me asking if it was possible that some employment could be found for him—could I find some one who would give him employment, knowing the fact that he had been in the penitentiary, because he said the moment it became known it seemed to be a barrier against his obtaining employment or the opportunity of earning an honest living. I dare say that there is a good deal of that feeling. It is natural that it should be so, because men do not know how far they may trust one who has been a violator of the law.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not strike me that the hon. gentleman from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Clemow) is deserving of censure for having called attention to Mann's case, because attention had already been directed to the case in the press, and it was desirable that the minister should have an opportunity of making the explanation which he has made. There were some things which the hon. gentleman from Rideau said which I agreed with, and I think that his observations deserve the consideration of the Minister of Justice and of all those who are engaged in the work of administering justice in this country. One point the hon. gentleman made was that criminals were too well treated, and I think there is a good deal of force in that. In some places—I do not speak of the penitentiaries—in the jails and other local prisons the prisoners are too well treated. They have nothing to do, and they are well fed and lodged, and better off than honest men who earn their living outside. I know that in Halifax it was rather a common thing for a man who had been doing odd jobs during the summer, earning enough money to get liquor and enjoy himself, when the weather began to get cold to commit some offence which would send him to the city prison for ninety days. He boarded there for ninety days, until the weather became suitable, and then went out. But, fortunately, a new governor was appointed, prisoners had to work harder, and since the change boarding at Rockhead prison has not been as comfortable nor as fashionable as before. I think they should get enough food, but it should be very plain, and they should be made to work. I have often thought that the prisoners in jails and lock-ups might be utilized to improve the condition of the roads and streets in their vicinity, and further, that would exhibit them to the public, which would have a deterrent effect. There were one or two points in the Bill to which I thought it desirable to direct the attention of the Minister of Justice. The first clause reads :

> The provisions of chapter 49 of the statutes of 1899, intituled 'An Act to provide for the conditional liberation of Penitentiary Convicts,' shall apply to all persons convicted of any offence and being under sentence of imprisonment in any jail or other public or reformatory prison.

I agree with the hon. leader of the opposition that if this ticket of leave system is to apply to grave offenders who are confined in the penitentiary, the reason for applying it to persons guilty of trivial offences is still greater ; but I have some doubts—and I trust the minister will consider the point—as to the speedy release of the lad who is confined in a reformatory. A boy is sent to a reformatory for the purpose of being reformed rather than being punished, and if he is let out after a very short time, the reforming process is cut short, and I trust that even though the Minister of Justice may have the power to release a lad from a reformatory, that that power shall be rarely exercised. The better way is for the lad to stay in the reformatory a sufficient time to enable them to accomplish something in the way of reforming him. I should be glad to see the word "reformatory" struck out of the clause. The power to let boys out of reformatories is a power which should be used with great caution. As to the form of the Bill, it should state that the form of the ticket of leave which is embodied in the original statute should be modified so as to include the other prisons. The form in the statute applies only to the penitentiaries. I do not know that it is absolutely necessary, but it is perhaps better on the whole that this Bill should state that the form be altered to meet that.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The hon. gentleman's objection to including reformatories does not appear to me to have force, because any case of that kind would be dealt with on its merits, in the same way as the case of a convict in a penitentiary. The Minister of Justice would not think of allowing a lad to go if the circumstances of the case were such that it appeared to him, in his judgment, it was better for the lad to remain where he was.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We would not let him out except on the advice of the officer in charge of the institution.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—This Bill is framed by those who have taken great interest in prisons, and the treatment of crime ; and I think the retention of this power with regard to those confined in other places besides the penitentiaries, if properly exercised, will be of great benefit, and it ought not to be stricken from the Bill.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I should like to make a few observations upon this Bill. I have listened with very much interest and profit to the discussion. I am thoroughly satisfied that the Bill which passed into law last session was legislation in the right direction. I am equally satisfied in my own mind that the proposed legislation now before this House is also a further step in the right direction, and I can only say that I am entirely in accord with the hon. gentleman from York (Hon. Mr. Allan) that if this conditional release can be applied to convicts in the penitentiary, much more should it be applicable to persons incarcerated in jails, central prisons and reformatories for minor offences. Until the Act of last session, there was this state of things existing. An application would be made for executive clemency, and the Minister of Justice, in many cases, while he felt, I have no doubt, that he could not advise executive clemency which meant unconditional pardon, would like to have some compromise between these two. I have had an experience of prosecuting criminals for many years, and I know from conversations with judges presiding at trials, and with others competent to pronounce an opinion, that they entirely approve of the legislation enacted last session, and the extension that is now proposed by this Bill. Many judges, especially in cases of minor offences and minor offenders, think it better where in the exercise of a wise and sound discretion they can do so, to allow a person charged with and even convicted of an offence, to go upon suspended sentence. The effect of that is more salutary, in the opinion of the judge who so disposes of the case, than imprisonment. The very consciousness of the sentence hanging over a prisoner has a very salutary effect upon his future conduct. Now, I suppose the object of all punishment is to deter others from committing offences, and what I consider even more important than that, the reformation of the party immediately concerned. The penitentiary, no doubt, is a very good place to punish a convict, but I question whether too long an imprisonment is the best way to reform a criminal. It is said that evil communications corrupt good manners. I think evil communications may make bad manners even worse, and I have always felt that it would be well if, after imprisonment for a time, convicts should be allowed to go at large conditionally, knowing that they are not pardoned, knowing that they are still liable to be rearrested and imprisoned. I believe a consciousness of that will be very salutary upon the walk and conversation of the person so conditionally liberated. I am glad that there seems to be such unanimity of sentiment in favour of the legislation now proposed, and I have no doubt that the operation of this Act in the future will be such as its most sanguine supporters expect of it. I am sure that whoever happens to be the Minister of Justice for the time being will exercise a wise and sound discretion. It is not a fair argument against the principle of any measure to argue from a case that has been a partial failure or mistake, but only from a number of cases in which the law has had a beneficial operation. I shall have the greatest satisfaction in supporting the Bill. I am sure that it will meet with the hearty concurrence of the public. I have been prosecutor in many cases in which prisoners are now undergoing sentence in the penitentiary, and while I could not recommend, or the presiding judge could not see his way clear, in his report to the Minister of Justice, to recommend unconditional pardon, I have no doubt that in a great many cases they would be very glad of the opportunity to recommend that a conditional pardon be granted, such as will be effected by the license proposed with the conditions endorsed. I think it is better to err on the side of mercy than on the side of vengeance. 'To err is human, to forgive divine,' and at any rate we will show by the course we are taking that we still have some hope for the reformation of offenders, and that we desire to give them an opportunity to show that they can work out their future course and live down the disgrace under which they must be for a length of time. I therefore cordially support the Bill.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

SUPREME COURT OF THE NORTH-WEST TERITORIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (C) 'An Act respecting the Supreme Court of the North-west Territories.' He said: At the present time there is no Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the North-west Territories.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do you call it 'Supreme Court'?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is the title. My hon. friend called it that.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C)—It is the same in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is merely for the purpose of enabling us to name one of the judges as Chief Justice. At the present time there is no such party, and there are five judges now; but except as to difference of seniority, they are all on a footing of equality. They are puisne judges. When we go into committee on the Bill I shall make some small verbal alterations. From the representations that have been made to me, and the rapid growth of settlements in the country. I think that we ought to have the power of appointing one more judge, if necessary. There are now five judges, and if we make one of them Chief Justice there will be four puisne judges. What I propose to say is this : The Supreme Court shall consist of the Chief Justice and not more than five puisne judges, so that we need not appoint the five judges unless experience shows that it is necessary.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to express my satisfaction with the proposed amendment of the North-west Territories Act. There has been for some years an expression in this direction on behalf of the bar of the Territories as well as the same feeling on behalf of the judges. I might also say that the benchers of the North-west Territories have recently taken some action in memorializing the government to create the office of Chief Justice. In the appointment of Chief Justice, I hope the government will see their way to appoint the present Senior Judge of the Territories, the Hon. Justice Richardson, who has ably presided for many years as senior judge of the North-west Territories, in fact since the organization of the present court. I may say there are no two opinions in the Territories in regard to the advisability of appointing that judge to the position which it is now proposed to create. With reference to the appointment of an additional judge to the Territories, I may say I am at variance with the hon. Minister of Justice ? Five justices are quite sufficient for the volume of business that is now being transacted throughout the Territories, and while I am aware of the fact that there has been some opinion expressed in various quarters in the Territories that they should have a resident judge, and with that I do not disagree, yet the volume of litigation throughout the Territories at the present time can easily, in my judgment, be performed by the present number of judges. With the Bill as at present drafted, I most heartily concur, and am very pleased to give my support to it. With reference, however, to the other suggestion, I am at variance with the Minister of Justice on that question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say that we ought to have an additional judge, but I propose to amend the Bill in this way, that the Supreme Court shall consist of the Chief Justice and not more than five puisne judges, so that the court will be properly constituted with even a smaller number than four judges. My hon. friend knows that the present number of five judges has existed in the Territories for fourteen years, and that the Territories have perhaps trebled in population since that time, and whether the present judges can do all the business, I am not prepared to say. All I can say is that I have no inclination to appoint any more than are required.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will it not be time enough, when the Minister of Justice is convinced that it is necessary, to take the power to do it ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is all I am doing. My hon. friend will see that if it were found necessary to reorganize the districts with regard to the Territories, we would be obliged to ask for further legislation. We could not appoint five judges without the authority of parliament.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to point out that if you now pass legislation providing that the court shall consist of six judges, instead of five as at present, it is needless to say how at once the greatest amount of importunity will be brought to bear on the government to appoint the sixth judge, and I might say that legislation in the direction indicated would be equivalent, in fact, to the appointment of an additional judge. Although the population has very considerably increased since the organization of the court in 1886, yet, as a member of the legal profession, I am compelled to say that the volume of litigation has fallen off very considerably.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A good job for the country.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

THE POLITICAL CRISIS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C)—Before the House adjourns, I wish to say a few words to the members of the government about the condition of affairs in British Columbia. It is a most unfortunate condition. The Lieutenant Governor seems to be going from bad to worse. Hon. gentlemen know how a year ago he dismissed his government before the elections were over, and now he has dismissed another government. The Premier assured him that he could form a government with five majority, but was not listened to. The Lieutenant Governor has called on another man to form a government and no member of the legislature will have anything to do with him, and the new Premier is calling in outside parties. The legislature is at a deadlock. I think the Lieutenant Governor should be recalled. I should be sorry to say anything against him personally, having known him for many years, and having been associated with him a long time in this House, but the public interest demands that something should be done. I find in the Free Press to-day the following :

> Ex-Premier Semlin and other members of the British Columbia legislature claim to have assurance from Ottawa that Governor McInnes will be recalled in consequence of his mistake in making Joseph Martin premier.

Perhaps that would not be a good cause, but taking the whole thing in connection with that, whether there is any truth in this I do not know, but I do hope the government will either recall him or point out what he should do, because evidently public affairs are in a very bad condition in the province at present. No money has been voted. If Mr. Martin and his colleagues can sit and draw their salaries for four or five months, they will not call the House together at all. This is a very bad condition of things.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend knows that we have, under the British North America Act, in all provinces, or are supposed to have, parliamentary government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a supposition out there.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It has been a supposition in many cases. Whether the Governor has done rightly or not, I am expressing no opinion at the present time, because, having parliamentary government, he is at present forming a cabinet that must, if it continues to carry on the government of the country, enjoy the confidence of a majority of the electorate. They must have a majority of the electorate behind them, or else as a government they cannot exist. In the province of Quebec, not long since, there was a government dismissed, there was a dissolution of parliament, there was a new government formed, and that administration was allowed—and I think my hon. friend was in office then—to carry on the government for several months without a legislature at all. The legislature was dissolved and no appeal was made to the country. That was a most extraordinary course to adopt, and I do not know that the government of British Columbia has any intention of taking any course so unusual as was adopted at that time; but in my opinion, and I am expressing it here as my individual opinion—

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What case was that —in Quebec?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Lieutenant Governor Angers dismissed the government of Mr. Mercier, at the same time dissolving the legislature of Quebec, but did not go to the country for four months afterwards, wholly contrary to anything known in British history. It is an instance standing by itself. There is no doubt of this, that the Governor who dismisses his ministers and appeals to the country takes his life in his hands. The responsibility is with him. The result will be determined by the people of the province.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am happy that the minister has limited the time to four months. That is receding from the first position the hon. gentleman has taken.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said four months.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The minister said four months when he saw he was going to be committed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said it at first.

Hon Mr. LANDRY—The facts in the Quebec case are these : The Mercier government was under an inquiry—does the hon. minister deny that ? When the inquiry was over, the ministry was turned out, having lost the confidence of the Lieutenant Governor. A new ministry was called in, and the first act of the new ministry was an appeal to the people. I defy the hon. minister to prove the contrary.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I state the facts as they are. It is true that Governor Angers issued a commission, but in issuing that commission he assumed the functions of the power that had the appropriation of money, and so far his act was unconstitutional. He dismissed a government, which he had a right to do, but took his ife in his hands when he did so, but he did it on the eve of the period of time within which the British North America Act says that pariament shall be called. The parliament of every province shall be called within twelve months from the close of the previous session. Before the twelve months had quite expired he dissolved the legislature and made it impossible for him to call the legislature within twelve months, as the constitution required. Then, instead of, under these circumstances, making the proclamation of dissolution and the proclamation calling a new legislature, one instrument, as is always done elsewhere, he dissolved the legislature and waited four months without a parliament at all, so that these men who carried on the government for these four months—and they could have carried it on for twelve months under the same theory—were not represented in the constituencies, were not members of any house, had no legislature or parliament behind them, and might have been defaulters and retired from the country and there would have been no control over them. My hon. friend had better not undertake to defend the indefensible, and I point out that instance as one that Governors in other provinces had better not make a precedent of.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think my hon. friend had better not persist in his statement. He ought to know one thing, which he seems to forget entirely, that a royal commission had been appointed, and that the Governor at the time could not deal with the case of Mr. Mercier before the judgment of the royal commission was given. The judgment of the royal commission was only given on the eve of the expiration of the twelve months alluded to by the hon. minister. No use trying to put the fault on the shoulders of the Lieutenant Governor of the province at the time. He was bound by the constitution and by common sense to wait for the result of that royal commission, and that the royal commission took so long to render its decision was the fault of one of the judges, who is one of the honourable minister's own friends.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think the hon. gentleman will agree to this, if this chaos is to last much longer it will be an injury to the province, and should be put an end to. No one can recall the Lieutenant Governor but his masters, the government here. The matter should be taken hold of by the government here and not allowed to run for any length of time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to ask the hon. gentleman from Stadacona (Mr. Landry) if the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec immediately issued the writs for a new election on the presentation of the report of the royal commission?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That was the first thing that was done when the new ministry was called. They dissolved parliament immediately.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My question is a very simple one, and the hon. gentleman is a pretty clear headed man. The question I asked was this: The hon. gentleman said that the Governor could not act until the royal commission reported. The royal commission reported, and on that report the Governor, as I understand the hon. gentleman, dissolved the legislature. The question which I asked was, did the Governor at the same time issue the writs for the new election ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—As soon as the Lieutenant-Governor dismissed Mercier's government he called in a new administration, and that new administration dissolved parliament and the writs were immediately issued.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No. My hon. friend is mistaken.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is a matter of history.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I remember the fact very well.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The parliament was dissolved immediately and new writs were issued.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is mistaken. Four months elapsed between the formation of that government and their election, and what is more, and my hon. friend ignores this important fact, Governor Angers had a legal adviser. Mr. Mercier was his adviser. He appointed a royal commission—at whose instance and on whose advice—a commission to inquire into the conduct of those who advised him? Besides it is wholly unknown to our parliamentary system that, if the moneys appropriated by the legislature are misused, the government should appoint a commission to inquire into what has been done with the money instead of leaving that to the House that deals with such matters.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—To show how little the honourable minister is acquainted with the facts let me tell him that Mercier at the time accepted the commission, and it was Mercier himself who appointed it.

The Senate adjourned.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (E) 'An Act for the relief of Katherine Cecilia Lyons.'—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

THE DISMISSAL OF MERCIER'S MINISTRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to direct the attention of this House to something which occurred yesterday on a question brought up relating to the governorship of British Columbia. In the discussion which took place at the time, allusion was made to the facts that occurred in the province of Quebec when Governor Angers dismissed his ministers. I asserted then that the statement made by the hon. Minister of Justice was not in accordance with the facts, and the hon. gentleman reaffirmed his assertions, and gave this House the impression that Governor Angers in dismissing his cabinet had acted against the constitution in two ways: firstly, in appointing a commission against his own advisers, and secondly in not issuing the writs for the new legislature when the new government was formed. I denied those affirmations, but the hon. minister reiterated them. In answer to a question put by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, I had stated that as soon as the Governor had dismissed the old government he called in a new administration, and that this new administration dissolved the legislature and that the writs were immediately issued. Then the following discussion took place:

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No. My hon. friend is mistaken.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is a matter of history.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I remember the fact very well.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The parliament was dissolved immediately and new writs were issued.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is mistaken. Four months elapsed between the formation of that government and their election, and what is more, and my hon. friend ignores this important fact, Governor Angers had a legal adviser. Mr. Mercier was his adviser. He appointed a royal commission—at whose instance and on whose advice?—a commission to inquire into the conduct of those who advised him? Besides it is wholly unknown to our parliamentary system that, if the moneys appropriated by the legislature are misused by the government, the government should appoint a commission to inquire into what has been done with the money instead of leaving that to the House that deals with such matters.

I am but a humble member of this House and I have not the constitutional reputation of the hon. minister who is leading this House. Therefore my denial could not be of great weight against his assertion, but as I said history is there and the facts sustain my affirmation. If my hon. friend will look at the Official Gazette published at the time he will find that what I said was perfectly true. The commission named by Governor Angers was appointed by his constitutional advisers themselves, by a proclamation dated Sept. 22, 1891. The proclamation reads as follows :—

Victoria by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, &c., &c.

To all to whom these presents shall come or whom the same may concern—greeting.

A Proclamation.

J. E. Robidoux, Attorney General.

Whereas, by report of the hon. Prime Minister, on a report of the hon. Executive Council for our province of Quebec, and by an order of our LieutenantGovernor in Council, it is declared that it is advisable, in the interest of the public, that a royal commission be issued to inquire into and report on the facts and circumstances which preceded, accompanied, caused and followed the transaction made under the Act 54 Vic., chap. 88, in so far as they relate to the Bay de Chaleurs Railway Company.

And whereas, we have deemed it advisable, in the interest of the good government of our said province that such inquiry be made.

Now know ye, that by the advice of the Executive Council of our province of Quebec, and under the authority of article 596 and following of the Revised Statutes of our said province on the subject of inquiries concerning public matters, we do constitute and appoint the Hon. Louis A. Jetté, judge of our Superior Court ; the Hon. Louis François George Baby, judge of the Court of Queen's Bench; and the Hon. Charles Peers Davidson, judge of our Superior Court, all three of the city of Montreal, commissioners to make an inquiry into and report on the facts and circumstances which preceded, accompanied, caused and followed the transactions made under the Act 54 Vic., chap. 88, in so far as they relate to the Baie des Chaleurs Railway Company, and we do constitute the said Hon. Louis A. Jetté president of the said commissioners.

And for that purpose, under the authority of the said articles 596 and following of the Revised Statutes of our province of Quebec, we do give to the said commissioners all the powers granted in and by the said articles, and particularly the power of summoning before them any witnesses, and of requiring them to give evidence on oath orally or in writing, and to produce such documents and things as they may deem requisite to the full investigation of the matters into which they are appointed to examine, and we do authorize the said commissiones to employ a clerk, stenographers and other officers who may be required and to cause the minutes of their proceedings, the proof and their report to be printed.

And we do order that the sittings of the said commission be held in the city of Quebec or elsewhere in our said province, if the ends of justice require it.

Of all of which our loving subjects and all others whom these presents may concern are hereby required to take notice and to govern themselves accordingly.

In testimony whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patent and the great seal of our said province of Quebec to be hereunto affixed. Witness our trusty and well beloved the Hon. Auguste Real Angers, Lieutenant-Governor of our said province of Quebec.

At our Government House, in our city of Quebec, in our said province of Quebec, this 21st day of September, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, and in the fifty-fifth year of our reign.

By command,

CHAS. LANGELIER,
Secretary.

The contention of the hon. Minister of Justice was that the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec had acted without the responsibility of his legal advisers. That I deny on the authority of the proclamation itself, published in the Official Gazette of Quebec under the authority of the Executive Council, the Prime Minister and the Attorney General of the province of Quebec. In the face of that proof, the hon. Minister of Justice, I think, will admit that he was not aware, at all events, of the facts of the case. Now, the second accusation brought by the hon. Minister of Justice against Lieutenant-Governor Angers is this:

Then, instead of, under these circumstances, making the proclamation of dissolution and the proclamation calling a new legislature one instrument, as is always done elsewhere, he dissolved the legislature and waited four months without a parliament at all.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear,

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman says 'hear, hear.' He stands by what he said yesterday. So much the worse for him, because he will then be twice convicted of ignoring the facts. I continue the quotation :

—so that these men who carried on the government for these four months—and they could have carried it on for twelve months under the same theory—were not represented in the constituencies, were not members of any House, had no legislature of parliament behind them, and might have been defaulters and retired from the country, and there would have been no control over them. My hon. friend had better not undertake to defend the indefensible, and I point out that instance as one that Governors in other provinces had better not make a precedent of.

In answer to that charge I will give the hon. Minister of Justice the advantage of bringing to his notice the following extracts from different proclamations which were issued at the time. On the 22nd day of December in the year of Our Lord 1891, the following proclamation was issued :

Victoria, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, &c.,

To our beloved and faithful the Legislative Councillors of the province of Quebec, and the citizens and burgesses elected to serve in the Legislative Assembly of our said province, and to all to whom it may concern—

Greeting :

Whereas, on the Thirteenth day of November, it has pleased us to prorogue the Legislature of our province of Quebec, and to convoke it for the Twenty-ninth day of the month of December, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one.

And whereas, we have thought fit by and with the advice and consent of our Executive Council of our said province of Quebec, to dissolve the Legislative Assembly of our said province ;

Now know ye, that, by this our royal proclamation, we dissolve the said Legislative Assembly ; accordingly we exempt the Legislative Councillors and citizens and burgesses of the Legislative Assembly from the obligation of meeting and attendance on the Twenty-ninth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one.

In testimony whereof, we have caused these our letters to be made patent and the great seal of our said province of Quebec, to be hereunto affixed : Witness, our trusty and well beloved the Hon. Auguste Real Angers, Lieutenant Governor of the province of Quebec.

At our Government House, in our city of Quebec, in our said province of Quebec, this twenty-second day of December, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, and in the fifty-fifth year of our reign.

By command,

L. DELORME,
Clerk of the Crown in Chancery,
Quebec.

That is the proclamation dissolving the legislature, and was given on the 22nd day of December. On the same day, the following proclamation was issued :—

Whereas, we are desirous and resolved, as soon as may be, to meet our people of our province of Quebec, and to have their advice in parliament.

Now know ye we do make known our royal will and pleasure to call the legislature of our said province, and do further declare that by and with the advice of the Executive Council of our said province of Quebec, we have this day given orders for issuing our writs in due form for calling the Legislative Assembly of our said province, which writs are to bear date of this 23rd day of December inst., and to be returnable on the 15th day of March next. The nomination of the candidates at the different elections in all the electoral districts of the province shall take place and be held the first day of March next, except, however, our writs for the electoral district of Gaspé and for the electoral districts of Chicoutimi and of Lake St. John, which writs will be returnable on the 15th day of March next.

In testimony whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patent and the great seal of our said province of Quebec to be hereunto affixed. Witness, our trusty and well-beloved, the Hon. August Real Angers, Lieutenant-Governor of the said province of Quebec.

At our Government House, in the city of Quebec, in our said province of Quebec, this 22nd day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, and in the fifty-fifth year of our reign.

By command,

L. DELORME,
Clerk of the Crown in Chancery,
Quebec.

This proves that the proclamation issuing the writs was published on the same day as the proclamation for the dissolving of parliament and this undeniable proof meets and does away with that most singular assertion of the Minister that Governor Angers, after dissolving the legislature, waited four months before issuing the writs. But the hon. minister goes further in saying, and this is another ground of complaint :

Instead of, under these circumstances, making the proclamation of dissolution and the proclamation calling a new legislature, one instrument, as is always done elsewhere.

Let us see what the hon. gentleman did himself when he was in power in 1873 and 1878. In November, 1873, he came into power. On the second day of January, 1874, there was a dissolution of parliament. Two proclamations were issued on the second day of January, one to dissolve parliament, as was done in the legislature of Quebec, just in the same terms, telling the faithful senators of the Dominion of Canada and the members elected to serve in the House of Commons that they were not obliged to meet at the House on the 26th January, as they had been invited to do in a previous proclamation, but that parliament was dissolved, and that they were dispensed from their meeting and attendance on that date. Then after that proclamation, in a distinct and different instrument, the hon. Minister of Justice being a party to it, the government of the day issued the writs and made them returnable for the 12th day of March next. That was done in 1874. This shows that at that time the Minister of Justice had not the views and had not the constitutional learning that he has acquired since. Then came the year 1878. The hon. Minister of Justice was then, I think, Minister of the Interior. At all events, he formed part of the government of the day, and the government of which he was a member dissolved parliament on the 26th July, 1878. How did they proceed? Did they make the proclamation of dissolution and the proclamation issuing the writs one instrument, 'as is always done'? No, they made two instruments, one to dissolve parliament and another to issue the writs. If the ground taken by the hon. minister in this instance is correct, if it is unconstitutional to do in two instruments what he pretends must be done in one, 'as is always done,' then in 1874 and 1879 he acted in a very unconstitutional manner, and those two precedents must bear greatly upon the decision taken afterwards by the different provinces and especially by the province of Quebec. We see by those two examples that what I said yesterday was in accordance with the facts of the case, and that the hon. Minister of Justice had no right to dispute my assertions, and to say that the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec had acted unconstitutionally. He did, on the contrary, what was perfectly correct. He did what the hon. gentleman himself did on different occasions, and the reproach which he cast upon the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Quebec was unmerited. If the hon. gentleman would not rely so much upon his constitutional reputation and would look a little more into the facts, it would prevent such mistakes and would not leave the House under the impression that the precedent that he quoted yesterday was a precedent which could not be followed.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend opposite will find that my statement was accurate and that he has not improved the position of his friend by the observations which he has addressed to the House. If I remember rightly the hon. senator defended the conduct of the government here in dismissing the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, Mr. Letellier. What did Mr. Letellier do ? He dismissed the government. He was within his constitutional powers to say the least. His act was strictly legal whether it was in accordance with the usual constitutional practice or not. The result of that act of itself would depend upon what followed. He dismissed his administration for cause, and that cause was that the administration undertook to decide their policy and to decide what measures they would introduce into parliament without taking counsel with him, and contrary to the views that had been expressed over and over again in the district of Montreal, if I remember rightly. A new government was formed and that government went to the country and was sustained, and so far as that was concerned, that was an end to any jeopardy to which he could be constitutionally subjected. Nevertheless, when he was dismissed and it was said that his usefulness was gone, I think the hon. gentleman who has now spoken in defence of the unconstitutional and arbitrary conduct of Lieutenant-Governor Angers, undertook to find a sufficient justification for the dismissal of Mr. Letellier. In the case of Mr. Mercier there were certain charges made against him in connection with a certain letter. Those charges related to the expenditure of public money. If there be any point well settled in our constitutional system more marked than another, it is that the expenditure of public money is exclusively under the control of the representatives of the people, and that if a government misuses public money, that government is responsible to the representatives of the people in parliament or in the legislature elected by the people in their province. What is the first step in connection with this commission to which the hon. gentleman has referred ? The first step is that this commission is a commission issued mainly for the purpose of inquiring into the conduct of those who are accused, and he says upon their advice and my hon. friend argued that the proceeding was strictly constitutional because the ordinary advisers of the Governor advised that course to be taken. As I understand it, they advised no such thing. The Governor gave them the choice between tendering their resignations or submitting to a commission. My individual opinion is that they erred under those circumstances in not tendering their resignations.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They took the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman is mistaken. There are some things the responsibility of which no pretended assumption or real assumption on their part can make them solely responsible. The Governor himself on that occasion conspired against the rights and liberties of the people who elected that legislature. It was that legislature's right to inquire into the conduct of the ministry and to ascertain whether those ministers had misused the public money or not. The Governor undertook to take that matter out of the hands of the legislature, and supposing he had made the appointment upon the advice of his ministers, that appointment was to do what ? To inquire into the conduct of those ministers. They did not require the information. They knew what their conduct was. Were they to advise him upon the report, and to tell him what their conduct was upon this inquiry? It was an inquiry which they did not need, but which the representatives of the people did need, if there was any proper ground for the accusation. He was either a conspirator against the rights of the legislature, or a conspirator for or against his advisers. That was his position, and it is preposterous to talk about a position so assumed to be a constitutional one. But that is not all. Look at the condition of things. When that administration was dismissed, they were within a few days of the expiration of the twelve months within which the constitution says what? 'There shall be a session of the legislature of Ontario and of Quebec once at least in every year; so that twelve months shall not intervene between the last sitting of the legislature in each province in one session and its first sitting in the next session.' Did he obey the constitution?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, he did.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—How could he obey the constitution when he dissolved parliament?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Because it says twelve months shall not intervene between the end of one session and the beginning of another, of the same legislature.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, not the same legislature. No government in any province is at liberty to permit twelve months to elapse between the end of one session and the beginning of another, whether it is the same parliament or another parliament. That is the provision of the constitution. That is the protection that the constitution intended to give to the representatives of the people in parliament. They had a duty to discharge. There had been accusations made against ministers. They were entitled to inquire whether that was so or not, and the governor undertook to put it out of their power by dissolving the legislature and preventing a meeting altogether. Then what did he do? Did he immediately call another? Magna Charta says that not more than forty days must elapse between the dissolution of one House and the election of another. The governor permitted more than three months to elapse before the legislature—three months, within a few days, between the dissolution of one House and the election of another. Was that calling the legislature together within the provision of the constitution? Was it calling the legislature together within the provision of Magna Charta? Not at all. Why did the Lieutenant-Governor, when he dissolved parliament, permit three months to elapse before another was returned? If he could legally and constitutionally permit three months to elapse, he could permit twelve. There would be no limitation. But there is a reason, and the reason that he himself assigned was that he believed if he had gone to the country at once, Mercier would have been sustained, and so it was necessary that time should elapse and time be given to canvass the province of Quebec against him. That was the position, and that is the position taken by a man representing the Crown, whose duty it is to be perfectly neutral between political parties. I need not go into a discussion of that matter further. I mentioned it incidentally yesterday, and for this reason, because I think it is important that the Lieutenant-Governors should respect these constitutional usages and privileges which are of the first consequence if parliamentary government is to be upheld. Every one who undertakes to disregard those usages that are recognized in England, and have been there so long established, must be looked upon as an enemy to our constitutional system. We are beside a great and powerful republic, which exercises a certain amount of influence over our institutions. That is the result of a powerful and numerous nation living alongside one not so numerous or powerful. Look at the various organizations that have from time to time found a footing in Canada. A recent institution that became a political factor here of no little consequence was based on principles thoroughly consistent with the political system of the United States, but thoroughly outside of the principle of the constitution we have adopted here—I refer to the Patron organization. That organization was based upon republican ideas, democratic views, views which would take the executive or administrative power out of the hands of responsible ministers of the Crown and put it directly into the hands of the electorate, a system utterly at variance with ours. Some may regard it as better than ours. I do not. I believe it to be calculated to exercise a mischievous influence over our institutions. If there be a country in any portion of the British Empire in which it is important that constitutional usages should be respected, and constitutional usages should be respected by those who claim to represent and do represent the Crown, it is in every part of this country, and therefore I thought it necessary incidentally yesterday, in speaking of another matter, in referring to what I regarded as a very grave breach of constitutional right and duty in the province of Quebec. My hon. friend opposite could direct his ingenuity and industry to a better purpose than to undertake the defence of conduct such as that which he has undertaken to defend yesterday and again to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the House will permit me I shall say just a few words in reply, as there has been new matter brought in—the Magna Charta. I should like to know if the hon. member had the Magna Charta in mind in 1874 and 1878? The dissolution that took place in 1874, was announced by proclamation on the 2nd of January, and the writs were made returnable on the 12th of March, 1874, an interval of 69 days, and in 1878 the dissolution was on August 7, and the writs were returnable on the 21st of November following, an interval of 106 days. Where was the Magna Charta then?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The elections were held on the 17th September, 1878.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Where is the Magna Charta there?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The dissolution was in August, and the elections took place in September.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How does the hon. gentleman reconcile his actions and his declarations? And what about that formal affirmation of the minister that the dissolution of the House and the issuing of the writs should be made by only one instrument 'as always is done?' How did he act himself in 1874 and 1878? How can he answer that? He never tried to give the slightest explanation, but here comes a new theory, for it is a new theory which the minister has brought up to-day. In vain will a ministry take the responsibility of an act of the Lieutenant-Governor, the minister contends that it is not the ministry that is responsible but the Governor himself. Where is the Magna Charta? Does Magna Charta or the constitution say that? I was always led to believe that every act of the Lieutenant-Governor or the Governor must be on the advice of the ministers, that they must take the responsibility of the Governor or of the Queen's action. That was my belief, but here is new light on constitutional law. It brings to our knowledge a new theory, it is not the ministry that is responsible. In the present instant the ministry issued a proclamation naming a royal commission. It might have been contrary to the usages or privileges of parliament, but who took the responsibility of it? It was the ministers themselves. The hon. minister cannot deny that, unless Magna Charta comes in and contains something that might apply to that, but if it applies to that the same as to the Dominion parliament in 1874 and 1878, I understand why Magna Charta is so well forgotten now. The hon. minister has not answered the objections I raised yesterday. He comes in with new theories that might bring up a new answer, but as he has not answered one word of what I said, and now he is sticking again to his assertion that four months intervened between the dissolution of the legislature and the elections. How does he find it four months? Is there something in Magna Charta to say that from the 22nd of December to the first of March is four months?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is three months. The legislature which by law should have met in December did not meet till April.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. member will count from the 23rd of December to the 1st of March, he will find that it is not three months. The minister said four yesterday—he said four to-day, but it is not even three months, and he must not forget that these elections took place in the province of Quebec in winter time, and where they were obliged to go down as far as the Magdalen Islands and along the Labrador coast with the writs, he will find it was not too much. This only took eighty-two days altogether from the issuing up to the return of the writs, while the hon. gentleman's government took 106 days in 1878.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the point that was urged by the Minister of Justice yesterday is absolutely clear. He had the theory and the facts absolutely beyond contradiction. I shall read the rule again :

There shall be a session of the legislature in Ontario and Quebec at least once every year, so that twelve months shall not intervene between the last sitting of the legislature of such province in the one session and the first session of the next.

Now, I hold the journals of the province of Quebec for 1890 in my hand. The legislature was prorogued on the 30th of December. During the whole year 1891 there was no session. There was no session held in the province of Quebec until the 26th of April, 1892. There is the fact. There were nearly four months, within a few days of four months, intervening between the antecedent session and the new session. That is the whole point of the case. It was a direct breach of the constitution.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not call that a frontal attack. I think the hon. minister is attempting a flanking movement. That does not alter the position I took. The dissolution of parliament was an act of the ministry of the day, and of the Lieutenant-Governor. In dissolving parliament the De-Boucherville government at the time took the responsibility of that act. They went before the people with that responsibility and the question was discussed before the people, and the people by an overwhelming majority sustained the act of that government. They had 37 or 39 of a majority in that House. The hon. minister said : 'How could he appoint a commission to judge his own advisers ?' The hon. gentleman knows better than that. Some of the members of the government were implicated it is true, but quite a number of the members of the legislature were also implicated, and if the virtue of the Minister of Justice can be outraged at the idea of two or three ministers being brought before a royal commission of their own, how could this same virtue allow a legislature to be its own judge, when the majority of its members were accused of corruption? There are, moreover, precedents for royal commissions, and how does my hon. friend forget that an accusation brought by the late Speaker of the House of Commons against one of the ministers in the late cabinet was dealt with by a royal commission. Did Magna Charta say something about that ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No. Well who was going beyond Magna Charta there, as he is to-day.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He asked for a committee of the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It was not a committee of the House, it was a royal commission which acted upon this case. The hon. gentleman ought to know better. The hon. Secretary of State may read as much as he likes that paragraph of the constitution which relates to the obligation of holding sessions in due time. I know that paragraph, and I accept it, but I say it was not an unconstitutional thing on the part of the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec to yield to the advice of his ministers and dissolve parliament. The dissolution of parliament is one of the prerogatives of the Crown, and when it is advised by the ministry, I think they are better judges of the opportunity to act in that way, and it would certainly have been more unconstitutional to keep a parliament like the one that existed at that time, corrupt as it was and proved to be, than to go to the people and ask for a renewal of their confidence, and come up with a new and clean parliament.

BUSINESS IN THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I should like to ask the hon. leader of this House why it is we have no business before us when we are meeting here day after day ? We had a long adjourment of four weeks asked for, not by members of the Senate generally, but by the leader of the government. He named the date we were to adjourn, and the time at which we were to resume. All the members of this House understood that that adjournment was to enable the government to bring business before us. It is said that there is an important Bill in the other House which is expected to come up soon, but we had that Bill before us last year and rejected it. That is the only business within view. The House of Commons is very much pressed with business. There is a very important matter before them which they have not had time to touch. The leader of the government is anxious that it should be gone into, and Mr. Borden also is anxious. Of course you all know the matter to which I refer—the case of alleged ballot stuffing. The Conservative members are also anxious to have the matter gone into, but the Premier says it must wait until other measures are disposed of. Mr. Borden says if you wait for that we cannot get it through. Think of the misery inflicted on the Premier. There are two men in the House of Commons that Mr. Borden says have no right to sit there. These men are anxious that their skirts should be cleared of the calumny which is put on them. Then there is a man named Preston said to be implicated, and he has vanished from the country. No doubt he is anxious to have the matter settled, in order that he may be relieved from the misery he suffers. His only connection he now has with the country is his salary which, I understand, he draws quarterly. I would suggest that the hon. leader of this House should speak to his colleagues in the House of Commons and tell them that we have plenty of time here and are ready and willing to examine into the matter. We all remember the Baie des Chaleurs case. The Minister of Justice deprecated the way that this House took it up, but the other House failed to find the corruption which we discovered when we investigated it here. It passed through the House of Commons and they had not discovered the corruption there, and were surprised when it was brought out in the Senate. It was brought out in this House chiefly through the instrumentality of the hon. gentleman from Richmond, the Hon. Mr. Miller. I have no doubt that when the ballot stuffing charges are brought before us, we will be able to unravel the matter, and perhaps discover the machine for which they have been hunting a long time, or we will perhaps prove that the whole thing has been a Tory lie and that there has been no machine at all. I therefore suggest that the hon. minister might tell us that there is nothing in Magna Charta to prevent that matter being transferred from the House of Commons to this Chamber, because if that is not done we shall have nothing to do.

The Senate adjourned.

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called.

1. That the establishment of a telegraph cable across the Pacific to connect Canada with the Australasian colonies has long been regarded as of high importance to the empire, it having been recognized to be of Imperial importance at the Colonial Conferences of 1887 and 1894, affirmed by an agreement between the home government and the government of Canada, New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland and New Zealand, and ratified by the Canadian parliament last session; this House therefore regrets that serious delays have occurred in the prosecution of the undertaking, manifestly through the hostility of the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, which company is now demanding concessions from the Australiasian colonies, which, if granted, will imperil the success of the Pacific cable.

2. That this House is of opinion that any further delay in proceeding with the actual construction of the undertaking would be inimical to the interests of the empire, and strongly deprecates granting any further concessions to the Eastern Extension or any other company.

3. That it is expedient in granting permission hereafter to private companies to lay cables between British possessions, it be on the express condition that the state may assume ownership whenever in the general public interest it is advisable to do so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL said: Might I ask my hon. friend, the leader of the House, when I may expect the papers in connection with this subject for which I moved some time ago? I understood the return was to be laid before the Commons to-day. Of course if that return were brought down, it would answer my purpose. I should like to see some of the papers before proceeding with the motion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will have to ask my hon. friend to postpone the motion. I have been anxious to get the papers down, and I am unable to say why they have not been forwarded to me to be laid on the table. This motion has been standing for some time, and if the papers are brought down in the other Chamber I suppose that will serve my hon. friend's purpose?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes. I merely wished to look at them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is a reasonable request and I trust my hon. friend will allow the motion to stand until we are able to submit the papers for his consideration.

The motion was allowed to stand.

TICKET-OF-LEAVE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (B) 'An Act to amend the Act to provide for the conditional liberation of penitentiary convicts.'

(In the Committee.)

On the first clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—For the information of hon. gentlemen who feared that the country was going to be flooded with convicts, I had an account made of the number of licenses which have been issued since last year, which would apply to between two and three thousand prisoners, and I find that only 27 licenses on parole have been issued up to the present time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is on ticket of leave ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is enough for one year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There would be more the first year, of course, than afterwards.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

SUPREME COURT OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES' BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (C) 'An Act respecting the Supreme Court of the North-west Territories.'

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I move the adoption of the first clause as it stands. The clause provides that the Supreme Court shall consist of a Chief Justice and four puisne judges. I mentioned at the second reading that I proposed to change this clause. The amendment I suggested to make was that the court should consist of the Chief Justice and not more than five puisne judges. As my hon. friend has stated his views so strongly in opposition to this suggestion, and he is a member of the bar of that section of the country, I think that if it is found that the court as now constituted is not adequate, we can easily provide for the appointment of another judge: I therefore move the adoption of the clause as it stands. It makes no difference in the Act except that one of the five puisne judges, is to be designated as the Chief Justice.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. WOOD, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

COX RELIEF BILL.

SECOND REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Mr. PERLEY (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer), moved the adoption of the second report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in re Cox Relief Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I do not wish to allow this report to be adopted without a few remarks. While the constitution of our country permits the dissolution of marriage, before taking cognizance of the proceedings in the committee, this House ought to be very strict in adhering to its rules. I see in this case the committee report that personal service cannot be made on the respondent. The report does not give us the reasons why. She may be away out of the country. My objection to the report is that the committee state that the service ought to be considered sufficient if made upon the half-sister of the respondent who lives in Guelph, another half-sister who lives at Lachine, another half-sister who lives in Montreal, another half-sister who lives in Westmount, and a half-brother who lives in Westmount, and Mr. Leet, lately solicitor for the respondent. If we are going to allow divorce cases to pass through this House under such circumstances the fact should be known. I do not say that the report should not be adopted, but I bring the matter before the House and the House can act as they think proper. I consider it a very loose way of doing business. We should have at least sufficient reasons adduced to the House why the respondent cannot be served.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The objection taken by the hon. gentleman is a good one, although I suppose I look on questions of this kind from a different standpoint from his. If the Chairman of the committee were here he could give us information; but as divorce cases are important in their character, I agree with the hon. gentleman that when the necessary papers cannot be served on the respondent the reasons should be given. I would suggest that the motion should be allowed to stand until the Chairman is present, and probably he can give satisfactory information.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I might add that I am perfectly confident that the people connected with the respondent do not wish to have their names connected with the respondent in such a manner as to consider the service on them would be sufficient.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—This is merely preliminary to the report to be brought down. It is simply substitutional service because they find it utterly impossible to serve the respondent herself. I do not intend to move the second reading of the Bill to-day, but that it should be read the second time on the fourteenth instant, so as to give an opportunity to the committee to show why the service is not made in the proper manner.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The objection taken is a very proper one. We cannot be too careful in passing a Bill of this kind and adopting these reports. I am a little surprised that the Chairman of the committee is not present to give the necessary explanation. I am even more surprised that we have had no explanation from other members of the committee who are present and who ought to be able to give us the information in the absence of the chairman. They ought to know just as well as the chairman the reasons why personal service could not be made, and an explanation from them would be just as effectual as from the chairman himself.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I notice that there is a slight error in the minutes to-day. The hon. gentleman from Sarnia has called my attention to it. The item on the Order paper is the consideration of the 2nd report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in re Cox Relief Bill. At page 80 of our Minutes the report we are considering is described as the third report. It is not a very important matter, but still our Minutes should be accurate. I concur with the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this matter; and I think the hon. gentleman from Glengarry (Mr. McMillan) deserves the thanks of the House for bringing the matter before us. It has been stated by the hon. gentleman from Rideau that when the bill comes to be read the second time we shall get all the information, but it seems to me that when we are asked to accept a report which provides for substitutional service, that report should set out the reasons why the substitutional service is asked for, and this report does not do that, but simply says that the committee having considered the circumstances recommend as follows. The opinions of members of the Senate would probably be influenced a good deal by the reasons, if they were given.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I regret I was not in the House when the motion was made, because I would have given the explanation which I am about to make now. When the case came before the Committee, evidence was brought before us that attempts has been made to serve the respondent personally, but she was unable to be found, and an effort then had been made to ascertain the residence of the party by communicating with a number of sisters, and other relatives who live in Montreal and other places in Canada. Not having been able to ascertain from them the whereabouts of the party, the Committee, having heard the evidence and gone into it thoroughly, decided that they would make an order to have all the parties, whose names were mentioned as being relatives or connected with this person, served, so as to bring notice, if possible, before the relatives and others who might communicate with her if they found they could at any time discover the locus in quo. It was the means the Committee thought was best calculated to discover where the party was residing and to bring the notice to her if it could be done in any way. Of course we could have advertised. We could have made an order to have substitutional service, or an advertisement, but it was thought it was more reasonable to give all the parties who are connected with the respondent notice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This is a case which demonstrates very clearly the inconsistency sometimes of hon. gentlemen when they desire to analyze too closely, if I might so use the expression, a case of this kind, and particularly one in which their conscience may protest against accepting the report of the Committee. This honourable House on the 9th day of February adopted a report in this particular case of a similar character to the one now before the House, and if hon. gentlemen will refer to page 48 of the Minutes they will find that in this same Cox Divorce Bill they adopted a report accepting the service of papers upon persons other than the respondent as a substitutional service of the notice there dealt with. The report which is at present before the House, is, I may say, of precisely of the same character as the one dealt with on page 48 of the Minutes. As far as the objection raised by the hon. gentleman from Halifax is concerned, this is not the third report of the Committee with reference to this particular case. It is simply the third report of the Divorce Committee to this House at the present session of parliament. If hon. gentlemen will look at page 80 of the Minutes they will find that made quite clear, that the Committee were simply presenting their third report, and it deals with this particular case. I quite concur with what hon. gentlemen have said in reference to the desirability and necessity of effecting personal service in such important matters as bills of divorce, but there are times when it is a physical impossibility to effect that service and there is no better established practise in the courts of law of our country, and elaborate provision is made for the purpose of effecting substitutional service upon parties who cannot be served personally. It is not necessary for me to point out to hon. gentlemen that when a party becomes either defendant in a suit, or respondent in a Divorce Bill, the disposition is to either evade service of the process of the court, or of this chamber, as the case may be, and in most instances if hon. gentlemen will study the facts attendant upon proceedings of that nature, they will satisfy themselves readily that many persons concerned in difficulties of this kind are not to be found. I do not think it is an exaggerated statement for me to say that a very large percentage of the writs which are served upon defendants in our courts of law are not served upon them personally, as well as many of the notices which are served in connection with the Divorce Bills are likewise not served personally upon the party concerned, but substitutionally. Our rules make provision for that. The Committee have made careful inquiry as to the possibility of effecting service on those concerned and have convinced themselves that it is impossible do to so. I would furthermore say that, owing to the temporary absence of the hon. gentleman from Brandon, the hon. Minister of Justice presided over the proceedings of the Committee. He is also a member of the Committee, and he it was who presided over the Committee when the matter was dealt with, and I am satisfied that hon. gentlemen of this House will have every confidence in the ability of that hon. gentleman to consider fully and weigh well the facts, particularly in a case of this kind, that may be submitted to the Committee, so as to see that justice be done between all parties. Consequently, this decision was come to under the presidency of the Minister of Justice, and there was no division of opinion in the Committee as to all necessary steps having been taken to effect personal service. I might further say, for the satisfaction of hon. gentlemen and the vindication of the Committee, that there was a mass of documents read and submitted to the Committee in which were set out all the facts in reference to the steps which had been taken to effect service upon the respondent. The Committee did not deem it prudent—and I think this House would not approve of it—that there should be embodied in the report of the Committee all the facts contained in the affidavits which, if I mistake not, numbered four or five documents at least. Therefore under these circumstances, after the explanations which have been made and with the knowledge that the matter had been gone into fully under the presidency of the hon. Minister of Justice in the Committee, this House should be satisfied with the report and should adopt it?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Where is the second report of the Committee to be found in the Minutes ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The first report is on page 48, and the third report on page 80.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to call the attention of the hon. gentleman from Calgary to the fact that my technical objection was well founded. At the bottom of page 80 we find :

> The standing committee on divorce beg leave to make their second report as follows :

and farther upon the same page we find the third report of the Committee which is the one we are now dealing with. So that my criticism is right.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—On page 48 we find the first report of the Divorce Committee and at the bottom of page 80 we have the second report of the Committee, and in the middle of page 80 will be found the third, and the third report deals with this case.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not propose to enter into a discussion with the hon. gentleman from Calgary, but it has come out already in the little discussion which has taken place in the House that none of the half-sisters of the respondent know anything about her. Probably she is not looked upon as a reputable member of the family, and they do not know anything of her whereabouts, and we are asked to accept service upon these people, who do not know anything about her, as equivalent to service upon her. It would occur to an ordinary observer that the best chance there would be of having these proceedings brought to the notice of the respondent would be by advertising in the newspapers which are supposed to circulate in her locality.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is somewhat hypercritical. These persons who are reported to be half-sisters of the respondent, are the only persons, so far as the solicitor of the applicant for divorce could ascertain, that could be served, because the whereabouts of the respondent is not known. She left the country in company with another party, and it is impossible to serve her. The party who undertook service made affidavit that he had made diligent search for her and was unable to ascertain her whereabouts. Communication had been made, so far as I recollect, with these half-sisters and the half-brother mentioned, without success ; but the committee, for the purpose of removing all doubt in the matter, recommended the proceeding that has taken place here for the very purpose of avoiding anything like proceedings for divorce without an honest and earnest effort being made to ascertain the whereabouts of the party. It may be, and that was the impression on the minds of the committee, that some of her relatives know where she is and might not be willing to communicate that information to the complainant in this case, and so, with this communication made to them, if they do know where she is—I do not know that they do—there might be a mode of communicating to her the fact, that divorce proceedings were being had, but from the report on her conduct, which has not yet been inquired into by the committee, the evidence not yet having been taken, if the representations made are sustained, it is not at all improbable that she does not care about having her whereabouts made known, nor is she anxious to resist the proceedings that are being taken.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What would happen if the party had no half-sisters ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They might apply to my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want a serious answer. What would happen if that party had no half-sisters ? What would be the procedure ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend can apply to a solicitor in the ordinary way.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The question that has been brought up in the House was the subject of some discussion in the committee, and was carefully considered there. The view was presented that the mere service of notice upon these not very near relatives of this woman, and the statement of the petitioner that they do not know the whereabouts of the woman, might not be considered sufficient effort on the part of the petitioner to ascertain the whereabouts of the respondent, and to make personal service upon her ; and the view was presented that it might be more satisfactory for some of these persons, either the half-brother or some of the half-sisters, who are all residents of Montreal, to have been brought here and examined upon oath as to their knowledge of the whereabouts of the respondent. The matter, however, was discussed at some length, and the majority of the committee decided that the service which had been made was sufficient to meet the requirements of the rules of this House. I am not sorry that this question has been raised. It is in my opinion one of some importance, and I quite agree with the remark of the hon. gentleman who raised the objection, and those who followed him, that we should be as strict as possible in requiring the very best evidence obtainable in our proceedings in cases of this kind.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

ROYAL TRUST CO. BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved the second reading of Bill (D) 'An Act respecting the Royal Trust Co.' He said: This Company was incorporated by the legislature of Quebec in 1892 for the purpose of executing trusts and administering estates and as a safe and deposit company, and for general financial purposes. The work of the company is confined to Quebec, and now they seek to be incorporated as a Dominion company to enable them to carry on their operations in all parts of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Before the motion is carried, I ask my hon. friend from British Columbia whether this is not a corporation under a provincial statute?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And my hon. friend now proposes to make it a corporation under the statutes of the Dominion of Canada?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Are there any clauses in it that are to continue in operation—any provisions or franchises under the law of Quebec which are to be continued under this bill?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I believe all the powers given by Quebec are to be applied to the Dominion. There are no fresh powers at all.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It will be necessary, then, to constantly refer to the Quebec Statutes to know what the powers and franchises are and it will be very much better to re-enact the provisions of the law altogether.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That will be all explained in the Committee on Banking and Commerce to whom I shall refer the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is a great deal of force in what the Minister says, and hon. gentlemen remember that last year the House, on a recommendation of the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, adopted a resolution to the effect that in future, when the corporate capacity of a provincial company was being extended to the remainder of the Dominion, the provincial Act which gave it its corporate life should appear by way of schedule, or otherwise, in the bill presented to the House. I think this is peculiarly a case where it is desirable that that information should be before the members of the House; and I am rather surprised that a bill prepared in this House should be printed without having the Quebec Act annexed as a schedule.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think these points will all be gone into by the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and if they require those provincial Acts to be embodied in the Bill, that can be done as a matter of course.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I only call attention to it.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read a second time.

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the House adjourns I should like to ask when I may expect the return relating to the Pacific Cable which I was under the impression was to be laid before the House of Commons yesterday. I cannot ascertain if the papers were submitted, although a very important statement was made by the Postmaster General in reference to the Pacific Cable.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The papers were to be laid on the table to-day. The hon. the Postmaster General promised after they were laid on the table in the House of Commons, that they should be sent over here in order that the hon. gentleman might have an opportunity of seeing them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then I shall postpone the motion until Monday.

ELECTION IRREGULARITIES.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The hon. junior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Almon), yesterday, asked the leader of the government a question in respect to the investigation of election irregularities by a committee of this House. I do not think the hon. gentleman has been treated with that courtesy that he is entitled to, because no notice was taken of the question. I should like to ask the leader of the House if the government has taken the matter into consideration.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was sorry my hon. friend could not be heard yesterday, owing to the noise in the Chamber. The proposition he made, of course, could not be carried out unless we had first the authority of an Act of parliament which we have not at present on our statute book.

Hon. Mr. POWER.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What business are we likely to have for to-morrow? We have been in session a month and eight days and the business done here consists of two government Bills, one of fourteen lines and the other of six. We were promised some important Bills which were to be laid before the Senate early in the session in order to give us something to do. It has been suggested by my hon. friend on my right that they have done very little more in the other House; but that is no reason why we should be lacking business here.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I am not at all satisfied with the answer of the hon. Secretary of State to my question. I think it would be quite within the power of the House of Commons to appoint a commission, and that that commission should be a committee of the Senate, to investigate the charges which have been made of election irregularities. The hon. minister should be very anxious to answer my question in the affirmative. He believes, as we all do, in Sir Wilfrid Laurier's professed desire to have these elections investigated. I stated yesterday that the two members in the other House who occupy seats, the legality of their election to which is under question, are anxious to have their right to retain those seats established. They have not said so, but I know I would feel that way, and I am sure that no member of this House would like to occupy a seat which he had any doubt he was entitled to. I am sure that Mr. Borden is in ernest in his desire to have the matters investigated. Any one who has followed the proceedings in the House of Commons would know that the investigation has been delayed and is not likely to take place, although, if the allegations are true, the people of two constituencies have been cheated out of their representation. The Secretary of State knows that the House of Commons has power to transfer that question to us, just as it has to appoint ad hoc judges to investigate such matters. The Premier demands this investigation and the public generally require it. Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated (metaphorically speaking) with tears in his eyes, that it was impossible to remove the obstacles which prevented the investigation in the House of Commons. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken in saying that it will require an Act of parliament to enable the matter to be investigated by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is anxious to exercise a superintending care over the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I suppose my hon. friend regards this as the superior chamber; nevertheless, I am inclined to think that the House of Commons would be disposed to resent any supervision on the part of this House in respect to the House of Commons. There is also a well recognized provision of the law and custom of parliament that stands in our way. That provision is that each House is the judge of the qualifications and regularity of the sitting of each member. The House of Commons has never yet, during the 30 odd years of its existence, undertaken to appoint a committee to ascertain whether any member of this House was not qualified to sit here, or had reached this House by any improper means, and I think there would be a like objection on the part of the House of Commons if we were to undertake any such inquiry as my hon. friend has suggested. That being so, I do not think that the suggestion of my hon. friend, which is somewhat revolutionary in its character, can be seriously entertained.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Your friends would like it all the better for that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know that my hon. friend is serious in the proposition he makes.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I think the hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I suggested that the House of Commons should appoint us as a committee. I wish he had a good deal more influence with the first minister than he has. I suggested that the Senate might be appointed a commission by the House of Commons. If there is any law against that I should like to know it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend knows that the House of Commons is not overburdened with excessive confidence in the second chamber. They submitted to the second chamber measures which they regarded as very important in the public interest, and the judgment of the Senate was not in conformity with that of the House of Commons, and I suppose the rule that they are not disposed to trust the Greeks would apply in the matter in this House. In reply to my hon. friend opposite, with regard to the public business, I may say that we seem to be making about as much progress as they are in the other chamber, and my hon. friend will also see that, although the Bills we have carried through this House are not measures that occupied a very great deal of space, they are nevertheless important measures, of intrinsic value in themselves. I may say, also, that when the House rose my hon. friend asked me to submit, even before there was a meeting again, amendments which it was proposed to make to the Criminal Code, printed in galley form, and still stand in that form. The reason for not bringing the measure forward was the same as often happens: a very large number of suggestions, in addition to the suggestions made last year, were made immediately after the adjournment by various parties who ought to have had a good deal of experience in connection with the administration of the criminal law, and those have been printed, and have been under the consideration of the Solicitor General and myself, as we have had opportunities. I hope we have gone through pretty nearly the whole of those suggestions, and that the measure will be before the House at the beginning of next week, and then I judge that we will have the Redistribution Bill immediately.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—It has been stated by what is called the 'reptile press'—a name used as a matter of vituperation when people have no argument—that petitions will flow into this chamber in favour of this Redistribution Bill, and if that is the reason the business is delayed I can certainly understand it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is in an excited mood. I had not quite finished my observations when he interrupted me. I may say that I expect that Bill will be brought up almost immediately, that we will have an opportunity of discussing it, and that the Criminal Code Amendment Bill will be introduced at the beginning of next week. These, together with other business, will occupy our attention for some time to come. I do not see anything on the order paper for to-morrow, and if there is no objection, I would suggest that when the Senate adjourn this afternoon it do stand adjourned until three o'clock on Monday. I have not given notice of this motion, and if there is no objection it may be adopted.

Hon. Sir John CARLING—I think it would suit the convenience of the members from Western Ontario if we were to meet on Tuesday instead of Monday.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I have a word to say.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman objects that is an end of it.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I suppose I may be allowed to say a word besides objecting. I do object to this system of repeated adjournments, and I wish to say that I hold the government responsible for it. There is an old saying that whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad, and it appears to me the gods of the government are disposed to make the Senate mad by adjourning every second day so that they will soon be destroyed, but I hope the Senate is not going to be destroyed in that way. The matter brought to the notice of the Senate by the hon. junior member for Halifax is a serious one and deserves more careful consideration than has been given to it by the government. We know very well that there is, to a wide extent, a great deal of corruption practised in Canada during elections, and I take it that the government is bound to keep up the standard of political morality to the very highest pitch possible, It is their duty, in my opinion, to throw no obstacles in the way of an investigation into the charges of corruption, but to use every possible means to bring guilty parties to justice, I am sorry to have to say it, but it appears to me that political morality in Canada is to-day at a very low ebb, and it is becoming lower and lower every year. I cannot but contrast it with the high moral tone of the politics in the old country. In England a public man would sacrifice his life before he would sacrifice his honour. He regards his reputation and the reputation of his family, and his own public record as far in advance of money consideration, and the public men of England will not stoop to corrupt practices as public men in Canada are doing to day, I take it that it is the duty of the government more particularly than any other class, but it is also the duty of every public man, I do not care what position he occupies, to put down his foot and say that this thing must come to an end, to say that this corruption must not continue any longer, and that the representative men on both sides of politics should insist upon their political battles being carried on in an honest, straightforword and honourable way. If the present practice is allowed to continue where is it going to end ? We know what the consequences will be. It simply means breeding a civil war. No people in the world are going to submit to a machine controlling the public affairs of the country, and I say it is the duty of the government to investigate this matter. They should throw no obstacle in the way of an investigation of charges of corruption, so that the guilty parties may be brought to justice and punished. Let us all endeavour to elevate the standard of public morality in this Canada of ours.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Referring to the intimation of the hon. leader of the House as to the introduction of the Criminal Code into this Chamber next week, I would like to point out the very cold comfort there is in the preparation of such a bill of fare as that indicated. For several sessions past, in fact I think for three sessions past, this House has laboured industriously in amending the Criminal Code, and has given no little attention to it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Two sessions.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not remember any amendment we made in this House the last three years that passed the House of Commons. In fact, these amendments were introduced in the House of Commons at the eleventh hour and permitted to stand over. So that I have a very serious suspicion in my own mind that this Criminal Code is intended to do duty for some sessions to come in keeping the Senate marking time in the absence of anything more important. I do not mean by that that the leader of this chamber is in any way to blame for not having business before us. It, however, affords one the opportunity to make this remark that in the early part of the session it is impossible for this Senate to have as much work before it as would demand its serious attention and necessitate its constant attendance and it seems to me that while session after session we discuss this phase of the subject, both sides of this House might possibly get together and discuss the desirability of a long adjournment in the beginning of each session. It seems to me that would be a desirable move. It would reflect more credit on the Senate than constantly attending day after day and simply opening with devotions, which may be very desirable, but for which we are not here entirely. It therefore seems to me that the subject should command the attention of some of the older members of the Senate and the question might be discussed with propriety as to our adopting some established practice by which we might have a longer adjournment with the assurance that when we returned here there would be such a volume of business before us as would command our attention.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend opposite objects to the adjournment?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—No, I withdraw my objection.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—An adjournment till Monday would be long enough I think.

Hon. Sir JOHN CARLING—As there does not appear to be any business in the Order paper for to-morrow or Monday, and it is more convenient for many of us to return to Ottawa on Tuesday, I think we might have the adjournment till Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I suggested that we should adjourn till Monday at three o'clock but if it is the general wish of the House that the adjournment be made till Tuesday I have no objection, but I understand there is a feeling against it.

Some hon. MEMBERS—Tuesday, Tuesday!

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it stand adjourned till Tuesday at three o'clock in the afternoon.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at four o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, March 13, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

RESOLUTION POSTPONED.

The notice of motion being called:

By the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, K.C.M.G.:

1. That the establishment of a telegraph cable across the Pacific to connect Canada with the Australasian colonies has long been recognized as of high importance to the empire; it having been recognized to be of Imperial importance at the Colonial Conferences of 1887 and 1894, affirmed by an agreement between the Home government and the governments of Canada, New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland and New Zealand, and ratified by the Canadian parliament last session; this House therefore regrets that serious delays have occurred in the prosecution of the undertaking, manifestly through the hostility of the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, which company is now demanding concessions from the Australasian colonies which, if granted, will imperil the success of the Pacific cable.

2. That this House is of opinion that any further delay in proceeding with the actual construction of the undertaking would be inimical to the interests of the empire, and strongly deprecates granting any further concessions to the Eastern Extension or any other company.

3. That it is expedient in granting permission hereafter to private companies to lay cables between British possessions, it be on the express condition that the state may assume ownership whenever in the general public interest it is advisable to do so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL said: There are other papers, I understand, to be laid upon the table in order to complete the correspondence in connection with this subject, and, under the circumstances, I think it would be advisable that I should not make this motion, although it has been upon the order paper for some little time, until all the papers are before the Senate. They will enable us to deal with the question more intelligently than we could at present. I shall, therefore, let the notice stand until the papers are brought down.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think they will be on the table this afternoon.

The notice of motion was allowed to stand.

PROTECTION WORKS ON THE RIVER DU SUD.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to inquire :

What was the total cost of the works performed for the protection of the Rivière du Sud, in the parish of St. Thomas, county of Montmagny ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have not the information which the hon. gentleman asks for, but I shall make inquiries and endeavour to obtain it for him if he will permit the question to stand.

The notice of inquiry was allowed to stand.

COST OF POST OFFICE AT MONTMAGNY.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

The notice of inquiry being called :

What was the total cost of the post office at Montmagny, the cost of the ground and of the buildings thereon, and the extra works required for the adaptation of those buildings to the purposes for which they were bought?

Hon. Mr. MILLS said : I have not had the information transmitted to me by the Post Office Department, and so I am unable to give him the information which he asks.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY--That is very satisfactory !

The notice of inquiry was allowed to stand.

MURRAY HARBOUR BRANCH OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired :

1. Whether a contract for grading a section of the railway from Charlottetown to Murray Harbour, P.E.I., for which tenders were called in November last, has been awarded?
2. If so, to whom, what is the mileage of the said section, and the contract price per mile?
3. When is the work to be commenced, and when completed?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—A contract for a section of the railway from Charlottetown to Murray Harbour, P.E.I., for which tenders were invited last November, was awarded to J. W. McManus. The length of the section is eleven and a half miles. The contract is not per mile, but a schedule price contract. The work was to be commenced at once, and by the terms of the contract, is to be completed by the first August, 1900.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My object is to get at the cost, the amount of expenditure involved. Could not my hon. friend give that as a total ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have not been furnished with any such information, and I do not know, if the contract is by schedule price, whether there has been such a survey that the quantities can be ascertained or not. I can make inquiry on that subject.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Of course that could only be approximate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quite so, and unless there has been a careful survey, not even that, because sometimes these tenders are let according to quantity without the quantity having been ascertained at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not without a survey.

SUPPLIES OF OIL FOR THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The notice of motion being read :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate copies of all notices issued by the Intercolonial Railway since May, 1896, calling for tenders for the supply of oil for the said railway, and also copies of all tenders received in reply to said advertisement and contracts entered into as a result of such call for tenders.

2. A return showing the car mileage on the Intercolonial Railway for the year ended October 31, 1899.

3. Also, a return showing the total amount paid for oils for the Intercolonial Railway for the year ended October 31, 1899, giving the names of the parties to whom such payments were made.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON said : I do not propose to proceed with this motion for an address to-day. I merely rise to ask my hon. friend, the leader of the government, whether he is prepared to submit a return, which I asked for last session, on this subject. This address proposes to bring the information on the subject up to date ; but early last session, as my hon. friend may remember, I made some inquiries on this subject, and received some answers, but my hon. friend pointed out to me that some of the inquiries could only be answered by a return. I proceeded then to move for a return which I did at quite an early period last session. I was anxious to get it before the close of last session. I made repeated inquiries for it last year, and I do not wish to go on with this motion until that return is brought down.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I can only tell my hon. friend that the matter has been brought under the notice of the Minister of Railways, and as soon as the return comes from the Minister of Railways, I shall be prepared with pleasure to present it to the House, but I cannot say at this moment when the return will be ready. I have not that information.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend may remember that the Minister of Railways put a statement in his hand, which he read to the House, saying, with regard to the points that could not be answered by a question, that the papers were being sent for to Moncton, and would be brought down when they come. That is a long time ago, and I have made many applications for them. I hope my hon. friend will go further than he has gone, and will remind his colleague earnestly on the matter and see that the information is brought down.

CLAIMS FOR REFUND OF DUTY ON FISH.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE inquired :

If the government, or any member thereof have received a petition from Mr. C. C. Carlton, of Souris, P.E.I., praying for the payment to him of the sum of $208.50, to reimburse him for certain money paid by him to the United States Customs Department, as duty on fish exported on or about the year 1872, as set forth in his said petition? If so, is it the intention of the government to pay the said claim, as was done last year in settlement of a similar claim made by Messrs. Mayrick & Co. ?

He said : I wish to make a remark or two on this question. It may be remembered that about the year 1871, the British government requested the Dominion government, and also the government of Prince Edward Island—that province at that time not being part of the confederacy—that they would allow United States fishermen to fish in the waters round the British possessions in North America as had been done under the previous treaty, upon the understanding that the fish caught and fish oil produced by British subjects would be admitted into the United States free of duty. The government of Prince Edward Island acceded to that request of the British government, and made no objections to United States fishermen fishing in Canadian waters ; but the Dominion government did not pass such an order in council, or law, in reference to that matter, and in consequence the promise that was obtained from the United States to admit our fish and fish oil into the republic duty free was not granted on the ground that Canada had not acceded to the request of the British government. The people in Prince Edward Island, dealing in fish, had exported, during 1871 and 1872 a large quantity of fish and fish oil, with the expectation that the duties they were paying on these exports were to be refunded them by the United States government. They were in that regard disappointed, and afterwards they made application to the Dominion government to reimburse them for the loss they had sustained. In 1885, I think, the Dominion government appointed a commission to investigate these claims of the people of the island, and the commission reported favourably upon certain claims of British subjects, and also submitted a report on claims made by United States subjects doing business in Prince Edward Island. The claims of the British subjects were conceded and paid, but the claims of the United States subjects were not paid. There was nothing further heard about this matter until last session, when one of the claims was again revived, and a vote was passed through the parliament of Canada, granting to one of these United States firms doing business in Prince Edward Island the sum of $15,000 in settlement of their claim. Mr. Carlton, the gentleman I have referred to in this question, made application to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries since last session for information as to how he would proceed to collect his claim. He got no satisfactory answer from the minister, and I ask now that Mr. Carlton be placed in the same position as the other gentleman whose claim was paid last year. In doing so, I do not commit myself to the opinion that either claim should be paid, but certainly if it was a right and proper thing to pay fifteen thousand dollars to one individual, surely two hundred dollars ought to be paid to the other, who is in exactly the same position. They are both United States citizens, doing business in Prince Edward Island for the last forty years, and I see no reason why one should not be placed in the same position as the other.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A petition was received from Mr. Carlton a few days ago—I think on the sixth of March—and was referred in the ordinary way for report to council, and from council to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to inquire into the facts, and until those have been ascertained, I am not in a position to say what the government would do. It would depend, of course, altogether on the statement of facts.

THE LATE SENATORS LEWIN AND BELLEROSE.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I desire to recall to the minds of hon. gentlemen that since we separated last Thursday, an hon. member of this House has been called away by death. The Hon. Mr. Lewin was an old member of this House, having been called to this Chamber, I think, in 1876, and during the earlier portion of the time he was rather a constant attendant. Of recent years he has not been here very regularly. Of a very quiet and retiring disposition, Senator Lewin soon won the respect and esteem of every gentleman in the chamber. He rarely addressed this House in debate, although when matters pertaining to the subject with which he was thoroughly familiar, that is, banking and financial matters, he always took an active part. The hon. gentleman has gone to his long rest, highly esteemed and respected by the whole community who knew him. He was blessed with a very long life, having been born in 1812, and had been president of the Bank of New Brunswick for a period of over forty years—a period that is rather unexampled in the history of Canada. I am quite sure every member of this House fels that the Senate has lost a very kind and valuable member in the late Senator Lewin.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I take the opportunity of re-echoing the sentiments which have been uttered by the Secretary of State in reference to the late Senator Lewin. His death, I know, was a shock to every one who had the pleasure of knowing him. Although not politically allied to that gentleman, still during the short period of time I have sat with him in this House, I formed a very high estimate of his character. I do not know that I can say more than the hon. Secretary of State has said, and to express the deep regret which, I am sure, every member of the Senate feels at his sudden demise—sudden I call it, though he was well advanced in years. I met the hon. gentleman not many weeks ago in the city of Montreal, and he then told me that he had not felt in better health for years, and I looked forward, as many did when they saw him here, to years being added to his life. The only thing that he really felt was the failure of his eye-sight; beyond that he assured me over and over again that he had not felt physically better for many years past. I must say it was a very great shock to me when I read of his sudden—for such I look upon it,—death the other day. While repeating almost the words that have been uttered by the hon. Secretary of State, I may also call the attention of the House to another death, although it did not occur during our present sitting. Since the prorogation of the last parliament the hon. member from De Lanaudière (Mr. Bellerose) was taken from us. He was a gentleman known to all of us, and he had been in parliament since confederation, and I believe in the old parliament of Canada prior to that. He was a man of strong will, and held strong opinions upon almost every question presented for our consideration. I do not, however, consider that any detriment to a man's political or private character, because it is well that all men, no matter in what position in life they may be placed, should have strong, honest convictions upon questions with which they have to deal, and I am sure that we all respected that hon. gentleman, although we did not always agree with him. I felt his death personally, having known him for the last thirty years, and having sat with him at one time in the House of Commons. Although he and I very often were on opposite sides on different questions, he was a member whom I learned to respect, and in his latter days I think we were more intimately associated than during the previous part of our political career. Death has been making great inroads upon the members of the Senate, but when we consider the ages of a number of us, we may look for these changes. All I can hope is that those who succeed our departed brothers will be as worthy of the positions they are all called to occupy.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It seemed to me that it was more appropriate that my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, should allude to the death of Senator Lewin than myself, because he sat in this chamber with him since 1876, when he was appointed, a period of twenty-four years, while I, a comparatively new member of this House, had not the same intimate relations with him as my hon. colleague. I agree with all that my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, has said with regard to Senator Lewin, his high character, his modesty, his attainments, and his thorough acquaintance with the business of banking which made him a valuable member of this House. I may say. also, with regard to the late Senator Bellerose, that I knew him as a member of the House of Commons, like my hon. friend opposite. I knew that he was a man of very strong convictions, of great force of character, and of more than ordinary ability, and I am sure that those who sat with him in the House of Commons, as well as hon. gentlemen in this House, who knew him in his later years here, must all recognize the ability, the energy and the industry which he brought to the discharge of his public duties, and while we regret the loss of those hon. gentlemen, who were ornaments of this House, as well as representatives of the people for a time in the House of Commons, when we see the great age that they attained, we must realize that they could not, at best, have had many years further before them. We trust that those who succeed them in this House will bring the same industry and the same ability to the discharge of their duties that they exhibited while they were members of this chamber.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Whether it is they who go away or we that remain who deserve compassion and tears, we all regret the departure from among us of the honoured and highly esteemed colleague who has just passed from this life to his rest in the grave and beyond the grave. As his countryman, as his colleague here, and as his next desk neighbour, I had sufficient intercourse with him to know him well. I always found him, as indeed we all found him, a kind and good man ; indeed kindness and goodness were characteristic traits in him, so much so that they had become depicted in his features. After many years of the performance of good works, the souls of virtuous men become transparent, impressed, or, as it were, photographed in their whole appearance, and especially in their smile. Such was particularly the case with our departed friend. He has gone ; he has been gathered in the granary where Providence will gather us all, those of the other House as well as the Senate, and that at the bidding of no mortal man. The departure of Senator Lewin will cause deep regret in the community, and especially in New Brunswick, where he was better loved, because he was better known. We are losing in him a cherished colleague, a true Canadian, a great Christian and a good man.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—After the kindly, truthful and appropriate remarks of the leader of the government, and the leader of the opposition in this House, it is quite unnecessary for me to say a word, because I think those two hon. gentlemen express clearly the character of the hon. gentleman who has been taken from amongst us. But coming from the city of St. John, and knowing that gentleman for the last fifty years, I felt that I had a right to say a word or two. I knew the hon. gentleman when he was favoured by the British government with a prominent position under that government, and sent out here by them some fifty years ago. He held that office, and it was a very delicate office. It was a position in the Customs Department, where he was most likely to give offence to a great number of people in those days. Notwithstanding the position he held, I always found that he acquitted himself without giving unnecessary offence to any one. He was considered an honourable and fair-minded man even in that office. I have known him since he became president of the Bank of New Brunswick, and perhaps in this Dominion there is not a more successful institution than that bank became under his presidency. It is paying its original stockholders twelve per cent per annum, and is readily selling at over $300 per original share of $100, and its transactions have been carried on in a most satisfactory way under the administration of Mr. Lewin. His name was looked upon as a household word throughout that province. I might say that every word uttered by the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition in this House as to the character of that hon. gentleman was literally true; he was extremely retiring and modest in his nature and thoroughly honourable in his transactions. It is true he was not what might be considered a troublesome man in politics, but notwithstanding that he was most anxious for the well-being of his adopted country. His native country was Great Britain, and he was an Englishman to the core. He loved his country well, and sustained it in every public measure where he had a right to do so. I do not know a man in my experience who bore a more honourable character than the late Mr. Lewin. After the many kind expressions uttered by hon. gentlemen who have spoken to-day, I do not see that it is necessary to say anything further. I consider we have lost a model Christian, a good man, a citizen of St. John, who will be remembered for a very long period, and in my opinion it will be difficult to get his equal. I am much pleased to be able to say this from an acquaintance of fifty years with that hon. gentleman.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would like to ask my hon. friend, the leader of the government, if there is any probability of our getting the papers for which I moved on the 9th February, in reference to the correspondence between the late Major-General and Col. Hughes. The motion was passed on the 9th February, and we have not yet heard anything about it. If we had those papers before us they might aid materially in the discussion which is likely to follow the motion which I have already placed on the notice paper. While I am on my feet, I desire to ask the hon. Secretary of State whether there is any probability of our ever getting that return for which I moved early last session in reference to the dismissals in the different departments, some of which were laid before the House, but there were other departments which did not send any returns to us, particularly the Department of Railways and Canals, from which department was sent a very curt reply to the questions asked; I acquit the hon. Secretary of State of any blame in the matter, because I know his desire to have the papers laid before the Senate when they are ordered, but it does seem to me that some of the departments have made up their minds to treat the requests of the Senate with contempt, particularly the Department of Railways and Canals, for, ever since the present government has been in power, when a question has been asked here, and motions have been passed by this House relative to public matters, for information which we are entitled to get, scarcely ever has the information been furnished. I do not desire to cast any reflection on any department, but I think the dignity of the House demands that there should be either a distinct refusal to bring down the information, a defeat of the motion when it is made, or that the information should be furnished us within a reasonable time. Some departments give us the information and others do not. If it is not in the interests of the country that these facts should be laid before us, all the government has to do is to say so, and I do not know that we would particularly object. If it is not in the interests of the country that certain papers should be brought down, those at least who have had some experience in governing the country, would acquiesce at once, but when motions are regularly and freely accepted, and then session after session passes without the returns being brought down, I think my hon. friend who leads the government in the Senate will agree with me that it is not treating this House with the respect to which it is entitled.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know any reason—there may be reasons—why the papers that were moved for some time ago have not been brought down. With regard to these that the hon. gentleman has moved for, the Hughes-Hutton correspondence, I may say I know the Department of Militia and Defence has been so occupied of late that it would be very difficult indeed to take up anything but what is absolutely necessary, and pressing on their attention. I shall, however, call the attention of the Minister of Militia and Defence to my hon. friend's motion, and trust that the papers may be brought down before he discusses the letter which he has read here to-day, and upon which he purposes inviting a discussion in this House. With regard to the other return, I shall invite the attention of the Minister of Railways to the motion of my hon. friend, and the delay that has occurred.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There are many other departments as well as the Department of Railways that are behind with the information.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understood there were one or two parts of it which my hon. friend the Secretary of State brought down some time ago.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Some of it, but not all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The Railway Department brought down a return which was not acceptable, but some departments did not bring down any at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Particularly that return with regard to the receipts from the sale of school lands in Manitoba. I did not ask for any elaborate return. All I asked for was that a return, which had been made up to a certain date, should be continued up to the present time. There cannot be much work involved in that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend refers to the school lands return now?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would suggest to my hon. friend also, so that he may not knock at the wrong door, not to ask the Postmaster General for the information I was seeking for to-day, but to address himself directly to the Department of Public Works.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I noticed my hon. friend's question.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (G) 'An Act to incorporate the Canadian Steel Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

COX DIVORCE BILL.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER, from the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented their fourth report. He said: This is the report made by the committee on having submitted to them the evidence showing that service had been made on all the parties as ordered by the last report on this case which we discussed last week. I may say, for the benefit of those hon. gentlemen who seemed to think that the committee had been lax in its directions, or remiss in its efforts to obtain personal service upon the respondent in this case, that at the time that the former report was made the committee instructed the petitioner to produce service upon the respondent in this case, that at the time that the former report was made the committee instructed the petitioner to produce additional evidence showing the efforts that he had made to serve the respondent personally, and that evidence was produced to-day, and as the affidavit is short, I will ask the liberty of the House to read it. The affidavit is as follows:

I, Edwin James Cox, of the city and district of Montreal, the said petitioner, do solemnly declare:

1. That down to the present time I have been unable to obtain any information as to where the said respondent is or has been during the last three or four years.

2. That I have not seen or had any information as to where she is since shortly after the judgment in review, in the action in separation, a copy of which judgment has already been filed with this petition.

3. That shortly after said judgment the said respondent seems to have disappeared from Montreal, and all inquiries, including the efforts made by the detective, John A. Grose, whose declaration is also filed herein, concerning her, have failed to obtain any information as to her whereabouts.

4. That from time to time I have made inquiries of all the persons mentioned in my last declaration as being related or allied to her, and on whom copies of the present Bill and Notice have been personally served in accordance with the order of the Senate, as appears by the returns herewith, with the result, as before stated, that I have been totally unable to obtain any information as to where she is which would enable me to serve or have her served with a copy of the said Bill and notice.

And I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing it to be true, knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath, and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

ED. J. COX.

Declared before me at the city of Montreal, in the county of Hochelaga, in the province of Quebec, this twelfth day of March, A.D. 1900.

HURLOW H. HUTCHINS.

As I said before, when we were discussing this subject, we might have ordered publication, or might have had an advertisement and made the service by publication, but I think the House will agree with me that under the circumstances, we did everything we could to bring the notice before the parties. I move that this report be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF RIVER DU SUD.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

What was the total cost of the works performed for the protection of the Rivière du Sud, in the parish of St. Thomas, county of Montmagny?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot give the hon. gentleman the information. As soon as I receive it I shall bring it down to the House without delay. I have already asked that the matter be expedited.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose the same applies to the other question of which I have given notice:

What was the total cost of the post office at Montmagny, the cost of the ground and of the buildings thereon, and the extra works required for the adaptation of those buildings to the purposes for which they were bought?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The same answer applies.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And to every question we may ask this session. It would not take half an hour to get that information if the hon. minister was willing to get it.

SUPPLY OF OIL FOR THE INTERCOLONIAL.

MOTION DROPPED.

The notice of motion being read:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate copies of all notices issued by the Intercolonial Railway since May, 1896, calling for tenders for the supply of oil for the said railway, and also, copies of all tenders received in reply to said advertisement and contracts entered into as a result of such call for tenders.

2. Return showing the car mileage on the Intercolonial Railway for the year ended October 31, 1899.

3. Also, return showing the total amount paid for oils for the Intercolonial Railway for the year ended October 31, 1899, giving the names of the parties to whom such payments were made.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON said: The papers have already been brought down, I believe, and I ask that the order be discharged.

The order was discharged.

MILITARY CHURCH PARADES.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to direct the attention of the government to a couple of articles which have appeared in recent issues of the Ottawa Citizen and other papers. The paper which I hold in my hand is the Citizen of last Monday, and the article to which I refer, reads as follows:

Dr. Rose Complains

That There was no Parade of Methodist Members of Strathcona's.

Rev. Dr. Rose, in the course of his sermon in Dominion Methodist church yesterday morning, drew attention to the fact that none of the officers or men of Strathcona's Horse who were in the church parade, were in attendance at the service, although provision had been made for the Anglicans, Roman Catholics and Presbyterians, who were told to attend service at Christ Church Cathedral, St. Patrick's Church and St. Andrew's Church. Hence the Methodist pastor regretted that no provision had been made to enable the Methodists to attend their own church. He regretted it all the more, he said, from the fact that on Thursday last he had written Col.

Steele stating that his officers and men would be made welcome at Dominion Methodist Church whether they came singly or in a body. He could not think that Col. Steele would ignore his invitation, as such a proceeding would constitute a serious breach of military etiquette.

Col. Steele, when spoken to on the matter later in the day, stated that he regretted to have to say that Rev. Dr. Rose's kind invitation had not been brought to his notice. Had he received it he certainly would have acknowledged the courtesy of the pastor of Dominion Methodist Church.

All arrangements for the church parade, Col. Steele stated, were left in the hands of Col. Cotton, district commanding officer.

And in to-day's Citizen I find the following, among other things :

The following telegram has been received by Dr. Rose from Col. Steele:

'Your statement in the pulpit that I repudiated your invitation is incorrect. The very day received, it was referred to the officer commanding the Ottawa brigade.'

It will be seen from the above that Col. Steele has been misled as to what Dr. Rose really said. The latter did not even suggest a repudiation of the invitation, but simply stated the facts of the case without any comment in order that the members of his congregation might know that the omission of the Methodist parade was not due to their pastor's negligence.

In directing the attention of the government to this incident, I might say that had Col. Steele not authorized an officer outside of the Strathcona Horse to look after this parade, probably the government could take no cognizance of the incident which unfortunately occurred. But inasmuch as Col. Steele handed over the arrangement for the parade to an officer under the authority of the Militia Department, and who presumably is acting in whatever he does under the authority of that department, it is but right, in justice to the Methodists of the Dominion, that the attention of the government should be directed to the act of discourtesy which is complained of, because I might say that any official of the government being guilty of an act of discourtesy to Dr. Rose, in his capacity as pastor of the Dominion Methodist Church here, is likewise guilty of an insult to the whole Methodist body throughout the Dominion. Knowing Col. Steele as I do, I would not for a moment accuse him of discourtesy or incivility. In fact, the North-west public have the fullest confidence in Col. Steele's courtesy and recognition of the rights of the men under him. His reputation is of such a character that nobody would think for a moment of holding him in any sense responsible for this act of discourtesy of which I complain. I might say that I would not direct the attention of the government to this incident had not the frequency of these incidents been thrust upon the public from time to time in connection with the Militia Department. It was only a few weeks ago, in connection with the second contingent at Halifax, that the intervention of the minister was required to prevent military discipline from being exercised upon some members of that force, because they refused to carry out the instructions of an officer to attend some church other than the Methodist Church, and I notice by the public press that it required the intervention of the Minister of Militia to do justice in the matter. I might say that the Methodist body has not been supersensitive in directing public attention to this, I might say constant, or frequent, ignoring of the rights to which they are entitled as well as the other religious bodies throughout the Dominion. It is not necessary for me to say that the Methodist body is the largest Protestant body in the Dominion, that the last statistics established the fact that they are the owners of one-third of the churches throughout Canada, that their churches, their benevolent institutions, their universities and schools cover this broad Dominion, but, notwithstanding this fact, what they cherish more than those forces to which I have referred is the fact that in this Dominion of Canada civil and religious institutions are enjoying a freedom not exceeded in any other country within the empire. Hence, they naturally resent any act of discourtesy from officials who may be of an irresponsible character, as in this case. While I direct the attention of the government to this fact, I might say also that the same thing repeats itself in state functions throughout the Dominion. As I said a few moments ago, the Methodists are not a hypercritical body in regard to special, or exceptional, or even a general recognition of their rights, but we find that in the state precedence which obtains in this Dominion, there has never been any recognition of that body to the same extent as some of the other bodies in the Dominion. In fact, my attention was directed to the regrettable fact that, while at the opening of this House special provision was made for the reception on the floor of the House of the representatives of other religious bodies, there was an absolute ignoring of the representatives of that great religious body, and it required the intervention of certain members of this House before the official charged with the administration of etiquette at those functions recognized for a moment that the representatives of that body had the same right as those representing other religious bodies to sit upon the floor of this chamber in the opening of parliament. I might say that the Methodist body is not seeking any special rights. They are not seeking for political favours. All that they seek, and all that they require from the government, is that there should be impressed upon its officials the necessity of extending courtesy and civility to that body the same as extended to any other religious body throughout the whole Dominion, and if a general order has not been passed so as to compel military officials to pay respect to the various religious bodies throughout the Dominion, and recognize the equality of all religious bodies—because it is not by reason of one being a more influential body than the other that this preference is shown—then such an order should be promulgated so that there should not be that offensive conduct in the matter of drawing invidious distinctions which so oftentimes is obtruded upon the public notice and particularly upon those religious bodies which have been so ignored. I am satisfied that all I have to do in the matter is to direct the attention of the government to this unfortunate incident and there will not be a repetition of it in the future. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition directs my attention to an article in another paper which I had not seen before, and possibly my hon. friend will read it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The correspondence to which I refer is that of the Toronto Mail and Empire, in which attention is called to the circumstances of which the hon. gentleman from Calgary has spoken. The correspondent says that he called Col. Steele's attention to the remarks made by the Rev. Dr. Rose, and that the answer of Col. Steele was as follows :

The commanding officer informed me that he had no recollection of having received any letter from Dr. Rose, as stated, although it might possibly be among a stack of correspondence which he had not time to look at. It was the last thought in his mind to slight any church or any person. If he had received one, he had received fifty personal invitations for the regiment to attend church to-day, but in every case the same answer was given——

This is the point to which I desire to call attention :

—namely, that the Militia Department was making all the arrangements. So ignorant was he of the matter that when he left the grounds this morning, he had no idea where the churches were to which his men were going.

The only point in that article which justifies any reference to it, is the fact of Col. Steele's statement as to the Militia Department making the arrangements, and it appears that it was confined simply to the three churches. I might mention, also, that this is not the first time that I, individually, have had to complain of the want of that courtesy which I think should be extended to all churches. When I came here to attend the opening of the Senate, I had received a letter from Senator Cox, from Toronto, asking me to see that the president of the Methodist body, the Rev. Dr. Carman, had a proper seat allotted to him. Every one knows what position the Rev. Dr Carman occupies as the head of the largest Protestant body in the Dominion of Canada. When I went to Black Rod, who has this matter in charge, and asked him whether a ticket had been sent to the Rev. Dr. Carman as the head of the Methodist body, I was informed that no ticket had been sent. I then looked at the list and found that there was not a single Methodist clergyman in the city of Ottawa who had been allotted a seat in the place set apart for the clergy and different dignitaries in the city, and no tickets had been sent. I was informed by the Usher of the Black Rod that if a ticket had been sent to Dr. Carman it was done without his knowledge, and that he had nothing to do with it. I do not know whose duty it is to look after it, but I think it is high time that a denomination so important as the Methodist body should have the same attention paid to them as is paid to the others ; and upon my suggestion a ticket was sent to the Rev. Dr. Rose, and a place allotted to those two gentlemen on the floor of the Senate. The ticket of invitation to the Rev. Dr. Carman had been sent by the Premier individually, without the knowledge, so far as I could ascertain, of any one connected with the Senate. Of course, I make no complaint of that, but I think the least that could have been done would have been to inform the Senate authorities who had the allotting of seats to these gentlemen, so that they would know who was coming, and even if that had not been the case, if the Premier had not sent this ticket, none would have been sent to that body at all. It is not necessary for me to enlarge upon this subject. It is unfortunate that it has occurred. My hon. friend the Secretary of State knows the difficulties which have presented themselves to all governments upon this unfortunate question of precedence, but I will say, without violating any secret of either government, that when I was in London three years ago, I had an interview with the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Chamberlain, upon this very question, and he frankly stated that anything that Canada wanted in reason in reference to the changing of the order of precedence, the Colonial Department would not object to. Then, he pointed out that some little difficulty had arisen in the correspondence that had taken place. I went to the Under Secretary, and saw him in reference to that question, and simply pointed out to him the fact that there is no state church of Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Everyone is upon a footing of equality, and all that we ask is that the Methodists, the Baptists, or any other body that has an organization, should be treated upon a basis of equality. No one denies that the older churches should take precedence—at least I do not, and I do not know that anybody does. The question has been one of the difficult matters with which we have had to deal for the last ten or fifteen years, but like many other questions in which the Colonial Secretary and the home government acquiesce in the demands which have been made upon them by the government of Canada, it stops there. You cannot get them any further, and I think I will show that plainly when I come to deal with the question of the Pacific cable. This is another instance of it, and the sooner it is put a stop to in a country like this, where all religious bodies stand on an equal footing the better. I am quite willing to give precedence to the older churches, but let all have a place allotted to them so that they will know where they stand.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—When my hon. friend speaks about the older churches, I think he might have a very fierce controversy upon that subject, for there is not likely to be an agreement upon that point. I may say that I entirely agree with the view expressed by the hon. gentleman, that in the opening of parliament and our state functions, we ought not to discriminate between the religious bodies of the country, that we have no state church here, and we will presume that in that respect they all stand upon a footing of equality; that we are not here an ecclesiastical council to decide who is right and who is wrong, and that being so, we cannot distinguish between them. My hon. friend speaks about a matter that I have heard. I remember reading in the newspapers a paragraph relating to the fact that the Rev. Dr. Carman and the Rev. Dr. Rose, had not been invited to a seat on the floor of this House as representative men of the Methodist body. Whether anybody should be represented here is a question which might perhaps be considered in the face of these controversies that have arisen, but I may say that I have no doubt whatever that the Minister of Militia has not undertaken to discriminate between the different religious bodies of the country with regard to military affairs. I am perfectly sure that he has not undertaken to discriminate against the Methodist body. How the difficulty has arisen to which the hon. gentleman from Calgary has referred, it is impossible for me to say, because I have heard of it here from him for the first time. The articles which he has read had escaped my attention, and with regard to the course pursued by my hon. friend opposite in this House, I do not think we have made any alterations or changes in the conditions of things which exist at present of which he complains. I think those conditions have continued to exist since confederation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So far as the order of precedence is concerned, that is so, because that was adopted by the Colonial Office, but there are the other difficulties.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As to the other matter, I knew nothing about it. It was not brought to my attention, and my hon. friend admits that Senator Cox, a prominent Methodist, communicated with him. He did not communicate with me, and so far as I am concerned, I knew nothing of these matters. I supposed that they had all been settled at a very early period of confederation, so far as their rights to a seat on the floor of this Chamber were concerned.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Only two bodies.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If that be so, if there be the difficulties which my hon. friend has mentioned, that may be the reason why the matter should be taken up and the various religious bodies of the country put upon a footing of equality in the opening and closing of parliament, and at other state functions. I think that in a country where you have no established church that would be very desirable, and that the very weakest body in the country in that regard—because it is a personal and individual matter—should not be put in the position of inferiority, even to one that is very numerous and very powerful.

THE BUBONIC PLAGUE.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to remind members of the government and of this House of the fact that very early this session I called attention to the necessity of taking measures to prevent the bubonic plague coming into Canada. I have read in a paper to-day that a ship arrived from Japan, one of the Japanese line, probably officered and commanded by Japanese officers, with a great many coolies on board, and they were all huddled down in the hold in the greatest dirt and filth imaginable. The ship had to be torn to pieces, so as to cleanse it. The worst feature of it is that within fifty miles of Canadian territory the bubonic plague has been landed, on the shore opposite Victoria. I hope the government will take every possible means to prevent this plague from coming in. The Japs who have the plague may at any time escape into the Dominion, and if the disease finds lodgment in the country, there is no saying how far it may go. The government should at once communicate with the quarantine officers and leave nothing undone that can be done to prevent the plague from coming into the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend gave notice of this inquiry at a very early period of the session, and I received at the time, and had in my desk for several weeks here, a report from the quarantine officer, Dr. Montizambert, and perhaps in reply to my hon. friend, I had better read it :

Ottawa, February 9th, 1900.

With regard to the presence of bubonic plague in Japan, it will be within your recollection that special precautions have been carried out at the quarantine station in British Columbia for the last three years, owing to the presence of bubonic plague in the Orient. These precautions include the bathing of the persons of all Chinese and Japanese steerage passengers arriving at William Head, and the disinfection of their clothing.

Since the outbreak of bubonic plague at Kobe, I have communicated with the superintendent of the steamship lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and have an assurance from him that up to the latest advices to date of 6th January, their vessels are not carrying steerage passengers from that port.

There have been, by your authority, very stringent special regulations issued for the protection of Canada from the threatening invasion of this disease.

With regard to the question of the possibility of the bringing in of the disease by the importation of silks, and fabrics of that kind, and fruit, and the question as to whether it might be necessary to stop the importation of all kinds of products from Japan, and to stop immigration, I may say :

1st. With regard to immigration, that we have protection from the facts partially recited above ; from the fact that the steamship companies, as a rule, for their own sakes, cease to bring immigrants from a port which has been declared infected ; that immigrants taken at any port in the Orient, are subjected to medical inspection, before being allowed to go on board ; that the length of the voyage is greater than the period of incubation of the disease, so that when a vessel arrives at William Head without any cases of plague having occurred on board, the danger of any of the passengers declaring it afterwards may be safely considered as past, after our special quarantine inspection.

2nd. With regard to the question of cargoes, in view of the facts that the possibility of the conveying of plague by merchandise is still unproven ; that the experience of the harmless importation of cargoes to this country, to the United States, and to Great Briain, for years past, from countries where plague has been present, would seem against the theory of its possible importation by such means ; that such knowledge as we have of the life history of the bacillus of this disease confirms us in this belief, I have not considered myself justified in recommending you to cause any restriction to the free acceptance of merchandise arriving by healthy vessels.

With regard, however, to cargoes that may arrive in vessels on board of which actual cases of the disease have occurred, the special regulations which you have issued to your officers, provide for the most stringent and complete disinfection of the cargo as well as of other parts of the vessel.

F. MONTIZAMBERT, M.D., Edin., F.R.C.S.
Director General of Public Health.

I think my hon. friend will see that proper precautions have been taken to prevent the introduction of the plague into this country.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I am sure the House will feel gratified to hear that very full and comprehensive report. The urgency now is much more pressing. Fortunately the ship lies some fifty miles from Victoria. I shall communicate, myself, with Dr. Montizambert, and give him this paper with the report to show him how close the plague is now to our shores.

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved :

1. That the establishment of a telegraph cable across the Pacific to connect Canada with the Australasian colonies has long been regarded as of high importance to the empire ; it having been recognized to be of Imperial importance at the Colonial Conferences of 1887 and 1894, affirmed by an agreement between the home government and the governments of Canada, New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, and New Zealand, and ratified by the Canadian parliament last session ; this House therefore regrets that serious delays have occurred in the prosecution of the undertaking, manifestly through the hostility of the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, which company is now demanding concessions from the Australasian colonies which, if granted, will imperil the success of the Pacific cable.

2. That this House is of opinion that any further delay in proceeding with the actual construction of the undertaking would be inimical to the interests of the empire, and strongly deprecates granting any further concessions to the Eastern Extension, or any other company.

3. That it is expedient in granting permission hereafter to private companies to lay cables between British possessions, it be on the express condition that the State may assume ownership whenever in the general public interest it is advisable to do so.

He said : This motion, which has been standing on the paper for some little time, is one of very great importance, not only to Canada as a portion of the empire, but to the empire itself. Since the motion was placed uopn the paper, the question has been so thoroughly discussed in the House of Commons, and also before the Confederation League that met a few days ago, that I am relieved of the responsibility and labour, to a very great extent, of dealing with the subject from what might be considered a colonial or imperial standpoint. The imperial character of the enterprise is so thoroughly understood, and so completely appreciated by the whole of the British Empire, outside of the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, who are directly and pecuniarily interested, that to spend time in elaborating the subject would be altogether unnecessary. I have deemed it expedient, therefore, to confine myself, as near as possible, to a discussion of the enterprise from the time that the first resolutions were passed, in 1887, at the conference which was held in London. My reason for doing that is to point out to this House and to the country the dilatoriness with which the project has been treated from the time I have mentioned, and to try to point out why delay has taken place from 1887 until the present period. A study of the subject will convince any one that that delay has been brought about by an undue influence on the part of that great cable monopoly that exists in London at the present day, and that in exposing that we shall accomplish, I hope, the end we have in view, which is the breaking up of that monopoly and the establishment of telegraphic communication around the whole world touching no other portion of the earth except that which is under the British flag. In 1887, a conference was held in England to consider trade relations between Great Britain and her colonies. At that time the question of a Pacific cable between the Dominion of Canada and the Australasian colonies, connecting with the lines already existing, was brought under the consideration of that conference, and it is somewhat gratifying to know that the resolution, passed at that time, was proposed by a Canadian.

Sir Alexander Campbell and Mr. Sandford Fleming were the delegates representing Canada at that conference. At that time the Hon. Mr. Campbell, P.M.G., moved a resolution affirming the necessity of the Pacific cable, which we are now considering. That resolution was passed unanimously. It was then urged upon the Home government the necessity of having a hydrographic survey of the Pacific Ocean made in order to ascertain whether, in view of the distance between this continent and the first point at which the cable would touch some island in the Pacific, and thence on to Australia, the project was at all feasible. At that period of our history, it was also thought that the depth of the ocean would militate against an enterprise of this kind. However, experience has taught us that the depth of the ocean is no barrier—on the contrary, that when a cable is sunk sufficiently deep, it is safer and lasts longer, is less subject to friction from the waves than it is in shallow water. The British government sent a vessel to make a survey of the ocean. However, it had not been long at work until it was withdrawn, and, strange to say, no one knew what the result of that survey was—what the report of the officers was—until as late as 1894. Then a report was made, but that report was not laid before the public so as to show the exact position in which the question then stood as to the feasibility of this scheme. The matter then remained in abeyance until 1893. Previous to that, however, Canada had subsidized a line of steamers to run between the Dominion and the Australasian colonies. That line of steamers had not been at work very long until it was found that, in order to make it a success, it was necessary to have telegraphic communications between Canada and Australia across the Pacific. There are many reasons which I could give why that view was taken, but it is unnecessary, I think, at the present day to recite them, because the question has been so thoroughly discussed that there are few who have paid any attention to the subject that do not realize the fact that trade in these days can only be carried on successfully by means of cable communication between different parts of the world. In order to impress that idea on the people of Australia, the Dominion government decided to send a delegate to those colonies for the purpose of bringing under the notice of the different Australasian governments the importance of trade between these two portions of Her Majesty's dominions, and also to bring under the notice of these governments the necessity for cable communication in order to facilitate and build up that trade between the colonies that we hoped, and still hope, will increase and multiply in volume. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was selected to proceed to Australia, and was accompanied by the then Mr. Sandford Fleming, as his adviser. I may add this to the credit of Mr. Fleming, that his mission and all the work that he performed in connection with this enterprise, and his journey from Canada to Australia, and from Australia to England, where we desired to bring under the notice of the Imperial government the very important questions to which I shall allude before I sit down, was all at his own expense. He paid his own passage and his own travelling expenses throughout. I pay this tribute to that gentleman because many thought at the time, when he was taking so much interest in the project, that he was being paid for the work he was doing, while, on the contrary, he was paying for it out of his own pocket. After the Canadian government had decided to send their Minister of Trade and Commerce and Mr. Fleming, the Colonial Office was notified of the object which the Canadian government had in view in sending a deputation to Australia, and notice was cabled to the Colonial Office on the 11th of September, 1893, asking that department to render such assistance as was within their power, to accomplish the object which the Canadian government had in view—that is, the construction of the cable and the increase of trade between the two countries. The deputation sailed on September 17, only a few days after the Colonial Office had been notified of the intention and the action of the Canadian government. When I point out to you, as I shall shortly, what occurred, it will not only surprise every member of the Senate, but, I think, will surprise every one who has not studied the question; instead of sending documents to the different colonial governments in Australia, asking them to assist the Canadian delegation, all the letters and despatches which were sent had but one object, namely, to frustrate anything they might attempt to do. En route to Australia, Mr. Fleming and myself stopped at Honolulu, the capital of the Hawaiian Islands, and, while there, we took the trouble to investigate, as far as we could, all the documents and papers which were within reach, and also the Admiralty charts, to ascertain if there was not some island in the Pacific Ocean which could be utilized for the purpose of a landing spot, so as to break the great distance that must necessarily occur, if the cable was laid from this continent to Fanning island, the first British possession we could reach in that locality. We found that there was an island called Necker Island upon which the flag of no nation had been raised. We then took steps to bring the existence of this island under the notice of the Imperial government. I merely mention that 'en passant,' but shall refer to it more fully hereafter. On arriving in Sydney we at once sought interviews with the different governments of Australasia. We had an interview with the New South Wales government on the 11th October; with the Queensland government on the 20th October; with the Victoria government on the 30th October, and with the government of South Australia on the 2nd November. At each of these meetings, the first thing that met us was a despatch from the Colonial Office containing a letter dated the 15th September, 1893, written four days after the notification of the Canadian government to the Colonial Office of the fact that a deputation was to be sent to Australia, and that despatch contained also letters from the General Post Office of the 5th July, 1893, and the report of the hydrographer, of February 28th, 1887, all of which were adverse to the laying of that cable. Now, the question arises, when the Colonial Office was asked to assist, why were these adverse reports sent immediately to Australia in time to reach there before the Canadian delegation, and to place the Post Office Department in each of the different colonies in possession of reports which threw cold water on the project and which declared, in some of them, the impracticability of laying the cable.

There was also a letter from the late Sir John Pender, who was president of the Eastern Extension Telegraph Co., as you all know, he being strongly opposed in every respect to the construction of this cable. In addition to that, while we were engaged in these negotiations in Australia, strange to say a positive agreement was entered into between the Colonial Office and the Eastern Extension Co., giving a monopoly to the company of landing privileges in Hong Kong until 1918, or 20 years, and a special provision is in that agreement, as against Canada, but the Imperial government, reserve to themselves the right to purchase all the interests that the Eastern Extension Company had in that telegraph plant. But what I desire more particularly to point out to the Senate is the extraordinary fact, that while the Colonial Office was in possession of the fact that Canada had subsidized a line of steamers to cultivate trade between those two portions of Her Majesty's dominions, and had sent a delegation to Australia for the purpose of assisting in developing trade and for the purpose of having cable communication laid across the ocean between the two continents, that they should have sent, at that very time, reports adverse to the whole scheme, and, in addition to that, entered into another agreement with that great monopoly, the Eastern Extension Company, by which Canada was specially precluded from landing a cable of any kind in Hong Kong. We can draw just what inference we please from that fact. Having got through that portion of our duties we brought the attention of the Australian governments to the necessity of securing possession, if possible, of Necker Island, and I may say the Australian governments fully concurred in everything we did in that particular. We at once drafted a despatch, not only to our own government, but also to the Imperial government, urging upon them the necessity of securing the sending a war ship and raising the British flag on the island. That is fully brought out in the paper that has just been laid before the Senate, and in reading a couple of paragraphs from that paper the Senate will get a better idea, and in a more succinct form, of the matter than I could give, of what we did at that period. The writer goes on to say :

Every inquiry at Honolulu, during the minister's visit in 1893, having satisfied him and the resident British Commissioner that Necker Island was unclaimed by Hawaii or by any power, a memorandum was sent to the British government pointing out its singularly commanding geographical position for telegraphic purposes, and as possibly it was of vital importance to secure it as a landing station for the Pacific cable, it was strongly recommended that it be immediately taken possession of in the name of Her Majesty. The circumstances respecting the availability of Necker Island were, without loss of time, made known by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the governments of Canada, New South Wales, Victoria and Queensland. Each of these governments was convinced of its great utility, and in October, 1893, sent instructions to their respective High Commissioners or Agents General in London to urge upon the home government the advisability of immediate action being taken in securing possession of this unclaimed islet, for the purpose of making it a landing station for the Pacific cable. The Australian governments as well as the Canadian Minister of Trade and Commerce, having read the despatches above mentioned, recently transmitted by the Colonial Office, were impressed with the alleged impracticability of the Fanning Island group, and looked upon the possession of Necker Island as vital. It was accordingly arranged that I should proceed from Australia to London with the special object of leaving nothing undone to secure its possession.

It is Mr. Fleming who wrote this despatch. Mr. Fleming left Australia while I was in the colony, and proceeded to England and laid this important question fully before the Imperial government. The result was that a gentleman was sent—it is not necessary for me to mention names—from England to the Hawaiian Islands for the purpose of investigating this subject, and I may add that the Canadian government sent Mr. Fleming to accompany him, meeting him in San Francisco, but, unfortunately for this country, some people could not hold their tongues, and there were people in Honolulu who let the cat out of the bag. The moment the president of the then Republic of Hawaii heard of it, he at once despatched a warship of their own to Necker Island and hoisted the Hawaiian flag. Delay and talk caused the loss of that island to Great Britain, and for the reasons which I have pointed out, I have no doubt at all but what, by some means or other the Pender monopoly obtained the information, which they should not have had, and probably the same influence which induced the Colonial Office to put the Australian government in possession of information which would lead to the destruction of the whole enterprise, if acted upon, obtained that information through the same source, and communicated it to the authorities in Honolulu. However, I have given the House these historical facts, which may be new even to many people who take an interest in this project. The matter ended there and the question then arose as to whether a cable could be laid between British colonies and Fanning Island, and successfully worked. I may state, as a piece of information, that that objection was met when Mr. Fleming and I were in London in 1896, when we took means, through the kindness of Mr. Hosmer to have that matter decided, tested the question by maintaining a direct connection between London and the terminus of their Atlantic cable on this continent, and returned back to London without a break. That established beyond a doubt or peradventure that there was no difficulty whatever in laying a cable from British Columbia to Fanning Island, and having it successfully worked, notwithstanding its distance. So that in that respect we were enabled to meet the objection, which I am glad to know has been verified since the time that we were in England.

The next step taken in this connection was at the Colonial Conference held in Ottawa in 1894. That conference was composed, as hon. gentlemen know, of representatives from all the principal colonies, and further, by a representative from England herself. That was the first time, in the history of our country, that a colonial government suggested a conference to consider the question of trade between the different parts of the British Empire, and the construction of a Pacific cable, and in addition to that to invite the Imperial authorities to send a delegate to take part in its deliberations. I look upon that as an event worthy of mention, and one that will be considered many years hence as an important incident in the history of our country. The Canadian government inaugurated that conference of 1894. They invited the Imperial government to assist them in coming to conclusions as to the best mode of cementing the different portions of the empire together, and establishing trade relations that did not then exist ; and at that meeting a resolution was unanimously passed, affirming the importance and the necessity of this cable. They went further : they authorized by resolution the Canadian government to advertise for tenders—they did not say to advertise, but to ascertain by every means possible, the cost of construction and laying of a cable of that kind, and its feasibility, and whether it was probable that science had sufficiently advanced to overcome the many difficulties which had existed years ago. The Minister of Trade and Commerce at once advertised in the English papers for tenders for the laying of a cable between Canada, Fanning Island, and New Zealand, and the other Australasian colonies, asking for tenders via Necker Island, and via Honolulu, and by Fanning Island. The result was that the very best cable manufacturers in the world sent in tenders, offering to construct and lay the cable for nearly half a million of money less than it had been contemplated a cable of the kind could by any possibility be laid, and with a guarantee for two years of its successful working. Nothing further could be done by the Canadian government. Unfortunately there the matter remained in abeyance until 1896, nor did the Colonial Office take any active steps to accomplish the object which the passing of these resolutions had in view. I attribute that, in a great measure, to the same influence to which I have already alluded—back door influence, where information was furnished when it should not have been given. In 1896 the government of Sir Charles Tupper, after he had formed his administration, asked me to proceed to England with Mr. Fleming as expert adviser, in connection with Sir Donald Smith—now Lord Strathcona—to meet representatives from the colonies to consider this question. After our arrival in England the Colonial Secretary appointed Sir Donald Smith and myself and a representative from each of the different Australasian colonies to meet in conference and discuss this question. We met, but, as in other cases, nothing was done. Unfortunately, it was at a period when the Imperial parliament was in session. A conference had been arranged to consider a telegraphic code, which was to meet at Buda Pesth, and our Australasian delegates, instead of remaining in London to consider this great question which affected them infinitely more than it does Canada, when we consider the pecuniary interest they had involved, went off to Buda Pesth and left Mr. Fleming and myself in London for three or four weeks doing nothing. As soon as they returned a meeting was held. Lord Selborne, the Under Secretary of the Colonies, was appointed chairman.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not catch the name of the hon. gentlemen who went away.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Australasian delegates were Sir Saul Samuel, of New South Wales, and Mr. Gillies, of Victoria. The agent general for South Australia did not take part in the conference for the reasons that South Australia is largely interested, having invested a large amount of money in the construction of land lines in connection with the Eastern Extension Company cable, and therefore the construction of any other line would be competition with their line and would deprive them of certain revenues. South Australia never gave any encouragement to the construction of this line. On the contrary, the Premier, Mr. Kingston, pointed out to me very frankly: 'If we assist you in constructing this line, we deprive our own line of business and deprive ourselves of revenue from the working of our line.' The holidays were about coming on then, and any one who knows anything about English people knows that they must not be deprived of their holidays. It was suggested that our conference should adjourn until some time in the fall. It was adjourned and we returned home. During my absence the government changed. I thought that the government of the day would much prefer having some gentleman to represent them on that commission than myself. I was not aware of what their feelings were upon this subject. I had no knowledge at that time of what their policy would be, and for that reason I sent in my resignation to Lord Selborne, and acquainted the Premier of Canada that I had done so, giving my reasons. The Hon. Albert Jones, of Halifax, was appointed in my place. He and Sir Donald Smith were the representatives from Canada, assisted, as was the case while I was there, by Mr. Fleming. That meeting resulted very much in the same way as the conference with which I had been connected. They did, however, come to a decision upon this important question as to state ownership, and the construction of this line, but strange to say, though this was in 1896, the report of what they did and the decision to which they came was never known to the world until 1899. Here was another delay of about three years. It was not long after that meeting, as early as May, 1899, that the Colonial Office desired a change in the agreement to which they had come as to state ownership, and desired to place themselves in the position of an endorser to the extent of five-eighteenths of all possible loss that might occur from the working of the cable, thereby divesting itself of any ownership directly or indirectly of the cable itself, so that if there was a loss in the working the British government was to be responsible for five-eighteenths of that loss, only, the colonies were to assume the balance, and the colonies would thereby own the cable instead of its being a joint ownership by Britain and her colonies. The Canadian government, I am glad to say, protested most vigorously against any such departure from the terms of the agreement entered into in 1896. After the protest by the Canadian government and by the British press against any departure from that agreement, the Colonial Office asked for another conference, and the Hon. Mr. Tarte, who was then proceeding to England, was appointed by his government to associate himself with Lord Strathcona, and he was accompanied by Mr. Fleming as expert adviser, to again meet the delegates of the different colonies and the Colonial Office, for the purpose of protesting against any change in the arrangement. Now, strange to say, that meeting of delegates was held on the fourth of July ; the Hon. Mr. Tarte and Mr. Fleming did not arrive in London until the fifth of July, so that the delegation which had been asked for, and sent by the Canadian government, had nothing to say or to do with any new arrangement that might be come to. Lord Strathcona, of course, was present, and I suppose they did not deem it advisable to delay any further, as the Colonial Office had receded from the position which they had last taken and had consented to carry out the original agreement, that is of joint ownership. Those who have considered the question will agree, I think, with the position assumed by the Canadian delegates on behalf of the Canadian government from its inception up to the present time, as to the advisability and necessity of having the cable owned by the joint ownership of Britain and her colonies. We all know that in enterprises of that kind there are large expenditures in connection with what is called promotion. There would be large loss in the issuing of bonds. No company can come on the British market and put its bonds to the amount of ten millions of dollars without having to submit to a very great loss in the sale of the bonds. It is very questionable whether the money could be raised at less than five or six per cent when we consider all the circumstances connected with the issue of the bonds. Every one knows that debentures or bonds, issued for a long period of time, guaranteed by the Imperial government, the Australasian governments and the Canadian government, money can be obtained at from two or three per cent at most, and then the necessity for placing such charges upon the messages sent from this country to Australia and vice versa would not necessarily have to be so large as to pay a dividend to stockholders. All that the country could desire would be that the charge would be sufficiently high to meet interest upon the investments which had been made, and the commercial world would, under the circumstances, have received the benefits arising from cheap telegraphy, instead of having high rates placed upon it as is at present by the Eastern Extension Company in order to make large dividends for the stockholders. We all know if any one of us had a hundred pounds stock in any cable company we would want some return from it ; we know if the country had a hundred pounds of stock, all it would require would be to have sufficient revenue to pay the interest of the investment. I am glad to know that at this last meeting the conference did come to a decision. A board of control was appointed, composed of the Earl of Selborne, Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Sir Francis Mowatt, Permanent Secretary to the Treasury, Sir Geo. Herbert Murray, Secretary to the Post Office, Lord Aberdeen, Lord Strathcona, Sir Julian Salomans, Agent General for New South Wales, Hon. W. P. Reeves, Agent General for New Zealand, and Sir Andrew Clarke, agent General for Victoria, being eight in all. If I might be permitted to express an opinion, I think it was a great error having so large a board of control. I think one from each of the colonies would have been quite sufficient, I go further and say, in the appointment to this board they should have had some expert, some scientific man, who knew exactly what was required in order to push the enterprise to completion. The first meeting of that board of control was not held until December last. The work done is not yet known. The board is to meet once a month. The country does not know what has been done or what they intend to do in future, or when they intend to put this work under contract. I do not hesitate to say that if the action of the Canadian government had been followed up vigorously in 1896, we would have had that cable laid long ere this, and at a saving in price of material in 1896, compared with present prices, of half a million dollars. But the dillydallying that has taken place—the difficulties which have been thrown in the way of the construction of this line by the influence to which I have already called attention, has been such as to almost destroy the enterprise. In what position does it now stand? We find that while this board of control has been sitting we know not what the results have been, but we know that the Eastern Extension Company has had sufficient time given it to begin its operations again in Australia in order to prevent the success of the laying of this line.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It has always been operating.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was speaking of the Eastern Extension Company asking for favours and concessions from the Australian colonies, which, if given, would destroy to a very great extent the success of the cable between Canada and Australasia. They have asked for concessions which, if granted, would place them in possession and control of almost all the telegraphic facilities that now exist in Australia. It must be remembered the Australian colonies own and work the telegraphic system in these colonies, as a government work, and if they become a partner in this great enterprise which we are endeavouring to carry out, their interst would be to throw all the trade and traffic over the Pacific cable line, being interested pecuniarily in that line, and more particularly in its guarantee that the charges for telegraphic messages would be reduced from about four and six to two and six at the outside from one of the colonies to another. Speaking of this incidentally, Mr. Fleming paid while in Australia for a cable of two words from Sydney, New South Wales, to Canada, two pounds eleven shillings and sixpence, of which ten shillings was for the privilege of registering his name in a book so as to let the Telegraph Company know, when they received a cable from Canada, where to find him. All that was necessary to register was 'Sandford Fleming, Australian Hotel,' but they would not register it until he paid ten shillings for the privilege. I may add, the Canadian government protested most vigorously against any change being made in the terms of joint ownership and against any concession being made to the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company. This phase of the subject has been so ably commented upon by an English paper, the Mail, that I take the liberty of reading one or two extracts from it. The London Mail says:

> The government of New South Wales has written to the Colonial Office asking permission to grant to the Eastern Telegraph Company a concession which, in the opinion of some of the distinguished promoters, threatens the whole project with something very like extinction!
> England, Canada, New South Wales, and the other Australian colonies concerned were so many partners in the all-British Cable Scheme, and one of the cardinal and elementary conditions of partnership must be that all important transactions shall be carried out before the eyes and with the acquiescence of all the partners. The action of New South Wales, therefore, is sufficiently surprising, but there is something else to tell that is more surprising still. It is that the Colonial Office has granted the request!

I believe that that later statement has not yet been verified. It was supposed at the time there was a despatch from some of the parties connected with the Colonial Office saying that they saw no objection to it. But the protest of the English press, and the protest of the Canadian government was such as to compel them to recede from that position. The Mail continues:

> Readers will call to mind the opposition which was raised by the Eastern Telegraph Company when there was brought forward the idea of linking together the great sea-sundered portions of the empire by an all-British cable—a telegraphic system which would assist inter-colonial or inter-British, commerce in transacting its business unhampered by private company monopoly and high cable rates, and would ensure freedom for ever from the disadvantages incidental to the fact of portions of a route being in foreign territory. The promoters felt that this system would constitute another Imperial link binding what Mr. Kipling calls the "stalwart sons" to the mother country.

But such a scheme, though good for the empire, was against the private interests of the huge monopoly known as the Eastern Telegraph Company, and they—no blame, of course, to them—went against it with all the subtle wisdom and widespread power of a great corporation defending its sources of profit.

Now, the land telegraph lines in Australia are government lines belonging to the colonial governments, and there are no private companies lines inland. So when a merchant or banker or private citizen in Australia wants to telegraph to England or elsewhere he hands in his message to the government telegraphists, who send it over the state wires to the coast station of the Eastern Telegraph Company, where it is passed on to them. The concession which that shrewd corporation asked for was the right to have land line trade, so as to be in a position to transmit the cable all the way through themselves. This looks very innocent in itself. But the serious part of it is that the Eastern Telegraph Company would then be able to go to the bankers, the institutes, the large merchants, and so on, and say, 'Now we can take your cables direct, and will do it at a cheap rate—say half-a-crown a word—for the next ten years, and are willing to make a contract with you on these terms.'

This would, of course, be perfectly honest procedure on the part of the Eastern Telegraph Company, and would be 'very fine business,' too, no doubt; but those who have the all-British Cable Scheme at heart have heard of this move, and are up in arms against it.

Lord Strathcona, High Commissioner for Canada, has sent a message across to his government urging them to protest against any such concession being granted, and some of the other colonial representatives in London have acted similarly in their own spheres. For they believe it would cut the ground from under the Imperial project.

When parliament opens, the Colonial Office will, perhaps, be called upon to explain why it gave permission for the carrying out of a movement which men like Lord Strathcona believe might deal a death-blow to a great Imperial project.

In that extract the House can see what the effect would be of making the conclusion to which I have alluded to the Eastern Extension Company. I find in the Hansard report of March 1st, 1900, a question was put by Mr. Casey in the House of Commons to this effect:

Do the government know whether Sir Robert G. W. Herbert is acting under Secretary of Colonial Office? If so, how long has he so acted? Do they know whether he has acted in any other official capacity? If so, what and when? Do they know whether he is the same Sir R. G. W. Herbert who appears, by the directory of directors, to be a director of the Eastern and Southern African Telegraph Company and chairman of the Telegraphic Construction and Maintenance Company.

The Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, replied:

The government have no official knowledge upon this question, but I understand that Sir R. G. W. Herbert has been superannuated, but he was recalled a few days ago to take the place of some gentleman who is ill. I am informed that he is the same gentleman who appeared as a director of the Eastern and Southern Telegraph Company.

Now, Sir Robert G. W. Herbert is chairman, and has been chairman of the Cable Construction Company and a director of the Eastern and Southern African Telegraph Company. You all know what a construction company means. It is a company usually composed of the directors of an enterprise. The directors contracting with the company, which is themselves, for the laying of the cable or the construction of any work. So that when a cable is laid by the company, they receive all the benefits and profits from the construction of it, paid for out of the funds of the company of which they are directors. Is it unfair to draw the inference that this gentleman, holding that important position, has been throwing—and perhaps this is a serious charge to make—difficulties in the way of accomplishing that which the colonies, and apparently the Colonial Office, have had in view? The Outlook, a very important paper published in London, does not hesitate to say distinctly and positively that that is the case, and from what came under my own observation, I think it is just as well to speak plainly upon this question.

Hon. Mr SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—From what came under my own observation, I am strongly impressed with the conviction that the difficulties have arisen from the pecuniary loss which these gentlemen, who are large stockholders, would suffer if this line was constructed, and therefore they have thrown, directly and indirectly, as many obstacles as possible in the way of its construction. The Outlook does not hesitate to express that opinion, and very freely. It is a short extract and it is worth putting upon record. The Outlook says:

It is matter of universal consent that, for all our superb fleet and strong places at home and abroad, the defence of the empire is insecure for lack of an all-British system of cables linking the Mother Country and her dependencies each to all. We need nothing more urgently than a system of sub-marine cables, as inaccessible to the enemy as the deep sea and protected stations on British soil, served exclusively by British subjects, can make them. The chief reasons why, in face of awakened public opinion, such a manifest need has not been provided for is because of the opposition of the Pender Cable Trust, who, for the defence of their monopoly, have enlisted—and this is the point—the services as Directors of those of Her Majesty's servants—some pensioned and some on the active list—who have knowledge of, and influence in, the administrative departments of the government. It is idle to deny that in this fact we make a close approach to what is most pernicious in the methods of the American trusts.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is plain language, and it is not plainer, I think, than the parties who have taken so active a part in endeavouring to frustrate our enterprise deserved. This idea that I have been endeavouring to impress upon the House is strongly brought out in the report made by the Postmaster General, who has control of the coast telegraphic department at Brisbane, in Queensland. On the 1st of February he made this report to his government, a short extract from which I will read, bearing particularly upon the point which I have been endeavouring to elucidate. The Postmaster General of Queensland says :

It is to be regretted that the vexatious delays which have taken place have afforded the company so many opportunities for the exercise of its insidious influence upon the government, the press and the public. Early in 1895, and soon after the Ottawa Conference, Queensland was urged to undertake the laying of the cable upon her own responsibility. Had she done so, the work could have been carried out at little more than half the estimated cost of the cable now, and most of the difficulties which have taken place would have been solved.

That section of the report of the Postmaster General of Queensland bears out to the letter the point I have been endeavouring to make of the undue influence which has been brought to bear by interested parties against the construction of this cable.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think my hon. friend will see that Mr. Herbert's return to the Colonial Office, has been very recent indeed, and since the illness of Mr. Wyndham. Is it not a fact that these difficulties arose before his return, which would indicate that there must have been influence from some other parties as well ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I thank the hon. minister for calling attention to that fact. Robert Herbert was an employee, a very important one, in the Colonial Office before he was pensioned. I speak under correction now, but my impression is that he was at the head of that department in 1893, when I was in Australia, but whether that be true or not, if he were there, and considering the interest he has in the Construction Company and in the Extension Company, I could then understand how it is that the Australian government were furnished with reports and letters adverse to the whole scheme. If he were not there, some other influence was brought to bear, but during the sickness of the Under Secretary, the gentleman to whom the Minister of Justice refers, was called back, and is at the head of that department now, and has been for some time, certainly during the difficulties which I have pointed out that have arisen in connection with the carrying out of the scheme and since the present government have been in power. I have pointed out the different stages in connection with this enterprise, and the delays which have occurred. I am glad to know, however, that the Imperial government have become alive to the necessity of having an all-British communication around the whole world, and since the House assembled to-day, I have had put in my possession another document which I have not been able to peruse as carefully as I should like, but I am gratified to find that Lord Selborne, the chairman of the different conferences which were held in London when I was there in 1896, and also in the later conferences after my resignation, has not only become convinced, but in his report to his chief, Mr. Chamberlain, has stated, the absolute necessity of setting at defiance, even at this late date, that baneful influence by which they have been surrounded, of the Eastern Extension Company.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Canada's loyalty forced them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think there is a great deal in what my hon. friend says. The steps which have been taken by Canada in assisting to maintain the sovereignty and power of Great Britain in other parts of the world, has led the Imperial government to the conclusion that if they desire to retain the affection of her people outside of England, and in the Colonies, she has got to accede to some of the requests which they make, particularly when these requests are in the interests of the empire herself.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has been said that this cable would not pay. It has been stated that the Canadian people have taken the position they have assumed on account of the profits they expect to derive from the project. That is but one of the objects which British subjects in this country have had in view in dealing with this question. They have had also the greater and more important object in view, namely the cementing and unification of the empire to the greatest possible extent, and they came to the conclusion years ago, and feel more strongly than ever to-day, that the best way to accomplish that object is to unite them by the electric spark, so that we can communicate with every part of the empire, when it is necessary to maintain the power and influence of Great Britain over the world. I have been able to read but a few paragraphs of this reply of Earl Selborne's to the Eastern Extension Co.'s demand for delay in the construction of this line, I will read two paragraphs. I frankly confess I have not read the whole of it, but one or two paragraphs struck me so forcibly that I thought, in the discussion of this question, more particularly as I intended to take strong grounds against what I conceive to be the undue influence that has been at work, to place on record at the same time the admirable language and unanswerable position assumed by Lord Selborne at this moment, owing to the stand Canada has been taken in this hour of trial in the mother country. The paragraph I am about to read is in answer to the charge that Canada was advocating this scheme exclusively in her commercial interests. Lord Selborne says:

> Mr. Chamberlain is not aware that it has been stated by any responsible person in the colonies, and it has certainly not been urged by Her Majesty's government, that the cable is primarily required to facilitate telegraphic communication between Canada and Australia.

That is admirably put, because it places Canada and the Australasian Colonies in the position of true patriots desiring to accomplish a great object at their own expense and risk, independent of the commercial advantages which we derive therefrom, believing it to be in the interests of the empire. Paragraph 9 reads:

> It will certainly have that effect, and on that account alone, as a measure tending to bring these parts of Her Majesty's dominions into closer touch and more intimate relations with each other it would deserve the sympathy of Her Majesty's government. The smallness of the number of messages passing between Australia and Canada instead of being an argument against the project is in fact strong reason why Her Majesty's government should do what is in their power to facilitate and stimulate its growth. With a tariff as high as 6s. to 6s. 3 d. a word, the small amount of the present traffic can occasion no surprise, and, in view of the rapid development which is taking place in Western Canada a large immediate increase may confidently be anticipated as soon as messages can be sent at the much lower rate which the Pacific cable will render possible, and, of course, a similar development of the traffic with the United States may be looked for.

And the 10th paragraph which says:

> Though the establishment of the proposed cable will have the effect of bringing Canada and Australia nearer together, it is primarily as supplying a link in a telegraphic system connecting this country with its possessions in Australia that the project must be judged, and as providing an alternative route wholly under British control to those possessions, and also, in case of emergency to the East.

There are many other paragraphs in this connection which I might read, but with which I will not trouble the House. I throw out the suggestion that in the publication of the document which has been laid before parliament, this and one or two other dispatches which this book contains should be published with them, in order that we may know that the British government, through its Colonial Secretary and through Lord Selborne, the chairman of these different conferences, have at last some to the conclusion that it is absolutely necessary, not not only in the interests of Canada, but in the interests of the empire itself, that they should act in accord with the outlying portions of the empire, making them an indivisible portion of the empire itself, and that they shall no longer be looked upon as children under age, or as colonies. I have occupied more time than I intended to occupy in dealing with this matter, but it is a subject which I have deeply at heart. I repeat the language of the Postmaster General at the League yesterday. At first when I took up this question I looked upon it as a dream, a fancy, but the more you consider it, the more you admire the empire to which you belong, the more strongly you will be convinced of the necessity of something which will link together every portion of the British Empire, not only for defensive purposes, but for the commercial prosperity of the country. We have learned that trade does not, in these days, follows the flag —that while the flag, wherever it floats, reaches a portion of the world where trade may be carried on, you require the electric telegraph in order to take advantage of the markets from time to time, that is if you desire to build up trade between any portions of the empire. I hope no delay will occur in carrying out this project. It will cost more now than it would have cost five or six years ago but with the Board of Control in England, with the feeling which now prevails in the empire, in the Colonial Office and the Colonies, the work should be put under construction at once and pushed to completion. It is all very well for the Australian people to say now, after having entered into that compact, the Eastern Extension Co. have offered a reduction of rates; but there is this provision in the contract, they are to be reduced in proportion to the increase of trade. That was in the old contract, but as soon as they found they could not give a sufficient dividend to the stockholders, they ceased to give the advantages unless other concessions were made, and so it will be in this case if the Australian colonies are foolish enough to grant them these concessions. There is just one other point. The marvel to me has been, and it must be to every one who has considered the question that colonies like those of Australasia, which have been suffering so severely under the charges made by the existing telegraph company, should hesitate one moment to push forward an enterprise which would save them millions of pounds in a very few years. There must have been some influence brought to bear which should not have existed, and which the people of Australia should have resented the moment they found these obstructions thrown in the way of this cable project. I must say this in defence of the Australasian governments, speaking from experience with them, that whenever we pointed out the evil and oppressive influences of the Eastern Extension Cable Co. and the necessity for having a competing line via the American Continent, they acquiesced at once, and in no case, except South Australia, to which I have already called attention, is there any other feeling than an earnest desire to have this line constructed; but for some reason or other, as soon as you are beyond the influences which are brought to bear, something stood in the way and matters have remained as I have pointed out since 1887, and everything has been kept in abeyance. Let us hope that that is ended. I notice by a cable just received from England that they are acting energetically in this matter now. If there ever was a question in which all parties, Liberal and Conservatives, have united completely it is this question of the maintenance of British supremacy throughout the whole world, and more particularly uniting the different colonies and outlying portions of the empire with the mother country. Let us hope that that feeling will continue. We may thank to a great extent—I only repeat what was said here a few days ago—President Kruger for the present condition of affairs in this country. I am glad to know that the advance of the British arms at this moment has raised the flag in the capital of the Orange Free State, and we may reasonably hope that it will soon float over Pretoria; and that the tyrant Kruger will soon be placed in the position which men who trample on the liberties of the people should occupy.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It is a very hard thing to venture to differ from the sentiments expressed by the hon. leader of the opposition. I cannot say that I differ from the sentiments altogether, but I do say that I cannot follow his resolution. The resolution which the hon. gentleman has submitted for the approval of the House is contained in three paragraphs. They are:

1. That the establishment of a telegraph cable across the Pacific to connect Canada with the Australasian Colonies has long been regarded as of high importance to the empire; this House therefore regrets, that serious delays have occurred in the prosecution of the undertaking, manifestly through the hostility of the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, which Company is now demanding concession from the Australasian Colonies which, if granted, will imperil the success of the Pacific Cable.

2. That this House is of opinion that any further delay in proceeding with the actual construction of the undertaking would be inimical to the interests of the empire, and strongly deprecates granting any further concessions to the Eastern Extension, or any other company.

3. That it is expedient in granting permission hereafter to private companies to lay cables between British possessions, it be on the express condition that the State may assume ownership whenever in the general public interest it is advisable to do so.

In that third paragraph I most cordially concur. That provision has been inserted in the case of the Singapore and Hong-Kong Cable, and I think it is most desirable that the Imperial government, in dealing with any company, should insert a provision of that sort in the contract. As to the other two paragraphs, there may be some difference of opinion. Let us see what we have done. This parliament passed last year an Act, chapter three of the Acts of 1899, undertaking to bear a certain proportion of the cost of this Pacific Cable. The third section of the Act of last year says:

> The Governor in Council is hereby authorized on behalf of Canada to guarantee payment of five-eighteenths of the said total principal of the said debentures, limited as aforesaid, and of interest as aforesaid on the five-eighteenths.

Hon. gentlemen will observe that Canada does not simply guarantee payment of five-eighteenths of the interest, but guarantees the payment of five-eighteenths of the principal as well. That is a provision which we do not find in Acts relating to any private undertaking. It will be remembered this Act was passed in this House last year with very little discussion. The Secretary of State introduced the measure, and it was supported by the hon. leader of the opposition, I did not at that time sympathize with the measure, and I took the liberty of expressing a certain measure of dissent. I find that I used this language:

> The measure before the House is an indication of the strength of the Imperialistic idea at the present time. I do not think that any one will pretend that Canada is directly and materially interested in this cable scheme to the extent of the interest which she has undertaken to pay. The general feeling throughout the country has been, and the feeling is well founded, that while Australasia and England are very greatly interested, the interest of Canada is a comparatively subsidiary one.

At the close I spoke of the policy of this Act and said:

> It may or may not be wise, but it shows how strong the feeling in favour of imperial unity is in Canada, and goes far to remove any reproach that may have been attempted to be cast on this country for her action in connection with Imperial defence and other questions.

The position of affairs has somewhat changed since last year. There had been a disposition in Canada, as well as elsewhere, to belittle the interest which the Dominion had manifested in Imperial affairs, but since we parted here last year, that reproach, if it had any foundation (which I do not think it had) has been entirely removed, and we stand in a somewhat different position from what we did then. The entire scheme, is practically not only a scheme for a cable from Canada to Australia, but for an all-British cable around the world starting from Vancouver, going to Australia, from Australia to Natal, and then coming across the Atlantic again to Canada and Bermuda. That is a very captivating scheme. There is a fine Imperialistic air about it which is calculated to take the fancy of any loyal subject, and I might say that I should very much like to see that system of cables completed. As far as Canada is concerned, undoubtedly a great deal of the credit of having got things to the position in which they are is due to the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House. That hon. gentleman went into the advocacy of this scheme with an energy and perseverance which he always shows in any undertaking into which he goes, provided he thinks the undertaking is a good one. I trust he does not go into any undertaking which he does not think is good. Although the hon. gentleman took hold of this scheme and fought in its favour to the best of his ability, I think the gentleman to whom we are really indebted for the scheme is Sir Sandford Fleming.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear; I readily admit that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Sir Sandford Fleming deserves a great deal of praise for his efforts in connection with this scheme. His idea is that there should be this system of all-British cables around the world, and he has given, without money and without price, a great deal of his time and labour to bring forward the project and have it accepted by the Canadian government and by the Imperial government. Considering all the circumstances, his example conveys a very important lesson to other people who have wealth, leisure and ability.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The usual course in the case of gentlemen of Sir Sandford's position is that he should retire from Canada and go and live on an estate in Scotland, or somewhere else, and not bother his head materially about Canada afterwards; but he has acted differently. This is not the only important Canadian enterprise with which he has been connected. We should, however, look at the proposition itself, and should not be too much influenced by the person with whom the plan originates, or those who favour it. I was at the meeting of the British Empire League as a spectator,—the meeting to which the hon. leader of the opposition has referred—and I found there that the leader of the opposition in the other House, and the Postmaster General were equally vigorous and emphatic in their support of this scheme; and consequently it requires a good deal of audacity—I may use almost as strong language as that—for a private member of the House to rise and say he ventures to differ from leaders on both sides of politics. It would be easier and pleasanter to go with the tide, but I feel that a member of this House, or of the House of Commons, has a duty to look at the measures which come before parliament from a different standpoint. He should look at them from the point of view of a member of parliament; and a member of parliament is, I take it, in a certain sense a trustee for the people, and it is his duty when any scheme which involves a heavy expenditure is before parliament, to consider whether the country is likely to get reasonable value for the expenditure. Parliament is not a philanthropic institution. It is not altogether a patriotic institution: it is not an eleemosynary institution. It is a patriotic institution in the best sense, but it is a business institution also; and I have never been able to see, for my part, where Canada was to get value for the expenditure involved by this scheme. We commit ourselves to an expenditure in round figures of two millions three hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a good deal for what we are getting. We are asked, as I say, to guarantee the payment of the principal sum of $2,360,000 and the interest, and the probabilities are, the conclusion which I draw from a perusal of the correspondence before parliament is that we shall have to pay the money, as in most cases where governments guarantee they have to pay. The first question that presents itself is this: Is Canada interested in this matter to such an extent as to justify her in assuming the liability for this large expenditure? While we should all like to see a system of all-British cables, I do not think it is the duty of the Canadian parliament to look after Imperial interests in places outside the limits of Canada. It is the duty of the Canadian parliament, I think, to help to govern this Dominion of Canada under the British North America Act to the best of our knowledge and ability. It is not our duty to protect the interests of the empire in Australasia, in Africa and in other places. Of course, when the empire is attacked, then we are all part of the same empire, it is our duty to help to defend it; but in a matter of business like this, such a matter as an ocean cable, I do not think it is our duty, unless very grave reasons are shown for our doing so, to undertake responsibilities outside of our own country. As to Canadian business, to be served by the Pacific cable there does not seem to be, on the face of it, very much. I have been fortunate enough to get a copy of the correspondence which the hon. gentleman has read from, and I find this statement, which is not contradicted anywhere. It came out in an examination before a committee which met in London.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It has not been contradicted by anybody. It will be found on page seven:

> The all-British Pacific cable is stated to be required, primarily, to facilitate telegraphic communication between Australia and Canada, and, secondarily, the Australian government expects indirectly, to obtain by it a reduction of the cable charges.
>
> The total Australasian cable traffic was reported by the committee to be about 1,860,000 words per annum.
>
> Now, the only evidence laid before the Committee with regard to the cable traffic between Canada and Australia was that in September, 1896, the number of messages exchanged between the two countries was thirty-five. This, at an average of thirteen words to a message, would represent 5,460 words per annum, which, at the present tariff of about 6s 3d. per word, would amount to 1,706 pounds per annum. For this trifling traffic it is proposed that the Imperial government should give a guarantee of 20,000 pounds a year, and the Canadian government even urges the Imperial government to provide a capital sum of roundly, 500,000 pounds and proposes itself to expend a similar amount.

That is the amount of the business.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman kindly inform the Senate who the writer of that is ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It comes from the Eastern Extension Company.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Oh !

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is answered by paragraph eight of Earl Selborne's despatch.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I shall be very glad to read that paragraph of Lord Selborne's despatch. The hon. gentleman quoted a paraaph from Lord Selborne's letter to the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, with respect to that particular point, and the ground taken by Lord Selborne was that the fact that so little cable business had been done between Canada and Australia was a ground for supposing that there was a great necessity for the cable. It does not strike me that way ; but I shall read to you what Lord Tweeddale, the chairman of the Eastern Extension Company said in reply to that. I direct the hon. gentleman's attention to paragraph 8 :

It certainly had not occurred to me until I read the ninth paragraph of Your Lordship's letter that the smallness of the number of messages passing between Canada and Australasia could be used by any one as an argument in favour of incurring large capital outlay upon a Pacific cable. If this were so, it would logically follow that if there were no traffic the necessity for such a cable would be still greater.

And that is what I think would strike any ordinary observer. We know that while there is a certain amount of business between Canada and Australia, the amount is not large ; and although it may increase gradually, it is not likely at any early date to become very great. On page 7, from which I quoted before, this letter goes on to say :

The Australasian traffic with the United States, according to the same evidence may amount to about 100,000 words per annum: but even this, which is only about 5 per cent of the Australasian traffic, is in itself wholly inadequate to justify the laying of a Pacific cable.

I think, as a matter of business, that is correct. Our business does not require that we should expend so very large a sum of money for the purpose of having this cable. But, then it has been urged by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and I have heard it urged by other people and I have seen it urged in the press, and I think it is referred to in the correspondence, that the cable would be a very important thing in case of war. It is very easy to over-estimate the value of a Pacific cable in case of war. If we could take the whole of the British Navy and use it to police that Pacific cable, then it might be a very important thing. But everybody knows how, during the recent war between the United States and Spain, cables were cut with very little difficulty, and unless a very large proportion of the British Navy was employed in policing that Pacific cable, it would be cut within a very short time after war had begun, if a war took place with Russia, or Germany, or France, or the United States. Of course if we had a war with a country like the Transvaal Republic, which has no navy, then the cable could not be meddled with, but that is an improbable case. What is happening now is not likely to happen again. I may mention that that despatch of Lord Selborne's was dated 10th of July, 1899. We have later correspondence than that, to which I think it well to direct the attention of the House, and I find it amongst the correspondence recently laid on the table. On the 26th of February, 1900, the Premier of Canada cables to Lord Strathcona, the Dominion Agent General, that the Premier of New Zealand has cabled that the government of New South Wales has definitely decided to accede to the Eastern Extension Company's terms, and he adds ' Please communicate to Colonial Secretary.' Sir Wilfrid Laurier cables to the Premier of Victoria objecting to this arrangement being made. In fact, Sir Wilfrid Laurier telegraphed to all the Australian governments urging them not to come into this arrangement, and I shall read one despatch which was sent on the 20th of February :

Canadian government consider granting terminal facilities to Eastern Extension, even when Pacific cable laid will seriously prejudice financial prospects and impair usefulness of Pacific cable scheme. Proposed concession material alteration of conditions under which government formed Pacific cable partnership and may endanger scheme. Hope no change without consent of every partner.

And Sir Wilfrid telegraphed in the same way to the Premier of New South Wales. The premier of Victoria telegraphed to the effect that Victoria proposed to give terminal facilities only when the Pacific cable was completed. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had suggested that the company be not allowed to lay a cable which would compete with the Pacific cable, and the Premier of Victoria said in reply to that :

Suggested monopoly for Pacific cable both novel and untenable.

I trust that the House will permit me to read another despatch. These despatches, I may mention, are not arranged exactly in chronological order. The last of these despatches is one from the Premier of New South Wales dated Sydney, 2nd of March.

Eastern Extension proposals seems some misapprehension. We are ready and anxious to carry out our undertaking regarding Pacific cable ; admitted all sides this cannot be completed for three years, probably more. Meantime Eastern Extension offer immediate reduction our rates to four shillings or about 16 per cent, and by sliding scale coming three years to two shillings and 6 pence as business increases: also lay cable Cape, at Adelaide and then reduce present excessive cape rates from 7 shillings and 3 pence to two shillings and 6 pence word. No concession asked for or given until Pacific cable completed: they want direct offices so as to compete on equal terms, and in meantime any reduction whatever to remain until Pacific cable laid. Our present agreement terminates April 30, and if no fresh one made, company can instead of reducing rates, increase them up to 8 shillings a word.

That is the position, hon. gentlemen, as far as we can ascertain. New South Wales and Victoria, as well as Southern and Western Australia, have agreed to the terms proposed—at least they have come to terms with the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company under which the company is to lay a cable from South Africa, I think by the Mauritius to Western Australia, where it is to connect with the land lines owned by the governments of the Australian colonies. The rates are to be reduced immediately from four shillings and nine pence a word to four shillings a word, and ultimately to two shillings and sixpence a word.

Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL. And other reductions in proportion to the increase of trade. Give them credit for all of it.

Hon. Mr. POWER. Yes. It appears, hon. gentlemen, that nearly all the Australian colonies, the colonies who are most directly interested in the matter, are satisfied with the terms offered by the Eastern Extension Company ; and I really do not see why Canada, which has very slight direct business interest in the matter, should undertake to dictate to these other colonies how they are to manage their own business. That is the way the thing strikes me. If they find it suits them better to make these terms and come to these arrangements, why should we interfere ? As intimated last year, Canada has almost no interest—I mean no practical business interest, in this scheme for a Pacific cable ; and she is just the only country which has been urging the scheme all along. In the first place, England was indifferent. The correspondence shows that at the beginning the English government did not care about it at all, and in some of the recent despatches, Mr. Chamberlain says there is no hurry. The Australasian Colonies, which one would suppose would be most vitally interested, have not been very active. It is Canada, which has no special direct interest in the matter, which has been urging it, and which has been pushing and urging the governments of the other countries into action. One of the arugments which was used before this, not so much just now, but which is still used in favour of our going into this scheme was the desirability of an all-British cable to Australia, but the correspondence shows that that object has been attained. The Eastern Extension Company are contracting with the governments of Victoria, New South Wales, Western Australia and Southern Australia to lay a cable which shall be all-British, from Durban to Western Australia, so that one of the objects which we had in view has been attained without our spending any money. The other argument in favour of this scheme was based on the excessive rates which were charged on despatches to and from Australia. Those rates have been reduced somewhat already, and under the agreement being made between the Eastern Extension Company and the Australian governments, they would be still further reduced. Looking at the very small interest which Canada has in the mater, I think that we should be satisfied if the colonies which are largely interested are satisfied. The correspondence which is before us shows that both arguments which were used on behalf of this scheme, some months ago, are now non-existent. As I intimated, this matter, in my humble judgment, does not come properly within the purview of the Dominion parliament at all. It is not our business to undertake to control the destinies of the whole empire. We have a sufficiently large territory.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We are a big people.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes we are. We have a sufficiently large territory and sufficiently large interests committed to our care without any mistake or peradventure, and these I think will give us occupation enough, and if we have money that we wish to spend, we can certainly find many deserving objects in our own country. There are a great many matters which come under the jurisdiction of this parliament and of the government of this country, for which the funds do not seem to be forthcoming. If application is made to the government or to parliament, for funds, we are given to understand that they are not forthcoming. I do not propose to speak of my own province, but we could spend that $2,360,000 down there to great advantage if the government could only see their way clear to allowing us to do it. We have railways to build and public buildings to erect, and numerous other things to do. But, without going to Nova Scotia, there are a number of things which apparently cannot be done as it is, and to which a portion at any rate of this large sum might be more profitably devoted than to the unnecessary Pacific cable. In the first place, there is needed here in Ottawa, in this Washington of the North, a suitable building to accommodate our very valuable geological collection, a collection which is now in a place where it is very liable to be destroyed by fire, and a collection which, if once destroyed, can never be replaced.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If we have money to spare for purposes outside the country, we ought to be able to erect a suitable building to contain this very valuable collection. The library of parliament is in need of additional accommodation.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Books have to be stowed in all sorts of out-of-the way places. In my humble judgment, there is need of an appropriation for a revision of the statutes. These statutes have not been revised now for fourteen years, and the general impression amongst professional men is, that they should be revised every ten years. I know before hon. gentlemen opposite went out of power they had made arrangements to have them revised. I regret that the finances of the country are not able to stand that strain—that is, we want to spend this money on cables and we have not got it to spend for our own wants. The better way would be to let the cable slide and spend the money at home. It occurs to me that if there is money for these purposes I should like, as one humble member of this House, to see the statutory increases paid to all the civil servants who deserve them. I do not know how many do not deserve them, but I observe that the increases are not going to all. I am narrow minded and low toned enough to prefer to see these men get the statutory increases rather than to see the money paid for a Pacific cable. I do not say that the money should be spent for all these objects. I am not committing myself to that, but I say that these objects come properly within the purview of this parliament. They are, I think, meritorious objects, and if the government feel they have not money for these objects, they ought also to feel that they have not money for the Pacific cable. I disapprove of this expenditure because it is going outside of our proper sphere, to begin with, and under the recent offers made by the Eastern Extension Company to the Australian governments, the thing is not necessary. We will have the all-British cable to Australia without spending all this money in the Pacific Ocean, and then we would get no adequate return for the money that we spent. It was felt a year ago that the expenditure was necessary to show some imperial spirit. I think hon. gentlemen that we have shown the Imperial spirit since in the very best and most admirable way, and it is not necessary for that purpose. I am aware that I have taken what is here and now a rather unpopular line; but I have acted according to the dictates of my own judgment and conscience.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It is not a common thing for the hon. senior member for Halifax to favour a monopoly. It is the first time that I have ever heard him express himself in favour of a big monopoly. It is not pretended that there is any immediate benefit to come to this country in the shape of direct cash. It will not pay at the start;

I know that many hon. gentlemen were opposed to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. They said it would not pay; that it was against the interests of the Dominion. They said it would not pay enough to buy the oil to lubricate the wheels, but to-day the stock is at par, and I have no doubt that Pacific cable in the course of time will turn out the same way.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Supposing we are out of pocket at the start, it will eventually bring us a return, if not in direct cash, it will be a benefit in some other way. It is desirable that we should have communication with all parts of the British empire. My hon. friend says that the cable will be cut in time of war, but if they cut it we will repair it. My hon. friend spoke of the water being very deep on the route that the cable would take. So much the better; it will be harder to cut. They cannot get at the cable if it is in very deep water. I am surprised at my hon. friend, the senior member for Halifax, because it is the first time since I have been in parliament that I have heard that hon. gentleman favouring anything like a monopoly.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not advocating a monopoly.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The Eastern Extension Cable Company are a monopoly and they are using their influence to try and kill this undertaking, and certainly they want a monopoly. Of course the hon. gentleman has a right to say what he thinks and advocate whatever he pleases. I cannot find fault with that, but I have a right to criticise his actions and say what I think of them. I have read all the correspondence that has taken place from the time that this was first proposed to this day, and I have always been in favour of it, not because I considered it would pay us in gold, but because we would derive benefits in other ways.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I do not intend to make a speech on this question. We have heard two very able arguments, and also an explanation of the matter by the hon. gentleman who proposed the motion, and the hon. gentleman who has answered his remarks, but I desire to call the attention of the government to an article which appeared in the Globe a few days ago and which was recopied in the Calgary Herald, respecting the Doukhobors who were said to be in a starving condition in the North-west. This is not a laughing matter and it is my duty to bring it before the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is importing this matter into the middle of a discussion.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—But I want the money spent in supporting these people, and not in laying the Pacific cable just now. Whether I am out of order or not, this is an important matter and I am going to call the attention of the government to it, and ask the leader of the government here to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the matter and ascertain if the paragraph is true. It is quoted as coming from the Globe, and probably there may be some truth in it, because they would not receive a report of men starving to death unless there was some foundation for it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What is the date?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The Calgary Herald of the 10th March, but it is copied from the Toronto Globe.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then the article in the Globe would be very much earlier.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I am sure that hon. members of this House will be very much astonished, and I am also astonished when I say that I agree with a great deal that has been said by my hon. colleague the senior member for Halifax. I could not believe it when I heard the statement made by the hon. Knight from Belleville that a Colonial Secretary, an important person in the Colonial Office, could influence a man like Mr. Chamberlain. That, to my mind, is an impossibility. I think if he influenced him, that Mr. Chamberlain must have had the opinion before the Secretary endeavoured to impress it upon his mind. What the hon. senior member for Halifax said about the usefulness of a cable in case of war is quite apparent. I do not think that the British could protect the cable in the Pacific Ocean from Vancouver to Australia.

We all know how the cables are cut in war time. The hon. member pointed out what revenue may be effected by taking the revenues already derived by established companies. Lord Selborne's argument was that if the revenue was small, it was all the more necessary that a cable should be laid. It puts me in mind of a story about the Duke of Buckingham in the time of Charles II. in one of Dryden's plays. He says: 'My want is great, it is so small.' The Duke of Buckingham said then 'it should be greater were there none at all.' Mr. Fleming deserves great credit for the trouble he has taken about this, at his own expense and without reward of any kind political or otherwise. Other persons interested in this enterprise have not worked at their own expense. As I said before, I do not think the cable will pay, because the Eastern Extension Company will now take our messages to Australia, and I do not think there is any advantage to be derived from the sum of money which will be invested in this cable. There is not a fact laid before this House to show that the project will pay. We know those companies never do pay, and therefore I think it will entail a great loss to this country. If we want cables there is one needed to connect Sable Island with the mainland. Wrecks often occur there, and in the absence of cable communication great loss may occur. When I had the honour of being a member of the House of Commons, I brought up the necessity of such a cable. Then, again, we want a large sum of money for other purposes. When we have no cable to Sable Island I do not think we should go to this expense for a cable across the Pacific. We are told that this mysterious Eastern Extension Company is supposed to influence the British government, but I do not believe they can. I must apologize to my hon. friends, from many of whom, no doubt, I differ, and while I do not often agree with the senior member for Halifax, I feel it is my duty to act in concert with him in this instance.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am rather surprised at the turn the debate has taken, after the unanimity that prevailed throughout the press and among the public men of Canada on this subject of the Pacific cable. The Act of last session did not really receive any material opposition in either branch of parliament. I do not propose to dwell on the reasons why we should sustain and maintain the position we have already taken in reference to the Pacific cable. There were two reasons why Canada entered on the project. One was the commercial one. We were developing trade with Australia. We had subsidized a line of steamers there. We were developing a trade with China and Japan. That trade, as every one knows who has followed the question, is increasing year by year. No one can possibly doubt that the construction of a cable to Australia, and the extension to Hong Kong and up to the coast cities of China and Japan, would have enormously increased that trade.

Hon. Mr. POWER. The Eastern Extension Company have a monopoly at Hong Kong.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think we can get power enough to break up the monopoly if we have this cable laid.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Japan is not yet under the British government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is a clause in the contract by which the Eastern Extension monopoly can be ended. At all events, our messages would not be discriminated against, and so it cannot be called an impediment in the development of the trade which Canada can seize by having cable communication with Australia and the east; but the real moving impulse that Canada had in furthering the construction of the Pacific cable was the national one, in order that all parts of the empire might be united by a cable. That is of the first importance. We all know very well that if England became entangled with any country in Europe in war, how easy it would be to cut off her connection with India, Australia and all her eastern possessions, making it absolutely impossible to have any communication.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would it not be just as easy in the case of this cable?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, because the cable I have spoken of passes through the Mediterranean and the Red Sea and, in many places, can be easily broken in a night. It is different where it is carried over our own territory, and at all events, as observed by the hon. leader of the opposition, once it gets into the deep waters of the Pacific it is perfectly safe. We always have a fleet along our coast in the Pacific, and Australia herself has a fleet on her own coast, so that the Pacific cable would be safer than in any other part of the globe, and certainly no more glorious heritage could be given to those who come after us than to have a cable connecting all those big red patches on the world. There is going to be a large section of South Africa which will be British when the Orange Free State and the Transvaal are really self-governing colonies, with the liberties and possibilities that we in Canada enjoy, when the Boers will rejoice over the Union Jack, far more than they have rejoiced over their own standard. I desire to express my approval of the attitude taken by my hon. friend opposite in the sharp criticism he has felt proper to express in reference to the obstacles that have intervened in the construction of this work. He has given us a very interesting history of it. In 1887 it was first conceived. That is 13 years ago now. It got, however, its greatest stimulus when the meeting of delegates took place in this Chamber in 1894. It is Canada's duty now to take a prominent position in reference to this whole cable controversy, because it was delegated to Canada at the meeting of all the representatives from the Australian colonies, England being represented by a distinguished nobleman, here in this Chamber. It was delegated to Canada to take the leading part in the cable agitation. Hon. gentlemen may have forgotten it, but a resolution was passed which crystallized that idea into form. It was a legacy left to us by all parts of the empire that we were to take the foremost part in this agitation and carry it out. The next important step was the meeting that took place in London in the latter part of 1896, under the presidency of Lord Selborne, and the report on which appears in one of the blue books, dated January, 1897. That report dealt with the practical side of the question. It gave the cost of the cable, the receipts and expenses, and practically defined what each section of the empire would have to pay. It was a regular business prospectus which was issued. Now, unfortunately, that report signed by Lord Selborne and by the Canadian and Australian delegates, was pigeon-holed in the Colonial Office. It was put in what is called the confidential file, and was not allowed to see the light of day for two years, and that is where the Pacific cable was first maimed—where the first attempt was made to strangle it, in the concealment of a report which has not a line which should not have been made public the very day after it was signed. It is found at page 32 of the blue book. It is a practical review of the whole subject, the route and the cost, based on actual tenders. Parties were willing to build the cable for the sums mentioned. There are calculations of the number of words per day that were expected and what each section of the empire was to bear. If my hon. friend for Halifax had only examined that report, he would have seen that the burden on Canada would be infinitesimal. Being a state owned cable, the cost would be reduced by the issue of bonds which at that time would not have borne more than between two and three quarters per cent, and three per cent at the outside; certainly some business would accrue from it. Then, the Australian business would be an enormous item, so large that we find the Eastern Extension Company willing to lay a cable without any subsidy, if they are permitted to connect their submarine cable with the local land line. They regarded it as so valuable a franchise that they were willing to lay the cable, without subsidy, from Natal to Australia and connect with all the land lines of Victoria and New South Wales, giving the very best possible proof that it was a paying project, so that the cost need not be urged as an argument against the construction of the cable. The suppression of that report is really what embarrassed the whole situation, because during those two years the Eastern Extension was quietly occupying the ground which belonged to the Canadian Pacific cable, and were making terms with the Australian colonies. They were offering them, I will not say bribes, but such advantageous proposals that it became almost impossible to resist. Had this report been made public at the time and acted upon, as no doubt it would, had it been given to the public, the Eastern Extension Company would not have had the opportunity of making the proposition it did to New South Wales and Victoria. That is exactly what we have to meet now. Until within the last three months the Colonial Office did not really rise to the importance of this cable connection. Influences were at work. We know very well that the under-secretaries in the various departments of Great Britain are men who hold distinguished positions and have very great influence—positions which give them very great power, and there has been a very great sense of delicacy in the last six months in the men of Canada criticising the source from which this opposition has come. I have felt, myself, for a long time that it was due to ourselves that we should expose the various sources from which all this opposition has arisen. I do not hesitate to say my hon. friend opposite accurately places it; the facts are so strong that there is no evading the conclusion that it is all due to one individual. I have taken a great deal of interest in this question for a number of years. I have been sorry to see it balked from time to time, and I have taken occasion to know where the balking came from, and it is only since Canada has taken such a prominent position in the war in South Africa that the British public are beginning to trace out the causes which have led to this postponement of the cable project. Already, as hon. gentlemen will see, gentlemen in the British House of Commons have been following up this inquiry, and have, within the last two weeks put questions on the paper occasionally, asking Mr. Chamberlain the cause of the delay. The facts will come out that have been suppressed too long. It would have been much better had they been exposed six months ago. Sir Edward Sassoon took up this question in an address delivered before the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce three or four months ago. He went fully into the whole question and brought forth the important fact that before Great Britain purchased the telegraph lines within the United Kingdom the British people were paying a very much larger sum than they are paying now. To-day the rate throughout the whole United Kingdom is a cent a word. For ten cents you can send a message to any part of it. That is in consequence of the state having acquired the telegraph system, and no doubt it is a mere matter of time when the telegraph systems throughout the world will be owned by the different countries. Canada has been taking the lead in reference to ocean cables, and we all must regret very much indeed that the opposition to which I have referred, for a time defeated the project. The last communications received over the wire have been that New South Wales and Victoria have been requested to stand by the agreement that they made with Canada and Queensland and the other parts of the empire. No doubt, to them now it would be a very great sacrifice, because they were offered free communication. They are now called upon to set aside terms that were immensely valuable to them, because they were offered a reduction of rates to satisfy them, and all that the Eastern Extension Company desired in return was to be permitted to make connection with the state-owned lines in Australia. And they agreed upon a reduction of rates. Now, in consequence of the position that the enterprise has got into, it becomes necessary to ask them to make that sacrifice. I have no doubt they will. I have no doubt the present has been an opportune period to bring out that Imperial feeling both in New South Wales and Victoria that will rise to the importance of this subject. The financial loss will be only for a time, because I have no doubt whatever that in the near future the Pacific cable will be a paying enterprise. It is rather unfortunate, however, that it is being delayed, because the cost of material has immensely increased—probably a third, or perhaps nearly half, more than it was. That, coupled with the fact that we lost the opportunity of securing Neckar Island, which also was due, no doubt, to underhand influences, will tend to increase the cost.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Open-mouth influence.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend opposite explained that no one knows exactly how it arose. It was one of those questions that ought to have been covered by confidential letters, but it was made public in some way or other, and our action was anticipated. I hope the time is coming when this long-talked-of project will have overcome all the difficulties which have intervened, and I am sure that no proposition has been made in recent years that will bind the empire more closely together than a state-owned cable round the world, touching all parts of the empire.

The motion was agreed to, on a division.

PROTECTION OF RIVIERE DU SUD.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

What was the total cost of the works performed for the protection of the Rivière du Sud, in the parish of St. Thomas, county of Montmagny ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have received some replies to the questions which the hon. gentleman has put on the paper, since I came to the House, but this is not among them. I shall have to ask him to let this one stand.

THE MONTMAGNY POST OFFICE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

What was the total cost of the post office at Montmagny, the cost of the ground and of the buildings thereon, and the extra works required for the adaptation of those buildings to the purposes for which they were bought ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I shall have to give the hon. gentleman the same answer to that as to the other. I might say to my hon. friend, the answers which have been sent are in reply to other questions, and I shall have to ask him to let this question stand.

PENITENTIARY BINDER TWINE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY inquired of the government :

About how many pounds of binder twine will be manufactured under the government management in the Kingston penitentiary, or at other points, and if any for sale this year ? Also, how the government propose to dispose of the said twine ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The amount that will be manufactured between this and August 1, the period for which tenders will be sought, will be about 350 tons.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I understood there was a notice, the other day, that the government would dispose of this twine at wholesale rates to farmers who might wish to purchase.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Up to March 20.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Will the hon. gentleman explain how that is to be done? I might apply for some.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have not the value that is put on the twine. We sell twine under car-load lots at one rate. We sell it in car-load lots at a rate of a half a cent a pound lower, and at 50-ton lots, half a cent lower than that.. The smaller lots, of course, give a little more work, and we charge what is sufficient to enable us to meet the wishes of those who desire to buy in small quantities.

THE CASE OF LIEUT.-COL. WHITE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL rose to

Call the attention of the government to the following letter which has been published in different newspapers of the Dominion, and will inquire whether the statements therein made are true and correctly stated —

Department of Militia and Defence,
Ottawa, February 1, 1900.

Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 20th ult., I am directed by the Major General Commanding to inform you that your name was removed from the list of officers to undergo the staff course at the Royal Military College, Kingston, by the honourable minister, on the ground that you have of late taken some active part in politics on behaf of the opposition.

I have the honour to be,
Your obedient servant,
H. FOSTER, Colonel,
Chief Staff Officer.

To Lieut.-Col. White,
Guelph, Ont.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer is a bald negative. The minister never knew the letter was written.

BINDER TWINE AND BARBED WIRE COMBINE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY inquired :

If the government are going to take any steps towards breaking up the combine on binder twine and barbed wire in Canada, by putting a protective duty on them, or otherwise ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not aware that there is any intention of puting a duty on either binder twine or barbed wire with a view to breaking up a monopoly. So far as binder twine is concerned, we do not admit there is a monopoly. In my opinion there is not. In answer to the various representations that have been made, in the communication that I submitted to the House a few days ago, I have made it perfectly clear that there is no monopoly with regard to binder twine. I have received the prices at which binder twine is sold by all the wholesale dealers in the country, the Deering Co., the Plymouth Co., the Brantford Co., and by ourselves, and it will be found that the prices at which that twine was disposed of last year varied from five and a half to seven and a half cents, and that the avearge price of the binder twine in all the departments from which details were sent to me, showed the average price was six and a half cents a pound. It is perfectly clear there is no such thing as a combine in that matter. The retail dealers buy the twine with the expectation of selling at some profit. It happened last year that after the sales had been made by wholesale men, the price of raw material nearly doubled—I do not know but it actually doubled—in value, and the retailers who had purchased twine and were obliged to hold it for some time before the consumers called for it, asked an increased price and did precisely what others do in business—they got as much as they could for the article in which they traded. My hon. friend will see we have always sold after August 10 to persons who might desire it. After that, however, very few people required it, except those who have to bind corn stalks and for some very late crops which they wish to tie up, and also those who are engaged in manufacturing lath and articles of that sort, who buy the twine for the purpose of binding it. Except this, there is not much sold until very much later in the season. I have made some inquiry with regard to sales in United States institutions as well as our own, and the experience there has been that there is no such thing as a sale to the farmers direct. For instance, the Minnesota Prison Manufacturing Company produces about five times what we do —about 2,500 tons a year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that a company ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is by a board that is appointed for the purpose. They manufacture about 2,500 tons. They have been in the practice of reserving about 175 tons for sale to farmers direct, except last year, when it was supposed there was going to be a shortage, and there was a very great deal of excitement in the country, and they have never been able to sell 75 tons out of the 2,500 to farmers who had ordered through the institution, and so their policy has been to deal with retail men. I have discussed the whole subject in the communication which I have submitted to the House, and my hon. friend will find information on that subject which will, I think, show conclusively that there is no such thing as a combination. The truth is that the wholesale dealers part with the article at a very moderate figure, but those who hold it, of course, get what they can for it, and if they are obliged to carry a certain quantity of it over, and take that risk, it deteriorates in value. The oil dries out, and it runs very badly off the reel, and it is not passed easily through the needle, and has less value. It is one of the articles you must deal in while it is new and fresh if you expect to give satisfaction.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—What can I buy a ton of it for now at the Kingston Penitentiary ? It is open for sale up to March 20th, I understand ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That depends upon the quality.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The best they have got ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If it is in small quantities it will be fourteen cents. The raw material costs us nearly that. The price is eight and a half to fourteen cents. We have sold as small a quantity as fifteen pounds.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That would be delivered at the Penitentiary ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

SALARY OF HARBOUR-MASTER AT MONTMAGNY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

What is the name of the present harbour-master of the harbour of Montmagny ? What is his salary ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Louis D. Dion is harbour-master. He is allowed $200 per annum of fees during the calendar year. The collections for the season ending Dec. 31 amounted to $71.

SALARY OF WHARFINGER AT MONTMAGNY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

What is the name of the present wharfinger at Montmagny ? What is his salary ? What has been the amount collected, and how much has been paid into the government for rates collected for the use of the wharf from April to December, 1898 ? How much collected and how much paid in to the government for the corresponding period in 1899 ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The present wharfinger at Montmagny is Louis Dion. His salary is twenty-five per cent of his collections. Then as to the question what have been his collections and how much has been paid to the government for the rates collected, the answer is, nothing. As to the further question, how much collected and how much paid in to the government during the corresponding period in 1899, the answer is, 'Amount collected, $6.72 ; amount paid to the department, $5.04.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Can the hon. gentleman tell me when this system of paying officers 25 per cent was adopted ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot tell my hon. friend.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 18) 'An Act to amend the Dominion Lands Act.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

THE CASE OF LIEUT.-COL. WHITE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In view of the remark made by the hon. Secretary of State just now in reference to my query, or in reference to the notice which I intended to call the attention of the government to, I shall ask him to-morrow what action has been taken towards bringing Mr. Foster, Colonel, Colonial Chief Staff Officer, to account for telling what my hon. friend says is a falsehood. The hon. gentleman can inquire in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Let it stand till Monday, as Dr. Borden is out of town at present.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Very well.

GRANT IN AID OF AGRICULTURE IN NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY inquired :

If there is a probability of there being any increase in the supplementary estimates to the grant in aid of agriculture in the North-west Territories?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am unable to answer my hon. friend's question at the present time. The hon. gentleman knows it is a well-established rule that where a matter has not been stated in the estimates brought down to parliament, it is not given to either House in advance, and I may say that I cannot give my hon. friend the information he wishes on that subject until the question of the supplementary estimates comes to be considered.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY rose to Ask the government if they assume to have any power or right of influence in respect to the section of country a railroad shall be built which they subsidize by land grant or otherwise?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know that I precisely apprehend the question.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I will explain it. Supposing that the government grant a subsidy to a company to build a railroad from one end of this building to the other, would they have power to direct whether it should come round by this side of the House or the other side ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the government make it a condition of granting a charter that the road shall be located as it is directed in the terms of the charter, the company would undoubtedly be bound by it.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE GRAIN TRADE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY inquired :

How many persons constitute the royal commission to inquire into the grain trade of Manitoba and the North-west Territories and the mode of shipment of grain through flat warehouses and elevators? Also, who they are and where they reside when at home? How much salary per day do they receive each, and the date on which they commenced to draw salary? How many days' service have they been paid for up to date? Also, how many clerks have they assisting them, and what remuneration do they individually receive, and who are they? Also, do the commission and staff get hotel and travelling expenses in addition to salary?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The answers to the six inquiries of the hon. gentleman are as follows: 1. Four commissioners. 2. The late Judge Senkler, of St. Catharines, who was succeeded as chairman of the commission by Justice Richards, of Winnipeg; W. F. Sirett, of Glendale, Manitoba; William Lothian, of Pipestone, Manitoba; and Charles C. Castle, of Foxton, Manitoba. 3. The chairman is paid $25 a day; and the other commissioners $10 a day. The practice is to pay commissioners from the date on which they leave their ordinary avocations to perform their duties as commissioners; and as only in the case of the late Judge Senkler has an account been rendered, it is impossible to state the date from which the other commissioners will commence to draw pay. Judge Senkler's services commenced on the 12th October, 1899. 4. No payments have yet been made. 5. Mr. Charles N. Bell, of Winnipeg, was appointed secretary to the commission at a salary of $10 a day. Members of the Hansard staff reported the evidence. The government is not at present aware as to whether further clerical assistance was secured by the commissioners. 6. The commissioners and staff received hotel and travelling expenses, in accordance with the practice which has always obtained.

MILEAGE OF SENATORS.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. MacKEEN—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to a question that has appeared on the Order paper of the House of Commons, which, I presume, is intended more or less to reflect discredit on some hon. members of this House. The notice is given by Mr. Dechene, and reads as follows:

1. Is the government aware that the late Hon. Senator Temple, of Fredericton, N.B., a Conservative, drew for mileage $162.40, whereas Hon. Senator David Wark, also of Fredericton, but a Liberal, draws but $116?

2. That the Hon. Senator David MacKeen, of Halifax, a Conservative, draws for mileage $192.60, and that Hon. Senator Almon, Conservative, draws for mileage $192.60, whereas the Liberal member for Halifax, Dr. Russell, draws but $175, as shown by the Auditor General's Report, 1897-8?

3. What explanation can the government give?

As I said before, the object of these questions is apparent to everybody. For myself, I may say that I am almost ignorant of the regulation regarding the way in which mileage fees are paid. I have been here three or four years, and I think when I came first the question was put to me by which route I came, and I remember answering. As a rule I have always come around by Boston. I remember last year and the year before I said to the gentleman who acts as paymaster, that I had come by Boston. He told me he did not think I could be paid on the basis of that route. I said 'certainly not—I do not expect it, neither so I wish it.' The mileage, whatever it amounted to, was regulated by him, and I am safe to assert that last year I said nothing to him about it. This year I came by way of Boston. I have said nothing to him so far, neither do I intend to. I suppose I shall take whatever he gives me without question. So far I have had no money whatever from him. The amount here involved is $17.60, but the notice of inquiry about the alleged irregularity is intended, no doubt, to make a point against a political opponent. That is very clear, but if this gentleman, in his zeal for the public service, would inquire a little further and examine the Auditor General's Report, perhaps he would find there were payments made to gentlemen not Liberal-Conservatives, which might reflect against them the same as this is intended to reflect against me and others. If there is any irregularity in the payment to me, I am ready to make it good. I have no need, and no intention of asking for anything beyond what is my right. I should be very sorry to do so. It is unnecessary—it is too small a sum. Were it larger, there might be some use in it, but it is rather insulting to be accused of trying to fleece the government out of $17. It is unfortunate that there should be a regulation which is liable to misunderstanding. That, however, is none of my business; I do not know what the regulations are. So far as I am concerned, I took no more and no less than what was offered me by the paymaster.

PROTECTION OF RIVIERE DU SUD.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

What was the total cost of the works performed for the protection of the Rivière du Sud, in the parish of St. Thomas, county of Montmagny?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to the hon. gentleman that the total cost to the 30th June, 1899, was $12,086.76.

COST OF POST OFFICE AT MONTMAGNY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

What was the total cost of the post office at Montmagny, the cost of the ground and of the buildings thereon, and the extra works required for the adaptation of those buildings to the purpose for which they were bought?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The cost of the land and buildings was $5,000. The cost of the alterations, fittings and furniture was $2,494.75.

PURCHASE OF TOWN HALL AT MONTMAGNY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

What amount of money was paid by the government for the purchase of the town hall of Montmagny? To whom was this amount paid? Is there a deed of sale, and who are the contracting parties? By whom and on what date was this deed passed?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say that there are practically four questions embraced in the one. The first question is what amount of money was paid by the government for the purchase of the town hall of Montmagny? The answer is $5,000. The second question is, to whom was the amount paid? The answer is, to the Seminary of Quebec. The third question is, is there a deed of sale, and who are the contracting parties? The answer is, yes, there is a deed of sale, the parties being the government and the Seminary of Quebec. The fourth question is, by whom and on what date was the deed passed? The answer is that it was passed before M. P. Cirouille, a notary, on the 17th June, 1898.

TAKING OF DECENNIAL CENSUS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) inquired:

Should a redistribution of seats be made during the present year affecting representation in the House of Commons, will the decennial census be taken in 1901 according to the provisions of section 51 of the British North America Act, and will another redistribution be made after the completion of the census, if taken?

He said: The question I have put on the paper would no doubt come up to-morrow, but it would be convenient to know now what the intention of the government is in the event of the Bill for redistribution, as promised, becoming law. That is, if there is to be a redistribution this year, will there be another redistribution after the census is taken next year?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The British North America Act provides for a redistribution after every census if the redistribution is necessary. If the result of the census is such as to show that the population of the different provinces is the same as it was before the census was taken, there would be no object in making a redistribution of seats.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I believe the Act does not say, 'If necessary.' It says there shall be a redistribution.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A re-adjustment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But my hon. friend will see that that is upon the assumption that the census discloses a difference. If there is no disclosure of a difference there is no re-adjustment of seats.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—What about the Bill which is to be brought up to-morrow ?

THE COX DIVORCE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I wish to ask the indulgence of the House to amend the resolution carried on Friday with reference to the Cox Divorce Bill. I moved that the Bill be read a second time at a future date, under a misapprehension. I did not know at the time that the fourteen days' notice required by the Act had expired. I should have moved the second reading then. I therefore move that the said resolution be now rescinded, and that the Bill be read the second time presently.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (H) 'An Act respecting the Great Eastern Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Owens.)

Bill (I) 'An Act respecting the Montreal Bridge Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Owens.)

Bill (J) 'An Act respecting the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Owens.)

CANADIAN TRADE AT CAPE NOME.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask if the government have heard anything regarding the action of the United States government respecting the trade at Cape Nome. I understand the intention is not to make it a port of entry, so that vessels going to that point will have to land 150 miles below Port Nome. A number of Canadian vessels have contracted to take goods there, and they will not be allowed now to land at Cape Nome. I hope the attention of the government will be called to the matter so that they may take action to protect Canadian interests. It is so important to the trade of the Dominion that I call the attention of the government to the fact.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am unable to give the hon. gentleman any answer to the inquiry he makes. It is the first time that the matter has been brought to my notice, and I am not aware that there are any restrictions upon Canadian ships at Cape Nome more than at any other United States port. However, I shall make inquiry.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I saw a letter from the Secretary of the Treasurer of the United States, published in a western newspaper, saying they would not make Cape Nome a port of entry.

KASLO AND LARDO-DUNCAN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved the second reading of Bill (26) 'An Act respecting the Kaslo and Lardo-Duncan Railway Company.' He said: This is a Bill to change the name of the company, and asking power to divide up the road into sections for the purpose of construction, and for the extension of the time for its completion.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CANADIAN STEEL COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (G) 'An Act to incorporate the Canadian Steel Company.' He said: This is a Bill asked for by several capitalists in the United States, for the purpose of establishing iron works in this country. I believe the intention is to establish works in the county of Lincoln, and they have also bought large mining properties. They propose to extend their works to the county of Ottawa, where there are large iron deposits. The enterprise will be of very great benefit to this country.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (18) 'An Act to amend the Dominion Lands Act.' He said: The first clause provides for an amendment to meet the case of parties who have earned their patent, but have died, and whose heirs or representatives belong to a foreign country. Where that is the case, the provisions of chap. 54, section 38, are applied. The section to which I refer provides in case a settler obtains a right to a patent and dies, that if his legal representatives are citizens of a foreign country, it shall be an exception to the provision in section 38 as it stands in the original law. With regard to clause 2, it provides that subsection 2 of the 38th section shall be amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:

(b.) If the settler has his permanent residence upon farming land owned by him in the vicinity of his homestead, the requirements of this Act as to residence may be satisfied by residence upon the said land.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What interpretation will we put on that word 'vicinity?'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Vicinage or neighbourhood. If he resides within a reasonable distance—where a man is carrying on the cultivation of the land himself.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Who shall decide that?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He reports it to the land agent. The intention is to make the law a little broader than it is at the present time, and it enables a man to homestead land while he is actually living on other land.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me there is a possibility of injustice being done by the use of a term so broad as that, except some regulation is passed so that equal justice may be dealt to all parties alike. One agent may construe the meaning of the word one way, another agent may construe it another way. It seems to me, before this Bill goes to committee, the government should think out some way of placing a uniform definition of interpretation upon that term.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend knows we use the term in legal phraseology as equivalent to residence within the township, or in the neighbourhood or district.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not objecting to the principle of it. I think it is a wise provision.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, it is a necessary provision, and what my hon. friend says is perfectly just. It would be a monstrous thing if the government were to give a more liberal interpretation to this clause in the case of one settler than they would give in the case of another. But I apprehend, when the clause comes to be worked out, there will be no difficulty in that respect. It is the same as many other provisions of the law are in departments administrative, so that you cannot perhaps restrict it just with the same provision that you would the ordinary provision of law that was not intended to serve that purpose.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think the trouble would be so much with the government. The difficulty would arise with some of the agents, who would perhaps be not so particular. Another point in connection with this clause is that it enables a settler to homestead who has already purchased land—that is, a man who owns property living upon it can homestead the adjacent 160 acres. The object of giving the homestead, as I have always understood it, is to induce settlers to come in there. If my interpretation of this is correct, a man who is living there, having purchased land, could take an additional 160 acres.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not necessarily. The words are 'in the vicinity of his homestead.' It assumes a condition to exist at the present time. A man may have homesteaded one piece of land and may have bought another, and may have found that, for certain reasons, spring water or a better building site, or some other reasons, he prefers to erect his residence and to actually reside upon the lot which he has purchased rather than on the one which he has homesteaded. Under this provision he will not lose his right of homestead from the fact that he did not reside upon the lot, and if it is in the vicinity of the lot upon which he resides, he has an opportunity of actually cultivating it precisely the same as he would if he had resided upon it, and I apprehend the intention is, not to provide for a man who resides far away from his homestead, but who resides in the vicinity, who perhaps may have bought the adjoining quarter section, and who has in that way an opportunity of residing upon the land he has purchased, simply because it may be better suited for building purposes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I quite understand that, but it does not reach the point I raise. Supposing a man has not homesteaded, but has gone and settled the land, and there is a government lot next to him, can he, after he has been a settler there two or three years, go and homestead the adjacent property, if he has not already homesteaded it ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not see why he should not. I do not see why he should be put in a worse position, because, after all, my hon. friend knows that our area of unoccupied land in the North-west is very great, and that if a man obtains an additional lot after having bought one, he can do so by homesteading it. If he has already homesteaded it, he cannot homestead again. You give him an opportunity of bringing a larger area under cultivation, and under the existing circumstances I do not think that that is a disadvantage in any way. Section 44 of the Act reads as follows :

If such settler has not performed the conditions of settlement required to entitle him to a patent for such homestead within the time and in the manner provided by this Act, and has thereby forfeited his right to obtain a patent, the holder of the charge created thereon may apply to the minister for a patent of such homestead, and upon establishing the facts to the satisfaction of the minister, shall receive a patent in his name therefor ; and such patentee shall be bound to place a bona fide settler on such homestead by the sale thereof to such settler, or otherwise, within two years from the date of such patent, and in default of so doing within the said period shall be bound to and obliged, on demand, to sell the said homestead to any person willing to become a bona fide settler thereon, for such sum of money as is sufficient to pay the amount of such charge and interest, and the expense incurred by the patentee in obtaining such patent.

Clause three of this Bill reads :

Subclause 5 of clause 44 of the said Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the words, 'in which case the patent may issue in the name of the settler even if he is not a British subject.'

That is to enable him to acquire the legal right that he would have in other cases, in order that he may deal with the property in accordance with the provisions of this section. He has to put a settler upon it within a reasonable time, or sell it to one who is ready to occupy it. There are cases where a provision of that sort seems necessary in order to do justice to the parties.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—To show how much more liberal we are than they are in the United States.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Clause 4 provides for the renting of the residence of the volunteer on active service. His time counts while he is on active service, and the following clause provides that if he is disabled and so unable to cultivate the land or improve it as required, he shall be protected in his rights. Clause 6 provides for the recounting residence in the case of certain losses. It reads :

If at any time after a settler obtains his entry for a homestead and before he completes the conditions of such entry, he suffers such loss, by the destruction, by fire or other cause, of his dwelling-house, out-buildings, farming machinery, farming implements, horses or cattle, as in the opinion of the minister forces such settler to leave his homestead to earn money to erect buildings in the place of those destroyed, or to purchase other necessary farming machinery, farming implements, horses or cattle, the period during which such settler is so forced to be absent from his homestead, not exceeding, however, six months at any one time, may be counted as residence upon his homestead within the said Act or of any Act amending it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is not in the Bill which is distributed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not in the Bill we have before us. The Bill introduced in the Commons has evidently been amended, and that clause has been struck out.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—In clause 4 does the word 'contingent' cover those who are out on foreign service ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is intended to cover it.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It says, 'The defence of Canada or any part of Canada, or the defence of Canada against any foreign power.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We will make that clear when in committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned.

THE CASE OF LIEUT-COL. WHITE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL rose to

Call the attention of the government to the following letter which has been published in different newspapers of the Dominion, and will inquire whether the statements therein made are true and correctly stated:

Department of Militia and Defence,
Ottawa, February 1, 1900.

Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 20th ult., I am directed by the Major General Commanding to inform you that your name was removed from the list of officers to undergo the staff course at the Royal Military College, Kingston, by the hon. minister on the ground that you have of late taken some active part in politics on behalf of the opposition.

I have the honour to be,
Your obedient servant,
H. FOSTER, Colonel,
Chief Staff Officer.

To Lieut.-Col. White,
Guelph, Ont.

He said: I merely put the question now in order to hear what explanation will be made reserving to myself the right of commenting on the answer, if necessary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was under the impression that the question had been put, and I answered it the other day as far as my information went.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman said it was not true.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have received the reply of Mr. Borden, Minister of Militia, to the question. It is dated to-day, and is as follows:—

I return herewith Sir Mackenzie Bowell's question about Col. White. The answer is, first, that the reason given in Col. Foster's letter for the removal of Col. White's name from the list of officers for the staff course was not the true one, and, secondly, was not the reason given by me; thirdly, no one was authorized to make any such statement as that made in Col. Foster's letter, namely, that Col. White's name was removed from the list because he had 'of late taken some active part in politics on behalf of the opposition.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I stated to the hon. gentleman, when he made a positive denial just before adjournment, that I should ask in addition what means had been taken to punish the gentleman who undertook to make such statements, if no authority had been given. The hon. gentleman has not answered that, but he has given a positive denial to a statement made by the chief staff officer of the Militia Department. I do not know what action the Minister of Militia will take under such circumstances. If an officer of the department had put language of that kind into my mouth, when I had the honour of being Minister of Militia, I would have brought him to task instantly. I never would have allowed him to remain in the position he occupies if he was capable of writing a letter of that kind without having positive authority. Those who know Col. Foster, know that he has been an officer of the British army, and I presume cares very little about the politics of Canada, and how it is possible that a gentleman of that character occupying the prominent position that he does, could write such a letter of that kind without authority, is altogether beyond my comprehension. I think that when this matter is fully investigated, the public will be able to judge more correctly as to where the fault lies and who tells the untruth. It is not my province to say that the Minister of Militia has stated what is incorrect. I should be equally sorry to say that a gentleman of Col. Foster's position in the army, and occupying an important office in this country, would deliberately concoct what the Secretary of State calls a deliberate falsehood, which, if he knew anything about politics, would bring his minister into disrepute if it ever became public. That this letter was written is beyond peradventure, because Col. White was written to and asked to consider that this letter had never been written. Who instructed Col. Foster to ask Col. White to consider that this letter had never been written? When we look at the actions of some ministers of the present day, and the length to which they have carried the principle of cutting off the heads of officials, one would not be surprised that the Minister of Militia, or many others, would give such instructions. In my old constituency of North Hastings, the reason given by the Postmaster General for removing a country postmaster who perhaps got twenty dollars a year for his services, furnishing his own house for the office, was that he had had the audacity to allow some one to put up a cartoon in the building which was used as a post office—a cartoon reflecting, I suppose, on some of the ministers. I hope that neither of my hon. friends will come into my room, No. 3, for fear of the consequences which might follow, because I frankly tell them I have cut out a number of cartoons that I can look at, and laugh at, and ask my friends to do the same. Fancy the Postmaster General giving as a reason for dismissing a country postmaster, that he reflected on my hon. friend opposite? Whether it was one of the By-Town Coon cartoons or something of that character, I do not know, but I cannot believe for a moment that the leader of this House, or the hon. Secretary of State, would be a party to so paltry, so contemptible an act as that. It is true they added that this man had played the partisan while acting as a returning officer at a local election. Supposing he did, what had the Postmaster General to do with how that man acted at the poli in a local election? The charges made relating to him were positively denied by him. He denies that he ever did what is charged against him—that is showing partisanship while acting as a returning officer. But supposing he had acted in a partisan way, could not the Ontario government have taken care of him without calling to their aid the Postmaster General of Canada to punish this unfortunate man for not having opinions in accord with their own? But the Postmaster General thought that a cartoon, probably cut from the Star, was so offensive to the people who came for their mail that the postmaster had to be deprived of the office, and of the two penny-halfpenny remuneration he received. If a man is to be deprived of an office like that because he dares to hang up a cartoon in his office, or if a man is to be prevented from preparing himself for the service of his country because he has taken the part of the opposition against the government, the sooner the world knows it the better. It would be much better that we should know it, and then we can come to this conclusion, to leave the defence of the country in the hands of the gentlemen who think as the hon. gentlemen opposite do and belong to their party. My attention was called to this matter by a colonel of a battalion who has been a liberal all his life, and he expressed such disgust at a statement like this, coming from a high official, and as having emanated from the minister, or from the Major General, that it is questionable in my mind whether, having a proper regard for the rights of the people of this country, he will longer remain with the party he has been connected with all his life. He has too much respect for the liberty of the people, too much respect for the officers of his battalion, who are composed of both parties, to approve of such discrimination, hence the sooner it is understood in this country that we know no party or politics when it comes to the defence of the country, the better. I can say for myself, that while I occupied the responsible position of Minister of Militia, I ignored politics in toto, as I believe every man should; otherwise he would be unworthy of occupying any prominent position. I go further, he would be unworthy to enjoy the liberty which all British subjects fancy they enjoy in this country. If such a policy is to be pursued, we had better ask Kruger, if he ever gets into power again, to pass a resolution of sympathy with us, and ask the world to assist us in securing our liberties. How much better off are we, if this gentleman state the truth, than the Uitlanders in the Transvaal. If Col. Foster does not tell the truth, the Minister of Militia should dispense with his services without a moment's consideration. I should call him to account at once. I should say 'You have made an untrue statement, on what authority did you make it?' In the letter he says he is instructed by the Major General commanding to inform Col. White that his name has been removed from the lists of officers 'by the hon. Minister of Militia.' There are two or three people who have, to use a plain Anglo Saxon word, told a lie. Mr. Foster says he is directed by the Major General Commanding to inform him that he was instructed by the Minister of Militia to tell Lieut. Col. White that his name was removed because he had taken some active part in politics on behalf of the opposition. There is the statement between the three. Col. Foster says distinctly—I have it on the best authority and I state it publicly in order that the Minister of Militia may take such steps as he deems proper to bring this gentleman to a proper sense of his duty—that he did receive that order directly, and that the commander of the forces, Major General Hutton was not in the city when the letter was written. I can easily understand why Major General Hutton, at the banquet given him, in this city, spoke as if he was living in an atmosphere of political influences, when he said :

I should feel more hopeful of the future of Canada if the government had ever shown an active interest in our recent efforts for a higher efficiency, or indicated their approval of the principle upon which our efforts are based.

That is a very serious charge for a gentleman occupying his position to make against the minister under whose directions he was acting, and whose approval he should have upon all and every step that he took in connection with the militia. It may be true that the Major General may have endeavoured to carry out the strict, rigid rules of the Imperial service, and it may also be true that he may not have understood the genius of our people to such an extent as to modify the views of the Imperial regulations to meet the requirements of the force. He may have been a little too rigid in that matter, but in everthing he did, I venture the assertion that he believed he was acting in the best interests of this country and of the militia force in particular. I had the honour of meeting that gentleman while in Australia. I saw the efforts he was making to put the volunteer force of that country in an efficient state, and the results were such that any one who had paid any attention to military matters would come to the conclusion that he was one of the best officers that could possibly be placed in the position he occupied. There may be other causes of friction to which I will not allude, but I confess as an old volunteer, having been in the force for a long time, associated with Liberals in the ranks and at the mess table, and knowing as I do that one of the best officers that we have now in our own county is a Liberal, a colonel of a battalion, I, with him, felt that there had been a blow struck at the volunteer force of this country which it would be difficult in the future to eradicate from the minds of those desiring in future to serve upon the force. I speak strongly upon this point, because I feel what I say. If this is not true, Mr. Foster should be sent home at once. No man, whether he be an Imperial officer or a Canadian officer, should be permitted to make a statement of that kind as coming from a Minister of the Crown unless he had authority to do it, and I hold that it is the duty of the minister, and the duty of the gentlemen opposite me, who are responsible just as much as the Minister of Militia himself for the proper maintenance of the regulations affecting the service, to take action to sustain the minister if this statement of the minister be correct, and have the officer dismissed ; or if the officer is right and the minister has made such a statement as that attributed to him he ought to be hurled from office within ten minutes of the time it is made known that it is true.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am rather surprised at the very violent speech made by my hon. friend opposite, the insinuations in which he has indulged and the attack upon the Minister of Militia without any evidence to sustain the charges and the insinuations which he has made. The hon. gentleman has made a violent speech against the Minister of Militia. What has he submitted to this House, what facts has he brought before us to warrant the attack which he has made upon the minister ? The hon. gentleman says that the subject of politics ought not to be introduced into the force. I agree with him, but the subject of politics has been introduced into the force for the last twenty years. The hon. gentleman knows that quite well.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I do not know anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then the hon. gentleman is ignorant of what everybody else knows.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Give us evidence of that. The hon. gentleman's statement is not sufficient.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am going to give the evidence of what I say. I know, myself, before the hon. gentleman came into the government, that the militia force of this country was reorganized, and I know that every officer who was in the force at the time that that Bill was introduced into parliament, was legislated out, and those that were of the Liberal party were left out at that time. In my own constituency there was not one restored to the force that had been in the force before.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When was that ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—1868 or 1869. The hon. gentleman is quite astonished that it is a good while ago, but was it not a principle then as much as it is a principle to-day ? I say this in defence of the Minister of Militia, that three-fourths of the officers who have gone on the two contingents to the continent of Africa to uphold the unity of the empire are politically opposed to us, and does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that if you appoint a Liberal to an office in that force that the government are to be censured for it, and that because a man is a Liberal he ought to be disqualified from holding office.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Did I say so ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, but the hon. gentleman has attacked the government on the ground that they have acted the part of political partisans in the constitution of the militia force, and he quotes this letter of Col. Foster's for the purpose of sustaining that charge. Let me call the attention of the House to this letter. Col. Foster does not pretend to say anything of his own knowledge. Col. Foster says :

> Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 20th ult., I am directed by the Major General Commanding to inform you that your name was removed from the list of officers to undergo the staff course at the Royal Military College, Kingston, by the hon. minister.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Go on.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let the hon. gentleman be patient and seek to preserve the dignity of the House. Hon. gentlemen should be moderate and should desire to be regarded as fair, and I ask them at least to have the appearance of seeming fairness if they do not feel disposed to be fair. What does he say ? He says : 'By the minister on the ground that you have of late taken some active part in politics on behalf of the opposition.' I have the most unqualified denial of the minister to that statement ; more than that, I say that if the minister had made that statement it was a most improper thing for General Hutton to put into a communication to the party. He says : 'I am directed by the Major General Commanding to inform you'—what is he directed to inform him ? 'That your name was removed from the list of officers to undergo the staff course at the Royal Military College, Kingston, by the hon. minister on the ground that you have of late taken some active part in politics on behalf of the opposition.' I venture to say that the hon. minister made no such statement, I venture to say that no minister is so imprudent as to make a statement of that sort, and I venture to say that if a man were not hostile and malignant in his feelings against the minister, even if he had said it, he would not have put such words into a communication to a party to be removed. What are the facts ? This man to whom this letter is addressed, Lieutenant Colonel White, of Guelph, is to be sent to Kingston to take the staff course there. He is a retired officer. He is over sixty years of age, and he is a cripple. He was doubly disqualified, and it was on the ground that he was so disqualified that Mr. Borden, the Minister of Militia, told the gentleman that he could not be taken upon the staff, and yet, instead of assigning the reason given by the minister to the Lieut. Col., the Major General assigns a reason of his own. Now, I say that is what has been done. I venture to assert that Colonel Foster will not say, if he is asked, that he had had any communication whatever with the minister upon the subject. He was not directed by the minister. He received his instructions from the Major General. It was the Major General who professed to have had this communication with the minister, and the Major General put these words into Colonel Foster's mouth for the purpose of communicating them to Mr. White. The Major General has gone out of this country ; I am making no attack on him. I am not going to discuss on this occasion whether he was the best officer, or a proper officer, or not, but I would just say this, there have been major generals in this country before him, and if there is any one of them with whom the hon. gentleman and his colleagues agreed let the hon. gentleman name him.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Major General Selby Smith, for instance.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Selby Smith was out of the country before the hon. gentleman came into office, but the hon. gentleman and his colleagues have not got on more smoothly with the officers that the British government have lent to this country than the present government did with Major General Hutton. There can be no doubt on that score. These gentlemen, I know right well from discussions which have taken place before, seem to be of the opinion that because they are British officers they are not amenable to the civil officers of this country. I take a different view. I say that the ministers of the Crown in this country hold the same relation to the officers of the militia force that the ministers of the Crown in England do to those in the command of the forces there, and, as the Duke of Wellington said on one occasion, the Commander in Chief cannot move a corporal's guard from one part of the city of London to another without the sanction of the Secretary for War, and I say here we cannot admit that there is any authority existing in this country that is not subordinate to the civil authority to whom the people of this country have committed the affairs of government, and who have the right to exercise that superior authority as long as they enjoy the confidence of the representatives of the people in parliament, whether they be of one party or the other.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was that done in Montreal lately ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend on my right read from the minister to-day a complete denial of everything affirmed in this letter, and I say that the minister was not aware at the time of this letter to Colonel White being written, it was brought under his attention some time after it was written. I believe that he sent for Col. Foster, and Col. Foster admitted that he had had no communication with the minister on the subject—that his instructions were received from Major General Hutton, and that he wrote in accordance with the directions which he had received from the Major General—which was not the reason that the minister gave—that those instructions expressed the reasons that were given by the minister for not permitting this person to undergo the staff instruction at the Military College at Kingston, viz. : because he was over age, and on account of physical infirmities he was disqualified to continue in the service.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Why did he not say that ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Why did not who say it ?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Why did not the minister say it ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The minister said it. He called the attention of Major General Hutton to the fact that Col. White was legally disqualified to be on the list, because he was over age and a cripple. Both statements were made to him and both statements were concealed, and a different reason was assigned in the letter which Col. Foster was instructed by the Major General to write.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How did it come that his name was placed on the list ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was placed there by the Major General. Others were placed on the list by the Major General that were not qualified, and they were struck off when brought to the attention of the minister.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The Minister of Justice has spoken under a good deal of excitement. My hon. friend feeling no doubt he had a very bad case, thought it was necessary, by the strength of his adjectives and by evincing a good deal of feeling to cover the weakness of the cause which he had undertaken to defend. My hon. friend tries to divert the attention of this House from the crucial point in this letter of Major White's, by raising a discussion over the fact which he alleges, that no government in this country has got on very well with major generals commanding the forces here—that there have been disagreements between various goverments and the Major General's commanding the forces in Canada. This may be true; matters of disagreement, may always be expected. It is perfectly reasonable that such should occur and without any cause for alarm or surprise; but this is not a mere difference of opinion. It is a matter where there is a direct contradiction in words between the minister and one or both of these British officers.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Only one.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Only one. My hon. friend draws the deduction that the major general commanding is responsible for giving this reason and instructing Mr. Foster to put this reason in this letter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is the plain meaning of this letter. The minister puts in the hands of the Secretary of State a statement which gives a direct lie to the words of the Major General. We are asked in this House, behind the back of the Major General, to believe that this British soldier has deliberately and maliciously, and malignantly—I think that is the word the Minister of Justice used—put this reason, without any ground or authority for it, in this letter for the purpose of injuring the minister. The honour of a British soldier is something proverbial, and I think that hon. members of this House and the people of this country will be slow to come to the conclusion that Major General Hutton deliberately and designedly, and malignantly instructed Col. Foster to put a falsehood in this letter for the purpose of injuring the Minister of Militia. Are we prepared to accept that conclusion without a word from Major General Hutton in defence? Are we prepared to accept even the word of the Minister of Militia when the acceptance of it involves such disgraceful conduct on the part of a British officer? The hon. gentleman wishes to convey the impression to this House that Major General Hutton has been greatly to blame during his administration of militia affairs in Canada, and I have heard the statement made elsewhere that Major General Hutton had got into difficulties with provincial governments in other places before he came to Canada. I have the authority of a member of an Australian Legislature, who was on the floor of this House not a week ago, that General Hutton's administration of the forces in New South wales was eminently satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Why was he recalled?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend was once a minister of the government and did not remain a minister.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Major General Hutton was recalled before his time was up.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He may have been recalled for service elsewhere. I had the statement made last week to me that Major General Hutton's administration of the forces in New South Wales was eminently satisfactory to the people of New South Wales. It is certainly a very serious matter that the Minister of Militia had no way, apparently, to get out of this position in which he finds himself placed, than by asking the people of this country to believe that Major General Hutton, a British soldier, deliberately, and malignantly, and designedly instructed that a falsehood should be inserted in this letter which Col. Foster wrote to Mr. White.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—In the face of the very strong denial read by the Secretary of State, I do not know that much more can be said to any advantage on this subject. As the matter now stands, the reply from the Minister of Militia places the responsibility on Major General Hutton of stating what is practically untrue. There is no escaping from that dilemma, that the Major General ordered Colonel Foster to write an utterly untrue statement to Colonel White. From all I have seen, and from what I know of Major General Hutton, I cannot conceive that he was capable of doing anything of the kind, and although, as I said before, it is not very much use to follow up this matter in the House at present, yet I do not see how it is possible that it can remain as it is, because we should have yet some statement from Major General Hutton to show whether he has been guilty of making a deliberate mis-statement in placing the grounds of refusal to allow this officer to follow up his course at the Military College on remarks which were never made by the Minister of Militia. I do not know, and I think very few of us know exactly the circumstances under which Major General Hutton resigned his appointment here, but I am glad to take this opportunity of saying that I know of no major general commanding the militia in this country, who has ever done as much for the militia of Canada as General Hutton has done. That is the unanimous opinion and feeling of everybody connected with the militia, and volunteer forces, at all events throughout Ontario, and I fancy it is the same in the other provinces of the Dominion. He has put spirit and life in the organization, and taken a personal interest in it such as no major general had ever done before. I suppose everybody is bound to accept the distinct denial of the Minister of Militia that the Secretary of State has been authorized to read to this House, but I think hereafter we shall require to have a further explanation to convince us that General Hutton instructed Colonel Foster to write a distinct untruth.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman thing it reasonable apart from every other consideration, that the minister would assign such a reason in a public document for the removal of an officer who was over age and crippled ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Does the minister think a non-political officer like the Major General would drag politics into a matter of this kind ? Not likely. The Minister of Militia is a strong politician.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not as strong as the major general was.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Who is more likely to drag politics in—the major general or the minster ? We are bound to look at the major general as being as honest and truthful as the Minister of Militia. I do not wish to convict the minister of a falsehood, but it looks more likely that he would be more apt to use political influence than the major general would be.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I notice that there is a much more one-sided view of this quesmtion of the ex-major general taken by the Conservative party in this House than in the other House. In the House of Commons the Conservative party did not venture to line up behind Major General Hutton ; and I think possibly hon. gentlemen opposite may find by-and-by that they have made a mistake in taking the attitude they have assumed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman inform me when this matter was discussed in the other House ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The question of the major general's withdrawal was discussed, not his connection with this particular letter. The Major Hughes matter was discussed in the other House ; and the Conservative party there did not seem to take the view that the Conservative party here seems disposed to take. They say it is an ill bird that fouls its own nest, and it is a highly discreditable thing that, from political motives, any hon. gentleman should be prepared to say that if there is a question of veracity between any officer who comes here and a member of the government, it is our duty to believe the stranger, rather than the member of the government.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I desire to say that, as far as I am concerned, I made no statement of that kind. I expressed no opinion whatever as to the denial which was read here by the Secretary of State from the Minister of Militia. I only said I could not believe until there was some further evidence before me, that Major General Hutton, in whose honour I would place as much trust as I would in that of the Minister of Militia or anybody else, would be guilty of stating an untruth.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My remarks did not refer to the hon. gentleman from York, because he was studiously moderate, but to the two hon. gentlemen who preceded him. It is not long ago that we were given to understand that Canadian officers and soldiers did not know anything about fighting.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh !

Hon. Mr. POWER—That was the ground taken, that unless our men were drilled into machines they would be no use in a campaign. That fallacy has been completely exploded; and I think the view that the word of a Canadian is not as good as the word of an Englishman is another fallacy which will also be exploded in due time. I take it for granted that a Canadian is just as little likely to lie as any other man. With respect to this letter, no one has said that Colonel Foster was not instructed by the Major General commanding. It is simply a question of veracity between the major general commanding, who was under orders to leave at the time the letter was written, and the Minister of Militia who probably had something to do with having him leave.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the statement he made as to the reasons given for the removal of Colonel White's name from the list of those who were to go to Kingston. Before doing so, I wish to congratulate him on the moderate and temperate manner in which he approached this subject. What he meant by the statement that there never was a major general in this country with whom I could agree, I do not know. Perhaps he had reference to the tilt I had with one major general.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Herbert ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I had no difficulty with Colonel Herbert. Other colleagues did not get on with him. Colonel Herbert, as I learned when in London three or four years ago, spoke highly of me. I mention that to show that I had no difficulty with him ; but I did have some little difficulty with Colonel McDougall in 1869, when he took me to task for expressing my opinions on the floor of the House which I denied his right to do. As a representative of the people, I laid down the doctrine that I had a perfect right to discuss militia matters, the action of the General at the time, and everything affecting the interests of the country. That was my difficulty with the colonel. He was an admirable officer outside of that, but I thought he went a little too far when he undertook to chastise officers of the force, as he did me at that time, for expressing an opinion as to the management of the department or as to what I thought was right in making it more efficient. The hon. gentleman spoke of Selby Smyth. I was in office at the time he was here, and I was on the very best possible terms with Selby Smith. On that occasion, so far did I go, and without obtaining his consent, as to order out the troops to quell a riot, and he said I was perfectly right. I had no difficulty with any major general other than the one to whom I have called atention.

Mr. Foster in the House of Commons asked this question :

1. What is the purpose had in view in selecting officers of the Canadian militia to undergo a course of instruction in the duties of the general staff at the Military College, Kingston? 2. What is the basis on which the selection is made? 3. What are the names and standing of the officers originally selected for the staff course now going on, and the date of notification? 4. What changes were thereafter made, and for what reasons?

The answer of the Minister of Militia and Defence was as follows :

I beg to reply: 1. For the purpose of promoting higher military education and of preparing officers for positions of command and for staff duties when required. 2. Suitability for promotion, capacity for staff duties, and the probability of their being required to act on the staff generally, or at the Royal Schools of Instruction, in replacing officers selected for active service. The Queen's Regulations do not admit officers over the age of thirty-five to the staff course in England. 3. Lieut.-Colonels: W. W. White, W. E. Hodgins, A. Roy, G. E. A. Jones, D. McL. Vince, H. McLaren; majors: J. C. Galloway, W. G. Mutton, E. Chinc; captains: A. E. Carpenter, J. J. Sharples, W. S. Smith. They were notified in orders, January 20, 1900, without the authority of the minister. 4. Of the officers named in paragraph 3, Lieut.-Colonels Vince and White were removed from the list chiefly on account of age, and because they had retired from active command. Captain Mutton was struck off the list at his own request. Captain Taylor was added to fill vacancy. Lieut. Webster was put on and retired without instruction or authority from the minister.

Col. Vince, I believe, is a New Brunswicker, a gentleman who was turned out of the post office a short time ago, because he has political proclivities differing from those of the hon. minister. The Minister of Militia gives no indication that Col. White was a cripple. If he is a cripple I can understand his incapacity for military duty, but there is no such reason given for the action taken, and I repudiate, in as strong language as I can, the charge made by the senior member for Halifax, that this action of mine and those who agree with me, arises from a political motive. I would regret a statement of that kind coming from a Conservative as quickly as I would coming from anyone else, when it affects a branch of the service in this country where no politics or religion should be allowed to interfere or intervene. This is the second or third time that the senior member for Halifax has taken me to task because I have not done certain things in accordance with his ideas of propriety of right and wrong. However, that will not deter me in the future, although I stand in very great awe of the hon. gentleman when he rises to administer castigation to a youngster like myself, who has had very little experience of politics. I will accept it in due humility, considering the source from which it came, and I am sure the hon. gentleman may administer just as many castigations to me as he thinks proper. If they are deserved I will profit by them; if not I will pursue just such a course as I think right. I repeat in that I cannot help coming to the conclusion, when a man can be dismissed from a petty post office because he likes to look at a political cartoon and laugh at it, that the ministers who would be a party to that kind of thing would be capable of doing anything in the line of dismissals.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no need to bring up the question of the dismissal of the postmasters. If we go back to 1878 we will find a very large number of dismissals, page after page, that I have produced to this House. The hon. leader of the opposition was not in this chamber at that time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was in the chamber when the hon. gentleman read the list.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There was a very large array of them. They all happened to be politicians on the wrong side.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In nearly all the dismissals the reasons given were 'Services not required.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If we did wrong, were you right in doing likewise?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, but the hon. gentleman is disqualified from complaining.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is the first time that it has come to my ears that the present Minister of Militia has been charged with acting politically. On the contrary, I have seen in Conservative papers all over the country words of approval of the course he has taken in choosing officers irrespective of politics. It is a matter of notoriety that some bitter enemies of the government were appointed upon the contingent when friends of the government were applicants. The whole question which governed the Minister of Militia was proficiency. So far as the officers of militia are concerned, I think I could point out a good many instances of dismissals when the late government were in power. Take Col. Hamilton. He was an officer who had rendered great service to this country and was recognized as a very efficient officer. The hon. member for North York (Hon. Mr. Allen) will know whether that was correct or not. I think he was dismissed wrongly. I only rise to say that the charge against Dr. Borden for acting from a political standpoint is indefensible and unjustifiable, and I do not know that it is quite fair, in the absence of Major General Hutton, to discuss the ground upon which he was removed. He was removed upon very good grounds, however. I only take up one point, and that is because the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) made the statement that a gentleman from Australia stated that Major General Hutton was an excellent officer there and rendered good service. I do not know whether he added that at the time he was recalled the representatives approved or disapproved.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, his conduct was approved.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Very well; I make this statement now. I had occasion several times to criticise Major General Hutton, and I did it to his face, and in doing so I reminded him that he had been obliged to leave New South Wale in consequence of his interfering in politics. He did not deny that. He did not deny that he had been instrumental in bringing about a change of government, so much of a politician was he.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Was that the reason the present government let him go?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the Major General was plotting against this government, I think it is a very good reason. I do not propose to make the charge. I simply take the statement made by the hon. member from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson), and I state that in conversation with Major General Hutton, when I did charge him with interfering more than he should have done, and referred to the fact that in New South Wales he had been instrumental in bringing about a change of government, he admitted having done so.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—How many miles away is he now?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I would not bring the matter up if the hon. gentleman had not referred to it. The hon. gentleman introduced into the debate an element which ought not to have been discussed here, but I have made my statement on the authority of the gentleman himself. He took great credit for having done so, and stated as a justification that he had been the means of bringing about confederation in the Australasian colonies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He deserved a great deal of credit for that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was his justification. I give it to the House as he gave it to me.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will relate a little of history when the hon. gentleman concludes his remarks.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am stating a fact which occurred in the conversation I had with the Major General. It affords the House and the country an opportunity of knowing how far the Major General was inclined to act outside of the lines of his duty.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend the Secretary of State has brought up a second instance in which he sets up the word of a minister of the Crown against the Major General.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My own word.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But what is the hon. gentleman's word more than the word of any other minister of the Crown ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman can take it as he pleases.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I should think the direct contradiction between Major General Hutton, and the Minister of Militia was quite enough, without bringing up another conversation. We might hear it from a different point of view if the Major General was heard in his own defence.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon, gentleman brought up the matter. I did not introduce it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—There is no use discussing this matter. The reason given by Col. Foster in the letter before us is that Col. White took part in politics in favour of the opposition. Hon. gentlemen know that is the reason given all through the country when hundreds and thousands of men are discharged. I suppose they have been so much in the habit of giving that reason that they could not give any other in the case of Col. White. In the beginning of the session it was remarked that to the victors belong the spoils ; I think they have illustrated that pretty well in the public service generally, but I do not think they should follow that principle in the militia of the country. I think we should get at the truth of this matter. I will not say that any one is lying, but somebody is stating something which is not correct, either the Minister of Militia or the Major General, or this gentleman in charge at Kingston. We must find out the truth for the benefit of the people of this country, and for the benefit of the militia of the country. It is the same old reason. 'You took part in politics,' and I suppose probably they could not find any other reason for dismissing this man. I hope this matter will be cleared up. The hon. gentleman from York (Hon. Mr. Allan) says it will, and I should like to see it investigated. It is an important question to the people of this country if a minister of the Crown is to tell what is not true, or the Major General is to state what is not true, and somebody is punished in the meantime. The only reason they give in the letter to Col. White is that he took part in politics. I consider that it is of very little consequence whether he took part in politics or not ; it is a small thing to deprive an officer of his privileges because he happens to take an interest in politics, no matter which side gets his vote.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would not have spoken again on this question had not the hon. Secretary of State referred to Major General's visit to Australia and the fact that he was recalled. I knew he had a difficulty there, and Sir Geo. Dibbs, then premier of New South Wales, asked me what we would do in Canada under the circumstances. I asked him what the Major General had done, and he told me, I said 'If you were in Canada that would not be tolerated.' The case was this: there was a riot at the Broken Hill Mines, the largest silver mines in the world. Great injury was done, life was lost and threats were made upon the legislature and government House. They waited upon Dibbs, then Premier, and he himself, upon his own responsibility, called out the volunteers and threatened to bring the naval forces from their ship in the harbour. He said exception had been taken to that by the Governor General of New South Wales, Sir Robert Duff, and also by the Major General. They claimed that he had no authority as Premier to act in that way, that he should have made his report through council to the Governor, or sent for the Minister of Militia, and that the order should have gone through the Major General. My reply was that if that were in Canada that is the course that would have been pursued. No Premier would have a right to order out the militia force in that manner, and the proper and correct way would have been, as far as my knowledge enables me to judge, to have communicated with the Major General commanding the force at the time, and he should have performed the duty which the Premier assumed. Well, he said, 'We pay for it, and I think I had a right to do it.' I said it would not be tolerated in Canada. That is the character of the quarrel, so far as I know, and the statements of the Secretary of State brought vividly back to my recollection the interview I had had with Sir Geo. Dibbs when he appealed to me to know what we in Canada would do under the circumstances. But apart from that, it is certain that Major General Hutton must have been considered an officer fit for the position he held, even if he were recalled, or he would not have been sent to this country. If he had not been the British government would not have acquiesced in the request of hon. gentlemen opposite to send them a proper officer. I do not know what course they pursued in the matter, but I know what the practice is, that while the appointment is in the hands of the minister of the day, they generally appeal to the home government or Commander-in-Chief of the forces, to send such a man as he thinks is fitted for the position, and several names are suggested, but it is left to them generally to make the selection. They must have thought Major General Hutton was efficient or they would not have sent him. Major General Hutton is a much greater statesman than I took him to be, if he arrogated to himself the bringing about of confederation in Australia.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Do the following words, taken from the number of the newspaper 'La Patrie' for September 28, 1899, report in a sufficiently exact manner a part of the speech made by the hon. the First Minister at Drummondville, on September 26 last:

'You know that in 1896 an irritating question was causing trouble in the country. It was a question where religion and politics were confounded. The solution of this question demanded the strongest qualities of a statesman. The old administration pretended to have settled this question by the presentation of a Bill called remedial, but which did not remedy anything at all. This Bill, from another side, was of a nature to irritate the population of a sister province. The measure was wrecked, and we came into power. We have promised to settle the question in six months. You are witnesses that this promise has been fulfilled to the letter.

'The school question does not exist any longer, although our friends the Bleus seek to bring it up again.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The papers to be moved for in this House and information sought are papers that are under the control of ministers, or information that is connected with the administration of government. This is neither. The hon. gentleman wants to know what the Prime Minister said at a particular place, I beg to say to my hon. friend that I cannot tell him, and that if he desires information as to that, beyond what he possesses himself, he will have to write to the Premier outside of parliament and obtain that information from him. It is not information that I am in a position to give.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not answering the question as put; I do not want to know if the Prime Minister has uttered such or such words, but I want to know if the report which is given is a sufficiently accurate report of the speech delivered by the hon. Prime Minister at Drummondville. The hon. Minister of Justice should know if it is a sufficiently exact report.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And the Prime Minister knows what he had for breakfast this morning and I do not. If the hon. gentleman wants to find out he will have to write him for that information. The speech the Premier made at Drummondville is not of the slightest consequence to me. It may be to my hon. friend. It is not a matter under the jurisdiction of parliament which my hon. friend can regularly ask for here. He must obtain it from the Prime Minister himself. I do not know that he ever made a speech at Drummondville.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When does the government propose to have the Prime Minister in this chamber ? I think speeches delivered by the Prime Minister in the country are of such importance that they should be brought before parliament, and it is my right to ask if the Prime Minister has given such utterances to the public as those reported. If the government are afraid to take the responsibility of the speeches made by the Prime Minister, no wonder we have the answer that the Minister of Justice has given us to-day. But that is not answering the question at all. What about the position of the hon. Minister of Justice himself in the face of those declarations attributed by a ministerial organ to the head of the government ? Would he assume to take the responsibility of such a declaration ? Is he afraid to come here and state in a manly way that the Prime Minister has uttered such words?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not of the slightest consequence to me whether the Prime Minister has or has not made such a statement. The Prime Minister is entitled to say what to him seems good in addressing a public audience. I do not know, as a matter of fact, that he ever spoke at Drummondville. I am not specially concerned in it, and I say that if my hon. friend wants that information, as it is not information that he has a right to move for in this House, he must seek it from the Prime Minister himself, and not from me.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—While I agree in the main with the principle laid down by the hon. leader of the House, I must dissent altogether from the position he has taken in reference to the right of members to ask questions.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not disputing any right to ask a question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman refuses to answer——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I simply say that I am not called upon to answer.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman must not be so impetuous. A little less impetuosity on the part of the hon. gentleman in answering questions would be much more in accord with the position he holds.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Who is lecturing now?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is the right of every member to ask whether utterances of a gentleman occupying the prominent position of a minister of the Crown have been properly or improperly reported. That is constantly done. If I, or any other private member of parliament, were to make a statement of fact, it would be of no consequence, and it would be improper for the hon. member from Stadacona, or anybody else, to ask questions about it; but the utterances of a gentleman occupying the prominent position of Premier of this country are of importance to every man who has heard or read them. That is the position that I take, because it may be the individual opinion of the minister or of the Prime Minister at the time, or he may be speaking on behalf of his colleagues, and giving utterance to a policy which they intended to pursue, and consequently I think it is a question that the hon. gentleman might very properly ask. It is done in the other House constantly, and the simple duty of the minister from whom the question is asked would be to say to the Premier 'this question is to be asked: What reply shall I give to it?' That was the policy pursued when I was in the government. The Premier might reply 'Tell him it is none of his business,' if he liked, but the general course is to say 'it is not what was stated,' or 'it is substantially true, but I am not going into detail to please the hon. gentleman from Stadacona.' But it is unusual to refuse to answer questions on a subject of vital importance to the country—it may not be important to me, but it may be to others—as to whether the Premier expressed certain sentiments and stated certain facts which affect a great question which is agitating the mind of the people of this country or not. It is easy for him to say 'no I did not say that; I said something else,' or 'I said something which is substantially the same.' If answers of that kind were given, we could get on better. An answer was given to my hon. friend from N.B. (Hon. Mr. Poirier) the other day—I was not here—which I thought was not only improper but discourteous. He had a right to ask the question, and to tell the hon. gentleman to go and seek information elsewhere is not doing justice to a questioner.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As to what is becoming or unbecoming to the position I hold, I must be the judge. My hon. friend cannot judge for me. He takes the opportunity of giving me a lecture whenever he rises to his feet. I have always sought to obtain the information for hon. gentlemen with regard to any matter before the House which they are entitled to ask. But this is not a matter concerning any business of parliament. It is not a motion for any paper in the possession of parliament. It is not a matter over which the government, as a government, has any jurisdiction whatever. The hon. gentleman cannot move for an address to His Excellency, the Governor General, for what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said at Drummondville. This House cannot order it as a return. That is perfectly clear. The hon. gentleman puts to me a question to satisfy his curiosity, which can only be put with any propriety to the minister himself. Now, that is not the practice in parliament. The hon. gentleman is in this regard departing from the usual practice. It is not his privilege to rise and ask such a question except from the individual himself as to what he has said at a particular place out of parliament. Sir Wilfrid Laurier may have made a speech at one or other of these places, and may have said something similar to what the hon. gentleman has put in this question. He may have said something very different. I do not know that I have any interest in obtaining the information. My time is occupied sufficiently with my duties as minister and my duties in this House, and the hon. gentleman —I say it with all courtesy—has no right to put such a question. He knows that as well as I do. It may be a matter of amusement to him, but I am not bound to assist in amusing the hon. gentleman as a matter of duty in this House. If my hon. friend wants such information he must apply to the Prime Minister himself on this subject, as a matter outside of parliament altogether, or he must get some other person to put the question to him in the other House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I understand my questions are not a matter of amusement to the hon. minister. That is the conclusion I draw from his speech. But let me show how illogical the hon. gentleman is. Some time ago my hon. friend on my right (Hon. Mr. Poirier) put a question to the minister. The Minister of Public Works had declared in Toronto that the nomination of Mr. Chapleau as Clerk of the Senate was merely the first step in the direction of reforming the Senate. That was taken out of a newspaper. The hon. minister refused to answer the question, because it was taken out of a newspaper, and was a debatable fact. Two days after I read an extract from a newspaper of this city and asked if a man called Vandel had been liberated from the penitentiary as the papers said. That was a debatable matter, but I got an answer from the minister. He delivered, it is true, a lecture on the duties of ministers of the Crown and the Minister of Justice, but I got my answer. He told me there was no truth in the report in the newspaper, while my hon. friend (Mr. Poirier) who had asked if a reported statement made by Mr. Tarte, in Toronto, was true, could get no answer. Was the minister more occupied with his business when my hon. friend on my right asked his question than when I put mine? And what has happened to-day? Here is the hon. minister giving an answer to the hon. leader of the opposition in this House relating to a statement made by Colonel Foster in the name of the Minister of Militia. Why the hon. gentleman goes out of his way altogether. He gets from the Minister of Militia a letter which he has read in this House. He took much pains to get that letter, and are we to believe that he could not ask the Prime Minister if that report referred to in my motion is true or not. No time? he could wait half an hour to get a letter from the Minister of Militia, but he could not wait two minutes to get an answer from the Prime Minister on a matter of public policy, as to whether this is really an authorized declaration that he has settled for ever the Manitoba school question. The Prime Minister boasted that it was the end of the Manitoba school question. I want to know if it is true that he said so, not whether the words are textually cited, but if that extract which I have given is sufficiently correct. The Minister of Justice has no time.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—You want to know if that question is settled or not?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to know if the question is settled in the way the Prime Minister says or not. I want to know if the hon. minister can take the responsibility of giving an answer to that question. He is unable to do so. What does Magna Charta say of that studied silence in which the minister is fortifying himself ? Nothing at all. It stands as mute as the hon. minister.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—As a piece of consolation to my hon. friend I will tell him the hon. minister took at least the trouble to read his question, which he very courteously told me he had not done in my case, so my hon. friend stands one better than I do anyway.

ALBERTON AND KILDARE POSTAL SERVICE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired :

Why was the service of carrying the mails on the Alberton and Kildare route, P.E.I., not put up to tender on the expiration of the contract on December 31 last?

He said : Last December the contract for carrying the mails on this route expired and some time before the expiration of the term the contractor, a Mr. Reid, was asked by the local officials whether he would continue to perform the work. He consented, and said he would like to know whether he was to have it for the new term, because he wanted to make arrangements. He was told that the Postmaster General was considering the question whether he would allow him to continue the contract.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say I have not the information yet.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When will my hon. friend have it ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot say. I shall bring it here as soon as I receive it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is simply an answer. Surely that is a matter that it will not take long for the minister to explain.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It will not take long to explain when I can get the explanation.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am simply asking why the contract was not let by public competition.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot tell the hon. gentleman until I get the information.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The notice has been on the order paper for two days.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am aware of that, and I am most anxious to give the hon. gentleman the information, but until I get it from the department I cannot do so.

BINDER TWINE AND BARBED WIRE FACTORIES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY inquired :

How many manufacturers of binder twine and barb wire were there in Canada prior to the change in the duty on those articles? Also, how many manufacturers are there of each of those articles in Canada now?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am unable to answer my hon. friend's question. Of course we have no official information on this subject since the census. I dare say there have been some institutions established since for the manufacture, but how many there are I am unable to say.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The statistician, Mr. Johnson, might be able to give the information if you ask him.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He may have it ; I will make inquiry.

THE PREVENTIVE OFFICER AT MONTMAGNY.

INQUIRY.

Mr. LANDRY inquired :

What is the name of the present preventive officer for the district of Montmagny? What is his salary? How many seizures has he effected since he has been doing duty for infractions of the customs and excise laws? How much has the government realized from these seizures, either by the sale of the articles confiscated or by fines imposed?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Inland Revenue Department at present has no preventive officer specially appointed for the county of Montmagny. In February, 1895, Mr. Maxime Dubé was appointed a temporary preventive officer for the district of Montmagny, and his services were dispensed with on the 26th of August, 1896. During that period two seizures were made by him in the county of Montmagny, one of which realized net $59.99, and the other $163.34. Since the 26th of August, 1896, no preventive officer has been specially appointed for Montmagny, and the service for that county and the other counties comprised in the Quebec division is carried on by the general staff of that division.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does that apply to customs as well as excise ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it applies to excise only.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand this question to refer more particularly to customs. Would the hon. gentleman tell us whether there are any preventive officers in the Customs Department there ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot give the hon. gentleman that information.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will the hon. gentleman allow my question to stand ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Because I think he is mistaken in his answer. I know there is a preventive officer, whether customs or excise I cannot tell.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Will the hon. gentleman give me the name and I shall make inquiry.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The name is Dion.

REPRESENTATION OF YUKON DISTRICT IN PARLIAMENT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired :

Is it the intention of the government to introduce a measure during the present session giving the Yukon district representation in parliament?

He said : The Yukon District is a part of Canada of very great importance. I am not going to submit any statistics or information that hon. gentleman do not already possess, for I apprehend that every hon. gentleman knows as much as I do with regard to it. We know that trade in the Yukon district is very large. We know that a considerable population has entered into that part of the Dominion—not perhaps quite as large now as it was some time ago, but nevertheless a very considerable number have gone there. We know the transportation of that country is a matter of very great consequence. Vast trade that can hardly be comprehended by those who have not gone into it and examined it a little is being carried on in that country. Among other some of great banking institutions have been established there and are doing large business. The wash-up of gold from year to year is very great. The transactions between the government of Canada and the people of that country and the men who have gone in there are of the most extensive and important character. In view of these facts and that it is now very apparent—I have it on the authority of some correspondents there who, I know, are very well informed—that the wash-up this spring is likely to exceed $20,000,000. We know that the Yukon territory promises to be a rich gold producing country. We know that there are large interests requiring the care and solicitude of the government. Knowing all these things, I submit the time has come when the government should take up and consider the giving of the Yukon District representation in parliament. We know that day after day, any of us who have friends there, and most of us, I dare say, have, we are receiving communications from them complaining in the strongest possible manner of the condition of affairs there. I am not going to take the ground that all that arises from lack of administrative ability or some other lack on the part of the Minister of the Interior, or that the fault lies entirely with the officials sent there. I am not going to take an extreme ground on that, but I do hold that the interests involved are so great, and the complaints are so numerous and strong on the part of the people there fighting under great disadvantages to develop that country and do something for themselves, that all this should call the attention of parliament to the necessity of giving those people some voice in the government of this country. Speaking for myself, and from the letters I have received and that others have received, I know there is intense dissatisfaction in that country with the administration of its affairs. I believe at this moment there is sufficient indignation and dissatisfaction in the Yukon country that, if it were equally distributed amongst the constituencies of Canada, would prevent the government getting many supporters returned to parliament. I know that all these complaints are coming in, not merely from Conservatives, but from men who were most pronounced Liberals when they went into that country. I know that these men are complaining strongly. I am not saying whether their complaints are warranted or not, but the existence of complaints, the important interests involved, the established richness of that country—all these things point out, to my mind at least, the desirability of giving that country a voice in the administration of affairs at an early date.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The subject is under consideration, but I am not able to answer the hon. gentleman as to whether there will be a measure introduced for representation during the present session or not. If the extraordinary condition of things existed which the hon. gentleman describes, of course it would be a powerful deterrent against any proposed legislation whatever, but the information which I have received from the country—and I have received a good many letters—does not represent that turbulent and dissatisfied condition which the hon. gentleman has presented to us here to-day. On the contrary, I find that those who are Canadians, who have gone up there with the hope of engaging in mining operations have, on the whole, been fairly successful and are fairly contented with what they have done. A good many men have gone in there for the purpose of living by their wits at the expense of others, for you must remember they are not Canadian or British subjects, and they have not been as successful as they hoped they might be and they are dissatisfied and many of them have left, and more, no doubt, will leave, and except for what they consume they have been of no great advantage to Canada. Those that go there for the purpose of engaging in mining operations are, no doubt, to be encouraged. Many are investing large sums of money. Others are seeking to invest as well large sums of money, and they expect to make their fortunes out of the mines in that country and I am sure that we all hope that they may be successful, but those who go there to establish gambling houses and to live at the expense of the rest of the community, and to fleece the miners when they come in from their mining operations, and who are dissatisfied because the opportunity has not been presented to them, are not persons deserving of the sympathy of this House or the other, or the people of this country, and I am sure that they have been disappointed will not be a source of dissatisfaction to the people of Canada. As to representation, we provided for representation in the local assembly by a Bill carried through this parliament last session. So far, I believe, there has been no action on the part of the people—no expression of opinion—to avail themselves of that provision. I trust they may do so at an early date, but until we have a more settled population in the country we are not likely to have any great demand for political rights or privileges within the territory. You have a great many people going in and remaining there for a season or two, and coming out again, and those people are not specially interested in political representation from the Yukon country. They are looking to the sections of the country in which they have their permanent homes, and so far as the population of the country is concerned, I think about eighty-five per cent of them are not British subjects.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Outlanders.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They are outlanders in a very different sense from what others are Outlanders in the Transvaal country. Whether the hon. gentleman is suggesting that those who are aliens in that country and have gone in, many of them to make a fortune in the way I have intimated, ought to have the rights of the elective franchise conferred on them I do not know.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Certainly, if they become British subjects.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If my hon. friend is in favour of conferring upon them the elective franchise the moment they arrive in the country, his opinions differ from mine.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not go quite as far as my hon. friend on my right. I think he might very properly wait until after the next census. That would be the proper time to consider this great question as to the readjustment of seats and the giving of representation to the Yukon territory: but what I wanted to call the attention of the House to was the state of feeling in that country just now on account of not having had the law, to which the hon. gentleman has referred, brought into operation. It was only last night I was reading an account of a public meeting which was held in Dawson City protesting in the strongest possible manner against the authorities and the manner in which the affairs of the country are carried on. Whose duty it is to proclaim that law I do not know. I regret that I forgot to bring the paper here, as I intended to read portions of it to the House, but the burden of it is this: they have a council at present. The law we placed on the statute-book last session gives the right to British subjects there to elect two representatives to sit at that council. I was somewhat astonished to find in the speeches which were delivered at that meeting that this council, which govern the Yukon Territory at the present moment, sits with closed doors. They refuse to allow anybody within the precincts of their offices. They make laws in secret. One of the judges presides at those meetings and administers the law afterwards. What the meeting protested against most was that the law was not put in force in order that the people could have a representation in the local council, or whatever it is called, and assist in the making of the ordinances or laws necessary for the government of the country; and they complained, very bitterly too, that all that is done like in the days of old in the Star Chamber, with the doors closed, and not a soul allowed to hear the discussions. Whether the attention of the hon. minister has been called to that, I do not know.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a question that I think the Minister of Justice should look into. I will take the liberty, if he has no objection, of sending him a copy of the paper, in order that he may see what the expressions of the people are, and take action in the matter. These are not expressions, from the names and statement made by the editor of the paper, of what may be called outlanders, or people who come in there for the purpose of fleecing those who have made money, but of men who have an actual bona fide stake in the country. Some of them have been living there for years and have made money and there are professional men who are taking an interest in what they consider is for the benefit of the country. Whether it is the duty of the Minister of Justice to proclaim that Act, I do not know. If it is, he should take action at once in order that the people may have an opportunity of electing those two representatives, who must be British subjects, in order that they may assist in making the laws which are to govern them. After that will come the suggestion made by my hon. friend as to representation in parliament. There are other portions of these gold bearing regions of the Dominion which require consideration as much as that. When we look at the present district of Yale and the large population that is flowing into Atlin and Rossland and that part of the country, that will all have to be considered too, I would suggest to my hon. friend not to push the motion for the inquiry——

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is only a question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Until we have the census, and then they will be able to deal with the matter. We know we shall have the Representation Bill before us to-morrow, or very early, and the minister may make some suggestion about the representation of Klondike, Atlin and Rossland districts, but I do impress upon him the necessity of taking action in the line I have indicated in order that the people may be pacified. I think they would be satisfied if they had that law put in force. I throw out the suggestion to my hon. friend, and I hope he will take it in the spirit in which it is offered, and I hope my hon. friend from Halifax may not say it is made from political motives.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am astonished at the statement of the Minister of Justice that the legislation of last session has not been put into operation with regard to the Yukon council. I might say that it does not rest at all with the people of that district to call that machinery into action, but rather with the Governor in council, and if there has been any remissness in that regard it has been entirely owing to the government not having taken the necessary steps to do so. In the legislation which was passed last session, it was provided that Governor in council, under the Privy Seal, might appoint and constitute such persons as are contemplated by the Act, and that the council should pass ordinances and make provisions for the election by the public of representatives of that council, and consequently until the Governor in council acts in that direction, it must be manifest to the House that the people of the Yukon district are certainly not in default in availing themselves of the rights under the Act passed last session. With reference to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) as to the two districts alluded to, Atlin and Rossland, those districts are in the province of British Columbia, and additional representation could not be given to those districts until the census of 1901 is taken ; but the Yukon Territory is in an entirely different position, as well as the North-west Territories. They do not in any sense come within the provision of the British North America Act so far as the application of the census is concerned. The parliament at any time can legislate with reference to giving additional representation to any parts of the territories. We cannot impress too strongly upon the government the necessity, in my judgment, at a very early stage in the opening up of new territory of giving representation to citizens of the Dominion, or people who may become naturalized British subjects, who may settle in those particular districts. It seems to me that, if, in the early days, previous to 1885 in the North-west Territories, when the government had to confront all the serious difficulties connected with the rebellion of that period, if those territories had enjoyed representation in the councils of the Dominion, I very much doubt indeed if that rebellion would have arisen. It is very well known that in the history of every country, particularly during the initial stages of development, difficulties are bound to arise, owing to the incompetency, possibly, of government officials, owing to their not appreciating the questions that arise in reference to legislation and a proper recognition of the rights of the people that lead to interminable difficulties, difficulties which cannot possibly be forgotten for many years. I might say that many of the difficulties to which attention has been directed as existing in the Yukon country are largely attributable to the fact that the cabinet are not at all aware of the existing difficulties in that country. Whence do the government receive their advice as to the condition of affairs in that country ? Mainly from their own officers, mainly from those who are prepared to give them servile following and to offer up incense at their shrine continually. It is not from the independent citizen or those helping to develop the country that they seek advice. It is from their hirelings in that country, and it is natural that those officials, be they hirelings or otherwise, look at the administration of public affairs or the administration of governmental machinery. from the standpoint from which they themselves administer it. I cast no reflections upon these officials at all, but it is manifest that if the government will seek advice with reference to the difficulties which exist in that country from their own servants, from those who are charged with the administration of public affairs in that country, they must necessarily receive only a one-sided view, and must necessarily stultify themselves if they represent to their government that it is necessary to enlarge the rights of the people, or to enlarge those avenues through which the public can find free expression in regard to the abuses and grievances which exist. It must be apparent to every one that a public officer in exposing grievances would be stultifying himself, because the first question of the government would be : Why do you not so administer the law that you will prevent any feeling on the part of the people that they are becoming the victims of abuses and grievances ? That has been the history of the opening up of any new country. History is repeating itself in regard to the advisability of the government giving an early representation in the councils of the nation to the citizens of every new territory, so that the government may have a free and independent expression of opinion upon the floors of parliament as to the public necessities in those particular places. The longer I have lived in that western country, the more I have come in contact with frontier life, the deeper my conviction has become as to the expediency of the government giving proper representation in parliament to the people, and it seems to me that this government can easily obviate many of the difficulties which to-day are confronting them by giving proper representation to that new country, a country invested with great wealth, as has been pointed out by my hon. friend, and which only can receive proper attention at the hands of the government by its representatives being on the floor of parliament.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know that I differ very much from my hon. friend on the subject of representation. I think in the territorial legislatures that are created for the local government of the country it is well, at a very early day, to introduce representatives elected by the people for the settlers who have come into the country. That was the provision made in the Bill last year. The administration of that Bill is not with the Department of Justice, but with the Department of the Interior, and that department, I think, put itself into communication with the country at a very early date after our session closed. My hon. friend knows it was almost autumn before parliament prorogued last year, and before that Bill became law. I am not aware whether, up to this moment, any communication has been received from that country. My hon. friend knows the facilities for communication are not good, and the time occupied for transmission is great, and the information which the Department of the Interior has received up to the present time, I am not in a position at the present moment to say, but I entirely agree with him that it is most desirable at a very early day, to have representatives elected sitting in council and the deliberations ought to be public. But when they sit in an executive capacity a different view should prevail.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—When I heard the leader of the House make a statement this afternoon giving an account of the correspondence which he had had with various people in the Yukon district in which he painted that country in rosy colours, who assured him they were doing very well under the conditions in which they lived, it is quite apparent to me, as it is apparent to the hon. gentleman from Calgary, that the correspondence which the Minister has had has been undoubtedly with a class of people who are sympathizers with his own party who have gone to that country, some of them actuated by nothing more than a desire to make fortunes for themselves, but the great majority of them fortified with letters and recommendations from ministers which, when they landed in that country, would serve to give them pointers and place them on the inside track. The correspondence alluded to differs from the correspondence I have had with men who are in that country now, and the same correspondence has come into the hands of other hon. gentlemen in this House, and it leads me to an entirely different view to that expressed in those letters of the heelers and hangers-on who have obtained positions in the Klondike. I have had scores of letters which intimate to me that not one-tenth of all the corruption and all the rascality and all the mismanagement existing in that country has ever filtered through down to this point, that if they ever had an opportunity such as Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper asked for in the House of Commons of giving evidence before a Judicial Commission, there would have been such an exposure of rascality that neither the Minister of the Interior nor the government could have faced it. We know that the parties who would have given that evidence are afraid, because nearly all of them have interests up there which one turn of the screw would probably deprive them of, and they are afraid to come out and give evidence. They are not going to travel thousands of miles to give evidence, or to correspond with the leader of the House or people of that kind, because they know they will not get relief in that way; but they correspond with others, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that if he thinks he correctly understands the opinion of people in the Yukon district, he is mistaken.

There are people there who are perfectly satisfied with the conditions that exist and who are getting on fairly well, and probably more than fairly well, but those are the people who have been sent up there with the whisky permits. At Oak Lake, twenty miles from where I reside, some parties were given a permit. They took in a large quantity of whisky and a number of dance girls, and cleared one hundred thousand dollars. They came back and divided the money with prominent people there. I know an instance in Brandon where a gentleman was given an opportunity of going out there with a permit in advance, when the permits were going to be stopped, and he started two days before they stopped giving the permits. He landed under an assumed name in Dawson with his cargo of liquor, and when he got there he was the only one who was allowed to remain. All the rest of the liquor cargoes in transit were not allowed to be taken in. He came down with his sole consignment and cleared about twenty thousand dollars and is proud to say so to-day. He is building a block in Brandon, which is commonly called the Whisky Block. That is only one instance. There are others who are sharing in the profits. He has to divvy up with others as well, and I know from my own experience that these liquor permits are being issued and sold in Vancouver and Seattle, and the parties are getting a rake-off from those who have the whisky permits. They receive a permit and it is taken away and peddled in the United States cities, and they make their profits out of it. I do not wonder that these people write to the minister that they are fairly well satisfied. The hon. gentleman says that the only people complaining are those who are living by their wits—the people who have gone in there and started gambling houses. He does not understand it. Who are making the most money? It is the gambling houses and these places that are fostered by the government. They are the people doing the best business in that place. I think a country like that is entitled to a representative in parliament. But from the reports we get from there of the arduous duties placed upon genuine miners, it seems to me that the population is slipping away, and I do not know whether these gentlemen will not have sucked that country so dry that there will not be enough people to appoint a member to represent it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think this discussion would have been complete without the imaginative speech of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. We had gentlemen who came here to Ottawa some two or three years ago tell us how badly that Yukon country was governed, but I think some of those gentlemen did not find it convenient afterwards to return to Dawson. It was a continual matter of complaint on the part of gentlemen of the Conservative persuasion that Mr. Ogilvie, a man whom everybody respected and trusted and believed in, had not been made commissioner, but that another gentleman, Major Walsh, had been appointed. Mr. Ogilvie was afterwards appointed commissioner, and an investigation was made on the spot. The hon. gentleman from Brandon was quite correct. You could not expect the gentlemen from Dawson to come four thousand miles to give evidence, but they might have stepped into Mr. Ogilvie's office. They all respected and believed him.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Had he the right to take evidence under oath?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, I think so. It is all very fine for hon. gentlemen here, among people who are not familiar with the matter, to make these reckless statements. I do not take what is said by the government speakers or opposition speakers as being absolutely reliable; but I came across a small volume, published by an English mining engineer, who goes into the whole matter of the Yukon with a great deal of care, who talks about the character of the mines, and the prospect of the mines holding out. He also speaks of the way in which the country is administered. These stories about the universal corruption and all that, which you might expect from those United States friends of the Conservative party, was not indulged in at all, but he did say—and I unuerstand that there is a general feeling to that effect—that he thought the rate of royalty was excessive. That gentleman is, as far as I am aware, not interested politically one way or the other. His domicile is not in Canada, and he was apparently only anxious to give information to those who might think of going there for mining purposes. I take it his statements are much more reliable than the statements we have been in the habit of hearing.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—What is the expert's name?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have forgotten his name. I can produce the document. He is an Englishman, and I think a graduate of Oxford.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (59) 'An Act to provide for the expenses of the Canadian volunteers serving Her Majesty in South Africa.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

THE CASE OF COL. WHITE.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Since the case of Col. White was under discussion to-day, I have received the following letters:

Ottawa, February 3, 1900.

The Major General Commanding the Militia.

I am instructed by the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence to call your attention to the fact that in an official communication written by Colonel Foster, under your instructions to Lieut.-Colonel White, that gentleman was informed that the minister's reason for striking his name from the list of those recommended for the staff course at the Royal Military College was that he had of late taken some active part in politics on behalf of the opposition.

I am further instructed to inform you that the reason assigned in this letter for the minister's action is entirely erroneous and misleading, and as the minister understands that Colonel Foster reported to you what actually did take place when the minister struck off Lieut.-Colonel White's name, he cannot understand why you should have attributed to him the reason you assigned. The minister then told Colonel Foster that he struck off Lieut.-Colonel White's name because he was obviously unfit for such an appointment, having only recently been retired from the lieut.-colonelcy of the 30th Battalion on account of his length of service, being too old and maimed.

The minister fails to understand why you should suppress his real reasons for the action he took, and substitute for them a different and incorrect one. He instructs me to express his wish that the letter written under your instructions should be withdrawn, and one written to Colonel White informing him of the true reasons for the minister's action.

(Sgd) L. F. PINAULT, Lt.-Colonel,
Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence.

February 7, 1900.

Sir,—Adverting to previous correspondence in regard to your name being removed from the list of officers selected to undergo the staff college course, I am directed by the Major General Commanding to inform you that the letter in which the reason assigned for the removal of your name was stated to be that 'you had taken an active part in politics on behalf or the opposition,' was sent in error, and is to be considered as withdrawn.

The hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence considered that the course should be restricted to younger men, and in consequence directed the removal of your name.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant.

(Sd.) HUBERT FOSTER, Col.,
Chief Staff Officer.

To Lieut.-Colonel W. W. White,
Guelph, Ont.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The first letter was written to the Major General ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, addressed to the Major General.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there any reply to that from the Major-General ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—None other than the letter to Mr. White.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—When did the government terminate his services ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I could not tell.

Hon Mr. LOUGHEED—Was not it previous to the 3rd February, the date of the letter ?

Hon Mr. SCOTT—No ; that letter is addressed to him 'Commanding the Militia,' so he must have been acting then.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It does not necessarily follow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The letter is written by the Deputy Minister of Militia, L. F. Pinault, to the Major General, and Col. Foster writes to Lieut.-Col. White, as I indicated when I made the remark. I would like to know what answer the Major General gave, or whether he made any answer.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He accepted the information. He made no answer.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If he did not answer it, there must be a reason for it. If he did answer it, we would like to see the letter. Would my hon. friend ask the department whether Major General Hutton made any reply to that letter, and if so, will he kindly put it before the Senate ? I think, in justice to all parties, it should be here.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will inquire about it.

CRIMINAL CODE BILL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to point out that early in the session there was an assurance given to this House that the Criminal Code Amendment Bill would be introduced at an early day in the session. We know that for two or three years back the Senate has given a great deal of attention to the amendment of the criminal laws. We have given a great deal of time to the subject, and last year I think on the whole a Bill was passed in this House fairly satisfactory to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. I know a great deal of attention was given to it, and the result was we thought we were getting a very good Bill indeed. That Bill reached the House of Commons too late to be carried through. It went into the slaughter of the innocents at the close of the session. This year we were promised a Bill on the subject in the address in reply to the speech from the Throne, and my hon. friend told us before the adjournment that he had some little preliminaries to attend to before he would be able to introduce it, but that they would soon be got through, and although he was not ready to bring in the Bill at that time, we would have it at an early day. We are in the seventh week of the session, and we have not seen the Bill yet. If it is put off much longer, we will be going through the same work that we performed last year without any hope of its becoming law, because the Commons will not be able to pay attention to it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think I stated to the House—my hon. friend was absent at the time—that after the Bill was ready and sent to the printers we received a large number of suggestions from the various prosecuting attorneys, and from some of the magistrates and judges interested in the administration of the law, and these I, with some of my officers, had to consider before we sent the Bill to the printers; otherwise the Bill would have been printed and in the hands of hon. gentlemen by the end of the adjournment. All these suggestions and proposals have been very carefully considered, and those which we think ought to be embraced in the law have been so incorporated. I had the Bill here yesterday in galley form, and I handed it to the Law Clerk to have it printed in proper form, and I thought it might be here to-morrow or next day; so that there will, probably, be no trouble on that score, and no very great delay.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, March 21, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at three o'clock.

Prayers and Routine Proceedings.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (K) 'An Act further to amend the Criminal Code of 1892.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.

Bill (L) 'An Act respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company.'—(Mr. Kirchhoffer.)

THE SIZE OF APPLE BARRELS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired:

If it is their intention to introduce a Bill during the present session of parliament in amendment of the Act of last year, relating to the form and size of apple barrels?

He said: Last year, as hon. gentlemen will remember, this parliament passed a measure providing for the uniform size of apple barrels. It was felt when that measure was under discussion here, that there were some doubts as to whether the kind of apple barrels authorized by that Bill would be satisfactory, but as the measure was not to come into force for over twelve months, in fact not until the first of next July, it was felt that no harm could be done by allowing the measure to pass and it would leave it open for further legislation in the meantime. I may say from communications I have had from apple shippers and dealers in the maritime provinces, at least, that there is very strong objection to this barrel. It is said to be three quarts larger than the authorized barrel of the United States, and the feeling I have found to exist among those interested, is that we should adopt a barrel of the same size as that adopted by the United States, and that it is not wise on our part to make our barrel three quarts larger than theirs. That difference in the size would scarcely be appreciable to the eye, and would very likely not result in getting any better price than the smaller barrel, while it would be just so much more taken out of the pockets of our apple growers. A hundred quarts is the size that is settled by the apple dealers at the convention in the United States, and that is the size which regulates trade in the United States and with other countries as well. It was stated that this barrel that was legalized last year would hold 103 quarts, being 3 quarts larger than the United States barrel. I know that the feeling in the part of the province from which I come is, that while it is eminently desirable that we should have a uniform barrel for Canada, it is also desirable, as our apples go side by side, and are sold under the same conditions in the common market, as the United States apples, that we should have the same sized barrel as they have. There is also a very strong feeling that the same uniformity in barrels should extend to other things as well as apples. Take potatoes, for instance. When we are speaking of a barrel, it is desirable that it should mean the same thing all over the continent, if possible.

Hon. Mr. MILLS. The Minister of Inland Revenue has had the subject before him, and the reason for reconsidering the subject was that which has been stated by the hon. gentleman, that the apple barrel of the United States was of a different size from our barrels. There is less difficulty in bringing the apple barrel used in the maritime provinces into conformity with the size of the barrel in the United States, than there would be in other portions of the Dominion. In the province of Ontario, where an immense apple crop is sometimes grown, the most of the growers purchase flour barrels, and it might not be convenient for them to alter the present practice. It is a matter of great convenience to be able to get barrels at any time for this purpose, and the same barrel that is used for the packing and exportation of flour is also used as an apple barrel. What the size of that is, I cannot precisely say, but there may be a difficulty, so far as Ontario is concerned, in adopting the United States size of barrel, if it should be different from that used in the maritime provinces. It might be that the United States barrel is the same size as the flour barrel. As to that, I cannot say.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I asked an explanation from the Minister of Inland Revenue with reference to this subject, and he tells me that the barrel which has been legalized is the one which has been in use in Nova Scotia for several years. It was at the instance of the Nova Scotia apple dealers the barrel was legalized throughout the Dominion. Since that time they have discovered that it is a larger barrel than the United States packers use.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Who gave my hon. friend the information ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Sir Henry Joly, the Minister of Inland Revenue. He told me it was at the instance of the Nova Scotia growers that this particular barrel was legalized. He knew at the time it was a somewhat larger barrel than the ordinary barrel which had been used, which I presume was a flour barrel. It was so much larger in parts and held three quarts more than the ordinary barrel. I understand the subject will be remitted to the Fruit Growers' Association in order that they may decide the question.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—However the mistake has arisen, whether it is a misunderstanding on the part of my hon. friend of what the Minister of Inland Revenue said, or an error of his own. I can assure the hon. gentleman the information is entirely erroneous.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As far as Nova Scotia is concerned ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I can tell him that the barrel used in Nova Scotia is smaller even than the United States barrel, and the Nova Scotia people would be called upon, if the United States barrel is adopted, to abandon their barrel. My hon. friend behind me says the Nova Scotia apples are largely consumed in the London markets, and they are sent to market, up to the present time, in a barrel even smaller than the United States barrel, a rather uncouth barrel, but the character of the apple has been such as to gain for it an excellent reputation, so that even in these smaller barrels Nova Scotia apples are sold at a higher price than other apples in larger barrels from other markets. Uniformity, however, is desirable, and it would be necessary for the people of Nova Scotia to give up their smaller barrel. The barrel legalized last year is larger than the one in Nova Scotia, and larger than the one in the United States.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—How many pounds of apples does one barrel contain more than another. We ought to know that. Why not sell apples by weight ? We might as well as have different sized barrels, but say a barrel shall contain so many pounds weight.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Apples will vary very much in size and weight. I have found that apples which were pressed under precisely the same conditions varied all the way from 147 to 167 pounds—different varieties. Some are very much heavier than others. The railways take 165 pounds as the weight, barrel and all.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—When you ship apples you mark on the head of the barrel what varieties they are. I know one class of apples weighs more than another. Take for instance Kings, Spies, Russets, and Baldwins, they all weigh differently, but you can say a barrel of Baldwins shall weigh so much; a barrel of Kings so much, a barrel of Greenings or a barrel of Russets so much. In that way you would get uniformity all over the country. Otherwise you cannot get it?

BARBED WIRE AND BINDER TWINE FACTORIES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY inquired:

How many manufacturers of binder twine and barb wire were there in Canada prior to the change in the duty on those articles? Also, how many manufacturers are there of each of those articles in Canada now?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have not the information. We have no official information. My hon. friend knows that the information brought down in parliament is information within the control of some department. This is not, but it is a matter of public interest, and I should be pleased to get it for my hon. friend if I can do so.

TRADE AT CAPE NOME.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD, (B.C.) rose to:

Call the attention of the government to the report published in the 'Colonist' newspaper of Victoria, B.C., that the United States government does not intend to declare Cape Nome, in Alaska, a port of entry for the reasons hereinafter set forth; and will inquire if the government will ascertain the opinion of the United States government with respect to this subject:

In reply to the telegram sent Secretary Gage by United States Counsel Smith, inquiring as to whether or not British steamers will be allowed to enter at the nearest port of entry, take on an American customs officer and proceed to Nome to discharge their British consignments, a negative reply has been received, it being explained that through the revival of an almost obselete section of the American shipping law, contained in the Revised Statutes of the United States, vol. 71, such foreign vessels will be compelled to complete their discharging at the port for which they have cleared. St. Michael, 150 miles away, is understood to be the nearest port to which the 'Alpha' or any other British ship may go for the new gold fields, and it is therefore not improbable that this one vessel, at all events, will be disposed of to American citizens.

Another Unfriendly Act.

Treasury Orders Duty Collected on all American Goods Taken North by Canadian Carriers.

Port Townsend, March 10.—Advices from Washington say that the Treasury Department has taken a decided stand relative to shipping American goods via Canadian points into Alaska on British vessels, and has instructed the collector of customs to collect duty on all goods arriving in Alaska on British vessels, even if they are accompanied with export certificates. Many shippers to Alaska obtain export certificates and send their goods to Vancouver and other points, and thence to Alaska in British vessels, thereby working an injury to American vessels. This order will practically debar British vessels from entering the Nome trade in the freight carrying business. It is said that American firms have already contracted with British vessels for the delivery of large consignments of merchandise at Nome, but owing to the ruling of the Treasury Department these contracts will have to be cancelled.

He said: This is a very important matter. If goods are put in British bottoms they have to pay United States duty—even United States goods. I ask the minister to inquire into the matter and see if there is any truth in the report or not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I shall make inquiry and find out anything that can be ascertained. I have seen the announcement to which my hon. friend refers, that there is no officer there, and that this place has not been made a port of entry, so no goods can be landed there.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In making the inquiry, would the hon. gentleman go further and ascertain whether United States goods which are in bond at Victoria or Vancouver can be carried in a British vessel to a United States port in Alaska. I do not well see how they can prevent that, unless they interpret the Coasting Laws to extend that far, that any goods brought by a United States vessel and put in bond in Victoria, and then ex-warehoused, and taken to an Alaskan port in a British bottom would be considered a breach of the coasting laws. I do not see well myself how it could be so interpreted, but I know that in the past in interpreting the coasting laws they have carried that principle to a very great extent. For instance, I have known where an engine was shipped from St. Paul to St. Vincent, carried by the Canadian Pacific Railway to Vancouver or New Westminster. They would not allow that to be transported in a British bottom to Seattle or Tacoma. That is carrying the interpretation of the coasting laws to a very great extent, but I know they have enforced it. I do not see very well how it could be done in the case to which my hon. friend calls attention. It would be well to inquire into that also.

THE DOMINION FRANCHISE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Before proceeding to the Orders of the Day I should like to ask a question of the hon. Minister of Justice if he will permit me to do so without putting a formal notice on the order paper. It will be in the recollection of the minister that when the Franchise Bill was before parliament two years ago, an amendment was moved to the Bill in another place whereby there should be an appeal from the municipal revising authorities to the judiciary. An amendment to that effect was moved by the leader of the opposition in that branch of parliament and was defeated, being opposed by the government. However, the government at the time promised that they would use their influence with the local legislatures to have the laws in those provinces where no such appeal existed brought into harmony with the law as it existed in the province of Ontario, and I am aware they afterwards carried out that promise. They communicated with some of the legislators of the provinces recommending, I think, that the law should be brought into harmony on that question with that of the larger provinces of Ontario and Quebec. When the Bill came before this House. I moved amendments to it similar to those moved in the House of Commons, which passed this body, but were rejected in the House of Commons, and the Bill with the amendment omitted was accepted afterwards by this House. What I wish to know is how that matter stands at the present time. The reasons given by the premiers of the different provinces were that the subject was brought to their notice too late in the session to be attended to, and I think the correspondence contained a promise that at the next session of these legislatures the matter would be taken up and dealt with. I should like to know how this stands at the present moment, and whether there is any probability of the promise given by the government in the House of Commons with regard to using their influence to have the laws brought into harmony on this question is likely to be carried out. I do not know whether my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, is prepared to give any answer to this question. If he is not, I was going to say that I shall be willing to wait until some future occasion when he will be prepared to give an answer, but if he is in a position now to reply, I should like to know how that stands and what probability there is of the laws being amended.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—A communication was addressed by the Prime Minister, I think, to the local governments in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick where this feature of the law which my hon. friend undertook to amend prevails. That communication, I think, was made to some of the ministers orally, who represent in the government here the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, that in speaking to the local ministers upon the subject they said there had never been any complaint there, or any suggestion in either legislature that such appeal should be given, and that until there was some ground of complaint, or some objection made, they did not feel disposed to take the matter up. That is the position in which the question stood, and I dare say my hon. friend will see that it is somewhat difficult to press upon them to amend the law when the answer given is that the electors in the various constituencies, who are our electors also, did not desire any such change to be made, that they were satisfied with the law as it stood, that there had been no practical grievance in the preparation of the voters' list, and that being so, there was no disposition on their part to disturb it. I am speaking now from recollection of the discussion or conversation which took place some months ago.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not think that was the purport of the correspondence—the answer is given.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, not quite.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman why it was that the province of Manitoba, which virtually by attempting to pass resolutions in the House and by a clamour all over the country that the judges should be appointed revising officers, was not asked at the same time as the other provinces who did not want it were asked.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think they have an appeal there.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not an absolute appeal as in the province of Ontario. My hon. friend will agree with me that there is nothing to prevent the party in power to deal with the matter. One party was in power there and they were satisfied with the present law. Another party is in power in Manitoba and if they are not satisfied with the law I have no doubt a change will be made.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I am sure it will. I was not calling attention to what would be done now, but I was asking why the other step was not taken. I know very well what will take place now.

INCOMPLETE RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I call the attention of the hon. Secretary of State to the return which he laid on the table yesterday. It is only from the Customs Department.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The others have come down.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Only a few of them. I will make a memo. of those which have not come down.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The return from the Department of Railways and Canals was brought down, but was rejected because it was not sufficient, and was sent back.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have endeavoured to have it put in the shape my hon. friend desires, but I am quite unable to obtain it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Are we to understand, then, that the Department of Railways declines to give the return ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They said they gave all the information in their power. I think the only omission was in reference to the labouring men, and there was no record kept of their names.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And they were not in the civil service.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It should only apply to those who have some standing in the civil service. My hon. friend is running this question of dismissals into the ground. They could not possibly give the names of labourers who are employed two or three days, or perhaps a month, as track repairers.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My impression is —and I think I am right—that when the return from the Railway Department was submitted, and my hon. friend the leader of the opposition pointed out that it was incomplete and did not comply with the order of the House, the hon. Secretary of State took charge of it and sent it back to the Railway Department, and it is not really in the possession of the House. He agreed that the objection of the hon. leader of the opposition was quite reasonable, and therefore he returned it to the department.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is quite correct. It was never contemplated when I asked for that return that the day labourers should be given, because a break might occur and you might require twenty or thirty men, and when it was repaired they would be sent away. The return speaks for itself. I do not want anything unreasonable.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will make further inquiry about it, and whatever it was, it will be brought down, and we will see what further information can be obtained.

THE REDISTRIBUTION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (13) 'An Act respecting representation in the House of Commons.' He said : In rising to move the second reading of this Bill, I am submitting for the consideration of the House a Bill embracing principles that were accepted by both political parties down to the year 1872, and formally enunciated by the Prime Minister on that occasion, the leader of the Conservative party, as the basis upon which he was proposing the redistribution of seats after the census of 1871. The principle then enunciated was accepted by gentlemen who represented in the House of Commans the views and sentiments of the Liberal party. So that there was no ground of division between the two parties at that time. Both accepted the principles enunciated by English statesmen and upon which a distribution of seats was provided in England for a very long period of time. In 1882 a different rule was adopted, and it is perhaps of some little historical interest to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the reasons for the course that was adopted on that occasion. My hon. friend opposite, and those associated with him at that time, occupying a prominent position in the Conservative party, supporting the views that were put forward, adopted as a fiscal policy of Canada the principle of protection, and in 1878 they won the elections largely upon that ground, perhaps greatly supported in their chances of success by the very great depression that had existed in the commerce and industries of Canada as well as nearly all the rest of Christendom at that period. Hon. gentlemen know right well that the promises made on that occasion were not quite consistent with each other, and it was not easy to reconcile the views put forward by various prominent members of the Conservative party with each other. Not long after that, the enthusiasm in favour of the principles of protection began to wane. There had not been the large sums brought to Canada from abroad for investment that were promised, the expectations that were held out were not realized, and there was in many parts of the country not a little disappointment. Before the period for which the parliament of 1878 was elected had expired, the hon. leader of the government on that occasion advised His Excellency Lord Lorne, that it was important to dissolve parliament and appeal to the country to know whether the country was prepared still to stand by the principle of protection, because there were thousands of people abroad with millions of money anxious to come to this country for the purpose of investing it in industrial enterprises, but who do not wish to invest their money in this country until they knew whether the tariff which the government had adopted in 1879 was likely to be permanent or not, and so the appeal made to the country was ostensibly for the purpose of ascertaining whether the mind of the electorate of Canada was the same in 1882 that it had been in 1878. But I wish to remind hon. gentlemen that the government of that day did not wholly rely upon the confidence that the electorate had in the policy that had been adopted. They felt that it was necessary to strengthen the position of the government, to give them a greater chance of success than they would have under the condition of things that existed, and with the constituencies as they existed before 1878, and so they undertook to alter the boundaries of constituencies in a way that was in fact revolutionary, in a way wholly inconsistent with those principles of parliamentary government, and with that theory which had been recognized for a long period of time in the United Kingdom, and with the doctrine that had been enunciated by Sir John Macdonald himself in 1872. A fundamental principle under the English parliamentary system is that the boundaries of counties shall not be broken in the formation of constituencies, that they shall be preserved intact, and that when any electoral district is formed, or a riding, its electors shall consist of those who have been in the habit of acting together for various other purposes connected with the affairs of the country. In fact, under the English parliamentary system they recognized the principle of social organism. They admit that the nation is a thing of organic growth, that it is not a mere artificial contrivance that can be cut or carved as it may please politicians and representatives in parliament, that you begin with the family as a unit, and you have the titheing and the hundred and the county and the kingdom, and so we here, in forming a confederation, never intended that we should separate the provinces wholly from the Dominion. The townships, the villages, the counties, the provinces are all a unit, an integral part, the one of the other, and so the province in like manner is an integral part of the Dominion. If the Dominion is obliged to go back and beneath the province, it finds the county just as the province finds it, and it finds the other municipalities as they are found by the province. They are inseparable parts of each other, and if you undertake to disregard county organizations and other organizations, you are undertaking to construct or base the Dominion upon a condition of things that the province has not recognized. In other words, you are undertaking to ignore the existence of the province and the municipalities in Dominion affairs. That was not the intention, and it was pointed out by Sir John Macdonald, in the speech which he made in 1872 in discussing this subject that if you were to cut off a township from one riding or county and attach it to another and different county, you may take the very best man of the constituency, a most promising man, who may not yet have appeared in public life, and put him into a constituency where he is personally unacquainted, where the community know nothing about him, or his fitness, and you destroy his opportunities, the legitimate ambition which he may properly have, and deprive the country of the advantage it would derive from affording him the legitimate opportunity which he may rightfully claim. As he pointed out then, in the Dominion of Canada, and especially in the province of Ontario, you have municipal bodies, you have your township councillors sitting in the county council. They become acquainted with each other's capacity and ability. You have them meeting together as jurymen in the administration of justice. You have them meeting together in agricultural societies and in the promotion of the various interests which the communities possess. In this way they form a body of organic growth, and when you come to create constituencies returning members of parliament, you give to each man the legitimate opportunity which he may fairly claim of obtaining that position and status as a public man to which he is entitled. I say that we departed from that principle in 1882. What was the reason given? If any hon. gentleman will turn back to the discussion in the House of Commons that occurred on that occasion, he will see that the reason given was, not that there had been any mistake in the principle adopted in 1872, but that Sir Oliver Mowat, in forming the constituencies for the province of Ontario for the return of members to the local legislature, had disregarded it, and had gerrymandered the constituencies, and that the government of the Dominion were justified in adopting the same policy—that he had been interfering in the formation of the constituencies—that he had established boundaries to the disadvantage of the Conservative party in the returning of members to the legislature, and that the government of Canada were justified in doing the same sort of thing for the return of members to sit in the House of Commons. Now, I am not going into any discussion on the present occasion as to how far that was a correct statement. It is not necessary that I should do so. If it were true, and I think it is an exaggerated statement—but if it were true, that would be a reason for undertaking to agitate the province of Ontario against that injustice and to appeal to the sense of justice and fair-play of the people of the country to rectify the wrong which had been done, and not to further lower the moral tone of the country by degrading the parliament of Canada to the same level of policy, in this regard, that the local legislature of Ontario were accused of having attempted in respect to the return of members to the local legislature. I think I am not misstating the facts historically when I say that several gentlemen had a map prepared—members of the government with the assent of their colleague for the province of Ontario—in which there was marked in every municipality the vote that had been recorded at the elections of 1874, and that vote was largely against the Conservative party. A large majority was returned at that election to the House of Commons in favour of Mr. Mackenzie's administration. Now, there was marked on that map the vote and the problem which these hon. gentlemen proposed to themselves—and their names have been given to me—was how can we divide the province of Ontario, with a vote which was the most unfavourable to us that has occurred in recent years, so as with that vote to give us a majority of the constituencies of the province? That, I understand, was the proposition, and so to work out that with a free hand it was necessary to disregard county boundaries altogether. I say that that measure was most unjust. It was one that was greatly against the interests of this country. It was one which destroyed the feeling that the contest between political parties ought to be open and manly warfare. It was an attempt to secure, regardless of the public opinion of the country, a majority of the seats in parliament, no matter what might be the current of that public opinion. That was done. The measure has been sometimes defended on the ground that the proposal was one based upon the principle of representation by population. I say now, as I said here a year ago, there is no foundation whatever for that statement. It is utterly at variance with the facts. There is not the slightest regard to the principle of representation by population in what was done. If the principle of population were to have been adopted as the paramount consideration, and the boundaries of counties were to be disregarded, you would need to begin at some point, say the Detroit River, and when you had an equality in any one of the constituencies—they required to be about twenty one thousand at that time—that you were to stop at that point and then begin another constituency; but so far from that being so, you find that there were some constituencies with eight or ten thousand more residents than were required for the representation the county received. When you come to the county of Kent as it was formed, you find that their representation was about 12,000 more than was entitled to a member, and where that was the case it necessarily followed that there must be a number of constituencies the population of which was far below the unit entitled to return a member to parliament. Now, I say that that is absurd. It is at variance with the facts? It is not honest to pretend that population had anything to do with the manner in which the province was carved up on that occasion. The paramount consideration was not population, but party, and how the division could be made so as to give one party, no matter what might be the political feeling in respect to it, a majority in parliament, to load the dice, to assure it success, no matter what the political feeling of the country might be. No, I say that that principle was one utterly at variance with the principles of British parliamentary government. It was far more in accordance with those principles which prevail in some of the South American Republics, and it would be impossible to maintain a high and manly tone in public life in this country if such methods of warfare are to be recognized. A great wrong has been done. That wrong has been perpetuated for a long series of years, and we are proposing at this moment that the wrong should come to an end. It has been sometimes said, and I should consider that matter more at length in a moment, that we take the census every ten years, and last year several hon. gentlemen in this House, among them the hon. member from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) maintained that it was illegal to undertake the redistribution of seats except immediately after the taking of the census. I think that the position will hardly be seriously maintained, to-day. There can be no doubt whatever of the plenary authority of parliament in this regard. We could change the representation every year if we thought necessary, but we cannot change the proportions within the ten years between the different provinces of the Dominion that are settled by the census. Let me suppose this state of things: supposing you had a legislature returned here, partisan in its feeling, so strongly partisan that in order to secure an ascendancy in the province of Quebec, it undertook to divide that province in such a way as to enable the English speaking minority to return a decided majority to parliament. Supposing they were to divide the French constituencies of the province of Quebec to give them twenty representatives, and to give to the English speaking population of the province forty-five representatives, they would have the legal power to do so. Let me suppose that the legislature was so strongly anti-French and partisan in its feeling that it would undertake to adopt a measure of that sort and did adopt it, and it became law, would any hon. gentleman seriously argue that when public sentiment cooled down, and after a new election under a fairer state of public feeling a majority was returned disposed to do justice between the different sections, of the country, that because you had one redistribution in ten years you could not rectify the wrong and make a fair redistribution of the constituencies in the province of Quebec? Will any hon. gentleman say that is so? Does he think that this parliament should be precluded from correcting a wrong of that sort, simply because the previous parliament, after a census had been taken, had so misused their power or authority? I am sure no hon. gentleman will so argue, and so the question that we have before us to-day is not a question whether the census is going to be taken next year, or the year after, or whether the distribution will be made in 1902 or not? If the census shows that a different number of members should be allotted to the different provinces from the number now prevailing, of course there should be a redistribution.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—A re-adjustment?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—A re-adjustment. I accept the hon. gentleman's phrase. It is more accurate. My opinion is that we ought to disturb the constituencies in re-adjustment as little as possible. In 1882 we altered the boundaries of 55 constituencies in order to give the province of Ontario four additional seats. That at least was a most improper proceeding, but apart from that altogether, if this principle of cutting and carving and gerrymandering the counties, disregarding county boundaries, is wrong, as I maintain it is, and as every Liberal has maintained throughout the province of Ontario, and I believe throughout the Dominion of Canada since the time that the injustice was perpetrated, we have a right to correct that wrong, no matter whether we are within two years of the taking of the census and another readjustment, or whether we are eight years away.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I think there is no doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think there is no doubt of it either, and while there is no doubt about the justice and the constitutionality of the course neither is there any doubt as to its expediency. All we have to establish is that the principle is wrong, and that we have a mandate from the people of this country to restore the principle that was recognized from the time the confederation was formed until 1882. This was one of the questions that was discussed in every parliament from 1882 to 1896. There was no parliament in which there was not a resolution on the subject proposed. In our conventions we discussed the questions. It was an issue in the elections, and it was such an issue as any other one of those which hon. gentlemen refer to when they say we have given pledges which we have not redeemed. This is one of the pledges, and it is one that we are undertaking to redeem, and one of the pledges that the electors of Canada, as the political sovereignty of the country, have returned us to parliament for the purpose of redeeming. That being so, it is important to consider what is the position of this House upon that question. I say that this House has the power of rejecting this measure, as it has the power of rejecting every other measure which we propose to submit to it, but the power to do a thing and the constitutional right to do anything are entirely different, and I say this House has not the constitutional right to reject this measure, because the people of this country, at the general election in which this was an issue, have returned a majority to the House of Commons for the purpose of carrying out that principle and giving it the effect of law. The principle that governs this House is precisely the same as that which governs the House of Lords in respect to matters of this sort. The House of Lords claimed an unrestrained power in respect to the subject of representation prior to 1831. In the elections of 1832, immediately after the rejection of the Reform Bill, Earl Grey, who was the Prime Minister on that occasion, proposed the appointment of a sufficient number of peers for the purpose of carrying the measure in the House of Lords, or giving to the friends of the measure a majority. The political sovereignty of the country, the electorate, had pronounced in favour of it. The representatives in parliament had given a similar pronouncement. The advisers of the Crown held that view and took the responsibility of submitting a measure of that sort to parliament. Now, in order to avoid the policy of appointing a sufficient number of peers to enable them to carry the measure, a certain number withdrew from the House of Lords and permitted the measure to be carried by a majority, and from that date the rule adopted in the House of Lords has been, where a question has been an issue in the country and the majority have pronounced in its favour or an administration is returned who are prepared to take it up and sustain it, is to accept the principle of the measure.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—What about the precedent of 1884—Gladstone's Bill ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon friend refer to the Redistribution Bill ?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Both the Redistribution and the Franchise Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The principle was not departed from. On the contrary, the principle was recognized, but the opposition said 'we will postpone the measure, not vote against it or reject it, until you bring down your Redistribution Bill.'

Hon. Mr. MILLER—' Satisfactory to us.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They proposed a Bill for the extension of the electoral franchise, but they wanted the Redistribution Bill to be submitted along with it, because they were entitled to have both before them and the one, the opposition maintained, could not well be considered without the other.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—But did not Gladstone's government promise a satisfactory Redistribution Bill would be submitted, and was not a satisfactory Redistribution Bill submitted ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—A Redistribution Bill satisfactory to the men who returned them to parliament. I should like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the speech of Disraeli at the time in the House of Commons, when Gladstone opposed the abolition of the established church in Ireland. That was near the end of parliament. Disraeli said 'public opinion has not been expressed on this ; you are proposing an amendment to the constitution. You are proposing to do a thing which, if done, cannot be undone, and therefore the electorate of the country ought to be heard upon a question of this sort,' and Gladstone agreed with that view. He agreed that no measure should be introduced beyond adopting the resolution which committed the party who supported it to the abolition of church and state connection. He admitted they ought not to go further until there was an election held.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—On that specific question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, on all the questions that were before the country, and on all those questions there is an opinion expressed, because we have not adopted the principle of the plebiscite in public elections. We do not submit a single question for the purpose of ascertaining the views of the country. It is the entire policy of the party that is submitted, and if that party is returned to power, the House must assume that they have a mandate to deal with all the questions embraced in the policy of the party. That is as clear as noon day. It is the principle recognized in England, and that principle has been adhered to ever since. I say that the government went to the country on that question, but not on that question alone. There were a number of other questions involved. They were all dealt with by the Gladstone government, and the House of Lords proposed no amendment directed against the principle of any one of their measures. Reforms were proposed ; changes were proposed that it was held would emasculate some of those measures and diminish their utility, but there was not an amendment proposed which pointed directly against the principle of a Bill upon which the public opinion of the country had been pronounced. What is the recognized doctrine of modern times ? It is that the electorate are the political sovereignty of the country.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There was an appeal made to the electorate in 1896. That appeal embraced the adoption of the franchise as it existed in the different provinces. That was accepted and has become law. It was supported in this House, not on the ground that my hon. friend, or others who agreed with him, approved of the principle of that measure, but on the ground that they, as senators, were prepared to acquiesce in a settlement which had been expressed by the electorate of the country who must finally determine what shall be accepted and what shall not. There would be no object in an appeal—there would be no point in an appeal if, after the appeal had been made, the majority in this House had the constitutional right to reject the proposition after it had been approved of by the people. That being so, this House is constitutionally bound to give effect to the principle that the county boundaries shall be respected, and that the divisions in the ridings where divisions are required shall be made in conformity with those boundaries. That is the position, and this House, I have no hesitation in saying, will be direlict in its constitutional duty if it rejects this measure. We go a long way in this measure in proposing that, after having adopted the doctrine that is recognized in England as to what we ought and ought not to declare, we leave to certain judges the power of making the redistribution. What is the reason in England of adopting the principle of referring this to commissioners, in many cases surveyors, men qualified to carry out the object and aim of parliament ? When a county has to be divided in England, the first thing to be considered is what portion of its population are a borough population, who, although residing outside of the town or city limit, are nevertheless a city population ; and they are included along with the population of the borough. That is one duty to be discharged. It is a matter of following a principle which is well understood, and then there is the division of counties into ridings. In that country there is far less necessity for appealing to any outside body than there is here, because there is no particular fact that requires outside interference —there is no fact better known to the commission than to the House of Commons. Nevertheless, the government of Canada, knowing that their conduct in making a division would be open to criticism, and that charges of partisanship might be made, content themselves with these declarations and provisions which are recognized in the English practice ; that is, they declare the number of representatives to which a county is entitled, and leave it to three judges to say what the division of that county shall be. They have not left—they could not leave it, having any regard to the law, to the judges to say how many representatives there shall be. We recognize in a subordinate way—in a way that the constitution intended, in the way that was recognized when confederation was first established—the principle of representation by population. And so you say that a county with a large population shall have, where the population is sufficient to entitle it to an additional member, the largest representation. You say, as far as you can, from the census provided, what number of representatives shall be given to each county, and when a division comes to be made you leave to this outside body the power of making the division. This is the rule which is recognized in the British North America Act. I shall not pursue the subject further. I am content with stating the general principle of the Bill, of its having been an issue in the elections of 1896, of its having received popular sanction, and I ask this House not to stand in the way of having the wishes of the people in this regard carried into effect.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Is this an exact copy of the Bill that we had before us last year, or have any changes been made ?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is not an exact copy of the Bill but a copy of the Bill as amended.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The clause relating to St. John has been dropped and the clause dealing with Toronto has been amended.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is a copy of the Bill as it came up to us.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—No, St. John is dropped ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I thought that was dropped in the House of Commons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We have had the usual academic display from the hon. gentleman and the annual lecture upon the constitution repeated, that we have on all occasions of this kind. I confess that I have that speech pretty nearly by heart. I have heard it a great many times, and every time the hon. gentleman repeats it, the better he makes it. By the time the regular redistribution takes place in 1902, he will have it so perfect that we will all know, not only what to expect, but how to enjoy it when we hear him deliver it. Because it is always well in any person who has a speech or a lecture to deliver that he should have it by heart ; when he has it by heart it comes more freely, and it is enforced with greater power. I congratulate my hon. friend on his reiteration of the speech he has delivered so often.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I remember once, when we were both in the other House, and I was criticising some of the acts of his with reference to the affairs of the Department of the Interior, in which I called attention to the fact that on a number of papers which came under my hand, I found the initials ' No, D. M.,' and the same thing comes up here. The hon. gentleman has delivered a speech not only with force and emphasis but containing a good deal of information and a good deal of assumption, and if it would not be considered improper, I would put presumption with it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The presumption is yours.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He has told us all that was done by the parliament of 1874, and there I think he was in error. He did not mean 1874, because the Conservatives party were not in power.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said 1872. I mentioned '74 with reference to the number of votes that had been recorded for my hon. friend's party.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What we have to do with just now is the Bill before us, and it was not my intention to discuss at any length the merits of the Bill or the reasons which induced the Senate to reject it last year. The reasons are fresh in the minds of the people. The position he has taken as to the constitutional right to change and amend the Bill was not disputed by the Senate when it passed the resolution rejecting the measure. Hence the fifteen or twenty minutes devoted to that point was quite unnecessary. It was predicated, however, on the position take by one or two members of the Senate who differed from the hon. gentleman on that question, and I might say that when my hon. friend from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) assumed that position, he did it upon the opinion of just as eminent lawyers as there are in this Dominion, and who entertain the same opinion to-day. However, that was not the opinion we then affirmed, nor do we propose on that ground to deal with the question now. My view of the matter is simply this; the government had nothing ready, they had no Bills prepared, and when they were asked if they had anything for the consideration of the House of Commons they reintroduced the old Bill which had been rejected by the Senate last year, and that the introducing of it was for the purpose of giving them time to prepare whatever they had to submit to parliament. The hon. gentleman has devoted a good deal of time to impressing upon the minds of senators the iniquity of the Bill of 1882. He has told us that some person had a map prepared in order to show what votes were cast in different constituencies. Well, supposing they had—I am not prepared to deny that they had—supposing that the redistribution is submitted with the county boundaries to the judges as they propose to do, will it not be necessary for those judges to have some authoritative map before them to enable them to come to some conclusion as to the proper division, and should not that map contain a statement of the population in each constituency and county, if they desire to come to any conclusion as to the proper representation by population or the equality of representation in the constituencies. My hon. friend says that is a crime. I do not deny that such a map was in existence and I do not deny that I have that map in my possession now, and it would enable me at any time, looking at that map, to ascertain not only the extent of each county, but the population in each township. But the hon. gentleman goes further: he says: As to the opinions held justly and to a very great extent naturally in these townships, any one who desires to deal intelligently with a question of this kind, would necessarily have just such information before him; but he says it was all done for political purposes, and they pledged themselves at the last election that they would destroy that redistribution and adopt the system of county boundaries. That may be what they said in the constituencies, and what probably they intended to do, but I venture the statement that no constituency had the slightest idea that that redistribution was to take place until after the census of 1901, nor would they contemplate anything of that kind. That is the position that the Senate has assumed before, and I think are prepared to assume now. What are the facts? I hesitate not to pronounce this Bill an abortion; that is, if it be based upon the ground that the representation should be confined to county boundaries. My hon. friend has told us as they told us in the House of Commons, that county boundaries were necessary in order to keep us within the constitution of the country. To my mind, adherence to county boundaries is an absurdity, so far as it refers to representation in the House of Commons. If it has been the principle of the Liberal party throughout the whole country that county boundaries should be strictly adhered to, why in the name of common sense has not the province of Ontario adhered to it? Take the county of Cardwell, which is composed of two or three townships. Take the constituency which the hon. Minister of Education represents to-day; that is composed of two or three counties, and not confined at all to county boundaries. The Minister of Education in the province of Ontario sits in a riding which is made up of three counties, a portion of the county of Lincoln, a portion of the county of Welland, and a portion of the county of Haldimand. Take the county of Cardwell in the province of Ontario. That riding was composed of two counties, portions of Simcoe and Peel. I merely call attention to these facts to show that the fundamental principles of the Liberal party have not been carried out in a province where they have had a majority for over twenty years. The fact is, they have done in the province of Ontario precisely what my hon. friend proposes to do here—carve out, and so arrange the constituencies as to wipe out of existence the Conservative party so far as they can possibly do it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And yet I suppose we ought to approach these things with a great deal of fear and trembling, considering the threats that have been thrown out to us. In order to intensify what I have said in reference to the object which this Bill has in view, all you have to do is to cast your mind back a very short time, and look at the speech made by the hon. Mr. Tarte, the master of the administration, when he was in Brantford a year or so ago. He said that they had secured the province of Quebec, and just as soon as they had an opportunity of changing the constituencies in Ontario, they would 'take the life out of the Conservative party.' I am quite prepared to allow the electors of the province of Ontario to decide as to how far they propose to allow Mr. Tarte to take the life or the life-blood out of them.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I think he used the word 'squeeze.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I have the exact quotation—'take the life out of them.' We find the Hon. Mr. Paterson, the Minister of Customs, telling them in the debates :

> Now that we have the power in our hands, we propose to act.

That is to take the life out of the Conservative party in Ontario. We may go a little further, and find that Mr. Heyd, the successor of Mr. Paterson for Brant, uses this very moderate language :

> My own opinion is that the government are altogether too honest in dealing with our friends on the other side. If I had the power that the present government will receive from the people when they once more appeal to them, it would not require thirty Grits to assist gentlemen opposite in filling that side of the House, because there would only be a Grit House here.

The threat is clear enough. But that is not all. Take the Hon. Mr. Davies. He held out dire threats as to what would be the consequence if we dared, under any circumstances, to interfere with this Bill. But then I am not frightened, I must confess, at any threat which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries makes. I have heard of a good many threats he made to the electors of Prince Edward Island but a few months ago, in which he told them that if they did not vote in a certain way and return certain members to the local legislature, the probabilities were that the government of which he was a member would not build a railway for which they had taken an appropriation, and in order to induce them to vote, he held out other promises. But the honest people of Prince Edward Island in these two constituencies paid very little attention to the threats of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries and rejected both his candidates, one of them being the Attorney General of the province.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What have these interesting facts to do with the Bill before the House ?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am speaking of the threats the Minister of Marine and Fisheries made in reference to what is to become of this House if we reject this Bill, and I am saying at the same time—and if the hon. gentleman had paid any attention he would have understood what I have said—that his threats were of very little avail, that even the people in his own province, and that too, in a gerrymandered county, a division in the province of Prince Edward Island, rejected his candidate notwithstanding the threat he made to deprive them of rights to which this parliament said they were entitled. That is a point I am desiring to make, and I hope it is sufficiently plain to my hon. friend, however disagreeable it may be to him. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries in dealing with this question in the House of Commons used the following language :

> Are they going at all times to submit to the dictation of the Chamber which does not either directly or indirectly represent the people of Canada? Is the voice of the people of Canada to be for ever silenced by the vote of a Chamber which is utterly irresponsible? If a Bill embodying these just principles is persistently thrown out by reason of party principle, then some other method must be resorted to for obtaining the rights of the people. But, Sir, if the Conservative party, with a majority in the other Chamber, determine that the intervention of the judges shall not be permitted, then this House of Commons will have to take the matter into their own hands and make the division themselves.

I am quite willing that the people should decide as to whether this House has done its duty to the country, and in the interests of the people, notwithstanding the covert threats of the hon. gentleman to whom I have referred. Now, does this Bill carry out the principle my hon. friend has, with so much ability and eloquence, advocated? Let me ask him the question, is he of the same mind as to the necessity of representation in the whole of Ontario as that which he held in 1882, when he discussed this question, or has he, like his colleagues, changed his opinions? If he holds the same views that he uttered then, he should have applied the Bill to the whole of the province of Ontario, and not confined it to the western section, in which they expect to obtain political advantages by interfering with the divisions. I will read an extract from the speeech of the hon. Minister of Justice, delivered in 1892, upon this question. But before doing so, let me point out to the House that they have taken the western section of the province of Ontario and declared that the representation shall be re-adjusted in accordance with the county lines, but in the eastern portion of the province they have not interfered with any of the constituencies below the county of York. Why is that? During the whole discussion upon this question, both in the press and by public men—and no man was more eloquent or delivered himself oftener than the hon. Minister of Justice upon the iniquities that were perpetrated upon the people of Ontario, because the representation of the people of the eastern section of Ontario, on account of the inequality of the representation below the city of Toronto, or the county of Ontario, and yet to-day that which they have been condemning for ten or fifteen years they have not touched. If there were better evidence of the correctness of the Redistribution Bill of 1882, it is the fact that they have not interfered with that which for twelve or fourteen years they had been constantly through the public press and in parliament condemning. The hon. Minister of Justice, then in the House of Commons, at page 1871 of Hansard, volume two, 1892, spoke as follows:

> It is only necessary to look at the census to see that the portion of the province of Ontario which lies west of Toronto is under-represented at the present time, and the portion which lies to the east, between the Ottawa and the St. Lawrence rivers, and the eastern portion of Lake Ontario, is over-represented; but the hon. gentleman and his colleagues have taken away the two members from the district which is already under-represented, and have left that section of the province which is at the present time and has been all along, over-represented, having in this House a representation out of proportion to the numbers which its population would warrant, just as it is.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman says 'hear, hear.' Let me finish the quotation:

> Why that is done is perfectly obvious to every member of this House, and will be perfectly obvious to every citizen of the province of Ontario.

Now, could any one suppose that utterances of that kind, to which my hon. friend cries 'hear, hear,' approving of his utterances of 1892, that he would come down with a Bill to correct what he says are errors, improprieties and iniquities, and never touch that part of the province at all, leaving it precisely as it was readjusted in 1892 by the Conservative party? But he deals with the whole western section of Ontario—not the whole of it, but that section a little west of Toronto, and from which they expect to gain some advantages. The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do why it was necessary to readjust that portion, or certain portions of the province of Ontario. It was in order to give additional representation to sections of Ontario not then represented in the Commons; and if you confined the readjustment to county boundaries, you would necessarily have to deprive those growing portions of Ontario, what is now familiarly known as New Ontario, of representation in the Commons altogether. The district of Algoma is nearly as large as the whole of the other portions of the province of Ontario. The construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was the means of settling it and adding to the population, what is termed now the Nipissing District, extending over a large area of country; large numbers of inhabitants were being brought from the United States by clergymen and settled in that portion of the country. It had increased numerically so much that they were entitled to a representation, and the only means of giving it to them, was by dividing up the south-western portion of Ontario, and depriving that section of one representative in order to give it to the district of Nipissing. And what did the Conservatives do in that case? Did they deprive a Grit constituency of its representative in order to accomplish this purpose? The constituency that was wiped out of existence was represented, and has been for years represented in parliament by a Conservative. Run the mind back from the time of the first redistribution, and every single constituency in the province of Ontario that was deprived of a representative, either for the purpose of giving the representation to another section which was more largely populated, or for the purpose of wiping out small boroughs, was represented by a Conservative. Cornwall has always been represented by a Conservative. That was wiped out of existence and attached to the county. Niagara had always been represented by a Conservative, but was wiped out and attached to Lincoln. Monck, the last one that was wiped out of existence and deprived of its member, had been represented by a Conservative. Yet the hon. gentleman tells us that everything that has been done by the Conservative party in the readjusting of the representation of Ontario in the House of Commons has been to deprive the Liberal party of its just rights in that part of the Dominion. There never was a baser slander uttered against the Conservative party than declarations of that kind, as facts and history will show. I am not going to weary the House with the speech I delivered in 1892, which will be found in the Debates, which established beyond a doubt the incorrectness of the statement made by the Minister of Justice as to population.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was perfectly correct, and we can establish it, I believe.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In the redistribution of the constituencies in that section of the country, population was the basis upon which it was made, and it is the principle upon which the party, now represented by hon. gentlemen, nearly drove this country into rebellion, because the Conservatives at one time would not and did not accept it. But, just as it is to their interests and their purpose to ignore every profession of principle which they uttered in the past, they are quite as willing to swallow this as they have swallowed every promise they have made. The Hon. Mr. Mills, then a member of the House of Commons, at page 3268, volume 2, of Hansard, the same year said:

> In the readjustment of the representation in the province of Ontario the proper course, whatever system might have been adopted, would have been to have withdrawn representation from that section of the province which is over-represented, and to have conferred the representation obtained in this way upon those sections of the province that are inadequately represented, but that is not done by this Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I might apply that argument to the present Bill. The hon. gentleman says 'hear, hear.' He condemned the Conservative party because they did not interfere to any extent, except to equalize the population in the eastern section of the country. He reiterates that, and approves of that now, by saying 'hear, hear,' and yet, strange to say, he has a Bill before us in which he has not touched that point of the country at all. He leaves it precisely as we left it—the best compliment he can possibly pay to the action of the Conservative party in 1892. The Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright spoke very strongly upon this point also, and after pointing out the over-representation of the eastern group of counties, said:

> On every principle that can be conceived, whether you have regard to the convenience of uniting one or more counties together, whether you have regard to the distribution of the population, whether you have regard to the wealth and tax-paying qualities of the population, on every conceivable principle, any members that it may be necessary to give the central group in order to afford it such representation as it may be entitled to should, if you disturb the representation at all, in all fairness and justice, be taken from the eastern group, whose population is at present nearly 20 per cent below the figure required to entitle it to its present representation, and not take it from the western group, which at present has barely the representation to which its poplation entitles it, taken collectively.

He said further:

> I find, on examination, that out of the thirty-five constituencies which now return representatives to this House east of Toronto, thirty return supporters of the government, and five members of the opposition. I turn to the other side of the picture, and I find that out of the western section of Ontario, which to-day returns fifty-one members, the Liberals hold twenty-seven seats. Need I say more to explain to my hon. friends or explain to the people of western Ontario why it has been found absolutely indispensable to cut and carve the boundary lines of half a dozen constituencies in western Ontario, while not a finger is held up to touch a constituency east of Toronto, with the single exception of Russell and Prescott.

Here is another strong condemnation of the division which took place in reference to the eastern portion of Ontario, and yet Sir Richard Cartwright, being in the government to-day, and as well as my hon. friend who, we have every reason to believe, prepared this Bill, has not one word to say about it. Why, because at the present moment this iniquitous inequality which they have pointed out, in the last elections, returned a majority supporting the hon. gentleman. If the representation of these constituencies, the boundary lines of which they condemn so strongly, had returned Conservatives, as they did at the time Sir Richard Cartwright made that speech, you would have found that tinkered with and interfered with the same as the others, but they do not dare to do it now, because, if they do, it will result in disaster to themselves. Take the city of Ottawa. The city embraces the former village of New Edinburgh and the former suburb of Rochesterville. New Edinburgh has a large Conservative majority. For electoral purposes it is within the county of Russell. The county of Russell is sufficiently Liberal to overbalance the majority that would be given by the Conservatives in New Edinburgh. Hence, it is not added to Ottawa, because it would be sure, with the other suburb to which I have referred, to return two Conservatives for the city. Rochesterville belongs, for electoral purposes, to the county of Carleton. Carleton, with its large population, could very well spare Rochesterville, but it is sufficiently strong in Conservatism to elect a Conservative. Attach that to Ottawa, and it would make Ottawa beyond a doubt strongly Conservative. They have not touched it, and why? I leave you to draw your own inferences. I could go on and show in other cases, such as Frontenac and Addington, where one part of the county is attached to the other, but they are at present partially represented by gentlemen who support the present government, and, consequently, are not interfered with. Then, take the cities. In Toronto they take the suburb of Parkdale, which, for electoral purposes, belongs to West York, and attach it to Toronto. They take it out of Mr. Wallace's constituency in order to carry out the boundary line principle, and make West York a Grit constituency, so that Mr. Wallace may be defeated. Then, there is the suburb of Yorkville, which belongs, for electoral purposes, to East York, a constituency which gives Mr. Maclean a large Conservative majority. They detach it from East York and add it, for electoral purposes, to the city of Toronto, hoping to defeat any Conservative who would run in East York. Then, they destroy the present mode of representing the city of Toronto by dividing it into five divisions, each to elect a representative, in the hope that they may catch one, or, perhaps, two of them. Why have they not applied the same principle to the city of Ottawa? The city of Toronto was not gerrymandered. Nobody interfered with it. Parkdale became a suburb; Yorkville became a suburb from the settlement that took place owing to the manufacturing industries and the terminus of the railway station to the north. Parkdale has belonged always to West, and Yorkville to East York, but there was a political advantage to be obtained, and, ergo, they took Parkdale and Yorkville out of the two constituencies to which I have referred and attached them to the city of Toronto, with the hope of securing an advantage. It was absolutely necessary, they say, in order to secure a proper representation of the people, to divide the city into five constituencies. Why they have not divided Hamilton, or Ottawa, or Halifax, each of which returns two members, has yet to be explained. They proposed to interfere with the city of St. John, in the province of New Brunswick, and give the county, with 14,000, a representative, and the city of St. John, with 39,000, two members. I am using, now, Mr. Ellis's figures, which I have under my hand. As soon as Mr. Ellis, a supporter of the government, pointed out to them that he would have to vote against it, because it was neither fair play nor British justice, they came down, like Davy Crockett's coon. All he had to do was to point the gun and down came the coon. If that was iniquitous, and the iniquity was pointed out to them, and they receded from their position, why did they not do it in the case of other constituencies? Simply because those who objected to the wrong that was to be perpetrated belonged to the Conservative party. There never was, to my mind, a grosser and more palpable exhibition of partyism exhibited than there is in this change in the representation. It is not my desire or intention to occupy the time of the House at any length in further discussion. There were a great many things said by the hon. gentleman in his speech to which I might take serious objection, but I want to point out this fact: In 1874, the hon. gentleman's party went to the electors and were sustained by a very large majority. About five years of the administration of the affairs of this country convinced the people that a change was necessary if the country was to prosper, and a change took place on the same basis of representation as before. In 1896, the hon. gentlemen went to the electors of this country and were sustained by a large majority, and now hold power. They have a majority in the province of Ontario, a majority derived from the constituencies which they say were so iniquitously changed and manipulated in the interests of the Conservative party. More than that, they hold power, as far as Ontario is concerned, with a minority of the votes——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, with a minority of the votes cast, so that, if the divisions were such as to give the full majority of the votes cast in 1896 to the Conservative party, they would not have a majority of representatives from the province of Ontario, but would be in a minority? I do not say that they would not be in power, because Quebec gave them such an overwhelming majority as would have sustained them independent of the province of Ontario. I have no objection, particularly to their redistributing the seats. I think it is within their province to do so, providing they carry the next election, and after the decennial census has been taken. The doctrine laid down by my hon. friend for the guidance of the House of Lords is in some respects correct, and in some, not correct. Take Gladstone. He went to the people the last time principally on the question of Home Rule for Ireland.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Solely.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The House of Lords did not object to the Home Rule Bill on the ground that it had not been submitted to the people, but because Gladstone, on behalf of the Home Rulers, refused positively to define or give any explanation as to the manner in which Home Rule was to be conceded to Ireland. His ministry was returned by a large majority, but just as soon as he brought down the details of the measure, the House of Lords rejected it, and they rejected it upon the ground that the people, when they voted for Gladstone, mainly on the question of Home Rule, were not aware of the principle on which it was to be carried out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is mistaken.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I am not mistaken. I have not studied the constitution as closely as my hon. friend has, but I keep myself tolerably well posted on political events, and I repeat, that the ground on which the House of Lords rejected that Home Rule Bill was because the details of the measure had not been submitted to the people, and they made this statement, that if the people had known what the principles of the Bill were, and the terms upon which it was to be conceded, they would never have returned Gladstone to power. Then, parliament was again dissolved, and they went to the people, and the position taken by the House of Lords was sustained by the largest majority that any Imperial cabinet has had during the last century. I point this out to show the fallacy of the statements made by my hon. friend, that the House of Lords has acted always in accord with the principles he has laid down. I do not hesitate to say that had the people returned to power Gladstone and his party, knowing what the principles of the Home Rule Bill were, the House of Lords would have acceded to it at once. I am quite satisfied when the hon. gentlemen go to the people, if they are returned again, and have under the law the readjustment of the constituencies, if they have to give Ontario an additional one or two representatives, taking the unit as it is laid down in the constitutional Act, they will have to distribute the constituencies in some way or other to accomplish that, unless New Ontario has become sufficiently populous and important to give that district representation without interfering with the others. There are many cases in history to which I might call the attention of the Senate with reference to the action of the House of Lords, and the Senate occupy today, in a minor degree, a position similar to that of the House of Lords. The hon. gentleman says that one of the pledges of his party was to respect county boundaries. I need not repeat, I look upon it as a mere fiction—a matter of no consequence whatever in the distribution of seats for the House of Commons. If the people did affirm it, that was one of the minor issues, if it was an issue at all. I have no recollection of it being made an issue, but if it was, the people thought at the time and voted in accordance with the opinion that the readjustment would take place after the census had been taken. The hon. gentleman started out by saying that we had the constitutional right to reject this measure as we thought proper. He wound up his speech by declaring that we had no constitutional right.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The hon. gentleman said we had the constitutional power, but not the constitutional right.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There may be a difference, but it is so slight that I am quite incapable of comprehending what the hon. gentleman means by having the constitutional power but not the constitutional right.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Crown has the constitutional power to pardon everybody that is now in penitentiary, but the Crown has not the constitutional right to do it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There is no analogy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Crown also has the right to declare war, but will my hon. friend say that Her Majesty has no such constitutional power? That may be predicted on the fact that she has no power to carry on war unless the House of Commons vote the supplies. The people have power over the Crown in that respect. If we have the constitutional power we have the constitutional right, and if we have not the constitutional right the sooner the power is taken from us the better; but just so long as we have the power to do it under the constitution, we propose, if we can, to exercise the right in accordance with our judgment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You could reject every Bill on that theory that is proposed to the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is altogether too abstruse in his constitutional theories for the ordinary mind. We have the right and power, I admit, to reject every Bill, and if every Bill was of the character of the one which is now before us, which does not carry out the principle which the hon. gentleman has been advocating for years, but is in direct contradiction to his own views uttered over and over again, we would be justified in rejecting them. When I say we, I mean the majority of the Senate, and if they entertain the same opinion of this Bill that I believe they do, they will do what my hon. friend from Richmond suggests. My hon. friend gave as an illustration the course pursued by the government with reference to the Franchise Act. Certain amendments made to the Bill in the Senate were rejected, and certain amendments were accepted by the lower House, and we pointed out that we thought it essential to a free franchise and a correct voters' list that there should be an appeal to the judges. The Premier pledged himself to take certain action in connection with that. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice did precisely the same thing in the Senate. He said if the Premier has promised what the hon. gentlemen opposite has said, I will assist in carrying it out. I then read the pledge made by the then Hon. Mr. Laurier, and when I asked about it the next session, not a single step had been taken to carry out that pledge. They have failed also to carry out other pledges with regard to the franchise. One pledge which was continually advocated by my hon. friend opposite, was that we should adopt the provincial franchises intact. Have they done so?

An. hon. GENTLEMAN—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who said 'Yes?' The man who said that has never studied the question. The franchise that existed in the province of Nova Scotia for the local legislature, the franchise that exists in Prince Edward Island, and in British Columbia, are not the franchises upon which the voters' lists are made up for the Dominion elections. They are changed in three or four instances, one, quite properly, because it gives the franchise to certain of Her Majesty's subjects of which they were deprived by the local legislature. But it sustains the position I have taken; what I have said is, the government have not carried out their pledges in that respect. They did not dare to do it. They had to depart from it to a certain extent, and where they did depart from it, they departed in the right direction. The reason which induced the Senate to reject this Bill last year is intensified this year. We said in our resolution last year that the constitution makes it imperative on the government of the day to re-adjust the representation after the decennial census. It was pointed out that the power was given to the local legislature to re-adjust the constituencies whenever they pleased, and if it ever had been intended by the fathers of confederation that the constituencies should be gerrymandered or tinkered with, or interfered with, during the period between the times at which the census should be taken, it would have said so. My hon. friend knows that at the first Quebec conference the redistribution of seats and re-adjustment of constituencies was to be left to the provincial legislature, but after mature deliberation that power was taken from them, leaving the power only to deal with the constituencies of their own provinces. Now, that was done for a purpose. It was done, I have no doubt, for the purpose of depriving the provincial governments from jeopardizing the interests of the people in different sections of the country. My hon. friend says that the question of representation by population is only applicable as between the provinces, taking the unit of Quebec, but that this is not to be applied to all the rest of the country. I should like to know whether there is any good reason why that principle should be adopted for provinces in dealing with matters affecting the whole Dominion, and not matters affecting the individual province?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No government has ever applied it to the divisions of a province.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What principle?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The principle of representation by population. Your constituencies have varied from 50,000 to 9,000.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has a habit of interjecting something different from what the speaker has in his mind's eye at the time he is presenting his argument. The point I want to make is, if the principle of representation by population is to be applied and is proper as applied to provinces, why is it not equally proper as applied to constituencies?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I say you never have applied it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I say we did, so far as it was practicable to do it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, no. I can tell the hon. gentleman——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I can tell the hon. gentleman that I know whereof I speak. There were exceptions. The Muskoka District was given a representation when it had only about 8,000 inhabitants. Why did we do that? The matter was fully discussed at the time. It was done on the same principle that you give to Nipissing District a representation, and before ten years rolled round the Muskoka district had from 18,000 to 20,000, and has to-day more than its full quota, because it was then being opened up by the Ontario government by free grants, and people were pouring in, and it was known before the next decennial census could possibly be taken that that county would have more than its quota of population, and so it has been with the others. Let me put this question to my hon. friend: Is not the county of Vaudreuil just as much interested in what takes place here as the county of Glengarry adjacent to it? Would not the legislation of this dominion affect that portion of the province of Quebec just as much as it does the province of Ontario, and if it was thought necessary that the province of Ontario, having the largest population, should have a larger representation in parliament than the province of Quebec, with a small population, why should not we carry the principle further and say that the city of Toronto, having 200,000, should have a representation on the basis of the unit of the province of Quebec? The principle is precisely the same. If we were dealing with municipal matters and matters of roads and bridges, then I could understand the argument of the hon. gentleman, and his logic in advocating boundary lines which apply to counties. Now, we deal with something of a larger character. We deal with the question of protection, for instance, and it matters not whether a man gives his vote in one county, or township or another, when that question is placed before him. These being the facts, and believing sincerely that the constitution never contemplated what the hon. gentleman suggests, and believing further that it is not in the interests of this country that the Bill before the House should be passed, but that the matter should be left until after the next census is taken, my own opinion is that the Senate should do with this Bill what they did with the other. The hon. gentleman says, 'Let us leave this question to the judges.' That is a fiction. What do they do? They say, 'You must take the county boundaries and then you must divide the county in such a manner for representation.' Why does he not go further? I gave utterance to this opinion last session when we were discussing this question. I do not go quite so far as Sir Charles Tupper does in his amendment, but it is infinitely better than the one the hon. gentleman has proposed, because after the census is taken it deprives any party or any government of the right to interfere with the re-adjustment of the constituencies. It says this—You take the judges, not selected by the ministry of the day, but the chief justices, no matter who they may be, and in Ontario that would place the adjustment of the constituencies in the hands of the chief justices, a majority of whom are Liberals. I have every confidence in the chief justices. I would leave it in their hands as readily as I would in the hands of Conservatives, because I believe they would do justice. But the hon. gentleman goes further; he says, adhere to county boundaries—that I have no particular love for—with a view to the population of each constituency. That is the principle that I should like to see adopted, even if you stick to county boundaries. It is not new to me. The hon. gentleman knows I advocated it last year. There is another evidence of the facility with which these gentlemen change their views and opinions.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman has changed his.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In what respect?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—About this very matter. The hon. gentleman did not act on his view of last year during the eighteen years he was in power.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have not changed my views at all; it is the hon. gentleman who has changed his views. When this question of submitting the redistribution to the judges in 1892 was before the House of Commons my hon. friend knows that his leader denounced the principle.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The leader accepted it, and my hon. friend rejected it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He did nothing of the kind, and neither did I. Will the hon. gentleman look at Hansard. Here is what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said in 1892.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We had a division in 1892, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier voted with us.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not surprised at it, because he is constantly voting one way and preaching another. Then Mr. Laurier and Sir John Macdonald agreed on the point.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Sir John was dead.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not at the time I am speaking of. He was dead in 1892. This is the language of Mr. Laurier when this question was up before. He said :

The suggestion has been made that the duty of redistribution should be referred to a commission of judges specially appointed; in other words, that parliament should divest itself of its power in this most important particular.

Sir, I am bound to say at once that this is a proposition which my friends and I would not favour either upon this or any other subject.

I am bound to say that we would not entrust to any this duty and privilege which properly belongs to parliament.

Moreover, this proposition implies a singular want of confidence in parliamentary institutions.

It implies that in a matter of this kind the majority would never be able to rise above the low temptations of strengthening themselves at the expense of their opponents.—' Hansard,' 1892, p. 312.

Sir John Macdonald took precisely the same view in this discussion. He was a very great stickler for the rights and privileges of parliament, and was opposed in every instance to delegating the power of parliament and the responsibilities of responsible government to judges or to any one else. My hon. friend will remember he took that view when Mr. Blake proposed his measure for referring disputed constitutional questions, particularly the Manitoba school question, to the court. Sir John objected at the time, but after reflection, he used this language, that upon reading carefully the amendment which was proposed by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Blake), he found that it left the power in the hands of the executive of the day, and did not deprive the responsible advisers of the Crown of that responsibility which rested upon them, and that they would have the power, notwithstanding the decisions of the judges of the court, to deal with complicated questions of that kind and take the responsibility. I give that as an illustration to show the tenacity with which the Hon. Sir John Macdonald adhered to what he believed to be the correct principle of responsible government. He agreed with Mr. Laurier when he uttered those sentiments, and now, the other day, the hon. gentleman complimented Sir Charles Tupper on the position he has taken, and while complimenting him he voted against his amendment. Mr. Laurier spoke as follows :

I have to congratulate the House that at last the opposition have come to a better understanding of the principle which we maintained in 1882, and again in 1892, that a redistribution should be made by a judicial authority.

These hon. gentlemen took issue with us. They would not hear anything of the kind. They insisted in 1882 that the redistribution, instead of being made by judicial authority, should be made by the authority of parliament, and they said the same thing in 1892.

You have the utterances of the present Premier in 1882, and you have him complimenting Sir Charles Tupper and the Conservative party upon enunciating a principle which he says they adhered to and advocated in 1882, and which the extract which I read from the speech proved he condemned. I am not surprised at my hon. friend saying he made a speech one way and voted another. There is scarcely a question which arises affecting the public weal in which the Premier and those surrounding him, fail to perpetrate the same act. My hon. friend condemned in the strongest language he could pick out of the dictionary the distribution of this eastern section of Ontario, and yet to-day he does not touch it. He has the power, but yet, like his leader, I suppose he has changed his views. I am firmly of the conviction that the action of the Senate at the last session of parliament with reference to this Bill is the same course that should be pursued at the present time, and if there are a sufficient number of members in this Senate holding the same view as myself, they will vote that way. I therefore move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Ferguson :

That the bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Before the motion is put, I wish to say a word ; Sir John Macdonald, in discussing the dismissal of Mr. Letellier, as Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, said that he did not question that the Lieutenant-Governor had the power to dismiss his ministers, but that he did question the constitutional right to dismiss them.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I admit there are cases where a constitutional power may exist without a constitutional right. The case quoted by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, when he interrupted the leader of the opposition was that of the Crown possessing many constitutional powers without constitutional rights. I said that that case bore no analogy to the constitutional right of parliament and the constitutional power of parliament, and I will explain to the House why I said so. It is well known that the constitution of Great Britain is not a written, but an unwritten constitution. Many prerogatives of the Crown which existed years ago, and many constitutional rights of the Crown which were acted upon many years ago, have during modern times been curtailed and limited by usage and precedent, which under the British constitution has the force of written laws. With us, therefore, I say there are many cases where the Crown has a constitutional power where, however, it has lost the constitutional right by usage and precedent established during this century.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—But take the parliament of Canada; can there exist a case where a constitutional power is given to the parliament of Canada where no written restriction is placed upon that constitutional power, that that power does not exist in its fullest force and vigour? In our constitution there are many proofs of what I say, because there are some constitutional powers possessed by the House of Commons which are expressly in the British North America Act taken away from the Senate. I will give one instance alone which will do to illustrate my argument at the present moment. We have not the power to initiate in this House money bills. Why? Because it is expressly taken away from us by the British North America Act, our constitutional charter, but wherever any constitutional power is given by the British North America Act and it is not limited by that Act, I contend that that power exists in its fullest force and vigour, and there is no analogy between such a constitutional power to legislate as was attempted to be set up by my hon. friend in quoting the instance of the prerogatives of the Crown. I think the point is so clear that there cannot be the slightest difference of opinion with regard to it, and I can only attribute it to what is justifiable in controversy between members of the House that my hon. friend would use such an illustration, because my hon. friend has too profound a knowledge of constitutional law not to know better. Although I take the liberty of differing with him, perhaps no man in this House has a higher opinion of his knowledge of constitutional law, but in this and many other cases, he uses the privileges and perhaps the rights of controversy to adduce an illustration which he knows will not bear the test of reason or of argument.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, March 22, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE DUTY ON PETROLEUM.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I have presented several petitions, largely signed, asking to have the duty taken off petroleum. I have been asked to read this petition, which I shall now do:

Humbly showeth: That your petitioners necessarily import and use large quantities of petroleum and the products thereof: that the persons directly connected with the Standard Oil Company, of New York, U.S.A., and other persons and corporations affiliating with it, did during the summer of 1898 obtain control of the oil refining industry in Canada; that the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and other railway companies operating in Canada did, on October 1, 1898, advance the freight rates on petroleum and the products thereof from 50 to 100 per cent to your petitioners and other persons not connected with the Standard Oil Company, but did not advance freight rates in the same manner to the Standard Oil Company and persons and corporations affiliating with it;

That to illustrate the freight discriminations, your petitioners submit the following: The Grand Trunk Railwway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and others, are charging the Standard Oil Company and persons and corporations affiliating with it, 25 cents per hundred pounds from Sarnia, Ont., to Montreal, Que., whereas the said railway companies are charging independent importers and shippers not connected with the Standard Oil Company, 35 cents per hundred pounds from Suspension Bridge to Montreal, notwithstanding the fact that the distance from Sarnia to Montreal is seventy-seven miles more than from Suspension Bridge to Montreal. To many other points in the province of Quebec and elsewhere, the discrimination is far greater;

That the Standard Oil Company, or persons and corporations affiliating with it have formed a trust or combination, and have unduly enhanced the price of petroleum and the products thereof in Canada at the expense of your petitioners and many others, whereby your petitioners have suffered great loss and find it impossible to continue their various lines of business as before, particularly in such branches of their business where they use large quantities of petroleum and its products;

That your petitioners submit that if the very heavy duty now imposed on petroleum and the products thereof were removed, the Standard Oil Company and persons and corporations affiliating with it could no longer continue to exact such enormous and unreasonable profits from your petitioners and the people of Canada generally;

That your petitioners submit that the petroleum industry in Canada to-day is no longer what might be called a Canadian or home industry, because it is controlled and manipulated by the Standard Oil Company of New York, and persons and corporations affiliating with it, and millions of dollars are to-day being unlawfully extracted from your petitioners and the people in general of this Dominion for the sole benefit of the Standard Oil Company and persons and corporations affiliating with it;

That it is the firm conviction of your petitioners that unless some measure of relief is afforded by your hon. Senate, in parliament assembled, your petitioners and the whole Dominion will suffer;

Wherefore, your petitioners humbly pray that your hon. Senate, in parliament assembled, may be pleased to take the foregoing representations into consideration with a view to abolishing the existing customs on petroleum and the products thereof, so that the combination now existing may be broken, and your petitioners be enabled to purchase petroleum and its products at reasonable prices;

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c., &c.

THE PARIS EXPOSITION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired :

1. If the Hon. J. Israel Tarte, Minister of Public Works, has been entrusted by the government with any duties on behalf of Canada at the Paris Exposition ? If so, what are these duties ?

2. Is the selection of persons to act as assistants to Mr. Tarte made directly by him or by the Governor in Council, or by the provincial governments?

3. Will all the provinces be represented on the staff of assistants at the said exposition?

4. Has Henry J. Pineau, member-elect of the legislature of Prince Edward Island, been assigned any duty at Paris in connection with the said exposition?

5. If so, was he nominated for such service by the provincial Premier or any of his colleagues, or any member or Senator representing the province of Prince Edward Island in parliament? If so, by whom?

6. What remuneration is he to receive, either under the heads per diem allowance for services, or as living or travelling expenses? And how long will his employment continue?

7. What are the names of all other persons employed in connection with the said exposition?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The chief officer of Paris exposition on the part of Canada is Lord Strathcona ; he will receive no compensation. The Chief Commissioner is the Hon. Israel Tarte, who was appointed on the 13th of March, 1900, without salary.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is a bad date.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The selection of the officers connected with the exposition is made by the Canadian board of commissioners of which the Hon. Sydney Fisher, Commissioner of Agriculture, is Chairman. The various officers are Doctor G. M. Dawson, no salary, receives a living allowance in Canada of $3.50, and in Paris of $5.00 per day.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Which question is the hon. gentleman answering now ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am answering the question by whom are the selections made. They are not made by Mr. Tarte. None of the provinces are represented, so far as I know, in the organization. I do not find Mr. Pineau's name upon the list that I have, and so I assume that he has not been appointed. Of course if he is not acting he has not been assigned any duty. The provincial governments have nominated no person, so far as I know, certainly not any one connected with the representation of the Dominion. I am not aware that Mr. Pineau is to receive any remuneration, because I am not aware that he is appointed. The names of those appointed to the Paris International exhibition, are :

Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal, High Commissioner for Canada ; Hon. Jos. I. Tarte, M.P., Chief Commissioner, appointed 13th March, 1900. No salary. Canadian board of Commissioners : Hon. Sdyney Fisher, M.P., Minister of Agriculture, chairman.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Are we to understand they are all salaried except those who are mentioned as having no salary ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They are not salaried, except the two secretaries. The others receive living allowances only. They receive a living allowance of $3.50 in Canada in connection with the exhibition, and $5 a day in Paris. Otherwise there is no compensation except to the two secretaries, as I have stated.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend cannot have failed to observe that one question has not been answered. In fact, I think two of them have not been answered, but one in particular. I asked my hon. friend if Henry J. Pineau, member-elect of the legislature of Prince Edward Island, had been assigned any duty at Paris in connection with the exposition.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I told my hon. friend, I believe he is not appointed, and therefore all the other questions depending on that disappear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend will allow me to say the way I understood him to answer the question. He said that he did not see Pineau's name on the list before him, and therefore concluded he was not appointed. I submit that is not an answer. Mr. Pineau's name had no right to be on the list given in answer to question seven. It was in the power of the hon. gentleman to learn whether Pineau had been appointed or not. If he is not appointed it is easy to say so. It is not sufficient for my hon. friend to say because he does not find Pineau's name on some list that he is not appointed. The question is specific,—has he been appointed ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not look at the answers placed in my hand until I came here, but I asked for a statement of all the officers who had been appointed, and I had this statement from the Department of Agriculture,—not from the minister, but from the officers of his department. I have also in my hand the statement of the minister himself, as reported in the Citizen, this morning, which he informed me is correct, in which I did not find the name of the gentleman about whom the hon. senator is making inquiry, and as his name is on neither list, I think the conclusion is fair that he has not been appointed at all. I am asked specifically the particular question which the hon. gentleman has put. I think it is pretty clear that Mr. Pineau, of whom he makes inquiry, is not an officer connected with the Paris exposition.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If the hon. gentleman will allow me to say it, I cannot help coming to the conclusion that all this is an attempt to evade an answer to the question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman has no right to say so, under the rules of this House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have a right to say so, if I choose, and I am in my right to say so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman has no right to draw an inference which means that some member of the administration is acting dishonestly towards him.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have a perfect right to say that my hon. friend, or any other member of the government, is evading my question, and I submit my hon. friend is long enough a member of this House to know that I am perfectly within my right to say so. Here is a plain question, to which yes or no can be said.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I submit, as a matter of order, if the hon. gentleman is not satisfied with the reply to his question, I told him what I was ready to do—he may put another question, but I do not think the hon. gentleman is entitled to rise and make a speech as a commentary upon the answer I have given.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend knows the practice of the House has permitted these commentaries, and I must tell him I decline to put another question on the paper, because I have already put one which he must either answer or refuse to answer. It is not enough to say that because he does not find the name of Pineau on the list, he draws the conclusion that he has not been appointed. We can all draw a conclusion. The question is: has Henry J. Pineau, member elect of the legislature of Prince Edward Island, been assigned any duty at Paris in connection with the said exposition? I have reason to know that he has been so assigned, and therefore I have spoken, and I have used the word evasion with regard to the reply which I have received. I have good reason to know that Pineau has been assigned some duty—that he has been spirited away out of this country in order to affect the standing of the government in the provincial legislature in the province of Prince Edward Island—that this man has been elected by the people of that province since the last general election, and that he has been approached and spirited away under the cover of doing service for the government at the Paris exhibition. That is a plain statement, and it becomes my hon. friend and the government he represents in this House, to answer this question, and not to say he draws some conclusion from some document.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am quite at sea as to one part of the answer of the hon. minister. I think he stated, in speaking of the salary or allowances given those people, that they would be given $3.50 a day while in Canada, and $5, I think, while in Paris; but between Canada and Paris there is a long distance. What will be the allowance then?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman is at sea.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to know what will be the salary between those two places. Supposing one of the parties stops over in England and spends a month in London, what will be the salary? Will the Parisian salary or the Canadian salary be allowed? I think the answer of the hon. minister is not complete.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the hon. gentleman puts his question, I shall answer it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The practice has been to pay the per diem allowance from the time an officer leaves here until he reaches his destination. Sometimes they have to be allowed something at sea, but, as a rule, the passage money covers the expenditure for board and allowance on sea. If in London, I presume the Paris per diem allowance will be paid. That has been the practice in the past, and there is no reason to depart from it now. I do not think the allowance they make these gentlemen and ladies while they are away, is any too much, if I may be permitted to express that opinion. As to the salaries, I do not know anything about that.

I want to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to the very serious statement made by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield. He says that he has reason to know that a certain gentleman who had been lately elected in opposition to the government of Prince Edward Island, had been appointed, or promised an appointment, to perform some duties for the government in Paris, and he went further, and made the serious statement that this newly-elected member had been spirited away. That means, if I can draw any conclusion from it, that he has been spirited away by those who have been instrumental in having him appointed to the position which he is supposed to hold, in order to affect the stability of the government of one of the provinces. The hon. Minister of Justice did not indicate any intention of replying to that charge, that the government had seduced a member who had just been elected to oppose the local government, and whose vote in the island legislature would, in all probability, turn out the government.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Would certainly turn it out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Some one made him an offer—in other words, purchased him and sent him out of the country to remain away until after the legislature has met and adjourned, and the government remain in power with one of a majority, or with the casting vote of the Speaker, as the case may be. If that be true, it is a very serious charge against the administration, or some member of it or some one who acted on their behalf.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Do you not think it would be well to ascertain whether it is true or not, before making such a charge in the House, here?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend (Mr. Ferguson) said he knows it to be true, and I am only repeating what he said. I know nothing about it. I am repeating the charge he deliberately made in this House on his own responsibility as a member of the Senate, and I take it for granted he knows his position here as well as any of us, and he knows not only the difficulty, but the very unenviable position in which he would place himself in making a statement of that kind unless he knew it was true.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You ought to have a committee to inquire.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There should be a clause in the Criminal Code to punish people who traffic in giving offices in that way. I know that the principle has been acted on that 'business is business'; if this is business, it is a very serious business, and one which affects the reputation of the government and of every man connected with it, and certainly is a charge which should be met fairly and squarely by a direct denial or admission.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I thoroughly understand the language of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I tried to be plain.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And sometimes offensive and insulting also.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, neither one nor the other. There is no gentleman in this House who is more offensive than yourself—no one who rises and contradicts gentlemen with more pertinacity than you do.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman is out of order: he has no right to refer to any gentleman personally in this House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— I admit it and apologize for it; but you should not have set the example.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the intention of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson) is to make a charge against the government, let him do so, but he has put a question. The hon. gentleman makes a statement which, if true, seriously affects the Minister of Agriculture and the local government of the province of Prince Edward Island. If he knows it to be true, then let him bring forward his proposition. Let him call for an inquiry. Let him be prepared to make a declaration. But that is not what the hon. gentleman has done. He has put a question here to obtain information with regard to a matter on which he professes to have all the information at the present moment that will enable him to make an affirmative declaration. Then the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition gets up, and assumes that to be true, and makes a certain number of offensive declarations with regard to the government. Whether this statement were true or false, I say I have seen this party's name for the first time in the hon. gentleman's question. I know nothing about his appointment to office, if he were appointed. I say here that the answer given to me does not contain the name of this man, and as I put the question before my colleagues which the hon. gentleman put, I assume that if this party had been appointed his name would have appeared in the list of officers appointed. Then the hon. gentleman gets up and says we are trafficking in officers.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I say that is not the fact, and what is more, if the hon. gentleman thought that, he ought to have formulated that into a charge against the administration, and not skulk behind a question. It is a course of discussion that is unworthy the hon. gentleman when he rises in this House aud makes offensive and insulting references to the administration in that way. That is not the way to carry on discussions in this House, or elsewhere. I wish to maintain friendly intercourse with the hon. gentlemen opposite, but when an hon. gentleman rises and practically says 'you are a thief and a robber,' and makes every conceivable charge that can be made against a citizen, the hon. gentleman is himself seriously interfering with the ordinary rules of debate and the ordinary courtesies of this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman from Marshfield ought not to allow his suspicions to carry him quite as far as he does on some occasions, and to insinuate that the statements made by the hon. Minister of Justice are not fair, honest and ingenuous.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not insinuate it at all. I made it broadly.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When I heard it, I left my seat and called Mr. Fisher out and asked him if Pineau had been appointed on the Paris Exposition. He said, no, I have heard nothing about his appointment.

Hon. Mr. MILLS.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Why was not this question answered ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was answered.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It was not answered.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The minister read the statement given to him by the department and also by Mr. Fisher. He said Pineau's name had never been submitted to him—he had never contemplated the appointment, and did not make it. The provincial government may appoint him, I suppose, just as the other governments are appointing representatives. I see that in Ontario the Speaker had been appointed there, and it is just possible, although I do not know anything about it, that Mr. Fisher was ignorant of any suggestion of Mr. Pineau's name.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not in the habit of skulking behind any one's question when I have anything to say. I do not think that is a charge that any one who knows me will lay at my door, except the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not refer to the hon. gentleman at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman said I had skulked behind the door of what the hon. gentleman had said, I made no charge against the administration. I did not insinuate a charge against the administration. What I said was, if the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield was correct, then certain things should follow. I guarded myself by saying I knew nothing at all about it. I knew nothing about it until I heard my hon. friend make his statement here today, and then, knowing the facts connected with the election in Prince Edward Island, I had a right to place the matter before the Senate as I did, without receiving the chastisement that the hon. Minister of Justice thought proper to administer to me, and used language which he attributes to me, and which he himself is apt to use and is continually using when he wants to correct any one. I repeat every single word I said, that if the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield be true, then somebody is guilty of a wrong. I do not say the minister did wrong. I said if the ministry did what is alleged, they deserve condemnation, or if any persons did it for the purpose of getting rid of that man out of the Prince Edward Island legislature, then they should be subject to the condemnation of every honest man in the country. I repeat it. If it be considered offensive to so characterize an act, which bears on its face dishonesty and corruption, I take all the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I wish to throw oil on the troubled waters. I do not wish to be offensive. I never made an offensive remark in my life. (Laughter.) I am glad to hear this unanimous approval of that remark. When the hon. gentleman who moved for these answers made the remarks he did he was justified by the minister's reply. We all know that the question was on the paper for some days. It was thoroughly familiar to persons who know that part of the country that the principal part of the question referred to Pineau. When the leader of the House answered the question, it was perfectly clear that he answered every part of it except that one that was the gist of the whole thing. When the hon. gentleman came to Pineau's name he stopped and hesitated and looked at his paper and said he did not see the name of Pineau upon it, and therefore concluded he had not been appointed. I agree with my hon. friend from Marshfield that that is no answer to the question, and I think the House will agree with me that it is not. It does not at all necessarily follow that because the name was left out of that paper the gentleman was not appointed. I do not wish to lecture him upon this matter, but I will point out to the leader of the House that where questions of this kind have been on the paper some time, and when he says the name occurs to him now for the first time——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was put on the paper on the twentieth and this is the twenty-second.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—That is three days. When the hon. gentleman says it is the first time this name has been called to his attention, and that since he entered the House he read the questions for the first time, it is not——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The answer was put into my hands since the House opened.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—If the hon. gentleman was not prepared to answer that question himself, as an honourable man he knows how a question should be answered. I think when he came to this question he should have said 'as far as this part of the question is concerned I have no information.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I told my hon. friend before I sat down that I would make direct inquiry about this particular part. I promised to make further inquiries.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—If further inquiry is to be made and an answer to be given, I think the whole matter might be allowed to stand until that information is given.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend told me I could give further notice, which I declined to do, because I had given as clear notice as could be given under the circumstances. I said before there were two of these questions which were not sufficiently answered. One was the third 'Will the provinces be represented on the staff of assistants at the said Exposition ?' If my hon. friend gave any answer to that I certainly did not hear it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I told my hon. friend that in making these appointments we had nothing to do with the provinces.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They were not considered at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understand by that, the federal government, in choosing officers, to look after the affairs of Canada at that exposition, will not look to the point of having all the provinces or any particular province represented ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That does not follow. The federal government is making a dozen appointments. It is selecting those parties from the various provinces, but that is a wholly different thing from my hon. friend's questions.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, no. If my hon. friend will look at the question he will see that I am speaking of assistants to Mr. Tarte, and I ask, will the provinces be represented among these assistants.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not as provinces.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Ontario government have appointed the Speaker of their House to represent the province of Ontario at Paris.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We do not appoint them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was not looking for information as to what the provincial governments were doing, I am referring to what the government of Canada is doing and whether the government of Canada, in arranging the staff of officers is looking to the point of having the provinces represented on that staff out of the assistants that will be employed there by Mr. Tarte, or whoever is the chief commissioner at that exposition, and the answer is not yet as distinct as I could have it, because my hon. friend appeared to think I was asking what the provincial governments are doing. I was simply asking what the government of Canada is doing, and whether in their arrangement they are going to see that the provinces are represented.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think they have done so. In the selection they have taken into consideration the entire country, and undertaken to represent the entire country.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The next question referred to Mr. Pineau. The facts of the case are that Mr. Pineau was elected less than nine months ago in opposition to the provincial government in a very hard contest. Since the beginning of the year, in fact, some time during the month of February, it began to be rumoured that Mr. Pineau had been approached and offered $5.00 per day and expenses for going to Paris to represent either the province of Prince Edward Island, or the Dominion, in some capacity in connection with the Paris exhibition. That statement was broadly put forward and just as indignantly denied and repudiated by those who thought it was impossible that any such proposition, involving such deep dyed corruption, could be made by any person in the interests of the federal government or the provincial government, who were opposed to Mr. Pineau in politics; as the object could only be to get Pineau out of the way in order to save the provincial government in the approaching session. Mr. Pineau gave notice of a number of meetings in his constituency to discuss local questions. On the Monday previous to the dates these meetings were to take place, without consulting his political friends, without giving any explanation whatever, he went down to Charlottetown and from there to Georgetown, and from there he came to Ottawa. He gave no explanation of his conduct to his constituents. They met and he was not there. There was no explanation and no answer given. He was in Ottawa as we know for a period of nearly two weeks. He was evidently kept out of the way. No Conservative member or no person in sympathy with the Conservative party could see this man or find out where he was. He was here until about the day Mr. Tarte left for Paris, and it is believed, and not only believed but thoroughly understood, that he was engaged to represent the provincial government or the federal government at the Paris exposition, and that he was employed and bargained for to act in that capacity.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Did the hon. gentleman advertise for it—lost, strayed or stolen?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend treats this matter with levity. First he tried to frown it down with anger, and now he treats it with levity. I think the country has had too many exhibitions of this kind. We have had the burning of the ballots in West Elgin, and then the purchase of a member of parliament in another province, and the determined efforts being put forward to prevent investigations into election frauds in another place. We have all that before us, and still my hon. friend asks me to formulate the charge. I am not in a position to say whether it has been done in the interests of, or by the agents of the provincial or federal government. I have not said by whom it was done. Very likely it has been worked out in collusion between the two. But I make the charge that this man has been approached and seduced from his duty to his constituents.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—By whom?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—By the federal or the Dominion government, or their agents, and that he is now on his way to Paris. I make these statements on good authority, and I have very good reason for believing them to be true; and that being so, it is not a surprise to me to find that my question has not been answered yes or no, when all the other questions were answered directly. My hon. friend says 'I cannot find this man's name on the list submitted to me, and therefore he has not been appointed.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend went and saw the list.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. My hon. friend is making a third speech.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I move that the House do now adjourn.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I second that motion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I expected that would be the result.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was going to deal with the observation of my hon. friend the Secretary of State. It appears that he has had some communication with the Minister of Agriculture since this debate began. The Minister of Agriculture may, for reasons that suggest themselves to him, not come to the front in this matter. So far, it is possible that Mr. Tarte may have made this arrangement—more than likely that Mr. Tarte made the arrangement, and that the Minister of Agriculture may be able to say truthfully: 'I do not know anything of this, I did not make the arrangement.' But what strikes me as most remarkable is that this evasive answer came from the Department of Agriculture. My hon. friend was answering for the Department of Agriculture, was he not?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly. There was no other department concerned.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then, does it not seem strange that this question could not be answered directly when it came before the department in the way of an inquiry from parliament? It is a most singular thing that the Minister of Agriculture could give an answer, yes or no, by telephone to the Secretary of State, while he could not give a direct answer to the question of the House. It seems most extraordinary that such should be the case. I certainly have great regard for my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, and will accept his word when he says he does not know anything of it, and if I had received a direct and emphatic answer of 'no' to my question, I would at once have come to the conclusion that the provincial government had been guilty of this act and that this government were innocent. That would have been the conclusion to which I would have come, notwithstanding the fact that it is very strange that Mr. Pineau should come to Ottawa for instructions, and that he should be here nearly two weeks, but still if the direct answer had been given by my hon. friend, supplied as he is with information form the Department of Agriculture, that Pineau was not employed in any capacity whatever, we would have been much better satisfied in our own minds. I am inclined to think that some one in the Department of Agriculture has had something to do with this scandalous appointment of Mr. Pineau.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We ought always to think the best we can of our fellow citizens, and it occurs to me there is one solution to the puzzle which is troubling us all just now, which is simple enough, that Mr. Pineau my have come to Ottawa, and may have gone to see the Minister of Public Works on some business or other, and that the Minister of Public Works may have been so impressed by Pineau's business capacity and other good qualities, that Mr. Tarte may have selected Pineau to act as his private secretary.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I beg to withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—This question of the appointment of this man becomes a very serious one, and I am not disposed to reiterate the charge made by my hon. friend from Marshfield, but to draw certain inferences from what has been stated. I think the answer of the Minister of Justice was given in such a hesitating, undecided way that it left the door wide open for suspicion. It was not such an answer as an ordinary man would expect from a minister of the Crown. It looks to me as if we are pretty near the climax of corruption to-day in this transaction. It was bad enough in the olden days when candidates used their own money to bribe the electors. It was ten times worse when the government of the country took public money to bribe and purchase votes. It became fifty times worse when the machine was organized in Canada for the purpose of stealing ballots and replacing them by ballots in favour of the party which instituted this machine. And it becomes fifty times worse, after an election takes place and the public vote has been given in favour of a policy, when the machine, or parties governing the machine, take the public money to buy that representative of the people and deprive the electors of their representation, which they have chosen. I say it becomes a serious matter, and as I said the other day, I think the time has come when we all should speak, not in an evasive way, but declare ourselves openly against this corruption which is sapping the life blood of Canada to-day.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I entirely agree with the hon. gentleman that we ought to have honest government and we have waited a good while for it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—We are waiting yet.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman is waiting for something more. The hon. gentleman has made certain charges, but he does not know against whom. He is perfectly certain that there is corruption in this matter, but he does not know whether it is the local government or the Dominion government that has bought Pineau, but he is perfectly certain somebody has bought Pineau, and without any knowledge on the subject he is prepared to come to this House and make imputations incompatiable with the honour or honesty of somebody.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is no doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman proposes that somebody shall be put upon trial, but he does not know who it is has committed the offence, or who the party is that ought to be tried. The hon. gentleman has had from the Secretary of State, who went after the hon. gentleman put his question here directly to the Minister of Agriculture, who has alone authority to deal with matters within his own department and jurisdiction, and asked him whether this man Pineau had been appointed by him to any position connected with the Paris exposition, and he says he has not appointed him and that his name was never mentioned to him, and the hon. Secretary of State comes back and makes that statement; yet in the face of that statement the hon. gentleman says 'I do not believe what the minister says; I do not think he is stating the truth. I know that this man has been corruptly appointed by somebody. He is a member of our party; he was in the market; he has been bought, and the local government have been kept in office by his purchase. I do not know whether the Dominion have the slightest interest in keeping him in that position, but as I am here, and as the Dominion government is here, I am prepared to come into the Senate Chamber and make the charge against some minister or other, notwithstanding the denial and notwithstanding the fact that I have not a single iota of evidence of any kind whatever, to submit to this House to substantiate the very serious accusations which I am making'. That is the hon. gentleman's position here to-day. He says: 'Pineau was brought to this town.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not say that. I said he was spirited away.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—'I do not know what he came for, but he was in the city? I do not know, but I believe while he was in the city of Ottawa he saw the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—'And there was evidently a corrupt understanding between the parties or he would not have been here at all.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—'He may have seen Mr. Tarte. I do not know whether he saw Mr. Tarte or not. I did not see him with Mr. Tarte, but he was here and Mr. Tarte was here, and the probability is that he saw Mr. Tarte, and Mr. Tarte is gone and Mr. Pineau is gone, and I think they must have gone together. I am not sure. I did not see them buy their tickets—I did not see them on the railway train together, but they were in the town and are now out of town, and that is evidence of their guilt, and I ask you to assert here that Mr. Tarte has purchased Pineau and taken him off to Paris.' That is the statement which the hon. gentleman makes. I say that statement is wholly unworthy of any member of this House to make upon a mere suspicion existing in his own mind. There is the statement.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Who pays him? Somebody must.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know that he gets a dollar from anybody. I do not know whether he was employed by the local government or not. I have no connection with the local government of Prince Edward Island, but I know that my colleague who has charge of this matter, who is responsible for these appointments, says 'I never appointed this man, and his name was never mentioned to me.' That is enough for me. It ought to be enough for the hon. gentleman, unless he had something more than a suspicion to bring before this House. He has had nothing but suspicion, and I think to mention such suspicions affecting the character of a man on no better evidence than he brought, is an unworthy suspicion, and he ought to have kept it to himself unless he was prepared to sustain the suspicion by more cogent facts than he has brought here. He might just as well go on and say he has a suspicion that some man has committed a criminal offence and on such suspicion put him on trial. What has this House before it? If the statements were true, this House would have a right to inquire into the matter for the purpose of maintaining purity of government. Does the hon. gentleman propose to do that? He has not a scintilla of evidence to submit. Then why should he bring things here that are only calculated to degrade the dignity of public life? That is the position the hon. gentleman takes here, and he hardly ever takes part in any debate affecting the administration, or any member of the administration, that he does not put forward such unworthy suspicions as he has submitted here to-day. We have occupied more than an hour here doing what? Discussing the suspicion of the hon. gentleman. I told him that, not having the name of Pineau on the list, I was prepared to make further inquiry, although I was quite certain he had not been appointed. The hon. gentleman was not satisfied with that, he must go on nagging and nagging, as he does whenever an opportunity occurs of casting some imputation on a minister. That is the position here to-day, and the hon. gentleman wishes to cast unworthy imputations against the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or against the Minister of Agriculture, and on his own showing he has no evidence whatever upon which those suspicions can be upheld.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I think it is very regrettable this discussion has gone so far, and that so much has been said on both sides which would be better left unsaid. It can only excite resentment and irritation. Whether the hon. gentleman from Marshfield has been more persistent in trying to get an answer to his question than was perfectly justifiable, I cannot say, but I regret there should be anything like ill-feeling between the two sides of this House. I am quite content to accept the explanation made by the amiable senior member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) when he suggested to us that the probable solution of the whole thing is that Mr. Tarte has spirited this man away as his private secretary.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The words of Marmion are absolutely applicable here:

> O, what a tangled web we weave,
> When first we practice to deceive.

If the hon. Minister of Justice had noticed the way the answer was put on the paper when he first attempted to answer the question, and had said that he could not give an answer to that question, but would ascertain the facts and reply at an early day, there would have been no necessity for this discussion, and I am sure it would not have arisen.

The motion for adjournment was withdrawn.

DISMISSAL OF R. K. BRACE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired:

Why has R. K. Brace, of Charlottetown, been dismissed from the office of Inspector of Gas Meters, Charlottetown, P.E.I.?

He said: I would call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that Mr. Brace is in the prime of his life. He was a good officer. I think that is well understood in Charlottetown. He furnished his only son as a member of the contingent that represents Canada and is now fighting in South Africa. The same mail that brought Mr. Brace the notice from the government that his services were dispensed with in the little office worth $175 a year, brought the announcement that his only son had been wounded while fighting for the Queen in South Africa.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The services of Mr. Brace, late inspector of gas in Charlottetown, have been dispensed with—he is not dismissed—on the ground of economy and the duties of inspector of gas have been given to Mr. E. Davy, the inspector of weights and measures, without any increase in his salary.

HILLSBOROUGH RIVER BRIDGE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired :

Whether the bridge proposed to be constructed over the Hillsborough River at Charlottetown, at the joint expense of the Department of Railways and the provincial government of Prince Edward Island, will possess separate tracks or roadways for railway, vehicular and pedestrian traffic?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The bridge, I understand, is planked entirely over, where the track is as well as elsewhere, and the railway track is laid down in the centre. It is so laid down that there is no difficulty in ordinary vehicles driving across it—driving one side or the other. It is not railed off and made separate from the ordinary portion of the bridge used for vehicles and traffic.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—May I ask my hon. friend whether the bridge is sufficiently wide to admit of vehicles passing while a train is on the bridge ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So I believe.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend gives that opinion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not absolutely sure of the width of the bridge, but I am speaking of the manner in which it is constructed, so that vehicles may drive on either side of the track or on the track.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When trains are on the bridge ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot say as to that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is there a separate roadway for pedestrian traffic ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understood that there was.

THE PREVENTIVE OFFICER AT MONTMAGNY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

What is the name of the present preventive officer for the district of Montmagny? What is his salary? How many seizures has he effected since he has been doing duty, for infractions of the customs and excise laws? How much has the government realized from these seizures, either by the sale of the articles confiscated or by fines imposed?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I was told this would be sent to me to the House to-day, but it has not been sent yet.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This notice was given on the 13th March.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I know. This is a matter that is not within my department. I asked for the information, but I see there are as many as one hundred questions on the list in the House of Commons, besides the questions here, and my hon. friend must not expect to get answers as quickly as he wishes. I have pressed for an answer and have not received it yet, though I expected it here to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman would press it out of his fingers we might get it.

THE GOLD FIELDS OF THE KLONDIKE.

Hon. Mr. POWER—During a discussion two or three days ago I referred to the work of an expert as a good authority on the Yukon Territory, and the hon. gentleman from Monck asked me the name of the expert. I regretted at the time that I was not able to furnish the hon. gentleman with the name. I am glad now to be able to say I have since secured another copy of the work, and I find that the name of the expert is A. N. C. Treadgold. He is an M.A. of Oxford, and special commissioner of 'The Mining Journal, Railway and Commercial Gazette,' on the gold fields of Klondike. The work is published by George N. Morang & Co., of Toronto.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has the author received any encouragement from the Department of the Interior ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not know.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why has this been distributed gratuitously by the Department of the Interior ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was informed that after the work had been published they bought some copies of it.

INCOMPLETE RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the Secretary of State if he would kindly see, that the Railways and Canals Department return the report which was sent back to them for amendment. If they decline to give further information, I suppose it is impossible for us to compel them ; and if that be the attitude they assume, let us have the return as they presented it at first.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I gave instructions to the deputy minister to go over and see Mr. Schrieber and see if the report was there. You are quite sure it was returned ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes. Might I ask the hon. gentleman whether he has made any inquiry as to whether General Hutton made any reply to the letter which was sent to him, and which the hon. gentleman read here yesterday, or if there is any other correspondence with regard to it ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understood there was an answer marked 'confidential,' which they could not very well give me. It was marked confidential by the General himself.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We are in a rather strange position. We have the Minister of Militia sending a letter and having it read here in justification of himself, and the General's reply withheld because it is confidential.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Would you expect me to bring it down under these circumstances ? I saw the letter to-day and it was marked very significantly 'confidential.'

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why bring the other ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The other was a public document.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Whether that letter was a denial or an acceptance of the case as stated by the minister of course is best known to themselves. All I can say is, if he will take the trouble to look through the reports which have been brought down for the last twenty or thirty years to parliament, he will find many letters were laid before parliament which were marked confidential. If it be in the interests of the public the word 'confidential' does not in all cases cover them. I shall not dispute the point with the hon. gentleman now. It is important, however, if we are to have a correct knowledge of what is taking place, that we should have both sides of the question. I should like also to ask if my hon. friend knows whether the return which was moved for in the other House is likely to be brought down—that is the correspondence with Col. Hughes and Col. White. I make this statement because I have a letter from Col. White this morning in which he gives a positive contradiction as to the reasons which were assigned for his removal from the list of those who were to attend the military school. In the first place, he says he is not past the age, and in the second place, he is not lame. He says this letter is written by the hand some of the fingers of which are gone. All I can say is if I could write as good a hand I should be gratified. I make that statement in justice to the gentleman. If this correspondence is coming down, I shall not put a notice on the paper. If not, I shall give notice that I will ask for them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not observed the notice in the other House. If there is anything to be brought down, I shall ask Mr. Borden for a copy of the return.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not see the notice either, but I say unless there is such a notice——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The correspondence with Col. Hughes is prepared. A large part of it is marked confidential. I do not think it would be advisable to bring it down, but it is quite ready to lay on the table and I just hesitate whether any good will come of it. Mistakes were made on both sides. It was rather unfortunate all that was said on both sides. I shall hand it to my hon. friend and he can decide whether it would be well to bring it down.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (M) 'An Act for the relief of Gertrude Bessie Patterson.'—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

THE REDISTRIBUTION BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called,

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Mills for the second reading (Bill 13) An Act respecting Representation in the House of Commons, and on the motion in amendment thereto of the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, that the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read this day six months.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON said: The Bill before us being substantially the same one as we had before the parliament of Canada last year, and having spoken at some considerable length on the measure when it was then before us, I would be content to have given a silent vote on the present occasion, satisfied that the reasons advanced by myself and others a year ago were ample to justify the action of myself and the majority of this House in voting against the Bill on that occasion; but I have to ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes in consequence of a return which was brought down to this House by the government in answer to a motion by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. I may say, with regard to that return, that a most extraordinary course has been pursued in dealing with it. I have no objection whatever to members of the government holding any correspondence they chose as between themselves, and whether they are profound or whether they are silly is no concern of mine; but when these gentlemen hold a correspondence between themselves, I submit they have no right, under a motion of this House that does not call for that correspondence in any sense, to interject those letters between themselves into the return brought to this House. And especially is that the case in this correspondence. A gentleman, not a member of this House, dealing with statements made on the floor of this House, under cover of a return, undertakes to discuss questions with members of this House. That, I submit, the Solicitor General has done in a letter which has been submitted to the House. I pass over the introductory part of the letter of the Minister of Justice which calls for this communication. Mr. Fitzpatrick says:

I have seen it stated that the opinion is not reasoned, and is not as valuable as one that has been reasoned.

Then he comments upon that as follows:

Those who think that counsel of such eminence as Blake, Haldane, Asquith, Carson and Robert Cecil give lightly opinions on an important question such as that involved in the case submitted to them, know little of the ethics of the English bar.

This had reference to a quotation from the Debates of a remark of mine. All I have to say is that the Solicitor General may be a very high authority on the ethics of the English bar, but he certainly is not an authority on the ethics of parliament. I assume the Minister of Justice did not bring this letter down without his consent and desire, and I hold that he is responsible, and if he is, he has a very limited acquaintance with the ethics of parliament or he certainly would not have made such an uncalled-for remark. To deal for a moment with this flippant, I might say impertinent, statement of the Solicitor General, I venture the assertion that an unreasoned opinion by a lawyer is not entitled to as great weight as a reasoned opinion, and I will submit the opinion of a gentleman whose name stands first on this list itself in support of that view. In 1890, Mr. Blake, in proposing a resolution on disallowance, used this language:

For my own part, I attach little comparative importance to judicial solutions reached without argument and announced without reasons. This, Sir, is only common sense. The experience of mankind has established as the essential ingredients for the attainment of justice between man and man. The opposing arguments of the parties before the tribunal and the reasoned judgments of that tribunal upon the arguments so addressed to it. The acutest minds are but too apt to err unless so aided in the formation of their judgment, and so checked in the announcement of it. Which of us, I ask, would submit, in any important case of his own to such a method of reaching a conclusion. And how can we expect that the public at large will submit to such a method in the public cause. Let the opposing views be stated, presented and sifted in public, and in the presence of both parties so the best materials for consideration will be obtained.

Here Mr. Blake was speaking and condemning as unworthy of great value a judicial solution by a court, although lawyers might have appeared on both sides, although the case might have been openly presented and sifted, unless the judge was checked by the necessity of giving the reasons on which his judgment was founded; and yet, in the face of this, the Solicitor General voluntarily injects into papers that did not call for anything of the kind, an opinion of his own, that a man who held such views as I have read from Mr. Blake, knows nothing of the ethics of the English bar. Now, I shall read another opinion on the same point. Sir John Macdonald said, in the same debate:

> As the hon. gentleman has stated, when a question is submitted by the Crown to the courts. The simple answer, 'Yes' or 'No,' is most unsatisfactory. It is a 'pronunciamento' of the court without giving any reason for the decision which has been given. The proposition in this resolution that the courts could be required by the executive to hear counsel, to take evidence in questions where facts form a portion of the subject to be decided, the fact that it is provided that the courts can and must give reasons for their answer is sufficient, in my opinion . . . . to warrant this House to adopt it.

Now, I shall give you a similar opinion of Mr. Blake on another occasion. I refer to the Jesuits' Estates Bill. It will be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen that in the year 1899, after the Jesuits' Estates Bill was before parliament, and the vote of parliament was taken upon it, the government of the day undertook to submit that case to the law officers of the Crown before the next sitting of parliament, and the unreasoned judgment of the law officers of the Crown was submitted to parliament. A number of leading members of parliament, among them Mr. Blake, expressed strong disapproval of the course of the government in that matter, although agreeing with the conclusion reached. Mr. Blake said:

> Not that I deny for an instant the uprightness, the honour and the transcendent ability of many, of almost all, those who have filled the high positions of Attorney and Solicitor General of England. As a rule, they win that position by force of merit and they hold it by force of merit . . . but what I say is this, that these are busy men, as well as that it is not their regular business to act judicially at all; that they are political personages, and their opinions expressed on these occasions are not entitled to the same weight as the opinions of judges. . . . I say that the three possible sources to which we might apply, the law officers are unquestionably the third. I hold that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the Supreme Court both stand in rank of suitability for that purpose higher than the law officers.

And against the manner in which this opinion had been obtained from these lawyers, Mr. Charlton, a prominent supporter of the present government in the other Chamber, on that occasion denounced the conduct of the government of the day in obtaining from the law officers of the Crown opinions on the Jesuits' Estate Bill, without the case having been presented by those who were interested on the opposite side of it, and he characterized the conduct of the government as clandestine, and if his language was applicable on that occasion, it would be applicable now, when the Solicitor General, behind the back of those who took the opposite view, obtains this opinion secretly, and now comes down here and tells us that those who think that the judgment so obtained is not entitled to great weight or value because it is not reasoned, or without the case being fairly presented, is a stranger to the ethics of the English bar. I could also read a statement by the present premier of Canada on the same point. In 1890, Sir Wilfrid Laurier took the government to task. The hon. leader of the opposition in this House was a member of the government at that time. Sir Wilfrid condemned them for having obtained the opinion of the law officers after parliament had dealt with the question at the last session. He used these words:

> The reference to the law officers of the Crown, in my judgment, was an ill-timed movement, because it must have struck the government that any such reference, in which the contentions of those who opposed the Act could not be heard, could not be satisfactory at all, and by making the reference, the government created the impression that they were not sure of their own ground.

That was Sir Wilfrid Laurier's opinion in 1890 in regard to the submission of the law officers of the Crown of the Jesuits' Estate Act. What conclusion are you to draw? That the Solicitor General, in submitting this question to these eminent lawyers in England, was not very sure of his own ground, or the ground taken by the government, or else he would not have made the submission. The opinion in itself, as stated by such eminent authorities as the hon. Edward Blake, Sir John Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, I have no hesitation in saying is plainly an opinion obtained, behind the backs of those who held the contrary opinion to that of the Solicitor General, on the statement of a case to which they probably would not assent or agree, an opinion had without argument, and then announced with just a bare categorical answer, which amounts to nothing more than yes or no. I know in the estimation of lawyers it would not be considered very weighty, and I do not think it would be held to be of very much weight in the estimation of any other person. But it appears from the discussions which have already taken place, and from this correspondence between the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General, that this submission was made to combat some of the views that I had expressed on the floor of this House last year. It appears that the Solicitor General of Canada—this very eminent lawyer who can afford to use his profession as an eminence from which he can look down on other people who do not happen to be lawyers, and express his contempt in the supercilious manner in the papers submitted to the House, that he was obliged to call in Mr. Blake, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Carson, Mr. Cecil and Mr. Haldane, and get a formal opinion from them simply to negative some of the things a layman like myself had advanced in the course of debate, not alone, I am happy to say, but advanced by the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) also; but in reading the discussion I find the reference was just to controvert some of the opinions I expressed. I am flattered with the honour this implies. Such honour is often conferred upon the gods, but not often upon men. Some discussion took place yesterday between my hon. friend on my left and the hon. Minister of Justice with regard to the constitutional power of the Senate to defeat the Bill which is now before us, and my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, took the ground that this House had the power to reject this Bill, but it had not the right to do it. He drew a distinction which I daresay, if it were explained to us, would be found to be a very subtle one, between the power and the right. Applying this view to the right of parliament to pass this Bill, my hon. friend will contend we have the power to pass it. He did not always take such a ground as that, but he makes that contention now. We know this parliament has the power to do most arbitrary things. We could, by a very strict exercise of our power, do things that would be very strange indeed. We might stretch our power in order that we might do this, but what I suppose my hon. friend means is that you must draw a distinction between such a stretch of power and the proper exercise of it. I am not willing to admit that this House has the constitutional power to pass this Bill. I daresay my views on this subject will not be accepted by a great many members of the House. I am not at all concerned whether they will be agreed with or not, but I am content with having satisfied myself on the subject and having found my views sustained by, I think many gentlemen who are at least as good lawyers as any of the hon. gentlemen opposing us in parliament. I am therefore all the more satisfied with the views I have arrived at in my own way by the application of common sense without any pretension to any legal knowledge. I take this ground, that this parliament has very extensive powers, but there are limitations imposed by the British North America Act on our powers. I may say, in starting, that my hon. friend who has charge of this Bill, and who had charge of it last year, and who had spoken three times upon it, has not, on any of these occasions, gone into a close, careful argument, such as he has indulged in on similar occasions in the past, and which he is well able to do. I have noticed that in these debates he has avoided a close discussion of the constitutional right of parliament to pass a Bill of this kind except at a decennial census, and I have wondered why my hon. friend has done so. We know that in the past, when such questions as the Jesuits' Estates Act and the Redistribution of 1892 were being considered, the hon. gentleman entered very keenly and warmly into elaborate discussions as to the constitutional merits of these questions at that time, but it will be observed, if his speeches on this Bill are carefully read, that while making assertions and taking things for granted, he has taken very great care that he has not entered into any very elaborate argument on the question. But the hon. gentleman did enter into an elaborate argument on a question which covers the entire ground of the constitutionality of this Bill. He entered into that argument in 1892. I have looked over that speech very carefully, and it has convinced me—and I think it would convince almost any hon. gentleman who will read it as carefully as I have done—that the parliament of Canada has no right to pass a Redistribution Bill at any other time than in connection with the decennial census. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, seeing that I am proceeding to deal with his own argument on a previous occasion, might do me the courtesy of paying some little attention to what I have to say. I cannot help it if the hon. gentleman will studiously remain away from his seat and ignore the argument I am presenting. Of course, he has a perfect right to do so, but I do think that in courtesy to this House, of which he is the leader, having charge of this Bill, it is his duty to pay some little attention to the argument that may be advanced on the other side of the question, even although it may come from so humble an individual as myself. I turn to a speech made by the hon. Minister of Justice in 1892. He was dealing with the 40th section of the British North America Act. I will read the section so that there may be no mistake. It is as follows:

Until the parliament of Canada otherwise provides, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall, for purposes of the election of members to serve in the House of Commons, be divided into electoral districts as follows:

Then there is a schedule for the province of Ontario, and there is provision for the province of Quebec, and provision for the province of Nova Scotia, and still another provision for the province of New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Are they county lines?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—These are the constituencies as they existed then, or as they were provided in the schedule to the Act at that time. That question of county lines is not involved in the argument which I am now presenting. The question of county boundaries is not at all presented in that argument. It was provided in the British North America Act that these constituencies should remain in the shape and form in which they then were, until the parliament of Canada would otherwise provide. The hon. Minister of Justice, when speaking on this question in 1892, made use of these words at page 3206, Hansard, 1892:

What does the 40th section say? It says, 'until the parliament of Canada otherwise provides.' Until the parliament of Canada otherwise provides—provides how? In what way arbitrarily? No, Sir, provides in the way pointed out in section 51. It is authorized to provide in that way. It is not authorized to provide in any other way. Now, there is no rule of constitutional authority better settled than this, that you cannot set up an implied power against an expressed one. . . .

And then he quoted the fifty-first section that we are all familiar with. It goes on to say that immediately after the decennial census such and such shall be done. Here the hon. minister laid down that the fortieth section provided that the boundaries of the constituencies should be so and so, and that that could be altered in no other way under the fifty-first section. These are not my words: These are the words of the hon. Minister of Justice himself.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—He was on the other side then.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I ask hon. gentlemen to follow me and I ask them to read these words of the hon. gentleman. He is not dealing at all with a readjustment as a starting point. He is dealing with the constituencies as they were settled by the British North America Act, which Act provided that they should remain in that way until they were changed by the parliament of Canada, and he goes on to say that the parliament of Canada could change them in no other way than under the 51st section. Nothing could be plainer than the words of the hon. gentleman on that question, and if I entertain the opinions I do on that question, that these constituencies were not intended and are not authorized to be dealt with by the redistribution except after each decennial census, I have the solid opinion of the hon. Minister of Justice himself, as placed on Hansard, declaring that way.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman is following me now. In case the hon. gentleman should lose the point, these words are to be found on page 3206 of the Hansard of 1892. He says the electoral districts as provided in the British North America Act, could only be changed under the 51st section of the British North America Act, which provides for the readjustment after each decennial census.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Will the hon. gentleman read anything where I said they could only be changed once every ten years, after each decennial census ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I shall answer the hon. gentleman by asking him another question. Does he hold that the parliament of Canada has a right to make another redistribution, under the 51st section, apart from the redistribution that is required after each decennial census ? My hon. friend is silent.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The parliament of Canada has power to make the redistribution, and I think the 51st section is broad enough to enable them to do it every year.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We shall see what my hon. friend has said on that question, and before I conclude I shall have occasion to quote my hon. friend entirely opposite to the view he now expresses. I will show where my hon. friend pointed out that parliament had gone wrong in 1882, and in subsequently dealing with the distribution of seats, and he went into a long argument to show that although parliament had done wrong in these previous years, that was no reason why they should do wrong now. I will reach that at a later point, but here we have my hon. friend nailed down to this view, that the constituencies of Canada, as they were provided for under the 40th section—that is, the individual constituencies in all the provinces of Canada—could not be altered in any other way than under the 51st section of the British North America Act. In the argument which has been offered on the other side of the question, I have not seen anything like the contention that you could make a second redistribution under the 51st section. The contention was you could under the 91st section, which enables parliament to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada—that under that section you could pass a Redistribution Bill. If you could do it one year, you could do it every year intervening between the census years—you could do what the British North America Act says you shall do on the completion of the census. My hon. friend is not alone in evidence on this point. The hon. Minsiter of Marine and Fisheries, discussing the question at the same time, declared it had to be done then.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There was a redistribution amending Bill introduced in 1886. Does the hon. gentleman say that parliament had no power to make that revised redistribution ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is altogether another question. I discussed that question very fully last year, and I have no objection to stating my views on it now. If the parliament of Canada, on the completion of the census, undertakes, in the fulfilment of its duty, to make a redistribution to comply with all the requirements of that 51st section, and there are many of them, and completed it, the work is then done. But, if it should be found during the then decennial period that some omission has been made, by which parliament had not completed its work, that would be another question. Let me point out the case of the city of Ottawa. It was found, on the taking of the census of 1891, that the province of Ontario was entitled to ninety-two members, and that number was assigned to Ontario, but in the Redistribution Bill of 1892 a mistake was made, and Ottawa was given only one memmer, which left Ontario with only 91 members. It was a purely clerical error. I think my hon. friend will agree with me that parliament had the right to go on and complete the readjustment of 1892, which had given Ontario so many members, and in order to carry that out the clerical error which was made had to be remedied. That illustrates what I mean, and I believe all the others, with the single exception of the Tuckersmith Bill, were in the same direction, to remedy errors that had been made, and which left the redistribution incomplete, and without which it was not a fulfilment of the provisions of the 51st section.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Bill of 1886 took certain municipalities off one riding of the county of Renfrew and put them on another.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Every one of these was thrashed over in this House last year, and the result was we had a good deal of trouble with one or two in Quebec which my hon. friend from Stadacona settled by producing indubitable evidence that they were to remedy an error in the Act of 1892, and without which the Act would not have been a real adjustment such as is called for by the British North America Act. That was the ground that my hon. friend took, and took it with the greatest possible firmness, in 1892, that parliament had no right to deal with this question except under the 51st section. He took the ground that even if parliament had dealt differently before, and had done wrong in introducing measures between the census years, it did not alter or change the law, and that the true interpretation should be given to the law now. Hon. gentlemen are aware that under the Quebec resolutions the 23rd article provided that the redistribution of seats should be under the supervision of the provincial legislatures of all the provinces—that the Dominion of Canada should have nothing whatever to do with the shaping of constituencies. That was the original intention. Those who have gone over the confederation debates know there was a good deal of argument on that point. In the province of Quebec there was a feeling that the Dominion parliament would hive the French constituencies. There was a feeling in other provinces that the Dominion would not do justice to the increase in wealth and population which might prevail in some sections. There was a jealousy of the federal power with regard to the redistribution of seats, and until the delegates went to England, the 23rd article remained the basis of confederation, and that article provides that the redistribution of seats should be managed and controlled by the local legislatures. When the delegates met in England this 23rd article was abandoned. I think I am right in saying that a compromise was arrived at. Those who entertained doubts about giving the full and unrestricted power to the parliament of Canada to redistribute seats in the fear in one province that they might do injury to races or creeds, and in another they might not do injustice to the industrial growth and growth of population, those who held these ideas were induced to give way, and the 51st section, with some of its subsections were substituted for the 23rd article. Why? Because there was a feeling that there were not safeguards provided up to that time, the feeling was held strongly that the interests of the provinces had to be safeguarded, and it was not until this 51st section was put in the shape it now is that the different provinces withdrew their objection and allowed the federal parliament to redistribute the seats. My hon. friend will, perhaps, say that there was no occasion for such fear as was felt. Perhaps not, but it was entertained all the same. There was a feeling of alarm and anxiety on the part of many people of Canada that this power might not be exercised justly by the federal government, and this safeguard was put in that a redistribution should be made immediately after each decennial census, 'by such authority, in such manner, and from such time as the parliament of Canada from time to time provides.' Now, the hon. gentleman tells me that all the safeguard that was then obtained was a safeguard against a possible wrong that could be done in adding one member to Ontario, or taking one from Nova Scotia, or something of that kind—that that was the only thing that was safeguarded against. Sir George Cartier, and other eminent men, were satisfied, we are told, with the 51st section as a safeguard against a possible injury that might arise from the abuse of power by the federal government in the adding or reducing of one or two seats. He was quite satisfied, they say, with that safeguard, leaving the door entirely open during all the other nine years—leaving the government to cut up the constituencies throughout the Dominion of Canada. All I have to say, if they held this view they were easily hoodwinked. They were easily satisfied, if we are to accept the theory that nothing was meant by this readjustment, but simply dealing with the one or two seats which might accrue to a province by change of population, and that it was only to guard against the wrong that might be done the minority in race or creed, or to a province in the decennial adjustment, that this provision was put into the Act, and all the strong grounds which had been taken with regard to holding the redistribution in the hands of the province were relinquished and cut away. I am certain that these men were satisfied in their minds that they got in that 51st section an ample guarantee against any abuse by the federal government which they would not possibly have had if it was free to any government under the 91st section of the British North America Act for the maintaining of peace, order and good government of Canada, to cut and carve the constituencies of the country as it thought proper. These are my own views, but I read the views of the hon. Minister of Justice in 1892. The hon. gentleman used these words :

In looking over the articles of confederation, which were adopted prior to union, I find that by the 23rd article, it was agreed that the legislature of each province should divide such province into a certain number of constituencies. That seemed to be the plan. There was some distrust as to the use which parliament might make of its power, and if the hon. gentleman will look at the discussions which took place at confederation he will find the view expressed that you might hive the French, you might divide the province of Quebec in such a way that the English-speaking section would have a majority of the representatives on the floor of this House. You might find jealousy of the rapid growth of a particular province so divide its constituencies as to prevent an adequate expression of its opinion in consequence of its increased population. To guard against such contingencies, it was proposed, in the first instance, that the legislatures of the different provinces should divide the provinces for the Dominion parliament. That, however, was abandoned before the delegates went to England, and when the British North America Act was formed for the purpose of carrying into effect the articles of confederation—the Quebec resolutions which were agreed upon—the 51st section was substituted for them.

Here was the view of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, and he is entirely right. He says this twenty-third section, which retained the redistribution in the hands of the provinces, was taken away from the province at that time, and that those who stood for the provinces having control of the redistribution yielded on account of this fifty-first section.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend knows that in using my argument there for the purpose of showing a redistribution can be made only once in ten years is misrepresenting my argument entirely. My argument pointed to one thing, and that was the intention in making the redistribution to take some outside authority.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understand precisely. My hon. friend on that occasion was making an academic speech as he very often does. His leader stood out by declaring in the House of Commons that he was entirely opposed to relegating the powers of parliament to judges or any one else. Parliament should do its own work in its own way, and he had no confidence in persons who would be appointed that way, because they would be marked with the views of those who appointed them. If my hon. friend doubts it, I can easily find it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That has nothing to do with the point I just now put.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes it has. That was the view of the hon. gentleman's leader. My hon. friend made an academic speech in favour of another view altogether, entirely opposite to the resolution which he voted for and the speech of his leader, and that was in favour of relegating the redistribution to some independent authority. Am I not right ? That was my hon. friend's view, and his whole speech was made in support of that idea of his, of submitting, under certain conditions, the division and the shaping of the constituencies to some independent authority, and it was in connection with that idea that this whole speech of his in 1892 was made. That is quite plain, but it so happens, as my hon. friend must know very well, that when one starts out on an expedition such as he started out upon on that occasion, and when he was laying a foundation for his contention that parliament could not distribute the seats itself directly, but must call in an independent authority, he laid so broad a foundation that he supplied the most admirable argument against any redistribution except after the completion of the decennial census. He supplied an admirable argument in favour of only one redistribution, as provided for under the 51st section of the British North America Act. My hon. friend has this advantage over me, he has had a longer and wider experience in the discussion of these questions in parliament than I have had. That is a decided advantage of which he has made good use ; but it so happens when an hon. gentleman discusses questions of this kind on many occasions, he places himself under this disadvantage, he finds himself brought up by a short turn in antagonism to some view he has expressed previously. And that is what has occurred in this instance. We find here, in pointing out with exact truth on his side that it was originally intended that the provinces should redistribute the constituencies, that this was adhered to for the reasons which he enumerated, and which seemed to be strong reasons in the minds of those who held them, yet they did waive those doubts because of the insertion of this 51st section of the British North America Act. My contention is if they waived it because they got those provisions, they felt they were safe against any redistribution except what could be made under them. If not, they were very childish in giving away their contention unless they got an ample safeguard. In addition to that, I find in reading the speeches in the British House of Commons—that the members of parliament who framed the Act were themselves of the opinion that they were giving, under this fifty-first section, a decennial redistribution and no other. I have not the parliamentary debates at my hand, but it was either Mr. Adderly or Mr. Cardwell, I am not sure, who made this statement when somebody had objected that a redistribution every ten years was too often. The reply was it would certainly be too often for England, but that in a new country like Canada, where population increases very rapidly, it was not too often, showing very plainly that in the minds of British politicians who framed this Act, they regarded this redistribution immediately after the decennial census as the only redistribution provided for under that Act. I shall read another extract from the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice in 1892. It is a very copious and full extract. I have taken great care to begin where the hon. gentleman begins the point, and carry it on to his conclusion, and while as I said before, it is quite true that all this is an argument in favour of the reference of the redistribution of 1892 to an independent authority, yet hon. gentlemen cannot fail to find that it had a far-reaching effect and that the argument sustains the contention of those who have held that we should have a redistribution only after the decennial census and not at any other time. Here are the Hon. Mr. Mills's words :

> We are entitled to have a House of Commons; it was to be elected every five years, if not sooner dissolved. Then there must be a redistribution of seats. If there were no provision for the distribution of seats, certainly the power would be here, and be here on the principle that we have a grant of powers, and this is a necessary incident to carry that grant into effect, but when the constitution itself does prescribe the rule by which that grant is to be exercised, when it prescribes how that power is put into effect; when it tells you there is to be a redistribution of seats by a tribunal created by you and acting under instructions from you, in which you describe the manner and the time it must be followed, and all the more because by it we have the protection against the very abuses we complain of in this Bill. There is a special condition in the law for the exercise of this power, and I deny altogether that is or can be applied in the grant which the hon. gentleman has mentioned. It has been said by a very high authority in the United States, as well as in the United Kingdom, that you cannot draw as an incident of an express grant what is an express grant in another way.

I have submitted these extracts, which are very full and copious, and I will leave hon. gentlemen to decide as to whether I have not the authority of the hon. Minister of Justice in favour of the proposition that I maintain, and that is that we have no power to distribute the seats except under the 51st section. If I am wrong in that, my hon. friend was wrong when he made this admirable inquiry into the subject in 1892. His speech in 1892 is well worth reading, and if hon. gentlemen would take the pains to read it, which I strongly advise every member of the House to do, I am convinced every one of them will rise from the consideration of that question convinced, as I was, that a very powerful argument had been made against any redistribution except one immediately following a decennial census. Then we have, in support of this view that I am expressing, the usage of parliament since confederation, with the exception of rectifying inadvertent errors made with regard to Ottawa and with regard to a township or two in the province of Quebec—with such exceptions there has been no attempt made since confederation to redistribute seats, except what was made immediately following each decennial census. There was one exception and that is the Tuckersmith Bill, a different one from all the others. It was for the carrying out of a different object altogether. Sir John Macdonald declared, in his judgment, not long afterwards that the Tuckersmith Bill was an attempt at an infraction of the British North America Act. He showed by this remark on the Tuckersmith Bill that he was of opinion that redistribution could only take place immediately following the census without an infraction of the British North America Act. I have placed these views on record. I am not concerned just now whether they will be concurred in or not. I am quite content that they should go on record, and it will be found at least that I have had very good authority for the position I have held on this subject. I have this confidence, that as the years roll on in Canada, the view that I have presented will strengthen, and that whatever little deviations from that principle occurred in the correction of these little errors in the Acts passed after the census of 1882 and of 1892—whatever may have happened in that respect in the past, that we are advancing to solid ground on this question, and it will not be very long when the parliament of Canada will stand unanimously and resolutely on the ground I have taken. I have confidence that such will be the case, and I am willing to pledge myself for my own action that I would neither be a member of the government nor support a government that would attempt to deal with the constituencies of Canada as this Bill proposes to deal with them. Admitting, if you will, that this parliament, in the exercise of its utmost power might do it and that the elections held under the Act, even though wrongly passed in the first instance, would be valid, this parliament, if it choses might do extraordinary things, but that does not make them right. It does not even make them constitutional, but I am willing to let time settle this question, and I am confident it will not be very long until the wonder will be expressed in Canada that any party should ever be found so foolish or so misguided as to attempt any such thing as is proposed in the Bill before us, putting it on a constitutional ground. As far as the expediency of this Bill is concerned, I think scarcely a word can be said in its favour. If there were no provisions for decennial readjustment at all. I take the ground that we should not pass this Bill now, because we have not a census available to give us the right guide for the fixing of the seats. Putting the whole question of the British North America Act if you like to one side, putting the question of the decennial redistribution out of the way, I hold that the mere fact that the census is nine years old, and that in a country like Canada population has been increasing and moving with such great rapidity, that not one sensible word can be urged in favour of making a redistribution so near the next decennial census as this.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.

The position of the government was weak in the matter last year. It was then eight years after the census, but here we find them, one year from the next decennial census, bringing down this Bill, forcing it into the House last year, and now bringing it down a second time and forcing it upon us when they must know that it is impossible for them to allot representatives in these counties in such a way as will conform with the results of the next census. My hon. friend in introducing the Bill started by saying that the principle of it was one that was accepted by both parties in Canada in 1872. I was a little curious at that stage of my hon. friend's remarks, because I wanted to find out what he meant when he spoke of the principle of the Bill, for I confess I have not been able to see any principle in it at all, but I find that what he referred to was the county boundaries. It is hardly necessary to discuss these details, but every hon. gentleman knows that this Bill does not apply the principle of county boundaries, except to a very small portion of the Dominion of Canada, only dealing with a very small part of the country, and that if it is proposed to apply the principle of county boundaries that principle should be applied to every county in Canada. That cannot be the principle of the Bill, because it only applies to a few counties. Then an argument has been attempted to be built up, in favour of this principle, and it is hardly necessary to discuss this, since the principle is not proposed to be applied all round in Canada; but to my mind, if there is anything at all in the argument that my hon. friend addressed to the House yesterday, that it is not desirable to break up existing associations, it is not desirable to carve counties because you may pen a man off to a part of the county where he is without influence, taking him away from the district where he is a strong and influential man. And how is he a high and influential man? Because in business and in his intercourse with his fellow-citizens he has developed a strength of character which makes people consider him well suited for parliament. If you carve that county where he has these associations in an unfair way, or indeed at all, you are not rendering it easy for him to get elected to parliament. All this is a magnificent argument against this Bill. What do we find ? The present shape of these counties that it is proposed to change is nearly twenty years old. It will be nearly twenty years from the time they were formed until an election is held under this Bill should it become law. That is a long time in the life-time of a community. If you take the trouble of comparing the voters' lists in the different counties you will find very few names remain for 20 years. Some die, some go away, some change their views, and a world of change takes place. My hon. friend in order to carry out this idea of county boundaries, in order to prevent good men from being treated in this way, and to prevent counties from being cut up, brings in a Bill that breaks up all these things that have grown up for 20 years. Supposing a Bill in 1872 broke up things that were as old, or older, it was a pity. There may have been good reason for it, but it was a pity if any injury was done. I do say that the Bill as it is now shaped, and as he proposes to deal with these counties, breaking them up in this way, will accentuate the trouble and create the difficulty which my hon. friend the Minister of Justice deprecated so much. Then he speaks of representation by population. But my hon. friend did not claim that that was a principle of the Bill. Toronto has a population of 200,000, and it is proposed to give it five representatives. Ten should be the number, taking the unit applied to the province as a whole. It is proposed to give Prince county in the province of Prince Edward Island, with 35,000, two members, while the county of King's, with 27,000, will have one member. One man will represent 17,000 in Prince, and another man will represent 27,000 in King's. That is the way the principle of representation by population will be respected. I may say the state of things, it is proposed to do away with in Prince Edward Island, is an exact application of the principle of representation by population. The division could not be made more exactly except by cutting into townships, and if you go over that province from one end to the other, it will be found on a close examination, that no other division could be made that would more exactly conform to the principle of representation by population, and no division could be made which would do less injury to the feelings or desires of the people with regard to the manner in which they should be associated together than the arrangement this Bill is intended to repeal. In Prince Edward Island we have no county institutions at all, and consequently no municipal life has grown up in that province, and a township in King's is just like a township in Prince, and the community of interest is all the same whether you belong to one county or another, and the dividing of that province into five ridings to comply with the state of things we found to exist after we lost a member, to allow the five members to the province, was the best method. No better method could be found than that adopted in 1892, which I have never heard condemned since, and still it is proposed to go back upon that. Another principle is the principle of redistribution by judicial authority. I should like to know why it is that the two counties of Prince Edward Island should be assigned to members running as counties. Why do they not bring judges in and divide the counties in the same way as they are dividing the others ? I will read the view of the hon. Minister of Justice in 1892 on that subject. He said :

> There is another matter which is important, and it is that there should be single constituencies. It is not proper to have two constituencies united into one. In the first place, it is extremely inconvenient. In the case of a by-election in this city, why should a candidate be called on to ask the suffrages, practically, of two constituencies in order to obtain a seat in parliament? The same may be said of Pictou, Halifax and Hamilton as of Ottawa. All these constituencies ought to be divided, and in no case ought there to be two representatives for the same constituency.

This was the view of the hon. Mr. Mills in 1892.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was not my hon. friend's opinion, because he argued otherwise.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not, but the hon. friend of the Minister of Justice is on trial just now, and it matters not what other gentlemen may have done. I was not in parliament in 1892. This Bill and the hon. Minister of Justice are to some extent on trial before this House just now, and I am not going to divert the attention of the House from his interesting record on these questions in order that he might compare records with me. I choose rather to hold my hon. friend to his opinions of 1892. I must confess that the task may be too much for me or any one else to hold my hon. friend to his opinions, but he will not escape without having his attention called to the extraordinary manner in which he differs from himself in 1892, not only in this respect, but in a great many other respects to which I shall allude before I resume my seat.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is open to the same remark.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If he can only find some other member in the House who has done wrong, he thinks it makes him right.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Has the hon. gentleman said it was wrong ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am dealing with my hon. friend, and I will not allow him to draw my attention to any other person at the present time. I should be much inclined to gratify my hon. friend on other occasions, but just now I will stick to the subject on hand. My hon. friend, in 1892, declared that this principle of single constituencies was a very important one, and that there ought to be no constituencies returning two members. He put himself upon record in that way, and now he is believed to be the author of this Redistribution Bill. At all events, he champions it as a member of the government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He prepared it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If he prepared it, I am sorry he had not a little more regard for his former opinions, or if he were permitted by his colleagues to do as he liked, that he did not adhere to some of the opinions that he expressed in former years.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Which you did not support ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend, in 1892, expressed himself in favour of single constituencies, and we find him introducing a Bill in this House which only deals with one-fifth, or one-sixth, of the constituencies, but so far as it goes, creates two new double constituencies and does away with one in the city of Toronto. It creates two new ones in Prince Edward Island. St. John, I think, stands as it did. But my hon. friend has gone up one step and come down two, and in place of adhering to this grand principle of his, of single constituencies, we find him adding to the number of double constituencies by the Bill which he has now presented to this House. My hon. friend claimed that the Bill was to remedy a very great wrong that had been committed, more particularly in 1882. When we examine it we find it deals with some things which happened in 1892. The Prince Edward Island matter is a matter of 1892 and not of 1892, but he is, perhaps right in his statement that, as far as the western part of Ontario is concerned, this Bill deals with constituencies that were affected by the Act of 1882. I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, March 23, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

PRESENTING PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER—I desire to inform the Senate that the time has expired for presenting petitions for private Bills. It is for the Senate to decide whether the time shall be extended or not.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—There has been no arrangement by the committee for extending the time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It will be for the committee to recommend the extension, and perhaps it would be advisable to do so when we consider the long adjournment that we had. I merely throw out that suggestion.

THE POST OFFICE AT MONTMAGNY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate :—

1. A copy of the correspondence exchanged between the member of Montmagny, at diffeent periods, and the government on the subject of the construction of a post office in the town of Montmagny.

2. A copy of each communication on this subject made to the government by the town council or by any person belonging to the town of Montmagny.

3. A copy of the deeds passed for this purpose by the government and the Seminary of Quebec for the sale of the land on which the post office of Montmagny was built; and also of all deeds forming the titles of the property in question.

He said: I desire to call the attention of hon. gentlemen in this House to the following facts. In answer to a question put by me on the 19th day of March, respecting the purchase of the town hall at Montmagny, the hon. Minister of Justice told us that that property had been acquired or purchased from the Seminary of Quebec, and that the amount paid for it was $5,000. The deed of sale was passed on the 17th June, 1898. Previous to that a party named Duhaime, living in the county of Montmagny, in the parish of St. Thomas, was the proprietor of a lot on which a fine building was erected. That man got into business difficulties, and his property was seized and sold by the sheriff. The Seminary of Quebec had a mortgage on that property for an amount, I think, of between $2,500 and $3,000. The property was sold, and the Seminary of Quebec, to assume the payment of the mortgage that was on the property, acquired the property. Mr. Choquette, now Judge Choquette, and then member for the county of Montmagny, had some time before the sale of the Duhaime property and its purchase by the Seminary of Quebec, acquired from the town of Montmagy and old building, known as the town hall. This building was removed and a new building erected at the cost, I am told, of $2,000. Naturally the interest Mr. Choquette took in the county he represented led him to ask the government to build a post office in the town of Montmagny, and he found that the best plan was to hand over his own property to the government for a post office, but I suppose, being a lawyer, he suspected that the Act concerning the independence of parliament, prevented him from selling that property directly to the government. So that he came in pourparlers with the Seminary of Quebec, and made an exchange of property. The property he bought from the town of Montmagny was exchanged for the property the Seminary of Quebec had purchased from the sheriff and then the Seminary of Quebec, I suppose by the means of Mr. Choquette, came in contact with the government, and Mr. Choquette's former property was purchased by the government from the Seminary of Quebec for a sum of $5,000. I do not know who pocketed the profit. That might be the subject of an inquiry whenever we can obtain an inquiry. But there are the facts. Under the disguise of an exchange between the Seminary of Quebec and Mr. Choquette, the government secured from the Seminary of Quebec that property at a price of $5,000. That was the answer given me by the Minister of Justice some days ago. I desire by this motion today to bring before this House the papers connected with the deal in order that we may find out in a more official way, perhaps in a way to convince the hon. Minister of Justice and other members of the cabinet, that in reality the property has been purchased from a gentleman who was at the time a member of parliament, and that the deed that was passed between the Seminary of Quebec and Judge Choquette was merely to evade the provisions of the law as laid down in the Independence of Parliament Act. The hon. minister shakes his head; he thinks I will not find it. I suppose it is too cleverly done to be found out, but let him bring down the papers. I hope we will have them this session. I ask not only for the deed of sale which was passed on the 17th of June, 1898, but also for all other deeds which may constitute the titles of the property acquired by the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no ojection to bringing down the papers that the hon. gentleman moves for. I know nothing about the transaction, but this much I do know, and the hon. gentleman will see if he examines the Independence of Parliament Act, that there is no reason in the world for doing, in order to protect a member's seat, what he suggests. When a member enters into a contract with the government or receives pay as an annual salary, he forfeits his seat, but the government cannot, by taking a member's property, put him out of parliament. The papers will be brought down.

The motion was agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF LIQUOR PERMITS IN THE YUKON.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER inquired :

1. If at any period in the year 1899 the granting of Yukon liquor permits was suspended or terminated ? If so, what was the date, and when it was resumed ?
2. Was any notice given to the public, and if so, what and how, that the granting of such permits would cease at a certain date, or that it would subsequently be resumed ?
3. When and how was such or any notice of this fact communicated to the license inspector at Yukon ?
4. Who was the license inspector at the time ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—1. The issue of Yukon liquor permits, other than permits for liquor for personal use, was suspended on the 13th April, 1899, and has not yet been resumed. 2. Customs and police officers were so notified, and instructed to inform the public. 3. and 4. The office of license inspector had not been created at that time.

YUKON LIQUOR PERMITS.

INQUIRY.

Hon Mr. KIRCHHOFFER inquired :

1. Whether any Yukon liquor permit was granted to Mr. Chambers of Oak Lake, Manitoba, or Mr. Chisholm of Griswold, Manitoba, or any syndicate with which the names of these persons were connected ? If so, what was the date or dates, and what quantity of liquor allowed ?
2. Was any Yukon liquor permit granted to P. C. Mitchell or Peter Campbell ? If so, what was the date or dates, and what quantity of liquor ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—1. The records of the department show that a liquor permit was issued to William Chambers ; but they do not show that any permit was issued to Mr. Chisholm, of Griswold, Manitoba, or to any syndicate with which his name was connected. 2. The records of the department do not show that any permit was issued to P. C. Mitchell or to Peter Campbell. I may say further, with regard to the first of these questions, that the liquor permit granted to Chambers was issued on the 7th of August, 1897, and was for one thousand gallons.

POSTAL CONTRACTS IN P.E.I.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired :

Why was not the service of carrying the mails on the Alberton and Kildare route, P.E.I., put up to tender on the expiration of the contract on the 31st December last ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS.

He said : I have a book here in my hand, published by the present Postmaster General, containing a long statement of post office contracts which were renewed by the late government without tender. A great many private letters are here published, and the object apparently sought to be gained was to show that in a great many cases contracts were renewed with contractors without letting the work by tender. Now, in this particular case the contractor had, I understand, given good satisfaction. He had the contract for a period of four years, and at the end of that term, or shortly after the expiration of the term, it was taken from him without any call for tender and awarded to Mr. Clark without tender, at the same figures Reid had received. That is what Reid tells me and he is a responsible man. One would think if any one was to get the contract without tender it would be the man who had performed the service in a satisfactory manner, and if it was not given to him it should be set up to tender.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Two offers for this service were received by the department ; one from the recent contractor, at $98, and the other from William Clarke at $90, and Mr. Clarke's being the lower offer was accepted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That does not an-answer my question. I asked why was it not let by tender. Certainly no tenders were called for.

Hon. Mr. MILLS. There were two offers made. The government never have, neither the present, nor the preceding government, advertised for tenders where the amounts are very small. The cost of advertising would exceed the cost of the work to be performed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is in error.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I am not in error.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know in my own county, Hastings, it has been the case.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are getting into an exceedingly irregular habit, and that is of discussing questions after they have been answered. We did so yesterday, and while I am not going to object to the hon. gentleman continuing his remarks on this inquiry, because the objection has not been raised before, yet I think when a question is answered it ceases to be before the House. It seems to me it would be more advantageous in transacting the business of the House that we should in a larger degree adhere to the rule. I am not objecting to my hon. friend continuing the observations he proposed to make, but hereafter, I propose to object to such discussions on the ground I have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The custom of this House has been that any one could debate a question, but a member could not speak twice on a question. That practice has been followed for a number of years.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The rule, as I understand it, is that the member who puts the question may speak, but it is not like a motion on which every one may speak ; the discussion ends when the question is answered.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—This subject has more than once engaged the attention of the Senate during the past thirty years. In the early days of confederation there were many discussions in this House regarding it. I do not know to what rule or precedent the hon. Minister of Justice is referring, but I do not at all agree with the doctrine that he is laying down here as to the practice in this House in reference to debates on inquiries. The practice in this House is not the same, I need hardly say to the hon. gentleman, as in the House of Commons. In that House no comment or argument is permitted when an inquiry is made of the government. We have, however, founded our practice more on the practice and usage of the House of Lords, and even extended it further. In the House of Lords a discussion is always permitted—in fact is never attempted to be stopped—on an inquiry.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Also in the House of Commons in England at the present time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS. Only the mover.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I am speaking now of the usage on which we have based our practice. I am speaking also with a recollection of what has taken place in this House in the last thirty years. The rule has been settled in this House and acceded to by the leaders on both sides, by my hon. friend opposite (Sir Mackenzie Bowell), and by such good parliamentarians as the late Sir Alexander Campbell, Sir John Abbott and others. The practice, as is fully borne out by reference to the journals of the Senate, is to permit reasonable discussion on inquiries. In the first place, the member making the inquiry is permitted to state such facts and to use such arguments as are necessary to fully bring the subject of his inquiry before the Senate. The same latitude is permitted to the minister who replies to him. The minister is expected to reply immediately after the question is put. Third parties are not permitted to intervene between the making of the motion and the answer of the minister, but afterwards, the practice has been, since confederation, to permit discussion. The hon. member informs the House that a motion and inquiry are two very different things. Of course they are two different things. I presume hon. gentlemen who give the least attention to the rules of the House know that they are two different things. On a motion there can be unlimited debate, but on an inquiry only a limited discussion can take place. In 1876 or 1877, I am not certain which, but during the incumbency in office of Mr. Mackenzie, in whose government the Minister of Justice held a portfolio, the late Sir David Macpherson introduced a new practice into this House, founded upon the usage then prevailing in the House of Lords. It was this, that on a statement of facts and an inquiry, without a motion, unlimited debate could take place.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That was in the session of 1877.

Hon Mr. MILLER—I know it was while Mr. Mackenzie held office. Sir David Macpherson introduced that practice on a precedent taken from the House of Lords. He cited his precedent in order to make a new departure, and it was that on a statement of facts accompanied by an inquiry, but by no motion, unlimited debate was permitted. I was opposed to an adjournment of a debate on such an inquiry, as I considered it irregular. I did not consider a debate could be adjourned except on a regular motion. However, the House considered there was very great convenience in the precedent introduced by Sir David Macpherson, and discussion after discussion took place upon these inquiries, which were adjourned from day to day in all respects, as if a regular motion had been made. The settled practice, therefore, of the House with reregard to it is that a reasonable discussion can take place not only between the gentleman who asked the question and the minister, but in the House generally. That is the settled practice of this House, and I am in as good a position, perhaps, as any other member of this House to speak of it. I think it would be unfortunate if it were otherwise, considering that we are not hard pressed for time to do business, as they are in the House of Commons, where unnecessary debate may perhaps be very inconvenient, interfering with the public business. We are not pressed by anything of that sort in this House to make it necessary for us to curtail our privileges and rights of debate. On the contrary, it would be more desirable that we should encourage discussion of all questions in this House rather than we should attempt to curtail the privileges we now enjoy. I felt it my duty, being one of the oldest members of the House, and one who at one time had the honour of occupying the Chair of the House, which made it necessary for me to give some attention to the rules of the House, and practice of parliament, to state the settled practice of the Senate on this subject.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Reference might be made to rule 20, which lays down in the broadest possible language the latitude allowed in discussion with reference to questions which may be submitted to ministers, and I might also say, as the hon. gentleman from Richmond (Mr. Miller) has said that this is not a new point. It has been fully discussed, and hon. gentlemen will find it fully presented in Bourinot. Rule 20 says:

A senator may speak to any question before the Senate, or upon a question, or upon an amendment to be proposed by himself, or upon a question of order arising out of the debate, but not otherwise, without the consent of the majority of the Senate, which shall be determined without debate.

So that by the consent of the majority of the Senate, any member may speak upon any question. At page 381 of Bourinot this matter is discussed rather at length. Dealing with questions put by members, the author goes on to say:

The procedure in the Senate upon such occasions is quite different from that of the Commons. Much more latitude is allowed in the Upper House, and a debate often takes place on a mere question of inquiry, of which, however, notice must always be given when it is of a special character. Many attempts have been made to prevent debate on such questions, but the Senate, as it may be seen from the precedent set forth in the notes below, have never practically given up the usage of permitting speeches on these occasions, a usage which is essentially the same in the House of Lords.

And in note 2, page 382 of this work, will be found cases in which the question has come up in this Chamber, and been discussed at length, and the Senate has invariably asserted its right to the widest possible discussion upon such questions. So, therefore, as the hon. gentleman from Richmond has pointed out, the subject is by no means a novel one. It has been discussed at length on very many other occasions, and this Chamber is simply following the well established precedent or practice of the House of Lords and from the organization of the Senate down to the present time, the widest latitude has been allowed in the discussion of such questions.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is not necessary to pursue that line of discussion very much farther. Since I have been a member of this House it has been the practice to permit discussion upon inquiries. However, I must dissent from the view submitted by the hon. Minister of Justice just now, that when a question is asked and an answer is given, be that answer good, bad or indifferent, then the matter should end. The object of a question is to obtain information, and if the answer is to defeat its object, it will, I think, be held as an essential feature of the discussion which we are permitted to make on inquiries that the party making that inquiry, or every member, should insist that the answer should be a fair answer, and one germane to the question. This particular inquiry that I made to-day was to ascertain why tenders were not invited for this particular service. The answer I received was that two offers had been received. That was not a reply to my question why tenders were not called for. He says two offers were received. These offers were received secretly and without public notice having been given. They may have been from friends of the government. I do not say they are, but one of them certainly was, that from the man Clark to whom the contract was awarded. Mr. White, the previous contractor, was asked in the event of the Postmaster agreeing to a renewal of the contract whether he would renew it at the same rate. He was asked that question by the deputy inspector in Charlottetown, and then Mr. Clark, without any call for public tenders whatever, made an offer. I asked why tenders were not called for. If Mr. White had known that tenders were to be called for he might have made a better offer than his previous contract. I think in these cases we should have a satisfactory answer, one germane to the question, and not an evasion of it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not desire to prolong this discussion further than to reassert what I stated a few minutes ago, that in many cases tenders were asked for even in small contracts by the late government. I might say that tenders were asked for and lower offers made, but the old contract was continued, that is for very many reasons. Some times you have a first class contractor who has performed his work well for a great many years, and you have an offer from a man who will do the work for ten or twenty dollars less on a long route, and the Postmaster General took the responsibility of renewing the contract with the former contractor. That is the point I intended to make in answer to what the hon. gentleman said in reference to the practice of the last government. The hon. gentleman is wrong in his statement in reference to the practice in the House of Commons in England. I know a difference prevails here, and what impressed it so forcibly upon my mind, was the fact that when sitting under the gallery in the House of Commons in England, I noticed that when the question was put and the answer given the discussion continued. But there you must confine it to subjects which are brought out in the answer, and not introduce any irrevelant matter. If you do, then the Speaker calls you to order. I am very positive upon this point, because I had a conversation with the then Colonial Secretary, Sir Henry Holland, upon the question, telling him what our practice was in Canada, and that we followed the parliamentary practice as laid down by May, an English authority. Then he explained that they had departed from that practice in the House of Commons in England. So that when I said the practice was pursued in the House of Commons, I knew I was quite correct in the statement I made with the qualifications I have pointed out. So long as the discussion continued in the line of the answer by the minister, just so long would it be in order, even in England, and certainly it has been so in this House. I remember very well when I first occupied a seat in the Senate, the chair which the hon. Minister of Justice occupies now, I was rather surprised at the latitude given to discussions when questions were asked, and I inquired about it. I did not rise and say, 'The rule says so and so,' because I did not know. And it is quite evident my hon. friend did not know the rule. I asked the practice, and I was informed, as my hon. friend has been informed, that the practice was to carry on the discussion so long as you kept within the bounds of the subject which was involved in the question. I put the question myself, and did not attempt to dictate in the House, because I did not know. I am sure the House would say I had a right to make these remarks, I did not intend to ask any favour of the Minister of Justice to permit me to go on with the discussion. I should like to adhere strictly to the rules, and if, in discussing these questions, we introduced irrelevant matter, it would be the duty of the minister, or any one else, to call us to order.

SALARY OF PREVENTIVE OFFICER AT MONTMAGNY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

What is the name of the present preventive officer for the district of Montmagny? What is his salary? How many seizures has he effected since he has been doing duty, for infractions of the customs and excise laws? How much has the government realized from these seizures, either by the sale of the articles confiscated or by fines imposed?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The Inland Revenue Department at present has no preventive officer specially appointed for the county of Montmagny. In February, 1895, Mr. Maxime Dubé was appointed a temporary preventive officer for the district of Montmagny, and his services were dispensed with on the 26th August, 1896. During that period two seizures were made by him in the county of Montmagny, one of which realized net $59.99, and the other $163.34. Since the 26th August, 1896, no preventive officer has been specially appointed for Montmagny, and the service for that county and the other counties comprised in the Quebec division is carried on by the general staff of that division. I think I answered that question before.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman answered part of the question before, but I have no answer to the part relating to the customs.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I must call the attention of the hon. Minister of Customs to that. I will call his attention to the inquiry which has been made with reference to the custom house.

REDISTRIBUTION BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called,

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Mills for the second reading (Bill 13) An Act respecting Representation in the House of Commons, and on the motion in amendment thereto of the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, that the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read this day six months.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON said: I have very great objection to the Bill before us, because it is not general in its character. In a readjustment or Redistribution Bill that would be merely called for to allot an additional member to a province in consequence of the increase of population during the decennial period, or to make provision for the loss of a member in a province, as long as it would be confined to that, a great deal of harm would not be done. But when you undertake to deal pretty broadly with the representation of the country, it is essential that you should deal with it, not for one-half or one-third of the country, but that you should make its provisions apply to the whole country—make it general in its character. There is a great deal of importance attached to that point, and my hon. friend the Minister of Justice discussed it in 1892, and he did it so well that I feel I cannot do better than to read my hon. friend's opinion on that point:

I maintain that the redistribution ought to proceed on certain lines in conformity with certain principles. It may not secure to each party in every locality representation according to its exact strength, but it gives to the party who is unduly represented in one place an under-representation somewhere else. If you act on some uniform and settled rule, regardless of party, then you have the principle of compensation that Mr. Bright referred to as always operating to correct these theoretical defects which may be pointed out in any practical measure which can be submitted to parliament.

The hon. gentleman's argument was that you must apply some rule, and you must apply that rule over the whole country. If you apply it only to a part of the country, then you may injure one political party; you make the changes at the expense of one political party and to the advantage of the other political party. A good rule will, of course, always work well, but a rule which in itself is not the best, if it is applied all round, will result in compensation, so that what a party will lose in one place they will make up in another, because the circumstances would be such that they would not always tell against one political party. That is a point against this Bill, and I say that any Redistribution Bill, proceeding on whatever principle you wish, must be made to apply to the whole country if it is to be taken at all. Then the principle on which the Bill proceeds ought, of course, for the same reason, to be maintained and insisted upon. But if you do as is proposed in this Bill, create double constituencies in one place and wipe them out in another, you take to yourself the power to discriminate in favour of the dominant party. The government takes to itself a weapon by which it can crush the party opposed to it, and build up the party of its own political friends.

Take the case of my own province. There two double constituencies are created under this bill, Queen's and Prince counties, in Prince Edward Island, while it does away with the double constituency in West Toronto. Is there any fair play in a matter like that? The government pick out West Toronto for some reason of their own, and say we will break up West Toronto and make single constituencies there. If they acted on the same principle in Prince Edward Island, I could understand it, but instead of that, they make two double constituencies in that province—Queen's and Prince counties. If you employ an independent authority for the division of constituencies, no independent authority could take Queen's and Prince counties and divide them without giving the Conservative party a seat in each. If, therefore, the principle that is applied to Toronto, of wiping away the old double constituency and substituting single constituencies, were applied to Prince Edward Island, this government would not have a ghost of a chance of returning a majority from that province. No doubt the representative of Prince Edward Island in the cabinet advised his colleagues of the effect of applying the same rule to Prince Edward Island that they apply to Toronto; therefore, they create two double constituencies in the island. Here is what my hon. friend the Minister of Justice said about double constituencies. He not only declares against them, but gives reasons, and very strong reasons. They are:

> If you have a division you increase the opportunity to each party of electing its candidate. Let us suppose, in this instance, one had a majority of 20 or 50 in the whole city. If we divided the city the majority may be found in one constituency. It might be found that the party who had a majority of 50 in the whole city had a majority of 100 in one-half the city and was in a minority of 50 in the other half. Is it not better and fairer, where parties are equally divided, that they each should have an opportunity of returning one, than that a majority of one should have an opportunity of returning two.

In violation of this principle which he lays down, and which he supported in 1892 by an admirable argument, in Prince Edward Island he creates two double constituencies, and does not allow the judges to go in and divide them at all.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman's friends did not concur in that view. They voted it down.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think that is correct. I suppose my hon. friend refers to the Liberal-Conservative government that preceded him; I tell him they did concur in that and divided Prince Edward Island into equal electoral districts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They did not divide St. John, Halifax, Ottawa or Hamilton.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is the old story; the hon. gentleman will not say he was wrong in 1892, and that this bill is right. He simply says others have done wrong, and, therefore, he has a right to follow them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I say that was voted down.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The same observation applies to the principle of adhering to county boundaries. I ask, why should this fetish of county boundaries be made important in Ontario, west of the city of Toronto, and be of no consequence in the rest of the province? Why is it that it is magnified to such importance in Prince Edward Island and western Ontario and allowed to be utterly disregarded in the other portions of the great province of Ontario? If hon. gentlemen think that it is absolutely necessary to resort to the principle of county boundaries, why, I ask, did they not make them general? By selecting one part of the country to which they wish to apply this principle, they are trying to take an unfair advantage of their opponents. Another plea that has been set up for this Bill is that it repeals the redistribution of 1882 and 1892. I ask, does it do that? My hon. friend said, I think, that it did. I know the press supporting the Bill says that it does. Will my hon. friend claim before the House that that is the effect of this Bill—that it deals with all the cases where county boundaries were ignored by the Conservative government in 1882 and 1892? My hon. friend will say nothing of the kind, because we know that a great many changes were made in central and eastern Ontario, and other parts, that this bill does not deal with at all. With regard to repealing the Acts of 1882 and 1892, I have just this to say: This bill does not do it. If it attempted to do it, it should do it all around. But even supposing anything wrong had been done in 1882 and 1892, time repairs any disadvantage to a party that may arise under an unfair distribution. I trust hon. gentlemen understand me distinctly. I am not saying that anything wrong was done in 1872, or 1882, or 1892. The parts of the country in which this alleged wrong was done I am not familiar enough with to say how it is, but I say if wrong was done time has repaired that wrong, and you cannot proceed now to reverse what was done in 1872, 1882 and 1892. It would work changes and bring about a great deal of difficulty by disturbing the boundaries of constituencies that have been in existence many of them for twenty years, and have all the bad effects which my hon. friend tried to persuade this House the original Distribution Bill had at the time it was passed. While that is the case, and an objection that lies against this Bill, I take the other ground, that if there was anything wrong in the redistributions of 1872, 1882 or 1892, time has repaired those wrongs. Hon. gentlemen are conversant with many constituencies in Ontario where it was said the Liberals were hived in 1882, that are now represented by Conservatives, and were represented by Conservatives not very long after the redistribution took place. That does not warrant the assertion that they were made hives. I turn to the case of King's, in Prince Edward Island, for local purposes, which was completely turned inside out by the Peters administration. It was a county that usually returned nine or ten Conservative members—ten was the total number—but the county was so changed by the local government that four of the constituencies were operated upon, and it was claimed the Liberals had made sure of carrying a majority from King's county. What happened? With the exception of one of these constituencies which were gerrymandered by the Peters government in 1893, cutting the townships in two to hive the Conservatives, notwithstanding that, all these constituencies have been won back by the Conservative party. In the district of Murray Harbour, from which district my hon. friend (Mr. Prowse) comes, two townships were taken off that returned Conservative majorities, and recently the Attorney-General was defeated in a by-election in that district of Murray Harbour, proving what I contend, that although at the time men may think they are very wise, and if they are cunning enough, may gain a temporary advantage, men's opinions change, and men die, new men come in, and the complexion of a constituency changes to such an extent that the wisdom of men who try to do anything of this kind is entirely circumvented and rendered null and void. Yet, here we have the Minister of Justice coming before the House and seriously asking us to pass this Bill because some wrong was done eighteen or nineteen years ago. I have referred already to the provision of this Bill for the division of constituencies by some outside authority. On that subject I confess I am not in love with the proposition which both sides support now, and that is, that a commission of judges should be called in for this purpose. It has not been the practice in England. It was not done in 1884 or in 1885. I think we are calling in the judges too much to do political work in Canada, and that it is not calculated to raise the character of the bench, and that there might be some other way of dealing with some of these things which we are in the habit of referring to judges. I certainly would agree to the proposition that the divisions should be made by some independent authority, but I think some other way might be found without referring it to the judges. Parliament should keep a grip on the matter itself. It was a favourite idea of Sir John Macdonald's, that the constitutional power of parliament should not be relinquished. I think he was right. In England, that was not done. An agreement was reached between the two political parties, and they agreed upon certain lines on which a redistribution should be made. They agreed upon the men who were to do this work of dividing the counties and boroughs of England into ridings. The Bill reached a certain stage in parliament, and it was allowed to rest there until a commission was appointed, which went over the whole country. They took evidence, held meetings, and did everything open and above board, and before the world, and after their report was in, and after parliament knew the final result, to the very last borough and county, of what these men had done, they passed the Bill with their eyes open. That seems to be a statesmanlike way of doing it. But the proposition here is that we are to pass this Bill, and the government call in the judges or people they appoint, and they have all the power and parliament suspends its functions. It seems to me the English system is statesmanlike and the proper course to pursue. In 1892, the party now in power did not pursue the course they are following now. They were in opposition then. They proposed that a conference of both parties should be held, not that a commission of judges should be appointed. I know that my hon. friend made a long, elaborate and able argument in favour of a reference to an independent commission, but he was speaking at the same time in support of a motion which did not contemplate that, as far as I can see, for the Hon. Mr. Laurier, in proposing his motion, said he was distinctly opposed to the reference to judges or commissioners or any other body, of work that parliament should do itself, and he said if judges were appointed the government would stamp them with their own views. He wanted a conference between the two political parties. Here was his motion :

That Bill (No. 76) 'An Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons,' be referred to a conference of commissioners, to be composed of both political parties, to agree on the lines or principles on which a Redistribution Bill should be drawn.

I read yesterday what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said on that occasion, and which I have just now paraphrased, in denunciation of calling in judges or commissioners to do the work parliament should do itself. All he wanted then was that parliament should agree upon the lines on which the redistribution should be made, and parliament would work it out in its own way. That was their view in 1892, and now, when they come into power, we find them pursuing the very course they condemned their opponents for having adopted, that is, one party proceeding to do the work without conference with the other party. Why did not these gentlemen, when they introduced this Bill, ask for a conference as they proposed in 1892 ? That is what they would have done had they chosen to be consistent. They have gone back on the ground they took in 1892. I am opposed to this Bill because, I submit, that it is one proposed to be passed for party purposes. I see no higher ground. No higher grounds has been taken in the discussions on this Bill, as far as I have heard them, than that it was to right some wrong that was done twenty years ago or nine years ago—simply to repair a wrong that it was claimed the Liberal party received so long ago as that—merely in the interests of the Liberal party and not in the general interests at all. It is merely put forward that the Liberal party, as they are in power, ought to be able to pass a Bill that would help them in some parts of the country where they claim to be at a disadvantage. Now, in 1892, a member of this administration, Sir Louis Davies, spoke in the House of Commons on this question. I know my hon. friend is a very clever, ingenious man, but I never knew before that he claimed to be a prophet, but he certainly has a good right to set up that claim, for, in this instance, he has proved to be a true prophet. He said :

If you are to go on, and ignore the existence of their opponents, and say we will arbitrarily proceed to decide in this way or that way. The result has been, and may be again, almost to annihilate one of these parties, and when the party which is excluded for the time being happens, by a combination of accidents, to be returned to power, that party will, perforce, be driven to adopt the same unjust and unfair system, and will introduce another Redistribution Bill not founded on justice or on the lines of the constitution, and intended to give the people a fair means of representation, but intended to promote the interests of the dominant party alone.

If you are to go on in the way you are now going on, you are forcing the Liberal party to take the same course against you if they should come into power. In that case they must gerrymander.

No person will venture to dispute that whatever else Sir Louis Davies is, that he is a prophet, for what he said has happened to the letter. A combination of accidents brought these gentlemen into power, and they are proceeding to pass a Redistribution Bill, not in the interests of justice and fair play, but in the interests of the Liberal party.

And, they are doing it. Certainly no person can dispute the right of the hon. gentleman to be a prophet. The only necessity for a change in the representation of this country, is in the Yukon district. Every other part of the country has a voice in parliament. Some places may have grown up through the increase of population, but nevertheless there is nobody settled in a civilized part of Canada but can appeal through a representative. They all have representation in parliament that the Yukon district has not. That important district—the richest minerals in all Canada, with a boundless prospect before it, notwithstanding its mismanagement—that part of the country is alone without representation. It is the only place in Canada that is not represented ; it is crying out for representation which is not provided for in this Bill, though it is the only thing that the government could do in changing the representation of the country in a constitutional way at this time. They have a constitutional right to deal with that territory apart altogether from the 51st section of the British North America Act, and they could give a representative to the Yukon district, without raising the question as to the constitutional right to do it, while in all other places it is open to the long argument we have heard as to whether parliament is within its constitutional right to pass this Bill. I will turn, for a moment, to the interpolation of the Minister of Justice yesterday. When I showed hon. members that the Minister of Justice had, in 1892, most elaborately argued that no change could be made in the distribution provided in the 40th section of the British North America Act at confederation, except under the 51st section, which says on the completion of the decennial census of 1871, &c. When I established by most full questions from the hon. gentleman's speech in 1892, that he held the ground—and he has never declared he repented of that since—that no change could be made, except under the 51st section, my hon. friend challenged me to point out where he had ever said that not more than one Redistribution Bill could be passed within the decennial period of 10 years. I thought at the time the challenge was very unnecessary. He might as well have challenged me to find if he had said during his life that there were 13 months in the year, for the one would be just about as reasonable as the other. Let us just turn, for one moment, to this section 51. My hon. friend a little further on interrupted me by saying section 51, was broad enough to allow a census to be made in every year.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Let me tell my hon. friend he did say it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I did not say it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I beg my hon. friend's pardon. What I intended to say, was that my hon. friend interrupted me in remarking that it was competent for parliament to make a redistribution every year under the 51st section of the British North America Act. That is what my hon. friend said. I have had the official report of that under my eye, and I know I am speaking correctly.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not what the hon. gentleman said.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have corrected that and the hon. gentleman need not nurse his wrath on this subject any longer to keep it warm. He is on record as saying that this 51st section is broad enough to admit of a redistribution being made every year. I shall turn to that section, and read it to hon. gentlemen and allow them to draw their own conclusions:

> On the completion of the census in the year 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner and from such time, as the parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules, &c.

Is there a word in that which allows a redistribution during the first four years? Will my hon. friend undertake, in the presence of this House, to say that the 51st section gives any power to make a redistribution until 1872? It was only on the completion of the census of 1871, that this section comes into operation at all, so far as making a redistribution. It says:

> And on each subsequent decennial census.

Is not that plain? I can well understand gentlemen who believe, as many able and consistent men believe, that the 91st section of the British North America Act gives power to make a redistribution, that under the general power of legislating for the peace, order and good government of Canada, you can make a redistribution at any time, I can easily understand the gentlemen who hold that view, taking the position the hon. gentleman does; but when he nails himself down to the 51st section and says a redistribution can only be made under that section, and then adds that it can be made every year of the ten, that is something I cannot comprehend. To my mind nothing can be clearer; it is absolutely beyond the power of parliament to make a readjustment under this section during the first five years, or until the completion of the census of 1871. We both take the ground that the 51st section is the governing one, and under that section, it was not until after the year 1871, that parliament could make a readjustment, and having exercised that power, it could not be exercised again until after the next decennial census. Now, I will turn to an opinion in support of my hon. friend's contention that the 51st section is the governing one. I do not calm any particular weight for my own opinion on this matter, but I think my hon. friend's opinion is a very good one, in fact his discussion of these clauses, the 40th, 51st and 91st sections of the British North America Act in his speech of 1892 is, to my mind, the best discussion of the question that has ever been made in the parliament of Canada. I have no hesitation in saying that such is my judgment with regard to that speech. In that discussion he took the ground, and took it very strongly, that this 51st section governed. There is an elaborate argument in his speech of 1892, in which he illustrates his point by a reference to the case of the province of Quebec, and he contends that if you admit once that you can legislate on redistribution outside of the 51st section, you could decrease the representation of the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am not discussing this question with my hon. friend the Secretary of State; I am dealing with his colleague and leader, the hon. Minister of Justice. My hon. friend took this ground, that if we once admit the right to redistribute or readjust, whatever you call it—to my mind the terms are interchangeable—under the 91st section, you open the door to reduce the representation of the province of Quebec, because under the 52nd section, as hon. gentleman know, the power is given to parliament to increase the representation of the province of Quebec, by increasing in a proportionate rate the representation of all the other provinces; but there is nothing said in the British North America Act, that you can reduce the representation of Quebec, nor is it declared that you cannot reduce it. My hon friend argued that, as a consequence, if we once admit we could apply the 91st section for a redistribution, you could reduce the representation of the province of Quebec. I shall read what the hon. gentleman said, replying to Sir John Thompson:

> Is this power of legislating, as the hon. minister proposes in this case, vital to the exercise of this power of distribution? Why, the very section which I have read shows that it is not. Parliament may give to Quebec more than 65 members; there is no provision that it may give less, yet the hon. gentleman, if his argument were a good argument, would, notwithstanding that provision, imply that this parliament might decrease or diminish the representation at Quebec. If the power is implied, it is a power that may be exercised independent of these sections (51 and its sub-provisions), but I say that the power here is an expressed grant, and you cannot set up as incidentally to any other power a power in opposition to the grant.

The illustration shows the absurdity, when you concede the right to legislate on redistribution under this general provision to make laws dealing with the peace, order and good government of Canada. Now, here is what the Hon. Mr. Davies said in 1882, with regard to the point raised by my hon. friend, as to whether parliament could exercise its power at all within a decennial period:

> I ask the House to take a higher view of their responsibilities and I say that the Imperial parliament determined, in passing the law, that not only should the lines and principles be laid down, but that at every decennial census you should make a change in these lines and principles to suit the changed condition of the country. The Act does not say that parliament shall lay down what for all time shall be the lines and principles to be followed, but that parliament, after each decennial census, shall lay down these principles.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—And not before.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Not before, nor a second time within the period. Mr. Davies continues:

> You have no authority arbitrarily to cut and carve as you please. The law does not give it to you. A limitation has been placed on your power. It does not say you may do so-and-so, but you shall do so, not once for all, but from time to time; after each decennial census you shall readjust.

These words are plain enough. These are the words of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries in discussing this question in the House of Cammons in the year 1892. I turn again to section 51 and hon. gentlemen who are interested in pursuing the inquiry will find an admirable argument in the debates of the House of Commons a year ago by Mr. R. L. Borden, of Halifax, who is, I may say, in my estimation, one of the best lawyers in the Dominion of Canada to-day. If there is any equal to him I do not think there is any his superior. Hon. gentlemen will find an elaborate argument on these points in his discussion in the House of Commons a year ago. He calls attention to this point and says that this section 51 does not provide for the redistribution simply as between the provinces. He says on the completion of the census, in 1871 and on each decennial census the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted. It does not say the representation within the four provinces shall be readjusted. It does not say the representation between the provinces shall be readjusted, but it uses the general words that the representation of the four provinces may be readjusted. I have taken the pains to look over the utterances of Sir John Macdonald with reference to this question, and hon. gentlemen who are at all acquainted with his career have remarked the surprising exactitude of his terms. He was exact in his language, and some of the gentlemen who had to deal with him, who were not by any means so careful and exact as he was, found out after they were through with Sir John Macdonald that he understood the bargain better than they did, owing to the exactitude of his terms. Sir John Macdonald, perhaps not always in conversation, but in a public manner used the word readjustment. He did not use the word redistribution. The word redistribution does not appear in the British North America Act. It is 'readjustment.' I do not think the word redistribution is to be found in the British North America Act. In England they call the dividing of the constituencies for political purposes a redistribution. In the United States they call it an apportionment. And we properly should call it a readjustment, for that is what it is called in our fundamental act, and that is what Sir John Macdonald always called it. If you give the exact meaning to these words that they convey, I hold that the 51st section gives the power to readjust the representation within the provinces, and between the provinces, and that it meant all that. I do not claim to be singular in the view I am presenting to the House. I may say that I have followed the speech of the hon. Minister of Justice in 1892, but I still would have some doubt were it not that I find that the view I am urging has other strong advocates. If hon. gentlemen will read Mr. Borden's speech they will observe that it is his view, and that it is the view of Mr. Powell, and Sir Charles Tupper. Sir Charles Tupper is not a lawyer, but his opponents will admit that he has an admirable analytical mind, and probably his long course in dealing with constitutional questions makes him a better authority than almost any lawyer in the country. I think I am right when I say that these views are shared to some extent by the hon. gentleman from Calgary; but my hon. friend will present his own view when he addresses the House. I am not alone in the view I take. I want to refer again to the only real statement on this point of Sir John Macdonald. We have to bear in mind that up to 1892 this point was not discussed, and beyond the one single remark of Sir John Macdonald, when the Tuckersmith Bill was referred to, that it was a violation of the British North America Act, up to 1892, we had not a real discussion of it until my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, that year, took it up and dealt with it. But during those years the reference to it by Sir John Macdonald may be found in his remarks that the Tuckersmith Bill was an infraction of the British North America Act, and he could not take that view unless it was a measure which could not be passed except immediately following the decennial census. In opening my remarks yesterday, I made some observations called for by the extraordinary observation which the Solicitor General saw fit to interject in a letter to the Minister of Justice, laid on the Table of the House. I took some occasion then to quote opinions of prominent lawyers in Canada in regard to the value of this particular kind of opinion that was obtained in England by the Solicitor General. I have to say that I believe Mr. Blake, would not go back upon his declared opinion in 1890, that even the ablest of men if called upon to give an opinion without a fair presentation of the case, and without it being sifted before them by argument and without being checked by the necessity of giving a reasoned opinion, all of which he set forth in his two speeches in 1890, I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Blake would apply that rule to himself as well as he would to any other man, and that he would be quite willing to have these observations applied to him as well as he would to others. Mr. Blake is an authority on the British North America Act than whom we have no greater. His intimate acquaintance with it in parliament, his dealing with large and important cases arising under it in the courts, his eminent qualities as a lawyer, all point to him as a man whose opinions are entitled to very great weight, and had this opinion been given by Mr. Blake after hearing argument, after having it sifted before him by argument, and he had sat down and given a reasoned opinion, I would take the opinion of Mr. Blake as quickly as I would that of any other man living or dead, with regard to the British North America Act. But Mr. Blake must admit that the rule which he laid down in his speech in 1890 as to the comparatively little value of opinions or judgments of courts when they are obtained without argument and without being sifted in the light of day, and when they come simply as a Delphic oracle, yes or no, is aplicable to this case. As to the English lawyers whose names are attached to this paper, I desire to say that I question very much whether any of them gave much attention to it. There is no answer to the question as to the fees and emoluments given to the lawyers, but the impression was conveyed by my hon. friend, when he submitted the return to the House, that it was a pure labour of love.

Without wishing to hurt the feelings of lawyers I might say that we laymen are inclined to think that what lawyers will do as a labour of love is not very great; and I must say that this paper itself is a very slovenly piece of work to be submitted by the Solicitor General to the parliament of Canada. In order to show hon. gentlemen that I have some ground for making my statement, I will read from this document. It reads as follows:

CASE FOR OPINION.

The annexed Bill for altering some of the electoral divisions for the House of Commons of Canada, leaving unchanged the numbers of the members representing each province, was passed by the House of Commons of Canada in the session of 1899.

It has been rejected by the Senate on the ground that it is not within the constitutional competence of the parliament of Canada to legislate altering the electoral divisions save on the occasion of the decennial proportional readjustment of the representation, obligatory under the British North America Act, 1867, after each census.

As far as the opinions of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and those who believed as he did, were concerned, it was a wilful misrepresentation of the attitude of those gentlemen. I am not pleading that it was a misrepresentation of my view. I say it fairly represented my view. I believe the majority of those who voted against the Bill, perhaps without inquiring fully into the Bill, but satisfying themselves of the inexpediency of passing the Bill, and many of them may have even decided adversely to the theory that it was not constitutional to pass it except after every decennial census; but all of them thought it was not expedient to pass it until the census of 1901. The document proceeds:

Your opinion is asked whether it is competent to the Canadian parliament to legislate as proposed and independently of the decennial readjustment.

Let me tell hon. gentlemen that what I have read is put down here and is not addressed to anybody, not signed by anybody and not dated. It stops there, and somebody else commences to speak, as follows:

We are of opinion that it is competent to the Canadian parliament to legislate as proposed, and independently of the decennial readjustment.

Would you not have thought that some person would have signed that document to authorize it in some way, to show that this was actually the reference? It is not signed or dated. The date is of very great importance. This opinion was obtained a very few days after the Senate of Canada rejected the Redistribution Bill, and if there was a date put to this submission, then it would be found how many hours or days these six gentlemen had heard of this matter before they were asked to put their names to this paper. I think it is very important that these particulars should have been put before us, and I must say that if it was intended to influence public opinion, or to influence opinion in this House, the Solicitor General ought to have submitted a document which would have more appearance of credibility upon it and some authorization by way of signature, and that document should convey information as to when the submission took place, when the gentlemen were put in possession of the inquiry.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Are there no signatures?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is no signature to the case.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It might be a concoction.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The whole thing runs into a mass of reading, and you are only to guess from the substance, you are to form your own judgment as to where the question ends, and where the answer begins. I think if there were any degree of exactness, of desire to honestly influence public opinion, the submission would have contained a date when it was handed to these gentlemen, and it would have been signed as a pledge of its authenticity, and there should be a date given when the submission was made and judgment was handed in. These things were absolutely necessary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not propose to follow the hon. gentleman from Marshfield in the very long and elaborate argument he made yesterday and continued to-day on the right of this parliament to pass this Bill at the present time. I heard with some degree of astonishment the very flippant remarks he makes in reference to the report, or rather the opinion of distinguished English counsel on which he seeks to cast a reflection that it is an opinion which, according to his judgment, is not to be entitled to weight because of the source from which it comes. He says that because it was not paid for, and was not argued out before Mr. Blake and other counsel, that it was not entitled to very much respect. Mr. Blake is not a man who is in the habit of giving opinions unless he has thoroughly thought them out. I do not think it is necessary to refer to the English opinion. I turn to the Act of 1897. We had this discussion last session, when parliament, after having a readjustment in 1892, made a readjustment of no less than ten seats in 1893—the electoral districts of Nipissing, Ottawa City, Labelle, Hochelage, Rouville, Chambly, Vercheres, Bagot, Richelieu, St. Hyacinthe and Provencher. Those were dealt with differently from the way they had been dealt with in 1892. Nobody challenged the right of parliament to make these changes. It was called a Bill to amend the Act for the representation of the House of Commons, and the Bill before the House to-day is to amend the Act respecting representation in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—But that was just after the census.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If it had been done in 1894, would it have been void ? Why was it good in 1893 and not good in 1894 ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—If the Senate had sanctioned this Bill the government would have put it in force.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suppose we would. The very fact of our having in 1893, after having had a decennial readjustment in 1892, when we made certain changes and alterations in the Redistribution Bill of 1892, is sufficient evidence that this parliament has claimed the power in the past to deal with this question.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The government has the power.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am glad the hon. gentleman makes that admission. At all events, we have exercised it in the past, and if this House is willing to do what is fair and reasonable, I think they will pass the present Bill. I presume all hon. gentlemen will admit that in framing a district for representation it should be based on principles that would be fair to both political parties. I think if we could lay that down as a principle all would acquiesce in it, and that is the principle which for a hundred years had prevailed in this country in the old province of Upper Canada, in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec. The invariable practice up to confederation was to base representation upon county lines. It was equally fair then to both political parties. One might have an advantage in one county and another an advantage in another county. There was no attempt whatever made to disturb that principle. There was a time, which I can recollect very well, when the county of Bruce had one member, and when it grew more populous it had two members, and later on it was allowed three members, and the same applies to Huron and many other counties I could name. There never was a departure from that principle, which was a sound and fair one. The principle in the British North America Act, if hon. gentlemen choose to refer to it, is that the constituencies are all laid down according to county lines. Where they are divided they are divided north and south and east and west. At that time there were no other than two, commencing with the north riding of Lanark and the south riding of Lanark, North Grenville and South Grenville, making no departure whatever. It was in 1867 that the first departure from that sound principle was made. It was made in the cases of Bothwell, Cardwell and Monck. Those were the three exceptions, and at that time there seemed to be reasons that for the moment recommended them to the parliament of the country. They were not changes made for any political purpose. They were changes made according to the peculiar circumstances that existed. There were two populous counties, Essex and Lambton, and rather than give the increase to those counties, it was thought better to take a part from each of those populous counties, and make the constituency of Bothwell. The same principle applied to Monck and Cardwell. The Conservative party who had practical control of that at the time, did not regard it as an Act that was entitled to very favourable consideration. I have an extract here from Sir John Macdonald's speech in 1872, in which he apologizes for the Bill that was then before them. I am reading from Hansard, June 1, 1872, page 928. This speech was not delivered under political exigencies, but was merely to meet the views and rights of both political parties :

With respect to the rural constituencies, the desire of the government has been to preserve the representation for counties and subdivisions of counties as much as possible. It is considered objectionable to make representation a mere geographical term. (Hear, hear.) It is desired, as much as possible, to keep the representation within the county, so that each county that is a municipality of Ontario should be represented, and if it becomes large enough, that it should be divided into ridings; that principle is carried out in the suggestions I am about to make. That rule was broken in 1867 in three constituencies, viz. : Bothwell, Cardwell and Monck ; and I do not think, on the whole, that the experiment has proved a successful one.

That was the first departure in 100 years from the recognized principle of county boundaries, and Sir John Macdonald himself had doubts as to the wisdom of the course that was then adopted. A change of government took place in 1878, owing to causes which I need not here discuss, except to say, they were due to a depression that existed all over the world, not so much in Canada, but in the United States, and in Great Britain, because they were the purchasers of our natural products. At that time Canada had not the manufactures she has to-day, and, therefore, when we were unable to sell the products of our farms and the lumbermen could not sell their lumber, a depression arose in Canada. and it was made use of by the Conservative party to oust the government out of power. When they attained power, they decided to so arrange the constituencies, especially in Ontario—I do not know so much about the provinces outside of Ontario—that it would be practically impossible to bring about a change except under very extraordinary conditions, and I propose to point out the gross frauds that I consider were perpetrated in the redistribution made in 1882, and subsequently in 1892. The only justification upon which any redistribution could be made——

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Is it in order to speak that way of an Act of parliament ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Possibly not. I am not speaking of any individual.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It is pretty strong language.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I think it is out of order to speak that way of an Act of parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If it treads on any one's corns, I withdraw the statement, but I think I shall prove before I sit down, that any one is justified in the use of the language I am now using. I say, the only defence they made, was that it was to equalize the population of the different electoral districts. That could be the only defence. County boundaries could only be departed from on the ground that you were going to give a representation more equal and fairer to the people of the provinces. Before I proceed to do this, I should like to say a word in answer to what has been said by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson), as to limiting this Bill in its operation. It was intended only to remedy the more gross cases that presented themselves. There is not doubt at all about it that in Eastern Ontario, as well as in Western Ontario, very unfair advantage was taken by the government majority in the two Houses to carry that Bill, but the grosser cases were in Western Ontario, and it was thought advisable not to distribute unnecessarily the whole of the province of Ontario, but to remedy the greatest abuses.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend smiles, but one of the changes in Eastern Ontario, was, when Mr. Rosamond thought he was not sure in Lanark, two townships were taken from Carleton to make his seat sure. When Mr. Haggart wanted to make himself safe in the other riding of Lanark, what was done ? He had the village of Smith's Falls taken out of the township—the township itself was not moved—and attached to his constituency, in order to make his seat safe.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, no.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend says : No, no ; but it was all discussed at the time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The assertion was made then as now. The object was to equalize the population as nearly as possible.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We will see about that. Brockville and Elizabethtown had been for many years a Liberal seat.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think I know the Brockville seat pretty well. The Hon. Mr. Richards, who represented it in the days of Hincks, continued to represent it until he retired to the bench. Then Mr. Buell represented it for years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who succeeded Mr. Buell ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite aware that the seat was recovered by a very small majority, but to make it certain the township of Kitley was added.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was held by the Conservatives ever since Mr. Buell was defeated.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not time to go into these refinements. Even with Kitley added, the vote was an extremely close one. As I said before, the only justification for making those radical changes was the equalization of the constituencies. If hon. gentlemen will only look at the actual facts, how the province was left after that redistribution, they will see that that argument will scarcely apply. Take the county of Peterborough. Peterborough West, 15,000 ; Peterborough East, 21,900.

Hon. Mr. MILLS. The principle of representation by population was not involved.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The principle was not followed there, and when seats were carved out of other counties, there was no attempt at equalizing the constituencies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the hon. gentleman have any objection to telling me whether he is predicating his argument on the census for 1891, because that is the only authority on which he can make it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My remarks apply to the Acts of 1882 and 1892. My figures apply to the census of 1891. I merely quote those figures to show that equality of representation was not the element which was considered in the drafting of that Bill. Take Middlesex West, 17,000. It adjoins Middlesex East with a population of 25,000. There was no attempt there, although the Middlesexes were dealt with in a variety of ways, to equalize the population.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will give my hon. friend the figures. West Middlesex, 17,000 ; North Middlesex, 19,000 ; East Middlesex, 18,000. They were made as nearly equal as they possibly could be.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quoting the exact figures.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So am I.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In order to show that population had nothing whatever to do with it, I will take here as an illustration, the municipal county of Oxford. It has a population of 49,800. That could easily be divided into two ridings.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will you tell me how it was divided ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it would be better to let me go on without interruption. If I state anything that is absolutely wrong, I am open to correction. Blenheim and Dereham, with a population of 9,631, were taken out of Oxford and put in Brant, and were replaced by East Thorpe and Burford, with a population of 9,639. Was that with a view of equalizing representation ? Not at all. It was done for a purpose, as all the other changes were made for a purpose. It was notorious that during the time the Act of 1882 was being prepared here, for months the Conservative party had recourse to plans and maps and had a regular room for meeting where each man was to arrange his constituency to suit himself. There is no use disguising the fact, it may as well be admitted at once. Why was that change made? North and South Easthope were Liberal. Mr. Fisher was the Liberal candidate in the county in 1878, and Mr. Hazen was the Tory. North and South Easthope belonged to the county of Perth. In the election of 1878, Mr. Hazen's majority was only 83, but when he got rid of North and South Easthope, and put them into Oxford, his majority in the next election was increased by 232. North and South Easthope had a Liberal majority of 482 and, therefore, it was desirable to get them out of the constituency that the Conservative party thought should belong to them, and so, it was put into the county of Oxford, where it could do no harm, because it was already a Liberal hive. In the same way the township of Burford was taken out of Brant. It was a Liberal township. Mr. Paterson had a majority of 131, so that 613 Grit votes were put into Oxford and one Tory township was taken out of Oxford—two altogether, but one strongly Tory—and was attached to North Oxford for the very purpose. Here is the appearance of Oxford at present, a church with a steeple. Hon. gentlemen can see whether that is fair in politics. There is the constituency as constructed by the Conservatives in 1882, but it so happened in Easthope there was the village of Stratford, with a Tory majority. When Easthope was added to Oxford, Stratford was cut out and given to Perth. There was a Conservative majority in that, and it could not be allowed to go.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is not Stratford in the county of Perth? It is the county town of that county, and always has been.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is now as laid out, but it was not at the time when the Conservatives made the change. If you look up the Post Office Annual, which I did a little while ago, you will see.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Are you sure that is correct?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Who made that plan?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a plan of the electoral district made by the late government.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Who drew this plan?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is on the lines of the statute passed in 1882.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is presumed to be on the lines of the statute.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is made for the government out of the official map, and that is the appearance of it. The other part of Oxford, which was rectangular, was mutilated, as shown on this plan. My hon. friend from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) dilated very largely on the affinities that grow up in a short time in an electoral district: there can be no possible communication between the eastern part of North Oxford and Dereham, which has been added to the riding. It is only once in four or five times that they come together. I have brought some plans to-day to show to the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, here is one like a step of stairs, North Ontario. There is a distance of 60 miles there.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Have you one of South Huron?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Give us a map of Elgin.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Those places are all well connected by railway, are they not?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. I think I have shown there could be no other motive for such changes than the one that was recognized of hiving the Grits in a county already Grit. It was well known there were two Grit counties, North Brant and South Oxford, and so the Grit townships in that vicinity were brought into those two counties where they could do no harm, and as a consequence, it increased the Conservative vote in the adjoining townships, which benefited by the addition of Conservative townships. That is an illustration of what was carried out through the province of Ontario. I do not profess to speak of other provinces; I do not know anything about them, but I have given one or two illustrations where exchanges were made for no other purpose than to benefit Conservative constituencies in the neighbourhood. This House, having approved of it, is asked to continue to approve of the principle which places one political party at a very serious disadvantage and quite justifies the observations read by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, from Sir Louis Davies, that the time might come when the Liberal party would have a majority in both Houses, and they would be justified in retaliating. I think they are too honourable and patriotic to play such a game. It is too contemptible. In no way can you strike the feelings of the people more seriously than by robbing them of the franchise. We are having a war in South Africa for the purpose of securing the franchise to British subjects, yet here in Canada, we have a law which gives an advantage to one party over another.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Has not the hon. gentleman's party got more members for less votes than the Conservatives have ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I shall come to that. I have no doubt my hon. friend is open to honest conviction, and I have too much regard for him to believe that he desired that any substantial wrong shall be done by one political party to the other, owing to a casual majority in the two Houses of parliament. It is an extremely unfortunate thing that it should go abroad that that is the condition of things in Canada, that this House, while it has a Conservative majority, shall oppose any change to minimize the wrong done in 1882, and repeated in 1892. Now, in reference to the proposal to go back to the only honest way in which the two parties can be placed on the same basis, that is the boundaries of counties, because there they are on equal footing, there is no gerrymander in this Bill. I say going back to county lines you will be able to divide the constituencies fairly where necessarily they are entitled to two or three. You will be enabled to divide them according to the population quite as fairly and reasonably in regard to the respective populations of each riding, and more so, than under the system which prevailed in 1882 and 1892. They might be divided as follows :

In adhering to county boundaries it will be observed by reference to the foregoing table, that the proportion of population to each representative will not materially differ from that now existing under the present representation.

The two Brants will each average 18,222; those ridings will not materially differ from East Huron with 18,968, as at present constituted; South Middlesex with 18,806, as at present constituted; West Middesex 17,288, as at present constituted; West Ontario with 18,792, as at present constituted. Bruce —boundaries remain as at present. The two Elgins will each average 21,688; the three Greys will each average 23,738; Haldimand will have 2,000 more than Haldimand and the extinct county of Monck; the three Hurons will each have an average of 22,260; the three Kents will each have an average of 19,271, (more than either South or West Middlesex) and other existing constituencies; the two Lambtons will each average 28,962; Essex, Kent and Lambton are constituencies adjoining with similar interests—Bothwell at present being composed of parts of Kent and Lambton, and the seven members representing the group will represent 171,284—being an average of 24,469 for each representative; the three ridings of Middlesex will each have an average of 21,484; the two ridings of Norfolk will each have an average of 15,496, reducing them to the level of Cardwell, Durham West, North Leeds and Grenville, Peel and other constituencies created by the late government; the two Ontarios will each average 22,677; the two Oxfords will each average 24,928; the two Perths 25,858; the three Simcoes will be slightly above the average 27,575; the three Wellingtons will have an average of 20,425; Wentworth will be above the average; the three Yorks will have 21,457.

I should like, in connection with this matter, to quote Sir John Macdonald again in 1872 on this question, and I regret very much that the House is so slim—that there are not more senators present who would probably appreciate his language used at that time, before any feeling had arisen as to the proper way to divide the constituencies, he himself recognizing that county boundaries was the only fair way of dividing. He said, in introducing the Bill, in 1872:

> But it is obvious that there is a great advantage in having counties elect men whom they knew. Our municipal system gives an admirable opportunity to constituencies to select men for their deserts. We all know the process which happily goes on in western Canada. A young man in a county commences his public life by being elected by the neighbours who know him to the township council. If he shows himself possessed of administrative ability, he is made reeve or deputy reeve of his county. He becomes a member of the county council, and as his experience increases and his character and abilities become known, he is selected by his people as their representative in parliament. It is, I think, a grand system that the people of Canada should have the opportunity of choosing for political promotion the men in whom they have the most confidence, of whose abilities they are fully assured. All that great advantage is lost by cutting off a portion of two several counties and adding them together for electoral purposes only. Those portions so cut off have no common interest; they do not meet together, and they have no common feeling except that once in five years they go to the polls in their own township to vote for a man who may be known in one section and not in another. This tends towards the introduction and deviopment of the American system of caucuses, by which wire-pullers take adventurers for their political ability only, and not for any personal respect for them. So that, as much as possible, from any point of view, it is advisable that counties should refuse men whom they do not know, and when the representation is increased, it should be by subdividing the counties into ridings.

We have heard a good deal about what is done in England. I have here under my hand the instructions given to the commission that made the subdivision in England in 1884. It is said that we ought not to leave it to the judges—that it is out of their way. I quite grant you that if the proposition made by Sir Charles Tupper were adopted, that they should go outside of the county boundaries, they might be objected to; but where it can make no great difference whether there is a distribution between one part of the county and the other, there can be no possible objection to the judges. My hon. friend opposite read from a speech of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in which he advised both sides of the House should agree and name a commission. Both sides would not agree. The government side would not agree. The government made a division to suit themselves, and would not take Sir Wilfrid Laurier's advice. Sir Wilfrid Laurier thought surely a tribunal of judges could not be open to objection. For eighteen years the Liberal party have been placed at a disadvantage, and they think it is high time that that disadvantage should be removed. In England the two parties did agree upon a commission. I suppose if we could agree on a commission now, a subdivision made between county lines might be arranged. With the experience of the past, when the Conservative party refused the olive branch over and over again and insisted on having their own way because they had a majority in both Houses, it seemed useless to propose anything of the kind. The following is an extract from the document appointing commissioners to inquire into boundaries to be assigned to the divisions of the several counties in England and Wales, under the Redistribution Bill of 1884 :

The duties of the commission will be the following:

1. With resepect to counties. In the first place, to examine the survey maps of the ordnance department, and determine from them and other documents in the possession of that department, and of the local government board, and from other available information, the boundaries to be assigned to the several divisions of each county to be divided. In forming the divisions, the population of the several divisions, excluding that of the parliamentary boroughs, should be equalized so far as practicable, and care must be taken in all those cases where there are populous localities of an urban character, to include them in one and the same division, unless this cannot be done without producing grave inconvenience, and involving boundaries of a very irregular and objectionable character.

Subject to this important rule, each division should be as compact as possible with respect to geographical position, and should be based upon well known existing areas, such as petty sessional divisions, or other areas consisting of an aggregate of parishes. In some instances, however, it may be found necessary to include separate parishes, but a divisional boundary must never be allowed to intercept a parish.

The English principle in many ways is applauded in this House, yet, when we propose, in a most important part of the carrying out of the constitution of the government, to adopt the English practice, this House says, 'No ; we will not agree to it.' Yet, on other subjects this House is prepared at all times to recognize the wisdom and reasonable character of the plan usually adopted in Great Britain, more particularly in regard to representation. Having said this much, I come now to the consequences of the Act of 1882, because, after all, it was the consequences that were aimed at in the passage of the Act of 1882, and I take up a return here that was prepared by the late government, I do not know that it has ever seen the light of day. I have got it very fairly and properly. It is open to criticism, and the figures are easily verified. I have here the total vote on the lists of 1882, polled by each party. I am just giving my hon. friend from Marshfield the result of the conspiracy formed in 1882. The Conservative vote in 1882 was 140,025, the Liberal vote 133,771. The Conservative majority, even after all the manipulating of the constituencies, was only 6,254.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—How can the manipulating affect the general vote ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not hesitate to say that that is the proper word.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No doubt it is the proper word.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When the hon. gentleman has heard all about it he will admit it is the proper word. There was a difference of 6,254 between the vote of the two political parties in 1882 in the province of Ontario. The Conservatives elected fifty-five members and the Liberals thirty-seven, making a majority of eighteen for the Conservatives. Now, what would it require to elect the Liberal members ? The Liberal members required 3,615 votes, and the Conservatives required 2,546. Therefore, in that year the Liberals required 1,100 electors more than required by the Conservatives. I ask was that a proper thing ? Take the year 1887. The vote polled by the Conservative party was 181,726, the Liberal vote 176,281, leaving a Conservative majority of 5,445. Of these figures the Liberals represented 4,638 electors, and each Conservative represented 3,365 electors. In other words, each Liberal had 1,300 more electors behind him than each Conservative ; I simply put those figures before the people of Canada, and I ask whether they do not speak more eloquently than any logic as to the effect of the gerrymander of 1892. There is just the result of it, and there is no denying the figures. I have obtained them from a source that cannot be called in question. The Conservative party were so proud of it that they had the figures of 1882 printed, and I happened to get hold of it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Has the hon. gentleman similar figures for the later election ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It would be interesting if my hon. friend had figures showing the result of the last election in the parts of Ontario affected by the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have them here, and they show the Conservatives had over 6,000 of a majority.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A good deal depends on how you count the Patron vote. The Patron vote had not arisen at that time, and those figures are taken squarely for and against the government of the day, and they show that extraordinary result that I have indicated, that in the election of 1887 the average that each Liberal had was nearly 1,300 more than the Conservative. I think the bare statement of that fact ought to satisfy hon. gentlemen that the readjustment of the constituencies could not have been on any fair basis, where there is that extraordinary disproportion, where in 1882, with only 6,254 for a majority, they had eighteen of a majority in the House, and in 1887, with only 5,445 of a majority, they had still sixteen members over the Liberal party in the House of Commons. Those figures cannot be gainsayed. The effect of the figures points clearly to the successful manipulation of the constituencies in the gerrymander that we complain of, and I think with very good reason. That is not a condition of things that the Conservative party can be proud of. I do not think it is a manly way of fighting. The two parties ought to be on the same plane. They ought to be fairly arrayed against each other, and the only way you can bring that about is by going back to the county boundaries, where each party will have the same opportunity. Some counties are Liberal and some Conservative; I do not know how they pan out myself. I have never gone into that, but certainly the objection that can be made to the present system could not, by any possibility, be made against the confining of the representation to the county boundaries in the way I have indicated.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It never has existed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It always did exist.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A township in my riding was attached to Renfrew at confederation—the township of Jones.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Was there a voter in it? Sir John Macdonald forgot Jones. It all illustrates the principle I have explained to the House. I will not call it a disgrace, but we will call it an arrangement, the mildest possible term for the readjustment of 1882. I say it panned out quite to the anticipation of the hon. gentlemen who made it, and I have shown you how it was done. It was done by rearranging the constituencies so as to make the election sure for the Conservative party. I could take individual elections and just show how it was done. Take the case of the Mr. Haskin, where he had to get rid of two Easthopes in order to make his election in Perth absolutely sure. I think with that statement of fact that hon. gentlemen ought to pause before they commit themselves to the continuation of that kind of thing. Hon. gentlemen must recognize that it will be irritating to the Liberal party that they do not feel that they are on the same plane with the Conservative party, that as the law stands they are at a disadvantage, and that is an irritation which ought not to be permitted in any free country. I appeal to gentlemen who are prepared to take high ground on the question of political morality——

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Hear, hear; that is a good word.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Whether they can fairly approve of a system which gives such manifest advantages to one political party over the other. I am quite willing that those figures should be analysed. They, no doubt, will be discussed. I have copies for the press, and they will be given to the people of Canada, and when it is known there is that disadvantage, it will recoil very much on this Senate if it is felt that this House is the obstacle in the way of having this question of representation put on a fair basis. I do not think this Senate, before a fair and impartial tribunal, can justify the action it proposes to take. I presume many hon. gentlemen are committed to the view that this Bill ought to be thrown out. In adopting that view, they entirely approve of the manipulation of 1882 and 1892. It will be an approval of acts that I think cannot be fairly or honestly justified, and I think no impartial man will say it was fair to so distribute the constituencies in Ontario—I am not speaking of the other provinces, because I am not prepared to express opinions on them—that one of the parties should have the manifest advantage I have shown, which was given to then under the Acts of 1882 and 1892.

Hon. Mr. WOOD moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

THE COMMISSIONERS TO PARIS.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Before the House adjourns, I wish to call attention to some of the questions which the hon. gentleman from Marshfield put yesterday in regard to which I told him I would give the information later on. I may say I had the information before me yesterday. I feel it necessary, in justice to the Minister of Agriculture, to say that he gave me the paper which I hold in my hand, in addition to the paragraph that I read from the newspaper. Then I received from his office, after I came to the House, what I assume to be an answer to the question, in which, of course, there were the omissions to which my hon. friend called attention. I assumed that because the question called for a statement of those who were appointed to the Paris exhibition, that it necessarily followed that any party whose name was not on the list was not an officer or an appointee for the Paris exhibition. That I showed by the paper which I had on my table, and which he informed me to-day was amongst the papers, and I have found it. The answers are as follows :

First, Mr. Tarte is chief commissioner for Canada at the Paris exhibition.

Second, that the staff is not named by Mr. Tarte. The higher members were appointed by order in council and others by the Minister of Agriculture.

That is the statement he gave me yesterday. And, further, that the staff is not yet complete. As much as possible all parts of the Dominion are represented on the staff.

Fourth, that H. J. Pineau, M.P.P., has not been appointed in any connection with the Paris exhibition.

The fifth question is answered by the above.

So that, the hon. gentleman will see that the answer I gave him yesterday was perfectly correct, and that this special man that is named, and that he declared was appointed by the government, was not so appointed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I only wish my hon. friend had submitted yesterday the answers which he now gives. If he had done so, I would have had no complaint, so far as he was concerned. But my hon. friend will notice that yesterday, when he reached the fourth question : 'Is Mr. Henry J. Pineau to be assigned any duty in connection with the Paris exhibtion ?' he, looking at the paper further down in his hand, said : 'I see a list here of persons who are appointed to this exhibition, and I do not see that name on that list, and, therefore, I assume he has not been appointed.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quite so.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I had good reason for being dissatisfied with that, because the seventh question, which called for this list of names, asked for other names, and his name had no right to be on that list, and we had a right to have a direct answer to the 4th question. My hon. friend has now submitted information which, as far as it goes, we are bound to accept, but it is not conclusive yet. I did not say, yesterday, that Pineau was appointed by this government, but I did say that I knew he was bargained for and spirited away, and I made these statements, which were not controverted by what the hon. gentleman said, as my hon. friend says that all the provinces are to be represented.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said nothing about the provinces ; I said all parts of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—And that all the appointments are not yet made, neither those that are to be made by order in council, nor those made by the Minister of Agriculture. As the matter is in that state, we will have to wait until we see what we shall see.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, March 26, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

COST OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT MONTMAGNY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to inquire :

1. Whether the sum of $91.19, to be found in the Auditor General's Report for the year 1899, part Q, page 85, as the amount expended during the fiscal year 1898-9, upon public buildings at Montmagny, was expended for the Montmagny post office ?
2. Does this amount make part of the sum of $7,494.75, the figure given to this House as the total cost of the Montmagny post office, or should it be added to that figure ?
3. Which of the two amounts, $7,494.75 or $7,585.94, represents the true cost of the Montmagny post office ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In reply to the first question, the answer is 'yes.' To the second question, the answer is 'no'; and to the third question, the answer is : 'The amount of $7,494.75.' The law costs were received after the end of the fiscal year. The balance of $91.14, was for maintenance and so on, which is never charged to the cost of the building.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why was a similar amount charged to the cost of the buildings for the first year ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend assumes that I am supposed to answer his question off-hand. In the first place, I do not know that his question accurately represents the facts, but if he desires further information, I will endeavour to obtain it for him.

SALE OF BINDER TWINE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY rose to Ask the government, how many pounds of binder twine they have sold this year at the Kingston Penitentiary, and the price sold at, and if to farmers ? And, also, how much was on hand on the 20th March instant ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am unable to answer the question of the hon. gentleman. I think the papers have not been sent over to me from the department. The very same question was put in the House of Commons, or very nearly the same question, and the information has been sent there. I cannot say what amount was on hand on the 20th March. We have not that information in our possession. We are obliged to send to the Kingston Penitentiary for the information which the hon. gentleman asks for. The sale is, of course, from day to day, and I cannot say up to what date the information came from the department, but I will inquire. The hon. gentleman's question might be allowed to stand until to-morrow, and I will endeavour to obtain the information.

MANUFACTURERS OF BINDER TWINE.

INQUIRY.

The Order of the Day being called—

By the hon. Mr. PERLEY :

That he will ask the government, how many manufacturers of binder twine and barb wire were there in Canada prior to the change in the duty on those articles ? Also, how many manufacturers are there of each of these articles in Canada now ?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY said : I suppose this question may go off the Order paper now ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Mr. Johnson, the statician, told me he had not the information in his possession, but he would look at the names of the parties that appeared in the census in 1891, and he undertook to make inquiries. The hon. gentleman can let the inquiry stand, and if Mr. Johnson is able to obtain the information, I will bring it here for him.

THE JOINT HIGH COMMISSION.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Before proceeding to the Orders of the Day, I should like to call the attention of the leader of the House to a Washington despatch in the Ottawa Citizen of to-day in reference to the American-Canadian commission. A few days ago it was stated by the leader of the government in another place that that commission was quite alive, and that the probability was its proceedings would be revived in the near future. This was a very important announcement, and the subject is one in which we all take a deep interest. I want to know if the government are prepared to give further information in reference to it ? The despatch from Washington, to which I wish to call the attention of the minister, is as follows :

HAY HASN'T HEARD OF THE COMMISSION SIR WILFRID SAYS IS VERY MUCH ALIVE.

Washington, March 24.—Secretary Hay stated that so far as he knew there was no foundation for the announcement by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Canadian premier, that the American-Canadian commission would soon reassemble. Secretary Hay said that he had no communication with the British government on the subject. He added that there might be some official despatches on the way from England which would throw some light on the subject, but no intimation of their arrival or contents had reached him.

The House will perceive there is a very flat contradiction here of the Canadian premier's utterance in his place in the other branch of the legislature, apparently at the instance of the Secretary of State of the United States government. If the hon. minister is in a position to throw any light on the discrepancy between these statements, I am sure it will be acceptable to the House and the country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not aware that Sir Wilfrid Laurier made any such statement.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It has been all through the press.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are many things in the press for which there is no substantial foundation, and I think in all probability this is one. I am quite sure if there had been any communication, official or otherwise, that would have pointed in the direction of an early revival of the commission, I would have heard of it. I have heard nothing of that sort. Is my hon. friend sure there was such a statement made ?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Yes, quite sure.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (26) 'An Act respecting the Kaslo and Lardo-Duncan Railway Company.'—(Mr. Macdonald, B.C.)

Bill (33) 'An Act respecting the British Columbia Southern Railway Company.'—(Mr. MacInnes.)

Bill (48) 'An Act respecting the Montreal and Ottawa Railway Company.'—(Mr. MacInnes.)

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(IN COMMITTEE.)

The House resolved itself into committee of the whole on Bill (18) 'An Act to amend the Dominion Lands Act.'

In the committee, on the second clause.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has my hon. friend given any consideration to placing an interpretation on that word 'vicinity ?'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think all these cases, as I understand the practice, come here and are dealt with by the Surveyor General, or by the deputy minister, and so there will be a uniform rule applied whatever it may be. I do not think it is very easy to frame a definition that would not perhaps exclude somebody that ought to come in, and it is safer to leave the matter, if possible, to the judgment of the administrative officer in charge.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I ought to have informed myself as to the taking up of a homestead. What is the limitation to the number of homesteads that a settler can take ?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—One.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In many cases, in order that a party might bring himself within the law, he was obliged to put up buildings on the homestead which would be more convenient elsewhere, and while he is carrying on farming operations on the homestead it may be more convenient, on account of water, or some other consideration, to have his farm buildings on the lot or portion of the lot on which he has his residence. This is all met by this amendment.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

CANADIAN CONTINGENTS EXPENSES BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called—

Second reading Bill (59) 'An Act to provide for the expenses of the Canadian volunteers serving Her Majesty in South Africa.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL said :— I think this second reading might stand.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are rather anxious that the Bill should go through, because ever since the government have undertaken to act in this matter, they have been compelled to incur expenses for which there is no parliamentary or legal authority, on the assumption that parliament would indemnify the government for what they are doing, seeing that it was in accordance with the sentiment of the country. Therefore, there is some urgency in the matter, but if my hon. friend desires the Bill to stand for a day or two longer, I will make no objection.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think that allowing it to stand for a day or two will make any difference. I have no doubt that the House will indemnify the government for what they have done. There will not be any opposition to the measure, although, there may be some little discussion arising out of the debate which took place before. We do not intend to oppose it, but we wish to discuss it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (L) 'An Act respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer.)

Bill (H) 'An Act respecting the Great Eastern Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Perley.)

Bill (J) 'An Act respecting the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Owens.)

MONTREAL BRIDGE COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. OWENS moved the second reading of Bill (I), 'An Act respecting the Montreal Bridge Company.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—These three Bills appear to be tied together, and form part of one magnificent scheme, and I notice that we are extending the time up to 1905, and, as far as I am aware, not one of these three companies has given the slightest indication of capacity to carry on the work which it is chartered to do, and I have grave doubts as to the wisdom of our passing legislation of this kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are passing these Bills without any discussion, and without knowing upon what ground the companies are demanding an extension of their charters.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—This Bill was not sent to me personally. It was sent to Mr. Thibaudeau. I understand they are only asking for the usual extension of time for the completion of the work, and are not asking for any additional powers in the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (K), 'An Act further to amend the Criminal Code of 1892.' He said : This Bill is only printed in English, but as the principle of the Bill, and in fact nearly the whole Bill, was accepted by this House last year, I understand there will be no discussion on the Bill at this stage, and if the second reading were taken we would be making progress, and the Bill would stand for discussion, when we go into committee on the various clauses of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. minister just tell the Senate whether the clauses which were defeated by the Senate are reinserted in the Bill ? The hon. gentleman remembers that some important clauses affecting contracts and contractors were struck out last session.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think there is nothing in this Bill to which the Senate took exception last year, and there are one or two clauses which, I think, passed last year that have been omitted from the Bill, and there are a few things added. They are printed in italics so that the Senate will have an opportunity of seeing what is entirely new.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (N) 'An Act for the relief of Gustavus Adolphus Kobold.'—(Mr. Clemow.)

THE JOINT HIGH COMMISSION.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to give the hon. minister the information he just now asked for. I quote from the proceedings in another place on Monday last:

THE JOINT HIGH COMMISSION.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (Cape Breton). Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my right hon. friend whether he proposes, now that the negotiations between the United States and Great Britain and Canada seem to be at an end, to furnish the House with the information usual in such cases as to the protocol that were laid by either party, and to state to the House in what position the whole matter stands?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am glad to be able to say to my hon. friend that neither the government nor the commissioners consider that the negotiations have come to an end. They are only temporarily suspended, but I am not prepared to say when they shall be reopened. In the meantime, neither am I in a position to state whether the protocols can be laid on the Table, but this is a matter to which my attention has been called and I will be in a position in a few days to give my hon friend an answer.

It is evident there is a most complete contradiction between the statement of the Premier of Canada and that of the Washington authorities, according to the despatch I have read as coming from that quarter in to-day's Citizen.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is perfectly true that the commission has never been formally terminated. There was simply an adjournment of the commission. There has never been a call of the commissioners again, and what Sir Wilfrid Laurier says is, 'I glad to be able to say to my hon. friend that neither the government nor the commissioners consider the negotiations have come to an end.' That can only be so when there is a formal termination of the commission. They are only temporarily suspended, the Premier says. That is perfectly true, and he adds, 'But I am not prepared to say when they shall be reopened.' That shows that there has been no action taken, since the adjournment of the commission a good while ago, for a further meeting.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Has the hon. gentleman no information to give us?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have no further information.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I hope we have heard the last of the commission.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The paragraph read is no contradiction to the statement from Washington.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The commission stands pretty much in the position of some customs officials, they are temporary-permanents.

THE REDISTRIBUTION BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called for:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Mills for the second reading (Bill 13) An Act respecting Representation in the House of Commons, and on the motion in amendment thereto of the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, that the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read this day six months.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—My object in offering a few remarks on the measure which is now under the consideration of the House is not with the hope that I may throw any new light on the subject, but rather in order that I may place the views which I hold upon this question on record before I cast my vote. The matter has already been discussed, both last session and this, and arguments both in favour of the Bill and against it have been presented to the House, and I shall avoid as much as possible, repeating the arguments which have already been used. There were some statements made and some arguments used by the hon. Secretary of State to which I shall make brief reference, but before doing so I wish to say just a few words with regard to the constitutional feature of this question. This has been very ably discussed by the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State, who maintain that the Bill before us is perfectly in accord with the constitution under which we are living, and the opposite view has been as strongly taken by my hon. friend from Marshfield. I may say with regard to the arguments which that hon. gentleman presented to the House, that they appear to me to be worthy of very serious consideration. They appeared to me to have very great force indeed. I will not say that I am prepared to endorse all the views which he presented to the House, but I must say this, that his arguments appeared to me to have sufficient strength to justify the conclusion that this is at least a debatable question, and one upon which we might reasonably expect a considerable difference of opinion would exist. I maintain that the action taken by the Senate, when this Bill was under consideration last session, has been fully justified. We have an opinion set forth in the document that has been laid on the Table of the House, an opinion from the law officers of the Crown in England, which, on the face of it, condemns the action of the Senate last session.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not from the law officers.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—From eminent counsel.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—From eminent counsel, which, on the face of it, seems to condemn the action of the Senate last session. In order that I may be clearly understood on the point to which I shall refer in connection with this subject, I ask the indulgence of the House to read that opinion. It already appears in Hansard, but I desire to read it again in order to impress the point which I wish to make.

> The annexed Bill for altering some of the electoral divisions for the House of Commons for Canada, leaving unchanged the numbers of the members representing each province, was passed by the House of Commons of Canada in the session of 1899. It has been rejected by the Senate on the ground that it is not within the constitutional competence of the parliament of Canada to legislate altering the electoral divisions, save on the occasion of the decennial proportional readjustment of the representation obligatory under the British North America Act, 1867, after each census.

That is the statement of the case as contained in this document before the House. The document continues :

> Your opinion is asked whether it is competent to the Canadian parliament to legislate as proposed and independently of the decennial readjustment.

To this question the opinion given was in the affirmative. As was pointed out by the hon. leader of the opposition, the position of the Senate upon this question is incorrectly stated in the case as submitted to these legal authorities, and in order that that may be clearly apparent, I shall read the amendment which was moved by the hon. leader of the opposition and carried by this House last session, when the Bill was under consideration :

> That it be resolved, that it is inexpedient to proceed with the Bill now under consideration, inasmuch as it is provided by section 51 of the British North America Act that the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons shall be readjusted upon the completion of each decennial census, subject to and in accordance with the rules in the said Act set forth, and as the next decennial census will, under the provisions of the Confederation Act, be taken in 1901, a readjustment of the constituencies in the Dominion made previous to such census being taken would, in the opinion of this House, be a violation of the spirit of the said Act.

I would call the attention of the House to the very important difference between the case as stated in the document which I have read and which was laid on the Table of the House, and the position which was actually taken by the Senate last session. I maintain that whether this opinion given by these eminent legal authorities is correct or not is not material to the case before us. It may be perfectly correct, and yet the action of the Senate last session be fully justified. I may remark here that I think it is very unfortunate that in an important public document of this nature the position of the Senate should be incorrectly stated. It is important, too, that this point should be referred to and that this incorrect statement should be placed upon our official records ; so that in any future consideration or reference made to this question this may clearly appear. I should like to ask the attention of the House for a moment to the purport of the legal opinion which we received from these eminent authorities in England. It merely says that it is within the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada to pass an Act redistributing the electoral seats in any province of this Dominion at any time, whether near or remote to the taking of the decennial census. That, in my opinion, simply means that if the parliament of Canada passes such an Act at any time, it is not in the power of the courts to declare that Act unconstitutional. Of course, if that Act was unconstitutional, it would be null and void, and this opinion goes no further than to say that if the parliament of Canada at any time chooses to pass an Act altering the boundary lines of the constituencies in any of the provinces of Canada at any period remote from the taking of the decennial census, that Act is constitutional, and would be legal and operative and binding. That I take to be the substance of that opinion, and nothing more. This does not conflict with the conclusion that the Senate reached in considering this subject last year, and I for one, maintain that the Senate were perfectly right in the course which they took, and that a similar course should be adopted in dealing with this measure now. I maintain that it is with the spirit of our constitution that we have to deal in considering a question of this kind. In the British North America Act there is no express declaration defining what course of action we should adopt. We have to look to other sources for information upon the subject. We have to look to different authorities for guidance in a question of this kind. It does not specially interest us, if we are to be guided by the spirit of our constitution, whether an Act of this kind can be passed and yet not be so flagrant a violation of the letter of the British North America Act as to be unconstitutional. As has already been very properly remarked in the course of this discussion, I think it was by the hon. Minister of Justice, this parliament possesses very large powers. It may do extraordinary things without the courts being able to pronounce its action unconstitutional. I do not know of any better illustration that I could give of the point which I am now making than the very illustration that was furnished by the Minister of Justice himself. He referred to what might possibly happen in the province Quebec, that we might have in power in this Dominion a strong anti-French party, that in redistributing the seats after a decennial census, in order to reduce the influence of the French people in the province of Quebec, they might so arrange the constituencies as to very largely reduce the number of French representatives and very largely increase the number of English representatives, still maintaining, of course, the number, which, under the British North America Act, Quebec is entitled to, being sixty-five. That would be a gross act of injustice, as he said, yet as he pointed out, it would be entirely within the powers of this legislature, and if such an Act were passed it would not be in the power of the courts of Canada to pronounce that Act unconstitutional. On the contrary, it would be within the strict letter of our constitution, and would be legal and binding and operative. Yet it is manifest to every one that for this parliament to adopt such a course would be a gross injustice to the French inhabitants of the province of Quebec, indeed so gross an injustice that no parliament would ever do it. We are, therefore, as I say, in this case not interested so much in ascertaining whether it is possible for us to go the length, in the redistribution of seats in the different provinces of this Dominion, proposed in this Bill, but whether the measure now under our consideration is one in harmony with the spirit of the constitution, under which we live. Fortunately in Canada, as in Great Britain, a great deal of importance is attached to precedent; where an established practice has grown up it is considered both in the courts of law, and in all our parliamentary institutions, to have almost as binding an effect as a statute law. Where parliament for a number of years has adopted a certain principle, has governed its proceedings by certain well established practices, those practices are supposed—and very properly so—to have a binding influence upon succeeding parliaments, for it may be very properly inferred that if succeeding parliaments for a number of years, adopt any particular principle or practice, they have some good reasons for doing so, and these practices should not be departed from, cannot be safely departed from, unless it is made very clear that some change of circumstances has rendered it necessary to depart from them. I maintain, therefore, that in considering this question, so far as its constitutional aspect is concerned, we have to look to the spirit of our constitution. We have to guide us the precedents which have been followed by the parliament of Canada from confederation to the present time. We have to be guided by the practice which each parliament has adopted after each decennial census, and we have besides that, to guide us the very clear expressions of opinion upon this subject which have been given by the Right Hon. Sir J. Macdonald, and by Mr. Blake, and by the Minister of Justice himself, as was pointed out by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson) the other day, all in support of the view that the principle of redistributing the seats in the different provinces of this Dominion immediately after the decennial census, as provided in the British North America Act, should be strictly adhered to and that no change in the boundaries of constituencies should be made at any other time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let me say to my hon. friend that I never put forward or advocated such a view, and my hon. friend will look in vain in anything I ever said to find such an opinion expressed.

Hon. Mr. WOODS—I have not the quotation of the hon. gentleman's speech before me. The statement was made by my hon. friend from Marshfield, and I think he read from the hon. gentleman's speech the quotation by which he supported that statement.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is altogether mistaken. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield undertook to attribute such sentiments to me, but he found nothing which would support such language.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I will not discuss that point with my hon. friend. We have at all events the opinion, as I said before, of the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, expressed in the clearest terms, and his view was also supported by opinions expressed by the Hon. Edward Blake, and I believe by other prominent statesmen. If we are to be guided by these expressions of opinion, of men whose opinions from their experience and ability upon such questions are entitled to the very greatest weight, if we are to be guided by the practice which has grown up in this country, by the precedents which have been established by succeeding parliaments from confederation to the present time, and by the spirit of our constitution, our duty in the present case appears to me plain. There seems to be no alternative for the Senate to adopt on the present occasion, but to pursue the same course that we pursued last year and reject the Bill. But, hon. gentlemen, this measure is not only opposed to the spirit of our constitution, and to the opinions of the most eminent authorities with regard to the practice which the adoption of this Bill would inaugurate, but, in my opinion, there is another very grave and serious objection to the adoption of this measure; and that is that it is a measure of a purely political character. If any one will analyse the arguments which have been used both in this House and in the other branch of parliament by those who have advocated the adoption of this measure, they cannot fail to come to this conclusion, that the sole aim and object and purpose of this Bill is to place the political party now in power in a more advantageous position for the elections which must take place within a year than they stand in at the present time. The hon. Minister of Justice himself made use of that argument the other day. He told us that a wrong—I took down his words as nearly as I could, I will not say they are exact—was done the Liberal party in 1882. That this wrong was perpetuated by the Act of 1892, and he says: 'We now propose by this Bill to rectify that wrong.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear. My hon. friend argues that a wrong cannot be done to a party.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—No, I made no such statement. I said that was the line of argument which my hon. friend took, and my hon. friend the Secretary of State took precisely the same line of argument.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I have quotations here from speeches delivered by members of the government in the other House which very strongly emphasize this point.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It is not denied that this Bill is for the purpose of undoing the wrong done in 1882 and 1892.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not think it can be denied. I do not know that it is necessary to take up the time of the House with reading quotations from speeches in the other House, although they are very strong in the same direction. We will accept the position, as I understand, of both the Minister of Justice and my hon. friend. Both admit the argument which I have just used, that the Liberal party claims an injustice was done them in 1882, that that injustice was continued in 1892, and that the object and purpose of this Bill is to undo that wrong or remedy that injustice. Now, what was the injustice that was done in 1882? The injustice they claim as this, that the Liberal party did not have a voting power proportionate to their numbers in a certain portion of the province of Ontario—that the Act of 1892 did them an injustice, giving them less voting power than they were properly entitled to according to their number. That is the injustice it is proposed to remedy. How can that injustice possibly be remedied, unless under this Bill you give them a greater voting power according to their numbers than they have at the present time? Therefore, I say that the sole aim, object and purpose of this Bill is to give the dominant political party in Canada to-day a greater voting power according to their numbers in the next election than they possess to-day, to place them in a more advantageous position than they now occupy, and to do this on the eve of a general election. The Minister of Justice has told us that the principle of adopting county lines as the boundaries between electoral districts is an important one, and that it is the great principle underlying the Bill. If, hon. gentlemen, you will note the argument which he made, and keep in mind the arguments I have just addressed to the House, you will see that this is merely a means to an end—that this Bill is not to vindicate any principle——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—If this Bill was a vindication of the principle to which I have just referred, the adoption of county lines between constituencies, they must, to be consistent, make it universal in its application. They do not pretend or claim to do that. The hon. Secretary of State said emphatically to us in the debate on Friday afternoon that they confined the application of this principle to a certain portion of Ontario, and gave the reason why they did that, because in that portion of Ontario the greatest injustice was done.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—In other portions, where county lines were not observed, the same injustice was not done, and so the principle is wiped away—the adoption of this principle is only a means to an end, the aim, object and purpose of the Bill being to give the Liberal party in a certain portion of Ontario a greater voting power according to their numbers than they have to-day. With regard to this question of county boundaries, and the other general questions of that character that have arisen in this debate, it does not appear to me really that there is very much difference of opinion between the two political parties in the country, or between the different members of this legislative body. The hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. Secretary of State claim that the adoption of county boundaries as the dividing lines between electoral districts is a very important principle. The hon. leader of the opposition agrees to that. They both refer to the statement made by Sir John Macdonald, who very strongly emphasized the importance of that principle. I heartily agree with that expression of opinion. I think it is a most important principle, and as far as practicable, whenever there is a redistribution of seats, I think that principle should be adhered to, but there is none of us who claim that that is a principle of paramount importance. There are other considerations which must also have weight. We must take into consideration an adjustment on the basis of population. We must, as far as is practicable, equalize the population in the different constituencies. That is an important principle too, an equally important principle, and yet that is a principle to which there are some exceptions, for I think there will be no question but in adjusting the constituencies for electoral purposes it is perfectly right that in large commercial centres or large manufacturing centres, or in a district where there is a large floating and transient population, the unit of representation should be very much larger than in rural districts, where the population is more stable and permanent in its character. These are all good principles, and are all entitled to a certain amount of consideration, but it does not appear to me really that there is much difference of opinion between hon. members in this House as to what general course should be pursued in the redistribution of the electoral districts—that having due regard to all these principles to which I have referred, the best possible arrangement should be made by which all classes would have a fair share in the representation of the country, and by which the public convenience would be best served. Then, what is the real question in dispute between those who are supporting and those who are opposing this measure ? It is simply a question of fact, as to whether or not, under the Redistribution Act of 1882, an injustice was done to the Liberal party in Canada. My hon. friend the Secretary of State claimed that a very gross injustice was done. Both he and the Minister of Justice described this Act of 1882 as one of the most iniquitous measures that had ever been placed upon our statute-book. The Secretary of State submitted to the House some figures to sustain his position on this point. I undertook to take them down, but was not able to do so, and have not had access to them since, and, therefore, cannot analyse the figures which he gave. It must be evident to every one that that is a question on which two political parties cannot agree. It is one of those peculiar questions on which political parties never will be able to agree, nor can the two political parties in Canada ever be expected to agree on a question of that kind. Some figures have been placed in my hands by a prominent gentleman in Ontario who is very familiar with the constituencies affected by the measure which is now before us. This measure affects forty-eight constituencies in Ontario. In 1882, the Liberal vote in these forty-eight constituencies was 78,483. The Conservative vote was 72,309, showing a Liberal majority, in the whole forty-eight constituencies, of 6,174. In that election there were thirty-two Liberals returned and sixteen Conservatives. The Liberals had a very much larger representation in parliament after the elections of 1882 than their total voting power would entitle them to. If the proportion of representation had been in accordance with the votes, the Liberals would have had twenty-five instead of thirty-two, and the Conservatives twenty-three instead of sixteen in the parliament elected in 1882.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What portion of Canada is the hon. gentleman speaking of ?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The constituencies affected by this Bill in Ontario. If you take this same district of country previous to 1882, we have the following particulars which are rather striking. Previous to the Redistribution Act of 1882, there were only forty-three constituencies in this section of the province of Ontario. In the election of 1878, which was previous to the Redistribution Act complained of, and at a time when the division of electoral districts was, I believe, acceptable generaly to both political parties in the country, the Liberals elected twenty-two members to parliament, and the Conservatives twenty-one. In the same constituencies in 1882, after the Redistribution Act was passed, the Liberals elected thirty-two, a gain of ten, and the Conservatives elected sixteen, a loss of five. These figures—and I have no doubt of their correctness, I have given the authority from which I got them—would show that the Liberal party had no just cause for complaint.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—They gained rather than lost in the constituencies affected by the Bill now under consideration. In the election of 1896, taking these same constituencies, the Liberals elected twenty-nine representatives and the Conservatives seventeen. The total vote of these constituencies was 102,431 Liberals and 96,676 Conservatives, according to which there is a Liberal sitting in parliament for every 3,532 Liberal votes cast, and a Conservative for every 5,687 Conservative votes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is for only one section of the province. I took the whole ninety-two seats.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The section affected by this Bill.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—This is for the section affected by this Bill, the section of the province of Ontario where it is claimed that the grossest injustice was done by the Act of 1882.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear hear.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—But the hon. gentleman says that he took the figures for the whole province of Ontario. I happen to have the figures for the whole province of Ontario and no doubt they will agree with the figures which the hon. gentleman has, for I took them from the Parliamentary Companion. In the election of 1878, taking the whole province of Ontario, the Conservatives returned fifty-nine members of parliament, and the Liberals twenty-nine. In the election of 1878, therefore, the Conservatives had, of members returned, a majority of thirty. In the election of 1882, after the Redistribution Act which is complained of, the Conservatives returned fifty-four members to parliament and the Liberals thirty-eight. The Conservative majority was reduced from thirty to sixteen in the whole province of Ontario. Now, we all know that in the election of 1882 the issue between the two parties was the national policy and also the ratification of the contract for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Those were two very important issues. They excited a great deal of discussion, and they were undoubtedly popular throughout the country and resulted in the return of the Liberal-Conservative party to power by a very large majority. Now, it is interesting in connection with this question to know the results of that election in 1882 in the different provinces. In the province of Quebec in 1878 the Conservatives elected forty-five members and the Liberals twenty, giving the Conservatives a majority of twenty-five. In the election of 1882, when the issues which I have spoken of were involved, the Conservatives elected forty-eight and the Liberals seventeen, giving the Conservatives a majority of thirty-one. The Conservatives in the province of Quebec increased their majority from twenty-five to thirty-one. In the province of Nova Scotia in 1878 the Conservatives elected fourteen members and the Liberals seven, a Conservative majority of seven. In the election of 1882 the Conservatives elected fifteen and the Liberals six, a majority of nine. The Conservatives had increased their majority in Nova Scotia by two. In New Brunswick in 1878 the Conservatives elected five and the Liberals eleven, a Liberal majority of six. In the election of 1882, the Conservatives elected ten and the Liberals six, a Conservative majority of four. The Conservatives, it will be observed made a very important gain in all the provinces of this Dominion except the province of Ontario, and in the province of Ontario they had a smaller majority after the election of 1882 than they had after the election of 1878. These figures certainly do not strengthen the theory that a very gross injustice was done to the Liberal party in the province of Ontario by the Redistribution Act of 1882. If we take the election of 1896, we find the Conservative vote in Ontario was 191,052, and the Liberal vote 166,335, a Conservative majority, taking the total vote of the province of 24,717, and yet the Conservatives elected forty-three members to parliament, and the Liberals forty-four. This certainly does not justify the assumption that the Liberals are labouring under any grievous injustice in the province of Ontario. It rather favours the opposite conclusion. At all events, I think it justifies us in believing that if any injustice did exist, time has entirely remedied it. If we take the by-elections which have occurred since 1896, we find that out of forty-seven by-elections, the Conservative party have, in the whole Dominion, only succeeded in electing three representatives to parliament. Now, I would only, in connection with these general figures, call attention to one or two points; first, it appears evident to me—it appears to be unquestionable, that there was nothing in the Redistribution Acts of 1882 and 1892 that prevented a free expression of opinion of the people of this country. Previous to the election of 1896 there was, no doubt, a very marked change in public opinion throughout the Dominion of Canada and we have, as a result of that election, a Conservative majority of parliament turned into a large Liberal majority. That change of opinion found expression in the changed complexion of the House of Commons of Canada after the election of 1896. It does really appear to me, looking at these general figures, without having a personal knowledge of the condition of things in the constituencies complained of, but taking a general view of the whole case, that the wrongs and injustices of which the Liberal party are complaining are, after all, more imaginary than real. And it does appear to me that the successes that they met with in the election of 1896 and in the by-elections since, should be sufficient to satisfy the reasonable ambition of any political party. I think that if the Conservative party meet with equal success in the next election it will be sufficient to satisfy the aspiration of such strong party men as the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons and the leader of the opposition in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—May I ask my hon. friend, am I to understand that the reason he is not in favour of legislation is that no wrong has been done, and, therefore, no remedy is required ?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Partly.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not say that I would favour the legislation if a case was made out that an injustice had been done.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not say that I would favour the legislation in that case, but I say that there is no justification whatever for this measure, unless you can make out a distinct and clear case of injustice, and that has not been done: that when you take the figures generally it is not, in my opinion, a fair course to pursue, to pick out a certain number of constituencies, and by adding together the total vote and taking the total number of representatives returned to parliament to make out a case of injustice. Any one can, if he chooses to do it, make out a case of injustice in that way. I think we should take a broader view of the whole situation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—And if we do so, I submit that the figures which I have placed before the House do not justify the assumption that any injustice was done the Liberal party in the Redistribution Act of 1882, that they are not labouring under any injustice now, that the wonderful change in the political complexion in the House of Commons shows that the change in public opinion previous to the elections in 1896 found its full expression in the change of the political principles of the majority that were sent to parliament. That is my contention. Having said so much on the subject of these statistics with regard to the election returns, I beg to ask the House to consider what is the position in which we stand to-day. We have a Bill before us by which it is proposed, on the eve of a general election, to change the relative advantages which the two political parties in Canada have at the present time. What are the reasons which are given for adopting this measure ? It is not claimed that any portion of the population of this Dominion is not represented at the present time. It is not claimed that any injustice has been done to any class of people in this Dominion. I think it will be admitted by every one that the agricultural classes are well and ably represented in the House of Commons to-day. It must be admitted, too, I think, that the commercial classes, the lumbering classes, the mining classes and the manufacturing classes all have their fair share of representation. No claim has been set up that injustice has been done to any of these important classes. We are asked, then, to adopt this measure simply to remedy an injustice, real or imaginary, which the hon. gentlemen opposite claim has been done to one of the political parties by an Act passed eighteen years ago, I would ask this House thoughtfully to consider whether a course of this kind would be a wise precedent to establish. I have already called attention to the weight and force which the establishment of precedents should have upon future legislatures. The hon. Minister of Justice drew my attention to that point in the address which he delivered the other day. He referred to the Act of 1882, and pronounced it one of the most iniquitous pieces of legislation that ever had been placed upon the statute-book.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That Act was passed in 1882, when the Conservative party, then in power, knew they were to appeal to the people of the country within a few months. According to his own theory, the temptation was too strong for them ; they could not resist it, and they had to take advantage of the peculiar conditions in which they were placed to make a most unfair rearrangement of the constituencies in the province of Ontario, and he made a further statement, that the reason which they assigned, and the only reason which they gave, to justify their action was that the precedent had been established by Sir Oliver Mowat in the local legislature. I should think, if a precedent of that kind had such disastrous results, that the hon. gentleman would feel the very great responsibility that must rest upon this House if we, by passing this Bill, establish a precedent of the same character.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Restore the county boundaries and leave the distribution to the judges.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why did not the government do that ?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I have already dealt with that feature of the question ; I have already dealt with the arguments which the hon. gentleman used, and I endeavoured, perhaps in a feeble way, to show that that was merely a means to an end.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That the real object, aim and purpose of this Bill was to place the Liberal party in a better position than they occupy to-day, and that the principle of which he boasts so much was only applied in that section of Ontario where it would have this result.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I feel that this Senate, at the present time, stands in a very responsible position, that in dealing with this measure we have a most important duty to perform, but I feel, at the same time, that our duty in regard to it is very plain. If we are to be guided by what is clearly the spirit of our constitution, if we are to be guided by the precedents which have been established by parliament already, if we are to follow the practice adopted by successive parliaments, from confederation to the present time, if we are to have respect for the opinions which have been expressed by such able statesmen as Sir John Macdonald, and other high authorities on these constitutional questions, there is only one course for us to pursue, and that is, to reject this Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—If we adopt this measure, it has not been shown that it can accomplish any general good. It is only claimed that it will remedy the particular case of injustice to which it is intended to apply. It has no general character to commend it to us. It has not been shown that it will accomplish any good. It has been shown, I claim, that it is liable to constant and serious abuse. Besides that, there is only one other point I would like to emphasize, and that is, the point already referred to, that this is an innovation, that if we adpot this measure we are establishing a new precedent, and, in my opinion, a very bad precedent. There is only one case, I believe, in the history of legislation in this country when a measure has been submitted to this House in which the same principle was involved, and that was the Tuckersmith Bill, which has been referred to by some speaker in the course of this debate. In that case Mr. Cameron had been elected for a constituency in Ontario. His seat had been contested. He was unseated and obliged to return to his constituency for re-election. In the meantime, a Bill was introduced in parliament altering the boundaries of his constituency, the effect of which would have been to have improved his chances for re-election. I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that the very arguments used in support of that Bill have been presented to this House in support of this measure ; that under the Redistribution Act preceding that election, a general redistribution Act, an injustice had been done to the political party to which he belonged, to the constituency in which he ran, and it was claimed that by adding this township of Tuckersmith that injustice would be removed, and it was to remedy that injustice that the Bill was introduced in parliament.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Oh, it was for more than that.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That was the very argument used by the men who introduced the measure and suported it in parliament ; the same argument that has been used in support of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—And just as honest.

Hon. Mr. WOOD——That measure passed through the House of Commons, and was rejected in the Senate, and yet, the same men who supported that measure, and who are living to-day, admit that they were wrong, and that the Senate was right in the action which they took on that occasion. If we reject this Bill the time will come, and I believe it will come very shortly too, when the same admission will be made in regard to the rejection of this measure. I trust that we will do our duty and reject this Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I was glad to hear the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland speak of the respect we owe to the spirit of the constitution. It is with that principle in view that I intend to approach the discussion of this measure. No one will venture to deny that this Upper Chamber owes respect to the will of the people, and that it is the spirit of the constitution that we should bow to the expressed wishes of the people of the Dominion. We may adjourn the passing of a measure which is sprung upon the country by the House of Commons in the belief that that measure is hasty and would not be approved of or endorsed by the people. I do not think that any member of this House would affirm that when the people have been expressly consulted upon a certain measure, it can reject that measure when it has been endorsed by the people at the polls. This House has, within my own recollection, followed this principle. The majority of this Chamber refused to sanction the Yukon Bill, because, as the hon. leader of the opposition declared, they were convinced that the people would not accept or endorse this measure. We passed, and the Conservative majority of this Chamber reluctantly accepted the Franchise Bill last session, because the people had endorsed the principle of that measure. I contend that the will of the people should be respected, and that in this case the will of the people was very clearly expressed. We have an express mandate from the people on this question, as clear, not clearer, at all events, than the one concerning the Franchise Act, in the programme of the Liberal party, which was endorsed by the people on the 23rd of June, 1896. This is the clause of that programme which was submitted to the people :

8. That by the gerrymander Acts, the electoral divisions for the return of members to the House of Commons have been so made as to prevent a fair expression of the opinion of the country at the general elections, and to secure to the party now in power a strength out of all proportion greater than the number of electors now supporting them would warrant. To put an end to this abuse, to make the House of Commons a fair exponent of public opinion, and to preserve the historic continuity of counties, it is desirable that in the formation of electoral divisions, county boundaries should be preserved, and that in no case parts of different counties should be put in one electoral division.

This was the mandate, and it is very clear. To what grievance did this declaration refer ? It referred to a practice which appeared for the first time on the other side of the border, by which a party, in order to maintain itself in power, hives its opponents in a few constituencies. What was done by the gerrymander Act of 1882 ? The Conservative party in power, led by Sir John A. Macdonald, took some Liberal municipalities from a certain number of counties, and added them to one central county in order to hive the Grits in that county, and to allow a certain number of Conservative candidates to be returned by small majorities in the counties from which the Liberal municipalities had been abstracted. With this system the Conservative party managed to elect a greater number of members than it could expect with the population as it stood within the former county boundaries. The hon. leader of the opposition denies that the Liberal party suffered a grievance in 1882. The hon. gentleman from Westmoreland and the hon. gentleman from Marshfield also deny it. The hon. gentleman from Westmoreland goes further and says that it is hopeless to expect that both parties should ever agree to admit that a wrong was committed in 1882. I know that the parliamentary career of my hon. friend has been a long one, and that he must know the name of a member of parliament who sat for his own province, Mr. C. R. Weldon, of Albert, a professor in the University of Dalhousie. That hon. gentleman was a member of parliament in 1892, a follower of the Conservative ministry, the standard bearer of that very party, I understand, at the last election. How did that hon. gentleman judge the Act of his own party in the House of Commons in 1882 ? Here are his own words as to his appreciation of their work in the redistribution of the counties :

I am one of these members who came into this House at the beginning of the last parliament, five years after the famous redistribution of 1882 was carried. Although a lower province member, I deemed it my duty to look at the statutes of 1872 and 1882, and also at the election returns and the census, to take a map of Ontario and to find out by patient study and by the assistance of some experts, what the merits of the Bill of 1882 exactly were; and I am free to say here now, after having reconstructed the old political map of 1867, and having gone over the counties of Ontario one by one as they were then defined by the British North America Act, and having compared the old map with the map of 1882—having found some townships scattered like flocks of birds, upon which the dogs had pounced, one being here and another being there, so that it was hard to find them and replace them in their old positions—after this study, I am free and frank in saying that I think the Redistribution Act of 1882 was one that reflected very little credit upon the parliament of Canada that passed it.

Another member of parliament, heretofore a strong adherent of the Conservative party, one of the luminaries of the Conservative party at the time, the late D'Alton McCarthy, spoke on the same occasion on this question, and, among other things, he said :

I am not going to apologize for my act in 1882, or to do more than say that I fully realize by this time that in every sense, party and political, that Act was a gross mistake.

And, further on, he added :

We are not showing our faith in English traditions when we copy that infamous system which prevails on the other side of the line.

Now, a gentleman who was in good standing (more so than D'Alton McCarthy) with his party, who if not a minister at the time became shortly after a member of the administration, the Hon. Mr. Dickey, said :

I must say that the Act which was offered to the House in 1882 was a very much better subject for the hon. gentleman's criticism and the hon. gentleman's good feeling than the present Bill, because I do think it argues a very great change of heart in a gentleman who could swallow the Act of 1882 to strain at the present Bill. The hon. gentleman says his stomach is not so good now. I am sorry to hear that after swallowing such a severe dose as he did in 1882 he is not capable of taking the dose in this Bill.

Mr. Davies. I think you make a little face yourself at it.

Mr. Dickey. I must say, although perhaps this is irrelevant, that the Act of 1882 does not commend itself strongly to my judgment. I do not know, but I suppose I would have followed the hon. gentleman from Simcoe, if I had been here, in supporting the Act ; but looking at it through the vista of years, it seems to me a very objectionable Act.

Here is the opinion of a member of the late Conservative administration, looking back through the vista of ten years upon the work and doing of his own party. The hon. member for Marshfield, and the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland in trying to condone the action of their party in 1882, say that the votes recorded do not show that there was such a gross injustice committed towards the Liberal party. I will not go over the figures presented to the House by the hon. Secretary of State, but I take his affirmation that in 1882 a Liberal represented 3,615 electors, and a Conservative 2,445 electors in Ontario and said that these figures, taken from the votes polled in 1882, do not show the exact political strength of the parties in Ontario. When you have hived the electors of a certain stripe in a county to such an extent as to make a contest quite hopeless for the other side—when you have brought municipalities that vote the same way into the same boundaries and give the Liberal candidate, if it happens that he is the one who suffers from that plethora, one thousand or twelve or fifteen hundred or two thousand majority, it will appear when the vote is counted that he has quite a large majority but that the vote polled was small, because few people volunteered to go to the polls knowing the result was a foregone conclusion. Perhaps as many electors remained away because they knew practically there was no contest in that riding. So, when a gerrymander Act is passed, hiving a certain party in certain constituencies, it is unfair to total up the votes recorded for both parties because you have those electors who did not think it worth while going to the polls, because they were sure of their candidate having a walk-over.

I think I have made clear that our mandate to remedy this grievance was clearly expressed by the people. It was not denied by the hon. leader of the opposition in the speech which he made last week. He did not deny that there was a clear mandate to redress the wrong committed in 1882 and 1892, nor did he deny our constitutional power to pass the present measure. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield did deny it, but I venture to affirm that the hon. gentleman is the only man in either this Chamber or the other who has ventured to make that affirmation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—He has declared to us that he had the opinion of a couple of barristers who thought as he does. I would ask him, before this debate closes, to put their names on record, for I do not know yet of any barrister, in this House or the other, who has declared that we have not the constitutional power to pass this measure. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield was happy to be able to state the opinion of the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed), which, according to him, was on similar lines. I did not remember that the hon. gentleman from Calgary had expressed the legal opinion that we had not the power of passing this measure, and looking at his speech I find very little comfort for the hon. gentleman from Marshfield from the remarks of his hon. friend from Calgary. The hon. gentleman from Calgary summed up his argument as follows :—

Any one reading the Confederation Act surely cannot seriously come to the conclusion that the framers of that Act, at the time of its passage, ever contemplated that there could be a disturbance and upheaval of the representation of the constituencies in each province every successive session; because, if you can do it at this period, you can do it every session during the interval of the decennial period.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Under these circumstances, one can very well appreciate the necessity of this House, if it possibly can, laying down a rigid rule, in the language of Sir John Macdonald in 1887, that at no other period than that succeeding the taking of the census should there be a readjustment, or redistribution, or disturbance of constituencies.

The hon. gentleman went as far as the resolution or amendment proposed by his leader went, but did not go further. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield, up to the moment that he closed his speech, seemed to enjoy the fact that he was alone—he seemed to pride himself on the fact that wolves go in packs, but lions hunt alone, yet at the last moment he weakened and declared that this parliament had very great powers indeed, and perhaps by some straining of our powers we could pass a constitutional Bill for, if it were unconstitutional, he would not have added that the Bill could not be overridden by the courts. If we can pass a Bill which cannot be overridden by the courts, we pass a constitutional Bill, and we have the constitutional power to pass it. I find in a leading Conservative paper in Montreal a clear admission that this Bill is constitutional. The Montreal Gazette of March 23rd, says in an article entitled 'The Redistribution Bill':

Parliament's power to redistribute the seats every session is not questioned.

In fact I have followed the debates of the House of Commons during the last session; I have latterly especially examined the opinions of the legal fraternity sitting to the left of the Speaker, and in none did I see the opinion advanced that we had not the constitutional power to pass this measure. The leader of the opposition admitted our power, but thought that he had a good argument to offer for the rejection of this Bill. I took it verbatim. The hon. leader said that the people, although giving us the mandate to repeal these gerrymander Acts did not contemplate that the change should be made before the new census. With all due respect for my hon. friend, I think that that is rather a puerile pretext. The people appeared on the 23rd June, 1896, before what they considered to be a packed jury. They complained of the unfairness of the trial; they declared that a fair trial could only be had on other lines. And yet my hon. friend wants the contending parties to again appear, be it within a year, six months, or two months, before the same packed jury. The hon. leader of the opposition cannot contend that the people in expressly declaring that an undue advantage was taken of one party over the other meant to go a second time within four or five years before that same unfair jury—that same packed jury? That argument of my hon. friend does not commend itself to my judgment, and I do not think if he looks at the article of the Liberal programme which the present government is trying to put into effect, that he will be justified in affirming that the people did not contemplate that a change should be had before the new census. The hon. gentleman accused the Premier of this government of being at times, if not always, inconsistent. I will pay the hon. gentleman the compliment of saying that on this question he is absolutely consistent. He helped to load the dice in 1892, and he thinks that they should remain loaded for the next election. I was considerably amused at the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland asking us if the aim of the present government was not to give an advantage to the Liberal party. The hon. gentleman cannot admit for a moment that a wrong committed by them should be redressed by the Liberal party with the effect of giving an advantage to his opponents. The proof that there was an undoubted advantage taken, outside of the admission of Messrs. Dickey, Weldon and others—is that the party which perpetrated the act clings to that undue advantage. That party does not say to-day that a wrong was committed upon them by this Bill. I have not yet seen in the discussion of the measure that a wrong was inflicted upon any one—no, I have seen the affirmation that the Liberal party would be benefited by it. The whole trend of the speech of the hon. leader of the opposition was that the Conservative party would be harmed by it in the redress of a wrong which he contributed to inflict upon the Liberal party in 1882. The hon. gentleman went considerably into the details of the measure after admitting that we had a mandate from the people to pass this measure, that we had power to pass it, admitting practically the preamble of the Bill, while refusing to pass the second reading, and refer it to the committee. He thinks that the Conservative party would be harmed by it, but he gives the government no chance to examine the measure clause by clause, and he suggests no amendment by which, if there is a grievance committed upon any one, it should be redressed.

The hon. gentleman was surprised that the government touched only counties in the western part of Ontario, and did not readjust the counties in the eastern part of the province. The reason for that is very simple; the grossest outrage committed in 1882 was in western Ontario, and if the eastern part remains intact, I cannot understand why my hon. friend should complain because it remains as he himself left it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not complain.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—My hon. friend brought to the attention of this Chamber a declaration which the Minister of Public Works made in Ontario, that after the gerrymander Act of 1882 and 1892 was recalled, the life of the Conservative party would go out in Ontario. He was scandalized by that remark, yet I think that the Minister of Public Works was quite justified in making that affirmation. Quebec was not gerrymandered by the hon. gentleman and his friends, and his party were nearly wiped out of existence there in the last election. When justice is done in Ontario—I know it will not be at the hands of the Tory majority of this Chamber—but I am quite sure when redress is given the Liberal party in Ontario, very little life will be left in their opponents.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If Quebec was not gerrymandered, what are you interfering with the constituencies for?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—When I say that, I am merely making a declaration which is true in the main, but not absolutely. I am ready to stand by my declaration. There was an attempt made by the Conservative party to gerrymander Quebec, but there was a man leading the House at the time who had not, perhaps, been so long in politics as his predecessors, whose stomach refused to accept that Bill, and he relented; we had for Quebec as unjust a gerrymander as for Ontario, when the Bill was brought down, but there was such a clamour that the Hon. Sir John Thompson desisted from the attempt which his party was forcing on him, and what did he do? Instead of gerrymandering Ste. Hyacinthe, Rouville and other parts of the province of Quebec, he came down like a man and respected the county boundaries. In the only instances in which he departed from the principle of county boundaries, he committed a grievous wrong. He took from the county of Bagot, where both parties were about even, where the majorities did not go beyond 50 or 100—he took the Liberal municipality of St. Pie and hived the Liberals in the county of Rouville, which the present member represents by 900 or 1,000 majority, and where the Conservative candidate lost his deposit. That is a grievance, because an undue advantage was taken by the Conservative party. When we come to Mississquoi, we find it again. The municipality of Stanbridge gave a big Liberal majority. After uniting two Liberal counties, like St. John and Iberville, the Conservative party was not satisfied with that but took the municipality of Stanbridge from Mississquoi and hived the Liberals in Iberville and St. John. They took from the other side of the river the parish of Lacolle, which was in St. John County, which had given 60 majority to the Conservatives in the previous election, and added it to Missisquoi, and when you look at the present Bill you will find that it is such wrongs as these which the present government is trying to undo. Who will deny that taking St. Pie from Rouville and restoring it to Bagot will work an advantage to the Liberal party, but we are remedying a wrong which was committed in 1882, and we say we have an express mandate to come before parliament and obtain redress of that wrong.

The hon. gentlemen from Marshfield and Westmoreland are surprised that we should ask, only one year before the census is taken, to make a new redistribution. If we are with in a year, or six months of the census, what difference does it make if it appears we are to have a general election intervening and that elections should be held on a fairer basis ?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Justice is a great thing.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Justice is a great thing when the Conservatives apply it to their own party, but works havoc when applied to the other one. Every one knows that before another census is taken we shall have a general election. What is the object of the redistribution of the seats and readjustment of the proportion of the electors in each county, if it is not to have a fair representation of the people ; and if we go back to the people with a packed jury, have we followed the desire expressed by the majority of the electorate who rule this country ? I say, no. I wonder how two parties in a civil case, appearing before a jury which was declared irregularly called, would like to be confronted with the same state of things if they were brought into court and asked to have their trial before the same jury because there was no time to call another jury, or for some other cause or pretext. The hon. member for Westmoreland spoke of the respect we owe to precedent, and to the traditions which have grown up, and which form part, sometimes, of the constitution. In this present instance, we are dealing with a constitution which is new, which has not lasted centuries, and besides, we are dealing with a written law which cannot be set aside for practice. But, upon what practice does my hon. friend want to rely in order to set aside the whole constitution ? Upon the fact that we have had no such measure before parliament since confederation. It is very easy to explain why we have had no such measure. In 1872, the county boundaries were respected. In 1882, the outrage of which we complain was perpetrated. There has been no chance to bring forward such a measure since 1882, for the party that committed the outrage, and which at every following election, benefited by it, would take very good care, being the majority in both branches of the legislature, to prevent any change. We are here dealing with new conditions. The party that benefited by the packed jury instituted in 1882 is now in the minority in the other branch of the legislature, where the people have a word to say in the choosing of its representatives and in the mandate that it gives them, and I wonder if in the face of the expressed will of the people, this Chamber will consent to allow public opinion to be tested within six months or a year, before the same packed jury, with the same loaded dice which won the game to the Tories in 1882. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield spoke of the letter of the constitution, and discussed article 51. I shall say but one word on that point. Article 51 in the constitution deals with what ? With representation according to population. Why was it enacted ? It was enacted at a time when the provinces were coming together—when considerable friction had already taken place in the country over the question of representation by population—when Ontario was increasing, manifestly, considerably, and in the compact made between the provinces a clause was inserted dealing with representation according to population, and giving a chance to the province that showed an increase of population to have an increased representation. This is the only reason for article 51, and the proof that it is limited to this question is, in spite of the question put by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, who seems to doubt it, that we are not obliged after every census to make a readjustment of the population. We are not obliged after every census to pass a Redistribution Bill. We are only to do so, if there has been a change in the population of the provinces. Article 51 is there in order to give a right to the province that has an increase of population to obtain increased representation, but it does not go further, and when we want to bring about an equilibrium between the population of the counties, we then act under our sovereign powers. The hon. leader of the opposition closed his remarks by declaring that he would move the six months' hoist, and fight against the measure, because he considered it was not in the interest of the country. I thought there would be a slip of the tongue which would express clearly his mind, after laying down the premises of his speech and that he would declare that he would vote against the measure, because it is not in the interest of his party.

The factious opposition offered, and which will be offered by the Tory majority of this Chamber, is all the more offensive and inexcusable because it deals with the constitution of the other Chamber. When the infamous Act of 1882 was brought before this Chamber, I quite understand that some hon. member got up and protested against the measure, and if a similar measure was brought down by the present government before this Chamber, I would quite understand that members of this Chamber would protest against it; and even if this present Bill contained some apparent or real grievance, I would quite understand how some hon. gentlemen would move in committee to have it redressed, but it is not that which is done. It is simply the rejection of the measure, until another election takes place with the unfair redistribution of the past. I have already expressed my opinion on this question, but the gross partisanship which will be exhibited by the rejection of this measure will fully justify the people who endorsed this part of the Liberal programme on the 23rd of June, 1896, and which reads as follows:

9. The present constitution of the Senate is inconsistent with the federal principle in our system of government, and is in other respects defective, as it makes the Senate independent of the people, and uncontrolled by the public opinion of the country, and should be so amended as to bring it into harmony with the principles of popular government.

I know that the hon. gentlemen, as long as they remain in the majority in this Chamber, will care no more for this declaration of the people than the preceding one; I know that, solidly sitting here in a compact majority, the Tory opposition in this Chamber will fight to the last to uphold the Conservative party and to retain the undue advantages which it has put on the statute-book; but it seems to me, when we are dealing with a question affecting the constitution of the other Chamber, that it speaks ill for the independence of the members of this Chamber who cannot rise above blind partisanship.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Last year a Bill similar to the one now under discussion was introduced in this House and rejected, not on the ground that the Senate had not the power to pass it, but because it was found inexpedient and against the spirit of our constitution to alter the electoral divisions of the Dominion on the eve of the decennial census. After each decennial census it becomes the imperative duty of this parliament to readjust the representation of the provinces so as to comply with the exigencies set forth by the result of the census. This House found, last year, that we were then too near the census, which has to be taken in 1901, to make for two years only such changes as would become imperative at the end of twenty-four months. Leaving aside for the moment the constitutional aspect of the question then submitted for our consideration, and all the arguments brought forward, we arrived at the conclusion that it was better in the interests of peace and sound government to postpone our acceptance of such legislation until the census was taken, and when we should be in a position to do justice to the case. Consequently, the Bill did not pass. That first-born child, the cherished son of the constitutional love of the Minister of Justice, had not constitution enough to breathe the pure air of justice and fair play. And he died in the hands of his father, killed no doubt, choked, it is evident, under the weight of all the utterances made in by-gone days of the leading men of the present administration. He was buried with all the honours, under a majority of twenty-four votes, the chief mourners being the hon. Minister of Justice, the Secretary of State, the senior member for Halifax, and my hon. friend the member for De Lorimier. Nine months have not yet lapsed since that lamentable event, when another child, a second son of the constitutional affections of the present administration, is again presented to us, introduced in this Chamber by its putative father, the Minister of Justice. He is the real image of the one who died last year. He has the same features. The Minister of Justice has given him the same name and the hon. Secretary of State has just murmured to the dear little one the same cradle song. And what is the song? The dominant note of it is that this branch of parliament must accept the views of the lower House, and consequently adopt the Bill now submitted for our deliberation in the form in which it is presented. The argument of the hon. minister is a very simple one in his mind. It relies upon, and takes its strength from the principle laid down by his colleague the Minister of Justice, and which is so convenient in the present hour for party purposes. The principle is that the House of Commons have the right and the power to pass such legislation, and that the Senate has the power, but not the right to defeat it. That fallacious principle has been pulverized and in the most proper way by the hon. gentleman from Richmond (Mr. Miller), who pointed out and victoriously demonstrated that with and within our written constitution, which has been given to Canada by the Imperial parliament, every distinct power conferred upon this Senate implies an equal right as well. No one can dispute that with the single exception of being unable to originate Bills for appropriating money, or any part of the public revenue, or for imposing any tax, this House has the power and the right to take the stand it deems convenient in the interest of peace, order and good government in Canada. This is precisely what we are doing to-day. In the interest of peace, order and good government we will reject the measure submitted to us if such a measure is not in the public interest, but merely brought forward to foster the interests of a party. My contention is that the present Bill is not in the public interest, but solely in the interests of the Liberal party; but before proving this proposition, let me answer one or two assertions made by the hon. Secretary of State in the speech he delivered in this House on Friday last. Here is the first statement made by the hon. minister in his opening remarks in this House. Referring to this discussion on the Redistribution Bill which took place in this House last year, he said:

> We had this discussion last session where parliament, after having a readjustment in 1892, made a redistribution of no less than ten seats in 1893. The electoral districts of Nipissing, Ottawa City, Labelle, Hochelaga, Rouville, Chambly, Verchères, Bagot, Richelieu, St. Hyacinthe and Provencher; those were dealt with differently from the way they had been dealt with in 1892. Nobody challenged the right of parliment to make these changes. It was then called a Bill to amend the Act for the Representation of the House of Commons, and the Bill before the House to-day is to amend the Act respecting representation in the House of Commons. The very fact of our having in 1893, after having had a decennial census in 1892, when we made certain changes and alterations in the Redistribution Bill of 1892 is sufficient evidence that this parliament has claimed the power in the past to deal with this question.

This quotation contains an assertion of facts and an argument based upon these facts. I will not answer the arguments. I need not do so if I prove that the facts upon which the argument is based are not correctly stated. The assertion made by the hon. minister was made with such angelic candor, with such a sanctimonious appearance of truth, with a tone of such mellifluous sweetness that the House was caught by it and no one dare suppose for one moment that it could be anything else but the truth which was then falling from the lips of the hon. minister. It must be a very poor measure that needs to be defended by such assertions. With the permission of the House I will take issue with the hon. minister. If the hon. minister was in his place I would ask him to-day if he asserts again that notwithstanding the legislation which took place in 1892 in connection with the redistribution of seats in the House of Commons, a new, distinct and different Bill was introduced in 1893, and that no less than ten electoral districts were dealt with, as he said, differently from the way they had been dealt with in 1892. What are the facts? In 1893 a Bill, chapter 9 of 59 Victoria, intituled 'An Act to amend the Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons,' was passed. As the hon. minister said ten or eleven constituencies were dealt with by that Act, but it was merely to correct clerical errors which are to be found in the legislation of the previous year. I will take the language of that Act. The first electoral division which the Act amends is the electoral district of Nipissing. When the Bill was presented in the House of Commons there was very little discussion. In fact no discussion took place. The Bill was presented by Sir John Thompson, who moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 42) to amend the Representation Act. He said :

This is a short Bill which I introduce for the purpose of amending the Representation Act of last session in certain particulars, which are of a clerical character, and which merely relate to the correction of the boundaries without making any change in any of the principles on which the Act was founded. The first section was more accurately to define the boundary lines of the electoral district of Nipissing. It enumerates the parishes and gives the boundaries with more technical accuracy.

That is all with regard to that first section. When the Bill went into committee on the 2nd March, 1893, Sir John Thompson added these words :

I desire to call attention to the reasons for the first section. The boundary line for the province of Ontario has been altered since the district of Nipissing was established, and the Bill, as introduced last year, did not extend the limit in accordance with the new boundary line. I am informed by the law clerk, by whom the Bill has been prepared, that the boundaries named in the Bill, in so far as they are named, are taken from the Ontario statutes, and otherwise —that is to say, as regards the new boundary of the province itself—he has followed the line closely as it can be traced on the map in accordance with the description contained in the Imperial statutes as to the boundaries of Ontario. I desire to amend this clause by inserting at the end a few words which were accidentally omitted in drafting the Bill, and which are in the present Act.

And he goes on reading the amendment that he proposed. This amendment was accepted by the House of Commons without any opposition. The second amendment in the law of 1893, reads as follows :

The paragraph lettered 'P' of the said subsection (2) of section 2, is hereby repealed, and the following substituted therefor:
The electoral district of the city of Ottawa shall consist of the city of Ottawa, except that part thereof known as New Edinburgh; and shall return two members.

What is the meaning of the amendment ? We find it in the explanations given by Sir John Thompson in his speech in the House of Commons on the 16th February, 1893. This second section was to correct an error in respect to the city of Ottawa as stated by Sir John Thompson. While the Bill was in committee the committee adopted the section correcting a clerical error which had been committed concerning the electoral district of the city of Ottawa, when the passage of the previous distribution Act took place. The law clerk in placing the amended subsection placed it as a paragraph to a section which provided that the places thereinafter mentioned should return one representative. This would have had the effect of depriving the city of Ottawa of one of its members ; therefore, we provided by the legislation of 1893 that the city of Ottawa shall return two members, as it had the right to do before the mistake had taken place. That is the meaning of the second section of that Act. It is just to put the city of Ottawa in a position to entitle it to have two members in place of one, which it would have had if the error had not been corrected. The third section reads as follows :

The paragraph lettered "B" of subsection 3 of the said section 2 is hereby amended by substituting the word "east" for the word "west' in the 10th line thereof.

What does that mean ? Sir John in his speech said :

Then there is an amendment substituting the word "east" for the word "west," in order to correct an error in respect to the boundary between new districts in the county of Ottawa.

So far we do not see that the assertion of the hon. Secretary of State is correct when he said this Bill was quite a different Bill from the one introduced in 1892. The 4th section reads :

The paragraph lettered "G" of the said subsection 3 of section 2 is hereby repealed, and the following substituted therefor:
(G) The electoral district of Hochelaga shall consist of the towns of Ste. Cunegonde, St. Henri and Cote St. Antoine, and of St. Gabriel Ward, in the city of Montreal.

It is merely a correction, and here is the correction explained in the speech made by Sir John Thompson :

In the next section we will correct a mistake in the electoral district of Hochelaga, providing that it shall consist of the towns of Ste. Cunegonde, Cote St. Antoine, St. Henri, and St. Gabriel Ward, in the city of Montreal. The Act of last session described them as being wards of a city, but St. Gabriel Ward only is such.

Section 5, of the Act of 1893, says :

The paragraph lettered "R" of the said subsection 3 of section 2 is hereby repealed, and the following substituted therefor:
The electoral district of Rouville shall consist of the village of St. Cesaire, Marieville, Richelieu and Canrobert, and the parishes of St. Pie, St. Paul, L'Ange Gardien, St. Cesaire, Notre Dame de Bonsecours, St. Michel de Rougemont, St. Jean Baptiste, St. Hilaire, St. Angele, Ste. Marie de Monnoir and St. Mathias.

In the discussion which took place in committee on the 2nd of March, 1893, it was explained that this section merely introduced the parish of Notre Dame de Bonsecours which had been entirely left out in the previous Act. Section 6 reads as follows:

The paragraph lettered "S" of the said subsection 3 of section 2 is hereby repealed, and the following substituted therefor:

The electoral districts of Chambly and Verchères shall consist of the town of Longueuil and the village of Verchères, Boucherville, Chambly Basin, Chambly Canton, Varennes, the municipality of St. Lambert, and the parishes of Boucherville, Chambly, Longueuil, St. Basile le Grand, St. Bruno, St. Hubert, Varennes, Ste. Julie, Verchères, Contrecœur, Ste. Theodosie, St. Antoine, St. Marc and Belœil.

The error corrected by the substitution of this section for the paragraph of the law passed in the previous year, is this: In the year 1892 the Act stated that the electoral district of Chambly shall consist of the town of Longueuil, etc., while it should have said the electoral district of Chambly and Verchères, as the two counties had been united, so that the clerical error was in the omission of the word 'Verchères,' and this clerical error was corrected by the legislation of 1893, and so on with each one of the different paragraphs that follow. There is not a single paragraph enacted by chap. 9 of 56 Victoria, passed in 1893, which is not the correction of a clerical error in the statutes of 1892, and I defy my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, to controvert that. I think I have given undeniable proof to the entire satisfaction of this House that the first assertion of the hon. Secretary of State is not warranted by the facts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What is the title of the Act of 1893?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is chapter 9 of 56 Victoria.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And it reads 'An Act to amend the Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons.'

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Where is the point?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is amending the Act of 1882.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly. Is that all? That is amending and correcting the clerical errors.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, the statute does not say so. It alters the boundaries in ten constituencies.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is the hon. Minister of Justice able to prove that all these corrections of this law of 1893 are anything else but correcting the errors of the law of 1892? If he can, I will allow him to do so now. He is unable to do it. I challenge him to prove it. Let him take time to do it now.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I purpose doing it when the time comes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman may take as much time as he requires to give me an answer to one of my inquiries and he cannot do it. What is there in a title? The hon. gentleman is unable to sustain his assertion. I have the law here.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have it here also and what the law does is to amend the Bill of the previous year. The hon. gentleman is contending that parliament has not the power to do it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What was the assertion of the hon. Secretary of State? Speaking of the ten counties, he said: 'Those were dealt with differently from the way they had been dealt with in 1892.' Nobody challenged the right of parliament to make these changes. It was called a Bill to amend the Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—My hon. friend asked me the title of it. He did not know it, although I had just read it before. 'The very fact,' said the Secretary of State, 'of having, in 1893, made certain changes and alterations in the Redistribution Act of 1892, is sufficient evidence that this parliament has claimed the power in the past to deal with this question.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But the hon. Secretary of State goes further and asserts that the amendments brought forward in 1893 gave to the Act of 1892 a different appearance. As the hon. minister puts it, it is a new amendment. It is not an amendment to correct certain errors, but it is an amendment to change the boundaries of the constituencies in another way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is what it does.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I say it does not, and I defy the hon. minister to prove the contrary. He is not able to do it. He may say 'hear, hear,' all night. He may laugh as long as he likes, but he is unable, as a constitutional authority, or as a minister, or as a lawyer, or as anything you please, to prove that I am not right, and when the hon. Secretary of State comes to this House and says that the Conservative party in 1893 undertook to readjust the counties, he says what the title may sustain, for he is playing on words, but what the corpus of the Act does not warrant.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Where ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All through it. It changes the descriptions.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It takes New Edinburgh out of this city, of which it was a part, and places it elsewhere. Read that provision.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Paragraph 2 says that the electoral district of the city of Ottawa shall consist of the city of Ottawa, except that part thereof known as New Edinburgh.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is substituted for subsection 2 of section 2 of the Act of 1892. That subsection reads :

The electoral district of the city of Ottawa shall consist of the city of Ottawa except that part thereof known as New Edinburgh.

Where is the change ? Where is the 'hear, hear' of the hon. minister now?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman will hear the explanation by and by.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The explanation is nowhere unless it is to be found in the Magna Charta of the Minister of Justice, I suppose.

At six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When the House rose at recess, I was trying to explain to the Minister of Justice what took place in the case of the amendments of the law of 1892, respecting the city of Ottawa. He did not seem to understand me, so I may be allowed to make a few additional remarks.

By chapter 6 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intituled, 'An Act respecting Representation in the House of Commons,' the city of Ottawa was given two members. We find this in paragraph D of subsection 2 of section 3, which reads as follows :—

The cities of Ottawa and Hamilton shall each respectively form an electoral district, and shall each return two members.

That was the enactment of the Revised Statutes of 1886, such as passed by this House. Section 2 of the Act of 1892—55-56 Victoria, chapter 11, 'An Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons'—reads as follows :—

Section 2. The said provinces respectively shall, for the purposes of the election of members to serve in the House of Commons, be divided into electoral districts established by the Representation Act, and by this Act ; each of the electoral districts hereby constituted shall, unless hereinafter otherwise provided, return one member ; and each of the now existing electoral districts shall remain constituted and represented as it now is, except in so far as it is altered by the following provisions, that is to say.

Following that is subsection 2, which, in paragraph (a) says : 'The electoral district of the city of Ottawa shall consist of the city of Ottawa, except that part thereof known as New Edinburgh.' By this Act of 1892, Ottawa was placed on the list of comstituencies as entitled to one member. That was an error, and that error was rectified subsequently, in 1893, by the Act passed that year, 56 Victoria. Section 2 of the Act reads as follows :—

Paragraph letter P of the said subsection two of section two is hereby repealed and the following substituted : The electoral district of Ottawa shall consist of the city of Ottawa except that part thereof known as New Edinburgh.

It is a repetition of the words in the former Act, with this addition, 'and shall return two members.' That is the correction. Now, the hon. Minister of Justice said, before recess, that the Act of 1893 took out of the city of Ottawa that part called New Edinburgh. With the facts as I have stated, I hope the hon. gentleman will see his error and will candidly admit it. He will see that he has no right to contend that the law of 1893 enacted anything new, or made a new division, or took away from Ottawa a portion of its area, as determined by the Act of 1892. I see, by the silence with which the hon. gentleman is fortifying himself, that he assents to what I say, and that he is now fully convinced of the eror of his ways.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. Minister does not say 'Hear, hear.' He admits the correctness of my statement, I suppose. I shall now refer to the hon. minister's colleague, the Secretary of State. That hon. gentleman, uniting his forces with those of the hon. Minister of Justice, found out that, after all, the Act of 1893 was a new Act, amending the old Act of 1892. As was stated in the House of Commons at the time when that Bill was introduced by the Minister of Justice, Sir John Thompson, the Act was merely 'a short Bill which I introduce for the purpose of amending the Representation Act of last session in certain particulars which are of a clerical character and nothing else.'

Mr. Laurier—now Sir Wilfrid—was in the House at the time, and made a speech of three lines, not to oppose the Bill, but to accept it. When the Bill went into committee, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said nothing at all. The committee rose and reported, and the Bill was read the third time and passed. There was no opposition to it, nothing of 'the mandate from the people' to oppose it, and nothing of 'the gross injustice done to the Liberal party which is now pressed upon us.' We heard nothing of the kind. I do not know that the hon. Minister of Justice was in the House of Commons in 1893, but if he was a member of that House, the debate on that question does not seem to indicate that he had a voice in the discussion which took place. He was mute on that occasion, as he is mute now. I come now to the second assertion made by the hon. Secretary of State in his speech delivered on Friday last. He spoke as follows :—

I come now to the consequences of the Act of 1882, because after all it was the consequences that we aimed at in the passage of the Act of 1882, and I take up a return here that was prepared by the last government.

We never saw anything of the kind, but I suppose his ipse dixit must be accepted and we must believe that the government of the day prepared a return which the hon. minister alone had in his hands. He proceeds :—

I have here the total vote on the lists of 1882 polled by each party . . . . The Conservative vote in 1882 was 140,025, the Liberal vote, 133,771. The Conservative majority, even after all the manipulating of the constituencies was only 6,254 in the province of Ontario. . . . The Conservatives elected 55 members and the Liberals 37, making a majority of 18, for the Conservatives. Now, what would it require to elect the Liberal member ? The Liberal member required 3,614 votes and the Conservatives required 2,546. Therefore in that year the Liberals required 1,100 electors more than required by the Conservatives. I ask was that a proper thing ? Take the year 1887. The vote polled by the Conservative party was 181,726, the Liberal vote 176,281, leaving a Conservative majority of 5,445. Of these figures the Liberals represented 4,638 electors, and each Conservative represented 3,365 electors. In other words, each Liberal had 1,300 more electors behind him than the Conservatives. I simply put those figures before the people of Canada, and I ask whether they do not speak more eloquently than any logic as to the effect of the gerrymander of 1882. There is just the result of it and there is no denying the figures.

As a matter of logic I do not assume that the Secretary of State is an authority in the matter, but let us go on. What inference is to be drawn from the utterances of the hon. minister? It was that the Representation Act of 1882 was manifestly unjust in its consequences, therefore in its principle. But the hon. minister was not fair in his argument, for he took great care not to show to this House all the consequences which flow from the Representation Act of 1882. Why did he not bring forward and show to this House the consequences which the elections of 1891 and 1896 have demonstrated? Let us take the general election of 1896 only. What are the figures? Ontario elected 92 members, forty-eight of which were Liberals, and 44 Conservatives, giving in the representation of that province in the House of Commons a majority of 4 members for the Liberal party, though the Conservative party, as a matter of fact, managed to obtain a majority of the voters of that province. This simple fact is a complete answer to the contention of the hon. minister that the Act of 1892 must be considered as an unjust one because of its consequences as shown by the two general elections of 1882 and 1891. I will not leave this subject without answering another assertion, made last year and repeated this year during the present debate, with regard to the character of the measure that is now submitted to us. It has been said that the Bill is intended to redress the injustice done by the Act of 1882 and, further, that this measure was promised to the electorate at the last general election. I will not take the time of the House in giving a general answer which would involve the studying of the old Act as applicable to each province of the Dominion. I shall confine my remarks to the province of Quebec and to make them as short as possible, I will give to the House the opinion of an hon. gentleman of our province fully cognizant of the facts and who is generally accepted as one of the chief organizers of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec. Here are his utterances as we find them in the Debates of the Senate of last session, page 869. He said :

Without going into the details of the gerrymander of the province of Ontario, I will give hon. gentlemen an illustration of what is a just law and what is an unjust law in the province of Quebec. In 1892 the province of Quebec was threatened with a gerrymander. Some crazy quilt work had been prepared in order to hive the Grits and to benefit the Conservative party. The lines of certain counties were being twisted to suit party ends. It was exposed in the House of Commons in such a thorough manner that it touched the conscience of Sir John Thompson.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Hear, hear

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That happens with people who have consciences.

The quotation proceeds :—

Who rebelled and receded from the stand taken by a certain number of his friends in their efforts to gerrymander the province of Quebec. Yet there remained one injustice and under that injustice the people of that province have ever since been smarting. One municipality was purposely taken from the county of Bagot to be thrown into the county of Rouville, in order to hive the Grits in that county. The county of Bagot was a close one, where the winning candidate was generally elected with a majority of less than one hundred. The Liberal parish of Ste. Pie, giving 200 of a majority was thrown into the Liberal county of Rouville. What was the result ? The Conservative candidate in Bagot was elected by acclamation, in 1896, and the Liberal candidate in Rouville was returned by 900 of a majority, the Conservative candidate losing his deposit. I have stated that when the Bill of 1892 was brought down the province of Quebec was to get quite a large dose of gerrymander, but what did Sir John Thompson do when the dishonest intention of some of his colleagues were exposed ? Instead of twisting Vercheres and Chambly in order to gain party advantage in two or three counties, shoving one municipality from Chambly into Rouville, and taking another municipality from Rouville into Chambly, he decided to honestly readjust the representation in the province of Quebec, and what have we on the statute-book ? We have the boundaries of Chambly and Vercheres respected. These two counties were simply united. They were neighbouring counties. We have not heard one complaint in the province of Quebec, because those counties, which it is true, were represented by two Liberals and could subsequently elect but one Liberal, were united. The county boundaries had been respected and no one complained. Sir John Thompson took Napierville and Laprairie, which were neighbouring counties and united them and no one grumbled. He took St. John and Iberville and united them, respecting the boundary lines and no one complained. It is true those counties never returned a Conservative. They had elected two Liberals, but now they only return one. The county boundary being respected, no one has raised his voice against the operation of that Act, with the same lines as laid down in the present Bill. As I have just remarked, the only time when an injustice was done was when St. Pie was taken purposely from Bagot to make secure that county for Mr. Dupont. It was taken and thrown into Rouville. We are simply taking St. Pie and returning it to Bagot.

That was the utterance of the hon. gentleman. Where is the gross injustice done to the province. Where is the mandate of the people ? We went to the elections. Where is the plank of their platform ? The hon. member read it, but he did not understand it. I shall read it for him. This was passed at the convention of the Liberal party which took place in Ottawa in 1893. It was resolved :

That by the gerrymander Act the electoral divisions for the return of members of the House of Commons have been so made as to prevent a fair expression of the opinion of the country at the general election and to secure to the party now in Ottawa a strength out of all proportion greater than the number of electors supporting them would warrant. To put an end to this abuse, to make the House of Commons a fair exponent of public opinion, and preserve the work of continuity it is desirable that in the formation of the electoral divisions, county boundaries should be preserved and that in no case parts of counties should be put in one electoral division.

That is the resolution which was passed at the Liberal convention which took place in 1893. The convention said that they wanted to prevent further abuse. What is done to-day ? Honourable gentlemen are coming with the same abuse with which they reproached their adversaries. The hon. Minister of Justice asks us not to restore the boundaries in the province of Quebec. He is detaching parts of townships from some counties to throw them into other constituencies. Does the hon. minister deny that ? I think he will have a fight with the hon. gentleman from de Lorimier.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Take paragraph 3, subsection. What does that subsection say ? That subsection takes off

All that part of the township of Stanfold, to wit : the first twelve lots in the first three ranges, and the first ten lots in the fourth and fifth ranges, the first four lots in the sixth range, and the first two lots in the seventh range of the said township, is transferred from the electoral district of Drummond and Arthabaska to the electoral district of Megantic.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How about that ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. minister say no ? He says yes now.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I do not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is not that taking part of a township from a constituency to throw it into another constituency ?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Of which it formed part

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. minister cannot answer. He admits it ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I do not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But he is unable to answer. What about the parishes of St. Guillaume d'Upton and St. Bonaventure d'Upton ? Those two parishes, which since confederation have always voted in the electoral districts of Drummond and Arthabaska, are taken away from that district and transferred to the electoral district of Yamaska.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—To which they belong both for provincial and municipal elections.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—To which they belong. They belong to Yamaska.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Since when ? They will belong to Yamaska if this Bill becomes law. It is not correcting an error of preceding legislation. Who ever heard a single word of clamour in the province of Quebec about these parishes ? No one grumbled, said the hon. minister, no one found fault with anything there, and this change is proposed, not with a view of undoing a wrong, but merely with a view of serving party interests. If that is not the view, what is the view ? The hon. minister shakes his head, but he does not know what answer to give me. He must rely on the hon. member for de Lorimier.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I do not. I shall answer the hon. gentleman at the proper time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But the proper time will never come. This Bill will be killed before the proper time comes, and the answer will be of no use. The proper time is now. Now is the proper time to show to this side of the House that the hon. gentleman is right, and I am in the wrong. Now is the proper time to impress on their judgment that the Bill before the House is a proper Bill and not one merely for party purposes. This is the proper time. I say that these two parishes since confederation have always been in the counties of Drummond and Arthabaska. Is that true or not ?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then let us have the answer.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Those parishes belong, for municipal purposes, to the county of Yamaska and have always belonged to it since confederation, and we are simply restoring county boundary lines.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is it not a fact that for federal purposes since confederation, with the assent of both parties in parliament, during the Macdonald administration, during the Mackenzie administration, during every administration since then, these parishes have always been in the counties of Drummond and Arthabaska for federal purposes ?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I cannot say from what day they have been taken from Yamaska and put into Drummond and Arthabaska, but one thing of which I am sure is that it is always time to re-establish county boundaries. Those people have all their dealings with Yamaska county, and there is no reason why they should be in that immense united county, Drummond and Arthabaska, when they naturally belong to a much smaller county.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That does not answer my question. That is a side issue. I am saying that the federal counties, Drummond and Arthabaska——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no federal county.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They are a united county for federal purposes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman knows that it is only for electoral purposes, and that is what we are fighting against.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is only the title. When we bring in an Act to amend an Act to amend clerical errors, and an hon. gentleman with his constitutional reputation sticks to a quibble like that, to maintain his pretension, I do not accept his definition of federal and local constituencies. The hon. gentleman knows that those two townships have always been for federal purposes in Drummond and Arthabaska, and to-day, for party purposes, he takes them out of those counties to put them into the county of Yamaska.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Where they belong.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman from de Lorimier (Mr. Dandurand) spoke of the mandate of the people. He said he went before the people in 1896, and came here with a mandate. I took down his words. He said that at that time they appeared before a packed and irregular jury with loaded dice. That was his expression. Here is a party that appears before a packed and irregular jury, and then they come here boasting that they have a mandate from a packed and irregular jury. What is the mandate worth? Nothing at all. If the jury was packed and irregular, I do not accept the mandate ; but I deny that such a mandate was given. The majority from the province of Quebec form the working majority of the administration. If they did not have that majority they would not have a majority in the House of Commons. There was one mandate given in the province of Quebec and that was to do justice to the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba, and all the friends of my hon. friend who wanted to succeed in being elected to parliament were obliged to sign a document or pledge their word that they would do for the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba more than the late administration had done. That was the mandate. Not a word was said about the boundary lines or Representation Act. The hon. gentleman knows it very well. There never was a mandate of the people on that question, and at all events if there was a mandate, it was the mandate of a packed and irregular jury who were playing with loaded dice.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Prepared by yourselves.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—As has been said, this legislation is merely proposed to be enacted for party purposes. It has not the character of public interest attached to it. If the principle advocated by the Minister of Justice is a good principle, why does he confine it to a few counties in the province of Ontario ? Why does he confine it to a few counties in the province of Quebec ? I may add this in addition to the assertion made by the hon. gentleman from de Lorimier that if a parish which, in a local constituency, is in one county and in the federal constituency in another county, should be placed in a county as for local purposes, why does he not do the same thing for certain parishes in the county of Yamaska and Nicolet? There are parishes there which have lately been annexed to Yamaska by the local legislature. Why does he not come with a similar measure and enact the same thing here ?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—It could be done in committee very well.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In one case they must serve party purposes, and that is the whole object of the Bill. As I said before, the Bill is confined to a certain part of the province of Ontario, but if that principle is good it should be extended, not only to the whole province of Ontario, but to the whole Dominion. It should be a general law for the peace, order and good government of Canada. It is not so in the present instance, and for that reason I shall be obliged to record my vote against the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not intend to detain the House at very great length, but I have a few remarks to offer on three or four very important points in this discussion, and the present, perhaps, is as suitable a time for doing so as I could select. My opinion of this discussion has been that the details of the measure should be debated by the gentlemen whose provinces are interested in the Bill, and who are certainly better acquainted with these details than those of us in the outside provinces, while the representatives of those provinces not affected by the Bill should maintain a judicial attitude towards the Bill, hear the arguments that are urged by the representatives from Ontario, Quebec and Prince Edward Island, in which a gerrymander is alleged to be contemplated under this Bill, and form their conclusion from the arguments adduced for and against the measure. Following this view of the case, I intend to confine my remarks to three or four important constitutional points in the discussion of this Bill, some of which not only refer to this measure, but to many other Bills which come from the House of Commons to this body for consideration. I can well afford to adopt this course because hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the opposition side on this question have made such able and exhaustive speeches, from the hon. leader of the opposition to my hon. friend from Stadacona (Mr. Landry) who has just resumed his seat, that I think on the demerits, of the Bill alone this House must be satisfied there is but one course open to it, and that is to support the motion of the hon. leader of the opposition for the six months' hoist. I was amused indeed at the many quotations made by the hon. member for Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson) during his able speech on Thursday and Friday, from past utterances of the leader of this House. I was amused to find that the hon. Minister of Justice had so completely boxed the compass on the constitutional question that the position he occupies to-day is certainly not the position he occupied in discussions elsewhere, and it astonished the Senate to find that a gentleman whom we all looked upon as a safe authority on constitutional matters should waver, as he was shown to have done by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield the other day. However, I recollect an incident which occurred some time ago when the hon. gentleman was a member of the House of Commons. I happened to be in the gallery on one occasion when my hon. friend made an able and exhaustive argument against the government of the day, when Sir John Thompson was Minister of Justice. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) denounced with all the force of argument he could command the use of the word 'viceroy' in connection with the Governor General.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—He held the House entranced for half an hour, during his eloquent denunciation on that subject. When he sat down, Sir John Thompson got up in that quiet way of his and read from Hansard of a few years before the language of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills) of which his then speech was as full and complete a contradiction as words could express.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman is mistaken. He read from Lord Dufferin's speech.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The House broke into peals of laughter, and I do my hon. friend the justice to say that no one laughed more heartily than himself. He had forgotten his position of some years before and completely contradicted all he then had advanced. I mention the incident to show that my hon. friend when he speaks on constitutional grounds cannot always be serious. He takes advantage of his reputation as a constitutional lawyer, to make assertions on constitutional law which will not bear the test of investigation.

The first point I intend to take is, that there is no mandate from the people to pass this Redistribution Bill. There is no mandate from the people which can for a moment be considered obligatory on this Senate. There is no mandate from the people which constitutional usage in England would regard as obligatory on the House of Lords, to accept a bill which either of these second chambers considered unwise, unjust and contrary to the well-being of the tate. It is important that the Senate should have a clear understanding of its rights powers and privileges in relation to what is familiarly known as mandates from the electorate, and I shall therefore endeavour to state what a mandate from the people should be to claim the acquiescence and submission of this House. The first requisite of such a mandate should be that it embodied with unmistakable certainty the wishes of the people.

At the last general election the Liberal party went to the country on a platform containing many planks—I forget the exact number, but at least a dozen planks.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I think more than that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Thirteen.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—They carried them all out, all the same.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There was a plank in favour of free trade as they have it in England. Did they get a mandate from the people on that ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, thirty-three and one-third per cent.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—They went to the country with another plank—the reduction of the taxation of the people, and I suppose they got a mandate from the electors on that subject.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—And carried it out.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is not pertinent to my argument on the present occasion whether they fulfilled their promises or not, although a great many people declare they did not, and the country will ere long decide that question. They also inserted in their political platform a plank in favour of the reduction of the public expenditures. It is to be presumed the Liberal party got more or less votes on every one of the planks in their electioneering platform. In fact, it is well understood, that every one of their planks was adopted with the view of catching votes, and that each of them did catch votes there can be no doubt. That was the chief purpose they were intended to serve. By an aggregation of the votes cast on the thirteen planks of their platform, the Liberal party secured a majority in the House of Commons, which brought them into power. But who can say, with unmistakable certainty, that on any single one of these planks they secured a majority of the electorate. Therefore, the position I take is, that so far as the Liberal party are concerned when they succeeded at the polls, and got a majority of the electors to support their platform—in bulk, if I may use that expression—they, as a party, were committed to each and all of these planks. The Liberal party, so far as the House of Commons was concerned, had, individually and collectively, a mandate to them from the people which that party was bound to respect. But, I say emphatically, that there was no mandate, with all the conditions of absolute certainty indispensable to its force and validity, such as this Senate should feel itself called upon to obey—in opposition to its own convictions, in regard to any one single plank of that platform. I contend that this House is not bound to submit to any alleged mandate from the electors that does not possess all the requisites of absolute certainty, and that the only way in which these conditions can be complied with is by a direct reference of the principles of a bill, including all its details, to the judgment of the electorate. This is the constitutional doctrine which prevails in Great Britain at the present day in regard to mandates from the people to the House of Lords, under their unwritten constitution, and it should and does apply with greater force in this House under the written constitution of Canada. The details of a bill, particularly a Redistribution Bill—may often be of more importance than the principle involved, as the most vicious details might easily be covered by a fair-sounding principle in legislation.

I intend to support my contention on this fundamental principle by the authority of one of the most eminent statesman of the empire to-day—a hereditary Liberal, and a very advanced one as well—a man who has been leader of the Liberal party in the House of Commons, and who is now a distinguished member of the Imperial government—I refer to the Duke of Devonshire.

It will be in the recollection of the House that when my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, was speaking, a few days ago, he said the House of Lords rejected the Irish Home Rule Bill because the details of the measure had not been submitted to the people—that although the principle of the Bill had been submitted to the electorate at the general election, the details had not been made public, and therefore the Bill was rejected by the Upper House, and that he was contradicted by the hon. Minister of Justice. The hon. leader of the opposition was perfectly correct in that statement, as I shall show presently. When the Home Rule Bill came before the House of Lords, the Duke of Devonshire—not a fossil Tory, I repeat, but an eminent Liberal statesman, took the ground that there was no sufficient mandate from the people to pass the bill ; that it was not sufficient that the principle alone should be referred to the electors and approved by them, but that it was just as necessary—and in many cases more necessary, and indispensable that the details of such a bill should be submitted specifically to the popular vote, before it could be said that there was any such mandate as the House of Lords would be bound to respect. On this and other grounds the noble duke moved and carried the six months' hoist to the Irish Home Rule Bill in 1893. This is the position the Senate should always take and hold unflinchingly on all similar occasions. When the government come here and tell us they have a mandate from the people to pass any measure, it will not do to show that they have only secured the endorsation of that measure in a general omnibus platform, with numerous other planks, but they must have a specific mandate from the people on a special reference, untrammelled by other issues, both on the principle and details, before they can ask the Senate to pass any important measure to which we are opposed.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—There is one question the hon. gentleman has omitted on which the government got a mandate, and on which they got the right sort of mandate—the plebiscite question.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I intended to touch that subject before concluding my remarks. It is strange, that on the only question for which there is a specific mandadte from the people which I think this Senate would be bound to obey, the government have repudiated that popular mandate, and ignored the wishes of the electors. But my hon. friends, the Minister of Justice and his supporters, will no doubt tell us that the government obeyed the prohibition mandate as well as all the other mandates, by which they caught votes in the general elections.

The Duke of Devonshire, in making his motion against the Home Rule Bill used this language :

I think that your lordships know well the limits of your power. You know that not being a representative assembly, and not backed by the strength which a representative character gives to a legislative body, and not sharing altogether the democratic principles which are making progress in this as in other countries, it would be unwise, impolitic and unpatriotic to insist upon your personal convictions by enforcing your own political convictions in opposition to what is believed to be the decided view of the country. Such was the case of the Reform Bill of 1832, and, I may say, also of later Reform Bills. Such was the repeal of the Corn Laws? Such was the case of the Irish Church Act. Such cases may recur, and it is not for me to say what it may be the duty of this House to do when a similar case occurs again. It may be that a measure may be in your Lordships' judgment so wrong, so impolitic, so unjust, and so mischievous that it may be your duty to resist it to the last at any risk, even at that of the loss of your own political privileges. But, my Lords, this is no such case. This is not a case in which you are called upon to refuse to read this bill a second time, because you are opposed to the principle of it. If I should conceive the case of the majority of your Lordships being of any opinion favourable to the principle of this measure; if, as the Prime Minister thinks might be possible, a measure founded upon a similar principle had been introduced by a Conservative government, I do not undertake to say what the conduct of this House might have been, but I, at all events, should be prepared to say the duty of this House would be the same. I maintain that on a question of such magnitude, so closely touching the fundamental institutions of our State, if there is any object in the existence of a second chamber at all; it is, at all events, to prevent changes of that character being made without the absolute certainty that they are in accordance with the will of the majority of the people. Now, as to that certainty, we have no knowledge, and we can have none. Look for one moment at the history of the measure. It has been preceded by no popular agitation such as preceded the passing of the Reform Act or the repeal of the Corn Laws. Those measures had been for years before the country, and had been fully debated and discussed throughout the whole country ? I admit the Irish Church Act was a different case. There the proposal of the measure had not been preceded by any lengthened or any excited agitation. But the whole of the Liberal Party, or almost the whole of the Liberal Party, had been long in principle committed to the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and, as Mr. Gladstone has reminded us, the disestablishment of the Irish Church Act was only proposed to your Lordships after it had formed the single issue submitted to the country at a general election and after the verdict of the country had been given in the most unmistakable terms.

The Home Rule Bill has never been accepted by the country when it has been placed as a definite issue before it.

No doubt, some electors voted for Home Rule, but it is quite certain that a larger number voted for disestablishment, or local option, or for parish councils, or for changes in the incidence of taxation in towns, or for changes in the labour laws. Well, these tactics were successful in their immediate object, and enabled Her Majesty's government to propose measures of great importance on these and various other subjects. But they have had this disadvantage—that it has been absolutely impossible to form any opinion as to what the real desire and wish of the people is upon this most vital question. We contend that it is a question large enough to justify us in refusing to pass this measure into law until that question is settled beyond the shadow of a doubt.

I maintain that this policy is of sufficient gravity to make it imperative that not the principle of self-government for Ireland alone should be definitely accepted by the country, but also the form in which is to be conceded, and the provisions by which this principle is to be carried into effect should also undoubtedly receive the popular approval. Here, I think, my Lords, we stand on still firmer ground. Not even those who contend that the last election was conclusive as to the opinion of the country on the principle of Home Rule will contend that its form or provisions were within the cognizance or knowledge of the country. This form and these provisions are in this case the very sense of the question in the contention of the promoters of the measure themselves.

When this measure is proposed only conditionally ; when, also, the form, structure, and provision of the measure have been avowedly concealed from the country up to the time of the general election, how can it be possible to contend that the country has given its decision on the measure, the form of which is now shown to be only less essential than the principle itself. I shall be told that the House of Commons approved of this Bill, and that the general election gave to the House of Commons the necessary mandate and authority to work out the organic details of the measure. I traverse that argument at every step. For reasons which I have stated, I deny that the House of Commons received any mandate upon Home Rule at all at the last election ; and I say, further, if there were a mandate, it was a conditional mandate, and that the conditions were not within the knowledge of the country. Before this measure is passed into law we have a right to demand that the judgment of the country shall be given, not upon a cry, not upon an inspiration, not upon an impatient impulse, but upon a completed work ; and that this measure, the result of the collective wisdom of the government and parliament, shall be submitted to the country for its approval, aye or no.

Under those circumstances, we are entitled to say that this measure, which we cannot know to have directly received the approval of the country, has not, from the consideration which it has received from the House of Commons, given us the assurance that it had indirectly that approval through the representatives of the people of parliament. I think I have said almost enough to justify the motion which I shall make, even if this House did not proceed to enter upon any discussion whatever of the provisions of the bill. The motion which I make is not founded solely upon the objection which we may individually entertain upon the principle and character of the Bill, but it is also founded on the fact that it is a change of too large and vital a description to make it right that it should be passed into law without greater knowledge and certainly of the real judgment of the people upon it.

The grounds taken by the Duke of Devonshire were also taken by other noble lords in the same debate, but his words are so clear and to the point that I do not consider it necessary to trouble the Senate with further quotations on the subject. Here we have the doctrine clearly laid down—a doctrine which should be kept in view by this House on all occasions, by one of the most eminent statesmen of our time, that a mandate from the people to be obligatory on the House of Lords, and with greater force on a second Chamber like the Senate of Canada, most be referred to the people singly, not only on its principle, but likewise on its details. There must be an unmistakable certainty that the people fully knew what they were voting for when they voted for the measure, and that they had everything within the four corners of the Bill before them. This is a precedent of exceeding importance to us as a second Chamber whose rights are being daily called in question by ignorant or unthinking opponents of this body, who perhaps have never given an hour's study to the marvellous structure of the British constitution, on the theory and principle of which, according to the preamble of the British North America Act of 1867, the constitution of Canada is based. I think it well that the utterances of so eminent a statesman as the Duke of Devonshire on this grave constitutional question should have a place in the Senate Hansard as a guidance for members of this House whenever that question is involved in the discussion of any bill submitted to this Senate.

The hon. member for Stadacona (Mr Landry) made a very good point in the course of his able speech to-day, when he showed that if any mandate were given even to the House of Commons in relation to redistribution of the constituencies, the bill before the Senate is not in accordance with that mandate, as read by the hon. member from Delorimier division (Mr. Dandurand) from the Liberal platform of 1893. If any mandate comes to this parliament in consequence of the success of the Liberal party at the polls in the last election regarding redistribution ; it was to adopt the principle everywhere of county boundaries, which the bill before the House, with few exceptions, completely ignores. Even in a restricted sense, there is not the shadow of a mandate for such a bill, based on no principle whatever, as we have now on the table of this House—and certainly not carrying out the principle of redistribution on which the Liberal party say they appealed to the country.

I come now to the second constitutional point which I desire to discuss. It has been contended on several occasions in this House that we have not the right to amend or reject this bill because it relates solely to the popular branch of parliament—that, in fact, it is simply a part of the domestic economy of that branch with which this Chamber has no right to interfere ; in other words, we have been told, although we have the power, we have not the right to meddle with the measure. Nothing could be more absurd or inaccurate than this contention. Wherever we have the constitutional power to pass a bill we have also the constitutional right to do so. The contrary contention is merely a play on words which when uttered by a high constitutional authority like the leader of the House, with an air of profound wisdom, may impose on the unreflecting, but will bear the test of investigation.

What, I ask, is the power of the Senate with regard to legislation ? Our rights and powers are clearly defined in section 18 of the British North America Act, 1867, which reads as follows, as amended in 1875, that :

> The privileges, immunities and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and the members thereof respectively shall be such as are from time to time defined by Act of the parliament of Canada, but so that any Act of the parliament of Canada defining such privileges, immunities and powers shall not confer any privileges, immunities or powers exceeding those at the passing of such Act held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the members thereof.

The plain meaning of this important clause of the British North America Act is that the Senate and the House of Commons enjoy precisely the same right and power in regard to legislation, except when our rights and powers are qualified or limited in any way by the express provisions of the said Act. What, then, are the limitations of our legislative power under that Act ? Section 53 limits our power with regard to money bills as follows :

> Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue, or imposing any tax or import, shall originate in the House of Commons.

We have the power to deal with any other bills that may come before us as we think proper.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is nothing in that which says we have not the power to deal with money bills.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I admit our power is limited or qualified with regard to money bills, but not with regard to bills of any other description, and that we stand exactly in the same position with regard to franchise bills and redistribution bills as we do with respect to banking bills, railways bills or insolvency bills. Nothing more or less. There is no warrant in the British North America Act for the contrary allegation. It imperatively behoves the members of this Senate that our undoubted rights and powers are not questioned in any particular—much less in so important a particular as that which I am now considering. I have already said that there could be no greater absurdity than to call a Frachise Bill or a Redistribution Bill a domestic affair of the House of Commons. The domestic affairs of either Houses of parliament are regulated by resolutions or orders, in which one House does not interfere with the other. Franchise bills and redistribution bills concern both Houses equally, and, above all, interest and concern the whole body of the electors. Could there be a greater anomaly than to call such bills domestic bils of either branch of the legislature ? I repeat, the right of the Senate to amend or reject these important bills is, under the terms of our written constitution, just the same as that of the House of Commons, and should be asserted and vindicated by us on all fitting occasions, because on their maintenance depends our usefulness and authority as a co-ordinate branch of the parliament of this Dominion.

I intend now to go further and prove to the Senate that the same rights and powers in relation to franchise and redistribution bills, as I claim the Senate possesses under the British North America Act, are claimed and exercised by the House of Lords under the unwritten constitution of the motherland.

When the Franchise Bill was before this House two sessions ago, the same questions were raised, of the power or right of the Senate to deal with that Bill, and I then went very fully into the precedents which the British Hansard afforded us of the action of the House of Lords on the Franchise Bill and the Redistribution Bill of Mr. Gladstone's government in 1884. That Franchise Bill was only second in importance to the Reform Act of 1832. It added 2,000,000 of voters to the electorate of the United Kingdom. The Bill was introduced in the Commons on the 5th of February, 1884, and received its third reading in July following, but was not accompanied by a promised Redistribution Bill, and the Lords took the position on that occasion. that until a satisfactory Redistribution Bill was placed before parliament, they would not give the Franchise Bill a second reading. All the speeches on the subject were illustrative of the point I am now making, that is, the undoubted right of the Upper Chamber to deal with both subjects in as full and ample a manner as the House of Commons. Nor was their constitutional right and power disputed by any statesman of standing in either branch. On the second reading, Lord Cairns moved the following amendment to the Franchise Bill, which resulted in the defeat of the bill by a large majority :

> This House while prepared in a well considered and complete scheme for the extension of the franchise, does not think it right to assent to the second reading of a bill having for its object a fundamental change in the United Kingdom, but which is not accompanied by provisions for so apportioning the right to return members as to ensure a true and fair representation of the people, or by any adequate security in the proposals of the government that bill should not come into operation except as part of an entire scheme.

The adoption of this motion resulted in the prorogation of parliament, when the government entered into negotiations with the leader of the opposition in order to secure a Redistribution Bill fair and satisfactory to their political opponents. There was no talk among responsible statesmen of abolishing the House of Lords for taking this high stand ; it was not alleged or contended that the bills related to domestic affairs of the House of Commons, with which the Lords had no right to interfere. Both Mr. Gladstone and Lord Granville spoke in the most courteous manner of the right of the Lords to assume the position they did, in bringing about the rejection of the Franchise Bill, and declared the willingness of the government to go any reasonable length to effect a fair compromise that would insure a satisfactory Redistribution Bill in order to secure the passage of the Franchise Bill.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Did they reject the bill ?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Yes, they rejected the Franchise Bill, as I have just stated, and Parliament was immediately prorogued.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say the House of Lords rejected the Franchise Bill ?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Of course, on the amendment of Lord Cairns, which I have just read.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They postponed it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—No. The bill was virtually given the six months' hoist and killed for the session—a queer postponement.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—At what date was that ?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I have already said in 1884. You will find the whole debate in the British Hansard of that year. Let me cite from Lord Granville's speech on the reassembling of parliament in the autumn of 1884 :

> My Lords :—I beg leave to make a short statement on behalf of Her Majesty's government. I presume that we are all agreed that the action to be taken this week by your Lordships' House is of vast importance, affecting not merely party ideas, but interests of a national character. There is no question as to the principle of the Franchise Bill.
>
>
> It is understood, and I believe not without reason, that your Lordships intend to give a second reading of that Bill.
>
> But I am not satisfied to assume this step will terminate the difference between your Lordships ' and Her Majesty's government. I do not propose to enter into the merits of this difference ; it is sufficient for my present purposes to remind your Lordships that while the procedure adopted by Her Majesty's government has been supported last summer, and again this autumn, by unusally large majorities in the House of Commons, it has been condemned by a majority of your Lordships in this House. I will not now refer to offers which at different times have been made by Her Majesty's government, and which are generally known as having been rejected. I am not aware of any intimation having come from the opposition, apart from an intention to reverse in some shape or other the procedure adopted by Her Majesty's government, and supported by the House of Commons, in order to adopt that which has been favoured by your Lordships. The result is a state of things which although it may be far from disagreeable to extreme politicians on both sides, is deplored by all modern men, and I sincerely believe, by a majority of your Lordships.

Lord Granville does not venture to tell the House of Lords that the Franchise Bill was a purely domestic affair of the House of Commons, with which their lordships had no right to interfere. He does not question their right to reject the Bill, but on the contrary, he freely concedes it. He goes on to say how the government proposes to meet the objections of the House of Lords ; and he shows the greatest consideration for these objections. His language is that of a high-toned and broad-minded statesman.

I am authorized by my colleagues to state how we would propose to meet the objections which have been raised by some of your lordships. To those, if there are such, who may desire to force on an immediate dissolution I have little to offer, but the case is different with those who desire a settlement—a desire which we claim ourselves, and of which we are quite willing to credit noble lords opposite, whose objections we honestly desire to meet. I understand that the objections are principally these. Your lordships think that although you are ready to support a Franchise Bill, it is dangerous to do so unless you are acquainted with the character of the Redistribution Bill which is promised, and which will affect its working. You are afraid that it may be of a revolutionary character, or, as some have put it, dangerous to the prospects of the Conservative party. You also fear that there may be no Bill at all, or, at all events, that there may be none until the two thousand new voters have acquired the right of voting. My lords, I will now proceed to state how, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the government, without sacrificing our own object, we may best meet these objections. Our object is to secure the passing of the Franchise Bill without delay. We cannot jeopardize it. Your lordships must be aware that we could enter into no understanding or take any steps as to the immediate introduction or prosecution of a Redistribution Bill, or as to anything connected with it, unless we have sufficient assurance that we should thus secure our principal object, namely, the passing of the Franchise Bill without delay—that is to say, during the autumn session.

* * *

In that case, I may tell your lordships that the Bill will come into effect on January 1, 1886. If we were sufficiently assured in the manner I have stated, I am not aware of any demand or suggestion that will be made with regard to the procedure affecting the Redistribution Bill to which Her Majesty's government will not be ready to accede. If we get that sufficient assurance, we should be ready to submit the main provisions of the Redistribution Bill.

This language contains no hint that the Lords' attitude towards the Franchise Bill or the Redistribution Bill was in the slightest degree unconstitutional. Lord Granville continues:

To make every reasonable effort for the purpose of accommodation, and any difficulties in the way of accommodation, I think I may say would not come from Her Majesty's government. We should be ready, if it is possible, and I do not see any impossibility in it, to present a bill framed in the spirit of that sketch given by Mr. Gladstone in the House of Commons and which on November 7, seemed to be received as satisfactory by Sir Stafford Northcote.

Her Majesty's government are prepared to use their utmost efforts to pass the Bill through the House of Commons in the early period of next year. And I am further authorized by them to state that they would consider the passing of their Bill through the House of Commons a question vital to themselves. My lords, I submit this proposal to the favourable consideration of both sides of the House. I trust that those who so cordially supported us last session will not think we have retired too much from the exact course of procedure which we had drawn for ourselves. And, I do, with considerable confidence appeal to the noble lords opposite to receive this proposition in the spirit in which we have made it. We have made it in a spirit of earnestness and of conciliation and as tending to settle a difference which every dictate of statesmanship, and indeed I may say of common sense, makes it desirable in the interests of all concerned, should be brought to a final and satisfactory close.

The compromise thus arrived at was honourably carried out. A Redistribution Bill satisfactory to the opposition was passed immediately after the Franchise Bill, and the right of the Upper House to an equal voice in such important legislation was admitted and vindicated to the fullest extent.

I now desire to offer some observations on the constitutionality of the Bill before the House—in other words the power of parliament to pass the Bill at the present time. On this important point I must say I hold an opinion different from some of my political friends for whose ability I have the highest regard. When the constitutionality of the Redistribution Bill was last year challenged in parliament and the press, in the early stages of the measure in the House of Commons, a great many persons, who, I think, have since changed their minds, were of opinion that a Redistribution Bill could only be passed after a decennial census. I think a good deal of misunderstanding arose from a confusion of the words redistribution and readjustment, which were very often taken to mean the same thing, which they certainly do not. They are two different words, meaning two very different things. Readjustment means the equalizing of the representation of the various provinces when the census shows that a decrease or an increase in one or more of the provinces renders an equalization necessary. That is, if after the census it is found that one province has increased in population while another has decreased so as to make the existing unit of representation for the Dominion inapplicable to either or both, then a readjustment must take place to rectify these discrepancies. For instance, Nova Scotia lost one representative, New Brunswick two, and Prince Edward Island one, while other provinces gained on the readjustment after the last census, which necessitated a Redistribution Bill to meet these changes in the representation. Not only do I admit that the present Bill is within the legislative power of parliament, but I also am of opinion that we have the power at any time to remedy by Act any abnormal or unfair conditions of the representation of any constituency that may be presented to this parliament.

While, however, conceding the constitutionality of the Bill as fully as claimed for it by the Minister of Justice, I entertain a strong opinion that the proper time for a general redistribution of the constituencies is the period fixed by law for readjustment, after each decennial census, and I think it is unfortunate that it has not been so fixed by the Act of union. I think it must have been an omission or inadvertency, and there is presumptive evidence in favour of that view. Many of the gentlemen who assisted in framing the British North America Act were for three-fourths of the time that has elapsed since confederation in power in this Dominion. The Conservative government up to the last hour of its existence contained eminent men who were among the fathers of confederation, who had first laid the stones of the constitutional edifice in Quebec, and who afterwards went to London to finish off the building under the auspices of the Imperial authorities, and to watch the passage of the Union Act through the Imperial parliament. These men established the precedent that the proper time for redistributing the constituencies was after each decennial census. I say they are high authority in regard to the precedent, of the wisdom of which I am a strong advocate. Having voted since confederation for that precedent, I intend to vote for it all along, and I regret that the present government has not adopted it, as it might thus have become almost an unwritten law. If they had done so, it would have given almost the force of law to a good precedent, and would be the means of preventing tinkering or improper interference from time to time, at the behest of powerful supporters, with the sensitive and delicate organization of the representation of the people in parliament, so far as regards the redistribution of seats. For my own part, I shall on every occasion when a general bill of this nature is submitted to parliament at the wrong time, whether the Bill be good or bad, vote against it. But while I believe the proper time to introduce a general Redistribution Bill is after each decennial census, it does not follow that I would feel myself bound to support any such Bill, though introduced at the right time. I would feel myself then as much as now at perfect liberty to oppose the Bill if I saw good reason for doing so.

I was not present during the debate on the Bill last year owing to ill-health, but I knew that when the second reading was asked for, the hon. leader of the opposition moved, without denying the constitutionality of the measure, a virtual six months, after arguments showing the injustice that would follow the passage of the Bill. I was surprised afterwards when I saw in the press an opinion of eminent counsel sent from England sustaining the constitutionality of the Bill, which had not been controverted by the Senate. This opinion was dealt with by the hon. leader of the Senate in the closing week of the last session. He showed that this opinion was based on a complete misrepresentation of the position of the Senate, and I thought this would be the last of the affair. The Minister of Justice said that he knew nothing about the opinion of Mr. Blake and others, or who had asked for it. It now transpires that it was asked for by his coadjutor in the Department of Justice, the Solicitor General. Can it be possible that the minister knew nothing of this action of his colleague? He says he did not, and of course we must believe him. But what about the misrepresentation of the position of the Senate by the hon. Solicitor General? Was it wilful misrepresentation or want of knowledge? I cannot suppose that a man who stands so high in his profession would be guilty of any such wilful misrepresentation—but he showed a very extraordinary ignorance of the attitude of the Senate, in the case he submitted to the eminent English counsel—by no means creditable to the second law officer of the Crown.

During the recess, the same opinion of eminent English counsel was republished in the newspapers of Canada, under the heading in large letters, 'The Senate Condemned.' I was astonished to see the misrepresentation of this House reiterated, even in Conservative journals, who made no effort to refute the slander and justify the action of the Senate, as could easily be done. Having an hour at my disposal I wrote a short article for the leading opposition journal in Nova Scotia, and not having an opportunity of speaking to the Redistribution Bill last year, I will now give the article to the House as an epitome of what I would probably have then said had I been in my place. It gives in a nut shell the reasons I would have advanced last year for opposing this bill :

THE SENATE AND THE GERRYMANDER BILL.

London, Aug. 24.—The constitutional dispute over the Canadian Senate's rejectment of the government's Redistribution Bill, which was submitted by Charles Russell to eminent English counsel has been decided against the Senate. The opinion, which was published to-day, says the Canadian parliament is competent to legislate as proposed, independent of the decennial readjustment. The opinion is signed by Robert C. Cecil and Messrs. Blake, Haldine, Asquith and Carson, members of parliament.

To the Editor of the 'Herald.'

Sir,—This 'opinion of eminent English counsel' was given to the public in full in western journals over three weeks ago, and was brought to the notice of the Senate by Sir Mackenzie Bowell during the last week of the session, who inquired of the Minister of Justice whether the latter knew who had asked the opinion of these eminent lawyers on the question indicated—an opinion that must have been obtained on a misrepresentation of the attitude of the Senate towards the Redistribution Bill. The Minister of Justice replied that he was unable to give any information on the subject. Sir Mackenzie Bowell then stated the position of the Senate on the Bill in question, quoting from the Senate 'Hansard,' as well as the reasons for its rejection by that House, and ridiculed the action of the friends of the Bill in sending across the Atlantic for such a legal opinion.

The attitude of the Senate towards the Redistibution Bill was—not that it was unconstitutional—but that it was unwise and inexpedient and contrary to sound policy to depart from the precedent established by the framers of our constitution of redistributing the constituencies (when necessary) after each decennial census, and at the same time that the readjustment of the representation of all the provinces was provided for by the Act of union. The nearness of the period for taking the census (1901) gave additional force to this argument.

But the main reason of the rejection of the Bill by the Senate is well known to have been, that the measure was atrociously unjust ; that as a gerrymander it exceeded in iniquity any thing that had even been attempted even by the one-house legislature of Ontario—a province notorious under Grit rule for the machine methods (of all kinds) there practised to secure party advantages, and where, by such methods, and unlimited corruption, the mis-called reformers have so long held power—the end of which, however, is happily now in sight.

Let me give one or two samples of that unique Bill :

A certain number of constituencies, presumed to entertain Conservative predilections, with a population of 200,000 were given by the Bill as introduced) four representatives in the House of Commons—while ten other constituencies, aggregating very little over the same population of 200,000, but presumed to be of the true Grit faith, were given ten representatives in that body. Then, again, the Bill contained a very marked exhibition of petty malice and revenge in regard to two constituencies that had rejected at the general election, two leading Liberals, now ministers of the Crown—the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Customs—which were swept out of existence—showing how little even a regard for appearances, not to speak of fair-play, must have animated the framers of the measure, Should there be any wonder that the Senate rejected such a Bill ?

I think I have shown, hon. gentlemen, that there is no mandate from the people to pass the Bill now on the Table of this House ; that the legislative power to reject or amend the measure is clearly given to us under our written constitution, the British North America Act, 1867 ; and that the same power is claimed and exercised in the parliament of the United Kingdom by the House of Lords, under the unwritten constitution of the motherland. I have also endeavoured to place on record, while admitting the constitutionality of the Bill, my decided conviction that the proper time to redistribute the constituencies is after each decennial census, and not at any period the whim, or caprice or interests of party may dictate, and on these grounds, coupled with my hostility to what I believe to be the unjust provisions of the measure, I feel it my duty to record my vote in support of the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition—a vote which, I contend, will be in accord with law in Canada and precedent in England, and which, I have no doubt, will be approved by a majority of the electors of the Dominion whenever they are called upon to give a decision in the premises.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.).—I do not propose to occupy the time of the House very long, after the able speeches we have had from the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. gentlemen from Marshfield, Westmoreland and Richmond. The last speech has given us clearly the constitutional aspect of this case, and it would take a very high authority to give an opinion against his, although different opinions were held at different times. First of all I shall call the attention of the Senate to the Bill itself, and not to its necessity now, or to its constitutionality. In a matter of this kind, where counties are divided, there should be a map before us in order that the House may better understand the scope of the Bill. Then again the worst part of it is we are asked to go it blind and accept electoral divisions made by the government of Ontario and not by the Dominion parliament or government. We know that the Ontario government is proverbial for its tendency to cut and carve constituencies for the benefit of the party in power and no one desiring to do what is right and just could possibly vote for a Bill containing a provision of that kind. The hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Power) is a great stickler on this point, and will not I suppose have two opinions on this subject. He has often contended that where a provincial statute is quoted in a Bill before this House it should be embodied in the Bill. I think his position is perfectly sound. I for one would not vote for this Bill with that part of it incomplete.

I confess that I am not well enough skilled in political anatomy to say whether these counties have been dissected fairly and squarely as between party and party, not placing the advantage on either side, but I can see that this Bill is a premature birth, therefore physically, and morally weak, and cannot stand in the face of a wholesome criticism. Why should this measure be brought forward before the orthodox time, when we know how fortunate the government has been under the electoral adjustments of 1892-93. I am not, as a rule, of a suspicious nature, but I do attach some suspicion to the launching of this Bill at this time, as the fundamental reasons for it do not exist. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield was able to show from a speech of the Minister of Justice on a similar Bill in 1892, that readjustment could only be had every ten years, after the decenial census. Now he says it can be taken at any time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I contradicted that, and I contradict it again. I say there is not a sentence in what I said which supports that contention.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is a good thing to have a good memory at times, and a bad thing for some politicians to have a Hansard.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not for me.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—I agree with the opinion expressed by the hon. gentleman in 1892. In 1892 Sir John Thompson expressed opinions on the constitutional aspect of the question like those which we have heard to-day from the hon. gentleman from Richmond, that is to say, that the British North America Act contained sufficient power, apart from sec. 51, to enact a Bill of this kind. My hon. friend met him in this way:

> The hon. Minister of Justice maintained that under the 91st section, power to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada conferred no constitutional powers to legislate upon this subject. It was from section 51 we derived our power.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not agree with that view of it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—The hon. gentleman further on said that 'it must provide in accordance with section 51 and not otherwise.'

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see there I am speaking of whether the parliament itself could make the division of the constituencies or whether we should appoint another body to make it. That is the point that is there discussed.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It seems to be the whole point whether parliament could pass that Bill without section 51. The Hon. Mr. Davies, now Sir Louis Davies, emphasized the opinion of the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, he emphasized his own.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Mr. Davies showed that where there was specific legislation, section 91 could not override it. Section 51 is specific, but section 91 is not specific, and it is common sense that where there is a specific clause in an Act it cannot be overridden by other general clauses. Sir Louis Davies at that time spoke very strongly in the same way, contending that it could not be done, he said, in reply to Sir John Thompson. These are my views, and therefore I contend that whatever is done should be done under section 51. That being the case, this Bill is premature.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are three specific sections dealing with the subject.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The Minister of Justice, in introducing this Bill, gave no strong or valid reason for doing so prematurely and before he had possession of the data necessary to a readjustment. The only reasons he gave was the necessity for rectifying the electoral divisions of 1892 and 1893. Sir John Abbott, when introducing the Adjustment Bill of 1892, gave good and valid reasons for its passing. He said :

> This Bill was rendered necessary in a large degree by the fact shown by the census, of a comparative loss of population in certain of the provinces, and an abnormal increase of population in some of the electoral centres of the Dominion.

These, as the House will see, were stronger reasons than any adduced now. With regard to the right of the House to amend or reject a Bill of this nature affecting principally the House of Commons, whatever affects that branch of parliament affects the whole country, and this House, in its two-fold capacity as a branch of parliament and as a portion of the electorate of the country, has a right to deal with it.

The Bill of Supply is supposed to be the most sacred right in the keeping of the House of Commons, and even that Bill can be rejected by the Senate. It is, therefore, quite clear that this Bill is not complete without the sanction of the Senate, and if we have the power to adopt and amend, we have the power to reject. Had the Bill kept to the boundaries of the counties, towns and villages, it would be a different matter, and entitled to more consideration, but it does not keep to such boundaries, and is partial in its scope. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that the Bill is equally fair to both parties, even then it would be open to two important objections : first, the suspicion attached to its being brought in just before the general elections, and, second, its being brought in prematurely and straining the provisions of the British North Amercia Act, in letter and in spirit. That Act lays down clearly when a readjustment shall be made. If it could be shown that the increase in population in the last nine years, or the movement of the people from one province to another, or from one county to another, made a readjustment necessary, this Bill would stand in a more favourable position ; but this has not been shown. It is quite true, the Constitutional Act does not say : 'You shall not pass a Readjustment Act at any other time ;' but it does say that it shall be done at a specified time. Any one in the position of a disinterested judge, watching the opinion expressed for and against this Bill, would, without doubt, come to the conclusion that a question of this kind should be removed from the parliamentary arena and placed on a plane beyond the manipulation of interested politicians. As there are two political parties in the country, necessary perhaps to keep each other in check, I would take three men from each party, presided over by a judge of repute as umpire, and let them adjust the representation on the lines of counties, towns and villages, and the proportion of representation to population, as laid down in the British North America Act. The hon. Secretary of State held views similar to these in 1892, and said :

> The readjustment should be in the hands of a tribunal outside of political influence.

The hon. Secretary of State expressed another opinion on that occasion, in these words :

> No one who has any pride in the future of the Dominion, or who has any feeling of manhood in him, would tamely submit every ten years to have the constituencies changed and euchred by foul means in order that the ruling party should continue to have power in their hands.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman is of a different opinion now. He thinks it could be done at the end of nine years.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was the euchring he was opposed to then.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is a misfortune for politicians that there is an official report of the debates, from which can be called up the grim spectre of wavering opinions from time to time. The next readustment, let us hope, will be placed in the hands of disinterested men, who will act impartially, without fear or favour, and then the electorate will be free to exercise its rights without being hampered by unreal and degrading boundaries.

Hon. Mr. KERR moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (N) 'An Act respecting the Western Alberta Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

Bill (34) 'An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

SALE OF PENITENTIARY BINDER TWINE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY inquired:

How many pounds of binder twine they have sold this year at the Kingston Penitentiary, and the price sold at, and if to farmers? And also, how much was on hand on the 20th March instant?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The answer to the hon. gentleman's question is:

Total sold—

	Lbs.
Maple leaf.....	157,700
Beaver....	61,855
Standard....	68,590
	288,145

Sold to farmers, of the above—

	Lbs.
Maple leaf..	57,620
Beaver.....	41,815
Standard....	8,590
	108,025

Statement of binder twine on hand on 20th March, 1900—

	Lbs.
Pure manila
Mixed manila.....	116,260
New Zealand.....	38,500

The amount of pure manila booked for future delivery as of the 20th March, was 53,370 pounds, but there was only 47,500 pounds of pure manila twine on hand. This leaves a balance of 5,820 pounds still to be manufactured to fill all orders. There are several orders amounting to about 40,000 pounds not included in statement, as the purchasers have not as yet specified which brand they require. It has always been the policy of the department to regard the prices at which the product is marketed as confidential until the close of the year in which the transactions took place.

Hon. Mr. KERR.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The hon. gentleman remarked the other day, in answer to my question, that the price asked of farmers was 14 cents a pound at the penitentiary. Have the government departed from that?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is from 8½ to 14 cents, if I remember rightly. It depends on the kind and quality that is ordered.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Blue Ribbon costs more.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The answer is clear enough, from 8½ to 14 cents per pound.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is the price less to jobbers? Will my hon. friend answer that question? The wholesaler buys to sell to jobbers. Is it sold for less price to them?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We sell to wholesale men at wholesale prices, and to retail men at what would be regarded as retail prices. So far we have endeavoured to avoid coming into active competition with other men, and we put our prices as low as, or below the wholesale price, and rather below the retail prices, but we are not giving the prices or the amounts, nor shall we until after the season is over. We have, so far, endeavoured to keep our sales as close as possible to the manufacturers' for the reason that a good deal of our raw material has been purchased at such a high figure, and of course if twine was to go back again to the old prices, there would be a very heavy loss indeed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then it is quite clear that the government have entered into an arrangement, or if they have not entered into an arrangement they have adopted the policy, as my hon. friend says, of not coming into competition with the wholesaler.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No. I said not into active competition with the retail dealers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—With those who purchased wholesale?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the offering to sell small quantities to the consumer direct—that is the farmer—is no advantage to him if the price at which the sale is made to the farmer is the same as that at which the wholesaler sells, when he retails it. I scarcely think that my hon. friend intended that. It would indicate a combination between the government manufacturing the twine and the wholesalers, because their prices would regulate to a very great extent the prices at which it would be sold by the wholesalers in the country, plus, of course, the freight, as there is no duty upon it; so that really, after all, the offering to sell this twine to the consumer direct is really no advantage to him at all, unless he can get it cheaper than the person who purchased it wholesale would retail it to him?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, yes it is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend tells the House that they have tried to keep as near as they can to the retail price of the wholesaler, or the man who sells and the farmer who buys, so that there is really no advantage in the new policy which has been adopted. I cannot for the life of me understand why the government should refuse to give the price at which they sell it to the wholesaler. If you go into the market of the United States, or any other country, and purchase from the manufacturer, every one knows what the price is. That price is given to the world. The only question that can arise is as to the amount of discount which would be given to the purchaser, and those who have studied this question at all know that the person who purchases a larger quantity from the manufacturer will get a larger discount, and probably the man who pays cash will get an additional discount, so that there is no secret in the matter. Every merchant, every retailer, and every consumer, knows just what profit he is paying to the retailer when he knows exactly what the wholesale purchaser pays the government. But the government steps in and says, 'Oh, no, we will not tell you, or the country, or the farmer who consumes it, what the wholesaler pays for it, for fear the consumer would know how much he is being mulcted out of in the way of profit.' That is really the position my hon. friend takes, and I do not see well how a policy of that kind can be justified. I am sorry to see the government take that position. The establishing of that binder twine industry in the prisons was not to enable wholesalers to become rich out of it, but to give employment to the prisoners in the production of an article which was being consumed more extensively than it had ever been before all over the country, and to give that advantage to the farmers independently of the manufacturers altogether. I remember distinctly, being a protectionist, we discussed that question somewhat elaborately for some time, as to how far we were going to injure the private manufacturers, but when we considered that the great mass of the people were of more importance than one or two manufacturers, and when we admitted further the necessity for giving employment to a large number of criminals in such a manner as not to interfere with the great mass of free labour in the country, we decided to adopt that policy, and I should be very glad to see them carry it out to its fullest possible extent. If it costs 6 cents a pound to manufacture, and they want a quarter of a cent to cover profit, they ought to sell it to the farmer for not more than 7 cents a pound. I am putting that as a hypothetical case. If it cost more, just in proportion to that would be the true policy under the circumstances, and there should be no combine or arrangement with wholesalers to keep the price at which you sell to him privately, because in doing that you enable him to secure from the consumer, that is the farmer, as high a profit as possible. No combine or understanding should be come to in public works of that kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The policy of not disclosing the price was adopted in 1894, two years before the present government came into office, and in that respect there has been no change.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I never heard anything about it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am stating the fact, and what is more, I do not well see that you can deal in this or any other article upon any other system. There is no combine. We have no combine of wholesale men. I do not know who the wholesale men of the country are. We advertised for the sale of the article in order, as I mentioned before, not to have a residue on hand when the season for sale is over. I mentioned the other day that when you manufacture an excess of binder twine the article deteriorates to a certain extent as the oil evaporates, and, if you keep it for a time the whole of the oil evaporates and it can only be used for tying lath or something of that sort; but for binding grain it is no longer suitable. So far as the output from the penitentiaries is concerned, we manufacture in a year about 500 tons. There are at least 5,000 tons consumed in the country. That is, we manufacture one ton in ten. There is no reason why the man who purchases one pound in ten should get it at a lower price than the other nine-tenths of the farmers get theirs. The business of the government is as far as possible to act on business principles. We have not begun the work of manufacturing binder twine as a benevolent enterprise, to help those who cannot help themselves. We have begun to manufacture binder twine in order to give prisoners something to do to earn their own living, and so diminish the cost of maintaining the penal institutions of the country. We do not wish to close any manufacturing establishment. The hon. gentleman has adopted the principle, favoured for twenty years, of protection, to give special favours to particular manufacturers. Now, all favour is taken away from the manufacturer of binder twine by putting it on the free list, and so, having it placed on he free list, we put our articles on the market at a fair rate, so far as the consumer is concerned. We charge him what we think is a fair price, making a reasonable profit, and if the article goes down in value, I do not know any one in this country who would be disposed to pay us more than the market price. We have, since the institution was established, often sold the twine at less than it cost us. No one will consent to pay us a fixed price which will yield us a profit if they can buy it in the market for less. That is perfectly certain, and so we must undertake one year if possible to compensate ourselves to some extent for the loss of another, in order to obtain a fair and reasonable compensation that will enable us to continue to give a certain class of criminals employment in this particular way.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me the admission of the government that the price of binder twine sold by them is regulated by the market price is equivalent to saying that in the event of there being a combine among producers or manufacturers of binder twine the government must necessarily become a party to that combine.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, nothing of the sort.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the government take the position that they are going to manufacture binder twine and sell it to the consumer at a fair profit on the actual cost, I could understand the wisdom of pursuing such a course.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is what we do.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But I understood my hon. friend to say that that price was regulated in such a way as not to interfere with the interests of those who deal in binder twine, or, in other words, that the government was not prepared to sell binder twine at a lower figure than the price at which it could be purchased on the market.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I did not say that, nor did I wish to convey that idea, because, as a matter of fact, we are selling it below the general price, so far as I can ascertain. I do not know the prices of the manufacturing establishments of the country, but our prices are certainly below theirs.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then I received, to some extent, a wrong impression from what I understood my hon. friend to say. The hon. gentleman has not yet made it quite clear. If the policy of the government is to sell it at a fair profit on the cost, that policy is a commendable one; but if the government is going to consider as a measure of the selling price the quotations in the market for that product it seems to me they must necessarily stand in with any combine, because if that is the position from which they start, they do not take into consideration the cost of producing the article, but rather its selling price in the market.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The price of binder twine is a matter of very considerable importance to the farmers of the North-west Territories, and that is why I take a good deal of interest in bringing this question before the government with a view to getting information for the farmers of the west.

It is very well known that after the adoption of the National Policy the manufacturers charged a high profit until other factories were established. I remember hearing Sir Richard Cartwright speaking on this subject in St. John, N.B. In that speech he said that after the national policy was established for a time they would make millionaires of the manufacturers, but in the course of time the manufacturers would compete with each other and become bankrupt. It is well known that in the Northwest for a time we paid 21 cents a pound for binder twine. By competition in the manufacture the price gradually decreased until it dropped to six cents. Then the cordage companies undertook to form a combine. I have bought it myself at that price. That was brought about by the government discovering that certain manufactures had cut down the price through competition, and Sir John Thompson, I think, was the one who organized this scheme of manufacturing in the Kingston penitentiary. He found out what binder twine could reasonably be produced for and put a profit on that, and the government sold it at Grenfell in the North-west Territories at 6½ cents a pound. That went on until there was a change of government and they put the article on the free list.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I say yes. I know what I am talking about, because I have bought the article. It has greatly increased in price ever since this government has been in power. The price has gradually increased, and the same applies to barbed wire. I have bought barbed wire at three cents and a fraction at Woolsley where I live. Now I cannot get barbed wire for less than five cents. When the government fixed a certain price for binder twine, with a profit of twenty or twenty-five per cent, it was sold at a low price, but when they put it on the free list the price increased, and we are now using United States twine. When he says no stock is carried over from one season to another, the hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I do.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY: I know that it is carried over and that it does not deteriorate. I know dealers who often carry it over from one season to another. I have carried it over myself, and I have never heard of its being unfit for use. Last year we paid twelve cents a pound for binder twine. I find that the raw material only cost five cents; still we in the North-west pay twelve cents for our twine. I find that the Cordage Company of Ontario declared a dividend of a hundred per cent last year, and in place of the government going to the rescue of the farmers they are joining in with the manufacturers to keep up their prices to help these monopolists, so that farmers have to pay this extravagant price for their twine. The day before I left home this year the representative of the firm from whom we bought a thousand pounds of twine last year asked me if we had any over from last year. I said yes, about two hundred pounds. He said: 'That is fortunate for you; I cannot sell it for less than 17 cents a pound this year.' The other day the hon. gentleman, answering a question that I put, laid great stress on the raw material costing more now than other years. I find it costs only five cents a pound.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Well, it is so stated in the Auditor General's report, and if he is a liar I cannot help it. The price was five cents for the raw material, and the hon. Minister of Justice told us that it cost three-fourths of a cent for the manufacture. He is an authority on the subject, because the penitentiaries are under his jurisdiction. That would be five and three-quarter cents a pound as the cost of the twine, and he told me the other day that he sold it for fourteen cents a pound to farmers. It looks as though the government was entering into a combine with the monopolists and the manufacturers in this country, to put up the price on the farmers, and he says to-day he will not be the farmers' friend, but the friend of the jobber who buys the twine, and will help the jobbers to extort from the farmers all they can. I say the policy is a very bad one and militates against the interests of the country. Agriculture is a great industry. There are individual farmers in my part of the country who used three thousand pounds of binder twine last year. Put eight cents a pound on that, and see what it amounts to. These men will not vote for a government which puts up the price in that way from six cents to seventeen cents a pound.

THIRD READING.

Bill (18) 'An Act to amend the Dominion Lands Act.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

THE REDISTRIBUTION BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called.

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Mills for the second reading (Bill 13) An Act respecting representation in the House of Commons, and on the motion in amendment thereto of the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, that the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read this day six months.

Hon. Mr. KERR—More than thirty-three years have come and gone since our constitution was being considered by the Imperial parliament. During the course of the discussion on that measure, the British North America Act, that great tribune of the British people, the friend of the people, John Bright in the course of his speech, foretold the present hour. With prophetic ken he seemed to look down the vista of the intervening years and see what would transpire in this Chamber today. He said that he foresaw that the time would come in the history of this Dominion when the will of the people might be thwarted, when a government, possessing in no uncertain degree the confidence of the great majority of this country, might be frustrated in their efforts to carry on the public business for the good of the country by an adverse majority in the Upper Chamber—that that might happen whether the government of the day was a Conservative government or a Liberal government, and that it was quite possible that one government, either Conservative or Liberal, might remain in power so long that their appointees to the Upper Chamber would be in a large majority holding views diametrically opposed to the views of the government of the day, who represented the people. That hour has come. It came to us last year. It has come to us with intensity this year, and what I should like to do in the few observations that I may be permitted to address to you is to try if I can to help the Senate to a wise solution of the trouble, and I wish here and now to say whether I shall get credit for it or not, that I am sincerely desirous that the result of this discussion should be one that the vote taken thereon should reflect honour and dignity upon the Senate. So long as I am permitted to enjoy a place in this Chamber, it will be my constant aim to rise above party considerations. We may not all be able entirely to reach that high stage. We are all human and naturally have party leanings; but at the same time my view is that we should so act in this Chamber that we will discharge our high functions irrespective of the effect that our action may have upon either political party in this country.

The question is what is to be done? Here we have a Bill before us which, as the Liberal party contend, and the government who represent the majority of the people of this country contend, is a fair, honest, and reasonable Bill. The answer to that is that it shall not now be read the second time, but that this Bill be read a second time this day six months, or, in other words, the Senate is asked to snap its fingers in the face of the great majority of the people of this country. I ask hon. gentlemen if this is not a pretty serious consideration. I have been greatly interested in the addresses which have been delivered. I refrained entirely from taking part in the discussion when a similar Bill was before this body last year. I could hardly trust myself to speak, I felt so strongly on the matter, and I felt that perhaps I could better preserve and maintain the honour and dignity of this Chamber by remaining silent. It is hardly necessary for me to say that the result of that discussion, and the vote thereon, was to me a source of profound sorrow and grief, not for its effect on either political party, but for its effect on this august body. We have heard a great deal since this discussion, and we heard a great deal during the last discussion, of constitutional and other questions. They are all very well as a matter of intellectual exercise, but I will tell hon. gentlemen, if they allow me, that it seems to me that the issue is very much narrowed down; the constitutional question seems to be eliminated, and the question is whether we are prepared to pass a Bill which may or may not affect one or the other of the political parties in this country injuriously. My argument is that if the Bill is a proper Bill to be passed by this House, we have nothing whatever to do with the result, and on that question of results I would just like to add that the impression I received from the discussion on both sides of the House and particularly from my hon. friends on the opposition—for I am happy to say that I can call all of the hon. gentlemen my friends—was that hon. gentlemen overestimated the effect of passing this Bill, and the effect that it is going to have upon the prospect of the Conservative party at the next appeal to the country. I do not think it is going to make a great deal of difference one way or the other. But it does make a difference whether it rights a great wrong or not, and it is to present that view of it that I shall devote the little time allotted to me on this occasion. I watched the debate carefully when a similar Bill was before us in July last, and I do not recollect any hon. gentleman in this Chamber rising in his place and taking the responsibility of saying that the Act of 1882, called the gerrymander Act—I am sorry we have any Act on the statute-book that can be called a gerrymander Act—was justifiable. I did not hear a single person take the responsibility of defending that Act. I am sorry that I cannot say the same thing with regard to some of the speeches that have been made this session, and it has pained me beyond measure that some hon. gentlemen, while not expressly and in so many words palliating and screening that measure, have impliedly done so, and have almost come out in defence of it. At any rate, they will not admit that a great wrong was done by that measure. I shall not indulge in, but shall rather try to avoid the use of harsh, hard names or words that might wound any man's feelings, but we are asked by what authority was the Bill introduced last year—by what authority is it re-introduced this year? We have been already told the reasons by the Minister of Justice in his speech, which I was sorry to hear characterized rather flippantly as an academic speech. I wish that I could imitate that academic style, and I am sure we would be all very glad if the monotony of this Chamber were occasionally enlivened by similar academic displays, because it seems to me, in the introduction of this measure, the Minister of Justice made what every one must admit was a model deliverance, fair, calm and dispassionate, and if anything further was wanted to show that the Act of 1882 was an Act that should not longer remain on the statute-book, it was abundantly supplied by the speech of the hon. Secretary of State. I do not say this because I happen to be of the same political faith or leaning as the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State, but I say that the figures and facts set forth in the speech of the hon. Secretary of State have not been answered, and never will be answered because a full answer to them is absolutely impossible. That is my position. There is no need for supporters of the Redistribution Bill in this House to add to those figures. We had a speech last night, from an able parliamentarian, no less than an ex-Speaker of this Senate, a man of rare and splendid talents, and it is with great deference that I come to what he says. He told us that in his opinion the Liberal government, or the government as representing the Liberal party, had no mandate from the people of this country to bring in this measure. I join issue with that hon. gentleman, though with great diffidence. If a government ever had a mandate to bring in any measure in this or in the British parliament, or in any other deliberative assembly, the government of Canada had that mandate. It is fresh in the recollection of all of you that the Liberal party in this country, from British Columbia to Prince Edward Island, were represented in this city in June, 1893, and they were not here simply for a holiday; they were not here simply for fun. They were here for downright solid business, and they did it, and during these two days' session, they formulated and discussed ten propositions. I have them here, but I will not take time to enumerate them—on which they believed the government of this country could best be carried on.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Please repeat them. We want to know them all.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I will hand them to the hon. gentleman, as I have not time to read them. The eighth resolution was a promise to introduce this Redistribution Bill. These speeches were reproduced in nearly every Liberal paper throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion, and I saw them myself in a good many Conservative papers. That was three years before the general election came, so that the people were not taken by surprise. They had an unusually long notice of trial, as we say in law. They had three years in which to consider and prepare arguments to combat these propositions. And we are told that it was true the government was sustained, but as to the mandate there was none ; I entirely dissent from the argument of the hon. gentleman from Richmond (Mr. Miller), that in order to have a mandate from the people you must have, in effect, the Bill prepared and every detail of that Bill submitted to them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I deny that proposition utterly, and say that it cannot be maintained.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Speak positively.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I will speak more positively before I am done. So much for the mandate. The logical argument of the hon. gentleman from Richmond would lead one to the conclusion that you could only have one of these mandates at a time, and where would you and I be when they got through with the ten mandates, taking about five years between the elections, with one at each election ? It would be fifty years. The thing works itself out to an utter absurdity. I am sorry the hon. gentleman is not present. The hon. gentleman from Richmond, as I submit, puts his splendid talents not to the highest use. No doubt he was conscientious, but I think he was very seriously mistaken. I say that the government of the day had a mandate on every one of these ten propositions. I know that in West Northumberland, where I happen to live, and the adjoining counties, through the entire campaign in every school house and town hall, and upon every hustings, nearly every one of these propositions was discussed and thoroughly discussed, and I heard more than one—myself included—say that if the Liberal government should get into power and fail to give effect to the very question before the House now, or fail to make an honest effort to pass such a Bill as is now before the House, they would not get their votes again. I think, however, that they made an honest effort last year and are making an honest effort this year, and if the Senate throws out this Bill, they are flinging it broadcast in the faces of the great majority of the electors of this country. What does this Bill propose to do ? It comes in suggestive proximity to the next plank, the ninth plank, which was Senate reform. I fancy a good many think that there was something which was not merely an accident in their being in such close proximity. Shall we require to have Senate reform ? We cannot get on in this way ; the people's will must be carried out. Does any hon. gentleman opposed to my view believe for one moment that if a Conservative government were controlling the destinies of the country this Bill would be kicked out ?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It never would come.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It would not have been presented.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Yes, but something did come from that Conservative government, and it had no trouble in getting through this House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KERR—And the only explanation I have ever been able to give why that Act of 1882 got through this House is that this House felt that under the constitution it was a matter of a domestic character relating entirely to the House of Commons, and that the Senate had just about as much right to interfere with it as they would have to go over and ask that they rearrange their desks and chairs in the House of Commons and place Mr. Speaker on the opposite side of the room. I use that as a homely illustration. I explained it to a great many, and I justified the action of the Senate in passing that Bill at that time. I think the Senate should never have been asked to sanction it, but they were asked and did sanction it, and the Senate had a good answer, because they felt—and I wish hon. gentlemen had the same feeling to-day—that while they might have the constitutional power, they had not the constitutional right to throw out the Bill. My learned friend told this House last night, as I heard him in a few remarks before, that to speak of a distinction between constitutional power and constitutional right was simply a play upon words. I do not take that position. I think I know something of constitutional law, and the distinction betwen power and right, and while a man may have a constitutional power to do a thing he does not necessarily have a constitutional right to do it, and I am prepared to submit that proposition to the Supreme Court of this country, and I dare to do it even in opposition to my hon. friend. Of course, we have the constitutional power to commit political suicide if we wish, but I do not think we have the constitutional right to do it, although we came very near it last year, and if this amendment is carried, I think it will about complete our political suicide. I wish to come now to the real root of the matter. What is this Bill for ? I will tell you what it is for. It it to right a great wrong. Hon. gentlemen smile, but I will relieve the agony of their souls in a few minutes.

I hope that if I prove that a great wrong was committed in 1882 that the liberties of the electors of this country were improperly interfered with, that hon. gentlemen will then think differently of the matter. My hon. friend from Richmond, in his speech last night, threw down the gauntlet, and I take it up on one point. He said : " Why does not some senator from Ontario deal with this question ?" Well, I am an humble senator from Ontario, and I dare to deal with it, and prove to your satisfaction that that Bill of 1882, alias the gerrymander Act, was conceived in political sin and brought forth in political iniquity, and it is on the statute-book to-day. I propose now to read the evidence of a respectable man on that question, the evidence of Mr. John Hague, and I read it for the junior members, so to speak, of the Senate, because I do not expect that anything I may say or do will convert hon. gentlemen. I wish that I could even almost persuade you that it is right to let this Bill go through.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who is the writer, please ?

Hon. Mr. KERR—I read from the Toronto Globe, of July 10, 1899. I could not find it in my heart to read it last year, but I should not feel that I was doing my duty now unless I poured all the light I could on this question.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) Is the Globe a party paper ?

Hon. Mr. KERR—I do not care whether it is or not. The question is whether Mr. Hague's statement is true or false.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The Toronto Globe—oh !

Hon. Mr. KERR—The Toronto Globe, the palladium of the people's liberties from the beginning.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is it an editorial, or a communication ?

Hon. Mr. KERR—It is copied from the Montreal Herald, and is as follows :

SOME SECRET HISTORY.

How the Gerrymander of 1882 was Planned by the Government—Mr. Hague's Story—A Huge Chart which was Jealously Guarded from View—Work was Not Paid For—Comments of Sir John Macdonald and Other Prominent Conservatives—The Map of 1891.

(Special despatch to the 'Globe,' Montreal, July 9.)

The secret history of the gerrymander of 1882 is told by Mr. John Hague, editor of the 'Journal of Commerce,' in a signed article in the Montreal 'Herald,' as follows:

On September 15, 1881, I received a notice from a member of the Senate, who represented the government of Sir John Macdonald in Toronto, asking me to call upon him at a certain hour, I was informed that in compliance with the constitution the government proposed to re-arrange the constituencies of Ontario. I was told that the work of preparing a chart showing the boundaries proposed to be established had been entrusted to the officers of the Department of the Interior, of which Sir John held the portfolio, but they had failed to draft a workable plan. I was asked if I would undertake to construct a chart according to the ideas and suggestions of the speaker. On hearing my assurance that I felt quite equal to such a task, the senator proceeded to say that he wished a chart made showing the existing boundaries of the electoral districts, the voting strength of each of them, and the majority at the last election. He wished me to make this chart quite large, and to exhibit the statistics desired on small tickets which were to be pasted over each district, the one fixed on a place which returned a Liberal member to be pink, and the one over a district which had chosen a Conservative to be blue. These tickets were prepared by Williams, Sleith & McMillan, printers, Toronto. They were the same size as a street car ticket. I strongly opposed this plan as likely to prove cumbrous and very difficult to operate from in altering the boundaries, but was induced to put the plan to the test.

The next question was, where was the work to be done? It was represented as one demanding the greatest secrecy; there must be no risk of the chart being seen by any outsider. After various suggestions had been made and suggested,

I offered to do the work at my own house, where I would give up my study to the service of the government and use the help of some members of my family in filling in the tickets and other mechanical work. This was agreed to. I secured an electoral map about 18 inches by 12, and raised all the lines up, so as to be a reproduction on a large scale, the chart I made being 5½ feet by 4 feet. After most tedious work, extending over several weeks, for I only devoted my evenings to it, the chart with its mass of pink and blue tickets was finished, and a pretty foolish affair it was, as I had predicted. Ontario, so treated, looked like some fabulous animal, covered with loose scales, blue and pink, which fluttered like so many tiny wings. The thing was condemned, and the author of it was puzzled. He saw it was impossible to re-arrange the electoral districts from such a chart, and invited me to advise as to the best way of proceeding.

What the Government Desired.

I was informed that what the government wished to effect was a re-arrangement of the electoral districts so far as possible recognizing a common unit of representation. This, however, was to be made sufficiently elastic to allow the grouping of different sections of the district, so as to detach Conservative voters from places where they were in excess for the needs for a majority, and the attachment of such voters to districts where the new accession would turn the scale at an election in favour of a Conservative candidate where a Liberal one had hitherto been returned. Electoral districts which were hopelessly Liberal were, if possible, to be abolished, or the constituencies so arranged as to put the Liberal voters altogether in one district, especially where they could be drawn away from a district where they menaced the Conservative candidate. The process was afterwards called hiving, which is quite appropriate, though while the work was being done for the Act of 1882 this word was never used. After making a colossal chart, I took each electoral district and its surroundings in hand, and wrote upon each the number polled for each party at the two previous elections, the total number of electors, with the majority in each case. I coloured each district to show at a glance its political complexion. I then made a thorough study of the official returns of the two last elections, and took out hundreds of statistics for comparison and readjustment. Some of the districts were most difficult to alter so as to secure the results desired. It was said the configuration of some of these represented nothing on earth, in the heavens or the waters under the heavens. Quite true; they simply represented an effort to fix the boundaries of electoral districts according to two rules: first, on the principle of equal representation to equal numbers of voters ; second, on the principle that electoral districts should be arranged to serve the interests of the party in power when they are rearranged. These rules do not work well together, hence the highly eccentric shapes of some of the districts on the chart I have constructed.. When nearly complete it was taken down to Ottawa.

Done with Secrecy.

I was assigned to a room close to that of the Minister of the Interior. Into that room I was instructed to prohibit the entrance of any one, even a cabinet minister, unless brought in by the senator. I remember the petty rage of one minister to whom I refused admission. One day the Hon. Mr. Aikens, the Minister of Inland Revenue, came in and saw the chart, upon which he made no comment. His silence elicited the remark, 'Why, Aikins, I am surprised at a straight-laced fellow like you being in such company,' to which Mr. Aikens gave his usual placid smile. One by one several members were consulted as to the changes made in their districts, amongst others being the late J. C. Rykert, Col. O'Brien and Mr. Mackenzie Bowell. The latter made a little fuss over some feature, but it passed off. When the final touch was put to my chart, it was shown to Sir John Macdonald. After closely examining the work done on the boundaries, the statistics written on the face of the map and the schedule I wrote on its side, showing the result of the changes, Sir John exclaimed, 'That takes a great load off my shoulders.' The gerrymander Act, as it was called, was simply the chart I had constructed, expressed in legal language. The changes were estimated to have given an absolute gain to the Conservative party of four seats, and a better fighting chance in a number of others. I remember remarking at the time that all such arrangements proceeded on the very doubtful assumption that future elections would proceed on the same lines as past ones, and that each party in the future would command the same support, no more and no less, than it had previously done. On my saying this to Sir John, he said, 'Quite true, but constituencies are governed a good deal by tradition, and Grits are very conservative in sticking to their party.'

Was Not Paid.

My experience in this matter should be a warning to do work for a government apart from a stated salary. My advice is: Insist upon a written agreement for a fixed sum, to be paid on completion of the work. The work done by me in preparing the chart for the redistribution of seats cost me over $500. When payment was asked, Sir John put me off with vague promises of a handsome reward, yet I never received one cent remuneration for labour which took all my leisure for months, and drained me of a very large sum which I paid for assistance, besides giving up one room in my house for the government service. Some member should move for the production of that chart. If it is not now in the possession of the government, it has been stolen from the buildings, where I handed it over to the Premier, the late Sir John Macdonald, by whose instructions it was constructed.

Another Map Found.

The 'Herald' adds: Inquiry at the Department of the Interior to-day showed that there was an impression that the map from which the gerrymander of Ontario in 1882 was drawn as described by Mr. John Hague, was at one time kept in the department, but that it is no longer there. The description of the map, as given to the 'Herald' correspondent, corresponded to that given by the man who claims to have been its author. The 'Herald' correspondent made another discovery, however, that the Hague map is not the only representation of the voting geography of Ontario that was made under the direction of the Conservative gerrymander. In the department is a large map, measuring about 6 x 10 feet, and representing the province of Ontario and the Quebec counties of Ottawa and Pontiac. The map itself is a well-finished one, prepared by the draughtsman of the Post Office Department in 1891, and representing the counties as they exist municipally. Over this are carefully drawn the lines of the constituencies as gerrymandered by the Act of 1882. The work is finished with a nicety of detail. Each township, town and village is there, with the voting strength of the two parties marked in blue characters. The available vote and the actual vote polled are each marked. Then follows the Conservative vote marked "C," and the Reform vote marked "R." Altogether the chart is a most ingeniously contrived and neatly executed piece of political machinery, evidently designed for use in the gerrymander of 1892, when an attempt was made to make the work of the sweeping gerrymander of 1882 more complete by calling into requisition the surgical knife to supplement the Acts used in hacking to pieces the county organizations in order to stifle the electorate and hive the Grits.

Mr. Hague is a Canadian; he is a highly respectable man, and as honest a man as there is in this Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is not very respectable business.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Was he not rather a traitor?

Hon. Mr. KERR—The question is not whether John Hague was a traitor or not. The question is has he made a true statement?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I do not suppose you believe him for a moment.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I have no reason to disbelieve him.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—A man who would write like that is not worthy of belief. I would not believe him on his oath.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Is another word necessary to convince this House that a great wrong was attempted, that a great wrong was effected, and that the people have been suffering from it to the present hour?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is one thing certain, he took good care not to write that letter until the gentleman who would have contradicted it had been dead two or three years.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I do not know that the man is dead. This information does not need any comment. There it is. There are some hon. gentlemen on the opposition side, who will speak before this debate is done, and I want them to be good enough to tell the Senate what they think of that transaction. It cannot be answered by a laugh or by a suggestion that the writer is a traitor. I have watched the columns of the leading Conservative journals to see if they denied it, and to this hour I have never seen one letter of denial of the whole thing. Now, hon. gentlemen, what are you going to do in view of that? I should think every hon. gentleman would say I shall not soil my hands with it. You may not have known of it at the start; you know it now; what do you think of it? I put it to you as honest men, what do you think of it?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We do not take that evidence.

Hon. Mr. KERR—You cannot get away from it that way, because I am instructed that it is susceptible of being corroborated to the uttermost. Now, in the face of that, are men, honourable men, going to rise in this Chamber and vote for that amendment? If they do, they will be, to all intents and purposes, accessories after the fact. What I have read to this House cannot be met by comments upon my speech, or by disturbing me in my speaking. All I could say for the next twenty-four hours would not place this matter before you as that statement places it. I should like to show you for a few minutes how this iniquitous thing worked. Two or three times some hon. gentlemen objected to the use of the word 'fraud,' or something of that kind, in characterizing the gerrymander Act. If that statement which I have read is true, it was one of the grossest frauds ever perpetrated upon a free people? I take the responsibility of saying that. My point is here, and I will come to it at once, after having shown what that gerrymander Bill of 1882 is, and what was its object. In 1878, when the Conservative wave rolled over this country, whether properly or improperly it is not for me to say, but I can say this, that the result was to give the Conservative party in the province of Ontario, for which province alone I am speaking, an abnormal majority such as they never had before, and never could expect to have again, and never could expect to hold. By what means did they propose to retain power? By no other means that by depriving the people of their political rights, and that infamous machinery was devised to bring about that result, and it did its work only too well. It was a masterpiece of strategy and villainy. Since this country has been a nation, in its history there never has been anything of the kind, and for the credit of the people of the Dominion, I hope it will never be repeated.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Did not Mowat's gerrymander Bill beat it ?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Does that justify it ?

Hon. Mr. KERR—I am dealing with the people who concocted this thing. I never justified, and I never will, justify a gerrymander. I hate the word. It is an importation. It is not of British growth. It is un-British, but we have adopted it, and for a very bad purpose. Just fancy a number of British statesmen, feeling it was necessary to do something to hold power, sitting down and concocting such a measure as we have described here. One shrinks from the very idea. It does not answer my argument to say the Mowat government did something wrong. I have nothing to do with that now. When that time comes then will be time enough to discuss it, but we are present now with a very important matter and we must deal with it, and we must call a spade a spade and a hoe a hoe, no matter what it hoes up. I should like to show you, if time would allow me, how that gerrymander, when it went into operation, did its work. I shall give you a few samples. I have told you the contention was that the Conservative majority in 1878 was abnormally large, and that they could not hope to have that at the next election in 1882, and in order to keep that abnormally large majority stationary, and prevent it returning to its former normal state, that infamous Bill was passed, and it did its work and did it well. Ontario is a large province ; it had then eighty-eight seats. It is a Liberal province, and while this gerrymander may have slightly affected other provinces, the aim and object of the Bill was to destroy, as far as it could, the Liberal party in Ontario, and what did it do ? After the election of 1882, what was the result ? Some twenty-three only out of eighty-eight members elected were Liberals—leaving fifty-five Conservatives in that Liberal province, out of all proportion to their numbers. What did they do then ? Some hon. gentleman says, But you have not shown that the Liberals were interfered with very much ? For instance there are hardly any to lose—only twenty-three. I can give you two Liberals who lost their seats by the gerrymander, Mr. Gillies of North Bruce, and Mr. Macdonnell of North Lanark. Mr. Macdonnell lost his seat by reason of the two townships of Fitzroy and Huntley being dragged in from Carleton. There was no reason, in a proper readjustment of seats, for taking these townships out of Carleton and tacking them on to North Lanark, except the party object, and that riding, instead of being Liberal, is now Conservative. Then in Brockville, Mr. Wood defeated Mr. Comstock by a majority of four, and this was simply owing to the dovetailing of Kitley, a Conservative township, on to the riding of Brockville, which was Liberal. Many other seats were kept in line by that Act, but the indignation prevailing against it prevented the full effect being felt in 1882. In 1887 the gerrymander got in its deadly work. West Huron and both the Ontarios went Conservative, and were held by the Conservatives until 1896. South Wenthworth also was gerrymandered. Mr. Paterson's defeat in South Brant was the result of the gerrymander, by taking two townships from his riding and tacking them on to another riding where they were not needed. The county of Bruce has a large Liberal majority, no question about that, but it was so gerrymandered that the minority have two seats out of three. The present member for North Perth owes his election to the gerrymander of that riding, and the late Mr. Trow's defeat at the election of 1882 was due to the gerrymander of South Perth. I come now to the last seat one would suppose would have been attacked ; the hon. Minister of Justice was in that. By his personal popularity, and by his great ability he managed to hold the seat until 1896. That he lost it then was owing, perhaps not wholly, to the gerrymander, but also because he spent too much of his time, as it now turns out, assisting his friends in other gerrymandered ridings. But the one redeeming feature about that Act is this, that it, unintentionally, resulted in giving to this Chamber the hon. Minister of Justice. I could go on with a great many more examples of this kind, but the hon. Secretary of State has rendered it wholly unnecessary on my part. I want to say just a few words more on the gerrymander. There was another gerrymander in 1892, and there was one in 1893, showing that our Conservative friends thought they had a right to deal with this question quite irrespective of 'immediately after the census was taken,' so that that argument goes for nothing. The whole thing is here. It is right to pass Redistribution Bills at any time, but it would not be convenient to be passing them all the time, and so long as you do not interfere with the 51st section of the British North America Act, you can redistribute as often as parliament sees fit. The word 'readjustment' is used all the time, and where I use it I mean readjustment of the provinces. That section 51 was framed as machinery to preserve the proportionate representation in the different provinces. That is the primary object of that section, and it seems to have been a sort of bugbear from beginning to end in this debate, but that is the primary object of it, and you can redistribute at any time so long as you do not interfere with section 51 and the five rules. That is the argument I would make before the Supreme Court. We have heard high opinions quoted here from members of the other House. They may be all right enough; all of the gentlemen are able lawyers, but I am prepared to stake my professional reputation on the judgment of the Supreme Court as to the true meaning of section 51. The argument that it is not a proper time to bring in this Redistribution Bill because the census has not been taken, goes for nothing, because in 1893 an Act was passed to correct the Act of 1892, and if they had a right to correct at that time, they had the right to redistribute, so that that argument goes for nothing. There was no necessity for gerrymandering Mr. Joseph Rymal's riding. They took Ancaster from his riding for the purpose of politically assassinating him, and they did it. They added it to another riding forty or fifty miles away. I know that Mr. Rymal prided himself on that riding, the south part of Wentworth, one of the most beautiful ridings in all Ontario. It was the pride of his heart. In his righteous indignation he pleaded that violent hands might not be laid upon his splendid riding. He protested in the language of the chained gladiator:

I loathe thee petty tyrant;
I scorn you with mine eye,
I'll curse you with my latest breath,
And fight you till I die.
I will not beg for quarter,
I scorn to be your slave,
No, I'll swim the sea of slaughter,
Or sink beneath the wave.

Now, what further can I say? Here we have a harmless Bill introduced, not a single objection to the Bill itself. It comes down to this, that the opposition to this Bill is solely and absolutely and unqualifiedly that it shall not pass until after another election and another census. Well, that is a big mistake. I tell the Conservative party now that they will be making, to my view, a big mistake. If I were a Conservative, as I am a Liberal, I would rise in my place if I conscientiously opposed this Bill and protest against its passage. I would, if necessary, denounce it, but I would not take the responsibility of kicking it out. That is the way I understand they do in England. If it would be too great a strain on their consciences to vote for this distribution Bill, they might imitate the example of some members of the House of Lords and find it convenient to go out and take a little fresh air when the vote is being taken, if that would ease their conscience. This Bill is an emancipation proclamation of freedom to those who were enslaved eighteen years ago.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Half of them are dead.

Hon. Mr. KERR—If one of them is living he is entitled to justice. Are we to convert this Chamber into a modern Pretoria, and say that only certain people shall have their full franchise and that some shall be politically paralyzed? Why are we sending contingents to Africa?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—To fight the other Boers.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Why is the gallant son of Mr. Speaker, and other Canadian youth, the flower and bloom of our country, to-day, at this hour, treading the burning sands of South Africa, foot-sore, battle-scarred and weary, but that men should have, not their civil and religious only, but their political liberties as well, and the bones of many of our noble sons, fallen in that mighty struggle, will lie, and are lying now, amid the sands of that dark continent, and there they will lie for ever! Hon. gentlemen, I mean no disrespect in opposing this amendment, because, as the hon. gentleman knows, I respect and have respected him for long years, and it is in direct contradiction to his teaching. I wish you could have heard the gallant knight as I have heard him in earlier days tell the story of the Battle of the Boyne and the Siege of Derry, and I am happy to say that his teaching has had no other effect upon me than to wish to abolish this tyranny on the electorate of this country. I would not so dishonour his name; and has that long, useful and honourable life culminated in this wretched amendment? Has it all come down to simply 'a six months' hoist?'

Tell it not in Gath; publish it not in the streets of Askelon!

The spirit of liberty is abroad in the land, and we cannot check it. The people of this country are going to have their rights. If they do not have their rights to-day, they will have them next day. If not this year, they will have them next year, and depend upon it, you will have to give up this unequal struggle, because the people of the country will rule. I have stated that the spirit of liberty, civil, religious and political, is abroad in the land. The battle cry of freedom that was raised in the Pass of Thermopylae and on the Plains of Marathon has been echoing along the pathway of nations, teaching men to do and to die for civil, religious and political freedom, as at Bannockburn, Waterloo, Balaclava, Kimberley and Ladysmith, and soon we shall see that flag, planted by loyal Canadian hands floating triumphantly from the battlements of Pretoria. To-night, or on the morrow, this Chamber will see—this country will see—the British Empire will see, civilized world will see, whether we have risen beyond the conception of liberty as under the rule of the President of the Transvaal. To-night, or the morrow, the people will see, how far in the evolution of the human race, according to Mr. Darwin's theory, how many in this Chamber have, and how many have not, got beyond the Paul Kruger stage of civilization.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—This very interesting question has been so fully and ably discussed that it was not my intention to have spoken on it at all, thinking it quite unnecessary to repeat the very powerful and varied arguments already adduced, but a remark made by my hon. friend, the Secretary of State—and he is a personal friend of mine, to whom I am sincerely attached—a remark made by him, and which has been endorsed by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, seems to me to render it absolutely necessary for the protection of mine own name and character that I should utter a few words. The hon. gentleman ventured to say that every hon. member voting for this amendment placed himself in the position of countenancing a diabolical fraud, or, as the hon. gentleman said, associating himself as an accomplice after the fact in some great wrong. If the hon. gentleman would remember that he is not endowed with the only wisdom and moral goodness to be found in this Chamber, he would think for a moment, before he uttered such a condemnation as that, on those who differ in opinion from him, and who will vote for the rejection of this Bill. Surely he must know that there are persons in this Chamber of mature years, of long experience, of high character, whose morality no one questions, that differ from him in opinion, and because of that difference of opinion they are to be characterized as criminals, associating with criminals, countenancing a very hurtful and diabolical piece of work done by the Conservative party some years ago. I hold that such a remark should not be made here, and that it should be remembered that whatever position may be taken by hon. members on this question, their moral character, their recognition of right and wrong, should not be thus trampled upon or called into question. I consider, for instance, although I am not a lawyer and do not pretend to judge constitutional questions in the way they have been discussed here at all, that I have an ordinary share of common sense. I believe I have a very high sense of what moral rectitude is, and I believe my whole course in the Senate, and in the outside world, would justify my claiming to be exempt from any charge of countenancing wrong, because I have a different opinion from the person who so characterizes such an act. The hon. gentleman from Delorimier made a remark with reference to the Senate and its qualifications and duties. He admitted frankly and freely that it was right for the Senate, if anything was sprung upon the House suddenly, to refuse to pass it for the time being, but he forgets, or if he does not forget he does not mention, that the Senate has other duties besides the duty of throwing out such a Bill. It has higher duties. It has duties here to judge of the measures from the House of Commons with all the fairness and justness which might be expected to be found in a body like this. One of the highest or most important qualifications is not merely the disposing of a Bill suddenly introduced, but also to guard against the introduction into the statute-book of measures which evidently are not for the benefit of the country at large, but calculated for the interests simply of a party which controls the Lower House. One of the highest functions of the Senate is to judge measures of that kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Was that their duty in 1882 ?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It is their duty at any time. I hold that it is one of the highest functions of the Senate, when a measure is not considered to be good or necessary for the country, to throw it out. It is their bounden duty so to do. It is not that we are rejecting the will of the people. That is an absurdity. It has been very strongly asserted that the mandate of the people has been given with reference to this Bill. I think, really, to judge fairly the arguments presented to us last night by the hon. gentleman from Richmond, that there does not seem to be a shadow of doubt whatever as to the power, and limitations of the power, of the Senate with reference to this question. He gave us the clearest and strongest evidence of the procedure in the House of Lords on a measure very similar in its character to the one which is now presented to us.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—What was that ?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—If the hon. gentleman was not present to hear it is not my fault. He gave us a full account of what was done, that before the House of Lords should pass a Bill relating to the franchise, they must also know the use which was to be made of it.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The hon. gentleman from Richmond mentioned three or four measures before the House of Lords. Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to tell us which one it was ? Was it Home Rule or the Disestablishment of the Irish Church?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The whole three of them.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Which was it ?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It is not necessary to specify any of the three measures which he referred to. I speak on the general principle of the right and duty of the House to interfere with legislation of the House of Commons under certain circumstances. Speaking of a mandate from the people here, I differ totally from the view presented by the hon. gentleman from Cobourg (Hon. Mr. Kerr). I do not think we have any mandate at all, or anything resembling a mandate, with reference to this matter. It is true it formed a part of the programme which was arranged in 1893 by certain influential members of the Liberal party, but what was that ? It was not parliamentary. It was not a meeting of gentlemen elected to represent the people. It was a company of people with very strong views who met together and arranged in their judgment a very fine plan for the benefit of the country.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—But they did not carry it out.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That programme was submitted to the people in June, 1896.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Did the hon. gentleman hear this programme discussed in the province of Quebec ? Did any one ever hear, upon any of the platforms, any mention of such a thing as the Redistribution Bill ?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I shall answer the hon. gentleman by telling him that that programme was submitted to the people and distributed in circulars and the Liberal papers in the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—And what was the result ? The Senate, last year, rejected the Bill. Surely if there was a feeling of this kind in the country there would be some manifestation of it, and petitions would come in by the hundreds if the people were not satisfied. I hold that had the people, whose rights we are said to be interfering with, taken a deep interest in this matter, we would have had petitions here by the hundred praying for the passing of this Bill. But we have not heard a word nor received a petition from anybody. It is said this is the second introduction of the Bill, and it was mentioned very quietly, it was intended to convey the idea to our minds that the people were asking it a second time. There never was a wilder fancy than that. They have never asked for it a second time, and I am satisfied, from my knowledge of the constitution of the Senate, and its members, that if this question were fairly submitted to the people even without the details which the hon. gentleman from Cobourg had implied that the hon. gentleman from Richmond mentioned, but if the people had an idea what they were voting for, just simply a Bill for the accomplishment of the very purpose of the Bill before us, and if that were voted upon by the people this Senate would not stand one hour in the way. They would carry out the will of the people as soon as ever they knew what it was. But the Senate does not believe that it is the will of the people that this Bill should pass. We have on former occasions differed from the House of Commons on some very important matters, and in my judgment and from what I have heard and read since, the views of the Senate have always been confirmed by the people at large. There has been no great public dissatisfaction with the action of the Senate. And what object have we in caring about one administration or another? We are not particularly interested whether it is a Conservative or a Liberal government. It should have no influence upon us, and our vote has no influence upon the government, and this matter, instead of being considered as before us on the mandate of the people, does not come to us in that capacity at all. I do not propose to go over the long arguments which have been presented, but it struck me when I was on my feet that I would like to meet one of the statements which have been made, which I think is wholly inaccurate, with reference to the real meaning of this Act of 1882, which has been condemned so strongly and pronounced so bad and so atrocious that it should not be on our statute-book at all. Since this Act was passed there has been a mandate from the people, the same mandate as the hon. gentleman from Delorimier refers to. Did not parliament three times appeal to the people after this 'villainous Act' of 1882 was passed, and did not the people approve of it? The people did not say it was wrong and that they must repeal it. Nothing of that kind was said. There were three distinct elections, and the country approved of the action which had been taken by that government.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—The dice were loaded.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Were they loaded in 1896?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I do not propose going into details. Dealing with this matter in a general way, I venture to say that, without knowing anything about its particulars, the charges against the Act are not justified at all, and I think I can maintain that position by the results which have flowed from it. It is quite possible that this document which has just been read to us by the hon. gentleman from Cobourg may have weight with some one. It has no weight with me whatever. I would like to know a little more about it, but I do know that we cannot presume to enter into the details of the Act which has been alluded to in that document. We do not know what the motives were. We do not know that that very document was acted upon. It was prepared and no further attention paid to it. There is no proof that it was a document which the then government acted upon.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The document states that I was called in to see what changes were made in my district. There never was any proposal to make any changes in my district, and therefore I could not be consulted about it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman deny having seen the map?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not deny having seen a map. I do not know that I have seen this map. The man says he was promised $500 and never got it, which probably accounts for the letter.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Then, in reference to the figures which have been given to us by the hon. Secretary of State, I do not think it is worth while going back to all the elections which have taken place. It will be sufficient, I think, to take the election of 1896, and what do we find on an investigation of the figures? We find a totally different result, the very reverse of what the hon. Secretary of State says, and the figures which I will lay before the House will be few in number and can easily be remembered. The very fact that in the House of Commons the Liberals have a majority of over fifty shows that whatever was done in that Act, did not deprive the Liberals of their rights, and that is the best test of what the Act was, It was not an Act which took away the rights of the Liberals which were supposed to be interfered with by it. Then what do we find is the present state of affairs? I was so struck by the figures put before us by the hon. Secretary of State that I have taken a great deal of trouble and have endeavoured very carefully and accurately to sum up the figures. I have taken them from the Parliamentary Companion, which will be accepted by every one, and guided solely by that book, I have endeavoured to show the truth of my statement, and the incorrectness of the statement that the Liberals have been injured by that Act. In the election of June, 1896, the last general election, the summing up of the total vote gives the Conservatives 195,875, Liberals 170,934, Patrons 32,034, Independents 22,318. That is the total votes polled recorded in this book. By looking at the number of successful candidates and the number of votes which they polled, we arrive at this conclusion: Forty-four were elected as Conservative members. The votes for those forty-four were 108,850. Divide it by forty-four and we get an average of 2,474 for every Conservative member elected. There were forty-three Liberals elected, and the votes which they received were 100,610, which divided by the forty-three, gives an average vote for each Liberal member of 2,331. In the face of those figures where is the injury to the Liberals? If it requires 2,474 Conservative electors to return a member, surely it is not encroaching on the rights of the Liberals when they get a member for 2,331 votes—140 less required to elect a Liberal member. Is that not sufficient to show that whatever may have been the intention of that Bill, whatever may have taken place in the drafting of that Bill, the result was not to do any injury whatever to the Reform party? It left them actually returning a larger number of members with a smaller number of voters. I do not think that that is doing them any great injury. I have disregarded the Patrons and Independents on account of the impossibility of dividing them so as to know what their sentiments were, or what party they might belong to, in addition to their occupying that position. But it does not at all affect the general statement, and I notice, also, in connection with this question, that this very scheming in legislation has been much better done in Ontario than it was done by the Dominion. They seem to have been better up to that kind of work, regulating the constituencies, because, it is a most extraordinary fact that there is a larger number of Conservative votes required to elect a member than with the Liberals. I went carefully through their last recorded election in 1894, with this result. I find there were twenty-four Conservative members returned, there were twelve Patrons and two Independents, which I had to disregard on account of not being able to apportion the votes between the Conservatives and the Liberals. The Conservatives returned twenty-four members, and they had secured 57,608 votes. That gives an average of 2,400 for each member. The Liberals returned fifty-three members, and they secured 107,662, an average of 2,031. Hon. gentlemen will see how well it was done there. All through Ontario it took nearly 400 for every Conservative member more than was required for election of a Liberal member; and in the face of these figures it will be seen that instead of any injury to the Liberals, the wrong has been the other way. To be represented as they should be, and according to their numbers, the Conservatives should have a larger number of representatives than they now have either in the Dominion or the local House. When people talk of the great wrong done by the Act of 1882, they should look into the figures more closely. I undertake to say that no discrepancy can be found in my figures, and I trust hon. gentlemen have sufficient confidence in my honesty to believe that there is not the slightest attempt to cover them in one way or another. It is just an earnest search after the truth. I was so startled by the statement made by the hon. Secretary of State that it set me to work to look into the matter. I did not see his paper or know what it professed to be. I do not propose to say much about the details of the Bill, but it comes to us announced very loudly and very strongly as being an attempt to remedy a great wrong. That is the strongest statement which has been made in favour of it, that a great wrong was done in 1882, and this Bill is to remedy that wrong. I have shown that in my judgment no wrong was done in 1882, and consequently in my view there is no necessity for this legislation. Then, again, if it is necessary to redress the wrong, why is it that this Bill is only partial ? Why is it that it does not deal with the whole question and the whole wrong done in 1882 in all the provinces as well as in Ontario ? I cannot see why. For that reason, I think the Bill is so defective and so incomplete that it ought not to be passed, that it is not the Bill to correct that wrong, even admitting that the wrong was done. If this Bill was very carefully considered in the lower House while being drafted, as I presume it must have been, there is one thing very strange, that when it came to this House a very important alteration was made in it, because the original Bill had a provision for the city and county of St. John, N.B. I understand that is a very important constituency, and there is some great wrong to be rectified there. It was in the Bill as it was introduced and was quietly dropped out. I do not know the reasons for it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The member kicked.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I have only to surmise the reason, and it strikes me that if it was a great wrong and the Bill was to remedy that wrong, why should that be left out ? I suppose the Minister of Justice will reply to all the arguments which have been advanced against this measure, and he may be able to give us the true explanation why the city and county of St. John has been left out of the Bill as submitted to us. To my mind, only two reasons suggest themselves: Either that the party spirit in the proposed distribution, as introduced in the other House, was so obvious and clear in that particular case that nobody could mistake it, and it was thought that it must be cut out, or it would jeopardize the whole Bill.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to tell him why it was taken out ?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—After I conclude my remarks. The other suggestion was that an influential member connected with that constituency was very much opposed to that provision being introduced, and it was to satisfy him that it was left out. If it was so, no matter what its importance, it was considered of such great value as to change the plan of the government. They could not afford to lose the one vote, but what does it all mean ? That that one vote was of sufficient consequence to lead them to forego the correction of a wrong to which they were committed. Surely, if that were the case, it would seem to indicate that coming events cast their shadows before. We can imagine the cloud rising in Manitoba throwing a rather heavy shade just now in this direction, and we may see a similar cloud in Prince Edward Island, showing that there must have been some little disturbance expected there, and I do not know but that what has taken place lately in British Columbia may have something to do with it. To my mind, it is very suggestive that it is sought to strengthen the Liberal vote by passing this Bill in order to have an additional supply. That is stated to be the intention.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We would hardly know on which side the hon. gentleman was.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I try to be fair. The side that I am upon, if I am on any side at all, is for the good of the country and for the interests of the people, and if I saw that a wrong had been done, if it had been done by my dearest friend, I would vote against it. I do not see any proof of the wrong, and I do not see anything in the way of a mandate from the people that we should pass this Bill, and therefore I shall vote against it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Listening to all the arguments which have taken place on this Bill, a layman is apt to get confused. It appears to me, after hearing all this discussion about the constitutional law and the privileges of the Senate, that a great deal depends on how it affects the party. If constitutional opinions come in conflict with the party feeling, so much the worse for the constitution. Looking at this bill before us, one party says that we have no right to reject it at all. Now, I consider if we have a right to pass it we have a right to reject it. If we have not, why appeal to us at all. Look at the Bill itself; what does it say? Look at the preamble of the Bill. It says:

Her Majesty, by the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows.

It cannot be passed without our sanction. We defeated this Bill last year—the same Bill with a little alteration? The only improvement, if it is an improvement, is in regard to the city of St. John. The necessity of this Bill is less now than ever. We are one year nearer the census. I may be a little more sensitive than some people, but it seems to me almost like an insult to send this Bill to the Senate again. What is the object? They might know it was a foregone conclusion that the Senate would reject it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—'While the lamp holds out to burn.'

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM. That is a good one; I hope the hon. gentleman will apply it personally. Does the hon. gentleman fancy for a moment that we are going to swallow ourselves this year when he has not made any improvement? He has not even seasoned it. He has not put pepper and salt on it to improve it. Some hon. gentlemen have gone so far as to say they got a mandate to pass this Bill. A mandate from whom? From a few Grit politicians who met in caucus. Is that a mandate? I do not consider it. I have the Bill before me and before I sit down I shall read the mandate to see how far they have carried it out. I will try and deal with what my hon. friend from Northumberland said before I sit down.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—What have the other planks of the platform to do with this?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—After I am through speaking I shall answer any question the hon. gentleman may ask. I did not interrupt him and I will not suffer any interruption while I am speaking when the object is to throw me off my argument. What is the great object to get this Bill through? Are my hon. friends afraid of the electors of this country? Look at the majority the government has in the House of Commons. Are they afraid to appeal to the same jury? It looks like it. And why are they afraid? Because, all the many pledges they made to the people, except this one, they have scattered to the four winds of heaven. They are afraid to meet the people squarely. The Minister of Justice accused this Senate of being Conservatives—they wanted to load the dice in favour of the Conservative party. I deny that. But the hon. gentleman, and those who act with him, want to load the dice in favour of the so-called Reform party, because they are afraid to appeal to the people who returned them to power. Why not wait and carry out the practice we have always followed since confederation, that is, every ten years, when the census is taken, we readjust the constituencies. We have heard from the hon. gentleman from Sarnia that the government has the advantage now, as between the parties. But they want to play with loaded dice, and as long as I am here they can not have my vote to sustain anything of the kind. I am satisfied there are many hon. gentlemen here who take the same view. I feel we should have every opportunity to have a fair election in this country. The Secretary of State tells us that he wants to have a pure election—that he wants to carry the elections on public morality. I said, while he was speaking, 'stick to that.' The idea of hon. gentlemen talking about political morality before people who know what is going on in this country now, especially those who know about the way the machine is working in the province of Ontario! It has been at work in West Huron and Brockville, and those gentlemen who are talking about purity of elections and fair play are the same gentlemen who called on their mechanical majority in the House of Commons to vote down an attempt to inquire into the rascality of interfering with the ballots. They talk about purity of elections, when they refuse to look into the rascality going on in these counties in Ontario! A man made an affidavit in Detroit, describing the rascality that went on in Ontario. What did the party do? Somebody offered him $100 a month if he would swear he was not at the Brockville election. The government are afraid to face the electors, and they want to load the dice. The people will surely punish them when the time comes unless they mend their ways, and they must mend them soon. The hon. Secretary of State submitted diagrams of the constituencies to show how constituencies were cut. I asked him if he could show us Tuckersmith, but he could not, that was not in his line. He was the man of all others responsible for the Tuckersmith swindle in this House. I remember when Malcolm Cameron was a candidate for South Huron, and Greenway, afterwards Premier of Manitoba, was his opponent. Malcolm Cameron was declared elected, but there was a petition against him for corrupt practice. What did he do? He introduced a Bill in the House of Commons to take Tuckersmith from Centre Huron and add it to his constituency in order to load the dice, as my hon. friend the Minister of Justice wants to do now. The Bill passed the Lower House and was presented here. The hon. Secretary of State was the man that fathered it. It was all right, he said; the Bill did not make any difference because both candidates were supporters of the government of the day. But what was the result? The Senate threw out the Tuckersmith Bill, an election was held and Mr. Greenway was successful. He came down here to parliament. He wanted to be introduced in the House by one member from each side. He was introduced and was not long there before they brought some influence to bear upon him—I do not know what, I was not behind the scenes, but they got Mr. Greenway to support them. They gave him a good start in the North-west by good advice or something else. I would like to read the speech which the hon. Secretary of State delivered when he introduced the Tuckersmith Bill to show how harmless it was to load the dice in favour of a supporter, but it would not go down in the Senate, it was thrown out. That is a long time ago, back in 1874, but they think now it is forgotten. The injustice they tried to perpetrate on that occasion will not soon be forgotten in this country. It will take a long time to wipe out such a measure by talking goody-goody and about preserving morality of elections. Act wrong once and it is bound to follow you. The hon. Secretary of State said at the time the Tuckersmith Bill was a measure affecting two constituencies in the county of Huron. Changes were made in the division of the two ridings. He continued:

He was not aware that there was any opposition to the measure. Of course it was quite competent for the Senate to interfere with legislation of that kind, but in a matter that was local in its character, and where it was a natural change to make and one that affects only the representation in the other branch of the legislature, he thought this House might acquiesce in the reasonable proposition made to it, and pass this Bill. It could not be said that the change bore a political complexion, as both ridings were represented by gentlemen of the same party.

Letellier de St. Just also said that the Senate had a perfect right to throw out the bill. To-day they tell us that we must pass this Redistribution Bill. There are other matters in connection with this measure that if properly looked into will not stand the light of day. I have before me the Tuckersmith Bill, and it is worth placing on record. It is as follows:

An Act to amend the Act 35 Victoria, chapter 13, intituled 'An Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons.'

Whereas, by the Act passed in the thirty-fifth year of Her Majesty's reign, and intituled 'An Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons,' the county of Huron was divided into three ridings for the purpose of representation in the House of Commons, the said ridings being called respectively the south, centre and north ridings—the south riding consisting of the townships of Goderich, Stanley, Hay, Stephen, Usborne, and the village of Clinton, and the said centre riding consisting of the townships of Colborne, Hullet, McKillop, Tuckersmith, Grey, the town of Goderich, and the village of Seaforth; and whereas, the said township of Tuckersmith by natural boundaries and geographical position should form part of the said south riding; and whereas, a large majority of the electors of the said township of Tuckersmith have petitioned parliament to be detached from the said centre riding, and to be attached to the said south riding for the purpose of representation in the House of Commons; and it is desirable to grant the prayer of the said petition, and this to make the said riding as compact as may be, and to have the several municipalities comprising the same contiguous to each other; Therefore, Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. The centre riding of the county of Huron shall hereafter consist of the townships of Colborne, Hullet, McKillop, Grey, the town of Goderich, and the village of Seaforth.

2. The south riding of the said county of Huron shall hereafter consist of the townships of Goderich, Stanley, Tuckersmith, Hay, Stephen, Usborne, and the village of Clinton.

3. This Act shall not affect the elections which heretofore have taken place for the present parliament.

The Secretary of State said also the other day that there is no way you can offend the people so quickly as by interfering with the franchise. I said then in reply to him, 'I agree with you,' but now on thinking it over, I find there is one other way you can offend them more, and that is by having a machine to count the ballots for the wrong man, as was done in the county of Huron, a crime which the government of the day refused to investigate. That will offend the people more, and the government will lose more support for that than for anything else. I am not going into the rascality which took place in Elgin. I am dealing with the Dominion elections in South Huron and in Brockville. The government is bound that we shall not get at the facts, but we know enough to show how ballots were 'switched,' and that is why they want to get this Bill through, to see if they can load the dice and pack the jury so that they can snap a favourable verdict from the country. The hon. Secretary of State said further that he wanted to carry on the government on the ground of political morality. That is the old cry. I remember him a long time back speaking of political morality and purity of elections. Does the election in South Huron show political morality? Would the election in Brockville show political morality when the hon. gentleman's party offer a man $100 a month if he will swear he was not at the election in Brockville? How will they explain their conduct before the people of this country? How can they explain their refusal to permit an examination of the ballots in the South Huron election that were partly examined last year? They have not the excuse they have in Toronto. They have not burned the ballots yet—at least, I do not think they have. I cannot see for the life of me why the men who sit as the representatives of those two constituencies in the House of Commons do not resign and go to the people again. The Secretary of State offered an excuse for how his party got defeated in 1878. He said there was a depression all over the world at that time from 1874 to 1878 while the Reform party were in power. We know that. There was a depression particularly in Canada. That was the time when Canada was a slaughter market for United States manufactures and our people were not employed. In fact, that was the period of the soup kitchen in this country, it was the time of the fly-on-the-wheel policy. I agree with the first part of the hon. gentleman's excuse. I admit there was a depression, but the government refused to act. They said they had nothing more to do with the prosperity of this country than a fly on a wheel might have with the turning of the wheel. The Conservative party appealed to the country. They made pledges; as my hon. friend from De Lorimier would call it, they had a mandate. They said to the people, 'If you elect us to parliament we will protect the interests of the country.' The Liberals said, 'You cannot do it.' Did the Conservative party carry out the pledge that they made on that occasion? They carried out every one of their pledges. If that was a mandate they carried it out. But what have these gentlemen done? They talk about having a mandate. Where do they get it? No one gave me a mandate to do so and so no one can command me except Her Majesty. I am free born, as every hon. gentleman present here to-day is, and we are not to be influenced by such arguments to load the dice so that the men who have misgoverned the country shall be returned again. They pledged themselves to parliamentary control over expenditure, to let contracts by tender to the lowest bidder, to purity of elections, and economy in expenditure. In this mandate they were told to economize the expenditure, have they done so? They said at one time that $35,000,000 was more than 5,000,000, people could pay annually. What did they do? They increased the expenditure and that is why they are afraid to face the people, and they want us to help them to load the dice to ensure their return to power. I do not wish to say anything disparaging of the hon. Minister of Justice. I think more of him than I did formerly. I think if he had a free hand things would be very much better. When I spoke last time I did the hon. minister an injustice and I am no man to do another injustice without putting the matter right afterwards. Speaking of those two anxious days here, the time the statement was made 'Not a man not a dollar,' I said that those sitting at the Council Board were equally guilty with Mr. Tarte and Mr. Laurier, and I named them. I found out afterwards that my hon. friend the Minister of Justice was not there. He was in the North-west; I withdraw that statement as far as he is concerned, because no matter how much I may differ from him politically, no matter how much I may dislike some of his actions, politically, on that question I exonerate him, and I say that I think he is loyal to the core. There is another point that they were very particular about, another pledge before the people, another plank in the platform. That was with reference to members of parliament being employed by the government. In the other House they went so far as to introduce a Bill to do away with this crying evil, and how do we find it to-day? Has it decreased? I would feel ashamed if I advocated one thing and submitted a Bill to parliament on any good grounds that I should pretend to desire to carry out and would not really carry out what I intended to do. We know, after all this, that they carried out the practice even after the introduction of the Bill. I have a copy of the bill here, which is as follows:

An Act better to secure the Independence of Parliament.

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. Except as provided by chapter eleven of the Revised Statutes, intituled 'An Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons,' no person shall be eligible to be appointed to any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the Government of Canada, at the nomination of the Crown, or at the nomination of any of the members or officers of the Government of Canada, to which any salary, fee, wages, allowance, emolument or profit of any kind is attached, while he is a member of the House of Commons or until at least one year has elapsed since the disssolution of the parliament of which he was a member.

After recess, I will read Mr. Mulock's speech when he introduced this Bill. I think that should appear in the debates along with the Bill. We can look back to a member of parliament from the province of Quebec, who had suffered a good deal for his party, who had an offer from the government, who was to be governor of Quebec. He had Mr. Laurier's promise in his pocket: He kept it there for a session or two until he could stand it no longer. Then he threatened to kick, and when he took up the gun, like Mr. Crockett's coon, Mr. Laurier came down accordingly. But, he could not get the governorship. They had to get Mr. Jetté to resign his position as judge, and then they appointed him to the position.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—When the House rose at six o'clock, I had not quite concluded my remarks. I would like to read to the House the speech of the present Postmaster General in the House of Commons when he introduced a Bill into parliament to prevent members of parliament being employed by the Crown. Mr. Mulock moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 111) better to secure the independence of parliament. The report in Hansard is as follows:

Mr. FOSTER. What are the principles of the Bill?

Mr. MULOCK. The object of the Bill is to accomplish what its title indicates, further to secure the independence of parliament. It has been the constant effort of parliamentarians to secure on the floor of parliament the free, unbiassed expression of the will of the people, and from time to time legislators have directed their attention to the removal of all obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of so desirable an end. Our predecessors have from time to time provided against biassing influences, as for example, the presence of placemen in parliament. That is recognized now as a condition of affairs which should not be tolerated in a free parliament. There are a few exceptions to the Act respecting this House, but the general principle has been affirmed long years since, that members of parliament should not owe any divided allegiance; a member of parliament should represent freely and fully the will of the people who sent him here, and, to speak inoffensively and yet perhaps in an apt way to describe my view, he should not accept the shilling from any side of the House to the extent of being in any way hampered in the discharge of his duties or rendered at all otherwise than free to act as his best judgment dictates in dealing with all questions before the House. Now, it is impossible for one to shut his eyes to an abuse which has grown up in the Canadian parliament, more particularly in the House of Commons, an abuse that is far-reaching and is attended by more evils than the one to which I particularly allude, but none equal in magnitude to the evil of menacing the independence of parliament itself. What I refer to is members of parliament and members of the House, applying to the government of the day for positions in the gift of the Crown, positions of emolument which if they were to accept would at once disqualify them from remaining members of the House. Why? Because the moment they have entered the public service as civil servants they would cease to be free, they would be servants of the government of the day, and therefore, to that extent, not untrammelled to represent their constituents. Well, Sir, I would like to know if a man is more free who is an applicant for a position or who has received the promise of a position from the government of the day as soon as it may suit them to appoint him. How many members are there in this House to-day in that position? There are a considerable number.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, a very considerable number of members of this House to-day are applicants for public offices from the government that they are supporting, and several have promises of such positions. A short time ago the Premier of this country wrote a letter to a member of the House stating that ten seats in the Senate had been promised. He did not say they had been promised to members of the House, but I have not the slightest doubt that a very considerable number of these seats are being kept vacant for some members of the House. We know, and the country knows, that public offices have been kept vacant now for years which ought to have been filled or abolished long since, in order that when a fitting time arrives, members of the House might be appointed to these positions. It is not very long since a member of the House was appointed to a position, the promise of which, I understand, had been made to him whilst he was a member of the House, and he continued to be a member for a length of time after the promise was made. How can a member of the House who has the promise from the government of a position of emolument be free to vote or take a stand as a representative of the people against the will of the government? However independent he may desire to be, that relation entirely destroys his usefulness as a representative of the constituency which sent him here. Further, Sir, to regard parliament as primarily a stepping-stone to office is calculated, in my judgment, to lower the dignity of parliament. I do not deny that members of parliament, after the lapse of a proper period of time, may have an equal claim with others to public office, but it will be a deplorable state of affairs if the idea comes to prevail that the best way to secure public office is to be a candidate for parliament or a member of parliament. Men will come here not to serve their country generally, but the government of the day in order that they themselves may profit and the interests of their constituents will only take a very secondary position. I think, therefore, considering the magnitude of the evil that the time has arrived when parliament must assert itself. I think I am not outside of the remark when I say that from 15 to 20 per cent of the members now supporting the administration have promises of a situation, and depend upon the government to carry out these promises. Such an element in parliament is calculated to lower the influence of public opinion in the House, and entirely defeat the object of our parliamentary system.

We are told that we have a mandate from the people to pass this measure to amend the Redistribution Act. What mandate have we received in reference to it? It is true that at a Grit convention they spoke of passing this Bill, but a great many other matters were also referred to. There are ten items in the manifesto of that convention. My hon. friend says that this platform was published all through the province of Quebec, and that is why I call it a manifesto. What right has the Reform party in this country to publish this document in the province of Quebec and call it a mandate to the Senate?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Allow me to interrupt for a moment. There is a misapprehension. We do not speak of that manifesto as a mandate, but we speak of the ratification that was given to that by the electors returning a majority to parliament as a mandate from the people.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—And this is one of the ten pledges, and I shall deal with the other nine later on. If the government were endorsed by such a large majority at the last election, why are they afraid to go to the electors without a packed jury? Have they sinned so much that they are afraid that they will be found guilty? My own opinion is that they will be convicted. A mandate issued from a caucus of politicians is not binding upon us. Then, tariff reform is another plank in that platform. How much did they reform the tariff?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Thirty-three and a third per cent by the preference to England.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I know they talk of preferential trade with England. They told the people what an advantage it would be to the farmers if they could sell their mutton, beef, grain and cheese in England by getting a preference in England over other countries. Did they get that preference?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Yes.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Talk about tariff reform. I question very much whether the people of this country assented to tariff reform. I am a loyal subject of Her Majesty.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I doubt it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—But I do not want the people of Canada to go in debt for silk and shoddy to bring into this country. With so many men idle in the country we ought to be able to produce enough to support ourselves. But it is a spendthrift government and we are going in debt. Is the balance of trade in favour of this country? No. I say we should extend that trade. We want a quid pro quo. We must deal with John Bull the same as with any one else.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That is not loyal.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman wants to buy loyalty. That is not my way of being loyal to my Queen and country. Then another plank was reciprocity. Where is it ? What is it ? Is it unrestricted ? That was the policy of the party at one time ? They were going to give us reciprocity. What have they done to get it ?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman's party could not get it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—There is one thing we would not do. The lever we had to obtain reciprocity was to exchange corn for barley ; the government were good enough to take the duty off corn and give it to the United States the same as they are giving things to England now, without any compensating advantage. Then the next plank is 'Corruption condemned.' What good people they are ; and they are steeped to the lips in corruption to-day, and they say 'Corruption condemned.'

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Curran Bridge.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I am not talking about the Curran bridge. I wish the hon. gentleman would not interrupt me, I do not mind it much, but two can play at that game, and if he takes my advice he will keep quiet. Corruption is a thing we ought to deal with. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice told us we had county councils and municipal councils in the towns of Ontario, but they did not tell us they had a machine there. I do not say he knows anything about the machine. I do not accuse him of that, but I accuse him of being a member of the government which is trying to stifle the wrong-doing in the elections at West Huron and Brockville. I do not hold him personally responsible for it, but he is in bad company. Then the next plank is economy. That is a beautiful word. They were very economical ! What have they done in reference to the expenses of the country? There is no necessity for me to go over it. Hon. gentlemen know how they have increased the expenditure without rhyme or reason. Then responsible government : I do not know what that means. I thought we had responsible government before. But this government thinks they are not responsible to the people. They do just what they please. Then the next plank, 'The law as to settlers.' I do not know what that means ; it is not explained here. What do they mean to do with the settlers ? Do they mean this gang they brought over from Russia, the people we are feeding in order to keep them in the country, while we are assessing honest men to bear the expense ? Probably the hon. gentleman from Northumberland might explain that, but I suppose he could not because the Globe does not say anything about it. If he had seen it in the Globe he could have told us all about it. Then we have the Franchise Act. Of course that is what we are dealing with now. Then Senate reform.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That hear, hear, was rather weak. It will be weaker yet. Let the House of Commons reform themselves. There is much need of it. They make false pledges before the people of the country and scatter them to the four winds of heaven. That is why they want reform. The people will reform them when they have the chance, and the Senate is not going to be foolish enough to load the dice to keep the present government in power.

Prohibition, what about that ? That was another pledge. What have they done with it ? It cost this country a good deal of money to take the plebiscite.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—They got a mandate.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—And what have they done about it ? Perhaps the hon. gentleman from de Lorimier will tell us by-and-by. I have gone over the ten items that they got a mandate for. A mandate from whom ? A mandate from a Grit caucus to tell the Senate what to do. They call it a mandate. I call it a manifesto, because it was published throughout the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I should think a man of the great knowledge of the hon. gentleman from West Northumberland (Hon. Mr. Kerr), a man of his standing at the bar, would have something better to give us than an article from the Globe newspaper—a newspaper which has been the party organ, right or wrong. He reads that to us and tries to make the Senate believe from it that this Bill is right. He struck a good attitude, and I know he is qualified to make a much better speech than he gave us to-day, but he was working against wind and tide, and when he could not do anything else he read an article from the Globe. Mr. Mulock gave the pledge to which I have referred. Let us see how he carried it out.

Since these gentlemen have been in power, sixteen members of parliament have been appointed to office. I do not consider it a crime, but the man who brought in such a Bill as the one I have read here to-day in order to make political capital, and then go back on it all, is false to his pledges to the people. I do not care how many good men the government appoint to the Senate or to the bench, but I do object strongly to the judges of this country taking part in the redistribution of the constituencies or in political elections. Judges had political feelings before their appointment, just as well as other people. Have they lost them since? Has Sir Oliver Mowat lost his because he was a judge on the bench? Have other judges lost theirs? The people of this country think highly of our judges, but the moment you bring them down from their high position to take part in political affairs, you belittle them in more ways than one. It is the first step to do wrong, and you will go further until you give the criminals of the country a voice in selecting their judges. I do not want the judges to have anything to do with the redistribution.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The first thing upon which I shall venture to express an opinion in dealing with the Bill now before us is the theory of keeping to the municipal boundaries when readjusting the different electoral districts of this Dominion. I must say that I am in sympathy with that proposition. In so far as it is practicable, I really believe that it is a sound policy. But we must not forget that this is not always possible in a new country like ours. And even when it is done at the time of the readjustment or redistribution, we are liable to find out after a few years that the rule does not apply any longer, because the provinces themselves have thought proper to alter those municipal boundaries on account of some changes in the circumstances of the population, such as an increase of that population. For instance, in the province of Manitoba I do not think that we can find any single period of five years during which some changes in the municipal boundaries have not taken place, just on account of the progress of the province. Consequently I do not think there is much after all, and for the present, in that theory, especially when we consider that whether this rule is adhered to or not, it does not prevent the electors going to the polling places, nor does it prevent the expression of public opinion. This assertion is borne out by the result of the elections of 1896, which took place under the redistribution made in 1892, by a Conservative government. It did not prevent the accession to power of a Liberal government. It must also be taken into consideration that the instances where the limits of the electoral divisions are not co-terminous with the municipal boundaries are an exception and a very small one.

We have heard several of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House complaining that an injustice had been inflicted on their party by the Redistribution Bills of 1882 and 1892. Of course this is quite debatable. But granted, for the sake of argument, that some injustice was done to the Liberal party then; it seems to me that we might very well say that the injustice complained of has been cured by the elections of 1896. These elections have shown that whenever the people think that a change of government should take place, no readjustment or redistribution of the seats can prevent it. And I may add that these elections have also shown that the complaints of the hon. gentlemen about the alleged injustice done to their party must be somewhat exaggerated, since they have been returned to power under that readjustment and with as large a majority as any government in this land ever had. What do we propose now? We simply direct these gentlemen to go back to the country as shaped, in so far as the electoral constituencies are concerned, when they were returned to power; we propose to give them an opportunity of having their political record approved of or condemned by the same electorate that elected them, and of securing a verdict in their favour or against them from the same set of jurors that were called to give their findings in 1896!

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Supposing we were beaten, and the other side came in, would you send them back to the same constituencies before you would permit the redistribution to take place?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Well, I shall not be a member of the next government. and I leave that for the ministers of the time to decide.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They are obliged to redistribute after the census, no matter who is in power.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Looking at this subject broadly, I say that if there was originally a serious injustice done to the Liberal party, it has been very materially remedied since, and whatever may remain of it now is so small and so doubtful and so vague that it has become a matter of secondary importance, while the essential thing to be taken into consideration is whether such legislation can with propriety be introduced at this period of the present parliament, and whether such legislation, at this time, was ever contemplated by the framers of the constitution. One of those who have laid stress on the alleged injustice done in 1882 and 1892 to the Liberal party is the hon. Secretary of State. Now, I am sorry not to see the hon. gentleman at his seat now. It was my intention to ask the hon. gentleman—and I had hoped that he would have been willing to give me an answer, whether he does not really believe that to fling on the country such a measure on the eve of a general election is a most objectionable policy? As the hon. gentleman is not in the Chamber, I shall try to have an answer to my question in some other way. A distinguished member of this House said in 1882, in connection with the Readjustment Bill of that time:

> I maintain (Senate Debates, 1882, page 721) that this question of representation is too delicate a subject to be treated in the way it has been.... It ought not to have been approached on the eve of an election, when political feeling is aroused. . . .

And elsewhere in the same speech (Senate Debates, 1882, page 716), the same honourable gentleman said:

> A measure of such consequence in the opinion of all fair-minded men, is one which should not be flung on the country just on the eve of a general election.

And now let us find who uttered these characteristic words! who stamped the present Bill with the seal of impropriety? Who has censured in such terms the action of the present government, approaching to-day such a delicate matter just on the eve of a general election? No less a personage than the hon. Secretary of State himself (Hon. Mr. Scott). According to the hon. gentleman and to his Liberal supporters it was then an outrageous thing on the part of the Conservative government to bring down a readjustment measure at that time, on the eve of a general election. But, for a Liberal government it is the right thing to do, notwithstanding the fact that we are also on the eve of a general election. And, mark! There was this to be said in favour of introduction of such a measure in 1882 by the government of the day, although it was on the eve of a general election. Section 51 of the constitution made it obligatory upon that government then to proceed to a readjustment of the seats as a consequence of the census that had taken place the year before. It reads:

> On the completion of the census of 1871, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted. . . . . .

The government of that day had to obey that mandate of the constitution. But to-day what are the circumstances? There is, in so far as the Bill now before us is concerned, no such mandate in the constitution. Not only are we to-day on the eve of a general election, but we are also on the eve of an obligatory readjustment, consequent on the decennial census that is to be taken next year. Then, if we make the redistribution that is now proposed to us, we will have within the space of two years, two redistributions of seats. I cannot believe that this was intended by the framers of the constitution. Holding this view, it seems to me that it is the duty of this Senate to interfere and to prevent such a breach of the spirit of the law.

I now return to the hon. Secretary of State. Pursuing his line of argument, that hon. gentleman reminded the Senate that it had 'a great duty to perform,' and accordingly he closed his remarks by moving the three months' hoist. From the utterances of the hon. gentleman, and from the course he took on that occasion, I draw two or three conclusions. 1st. The hon. gentleman affirmed the impropriety of approaching such a subject on the eve of a general election, thus condemning in advance the action of the present government, of which he is a member. 2nd. By moving the three months' hoist he affirmed the right of the Senate to deal with the matter. 3rd. His inconsistency is so glaring that he must of necessity forgive us if to-day we do not allow ourselves to be convinced by the speech with which he treated the House on Friday night.

I have just stated that the hon. Secretary of State affirmed some eighteen years ago the right of the Senate to deal with a Bill of this kind. He was not alone at the time in expressing that view. In fact, I do not believe the hon. gentleman takes a different view to-day. Quite the contrary. He and his colleagues are forced to admit that the Senate is within its jurisdiction in rejecting the present Bill, if it choose to do so. But while they are obliged to recognize the jurisdiction of the Senate, that concession of theirs is surrounded with restrictions and threats which we cannot ignore. Hence, the obligation on our part to give some attention to that subject. As to the threat, I have not much to say, except this : that no threat whatever will deter this House from doing its duty according to its understanding of the position it occupies in our parliamentary institutions and before the country. I may add that it does not behoove the government or its friends to speak so as to undermine, as it were, the political institutions of their country. If the Liberal party is in earnest when it says that it intends to reform the Senate or dispense with its services, let the government of its choice come down with a measure to that effect. The Senate can court the hostility of the Liberal party and the action of the government in that regard. It feels to-day that it has more grasp upon public opinion than it had at certain times in the past. Again, I say, let the government bring down their measures with regard to the constitution of the Senate in an open straightforward manner. Such a policy we could understand, although opposed to it. But until they choose to do so, they should not try to belittle one of the great political bodies of this country, nor should they indulge in misrepresentation about its rights and deeds.

As to the restriction with which the government and their friends want to entangle the action of the Senate, in so far as the Bill now before us is concerned, it is an easy task to have them removed. Parliamentary traditions, as well as constitutional principles, both here and in England, are clear on that point. That proposition I shall establish by the following quotations. In 1874 in dealing with the case of Tuckersmith, the hon. Secretary of State said :

> Of course it was quite competent for the Senate to interfere with legislation of that kind. (Tuckersmith case, Senate 'Debates,' 1874, page 266.)

In 1882, the hon. the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills) dealing with the readjustment Bill, questioned the right of the Senate to alter the Bill in some respects, but readily admitted its right to reject it. He said :

> This measure was properly introduced and considered in this House (House of Commons), and it was open for the other Chamber to accept the Bill or reject it. ('Hansard,' 1882, p. 1565.)

Sir John A. Macdonald said in 1882—(Hansard, page 1563) :

> There is no doubt in the world that the House of Lords has a right, and has exercised the right, to deal with the question of the representation of the House of Commons. The House of Commons admitted that right by the manner in which the Reform Bill of 1832 was dealt with. That right was never disputed until it was disputed by the hon. member for Bothwell to-night. This matter stands upon a different footing entirely from the Supply Bill. The hon. gentleman's memory and reading will tell him that the House of Lords did deal most independently with all matters of representation, that they have a right to protect the people in those matters and I defy either of the hon. gentlemen to say that the House of Commons of England have ever denied to that branch of the legislature the right to intervene and express their opinion legislatively on the question of representation. There can be no doubt about that question, though of course it may be a matter of expediency as to the extent.
>
> Mr. Macdougall—They may have the power, but not the right.
>
> Sir John A. Macdonald—Legal power is right, but the expediency of exercising that power is a different affair. The only matter in which the House of Lords cannot interfere is the Supply Bill. We know that when the Senate threw out the Tuckersmith Bill, the hon. gentleman did not deny the constitutional right of that House to interfere in the matter ; and they interfered rightly and well on that occasion, because they prevented a breach of the British America Act, by so doing.

If any gentlemen in this House have felt doubtful as to the rights of the Senate to interfere in this matter, I hope that the quotations just made will have the effect of clearing their mind of such doubts. And our interference to-day has no other object than to prevent 'a breach of the British North America Act,' as intimated by Sir John A. Macdonald, who then referred not to the letter of the constitution, but rather to the spirit of the law.

What I want now to impress upon the minds of the hon. gentlemen of this House is the principal object that we should have in rejecting this Bill.

I do not question the technical right of parliament to make a redistribution at any time; and right here I want to enter again my protest against the misrepresentation that has been made of the position taken by the Senate last year on this question. In order to place the Senate in a false position before the public—the Canadian and English public—a gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick, Solicitor General) whose official position in Canada should induce him to guard himself against such an indiscretion, has represented that the Senate of Canada had declared that a redistribution of seats, except immediately after each decennial census, was unconstitutional. That was a misrepresentation unworthy of the gentleman who made it, unworthy of the government which called him to the high position he occupies, unworthy of them all on account of the object that was sought to be served. A campaign of hostility is carried on by the party in power against the Senate, and any weapon against this body seems to be in order with some of these gentlemen. In this instance, the weapon was the misrepresentation of the facts, with a view of deceiving the people and thereby carrying away and astray public opinion with respect to the views and the action of the Senate. The very reverse of the representations made is the truth. Let me quote the resolution adopted last year. It says:

That it be resolved that it is inexpedient to proceed further with the Bill now under consideration inasmuch as it is provided by section 51 of the British North America Act, that the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons shall be readjusted upon the completion of each decennial census subject to and in accordance with the rules of the said Act set forth, and as the next decennial census will under the provisions of the Confederation Act be taken in 1901, a readjustment of the constituencies in the Dominion made previous to such census being taken would, in the opinion of this House, be a violation of the spirit of the said Act.

What is the true and honest construction to be put on this resolution? It is a plain assertion of the technical and legal power of the parliament of Canada to deal with that subject, but, at the same time, it affirms that it was not contemplated by the framers of the constitution that a redistribution of this kind should take place at this time. Hence, in the resolution these words, that 'it would be a violation of the spirit of the constitution' to adopt now such a legislation as that. It was well perhaps to leave the door open for legislation. Because, as the experience of years has shown, clerical errors may crop up in the decennial readjustment, and these as a matter of course should be corrected, as it has been the practice to do. But this practice is not antagonistic to the contention that it was contemplated that actual and formal redistribution should not take place more than once in every ten years. This view is in accord with the interpretation given to the constitution in the early days of our confederation and since by men of high parliamentary authority; it is also in accord with the rule acted upon by parliament itself. In the year 1872 Sir Leonard Tilley said:

A time might come and will no doubt arrive at the next decennial census when it would be necessary to readjust constituencies. ('Hansard,' 1872, p. 113.)

Of course, there is no precise assertion here that a redistribution cannot take place at any other time than after the decennial census. But these words most assuredly convey the idea that at that time no one regarded as a probability the recasting of the electoral map except after each decennial census. We find the same views in these words of Mr. Alexander Mackenzie, speaking on the same occasion. He said:

The Bill was brought in, it was to be supposed, for the purpose of complying not only with the letter but also as far as possible with the spirit of the Act of Union. But while it did comply with the letter by giving the provinces, that had established their rights, by a greater increase of population, a greater representation in that House, it did not fulfil the idea of those who had long advocated the principle of representation according to population in that House. They found in some of the more populous districts, that were very rapidly filling up, which before the next ten years would nearly double their present population, no regard had been paid to the great increase that had been taking place. ('Hansard,' 1872, p. 127.)

Now, what do we find here? Mr. Mackenzie complains that in readjusting the constituencies sufficient regard has not been paid to large tracts of the country where the population is increasing. He contends that an injustice will be done to those districts if that increasing movement of population is not now taken into account in readjusting the seats, and his complaint is that such injustice will last for the next ten years. Mr. Mackenzie would have had no reason to express himself in that way if he had not had in his mind the opinion that no redistribution could properly take place except after the decennial census. Because, otherwise, a redress to the grievance complained of could have been afforded at any time, when it would have been manifest that these territories were entitled to an increased representation. Now, in 1874, we find Sir Alexander Campbell, one of the fathers of confederation, as was Mr. Mackenzie, delivering himself of the following words when speaking on the Bill known as the case of Tuckersmith :

It was in accordance with the law that the representation of the people should be settled every ten years, after the census has been taken, but this (Tuckersmith Bill) was contrary to the spirit of the law.

This language is plain enough, it seems to me. That Tuckersmith case was an occasion when it was sought to legislate, not to correct a clerical error or remove some disabilities, but for a party advantage. The Senate then interfered to preserve the spirit of the constitution and 'rightly interfered,' as Sir John A. Macdonald said in 1882.

I am now going to quote a few words uttered in 1882, by the hon. the present Minister of Justice. But before doing so, I want to preface those quotations by intimating to him and to the House that I do not want to make him say what he did not say. The hon. gentleman did not say in express terms that a redistribution should not take place except after the decennial census, but he spoke in such a way as to lead every one to believe that such was the time to which he himself looked for a redistribution to be made. Here are his words :

When you propose arbitrarily every ten years to break up the whole constitutional body of the Dominion, what is the result? Why, that every ten years you will have society cut up by the roots, and new constituencies formed to suit the party in power. (1882 'Hansard,' p. 1392.)

If the breaking up of constituencies once in ten years is so objectionable, then the breaking up of the same constituencies twice in ten years, or perhaps oftener, cannot be less objectionable. Again the hon. minister said :

When you undertake to change constituencies every ten years and you cut and carve them up and disarrange the boundaries, you destroy this feature of personal and historic continuity which is to be found in public life under the English parliamentary system.

Well, now, hon. gentlemen, what does this continual reference to the ten years mean? Is it not a recognition, or at least a hint, that a decennial redistribution, following such decennial census, was then regarded as the rule?

I have two more quotations to make. Although it is now only nine years since Sir John A. Macdonald disappeared from amongst us to go to his lasting rest, it is long enough to have placed him in that position of fame and authority which is attributed to men of real ability, of knowledge and experience. His words can be considered as almost having a judicial character and as binding upon us when dealing with such matters as those we are now discussing. Here is what Sir John A. Macdonald said :

I think the principle was set early in our legislation that there should be no readjustment of the constituencies either in regard to boundaries or otherwise, except every ten years after the taking of the census, and I think it would really be well that we should adhere to that rule. (1887, 'Hansard,' p. 840.)

Later on he again said :

Depend upon it, we would bring upon ourselves a great deal of trouble and a great many objections from both sides of the House by making any other alterations in the boundaries of constituencies, because if the argument of convenience is adopted in one case, that argument will apply to another, and various reasons will be given why it is convenient to alter the boundaries of constituencies.

The boundary of a constituency should not be altered except once in ten years.

Here, I think I must, in justice to the hon. Minister of Justice, give the words by which he then interrupted Sir John A. Macdonald. Hon. Mr. Mills said :

We had no such rule as that.

Sir John A. Macdonald, replying, said :

I think we have never deviated from that principle.

This interruption of the hon. the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Mills), as recorded in the Hansard, was not warranted. The rule referred to by Sir John A. Macdonald has been substantiated last year by Mr. Mulock, the present Postmaster General, and the colleague of the hon. Minister of Justice in the present government. Mr.

Mulock, in moving the second reading of the Bill, as introduced last year, said:

It has not been the custom in the Canadian parliament to make changes in the constituencies, except in the session immediately succeeding the decennial census, but it has happened that, ever since confederation, the census and the succeeding redistributions have taken place while our political adversaries were in power.

The latter part of this sentence is indeed very suggestive. The hon. Postmaster General evidently thinks that his party should have a hand in this matter, now that it is in power. Be that as it may, this utterance of the hon. gentleman is a confirmation by the present government, eight years after Sir John A. Macdonald has disappeared, of the rule laid down by him in this matter. It is an evidence also that I have here correctly stated the policy of parliament with regard to legislation of that kind up to the present time.

Sir John A. Macdonald had before expressed a similar view. Away back to 1874, in that Tuckersmith case, he had propounded that policy. He then said:

It would be well to take into consideration the consequence of legislation of this kind. By the British North America Act of 1867, there was to be a readjustment of representation once in ten years. That principle should be carried out rigidly, and the time of parliament ought not to be taken up by Bills of individual members whenever the bounds of their constituencies did not happen to suit them. It would be an unfortunate thing if this practice was going to obtain. All parties were interested in the maintenance of the constitution, and this innovation should be resisted. . . . The principle of readjustment every ten years was one which would commend itself to the majority of members in the House. The spirit of fair-play to the constitution demanded that this principle should be rigidly adhered to. (Parliamentary Debates, page 79, 1874, 1st session.)

The Mackenzie government, which was then in power, did not precisely resist the proposed innovation, because they had a weakness for the member, one of their political friends, who asked for the change. But they did not dare to make of that Bill a government measure. It was afterwards rejected by the Senate.

And now, in addition to all that, we have the action of the Senate last year, affirming with no uncertain sound, that a decennial redistribution consequent on the decennial readjustment after each decennial census, should be the rule, except in so far as clerical errors or individual cases of urgent necessity may be concerned. That is what the majority of this Senate advocated last year and is advocating this year. I quite realize that some hon. gentlemen may object to my referring in that way to the action of the Senate last year. But nevertheless, my contention is that it is a link in the chain that we are trying to make up. We are trying to build up such a chain of usages and parliamentary traditions that it may be invoked in after years as the unwritten part of the constitution, and be a barrier as strong as the constitution itself against any attempt on the part of any government or their supporters to use the technical power that may be in our written constitution to redistribute seats at any time for party purposes or party advantages. That would become a parliamentary jurisprudence. It would fix a recognized and clear principle upon which redistribution would in the future be effected. It would do away with the temptation of forcing an alteration of the boundaries of our constituencies at improper times. We would thus secure, as far as possible, what the hon. Minister of Justice termed in 1892:

The feature of personal and historic continuity which is to be found in public life under the English parliamentary system.

In acting in that way the Senate does take a partisan view of the subject, but is simply undertaking to prevent a breach of the spirit of the constitution. I will vote against the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It is not my intention to occupy very much time in discussing this question, but the discussion has taken such a wide range and occupied so much time, that I do not feel justified in giving a silent vote on the Bill, particularly as it most seriously affects the province from which I come. It has been said by the advocates of the Bill now before parliament that it is of the greatest importance to adhere to county lines; in fact it appears to be of greater importance, in the estimation of these hon. gentlemen, than representation by population. On that question I must take issue with the advocates of the measure. I cannot divest myself of the idea that in all civilized countries that have representative institutions the principle of representation by population is the great leading principle, and the idea of county lines is only a means to an end, because the lines are so generally understood and so definitely drawn that there can be no mistake in reference to these lines, and that is the only object, so far as I can see, why county lines so far as convenient, should be adhered to. But I maintain that the great principle which should be observed above every other principle, in representation by population as far as possible. I do not say that this can be done to a unit, but the leading idea should be to give every man a fair representation in parliament. This principle was certainly adhered to by the advocates of confederation from the very start. It was on that very principle that confederation was brought about. If I understand history aright, there was, to some extent, a dead lock between Ontario and Quebec on that very same question, and that induced the representatives of Ontario and Quebec to seek an alliance with the lower provinces so that the difficulty might be overcome, and when confederation was established, it was definitely fixed that each province should be represented as nearly as possible according to population, by giving 65 members to Quebec, and every other province to have a representation in the same proportion as 65 representatives bore to the population of Quebec, and so the other provinces must have the same proportion, and if you talk about county lines and where one county may have fifty thousand residents while another county may have only ten, it is an unfair and unjust provision to say that you must adhere to county lines, and give the large county only the same representation as you give to the small county.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—On this question of county lines I wish to refer particularly to the application of this Bill to the province from which I come. It is in the last part of the Bill, and is certainly a bald proposition that is submitted to us for our approval. Even if the province of Ontario was dealt with fairly to the very letter, so that no person could find any objection to the Bill on that account, I must take exception to the section in reference to Prince Edward Island if for no other reason. It will be remembered that Prince Edward Island is divided into three large counties, and when that province became part of the union it was represented by two members from each of these counties. We had six members from Prince Edward Island. Through some clerical error—I cannot think it could be anything else, because in the Act of Union it was provided that the representation of Prince Edward Island should be readjusted according to the population of Quebec, when British Columbia was brought into the confederacy it was provided that their representation should increase in accordance with the increase of the population as compared with Quebec, and in consequence of the different wording of the two Acts of incorporation, Prince Edward Island lost a member after the census of 1891. We had three counties. One of them, according to the ideas of the government of the day, should be reduced by one member and they gave to Prince County two members, and to Queen's County two members, but they gave to King's County only one member. King's County had an equal voting power with Prince County, within one thousand votes. After the census of 1891 the late government made a redistribution of Prince Edward Island and divided it into five single constituencies, giving to each county an equal number of voters as near as possible, keeping absolutely to the township lines which in Prince Edward Island are as definitely fixed and as well understood as the county boundaries are. There is no man in Prince Edward Island that I have met, or outside of Prince Edward Island, that has ever uttered one word of complaint to me or in my hearing, against the redistribution made after 1891 in giving the single ridings the five representatives in place of six, and giving to each constituency an equal voting power, or as nearly equal as possible. There may be a difference of perhaps a thousand of a population between the several districts so as not to divide township lines, and I say that at the last election, and from that day to the present time, there has been no friction and no difficulty in the matter, and it has been just as convenient, and far more so, so far as the sections of the country I come from are concerned than it was before, and to have single constituencies is a great convenience to Prince Edward Island. What has been the history of Prince Edward Island in the past? It has happened that we have had, coming from Prince Edward Island, with only three constituencies, two members to each, that we have had six members supporting one side of politics. That is very undesirable from a whole province as small as Prince Edward Island is. It is much better that there should be one or more members coming from a province supporting the government of the day, or, in the other hand, one or more in opposition to the government of the day. But we have had, on more than one occasion, the whole six members on one side of politics. That is not likely to take place when we have five single constituencies. There is no likelihood of the whole five supporting one side of politics, which is not desirable in any province. I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me on that point.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It depends on which side it is.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The Bill before this House provides that we shall simply go back to the old system of having three counties and depriving King's County of one of its representatives to meet the necessity of the reduction in our proportion of representation, and that suits the present government splendidly, because King's County is well known to be a Conservative county, and in that way it is very convenient for them to go back to the old county lines, and to give to Prince County and Queen's County two representatives each, while King's County only has one representative. They do not make provision to divide Queen's and Prince counties into single ridings, as in Ontario. It is expected, I suppose, that by having a strong candidate, like the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, he will be able to drag a candidate in with him, and he will have the whole county, with some 45,000 voters voting for two candidates in place of one. That was the provision in the old county lines, giving to Queen's County two representatives and two representatives to Prince County, and only one to King's County. Under the rearrangement made under the census of 1891, the Island was divided into five equal constituencies, and every one had a fair fighting chance for getting to the House of Commons, and for that reason, if for no other reason, I should be bound to oppose the passage of the Bill.

But there are other, and perhaps stronger reasons why I, as a public man, should oppose this measure. One hon. gentleman, in discussing this measure, and I think more than one, said it was to right an infamous wrong that was committed in 1882. The adjective made use of by the hon. gentleman from Ontario (Mr. Kerr) was extremely strong, and did not, in my opinion, coincide altogether with his declaration of fair-play and honest intention, and a disposition to do fairly and justly between all parties. I interjected a remark, when he was making his speech, that if it was to right a wrong that was committed in 1882, eighteen years ago, half the electors that were in existence at that time in these constituencies would probably be dead or have changed their views. Of course, I do not admit there was a wrong. I do not know anything about Ontario. I would not pretend to give any opinion in the matter further than that I have had very great confidence in the honesty and good government of Sir John A. Macdonald and his administration. He administered public affairs in this country very successfully indeed from beginning to end, and if the present administration remains in power as long as he did, I hope they will do half as well. I interjected a remark, when the hon. gentleman was making his speech, that half the electors on the lists in 1882 were no longer electors in any constituency. Half of them are probably dead by this time, and the probability is that one-half the remainder have changed their politics. It is an old saying, that wise men sometimes change their mind, but fools never do, and to say that because a man supported a party eighteen years ago, that he must be expected to do the same thing eighteen years afterwards, is paying a very poor compliment to the judgment of the individual elector: so that, if a wrong was done in 1882 by continuing the constituency unchanged up to the present time, there can be no harm done by continuing it longer. Supposing this Bill before parliament is necessary, and right, and just; is this the proper time to pass it, just one year, perhaps less than a year, before the census will be taken. The late government has been charged with passing a gerrymander Act in 1882 and also in 1892, for the advantage of party, to help their party to retain power. I am not going to discuss that question, but taking it for granted that that is true, what will be said about this Bill that is before us, and the pressure that is brought upon this Senate to pass this Bill just previous to the census being taken, and just previous to a general election that must take place within a very short time? Is it not evident to everybody that this Bill is forced upon parliament just now, as it was last session, not for the purpose, as the hon. gentleman says, to right an infamous wrong done eighteen years ago, but for the purpose of giving the present party in power an advantage they have not got at the present time, and that they did not possess at the last election? They came in power at the last election. They went to the country with everything against them. The government was in the hands of their opponents. All the patronage and the influence the government could wield was used in favour of the government of that day, the Conservative party. Notwithstanding all that, the Liberal party defeated them at the polls and came into power. Are they afraid to-day to go back to the same constituencies, to the very men who sent them here against all the odds that were facing them, and with all the influence of the government in their favour? That is an admission that they are not to-day in the same position as they were before the last election, that they have lost the confidence of the people, and to obtain a fresh lease of power they wish to place themselves in a better position so far as the electoral districts are concerned. There is no other inference that can fairly be drawn from it.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—They promised this measure to the people and had to submit it to parliament.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—If the hon. gentleman from St. John will possess his soul in patience, I will give him an opportunity to speak shortly. Supposing we adopt this as a precedent for the future, we know that the present government have not the greatest confidence in the world in their political opponents, and they cannot expect to retain power for ever, and a change of government may come after the next election.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, some time after.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—They will find themselves in the cool shades of opposition. Will not that government, coming into power, be anxious, just before the following election, to place themselves in a position to come back to power? And is there anything in the world to prevent them? Can they not refer back to history and justify their course by what was done in 1900? And they may cut and carve constituencies very much more than the government are doing at the present time. I say the proper and safest course is to prevent this or any other government from gerrymandering the constituencies just before an election, and if I have a seat in this House when that time comes, I shall be as ready to oppose that Bill as I am to oppose this one, and by defeating this Bill now we will be establishing such a precedent that no government will attempt to do anything of the kind in the future. It is a most improper time—nine years after the taking of the census. How can we tell what representation to give to a constituency? Some constituencies have grown very much more populous than they were nine years ago, and some have diminished to a great extent in population, and it is impossible to tell what is the proper representation to give to a constituency, and how many members to give to a county, without having a census taken. After the census is taken is the proper time to do it. If the statement made by the hon. gentlemen who have argued in favour of this Bill is fair, I would ask them why the government did not accept the proposition made in the other House by the leader of the opposition there. I think it was a very fair proposition. I have not lost confidence in the judges of the country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was a proposition unwarranted by law.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I am no lawyer, but I have understood that parliament is able to do anything except to make a man a woman. I heard that proposition declared by a lawyer in the legislature, and I think that objection does not amount to very much. The proposition as made by Sir Charles Tupper in the other House, the other day, was a very fair proposition, and one that no honest man might not fairly accept, unless he wanted to get an unfair advantage by passing a different Bill. What is that proposition? I shall read it:

That all the words after the word 'That' in the original motion be struck out, and the following substituted instead thereof:

In the opinion of this House, it is expedient to introduce in place of the present Bill a measure based on the following provisions: First, that a commission to consist of the chief justices of the highest courts of judicature in each of the provinces of Canada shall be appointed for the purpose of fixing the boundaries of each constituency entitled to elect a member or members to the House of Commons in each province of Canada, and to determine the number of members to be elected for each constituency in accordance with the British North America Act.

That such commission, in so doing, shall consider the distributions of population according to the then latest census of Canada and the public interest and convenience, and shall particularly have regard to the principle of representation by population, and also have regard as far as practicable to the boundaries of counties, municipalities and cities.

That such commission shall be appointed as soon as possible after the completion of the next census and shall complete their work with all convenient speed.

I think that proposition was about as fair as any man could possibly make.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—When was this proposition made? Was it in 1882 or 1892?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The other day—on March 8th.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The hon. gentleman did not think of it until he reached the opposition benches.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Nor did you think of accepting the judges until you got on the ministerial side. You repudiated them before.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—We maintain the same principle.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, quite the contrary. Your Premier and leader denounced the principle as an interference with parliamentary principles and powers.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We proposed it in 1892.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Why do you not accept it in 1900? You say it was a mandate; why do not you carry it out?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This Bill does it.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The fact is, it would not give the party a political advantage, and that is why they would not vote for it on the 8th of March when it was proposed in the other House. If the Bill had come here with a proposition of that kind, so that we could remove this question from politics, it would have been a good thing, and I think the Senate would have accepted it without a division.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is what they have before them.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I have said all that is necessary, on the present occasion, to justify me in opposing this Bill. I consider it would be a great misfortune to this country to lay down a precedent for future governments to act in the same way, and if we adopt the principle now of defeating the measure for the second time, it will be so firmly established before the country that no future government will attempt to do anything of the kind again.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to some of the eloquent speeches delivered in debating this measure now before the House. My desire was to obtain such information as would enable me to vote intelligently on this subject. I heard the speech of the leader of this House, and if I did not know that he was a gentleman who is not desirous of hearing himself eulogized for his eloquence, his legal knowledge and philosophy in discussing legal points that are and should be the delight of a lawyer, I would say that that hon. gentleman had given such satisfaction to me that I need not feel the slightest apprehension that there should be any great opposition to this measure. The hon. Secretary of State also made a speech, and I am sure that every hon. gentleman in this House who will set aside prejudice will admit that it was a speech so convincing that no sincere man could find any objection to receiving his statements as facts in favour of the position he takes. This afternoon I listened also to an hon. gentleman, a member of this Chamber, whose speech was of a character to elevate the standing of the Senate. He adduced facts, historical and legal, that I thought were of so convincing a character that certainly hon. members who have shown opposition to the Bill would not fail to be converted to accepting the measure as a proper one for the regulation of the representation of the country. But, instead of that, I must say I listened to opposition speeches and I failed to hear any argument that was not most flimsy, with the exception of two, and when I mention those hon. gentlemen I have not the slightest doubt you will feel as I feel, that they are of no consequence in arguing this measure. The principal argument by every speaker who has opposed the Bill stated most emphatically that there was no mandate given to the government for the introduction of this Bill.

Another argument was—and the very last speaker also used it—that he thought the very fact of being so near the taking of the census should prevent the government from bringing in this measure until after the census was taken. In reply to the last statement, we were not so very near the taking of the census last year, and yet when this Bill was introduced in the Senate, I find the same gentlemen had the same excuse then, and I presume would have the same excuse every year as long as the present government would introduce such a measure for the benefit of the country. With reference to the mandate, I find the hon. gentleman who is not in his seat now (Mr. Vidal) contends that no mandate had been given. The hon. gentleman from Monck (Mr. McCallum) gave us a very eloquent speech. He also made use of the same expression, 'There was no mandate.' Another hon. gentleman said there was no mandate from Quebec. I have examined the matter, and have found that the recognized leaders of the Liberal party from Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and all the other provinces had met in convention in Ottawa in 1893. They took upon themselves, as representatives of the party, to lay down a platform, and one of the planks in that platform was that in the event of their coming into power they would redress the grievance the country had complained of in the gerrymander Act. These representative men went back to their respective provinces, and what was the result? The result was that this plank, with others, was placed before the electors, and the present government was returned, on the basis of these propositions, triumphantly at the polls. If that is not a mandate I would ask my hon. colleagues what a mandate is? I find a mandate is defined to be a command given by one party to another to carry out their views or their interest where they are deprived themselves from acting. If that does not describe this case then I fail to understand what a mandate is, notwithstanding almost every hon. gentleman who spoke on the opposition side used that as one of the most forcible arguments why this Bill should not pass. I say their argument has no influence with me, and I do not think it will have the slightest influence with the people who feel they have been cheated out of their rights as voters. I come now to the speech of an hon. gentleman from whom I would expect, and I think this House would expect, legal knowledge of a sound and convincing description. I refer to the hon. gentleman from Richmond (Mr. Miller). That hon. gentleman made use of these words 'The time for passing this Bill is after the decennial census.' My reply to that hon. gentleman and all who take that view, is why did not you and others hold the same opinion at the passing of the former gerrymander Bills? It was all right then, it is all wrong now. It is very strange how hon. gentlemen who profess such freedom from partisanship can hold such a view to-day and did not perceive it when their own party was in power. Unfortunately, they were blind then, but their vision is very keen now. His next proposition was that he likens this Bill to the Reform Bill, to the Irish Church Bill and to the Gladstone Home Rule Bill. Now, I do not pretend to be a lawyer, but I claim to have a little common sense and a little knowledge of the politics of my country, and I ask hon. gentlemen what similarity could any thinking intelligent man find between the Home Rule Bill, or the Disestablishment Bill, and this petty little Bill for the redress of a wrong done by the Conservative party who are most anxious to regain power in this country without the vote of the majority of the people? One is revolutionary, changing the whole constitution of Great Britain and changing the legislative union of Great Britain and Ireland to a federal union. Why the thing is so preposterous that I am astounded that a legal gentleman would propose for the consideration of an intelligent body like this, such a proposition as putting the Disestablishment Bill on the same level with this little Bill, coming from our House of Commons, in fulfilment of a promise to the electors of this country. I do not profess to be an extreme loyalist, but at the same time my loyalty is of such a nature that I want to stand on a firm basis, and I do not think I could claim to be so disloyal as to put the Disestablishment of the Church of England and the changing of the legislative system of Great Britain and Ireland, without submitting it to the people, on a par with this Bill. Very properly such a measure as the Home Rule Bill should be submitted to the people, and when Mr. Gladstone brought it in he was told you must put this question to the whole people, not to Ireland alone, before a measure can be received, showing clearly that it was the most important measure that had been placed before the British House of Commons for perhaps two hundred years.

I need not dwell further on this subject, because every one will see the point at once. The precedent cited by the hon. gentleman from Richmond has no application to this measure. The comparison is so ridiculous that I am surprised that an hon. gentleman of his knowledge would think it would have the slightest influence on the votes of this House by adducing such an argument. I might ask also why it is there is no opposition to this measure except from the Conservative party? We know that we have in this House a respectable minority of intelligent, conscientious gentlemen who have no reason to fear the influence or effect of this Bill, but they all, apparently, from the best information I can get in conversation with them, are in favour of this measure. They look upon it as honest and proper, but I find that every Conservative gentleman has some excuse or other to avoid giving a vote for it. It conveys to me the impression that the hon. gentlemen on the Conservative side must be queerly constituted. I could not accuse them of dishonesty. I believe they have consciences, as other men have, but if they can find no better argument than has been adduced by them, it is surprising how they can take the ground they do. I do not want to accuse them of dissimulation or of anything that would reflect on them, in my estimation, as men of honour, but I certainly cannot explain such a concerted, determined opposition to this Bill by these hon. gentlemen. The hon. gentleman from Richmond is here now, and I have one remark to make about him. I think I overheard him saying that there was no representative of the Quebes party at the conference in 1893, and therefore the Quebec party have a right to complain of the introduction of this Bill. For the information of that hon. gentleman, I wish to show that they had representatives. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, I believe, was their representative at the Ottawa conference, and that hon. gentleman was satisfactory, as far as Quebec is concerned, and I think the people of Quebec were satisfied as far as he was concerned that he would represent them in the government, and on this measure in a manner that would be entirely satisfactory. Therefore, I do not think the hon. gentleman from Richmond, and another hon. gentleman at this end of the House, had any right to declare that there was no representative from Quebec at that conference. On the contrary, Quebec was well represented, and that argument, in my opinion, falls to the ground. Of course, these representatives all voted and signed the political platform at that convention, and that platform was known to the voters and presented to them at the election, showing to this House and the country that there was a complete understanding between the voters of this Dominion and the Liberal party before the last election, and that when they were returned triumphantly it was the duty of the Liberal party to introduce in this House every measure that they promised at that convention. I also answer that they have done so, but this House has held up the iron hand in their face and declared that no measure they promised which would be beneficial to their constituents, need be introduced. That is the feeling in this case, and I assure hon. gentlemen instead of harming the Liberal party, the opposition of the Senate to this Bill and other measures, is going to do them an immense amount of good. All those sophistries I have listened to will have no effect on the people of this country? We have the legal right, and it is both expedient and proper to relieve the people by correcting the injustice of former legislation. That is the position, I hold, that the government of this country should take, and in my opinion they do take. They are bound, so far as they are able, to correct what is believed to be an injustice just as soon as they can possibly get the measure through this House. I am astonished at the opposition to this Bill.

Is there any complaint that has been repeated so often as that the present government have not fulfilled their pre-election promises? Now, when they make an attempt to carry out a promise, who objects to it? Who meets them and tells them determinedly 'you shall not carry out your pledge, because we want to tell the people that you failed to carry out your pledges.' Now, who is in opposition to this measure? Certainly the Conservative members of this House. It cannot be denied. They are the party who are preventing all progressive legislation and the fulfilment of the promises made to the people before the election. Between you and the people now, hon. gentlemen, the matter stands, and I have no doubt but the people will win. The day has passed for trampling on the people to keep in power men that the people do not want in power. These are my views. They are stated in all sincerity. I simply felt it my duty to make these statements, and to make them as strongly as I could. I have no interest in doing anything but justice. My whole aim and object is to see Canada fairly represented, having at the head of affairs men who are without bigotry, prejudice, meanness or smallness—men who will not stop in any way the progressive advancement of this new country, that I believe will, at a day not far distant, be a greater Britain.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—It was not my intention to speak again upon this question, having discussed it last year. My intention was simply to record my vote; but circumstances prevent my being here, and I do not want an important measure of this kind either to pass into law or to be defeated without having my views, at least, recorded. That is my one excuse, because we have heard a great deal on this question —a great deal that is pertinent, and a great deal perhaps that has no bearing whatever upon it. I am sure it will be a matter of deep regret for the Conservative members of this House—a lifelong regret—that they have not succeeded in so rising above party as to gain the approval of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, who is so able a judge, so discriminating and so learned. I hope they will survive it. For my part, I very strongly object to the words Conservative and Liberal being thrown so profusely about this House. I do not know that we gain by it. We are an impartial tribunal, and 'the government of the country' and 'those who are opposed to the government' will sufficiently define our position. To my mind, when men enter this House they throw aside and they should throw aside a great deal of their old prejudices, and should be prepared to take up a new fair, and impartial position. I feel myself in that position, and I am tempted to ask the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and who has denounced these gerrymander Acts in such eloquent terms, was he not himself in favour of the two last gerrymander Bills? Did he not vote for both of them?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—He voted for them both.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—Here is another illustration of what I say, that in this House men change their opinions sometimes, but I think there is a way of doing it—I will not say with becoming decency—but there are rules to be observed in these matters when one does change one's mind. An appeal was made early in the afternoon from one hon. gentleman on the opposite side of this honourable House that we should rise above party. He then gave us to understand—or rather, that is the natural inference that a man who makes such an appeal should himself be above party. Yet almost in the next sentence he declared that he is a Liberal; always has been a Liberal, and always would be a Liberal. I contend that that is not rising above party. A man who takes a view as a Liberal upon every question, especially a question of this magnitude—and I regard this measure as one of the most important that can come before this House—cannot and does not rise above party. I contend, that one cannot speak of himself as a Liberal, always a Liberal, pledging the future that he will always be a Liberal, and still be so impartial a judge, as to be qualified to appeal to us to rise above party. Another hon. gentleman who is absent at this moment asks us to obey the will of the people. That is what we are trying to do. We think in the course we are pursuing that we are obeying the will of the people and acting in the best interest of the people. How are we to ascertain the will of the people? I contend it is not always from a vote in the House of Commons. I have not been long in this House, but I have been long enough to know that the members of the other House occasionally vote one way and think and feel another way. I shall give two or three instances. Take the Drummond County Railway Bill for instance, when it came on the first occasion before this honourable House—how true men were to their party on that question. I do not exaggerate when I say that nine or ten, perhaps more, members of Parliament seemed desirous I should vote against that measure, which, as party men, they had supported. I shall take another instance: the Yukon Railway Bill, the Mann-Mackenzie Bill as it was called. I have not heard one single member of either party from the province of Quebec advocate that measure. On the contrary, several said: 'We had to vote for it. We have sometimes to swallow these things, but I hope the Senate will throw it out.' Take another measure, the Bicycle Bill, which passed the other House almost unanimously —there was very little discussion about it. The members voted, and what did they vote for? That the railways of the country should carry bicycles all over the country free of charge. If a race took place in the neighbourhood of Ottawa, say seven miles away, or Toronto, the railways would be obliged to carry the bicycles of perhaps many thousand people free of charge, and be responsible for their safe keeping. Yet members of both parties voted for the measure, and why? Some of my friends frankly said to me: 'We had to vote for it, but we knew the Senate would throw it out. Every village is full of bicycles, and we had to do it or have the bicyclists canvassing against us at election times. You in the Senate are independent, but we are not.' These are three instances where, if we had taken the votes of the House of Commons as our guide, we should have been far astray.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Just the other way.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—I wish to put the question I put to the hon. gentleman from St. John, during his absence a few moments ago. Did he not vote for the measures of 1882 and 1892 when they came before the Senate?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I voted for them, and I will tell the House why. I felt they were domestic matters pertaining to the House of Commons, and inasmuch as it was a measure from the House of Commons to put their house in order, I had no right to interfere, no more right to interfere with that Bill than to tell them how they should place their desks or their chairs.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—I think the answer is the best that could be given under the circumstances. But let me ask, if we were to take that position, what would be the use of this House? If we are simply to be the echo of the House of Commons, then let the Senate disappear.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Does the hon. gentleman wish me to answer that?

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—I commented favourably upon the hon. gentleman's answer, and I have put no further question to him. We are told that the principle of the Bill is that the boundaries of constituencies are to be county boundaries. It occurs to me, if that is the principle of the Bill, why should it be a partial Bill? Why should it not be applicable to the whole Dominion, and not simply to a portion of it? If it is favourable to the districts proposed to be legislated for, why favour certain districts, and leave out others?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The whole Dominion is not out of order.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—That is a matter of appreciation. Some people are bold enough to think that it is only those portions of the Dominion that require touching up in a particular direction, that will receive attention under the present Bill. But one hon. gentleman on the other side says: 'This Bill does not make a pin's difference, one way or the other.' If it makes no difference, why was it introduced last year, and, when it was defeated last session, why is it reintroduced this year? What new features, what new circumstances have been brought to our knowledge to make us act differently now? It occurs to me that it is an attempt to put the Senate in an awkward position. We defeated a Bill in 1899, yet in 1900 we are asked to adopt a Bill which is very similar to it to stultify ourselves, and to say that we were quite wrong in 1899. I think that is a position in which hon. gentlemen in the Senate are not anxious to be placed.

I am very glad that we have had so little law in discussing this question. Last year, I was overwhelmed by the legal aspect of the question as presented by the great legal luminaries. This year, the trend of the discussion has been such that one without much legal knowledge can follow it, and I ask myself, not simply what are the terms of this Redistribution Bill, but rather what was the intention of the framers of the constitution quo ad measures of this kind ? not what is the letter of the law, but what is its spirit. I think the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface has placed this House under a deep obligation in the speech he has delivered, a carefully-written, well-prepared speech ; bien cousu as the French would call it, holding together in all its parts with well joined links, and he has brought before us a vast amount of useful information. He has told us the opinions of our luminaries of former times. He has mentioned the names of Tilley, Mackenzie, one of our best men, Sir Alexander Campbell, and last, but not least, Sir John A. Macdonald, who have all passed away ; and he mentions two—and I say it in no spirit of cynicism—he quotes the opinion of the Secretary of State as favouring and of the present Minister of Justice, as seeming to lean in the same direction. And what are the views expressed by these gentlemen ? There is not a shadow of doubt as to their views. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, asks the question : How is it that all the Conservatives think one way? He is at a loss to explain it. I would ask him, in return, how many on his side of the House have voted in the opposite direction?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Because they have no right to do otherwise. But the opposition have been told by the people not to oppose this measure.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—The explanation is a weak one, not as strong as the former answer of the hon. gentleman from St. John, with which I expressed my satisfaction. He says it is an extraordinary thing that all the Conservatives vote one way, and he did not add that which I add for him, that all the Liberals vote the other way.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I beg pardon, I did.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—It shows that different minds have different ways of arriving at a conclusion, perhaps from reading and association. I will give hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House the credit of saying that they are animated by the same desire to advance the interests of the country as hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and we must not be taken to task if we do not perceive the error of our ways so quickly as hon. gentlemen who vote the other way and vote differently. I think in voting against this measure we are voting in accordance with the spirit of those —I will say some of them, many of them, were great men, who have passed away—the framers of the constitution, and I believe clearly that their views were that we should not appeal to parliament every time we required a change to influence the voting power, but that once in every ten years was enough, quite often enough, to disturb and unsettle the position of things in this Dominion.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—If I remember well, last year when this question came before us, I voted in favour of the Bill. The same question comes up this year, and after considering it in the best manner I was able, I find that I cannot change my views this year. Last session I did not give the reasons for my vote. I stood then, and I stand again, in a peculiar position towards my political friends on this side of the House. I crave permission to say a few words in explanation of the vote I gave last year and the vote I intend to give this year. On the merits of the Bill I have little to say. I believe the Bill is inopportune. I believe that it is distinctly against the spirit of our constitution that constituencies should be remodelled at other times than after the decennial census. I believe this Bill is against the spirit of the constitution, but not against the letter, and that therefore it may be constitutionally enacted. The government are, I believe, properly within their constitutional right in distributing or rearranging constituencies even at this 11th hour on the eve of a general election. The Bill in itself, I believe, is a distinctly partisan Bill, and that is regrettable. I do not like the features of it at all. The idea of returning to county boundaries I fully agree with, but the Bill does not make that principle general, and therefore it does not carry out the principle it purports to adopt. For example, it practically applies to western Ontario only. If it is meant to be a general principle, it should apply to all the Dominion. And then there are features in the Bill that I still more regret to see. This Bill does away with certain constituencies in such a manner as to show that a spirit of vindictiveness has been the actuating motive in the drafting of the Bill. For example, there are three constituencies that are wiped out, and why ? Because they have, while exercising their undoubted right, failed to elect certain candidates. That may be philosophical. I remember when one of those defeated hon. gentlemen was designated—and very appropriately, I believe—as the Philosopher of Bothwell. His constituency now is to be wiped out. It may be philosophical, but it is hardly Christian. It exhibits a spirit of vindictiveness which I regret to see in the preparation of a public measure. These are features which are against the Bill. On the other hand, there are good points in the Bill that call for our serious consideration. For example there is clause two, which reads as follows :

2. Where, under the foregoing provisions, any county or city is to be divided into more than one electoral district, such division shall be made by a board of commissioners, consisting of at least three persons, being judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature for Ontario, who, for that purpose, shall be appointed by letters patent under the Great Seal, and who shall divide each such county or city into the number of electoral districts by this Act assigned to it.

2. The letters patent appointing the commissioners shall direct them, in making the divisions, to consider the distribution of population according to the latest census of Canada, the public convenience, and such divisions as appear to them best calculated to do substantial justice.

I believe that this clause of the Bill, in itself, is such as appeals to our best judgment. It is undoubtedly a good clause in the right direction, and if this were the only redeeming feature in the Bill, I am of opinion that we should pause before rejecting it, because it is taking the electoral divisions out of political hands, and putting them in judicial hands, and that is what I believe we should aim at. It is now, I believe, the policy adopted in the old country, and whatever may have been the opinions of the leaders of the Conservatives or Liberals in 1882 or 1892, it is now pretty well agreed that that is what we should aim at. As a matter of fact, the leader of the Conservative party in the House of Commons has strongly endorsed this clause, and therefore, speaking from this side of the House as I do, although not voting with this side of the House, I say that this Bill is not altogether bad, and that this sole feature in itself renders it worth our while to hesitate before rejecting it. But the reason why I voted in favour of the Bill last year, and the reason why I have not changed my views is not consideration of the intrinsic merits of the Bill. It contains weak points, and strong points, but the position I take is an individual position. I stand pretty well alone in my views. My opinion is that although we have, by the letter of the law, the right and the power to interfere, we should not interfere. It is a domestic matter, a private concern for the House of Commons, exclusively, and the right or power we possess to interfere should not, in this case, be exercised by us. There are lots of powers and rights that exist that should not be exercised. Has not the Crown the power of veto, yet how seldom is that power exercised ! Just look at the records for the last hundred years, and see how many times that power has been exercised. And why ? Because it was not judicious, not opportune. This power that we have undoubtedly, but to exercise it in this instance is not opportune, is not judicial, is not in good form. The matter for readjustment of the constituencies is a matter that regards the House of Commons, I may say almost exclusively. We must not lose sight of the fact that in the three constitutional powers the Crown, the House of Lords in England or the Senate here, and the House of Commons, the one that possesses the greatest source of power, is the House of Commons. The Commons have always been jealous in the old country of their prerogatives and of their rights. We are trying to follow the traditions of the House of Lords. Let us see what they have done in situations similar to the one we are placed in now. I have read pretty extensively of late the attitude of the House of Lords towards the House of Commons in matters similar to this, and I find that from the beginning of the exercise of the franchise by the House of Commons, say from the beginning of the fifteenth century, from 1406 up to the Reform Act of 1832, nay up to 1884, the House of Lords have not interfered with the internal management of the House of Commons in questions akin to those that are now before us. I find, moreover, that the House of Commons has been very jealous of its privileges, that it has kept the House of Lords, and as much as possible the Crown itself, out from interfering with its privileges and internal affairs. I am of opinion that in the exercise of rights that we have under the constitution, we should strive to depart as little as possible from the best traditions that prevail in England, especially in the relations of the Lords with the Commons. I find, for example, that by common accord the Lords in the old country abstain altogether from taking any part in the elections for the House of Commons. I find also that the Lords have not the right to vote for the election of a member of the House of Commons. That right has been denied them. The Commons could not by themselves enact legislation to that effect, but still the prerogatives of the House of Commons are such that by mere resolutions passed in the House of Commons the Lords have been actually debarred from taking any part in the election of members to the other House. This question was settled by the Court of Common Pleas in a judgment rendered in 1872 on appeal of the Earl of Beauchamp, I believe, against certain municipalities. The Court of Common Pleas decided that the Lords had no right to interfere or to vote even at the election of a member of the House of Commons, except the peers for Ireland who were themselves actually elected and actually serving as members of the House of Commons. Chief Justice Bovill declared it positively. I think we should follow in the footsteps of the House of Lords and, following them, we come to the conclusion that we should not interfere with the internal management of the affairs of the House of Commons. In further support of these views I will cite one authority which will command the respect of all hon. gentlemen, Blackstone, who is the foremost authority in such matters, and also on matters of law in England. Now Blackstone lays it down as a maxim upon which the whole law and custom of parliament is based:

> That whatever matter arises concerning either House of parliament ought to be examined, discussed and adjudged in that House to which it relates, and not elsewhere.

I do not say that we could not and should not, in some particular cases, interfere. As far as I am personally concerned, I would interfere, and would deem it my duty to interfere in legislation of that kind by the House of Commons, if, for example, the constitution was violated or strained, or if vested rights were infringed upon. Are there any vested rights infringed upon by this Bill? The electors are simply shifted from one constituency to another. They preserve the same privileges, and the same rights that they had in the constituency to which they formerly belonged. They have their old rights and privileges in the constituency to which they are now attached. There are no vested rights infringed upon. As a proof of it, I have no knowledge of any petition to this or the other House by the electors of these constituencies asking for relief. The situation is left the same. What is done by the other House is the dealing with matters which belong to its privileges. The franchise is left identically as it was. It is only a shifting of it, and therefore it is a matter that pertains to the other House, and I who would, as a matter of duty, object if vested rights were interfered with, cannot in this instance find sufficient justification to interfere. As to the other point, if the constitution was strained, I would feel justified in interfering, but the constitution is not strained. Such is my opinion, however humble it may be; it is the opinion also of most of the leading men of this House on both sides; it is the opinion of the legal authorities in England, that the House of Commons has the right to do what it is now doing. True, the question was not put to those lawyers as it has been dealt with in this House, and it does not reflect great honour on the Solicitor General that he has put the question otherwise than he should have put it, but at the same time he has put a legal question, and the way the question is put, although it was not the way it came up in this House, embodies what is the true issue before us, and they in England have come to the same conclusion that I and most of the leading members of this House and of the other House have come to, that there is a legal right to do what the government is now proposing to do. Therefore, in the absence of two instances where I would take it upon myself to interfere, I do not feel justified in interfering, because the measure is constitutional, and because no vested rights are infringed upon. My hon. friend from Richmond made a speech last night, which, if he were not present, I might speak of in more eulogistic terms. It seemed almost to shake my conviction. He adduced very strong arguments, meeting the views I am discussing to-night, but the Act of 1884, which I believe was called the Representation of the People Act, was an Act that did touch on the constitution itself. It was, moreover, doing away with vested rights. It was changing the constitution, which this Bill does not do. The Act of 1884 was not perhaps changing much of the laws as to the county franchise in England, as it existed from the beginning of the 15th century to the Reform Act of 1834, and to the Act of 1853, because in the county franchise the rights of the counties were maintained mostly or in toto in the Act of 1884. The franchise consisted, as you are all aware, in property occupation and in residence. But it was otherwise with the boroughs. These had long vested rights taken away from them. Boroughs, as you know, had become the property of individuals who had come in the possession of them either by inheritance or purchase to such an extent that one individual person could elect to send to the House of Commons one or more members. Those were rights dating from time immemorial.

The Act of 1884, to which my hon. friend referred, took away from those individual persons their vested rights. If this Bill now before us were taking away vested rights from any individual member of this Dominion, I would, although reluctantly, in- internal or domestic affair for the House of this is not a mere matter of privilege or an internal or domestic affair for the House of Commons. But such is not the present case, as I said before. From 1406 to 1858, for 450 years there were changes in the composition of the House of Commons in England, and in the manner of conducting the election, or at least in the making of returns and of the service of the writs, and in no instance can I find that the Lords interfered, and when they did try to interfere, as they did in the return of members for the boroughs during a short period simply, they were thrown out, as interfering with matters not pertaining to them, and with a question of domestic affair exclusively for the other House. They were debarred, and the House of Lords never did interfere to my knowledge except when the constitution was changed as by the Act of 1884, or when vested rights were interfered with. I do not believe to-day that the House of Lords, whose tenure of office is stronger than ours, would dare to interfere with reference to such an Act where the nature of it would simply be the changing of electors from one division to another, without interfering with the nature of their franchise itself. Even the kings of England hesitated to interfere in matters pertaining to the representation of the House of Commons. True, the Tudors increased the representation of the Cornish boroughs, but their successors had to desist, and then the Crown itself had to concede to the Commons the exclusive rights and privileges, of which they are so jealous, to deal with their internal affairs as they deemed proper. Looking backwards to the House of Lords as we should do, since we have a House here taking the cue from them, we should be very careful not to interfere with what the Commons have done in their domestic affairs. If I were to recall here an instance, I would take it from Molière, a French dramatist, who relates an instance almost parallel but not so dignified. There was a quarrel between husband and wife. The husband necessarily was paramount, and the woman was maltreated, pretty much as the opposition in the House of Commons believe they are. They quarrelled, waxed warm, and a neighbour who had the right and power possibly to make peace, or for some other such purpose, did interfere and gave, as possibly we will do here, assistance to the woman, to the weakest combatant; but it so happened that after the woman and her husband became reconciled, they both turned upon the interferer, who had the right to interfere, and turned him out. Even the opposition of the House of Commons must be jealous of the rights of that House, and if we interfere with them it is at our own risk and peril.

We should not, from my point of view, (and I feel strongly on it), interfere with them except when the constitution is infringed, or if rights are infringed upon, and that is the reason why last year I voted as I did, and it is the reason why this year, although believing that this Bill should not have been introduced, and that it is distinctly against the spirit of the constitution, that I will not cast my vote against it; because I respect the liberty of the other House, which, of the three powers, the Crown, the Senate and the House of Commons, is the greatest power of all. The only power that has the right to bring the House of Commons to terms is the electorate and not this House. What happened in 1884, at the time of the Bill referred to by my hon. friend from Richmond? The House of Lords vetoed the Bill once, but when it was brought before them again, they did not dare to reject it. They came to a compromise, it is true, but they did not thwart the House of Commons a second time. Last year we rejected this Bill. It was a bold challenge to the House of Commons, and they bring it before us again. They have had one year to reflect. We are here to prevent hasty legislation. We acted that part. We prevented hasty legislation on this subject. The government have had time to think over it. They reintroduce the Bill this year, and although I believe there is less excuse for it this year than last year, because we are nearer the decennial census, still, as they send us this same Bill the second time, we are less justified now than we were last year in rejecting it, because last year we could plead we were giving them time to consider it. They come again, contending, and rightly so, that they represent more directly than we do the people, and we should not a second time reject this measure. The Crown itself, as I said before, would pause before interfering with the rights of the House of Commons. And what are we? We are creatures of the Crown. Are the delegates more powerful than those who constitute them? Are we going to assume to ourselves a larger power than the Crown would dare to assume? I do not believe we should. In taking the position I do, I cannot have the approval of my political friends. I should like to call all the members of this House my friends, but I do not depart by any means from the political convictions that I have. Those convictions I try to keep under control as much as possible. And why? It is the boast of the Senate that it should be non-partisan. The same thing does not apply to the other House. This Bill is a partisan measure. It is visibly and ostensibly a partisan Bill, an inopportune Bill; but we cannot forget, and should not forget, that the House of Commons is essentially a partisan House. It is almost essential to the constitution of a British parliament that the House of Commons should be partisan, and it is an essential feature in it that parties are divided. There is the government and the opposition. It is all right there; it is all wrong here. The government come here with a partisan Bill. We reject that Bill. What is our attitude towards a partisan Bill? We undo it by a partisan interference. I know that my hon. friends here do not view it in the same way. I would have voted in favour of an amendment in the line proposed by the leader of the opposition in the other House. I did appeal personally to some of my colleagues, but they refused to take that course, and it is to their honour, because, they told me, it would appear partisan in the eyes of the country. I would have voted for it, not for a second time, but the first time, to give the Commons time to think over it and prevent hasty legislation. Had the House of Commons come the second time, I would have swallowed my vote, because I think they should be paramount in the matter. I take the attitude here for which I was sat upon before in this House. I am not altogether averse to the remodelling of the Senate to a certain extent; but that is another question. I am averse, as far as I am concerned, to the Senate taking a partisan position. Our position, as senators, is good to-day, especially since the Liberals have come into power. We have done well, I believe, for the country. The course of the Senate has been well received, and has been favourably commented upon by the country. We acted as we should act, as safeguards of the country in the Dummond County Railway Bill, and especially in that most iniquitous Yukon Bill. We stood before the government and the country in favour of the interests of the people. We acted, not as partisans, but as a body fighting in the interests of the country. We saved hundreds of millions to the people of Canada by keeping the Yukon gold fields in the possession of the people, instead of giving them away to two men for a mess of pottage. The country look upon us as guardians, and not as partisans.

What would be the result were we to reject this Bill, as I hope we will not? Simply in the eyes of many Liberals—of a great number of Liberals who approved of our actions hitherto—we would appear as a partisan body. I do not say that it is a partisan spirit that actuates my hon. friends. I am sure it is not; but we might appear in that light before the country, and we have no right to do so. In the interests of the Senate—in the interests of the constitution, we have no right to undo a situation which is so favourable to us now. We have no right to expose ourselves even to a suspicion of partisanship. We know what happened Cæsar's wife. She was not an old woman, as I believe senators are called, but Cæsar had that respect for his wife that he would not even have her suspected. We should not be suspected by our fellow citizens, whose interests we are here to represent, and there is no necessity that we should interfere in this matter, especially when the House of Commons has passed the Bill a second time. However wrong, however objectionable or inopportune that Bill may be, provided it is not unconstitutional, and provided that no vested rights are infringed upon, or taken away from the people, we should accept it. For these reasons, and with an expression of regret to my hon. friends on this side of the House, and especially to my venerable leader, I shall vote as I did last year, for the same reasons, and for stronger reasons, because the House of Commons have had time to think over it, and that we should allow the House of Commons to arrange its own internal affairs in matters of franchise and in matters of election as they please.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 24), an Act respecting the Nova Scotia Steel Company Limited.—(Mr. McKay.)

Hon. Mr. POIRIER.

THE DEBATE ON THE REDISTRIBUTION BILL.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the House adjourns, I understand the hon. Minister of Justice has the right to reply and that no other hon. member proposes to speak. Although I know we have no right to prevent any one from speaking, I think that is the general understanding, that after the hon. gentleman has closed his remarks the vote will be taken. I merely mention that so that those who are present may know what the intention of the Senate is at the present moment, and be present if they think proper to do so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I favoured the meeting this evening, because I thought it desirable that we should take the vote before six o'clock to-morrow if possible when every senator could attend.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—May I ask if the return which I moved for some time ago, with respect to disallowance, is ready?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not sure whether it is or not. It is in my department, and of course all that is necessary is to make copies of papers that already exist. I have no doubt that a return has been prepared, because in all these matters, in every question that is asked in either House and every return that is moved for, the Deputy Minister at once takes cognizance of it, without my being obliged to speak to him personally on the subject, and I have no doubt the return has been prepared. I shall make inquiry as to what the progress is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would ask the Hon. Secretary of State if he has any information to give me with reference to the other return.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not. I gave instructions to the Deputy Minister of the department to inquire at the Department of Railways and Canals. I think that is the only one that is missing.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, March 28, 1900.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

SALARY OF PREVENTIVE OFFICER AT MONTMAGNY.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

The Notice of Inquiry being called:

By the Hon. Mr. LANDRY:

What is the name of the present preventive officer for the district of Montmagny? What is his salary? How many seizures has he effected, since he has been doing duty, for infractions of the customs and excise laws? How much has the government realized from these seizures, either by the sale of the articles confiscated or by fines imposed?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The answer is not ready yet.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the hon. minister think we can obtain that answer before the end of the session?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think so.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is not sure?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) We will get it next year after the census is taken.

The inquiry was postponed.

SECOND READING.

Bill (34) An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway.—(Mr. Lougheed.)

THE REDISTRIBUTION BILL.

DEBATE CONCLUDED.

The Order of the Day being called,

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Mills for the second reading (Bill 13) An Act respecting Representation in the House of Commons, and on the motion in amendment thereto of the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, that the said Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read this day six months.

Hon. Mr. MILLS said—I think my first duty on addressing the House on this question is to allude at the outset to the observations made by the hon. gentleman who sits opposite me (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) and who leads the opposition. The hon. gentleman said that he had heard the speech that I had addressed to the House upon this subject so often that he almost knew it by heart. If the hon. gentleman is not drawing upon his imagination instead of upon his memory, he certainly has the advantage of me in that regard, for up to the moment that I introduced this Bill to the House on the present occasion, I had not a moment to give to the consideration of the subject beyond those general principles which are involved, which I have frequently considered, and which I think must be obvious not only to myself, but to every hon. gentleman who has considered the question of representation. I noticed that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson), and the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), and the hon. gentleman from British Columbia (Mr. Macdonald), have repeated what I denied last year, and what I have denied again and again this session since the discussion began, that I put forward in 1892 views at variance with the proposition to legislate except once in ten years upon this subject. I say that I have never put forward any such views; neither in a speech in parliament nor out of parliament have I ever said that parliament was not competent to legislate upon this subject at any time that it was in session, whenever it might deem proper. I held to that view in 1882, in 1892, last year, and again this year. In fact, there is nothing in any speech which I addressed to parliament on any former occasion at variance with the proposal to legislate whenever parliament deems it expedient, upon this question. I am altogether unable to understand the argument which the hon. gentlemen have addressed to the House upon this question, and which a majority, during the discussion of last year, seemed to entertain, that parliament was not at any time competent to deal with the subject of the division of each province into constituencies. The only limitation that I know of is the limitation imposed by section 51 of the British North America Act, which provides for the readjustment of representation, and I think the provision for readjustment of representation also makes provision for the redistribution of seats. In that provision the Imperial parliament intended to decide during the ten years not what alterations may be made in the boundaries of constituencies, but the number of members to represent each province during the period of ten years ? What parliament does after the census, is to determine the number of members to which each province is entitled, and it is not in the power of parliament to give to any province any other representation than that to which the population entitles it ; but how the electoral divisions shall be organized, or what shall be the boundaries of those electoral divisions, parliament may at any time consider. I think hon. gentlemen will see that that is perfectly clear from section 40 of the British North America Act. Let me read the beginning of that section, and hon. gentlemen will see that it was distinctly contemplated by the framers of the British North America Act that the power of parliament in this regard should not be restricted, and that those powers that every legislative body, in every colony of the British Empire, have to alter and amend the redistribution, shall not be withheld from the parliament of Canada, the only limitation being that the representation given to each province within the federation shall be such as is determined by population. Section 40 says :

Until the parliament of Canada otherwise provides, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall, for the purpose of the election of members to serve in the House of Commons, be divided into electoral districts, as follows:

That is the provision of the constitution. When this Act was being prepared, the delegates who went to London on behalf of the various provinces adopted the principle which had been agreed upon in the Quebec convention, and ratified in some of the legislatures at least, that the representation of the various provinces in the confederation that was about to be formed should be representation based on population. As between the provinces, that was the principle recognized, and the basis for the adjustment of that representation was the census of 1861. The census of 1861 had been taken in all the provinces, and when the delegates met in London and undertook to settle the terms of union, they agreed that representation should be based on population. Now, the provision is that until the parliament of Canada otherwise provides the representation should be according to the electoral divisions made and set out in the schedule to the British North America Act. That is perfectly clear, and it is equally clear that at any time, the very next session, if it had been deemed expedient to alter the boundaries of any one of these constituencies or to readjust the constituencies within any one of the provinces, without altering the number to which the province was entitled, that power was conferred by the beginning of the section—

Until the parliament of Canada otherwise provides, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall, for the purpose of the election of members to serve in the House of Commons, be divided into electoral districts, as follows.

And so you find with regard to a number of other matters. Take, for instance, the qualification of voters. The Dominion had no existence until this Act was passed and brought into operation by the Queen's proclamation. When the Act was brought into operation, what was the electoral franchise of the Dominion ? It was the electoral franchise that had been previously provided in each province for the return of members to the legislative assembly of the province, but the Act also provides, just as it did in the section which I read, that 'until the parliament of Canada otherwise provides' the laws of the several provinces of the union relative to these matters shall be the law of the Dominion of Canada—'until it otherwise provides'—exactly the same words, showing that if at any time parliament chose to exercise its powers, it was at liberty to do so. It was not called upon to wait until another census was taken and until some further readjustment under section 51 was required. And this is the principle recognized. The hon. senator from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) talked about usage having settled the principle upon which we are to proceed, and that we were to have no alteration in the electoral divisions except after the census, once in ten years. Now, I deny that any such principle has been recognized. I deny that any such usage has grown up. I say that parliament has always exercised in this matter its judgment, and where legislation was called for to correct the boundaries of constituencies or to transfer territory from one constituency to another, if it was thought expedient, that was done. Let me call attention to chap. 45 of the statutes of 1869. Hon. gentlemen will see that that statute was passed eight years after the census had been taken, and but two years before the taking of another census. Did any hon. gentleman in either House on that occasion rise and say 'you are not to readjust the boundaries of the constituencies because you are within a period of two years of the taking of the census'? The census had been taken in 1861.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That was before confederation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Suppose it was. Is not the whole of the British North America Act based on the census of 1861? The divisions are made accordingly, and the principle that applies to any succeeding census, applies equally to the census of 1861. Now, what does this statute say?

Whereas it is expedient to change the limits of the electoral districts of the counties of Joliette and Berthier for electoral purposes, &c.

'Whereas it is expedient to change the boundaries of these electoral divisions'; what was done? The change was made accordingly. A Bill was introduced and carried through parliament. Sir John Macdonald was Prime Minister at the time. This statute had the sanction of Sir John Macdonald. It was a measure of his government. Sir George Cartier, if I remember correctly, had charge of this legislation at the time, and that being so, what becomes of the principle which the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland and other hon. gentlemen have referred to on the subject? Is it not perfectly clear if you can alter the boundaries of two constituencies eight years after the census has been taken, you can alter the boundaries of fifty? There is no difference of principle. The principle is perfectly clear, that, in the words of section 40, parliament is at liberty to legislate whenever it sees proper. 'Until the parliament of Canada otherwise provides,' are the words, 'the electoral divisions as established in the schedule of this Act shall be continued.' The Parliament of Canada, with regard to these two constituencies, did 'otherwise provide' in 1869, eight years after the census had been taken, and no hon. gentleman has pretended up to this hour to call in question the validity of that statute and to say that parliament was not competent to so provide.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will you tell us why it was done?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not necessary. The question is as to the power of parliament. Whether parliament had a good or a bad reason is not a matter of the slightest consequence. What is of consequence is the fact that it was done, and no one has called it in question. We had a readjustment in 1872. We had a readjustment in 1882, and we had a readjustment in 1892. In all these cases there have been some modifications—some consideration given to the question of revision of the boundaries, and my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, in discussing this question referred to the statute of 1893 which deals with the boundaries of some ten or twelve constituencies. One hon. gentleman calls it the correction of clerical mistakes. I have heard of clerical mistakes in a tariff numbering 160 odd items, and a clerical mistake that affects the boundaries of 12 constituencies is a clerical mistake so important in its character that it becomes an amendment of the Redistribution Act of the previous year.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Out of those ten cases could the hon. gentleman name any one which is not the correction of a clerical error?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend refers to some cases in the county of Lanark or Renfrew, where townships were transferred from one electoral division to another. My hon. friend may call that a clerical mistake or not as he sees proper, but my point is that any legislation altering the condition of things established by the statute and making a readjustment, is a complete refutation, no matter whether it is for the correction of a mistake or not, for parliament in law does not make mistakes. It is a recognition of the principle that the redistribution or division of constituencies, so long as the number to which the province is entitled is not altered, is at any time in order. The hon. gentleman from Westmorland spoke about this, if it were a wrong, being a political wrong, and the hon. gentleman argued that a political wrong is one that does not call for serious consideration at the hands of the members of this House, that in fact if a wrong is a political wrong, it is one that parliament ought not to redress, and one that nobody has a right to call parliament to redress, that in fact we have a sort of political warfare carried on in parliament, and that being carried on in parliament, we must submit to the fortunes of war, and the hon. gentleman intimated that if we could show that wrong had been done—although he doubted whether any wrong had been done in 1882—he questioned the propriety of undertaking to redress it. I thought that the hon. gentleman must have learned his political ethics from Paul Kruger.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is the friend of the hon. gentleman from Cobourg.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The friend of my hon. friend from British Columbia, who refuses to learn, and who insists on having his own way in everything.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think we all like to have our own way.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not doubt that the hon. gentleman speaks from his heart, and I do not call in question in the slightest degree the sincerity of his sentiment in that regard. Paul Kruger said, 'If we give additional representation to the English people they will outvote us and control the government. We are in a minority and any attempt to give them an equality would at once put the government in their hands.' That seems to be the sentiment of my hon. friend. Lord Rosebery a few years ago declared that when the Liberal party was in power there were two Houses in England, the House of Commons and the House of Lords, but when the Conservative party were in power there was only one House. They were all together. And our experience, hon. gentlemen, in this country has been that as long as the Conservative party are in power there is only one House in Canada. I hope and pray that at no distant day there will be two Houses in Canada and that the Liberal party will have an opportunity of having fair-play in this House as well as in the House of Commons. Let me refer to some illustrations which the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland used, and in which he was followed by some other hon. gentleman, to show that there was no wrong done the Liberal party by the gerrymander of 1882. He says that in 1878 there were fifty-nine Conservatives and twenty-nine Reformers returned in the province of Ontario, but in 1882 there were but fifty-four Conservatives, which is five less, and thirty-eight Reformers, which is nine more. That seems to me a rather extraordinary way of proving that the Bill was not unfair. The Conservative party had diminished in the country, the public had in some degree lost confidence in the leaders of that party, and there was a smaller vote polled for them, and a larger vote polled for their opponents; is it not obvious that there might have been a larger number of Reformers returned to parliament notwithstanding the injustice of the measure that had been adopted to keep them out? Let me take a few constituencies for the purpose of illustrating what I say. In 1891 the Liberal party polled within the county of Middlesex upwards of 1,100 votes more than their opponents, and their opponents returned three members, and the Liberal party, with a majority of 1,100 behind them, returned only one. Does any hon. gentleman pretend that the object of that measure was not to accomplish the result which we see flowed from it, that it was not intended to load the dice against the Liberal party there? Let me take the case that I referred to before, the electoral division of Bothwell. According to the votes, in the ordinary condition of things, we had a majority of about 500 in the county. What was done by the Act of 1882? The townships of Orford and of Howard and the town of Ridgetown, the section in which I resided, were taken off the county, and there was four hundred of a Liberal majority taken from the county by taking away those municipal divisions. There were other townships and municipalities added. According to the vote of 1878, the effect of those subtractions and those additions was to place me in a minority of about 300 votes. I carried the constituency afterwards, notwithstanding that change, but will any man out of St. Luke's pretend to say that the intention was not to defeat me by the alteration of the boundaries of the constituency? Will any one in his senses argue that? Was it not intended to accomplish that result? Let me take another case. Mr. Trow represented the riding of South Perth. There were two municipalities taken off that riding. Those municipalities had upwards of 200 Reform votes—about 400 my hon. friend tells me. They were put where? They were put in Oxford where the Liberals had in each riding nearly a thousand of a majority, and there were townships taken from the county of Huron, in which the Conservatives had a large majority, and put into Perth, for what purpose? Why were the Liberal townships taken off and put into a Grit hive, and why were the Conservative townships taken off the Reform riding and put into Perth? Does any hon. gentleman pretend to argue that that was not done for the purpose of securing the return of a Conservative in the South Riding of Perth? Every hon. gentleman knows that right well, and yet the party feeling is so strong in this House, there is such a strong desire to prevent the parties standing upon a footing of equality, that hon. gentlemen feel that they have an advantage in what has been done, and they are prepared to sustain it, and there are all sorts of excuses and arguments and devices put forward to defend the abuses that exist, and to prevent fair-play being done. That is the condition of things; it is perfectly obvious that there is a wrong, and that hon. gentlemen have resolved that that wrong shall not be redressed. One hon. gentleman speaks about the duty of the Senate. The duty of the Senate to be what? To be a body of janissaries to strangle every reform measure that is brought here? I say that is not the duty or the function of the Senate according to my notion. The Senate has higher duties to perform. It ought to have present before it loftier objects than becoming a mere instrument in the hands of a party to wage an unfair war upon those whose political views it is not in accord with, or with whom it has no sympathy. I say then that the Senate of this country might be considered a strong and influential body, it might exert an important and powerful influence for good in the government of the country. The tendency to-day is in the direction of democracy and that tendency is in a large measure without check. There is nobody in this country to hold up, to stay a party until there is full discussion, until the public mind is educated upon the questions that are submitted. The House of Lords has performed that function again and again. It is in some cases obstructive but its obstruction is overcome in the end by the fact that when an appeal is made to the country and the country has pronounced upon the question, while it may undertake to amend, it is always careful not to defeat the principle embodied in the measure that is brought before it. I deny altogether the doctrine which my hon. friend has laid down, and I will undertake to show the House that that doctrine is not well founded. There are constitutional changes made without popular sanction, but changes in the constitution ought always to have popular sanction. Many ministers bring forward, they are obliged to bring forward, questions that were never before the country at all. They arise after the elections are over. Exigencies may arise which render legislation important. I take the question of the contingent that we sent to South Africa as an instance. Let me point out that while a second Chamber may say to the government, 'You must stay your hands; this is so important a measure that public opinion ought to be pronounced upon it, and we ought to know what the view of the political sovereignty is upon a question of that sort,' they cannot say with regard to a measure that was before the country, upon which public opinion has been pronounced, and pronounced as clearly as it ever is upon these questions: Why there is no such thing as submitting an issue under the English parliamentary system at an election. There is all the policy of a party, whatever that party puts forward. It may embrace half a dozen things, but if it is elected and returned to power, if the public has expressed confidence in it, the theory of our constitution is that the public have pronounced in favour of that platform, whatever it may be, and that they are entitled to legislate, and that the Upper House are not entitled to obstruct. That is the position which has been taken again and again upon this question.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That was not the position taken by the Duke of Devonshire.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will come to the Duke of Devonshire's statement and I will consider it. There are two statements that I think I had better discuss together. There is one statement with regard to the general principle involved in the measure, and the other is with regard to the measure itself. I was astonished to hear my hon. friend from Richmond undertake to argue seriously that the second Chamber had the right to reject any measure unless the measure had been prepared and submitted to parliament and was before the country when the election took place. Now, that would be practically a plebiscite. That would be a vote upon the measure itself. If you were to adopt that rule you would have no right to alter or amend the law. You would have to take it as a whole as approved of by your masters. That is not the rule of the English constitution. You submit a principle. When the government bring it forward in the form of a measure. Either House may offer amendments, so long as the principle is adhered to. Both Houses do propose amendments; the measure is carefully considered; the freedom of parliament is not interfered with, but you know this, that in giving effect to an important principle on which public opinion has been pronounced, you are carrying on government in accordance with the well understood wishes of the people. It is said there are but two legitimate foundations for government—the one is force and the other is conviction, and our English constitutional system, the one which we have adopted in this country, is a system which rests, not upon force, but upon conviction, and when we obtain the approval of the people of this country in favour of a measure, we undertake to embody that principle into the provisions of an Act and put it on the statute-book. In 1868, Mr. Gladstone brought forward a proposition for the abolition of the State Church of Ireland. In that resolution, occupying some ten lines, he sets out that principle. Lord Stanley, afterwards Lord Derby, who was a member of the Disraeli government, proposed to amend the resolution. That resolution was still more brief. The resolution was before parliament, and upon these the two parties took issue. An election occurred afterwards, and the view which the country pronounced in favour of was the view embodied in Mr. Gladstone's resolution.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—They had the issue distinctly before them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, but not the Bill. That is my point. It was after the vote had been taken that the Bill was prepared. It was a most elaborate Bill, and had been carefully considered by ministers. They had received what aid they could from parties who were informed, but you will look in vain for any one taking the position in the House of Lords, that they had not the Bill before them—that they had only the general principle, and not having the Bill before them, they were at liberty to reject it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—But the general principle was the main thing in that issue.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Of course it was, and so it was in the case the hon. gentleman discussed the other day. Let me further point out what Disraeli said on this subject. It was clear in his mind that he did not know whether Mr. Gladstone intended to go beyond his resolution, or to stop at that point, and Disraeli in his speech undertakes to show that the policy was of such a character, so different from what had long been the policy of the United Kingdom, that it was absolutely necessary, under the principles and spirit of the constitution, that an election should be had, and that public opinion should be consulted. Let me read, for the consideration of the House, what Disraeli said on that occasion, because his observations are most instructive and, in my opinion, show that he had carefully considered the place along which this line ought to be drawn, and the character of the measures upon which parliament ought not to legislate without first having a mandate from the country. He says:

> Now, I want the House to realize the gravity of the question we are called on to decide. Do not, in consequence of the state of Ireland, arising from the development of the Fenian conspiracy, and the necessity, as I am frequently reminded, of "doing something," allow yourselves to be hurried into a decision which, if carried out and followed to its consequences—as it most assuredly will be—must give a new colour to your society and alter all the principles upon which you and your forefathers for years have acted. This is one of the gravest questions which can be brought before the consideration of public men. You are public men, you are men all of great intelligence, and many of you of eminence. To make a senate that the world speaks of with pride, while it recognizes your attributes with a consciousness that your conduct elevates the general character of human nature. But remember that you are something more than senators. You are representatives of a nation, and of an ancient nation, and I deny your moral competence to come to a decision such as that which the hon. member for Birmingham has recommended, and such as the right hon. gentleman, the member for South Lancashire, is prepared to carry out. I deny your moral competence to do that without an appeal to the nation. I say it is a question upon which the country can alone decide, particularly under the circumstances at which we have now arrived. You cannot come, on a sudden and without the country being the least informed of your intention, to a decision that will alter the character of England and her institutions. You cannot come in this off-hand manner to such a decision as that. Why, look at what you are doing. You are asked to take a course to-night which will effect a revolution in this country. I am not taking now the limited issue to which the right hon. gentleman conveniently confined himself. I take the broader issue laid down by the great master of this subject, and upon which England and Ireland probably will soon have to pronounce. How have you been introduced to this discussion? The Liberal party have been in power for more than a quarter of a century. Have they prepared the mind of England upon this question? Have their leaders risen from the seats of authority and told the people that the great principles upon which the society and even the political conditions of the country are erroneous. You and your forefathers and generations before them, and long centuries of men, have built up this great realm of England. You have acknowledged, you have encouraged, you have supported, you have stimulated, you have lived and acted, under the influence of ecclesiastical endowments, and you have not during all that time in any way guided public opinion to doubt the propriety of that system—of that great and beneficial system under which you were born and which your forefathers created ? Not a syllable of the kind.

I need not read further from this speech. It is a most able speech. It points to this, that in dealing with great constitutional questions, where you cannot revert to the condition of things which existed before you undertook to deal with them, the country ought to be behind you, and ought to have pronounced in favour of them. I do not pretend to say, and I do not think any hon. gentleman here will say, that this question is a question of that sort, and yet we have gone to the country upon it. We have stated our views. We have embodied those views in ten propositions. Those propositions were all before the electorate of this country before the elections were had, and, in the only way known to the English constitutional system, the public opinion of this country has been pronounced upon them. Now, let me point out this further, and it is an important fact, and it is one that this House must not shut its eyes to : in 1872, the two parties were agreed that in order to give security to whichever might be in opposition, the minority, that county boundaries ought not to be disturbed. There were other very important reasons. It is an essential part of the English constitutional system, and that is of very great importance, but apart from the question of its being a part of the English constitutional system, it is also a protection to the minority. In a large measure it restrains those who are disposed to go wrong and legislate in such a way as to promote the interest of a party apart from the strength or popularity of the party. We all agreed, I say, on the principle in 1872, after the census of 1871. We went to the country in 1872. We had another election in 1878, and there was a vote taken, and under the principles laid down in 1872, under the policy that was then adopted, we were beaten. Our opponents came in ; public opinion was behind them. Their success, so far as the division of constituencies was concerned, was perfectly legitimate, but in the election of 1872, which took place after the redistribution of 1872, and the election of 1878, not one word was said in favour of a new and different principle—in favour of one essentially different. Hon. gentlemen went to the country in 1878, and they did not say one word in favour of breaking down county boundaries and gerrymandering constituencies. There were many cases in which they had an opportunity of discussing these questions before the public after every session.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It was understood their policy was to distribute after each decennial census. The country understood that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend cannot get away from my point in that way. I say in 1872 it was agreed that the principle of county boundaries should be adhered to. In 1882 it was departed from, and there was no approval in the country of that departure. The country was not consulted. It was a conspiracy in the mind of the government itself. The country was not taken into the confidence of the government. How did this House act on that occasion ? Did the Senate of Canada stand up for the principle of county boundaries ? Did they adhere to the principle they laid down in 1872 ? They utterly disregarded it. They treated the question as one affecting the House of Commons mainly, and in which they had no interest, and what the government proposed they carried here, and although my hon. friend who sits beside me (Mr. Scott) was a member of this Chamber and made an earnest and vigorous protest against the action which was then taken, this House disregarded that protest and gave the sanction of the Senate to the policy of the administration, and that Bill became law. If the motion of the hon. leader of the opposition is carried, what will be the policy of this country ? Is it the same as it was in 1882 ? Is the House dealing with the present administration and its measure as they dealt with the measure of 1882 ? Did they say in 1882 'you were committed to the principle of respecting county boundaries ; that was the rule laid down by the one party and accepted by the other in 1872, and you said not one word about it in the country since—you have not made it an issue in your general elections or in by-elections, and you ought not to adopt it without popular sanction. It is such an amendment—such a radical change in the constitution, that popular sanction ought to have been had before you proposed it for the consideration of this House.' Was that position taken ? Did the House undertake to stand up for the constitutional doctrine as I think the constitutional doctrine is ? Not at all. This House utterly disregarded the provision and assumed that parliament was within its right when it took the course which it did. Allusion has been made to the Franchise and Redistribution Bills of 1884 and what the Duke of Devonshire said on the Home Rule Bill. Now, what was done in the case of the Home Rule Bill ? There was an election in which it was an issue ; nobody disputes that. The overwhelming majority of Ireland, Scotland and Wales were in favour of that Bill. The majority in England were the other way. Now, what was the argument by which that provision was upheld ? It was this, that England was the principal factor ; it was more populous than the other three sections taken together—that England is the largest contributor to the revenue and that a measure of so much importance, altering the constitution, ought not to be carried without the sanction of the majority in England. That was the position taken by the House of Lords, and upon that ground.

Hon. Mr. MILLS.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Not by the man who made the motion for the six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That was the position taken by Lord Salisbury, and that position is the one on which the Act was defended by the Conservative and Unionist members in England when the measure was rejected by the House of Lords. They knew right well that it was a departure from the doctrine that where an appeal is made to the country and a vote is taken of the country with the matter in issue, that the House of Lords must acquiesce. That doctrine was departed from in this case, and in order to find a pretext for that departure, the proposition was put forward which I have mentioned, that England, being the principal factor, the most populous, the most wealthy and influential section of the United Kingdom, that a measure working such important constitutional changes ought not be adopted without the sanction of the majority of the people of England as well.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It was only one of the arguments put forward.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was the main argument on that occasion.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—No. No mandate from the people was the main argument of the member who moved the motion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I say there was a mandate. The majority of forty that Mr. Gladstone had behind him was a mandate. That is the only mandate that can be given. There is no direct voting upon a measure. There is no attempt to adopt a system such as that which exists in Switzerland for certain purposes. The only mandate known to the law of England is the approval of the general policy of the party by the votes given to uphold that party when it appeals to the country. The hon. gentleman referred to another case—to the Redistribution Act of 1884, and the Franchise Act of the same time, and he pointed out that the Franchise Act was defeated. I do not think that it was so. My hon. friend will find that that was not admitted at the time. What was done was the postponement of the second reading of the Franchise Bill until the Redistribution Bill was brought down.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It killed it for the session.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But they gave a reason for what they did. I was in England and heard some of the discussions.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It was virtually a six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The largest gathering ever held perhaps in any country in the world, was held in England when that postponement took place. Six hundred thousand people from outside the city of London marched through the city and were six hours marching past any given point. There was a strong feeling against the House of Lords. There was a disposition in all parts of the United Kingdom to demand the abolition of the House of Lords, and Mr. Gladstone, who was always an ardent supporter of the principle of the constitution recognizing two Houses, adopted a policy in the interest of the House of Lords and with a view of preventing revolutionary measures being pressed on the attention of parliament rather than for any other reason, and the leaders of the Conservative party conferred with him, and the policy was adopted of carrying through the two measures simultaneously, or at all events allowing the leaders of the opposition to know what was the character of the Redistribution Bill that the government proposed to submit to parliament.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not going to trouble the House with so simple a matter as the one to which my hon. friend alluded as a piece of badinage, in which he said that I was mistaken in my use of the word viceroy. I was not mistaken. I used the word exactly as it has been interpreted by the judicial committee of the Privy Council. I quoted, at the time I referred to it, authorities, and Sir John Thompson did not show that I had ever used the expression in a different sense. What he did was to quote from the speech of Lord Dufferin in which the expression was used, and when I was a member of his government, and for which he said I was responsible. I was a young member of that government, and I admit my responsibility in a constitutional sense for the way in which that word was used.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That was the speech with which he opened parliament. It was not a speech of Lord Dufferin.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It was understood it was your duty, as a junior member, to write his speech.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not questioning that; I said it was a speech of Lord Dufferin.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A speech put in the mouth of Lord Dufferin.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And for which I said I was responsible. Hon. gentleman have said to us a good many times during this discussion that we were a government of unredeemed pledges—that we have made many pledges and we have not redeemed them. I do not think that there is very much in that objection. We undertook to redeem this pledge last year—the pledge we gave to the country and that the country returned us here to carry out.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—To carry them all out?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend moves the six months' hoist, and my hon. friend from Monck, I dare say, will vote for it. I know my hon. friend is very much opposed to dishonest measures of this sort, but personal interest makes a difference sometimes. I may recall to the hon. gentleman's recollection—I know his memory of it will be a good deal better than mine—that there was the township of Dunn which he sometimes represented and which he sometimes did not represent, and my hon. friend had a great interest in seeing that township transferred from his constituency to that of David Thompson. I do not believe that even McLaughlin, however sorrowful his demeanour may have been, was more sorrowful for the loss of his wife than my hon. friend was when he lost that township.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I suppose the hon. gentleman wishes to be honest. Does he wish to get the truth of the matter and know all about it?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have a very distinct recollection of the matter, but I will listen to my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I will give the facts. David Thompson, the late member for Haldimand, went to Sir John Macdonald and asked as a favour that he should take the township of Dunn out of the county of Haldimand and put it in the county of Monck. I know they brought pressure to bear on him, and he moved an amendment and swallowing himself back again. They did all they could to kill me; I represented a radical county in the Dominion of Canada for 18 years, and all the power they could bring to bear from Ottawa was not able to defeat me. My hon. friend knows that, and when he says it was a sin of mine, I can tell him I never asked for it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say my hon. friend asked for it. I said he was glad to see it go. My hon. friend opposite has spoken of this Bill not extending over the whole province of Ontario. Personally, I would have been very glad to have extended it to the whole province, and if the hon. gentleman had proposed to amend it in that direction he would have been acting more consistently than by moving the six months' hoist. The truth is this, that the eastern portion of the province of Ontario has always had, in proportion to its population, a larger representation than the western portion, and there was a question to be considered besides the question of altering the boundaries—the question practically, of the redistribution of the seats. Now, that has not been touched by this Bill, and that was the governing consideration in leaving the eastern portion of Ontario as it is at the present time. One hon. gentleman has spoken about the 'machine,' and about the case of Brockville and the case of the county of Huron. Well, I do not think there is much relevancy in alluding to those, without any facts before this House, in this discussion. I do not think they have much to do with this discussion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We will provide for that in the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There was not a fact, when the inquiry took place in the case of the county of Huron, that was not known to those parties who complained within the thirty or forty days within which a petition might have been filed, and it was an abuse of the power of parliament to ask for an inquiry in that case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend knows right well that he himself maintained and voted for the principle that no inquiry should be had or granted where the parties had open to them a petition and knew the facts within the time within which an inquiry could take place. I might refer to the case in which my hon. friend to my right (Mr. King) was interested. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman opposite was a member of the Privileges and Elections Committee in that case or not.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I know that the government of which my hon. friend was a member, voted against inquiry—voted against bringing the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery before the House to correct the false addition, and, although he had gone to the electorate and an election had taken place, and he had been returned by a majority, they said: 'your recourse is to file a petition and go into the courts if you want redress. Parliament will not listen to you. My hon. friend thinks that a rule which ought to be adopted when the Liberal administration is in power is an altogether different rule from that which should be adopted when a Conservative administration is in power.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no analogy between the cases.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—One hon. gentleman said yesterday that he had been implored by a dozen members of the House of Commons to defeat the Drummond County Railway Bill. That was a very extraordinary declaration, in my opinion. I think the hon. gentleman must have been dreaming—must have been labouring under some hallucination. It is a strange idea that members of the House of Commons should vote for a measure which they detested, and that they should come to him and ask him to defeat the measure. If I remember right, the hon. gentleman voted for the measure, and this House voted for it, and the whole of this House, or very nearly all the members, supported that measure and it was carried here the very next year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not the same measure.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Practically the same measure. What was it? It was to make the Drummond County Railway a part of the Intercolonial Railway, and that measure became law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, that is true, but the principle of making it a part of the Intercolonial Railway was not objected to by the Senate, even when the Bill was rejected. It was the terms upon which it was to be acquired.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Tell us about the Yukon Railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not going to digress from the measure before us except to say, with reference to the Yukon Bill, that a wiser measure never was submitted to this House, that a greater misfortune was never inflicted upon this country than its rejection. The Senate settled, as far as it lay in their power, the Alaskan boundary in favour of the United States by what they did on that occasion, and no man in this country or out of it, can be found who will undertake to build that road upon the terms of the Mackenzie-Mann offer. That is perfectly clear, and that hon. gentlemen should refer to that matter in which such lasting injury was done, is a matter of astonishment to me.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The agreement of the government with the United States has settled for ever our boundary?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What was the discussion in this House for? Was it not to help Mr. Smith at Washington?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I can tell my hon. friend that there is an immense number of people in this country who think it was.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I hope we will have an opportunity to discuss that question before the House rises.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think I have shown very clearly that this measure was a proper measure to submit to parliament. It was one in furtherance of the principle on which the government went to the country, and on which they received a mandate from the people to carry it into law. I think there can be no doubt on that point. It is a measure which this House, of course, has the power to defeat, but I deny that it has, according to the settled usages of England, the constitutional right to reject the Bill. The Bill is a proper one. It is for the purpose of removing a wrong that was done, of putting an end to an injustice, and to place both political parties, so far as it deals with the question of redistribution, upon a footing of equality, and our political opponents have no right to ask for anything more.

The House divided on the amendment, which was adopted on the following division:

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Will the Clerk of the Senate read the names?

The Clerk then read the names.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I call attention to the fact that the vote of the hon. member for Erie has been improperly recorded.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I voted against the amendment, and I desire to have it changed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I notice that the hon. gentleman from Yarmouth has not voted.

Hon. Mr. LOVITT—I paired with the hon gentleman from Westmoreland.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—A vote which has been irregularly or inadvertently recorded cannot be changed in the way indicated by the Hon. Secretary of State. The rule states how it should be done, and as it not very often occurs, it seems to me well that we should follow the rule closely. Rule 33 says:

With the consent of the House a Senator may, for special reasons assigned by him, withdraw or change his vote immediately after the announcement of the division.

I might point out that if the mistake had been made in the House of Commons, the hon. gentleman could not change his vote. It would have to remain the way he voted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not at all. He voted by a mistake.

Hon. Mr LOUGHEED—But his name was read out in favour of the amendment in the hearing of the House. There was an expression of surprise at the time the vote was recorded, because it was thought he would vote the other way, but inasmuch as it has been improperly recorded it seems to me the rules should be adhered to. I am satisfied no objection will be raised, but the hon. gentleman should state his reasons and the House would permit the change.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I beg to call the attention of the House to the fact that the senator from Acadia did not vote.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I paired with the hon. member from Milton (Hon. Mr. McKindsey), who is sick in town. I would have voted in favour of the measure, and Mr. McKindsey would have voted in favour of the amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is the first occasion that I have ever heard any objection offered to correcting an error when an hon. member states he did not intend to vote in the way his vote has been recorded. I should hope that the House would not offer any opposition to his request.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No objection is taken.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I think there will be no objection.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman from Calgary did not object to the change, but only asked that the rule should be complied with.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It should be changed at the instance of the hon. gentleman from Erie, and not at the request of the hon. Secretary of State ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no change at all. It is merely a mistake in recording the vote.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—The vote was properly recorded, but the hon. gentleman has a perfect right to have it corrected. That is the proper course, and it is not right to assert that an officer of the Senate has made a mistake, because there has been no mistake in the recording of the vote.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I thought that I was voting for the Bill and not for the amendment. My friends and others who know my mind upon the subject would well understand that. I thought I was quite clear in the course I was taking but if I did vote for the amendment it was a mistake and I trust the House will permit the correction.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION SETTLEMENT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr PERLEY inquired:

If the present school law of Manitoba is a satisfactory settlement of the school question of that province, as has been stated by the Honourable the Secretary of State it was? Also, in what particular does the present School Act of Manitoba differ from the last Act?

He said: I have no remarks to make in connection with this inquiry: I am simply asking for information.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend is asking the question in the wrong quarter. This is a matter under the jurisdiction of the local authorities of Manitoba with which they are perfectly competent to deal, and with which, I suppose, if the views expressed here sometimes are correct, they may deal. I may say to my hon. friend that I cannot tell him if the school law of Manitoba is a satisfactory settlement or not. There are additional settlers going into the country, additional accommodation is required for school purposes, new schools are being established and a larger amount of money is sometimes required at one period than at another. Whether the people of Manitoba want further aid for their schools or not, I cannot say.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not the point.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The question is whether the present school law of Manitoba is a satisfactory settlement. I am not in a position to answer that question. The question of the Manitoba school law is one that comes before this House only under certain terms and condition. It came before parliament on one occasion. It was dealt with, whether satisfactorily or not time will show. I noticed that in the newspapers, the only source of information I have, which is open to my hon. friend as well as to myself, that there were certain schools in Manitoba, known as separate schools, which I apprehend are entirely voluntary, and it is asked that they should be placed under the general Board of Education of the Public Schools. Whether that has been done or not, I do not know. I am not in a position to answer my hon. friend's question, so that I am not able to give my hon. friend very much information in reply to the first part of his question. The hon. gentleman asks also 'In what particulars does the present school law of Manitoba differ from the last Act'? My hon. friend has the statute-book of Manitoba open to him and has the same opportunity for investigating and forming an opinion upon it that I have. My hon. friend has no intention of paying me a fee for an opinion, and I have great reluctance to volunteer an opinion for which I am not compensated, unless it is my duty to give it, and I do not recognize any public duty in this matter. Therefore, my hon. friend cannot draw from me any gratuitous opinion as he proposes to do by this question.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—For the benefit of the hon. gentleman from Wolseley, I should like to read a special which appeared in the Star, headed 'Winnipeg Catholic Schools," under date March 10.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Dispense. We have read it.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—The paragraph reads:

Winnipeg, March 19.—At a representative gathering of parishioners of St. Mary's and the Immaculate Conception, the two Roman Catholic churches of this city, held yesterday afternoon, a resolution was passed requesting the Public School Board to take over the separate schools of the city.

The motion reads as follows: 'That the Public School Board be requested to take over the five schools now maintained by the Mary's and Immaculate Conception congregations, where upwards of 700 children attend school; that the Public Shool Board rent the present buildings, maintain and keep them in repair, and that the schools be inspected by the public school inspector, and retain the present teachers, who will be subject to the same rules and regulations as those now teaching in the public schools.'

This meeting was attended by about 75 prominent Roman Catholic citizens, and they nominated the members of the Catholic School Board as a deputation to wait on the Public School Board to present the foregoing motion for consideration.

That, I think, is a sufficient answer. Then in the late election two Roman Catholic constituencies returned members to support the Greenway government.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—No.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—There is not the least doubt about it.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I hope the minister will take the hon. gentleman from Moncton into the cabinet, so we can get an answer to our questions. That hon. gentleman seems to be prompt to give an answer for the government. I hope he will be as kind to me as to the hon. gentleman from Wolseley (Hon. Mr. Perley) and that when the hon. minister is unable to answer he will come to the rescue and I shall have a chance to get a reply. I take issue with the answer of the hon. minister. Where is the judgment of the Privy Council? Is it with Magna Charta? A judgment was given between the two litigating parties, and that judgment imposed on this parliament an obligation, and the hon. minister says now the question is not under his control. It is still under his control. Where is the remedial order passed by the late government? Has that order been repealed? The hon. minister is unable to answer those questions and the responsibility that rests upon this parliament has not been removed. It still remains, and until the minority in Manitoba are satisfied the obligation rests upon this parliament to redress their grievances. They may, as a matter of expediency, not come this session, or next session, or they may forget it altogether, but the obligation is there, and the judgment of the Privy Council places that obligation in undoubted terms on this parliament. There is a provision in the British North America Act which provides that when justice cannot be obtained for the minority from the local authorities it becomes the undoubted duty of this parliament to give that justice.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—He knows that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What do we see? They are unable to take the responsibility of their own declaration. When the head of the cabinet goes to Drummondville and makes a public speech, and we ask if the report of that speech contains the utterances of the Prime Minister, the hon. minister here says he does not know, and when the question is asked of the Prime Minister himself, he has lost his memory. I do not know if he lost his memory when he went to London or when he went to Drummondville—at all events he does not know what he said, he does not remember—perhaps he does not know.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I may have something to say about the school question again during this session, but it was not my intention to bring it before the Senate at this stage of the session. However, since my hon. friend from the west (Hon. Mr. Perley) has thought proper to call the attention of the government to this question, I may, with the permission of the House, say a few words. It is very seldom we have the pleasure of hearing the hon. gentleman from Moncton (Hon. Mr. McSweeney), but I must say it is a very sad spectacle to see that hon. gentleman, who has been almost always silent in this House, take this opportunity to break his silence with the view of trying, he, a gentleman of the Roman Catholic faith, to take the part of the enemies of his persecuted co-religionists in Manitoba in their hour of trial, and surely it would have done him a greater honour if he had continued to keep quiet on the present occasion. Now, the hon. Minister of Justice indulges too often in this House in evasive answers. His answer to the hon. gentleman from Wolleley is simply a subterfuge. I take this opportunity to call the attention of this House to certain ways of the representatives of the government here. When we put questions we have very seldom any clear answers from them. When we ask for returns they are brought down sometimes two years after they have been called for, and even then they are incomplete. The leader of the opposition has asked the minister to supplement a report on the school lands in Manitoba. I made a motion two years ago to get certain papers in connection with those lands, and my hon. friend made his application also two years ago to get the supplement that he wanted, and we are still awaiting that part of the report. Sometimes in dealing with important public questions, the hon. gentlemen duplicate themselves. They carry on correspondence in their private capacity so as to be able to hide all that is going on. I ask old parliamentarians in this House whether that is in accordance with the spirit of responsible government. If a correspondence on a very important public question can be carried on in that way, why could not everthing connected with public affairs be treated in the same way. When the correspondence on public matters is hidden without sufficient reason, where is responsible government in this country? Responsible government is the government of the nation by the nation, and the people must know what is going on, otherwise they have no ground to base their judgment. I really think that the hon. gentlemen on the government benches indulge too often in this kind of evasive answers. The hon. minister says he cannot answer my hon. friend. Who will accept that declaration? The hon. gentleman is a member well posted on every political and legal question. He knows there has not been any substantial change in the school law of Manitoba. He knows that the school question is not settled. He knows that this parliament has still jurisdiction. He has merely said that it is a matter of local jurisdiction. True it is to a certain extent, because this parliament, having failed to provide the proper remedies, until this time, it remains open for the local legislature to right the wrongs from which we are suffering, but nevertheless, as my hon. friend from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) has said, this parliament retains its full jurisdiction in this case. So long as the local legislature has not complied with the remedial order, this parliament retains its jurisdiction, and the hon. gentleman knows it quite well. The school question is not settled, and I must again enter here my protest against all that has been done to induce the people throughout Canada to believe that the question is settled. That is an entire misrepresentation. As to the elections of which my hon. friend from Moncton has spoken, I say most emphatically that the Roman Catholics of Manitoba voted against the Greenway government. You take three constituencies with French names where the Greenway candidates have been returned; you think all the people there are French Catholics, and from these notions you jump to the conclusions that the Roman Catholics in our province have pronounced themselves in favour of the Greenway government. That is not accurate. There is in all these constituencies a large non-Catholic vote, and that vote in the last election, went mostly against us, and carried the election. In one instance a large number of Mennonites voted against us. These Mennonites, that the hon. gentlemen opposite when they were first in power from 1873 to 1878, brought into this country, a class of people whom we exempted from military service, voted against our constitution and against the rights of a section of the people, trampling under their feet one of the greatest privileges a free people can and should have. While our sons are to the front giving their blood for the cause of Great Britain, these Mennonite people are allowed to enjoy all the privileges of the British subjects, even to the extent of intruding upon the privileges of their neighbours, while themselves remain quiet at their homes, well sheltered as they are from all the dangers of war by virtue of the exemption granted to them by the hon. gentlemen now occupying the Treasury benches. As to those elections, I remark also that there are many constituencies bearing English names, and it is taken for granted that they are all English constituencies. This also is inaccurate. Morris bears an English name, yet the majority of the electors there are French Roman Catholics, and that constituency returned a supporter of the Macdonald government. Woodland is another constituency in the same position almost, and we have in the western part of the province half a dozen constituencies where the Roman Catholic vote carried the election; so when we come to consider the matter as it should be considered we find at least sixty or sixty-five per cent of the Roman Catholic minority which voted against the Greenway government. These are the facts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I suppose Mr. Macdonald will give them the redress they require.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I hope so. But what I know for a certainty is that such a redress would never have come from Mr. Greenway. I might add to what I said about the election, that Mr. Macdonald himself would not be where he is to-day if a large portion of the Roman Catholic vote had not gone in his favour. So it is quite accurate to say that the Roman Catholics of Manitoba voted against the Greenway government. And even if that were not the case, as the hon. leader of the opposition has already said, that would not destroy the rights of the Roman Catholics ; and if there was only a minority among those Roman Catholics seeking justice, I say the governments here and in Manitoba would be obliged to redress their grievances. So, the telegram of last week from Winnipeg, which the hon. gentleman from Moncton thinks so interesting, has no bearing at all on this question. By the action of the men composing this government we have lost the redress that we expected to get from parliament when the remedial Bill was introduced, and our people have been struggling against poverty for ten years, and now they feel that if they want their children to be educated to some extent they must do something. For ten years the Catholics—principally in Winnipeg —have been obliged to pay for the support of the public schools, while supporting besides their own schools, and not only have individuals been obliged to pay for the support of public schools which their children do not attend, but the Catholic institutions have also been taxed all the time for the same purpose. One institution in Winnipeg, which is educating about 300 students, is taxed about $400 or $500 a year to support the Protestant schools. That taxation of the Catholic people for schools from which they had no benefit has amounted yearly to about $7,000 altogether. Under those circumstances some of the Catholics of Manitoba think that they are, to a certain extent, justified in seeking to have a modus vivendi by which they would be relieved of such a burden. They have not obtained the modus vivendi yet. And when they get it, if they ever get it, I am afraid that it will rather be a modus moriendi. This move of the Catholics in Winnipeg cannot be called a settlement. I am sure that it is not the intention of the promoters of that movement. They have too much regard for our rights, for constitutional and parental rights and for the Catholics principles of Catholic education. But if it ever takes the form of a settlement it will have to be regarded in the light of a city capitulating by reason of famine. When a city is forced to capitulate on account of famine, it must be admitted that it is a very poor settlement. The Catholics of Manitoba are not satisfied, and even the newspapers supporting the hon. gentlemen proclaim that the question is not settled, that we have not had proper satisfaction up to the present time.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the hon. leader of the House deserves the strictures that have been bestowed upon him. If one looks at the question proposed by the hon. gentleman from Wolseley, he will find that it is not a question which calls for an answer from the leader of the government. The hon. gentleman in his question says that he will ask if the present school law of Manitoba is a satisfactory settlement of the school question of that province, it having been stated by the hon. Secretary of State that it was. That is a matter of opinion. There are some gentlemen who think the question has been satisfactorily settled, and there are others who think it has not, and it would not really place the hon. gentleman from Wolseley in any better position if the hon. Minister of Justice were to put himself in either one category or the other. It would not affect the fact. The hon. gentleman asks in what particular does the present school law of Manitoba differ from the last Act. That can be ascertained by looking at the statutes ; and with the permission of the House I shall read some extracts from the Manitoba School Act of 1897, because I observe that the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface (Mr. Bernier) who for a number of years, has had the interests of the Catholics in Manitoba under his particular care, stated that no change had been made in the law.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—No substantial change.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Chap. 26 of the Acts of Manitoba for 1897 is the one which makes the changes.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The hon. gentleman is going to answer the question which the hon. minister refuses to answer.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman might have answered the question himself, and he did not choose to do it, and inasmuch as another hon. gentleman gives us to understand that there has been nothing done, it is just as well to understand what has been done, because the members of the House should be informed on this question. The first section reads as follows:

Religious teaching to be conducted as hereinafter provided shall take place in any public school in Manitoba;

(a) If authorized by a resolution passed by the majority of the school trustees, of the district in which the school is carried on or in which the school is corried on, or.

(b) If a petition be presented to said school trustees asking for religious teaching and signed by the parents or guardians of at least ten children attending the school in the case of a rural school district, or by the parents or guardians of at least twenty-five children attending the school in the case of a city, town or village school.

Hon. gentlemen will remember that one of the great objections to the public school law of Manitoba was that it did not give any opportunity for religious instruction in the schools. We all know that Catholics hold that it is desirable that religious instruction should be given at other times than on Sunday; that the Sunday school is not enough in that way, and that religious instruction should be given through the week. This enactment puts it in the power of the parents of ten Catholic children attending school in a rural district, to secure religious instruction in that school, and it puts it in the power of the parents of twenty-five children in a city, town or village to secure that religious instruction. I think on the whole that that is not an unreasonable provision.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that a restoration of the previous rights?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman can make his speech after I have concluded.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I think the discussion is all out of order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, we are discussing a question, and it is held in this House that we have a right to discuss questions.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—What is the question? There is no question before the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman did not take that ground a few days ago. As I said, that section of the Manitoba School Act which I have read is a reasonable provision. If ten parents in a country section or 25 parents in a village or town, wish to have religious instruction, the religious instruction is to be given. That is a somewhat important matter. Section 2 says that such religious instruction shall take place at certain hours; and hon. gentlemen will observe that it is not left to the discretion of the trustees. The trustees might pass a resolution authorizing the giving of religious instruction, or the trustees might not pass it. They might not be willing; but if the trustees are not willing, then the parents can get the right by simply presenting a petition. The matter is not left to the discretion of the trustees. Section 2 says:

Such religious instruction shall take place between the hours of half past three and four o'clock in the afternoon and shall be conducted by any Christian clergyman whose charge includes any portion of the school district, or by any person duly authorized by such clergyman, or by a teacher so authorized.

That provides that if the clergyman does not find it convenient to give the instruction himself, he may depute some one to give it, or if the teacher of the school happens to be one of his own persuasion, he can depute the work to him. I do not think you could make any more satisfactory arrangement than that.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am speaking of the religious instruction taken by itself. If the hon. gentleman has any scheme to propound under which the religious instruction can be better given in a mixed school, I shall be glad to hear it. Then another point which the Catholics were interested in was in seeing that there was a reasonable number of teachers belonging to their denomination; and the wish always is that as far as practicable Catholic children should be taught by a Catholic teacher. Section four of this Act reads as follows:

In any school in towns and cities, where the average attendance of Roman Catholic children is 40 or upwards, and in villages and rural districts where the average attendance of such children is 25 or upwards, the trustees shall, if required by a petition of parents or guardians, of such number of Roman Catholic children, respectively, employ at least one duly certificated Roman Catholic teacher in such school.

The remainder of the section deals with non Catholic children where the majority may be Roman Catholic. I do not know very much about the condition of things in Manitoba, but it is clear that in the rural districts of Manitoba, if there were 25 Roman Catholic children attending a school under that section they could have a Roman Catholic teacher.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (Windsor)—If in a city there are only 24 in place of 25, or in a rural district only 9 in place of 10, what then ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think you could expect a separate institution for nine children. It could not be maintained.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It was maintained for 20 years.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, not just that way. We are dealing with things as they were in 1897. I think that throughout the rural districts of Manitoba, where the Roman Catholics as a rule, I believe, are settled pretty well together, this provision will mean that where there are 25 Catholic children there is to be a Catholic teacher, and, with the provision as to religious instruction, substantially satisfies the Catholic claims. In the cities and towns I do not think the number forty is an excessive number ; and as I understand there is a Catholic inspector of schools likewise. The fifth section of the Act deals with the allotment of days for giving religious instruction to Catholics and non-Catholic teachers. That is where there are children of both kinds going to the same school. Then there is another section which does not deal directly with the question at issue, but it is interesting because it goes to show, that there is, at any rate, a certain spirit of fairplay pervading the system. Section ten says :

> When ten of the pupils in any school speak the French language, or any language other than English, as their native language, the teaching of such pupils shall be conducted in French, or such other language, and English upon the bi-lingual system.

The eleventh section reads :

> All the provisions of 'The Public Schools Act' and amendments and of 'The Education Department Act' inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, are hereby repealed.

On the whole, I think that Act does a good deal. It goes a considerable distance, and while I do not undertake to contradict the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface with respect to a matter as to which he is necessarily better informed than I am——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear, that is true.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman from Stadacona was careful to observe that rule, he would contradict less often than he does. The hon. gentleman from St. Boniface alleges that the action recently taken in Winnipeg is simply the result of the poverty of the Catholic people in that city. I do not undertake to contradict the hon. gentleman ; but I think it is possible that action may bear another construction. I think human nature in Manitoba is not very different from what it is in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. We had the same difficulty in the maritime provinces, that exists in Manitoba under the Act of 1890, and without any interference from Ottawa, without any Dominion legislation, the people down in these provinces have contrived to arrive at a settlement of the question. In the city of Halifax there were a large number of Catholic schools at the time the school system came into operation, and these schools were taken over by the school board and treated in every respect as public schools, inspected by the same inspector and governed by the same board of school commissioners, but the understanding was that the teachers were to continue as they had been, exclusively Catholic. In Charlotetown when the school law first came into operation, they had no such provision. They found out how the thing was managed in Halifax several years ago, and they adopted a similar plan in Charlottetown. In New Brunswick there was conflict and difficulty at the beginning, but the result has been that they have adopted substantially the same method of dealing with the question which we adopted in Halifax at the beginning, and now everything is peace and harmony in school circles in New Brunswick. The Catholics are fairly well satisfied, and other denominations are not dissatisfied.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The hon. gentleman forgets that the Catholics in Manitoba started with the right.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We are dealing with the condition of things that existed under the Act of 1890. I am not going to justify the action of the Manitoba legislature in 1890. We are talking business now. I do not know, but I have a strong impression that this movement in Winnipeg to-day is not due solely to the poverty of the Catholics, but that it is due to a feeling, probably a feeling may exist on both sides, that it is desirable to have the wound healed and have the matter closed up, and that they may adopt—and I trust it may be so—in Winnipeg the same system which has worked well in Halifax and Charlottetown, St. John and Moncton, and other places in the lower provinces. I trust that the upshot may be that the schools which are owned by the Catholics and have been maintained by them for so many years in a way that they should not have been maintained—I mean that they have been maintained at the sole expense of the Catholic ratepayers who are obliged to contribute to the support of the public schools also—I hope that that condition of things will change and that we shall have in Winnipeg the same condition of things which we have in the cities I have mentioned in the lower provinces.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Would the hon. gentleman permit me to interrupt. I have at present in my desk a letter the writer of which I am not at liberty to mention, which proves that the reason I have given for the movement in Winnipeg is the correct one—poverty.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have no doubt if the Catholic people were very wealthy they would not be anxious, perhaps, to make this compromise, but I trust that the compromise will be made. I do not intend to go into the condition of things which existed all over the country in 1896. We know what the feeling was from one end of the country to the other. It was nothing but war, and now it is otherwise. This is not the time, perhaps, to discuss the Remedial Bill, which is not before us ; but I wish to say that the Remedial Order which was made in 1896 set out properly the things which should be done ; but the best study which I was able to give to the Remedial Bill satisfied me that it did not carry out the provisions of the Remedial order at all.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—That may be, but we accepted it, and the opposition at that time should have acceded to our wishes unless they were not disposed then as now to do anything at any time, as the years that have elapsed since seem to have disclosed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Was the hon. gentleman, who insists upon having justice, authorized to accept less than justice ? The truth is, that the Remedial Bill would have done practically no earthly good to the Catholics of Manitoba and I say this knowing fairly well what I am talking about. The hon. leader of the opposition in this House, when he dealt with that matter, dealt with it, I think, with a single eye to do what was right and fair. I have always felt that the hon. gentleman was anxious to do full justice to the Catholics of Manitoba, but the same could not have been said of some of the hon. gentleman's colleagues. One of them, who was very prominent in the strike which took place in the late cabinet, declared afterwards, in speaking of the Remedial Bill and defending the action of the late government in pushing it, that under that Bill the Catholics of Manitoba could not have got a dollar of money, nor an acre of land ; and he knew what he was talking about.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But there was a way to get it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When the hon. gentleman's motion comes up there will be an opportunity to discuss the Remedial Bill, and I shall be happy to discuss it then, and discuss it at length, but I think the country has reason to congratulate itself that we have peace now. If we had had the Remedial Bill, we should have had nothing but continual strife, and the Catholics of Manitoba would not have been as well off as they are to-day. It would have been litigation and strife.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Before the hon. gentleman resumes his seat, will he permit me to put two or three questions to him ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—You have been speaking of what has been called the Laurier-Greenway settlement. The hon. gentleman is a Roman Catholic?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Is that settlement a compliance with the principles of the Catholic Church in the matter of education?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was the only settlement that could be procured.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not just the settlement that I should have desired if I could have had my own way. But hon. gentlemen will remember that out of every five people in this country at least three are Protestants and only two are Roman Catholics, and that the minority cannot force a majority to give the minority all that the minority thinks it has a right to. I say this is a concession of considerable value. I say that the Remedial Bill would have been practically unworkable, and would not have meant anything at all for the Roman Catholics in Manitoba, and I hope that the movement which has taken place in Winnipeg now will end in a settlement such as we have in the cities in the lower provinces, and if it does, then we have no very substantial grievance.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has not answered yet.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Yes, he has answered. Although it is wrapped up in many words, still we have the admission from the hon. gentleman that this settlement is not a compliance with the requirements of the Roman Catholic Church in matters of education. I should ask another question: Is that settlement a compliance with the constitution ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think that it was, on the whole, as fair and just a settlement as could be had under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not an answer.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The question put by the hon. gentleman from Wolseley, it seems to me, is quite academical. I do not see that the different opinions that the hon. members of this Chamber hold on this question could materially alter the situation. The hon. member from Wolseley belongs to the Conservative party, which has a strong opposition in the other Chamber, and before putting this question to the government it seems to me that he should tell us what is the policy of his party on this question. It is all very well for the hon. gentleman to rise and ask the government if the settlement is satisfactory. Has there been a word of dissent in the other Chamber ? Has his leader, Sir Charles Tupper, moved a vote of want of confidence on this settlement ? Has he complained ? I hear for the first time from the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) that the hon. member from St. Boniface (Hon. Mr. Bernier) is to move a motion on the subject here. The Conservative party, as represented by the opposition in the House of Commons, has not expressed itself officially on this question, and it seems to me, after the service rendered by the Tory opposition in this Chamber yesterday to the Tory party at large, that if they felt strongly on the matter they could bring pressure on Sir Charles Tupper and his friends to express their minds on the question. The obstinate silence of these gentlemen speaks volumes in favour of the Laurier-Greenway settlement.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I wish to know if this discussion is in order ? I ask the ruling of the Chair. The hon. gentleman from Halifax is always a stickler for the enforcement of rules, and he says he could put himself in order by moving the adjournment of the House. I have no objection at all to listen to a discussion of those questions, but I should like to see the procedure of the House in order. Here is a question by the hon. gentleman from Wolseley answered by the minister. How many have undertaken to answer that question since ? I take it for granted the Minister of Justice is capable of answering that question. He gave an answer and that answer ought to be sufficient, but my hon. friend from Halifax is evidently loaded to give us a speech on the question, and I want to know if it is in order, unless he moves the adjournment, to speak as he does. I want the ruling of the chair.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I raised a similar question the other day and it was decided against me.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I think it is very regrettable that these semi-religious questions should be brought before this honourable House. I fear that instead of hon. gentlemen looking on this question with the respect I thought they felt towards religion, their object has dwindled down into a political party question. I see the Roman Catholic body, or those who profess to be Roman Catholics, are very much divided on this question. It is true we have a large number of hon. gentlemen in this House who claim to be Roman Catholics perpetually bringing up this question. One hon. gentleman undertook to give us his opinion by reading from a newspaper. The hon. gentleman occupies as good a standing with the authorities of his Church, perhaps as any other gentleman in this Chamber. I do not think it is right that one Catholic, or half a dozen Catholics, on this side of the House should rise and proclaim—

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What does the hon. gentleman mean when he says 'this side of the House'?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The Conservative side.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Are you on this side?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Yes, unfortunately, my seat is on this side. They have tried to make a political question of this. There are other Roman Catholics who hold different views with reference to the school question. I know that in New Brunswick there was a very heated controversy at one time on the subject, but it has dwindled down to a satisfactory condition. It may not have satisfied certain extreme men, I admit, who are always anxious, like Shylock, to have the last fraction of their pound of flesh. They can have their pound of flesh, but they must in doing so, not spill one drop of blood. I regret exceedingly that this question should be brought up, as I think, for political purposes. I might speak of the grandeur and nobility of the Catholic religion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I think it is time that you learn some manners. You are perpetually disturbing your superiors in this House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is out of order. He is addressing me directly.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—You are a disturber of the peace. Notwithstanding my veneration for the Roman Catholic Church, I do not think it is my duty, in a deliberative body like this to weary a majority of members who have no sympathy with these discussions, but must certainly be very much annoyed when they see gentlemen so anxious to bring their private grievances before the public. I happen to know a little about the school question, and I have my own ideas about it. I have a notion that any church, or any people, who are afraid of unshackled education must feel conscious of some weakness in their position. I believe in free education—free investigation into every question, even the subject of religion.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—You are a Roman Catholic?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I profess to be. I am as good a Roman Catholic as you are at all events. It is an open question, and it is very clear that there is a division of opinion amongst even Roman Catholics on the subject, and I think it is high time it was excluded from this House. In New Brunswick, the Roman Catholics have accepted the school law, and have had appointed on the school board Roman Catholics, and from what I can learn the Roman Catholic members of that school board are well satisfied with their rights and privileges as Roman Catholics in that province. I do not see, for the life of me, why, with a little patience and a little tact, we may not have the same result throughout Canada. These are my views, and I trust that men who seem to put themselves more prominently before this House as Roman Catholics, than even the Pope himself, will realize that they are going a little too far, and that they are speaking for a very numerous body of people, who, perhaps, do not coincide with them in their extreme views, but, on the contrary, prefer to have their children given an open, manly unshackled knowledge of the world. I have been driven to speak, because the subject has been brought up here so often, that I have come to the conclusion it is nothing more than a political trick. Further, I wish to say, an hon. gentleman found fault with the authority of these newspapers. Whose newspapers are they? The newspapers on the side of the very party that is complaining.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a telegram.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—In the Citizen.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was published in the Globe too.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The telegram is a very important one, it says that: 'Winnipeg Roman Catholics want their schools taken over by the public school board." This is a very important thing. It shows clearly that a large majority of the Roman Catholics of Manitoba have accepted the situation, for I find that a representative body of 75 men have made application to have their schools taken over by the school board, and that over seven hundred pupils of the Roman Catholic denomination are ready to join them. After these statements, I think, it is high time that hon. gentlemen, instead of flattering the parties who are making this disturbance, should turn their face against it, and exclude it from this Chamber.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should not have risen to say one word on this question, had it not been for the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, in reference to the action of the government, of which I was the head, at the time the remedial order was passed. There is, however, in this discussion, and in most of the remarks which he made, a good deal that was quite irrelevant. The provinces to which he alluded, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, had no rights in law to separate schools at the time they entered confederation, and consequently the argument which he has made in reference to those provinces does not apply to provinces which their rights guaranteed by the constitution which was given them at the time they entered confederation. Just as well, might the hon. gentleman compare the position of the schools in the province of Ontario and Quebec, with the position of the schools in the provinces to which he has called the attention of the House. That is the only point to which I shall call the attention of the hon. gentleman. I express my gratification at the opinion which he gave in reference to myself in being honest in the course I pursued. In reference to the declaration made by the hon. gentleman behind me, and also by others, that the course which has been pursued on this question, has been followed for political purposes, all I have to say is, had I desired to float on the popular wave of my own province, at the time this question arose, and on which I took a very strong stand, all I had to do was to swim with the current of popular sentiment, instead of combatting a large proportion of those with whom I had been acting through life. But I looked upon the question as one of a constitutional character, guaranteeing rights to a minority in a certain province, and my own individual opinion as to the question of separate schools or the non-teaching of religion in schools, was not a question which I, as a public man, and head of the administration, thought I had to deal. I believe, and the older I get the more I am confirmed in the opinion I then formed, that the constitution as it is given to each province, must be held inviolate if you expect this Dominion to work harmoniously. I make this remark so as to disabuse the minds of those who say, when they apply it to me, at least, that I was actuated by political motives, because had I desired to stoop to that, I could have occupied a very different position, although, I believe, I occupy, in the minds of the more reasonable people in my own province, the position that my hon. friend concedes to me. Whether I was mistaken or not, I was firm in my convictions in desiring to maintain and preserve the rights of the minority in each province. My hon. friend (Mr. Power), said the order in council met the requirements of the minority in Manitoba, but that the Remedial Bill did not. I can inform the hon. gentleman, and he ought to know, and I think he does know, that the only power that the federal government has to deal with a question of this kind, is to restore the rights which the province had at the time it entered into confederation, and the very moment they went beyond that, it would be ultra vires and a Remedial Bill would have been of no value. All I can say to my hon. friend is this, that that was a point which was discussed and considered at very great length. The very best legal advice we could possibly obtain was procured, as to how far we could go within the constitution in the enacting of a law which would restore the same rights that the minority in Manitoba had before the interference with the schools in 1890, and the moment, in many cases, where the original Bill went a little beyond that, we had to strike it out and keep strictly within the limit of our constitutional power to which our law officers said we could go, and no further. Now, that Remedial Bill gave all the rights and privileges possible, which were enjoyed by the Roman Catholic minority prior to the interference with the law as it had existed before 1890, when the Greenway government interfered with what we believed to be the constitutional rights of these people.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it did not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In what respect ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It did not restore to the Roman Catholics, and could not restore to them, all their rights and privileges. It could not grant to them, nor could it compel the local legislature to appropriate to them money to support Roman Ctholic schools.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We knew that, nor was their law existing before Manitoba came into confederation compelling any power to grant money for the support of separate schools, for that very reason, as I have already pointed out, we did not attempt to go beyond the power which was given by the constitution, and interfere with any legislation which annulled the rights of the minority. There were these difficulties, I admit, but that was not the fault of the government at the time. The government did all they could do under the constitution. That is all the minority asked them to do, and they accepted that Bill. There was this which could have been provided for, that is to give to the minority their proportion of whatever the proceeds would be arising from the sale of the school lands, because when the lands were set apart for educational purposes, they were set apart for the whole population, just in the same way as the school fund is appropriated now in Ontario, and which was created by setting aside what is known as the school lands. The whole population has a right to a portion of that, proportionate to their population, and that would have been justice to the minority, but beyond that we had no power to go. We had no power to say to the legislature, You shall appropriate your money in such a way. We all know that, for that was not a right that they had prior to confederation. My hon. friend knows very well that the question of separate schools in Manitoba was one that existed, not by law, but, in the words of the Act by which Manitoba was brought into the confederation, by usage, and that was the ground upon which they made this claim. Ontario and Quebec had certain rights and privileges by law, and all that was necessary in the passage of the Federation Act was to guarantee to the province of Ontario, then Upper Canada, and the province of Quebec, then Lower Canada, the rights as they existed at the time by law. But in the Act bringing the province of Manitoba into confederation, the statesmen at that time—Sir George Cartier in particular, who, if my recollection serves me right, carried the Bill through the Lower House—knew there was no law governing this question in Manitoba, and he insisted on putting in the words 'by law or by usage,' and it is under that they claim.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it is under recent legislation. My hon. friend is mistaken.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I shall be very glad to listen to my hon. friend if I am in error. There is this difference between the clauses of the Confederation Act and the clauses of the Act which brought Manitoba into the confederacy. One says all the rights and privileges guaranteed 'by law.' The other goes further and says 'by law and by usuage,' and there is no question that was the main reason. I merely wanted to point out to my hon. friend that, so far as the late government was concerned, in dealing with this question their object was to give the Roman Catholic minority, as far as they possibly could by the Remedial Bill, all the rights and privileges they enjoyed prior to coming into confederation, either by law or usage. Beyond that they had no power to go, and beyond that they did not desire to go. They desired to maintain as fully as possible the integrity of the government of this country and the laws which they had put upon the statute-book dealing with this very delicate question. If the whole question is settled, I shall be very glad to know it is settled, and that we shall never hear of it again, but that must be left with those who are interested. If my hon. friend had confined himself to his answer the same way as his leader in the Lower House did on this question, we would have avoided this interesting discussion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I gave a proper answer to the question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a matter of opinion. I am not going to dispute it with the hon. gentleman. He is master of his own department. He leads the House on the part of the government, and it is for him to say what answer he shall give to all questions, and the House must either accept or differ from him, and if they differ from him, I suppose he will concede the right to think he should have given a different answer. The Secretary of State might have followed the example of his leader in the other House, when he was asked a similar question. The Prime Minister replied that his memory was not good enough to enable him to remember a speech which he had delivered six months ago. I believe that to be literally true, or he would not place himself in the position of contradiction, as he often does. It is often convenient to have a short memory, and it is just as well —no, I will not say that, I think it is well that people should know when they make public speeches what they intend to say and what they do say, and they will not forget it so readily when they are asked questions. My hon. friend said the other day, and there is force in it, that he is not responsible for what people say at public meetings. There is this difference. If the Premier, or a member of his administration, makes a declaration in public, the public have a right to suppose that he speaks not only for himself, but he speaks on behalf of the government of which he is a member, and it is quite legitimate for every member of parliament, and for every man in the country, to ask the question: 'Did you make that declaration, and, if so, is that your policy?' I do not think any public man will deny that proposition, unless we are to accept the theory laid down by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, when addressing a meeting not long ago in New Brunswick, and the Minister of the Interior when he made a speech a short time ago in Brandon. Mr. Blair then declared that Mr. Tarte did hold certain views and certain opinions upon a certain question, but the majority of the cabinet held otherwise, and that he had a perfect right to enunciate those views in public, though they were in contravention of the policy of the government of which he was a member. I differ from that in toto. If I understand the principle of responsible government, members of the government must be united upon all questions, and if one member of the government differs from his colleagues while at the council board upon a question, he must either accede to the policy laid down by the majority or resign. That is responsible government, if I understand it. Then, we have this wonderful spectacle, to my mind, of Mr. Sifton telling the electors of Brandon that there was a large deputation, commanding more wealth than the whole of Manitoba, demanding a duty upon lumber, but that he was the only man of the cabinet who opposed it. I have a slight recollection of what the obligation of a Privy Councillor is, and how that hon. gentleman could reconcile that expression with the doctrine of responsible government, or with his duty as a member of the council, I must leave my hon. friends to judge. I am sorry that I have been drawn into this discussion. I should never have referred to it if it had not been for the speech of the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I have no fault to find with it, because he delivered it moderately, but I take exception to the interpretation he put on the Remedial Bill and the action of the government of which I was a member.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It is quite evident that the hon. leader of the opposition, from the remarks I made with reference to this being made a political question, thought they applied to him. I pledge my word I did not apply the remarks to him. I had reference solely to gentlemen who, I think, are making too much trouble about this question. I had no reference to anybody else.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have listened to the observations that have been made as criticisms on the answer which I gave to the hon. gentleman. Let me read this question to the House. The hon. gentleman asks:

> If the present school law of Manitoba is a satisfactory settlement of the school question of that province as has been stated by the hon. Secretary of State it was; also, in what particular does the present School Act of Manitoba differ from the last Act.

My hon. friend puts it here in the form of a question. We are not here to answer academic questions. We are answering questions which relate to practical affairs of parliament. If the hon. gentleman has any fault to find with the answer, and he thinks the settlement in Manitoba is not a satisfactory settlement, and it is one that interests him and the country, and if he thinks a satisfactory settlement ought to be had, it is open to the hon. gentleman to propose a motion and to give to the House that information which he possesses and the reasons that, in his opinion, are sufficient to show that the settlement is not satisfactory. But hon. gentlemen will see that that is not a matter to be disposed of by a question. The hon. gentleman, of course, is an ardent politician. He is a strong political opponent of the administration. He thought the question was one which might cause embarrassment to the government if it remained subject to discussion in this House. I may say to the hon. gentleman that he is mistaken, and that in my opinion the settlement of the question is upon the lines on which the subject has been dealt with to some extent in the province of Ontario, and that in the province of Ontario the rights of the Roman Catholic population to-day are far greater in respect of separate schools—at all events their privileges are better—than they were at the time that those provisions of the British North America Act were agreed upon in Quebec resolutions. Public opinion, as my hon. friend knows, has grown in the direction of forbearance, and there is a disposition, so long as it does not interfere with the efficiency of the school system, to grant the fullest freedom or toleration to individual opinion. I have always had in my mind, speaking my own individual views, the opinion that when the excitement of this matter disappeared in the province of Manitoba, the current of feeling would set in there, just as it has in the province of Ontario. I have no doubt that practically you cannot carry, in the present state of the population, the law in the direction of public schools quite as far as it has been carried in Ontario, for the reason that the population is not so dense. I remember when this question was up for discussion on the proposed Remedial Bill, I took all the reports in the province of Manitoba and went over the various school districts, and I found an immense number of districts in Manitoba that had less than fifteen children attending each school. When you take a school district, people struggling to give education to their children, and unable to keep up that school more than a small fraction of the year, and if we divide that population again into Protestant and Roman Catholic, we find that the population of fifteen children divided into two, and perhaps one of them forming two-thirds of the fifteen and the other one-third, it would be practically impossible to carry your system out in these school divisions. I think every one who has looked into the question will find that to be the case. My hon. friend opposite refers to the Remedial Bill and the Remedial order. I looked into that matter with very great care at the time the subject was under discussion in the other House. As my hon. friend knows I was in favour of the province keeping faith——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Quite right.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And of the minority having the rights that had been bestowed upon them. My hon. friend knows there were two decisions given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and the idea went abroad that those were not in harmony with each other. That was not my opinion on looking into the question.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not going to discuss it now, but I beg to call the attention of the House to the fact that the first of these judgments was under a clause relating to denominational schools——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Which are a wholly different thing from the separate school, as my hon. friend will see by looking at the judgment of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, which was also confirmed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, although not reported at the time, but it has since been given from the notes of those who are interested in the case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is, they had the power to pass this law which they did pass.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The point was that denominational schools are not separate schools. They are schools under denominational control. They are schools over which the state exercises no authority, and you might maintain them, just as you did, and they said they could not call for such schools on a state basis, but the separate schools were not created at the union. They were created after the union.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In 1871.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, in 1871. According to the terms of the Manitoba Act, and according to the terms of the British North America Act, once these schools were created there was a compact between the minority and the majority with regard to them, that was as binding as if these schools had existed prior to Confederation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, Hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And it is upon that feature of these provisions that the second judgment was given, and that judgment held that there was a violation of the compact between the minority and the majority. My hon. friend has referred to the Remedial Bill and there are a great many things left out of it, as my hon. friend the Secretary of State pointed out before, simply because the parliament of Canada had no jurisdiction over them. That is perfectly true, but there are some things that were included in the Bill that I was satisfied, had the Bill become law, would have simply given to the majority a law suit and would not have given to them a remedy. I have no more doubt that that would have been the case than I have of my own existence. Let me mention as an instance—and this has always to be borne in mind— that these provisions of the Manitoba Act and the British North America Act confer rights, not upon the Catholic church, but upon the Catholic parents. They are, of course, likely to be guided by their spiritual heads. That is perfectly legitimate and proper, but it is not upon the church that the rights are bestowed. It is upon the parents of the children. Those rights are based upon the proposition that the work of the state is to be done in those schools just the same as it is done in any other schools, and so, if the province were to decide that there shall be but one examining board, you could not by any legislation here—although that right or privilege had existed before—say that there shall be a separate examining board. That, if I remember rightly, was in the Remedial Bill, and I say that you could no more legislate upon that subject than you could upon any other power within the local legislature, because that is not included within the rights that are conferred here. For instance, in the province of Ontario some years ago the office of superintendent of schools was abolished and a board, on which the various churches of the country were represented, called a council of public instruction, was appointed. I was for a time a member of the board. Under that board I remember there was the Bishop of the Church of England, and there was the Catholic Bishop, Archbishop Lynch of Toronto. The local legislature passed an Act sweeping away the board and abolishing the office of superintendent and establishing the office of Minister of Education instead of the board, and instead of the superintendent of education. In one sense that affected the separate schools, but it did not affect any right given by the Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It only affected the working and did not affect the principle.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, and my hon. friend in his Remedial Bill undertook to provide a board for the examination of teachers of Catholic schools distinct from the general board that the province had established, because that examination related to the qualifications of teachers to do the work required by the state, and so they did not differ in that regard from any other teachers ; and so if the government of Manitoba were to alter the constitution of their school system to-morrow, nobody could complain of it under the provisions of the Act, and so when it was proposed to confer that power here and provide for the machinery, I say that that could not stand, and if the Bill had been carried, it would have resulted in a law suit and would not really have afforded any remedy. I remember discussing that matter very fully with the minister at the time the Bill was before the House, and I am not sure but I mentioned the same view to my hon. friend who sits opposite. I am not going into a discussion of this question. The hon. gentleman proposes to bring it up. I do not think there is any advantage in it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who proposes to bring it up ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understood the hon. gentleman for St. Boniface said that he intended to bring it up. I think it is a misfortune to make this a matter for political discussion. It is a mistake to undertake to make political capital out of it.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—There is no such thing.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That was my view when the matter was before parliament on a former occasion, and I did not hesitate to express fully my views on the subject in the House of Commons when I was a member there. I entertain those same opinions still. My views have not undergone any change in that regard, but I say that the less the question is disturbed, the less attempt there is made to array one party against another on a question of this sort, the more likely it is that public opinion will settle down upon reasonable lines and will give to the minority all those rights and privileges which can be efficiently employed, and I am free to admit, because I entertain strong views, that proper religious training and instruction inculcated in youth, with which the minds of children are permeated, incorporate themselves with the character and make of them better citizens than it is possible to make by secular instruction alone. Holding these opinions, entertaining a strong conviction upon that question, I think it would be a misfortune if my hon. friend were to persist in making the Manitoba school question a subject for discussion in this House with a view of bringing political parties and the leaders of parties before this House as a tribunal. My hon. friend knows how strong the opinion of the people of Manitoba is on this question. He says that the majority of the electors voted with Mr. Hugh John Macdonald. I do not know how that may be. It may be so. I am not disputing what the hon. gentleman says. Personally, I have no knowledge of the question, but I venture to say that it would not be in the interests of the minority if Hugh John Macdonald were to change his policy upon this question, and to adopt another declaration than that which he made some time ago in which he agreed in the extreme views that had been taken by some of the most extreme amongst his political opponents. In my opinion, time, which does a great deal towards curing the differences of men upon questions of this sort, will do more than anything else can do, for the minority in Manitoba. It is astonishing how fiercely we sometimes fight over questions, and consider them of vital importance, and when we look back years afterwards we have the greatest possible difficulty in explaining to ourselves how it was that these questions assumed such magnitude in our minds. There are, no doubt, a great many people, perhaps a large majority of the population all over this country, who are in favour of national schools, or a uniform system of education, and who, taking no salt in their porridge, maintain that nobody else has any right to do differently from what they do, and what is good enough for them, they think should suit every one else. As long as they are excited you can keep that feeling to the front, and as long as you keep it to the front it is impossible to succeed in making any alteration or change, but when the feeling dies away and the party becomes indifferent, concessions on the part of those who are acting from very strong views, and from a very strong desire to uphold what they think the well-being of their families called for, in the end, have their way. People hold to their demands and after a time a mode of existence suitable to them and not inimical to others is accepted, and we get along fairly well, and each section of the community is satisfied with what they have been ultimately able to obtain.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—When I asked this question, I stated that I had no speech to make. I simply asked a question for information which, as a member of the Senate, I had a right to do, for my own information or for the information of others. It has been insinuated that I put the question for political purposes. I deny that statement in toto. I have nothing whatever to gain by asking the question for political purposes, but I have rather a chance to lose. I may say I have not consulted any member of the Senate in reference to asking the question. It was inspired by the fact that the Secretary of State said last year that this question was settled satisfactorily, that it was a satisfactory settlement of the school question. I have heard also that the Prime Minister made the same statement. Coming down on the train last year I happened to meet His Grace, the Archbishop of St. Boniface, and I complimented the reverend gentleman on the satisfactory settlement of the school question, which I supposed had been made, but the reverend gentleman told me I was wrong. He said the statement that it was settled was not correct. I said that the hon. Secretary of State and the Premier had stated that it was settled. I will not repeat the language which he used, but he gave the statement a flat contradiction and said that it was not settled. I did not place this notice on the paper until I read in the newspapers the statement that the Catholics had reluctantly given up the separate schools they had supported for years by direct taxation, and had come under the public school system, and when I saw that, I felt there must be some misunderstanding about what the Secretary of State said about the settlement, and it was for that reason that I asked the question. The Archbishop said there were concessions made, but that it was not a proper settlement, and I know, now that the change of government has taken place, there are not likely to be further concessions. I wanted to know whether the present settlement was satisfactory or not. That was my sole object. The man who says I was actuated by political motives is stating something which is not justified, and for which there is no foundation whatever. No member of the government can rob me of my seat, because I am a creditable man and behave myself properly and pay my debts, and neither the government nor the opposition have any power to take my seat from me. I do not care who governs the country. I have no favours to ask from any of them. If Sir Charles Tupper came into power to-morrow I would want nothing from his government. I want nothing more than what I have. I wish to conduct myself as an honourable member of this worthy Senate, and if I do, no one can reproach me; I would have something to lose by a change of government. I have a Grit son-in-law holding a first-class position under this government, and if the government is turned out my son-in-law will lose his position. If I were a party hack, prepared to support the government right or wrong, I should naturally endeavour to save my son-in-law, and perhaps might vote with the government on the Redistribution Bill. But I am here to do my duty as a man, and will do it notwithstanding the insinuations that I am a party man. I do not care whether it is Sir Wilfrid Laurier or Sir Charles Tupper who is at the helm, I am prepared to support proper measures, and I am astonished that hon. gentlemen should impute motives to me when they know that no honourable man could endorse all the acts of which the government have been guilty since they came into power. I have heard the hon. gentleman who answered the question, which the government did not want to answer. The Minister of Justice said he was not given a fee, but I know that no man could undertake to support the government in all they have done, unless he wanted to support a history of broken promises. I will vote for the government when I think they are right, and vote against them when I think them wrong. That is the spirit which has actuated me so far, and which will actuate me to the end.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I wish to say a few words more upon this question. The discussion has taken a wider range than I expected, and I think I should be allowed to give some explanation. The Minister of Justice has spoken of the two judgments which have been rendered in the Manitoba school matter. I wish to explain the grounds taken in such instances, and the bearing of these judgments. There is a good deal which is commendable in the explanation given by the Minister of Justice on this point, but I do not think his explanation represents the exact situation. The first contention of the minority was based solely on the rights and privileges which we thought we had by practice before the entry of Manitoba into confederation. That contention of ours was declared unfounded. The judgment is wrong, but we have to submit. Then we turned our attention to another point. We looked at subsection 2 of section 22, as affording to us another means of getting redress. In fact, the Lords of the Privy Council have declared that subsection to be the governing enactment, and a substantive enactment. Under that subsection we contended that we had acquired rights by law after the entry of Manitoba into confederation. The hon. gentleman is quite right, I think, when he says there is no contradiction between the two judgments, because they have been rendered on two different clauses and on two different instances.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It was the Prime Minister who said there was contradiction between the two judgments.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Let that alone for the moment and take the question as it presents itself here. I think every one should maintain, for the sake of justice, fair-play and reverence also for the Lords of the Privy Council, that that is the case. In the latter instance, our main contentions have been supported by the Privy Council. The hon. gentleman has spoken about separate schools. There is considerable misunderstanding upon that point. The hon. gentleman is speaking of denominational schools as differing from separate schools, and talks also about the control that the state should have over certain schools. This is to no purpose for the present. In our province all the schools were public schools before 1890. There were no separate schools, properly speaking, as understood in the other provinces, under the law. We had Protestant and Catholic schools, but both were public schools, and these schools were managed and controlled in the same way. The state had its legitimate control of our schools. We obtained our proportion of the legislative subsidy, but the state retained the right of controlling those expenses. We never objected to that, nor are we now. That was the condition of things and the distinction made by the hon. gentleman does not, I think, come under discussion now. What do we want to-day? We want nothing more than a compliance with the findings of Her Majesty's Privy Council. Give us that by law and we will be satisfied. Can there be anything more reasonable? We only ask what the highest court of Her Majesty has given us. The hon. gentleman speaks about political capital. He is entirely mistaken in supposing we want to make political capital. I am acting under a deep sense of duty in persisting in the maintaining of the rights of a section of the people. These rights, I repeat, are embodied in the findings of the Privy Council, and we ask for nothing more. If really, as the hon. gentleman says, I were convinced that everything would right itself without any action on our part, I would be quite willing to let matters stand. I have no desire to stir up prejudices. I want peace and harmony. I am a British subject and I like British institutions. Although circumstances seem for the present to be against us, still I rely upon the spirit of those British institutions and on British fair-play to get our rights. But my conviction is this, that somebody wants us to sleep until we die. That I cannot accept as a rule in performing my duties. Somebody cast some insinuation on the hon. gentleman from Wolseley. The hon. gentleman never consulted me on this matter. He asked the question of his own motion, and when I asked him if he had any ulterior motive, he said: 'No, all I want is information.' The hon. gentlemen on this side of the House should not be the object of insinuations of that kind. I must pay the hon. member for Belleville (sir Mackenzie Bowell) the tribute of gratitude which we owe him. Where did we find a better friend for our cause? The hon. gentleman (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) stood up in his place in parliament to maintain the rights of a section of the people. He rose superior to his own personal views on this matter for the sake of maintaining the constitution. He stood up in the council chamber of the nation to help a minority which was persecuted. That Orangeman stood up among his own fellow-Orangemen, that I know, for the sake of maintaining equal rights in this Dominion. But on the other side we had this lamentable and humiliating spectacle of certain Roman Catholics raising their voice against us. That will be a dark page in our history for Roman Catholics. I am glad also to be able to pay a similar tribute of gratitude to all those who stood by the hon. gentleman from Belleville in his effort to help us in these hours of trial.

THE PREVENTIVE OFFICER AT MONTMAGNY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

What is the name of the present preventive officer for the district of Montmagny? What is his salary? How many seizures has he effected, since he has been doing duty, for infractions of the customs and excise laws? How much has the government realized from these seizures, either by the sale of the articles confiscated or by fines imposed ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I shall answer this question for the third time. The Inland Revenue Department at present has no preventive officer, specially appointed for the county of Montmagny. In February, 1895, Mr. Maxime Dubé was appointed a temporary preventive officer for the district of Montmagny and his services were dispensed with on the 26th August, 1896. During that period two seizures were made by him in the county of Montmagny, one of which realized net $59.99, and the other $163.34. Since the 26th August, 1896, no preventive officer has been specially appointed for Montmagny, and the service for that county and the other counties comprised in the Quebec division is carried on by the general staff of that division. This is my answer given for the third time and the third time of asking.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend confined his answer, if I understood him, to the Inland Revenue exclusively. There are preventive officers for the Customs ; does it apply to them ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman knows very well that he gave me only a part of his answer, and if he is honest (Cries of oh, oh), or if he does not forget what he has already told me across the floor of this House, he must remember that he promised to get an answer from the Customs Department as to that part of the question which applies to the Customs. He says this is the third time I have asked. It is not the third time. It is the ninth or tenth time. I asked him first, on the 15th of March ; I did not get any answer. On the 16th March I reiterated my question ; got no answer. On the 19th of March I put my question once more ; no answer—asking always for delay. On the 20th March the hon. minister gave me a partial answer, promising that he would complete it by making inquiry in the proper department. On the 21st no new answer. On the 22nd, the hon. minister told me that he was expecting the answer in a few moments, that it had not arrived yet, but had been promised—that I would have it the day following. On the 23rd of March the hon. minister repeated the answer he gave to-day, and said that he would inquire from the Customs Department for the other part of the answer. On the 26th the Minister of Justice was unable to give the rest of the answer. On the 27th the minister declared that he was not ready to answer yet. On the 28th the Minister of Justice had not yet obtained the proper information, and on the 29th you have heard the answer I have received. It is a repetition of the answer already given, and the minister boasts that this is the third time he has answered the question. He has not answered it yet. I am giving a notice of motion that will bring all those cases before the House, and I shall ask an expression of opinion from the House. I think when we have a right to an answer that we should get it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman asks how many seizures have been effected since the officer was doing duty. Of course the answer it that there was no local officer there. I shall make inquiry of the Customs again.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman asked me the name of the party that was acting under the customs laws and I gave him the name.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman mentioned it to me verbally.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes.

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY LAND GRANT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY inquired :

If the land grant to the Great North-west Central Railway has lapsed, and if there is any probability of the government giving a cash subsidy to further promote the construction of the said railway ?

He said : I hope this will not kick up such a row as the other question did. I have never made any offensive remarks when asking a question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have not complained of any.

Hon. Mr. PERELY—The hon. gentleman has imputed political motives to me in all my questions. I rise with a good intention to ask my question for the purpose of getting information.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman's questions are perfectly legitimate, because they relate to questions of public policy under the jurisdiction of this parliament. He asks if the land grant to the Great North-west Central Railway has lapsed; I beg to say the land subsidy lapsed, with the exception of 320,000 acres earned by the construction of 50 miles of the line. With regard to the second part, Is there any probability of the government giving a cash subsidy to further promote the construction of the railway, I am unable to answer the hon. gentleman's question at the present time. My hon. friend knows that the government will submit their views with regard to the subsidies to various lines of railway before the end of the session, that is, if they do anything at all, and if anything is done, of course this will be considered along with others when the subject is before the government, and I shall inform my hon. friend as soon as we are able to give information on a matter of this kind.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I do not apprehend that my advice is of much service to this government, nevertheless I propose to give it. The Great North-west Central Railway is a road which starts in from the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, a few miles east of Brandon. It goes in a north-westerly direction across the country, and its terminus is supposed to be at Battleford. I think the charter extended to that point. There was a land subsidy in connection with the road of 6,400 acres per mile. Owing to this line being in litigation between the contractor and charter holders, it has gone on so that the right to the land subsidy has lapsed, as the hon. minister has told us to-day. In the early settlement of this country these railroads were chartered and surveyed, and it was natural to suppose that they would be built at a very early date, when they had such a large land grant. The land grant, I do not hesitate to say, at $2 per acre, would quite build the whole road. It is through a level prairie country, a very fertile country, perhaps as good a section of territory as there is in the North-west, and settlers went in there with the expectation that this railroad would be built at an early day. These settlers were prepared to undergo privations and hardships for a time, for any one who goes some distance from a railway and undertakes to raise wheat cannot do it with any profit. They will most likely do it at a loss. They perhaps did not realize that at the start, but they have since realized that raising wheat more than 16 miles from a railway cannot be done successfully. All along this survey of line there is a large settlement of farmers. Land has been given to colonization companies, and they have brought in a large number of settlers and settled them all along this line from the very start of it, to west of where I live, to Fort Qu'Appelle. I know north of where I live there is a Primitive Methodist Colony, a very superior class of people, 35 miles from a railway, and many of them have left and others will leave if this railway is not built. West of that there is another settlement, Abernethy and Balcarris, in the best wheat growing district. They have to haul their wheat 28 and 30 miles to market. They have remained in expectation of the railway being built. There is a doubt as to where the railway will go, and that is why I asked the question whether the government, in giving a subsidy, had not the power to control the location of the road. From north of the Methodist colony to the Manitoba and North-west Railway, there must be 60 or 70 miles of country without any railway. That extends down until you get north of Broadview station. From that to Yorkton the country is settled and all the way east to Brandon, in a solid block. When you get further west, if the road goes north, it will not suit the settlement that is there now, and that is what I want to call the attention of the government to. If they give a subsidy I want them to use their influence to see the railway company locate its road where it will suit the settlers now in the country. This charter is now owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they might say 'It is grist to our mill, no matter where it goes. If the railway goes north through the Beaver Hill country we will get the custom no matter where it goes.' That is not fair. These farmers settled where they are believing the road would go there, and I want to call the attention of the government to the fact that if they do not give the subsidy the road will not be built. It ought to be built now. I know as good men as there are in Canada who have been living there 17 years, every year hoping to have the railway built. They have urged me and are urging parliament to see that this road is built. The road has been in litigation from various causes and the people have had to suffer great hardship because of the delay in constructing it. There is no part of the whole North-west Territories better than the country this road will traverse.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—How many miles are yet to be built ?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY--There are only 50 miles built yet, but another 135 miles should be built. That would cover up the great body of settlement. If people want to go beyond that, let them go, but the people who are in there now ought, in all fairness, to have a railway and I want the government to see that the railway is built for their advantage. They have been good and worthy settlers and we ought to have this railway built where it will benefit them. I hope the government will be able to make such arrangements with the Canadian Pacific Railway that they will build it without delay through the settled portion of the country.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I want to support what the hon. gentleman has said. Although it is a long distance from Winnipeg, I happen to have been through that country. It is a first class country, and I think there are about 80 miles between the two railways from Broadview to Yorkton. These settlers have been there, some of them for many years, while others intend to go there, and I think it would be a really good thing for the settlers and also for the coutnry.

THE SITUATION IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct the attention of the hon. leader of the government to a couple of telegrams which have appeared in the newspaper, one from New York, the other from Sydney, N.S.W., which are of some importance to the country at the present moment. I notice a despatch in a paper dated 28th March, from New York, to the following effect :

COLONIES CONSULTED.

New York, March 28.—Mr. Chamberlain has taken into his confidence the Australian delegates now in London and consulted them about the South African settlement, says a London cable to the 'Herald'. It is reported that the Colonial Secretary had communicated with Premier Laurier of Canada on the same matter. What recommendations have been made by the colonial statesmen cannot be stated authoritatively, but it is believed that they favour the application of drastic principles to the problem. It is understood that a strong intimation has reached the cabinet from Cape Town that any policy involving leniency towards he rebellious Dutch will result in the wholesale conversion of loyalists into rebels. A rumour is current in parliamentary circles that the government will soon issue a proclamation annexing the Orange Free State, and that the same course will be pursued concerning the Transvaal as soon as British arms are in a position to enforce the edict.

What I wish to ask is, whether any communication of that kind has been had with the government, and, if so, whether the hon. gentleman is in a position to take the House and the country into his confidence and let us know what position the government have taken in the line indicated in this telegram? The second despatch is of equal importance. It is as follows :

Britain Must be Supreme.

Australian Premiers Send a Joint Message to Mr. Chamberlain on the War Question.

(Associated Press Despatches.)

Sydney, N.S.W., March 27.—The Australian Premiers have joined in a cablegram to Mr. Chamberlain, declaring that it is undesirable to conclude peace in South Africa except on terms guaranteeing the absolute supremacy of British rule.

I would also ask whether the hon. gentleman is in a position to tell us whether the Premier of Canada has joined in a recommendation of this kind, and, if not, what the intention of the gouvernment is ? My own view, if I may be permitted to express it, is that the Australian Premiers have taken a course consistent with the policy which they have adopted in aiding Great Britain in South Africa, that being the case, they would not be considered as stepping beyond the bounds of colonial propriety, if I may so term it, in suggesting to the government that, as they having given of their wealth and of their blood in the maintenance of British supremacy in that country, they should be permitted to give advice as to the settlement after the war, and that that advice is that no peace should be come to with the Transvaal and the Orange Free State, unless it be upon terms guaranteeing the absolute supremacy of British rule. I call the attention of the governemnt to this, and I hope that if they have not taken action they will do so in the same line and direction. I only regret that in this matter, as in the sending of the contingent, we should have to follow in the wake of the smaller colonies. It is an important responsibility, I frankly admit, that the colonies have assumed on a question of this great importance. Twenty years ago the idea of a colony suggesting to Great Britain the terms on which she should make peace, I think, would have been rather scouted, and the probabilities are that they would have received a genteel snub, as the parliament of Canada did from Mr. Gladstone when we passed a resolution in reference to the question of Home Rule, which was then agitating the country. That time has gone by, and the colonies have taken the important position of rendering such aid as their wealth would justify, and have given of their sons to the maintenance of British supremacy in South Africa. I may be excused for asking this question, because it is one, I know, that the people of Canada take a great interest in, and the government, I hope, may, in this, as they did on the question of sending the contingents, take a strong position, and in the same line that the premiers of the Australasian colonies have done, and make a protest—if it were necessary—against any terms being given except those set forth in this telegram.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not in a position at this moment to answer either of the questions which my hon. friend has submitted to me. I might say, further, also, that I do not apprehend that there can be a difference of opinion throughout the British Empire as to what the duty of the Imperial gevernment is on this question. I have none in my own mind, and I do not apprehend that there is any room for difference of opinion. Lord Nelson said, on one occasion, that England expects every man to do his duty, and I suppose we may assume that the Prime Minister, with his colleagues in the United Kingdom, will do their duty, and what their duty is is perfectly clear. At one time, the government of England thought, and that was the view of both parties, that the empire was extensive enough, and that they were biting off—to use a vulgar illustration—more than they could chew, if they undertook to acquire more territory. Since then the area of the empire has increased three-fold. I cannot, just at this moment, enter into a discussion of the changes in public opinion of the leading men of the United Kingdom that have led to this change. We will have an opportunity of debating it on the Bill relating to the contingent. England, however, did grant to persons who were born her subjects, their local independence, because the Boers were born within the dominions of the Crown, and they received that local independence on conditions. The Orange Free State fairly well observed those conditions up to the time they committed the folly of joining their more ambitious and less scrupulous neighbour. The government of the Transvaal never did. They seem to think every compact entered into was a compact only to be observed on the one side. They started out with a local independence secured upon the condition that the two white races of which the population was composed, the English and the Dutch, should stand upon a footing of equality. As soon as their local independence was fairly recognized they disregarded that principle, and the majority imposed liabilities upon the minority, disfranchised them, subjected them to the burdens without giving them any share in the honours or benefits. They continued that system until it ended in war, and that war ought to end in a peace that will leave no room to doubt that what was done before the war began could never be repeated until the end of time.

Hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is my opinion, and I trust that we will all do our duty in seeing that that becomes the policy of those who have the direction and the responsibility for the direction of affairs of the empire at this moment. We are nearer together to-day than we have ever been before, and I shall be very sorry indeed if, after the sacrifices of blood and treasure that have been freely made by the people in every portion of the empire, a peace should be concluded that would be a compromise, and which would leave upon the minds of the people of this country the impression that those at the head of affairs in the United Kingdom were not equal to the situation, and that a compromise should be concluded that would have a tendency to embitter the feelings and create disappointment in Canada and in the Australasian dominions of the Crown.

Hon Mr. LANDRY—Could the hon. minister let us know if it is possible that the views he has just expressed will be submitted to this House in the form of a resolution, or if they will be made known to England by an order in council ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am unable to say more than I have said on this subject. Last session both Houses passed, without dissent, resolutions in favour of securing to British people their rights in the Transvaal. This session we have made provision—and I assume this House will not reject the Bill—for maintaining a force in South Africa for the purpose of accomplishing the result that we thought desirable when we were here last session, and if we resolve one session and act the next, and provide the necessary means, I hardly think there can be any doubt as to what our sentiments are and what we expect to accomplish.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. minister did not understnd what I meant. Perhaps I have not made myself clear. I am not speaking of the sentiment of the hon. minister as laid down in the motion passed by this House last year, and which had as a consequence the sending of a contingent to Africa, but to-day we are asked, or we may be asked, to impress on Great Britain the necessity of making peace on such and such conditions. I want to know if we are going to mention the conditions, as the other colonies are doing, the conditions on which we think that peace should be granted. If that is to be done, I want to know if it is to be done by action of both Houses of parliament or simply by order in council.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend heard the two paragraphs read by the hon. leader of the opposition. I replied to the questions put to my hon. friend opposite, and those questions embraced the questions which the hon. gentleman puts now. I have no further communication or answer to make of a more specific character than that which I have made.

Hon. Mr. MILLS.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The answer we have received from the Minister of Justice is not perhaps quite as definite as the country would expect on the present occasion. We know there was a good deal of hesitancy on the part of the Premier when the question of sending the contingents was first raised, and the excuse was given that he was waiting for the expression of public opinion, and eventually public opinion was forcibly expressed, and then the government backed it. Possibly the answer we have received from the Minister of Justice on this question is similar to the reply of the Premier at that time, that the government were waiting for the expression of public opinion, and as this body represents to a great extent public opinion, I think it is well for the government to understand that the Dominion of Canada is entirely in accord with the sentiments of the Australian colonies on this question, and I am quite satisfied, as we have almost had it in plain words, that the Minister of Justice himself, is of the same opinion, and it is of importance that this expression that not only Great Britain should know that she will be supported by the Dominion of Canada, but that the other nations of the world may know that England will not have to fight this battle alone. The question becomes of greater importance from the fact that we know that one gentleman at least in the House of Commons resigned his seat as a protest against the sending of a contingent to South Africa, and it may possibly be taken for granted that there is a large portion of the people of Canada opposed to that policy and I am satisfied it is not the case. There may be an isolated instance here and there where opposition may be raised, but we can almost say that Canada is unanimous on this matter, and we will support the government in any strong policy they may adopt in assisting to carry on this war until the British flag is raised, not only over the Orange Free State but over the Transvaal as well.

CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER moved the second reading of Bill (77) 'An Act to incorporate the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer.' He said: Some gentlemen desire to be incorporated under the name of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer. The Bill provides for the appointment of directors, and provides also as to the property which they may possess, and also provides that the property shall not exceed $20,000.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I do not rise for the purpose of objecting to this Bill, but there is one feature of the measure to which I think attention might be called. There may be some objection to it on the part of other sections of Christian Canada outside the Roman Catholic Church. I refer to the title of the Bill particularly. I would rather see the title of the Bill changed to something else, because it is an assumption of a position which all Christian societies claim. All Christian churches, under whatever denomination, claim to be the congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, and it appears to me, I would not say exactly arrogance, on the part of these people, but it is almost presumption to claim to be such a congregation to the exclusion of all other Christian bodies.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I thank the hon. gentleman for his remarks. I may say that these people have for almost a century held that title. It would be an unfortunate thing if we interfered with their corporate name. The committee to whom the Bill will be referred might perhaps deal with that question.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CANADIAN CONTINGENT EXPENSES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (59) 'An Act to provide for the expenses of the Canadian volunteers serving Her Majesty in South Africa.' He said: This Bill is one of very great consequence, not simply because a number of parties are interested in receiving the payments for which it is intended to make provision, but because it is representative of a new phase of the relations between the parent state and the dependencies of the empire. Perhaps there is nothing connected with the growth of the British Empire more interesting or more important than the varied phases that have been presented of the relation in which those colonies stand to the parent state. Hon. gentlemen know that when the colonies were first established, when the mother country sent forth her citizens to take up new territories and to carry into them English law and English customs of social and industrial life, the parties were said to take with them so much of the law of England as was suited to their circumstances. They always contended that the law suited to their circumstances included the law of parliament, the creation and constitution of a local legislature for the purpose of legislating and supplementing the laws which they carried with them. It was admitted that there were many laws enforced in the mother country that were not suited to the circumstances of the colonies, and that there were requirements on the part of the colonies for which the law of the mother country did not make adequate provision; so that a legislature upon the ground, capable of judging of the facts, was an essential part of the machinery of government that must exist in the colonies. I will not go into a discussion of the various views that were entertained upon this subject. Most of the law officers of the Crown took a more restricted view, in the earlier period of colonial history, but there has been a broadening of the legal opinions that have been held until we find the Exchequer Chamber, in the case of The Queen and Eyre, the doctrine fully recognized that was long contended for by the colonies, that the right to a legislative assembly for the purpose of supplementing the laws they carry with them belongs to those that become colonists. This, however, was very far short of a complete embodiment of the principles of English parliamentary government. The Crown claimed the right, as a matter of prerogative, to make the division of the country into electoral divisions, to determine the number of representatives that should be returned, and the Crown also set out, in conformity with the rule by which a freeman was recognized, the holding of real estate in his own right, as the qualification of the elector. The Crown also claimed it as a prerogative to determine for what period the House should continue to sit, and did not permit, for a long period after colonies began to be established, the legislature to determine for what period of time its members should be returned. They could be continued in office as representatives for an indefinite period of time, if the Crown did not choose to exercise the prerogative of dissolution. In all these respects important changes took place, but the most important change, perhaps, in the history of colonial government, has been the introduction of the system of parliamentary responsibility of the ministers who are the advisers of the Crown. The introduction of responsible government has made the constitution of the colony, so far as this power is exercised, very much like the government in the United Kingdom. It has, in fact, made the constitution of every important colony of the empire, a transcript of the British constitution. This principle of responsible government and of local self-government, so far as legislation is concerned, has been wholly of a domestic character. As colonists, we had no external relations. Our commerce was generally with those of other dependencies and with the United Kingdom, and so our commercial interests did not bring us in any way in contact with foreign states, and this has been the condition of things for over half a century. It is only within very recent years that we have grown, until our system of local self-government is no longer quite adequate to our requirements. And, so this fact has been recognized by British ministers of both political parties when in power, and in the settlement of questions which specially concern us, the mother country has given us representation on any commission that was called upon to deal with a question in dispute on behalf of Her Majesty, whatever that question might be. We have, for a long period of time been complaining fitfully—more continuously in recent years than formerly—of the right to have a voice in the settlement of those questions affecting the external relations of the empire which specially concern ourselves. A few years ago, a colonial minister made the observation that we have in the United Kingdom, two classes of international relations, the one dealt with by the foreign minister, which concerns our relations with foreign states, and the other class dealt with by the colonial minister, that concerns the relations between the mother country and the great dependencies of the empire. Those dependencies year by year are growing up, and assuming larger proportions, having more important interests to be dealt with, and receiving in respect to those interests greater consideration from the mother country. I have never heard any one maintain that it was any violation of our constitution, or of its spirit and principles, to concede to us a voice in dealing with those international questions, in which we have a deep and abiding interest. It has only been felt to be an act of courtesy due to us that such a position should be assigned to us. That was done in 1871 or 1872, when the joint high commission sat at Washington, when Sir John Macdonald, on behalf of this country, was appointed a member of that commission by the Imperial government. And, so again in 1887, when the commission was appointed for the settlement of the outstanding differences between the United Kingdom and the United States, which specially affected us, we were represented on that commission. It consisted, on behalf of the mother country, I think, of Mr. Chamberlain, the present Colonial Secretary, and the present leader of the opposition in the Canadian House of Commons, Sir Charles Tupper. Then, the next international board, was that which sat at Paris for the purpose of settling the Behring Sea difficulty, and on that again we were represented, because, although, it was a matter affecting the external relations of the empire, it was one specially growing out of the relations between the subjects of Her Majesty in Canada, and the people of the United States. Last year we had another high commission sitting for the purpose of further dealing with those differences, so that the principle has become well recognized that, so far as our politcal powers and authority are concerned, they are not confined merely to questions of local self-government. They are extended to those international questions in which we have a large and abiding interest, and I refer to these cases, to point out the growth of our constitutional system. It is growing. It is not an artificial contrivance, but its growth arises from those vital forces which have, in a long series of years, served to make the English constitutional system what it is. It is strong without being stiff. It possesses a flexible capability of adapting itself to circumstances when they arise, and these features are not the result of any change in the principles or spirit of the constitution, but the necessary outcome of the changes which the growth of society is gradually forcing on the attention of those in authority. That being so, I think, no one in his senses, can fail to see that, while there is a growth of power, there must be a corresponding growth of responsibility. To claim power and to deny responsibility, to claim the advantages of self-government and to refuse any consideration for the burdens which grow out of the exercise of the power of self-government, would be a most illogical position. They must necessarily go hand in hand; but, in my opinion, they must for many years to come, be the voluntary exercise of the spirit of generosity, of self-respect, of a sense of right, of a disposition to do what is just and proper, according to sound principles of ethics under existing circumstances. There has been a very great change, not merely in the relations between the colonies and the mother country, but in the spirit with which those conditions are approached and considered and dealt with. Why, I need mention but a matter of family history to every hon. gentleman present, the proposal in the last century, after the peace of 1763, to create three new colonies west of the older settlements, colonies that belonged to the mother country. There was a proposition to organize one colony out of that portion which is now the province of Ontario that was then unsettled, extending to the Detroit River, to make the French settlement on the Detroit River the capital, and to embrace the whole State of Michigan and the territories north of the Wabash, west to the Mississippi in that northern colony. It was proposed to create a second colony upon the Ohio, and a third in what is called the Illinois country. There is in the library a report made by Lord Hillsboro, as head of the Board of Trade and Plantations, on that subject in which he opposes the constitution of these colonies. He says that the territory is so fertile that thousands of people will flock into the district for the purpose of occupying and settling the land, that they will be beyond the reach of the mother country, that the goods of the mother country cannot reach them, that they will become a manufacturing people, supplying their own wants, and it was infinitely more important to keep the colonists on the Atlantic border, where they could engage in the lumber trade between their own country and the West Indies, and become consumers of English goods. No one can read that report by Lord Hillsboro without seeing the very narrow view he took of the situation.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—What date is that?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—1768—and how utterly he failed to recognize any commercial or industrial right on the part of those settled on this side of the Atlantic. Their position was to be considered simply with reference to the parent state. A great change has taken place since that time. The colonial views of to-day are altogether different. The disposition is to regard the people of the empire as one people, having common rights and interests, so that on every question in which we are specially concerned, a voice is given to us and recognized as rightfully belonging to us, and there can be little doubt that the corresponding responsibilities will rest upon us. I am very far from saying, in the consideration of this question, that we ought to become involved in every war or struggle that takes place between the mother country and every petty state throughout Christendom. That we are not asked to do. I do not think that is our position. We are growing in the direction of unity, no doubt, for the purpose of defence, and that unity will, in time, come, but it is a unity which addresses itself to the reason, to the judgment, to the feeling of the interest which the people in every part of the empire have in its creation and in its continuance; and there can be no doubt whatever that undertaking, as we have done, to bear our fair share of burden, and to come to the defence of the interests of the empire, at a point where the maintenance of those interests are vital to the integrity of the empire itself, is a matter of very great importance, which has forced itself upon the attention of public men in every portion of the British dominions.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The English government are themselves responsible in some measure for the condition of things that has grown up. Everybody to-day will admit that it was a great mistake to confer local sovereignty upon the Boers who were settled in what was afterwards known as the Orange Free State and in the Transvaal. Those people were British subjects by birth. According to English law they carried with them the English law and responsibility to British sovereignty wherever they went, and that power might reach them in any portion of the world which is not within the sovereignty or dominion of some recognized independent states; but at the time the independence of the Orange Free State and the Transvaal was recognized, the British government, and the public men of both parties, were opposed to the further extension of the Queen's dominion. They thought they had all the territory with the government of which the people of the United Kingdom ought to be burdened. They held to the notion that the principles of free trade, what is now called the open door, were so obvious that they must commend themselves to the general acceptance of mankind, and that within an incredibly short period of time the great majority of the world would accept those principles and act upon them, so that the commerce of the mother country and the interests of its commerce could not be promoted by the acquisition of territory. They would have the same chance of sending English goods into the colonies of a foreign state that they would have to send them into their own. In fact, any one who will take the trouble to read the facts disclosed in the correspondence of the foreign and colonial offices in respect to the various trading factories that have been established both upon the Atlantic coast and the African coast, adjoining the Indian Ocean, will see that the English manufacturers and merchants do the trade, almost the exclusive trade, of the whole of the coast of Africa, south of the equator, and that they had here and there a consul who had acquired great influence with the native chiefs or Sultans, and that they had all the advantages, commercially, that they would have if those territories were territories of Her Majesty, without the expense and the burden of undertaking to govern them and make themselves responsible for the protection of life and property within those regions. That condition of things existed at the time that the local independence of the Transvaal and the Orange Free States was recognized. The British government was but applying to those territories the principles which they found so convenient, and which had for a long period of years proved adequate to the protection and preservation of British interests upon the coast, but after 1885, when the Berlin Act was agreed to, when the various powers, France, Germany, Belgium and England agreed practically to the partition of the continent of Africa, the British government became alive to the actual situation. The government knew that unless they did come in and acquire portions of the African continent, in which they had a special interest, there was no possibility of their being able to maintain the commercial interests of Great Britain upon the African continent. Every one who will examine the despatches upon this question since 1884 will see that I am stating the actual condition of things that existed. That being so, the position of the United Kingdom in South Africa was very greatly changed. The Boer population, unwilling to remain within the limits which had been assigned to them by treaty stipulations and conventions, undertook to trek abroad. They created friction along their whole borders. They were constantly embroiled in wars with native chiefs. They endangered the peace and security of the British people in Natal and in Cape Colony, so that it became necessary, in order to preserve peace, that Bechuanaland and the protectorate to the north of it, and ultimately Rhodesia, the territories that, under the chartered companies of Mr. Rhodes and his associates, should be acquired for the purpose of preserving the peace, and also for the purpose of developing the very important resources that these countries were found to possess. Unless active efforts had been put forward by British authority to acquire interests in those territories I have mentioned, there is no doubt that within a period of two or three years the possessions of Germany would have been extended eastward, and of the Transvaal westward, until the possibility of northern extension of British territory would have been out of the question, and the regions which had been explored and discovered, and to no inconsiderable extent developed by the enterprise of British people, and by the investment of large sums of money, would have been lost to British commerce if these extensions of territory had not taken place. Any one reading what has transpired within the Transvaal, and following the efforts which the government under Mr. Kruger has put forward, will see that that government had adopted the view that the whole of South Africa must ultimately become a Boer possession. It was a question of opportunity in their estimation. When Mr. Froude visited the country as an agent of the British government, he himself stated that on several occasions when he met the Boer authorities and they discussed the question of the federation of South Africa, they intimated to him that there might be a federation, they hoped there would be, but it would not be a federation under the sovereignty of Her Majesty. So that from the very beginning the intention was to oust British authority in South Africa whenever the opportunity arose.

Hon. Mr. DE BOUCHERVILLE—Were they independent ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend asks if they were independent. I say no, they were not, and if they had been, they would not have the right, except as a right of war, because if there is any principle that is well recognized in public life, it is the right of self-defence, and the British government would have been justified in putting forward any effort to put it out of the power of these people, by the aid of others, as they anticipated they would receive aid, to endanger British authority in these dominions. Let me mention a few facts which I daresay have come under the attention of almost any one who has given consideration to this subject. So far as the Orange Free State is concerned, the people of that state have fairly well, up to the declaration of war, kept their treaty engagements. The two races have stood upon a footing of equality, in the exercise of political rights, and in all the exercise of public functions, not less the one than the other. But that has not been so in the Transvaal. The Transvaal people received their powers of local self government, had them restored to them after they themselves had voluntarily given them up. They were a bankrupt state. They would not contribute the supplies necessary for the maintenance of their own governent. They were three or four times defeated by the natives with whom they had quarrelled, and whose sons and daughters they had undertaken to reduce to the condition of slaves, contrary to the treaty engagement into which they had entered. They voluntarily surrendered their authority. They recognized their position of dependence. They did not question the sovereignty of Her Hajesty. Mr. Kruger himself became an officer under Theophilus Shepstone and under his successor Col. Lauzon. It was not until the British government came to the defence of the Transvaal as a British colony, not until they had defeated the Zulus who threatened the very existence of the country, and with whom they had no cause of quarrel apart from the difficulties which had arisen between the Boers and the Zulus. After the Zulus were defeated and the Transvaal population were protected against the possibility of extermination by the natives, they began once more to talk of independence. Their independence was conceded, but it was conceded upon conditions. The suzerainty of Her Majesty was asserted and recognized, and one of the conditions, at the very outset, upon which everything else rested under the regulations of their independence was that the two races—British and Boers—should there, as in every other part of South Africa, stand upon a footing of equality. The three delegates who represented the Boer population declared that. Once they had the majority, and after the convention of 1884 was agreed to, they felt they had a free hand, and they began to impose disabilities, and disfranchised the English population and took away the right by which naturalization was secured. They did more than that; they imposed conditions and restrictions of such a character that it took fourteen years to become a citizen, and when one did become a citizen, he required two thirds of the vote of the people in his own district as well as the approval of the President and his advisers before full burgher rights could be secured. Now, that is not all. They also frequently quarrelled with the natives, and they commandeered British subjects who were even temporary residents of the country—who had not sought to acquire burgher rights of any sort—they commandeered them to furnish horses and military equipment to march north three or four hundred miles for the purpose of fighting the natives with whom they had quarrelled. If they did not furnish the horse and outfit, they had to pay a fine of some fifteen pounds a month or be confined in jail. Now, these provisions were all contrary to the stipulations and agreements into which they had entered. That was not all; they took away the right to receive instruction in the English language. In the municipal government of the city of Johannesburg, with a population of at least forty thousand who spoke the English language, and less than fourteen hundred Boers, it was proposed that the English population might elect twelve members to the council; the fourteen hundred Dutch might elect twelve, and the President appoint the chairman or burgomaster. The chief power was in the hands of that burgomaster. The fourteen hundred Boers owned nothing. The property was in the hands of the thirty-five or forty thousand English-speaking people. These were at the mercy of the others. The proceedings of the council had to be kept in Dutch, and those who could not speak the Dutch language were unfit to sit in the council, and were incapable of transacting the business, such were these difficulties to which they were subjected. The Boers of Cape Colony and Natal are entitled to the same rights as an Englishman. They have their children taught in their own language in the public schools. They have the right to use their own language in the courts of justice. In Cape Colony they may speak Dutch in the legislative assembly, but in the Republic of the Transvaal no Englishman had any right that a Dutchman was called upon to respect. If he were met with and did not submit to be commandeered, some Boer on horseback, with a long whip, if he were not a strong man, would flog him unmercifully. It is true the law provided punishment for assault and battery, but if the aggressive Boer was taken before the magistrate, the fine imposed upon him was paid out of the public treasury, and so there was no great deterrent provided in the fine, and he was rather encouraged to persevere in so patriotic an undertaking rather than abstain from anything of that sort. Men were robbed, men were flogged, men were prevented from using their own language, and this condition of things has produced the war, because, so far as the Boer population was concerned, there is no doubt there would have been war if they had persisted in the rejection of all reform; but they were confident of their strength and ability to succeed, and did not wait for any declaration of war on the part of Great Britain, but they marched into the colony of Natal and took possession of British territory. They also marched into Cape Colony and took possession of territory there, and declared by proclamation that it was annexed to the Orange Free State. I cannot understand upon what perverted theory any one can profess to sympathize with what they call the Boers' love of independence—the Boers' love of liberty. The true test of the love of liberty is what you are willing to concede to others. The man who is attached to liberty himself, who has a strong conviction of what is right, and who is ardently devoted to freedom, is anxious to confer upon every other competent man the blessing which he himself so highly prizes. But there was nothing of that sort in all that the Boer population have done. What they did was to undertake to make men who are better educated, more wealthy, more enterprising, more fit for self government than themselves, hewers of wood and drawers of water to the Boer population. They treated with indignity every appeal to them for the redress of grievances of which aliens complained. They granted monopolies. Take, for instance, the monopoly granted in respect to dynamite, affording protection, besides the monopoly which gave to the parties who enjoyed that monopoly about eighty-five shillings for every case of dynamite which sold at Kimberley for thirty-seven shillings. So these people were putting into their pockets several hundred thousand pounds annually. That was practically not a tax but an act of robbery. A United States judge some years ago, in deciding a case, said that a bonus given to a man for the erection of a mill in a town was not an exercise of the power of taxation, but the exercise of power of appropriating one man's property for the use of another without compensation. Taxation is money taken for the benefit and use of the state. It must be for a public purpose; but an appropriation taken from a man, which he is compelled to pay, which does not go into the city treasury, but into the pocket of a neighbour, is not taxation, said this judge, but robbery. That has been the policy of the Boer government in respect to dynamite during the last eight or ten years. I am not going to discuss this question further. I point out to you the importance of the success of British arms in this war, not merely to the people of Britain, but to the people of the whole British empire. What capital has developed the mines of the Transvaal? Mainly British capital. There are large amounts of French and German capital there as well, but those capitalists, whether they be English, French or German, have the same interest in good government, the one as the other. The Boers have had a very great and important trust committed to them. They have had possession of the richest mines in all Christendom, and they have made a very bad use of their opportunities. They have abused their trust. They have trampled upon the rights of those who are not of their own kin; they have disturbed the peace of South Africa, and if they had not done so now, they would have undoubtedly at the first opportunity availed themselves of making war upon Great Britain if they found it involved in a struggle with any other great state. In my opinion we have not voted any public moneys that are a better investment or that are more usefully employed than those for which we intend to provide by the Bill, the second reading of which I am now moving. I believe that this will be advantageous to Canada as well as to the mother country. It has been to this country a splendid advertisement, and I trust that no peace will be agreed to that does not recognize the unquestioned sovereignty of Her Majesty in the territories that have been misgoverned by Kruger and those associated with him. (Cheers.)

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It is a good many years ago now since, in conversation with an English gentleman of very high literary reputation and standing, that gentleman stated to me that he thought the manifest destiny of Canada was to become part of one great republic, from Labrador to Cape Florida. My reply was, I thought that was a destiny that would never be fulfilled—that if I knew anything of my countrymen at all, in the first place they were thoroughly loyal to their sovereign and the empire, and in the second place, they conceived it to be a much loftier object of ambition to be still more closely bound up with the greatest empire the world has ever seen, than to form part of any foreign state, however great. Events since then, but more particularly of the last six months, have shown that, with some very trifling exceptions, there is not the slightest wish or desire on the part of any Canadian to throw in his lot with a foreign state, but rather to draw closer the ties which bind us to the mother country. The best proof that could be given of this is the magnificent way in which our people responded when an offer was made to the mother country, and accepted, to send our men to South Africa to fight in defence of the empire. And not only that, but I think one thing which we must all rejoice at exceedingly is that that spirit has been shown, not by one portion of this community merely, but, with a very trifling exception, by both the great races which have served to build up and make Canada what it is today. I do not think that any one could have listened without the strongest feeling of emotion to the magnificent speech of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, which was delivered not very long ago, and rejoice that he, who was the leader of the government and a French Canadian, had expressed himself in such terms with regard to our loyalty towards the mother country. I hope, hon. gentlemen, that this feeling which is now so strongly aroused may draw us closer and closer in the bonds of one united empire. I hope also that one result of it may be that by degrees the different colonies will be admitted to some share in the councils of the empire, and that particularly with regard to the conclusion, which I hope one may look forward before very long, of this war, and the terms of peace which shall be made, that the colonies, which have freely spent both blood and treasure in fighting the battles of the empire, in some respect may be permitted an opportunity of expressing their views in regard to the settlement to take place. Hon. gentlemen, I have given a good many votes in this House, because I think I am now one of the oldest members of it, but I have never given and shall never give a vote with greater or more thorough pleasure and satisfaction than shall now for the passing of this Bill. (Cheers.)

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Before the Bill passes, as I believe it will pass with the utmost unanimity, I would crave permission to say just one word. Hon. gentlemen know that I represent here more particularly a portion of Canadian population of which little is known in the Dominion at large—the Acadian people of the maritime provinces, of which we are about one hundred and thirty thousand souls altogether. There were raised of late, unfortunately, cries of loyalty and disloyalty, and a portion of the population of the Dominion, the French Canadians, were said to be lacking in patriotism. That, of course, was not true. It was disproved; still, the cry was raised, and if it did apply to the French Canadians it might be thought to apply also to the French Acadians. Perhaps, in looking back on past events, on the fortunes and misfortunes of history, if a section of the population might be supposed to be wavering in allegiance to the Crown of England, it might be, by inference, we, the French Acadians of the lower provinces. But such is not the case. As a proof that we stand with the rest of our fellow-citizens, I may simply bring out this fact, and my speech will be ended: Last fall, in New Brunswick, when the municipal councils gathered—they do not meet on the same day—in one or two English-speaking counties, the question was raised as to whether the municipalities would help by money votes our Canadian boys going to South Africa, and nothing more was done. In the county of Kent, the majority of whom are French Canadians, the same question was put. It was deliberately put after consultation with the leading French Acadians of the maritime provinces, and it was carried unanimously. Instead of a vote, all the councillors rose and sang God Save the Queen (cheers), and the councillors who proposed that vote were French Acadians, from the warden down to the mover and seconder. That, hon. gentlemen, in itself, is a proof of the sentiment of the French Acadians in this matter, and shows, and shows conclusively that in this Dominion of ours, there are no sections of the country that are not abreast with the others in loyalty, although, perhaps, their expression of loyalty may not be so boisterous; but that it is all firm and solid, and that we are all in this Dominion of Canada one united, one loyal people, and one people that have faith both in our destiny and in the continual growth and grandeur of the empire. (Cheers.)

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, April 2, 1900.

The Speaker pro tem took the Chair at three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

COMMISSIONS IN MOUNTED POLICE.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a return showing :

1. The number and names of all persons to whom commissions have been granted in the mounted police force of Canada since June, 1896.
2. The length of time each person to whom commissions have been issued served in said force.
3. If no service had been rendered in said force by the person or persons so commissioned, the qualification they possessed for such commission or commissions.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMIRALTY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS introduced Bill (P) 'An Act to amend the Admiralty Act,' and moved that the Bill be read the first time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend might explain the object of the Bill so that hon. gentlemen would be in a position to discuss it on its merits to-morrow. From the short time I have had the Bill in my hands it seems to me rather commendable than otherwise.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Under the Admiralty Act as it now stands, each province constitutes an Admiralty District, and there is a Vice-Admiralty Judge who is judge also of the Exchequer Court, who discharges the duties of an Admiralty Judge. It is found in the province of Ontario, which is very large—and the same thing will be found in some of the other provinces perhaps—that it is sometimes inconvenient to take action against a vessel for any purpose for which such action is within the jurisdiction of the court, and to make the necessary service before the vessel leaves the port. The registrar resides in Toronto, as well as the Admiralty Judge, and complaints have been made by the Bar in various parts of the province of Ontario, and also by the Montreal Bar, that there should be a local or deputy registrar of the court, who could have power to issue the necessary papers and to receive the necessary services, and that they need not be returned until the completion of the proceedings. This is to amend the law in that direction and to provide for dividing the Admiralty District into divisions, in each of which divisions there may be a deputy registrar for issuing the necessary summonses, and also for receiving the papers where the receipt is necessary, and they will thus have, in the locality, the power to discharge the duties of a registrar for the purpose of this Act. These proposed amendments are for the purpose of meeting the convenience of the profession, and of those who have claims against shipping, and who find that, with the very extensive districts which exist at the present time, it is not possible to make service while the vessel is in port. There is no principle involved beyond the principle of convenience, and we propose, for instance, to make a district or division at Sarnia, and another at Windsor, where frequent complaints have been made, and at any other point where it is found necessary by experience that it is necessary to establish a division, to divide the district into divisions.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Is it intended that this Bill shall refer to the maritime provinces ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It may refer to any of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Is it the intention to appoint more judges ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Simply to divide the districts and appoint registrars ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Deputy registrars.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—To appoint deputy registrars in the divisions ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, that is it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I have not had time to look into the Bill to see if there are any objections to it, but on the face of it it seems to me that it is a Bill that will work to the convenience of the public.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is the intention, and beyond the deputy registrar, who is paid by fees, there is no expense incurred on behalf of the public.

The Bill was read the first time.

THE DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the hon. leader of the House what the intentions of the government are with regard to the amendments to the Dominion Franchise Act. In an earlier part of the session, in another place, I think an intimation was made that a measure in amendment to the Dominion Franchise Act was intended to be introduced by the government. We are now entering upon the third month of the session, and if a measure of this sort is to be introduced, we ought to know when it is coming, particularly as an adjournment of this House is in contemplation. I may say I think the Dominion Franchise Act stands badly in need of improvement. Very serious amendments are being called for in that Act, and I say also in the Dominion Elections Act, in order to better fit that into the Dominion Franchise Act. We are approaching an adjournment, and if it is intended that we shall have a Bill on the subject, we should like to know when to expect it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is a measure which affects the other House rather than this. The measure has been prepared and consolidated, amending the law relating to elections, and there are some provisions that were in the Franchise Act that more properly belong to the Elections Act. That Act has been very carefully considered, revised and completely consolidated, and I think that it is in the hands of the Solicitor General to present to the House of Commons. There will be also some slight amendments to the Franchise Act besides.

TRADE WITH CAPE NOME.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State if any communication has been had with the United States government about the Cape Nome matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware that any communication has been received.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Has any communication been sent to the United States government on the subject ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We had not sufficient information.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (66) 'An Act respecting the Cowichan Valley Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Macdonald, B.C.)

Bill (74) 'An Act respecting the Northern Commercial Telegraph Company, Limited.'—(Hon. Mr. Macdonald, B.C.)

CONFIDENTIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to direct the attention of the hon. Secretary of State to the fact that we have not had a copy of that return which was laid before the House of Commons in reference to the correspondence between Col. Hughes and General Hutton. It was called for last month, and it has never been brought here, although the motion was carried some time ago.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I thought when it was brought down to the other House it was not necessary to bring it here.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It would be necessary to have it here.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall have it brought down here to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I quite agree that it is not necessary provided a copy of the same return were presented here. I tried to get it two or three times, but I find they are not printing the return, but have six or seven clerks at work on some ninety-three pages of manuscript, making copies with typewriters. A number of members of the House of Commons have asked for copies. Any one knowing the expense attending the employment of half a dozen typewriters to make these copies over and over again knows that it might have been sent to the printers and not cost one-tenth as much. I see by the newspapers that quite a number of letters which are comprised in the correspondence brought down are marked 'confidential.' If the letters marked 'confidential' in the case of Col. Hughes are brought down, I cannot well see how the government can decline to bring down the letters that the Secretary of State said were confidentially written by the Major General to the Minister of Militia with reference to the removal of Col. White from the list of those who were to undergo the staff course at the Royal Military College, because they were marked confidential. This is my object in calling the hon. gentleman's attention to it now. If it be right to lay before the public, confidential letters in Col. Hughes's case, I cannot understand why it should be objectionable to bring down those that were written in Col. White's case.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In reference to the multiplication of the report, of course, it rests with the Printing Committee to say whether a document shall be printed or not. I am not a member of that committee, and I cannot say what papers shall be printed. There was no desire on the part of a considerable number of gentlemen to have it printed or it would have been printed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—See what it is costing?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it is very unfortunate. I shall have a copy of it brought down to-morrow if I can lay my hands on it.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (K) 'An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.'

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There are no less than four Bills introduced by private members in the other House, dealing with the Criminal Code, and they should be embodied in this Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They may not be accepted.

On clause 179,

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—What is the meaning of the amending clause: 'And without excess in the alleged beyond what the public good requires'?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It would be necessary to go into some discussion to point out the effect of the proposed amendment. If hon. gentlemen will read the clause they will see what is specially pointed at. What is published or what is done, may be very objectionable if done by any one else than a professional man, and for professional or scientific purposes. The parties charged with issuing obscene or improper publications, or committing such acts must show that what they did was for the public good, and that they did not go beyond what is necessary for the public good.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—I think that this clause should be struck out. None of the Acts referred to in subsections a, b, and c, can be said to be for the public good.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Subsection 2 is for the protection of medical men, and is the law at present.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—But they never publish obscene books.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The saving clause would apply to the whole section, as I read it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Most of the acts referred to could not be justified, even if done by medical men.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—A medical man may publish a book which contains illustrations altogether unsuited for general circulation, and while what is done is not in excess of his duties as a professional man, it would be greatly in excess of what any one else could do.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—Why not use the words, medical man ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Because we wish to use words broad enough to reach those intended to be protected by the Act and to reach those who are not protected by the Act.

The clause was adopted

On section 180,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. minister think this clause relating to the posting of scurrilous publications in the mails is necessary ? Does he expect to create a better class of newspapers by this provision ? The word scurrilous, has a very wide meaning. If you call a man a buffoon, according to the dictionary, that would be scurrilous. It seems to me it is carrying the crime of libel a little too far. I do not believe there is a newspaper in Canada which does not come under that designation. The Globe called the member for Nanaimo a liar, and names of that kind. Would that be scurrilous ? And yet the Globe justified the article which it wrote, on the ground that it was true, it certainly was a scurrilous article. There are many political editorials for which the publishers could be prosecuted under this clause.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have no very strong opinion in the matter, and if there is any objection, I will not persist in the section.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not object to it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I thought it would exercise a certain amount of restraint.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think this clause could be construed as far as my hon. friend thinks it could. I do not think it would be open to declare a newspaper article scurrilous, merely because such a remark might be in it. But, I think what is aimed at in subsection (b) would be considered scurrilous. Probably that is the point aimed at, and it would be very proper to have some legislation against putting scurrilous words on a post card, or on the outer wrapper of any parcel which goes through the mails.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. gentleman from Marshfield is correct. It seems by the note, that scurrilous articles were forbidden by the Post Office Act, and when the code was passed in 1892, these words were stricken out, and the provision in the Post Office Act was repealed and the note goes on to say :

> Of these, all but 'scurrilous' are probably thought to be sufficiently covered elsewhere in the code.

It seems simply to bring back the law to where it was before the code was adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is only what is written on the outside of the envelope or on a post card which could be considered scurrilous, because the postal authorities would not know what was inside, the Globe said, the Senate was a lot of 'tottering old idiots.' Would that be scurrilous ?

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—It seems to me that the field which would be covered by such an adjective, is so large that we should drop that clause.

Hon Mr. MILLS—We would have to abandon the whole section.

The clause was adopted.

On section 183,

Hon. Mr. POWER—There was a good deal of discussion in this House on a previous occasion in connection with a proposal similar to the one contained in this clause, and the House decided last session, that these words were to remain in. If they are to remain in I think there should be some protection such as is afforded by several sections of the English Criminal Law Amendment Act, of 1885. I, therefore, move that the following proviso be added to this clause :

> Provided that no person shall be convicted of an offence under this section upon the evidence of one witness only, unless such witness be corroborated in some material particular by evidence implicating the accused.

Take the case of a man who is in his shop, with only one female attendant with him; one can see that there is very great temptation to an unprincipled woman to try to levy blackmail upon the man, and I think we should insert some such provision as this.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not object.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think we should be careful in adopting such an amendment as this. It is not possible to have a witness to crimes of this class, and it would be a very serious matter if we were to call for the presence of a witness in such a case. We would not have convictions at all.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is a great chance for blackmail.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think we cannot go wrong in following the law of the old country. This is a serious offence to charge a man with. It is a charge easily made, and not at all easy to refute; and, it is desirable that here, as in England, there should be not necessarily another witness, but some evidence to corroborate the statement of the woman; otherwise an innocent man may be convicted on the unsupported evidence of a woman who is perhaps not better than she ought to be.

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended, was adopted.

On section 205,

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Up to 1883, the law on this matter contained no such exceptions as the one mentioned under subsection (c). Subsection (c) reads as follows:

(c) Any distribution by lot among the members or ticket-holders of any incorporated society established for the encouragement of art, of any paintings, drawings or other works of art produced by the labour of the members of, or published by or under the direction of such incorported society; (if—

The law did not except the drawing by lot or disposing by lot of paintings or other objects of art. This law stood that way for a great number of years, and in 1883 I see that it was amended by adding this exception to the law. The Bill emanated from this Chamber, and the reason given for amending the law in that direction is very clearly and concisely put by the late Sir John Macdonald. In moving the second reading of the Bill to amend the law respecting lotteries, he said:

It has been recently decided by a magistrate in Ontario—I suppose properly—that our present law on lotteries will prevent the Art Union, an association of artists, from holding its annual distribution of paintings and drawings. By the payment of an annual subscription fee, a person becomes entitled to draw for the right of first choice from among the pictures contributed by the members. This cannot be held to be an evil by the most strained interpretation of the law.

Then followed the amendment which is found under letter (c), and which the hon. Minister of Justice tries now to amend in order to have it better respected in its spirit. This amendment of 1883 only shows the very great danger of legislating for special cases. Since 1885 or 1886, to the knowledge of every citizen of Montreal, we have had lotteries flourishing, and at every street corner, tickets for drawings, or so-called drawings of paintings and other objects of art have been offered for sale. It has become a regular business. We are now in Montreal suffering under a real Italian plague of lotteries. We have tickets offered for sale, not merely on our streets, but at every tobacco shop and newspaper stand; we have people who canvass for the sale of tickets, and the money of the poor and the labouring classes is going into the hands of these lottery sharks. They pretend to be developing a taste for art by instituting classes, and I know that one or two of these lotteries have a whole flat where they have, or pretend to have, teachers to teach drawing and painting to pupils. I will not deny that if those establishments were carried on properly, it would do some good towards encouraging art culture, but I do not think that a single citizen of Montreal will rise to say that the price we are paying for that culture is not far too high. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are being diverted from natural channels simply to enable people to live in luxury out of the earnings of the poor. I do not intend to discuss the evil of lotteries. The law of the country has been well settled on that question. Lotteries have been pronounced immoral, and as they were regarded immoral in years gone by they are immoral to-day. I propose, instead of confining myself to the amendment which the Minister of Justice has suggested, that we should go back to the old law and, even if there is a genuine art union to-day, it will have to change its form of selling its paintings. I think we should do the greatest good for the greatest number. We have in Montreal young men who, on being arrested, have confessed to stealing money from their employers simply to try and enrich themselves easily by buying lottery tickets. I move that subsection (c) be struck out of the Bill. In order to show how they proceed, I shall read from the testimony of a young girl who was examined as a witness when an arrest was made last week of the whole organization of a lottery union. The Royal Art Union, is now before the grand jury, and another lottery called the Canadian Artistic Society was arrested last week. Here is the evidence of a young woman who was not arrested, but was called as a witness. She said :

She had been in the employ of the society for about a year. She was engaged by Mr. Darly to sell tickets. She described the various styles of tickets, 'straight,' flat saddle,' 'gig,' &c., and stated that tickets had been sold as high as $4 each for three numbers, and $10 for single numbers. Such tickets might win as high as a thousand dollars. Laird and Dupont were the paying cashiers. So far as she knew, winning tickets were always paid in money. She had never known any one to obtain a work of art or musical instrument for their ticket. She had played and won small sums occasionally. She never got an object of art for a prize.

Montreal citizens are scandalized at the state of things as it exists to-day. There is not a newspaper in Montreal, French or English, that has not thundered against it, and asked parliament to deal with the matter and try and stem the tide of these immoral operations. It is time we should put an end to them. By whatever means we may try and check the evil even by the amendment which my hon. friend proposes, for instance, by reducing the drawings to two a year, they will simply make it a larger concern, and offer prizes of fifteen thousand dollars, twenty thousand dollars and twenty-five thousand dollars. They would thus recoup themselves for the longer time they had to wait for their profits, and they would work the same injury on a larger scale. They resort to all kinds of artifices. One of them, not many months ago, advertised in the whole of the press of Montreal, and perhaps of Canada, because they have agents everywhere, that Mr. So-and-So had won ten thousand dollars. They published his receipt. I am credibly informed that the man received a few hundred dollars for his receipt and that no such prize had been won at all. They are trying to entrap innocent people, and every one knows there is a tendency in human nature to get rich otherwise than by the sweat of the brow.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Are those prizes which are distributed money prizes, or are they really works of art ? Are these associations which distribute the prizes incorporated societies ? Because this clause limits the exception to incorporated societies ?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—All these societies comply with the letter of the law. They have letters patent to do work which, on the face of the letters patent, comes within the letter of the law. They send an agent to Paris, or Italy, and procure fifty or a hundred paintings. Others exhibit musical instruments. These articles are numbered, and it is those numbers of paintings which decide the prize. They say a painting is worth two thousand dollars, but you can get the value in money if you sell it back. In the Art Union, which is a large concern, it was proved that they delivered the paintings, but it was arranged with a neighbour that he should purchase back the painting. They use the exception in this law to carry on a lottery business simply. Here is an advertisement of one of the companies appearing in the papers. They put it very clear in French and English :

'En Route for Paris.'

Those who have not taken the precaution to save the sum necessary for a voyage to the Paris Exhibition have numerous opportunities to correct their improvidence by purchasing tickets from the National Society of Sculpture, who have a drawing each month. On that subject, we may say that the value of prizes has been increased. The great prize is now $15,000, instead of $10,000, and the total value of 3,500 prizes distributed at each drawing amounts to from $47,742 to $53,627. The prize of the tickets is 25 cents, 50 cents and $1, according to the class. The drawings will take place this year at the following dates : April 18, May 16, June 20, July 18, August 15, September 19, October 17, November 21, December 19. A fortune is offered to all.

Those that sell tickets guard themselves to a certain extent by what is printed on the tickets, but the people who buy them know that they may win prizes from such a sum to such a sum, and that they can get the money at the wicket whenever they present themselves. In fact, there are hundreds of people who congregate at the places where the drawings take place, and afterwards present themselves at the wicket where they get their money without any offer even of the paintings, or musical instruments, which are supposed to represent the value of the tickets. In fact, in Montreal, as is shown by the advertisement that I have just read, there is no pretense at hiding their game. They are simply using the amendment of 1883 to ply their trade on innocent persons.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I heartily concur with the remarks of the hon. gentleman. Lotteries are the curse of the country, more particularly in the province of Quebec. My hon. friend explained the great harm done by those lotteries in the city of Montreal. But the evil goes further. They not only canvass in the cities, but also in the country, and those who purchase those lottery tickets are not wealthy people, but poor servants and labourers. If those organizations are not stopped, before many years elapse I believe it will be impossible to obtain the services of a good servant girl, because they are so tempted to make money by subscribing to those art societies, and as a matter of course, they always lose. I think the suggestion of the hon. gentleman ought to be adopted, and this clause should be completely wiped out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think that I shall vote for the amendment suggested by the hon. gentleman, although I am quite aware of the unfortunate condition of things which exists in Montreal; but I think the proviso at the end of paragraph (c) is just intended to meet the case. The proviso is that the section does not apply to:

(1) Such paintings, drawings or other works of art are themselves actually and bona fide so distributed, and

Well, they are not by these associations in Montreal. Second:

(ii) The member or ticket-holder is not given the option of taking in place of any work allotted to or drawn by him a sum of money or something else of value; and

In Montreal the ticket-holder is allowed the option, and it is understood he takes the option and does not take the picture.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—He can take the picture, as is done by the Royal Art Union, and exchange it for money next door with a neighbour who is there ready with the cash to take back the painting.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is a very important provision:

(iii) No other such distribution has taken place among the members or ticket-holders for a period of six months, less one day next preceding the date of, or the date fixed for, such distribution; or

The drawing of the Art Union pictures takes place, I believe, every six months. I think one can see that if those distributions are not allowed to take place more frequently than once every six months, the temptation to go into that distribution as a business is very much diminished.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In nearly all the lotteries in Louisiana and other parts of the world, it is six months, and sometimes twelve months, before an actual drawing takes place. That is to enable the party interested in these speculations to sell as many tickets and make as much money as possible. My hon. friend from Toronto asked if these lottery associations are incorporated. In my own town an advertisement was sent up from Montreal, because these schemes of swindling are not confined to Montreal; tickets are sold all over the Dominion. My attention was called to this advertisement, and I said: 'You at once subject yourselves to a penalty if you publish this advertisement, unless the association is properly incorporated under letters patent.' On inquiry we found they were incorporated. They came within the exact letter of the law. But they evaded it after selling tickets and the drawing took place. I think the suggestion is a good one, that the clause should be struck out, and that lotteries of all kinds should be prohibited to the fullest possible extent. I go further than that; I would prevent all raffles, and anything of the kind, although the same danger could not arise—at least, not to the same extent. But in this case it is a regular system of swindling, more particularly, as the hon. gentleman has pointed out, of the poorer classes of society, who are captivated by the promise which is made in the advertisements of the possibility of drawing something which, if they do not want it themselves, they can exchange for money, and, as pointed out by the hon. gentleman, this clause as it stands in the Bill, would not be a protection in a case of that kind, because they could always have confederates to whom prize winners could go to exchange or sell the prizes for money, and the paintings could be put in the lottery again the next day. I hope the Minister of Justice, after what has been laid before him, and from what I know he has seen of the effects of this in the past, and the number of petitions that were presented at the last session of parliament, that the amendment will be carried, and that subsection struck out of the Bill.

The amendment was agreed to, and the section, as amended, was adopted.

On clause 332,

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I propose to make some further changes to this section, which provides a punishment for stealing dogs and chickens, in place of section 332 of the code.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If you steal a dog that is running in the street, does it not come within the meaning of the present law ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The words in the section are 'ordinarily kept in a state of confinement.'

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Does that refer to any other animal ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—'Dog, bird, beast or any other animal ordinarily kept in a state of confinement.' This does not apply to animals covered by the common law.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Would it not be well to put in 'Not otherwise provided for'?

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I gather from the wording of the amendment, if a lad steals a chicken he is guilty of an indictable offence. If the value of the article stolen does not exceed ten dollars, it should not be made an indictable offence. Under the wording of that amendment, a lad who stole a chicken, or kitten, or puppy would be liable to be indicted. I think if he is punished at all he should be brought before a magistrate and summarily disposed of, but the indictable offence should be where the article was of considerable value, say forty or fifty dollars.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have left the amount blank.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it should be an indictable offence only where the value exceeds twenty-five dollars. Under section 332 of the Act it is not indictable. The object is to provide that where the value of the article stolen exceeds twenty-five dollars it should be an indictable offence. Would it not be well to add a subsection to the existing section, leaving it as it stands to apply to all amounts under twenty-five dollars ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That would answer the same purpose. We might let that section stand.

The section was allowed to stand.

On section 520.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is a somewhat important section. I have an impression that last year we passed an Act striking out the words 'unduly' and 'unreasonably,' and this section should read as the law is now and not as it was before we passed the Act of last year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, we struck out the word 'unduly.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—My recollection is that we amended section 520 last year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Was that not in a separate Bill ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes. I have the Act of last year before me, chapter 46, and I find the following provision :

> Section 520 of the Criminal Code, 1892, is hereby amended by striking out the word 'unduly' in paragraphs (a), (c) and (d) and by striking out the word 'unreasonably' in paragraph (c).

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Bill of last year never became law, as I understand it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—That is a special Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, but I do not think it is in the most satisfactory form. The word 'unlawfully' is retained and the word 'unduly' is struck out of each of these paragraphs, and in paragraph (c) the word 'unreasonable' is struck out, and it reads:

Unduly prevent, limit or lessen the manufacture or production of any such article or commodity, or to enhance the value thereof.

The difference is that instead of retaining the word 'unlawful,' I have retained the word 'unduly.' The reason is that the word 'unlawful' does not mean anything unless you declare what is unlawful, but the word 'unduly' refers to a question of fact.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How would this conflict with the short Act just read?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The short Act strikes out the word 'unduly' and retains the word 'unlawful,' and in this Bill we strike out the word 'unlawful' and retain the word 'unduly.' This would override the other Act.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 533,

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have received a letter from Chief Justice Meredith with reference to this clause, in which he suggests a provision which is hardly applicable without changing it a good deal. We propose to amend the law in accordance with his suggestion.

On section 540,

Hon. Mr. POWER—No such court as is known in the next preceding section has power to try any offence under the following sections. The court referred to is the Court of Quarter Sessions. It would be highly improper to allow a Court of Quarter Sessions to try an election case. It should be a Superior Court.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do you, in the proposed election law, intend to deal with the question of bribery otherwise than it is dealt with now? If not, you might put a stringent provision here to punish the bribed person as well as the briber, and make it obligatory on the provincial authorities to prosecute, because the way cases of bribery have been dealt with in the past, has been a farce. A number of persons have been reported by judges for giving and taking bribes, and there the matter has dropped. It seems to me the law ought to compel the Attorney General of a province to prosecute the parties thus reported against, if it is desired to put a stop to bribery.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that a trial is a different matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I hope the hon. gentleman will deal with it in the election law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That will be a matter coming within the Corrupt Practices Act, which we have not touched in this Bill at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You could put a clause in the Criminal Code to punish such offences.

The clause was adopted.

On section 520,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Section 520, which reads as follows was not adopted last year:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding four thousand dollars and not less than two hundred dollars, or to two years' imprisonment, or, if a corporation, is liable to a penalty not exceeding ten thousand dollars and not less than one thousand dollars, who conspires, combines, agrees or arranges with any other person, or with any railway, steamship, steamboat or transportation company—

(a) to unduly limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce; or

(b) to restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any such article or commodity; or

(c) to unduly prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any such article or commodity, or to unreasonably enhance the price thereof; or

(d) to unduly prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation or supply of any such article or commodity, or in the price of insurance upon person or property.

2. Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workmen or employees.

That was not adopted last year. Why is it reinserted here? I do not object to any exception which will enable workmen to protect themselves, but does not this clause go to the extent of exempting workmen from the operation of the law by enabling them to enter into any combine of any character, no matter what it may be, to lessen the manufacture or production of any article, while the employer who furnished the capital to carry on the business, is punished if he enters into a combine to unduly prevent or lessen the manufacture or production of goods. The workmen he employs may enter into a combine to stop the factory from doing any work at all. This provision was struck out last year, and I do not see why it should be put in this year.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I do not think it was struck out last year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It says so in the note.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was struck out in 1897. It was carried last year. Let me call my hon. friend's attention to the words; they seem to me to put the two clauses on an equal footing: 'For their own reasonable protection.' That is a question of fact. It exactly corresponds with the word 'unduly' in the other section: 'To unduly prevent or lessen competition.' If men were limiting competition so as not to exceed the demands of the market, it seems to me if they were charged with restricting the production, that would be a complete answer in law, that they were not unduly doing so, because they were not reducing it less than sufficient to supply the market. That would be 'reasonable.' By this clause you put workmen on the same footing when you say that nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combinations of workmen for 'their own reasonable protection.' If it goes beyond what is reasonable it comes within the penalties of the law. I do not see how we could be more definite than we have been with regard to both—using 'unduly' with regard to one and 'unreasonably' with regard to the other.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me this legislation is playing with a very important subject. For my own part, I am opposed to all those laws interfering with the rights of the people otherwise than to protect employer and employed. It is being carried to-day to a very dangerous extent, both for the welfare of the country and the business of the country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Both are.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, I say both. The whole industries of this country to-day are at the will and whim of a Yankee coming from Chicago. He comes in here and disturbs the whole business of the country, and we are legislating to protect him. That is the tendency of our legislation, and every one is afraid to say so, because it may affect a vote. We may as well speak honestly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The difficulty is that capitalists may combine, and labourers claim the same right.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is quite wrong. This prevents the capitalists from combining, but exempts workingmen from the penalties of the law if they combine.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Only to an extent that is unreasonable.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a play on words. Are a man's earnings, that he has been labouring all his life to acquire, to be set at naught by somebody else?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Take the case to which the hon. gentleman has referred—supposing the men who strike in Chicago have in Chicago a reasonable ground for striking, it does not follow that the men who are acting in concert with them in Toronto and Montreal have a reasonable ground for striking. I do not feel clear that a jury would not be disposed to hold that because the original strike was reasonable, the other was equally so. I have always opposed this sort of legislation, and if the hon. gentleman opposite moves to strike out this clause, I shall vote with him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Don't you think the decision of the jury would depend very greatly on the class from whom the jury was drawn? I move that the second subsection of clause 520 be struck out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That would leave every combination of workingmen at the mercy of any one who chose to prosecute them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the Minister of Justice thinks it will have that effect, I shall not touch it, but I think by striking out that subsection the clause will then apply to all persons—capitalists or workingmen—if they combine at all. You make a general law for a general purpose, and then you make an exception. Now, strike out the exception and that will place every one on the same footing. If it does have that effect I shall not press it, but that is my impression.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If my hon. friend were right in his view, and I think he is not, the clause as it stands goes no further than what he suggests. We say as to any person engaged in trade that if he arranges with any person, or any railway, &c., to unduly limit the facilities for transporting, producing, &c., any article or commodity, or restrains or injures trade or commerce, or unduly prevents or lessens the production of such commodity, or unreasonably enhances the price, &c., he is liable to a penalty. All these are punishable if it goes beyond what is reasonable. Now, the clause goes further and says that nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to combines of workingmen or employees for their own reasonable protection as such workingmen and employees.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If it does not apply to them, why is it necessary to have it there ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In order to make it perfectly clear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We passed an Act some years ago providing reasonable protection for combinations of workingmen.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no objection to letting this section stand for further consideration. My own impression is that it makes an exception of one class of people. If so, it should not be in the Act. All should be treated alike.

The subsection was allowed to stand.

On section 785,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that in Nova Scotia the recorders do not discharge any judicial function, and for that reason there might be some modification made in the wording of this subsection. Subsection 2 says :

This section shall apply also to police and stipendiary magistrates and recorders of cities and incorporated towns in every other part of Canada.

Recorders in Nova Scotia are not judicial officers. Prisoners are never brought before them at all. The minister might consider that. We could amend it to apply to recorders where recorders exercise judicial functions, that would remove the objections.

The subsection was amended by adding : 'Where they exercise judicial functions, and the section, as amended, was adopted.

On clause 838,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me this clause is going a long way. Subsection (a) of this clause reads :

3. If it appears before any award or order is made, that any valuable security has been bonâ fide paid or discharged by any person liable to the payment thereof, or being a negotiable instrument, has been bonâ fide taken or received by transfer or delivery, by any person, for a just and valuable consideration, without any notice, or without any reasonable cause to suspect that the same had, by any indictable offence been stolen, (or received, or obtained by false pretenses,) or if it appears that the property stolen, (or received, or obtained) has been transferred to an innocent purchaser for value, who has acquired a lawful title thereto, the court or tribunal shall not award or order the restitution of such security or property.

A bond or note held by a person might be stolen from his safe without the knowledge of the legal owner, and sold to an innocent party. The owner would not be likely to look at his notes or bonds every day. He generally looks at them when they become due, and then he finds they have been stolen and transferred to an innocent party. The man who stole them may be out of the way, and it may be impossible to punish him. I do not know how far that is the law, but it seems to me to go a long way towards depriving an innocent holder of property of his rights. If one gives a note, for instance, and it was stolen, a party knowing the maker might go to another party and say, 'I have a note against a certain person,' and he sells it to the party, cannot the owner claim it ?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I have always understood that it is a well settled principle of law that a man can always claim his own property wherever he finds it. Supposing a horse is stolen, can it not be recovered at any time upon proving property ? I think this is a most extraordinary provision.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a new doctrine in this country though, it has prevailed to some extent in England, but the principle always prevailed in Canada caveat emptor—let the purchaser beware. He must be careful. That is the only safe principle.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Take the two subsections with which this clause proposes to deal. The first subsection of section 838 of the Criminal Code reads:

If any person guilty of any indictable offence in stealing, or knowingly received any property, is indicted for such offence by or on behalf of the owner of the property or his executor or administrator, and convicted thereof, or is tried before a judge or justice for such offence under any of the foregoing provisions and convicted thereof, the property shall be restored to the owner or his representative.

That is the law as it stands to-day. What are the changes proposed to be made? The clause in this Bill reads:

If any person who is (charged with) an indictable offence in stealing, or knowingly receiving, (or obtaining by false pretenses), any property, is indicted for such offence, by or on behalf of the owner of the property, or his executor or administrator, and convicted thereof, or is tried before a judge or justice for such offence under any of the foregoing provisions and convicted thereof, the property shall be restored to the owner or his representative.

There is really no substantial change in the first subsection. Take the third subsection. Subsection 3 in the Criminal Code reads as follows:

If it appears before any award or order is made that any valuable security has been bonâ fide paid or discharged by any person liable to the payment thereof, or being a negotiable instrument has been bonâ fide taken or received by transfer or delivery by any person for a just and valuable consideration, without notice or without any reasonable cause to suspect that the same had, by any indictable offence, been stolen, or if it appears that the property stolen has been transferred to an innocent purchaser for value who has acquired a lawful title thereto, the court or tribunal shall not award or order the restitution of such security or property.

So that the law which we have been told is in force, caveat emptor, has not been in force since the Criminal Code was adopted. What change has been made? I think the world moves, and we are not where we were 50 years ago. It simply adds 'Or received or obtained by false pretenses.' Then it is dealt with in the same way as if it had been stolen. The principle is the same.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am sure my hon. friend is mistaken. They are transferred on delivery, and I have not to inquire how a man came by the possession of a note he offers for sale, unless it can be shown I ought to have suspected it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—The first part of subsection 3 is according to the law of the country, but the latter part of it seems strange.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think if public attention is called to it, it will not remain on the statute-book.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is simply putting articles obtained by false pretenses in the same category as stolen property.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But this speaks of negotiable instruments.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—And it is but just that the party should not pay it the second time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is quite evident that those hon. gentlemen who are learned in the law do not know the full meaning of the amendment, that being the case, it is not surprising that a lay mind should be muddled. It seems to me this goes a long way towards depriving a man of his property.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see there is really no extension of the law.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Then why change the law?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Here are two parties, and one or the other must suffer; and the law says that the party out of whose possession the article was taken is the party who shall suffer the loss; that is if there is carelessness to be attributed to either of the parties on whom the loss must fall. In what way does the section propose to alter the law? The clause says:

Or without any reasonable cause to suspect that the same had without any indictable offence been stolen, or received or obtained by false pretenses.

Supposing a man goes to the holder of property and by false pretenses obtains possession of it. He received it from him. He gives his consent, but he does so in consequence of a misstatement that was made to him, and he goes with that property to another innocent party and parts with it for valuable consideration. Which of the two ought to suffer—the man who parted with the property on a misrepresentation, or the man who in good faith paid value for it? In this respect it is simply bringing the Act with regard to that offence into harmony with what the law at present is with regard to other cases of a like kind.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would that apply to stolen property ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If a man steals your horse and sells it to me, I understand that the owner can claim it ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not under this section. If there is a strong feeling against this clause I would allow it to be stricken out. But all the objections which have been urged to it apply to the present law. Some one must suffer and the question is who is to suffer.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If property is stolen from me, can I not claim it wherever I find it ?

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Supposing a thief steals a valuable picture from my house and afterwards sells it to the Minister of Justice. I know the picture quite well, and will I not be able to claim it ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Under this a thief could give good title to property he had stolen.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think we had better strike it out.

The clause was struck out.

On section 801.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I wish to add clause 2 :

This clause shall not apply to police magistrates, stipendiary magistrates or recorders.

There has been a controversy between the clerks of the peace and stipendiary magistrates as to who should make returns, and Col. Denison has called my attention to it. He has to try several thousands of cases every year, and it would be an enormous undertaking to make a return of proceedings and convictions in his court to the clerk of the peace. I thought on the whole that the information with regard to the record of convictions could be had from the police magistrate the same as from the clerk of the peace.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does this affect the returns made by all magistrates during the year or every quarter ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It excepts them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They now make these returns and they are published or should be published every year.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

On section 332,

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In some places there are great complaints of stealing domestic fowls. Persons raising them for the market find them frequently stolen. The question is whether twenty-five dollars is not too high a figure. It is found that the present law is not a deterrent.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—What is the object of sending such cases to a jury ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Because under the present law the chances of conviction are not very great, and the chances of profit are ; so, persons go into the business of stealing chickens over a whole neighbourhood and carrying them away to market. A mere summary conviction and one month's imprisonment is not a sufficient deterrent. I propose to substitute for clause 332 a clause which will cover such cases.

The substituted clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I had an amendment put in my hands by the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. Allan) yesterday to provide that instead of sending boys to penitentiary they should be whipped. The suggestion is simply this : we have not a perfect classification of criminals. Boys are sometimes—except boys under sixteen years of age—sent for heinous offences to penitentiary, where they intermingle with the old offenders, which is a sort of training institution in crime, and it is a question whether the best thing to do with many a boy is not to give him a sound whipping and send him back to his parents. Perhaps the suggested amendment is too comprehensive, but I would ask the committee to rise and report progress, and we can consider the amendment when we go into committee to-morrow on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again to-morrow.

SUPPLY OF OILS FOR THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate copies of all notices issued by the Intercolonial Railway since May, 1896, calling for tenders for the supply of oil for the said railway, and also copies of all tenders received in reply to said advertisement and contracts entered into as a result of such call for tenders.

2. A return showing the car mileage on the Intercolonial Railway for the year ended the 31st day of October, 1899.

3. Also, a return showing the total amount paid for oils for the Intercolonial Railway for the year ended the 31st day of October, 1899, giving the names of the parties to whom such payments were made.

He said: This is a subject upon which I have, by means of inquiries and a previous motion, elicited a considerable amount of information, and the subject of the present motion is to supplement the information already obtained and bring it to the end of last year. I may state that in May, 1896, previous to the change of administration, tenders were invited for the supply of lubricating and signal oils for the Intercolonial Railway, and eight or nine tenders were received altogether, and in due course, after analysis, certificates were received upon the sample supplied, and after the tenders were duly considered, notices were issued to those that were considered the lowest and most advantageous offers, and four parties that had tendered were awarded contracts under the various tenders that were called for. After the change of administration, all this was stopped. Further notices were issued to the parties who had received the notices in the first place, and they were told that contracts would not be proceeded with. In answer to some of my questions last year, the Minister of Justice read to the House a carefully prepared statement, which he obtained, I have no doubt, from the Railway Department, and which is duly embalmed on page 690 of the Debates of this House for 1899. In that statement I find that the Minister of Railways stated, for the Department of Railways, that two things had happened—that a more favourable offer had been received from the Galena Oil Company, and that an order in council had been passed instructing the Minister of Railways to notify the parties to whom contracts had been awarded, or to whom notice had already been given, that contracts with them would not be proceeded with. When I made my motion last year, I called for a copy of this order in council, and I called also for a copy of this more favourable offer, or any other offer, from the Galena Oil Company, and the answer which is contained in these returns gives a flat contradiction to the statement which my hon. friend submitted to the House on the 12th of July last, that an order in council had been passed authorizing the Minister of Railways to re-open the question, and that a more favourable offer had been received.

It is stated in this return that no order in council to that effect had ever been passed. I also moved for this more favourable offer that was spoken of as having been received from the Galena Oil Company, and on which this alleged order in council was passed, and the subsequent action of the government taken—I asked that this more favourable offer might also be brought down, and the papers submitted to the House say that there was no other offer received, so that the statement that was submitted to this House, that a more favourable offer had been received from the Galena Oil Company, subsequent to the tenders in May, is not correct; and, further, that the action that was then taken was taken without the authority of any order in council whatever, notwithstanding it was stated to this House that an order in council had been passed authorizing the Minister of Railways to reopen this matter in the way it was done. This transaction is one that will bear a good deal of investigation. Tenders were called for and notices were given to the general public to come in and offer for the supply of those oils in May, 1896. Subsequent to the general election, and about the time that the Minister of Railways contested the counties of Queen's and Sunbury, in August, 1896, a Mr. Lichtewein, representing what was said to be the Galena Oil Company, of Toronto, and which turned out subsequently to be of New York or Pennsylvania, U.S., appeared on the scene and implemented with the government an offer which he had made in May previous, when tenders were called, an offer which complied with the specifications in no respect whatever. It was entirely on a different basis. He created a specification for himself. That specification was that a guarantee should be placed in the contract that the Intercolonial Railway should be lubricated, during the next coming year for which he was asking to get a contract, at a cost of ten per cent less than the lubrication of the Intercolonial Railway had cost under the old method of contracting for oil. That was the basis of his proposition, and, without calling for offers from any other person on a similar basis,—without giving others engaged in the oil business an opportunity of making propositions, by a private contract, without any further proposals even from this Galena Oil Company itself, as appears by the papers, and without an order in council, the Minister of Railways proceeded to award a contract to the Galena Oil Company to supply oil on this basis, guaranteeing to effect a saving of 10 per cent on the cost of lubricating the Intercolonial Railway in the past. This contract was made notwithstanding the samples of oil that had been sent in accompanying the proposals in May had been submitted to Professor Ruttan, of McGill University, a practical chemist, who was called upon to report upon the oils that it was proposed to furnish by the different contractors, and reported against. This is what Prof. Ruttan said upon the character of the lubricating oils offered by the Galena Oil Company:

> I find among the oils this year some submitted by the Galena Oil Company of a very unusual composition. Lubrication made up of a mixture of lead soap (the material out of which sticking plaster is made), fish oil and a light crude petroleum. Apart from the value of these oils as lubricators, I find a great disadvantage in their use, arising from the fact that the heavier lead soap tends to settle out and collect in the bottom of the containing vessel, forming a heavy sediment; hence, unless the oil is used by a person accustomed to handling it, it would be unlikely to give constant results.
>
> H. F. RUTTAN,
> Professor of Practical Chemistry,
> McGill University.

Notwithstanding this adverse report from the chemist, to whom all these oils had been submitted, with regard to this particular oil offered by the Galena Oil Company—notwithstanding the offer itself did not comply with the specification calling for tenders, but proposed to enter into the contract on another basis altogether—notwithstanding that the then management of the Intercolonial Railway proceeded to award contracts for lubricating and signalling oils on the basis of the specification they had themselves issued—notwithstanding notices had gone forth in conformity with all this, we find, after the change of government took place, and about the time the Minister of Railways was contesting the election in the counties of Sunbury and Queen's for the House of Commons, this man Lichtewein appeared again on the scene and, in the face of all that had happened, the notices were called in—in the face of this chemist's report on the quality of the oils proposed to be offered, the notices were called in and new contracts were let without any fresh offers—absolutely a private contract was made with this Galena Oil Company for a special oil for the Intercolonial Railway, and I find, from the information submitted in answer to my motion of last year, that up to the date of that motion and the return which was submitted to this House a few days ago, that no further solicitation of tenders has taken place, and that this contract has gone on from year to year, and that it is now well advancing to the third year of this contract, and no new tenders have been called for, and the general public have not been allowed to come in and compete for the supply of oil. Though started on the basis of a private contract it has been continued year after year up to the present time to this favoured Galena Oil Company of Pennsylvania, U.S. The motion that I made called for some information as to how this contract had been worked out, and amongst a number of other things the report of this analyst was called for. I have read that part of it which relates to the sample of oil offered by this company. It calls also, as I have already said, for these orders in council on which the Minister of Railways claimed to be acting when he called in the other notices and proceeded to award this private contract, and as I have already told you, the return says that there was no truth in the statement that an order in council had been made at all, and that the Minister of Railways appeared to have acted entirely on his own authority. My motion also called for a return showing the amount paid to the Galena Oil Company for lubricating the Intercolonial Railway for the last two years, and also a statement showing the cost of lubricating the road under the previous contract. For a part of the answer I have to refer to the Senate Debates of 1899, page 690, when my hon. friend, the leader of this House, gave this information in reply to a question of mine:

The total cost of lubricating oil used for locomotives and cars from November 1, 1895, to October 31, 1896, was $33,377.75. This amount was for the twelve months preceding the commencement of the contract with the Galena Oil Company.

Then the minister proceeds to answer my question No. 10 and says:

From November 1, 1896, to October 31, 1897, the oil furnished by the Galena Oil Company for locomotives and cars cost $43,174.09.

Here was an increase of about thirty-three per cent in the cost of lubricating the Intercolonial Railway, assuming these figures as they appear to be straight answers to my question. There is an additional cost of 33 per cent in the cost of lubricating the Intercolonial Railway in the first complete year after this private contract with the Galena Oil Company went into effect, compared with the previous 12 months when the old contract calling for oil by the gallon was made and entered into. The figures are given for another year, the year ending November 31, 1898, and here again the cost was $40,266, which is nearly 20 per cent in excess of what it had cost to lubricate the Intercolonial Railway under the old contract. This is for two complete years. I also called for a statement at that time showing what amount was deducted in order to comply with the 10 per cent guarantee. Now, what amount was deducted under this 10 per cent part of the contract? It does not show by the statement my hon. friend made to me that this was a gross amount and that it was subject to a deduction of 10 per cent. The inference to be drawn was that this was the amount paid after some deduction had been made, but from the return which has been laid on the Table of this House, it appears that after this question had been agitated in April, after some discussion at all events had taken place in the press upon it, or about two years and a half after the entering into the contract with the Galena Oil Company, the first and only deduction that had been made from the gross amount paid to them was made, although the contract calls for a monthly statement, and for a complete deduction on the 10 per cent basis at the end of the year for which the contract was entered into. Notwithstanding that, it appears by the return that was brought down, that this business went on with the Galena Oil Company from the 31st day of October, 1896, to the 8th day of May, 1899, and that the first deduction was then made, an amount of $23,067.14. Question No. 9 of my motion called for a statement of amounts deducted, with dates of such deductions from the accounts of the Galena Oil Company to cover the guarantee. In the face of this, we find that from the 31st day of October, 1896, when this contract was entered upon, for two years and a half that elapsed from that time, no deduction was made, and the first deduction made according to this return was on the 8th day of May, 1899, of $23,000. The answer that was given to my question last year showed that up to some date which was not given, but which would be some time before the answer was given in this House, the total amount paid to the Galena Oil Company for lubricating the Intercolonial Railway covering the years 1896-7, 1897-8, 1898-9, or the parts of these years that had then transpired, was $99,429.41. I presume that this statement, at any rate, of this amount in the round sum of $100,000, was paid for about two years and a half, perhaps it may have been a little less, more likely to be a little less than any more, because the only contract entered into was entered into on the 31st of October, 1896, and this return was brought down to the House in July, 1899, a round sum of about $100,000, was paid to the Galena Oil Company, and that was a net sum, after this deduction, of $23,000 was made. If this be the case—and that is the only inference that can be fairly and legitimately drawn from the return which I hold in my hand and which I examined with a good deal of carefulness—it certainly shows that the lubrication of the Intercolonial Railway, instead of costing 10 per cent less than it did under the old system of awarding the contract by tender, has cost a good deal more. My motion of last year, to which this return is an answer, called for a statement showing the car mileage of the Intercolonial Railway, for these different years, and here is the return. For the year ending 31st October, 1896,—this covers the complete year immediately before the commencement of this contract with the Galena Oil Company—the car mileage of the Intercolonial Railway was 43,120,237 miles; for the complete year after this private contract with the Galena Oil Company the car mileage is shown to have been 40,365,186 miles. It is due, however, to this honourable House to state that this return only purports to deal with car mileage, while the contract with the Galena Oil Company deals with the locomotive, passenger and feight car mileage. It is possible, although not very likely, that the locomotive mileage might have been increased in the year following the entering into this contract with the Galena Oil Company, that putting the locomotive and car mileage together, a somewhat different result might occur. It is not possible that it could be much. I do not think it is possible that it could disturb the figures essentially. As it stands now, these figures show that the cost of lubrication, taking the first set of figures given by the Minister of Railways, had increased about 34 per cent, and that there was a decrease of car mileage of 8 per cent. Then, again, for the next year there was an increased cost of about 20 per cent, and an increased car mileage of about 8 per cent. However, as far as this goes, until we have a little further information, there may be some evasion, as I am sorry to say there often is in the returns which this government bring down. There may be some point that is not as fully and clearly answered as it is necessary to have it before coming to absolute and final conclusions upon the subject. I desire to make a slight amendment in my motion. In the third paragraph I wish to add the words 'net after total' so that it will be understood that this will be the amount after the deduction of that 10 per cent under contract. I also propose to amend my notice so that the return will include locomotive as well as car mileage. These papers are only supplementary to what we have already had. The intention is simply to bring this information down so as to complete the last year with which this House can deal—that is the year ending October 31 last. The papers, as I have said, will not involve very much trouble. All we want to get is the locomotive and car mileage for that year, and also the total net amount paid for oils and that will be after any deduction has been made on account of this 10 per cent part of the contract.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to the hon. gentleman who has made this motion that I do not object to its adoption by this House. I think it is to be regretted, however, that no one who agrees with him politically in the House of Commons has been found to make the motion there, where the Minister of Railways is, and where a full opportunity would be given to him to explain or to defend any act which may be called in question. The hon. gentleman, however, has, it seems, not communicated with anybody in the House of Commons, or sought to have the matter brought forward where the minister may have an opportunity of entering into a full explanation. In the remarks which the hon. gentleman has addressed to this House, all of which relate to the expenditure of public money, of which the House of Commons is the special guardian, the hon. gentleman says that the information brought down to the House by me from the Department of Railways and Canals was inaccurate, that it did not state correctly the fact, that it was misleading in its character, that it professed to have been a contract that would involve a less expenditure of money, and that it would involve a larger expenditure of money, that it professed to be a contract for a better quality of oil for the purpose for which it is used, and that it is worse oil, and while it was represented as being a public contract, it was not a public contract, but a private contract without any oportunity of tender by other parties. The hon. gentleman stated what the annual cost was before this arrangement was made, and what the annual cost has been since. It is also stated that the car mileage is less now than it was formerly and that the cost is proportionately greater. First, because there is a larger expenditure of money, and, second, because here is a smaller occasion for that expenditure. I am not going into a discussion of this question. I do not know what the facts are. The hon. gentleman has moved for certain papers and these papers, I have no doubt, will be brought down, and when they are before hon. gentlemen there will be a better opportunity of entering into an intelligent discussion of the subject than there is without any other information than that which the hon. gentleman has himself afforded to the House. I do not object to the adoption of the motion which the hon. gentleman has made.

The motion was agreed to.

PREVENTIVE OFFICER AT MONTMAGNY.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day being called.

By the Hon. Mr. LANDRY:

He will draw the attention of the House to the following facts:

1. That on March 12 inst., notice of an inquiry from the government was regularly given by the Senator from Stadacona and handed to the Clerk of this House, the said notice reading as follows: 'What is the name of the present preventive officer for the district of Montmagny? What is his salary? How many seizures has he effected, since he has been doing duty, for infractions of the customs and excise laws? How much has the government realized from these seizures, either by the sale of the articles confiscated or by fines imposed?

2. That on March 13 this notice regularly appeared in the minutes of Proceedings of the Senate, and was thus brought to the knowledge of the members of this House and of the present administration.

3. That on March 15 the Senator from Stadacona put this question to the representatives in this Chamber of the present administration, but could not obtain from them the answer asked.

4. That on March 16 the hon. Minister of Justice asked for delay for the answer to be given.

5. That on March 19 the hon. Minister of Justice asked for a new delay.

6. That on March 20 the hon. Minister of Justice gave a partial answer to the question as put, promising to complete immediately the information desired.

7. That on March 21 the promised answer was not yet given.

8. That on March 22 the hon. the Minister of Justice, instead of giving the promised answer, announced to the House that he had just received the information that the answer was to be sent to him that day at the House, and that he was waiting for it from one moment to another.

9. That on March 23 the hon. Minister of Justice gave anew to the House the partial answer already given on March 20, and promised to inquire from the Minister of Customs as to the balance already promised, and which the day before the minister was still expecting from one instant to another.

10. That on March 26 the Minister of Justice was still incapable of giving the promised answer.

11. That on March 27 the Minister of Justice declared that he could not yet answer.

12. That on March 28 the Minister of Justice had not yet been able to obtain the information asked for by the Senator from Stadacona.

13. That on March 29, the seventeenth day after the publication of the notice given by the Senator from Stadacona, the present administration had not yet been able to find either the time or the courtesy to answer a question regularly put by a member of this House.

And that he will move:

That the inexplicable and unexplained delays in giving the answer daily asked for, for seven days, by a member of this House, constitute, in the present case, either an unpardonable forgetfulness or an unjustifiable negligence, and in any case a want of courtesy towards this House which it cannot but condemn.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to know if the hon. minister has any objection to the adoption of this motion, because if he has, we might let it stand.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If hon. gentlemen think a motion of this sort standing on the Order paper is befitting the dignity of the House I do not object.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think that the hon. Minister of Justice is taking the proper course. My hon. friend's question was, is there a preventive officer of any kind or character at the place indicated in his motion. That is, as I understand, his position. No full answer has been given to the question which has been put. My hon. friend asks a very plain question—was there a preventive officer at a certain place in the province of Quebec, and if so what was his name and how much did he collect in dues or fines? My hon. friend the Minister of Justice answered him three times, but premised every answer with the statement. 'The Minister of Inland Revenue gives me such and such information.' I asked, 'What about the customs?' Because the Customs Department have preventive officers as well as the Department of Inland Revenue, and I think all the difficulty might have been overcome if my hon. friend had said, 'I have no return from the Customs, but will ask for it and give you the information,' or stated that there is no such officer there. I make this statement simply because of the remarks made by my hon. friend in reference to the motion which he has put upon the paper. The hon. gentleman will excuse me if I say that a straight forward answer, yes or no, to all these questions would avoid a deal of trouble. I do not desire to dictate to him, but it seems to me we would get rid of a great deal of difficulty if he adopted that course.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not call for the hon. gentleman's advice, and I claim that I have adopted a straightforward course. The censure implied in his observation is a censure that nothing I have done renders proper on this occasion. Now, what are the facts in this matter? The hon. member for Stadacona had put a question on the paper. I answered that question as far as the answer was put in my hands. I did not look through the whole question when it came before me here, nor did I notice the first time I gave an answer to it, that there was an allusion to the Customs Department at all. The fact is, the question is not in proper form.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think it is.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—A question relating to two distinct departments ought to have been put in at least two propositions, not all mixed up in one question. What are the facts? I said, looking at the beginning of the question which the hon. gentleman put, what is the name of the present preventive officer for the district of Montmagny, &c. The inquiries of the hon. gentleman at the beginning, at all events, related to a matter of the Department of Inland Revenue. I obtained that answer for the hon. gentleman. Now, he did not drop from his question what was answered. I answered him so far as the Department of Inland Revenue was concerned, yet the hon. gentleman put the question, not retaining merely the inquiry relating to the Customs Department and putting it in as a distinct question, but repeated the question which was already answered, and not having a very great deal of time at my disposal beyond what is actually required for the discharge of public business, I sent the question again to the proper department—as I took it, the proper department, and the department which the hon. gentleman mentioned in his question and I got back the second time precisely the same answer from the Inland Revenue Department that I had got before. Then the hon. gentleman put his question again, and when my attention was specially called to the fact that information was required from the Department of Customs, I sent to that department and obtained the answer, and I have had the answer in my desk for some days, but the hon. gentleman has not been here. There is no question put on the paper to-day, but a long statement of facts pointing out that he had put a question and that this question had been put several times already. If the hon. gentleman had dropped that portion of this inquiry which was wholly distinct from his question, the other would have stood, and there would have been no difficulty in obtaining the answer because, on glancing at the question, I would have seen precisely what the hon. gentleman desired. But that was not what my hon. friend did. Now, I may say this is the answer which I received from the Department of Customs: Mr. Louis Dion is the active preventive officer of Customs at Montmagny. His salary is at the rate of $50 per annum. According to the records of the Customs Department, no Customs seizures have been made by Mr. Dion. I may say that immediately before this came up, the hon. gentleman told me he possessed this information—he said he knew who the officer was, and therefore he was asking me for information of which he was already in possession.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The explanations given by the Minister of Justice would lead one to believe that there was a kind of misunderstanding between us.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No misunderstanding at all.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And that all the fault must rest on my shoulders. If the hon. Minister of Justice instead of, as he said, only glancing at the question, had read it, I do not see how he could have made the replies he has made. What was the inquiry ? The name of the present preventive officer for the district of Montmagny. It does not say the present preventive officer is one employed by the Inland Revenue or the Customs Department. So far, the hon. gentleman could not make a distinction. The inquiry goes further. What is his salary ? There is nothing in that to show that it is more connected with the Inland Revenue than with the Customs. 'How many seizures has he effected, since he has been doing duty, for infractions of the Customs and Excise laws ? The hon. gentleman was faced with these two laws, Customs and Excise laws. With a genial inspiration he left the Customs aside and stuck to the Excise laws. Why ? Because the Excise came in second ? I do not see what justified the hon. minister to take the last in preference to the first one. After all, when he gave me that answer—when he knew that the information I asked for came from the Customs Department, he promised me he would give it and that promise he has not kept. He was waiting for it every moment. He had a letter from the department telling him they were sending him the answer, but I never got it. He now says 'the hon. gentleman gave me the name of the party, and why does he ask for it ? I wanted official information, and I also wanted the salary, and the work this official did during the year. That was the information I required, so the hon. gentleman will see that I am not so culpable as he supposes I am. If anything wrong has been done, it is on his side and not on mine. That is the only explanation I have to give the hon. gentleman in answer to the few remarks he has made. As the hon. minister has given the information I asked for, I may be allowed, with the permission of this House, to have this notice also dropped. At all events, it has given me the result I wanted to arrive at.

The motion was dropped.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to take exception to the remark of the Minister of Justice, that because a man had information in his possession he ought not to ask the question in the House. A man may do so because it is the only opportunity he has to bring the facts before the public. I do not hesitate to say that I know most of the facts in connection with a motion in my name on the paper. I intend to speak to the motion and afterwards withdraw it, because the information is already before the country. It has never been recognized as a principle that because a member knows a fact he should not ask a question about it. If the answer the minister has given to-day had been given on the two or three occasions when the question was asked, the matter would have been dropped. The opposition have good cause to complain of the answers given to their questions, and also of the incomplete returns which have been brought down to the House. We have a just right to complain of the action of the government in these two particulars. As I said before, and I say it with all humility, I desire to help the hon. gentleman rather than find fault, but every time a suggestion is made he takes it as a reflection on his knowledge and ability to conduct the affairs of the House. I shall take precious good care to make none in future, because the hon. gentleman knows it all, and can get on very well without help.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (67) 'An Act respecting the Banque Jacques-Cartier, and to change its name to La Banque Provinciale du Canada.'—(Hon. Mr. McMillan.)

Bill (72) 'An Act respecting the Merchant's Bank of Halifax, and to change its name to the Royal Bank of Canada.'—(Hon. Mr. Power.)

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole, consideration of Bill (K) 'An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.'

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I propose asking the committee to reconsider section 838. The committee will see, on examination, that present time, except as to 'received or objections are based on a misapprehension. Hon. gentlemen will see it is the law at the present time, except as to 'received or obtained by false pretenses.' It is a well settled rule that the property in negotiable securities passes by actual delivery, and if the security is presented to the man, liable for the amount, and he pays it in good faith, he is discharged, although the party from whom the property was received may have come improperly in possession of it. You could not deal in securities if the party had in every case to institute inquiry and ascertain whether the man who proposes to transfer a negotiable security had come legally in possession of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Does it apply only to securities ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. The property may have gone into the possession of the holder with the consent of the party who properly held it, and if it is good against him in case it were stolen, it ought to be still better if he has given his consent to it, even if that consent has been obtained in an improper way, or by fraudulent means. I think hon. gentlemen will see that the proposed amendments are simply supplementary to and embracing a class of cases with which the law already deals. This being so, I ask that this clause stand part of the Bill. We are only dealing with the criminal side, leaving the civil remedies untouched. I move that section 838 be restored to the Bill. This does not apply to goods, but only to securities and negotiable instruments.

The motion was agreed to.

On section 520.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It may be remembered that when we were in committee yesterday on this section 520, I said I thought there was some provision in the Act respecting Trade Unions which protected sufficiently the persons who are supposed to be protected by the second subclause of this clause. I shall read to the House the two sections of the Trades Union Act which I think do protect those associations. The second clause of the Act says :

> In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the expression 'trade union,' means such combination, whether temporary or permanent, for regulating the relations between workmen and masters, or for imposing restrictive conditions on the conduct of any trade or business, as would, but for this Act, have been deemed to be an unlawful combination by reason of some one or more of its purposes being in restraint of trade.

That is a sort of introductory section. Section 22 of the Act reads as follows :

> 22. The purposes of any trade union shall not, by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, be deemed to be unlawful, so as to render any member of such trade union liable to criminal prosecution for conspiracy or otherwise, or so as to render void or voidable any agreement or trust.

It seems to me that section amply protects the trades unions—in fact, does it just as fully as the second subclause in this clause, and this subclause is therefore unnecessary ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This does nothing more than protect the rights of trades unions as in the statute which my hon. friend has read, so that it may be regarded merely as a matter of abundant caution that it should be included. I move that this subsection 2, of section 520, be adopted. This enactment is subsequent in point of time to the measure, and might be held to be a repeal of the provisions of the other.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Take the sense of the committee on it.

The committee divided on the motion which was rejected. Contents, 9 ; noncontents, 11.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Has the minister taken any notice of parties purchasing stock that has been stolen ? I knew a case last year in which large quantities of articles of silver and gold were sold at a small price to certain parties, so much so that it was a subject of remonstrance by the judge. I want to know if it is not possible to provide against such practices so that the public may be protected. I have no doubt that these people are induced to commit these acts knowing that they can sell the property at a reduced price. There is also the same trouble with the second hand stores. I consider they are a nuisance in the community, and I believe that their system is worse than petty larceny. The Minister of Justice might embody in this Bill something to prevent this work which has been going on for years. Parties steal goods and take them to a second hand dealer, and a buffalo robe worth $25, is sold for $2. It is a great evil in this city. People are induced to purloin these things, and take them to these stores and sell them for a mere trifle. If it were not for these stores, I do not believe there would be one half of this petty larceny that prevails.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think the law adequately provides for that, because the receivers of stolen goods are responsible.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The judge at the court here last year said that there was no provision. It was a case where a man bought jewellery at a low price, and the judge commented on the fact that he could not be punished.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I observe that the hon. gentleman from Toronto has placed the following notice on the Order paper :

That when the House is again in Committee of the Whole on (Bill K) 'An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892,' he will move the following amendment:

'Where a child or young person, being a male, is convicted either on indictment or summarily, of any offence other than homicide, the court may, in lieu of sentencing him to penal servitude or imprisonment, or instead of committing him to prison for non-payment of any fine, costs or damages, adjudge that he be privately whipped with a birch rod, and thereupon he shall be whipped accordingly by a constable in the presence of an inspector or other officer of police of higher rank than a constable, and also, if the parent or guardian desires to be present, of that parent or guardian.

'The number of strokes shall not exceed (a) in the case of a child, six; (b) in the case of a boy who appears to the court the age of fourteen, twelve; and (c) in any other case, eighteen.

'This section shall not derogate from any other statutory power to inflict whipping as a punishment.'

The reason I refer to that is that I think it would be well to add that this whipping shall take place in the presence of the jail surgeon or a medical officer.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We would have to confine it to summary convictions. We can take up the clause to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I think it is unfortunate that this matter should be postponed till to-morrow. We have a thin House to-day, and the probability is that there will be fewer members present to-morrow, because an adjournment is anticipated. I wish to express my views on this clause, because I am entirely opposed to it. It is an extraordinary thing to entrust to a public official the beating of a child of six years of age. It must be done with a birch rod, which may be an inch thick. I am surprised at a proposition of this kind. If the officer was the hon. gentleman who proposed this amendment, I would not object to it for a moment, because I know he is full of the milk of human kindness, but I do not wish it to be put in the hands of any constable to take a birch rod and beat a child six years old. We had better drop the whole clause. There are other means to correct children.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman slightly misapprehends the intention of the clause. The number of strokes in the case of a child shall not exceed six, and in the case of a boy who appears to the court the age of 14, twelve strokes, and in any other case eighteen strokes. I agree with the hon. gentleman from Glengarry that the whipping should take place in the presence of the jail surgeon, or some other medical man, but I doubt the desirability of having the parents present. Either the feelings of the parents will be very much harrowed up, or the constable who is administering the birch rod in the presence of the parents will not lay it on as energetically as if the parents were not there, and I think if a boy of fourteen, fifteen or sixteen commits a serious offence, he should get an honest whipping.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—In reply to what the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour (Hon. Mr. Prowse) has stated, I may say that this suggestion was made to me by a gentleman who has had a very great deal of experience, more than any other man in Ontario, I think, with juvenile offenders. He is now, and has for some time, been the superintendent of the home for destitute children, and has had great experience in dealing with juvenile offenders. His firm conviction, from his experience, is that where for small offences these boys are sent for a few days to jail, not only does it not do them any good, but they for the time are heroes in the eyes of their boy companions. They think it is a grand thing to be sent to jail, and it does not deter them from repeating their wrongdoing; whereas there is no particular heroism in having a whipping, and he was satisfied it would do more to deter them from such practices than any other course which would be taken. I should also like to see this whipping surrounded with such safeguards that it would be certain that no undue severity would be exercised, and I am satisfied that it would be a wise course to adopt.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) Is there an age limit to the flogging?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It occurs to me—and I can submit it for the consideration of the House—that the offenders would come under the Summary Convictions Act, or Juvenile Offenders Act, and might be dealt with as provided in this clause, and, as my hon. friend has suggested, that boys under fourteen years of age shall receive so many lashes. I do not think it would do to say that it should be done in the presence of the jail surgeon, because that might necessitate taking the boy away to the county town, but it should be done in the presence of some surgeon.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. minister accept that clause?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I accept it as a portion of the Bill for the consideration of the House. I have had no opportunity to discuss it with my colleagues. It is adopted as far as this House is concerned.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I think a great deal of care should be exercised, and plenty of time should be taken to consider a measure of this kind. The idea of leaving it in the power of any man, in the case of a child six years old, to use a birch rod and to lay it on just as he likes is to my mind astonishing. How do you govern that? It is quite proper that the wording of the clause relating to the punishment should be more carefully considered by the Minister of Justice. The idea of a boy five or six years old being laid under the lash of some man, perhaps of a tyrannous disposition, perhaps of a cruel disposition, and to say that he can lay it on just as he pleases is unreasonable. If I were a parent and saw a man flogging my child of six years with the birch, I would have no hesitation in sending a bullet through his heart. Therefore, I think the greatest possible care should be taken in the wording of a sentence of this kind. I know that every one concerned in this legislation has only one idea in his mind, that of kindness and goodness, but they may be mistaken. I think this clause is not proper. Punish the boy by some other means, but do not leave it in the power of any man to say he will lay on the lash heavy or light, either above or below the belt. Do not give that option to any one living over another man's child.

Hon. M. VIDAL, from the committee, reported progress and asked leave to sit again to-morrow.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (O) 'An Act respecting the Western Alberta Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Perley in absence of Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

Bill (52) 'An Act to incorporate the Morris and Portage Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Power.)

Bill (25) 'An Act respecting the Brandon and South-western Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

HOLINESS MOVEMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER, moved the second reading of Bill (51) 'An Act to incorporate the Holiness Movement Church in Canada.' He said: I made a slight mistake with respect to this Bill. I mistook it for another one. It has been pushed along so far, and some one interested in the Holiness Movement might now take charge of it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I promised to take charge for the hon. member from Calgary, who is absent, and I move the second reading.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I wish to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to two clauses of this Bill, not with a view of objecting to the second reading, but to invite the consideration of the committee to some of its provisions. Clause five reads:

5. The movement may, from time to time, acquire and receive conveyances of such lands, moneys, mortgages and securities or other property as may be required for the purpose of chapels, colleges, schools or other educational purposes connected with the movement, or for the purpose of a conference hall, or for the purpose of printing and publishing houses in connection with the movement and carrying on the business of such printing and publishing houses, and for the purposes of endowing and supporting such chapels, colleges and schools and such printing and publishing houses and any book depository in connection therewith; and may also receive the benefit of any gift or devise by will or otherwise in its corporate name for the uses and purposes of the movement: Provided, that the annual value of real estate which the movement may possess in any one municipality shall not exceed the sum of ten thousand dollars; and provided also that the movement shall, within seven years after its acquisition of any real estate, dispose of and alienate so much of the said real estate as is not required for the use and occupation of the movement.

We might deal with a question of that sort in the North-west Territories, or in the Yukon district, but the question of property and civil rights being under the jurisdiction of the provinces, all we could do at furthest would be to confer a capacity upon the parties to receive it, and to confer such a capacity would be, to some extent, contrary to the provisions of mortmain, which, so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, and I think in the other provinces has been recognized. Clause 7 reads:

7. All conveyances and instruments of the movement shall be executed by affixing the corporate seal of the movement and the signatures of the bishop and secretary for the time being of the movement.

How conveyances can be made, except within the territories under our jurisdiction, each province may say for itself. We have, for instance, jurisdiction over the railways extending beyond the boundaries of a province, but we cannot say how the conveyances shall be made. Each province determines how property shall be transmitted or conveyed and what the ceremony or form of the instrument shall be. I am inviting the attention of the Senate and the attention of the committee through the Senate to these clauses.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The committee will look into all those questions when it comes before them. I do not suppose the organization will get very much property to look into in any case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In all cases of this kind, where corporations, and particularly churches, are given the right to acquire property by bequest and otherwise, they are limited to a certain amount, and if not limited to a certain amount, the bequest must be made a certain time prior to the death of the testator. All that must be taken into consideration. The principle was thoroughly discussed, I remember, a number of years ago, when it had been abused to a very great extent; hence the law stepped in to prevent people, on their deathbeds, from being improperly influenced in any way towards giving their property for churches, educational purposes, or anything else. There is another point that should be well looked into, as to whether we have the power, and if we have, the powers should be restricted as much as possible.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, April 4, 1900.

The Speaker pro tem took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (L) 'An Act respecting the Ontario and Rainy River Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Baker).

Bill (45) 'An Act respecting the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (43) 'An Act respecting the Port Dover, Brantford, Berlin and Goderich Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Merner.)

TENDERS FOR TIGNISH BREAKWATER.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired:

1. Were tenders invited in 1898 or 1899, for building a breast-work running south along the beach from Tignish, P.E.I.?

2. If so, what are the names of the contractors ?
3. What was the cost of the work, and was it built under government inspection ?
4. If no tenders were called for, who did the work, and the amount paid therefor ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers are: 1. Tenders were invited in October, 1898. 2. Contract was awarded to John Burns for $6,770. in November, 1898. Mr. Burns assigned his contract to Myrick & Co., and a new contract was entered into, dated 7th March, 1899, with the latter. 3. Work cost $6,770. Jas. Christopher, inspector. 4. As above.

REPAIRS TO NORTH CAPE LIGHTHOUSE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired :

1. What was the nature, extent and cost of repairs to the keeper's cottage at North Cape lighthouse, P.E.I., during the year 1899 ?
2. What are the dimensions of said cottage ?
3. What were the names of men employed, stating rate per diem of wages paid and the total amount paid each man, including horsehire ?
4. Names of parties supplying material, with the quantity and kind, and the total amount paid each man for same ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The repairs were: 1. Raising of the foundation ; new sills ; new windows ; laying new floor ; repairing plastering ; reshingling the roof ; painting and glazing, and generally making repairs required to put the building in good order.—Cost, $204.18. 2. The dimensions of the cottage are 30 ft. by 14 ft., with kitchen attached of 14 ft. by 12 ft. 3. D. Martin, $2.00, $35,00 ; P. Peters, $1.50, $19.50 ; F. Richard, $1.50, $19.50 ; John Barnard, $1.50, $34.50 ; J. McBeth, $2.50, $18.75 ; J. Barnard, truckage, $12.00. 4. Schurman, Clark & Lefurgey—5 windows, $11.25 ; 100 bricks, $1 ; 1,300 ft. spruce, $18.20 ; 100 ft. 7 in. base $1 ; 10 M. shingles, $23.00 ; 3 brls. hair, $1.20 ; 5 bundles lath, 90c. ; freight, $6.38.—$62.93.

John Barnard—1 sill, 50c. ; 50 ft. 3 in. plank, $1.50—$2.00.

J. H. Myrick & Co.—300 ft. boards, $2.40 ; nails, $4.71 ; spikes, 15c. ; screws, 40c. ; 1 roll tar paper, 45c. ; 1 cask lime, $1.75 ; chalk and chalk lines, 10c. ; hinges, 58c. ; 15½ lbs. zinc, $1.55 ; 2 hasks lines, $3.50 ; 2 hasps, 24c. ; 1 gall. paint oil, 65c. ; ¼ gall. turpentine, 20c. ; 12 lbs. white lead, 90c. ; 20 panes, $1.00 ; 11½ lbs. putty, 35c. ; 1 brush, 16c. ; 2 thump hatches, 14c. ; 3 hooks, 9c.—$19.32.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (82) 'An Act to incorporate the Crown Life Insurance Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Macdonald, B.C.)

SAN JOSE SCALE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (126) 'An Act to amend the San José Scale Act.'

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of the Bill. He said : It will be within the memory of the House that a year or two ago we passed an Act prohibiting the importation of nursery stock from the United States in consequence of the San José Scale. It was supposed that United States stock was affected by it. There was a strong protest by the nursery men, and others affected by the Bill, against the absolute exclusion. Various suggestions were made, that by fumigating, the effect of the scale might be reduced, or perhaps absolutely removed. However, the Minister of Agriculture, thought it was wiser, until further inquiries could be made. that the stock should be excluded altogether. It has been a serious loss to very many people who are relying upon United States nursery stock, and it is proposed now to modify the law to a limited extent. The Bill is comprised of one clause, which reads as follows :

Notwithstanding anything in 'The San José Scale Act,' chapter 23 of the statutes of 1898, the Governor in Council may name certain ports of entry at which the importation may be permitted of any trees, shrubs, plants, vines, grafts, cuttings or buds, commonly called nursery stock, from any country or place which the said Act applies, provided that such nursery stock has been properly fumigated with hydrocyanic acid gas.

The proposal, as submitted to the House of Commons last night, was that the Governor in Council should name one port in each province, and in Ontario two ports, at which the nursery stock could be imported. The most convenient ports, of course, would be selected, and inspectors would be named who would be furnished with the necessary gas in order to see that the proper fumigation took place, and if there was any appearance of the San José scale, it should be absolutely removed. This Bill passed through its third reading last night in the House of Commons, and His Excellency intends to come down this afternoon at five o'clock to give his assent to this Bill and the Bill for the expenses of the South Africa contingent. I therefore ask the House to allow the rules to be suspended, so that the Bill can be passed to-day. This suspends the Act, practically, to a limited extent.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—United States nursery stock is admitted subject to fumigation?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes; the object of limiting the importation to certain ports of the country is on account of the cost of fumigation.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the Bill is all right. The legislation of two years ago was passed under some misconception as to the nature of this pest, a very serious one certainly, but not at all so serious as we thought it was at that time. It has since been demonstrated that the pest was in Canada before that time, and that it does not sweep orchards down before it with the rapidity that many believed it did at that time, and the Act a few years ago, though well meant at the time, proved a detriment to the fruit interest as interfering with the introduction of good nursery stock from the United States. To the extent it is proposed to go with this Bill, no harm whatever can arise, and it will enable nursery people to replenish their stock from the United States under conditions that will be perfectly safe to the fruit interests of the country. Therefore, I support the Bill.

The Bill was read the second and third times and passed under a suspension of the rules.

CANADA LOAN AND INVESTMENT COMPANY'S BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (76) 'An Act to incorporate the Canada Loan and Investment Company.'

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved that the Bill be read the second time on Thursday next.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I have been spoken to by some members who take an interest in this Bill, and who consider there are unwise provisions in it which they wish to oppose. When the measure comes up, if the gentlemen interested in it are not here, I presume my hon. friend will allow it to stand over until they are here?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Certainly.

The motion was agreed to.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved:

When the Senate adjourns to-day, it stand adjourned until Wednesday, the 18th day of April instant, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

He said: If hon. gentlemen desire a longer adjournment, I am in the hands of the House.

Several Hon. GENTLEMEN—The 24th!

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The House of Commons is going to adjourn before Easter, until the following Tuesday. In that case, for a full week they will be doing nothing, so we may as well adjourn until the 24th.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There is only one objection that presents itself to my mind as to whether the adjournment should be till the 24th. We are not likely, from all we can gather, to have much business before us for two or three weeks. There is a debate on in the House of Commons now that will probably occupy a fortnight, and we are not going to have any business from that House within three weeks; but there is one thing the Senate should keep in view, and it is an important matter. We are entrusted here with the investigation of divorce cases, and it is necessary that these cases should go to the House of Commons in time to get through that House before the end of the session. An adjournment might delay those cases, and we should be sure that this adjournment will not create such a delay as would jeopardize the passage of these Bills in the House of Commons. The procedure for divorce is judicial and requires a great deal of attention in this House, and it would be a great disappointment to those interested, if after having gone through all the practical work involved they should get to the other House too late to be passed there. This is the only objection I see to a long adjournment, and if the gentlemen who are members of the Committee on Divorce think there is no danger to be apprehended such as I have mentioned, I have no objection to the long adjournment.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—There are two Bills now waiting for the second reading, one on the fifth and the other on the eleventh of April. There is another which has not yet had its first reading. It depends on whether the session is to be long or not, whether the adjournment will interfere with it. I hope when we do meet again measures will be brought down to this House in order that we may have time to consider all the legislation proposed for our consideration. Hitherto we have not been treated properly in that respect, and I hope it will not occur again in the future. I do not oppose this adjournment. It would not be seemly for me to do so, living at the Capital. I merely bring the matter before the House, in order that the business may be attended to properly. I trust after the adjournment the government will have their measures ready for our consideration. As far as the Divorce Bills are concerned, it would be a great misfortune to the petitioners if, after their expenditure of time and money, they should have their Bills postponed until another session.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—About the cases before the Divorce Committee, the adjournment will not in any way affect them.

The motion was amended to adjourn to the 24th instant at 8 o'clock p.m., and agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole, consideration of Bill (K) 'An Act further to amend the Criminal Code.'

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I propose to add section 931*a* as an amendment to the Bill, providing, as suggested by the hon. gentleman from Toronto, for the whipping of boys in certain cases, instead of sending them to penitentiary and reformatories.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Why not have a strap, the same as they have in schools, instead of a birch rod?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The words are directory and not mandatory, and it is stated by way of qualification 'if practicable', so that if there is no birch growing in the vicinity, something else might be used. The magistrate can judge of that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When this clause was being discussed yesterday I expressed the view that it was not desirable that the parents should be present, but that it was desirable that a medical man should be present, and I still adhere to that view. I regret to see that the Bill provides that the parent or guardian should be present and does not make any provision for the presence of a medical man.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—If he desires to be present.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It might render the clause nugatory if it were necessary that a medical man should be present—an unnecessary formality in the present instance.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Who is to inflict the punishment?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—A constable.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—In the country it would be difficult to get constables to inflict the punishment. It is equal to the duty of a hangman, and the constables are to be taken from the neighbourhood in which the boys live. For a neighbour to undertake to perform a legal thrashing of this kind—I cannot find language to express my contempt for any such proposition. I think it is unreasonable to say a neighbour is to be authorized by law to come into my premises and thrash my child, I do not care what the age of the child is, and that to be done under certain rules and regulations established by law. It will cause ill feeling which will never be overcome in a country place, and if the Minister of Justice would provide some punishment for the parents who do not bring up their children properly it would be more effectual than a punishment of this kind. Matters have come to a pretty pass when we appoint constables throughout the country to do hangman's work, and I am opposed to our adopting this provision in such a thin House.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—My hon. friend is under some misapprehension. No one would desire to go into his house and correct his child there. This is only in the case of young offenders who have been arrested for stealing, or some other act which brings them under the authority of the law, and in the rural districts it is a very unlikely thing to happen. These cases only occur in large towns and I am persuaded in my own mind that, instead of being a cruelty, it is the greatest kindness you can show to deter a youngster and his companions from repeating such offences, and I do not think there need be the slightest fear that the law will ever be administered too severely or without proper precautions.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—What age must a child be?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly a child under ten years of age cannot be amenable. There is no provision for punishing any one younger than that. It is not a hangman's work.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Should we not place some limit on the size of the rod to be used? What one might call a rod might be a handspike. I have a horror of using it in any way, and would like to see some limit placed on the size of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think a good switching received by a boy who has not been very well looked after at home will do him more good than confinement in jail amongst hardened offenders.

Hon. Mr. KERR—I prefer the word 'switch' instead of 'rod'. There is a good deal of humanity about the one and not about the other.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I do not think the parents should be allowed to be present. I move that that portion of the clause be struck out.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It is optional. It might be fairly left to the discretion of the magistrate as to whether parents should be asked to be present.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When a lad of fourteen or fifteen commits a pretty serious offence and the magistrate, or county court judge, before whom he is convicted, decides that he shall be whipped instead of being sent to jail, the whipping ought not to be a mere perfunctory process. It should be a vigorous whipping, and if the parent of the child is present, I have no doubt the arm of the constable will be paralysed and, consequently, if we wish the punishment to be effective, it is desirable that the parent should not be present.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The parents should do the whipping, and nobody else.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They have had all this legislation in England for the last half dozen years. I have looked in all the statutes and I find this same provision, and I think it is safe for us to follow their example.

The amendment was withdrawn and the clause was adopted.

On section 261.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will ask the committee to drop this section from the Bill, because the word 'sixteen' is used there, and the word 'fourteen' is used in the Act. There were a number of provisions when that was inserted in the Bill that were not in the Bill when it was brought down, and as I dropped the other sections I think that I should drop that also, because if I retain that section it will be necessary to change sections 269 and 306. With the consent of the Senate I ask that the section be struck out.

The section was dropped.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported the Bill with certain amendments which were concurred in.

The Bill was read a third time and passed.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (65) 'An Act to incorporate the Quebec and New Brunswick Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. McKay.)

Bill (67) 'An Act respecting La Banque Jacques Cartier and to change its name to La Banque Provinciale du Canada.'—(Hon. Mr. McMillan.)

ADMIRALTY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (P) 'An Act to amend the Admiralty Act.' He said : I stated on the introduction of this Bill the changes which it makes in the present law. It merely provides that an admiralty district which is under the jurisdiction of a single judge may be divided into divisions, and that a deputy registrar may be appointed in each of those divisions for the convenience of suitors.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill passed through its final stages under a suspension of the rule.

MERCHANTS BANK OF HALIFAX BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (72) 'An Act respecting the Merchant's Bank of Halifax, and to change its name to the Royal Bank of Canada.' He said : The Merchants Bank of Halifax have thought it desirable to change the name of the institution, because there is another Merchants Bank which does business throughout Canada, and confusion has arisen from the fact that there are two Merchants Banks. This change of name does not take effect until the shareholders of the bank who are present at the general meeting have considered it and have passed a resolution in favour of the change of name.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

BILLS ASSENTED TO.

After some time the House was resumed.

His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir Gilbert John Elliot, Earl of Minto and Viscount Melgund of Melgund, County of Forfar, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, Baron Minto of Minto, County of Roxburgh, in the Peerage of Great Britain, Baronet of Nova Scotia, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, &c., &c., Governor General of Canada, being seated on the Throne.

The Honourable the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House :

It is His Excellency's pleasure they attend him immediately in this House.

Who, being come with their Speaker,

The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery read the titles of the Bills to be passed, as follows :—

An Act to provide for the expenses of the Canadian Volunteers serving Her Majesty in South Africa.

An Act to amend the San José Scale Act.

To these Bills the Royal Assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the Senate in the words following :—

In Her Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor General doth assent to these Bills.

After which His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire, and the House of Commons withdrew.

The Senate adjourned.

WHARFINGER AND HARBOUR MASTER AT MONTMAGNY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to draw the attention of the government to the following facts :

1. That on the 15th March inst., in reply to two questions put to him, the hon. Minister of Justice declared:

(a) That Mr. Louis Dion was the postmaster of Montmagny with an annual salary of $200.

(b) That Mr. Louis Dion was the wharfinger of Montmagny with a salary of 25 per cent on the revenue of the wharf.

2. That on the 3rd April, in reply to a question asked since the 12th March, and put twelve times in the space of twenty-two days, the hon. Minister of Justice declared:

(c) That Mr. Louis Dion was employed by the Department of Customs as preventive officer, with a salary of $50 a year.

And that he will ask :

1. Whether the name of Louis Dion was not given by mistake for that of Louis Dionne?

2. Whether it is not really a person named Louis Dionne in whom cumulate the functions of postmaster of Montmagny, wharfinger of Montmagny and customs officer for the district of Montmagny?

3. Whether it is the intention of the government to dispense with the services of this factotum from the moment when it shall be proved to them that this Louis Dionne forms part of the associaiton of 'offensive political partisanship,' and that he spoke on the hustings at the time of the last federal elections in the county of Montmagny?

He said: There are two clerical errors in this motion. In paragraph (a) the word postmaster should be harbour master, and in the second question the word postmaster is used in place of harbour master.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say, in reply to the first question, that I do not know that the question was asked as to Mr. Dion being postmaster.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is a clerical error. It should be harbour master.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman is asking me about clerical errors. I do not know whether he is responsible for this one or not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should refer to the manuscript as to that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am in exactly the same predicament with regard to the other. The hon. gentleman asks whether the name Louis Dion is the same Louis Dion spelt with 'ne' after his name. I cannot tell him. I never looked at how the name was spelled. I read the answer as given to me, and did not notice the orthography, and I do not know whether my hon. friend is right in the orthography which he attributes to the answer which I gave or not. My French pronunciation is not good, and I may have easily mispronounced the name, but I think I did not spell the name to my hon. friend. Therefore, he must not hold me responsible for the orthography as given in this case, but I have no doubt if that be what the hon. gentleman desires to know, the same person is referred to throughout, that the party who is harbour master is wharfinger, and is a preventive officer in the customs also. I understand that he holds all these positions.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. minister has not answered the last question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What is that?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The last question reads:

Whether it is the intention of the government to dispense with the services of this factotum from the moment when it shall be proved to them that this Louis Dionne forms part of the association of 'offensive political partisanship,' and that he spoke on the hustings at the time of the last federal elections in the county of Montmagny?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will remember that there are a great many people who speak on the hustings who are subsequently appointed to office. This party was appointed, I understand, on the 23rd October, 1896, and my hon. friend will see that that is some months after the general election took place. As to his being a factotum, I do not know anything about that. I do not know how he could be a factotum as he is an original officer.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I cannot see what the minister points out, but I will help him to see something else. He says that this gentleman was appointed in the month of October, after the general elections, but my question does not say that. My question says that he took part at the last Federal elections in the county of Montmagny. Mr. Choquette was elected in 1896, but was made a judge afterwards. To fill the vacancy the subsequent election in that county took place long after the month of October, after the time that gentleman was appointed, and it is since he was appointed that he has become a member of that association of offensive political partisans, and it was while he was performing his duty as a Federal officer that he took part in that election. The present government discharged a number of officials in the county of Montmagny who had not said a word on the hustings, who had not even voted at the last election, on the charge that they were offensive political partisans. I wish to know if the same rule will be applied to a man who, after his appointment has taken an offensive political part in the last elections which took place in Montmagny.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has now given the information which he did not give in his question, and that is, that he has reference to an election that has taken place since the appointment of Mr. Louis Dion in 1896, a local election. That, of course, is information in addition.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is not a local election; it is a by-election.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is local in its character. It is not a general election. It is confined to a county. I may say, in reply to my hon. friend, that I am not in favour of political partisanship on the part of public officers. There are two classes of public officers. There are those who are political and those who are non-political. The political officers share the fortunes of the party with which they are associated. The members of the government are such, and they retain their position only so long as they are sustained by the majority. Further than that, there are the permanent public officers who are non-political, and their permanency, I think, largely depends on their maintenance of that character; but my hon. friend does not expect that because a minister of the Crown goes upon the platform, and takes part in an election, he is to be instantly dismissed by his colleagues. He is simply in the rank of political parties, those who hold their office during the continuance of their friends in the majority, and if Mr. Dionne has taken an active part in a political contest and has made himself, on that account, offensive to those who are politically opposed to him, he stands exactly, therefore, so far as the permanency of his position is concerned, in the position of a minister of the Crown.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And so if the charge against him is proved, he will share the same fate as the others?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, but not at the hands of his friends.

CANADIAN STEEL COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMONS.

A message was received from the House of Commons to return Bill (G) 'An Act to incorporate the Canadian Steel Company,' with amendments.

The amendments were read at the Table.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved that the amendments be concurred in, being merely of a verbal character, and the parties interested in the Bill being quite satisfied to accept them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The House cannot possibly understand what these amendments are without an opportunity of studying them. Speaking for myself, I have not the slightest idea what they are.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have a copy of the Bill here, corrected. The amendments are taking away powers from the company. The principal one is the expropriating power. Some members of the House of Commons thought expropriation powers ought not to be given to industrial companies. Then the clause authorizing amalgamation with another company was struck out, and a limitation was put in within which the work must be gone on with. The others are merely verbal.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is no increase in the powers?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it is withdrawing powers from the company.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that the Bill has been very much improved, and made less objectionable by these changes. I have, in fact, a very strong opinion myself that we have no power, except in the territories, to give expropriating powers to an ordinary corporation, because it is simply allowing one man, by force of the power given him by the statute, to enter on another man's property, and take it, upon giving compensation. We go that far with a railway company, because a railway company is a quasi public corporation. Those franchises of exercising eminent domain were considered royal prerogatives, and when railway companies came to exist they were given to railway companies, because a railway company exists for the purpose of performing certain duties not merely for itself but for the public. It cannot refuse to do so. Now, a private corporation, for the purpose of carrying on a private manufactory, however important it may be, or however extensive its operations may become, is nevertheless a private corporation, and in its rights it is not supposed to differ from any other individual, and you would never think of allowing any man, by power conferred upon him, to expropriate another man's property. That power was given to this company under the Bill as originally drafted, and that power has been taken away.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The power has been granted in a number of other Bills.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is true. My attention was called to the fact by the promoters of the company, that this power had been given to a number of other companies, and seeing we have done so, and if parliament chose to give them the power and say, 'You may take it for what it is worth, and take the risk of a suit with the parties who may resist your attempt to expropriate, under the provisions conferred upon you by this Act, you may do so,' but the company, I understand, did not care to take that power and with it the responsibility of litigation, and so they were content to take a Bill with more limited power. Therefore, the Bill in that respect has been made more in conformity with the power that parties possess to deal with property and private rights.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The explanations made by my hon. friend, as well as those by the hon. Secretary of State, seem to be altogether satisfactory, and I have no reason to doubt that these amendments are all, as the hon. gentlemen say, in the public interest; but my hon. friends have had opportunities to study the amendments which none of the rest of us have had, and as there is no hurry, I would suggest that the motion be that these amendments be considered tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I move that the amendments be taken into consideration tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (80) 'An Act respecting the members of the North-west mounted police force on active service in South Africa.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

Bill (104) 'An Act respecting the Montfort and Gatineau Colonization Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (96) 'An Act respecting the Quebec Bridge Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, De Lanaudière, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Fiset.)

Bill (86) 'An Act respecting the Thousand Islands Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. McMillan.)

Bill (84) 'An Act respecting the Bay of Quinté Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Lovitt.)

Bill (88) 'An Act to incorporate the St. Mary's River Railway and Colonization Company.'—(Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

Bill (91) 'An Act respecting the Oshawa Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Kerr.)

Bill (73) 'An Act respecting the Restigouche and Western Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. McSweeny.)

Bill (35) 'An Act to incorporate the Comox and Cape Scott Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Reid.)

Bill (70) 'An Act to incorporate the Gaspé Short Line Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Fiset.)

Bill (R) 'An Act to incorporate the St. Lawrence Terminal and Steamship Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, de Lanaudière.)

THE WHARFINGER AT MONTMAGNY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I ask permission to call attention to the error which appears in the motion I made some moments ago. The French version gives it correctly, and therefore the mistake has been made by the translators.

THIRD READING.

Bill (E) 'An Act for the relief of Catherine Cecilia Lyons.'—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (66) 'An Act respecting the Cowichan Valley Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Macdonald, B.C.)

Bill (74) 'An Act respecting the Northern Commercial Telegraph Company, Limited.'—(Hon. Mr. Macdonald, B.C.)

Bill (82) 'An Act to incorporate the Crown Life Insurance Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Macdonald, B.C.)

LOAN COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS introduced Bill (Q) 'An Act to amend the Loan Companies Act, Canada, 1899,' and moved that it be read the first time. He said: This is a very short Bill. It simply corrects two or three verbal errors in the Act of last year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No new principles ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, nothing new. The word 'franchise' was improperly used in the former Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the first time.

The Senate adjourned.

THE CASE OF LIEUT.-COL. WHITE.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate all correspondence between the Minister of Militia and Defence, Major General Hutton, Lieut.-Col. Foster, chief staff officer; Lieut.-Col. Holmes, D.O.C. Military District No. 1; the Deputy Minister of Militia or any other official of the Department of Militia and Defence, and Lieut.-Col. W. W. White, of Guelph, Ont., relating to or in any way connected with the selection of, and subsequent removal of, the said Lieut.-Col. White's name from the list of officers of the Canadian militia to undergo a course of instruction in the duties of general staff officers at the Military College, Kingston.

He said : Since giving notice of this motion, in reference to the correspondence between Major General Hutton and the Minister of Militia, a return has been brought down to the House of Commons, a copy of which I hold in my hand. I find that there are one or two omissions, and before making any remarks upon the subject, I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State, who has had this matter in charge, whether a letter written by Lieut.-Col. Holmes, the district officer commanding the western section, informing Colonel White that his name had been removed from the list of officers to receive instructions at the Military College, on account of his politics is on file in the department. It is just possible that it may not be there, being a letter written by an officer, I think, living in London. I find also that Major General Hutton's letter, written to the Department of Militia, is dated on the 2nd day of February, in which he approves of the course taken by the minister in removing names from the list of officers to receive instruction on account of their politics. I may comment upon that hereafter. But the letter of the Deputy Minister of Militia, disavowing the statements made that instructions had been given for the removal of Colonel White's name from the list of officers, is dated on the 3rd February, one day after the date of the letter written by the Major General, approving of the course taken by the Minister of Militia. There is no reply among the papers which are laid before parliament, to the deputy minister's letter of the 3rd, from the Major General. What I should like to ask the Secretary of State, is whether that letter was ever answered by the Major General, and if answered, why it is not put among the papers laid before parliament, or is it the letter to which the hon. Secretary of State referred as having been marked private and confidential, and for that reason it was not deemed advisable to lay it before parliament ? and if it be for that reason it was withheld, might I ask for what reason were the letters of Lieut.-Col. Samuel Hughes, marked private and confidential, sent, not to the department at Ottawa, but to some officers commanding in Kingston, and brought down among the papers which were laid before the House of Commons in reference to that gentleman, and also laid upon the Table of this House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I might also call attention to the fact that one of the letters written by Lieut.-Col. Hughes appears to be in answer to a letter that had been written by the Major General to him, giving reasons for the course which he, the Major General, had taken. That letter does not appear among the papers. Those papers, my hon. friend will remember, were laid upon the Table of the House here, and consequently they are papers with which we can more properly deal. What I should like to know, before pursuing this subject further, is, why these letters to which I have referred in the correspondence between Major General Hutton and the Department of Militia here, are withheld.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Of course the hon. gentleman knows that those returns are made up in the several departments, and bundles of them come over every day. It is quite impossible for me to go through them and ascertain what they embrace. I do not profess to do that. I can only take them as they are brought down. I shall be only too glad to call the attention of the department to any omission to which my attention may be directed, and ask for an explanation, but I am not sufficiently familiar with the run of the correspondence to follow my hon. friend, who has studied the matter. I did not take that interest in it that he did, and, therefore, I am not familiar with it, and cannot give the explanations.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I fully acquit my hon. friend of any intention on his part to withhold anything. My object in calling his attention to the subject, is that he should make a note of it and make inquiry, so that we may know what the contents of that letter really are, in order to enable us to deal with the subject more intelligently.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will have the report of the hon. gentleman's remarks sent to the department.

The motion was allowed to stand.

THE CLAIM OF E. J. WALSH, C.E.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate copies of all papers, correspondence, orders in council and communications of every kind to date, relating in any way to the claim of E. J. Walsh, C.E., against the Dominion government, the Department of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and the government of the Leeward Islands, for professional services rendered the government of the said Leeward Islands; also, copies of any papers or correspondence in the Department of Railways and Canals, or in the hands of the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, relating to the engagement or otherwise of the said E. J. Walsh, C.E.

He said : In making this motion I may state that I do so at the instance of the gentleman who is interested. I may add that when this gentleman called my attention to his claim, and placed the facts before me, I told him I was under the impression that the government of Canada was in no way responsible for the non-payment of his salary by the government of the Leeward Islands—that they had simply recommended Mr. Walsh to the Governor of the Leeward Islands as a civil engineer who could perform the work which they desired done at that time. It appears from what papers I have before me, that in 1890 the government of the Leeward Islands were anxious to secure a competent engineer to perform certain works that they required done in those islands, and they applied to the Canadian government of that day to recommend a competent man. The late Sir John Macdonald and the chief engineer, Mr. Schreiber, recommended this Mr. Walsh. He was employed on certain terms and conditions, which, as I learned from the papers, were that if he was employed for only a certain length of time his salary was to be a certain amount, and his expenses, whatever they might be, were to be paid to send him back to Canada. The term, however, for which he was employed extended far beyond that period. In 1895 he received notice that his services were no longer required. At that period his salary had not been paid for a full twelve months, and he was kept on the islands for three months after that waiting for his year's salary without any consideration, or any remuneration, and not until the Colonial Secretary instructed that the year's salary due, should be paid over, it being a Crown colony, did he receive his pay. What he claims, and I think from an equitable standpoint he is entitled to it, is that his salary should be paid for the three months during which he was kept on the islands before receiving his pay. They refused, however, to pay that, and it appears that the Colonial Secretary at the time wrote to the Governor of the Leeward Islands saying : 'I approve of your action.' They have refused ever since to pay him his salary, for the three months detention on the island. I think every one reading the papers would come to the conclusion that the government of the islands should have remunerated him for the time they kept him waiting for his pay. It is all very well for the government to say, 'It is true we were not in a position to pay your salary, but you need not have stopped here.' The probability is he had not money to get away. I told him I would bring the matter before the Senate, but the only good that could possibly result from it would be that the Secretary of State for Canada might call the attention of the Colonial Secretary of England to the fact that this gentleman had been deprived of his pay. If the hon. gentlemen opposite think on this subject as I do, they might add they think it should be paid, and it might result in the Colonial Office instructing the Governor of the Leeward Islands to pay the claim.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has correctly stated the facts of the case. I looked into the papers some time ago, in consequence of a communication from Mr. Walsh, and a communication was sent to Mr. Chamberlain calling attention to the treatment Mr. Walsh had received from the government of the Leeward Islands, and I think a second appeal was made to Mr. Chamberlain to endeavour to bring influence to bear on the officials of the Leeward Islands, but without avail. We have finally had to give it up. We could not compel the government of the Leeward Islands to pay the claim. We could only draw their attention to what we consider an unfair condition of things. I think the government of the Leeward Islands did an unfair thing. Mr. Walsh then made a claim on the government of Canada, but we came to the conclusion that our predecessors had reached—that we could not possibly undertake to pay a claim of that kind. We recommended him, but no guarantee was given that his pay should be any particular figure, or that he should be employed for any particular time. The recommendation was that he was a good official, and he was employed there with our endorsement. If there are any papers in the case they will be brought down.

The motion was agreed to.

REPAIRS TO THE STEAMER MINTO

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a return showing in detail the cost and nature of all repairs and alterations made to the steamer 'Minto' since her arrival in Canadian waters. The said return to show the names of the parties who were employed in making these repairs and alterations, and the amount paid to each.

The motion was agreed to.

EARNINGS OF THE STEAMER STANLEY AND THE STEAMER MINTO.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a return showing the expenses and earnings of the steamer 'Stanley' while engaged on the winter service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland for the years 1894, 1895, 1896, 1897, 1898 and 1899. And also a similar return for the steamer 'Minto' for the winter of 1900. The above statement of expenses not to include repairs to either steamer.

He said : I may explain that the object of this motion is to institute comparisons between the results of a moderate freight and passenger rates on the steamer Stanley, and the very high rates that were charged in former years. In the earlier years of the service, considering that it was an arduous one, and expensive to maintain, high winter rates were established. In 1895 the winter rates were made similar to the rates prevailing in the summer season, and the object of my motion is to ascertain whether the result of the reduction of the rates has been more favourable to the government, as I believe it is, than from the high rates which prevailed in the earlier period.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—How many years does the earlier period embrace ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This will take in one year. It ought, perhaps, to take in more.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think so.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then take in the years 1892, 1893 and 1894, and the comparison will be very much better.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would therefore amend the motion in that way. It would institute a comparison between at least three years of the old rates, and the years in which the reduced rates have prevailed. This would also include a similar return for the steamer Minto for last winter. In order that the result of this return shall not be complicated in any way with the other services to which the steamers are applied, the cost of repairs will not be included, because these repairs would belong as much to the fisheries service, the lighthouse service and other services on which the steamer was engaged as to the winter service.

Hon. Mr. MILLS.—It might vary in different years.

The motion was agreed to.

MURRAY HARBOUR RAILWAY LAND EXPROPRIATIONS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a return showing the amount, in detail, of compensation paid or tendered to landholders as damages to property or for land taken for the Charlottetown and Murray Harbour Railway; said statement to show the quantity of land taken from each owner.

The motion was agreed to.

DEPOSIT OF FILTH ON WELLINGTON STREET, OTTAWA.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I have been requested to bring under the notice of the government the practice of depositing filth and dirt on Wellington street, which is considered a menace to the health of the city, and particularly to members of parliament. The government should take measures to remove it. The street is under the control of the government and they should take proper care of it.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I am glad that the hon. gentleman from Rideau has brought this matter before us. He has always at heart the interests of the district which he represents. If hon. gentlemen will consider what those piles of filth, of which he complains, are composed of, and how they came there, they will understand the necessity for their removal. When the snow sets in, which is generally in October, all the filth of the horses which are standing there, and all the cattle driven along there, is left behind. There is a cab-stand at that spot, and from October to March nothing is done to remove the filth. It is not putrified, because the frost prevents it, but as soon as the frost leaves, the street is scraped, and the dirt is put in piles. There is also another reason why this should not be allowed. It is a menace to the public health. It has been discovered lately that bacillus of tuberculosis, which is one of the chief causes of pulmonary consumption, is contained in the sputa of consumptives. It contains the microbes which, after a time, turn into the bacilli, and they are inhaled into the lungs of people in perfect health, and sometimes result in consumption. When we consider the prevalence of consumption and the number of people suffering from it who must have passed along that street, and spit upon that place, we will realize the danger. The piles of filth have been there now for weeks, and unless active steps are taken, will probably be left there for weeks more. The filth becomes dry and the wind blows it about. If that street is under the management of the Dominion government, instead of wasting money endeavouring to make Ottawa the Washington of the North, we should try to remove a little of the dirt from that street. Independent of the menace to health, I do not think there is a city in the Dominion of Canada where such a nuisance would be allowed to continue under the eyes of all the persons passing over it. It must be offensive to members of the government, as well as to others. If it is not under the control of the Dominion government, some steps should be taken to compel the city of Ottawa to cause its removal.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If there be anything improper in the condition of the street, I will call the attention of the Acting Minister of Public Works to it, but I understand this is the result of the cab-stand on O'Connor Street, near Wellington Street, which is surely under the jurisdiction of the city, and not under the jurisdiction of the government. While the government may be benevolent and spend $60,000 annually for the city, I do not know that the removal of garbage from the streets is to be done at the expense of the government. It rather belongs to the municipality, and my hon. friend should call the attention of the city council to it.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—This particular street is under the control of the government, as I understand. If it is under the management of the city, of course, they should attend to it. I do not think that filth should be allowed to remain there to impair the health of members of parliament. I am anxious in regard to their health, and that is why I bring it to the notice of the government.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I wish to inquire of the government as to whether any progress has been made in the preparation of that document which I asked for on the 23rd of March last, respecting the deeds which passed between the government and the Seminary of Quebec for the sale of land on which the post office of Montmagny is built. It is just the copy of the deeds, and I suppose a month would be sufficient time to prepare the copies.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will make inquiry.

ATLANTIC AND LAKE SUPERIOR RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. OWENS moved the third reading of Bill (J) 'An Act respecting the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railawy Company.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not propose to divide the House on the question of the third reading of this Bill, but I wish to express my objection to it. The people who are asking for this measure have had the charter for a great number of years and have done practically nothing under it, and there is the best reason to suppose that there is not any very substantial company back of the charter. Parliament should be very slow in granting a charter in any case where there is any reason to doubt the substantiality of the company and the bona fides of the undertaking.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—The hon. gentleman who has just spoken is not in possession of the facts when he makes those statements. This is the first occasion on which this company has come before parliament asking for an extension of time. It has expended nearly half a million dollars on this road, without the aid of a subsidy from either the federal parliament or the provincial legislature. Therefore, I think they are quite justified, under the present circumstances, in asking for an extension of time when such an amount of work has been done. It is simply asking what has been granted to other companies under similar circumstances.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The Railway Committee, to whom this Bill was referred, was unanimous with regard to its report. The Bill was reported without amendment. I do not think there was a single amendment proposed to the Bill in committee, no division was taken in committee, and the action of the hon. gentleman from Halifax in opposing it when it was reported to the House rather surprised me. I should have thought, if he had any objection to take, the proper time would have been before the committee, but he took no objection there, and I do not think there is any reason why it should not be read the third time now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman from Richmond for his lecture. I did oppose the measure in committee; and whether I did or not, I have a perfect right, as a member of this House, to express my opinion about a measure at any stage.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—No one is disputing the hon. gentleman's right. It is a right he exercises more frequently than anybody else.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is my business.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That may be the hon. gentleman's business, but his opposition to this Bill is altogether uncalled for.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman denied me that right last year.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN STEEL COMPANY'S BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved concurrence in the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (G) 'An Act to incorporate the Canadian Steel Company.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to call attention to the amendments made to this Bill. I do not know whether our minutes are accurate or not, but if they are accurate, then several mistakes have been made in the other House in the amendments sent up here, because they do not fit in at the places mentioned, and I should suggest that the hon. gentleman allow this matter to stand until the Law Clerk has an opportunity to look over it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Law Clerk has already gone over it. The amendments are really not material. Two clauses are struck out, being clauses which the company did not ask for, but which were put in this Bill because they appeared in another Bill. That is the amalgamation clause and the expropriation clause. Outside of this nearly all the amendments are formal.

The motion was agreed to.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE IN SOUTH AFRICA BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (80) 'An Act respecting the members of the North-west Mounted Police force on active service in South Africa.' He said: The Bill contains but one clause, and it is brief. The object is obvious. The clause reads:

> Notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Superannuation Act, chapter 18 of the revised statutes, or in the Mounted Police Pension Act, 1889, all members of the North-west Mounted Police force on active service with the Canadian volunteers in South Africa, shall, for the purposes of the said Acts, be entitled to have such active service counted as service in the said force.

I think that is a reasonable proposition.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They do not lose any time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They do not lose any time. I think that is reasonable.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The reading of this Bill reminds me of what I look upon as being a defect in our military system. A civil servant is entitled to a pension or something in the nature of a pension. In England and other countries, the members of the regular services are entitled to pensions, but in Canada, as far as I can ascertain, neither the headquarters staff of the Militia Department, that is the military side of the staff, nor the officers of the permanent force, are entitled to anything in the way of pension. I wish to direct the attention of the government to that condition of things, which, I think, is very much to be regretted. A young man qualifies himself for a commission in the regular force. He serves perhaps until he is forty years of age, when he may be obliged to retire under the five years' limit, and he has nothing to fall back upon. He is completely out in the cold. That is a condition of things which should not exist. In England, where they have adopted the time limit, providing that an officer shall not hold a certain grade beyond a certain number of years, and that if he does not obtain promotion before reaching that age, he must go out, it is not unreasonable, because there he gets his pension; but to apply the time limit in Canada, where there is no pension, and oblige the officer to go out, as in England, where he does get a pension, is objectionable. When this condition of things gets to be generally understood, there will be great difficulty in getting young men to go into the permanent force. A young man who enters the permanent military force of this country, and takes the risk of his life, and gives up his hopes in other walks of life for that purpose, should be guaranteed some sort of security against poverty in his old age. Hon. gentlemen are probably aware that some of our best men —men who are remarkably good officers— are obliged to-day to resort to almost menial occupations for the purpose of supporting themselves and their families. In one case an officer who had been a D.C.O., is engaged in teaching a private school. This is a matter which the government ought to consider, and which I hope they will consider and see that our military—a standing army it really is—is either put on the same footing as the civil service, or on the same footing as officers and men in the regular army of the mother country.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The five years' limit to which the hon. gentleman refers, as I understand it, applies only to the volunteer force. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman advocates the pensioning of the volunteer officers, who have retired after a certain length of time that they have commanded their battalions. My impression is that the five years' limit applies to the lieutenant-colonels in the active force and not to the permanent force. I am fully in accord with the sentiments of my hon. friend with reference to what we may call the permanent force of the country. The officers are only retired with an allowance—at least it was formerly the practice. A gentleman who has to retire on account of age, after serving a number of years, gets an allowance proportionate to the time he has served; but as the hon. gentleman from Halifax, very properly remarks, a man who has devoted the best part of his life to soldiering, is scarcely fit for any other occupation, when he attains the age when it is necessary for him to retire. It is a crying evil towards men of that character. They are liable to be called upon at any moment to risk their lives in defence of their country, and if they have served faithfully, the least the country could do would be to give them something to prevent them from going to the poor-house, or having to resort to menial labour to live.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have made a note of the observations of my hon. friend from Halifax, and the hon. leader of the opposition, and I shall bring them to the attention of the Minister of Militia. He will no doubt see how far it would be necessary to make further provision than exists at the present day. This Bill, however, is dealing with the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and with the Mounted Police Pension Act, with a view to preventing parties who are in the mounted police, or in the civil service, being injuriously affected by the fact that they are away in Africa on active service, where the risk of life and the hardships are greater than in the service here. I have no doubt whatever, that every hon. gentleman will see that the policy proposed is a proper one to adopt, and under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I hope the hon. gentleman and the House will pardon me for having made a speech which was slightly irrelevant; but it occurred to me at the time that the subject should be mentioned.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

SECOND READING.

Bill (104) An Act respecting the Montfort and Gatineau Colonization Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

QUEBEC BRIDGE COMPANY'S BILL.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the House adjourns, though I am not in charge of Bill (96) respecting the Quebec Bridge Company, I should like to know why it is not on the Orders of the Day for to-day? In the Minutes of Proceedings of yesterday, the record is, 'Ordered, That the said Bill be read a second time to-morrow,'—that is to-day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is down for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think I am right—that it should be read to-day.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I notice that the hon. gentleman from the Gulf division (Hon. Mr. Fiset) and the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) are both absent. I would move that the Order of the Day be discharged, and the Bill be fixed for second reading to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That would be absurd. The Bill is on the Order of the Day for second reading to-morrow. Although it may be put down for the wrong day, we should allow it to stand until to-morrow. No harm or irregularity in the proceedings can happen in any way if it is taken up to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Stadacona has very properly raised the question. The Senate is not governed by the Order Paper. The minutes govern this House, and unless it is shown that the minutes are incorrect, the second reading of this Bill was made an order for to-day, and that order must be discharged.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I differ from my hon. friend altogether. If the hon. gentleman from Stadacona had moved that the Order of the Day be discharged and put on the Order for to-day, it could be done; but to move that the Order of the Day, as it stands for to-morrow, should be discharged, and be put down for to-morrow, would be something very unusual, and have a very absurd appearance on our minutes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The clerk calls my attention to the fact that in his minutes, the order was for second reading on Thursday. The mistake was made by the clerk upstairs or by the printer.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is a clerical error.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—All that the clerk has to do is to see when the Journals are printed, that the minutes are correct.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, April 26, 1900.

The Speaker took the Chair at three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (67) 'An Act respecting La Banque Jacques Cartier, and to change its name to La Banque Provinciale du Canada.'—(Hon. Mr. McMillan.)

Bill (80) 'An Act respecting the members of the North-west Mounted Police Force on active service in South Africa.'—(Hon. Mr. Mills.)

MERCHANTS' BANK OF HALIFAX BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (72) 'An Act respecting the Merchants' Bank of Halifax, and to change its name to the Royal Bank of Canada.' He said: The amendments to this Bill require some explanation, and I invite the attention of the Minister of Justice to them. This is a Bill respecting the Merchants' Bank of Halifax, and to change its name to the Royal Bank of Canada. This is the whole purport of the Bill. It was suggested in the committee that it was very undesirable that a bank having power to issue notes with its name on the notes should bear two names, an English name and a French name. Hon. gentlemen are aware, of course, that under the British North America Act, all the Dominion statutes have to be published in English and in French; and what some of us may not have borne in mind is, that the French copy is not simply a translation of the English, but is really an original equally with the English copy. In the previous Bill reported from the committee, the name La Banque Jacques Cartier was changed to La Banque Provinciale du Canada but as it still only bore a French name, there was no translation of the name; in both editions it was French. Here the change was from the 'Merchants' Bank of Halifax' to the 'Royal Bank of Canada' in the English copy; and in the French copy it read originally 'La Banque des Marchands de Halifax, changé en Banque Royale du Canada,' but it was contended that it was not right that it should go by another name in the French edition, and therefore the committee thought it right to make the alteration and to recommend that the name the 'Royal Bank of Canada' should appear both in the English and French copies. I move that the amendment be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is the proper way.
