PIPE LINES BILLS

REFERENCE TO REPORT IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN" OF NOVEMBER 23

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on question of privilege. I hold in my hand a copy of the Ottawa Citizen, dated November 23. On the front page, under the heading "Gas pipe lines bills again 'talked out' ", appears this statement written by John Bird:

> After almost every Alberta and British Columbia member had spoken, up rose Bob Mayhew, Minister of Fisheries by title, but a British Columbia member above all else.

I just want to correct the reporter's statement. There were ten members from Alberta who said nothing in the whole of the three hours' debate, and they took that position advisedly because they did not want to be blamed for talking out these private bills, or any such imputation made in respect to them. The Social Credit members in the house feel that these bills should be brought to a vote.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to table the documents to which I made reference in my remarks yesterday afternoon in the debate on the proposed amendments to the Combines Investigation Act.

STANDING COMMITTEES

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION—FIRST AND SECOND REPORTS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. A. J. Bater (The Battlefords) presented the first and second reports of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, and moved that the first report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING AND COMMERCE—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved:

> That the name of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood) be substituted for that of Mr. Rowe on the standing committee on banking and commerce.

That the name of Mr. Riley be substituted for that of Mr. Leger on the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Motion agreed to.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCES AS TO CHOICE OF ROUTE

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the undertaking given to the house on Monday evening, as reported at page 2040 of Hansard, I beg leave to table further correspondence with certain provinces with respect to the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): May I ask the minister whether the correspondence with the province of Nova Scotia is being brought down?

Mr. Winters: The province of Nova Scotia has not given permission to table the correspondence. In accordance with the undertaking given by my colleague, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) yesterday, I have communicated again with the appropriate minister in Nova Scotia, asking if his views are as previously stated.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Has the minister a reply to his inquiry?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Under this heading these matters are not debatable.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. Black (Cumberland): Has the minister had a reply to his latest letter to Nova Scotia concerning the trans-Canada highway? If so, what was that reply, and is the province going to agree to have the correspondence laid on the table of the house?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I have not yet had a reply.

Mr. Green: Has the minister sent a similar letter to Manitoba and British Columbia? I understand those were the other two provinces which would not agree to the tabling of the correspondence.

Mr. Winters: Yes, I have.

Questions

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO ENSURE EMPLOYMENT WITHOUT DISCRIMINATION AS TO ETHNIC ORIGIN OR RELIGIOUS CREED

On the order for introduction of bills:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 199, to amend the Criminal Code (discrimination).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): The purpose of this amendment is to secure for every Canadian the equal right to work without being discriminated against because of his or her ethnic origin or religious creed. By defending this right, parliament will give legal sanction to certain sections of the universal declaration of human rights, for which the Canadian delegation voted at the general assembly of the United Nations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SURPLUS CROWN ASSETS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS CROWN ASSETS BY CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the first reading of Bill No. 195 (from the Senate) to amend the Surplus Crown Assets Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 196, for the relief of Arthur Colpron.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 197, for the relief of Berengere Pare Fuller.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 198, for the relief of Enid Dorothy MacRae Gauley.—Mr. Winkler.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—REPRESENTATION OF WESTERN CANADA ON BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has consideration been given by the government since the appointment of Mr. William Parker to replace Mr. E. J. Young, or since October 26, 1949 to representations from the Winnipeg chamber of commerce asking that western Canada be given increased and equitable representation on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways?
2. If so, what is the result of such consideration?

Mr. Winters:

1. Since the appointment of Mr. William Parker, no further consideration has been given by the government to the request of the Winnipeg chamber of commerce for increased representation for western Canada on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway Company, as the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1936, provides that the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway Company shall consist of seven directors, and it is not the intention of the government to amend this act at the present time.

2. See answer to No. 1.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES—OCEANOGRAPHY

Mr. Isnor:

1. Has the Department of Fisheries a branch dealing with oceanography?
2. If so (a) where is it located; (b) what is the name of the person in charge; (c) how many persons are employed in this work?
3. Have any members of the branch done work on the Atlantic coast? If so, at what places?
4. Has work been carried out on the Pacific coast? If so, at what places?
5. Have exploration surveys been carried out in the Arctic? If so, of what nature?
6. Is it planned in the near future to expand the oceanographic operations of the east (Atlantic) and west (Pacific) coasts?

Mr. MacNaught:

1. The fisheries research board, as the scientific arm of the Department of Fisheries, has carried out investigations in the field of oceanography, both on the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts, for many years, particularly in connection with the studies of the biological aspects of oceanography.

During the late war the oceanographers of the board worked closely with the Royal Canadian Navy and the national research council in the field of physical-chemical oceanography. From this work the Canadian joint committee consists of representatives of the Royal Canadian Navy, the national research council and the fisheries research board, and the hydrographic and meteorological services co-operate in the work of the committee.

2. (a) The function of the joint committee is the further co-operative oceanographic research in Canada, to define policy and to direct the work of the two oceanographic groups. The Atlantic group is located at the Atlantic biological station, St. Andrews, N.B. The Pacific group is located at the Pacific biological station, Nanaimo, B.C.

(c) Four persons in the Atlantic group and six in the Pacific group, as on November 15, 1949.

3. Yes. The Atlantic group, following the planned program of the joint committee and with the assistance of vessels and personnel supplied by the Royal Canadian Navy, the national research council, the Department of Fisheries and the hydrographic and meteorological services, have made oceanographic observations in the gulf of St. Lawrence and the Scotian shelf.

4. Yes. The Pacific group, following the planned program as in (3) and with similar assistance, have made oceanographic observations on a number of points off the British Columbia coast, including Chatham sound, strait of Georgia and Alberni canal. Observations were also taken at a number of shore stations, and off Swiftsure banks.

5. Yes. By the fisheries research board in Ungava bay, where an investigation of the fisheries resources of the eastern Arctic has been in progress since 1947.

Oceanographic observations were also made in Hudson bay during the Royal Canadian Navy cruise there in 1948.

During the summer of 1949 oceanographic observations were made during a joint United States Navy-Royal Canadian Navy cruise in the Bering sea.

6. Yes. As soon as trained oceanographic personnel and ships are available.

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY—APPLICATION FOR INTERIM INCREASE IN RATES

Mr. Church:

1. What action, if any, will be taken by the government to prevent the Bell Telephone Company imposing a surtax of ten per cent on all bills?
2. Is it within the powers of the transport board at present to allow the Bell Telephone Company to take this action now?
3. What action has or will be taken in the matter?

Mr. Winters:

1. The company's application for an interim increase of 10 per cent will be duly heard by the board of transport commissioners in accordance with the provisions of the Railway Act.

2. Yes.

3. See answer to No. 1.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

FILMS FOR GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS—PRODUCTION BY COMMERCIAL FIRMS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What is the total expenditure in each of the years 1946 to 1949 for the production and processing of films for any government department or departments by commercial firms, giving particulars of the said commercial firms and the amount paid to each?
2. Did the national film board make any decision during said years that it considered the use of commercial firms for the production of films advisable in the public interest? If so, in what case or cases, on what date or dates did it so decide and for what reason in each case?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION—EMPLOYEES

Mr. Pouliot:

For a chart of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, indicating positions, grades, names and salaries.

UNEMPLOYMENT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPRESENTATIONS FROM LEGION AND LABOUR ORGANIZATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I have a question to ask the Minister of Labour, which in his absence I shall address to his parliamentary assistant. Has the Minister of Labour had a communication from the Canadian Legion and labour organizations in Vancouver in regard to the growing unemployment situation, and asking for a government program?

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): I shall make inquiries and let the hon. member know as soon as possible.

IMMIGRATION

TRANSFER OF DEPARTMENTAL PERSONNEL FROM OTTAWA TO MONTREAL AND TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser), as reported at page 2022 of Hansard, asked if Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are supplying houses to the Department of Mines and Resources for immigration staff in Montreal and Toronto. The answer is no.

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources, arising out of an article which appeared last night in the press. Why are certain personnel of the immigration branch being moved to Toronto and Montreal before Christmas? Why the rush?

Hon. Colin Gibson (Minister of Mines and Resources): That question was asked the other day, and I think it was then stated by Mr. Speaker that the question should be placed on the order paper. However, the reason is that the immigration branch is opening district offices in central and eastern Canada. That has been announced, and employees were informed some three months ago. While some of them may be required to move before Christmas, it will be advantageous to many of them if they move their families before or during the Christmas season so that their children may begin their school terms in the new localities after the Christmas vacation.

MERCHANT SHIPPING

REPORTED AGREEMENT BETWEEN UNITED KINGDOM AND CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I have a question to ask the Minister of Transport. Perhaps in his absence one of the other ministers would deal with it. A press dispatch today indicates that an agreement is being negotiated with respect to merchant shipping between the United Kingdom and Canada. May we have a statement in that regard?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I know nothing of such an agreement. I shall make inquiries, and if there is any information I shall be glad to give it to the house.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

FLOUR MILLING INDUSTRY—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CERTAIN DOCUMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask the Secretary of State if he will see that the omission from sessional paper No. 53-I, tabled by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) yesterday, is rectified, and that the document entitled "Memorandum of talk with chairman" on June 21, 1943, is included, so that the sessional paper may be complete and intelligible?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I shall inquire into the matter.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask a question of the Minister of Justice? Yesterday he tabled a return to a motion for the production of papers moved on November 14. There was another motion, moved on the same day, asking for letters, memoranda and communications from Mr. Donald Gordon or any member of the staff of the wartime prices and trade board to the flour milling industry or any flour milling company authorizing the making or maintenance of price agreements between December 1, 1941 and September 15, 1947, or subsequently. Do I understand there are no communications, and that nothing further is to be tabled?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will understand that, up to date, in examining the voluminous files we have not turned up any such written communications from either Mr. Taylor or Mr. Gordon. However, there is still a very great deal of examining to be done. I was going to speak to my hon. friend about this and suggest to him—I believe he has already agreed in another instance—to remove any reference to other officials of the board—

[Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West).]

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Garson: —which would cause a very extensive inquiry.

Mr. Coldwell: I understood that that was in connection with the other return.

Mr. Garson: No; I think it was in connection with both.

Mr. Coldwell: I am satisfied.

Mr. Garson: That is the reason why we could not bring down the return before. In order to be able to say that the information had been given, we would have to go through all the files. As a matter of fact I had hoped to have an opportunity to speak to the hon. gentleman about this, but I did not have time yesterday to do so.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO PHOTOGRAPH TO BE TAKEN BY NATIONAL FILM BOARD

Mr. Speaker: May I make a brief announcement? I have been requested by the national film board and the Canadian Press to allow them to take a photograph of the house while it is in session. At previous parliaments pictures have been taken, at a time when many of the members sitting on committees or attending to other business have been out of the chamber. I am suggesting to the film board and the Canadian Press that the picture be taken next Wednesday morning at eleven o'clock.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INSTITUTION AND CONDUCT OF PROSECUTIONS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, November 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson for the second reading of Bill No. 144, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) continues his remarks I should like to draw the attention of the house to a ruling which I made earlier in this debate on a question that was raised as to whether the whole of the McGregor report was debatable. On that occasion I ruled that the whole report was not debatable, but only those portions which were relevant to this bill. I ruled also that it was permissible only to debate the principle of the amending bill which is before the house, and not the principle of the Combines Investigation Act. I stated also that frequently some leeway was allowed—I think the word I used then was "licence"—and I have allowed considerable leeway. We have had an extended debate, and, unless the house thinks otherwise, it would be my opinion that we should conform more to the rules and procedure of the house and discuss only those portions of the McGregor report which relate to this particular bill.

Mr. Knowles: It does seem to me that if this ruling is to be applied against the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) there should be some clarification. Perhaps, sir, you would permit some discussion of the point before—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute—before it becomes necessary for Your Honour to discriminate between different members. There are others in the house who may wish to discuss the matter as the hon. member for Lake Centre is discussing it, which I think he has a right to do. I am prepared to speak to the point now or at any other time.

Mr. Speaker: I hardly think that further discussion is necessary at this time. I had allowed a full discussion when I made my ruling. I assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that I shall do my best not to discriminate between hon. members.

I think hon. members will realize that I am in a difficult position. It is going to be hard for me to determine just when an hon. member is referring to a section of the report that relates to this bill and when he is not. All I can do at this time is to ask the co-operation of all hon. members.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavour to keep within the purview of your ruling in the discussion of so important a matter as the various amendments to the Combines Investigation Act that have been presented to the house by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). I feel sure you will agree, sir, that in discussing those amendments we should be permitted to review some of the events of the last year in relation to the Combines Investigation Act as it was, with a view to ascertaining whether, if these amendments are allowed, there will be any assurance that they will be enforced and that the law will be upheld, rather than the practice followed which has prevailed during the last year.

At the time of adjournment yesterday I was endeavouring to answer in general language some of the statements made by the Minister of Justice as to why the law as it was, and as it still is, had not been enforced, had not been lived up to, had not been implemented so far as publication was concerned. The section having to do with publication is one of the most important provisions of the act. Indeed I think it was the former prime minister who said that publicity in connection with combines investigation was the antiseptic that was required in order to secure enforcement.

I suggest that when the government introduces these amendments parliament has a right to be assured that if they are approved—in a general way we accept the necessity for the amendments, reserving the right to discuss whether trial by jury should be taken away—they will be enforced. In considering these amendments one must necessarily take into consideration the events that have occurred and the answer given yesterday by the Minister of Justice to the question as to failure of the government to carry out the provisions of the act.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know how far the hon. member intends to proceed with his references to the clause in the act relating to publication, but there is nothing in the bill before the house amending that section, or, as I can see, relating to that section. I am not objecting to a reference to the clause, but I do not think it is debatable.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I always bow to your rulings, Mr. Speaker. Surely opportunity—I advance this by way of argument—should be afforded to hon. members to answer the statements made yesterday by the Minister of Justice when he dealt at length with the excuses for the failure of this government to publish.

Mr. Speaker: I must say to the hon. member that that opportunity was given to the house yesterday. When the Minister of Justice spoke on the amendment he did not close the debate, and other hon. members could have answered him at that time. As I said before, it is going to be difficult for me to keep hon. members in the straight and narrow path, shall I say, so far as this bill is concerned, but I think I have expressed the principle which should be followed.

Mr. Knowles: I know that hon. members—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: I am raising a point of order, and I expect some hon. members to boo. But members of this house still have rights, and I think that this point should be cleared up.

In fairness to Your Honour I do not think it should be something that is left to you to decide. It seems to me that the house itself should reach a decision as to what are the rights of hon. members in these circumstances.

I would point out, sir, that when you gave your ruling on November 14 on the point raised by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the discussion had been only with respect to the point that the Prime Minister raised. I would remind you that the point raised by the Prime Minister was whether or not we should discuss on the second reading of the bill any matter that had been discussed on a motion to go into supply. When you ruled, sir, that that point of order was not to be sustained, you gave an alternative objection to wide latitude, namely, the principle of relevancy to the second reading of a bill. The restrictions you suggest that the hon. member for Lake Centre should now observe arise from the suggestion Your Honour made that on second reading of an amending bill we should confine the discussion to the clauses of the act that is being amended.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I say to the hon. member for Lake Centre that I do not recall at the moment whether my ruling was appealed. If my memory serves me correctly, no one took exception to it, and I do not think I should be asked to change it now.

Mr. Knowles: I am not asking you, sir, to change it.

Mr. Speaker: After a ruling has been made, no further debate is allowed. I think the hon. member for Lake Centre will agree with me as to that. My ruling could have been appealed, but it was not, and I do not think I should allow further discussion of it at this time. The hon. member for Lake Centre has the floor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in view of your ruling—and there was no appeal from it—I now move in amendment to the motion for second reading of the bill, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:

"While this house is at all times anxious to assist in remedying any defects in the law with respect to combinations in restraint of trade that operate against the public interest, it regrets that His Majesty's ministers have failed to comply with the mandatory requirement of publication of reports under the Combines Investigation Act and that before inviting parliament to enact the said bill have failed to give any assurance that there will be no similar breach of the constitution in respect of this or any other act passed by the parliament of Canada."

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I should like to say that the amendment is out of order from the point of view of common sense. I appeal to the common sense of all hon. members, including the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The first part of the amendment indicates that the hon. gentleman and his seconder are anxious that a remedy should be provided to restrict the operation of combines, and yet by the amendment and their speeches they delay that being done. The amendment comprises three suggestions made by Mr. McGregor. He was either right or wrong.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: If in the opinion of the hon. gentleman he was right, hon. members opposite cannot oppose the legislation. They have no common sense.

Mr. Speaker: It appears to me that the amendment may be out of order because it does not relate to the bill. I think the hon. member is moving his amendment under citation 657 of Beauchesne. Even if it came within that reference, it would still have to relate to the bill. May, thirteenth edition, page 391, makes it quite clear that "the principle of relevancy in an amendment governs every such proposed resolution". I rule that the amendment is not in order. Shall the motion carry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, have you made a ruling already?

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely in this house we have the right to argue a case.

Mr. Speaker: I thought I gave the hon. member the right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With the greatest of deference, no.

Mr. Speaker: Far be it from me to try to prevent an hon. member from expressing his opinion if he thinks a motion is in order. I waited, and the hon. member did not rise. I think I should hear the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There has been no change in this regard since 1858. In that year a similar amendment was presented to the British House of Commons; it is to be found in the Commons Journals, 1857-58, at page 65. It is also quoted in May as still being in effect. The entry to which I refer reads as follows:

The order of the day being read, for the second reading of the Conspiracy to Murder bill;

And a motion being made, and the question being proposed, that the bill be now read a second time;

An amendment was proposed to be made to the question, by leaving out from the word "that" to the end of the question, in order to add the words "this house hears with much concern that it is alleged that recent attempts upon the life of the Emperor of the French have been devised in England, and expresses its detestation of such guilty enterprises; . . .

These are the significant words.

. . . that this house is ready at all times to assist in remedying any defects in the criminal law which, after due investigation, are proved to exist, yet it cannot but regret that Her Majesty's government, previously to inviting the house to amend the law of conspiracy by the second reading of this bill at the present time, has not felt it to be their duty to make some reply to the important dispatch received from the French government . . . and which has been laid before parliament."

That amendment is in almost identical words with the present one. I submit, having regard to the fact that ever since 1858 it has remained on the Journals and has been quoted with approval as an example of an amendment on second reading, that my amendment is in order.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to add two or three other examples of procedure in the United Kingdom parliament in addition to that which the hon. member for Lake Centre has quoted.

On the 12th of April, 1866, the question was proposed that the Representation of the People bill be read a second time. An amendment was proposed that all the words from the word "that" to the end of the question be left out in order to add these words:

This house, while ready to consider, with a view to its settlement, the question of parliamentary reform, is of opinion that it is inexpedient to discuss a bill for the reduction of the franchise in England and Wales, until the house has before it the entire scheme contemplated by the government for the amendment of the representation of the people.

It seems to me that is a very close analogy. In this instance the parliament at Westminster did not want to discuss one section of a question until it had before it the entire scheme. We in this house feel that we should not be confined to the discussion of just a few clauses of the Combines Investigation Act without having an opportunity to discuss the entire administration of that act, especially at a time when an important provision of the act has been violated.

There was a similar instance in the United Kingdom parliament on June 23, 1853; and I quote from the Journals:

The order of the day being read, for the second reading of the government of India bill:

And a motion being made, and the question being proposed, that the bill be now read a second time;

An amendment was proposed to be made to the question, by leaving out from the word "That" to the end of the question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this house, further information is necessary to enable parliament to legislate with advantage for the permanent government of India; and that at this late period of the session, it is inexpedient to proceed with a measure which, while it disturbs existing arrangements, cannot be considered as a final settlement," instead thereof.

There, I suggest, is another close analogy. The House of Commons at Westminster did not want to discuss part of the problem related to the government of India when the whole problem was not permanently settled. We here feel that we should not be restricted to discussing just the few sections of the Combines Investigation Act which the minister has brought in; rather we should have the right to discuss the whole administration of the act, particularly at a time when an important provision of the act has been violated.

Another case occurred in the parliament at Westminster on May 28, 1891. This is a long amendment; therefore I shall summarize it. It had to do with the fisheries off the coast of Newfoundland. The government had brought in a bill dealing with that question. In the meantime the house of assembly in Newfoundland had passed a certain resolution, and the request of the mover of the amendment to the motion for second reading was that any discussion of this bill, dealing as it did with only one phase of the whole question, be deferred until the representations of the house of assembly of Newfoundland had been taken into consideration.

On this whole question I also direct attention to an interesting sentence at page 509 of Bourinot, fourth edition. This is one of the pages to which Your Honour referred in giving a recent decision:

The second reading of a bill is that stage when it is proper to enter into a discussion and propose a motion relative to the principle of the measure, The Senate has a rule on the subject:

"64. The principle of a bill is usually debated at its second reading."

The Commons have no rule on the subject, but the practice of the house is always to discuss the principle of a bill at this stage.

I emphasize this for Your Honour's consideration: this House of Commons has no standing order or rule which says what is to happen on second reading. We have citations, we have excerpts from Speakers' decisions, and we have had comments made from the floor during the years, but there is no binding rule. Common sense, if I may quote the authority from Temiscouata, would seem to suggest that what is in order is anything relevant to the bill before the house. The bill before us, as the title makes clear, is a bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act. Surely that makes it clear that the Combines Investigation Act is now before us.

I would also point to two very short sentences in May, the first at page 298, coming under the chapter dealing with the same question not being offered twice, which reads:

. . . an entire bill may be regarded as one question, which is not decided until it has passed.

The other is on page 317, shortly after the famous "wholesome restraint" sentence, in these words:

This rule, however, does not apply to debates upon different stages of a bill . . .

My contention is that since the whole bill is to be taken as one, the discussion opened by the Minister of Justice yesterday, in speaking at another stage of this bill, is still before us, and that in effect the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre is pertinent to the discussion of the Minister of Justice yesterday.

Life is often like this. I confess that I had hoped myself to be in a position to move an amendment to this bill. That opportunity was acquired by the hon. member for Lake Centre, however, by virtue of his getting the floor before me. I mention that, not merely to record what I had intended to do, but to indicate the objectivity of the position I am taking. From my personal standpoint it might be better if this amendment were ruled out of order, which would give me a chance to move one of my own, but I am taking an objective position. I contend that the rights of members of this house, to whatever party they belong, should be defended when they are called into question. I feel very strongly that this amendment—this motion of censure, as it is—which has been moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre, should be regarded as in order.

Mr. Garson: The observations made by the last two preceding speakers would be quite relevant to the matter now before the house, I think, if the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) had not previously moved an amendment to the motion for second reading of the bill, and if that amendment had not been disposed of. But I suggest that the facts in this instance are these.

First of all, on a motion to go into committee of supply, we had a debate upon the substantial subject matter of the flour report and the actions of the government in relation thereto. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed out, however, at that time nothing was recorded in the Journals covering that debate; therefore it was proper at a later stage to refer to the same matter again in a subsequent debate. That second occasion was provided when the leader of the opposition moved in amendment that the said bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce, with instructions that they have power to send for persons, papers and records, and that in addition to other recommendations in respect to the subject matter of the said bill they should also have power to report upon the extent to which the effective administration of legislation relating to restrictive trade practices has been or is being prejudiced by the action of the government in failing to carry out the mandatory requirements of the existing law.

In other words the purpose—and the very proper purpose, from the standpoint of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition—of that amendment was to enable this house to discuss the flour report and the actions of the government in relation thereto. But, sir, once that discussion had taken place, and at very great length; once the house had voted upon that amendment, then surely any attempt under some new formula or some different language to bring the same subject matter before the house for a third time would be out of order. On that ground I suggest that the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre should be declared out of order.

Mr. Drew: Before you reach a decision, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the amendment I moved called for a direct reference of the subject matter of this bill to a committee of the house. That was its declared purpose.

Mr. Garson: With instructions.

Mr. Drew: With an indication from the house as to the terms of reference to that committee, which is in keeping with the rules. May I add that the use of the words, "the subject matter of the bill," instead of a reference to the bill itself, was in keeping with the practice in that respect; therefore the amendment with which the house has dealt was one which would have had the effect of placing this bill before the committee. Although the Minister of Justice saw fit to interpret certain aspects of the discussion that took place as a motion that had the effect of an expression of want of confidence, this is an interpretation which in no way affects the declared purpose of the motion.

The house voted on the amendment, and as a result of their decision the bill does not go before the committee. An amendment is now presented to the effect that the house express its opinion on what has been done; that was not contained in the other amendment. It would only be by a very broad inference that the contents of this amendment could be stated to have been before the members of this house when they voted on the other one. In the other one, the members were deciding whether or not this bill should be referred to a committee with the instructions that are an essential feature of a motion of the kind. This is a straight motion criticizing the action of the government in that respect, and I submit it is strictly in conformity with the authority that has been read by the member for Lake Centre. It is an authority of many years' standing which in this house and in other legislative bodies with the same system has been quoted repeatedly to show that it is proper to present a question of this kind to the house. I submit that the motion is in order, and in keeping with the rules and established practice.

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to say two or three words in connection with the points that have been made. In my opinion this amendment is in order. The first thing we have to keep in mind is that the question before the house is the Combines Investigation Act and the amendment of that act. If this bill had been brought before the house as an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act, abolition of juries,—which is a section in the bill—then any debate and any amendment would have to be limited to that point. The broad title of the bill, however, is an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act; therefore, as has been demonstrated in this house on a number of occasions, the whole act is open. The Minister of Justice shakes his head.

Mr. Garson: Horizontally, too.

Mr. MacInnis: Yes, and the time may arrive when I can demonstrate to the Minister of Justice that that is a ruling which has been made in this house. Since there is no definite standing order relating to this, the reference is citation 755 of Beauchesne's second edition. Let me read it:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill,—

Surely that is clear and broad.

> —or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction—

The circumstances connected with the introduction of this bill are quite clear, and they are matters that are before us.

> —or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

According to this citation, the amendment that can be moved at this time is so broad, Mr. Speaker, there is no possibility in my opinion of ruling it out. The mere fact that there has been another amendment on another principle cannot be taken now as a reason for ruling out an amendment that deals with an altogether different matter. I suggest to you, sir, that the amendment proposed by the member for Lake Centre is in order.

Mr. Speaker: I have heard the views of the members. May I say again that I regret that I started to give a decision without hearing the views of the members. I was under the impression no member wished to speak to the point of order. I have no intention of changing my practice of hearing the members when a question of order arises.

A number of points have been raised, but may I deal first with the reference to citation 755 of Beauchesne's second edition, which is 657 of his third edition. This reference has been read by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), and it appears to be so wide as to allow amendments which do not refer directly to the wording of the original motion. I think I should point out, however, that those amendments must necessarily be relevant to the bill which is before the house. May's Parliamentary Practice, thirteenth edition page 391, states, as I mentioned earlier, that "the principle of relevancy in an amendment governs every such proposed resolution." In view of my ruling earlier today, no hon. member has satisfied me that this amendment is sufficiently relevant to make it in order. Moreover, a close inspection of the references made by the hon. members for Lake Centre and Winnipeg North Centre does not disclose anything to disturb that principle.

The hon. member for Vancouver East also said that the whole act is open to debate. I cannot agree with him. I gave a ruling to the contrary last week. He stated that he could refer me to other rulings. I could probably remind him that I gave a different ruling myself when I was Deputy Speaker, but since then I have had the advantage of the advice of the members of this house, and I find I was wrong then, but I believe I was right last week.

A question has been raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) to the effect that this amendment is so similar to the amendment which was moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that it cannot be moved a second time. In reply to that argument, the leader of the opposition has stated that his motion was to refer the matter to a committee. He did not deny that the contents of this amendment and his amendment were practically the same. Let me remind hon.

members of the house that if the contents of this bill were referred to a committee, the committee would have to report back to the house and there would be an opportunity of debating that report and all that took place in the committee. The proposed amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre is sufficiently, in material respects, similar to the amendment moved earlier in this debate by the leader of the opposition to be inadmissible.

For the reasons which I have given, I am ruling the amendment out of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I regret that I must respectfully appeal from your ruling.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

Mr. Garson moved that Bill No. 144 be now read a second time. Mr. Diefenbaker moved, seconded by Mr. Green, that all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:

While this house is at all times anxious to assist in remedying any defects in the law with respect to combinations in restraint of trade that operate against the public interest, it regrets that His Majesty's ministers have failed to comply with the mandatory requirement of publication of reports under the Combines Investigation Act and that before inviting parliament to enact the said bill have failed to give any assurance that there will be no similar breach of the constitution in respect of this or any other act passed by the parliament of Canada.

I ruled the amendment out of order on the ground that it was not relevant to the act which is now under consideration, and also on account of its similarity to the amendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), which was recently before the house.

From this ruling the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and others appealed. The question is on the Speaker's ruling.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has the floor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was on my feet when the point of order was raised. Do I lose my place because I sat down?

Mr. Pouliot: I rise to a point of order—

Mr. Ferguson: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Pouliot: The hon. gentleman—and when I say "gentleman" I refer to the hon. member for Lake Centre—has spoken already on the second reading and has moved an amendment. He can speak only once at that stage of the bill. While I regret that the standing order will not permit me the pleasure of listening to him speak once more on the same matter, I submit that the floor should be given to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Speaker: According to the procedure followed in the house when an hon. member makes a motion, sits down, hands the written motion to the Speaker, as happened in this case, and the Speaker reads the motion, the member cannot speak again to the question. I call on the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us is that of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) for the second reading of Bill No. 144 to amend the Combines Investigation Act. The first sentence in the explanatory notes to the minister's bill reads:

> The amendments provided in this bill are designed to facilitate enforcement of the Combines Investigation Act, and of related Criminal Code provisions.

When the Minister of Justice introduced the bill on November 4 he opened with remarks which were substantially the same as those contained in the explanatory notes from which I have just quoted. As reported on page 1439 of Hansard, he said:

> This bill is designed to carry into effect three recommendations of the combines investigation commissioner which are designed to strengthen the enforcement of the Combines Investigation Act and the related legislation contained in section 498 of the Criminal Code.

I think it is appropriate at this moment for me to emphasize the fact that it is indeed one of the duties of the Minister of Justice to see that the laws of this land are obeyed. In line with that duty it is appropriate that if he discovers any act under his administration to be not adequate for its enforcement, he should at some stage bring to the house a bill rectifying those shortcomings.

Chapter 106 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, is an act respecting the Department of Justice. The duties of the Minister of Justice are set out in section four, and I should like to quote the first two paragraphs of that section as follows:

> The Minister of Justice shall
> (a) be the official legal adviser of the governor general—

Note that that is the governor general, not the governor in council. The minister, as has been said so often by the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), is the keeper of the king's conscience. To continue:

> —and the legal member of His Majesty's privy council for Canada;
> (b) see that the administration of public affairs is in accordance with law;

As I have said, it is proper and appropriate for the Minister of Justice, when he finds that a statute under his jurisdiction is deficient in such a way as to make it difficult for him adequately to enforce it, to bring before parliament a bill that would seek to correct those shortcomings. However, in the light of the circumstances connected with the introduction of this measure—I am referring now solely to such circumstances as were known to all of us before the minister made his speech yesterday, and I shall not, sir, transgress your ruling; I will not try to discuss what the minister said yesterday, despite what I may think about the ruling—in the light of the circumstances that were known to us before that pitiful defence was made yesterday, the action of the minister in bringing Bill 144 before the house at this time is an affront to this parliament.

When was the notice given for the introduction of Bill No. 144? As will be seen from Votes and Proceedings, it was given just before the deadline of six o'clock on Wednesday, November 2. What had happened on Wednesday, November 2? At three o'clock that afternoon two questions were asked on the orders of the day, one by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and the other by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar wanted to know if there was in existence a report from the commissioner having to do with the flour milling industry and if so whether it would be tabled, and the hon. member for Vancouver East wanted to know whether there was any truth in the rumour that Mr. McGregor had resigned.

Please note that there were some other things that this house knew before yesterday which are part of this whole circumstance. We know by reference to sessional paper 53-F, tabled by the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) in response to a motion of mine, that there was on September 13 an interview between the Minister of Justice and a delegation from the Canadian Manufacturers Association having to do with the administration of and proposed amendments to the Combines Investigation Act. According to this sessional paper it would appear that discussion of the whole question of amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, some of which are before us and some of which are not before us, would be in order in this debate. I will not take the time to go through it except to say that on the basis of that sessional paper—and, by the way, the Secretary of State has admitted to me it is not complete and that there are supplementary returns to come down later—it is evident that the question of amending the Combines Investigation Act and the question of its administration and proper enforcement have been under consideration by the Minister of Justice for a long time. He has lived with this matter night and day since last January.

Without going into the details of the sessional paper at this moment, I come to the last point, namely, that on September 13 there was this interview between a delegation representing the Canadian Manufacturers Association and the Minister of Justice. The burden of the interview is set out in a memorandum contained in this document, and it indicates that that organization wanted certain amendments to the Combines Investigation Act. It is also clear that they have been wanting them for a long time, and that they wanted them in the session of parliament of last January, February, March and April. But none of these considerations, none of these representations, and nothing arising out of the extended consideration that the minister gave to the problem prompted him at any time prior to November 2 to give notice of a motion for leave to introduce a bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

On September 21, as is now publicly known, my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), proposed to ask certain questions of the Minister of Justice. I need not go over what happened on that occasion, but it seems to me there is another point that should have led the minister to take action on this most important matter. On October 22 there was the three-hour discussion in the minister's office in which four people were involved, the minister and three others whose names are well known. Even that did not provoke the minister to the point of introducing the bill now before us. On October 29 Mr. McGregor sent his resignation to the Minister of Justice, but even that did not do the trick. On Wednesday afternoon, November 2, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and then the hon. member for Vancouver East asked questions which were embarrassing, and lo and behold, when we get our copies of Votes and Proceedings for November 2, which reached our desks the next morning, we discover that action is at last the order of the day.

Mr. Garson: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Gladly.

Mr. Garson: He is not trying to take the credit for these amendments for his party, is he?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, I can—December 4, 1947, in my letter to the prime minister.

Mr. Garson: This is the second instalment now.

Mr. MacInnis: There is one thing that is certain. There is not much credit coming to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has the floor.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you, although I am also grateful for the help.

The point I am making in answer to the Minister of Justice is that the credit for provoking the minister to give notice of this bill goes entirely to what happened on the floor of the house. None of these other things did it, and I have not told the house the story I could tell if I went through sessional paper No. 53-F. Then when it becomes evident, because the minister is not able to answer the question on November 2, that there is something strange going on, notice is filed that afternoon that Bill 144 is to be introduced. The next day, Thursday, November 3, as is recorded in Hansard, we got the answers to the questions asked the day before. The answer to one question is a simple yes, that there is a report from the commissioner on the flour milling industry and that it will be tabled. The answer to the other question is likewise a simple yes, namely, that the commissioner had tendered his resignation. In the same exchange that took place on Thursday, November 3, I asked the minister if, when he tabled the report, it would be within fifteen days of the date he received it.

His most interesting answer was that the report would be tabled on Monday. I asked him when he had received it, and was given a further interesting answer, namely, "some time ago".

Then came the next day, Friday, November 4. I felt it was only fair to the minister and to all of us that he should have the opportunity to tell us precisely when he received the report. Therefore I asked him that question, and it is recorded on page 1438 of Hansard. I want you to note, Mr. Speaker, that on page 1439 of Hansard there is recorded the introduction and first reading of the bill. Note how closely these circumstances are related. I should like to read from page 1438, as follows:

Mr. Knowles: Is the Minister of Justice now in position to answer the question I asked yesterday, namely, the date on which the flour milling report was transmitted to the Minister of Justice by the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act?

Mr. Garson: December 29, 1948.

There was nothing more to be said; there it was. The Minister of Justice had been caught cold breaking the act. A few minutes later, as recorded on the very next page—page 1439 of Hansard— the Minister of Justice stands up in the house and asks for leave to introduce and move first reading of a bill to strengthen the enforcement of an act which he had admitted a few minutes earlier he had broken. Was the house ever so grossly affronted and insulted as it was by the circumstances connected with the introduction of this measure?

It is my intention to move an amendment stating that very fact. I suppose I should expect that at some point someone will wonder whether my amendment is in order. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and everybody else, that it is. I am glad to note acceptance by the Minister of Justice, with his broad smile, that it undoubtedly is in order. I might as well move it now. May I say that in drafting the amendment I paid particularly close attention to citation 657 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, which of course is taken from May's thirteenth edition. To paraphrase a part of that citation, it says that it is competent for a member at the second reading stage to move an amendment, and these are the words that I wish to quote directly:

. . . expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution. . . .

The reference is to the measure. In other words, it is quite clear that a member of the house has the right, on the motion for second reading of a bill, both to speak and to move an amendment expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with the introduction or prosecution of the measure then before the house.

Having said that, I take it that the terms of the amendment which I shall propose will be obvious; because even at the risk of labouring the point I have made it clear that I feel, and I think most hon. members of the house feel, that the circumstances connected with the introduction of this measure constitute an affront to parliament. This is particularly so, as I have been able to point out, because of the fact that it is on the very day that the embarrassing questions are first asked that notice is filed that the bill is to be introduced, and it is on the very day that the minister is caught cold in the admission he has broken the act that he stands up in the house and moves to introduce a bill for the stated purpose of strengthening the enforcement of the act, the breaking of which he has just admitted.

So, Mr. Speaker, I think I shall read my amendment now, but on second thought I will not move it now and thus make the mistake made by the hon. member for Lake Centre. In other words, I do not think I had better send it to you yet; that might end my right to speak.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You will end everything if you do.

Mr. Knowles: My amendment, when I move it, will be in these terms:

That Bill No. 144 be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house the circumstances connected with the introduction and prosecution of this measure, namely, the action of the government in seeking amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, for the stated purpose of strengthening the enforcement thereof, at the very time when it has just been discovered that the Minister of Justice, with the approval of the government, has deliberately violated section 27, subsection (5), of the said act, is an affront to parliament, and that further consideration of this bill should be deferred until this house, by this amendment, has censured the government for violating the said act by failing to make public until November 7, 1949, the report of the commissioner under the said act with respect to the flour milling industry, which was submitted to the Minister of Justice in its final form on February 23, 1949, and which he was required by law to make public not later than March 10, 1949.

I had this amendment here on my desk yesterday in slightly different form. The one change I made was with respect to the dates at the end of the motion. Before the Minister of Justice spoke yesterday I would have had the last part read "which was submitted to the Minister of Justice on December 29, 1948, and which he was required by law to make public not later than January 13, 1949." However, I am prepared to accept the minister's statement yesterday, in the two and a half hour defence he made, that he did not have that report in its final form until February

23, 1949. I think that is being very lenient. If I were in court for speeding at fifty miles an hour and I said to the magistrate, "But, Your Honour, my speedometer said thirty," I do not think it would do the trick. I believe the Minister of Justice should be bound by the date on the report, which he himself said on November 4 was the date he received it. But I am prepared to give him the benefit of the doubt. I am prepared to admit that he was busy up in Manitoba—

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order, I would ask the hon. member if he is speaking to his amendment before he moves it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was why I was ruled out.

Mr. Lesage: I think the hon. member is speaking to his amendment before it is moved. If he is speaking to the motion for second reading, I respectfully submit that he is out of order. He must move his amendment before speaking to it.

Mr. Speaker: I rather agree with the hon. member. If the amendment the hon. member proposes to submit to the house is not in order, then of course it is not in order for him to speak to it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is why he is speaking in this way.

Mr. Speaker: If there is some question whether or not the amendment is in order, that must be decided now, and the hon. member must not speak to his amendment. I think that is only fair; and in view of the ruling which prevented the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) from speaking, I do not think I should permit the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to speak to an amendment which may be out of order. It is true that was more or less of a technicality, when the hon. member for Lake Centre sat down and handed in his amendment, but I could not permit him to proceed then in any event. Nor can I at this time permit the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to discuss an amendment which may be out of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I moved an amendment. A question of order was raised; Your Honour stood, and I have always been deferential, so I sat down. Because I did so, I was ruled out. I make that statement in reply to Your Honour now. I never fail to sit down when the Speaker stands. Your Honour stood; I sat down, and then I was ruled out.

Mr. Speaker: I think that is a correct statement. The only thing the hon. member has not mentioned is the fact that he sent his amendment to me, and when it was handed to me I rose and read it to the house. Then, of course, the amendment was before the house. I am sorry the incident occurred, but without the unanimous consent of the house there was nothing I could have done which would have permitted the hon. member to speak again.

Mr. MacInnis: Speaking to the point of order that has been raised, surely no amendment or motion is before the house until it has been read by the Speaker. If it is not before the house, the hon. member cannot be ruled out of order for speaking to it. He has read the amendment he intends to move, but it is not yet before the house; and it must be taken in relation to the subject matter of the speech he is making.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We all listened attentively to the amendment being read, but we have not received an official copy of it. The hon. member read his amendment at length—

Mr. Coldwell: The amendment he thinks of moving; but he may yet change it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would expect the action to follow the thought in this connection. One does not read a proposed amendment without intending to move it. It seems to me this amendment is out of order, but the hon. member is such an expert in procedure that he is trying to discuss the amendment—

Mr. Casselman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid there cannot be a point of order here.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If the amendment is out of order, I cannot conceive that the hon. member should be given another fifteen minutes in which to discuss it. We know what the amendment is, and it contains statements which are not according to the facts and which were rebutted and refuted yesterday in the speech of the Minister of Justice. That is the basis of the proposed amendment; and when it is read by the Chair we shall discuss the question of its legality.

Mr. Coldwell: If the minister is going to refer to the speech of the Minister of Justice yesterday, I take it we shall all have the same privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The minister was speaking to a point of order; but as one hon. member has said already, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre must deal at this time with matters relevant to the main motion.

Mr. Garson: May I clear up just one point, on a question of privilege? It will be necessary to refer to my remarks yesterday in order to do so. In the course of his remarks on his amendment my hon. friend stated that I deliberately violated the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, with the approval of the government. I say, sir, I did not deliberately violate the Combines Investigation Act, and I insist that my hon. friend accept that statement and withdraw the imputation.

Mr. Knowles: There are several things here, with some of which I shall agree in order to get along. I shall deal in a moment with what the minister said. First may I say that, if Your Honour does not stop me, I intend to speak for a few minutes more on the second reading of the bill, but not in reference to my amendment. Then when I reach the point where it seems necessary to argue the things set out in my amendment, I shall move it and send it to Your Honour.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I doubt if the hon. member is right in that attitude, since he has taken the precaution of saying "if I am not stopped". At this point I do not think he can go back and speak to the proposed amendment, but must limit his remarks to the motion for second reading.

Mr. Knowles: My good friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) is getting excited unnecessarily. I said I would go back and confine my remarks to the second reading, and when I thought I could not talk longer without getting into this amendment, I would move it and send it to the Speaker to decide the point.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Knowles: I come back to the question of the circumstances relating to the introduction and prosecution of this measure. Surely that is germane to the bill. I draw attention to the day on which notice was given. Surely it is germane to the bill to note the day on which the bill was introduced and given first reading, and to note other circumstances connected with it at that time.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, I cannot be asked to withdraw the imputation, which the Minister of Justice asked me to withdraw, about the deliberate violation of the act. The minister has admitted it and has taken responsibility for it. At one stage of the game he was relieved of that responsibility by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who said the whole cabinet agreed to it. At another stage he was relieved by the Prime Minister, who said he bore part of the responsibility.

What the Minister of Justice is now saying, Mr. Speaker, makes the circumstances connected with the introduction and prosecution of this measure more than ever an affront to parliament. If a minister would rise in the house and say: We broke the law, but we felt that the circumstances were extenuating, and we throw ourselves on the mercy of the house, this debate would not continue. My friends opposite are laughing; they think the whole thing is a joke. I say that this is one of the most serious things that has happened in the parliament of Canada, indeed in any British parliament, in a long time.

I have in my hand a quotation from a publication which is as strongly opposed to the Combines Investigation Act as any publication could be. It is the Letter-Review, about the most reactionary publication that comes to the desks of members of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is hardly a fair observation.

Mr. Knowles: My friend does not think it is fair. All right. My point is that the editor, who does not like the provisions of the act in question, says that nevertheless the government has no excuse for violating those provisions. Let me quote his remarks directly.

> But the cabinet certainly was not justified in flouting the law by withholding publication. In the old days, at least in Britain, the government would have gone down to defeat on the admission that it had deliberately broken the law.

I submit that I have made no misstatement, despite the request of the Minister of Justice to withdraw the imputation, and despite the statement of the Minister of Public Works that there are misstatements of fact in my remarks or in my amendment. I have said nothing that can be withdrawn, because I have stated plain facts which three ministers —the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister —have admitted. My point is that—

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member please refer to the page in Hansard on which any one of the ministers has admitted any such thing? He has made a statement that the admission has been made; now let him show where it is.

Mr. Knowles: Here is the first one I pick up. At page 2083 of Hansard, the following appears:

> Mr. Knowles: Would the minister say whether at any point when he was thinking about this matter in January he saw anything in the law that gave him any authority not to publish it?
> Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Garson: That is not an admission.

Mr. Knowles: It is a clear-cut admission that the minister knew he had no authority not to publish that document.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member going to continue?

Mr. Knowles: Yes, I should like to come back at three o'clock with more answers to the question the Minister of Justice has put to me. There are so many facets to this matter, however, and so many potential points of order to anyone who is interested, it keeps one rather busy collecting all the relevant material and it makes it difficult to find enough space on one's desk for all the things to which one might wish to refer.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, just before one o'clock the Minister of Justice asked me to substantiate my reference to admissions that had been made by ministers of the crown. My statement was that it had been admitted that the Combines Investigation Act had been deliberately violated. I quoted one such admission just before one o'clock. I now have three or four more. At page 1500 of Hansard of November 7, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said:

> Therefore I called the attention of the Minister of Justice to the situation and urged him not to table the report without further investigation.

I submit that was a deliberate decision. Later the same minister said, as reported at page 1503 of Hansard:

> Many hon. members will say that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was not warranted in delaying publication of the report. I do not share that view. After having doubt cast upon the validity of certain conclusions contained in the report by some of his colleagues, of whom I was one, the report was held from publication with the full authority of the whole cabinet for further checking and consultation.

I submit that that too is evidence of a deliberate decision on the part of the cabinet, freely admitted by a minister. I turn now to page 1524 of Hansard, still November 7, 1949, where I asked the Minister of Justice this question:

> Mr. Knowles: Will the minister tell the house on what authority the government relied when it made the decision to violate the provisions of section 27 (5) of the act?
> Mr. Garson: Well, Mr. Speaker, it relied upon the fact that any democratic government is answerable to the people of the country for its acts.

There is no denial of the fact that it made the decision to violate the provisions of the act, but rather an attempt to justify the deliberate decision that had been made.

On page 1526 of Hansard of the same day the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), in concluding his remarks, said:

> And I now feel it is only fair to the Minister of Justice that I should inform the house that he had discussed these matters with me, and I had concurred in the line of conduct he was adopting. I should bear, therefore, a portion of the responsibility, if there is responsibility, for attempting to carry out the implied or expressed undertaking given to Canadian industry that if they did their best to help us win the war, they were not going to be pilloried afterwards under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. St. Laurent: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. St. Laurent: Is the hon. member assuming that all this happened before the fifteen days provided by the statute had elapsed, or that it is something that happened afterwards, and after the delay had elapsed?

Mr. Knowles: That is a fair question. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it makes no difference whether it was a decision, before the fifteen days had elapsed, to ignore the provisions of the act, or whether it was a deliberate decision taken after these fifteen days had elapsed, to continue violating the requirement to make public the report that Mr. McGregor had submitted to the minister.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must move my amendment. May I be quite frank to the house and say that if I carry on after moving the amendment I shall be speaking to it. Thus if any hon. member feels it is not in order, I admit that that will be the place to raise the point of order. May I say that during the noon recess I made a slight change in the wording which I read out this morning, for reasons that will be obvious.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis):

> That Bill No. 144 be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house the circumstances connected with the introduction and prosecution of this measure, namely, the action of the government in seeking amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, for the stated purpose of strengthening the enforcement thereof, at the very time when it has just been discovered that the Minister of Justice, with the approval of the government, has deliberately violated section 27, subsection 5 of the said act, is an affront to parliament, and that further consideration of this bill should be deferred until this house, by this amendment, has censured the government for violating the said act by failing to make public the report of the commissioner under the said act with respect to the flour milling industry within fifteen days, as required by law.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I think my amendment is in order, and I should like to go on; but if there is any doubt, this is the time to clear it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has moved his amendment.

Mr. Knowles: I have.

Mr. Speaker: If you had not I was going to be forced to inform you that your time had expired.

This is the third amendment of censure that has been presented to the house. On its face this amendment proposes to censure the government. It seems to me that the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) included censure. I shall be glad to hear representations from hon. members. I might say that it has been my custom to hear representations when questions of order are raised.

Sometimes I have thought that we have had a rather protracted debate on questions of order and as to the regularity of motions. I trust hon. members will make their remarks as brief as possible.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, there are some points which can be dealt with briefly, because they are not in dispute. From what Your Honour has said I feel that there is no doubt as to the correctness of the form of the amendment. It comes clearly within the provisions of citation 657 which permits a member to move an amendment on the motion for second reading of a bill expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction or prosecution.

Form No. 93 in Beauchesne's third edition also provides for an amendment which asks for the further consideration of a bill to be deferred until such-and-such has been done. Thus there is no doubt as to the form of my amendment. Also I think there is no doubt as to its relevancy, because in the very words of citation 657 it does relate precisely to the circumstances connected with the introduction and prosecution of the measure; indeed that wording is in my amendment.

The only question which, I take it, is raised by what Your Honour has just said is as to whether or not it is substantially similar to the amendment moved the other day by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew). In reply to that may I point out first of all that this is the first of the three amendments—and if I am not correct I shall stand to be corrected—in which the word "censure" appears. I believe I am correct in that. The amendment of the leader of the official opposition was that the subject matter of the minister's bill be referred to a committee, and that the committee have power to discuss the extent to which the violation of the provisions of the act was interfering with its enforcement. This is the first amendment in which it has been specifically asked that the house should censure the government, right here on the floor of parliament.

With regard to this whole question as to the similarity of motions, may I read briefly from May, thirteenth edition, beginning at page 295, under the chapter headed, "The Same Question or Bill may not be Twice Offered in a Session", where it states:

> It is possible, however, so far to vary the character of a motion as to withdraw it from the operation of the rule. Thus, in the session of 1845, no less than five distinct motions were made upon the subject of opening letters at the post office under warrants from the Secretary of State. They all varied in form and matter, so far as to place them beyond the restrictions: but in purpose they were the same and the debates raised upon them embraced the same matters.

I submit that the mere fact that my amendment might produce debate upon the same matters as did the amendment of the leader of the opposition does not of itself make my amendment similar to his. Further I would point out that there have been quite a number of precedents in the House of Commons where amendments which were seemingly similar but substantially different have been moved, and which have been the occasion for continuing debate in the same general field.

I would remind hon. members who were here in the session in November of 1944, when the conscription issue was before us, that a large number of amendments were moved, some of which were ruled out of order, and others not. They were similar, and dealt with the same subject.

Mr. Pouliot: They were not similar.

Mr. Knowles: They dealt with slightly different aspects, and the debate carried on, all of it in the same field of discussion.

But even more striking is what happened back in 1926 when the so-called customs scandal was before the house. On June 22, 1926, Mr. Mercier moved a motion for concurrence in the report of the special committee dealing with that matter. An amendment was moved by Mr. Stevens, as reported at page 461 of the Journals for that year.

At page 465 I find that Mr. Woodsworth moved a subamendment, and Mr. Meighen raised a point of order with respect to that subamendment. Mr. Speaker reserved his decision until a later sitting. On Thursday, June 24, as reported at page 469, Mr. Speaker ruled Mr. Woodsworth's subamendment in order.

Then later, as recorded at page 475, Mr. Woodsworth's subamendment was defeated on a vote. Then on Friday, June 25, as recorded at page 477 of the Journals, Mr. Fansher moved another subamendment, against which a point of order was raised on the ground that it was similar to the one Mr. Woodsworth had moved. But by a vote of the house that amendment was declared to be in order.

I shall not take time to read all the details, because they are lengthy. If I were to do so I would be acting contrary to Your Honour's suggestion. However if I did Your Honour would see at once that there is considerable similarity as between these two subamendments, and it was the similarity of Mr. Fansher's motion to Mr. Woodsworth's which was questioned, unsuccessfully. Later, Mr. Fansher's subamendment, having been ruled in order, was agreed to by a vote of the house.

In the course of that interesting session there was a change in the House of Commons at which time Mr. Meighen became prime minister, with Sir Henry Drayton as acting house leader. But the debate went on. Another subamendment was moved to the amendment, this time by Mr. Rinfret on June 29, 1926. A point of order was raised by Sir Henry Drayton, and Mr. Speaker ruled that that subamendment was in order, despite its similarity to previous subamendments. Mr. Geary appealed from Mr. Speaker's ruling, with the result that the ruling was sustained and the subamendment of Mr. Rinfret voted upon. Later, Mr. Garland moved another subamendment which was accepted and agreed to, and finally Mr. Stevens' amendment, as amended, was agreed to, and finally the motion as amended, amended and amended was agreed to by the house.

I studied that volume carefully. That is certainly an instance of a long debate ranging over the same general field, but with sufficient difference in the successive amendments moved that the House of Commons at that time accepted them as being clearly in order.

May I now point out one further and striking difference between the amendment moved by the leader of the official opposition and the one I have now moved. The earlier amendment asked that the bill be not then read a second time, but that the subject matter be referred to a committee. As everyone knows, the effect of an amendment of that kind is to dispose of the bill so far as debate in the House of Commons during the current session is concerned. The only way that bill could get back to the house after its subject matter, not the bill, had been referred to a committee would be for the committee to recommend its reintroduction as a new bill.

But my amendment does not mention referring the subject matter of the bill to a committee. It is in keeping with the terms of citation 657 and the propositions following thereafter which are to the effect that such an amendment only delays consideration of the second reading, and does not do away with it altogether. In other words my amendment could carry, and it would still be in order, after an expression of the opinion of the house on the circumstances connected with the introduction of the bill had been recorded, for second reading of the bill to be moved again.

That is a very substantial difference, namely that the amendment of the leader of the opposition referred the subject matter to a committee, whereas my amendment is a proposal that the house record its opinion right here. And I add this further comment, that if the amendment of the leader of the opposition had carried it merely asked the committee when considering the subject matter of the bill to consider the extent to which the enforcement of the act was being interfered with by the alleged violation.

On the other hand my amendment asks that the admitted violation of the act be censured, right here on the floor of parliament. I submit there is more than a substantial difference and that theory, citations and precedents are all in favour of the acceptance of my amendment as clearly in order.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect may I say that Your Honour astounds me. You astound me because you have remained awake when so many dusty and forgotten precedents have been quoted. For the time being I shall not argue that the amendment is out of order, but I do say that it is out of place, that it is untimely and that it is uncalled for. I think it is more logical than the amendment sponsored this morning by the hon. member for Lake Centre. The hon. member said that we are anxious to go on with this legislation, but the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has a more logical mind. He abstained from saying that he was anxious to have the legislation passed, and I congratulate him upon saying that. This reminds me of a fire brigade and how it acts when there is a fire alarm. The firemen are supposed to rush down and take out the fire equipment.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: I am speaking to the amendment, sir.

Mr. Speaker: I was under the impression that the hon. member was speaking to the amendment. I am considering at the moment whether the amendment is in order, and I should like to hear any further representations that hon. members would like to make.

Mr. Pouliot: If you will permit me to continue, sir; I am not through.

Mr. Speaker: I can only permit the hon. member to speak at this time to the point of order.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, Your Honour. I am referring to what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said with reference to the delay in the second reading of the bill. I heard him say distinctly that it would not interfere with or cause any delay in the second reading of the bill. It is in reference to his statement made while sponsoring the amendment now before the Chair that I am using this metaphorical language.

It is quite easy to take Beauchesne, Bourinot or May and quote precedents that date back for scores of years and bore the Chair and the house in so doing. In my opinion a little time could well be taken to make a common-sense comparison. Instead of quoting a dusty Bourinot, a dusty Beauchesne, a dusty May or any of this dusty stuff, I want to appeal to the intelligence of the house; I want to do that rather than weary the exhausted memories of hon. members. We have had enough of that. Let us consider this matter like human beings and not like bookworms.

In making my comparison I am appealing to the intelligence of the house. A building is afire and the firemen want to get there as quickly as possible, but what are we to think when it is found that a pile of rocks and timber has been placed right at the door of the fire station to prevent the fire truck from going out? That is just what the hon. member for Lake Centre has done; that is what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is doing now, and for purely political reasons. They do not want the government to go ahead with this legislation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one short reference to the dusty precedents the hon. member has referred to. I am sure that if my hon. friend shortly becomes a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, as some expect he will, he will not be talking about dusty precedents but will be following them.

Mr. Pouliot: I am glad I called my hon. friend a gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have acted as such when referring to my hon. friend.

I refer particularly to May at page 390 as a basis for my submission that the amendment of my hon. friend is in order. There is no way in which what is stated on pages 390, 391 and 392 can be read except that it favours the amendment in question. My hon. friend referred to the various amendments moved at the time of the customs scandal investigation, and that is one example. Again in 1872, and this has not been changed since—

Mr. Speaker: I have not May before me, and I do not know what section the hon. member is referring to.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This reads:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move, as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill; or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction or prosecution—

Then turning to page 392—

Mr. Garson: Is that all of it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I shall read it all, if you like. It continues:

—or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence, or, in the Lords, the opinions of the judges. The principle of relevancy in an amendment governs every such proposed resolution, which must, therefore, "strictly relate to the bill which the house, by its order, has resolved upon considering."

Then there is cited as an interpretative case the case to which I referred this morning, which came up in 1857, when the Palmerston government was defeated as a result of an amendment very similar in terms to the one now moved by my hon. friend. I quote from page 392:

It must be borne in mind, however, that the resolution, if agreed to, does not arrest the progress of the bill, the second reading of which may be moved on another occasion.

That answers the hon. member for Temiscouata. No impediment is being placed in the way of passing these amendments; it is merely an expression of the attitude toward the government or any of its ministers in relation to the subject matter of the bill. I continue:

The effect of such an amendment is merely to supersede the question for now reading the bill a second time—

The word "now"' is in italics. And then later:

The house refuses, on that particular day, to read the bill a second time, and gives its reasons for such refusal: but the bill is not otherwise disposed of.

And again:

Thus the amendment to the second reading of the Conspiracy to Murder bill, in 1857,—

This is the bill to which I made reference this morning:

—being also a vote of censure—

What is the difference between this present amendment and the one that I moved and the one moved by the leader of the opposition?

—being also a vote of censure, was not only fatal to that measure, but caused the immediate fall of Lord Palmerston's ministry.

The wording of the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) falls within citation 657 of Beauchesne, is supported by May, and I know of no case where this right has ever been denied in any British parliament. As to the instance in 1858 when Palmerston's administration was destroyed, the amendment if it had not been a proper one certainly would have been ruled out of order with men like Cobden, Palmerston, Disraeli and Gladstone in that parliament, but they accepted it as a proper amendment, it was voted on and the administration was defeated.

Mr. Pouliot: Canning was opposed to it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He was not there.

Mr. Garson: I do not think anyone is arguing that, if the present amendment or the one moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) had been moved as amendments to the motion for the second reading of the bill, they would not have been in order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I want to have one point clarified that the hon. member for Lake Centre raised. I believe the amendment he referred to was an original amendment and not an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not hear you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I believe it was an original amendment and not an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The one in 1858 was just a straight amendment. The ones referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in the series of four, and I have that volume here—

Mr. Speaker: I was referring to the matter which the hon. member for Lake Centre raised. Thank you.

Mr. Garson: As I was saying, if the present amendment had been introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as an amendment to the motion for second reading of the bill, I do not think any member of the house would argue that it was not a perfectly proper amendment in every way. But that is not the whole story. The amendment now moved is moved after the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has been disposed of, and in connection with which he invoked this same citation, 657, Beauchesne, third edition. I may say that, as nearly as I could follow the reading of May by the hon. member for Lake Centre, the language in Beauchesne is identical with that of May.

Mr. Knowles: The opposition leader's amendment was made under 668. There is quite a difference.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Garson: The section which the hon. member for Lake Centre quoted from May—and I followed him—is exactly the same as citation 657 in Beauchesne, third edition.

Mr. Knowles: My point is that my amendment is moved under 657, but—

Mr. Garson: Is my hon. friend raising a point of order with me?

Mr. Knowles: —the leader of the opposition moved his amendment under 668.

Mr. Garson: What does citation 657 say? It reads as follows:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question,—

It refers to certain matters, but I shall name only two.

> —or expressing opinions as to any circumstances, connected with its introduction, or prosecution . . .

That is what the present amendment in part does. Further on there are these words:

> . . . or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

I suggest that the substantial subject matter of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition and the substantial subject matter of the amendment which has now been moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, namely, the flour report of the combines investigation commissioner and the actions of the government in relation thereto, has already been the subject of debate in this chamber on a motion to go into committee of supply. On that occasion, by reason of the fact that there was no motion connected with it, it was considered that that particular debate, for purposes of subsequent points of order, had not taken place. This same subject matter has also been the subject of debate on the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition.

The whole substance of the entire question has been considered at great length. There has been an opportunity for members to vote upon it and they have voted upon the whole subject matter. Therefore I suggest it is not competent later on, by invoking the same citation 657, with some other formula of language, to have a third debate upon the same subject matter. If that should be the proper interpretation of citation 657 then those who have some ambitions to get home for Christmas had better give them up, because one could go on moving other variations of this formula and produce other debates all on the same subject matter.

I would distinguish in this way the cases which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre cited in connection with the customs debate to which he referred. Even on the face of his argument as he stated it this afternoon, he was talking about a case where there had been a motion for second reading, an amendment to take some other action, then a subamendment to the amendment which was debated and disposed of, and then another subamendment moved and held to be in order. But, Mr. Speaker, the nexus, if you like, that was the foundation for the declaration that the second subamendment was in order was the fact that it was moved in relation to an amendment which was still on the order paper; whereas in the present case what was by any reasonable test a motion of want of confidence in the government, the amendment of the leader of the opposition, has been fully disposed of. Once there has been a full and adequate discussion of that subject matter—as it happens, for the second time in this chamber —and members have had an opportunity to vote upon the amendment and the amendment is voted down, then I submit it is not competent to raise any further amendments dealing with the same substantial subject matter. If it were in order to do so, we could have a whole succession of amendments almost without limit.

Mr. Coldwell: I should like to say a word. I have not taken part in the previous discussion because I felt that my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), was handling it exceedingly well. I want to deal with this matter in the reverse order to which the minister dealt with it. I should like to discuss first of all his argument regarding the moving of further amendments when others are disposed of. Let us look at the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. When one amendment is disposed of, another can be moved, and so on down the line. I do not think his argument has any effect. As to his other two arguments, first of all let me deal with his contention that the matter was discussed on a motion to go into supply. It is true that the matter was discussed on the motion to go into supply, but it was not disposed of; the sense of the house was not taken on it, and that had no bearing on any subsequent debate.

With regard to the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), I submit that it was substantially different from this. It did not seek the judgment of the house on the action of the government. All it did was ask the house to send this subject matter to a committee. This is the first time an amendment has been moved asking the house to express its judgment upon the action of the government with respect to the non-publication of the combines investigation report. This amendment is entirely different from anything we have had up to the present time. On every other count it is in order. I think that is generally admitted, as it has been admitted by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) himself. I submit that it is in order on the other ground as well, that this is the first time a definite vote of censure on the government has been moved, and I believe the opinion, or judgment if you like, of the house should be taken upon it. I say to the government I think it would be far better to permit the house to express its judgment on this matter than to try to prevent that being done by raising points of order.

Mr. Speaker: First let me say to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that I feel not only the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) but all those who have taken part in the discussion on the question of order, to use his own words, have discussed it exceedingly well.

Mr. Coldwell: I agree with that.

Mr. Speaker: As far as I am concerned in reference to all these questions of order, I have not come into the house with a closed mind. I have listened to the discussion and have made up my mind after hearing it, and I am grateful to hon. members for the assistance they have given.

A number of points have been raised during this discussion, and I do not know that I can go over them all. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said this was the first time the word "censure" had been mentioned in an amendment or motion. No doubt that is true, but when speaking yesterday the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) stated that the government accepted the previous amendment as a motion of censure, so it was then open to hon. members to discuss it as such.

Mr. Coldwell: Non-confidence.

Mr. Speaker: I feel quite sure he also used the word "censure", but in any event it would have the same effect. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre also read from May, thirteenth edition, at page 295, with respect to varying the character of a motion. It occurs to me that the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition included at least part of the amendment now before the house. There is similarity as between the two amendments but, as I said before, there is also the inclusion in the former amendment of at least part of the present amendment.

A number of hon. members have suggested that this matter has not yet come before the house, but that the amendment of the leader of the opposition suggested that it be referred to a committee. As I stated this morning, if a matter is referred to a committee that committee reports back to the house, so in any event it would be before the house.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) referred to May, thirteenth edition, at page 390, which is referred to in Beauchesne, third edition, as citation 657. I will agree with the hon. member that this amendment, to the extent that it relates to the circumstances under which the bill has been introduced, is correct; but I think it goes further than that. The Minister of Justice has pointed out that the amendments referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Lake Centre, which were allowed, were in each case sub-amendments relating to amendments. They were related to an amendment then pending.

In view of all I have said I can perhaps sum it up by saying that the proposed amendment in part relates to circumstances attending the introduction of the bill. It would therefore appear to be admissible under citation 657 of Beauchesne. However, in part it also amounts to a motion of censure of the government on substantially the same basis as did a previous amendment moved during this debate, upon which the house has already reached a decision by a recorded vote. I would refer hon. members to citation 357 of Beauchesne, third edition, which reads:

> No amendment shall call in question a principle on which the house has given a decision by its vote on a former amendment.

Since the proposed amendment is defective in part I must rule the amendment as a whole out of order.

Mr. Knowles: Your Honour will appreciate that I regret doing so, but I must appeal your decision.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

On the motion for second reading of Bill No. 144, an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act, Mr. Knowles moved, seconded by Mr. MacInnis, the following amendment:

> That Bill No. 144 be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house the circumstances connected with the introduction and prosecution of this measure, namely, the action of the government in seeking amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, for the stated purpose of strengthening the enforcement thereof, at the very time when it has just been discovered that the Minister of Justice, with the approval of the government, has deliberately violated section 27 of the said act, is an affront to parliament, and that further consideration of this bill should be deferred until this house, by this amendment, has censured the government for violating the said act by failing to make public until November 7, 1949, the report of the commissioner under the said act with respect to the flour milling industry, which was submitted to the Minister of Justice in its final form on February 23, 1949, and which he was required by law to make public not later than March 10, 1949.

I ruled that the proposed amendment amounted to a motion of censure of the government on substantially the same basis as the previous amendment moved in this debate, upon which the house had already reached a decision by a recorded vote, and that though this proposed amendment was in part admissible it was out of order as a whole. From my ruling, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre appealed.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, now we have again reached the debate on second reading of the bill. The matter has been discussed at full length upon the moving of many amendments. Everyone has said that he is anxious that action be taken. I, too, am anxious that action be taken. What I cannot understand is that those hon. members who, according to their language, seem to be most anxious to have the present situation remedied, have been precisely those who have put obstacles in the way.

Mr. Homuth: No.

Mr. Pouliot: I am not here to defend those who have been condemned by Mr. McGregor in his report. That is a thing of the past. Let us look to the future, so that the government may be able to take action against combines.

Mr. Homuth: When?

Mr. Pouliot: Only after being empowered by the legislation before the house. The more this legislation is put aside by amendments and other obstructive methods, the later it will be that the government can take action against combines and bring before the courts those who have been guilty of any malpractice. That is a simple statement which can be understood by anyone, and which is already understood by the man in the street.

The day before yesterday I met some people who said, "We are facing a very grave situation now. What is wrong with the House of Commons? Why does not the government take action?" Yesterday afternoon I met the same people. They are average and good citizens, and they said, "You are taking your time in the house; why do you not take action and vote second reading of the bill?" When I went to lunch downtown today they said to me, "What is the matter with some members in the house who are creating obstruction all the time, when it is high time to vote second reading of the bill against combines?"

That is what the average man in the street says—and I am repeating it so that no hon. member will have any excuse for saying that we are ignoring it. We cannot ignore it, because it is true. I am not inventing anything; I am just repeating what is being said by many people in this city and throughout the country.

Either members in the opposition groups are satisfied with the bill before the house or they are not. If they are satisfied with it, then the only thing to do is to vote for second reading; if they are not satisfied the thing for them to do is also to vote for it, in order that the bill may be sent before the committee, on which occasion they may make practical, useful and constructive amendments, if they have any to suggest.

That being said, I shall add no more to it. I have said what I wanted to say, and have repeated what I thought the house should know. The only chance any faithful member of parliament has to do something or to accomplish something so as to proceed against combines is to vote second reading of this bill, and to listen to the calling of each section before the committee. I presume of course that they have read the bill and, having done so, they must have annotated it. Therefore they will have no excuse for depriving us of the benefit of their study, knowledge and practical spirit.

Just one further word in closing. Either Mr. McGregor was right or Mr. McGregor was wrong. He could not be right and wrong at the same time.

Mr. Hodgson: Did you hear that on the street, too?

Mr. Pouliot: I would ask the hon. member to speak more distinctly; there is a lot of wisdom in what he says.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask hon. members not to interrupt.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank you, Mr. Speaker; but I appreciate it when I am interrupted provided I know what is being said. That is why I would be most grateful to the hon. member if he would repeat the same thing, but distinctly so that I could hear it.

Mr. Brooks: He wanted to know if it was the man in the street talking.

Mr. Pouliot: I should like to have it repeated so that with my limited knowledge of the English language I could understand it.

Hon. members who have spoken cannot at the same time be both for and against the bill. That is what happened when the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who is otherwise well informed, said that he wanted the legislation to pass, but was at the same time obstructing its passage.

Mr. Homuth: No, no.

Mr. Pouliot: The hon. member for Waterloo South was not here when it occurred, and what he has learned from hearsay is all wrong. This is most farcical and cannot be taken seriously. I hope the hon. gentlemen who have said that they are anxious to have legislation against combines will act with logic and vote for the second reading of this bill. If they want to compensate for the time lost in discussing amendments that were out of order they should let the bill pass on division and save some of the time that has been wasted.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, in view of what has been said during the past day or two with regard to procedure I am somewhat at a loss to know where I should start and where I should finish. It seems difficult to discuss the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act without referring occasionally to what has occurred in the past and trying to find a way to correct that in the future. The net result of some of the things disclosed yesterday by the minister is that every labourer or breadwinner in Canada has paid more for his bread than he should have over a long period of time. The minister referred to the flour milling companies and the squeeze that had occurred between the rise in the price of wheat and the setting of the ceiling price of flour. However, the milling companies were protected by subsidies and fixed floor prices and the result was that the only man being squeezed was the man who had to buy his daily bread.

Then it was said that the price of mill feeds was kept down. Mill feeds were scarce during that period and the farmers could not get them. Why? Because they were being exported at higher prices. That is why bacon, eggs, butter and milk were high in price or scarce, as in the case of butter. No wonder the people in the cities complained about the high cost of living. That is the reason, and that is why the workers in many industries went on strike for higher wages.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks on the second reading of this bill. While I support wholeheartedly the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) with respect to the action of the government, I am going to confine my remarks to the principle of the bill which I understand is the strengthening of the enforcement of the Combines Investigation Act and to some related matters. The explanatory note reads:

> The amendments provided in this bill are designed to facilitate enforcement of the Combines Investigation Act, and of related Criminal Code provisions. They relate to court procedure concerning undue monopolistic trade restrictions and unlawful combinations in restraint of trade.

While we are supporting this bill to improve the enforcement of the Combines Investigation Act we are of the opinion that the act and the amending bill represent a Victorian and outmoded method of tackling a twentieth century problem. This attempt to improve the enforcement of this act will prove insufficient in the future. A careful examination of history in the United States and Canada will give some validity to my argument. We know the history of the development of monopolies in the United States and the efforts made by various United States administrations, commencing most noticeably with the administration of President Teddy Roosevelt, to control and restrain monopolies and to provide for fair practices in business.

The United States have possibly had more effective legislation in this regard than we have had in Canada, but a United States Senate committee report indicates that the tendency toward monopolistic practices has increased greatly during and since the war. In view of the fact that a great number of these companies operate branch plants in Canada and have large investments in this country it is reasonable to suppose that the same state of affairs exists in this country.

Certain hon. members, particularly those of the Progressive Conservative group, have expressed a desire to return to the so-called free enterprise as it was known years ago. In my opinion that is a completely unrealistic approach to modern economic development. I give hon. members due credit for their sincerity, but the free enterprise that they envision is a thing of the past that has gone forever. Under our modern industrial and commercial civilization monopolistic development is inevitable and must be faced.

With the large amounts of capital required for the building up of industry, with the demand for natural resources, with the large number of employees employed and with the desire to establish assured markets, it is inevitable, and the course of events proves my contention, that monopolistic development has occurred in various fields, is occurring and will continue to occur.

We in the C.C.F. are concerned about monopolies, and in this we differ from our friends to the right. We realize that monopolies exist and are inevitable. We do not look backward to the return of so-called free enterprise and we face the situation from that point of view. We contend that monopolistic development under our present system of capitalism lacks social objectives. We admit that in many cases they produce efficiently, they prevent waste and things of that sort, but we submit that they must have social objectives.

They must come under the control of those who are responsible to the people rather than of those who are responsible to a board of directors and a group of shareholders. If that procedure is not effective, they must be brought under public ownership. Our objection to monopolistic development as it exists today is that on the whole it is based on the profit objective and usually lacks any form of social objective. We maintain that the first consideration in all economic development should be human needs rather than profits. We see the result of the profit objective in the development of our country. We have seen ghost towns created by the monopoly control of natural resources, the exploitation of timber and mines without any consideration for the future. We have seen monopoly control drive competitors out of business possibly by selling at a lower price for a temporary period. We say these practices are wrong and not in the interests of the Canadian economy or the Canadian people as a whole.

I am quite willing to admit, and my associates in this group admit, that monopolies are necessary in certain fields. They are necessary in the field of transportation. You could not have a dozen railroads operating across Canada. They are necessary in the field of communications. Even under private ownership, no one would suggest that we should have some ten or fifteen telephone companies operating within one province. They are necessary in hydroelectric development. They are necessary in the development of basic industries such as steel, and in the development of pipe lines and transmission companies of that type. It is admitted they produce efficiently in many cases. They prevent waste and overlapping and develop a certain sense of security for a particular group of people within the national community.

Our main objection towards monopolies and combines is that to date the motive has been largely a profit motive without a social objective. We in this group believe we cannot long allow a few people to have such wide powers in the development of our natural resources and the direction of our economic activities, responsible as they are only to boards of directors and shareholders. Therefore we advocate public ownership of monopolies where it is clearly to the advantage of the Canadian people. We advocate public ownership of certain monopolies where they will be controlled by people responsible to the people. I want to say that we do not claim there is any particular merit in socializing any portion of our economy just for the sake of socializing it. We do not believe in socialization for the sake of satisfying some doctrinaire point of view or doctrinaire conception. We simply say that public ownership should come into effect when it is obviously necessary and desirable, and is to the advantage of the Canadian people.

This is our approach to the question of monopolies and combines in Canada at the present time. We of the C.C.F. group, having in mind our natural resources and our ability to produce, believe that the Canadian people have a right to a secure and satisfactory standard of living. The C.C.F. group believe that every child born in Canada is entitled to the education that it is capable of absorbing, the education that it requires for the development of its talents and personality, to enable it to play the part it is capable of playing within the nation. We believe that the working people of Canada are entitled to secure and steady employment at wages which will produce a satisfactory standard of living, including a reasonable measure of comfort. We believe they are entitled to proper working conditions according to present-day standards.

We also believe that all those who are unable to earn their living because of ill health or sickness are entitled to be maintained on a proper standard of living with a reasonable degree of comfort at the expense of society where that is necessary. We further believe our older citizens are entitled to security with comfort in their declining years. Considering the natural resources of Canada and the capacity of the nation to produce, I do not think any fair-minded person would deny that these are reasonable and modest propositions in this day and age.

Therefore I say we approach the question of monopolies somewhat from this point of view. I may say that a monopoly means exclusive possession of certain natural resources, exclusive possession of certain privileges, exclusive possession of certain manufacturing processes, or exclusive possession of a market. We say that those in control must develop our natural resources according to conservation policies laid down by the government which will protect the present and future interests of the people of the country. Second, they must be willing to accept fair labour practices, sell their products at prices that will be fair to consumers and to their competitors, and operate according to a code of business ethics established by law. In addition we say they must be willing to accept a rate of taxation that, over and above other taxes collected from the general public, will provide the Canadian people with at least the standard of living and security I have just outlined. If any monopoly in Canada is willing to operate under these terms and accept the social objectives laid down in this way, we see no particular purpose in bringing it under public ownership at this stage of our economic development. We also say that if any monopoly refuses to operate under these terms then that concern should be brought under public ownership.

I am sure if a reasonable proposal such as that was brought to the attention of the public, and the fact of the refusal of any monopolistic concern to operate according to that code was brought to the attention of the public, not only would we bring these concerns under public ownership with the support of those who adhere to our political and economic ideas, but also with the support of a large majority of the Canadian people. In my opinion we will have to go much further than the Combines Investigation Act and develop a code of business ethics which will protect workers, consumers and competitors and will have over-all social objectives.

I wish to illustrate what I have said to the house by bringing to its attention the work of a monopoly with which I have had some experience, and in which I am particularly interested. It has developed within its sphere a code of business ethics and social objectives. It is a monopoly controlled by the many and replaced a monopoly controlled by the few. We have illustrations in our modern economic development of monopolies that are working to the public advantage. I can think of the Canadian wheat board, vegetable marketing boards, tree fruit boards, and other monopolies of that type. Before concluding I want to demonstrate the possibilities for the development of monopolies with social objectives controlled by the many in the interests of the many. For a few minutes I want to refer to Tree Fruits Limited in British Columbia, which has a monopoly of the sale of tree fruits throughout the interior of the province, in British Columbia generally, and for export.

What did we find under what some of my hon. friends would term ideal free enterprise conditions, when competition was running wild? Only a few years ago we found unfair practices as between growers, unfair practices by shippers and shipping houses, unfair practices by brokerage houses, and very unfair practices by certain wholesale houses on the prairies, as well as by all those who formed what was known at that time as the fruit selling combine in the western Canadian market. As a result of the operation of that unrestricted free enterprise and free competition, large producing interests, business interests and whole communities in the Okanagan and Kootenay valleys were facing ruin. Because of the lack of any business ethics or a business code, the will and advantage of the majority was defeated at every turn, and the situation became almost disastrous.

Then the producers and various interests in the industry got together and saw the unreasonableness of this unsatisfactory state of unrestricted competition and the unethical nature of the whole process. They took what I would term a positive approach; they said, "We must build up a code of business ethics in the tree fruit industry from the producer to the consumer if we are to have stability within the industry and sell our products to the best possible advantage of all concerned." So they went to the British Columbia legislature, and the first marketing act was passed, setting up the law upon which this monopoly was based. It received the support of a majority of the growers, and has worked to the great advantage of all.

The tree fruit organization itself is a non-profit association returning to its members all receipts from the sale of fruit, less costs of selling. Here is an interesting thing. Every charge that goes into the cost of a box of fruit as it goes from the producer to the consumer is open to examination by the public. The cost of production in the orchard, the cost of packing and packaging, the cost of transportation and the cost of selling; every detail of the operation of that monopoly, with its social objectives, is open to public review.

What has been the result of the adoption of monopoly control of the sale of tree fruits in the interior of British Columbia, supported by a majority of the people and conducted on the basis of co-operation with social objectives? We have immensely improved methods of distribution. Instead of five carloads of fruit going to a town which requires only one, distribution is scientific and proper throughout the prairies. We have improved the quality, the grades and the packing. We have improved the inspection. We have reduced to a minimum the rebates for damage in transit. Even at the present time we have managed to reduce the actual spread between the producer and the consumer. We have lower costs of production and lower costs of operation. We have reduced waste to a minimum. We have brought about fairer returns to the producer; more than that, by creating a monopoly in that one field based upon social objectives, with a code of business ethics, we have brought about stability in communities that were facing ruin; we have given security to hundreds of fruit growers, and have restored the level of prosperity in districts that were in a desperate situation a few years ago.

I take this somewhat different approach to this question from that taken by other hon. members to illustrate what I think must be the coming development if we are to satisfactorily deal with monopolies. That is, in addition to amending the Combines Investigation Act so the law may be enforced against unfair practices and things of that type, we must build up a body of positive law in this country under which no monopoly can exist unless it is willing to accept social objectives and work to the advantage of the Canadian people.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Attorney General of Canada may institute and conduct prosecutions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the minister the reason for this particular section, which reads:

> The Attorney General of Canada may institute and conduct any prosecution or other proceedings under this act, or under section four hundred and ninety-eight or section four hundred and ninety-eight A of the Criminal Code, and for such purposes he may exercise all the powers and functions conferred by the Criminal Code on the attorney general of a province.

I should like to ascertain the reason for this amendment, and also to ask the minister whether or not the amendments contained in this bill are the final amendments that it is anticipated will be brought forward. Perhaps, since this is the first section, some general discussion may be allowed, since I want to make reference to a number of matters.

First I should like to know what were the circumstances that made this section necessary. In 1946, when this act was last before the house, I moved two amendments, both of which were accepted by the then Minister of Justice, now the Prime Minister, which had the effect of placing in the hands of the individual in this country the right to take proceedings under the combines act. As the situation is today any person in this country may take such proceedings when and if he desires to do so. I mention that when dealing with this section in order to ascertain from the minister whether or not, when this power is placed in his hands, there will ever again be in Canada, a repetition of what took place in connection with the flour milling report. When I spoke on this subject I pointed out certain facts.

If this report had been published, as it should have been published, then any person in the country would have been able to take proceedings. The fact that it was kept from us, however, puts the attorney general of Canada in this position, that the suppression of that report was a denial of the operation of the statute. It took from every Canadian in this country who would have cared to take proceedings the right to do so. It had the result, and it is a serious result, of outlawing any action that might be taken against the flour milling companies.

We are called upon now to add additional powers to those of the attorney general of Canada. The attorney general did not use the powers he could have used against the flour milling companies. He has given various reasons for that, to which I intend to make reference later. When the attorney general asks for additional powers, the committee has a right to ascertain why it was that the powers he had were not exercised according to law. In so far as the failure to give publicity to that report is concerned, it amounted to the connivance and assistance of the attorney general of Canada in preventing or circumventing the operations of the combines act.

That is a serious situation, sir, for it is the same attorney general who now asks power to allow him to institute and conduct any prosecution, and to exercise all the powers and functions conferred by the Criminal Code upon the attorney general of any province. By hiding that report, the attorney general became a party to placing certain individuals in this country above the law. I cannot express, sir, the degree of my alarm that in 1949 the attorney general of this dominion should operate as he did in this case. Will the combines act be enforced with no greater zeal by the attorney general, when he gets the powers requested in this section, than it has been during the last year? I have known the attorney general for a long time, and so far as he personally is concerned I have a high admiration for him. That the attorney general of Canada, the representative of the king's conscience, should have allowed himself to act as a pawn in the hands of powerful ministers in the cabinet, it is difficult to understand.

I asked him, when replying the other day, to tell me where in British history such a course had ever been followed before, that an attorney general had failed to carry out the mandatory provisions of a statute. There has been no answer to that. I asked him whether the result of keeping this report concealed had not been, in fact, to defeat the powers of the Combines Investigation Act? It was held up so long that it denied any person in this country the right to take proceedings. Will this section improve that situation, sir? I do not hold him personally responsible. He explained it. He was new. He came in among the great, sir. Never before in Canadian history did any minister of the crown ever reveal what took place in cabinet council, unless he was about to resign. He raised the blind just a little and gave us a glance.

The minister indicated that, while gallantly accepting the responsibility himself, the reason he did what he did was at the instigation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). That minister held the trumps in that cabinet. Will the attorney general say that, if he gets this power, the Minister of Trade and Commerce will not push him around again? Why did they not publish it? There has been no denial by the minister, and these facts are underlined by his speech, that the government broke the law. The minister says there are reasons why the law was broken. One of those reasons was that publicity would have been given, that publicity would have done harm and, in any event, certain arrangements were made during the days of the war.

Next, I asked him to answer this: When since 1763 did any minister in Canada or Great Britain ever interfere, in so far as a statute was concerned, in order to place any subject above the law? This strikes at the purpose behind this section.

I am going to deal now, sir, with the excuses that have been offered, and several excuses have been offered for the failure to act.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I think this is all very interesting, but I submit that in committee my hon. friend is required by the rules of the house to confine his remarks to the section which is under consideration, which in this case is section 1.

The Chairman: Section 1 refers to the power to institute and conduct any prosecution or other proceedings under the act, but not to the publishing of a report.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I shall bow to your ruling sir. I do say to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, who has raised this question, that, in my experience in this house, in committee a general discussion of the whole situation is allowed on section 1. What has the minister to fear by discussion? Why the fear? For the first time, too, today one who was interested in the motions raised the points of order, namely, the minister himself. I have never before heard a member of the bar, interested in rulings about to be made before a judge, himself advancing the arguments on his behalf. You can rule me out of order, Mr. Chairman; you can say that I cannot discuss these things. But when you make that ruling you make a ruling that denies the rulings of Deputy Speakers throughout the last ten years and made when we were in committee. I must bow to it.

The man who made discussion impossible, and denied freedom of speech on this matter, is the Minister of Justice. I cannot understand that attitude. To use Mr. Mackenzie King's expression, the antiseptic of publicity is going to be denied in this as it was denied me today by the Speaker on a technicality. I bow to that ruling. I say this. Under that section we place in the hands of the attorney general even wider powers than he has today. I have no right to discuss how these powers are to be used. I have no right to ask the minister, sir, whether, if he receives these powers, he is going to allow the powerful within the cabinet to prevent him from exercising them.

This is one of the most serious debates that have ever come before any parliament. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that on reconsideration the Minister of Justice will not deny full and complete discussion on this subject, because we have not the answers yet as to what took place. I believe, sir, that if ever there was a matter that should be discussed, if the purpose of these amendments is to put teeth in the law, this is it. Teeth in the law are no good if the cabinet behind closed doors denies the operation of the powers that it already has in the Combines Investigation Act.

I will put it this way, in order to keep within your ruling, sir. If the attorney general is given these extra powers, will he give assurance to the house that never again will he as attorney general deliberately, to use the words of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, break the law and thereby protect those who were named as law breakers by the highest official of all under the Combines Investigation Act? I have never once suggested their guilt, sir; I would not do that.

Will the Minister of Justice assure the house, as he has not done yet—he showed little regard for the seriousness of what has happened—that in the future when reports are delivered to him, whether he regards them as incomplete or not, as long as the law is on the statute books it will be carried into effect? I was one of those, sir, who believed that it should have been modified. I raised the question in 1948. The then Attorney General of Canada pointed out that it was necessary in order to arouse public opinion. I said: "Well, possibly it might result in injustices." The answer of the then Minister of Justice was: "It is in the same position as the evidence on a preliminary inquiry, but above all it is necessary to publish in order to ensure publicity."

Will he give the assurance—and I am sure he will now after his experience of the last few days—that that section, or any other section of the law under the Combines Investigation Act, will never be circumvented by him again? It is not a difficult thing to answer. It is a very simple question. I ask him this also: Is it not correct that having held that report as long as he did, the result is that no action can be taken today against any of the milling companies? This matter, sir, all enters into the equation as to whether extra powers should be given. For extra powers given to the attorney general, and used as they were since January last, will be window dressing on the statute books of this country. The section reads:

> The Attorney General of Canada may institute and conduct any prosecution or other proceedings under this act . . . and for such purposes he may exercise all the powers and functions conferred by the Criminal Code on the attorney general of a province.

Even if that section had been on the statute books during the last year it would have been a mere scrap of paper. If all these powers he now asks for under section 1 (2) had been granted to him, will he say that anybody would have been prosecuted who has not been? Will he say that any prosecution would have taken place as against those named in the flour milling report? As far as that section is concerned it is a meaningless one, having regard to the amendments that were passed in this house in 1946, under which any person in Canada, whether the attorney general or anyone else, had the right to take proceedings.

Those are a few of the questions that I now bring to the attention of the minister. They are questions which are in the minds of the people of Canada today. You can pass laws; you can make amendments to the law; but if the unwillingness to enforce the law is as strong as that evidenced by the attorney general, directed as he apparently was by the Minister of Trade and Commerce since January last, any amendments are mere sham, mere window dressing, mere words.

One alarming fact that emerges from this debate is that the minister has given no indication that in the days ahead he intends to follow any other course than that which has been pursued in the last year. I am not saying that if these powers were secured consideration should not be given to what took place during days of war. But, sir, in that report there were offences disclosed before the war, before the wartime prices and trade board was set up, and after. I have the pages; they have been referred to on a number of occasions.

Mr. Garson: Does the hon. member mean September 15, 1947?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Oh, well—

Mr. Diefenbaker: At the ending of the wartime prices and trade board regulations. Even if the government did not wish to prosecute for what took place during the war, they could have used the events during those days of war to keep the entire action within the period of limitations within which action could have been commenced. The chain was broken. The Prime Minister himself said the other day that where a number of offences take place over the years, if they are continuing offences, the two years runs from the last offence.

Was the Combines Investigation Act not in force during the days of war? Who gave anyone authority in those days to say that the act would not be in effect? Certainly Mr. Gordon never had that power, and the attorney general at that time did not have it. The only institution that had power to say that the Combines Investigation Act was suspended during wartime would be parliament —or the executive, under the terms of the wartime prices and trade board orders in council passed under that act.

Mr. Garson: That is right; and that in effect is what was done.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was not done.

Mr. Garson: Oh yes, it was.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is just what was not done. The wartime prices and trade board was set up; but in no particular was there anything suspending by order in council the operations of the act during the period of war.

Mr. Garson: Of which act?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Garson: Oh no—

Mr. Diefenbaker: No—and that is exactly the point.

Mr. Knowles: They do not need an order in council; they just do it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The point I am making is this, that during days of war the attorney general and the government could not suspend the operations of the Combines Investigation Act without the consent of parliament, or otherwise under the prerogative rights of the king to pass legislation within the provision of the war emergency act.

Surely, sir, parliament has a right to know this: Will a statute of this country, the Combines Investigation Act, ever again be suspended by the simple word or desire of anyone in this country, without the consent of parliament? For if it was done at one time it will be done again, unless the minister—so long as he is the minister—will give that assurance. I say parliament is entitled to that assurance.

I shall say no more at this time, except this: What has been done by the attorney general is in contravention of our constitution. Will such contraventions continue? Is there any way today whereby, if reports are received from the commissioner, parliament will ever know it? Parliament relies upon the government to carry out the law. When the attorney general gets these extra powers will there be greater care in prosecutions than there was in the dental combines case? So far as that case was concerned, there was no case because the prosecution did not prove the material facts.

Will this section strengthen the Combines Investigation Act?

Mr. Garson: Not this section; section 3 will do that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I cannot discuss that yet.

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But not this section?

Mr. Garson: Not particularly, no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not particularly?

Mr. Garson: No. I can set my hon. friend's mind at rest. He is asking a good many questions on this section, the purpose of which is quite simple. It is to give the Attorney General of Canada the formal as well as the present de facto right he has to conduct these prosecutions. But it does not really add any powers to those which the attorney general now exercises.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I see.

Mr. Garson: I believe that covers the point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then that comes back to what I said the other day, that it is a most unimportant section; and that when we begin to analyse the changes asked for in the bill we find that they are, as I described them, unimportant. However, I shall deal with section 3 when we come to it.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Garson: I do not wish to interrupt if my hon. friend wishes to speak. However, I have been asked a good many questions, and I am afraid I shall forget some of them.

Mr. Coldwell: All right, proceed.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member for Lake Centre raised a number of points to which replies should be given.

Mr. Drew: May I interrupt the minister in respect to one answer he has given, so that in his following answers he may bear it in mind. The minister has said that the passing of section 1 does not add to the actual authority the attorney general now has to proceed. Is that what I understood?

Mr. Garson: No, I said—

Mr. Drew: The de facto right?

Mr. Garson: I said the real purpose of this amendment is to give to the attorney general the formal right to conduct these prosecutions, as well as the de facto right he has at the present time. I shall deal with that later in greater detail; but what I meant by saying that it does not add to his rights is that it merely formalizes the de facto rights the attorney general has been exercising through the years. I think any lawyer would appreciate the point. There is actually no increase in power. It just formalizes his status in the courts of the provinces.

Mr. Drew: But I would point out to the minister that it does increase his power in respect of the Criminal Code, because at the present time only the attorneys general of the provinces can present indictments under the Criminal Code.

Mr. Garson: That is right, yes.

Mr. Drew: This empowers the Attorney General of Canada to take proceedings which are now entirely in the hands of the attorneys general of the provinces.

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is right. But I still say that these de facto rights to which my hon. friend has referred are in respect of prosecutions conducted by the Attorney General of Canada in the provinces in the name, and by courtesy of, the attorneys general of the provinces. But my point is that after the passage of section 1 the conduct of these prosecutions in the provincial courts, while it will not have to be taken in the names of the provincial attorneys general, will not be carried on with any greater actual powers of prosecution that those which the Attorney General of Canada now exercises.

Perhaps it would not be amiss if I were to deal with this particular point a little more fully right now. It has been the practice for some years when an investigation by the commissioner of the combines act results in the finding that a combine exists to follow the procedure outlined in section 31 of the act, which reads:

(1) Whenever in the opinion of the commissioner an offence has been committed against any of the provisions of this act, the commissioner may remit to the attorney general of any province within which such alleged offence was committed, for such action as such attorney general may be pleased to institute because of the conditions appearing, any records, returns, evidence or report relevant to such alleged offence.

(2) The Minister of Justice may instruct counsel to attend on behalf of the minister at all proceedings consequent on any information being laid for an offence under this act.

That is to say, the attorney general of the province may lay an information if he wishes to do so and we have the power to instruct counsel. The first proceedings in the tobacco case were carried on by the provincial attorney general, but they resulted in a stay of proceedings. About a year later further proceedings were again instituted by the provincial attorney general but the Attorney General of Canada instructed counsel to appear.

When a report comes in from the combines act commissioner the practice has been to send a copy to each of the provincial attorneys general in order to give them an opportunity to decide whether or not they wish to take action. In the majority of cases they do not desire to do so, and this for a number of reasons. The report has not been prepared by their own provincial civil servants. If they step into the matter they will be undertaking to prove something that the federal combines investigation commission has created, that is, a report on a particular industry. Their position in that regard is not ordinarily as comfortable as our position would be in prosecuting upon a report made by our own combines investigation department. What ordinarily happens is that after a bit they reply politely to the effect that they do not wish to proceed, and then we launch proceedings.

Where we start proceedings because the provincial attorney general prefers that we take that responsibility, we conduct the prosecution, we pay the costs, but the proceedings are taken with the consent and in the name of the attorney general of the province in which the trial is to be held. The proposed amendment would dispense with the formality of asking the provincial attorney general whether he would consent to this course.

In the case of the two reports which have figured largely in the discussion during recent days, the flour and bakery reports, transactions of an interprovincial nature right across the country are covered. In a case of that kind it would be extremely awkward to say the least for a provincial attorney general to carry on a prosecution involving interprovincial matters. Every time a separate facet of the case was found to belong in some other province he would have to get another provincial attorney general involved and build up co-ordination with the other provincial attorney general or attorneys general in conducting the case. All that this amendment will do will be to give the Attorney General of Canada status by which he can commence action. It does not affect in any way the status of a provincial attorney general to commence action if he chooses so to do. As I said at the beginning, this amendment would formalize our present de facto powers of prosecution.

I agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre when he says that this is a relatively unimportant section of the bill. It is not nearly as important as section 2 or as section 3, which is the most important. While I am on my feet perhaps I should deal with some of the questions which the hon. member for Lake Centre asked in a new form of cross-examination. He put his questions in groups and if I overlook some of them I hope he will remind me.

He wanted to know who gave anyone the authority to say that the Combines Investigation Act was not in effect during wartime. I think the simple answer to that is: "No one." If he thinks that that answer is unresponsive and not sufficiently revealing I should like to refer him to the letter from Mr. Anger, the legal adviser of the wartime prices and trade board, to Mr. McGregor, to which I referred previously. This letter will be found on page 2079 of Hansard. In referring to wartime prices and trade regulations passed by order in council under the War Measures Act, a statute properly passed by this government, Mr. Anger says:

> The regulations have always provided that contravention or failure to observe any regulation or any order is an offence.

It is an offence to contravene or disobey any order of the wartime prices and trade board. Then he goes on:

> From the foregoing it is seen that it is not only a formal order of the board or of an administrator that must be obeyed, but also any general or specific requirement or instruction of an administrator. It being clear that failure to comply with an order as defined is an offence, it is equally clear that obedience of such an order would be a good defence to any possible action brought under the Combines Investigation Act or the Criminal Code, if there were, in fact, any conflict between such statutes and an order. As has been stated before, however, our legal department and the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act concur in the view that there can be no such conflict, because orders are in the public interest and there is no liability under the above statute except in respect of acts which are against the public interest or to the detriment of the public, which is the same thing.

Perhaps the hon. member for Lake Centre suspects that Mr. Gordon or Mr. Taylor gave assurances of privilege or assurances that the Combines Investigation Act would not be enforced against John Doe Company Limited, but it was rather a matter of the officials of the wartime prices and trade board calling the attention of the John Doe Company Limited to the fact or the law, if you like to look at it as such, that if they comply with the order of the wartime prices and trade board then ipso facto they will not be prosecuted under the Combines Investigation Act. That is not an assurance of privilege or exemption given by an individual. That is a statement by an individual, either Mr. Anger, the legal adviser, Mr. McGregor, the enforcement officer, Mr. Gordon, the wartime chairman, or Mr. Taylor, the present chairman, of what the law is. The law would be the same whether they stated it or not. That being the law, if the John Doe Company carries out the provisions of the wartime prices and trade board order, then by virtue of that fact it cannot in doing so be a member of a combine detrimental to the public, and it cannot be prosecuted under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If that be so, then why did you not publish the report? It would have done no harm because they were not liable anyhow.

Mr. Garson: I will tell you the reason why we did not publish the report. When it came in I read it and I was much impressed with it. I thought it disclosed an offence, but I had no knowledge of this other background, nor did any of the other people who read the report and who had not had communication with the officials of the wartime prices and trade board. The whole basis for any action on my part in the matter has been that I did not want to jettison the report until I had been absolutely assured by the proper authorities that the actions which were recorded in the report as being on offence under the Combines Investigation Act were not those which were a mere compliance with the wartime prices and trade board regulations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What do you mean by "jettison"?

Mr. Garson: Suppose when this report first came in we had followed the course my hon. friend recommended about two minutes ago. Suppose we had said: These things are all covered by the wartime prices and trade board so we will just not bother with the report at all. That would be jettisoning it because to all intents and purposes we would do nothing under it. I was not prepared to do that until the officials of my department and I had gone into the matter and we had satisfied ourselves, and I had been satisfied beyond any peradventure of doubt, that what had been done was really in accord with the wartime prices and trade board orders. It is not a case of any person like Mr. Gordon, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Anger or anybody else giving assurance of any protection. It is simply that the law applicable to the facts of the case does not disclose an offence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Do you believe that is the law?

Mr. Garson: I not only believe it is the law; I know it is the law.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why did you not put it before a court?

Mr. Garson: I know it is the law for the reason that it is stated in ruling after ruling which we have turned up on these files, and I have read some of them into the record. If my hon. friend is not informed in the matter he can become informed by no more complicated device than just reading Hansard. If he has any doubt after reading Hansard he can go back to the records of the wartime prices and trade board and be further convinced.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not find Hansard so informing.

Mr. Garson: The question has been asked who gave anyone authority to say that the Combines Investigation Act was not in effect? The answer is nobody; nobody made any such statement. All that they have said was that if the companies and the citizens affected by wartime prices and trade board orders complied with what those orders said, and if they did any act which furthered the substance of those orders, then by the law of this parliament, the wartime prices and trade board act and the orders in council passed thereunder, what they did was not an offence under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There was no wartime prices and trade board act passed by parliament.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is quite right. The wartime prices and trade board regulations were passed under another statute. It was the War Measures Act, a statute of this parliament.

The next point is that the hon. member said that the action of the government had taken away the right of citizens to launch proceedings under the Combines Investigation Act. I say that whatever effects may have flowed from any action we took in the matter—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Or did not take.

Mr. Garson: Any action that we took or any omission—

Mr. Knowles: By deliberate decision.

Mr. Garson: If you mean the decision not to prosecute, that was deliberate.

Mr. Knowles: I mean the decision not to publish the report.

Mr. Garson: No, I do not admit that at all. I think that is a most ungenerous interpretation of the facts.

Mr. Knowles: Was it not a deliberate decision not to publish the report until November 7? Was it an accidental decision?

Mr. Garson: I submit I am really breaking my own principle here because I have raised the point of order that these discussions are out of order on the sections of the bill. I do not want to evade forthright questions like that, and I will answer these two upon the understanding I will not answer any more that are out of order. So far as the report is concerned our position is this. The manuscript copy which was delivered to my office in my absence on December 29, 1948, is not the report which was tabled in this house. In any event, on the facts it was a physical impossibility for anyone to comply with the section of the act. I would be prepared to go into any court, and on the facts stated there stand trial on the question whether there was an offence under the act, and be quite confident there would be an acquittal. The manuscript copy was not the report tabled in this house. The final report was tabled after five separate amendments had been made in the manuscript report, and there were further negotiations which could just as easily as not have led to other amendments because the facts I laid before the house indicated that Mr. Taylor had gone to Mr. McGregor and Mr. McGregor considered the matter further, not for a few hours but for two or three days, I believe. I have forgotten exactly—

Mr. Diefenbaker: How many hours of consideration were given to it in seven months?

Mr. Garson: Just a minute.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right.

Mr. Garson: I am glad to answer questions but not in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, that is right.

Mr. Garson: So far as the report is concerned which was finally tabled in the house, I did not receive it from Mr. McGregor as a final report concerning which I was sure that no more amendments would be offered until well within fifteen days prior to the time it was tabled.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a most specious argument.

Mr. Garson: What my hon. friends are talking about is a technical offence under section 27(5) of the act.

Mr. Knowles: A most important section.

Mr. Garson: That is the technical offence with which they are trying to charge me, and I say there is no offence so far as we are concerned. Our offence is with regard to a matter of propriety, with regard to the length of time that it took during the interval to try to arrive at some unity of opinion amongst these—

Some hon. Members: The cabinet.

Mr. Garson: No, not the cabinet; not by any means. This would have been a very simple matter as far as the cabinet was concerned if they could have laid before them a set of facts upon which the executive officers would agree; but one group said, "Here are the facts," and another group said, "Those are not the facts at all."

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did Mr. Howe threaten to resign if you published the report?

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is true; the papers said so.

Mr. McCann: Do you believe all you see in the papers? It is not true, and you know it.

Mr. Garson: By that last question the hon. member for Lake Centre is trying to trap me into a disclosure of the very type he was accusing me a few moments ago of making, in relation to cabinet secrecy. Well, on that point let me say that I have disclosed no cabinet secrets at all in this matter; that I am well aware of the very strong oath I took concerning cabinet secrecy, and that I have endeavoured to the best of my ability to observe it.

The facts are these. When the various amendments we are now considering came from the combines investigation officials they had to be considered by cabinet before they could be put into a bill as representing government policy, so I took the amendments to cabinet for that purpose. There would be no other way of getting their agreement. While those amendments were before cabinet, as so very often happens in a matter of this kind, various members of the cabinet had ideas of their own about how the act might be amended. These were suggested to me, but I preferred not to discuss them until I had been briefed by my officials. So I went back to what was really my combines deputy, since at all times there has been direct contact between the combines investigation commissioner and myself. My chief deputy is of course the deputy minister of justice. The penitentiaries commissioner in a sense is another deputy; the mounted police commissioner is another; and the combines investigation is another. I have direct contacts with all of these officials.

Following the practice which I think has been universally regarded through the years as not constituting any breach of cabinet secrecy, since otherwise government business could not be carried on, I disclosed to my deputy the points that had been raised in cabinet. There was no other way by which I could get from him the memoranda I had to have in order to intelligently deal with the matter in cabinet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was that?

Mr. Garson: I would not even attempt to answer that question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the month of June?

Mr. Garson: It would be some time after the first draft of these amendments, which came to us on April 7, 1949. We considered ten different drafts, and I certainly could not make any pretence of saying in reference to which of those drafts, some of which were before June and some after, these other suggestions were made. I am rather inclined to think they were made after June, but I would not be sure. At any rate, when I got them I took them back to Mr. McGregor. He considered them and gave me a memorandum which I took back to cabinet; and that memorandum was so convincing that we did not go further with those suggestions.

In his letter of resignation to me Mr. McGregor felt that the only way he could clear up the position between himself and myself, as a justification for the resignation, was by referring to some of those suggestions which had been made in cabinet and communicated by me to him in confidence. He made that reference, and when I received the letter I said, "Look here, this puts me in a very bad position. If these things are published it will look like a breach of my oath of cabinet secrecy". As I have already indicated in previous statements, he replied, "My letter of resignation to you is privileged. You do not have to produce it anyway, so it is quite all right for me to make this disclosure in that letter". I said, "That may be all right; you may think it is privileged, but this government could never dream of claiming privilege in respect of a document of this kind". As a result this is a case where, through no fault of any person concerned, there will have been some leakage of cabinet secrets. My hon. friend, who is so glibly accusing me of breaking cabinet secrecy—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I never accused you; I just said you lifted the curtain.

Mr. Garson: You did it very skilfully, but that is the impression that would be given. The point is that no reference to any cabinet secrets has passed my lips in any of these debates, except that which arose out of Mr. McGregor's letter of resignation on the one hand, or from the statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in regard to his position, which he had a right to make, on the other.

Now the hon. member wants an assurance from me that I will not repeat the offence he alleges against me. Well, Mr. Chairman, I thought my hon. friend had greater respect for my intelligence than to ask for an assurance of that kind. If he stops to reflect for a moment on the difficulties that he must know I have had to face in connection with this matter, he will feel quite sure that upon the lowest possible basis of self-preservation he need have no fear for the future.

Mr. Knowles: "Have you stopped beating your wife?"

Mr. Garson: I was just going to say that; my hon. friend took the words out of my mouth. That is a trick question: "Have you stopped beating your wife?" If I say I will not do it in the future—

Mr. Diefenbaker: But you did it.

Mr. Garson: —my hon. friend wants me to admit by implication that I did it in this instance. I say I certainly will not do it in future, but I say that without any admission with respect to having done it in this instance.

Then the hon. gentleman said we had taken away the right of the individual to lay a charge under the act. Whatever other results may have flowed from our action or omission in this instance, the result he charges in that regard has not flowed. The right of any person to take proceedings under this act is no greater and no less than it was before we announced our position in the matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And the period of limitation?

Mr. Garson: Yes, I shall deal with that, too. My hon. friend would not have to ask me these questions if he were a little more diligent himself. He is a distinguished lawyer and can read the law as well as anyone can. If he would take the trouble to read it he would not have to ask these questions. The two cases he is talking about—I am speaking now from memory but I think this is substantially correct—are Rex v. Canadian Import Company Ltd. and Rex v. Elliott. I would not be too sure about the second citation, but in those cases there was a continuous course of conduct which came up within the two-year period. When the point was raised in this case as to whether they were barred by the two years' limitation the court said, "Well, we do not have to decide that point because the facts make it unnecessary for us to do so."

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister mentioned the coal case upon which he was engaged.

Mr. Garson: That is the Canadian Import case. I do not think there is any point, therefore, in what my hon. friend says.

In any event, it seems to me that the real substance of the matter is this: that as of September 15, 1947, the alleged offence upon which my friend is relying to give his argument any validity at all is no offence at all. The plain statement of Mr. Taylor, who was the one official who took all the proceedings in connection with it, and whose evidence cannot be contradicted by anyone else because he was the only man who took the proceedings, establishes this beyond doubt. Mr. Taylor said in the clearest possible terms that he directed what was to be done, and the concerns followed exactly what he told them to do.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But the commissioner did not accept that.

Mr. MacInnis: Why did the milling companies not bring Mr. Taylor as a witness?

Mr. Garson: The proceedings taken by the combines investigation commissioner are of a quasi judicial character, they are investigation proceedings rather than judicial proceedings. It is as a result of the investigation conducted by the commissioner that the criminal prosecution in the courts is taken; and you may be sure—as attorney general I was afraid of this all along— that if there had been any prosecution, Mr. Taylor would have been subpoenaed as a witness, as would all the other people with whom those concerns have dealt. They would have been called to the box and asked, did you tell me so-and-so at such-and-such a time as to what the law was? Did you not write to me to this effect, and so on?

Mr. MacInnis: Did they write? That is what I want to know.

Mr. Garson: So far as Mr. Gordon and Mr. Taylor are concerned, we have so far been unable to find in the files of the wartime prices and trade board any written authority from them. But remember that neither of those gentlemen acted as the flour administrator, though for a while Mr. Taylor was the food administrator. The milling companies would not need to have anything in writing from these two men because all the companies needed to do was to prove that there was substantial compliance on their part with the requirements of the wartime prices and trade board orders.

Mr. Coldwell: Knowing that this report was to be made public and that, at least, it would cast some reflection on them, would you not have thought if they had any evidence whatever or any witnesses to show that there was an understanding they would have produced either the documents or the witnesses?

Mr. Garson: I shall try to answer that question as fairly as I know how. My answer will not be worth a great deal because I have never acted as defence counsel in combines act prosecutions. Lawyers who are accustomed to acting for the defence in these different types of prosecutions build up a certain technique. My hon. friend the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) can tell you about it. This reply is just that of an uninformed person, but I would imagine probably the best technique in a combines investigation might be to sit tight and not make any moves at all, but reserving those for the trial. Otherwise, one would give one's case away to some extent.

Mr. Coldwell: If they thought they were going to be prosecuted, they must have felt that they were doing wrong.

Mr. Garson: No, they would not have thought they were going to be prosecuted. Let my hon. friend put himself in the position of any one of those people. Suppose you were under investigation and as the member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) said the other day, they rolled up with a truck and started unloading the files from your office, would you not draw into yourself a bit and be rather cautious and careful about your next move, regardless of whether you felt guilty?

Mr. Coldwell: I have nothing I need be ashamed of.

Mr. Garson: I believe that completes the questions asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. Knowles: On a matter of privilege; during an interchange a few minutes ago the Minister of Justice more or less accused me of making an ungenerous interpretation of the law. May I say to him what I had in mind was the case to which he has just referred, namely the Canadian Import case. I had in mind precisely the comment he has made with respect to that case. The Prime Minister said the same thing the other night, that the series of facts upon which they relied had commenced more than two years before the prosecution and—please note—had continued right up to the time of the prosecution. It was the continuing of the acts that made these people liable. My contention is that, even after the fifteen days had gone by, it was the continuing refusal, the continuing and repeated decision on the part of the minister and the government, not to publish the report which makes what has been done an offence against the law.

Progress reported.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. Hughes Cleaver (Halton) presented the first report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): At eleven o'clock tomorrow we shall continue with this Bill No. 144, the Combines Investigation Act. If we get through before one o'clock, we shall take up the two small bills I have mentioned many times, Nos. 64 and 65, the justice bills. At three o'clock in the afternoon, we shall take up the national defence estimates, and if we complete those estimates we shall take up the estimates of the secretary of state.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, November 24, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 105

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved:

That for the remainder of the session standing order 105 respecting the posting of private bills be suspended.

Mr. Knowles: Does this motion not require forty-eight hours' notice?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think so. In my view standing order 45 does not apply to private bills. It states:

Forty-eight hours' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for placing a question on the order paper; but this rule shall not apply to bills after their introduction, or to private bills—

And so on.

Motion agreed to.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: It has been brought to my attention by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that in connection with the motion moved by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Winkler) the house probably should have considered standing order 116. In fact when the hon. member rose I thought he was going to bring standing order 116 to my attention rather than the question of notice. As hon. members will recall, we discussed this standing order one day this week. It reads:

Except in cases of urgent and pressing necessity, no motion for the suspension or modification of any standing order applying to private bills or petitions for private bills shall be entertained by the house until after reference is made to the committee on standing orders or to one of the committees charged with the consideration of private bills, and a report made thereon by one of such committees.

I delayed putting the motion to the house in order to give hon. members the opportunity to raise the question with regard to the committee on standing orders. When no one raised that question I took it for granted that the house agreed that this was a case of urgent and pressing necessity, and I allowed the motion to be put.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That the name of Mr. Helme be substituted for that of Mr. McCusker on the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

VALUE FOR DUTY OF GOODS IMPORTED—INQUIRIES AND INVESTIGATIONS, ETC.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved the first reading of Bill No. 200 (from the Senate), to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 201, for the relief of Guy Merrill Desaulniers.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 202, for the relief of Margaret May Lester Rajotte.—Mr. Winkler.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

LABRADOR INDIANS AND ESKIMOS—MEDICAL SERVICES

Mr. Higgins:

What medical services have been provided for the Indians and Eskimos of Labrador?

Mr. Martin: While the federal government has given some assistance in emergency cases provision of medical services for the Indians and Eskimos in Labrador has been and has continued to be the responsibility of the Newfoundland government.

A. R. DECARY

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. Is Mr. A. R. Decary employed by the federal government in the province of Quebec, by the Department of Public Works?
2. If so, has he reached retirement age?
3. Why has he not been superannuated?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes, in a temporary capacity.

2. Yes.

3. He has been superannuated effective October 22, 1949.

LEGAL SERVICES—ARTHUR SLAGHT

Mr. Lennard:

1. Have the services of Arthur Slaght, Esq., K.C., been retained by the federal government during the years 1948 and 1949?

2. If so, in what capacity and in what matters?

3. What remunerations has he received from January, 1948, to date, in each of the matters in which he has been engaged?

Mr. Garson:

1. Yes.

2. As consulting counsel to the Criminal Code revision commission.

3. None.

*COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—LEGAL OPINION AS TO PROSECUTIONS

Mr. Coldwell:

1. Has the government sought the opinion of the Department of Justice or of any outside counsel as to whether the evidence contained in the McGregor report on the flour milling industry is sufficient in order to prosecute?

2. If so, what opinion or opinions have been received by the government?

3 Has an outside counsel been consulted? If so, what is his name?

Mr. Coldwell:

1. Has the government sought the opinion of the Department of Justice or of any outside counsel with respect to the application of section 1141 of the Criminal Code to prosecutions under the Combines Investigation Act?

2. If so, what opinion or opinions have been received by the government?

3. Has an outside counsel been consulted? If so, what is his name?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, these two questions asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) seek the disclosure of legal opinions received by the government. Upon making inquiries I am informed by my deputy, Mr. Varcoe, that this is the first time within his knowledge that production of opinions of this sort has ever been sought. I have also conferred with Mr. McGregor, commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act, with regard to these two questions, and, after that conference, I am of the view that the government should refuse to disclose any of the legal opinions in connection with any combines report.

It should be remembered that these opinions usually take the form of a review and analysis of the relevant parts of the report. Usually the opinions are quite long, and analyse the report from beginning to end. On occasions they refer to the transcript of evidence upon which the report is based. Possible defences in fact or in law, and how they may be met by the crown, are usually commented upon and appraised. The result is a communication between lawyer and client which is and should be privileged from disclosure, because in most, if not in all cases, such disclosure would give the accused and their counsel a preview of the crown's case. This would have a most prejudicial effect upon the prosecution of the case. The government therefore takes the position that it cannot table opinions of this sort.

Mr. Coldwell: Under the circumstances I am prepared to drop the questions. However, I would ask the minister to let me confirm this.

Mr. Garson: Yes, I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. Speaker: Questions dropped.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. MacInnis:

1. How many persons were receiving unemployment insurance in the months of September and October (a) 1948; (b) 1949?

2. How many new applications for unemployment insurance were received in the months of September and October (a) 1948; (b) 1949?

3. What was the total number of unemployed (applications for employment) by provinces for the month of October (a) 1948; (b) 1949?

4. What was the total number of positions vacant by provinces for the month of October (a) 1948; (b) 1949?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-LaSalle):

1. (a) In September and October, 1948, 44,761 and 55,384 claimants respectively were receiving unemployment insurance.

(b) For the same months in 1949 the figures were 83,525 and 105,064.

2. (a) 28,143 applications were received for unemployment insurance benefits in September, 1948, and 38,104 in October, 1948.

(b) In September, 1949, 51,935 made application, and 69,349 in October, 1949.

3. Unplaced applicants registered with national employment service offices at the end of October, 1948 and 1949, were as follows:

Province	1948	1949
Newfoundland	——	7,583
Prince Edward Island.	585	195
Nova Scotia	6,485	9,772
New Brunswick	4,153	8,099
Quebec	28,131	49,631
Ontario	31,445	45,811
Manitoba	5,136	7,976
Saskatchewan	3,322	4,258
Alberta	3,948	6,336
British Columbia	18,417	24,068

4. Unfilled vacancies recorded by offices of the national employment service at the end of October, 1948 and 1949, were as follows:

Province	1948	1949
Newfoundland	——	31
Prince Edward Island.	231	151
Nova Scotia	912	1,064
New Brunswick	1,077	710
Quebec	13,230	7,488
Ontario	24,697	15,197
Manitoba	3,482	2,001
Saskatchewan	1,565	1,132
Alberta	2,723	1,963
British Columbia	2,383	1,656

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

WHEAT—STORAGE IN GOVERNMENT ELEVATORS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What is the total amount paid by the wheat board for the storage of wheat between the 1st of April, 1947, and July 31, 1948, with particulars as to the companies to whom payment was made and the amounts paid to each?
2. How many government storage elevators were in existence during the said period of April 1, 1947, to July 31, 1948, and what is the location and capacity of each?
3. Were any of the said terminals or storage elevators leased or rented to private companies? If so, which?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFRIGERATOR CARS FOR SHIPMENT OF P.E.I. POTATOES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. MacNaught (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, and at the same time say how glad we are that he is back in the house. I am receiving complaints all the time from Prince Edward Island about the shortage of refrigerator cars. Can the minister make a statement about this situation as it affects Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The information I have on my desk this morning indicates that the position with regard to refrigerator cars on Prince Edward Island is excellent. As a matter of fact, at the moment there are 276 cars on the island ready for loading, which is more than there have been normally at this time of the year; and there are 152 cars in transit.

NATIONAL REVENUE

RESIGNATION OF DIRECTOR OF INCOME TAX, MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue if Arthur W. Gilmour, director of income tax in Montreal has resigned, and if so, for what reason?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Gilmour has resigned his position in Montreal, giving as his reason the fact that for family and personal reasons he did not care to accept a transfer to head office in Ottawa.

THANKSGIVING DAY

OBSERVANCE TODAY IN THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I would direct to the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that today is United States Thanksgiving day. We in this country have reason to be thankful for having such friendly neighbours.

UNEMPLOYMENT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPRESENTATIONS FROM LEGION AND LABOUR ORGANIZATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I asked a question yesterday which was taken as notice by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour. May I now have a reply?

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): This matter is being looked into. I may say, however, that certain communications have been received by the minister. But as these communications were addressed to the minister personally, I suggest it would be advisable to wait until his return later today, and let him check the matter himself, to ensure a more complete and satisfactory answer to my hon. friend's question.

IMMIGRATION

COUNT JACQUES DE BERNONVILLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Can the Minister of Mines and Resources tell me when the papers concerning Count de Bernonville will be produced?

Hon. Colin Gibson (Minister of Mines and Resources): I shall be glad to make inquiry and find out whether they are available.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

BRIEF TO ROYAL COMMISSION ON ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES—QUESTION AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. It was announced over the radio this morning, as well as in the press, that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply had stated that the brief presented by the national film board to the royal commission on arts, letters and sciences was not government policy. Why is it not government policy when there are two cabinet ministers on the national film board? Did they have anything to do with the brief? If not, why not?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I have not had an opportunity of reading the reports in the press, and under the circumstances I do not think I should comment on them.

Mr. Fraser: It was definitely stated over the radio that the minister had made that statement.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister whether he is still chairman of the national film board?

Mr. Winters: The answer is yes.

PARLIAMENT HILL

REFERENCE TO STATUE OF SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) to the statue of Sir John A. Macdonald, one of the fathers of confederation, which is situated between this building and the east block. The other day the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) referred to a conversation that had taken place before the monument, and it gave me the idea of going to look at it. I notice that the pincenez which Sir John holds in his hand has become broken and is now a monocle. That is an historical error, and I hope it will be corrected as soon as possible.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Perhaps there should be a relocation of the monument to place it out in front beside Laurier.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REFERENCE TO NOTICE OF MOTION FOR SATURDAY SITTINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in connection with a notice in Votes and Proceedings. I think an innocent mistake has been made in preparing it, because it asks that the house sit on Saturday, November 26. I wonder if the error was in not providing that the house should meet on that occasion at Varsity stadium in Toronto, where we will all be?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am sure a large number of hon. members would enjoy being at the stadium in Toronto instead of here, but I am afraid that their public duties must prevail over their desires.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Speaking only for myself, mine will not.

Mr. Speaker: If I may interject, may I say that my sympathies are with the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the motion is out of order.

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): As a past president of the Canadian Rugby Union may I say that the game last year between Calgary Stampeders and Ottawa did more to cement good feeling between the east and the west than anything this House of Commons has done in the last ten years. The game that will be played in Toronto on Saturday between Alouettes of Montreal and Calgary Stampeders will have a like effect. I think that if this house meets on Saturday it will be an insult to the sporting fraternity of Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lennard: —and I for one will not be here.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Mackenzie King said the same thing about the accomplishments of Barbara Ann Scott.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is not before the house.

Mr. Cruickshank: The west will win, anyway.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

INQUIRY AS TO DISTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance when the public accounts will be distributed. On Monday last, when this question was asked, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance said he would look into it and would make a statement the following day. No statement has since been made.

Mr. Gleason Belzile (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): The king's printer has not had time to print the number of copies that will be required, but we expect that they will be available in the near future, perhaps in seven or eight days.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INSTITUTION AND CONDUCT OF PROSECUTIONS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, November 23, consideration in committee of Bill No. 144, to amend the Combines Investigation Act—Mr. Garson—Mr. Dion in the Chair.

On section 1—Attorney General of Canada may institute and conduct prosecutions.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, so far as the strengthening of the Combines Investigation Act is concerned, we of the C.C.F. party are thoroughly in accord. As I said in the letter which I wrote to the present Prime Minister on December 4, 1947, we believe not only that the act needs strengthening but also that the combines investigation commissioner should have sufficient staff to deal with what we believe to be the large number of cases of price fixing and combinations we find in this country at the present time. Incidentally I might remark that the act does not deal with the question of monopolies as the anti-trust legislation of the United States, the Sherman Act, does.

We have long felt that if the government and the house believe in competition and free enterprise there should be legislation on the statute book to prevent private monopolies and combinations. I want to be specific; I do not believe the anti-trust legislation of the United States has been successful in meeting the needs of that country in relation to combines and monopolies. The only way to deal with a monopoly is to bring it under some sort of public control. As my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West, said yesterday, when an industry reaches the stage where it can exploit a community, at least it should be brought under effective control, which I believe involves national ownership of that monopoly. On the other hand, the majority of the members elected to the house do not believe that; consequently either the act should be strengthened or another act should be placed on the statute book to deal specifically with the matter.

I want to make one or two brief comments about some of the points that have been made in connection with what the minister has said, and what I have said, in this debate.

The minister's defence of the non-observance of a vital clause of the act is based entirely on wartime experience and alleged wartime agreements. That is not the point. The point is that the activities about which complaint is made in the report stem from the years before the war. The practices about which complaint is made were carried through the wartime period, and we believe into the period that followed the war. Consequently I do not think his contention if it were accepted is a valid one.

There is no documentary evidence to support the contention that immunities existed. There is nothing in the record except one interesting memorandum of June 21, 1943, indicating that a discussion occurred between the minister, the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, and certain officials, about the position of the subsidies, their implications, and so on. Let me refer to the paragraph reading in part as follows:

> . . . it may be desirable or necessary to place a minimum price on sales of flour in order to prevent any miller from taking undue advantage of the arrangement to reduce domestic flour prices at the expense of the government.

There is nothing in the record indicating that this was actually brought to a final conclusion. Moreover, I say again, as I have said several times—and I think it has been overlooked—that if the milling industry had told the combines investigator, and had presented substantial evidence of it, either documentary or oral, to the commissioner, that an understanding had been reached during the war concerning these matters and concerning the immunity of the milling industry under the Combines Investigation Act, at that point all further investigation would have stopped, and a report would not have been made of the kind which was to be placed before the people of Canada by the combines investigator.

I have not seen Mr. McGregor since long before this controversy began, but I am satisfied, from what I know of his past work and his reputation in the civil service, that if that had been done, this report would not have been made. I want to be quite clear about that, because it is vital to the discussion.

There is one paragraph in the memorandum of June 21, 1943, which I still find puzzling, and as a matter of fact I think the minister did too. There are these words:

> The foregoing is to be treated very confidentially and not made known to either the Administration or to the industry at this time.

In this document, which the minister was good enough to send across to me—it is the one that was omitted from the return—"administration" has a capital "A". Mr. Donald Gordon was present at this conference, and he was the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board; consequently it cannot refer to the wartime prices and trade board. The only interpretation I have been able to place upon it is that "Administration" means that this tentative understanding, which was never brought to a final conclusion, should remain confidential and not be made known to the flour milling industry or the government. If that is so, surely it is exceedingly strange. If the treasury board and the government were to be protected as alleged, why on earth should such an understanding be withheld from the government of the day. Surely if this was in any measure —and I mean the suggestions made in the memorandum—an understanding with a view to protecting government expenditures, why should it be kept secret from the government of the day? I ask the minister to explain that, because if I am wrong I want to be corrected.

Mr. Garson: I did explain it. Perhaps my hon. friend was not listening, and I certainly could not blame him for that.

Mr. Coldwell: Perhaps I was out of the chamber, attending a committee meeting.

Mr. Garson: When one speaks for two and a half hours he cannot expect to hold the attention of everyone for the whole time. I explained that in these terms: that I had asked that question myself, since the question suggested itself at once to anyone reading the memorandum. The explanation given to me is set out in Hansard. It is that they did not want the negotiations complicated by premature disclosures to the industry on the one hand or to the government on the other. They wanted no word of this discussion to go back prematurely at that stage through the people who had participated in it, to the government and to the industry, which seems to me a very natural desire. I hope my hon. friend realizes that the Minister of Finance himself was present at that meeting, so there was nothing sinister at all about this. I might also add that in substance the arrangement subsequently formalized by orders in council, notwithstanding what my hon. friend says, was the arrangement contemplated in that memorandum. The only difference I recall at the moment was in connection with the floor prices, which is also explained at great length in my statement.

Mr. Coldwell: I know the explanation, but I do not think it is good. In my opinion the orders in council to which the minister referred did not in any way validate the actions of the millers during the wartime period. That is an opinion, of course, which the minister can attack if he wishes; but to my mind those orders in council have no bearing on the contention made in the McGregor report. As I say, if they have, I cannot understand why the point was not made during the investigation, and why under those circumstances the report would have been made, knowing the careful way in which the commissioner under the combines act has always proceeded in regard to these matters. Moreover, as the hon. member for Vancouver East suggests to me, Mr. McGregor was one of the enforcement officers during the war, and he would have known of this arrangement when finalized and would have understood the implications of the orders in council. Consequently I do not think the argument advanced in rebuttal of the charges is good or valid.

I am not going to thresh old straw. We have had a long debate; and when the people of the country read it, so far as they are able to do so they will have to draw their own conclusions. I am satisfied the government was wrong in withholding the report. I am satisfied that the commissioner acted in good faith; that he made a report which was warranted, and that his recommendation that prosecution should follow was entirely justified on the basis of the evidence placed before him. If the millers had any reason to give as to why they should be granted immunity, I cannot understand why that reason or that evidence was not given to the investigators.

The minister said yesterday that if somebody came and wanted to see documents and so on in an office, the natural thing would be to see that anything which might have a bearing on a subsequent lawsuit would be to some extent protected. Well, I think if any evidence could have been produced to show that they were given privilege or immunity, they would have produced it, because that would have saved a great deal of public discussion and removed any possibility of the industry being under a cloud, apart altogether from protection against attack in the courts when the report was made. Indeed, it would have obviated the necessity for making any report at all.

That is all I want to say at this stage. I shall have some suggestions to make later, because I believe the act needs expansion so that certain other services and so on may be included within its scope. So far as I am concerned, however, the evidence that has been produced and the discussion that has taken place here should enable parliament and the people of Canada to form a considered judgment and conclusion on this matter.

Mr. Drew: I have not made any comments on the explanation of the Minister of Justice in his extended review of the situation, but I think this is an appropriate point at which to make those comments, since they bear on the question in the minds of hon. members as to the effectiveness of the amendment proposed in section 1 of this bill.

There was a short discussion yesterday during which the minister explained that the amendment contained in section 1, which provides that the Attorney General of Canada may institute and conduct any prosecution or other proceedings under this act, is really only a statement in statutory form of what already exists de facto, and that the existing provision of the combines act which leaves prosecutions under the Criminal Code exclusively to the attorneys general of the provinces has not in fact deprived the Attorney General of Canada of effective power to proceed with actions under both the code and the combines act by the process of consultation and co-operation with the attorneys general of the provinces. In effect that is a correct interpretation of the present situation.

I do suggest, however, that there is another reason why hon. members should feel they cannot pass this section. It is true that a law of this kind does not name individuals, and does not provide that a particular attorney general may do a particular thing; but the effect of this amendment will be that the present attorney general will be able to prosecute under the combines act with a degree of authority which he does not now possess. I think hon. members of this house should question whether the present attorney general, no matter what his motives may have been, has given any good reason for our believing that the act will be strengthened and not weakened if he has a wider measure of authority for prosecution than he now has. It is because of the wider powers that, in form at any rate, he would acquire under this amendment that we must examine the explanation he has given.

The Minister of Justice quite properly took adequate time to review the whole sequence of events which have brought us up to this position. In that review he had full opportunity to explain every detail of the course which has been followed from December 29 last until today. I submit, Mr. Chairman, there is not one word in that explanation which gives any reason whatever for the failure to publish this report in accordance with the act. From the point of view of the relationship of the position between the Minister of Justice and parliament, the regrettable thing is that nowhere in his explanation has the minister indicated any recognition of the gravity of the offence to parliament and to our system in this country. Moreover, I submit there has been a regrettable absence on the part of any member who ordinarily supports the government of any evidence of recognition of the effect of a proceeding of this kind upon the reliance of members of parliament upon statements given to the house by the Minister of Justice or other members of the government.

In effect, what is the explanation? The Minister of Justice quite reasonably explains that he was in Winnipeg until the third of January, and that on coming to Ottawa he was confronted with an accumulation of problems which required his attention before the opening of parliament a short time later. He quite reasonably explains it was not possible for him to devote the time that he otherwise might have devoted to a reading of this report, and for that reason—it is a valid reason—the time set out in the act for publication passed. I do not think there is a single member of this house who would not accept the explanation of the Minister of Justice about the difficulties he encountered at that time. I do not think there is a single member of this house who would raise any serious question if there had been a delay in publication resulting from a situation of that kind. I do not believe any member would challenge the minister's explanation if he said: I was confronted with these problems. These are difficulties that every member, particularly one who has had cabinet responsibility, will understand. The minister could have said: I am simply stating that under the pressure of business I did delay publication so that I might have an opportunity of examining this report before publication, with the consequent effects that it might have, because as Minister of Justice I felt that when the report was released I should be in a position to make some statement as to the attitude of the government in regard to it. All that is so reasonable, and so much in accordance with the difficulties all of us encounter day by day in meeting our own tasks that no member would have been unreasonable in that respect.

That explanation, however, does not for one moment explain a ten months' delay. It does not for one moment explain the delay in publication until a date which made it impossible for any prosecution to be undertaken. I submit that is one of the very serious aspects of what has developed. It does not reveal why the explanation that has been given to the house on this occasion was not given to the house when parliament was meeting from January until April. No explanation that the Minister of Justice has given suggests for a moment that the same views in regard to the publication of this report were not present in the minds of the cabinet members and in his own mind at that time.

On the contrary, at the time this report first came to his attention he was aware of the effect of its contents. He discussed it with the cabinet, as he has explained to us, and at that moment the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) raised the objection which he raised about a week ago in the house when he interjected a statement about this report on a motion for supply and which, in itself, had no relation to the combines act. The objections which were stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as reasons for not publishing this report are the same reasons he has held since January. The reasons given by the Minister of Justice on this occasion are not consistent with the reasons which he gave to the commissioner in his explanation to him of the delay in dealing with this report under the terms of the act.

It will be recalled that in his letter to the commissioner he stated that the publication of the report was being delayed until steps could be taken to amend the act, in view of the effect of the judgment in the dental case which had been rendered last February by the Ontario court of appeal. I do not believe the Minister of Justice will suggest that the provisions of this act are retroactive, Mr. Chairman. I have heard no suggestion to that effect. If that is so, then I fail to understand what bearing the enactment of the proposed amendments could have had upon the publication of the report of an alleged combine in the milling industry.

Mr. Garson: If my friend will permit just a word of explanation there, may I say that provisions of the act to which he is referring are set out in clause 3 of the bill concerning certain rules of evidence. The law is that the enacting of these rules of evidence would apply to all prosecutions as from the time they come into effect, and in that inexact sense they might be regarded as retroactive, since such prosecutions may relate to past offences. These rules would apply, for example, to a prosecution launched upon the basis of the bread report. My hon. friend's remarks would apply to substantive law, but not to provisions such as these in clause 3 of the bill which are of a procedural and evidentiary character.

Mr. Drew: What the Minister of Justice has said is that the only part of this amending act which could have come within the scope of his explanation to the commissioner as having some bearing on the effect of the judgment in the dental case is section 3 of the bill before us. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. Garson: Section 3 is really the heart of the bill.

Mr. Drew: There is nothing, Mr. Chairman, in section 3 which has any bearing whatever on the attempts which the minister explains he was making to bring some measure of harmony and understanding between the senior government officials who were dealing with this matter, because the difficulty encountered in the presentation of evidence was all disclosed, not only when the Ontario court of appeal gave its judgment, but, long before that, in the trial judgment as well. Hence the difficulty about presentation of evidence and proof as to the association of certain officials and certain documents with what had taken place was clearly in the mind of the government; and if that is the heart of the bill, then there is no reason why this bill was not presented to parliament last spring, with the explanation which has now been given and with the opportunity which then would have been available to this house to express its views at a time when action might still have been taken, if action was deemed appropriate.

Moreover, I am inclined to think that the problem which the amendments proposed in section 3 seek to cover is not so much a problem of new rules of evidence as it is of the presentation of evidence. A careful examination of what took place in the dental case will disclose that without much difficulty the evidence could have been given which would have connected the appropriate documents and individuals with the alleged combine. In making this statement I am directing no criticism to those who handled the case. It would appear either that they were instructed or that they held certain views which in effect prevented judgment in this case.

I come back to this argument: If the meat of the bill now before us is merely an amendment as to rules of evidence and the establishment of association with an alleged combine in cases of this kind, then there is no explanation for this delay; because we did not need to wait until now for the presentation of this simple provision as to how evidence can be brought in that will be effective. These rules as to evidence can have no conceivable bearing upon the appropriateness or otherwise of publication of the report on the alleged milling combine.

I hesitate to say this, Mr. Chairman, because the Minister of Justice has sought to explain the details. But after all, this is the high court of parliament, and it is the duty of every one of us to state what he believes to be the obligation of each minister, of the government as a whole, or of individual members within this high court of parliament. The fact that we may make statements that are in themselves extremely critical or that imply grave concern about the position of any individual within this parliament, is no more a personal matter than is the necessary statement by a judge or the necessary action by a jury in our courts because it is their duty not to allow personal feelings to restrain appropriate action or to call for action or for statements which would be unjust or inappropriate. It is our duty to state the position as we see it in the light of our understanding of the responsibility to parliament of the government and of individual ministers. In this light, Mr. Chairman, I can only say that the explanation given by the Minister of Justice makes the case infinitely worse than it was before he made it.

Let us come down to what the minister now tells us. He says that the core of the bill before us is merely a provision for more effective proof of certain documents and the more effective establishing of the responsibility of individuals to an association of this kind. If that is so, then by no stretch of the imagination does this amending bill offer the slightest explanation of the minister's failure to comply with the law when he could reasonably have done so, having regard to the difficulties he has explained as to his arrival here on January 3 with an accumulation of work before him. On the contrary, he has given to the commissioner, for his failing to act under the Combines Investigation Act, an explanation which, in the face of this bill and his present statement, simply does not hold water, and in itself challenges our opportunity to place full reliance on the explanations he has given.

Let us see what section 1 does. It is section 1 that we are discussing; the reference to section 3 arose out of the minister's explanation that it was the real core of this amending act.

Section 1 says that the Attorney General of Canada may institute and conduct any prosecution. It is so easy to forget that our established customs may be weakened, step by step, without full recognition of what is happening. Why should the attorney general, and particularly this attorney general, have wider powers and wider discretion when the discretion he has exercised in this case was a discretion not to prosecute without following the ordinary provisions of the act in regard to publication at the time? Everything that has been placed before the House of Commons is an argument why the present attorney general should have no greater responsibilities, but rather infinitely fewer. Every explanation that has been given is one which denies to the present attorney general that wider discretion implied by this amendment, even if it is only placing in statutory form what already exists de facto.

The explanation given by the Minister of Justice is a long one which seeks to justify the breach of law by the government itself. One of the explanations which I think should be given full attention is that there were changes in the report after January 14, by which time the report should have been published under the act. The minister speaks of different amendments. Mr. Chairman, this explanation is not one which can inspire confidence in the house in connection with any explanations given by the Minister of Justice concerning his responsibilities. The minister, and everyone who has had practical experience in dealing with reports of this kind, knows exactly what may happen under circumstances of the kind. I will go so far as to say that one member of the house particularly, who has had some judicial experience, knows of similar situations in connection with judgments of courts. While a judgment is held up and while a report under any statute is not presented, either a judge or an official will constantly refine and perhaps improve the wording. On rereading he may say to himself that a particular sentence does not express, quite as clearly as it might have, the opinion he had wished to express. He will change that sentence.

It must be remembered that the minister has told us that an effort was being made to bridge the gap which existed between the opinions of certain senior officials who carried on their responsibilities in different departments of government. It may well be —and I imagine it is so—that the commissioner under the combines act, while not in any way varying the sense of the report, sought to give an explanation which would leave no doubt as to what his opinion was in law concerning some of the discussions which had taken place. And that, I submit, Mr. Chairman, was a perfectly proper course, right up to the date the report was published. But it offers no explanation of the failure to publish the report; because we have the statement of the minister that he received a memorandum from the commissioner in January indicating to him when the report should be published. The evidence before us is conclusive that the commissioner felt all along that the report should be published. The withholding of the publication had no relationship in the commissioner's mind at any time to the minor amendments that were made.

So far as the present bill is concerned, I wish to leave no doubt as to our position in regard to the Combines Investigation Act. We believe that it is necessary legislation, and that it should be strengthened and clarified. We believe that it should be strengthened from the point of view of effective prosecution, and we believe that every provision in the act must be adhered to by the government of the day and the members of that government—particularly the minister charged with ultimate responsibility under the act.

We believe also that the act should provide a mechanism which will prevent abuses, but at the same time not interfere with those associations which are not injurious to the public interest. That was the purpose intended to be included in the act under the provision that in order to constitute an offence under the act there must be a combine contrary to the public interest. We believe a much more effective way of handling this can be provided. We believe, in other words, that these amendments are inadequate. If the motion to refer the subject matter of the bill to a committee had been adopted—and I am not debating the decision in that respect—there would have been an opportunity to examine fully that point, and to make recommendations. At this stage, in the debate on the bill, it is impossible to provide for adequate amendments which would really make the act effective.

It may well be that some who are discussing the combines act may have different views as to its purposes. I really doubt if there are the differences of views which have been suggested. I believe it is immensely important that combines which are contrary to the public interest should be dealt with effectively. I believe that legislation—and effective legislation—of this kind is essential to the very type of the free competitive system in which I believe.

I am convinced that our idea as to the advantages of free competition is premised on the fact that there will not be a denial of competition by agreements between companies which have the effect of preventing improvement in quality, improvement in usefulness, and reduction in prices by competition. Failure to have an act of this kind which is really effective, and administered effectively by the government in office, is in itself an invitation to that very rigid type of economy with which I disagree, and with which I am sure most members in the house disagree.

Sometimes these discussions are related to a misunderstanding of definitions. I was interested this morning to hear a reference to competition, and the necessity for competition to keep prices down. That is what we believe in. When we talk about a free economy and free enterprise, we are asserting our belief that the individual man or woman in his or her home in this country benefits most from a system which by competition itself will improve quality and lower prices.

That has been the advantage of this system; and it is because of that system that we have on this continent today the highest standard to be found anywhere in the world. It is because we want to continue that system, to continue that competition and to continue the improvement of the living conditions which come from lowered prices, improved quality and improved usefulness, that we so strongly insist upon an effective act to prevent combines which would destroy competition and which are contrary to the interests of the people of Canada. That is why we are devoting so much attention to what has happened in this particular case and expressing such strong opinions about it.

The Minister of Justice was asked if he would give the assurance that under no circumstances in the future would there be a similar breach of the law—again with that detachment which it is our duty as members of this high court of parliament to observe. The minister's explanation yesterday in that respect was the most cynical statement I have heard since I came into the house early this year, and I regret that there have been a number of them. The minister did not say to the hon. member who asked him the question: I recognize the enormity of a breach by the Minister of Justice of the laws of parliament which every citizen is compelled to observe, and it will not recur. He did not say that. He said in effect—I do not pretend to give the exact words, but I trust he will not question my interpretation: The hon. member who has raised the question places a very low estimate on my intelligence if he thinks that I would let myself in for this much trouble again. That is what he said. I am sure the minister will not suggest that I have misinterpreted his reply. In other words, what he says is this: If we keep it dark, we will really keep it dark this time and will not make this mistake once more.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, I think I would be prepared to leave it to hon. members of this house to decide whether or not the interpretation the hon. member has placed upon my language is an unjust one. Lest there be any misunderstanding about the matter, may I say that in response to the question of the hon. member for Lake Centre, as has been reported, I said that he would be placing a rather low estimate upon my intelligence if he thought that under circumstances over which I had any control I would let myself again be placed in this position, or, if I were, that I would not authorize publication.

I may say that my situation in the department now is quite different from what it was last January. I had nothing to do with the authorization or initiation of the flour investigation. I had nothing to do with it at all. About anything that is done while I am Minister of Justice I will be kept informed as it goes along. When the time comes that a future report comes down, I hope to have a fairly intelligent view of what the report is concerned with and its nature. This fifteen day period, which is altogether too short a time for anyone to know what he is publishing if he has never seen the report before, can be complied with only if the minister has been in the department beforehand and has some idea of how the investigation has proceeded, what it has dealt with, and so on.

The duty of conducting the investigation and making a report is by statute entirely upon the commissioner, but there is nothing in any part of the set-up which prevents the commissioner from conferring with his minister. If a minister is to avoid difficulty of this sort he should, at the time the report comes in, have a better grasp of the situation which is being dealt with than any minister could possibly have if he is new to the office.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Publication does not mean approbation.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend says that publication does not mean approbation. When you have a set of circumstances such as we had here, while publication may not legally mean approbation, the fact is that if the government publishes a report on the authority of the minister it cannot help but create an impression all through the country that it approves it. The man in the street does not know about section 27, subsection 5; all he knows is that the government has published a report. So far as he is concerned he says: If they do not approve it, why do they publish it?

Mr. Knowles: The man in the street knows it now.

Mr. Garson: I do not think that would be true of all men in the street.

Mr. Coldwell: Is the minister suggesting that he is going to interfere with the independence of the combines commissioner?

Mr. Garson: No, sir; not under any circumstances.

Mr. Coldwell: That interpretation might be placed on the minister's words.

Mr. Garson: I am glad my hon. friend has raised the point. If my remarks are susceptible of that interpretation, I certainly did not so intend them. I do not think any better indication of my good faith can be found than my conduct all through this present difficult matter. Where there were circumstances under which I might have been tempted to do that sort of thing, I have scrupulously avoided putting the slightest pressure upon the complete independence of judgment exercised by the commissioner. But there is no reason why the commissioner should not keep his minister informed of the progress of an investigation as he goes along. My information from Mr. McGregor is that that is the practice he has followed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did the minister not try to have the commissioner make an addendum?

Mr. Garson: In this particular case I could not follow that course, because the report had been filed before I appeared on the scene at all.

Mr. Coldwell: Did he keep the former minister informed of the progress that was being made?

Mr. Garson: I am informed by the commissioner that he kept the minister informed. I would not say that he kept him informed as to the language of his report, but he would keep him informed as to the progress of the investigation. I want to emphasize the fact that no authority is required from the minister to permit the commissioner to carry on an investigation; it is done entirely on his own authority. But I do not think the act could be properly administered if the commissioner started an investigation and carried it on in complete secrecy, without keeping his minister informed, and then at the end of the period produced a report, placed it on the minister's desk and asked that it be published within fifteen days, whereupon publication would take place.

Suppose we had taken a different course from the one we did take. Suppose we had published the report and then came along as soon as we were able to resolve the facts, which took many weeks, say from the spring of 1949 to the fall, and said: We cannot prosecute, because we have no case. I do not mind the criticism that has been directed against me, and I do not think I have shown any indication that I have any personal resentment in the matter. I do not think there has been anything personal in it. But take the case I am speaking of; would that result in strengthening public confidence in the combines investigation commissioner?

Mr. Coldwell: Is it not extraordinary that the document upon which so much reliance is placed now, which dealt with a matter of which Mr. Ilsley as Minister of Finance had knowledge, because he was being kept informed throughout the period from September 1947 to July of 1948, was not made available to the commissioner? If he was kept informed by the commissioner, why did not this document come to the attention of the commissioner, or why was it not a material factor in stopping the making of this report?

Mr. Garson: To which document is my hon. friend referring?

Mr. Coldwell: The memorandum of June 21, 1943.

Mr. Garson: That is a memorandum made by Mr. Hart, I think the name is.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Ilsley was present.

Mr. Garson: Yes, quite.

Mr. Coldwell: And he was subsequently minister of justice.

Mr. Garson: Quite right.

Mr. Coldwell: Then I cannot understand this at all. It makes it more difficult to understand.

Mr. Garson: I think not. I am afraid I am getting off on a tangent from the remarks of the leader of the opposition, but I do not think I can afford to ignore the point the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has raised. The memorandum to which he has referred sets forth the beginnings of the negotiation for the profit control arrangement that was imposed upon the milling industry. That profit control arrangement ultimately went into effect, and it was covered by the various orders in council, references to which are appended to Mr. Gordon's last memorandum. The position Mr. McGregor took, which is basic to an understanding by hon. members of this whole difficulty, was that he did not deny the existence of the arrangement with regard to subsidy and profit control contemplated in this memorandum. In that respect he could communicate with Mr. Ilsley on any number of occasions and there would be no point at issue between them at all.

Mr. McGregor's difficulty was simply this. He said that although the subsidy and profit control arrangement might be in effect, in his view it was essential that the milling industry should preserve free competition below the price ceiling in order to keep the prices of these products at all times as low as free competition would take them. His view was that if the milling industry did not do that, it should be prosecuted, because that was an offence against the Combines Investigation Act.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. MacInnis: Did Mr. Ilsley disagree with that position?

Mr. Garson: This is a rather subtle point to get over.

Mr. Drew: It is very subtle.

Mr. Garson: It is not often you get such a strongly held cleavage of opinion about a point which is not so clear, shall I say, as those which ordinarily form the basis of cleavages of opinion. Mr. McGregor's position was that competition should take place below the ceiling in order to take the price down as far as it could go under free competition. Mr. Gordon and Mr. Taylor, who had responsibility for the enforcement of all these arrangements, simply scorn that idea. They say that if the government steps in, provides a subsidy, and, after long negotiations and a voluminous report by a firm of chartered accountants, finally decides upon the approximate amount that the treasury would have to put up in order to pay that subsidy so that flour can be sold to the consumer at the ceiling price on the basis of 77⅜ cents for wheat, then that is the government policy. Having decided to put up tens of millions of dollars to subsidize the cost of flour to the consumer, the government did not want to have to put up some indeterminate figure, running into tens of millions of dollars more, because under the profit control arrangement the millers might push down by competition the price of flour to the consumer at the government's expense. If the government had wanted the price of flour to go down to two-thirds of the level of the ceiling price, it would have put up more subsidy in the first place, and in that event the higher subsidy and lower ceiling price would have been government policy.

Having gone to a lot of trouble to determine the amount the government was prepared to pay by way of subsidy, and to fix the price of wheat that goes into the making of the flour, and to fix the ceiling price on the flour, and to place the industry under such rigid profit control that the millers were compelled to pool all their export profits on which there was no ceiling, Mr. Gordon and Mr. Taylor say it is simply preposterous to imagine that the government should lose that control by free competition below the ceiling. That is the difference between the two viewpoints.

In answer to my hon. friend's fair question, the point I am making is that I do not think it likely that Mr. Ilsley, with all the multitudinous claims upon his attention and the load he had to carry, would burden his mind sufficiently with the implications of this arrangement, in order to raise this point if Mr. McGregor, who was much more closely in touch with it as enforcement officer, did not do so.

I respect my hon. friend's opinion for what it is worth, and I will give him mine. The hon. member says if the milling industry had raised these points with Mr. McGregor, then the report would not have been made, and the present difficulty would not have arisen. Perhaps there is some element of justice in his observation; but remember that when the law moves in on a man he is not likely to be in a very communicative frame of mind. That is especially so when, as before the war, there was some foundation for thinking that all the practices of the industry might not have been absolutely regular, and when, even during that same period, there were questionable communications being exchanged—something which we all have to face, even the government. In a case of this kind the man who is being investigated is more than likely to say: I had better sit tight and see what happens.

The hon. member has presented his hypothesis. Let me put one. I suggest if Mr. McGregor, who worked as enforcement officer on the recommendation of Mr. Gordon and under Mr. Gordon and the wartime prices and trade board, at any stage in the production of the report had had one single conversation with Mr. Gordon as to Mr. McGregor's theory that there should be unlimited competition below the ceiling price, then I certainly think there would have been no report. That is one of two or three different things about this question that I cannot understand.

Mr. Drew: We are in the same boat there.

Mr. Garson: I hope I am not lacking in frankness in these matters. I will admit it seems inexplicable. I do not understand why a man who had worked as an enforcement officer of the wartime prices and trade board under the chairmanship of Mr. Gordon would undertake, at different points in the report, to state what was the policy of that board, and to put an interpretation upon that policy, affecting the milling industry, upon which the whole report is largely based, without at any time even having a single conversation with Mr. Gordon, who had been chairman of the board.

Mr. Coldwell: Let us take one or two of these points. First of all the minister said—

Mr. Garson: I am afraid we are being discourteous to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Coldwell: With his permission, I would just say this. In the first place, the minister has made a great deal of the combines investigator moving in on the business. But that was not for the purpose of prosecution; that was for the purpose of investigation. If they could give a reasonable explanation, there would be no prosecution, so they would have nothing to fear.

In the second place, we all knew Mr. Ilsley in this house and the meticulous care with which he examined every detail. To my mind it is most extraordinary that Mr. Ilsley, who was a party to or had knowledge of the memorandum to which I referred, and who was minister during a major portion of the time the investigation was proceeding, almost one year, would not have raised this point with Mr. McGregor and stopped the investigation.

With regard to the financial advantage the minister has claimed for the government with respect to this memorandum, what do the millers themselves say? If we look at page 111 of the report we find this:

> Another representative wrote in 1945 that he recognized that "no agreement has ever worked one hundred per cent, but" he added, "by working seventy-five per cent it means a lot of extra dollars in the treasury."

That is their treasury, incidentally.

> In oral evidence he stated that this was his estimate of successful operation in 1945 in the west. On being questioned he conceded that conditions had been better in this respect in 1946, and better still in 1947 (evidence, pages 531-2). The effectiveness of the agreement on prices of one product, rolled oats, was estimated by the head of another company in 1938, not in percentages but in dollars and cents, when he wrote that ". . . the rolled oats conference has made us real money during the past five or six years. We estimate it has been worth $75,000 to $100,000 a year more than we got during the preceding years . . ."

Mr. Garson: I think it is only fair that I should interrupt right away, because by reading these extracts my hon. friend, unwittingly, is going to convey quite a wrong impression to hon. members. If before the war there were price fixing agreements, obviously they would be to the benefit of the treasury of the milling companies. But when this profit control arrangement was in effect, the milling companies could have had price fixing agreements until they were black in the face and they could not have made a penny by them, because anything they made would go back to the government in excess profits.

Mr. Coldwell: Then why did they try to get price fixing arrangements, if such arrangements would not inure to their benefit?

Mr. Garson: I am not saying they did, but a conceivable reason why they might do so, and why perhaps they did so, would be this. As I explained to my hon. friend, the price structure which was frozen by this government order was highly complicated in the flour industry. Since different firms had different ceilings, some had to sell below the ceiling in order that business might be carried on, because if they did not drop their prices in order to meet those of their competitors they could not get any business. So there was bound to be a certain amount of selling below the ceiling price, and the government recognized this from the start. But the government told the milling industry—and this is not open to any question; these are the uncontradicted statements of highly responsible men who were in charge of these matters—that it had decided how much it was going to put up by way of subsidies to the industry, and that it did not want to put up any more. Therefore the government would tolerate this competition to iron out these anomalies of the frozen price structure, but if there were any greater amount of competition beyond that necessary extent the government would step in and take away from the industry the benefit of the subsidy, to the extent necessary. Therefore it was in the interests of the industry to minimize that competition in order to maintain the benefits they were receiving in the form of the subsidy. There can be no question about that.

Mr. Coldwell: But apart from the subsidies, the returns to the millers, according to the reports of the Bank of Canada, went up after that year by year.

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Coldwell: I think so.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt this very interesting discussion, but I would not want to be placed in the position of having to suggest that the minister was adopting a one-man filibuster on this bill.

Mr. Garson: I want to be courteous to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and at the same time I want to be courteous to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and I am finding that a difficult task. I must apologize if I have interrupted my hon. friend.

Mr. Drew: I recognize that the minister did reply to questions which were asked, and I did not want to interrupt the discussion.

Mr. Coldwell: I thank the leader of the opposition for permitting me to ask some questions at this point.

Mr. Drew: I should like to complete what I was saying, and the questions may be asked afterwards.

To come back to the point I had reached in my discussion, I wish to leave no doubt as to the exact words I referred to as having been used by the minister so I quote from page 2147 of Hansard of yesterday, where the minister is reported as having said:

> Well, Mr. Chairman, I thought my hon. friend had greater respect for my intelligence than to ask for an assurance of that kind. If he stops to reflect for a moment on the difficulties that he must know I have had to face in connection with this matter, he will feel quite sure that upon the lowest possible basis of self-preservation he need have no fear for the future.

I suggest those words were correctly interpreted in what I said, subject to the fact that I made a subsequent observation with which the minister may or may not agree, but which did express my own opinion as to what those words really meant. I am definitely convinced that what the minister has just said to this committee demonstrates that far from recognizing the seriousness of what has happened—and I cannot overemphasize my own realization of that seriousness—the minister really thinks it would be a good thing if embarrassment of that kind could be avoided; and I cannot see any evidence that he has any other thought on the subject.

Mr. Garson: Then let us clear up that point now, if we may. I think it would be a good thing if embarrassment of that sort could be avoided, and I also think the best way to avoid that embarrassment is to publish in accordance with the act. I mentioned the lowest ground of self-interest, but that would be equally advisable upon higher grounds, upon grounds as high as my hon. friend likes. I do not think I could be any more specific than that; but if this matter is worrying my hon. friend he might write out a reasonable formula, and perhaps I would agree to subscribe to it. I would not want my remarks yesterday to be misinterpreted. May I say that there was no meaning intended such as my hon. friend has taken from them.

Mr. Drew: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have no desire not to co-operate in any way possible, but I would know in advance that any memorandum I might prepare would not be acceptable; therefore I will save my time in preparing it and the time of the minister in reading it. Perhaps what I would prepare would have some relation to what I find in one of the many editorials that have been written dealing with this subject. I do not think I have seen the core of the really serious aspects of this matter more clearly brought into focus than they are in an editorial appearing in Toronto Saturday Night of November 22—a highly responsible publication which has not at any time indicated partiality against the government in its discussion of public affairs. After a review of certain events under the heading "Law-breaking ministers", I find this in the issue to which I refer:

> It is a most dangerous attitude and one which, if allowed to go unrebuked, will extend eventually to even more important matters, if that be possible.
> That the report was unjust to the milling industry, and that the government would have been ill-advised to take action upon it, is in our opinion entirely true, but has nothing to do with the case. The law does not say that the government may suppress any report by the commissioner which causes it uneasiness, or with which it disagrees, or which it thinks likely to cause undue agitation in the public mind. The law says that the reports of the commissioner shall be made public within fifteen days; and the whole object of that provision was, as our Ottawa correspondent pointed out last week, to put the reports beyond the reach of any possible political pressures.
> In the United Kingdom, we do not hesitate to state, the unearthing of a situation such as this would lead to the resignation of at least the minister chiefly concerned. If the political atmosphere of Canada were as healthy as that of the United Kingdom—if electors demanded the same standards of their responsible rulers, and if rulers had the same sense of obligation to parliament and to the country—the same result would follow here.

This is not an overstatement of the seriousness of the situation with which we are confronted, and the attitude of the minister. If the minister had said: I came to Ottawa only on January 3; the report had been presented on December 29, and I remained in the west to clean up certain details; when I came here I was confronted with the necessity of preparing for parliament and I was not able to attend to this for a while; as Minister of Justice I have no discretion in regard to publication, but I did want to know something of what it was about; therefore, there was some delay which I regret. If this had been said, every hon. member would have agreed that we could not be critical of so reasonable a position. This default is continued, however, and when the explanation is given it is clear that the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not want the report published, and the Minister of Justice was not prepared to create an issue such as would have resulted, under our system, in the resignation of the minister. That is the situation.

Instead, however, the minister comes here and says he is assuming the responsibility. This morning he says, in effect, that a thing of this kind will not happen again; remember that on this occasion I did not have an opportunity of reading the report before publication. Why should he, unless he believes he should have an opportunity of reading it before it is in final form? What does that mean? Is there any hon. member who can misinterpret what the minister has in mind, that the report should be the subject of discussion before it is published? The purpose of publication was stated by the one who moved in this house the insertion of that section of the act, Mr. Mackenzie King. In his explanation of the purpose, he emphasized the prophylactic power of publication, and the independence of the officials in carrying out what they thought to be the necessary exposure of the conditions they had found, without the intervention of the government or any member of the government. That was the intention of this idea of publication. I believe it should be carried out.

I could easily put into the minister's mouth words in the form of verse which do seem to sum up his attitude. He will find them in Gilbert and Sullivan's "Iolanthe":

> The law is the true embodiment > Of everything that's excellent.
> It has no kind of fault or flaw,
> And I, my lords, embody the law.

In other words, never mind what parliament has passed; never mind what the responsibility is under the acts that those elected by the people pass; if we think anything might result from this with which we do not agree, then we will assume the responsibility as members of the government for changing the law, in effect if not in actual words.

I heard a comment a moment ago about quoting Gilbert and Sullivan which was not loud enough for the reporter to hear. As a matter of fact, Gilbert and Sullivan might well be quoted in respect to certain aspects of this matter. There is another reference to Gilbert and Sullivan which might be applied to another minister. I believe he well occupies the role of Pooh-Bah in another famous play which perhaps is better known than "Iolanthe". Nevertheless the fact that the ministerial Pooh-Bah is running not only his own department but the Department of Justice as well is no explanation for the Minister of Justice waiting ten months to get on his feet and resist that overriding power, with the qualifications he made, as soon as he had found out what it was all about.

For ten months, the government has been in contempt, and deliberate contempt, of parliament. The longer the explanations are that are put before us, the more it is emphasized why this government still thinks it had the right to break the law under the circumstances which existed at that time. If that explanation is sound, then it applies to other responsibilities of the government. If that explanation is sound, we have no way of knowing whether there are any other reports that should have been made or any other things this government should have done which it has failed to do under the same comfortable doctrine. It strikes at the very root of our system of responsible government.

I think it is time for us to recognize, Mr. Chairman, as has unfortunately been recognized too late in some other countries, that the first line of defence of our free society is not the Oder or the Rhine, but is right here in parliament. The first place for us to defend our free society and our system is the place where that freedom can find its guarantee, if the full responsibility of parliament is exercised as it was intended to be exercised.

If the present explanation is accepted, there is no assurance that this intolerable situation is any nearer an end than it was when this default was exposed so reluctantly. Who will forget the incident when the Minister of Justice was prepared to table the correspondence and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said, "No, no."

Mr. Diefenbaker: The veto power of the government.

Mr. Drew: It is the veto power carried right into the government.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt on a point of order? I shall not follow the trend the leader of the opposition has followed for the last two days. We have been dealing for quite some time with section 1 of the bill. There is a rule with which speakers are obliged to comply, and that is standing order 58. It reads:

> Speeches in committee of the whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

When the chairman took the chair, he read to the committee the item under discussion, which is an amendment to the Combines Investigation Act by which the Attorney General of Canada may institute and conduct prosecutions, a right which he has not at the present time. I know this is an interesting debate. I myself have followed it with great interest. I have listened to the arguments pro and con. There have been lengthy arguments, not only from the opposition but from my colleague. So much time having been taken in the discussion, if we are not now convinced that the opposition is right or that the government is right, I doubt if we ever shall be. I suggest to hon. members that from now on we confine the discussion to the matter before us, in compliance with standing order 58, and try to limit the arguments to the amendment which is before the committee. I will ask for a ruling by the chairman, if not before one o'clock, then later.

I do not often intervene in these debates, because I get more enjoyment out of listening to other people speak than out of speaking myself. But I have listened to a great deal of discussion, and I see that our minds will never meet. The leader of the opposition has his own views, others have their views, and we have ours. But the various views have been repeated and repeated by those who have spoken, and few new arguments have come out of the debate this morning. I therefore ask, Mr. Chairman, that we comply with standing order 58.

The Chairman: We are not discussing the principle of the Combines Investigation Act. We are discussing the principle of an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act, which is not the same thing. On the first clause I think it would be permissible to discuss, not the general principle of the Combines Investigation Act, but the general principle of an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act. There are three sections in this bill. The matter dealt with in section 1 is: Attorney General of Canada may institute and conduct prosecutions—we have discussed that; section 2: corporations to be tried without a jury; section 3: evidence. That is all that is dealt with in this bill. I think we have had a general and orderly discussion on the principle of an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act; and I would ask hon. members to confine their remarks to section 1 only.

Mr. Drew: I am glad to have that ruling, Mr. Chairman. I had almost concluded my remarks, all of which, I submit, have been directed to the reasons why this committee should be greatly concerned about extending any further powers to the present attorney general, and particularly with regard to extending to the attorney general the power to institute and conduct any prosecution or other proceedings under the act or the Criminal Code.

The Chairman: Not in regard to publication; in regard to prosecution. That is not the same thing.

Mr. Drew: That is right. The present Minister of Justice has broken the law, and I submit that he has no right to prosecute any Canadian for breach of this or any other law. He has put himself in contempt of the law of parliament, and of the house in which he sits today.

Mr. MacInnis: As to section 1, the section under discussion, ordinarily I do not believe there would be any disagreement in the committee. My understanding of the Combines Investigation Act as it stands is that prosecution, or the question whether there shall be prosecution, is first referred to the attorney general of the province in which the industry is located. If the attorney general does not prosecute, then the Attorney General of Canada, the Minister of Justice, may do so. What is involved in the amendment is concurrent jurisdiction in the matter of prosecution. I think that is correct. I have no objection to that. But so far as the section refers to the Attorney General of Canada—and that does not necessarily mean this Attorney General of Canada—I submit that the present Attorney General of Canada has put himself in the position where he should not ask for nor be given any further authority under this act. The fact of the matter is that throughout the country the suspicion has been created in the minds of the people that the present Minister of Justice, indeed the present administration, is not favourable to the purposes of the Combines Investigation Act. The thing that should be done now is that the Minister of Justice should resign and that the government should appoint a new minister of justice to administer this act.

The Chairman: Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. Knowles: One o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Weir: There are two minutes yet.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Can we not carry section 1?

The Chairman: Shall section 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knowles: One o'clock.

Progress reported.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Demobilization and reconversion—

250. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $547,497,388, including authority, notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $401,942,006, and commitments for future years of $145,555,382, against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1949-50 will not exceed $339,442,006.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, some questions were asked which I should like to answer at this time. The date of the naval order with regard to Canada badges, asked for by the hon. member for Three Rivers, was May 13, 1946.

The number of privates in the Canadian army (reserve) at October 31, 1949, is approximately 24,000. I say "approximately" because a return was requested from local commands on October 31, 1949, for this information. The information is collected at local commands, and had to be verified from certain units. We have received final returns from the areas representing 70 per cent of the strength, and extending the figures from the areas definitely reporting so as to cover the whole, gives a figure of approximately 24,000. That would be correct within 100.

The hon. member for Nanaimo asked questions with regard to air crew. In Canada at the present time there are approximately 60,000 men now in civilian life who during the second world war served as pilots, navigators, wireless air gunners and bombardiers. Approximately 47,000 have signified their intention of joining the armed forces again should a state of emergency arise. Because of age and physical factors the percentage of those suitable for employment in air crew duties will be reduced progressively each year.

In the R.C.A.F. itself, out of a strength of 16,356 there are 1,630 who are qualified air crew in the regular forces. Out of 3,086 in the air force auxiliary 471 are air crew. During the fiscal year 1949-50, it is estimated, approximately 200 men will qualify as air crew. There are now seven channels through which men may be qualified for air crew:

1. Men entering the R.C.A.F. from civil life for long service commands;

2. Men entering the R.C.A.F. from civil life for short service commissions;

3. University undergraduates who, as flying cadets, qualify as air crew throughout full-time work during the summer;

4. Cadets at Royal Roads and R.M.C. who will similarly qualify as flying cadets;

5. Serving officers in air crew trades which have been abolished—gunners, and flight engineers—who are being retrained as pilots, radio officers or navigators;

6. Serving airmen who have applied and have been selected for air crew training; and

7. Civilians with previous R.C.A.F. experience either as officers or airmen.

That covers all the classes by which men may be qualified.

Mr. Pearkes: The total number is 200 out of all those classes.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, 200 for 1949-50. At the present time the intake for air crew and the production of qualified men is sufficient to meet the requirements of the R.C.A.F. or to fill the gap until new air crew could be trained in the event of an emergency.

Mr. E. W. George (Westmorland): Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to prolong the debate unnecessarily, but in view of some of the remarks of hon. members in the opposition I feel it my duty, both as a member of the Canadian reserve army and as a member of parliament, to correct some of the impressions which have been given.

First I want to congratulate the minister upon the able way in which he has presented the report of his department to the committee. The minister is also to be congratulated upon having the courage of his convictions in asking for an investigation into the affairs of the Canadian navy, and for his subsequent publishing of Admiral Mainguy's report in full. I intend to leave the high-sounding philosophy on the theory of defence to the opposition, and to deal with the facts as I see them in relation to the reserve army.

Before the outbreak of the last war we had two armies in Canada, namely the permanent force and the non-permanent active militia. These two forces were governed by the same book, but actually were two distinct forces, with not too much good feeling between them. We had different rules and regulations in regard to training, pay, rations, clothing and equipment. In spite of all this, history has proved that we would not have been able to field the troops we did at the first of the war had it not been for the excellent work done by the N.P.A.M. between the wars.

Today, thanks to the policy laid down by the Minister of National Defence, we have one army. There is a good feeling of comradeship between those in the active force and those in the reserve force. All of us draw the same pay and allowances. We draw the same rations and wear the same clothing. Our training is the same; and it is the aim of all reservists to become as proficient as those in the active army. Those of us who were in the N.P.A.M. between the wars and are in the reserve army now, are most grateful to those who have laid down this policy and saw to it that it was carried out. The aim of those in the active army, from the top to the bottom, seems to be that of furthering the interests of the reserve army. After all, that is one of the main sources of manpower for Canada's army in the event of war.

[Mr. Claxton.]

The hon. member for Calgary East, speaking in the house on Friday, November 11, made the following statement as reported at page 1689 of Hansard:

> However, I think everybody admits that there has been extreme difficulty in getting men into the reserve units. The recruiting campaigns which have been put on have been flops.
> In Calgary we have had two or three army weeks that I remember, during which the various units came down town with pieces of their equipment. This equipment was put in prominent places such as busy street corners and so forth to be seen by the people. Posters were put up. Advertisements were put in the newspapers. Talks were given on the radio, and so on, all designed to draw in recruits for both the reserve force and the permanent force. So far as the reserve forces are concerned, these means were just hopeless. Very few recruits were secured as a result of them, in Calgary at any rate. I understand the same thing was true across most of the country.

Speaking on the same day the hon. member for Kamloops said, as reported on page 1695 of Hansard:

> If we are to play an effective role in defending our own territories, we must be able to put in the field an effective striking force within weeks or at the most a month of the time of the outbreak of hostilities. Is our reserve force capable of expansion in that way, to fill the role which that picture thrusts upon it? It certainly is not.

A little further on the hon. member said:

> If my hon. friend who asked me the question, or any other hon. member who is interested, will take the trouble to consult with the commanding officers of any of our reserve units, he will find the answer to his question. Those officers are reluctantly compelled to say that their units would not be battleworthy for a period not of weeks or a month, but of months or a year. We therefore have not a reserve force capable of taking the field, under present conditions, within less than a year from the outbreak of hostilities.

I quote those examples because they are typical of the criticism which has been levelled against the government and the reserve army. I do not propose to tell the committee what is wrong with other units in Canada; rather I propose to tell hon. members about one unit that has been able to recruit all the soldiers it wanted and to train them efficiently. There certainly are several units in Canada which are outstanding, and what I say in connection with one probably has to do with them all.

I refer to the Eighth Princess Louise's (New Brunswick) Hussars, fifth armoured regiment, with headquarters at Sussex, New Brunswick. Lieutenant Colonel G. R. H. Ross is the officer commanding and I have the honour to be second in command. I shall not go into the history of this regiment except to say that it is a very old unit and had a good war record in the recent war where it served throughout with the fifth Canadian division.

Upon being discharged from the active army in 1946 those members of the overseas unit who were interested were struck off strength to the reserve unit, the second regiment which had carried on during the war. A short summer camp was held in 1946 and I believe we were the only reserve unit in Canada to go into camp that year. The following year the unit trained at Camp Utopia, New Brunswick. In the meantime the four squadron headquarters had been established with A and B squadrons at Sussex, C squadron at Sackville and R.H.Q. at Hampton. This meant that we had personnel spread over a radius of 100 miles, which gave us a number of self-accounting units. This in itself is good training for the personnel concerned.

Recruiting was slow at first but those with the interests of the unit at heart soon developed a system which worked. We had been supplied with sufficient building accommodation for an armoured unit together with tanks and wheeled vehicles. This with the stores required for general military training and an A and T staff gave us enough to make training constructive and interesting. General military training was carried out at local headquarters and all armoured corps training was carried out at Sussex. We found that the recruiting campaigns made people think about the armed services and then all that was required was a little personal contact. Today our unit is within one hundred of being up to strength and we attribute this to the following:

1. Efficient administration, at all levels.

2. Well "laid on" progressive training leading to the qualifications of trained soldiers and tradesmen.

3. Good "Q" management—this includes good meals, sufficient clothing of the right size, regimental badges, flashes, ties, et cetera. All personnel attending week-end schemes or special courses are issued with sheets, pillow slips, pillows, blankets and the barrack rooms are conducted properly.

4. The social life of the unit. No unit can exist wholly on its social activities, but they are very necessary to maintain a proper level of military life.

All the items just mentioned should be the usual and not the exception. By making military life in the reserve army interesting and constructive, we built up an esprit de corps which, as you all know, is the secret of any unit. I cannot agree with the hon. member from Calgary East that it is hard to get men into the reserve army, nor can I agree that the recruiting campaigns which have been put on were flops. On the contrary we find these recruiting campaigns a great asset. In fact, on checking the records I find that allowing for wastage the strength of the Calgary reserve army units as at October 31, 1949, compared with the strength as at October 31, 1948, shows a net gain of 17·7 per cent. This shows that these advertising campaigns were not a flop in the hon. member's constituency as he suggested.

In my opinion no unit will ever recruit by waiting for the men to come to it. Each man presently on strength has a friend and he in turn has a friend and if the soldier is sufficiently interested he can bring several of his friends into the unit. We can bring our unit up to strength at will, and this will be done during the next recruiting campaign. There are, of course, always a number of non-effectives. In the case of officers and N.C.O.'s they are immediately struck off strength if they do not attend training without having obtained permission to be absent. In the case of other ranks an attempt is made to ascertain why they are not attending and if they persist in not attending, then they too are struck off strength. Of course, personnel can be forced to attend training under the Militia Act, but we do not want anyone on strength who does not want to belong.

In 1944 at the battle of Coriano Ridge, which was one of the battles of the Gothic line, members of the unit came across a badly wounded colt several days old beside her mother which had been killed during the battle. The colt was taken to the M.I.R. and patched up. The colt lived and was taken with the unit as a mascot. Eventually, the mascot went with the unit to northwest Europe and eventually was shipped to Canada. This colt, named Princess Louise, has become a member of the Hampton branch of the Canadian Legion and is also a member of the reserve unit. On all ceremonial parades and guards this mascot leads the parade. This unit put on guards of honour for both Viscount Alexander and Field Marshal Montgomery, and Princess Louise formed part of each parade. The presence of this mascot has helped to build morale within the unit and has helped recruiting.

For the past two years we have taken more troops into summer camp than any other unit in Canada and in each case could have taken far more than our allotment. The winter training done at local headquarters and at R.H.Q. trains the soldier for the specialized training he will get at summer camp. The troops enjoy summer camp and there is always a high percentage who would like to remain for additional training.

As you all know, a tank driving range requires a lot of territory, and since the tanks are so heavy it is impossible to transport them around the country without doing permanent damage to certain bridges, and roads. As I mentioned before, all armoured corps training was of necessity carried on at R.H.Q. at Sussex. Each squadron must attend one week end training period per month and one week end is reserved for officers and N.C.O.'s. This is all specialist training, which in the case of other ranks can lead to qualification as tradesmen.

In addition, there are many schemes arranged with other units in the area. Three weeks ago, for instance, there were over 600 personnel quartered in our lines doing a tank-cum-infantry scheme. Last year we put on a tank-cum-infantry scheme with the air force and artillery in support. Two weeks ago we were hosts to the area shoot at which every unit in the New Brunswick area was represented. You can see by this that the attitude toward the reserve army in New Brunswick is very good. In fact, according to figures published in the press recently, the province of New Brunswick had more personnel in the reserve army per capita than any other province in Canada.

An important part of the work of a reserve army is sponsoring cadet corps. We have affiliated with us five cadet corps. These corps are trained under direction of the area cadet officer together with what help we can give them with our own officers and N.C.O.'s and with the A and T staff. The members of these cadet corps are brought into R.H.Q. at least once a year and are given a practical knowledge of tanks and wheeled vehicles on strength. Annually we present a suitably engraved cup to the best affiliated cadet corps. We find that these cadet corps provide a steady stream of recruits for the reserve army.

Our percentage of overseas personnel in the ranks in relation to recruits is rather high. Twenty-two per cent of the other ranks had service with the active force during the recent war. Sixty per cent of the N.C.O.'s and 80 per cent of the officers served with the active force. In my opinion this is exceptionally good, and is of great benefit in training recruits. There are many officers and N.C.O.'s in the area who are fully qualified and yet have been unable to get on strength of a reserve unit because the complement is full. To overcome this, and to give reserve units the advantage of having additional trained officers and N.C.O.'s at their command, the department has allowed us to take on additional personnel from the supplementary reserve officers list up to our war establishment in equivalent ranks. We are also allowed now to take on W.O.'s and N.C.O.'s surplus to establishment up to 100 per cent of our war establishment.

The minister has made the statement several times that the 8th P.L. (N.B.) Hussars is the largest and best reserve unit in Canada today. We are very proud of this fact. It is our intention to bring this unit up to strength in the near future, and to maintain its standard of efficiency.

The hon. member for Kamloops made the statement on page 1695 of Hansard for Friday, November 11, that if we take any year from 1924 to 1938 or 1939, we shall find that the size of the reserve army is substantially in excess of the reserve army today. Although the reserve army strength before the last war was higher than it is today, nevertheless this was to some extent a paper strength, for we were training only 64·4 per cent of our total strength at that time, while we have been training an average of 86·4 per cent over the last four years. As a matter of fact, last year was one of our best years when we were training 92·2 per cent of the reserve army. Training today, compared with that between the wars, is so far superior that figures do not tell the truth. We are actually training today with sufficient men, equipment and buildings, together with good training at summer camps and summer schools. The men are really efficient, and many of them are ready to take the field, whereas between the wars, as we all know, training was of very little value.

Those of us who were in the N.P.A.M. between the wars remember well the conditions under which we trained. I personally remember when all ranks contributed their pay to regimental funds in order that we could hire horses and pay expenses to go into camp. When we were formed into an armoured unit around 1938, we were not allowed to train sufficient personnel, although we did get some money for the hire of cars which we used in lieu of tanks. In 1939, a few months before war broke out, we took into camp our authorized training allotment of fifty-five all ranks. I want to impress on all hon. members again that this was only a few months before war broke out. These conditions do not exist today. We have sufficient equipment and are allowed to take into camp enough personnel to assure a high standard of training in the reserve army.

At the present time I do not feel that Canada needs or can afford a large standing army. There is only one source of money, and that is the Canadian taxpayer. If the money is spent on defence it is not available for the many other needs of the country. There is sufficient money allotted to the reserve army today to train it efficiently. Some members of the opposition have voiced the fear that this money is being wasted.

I know that it is not being wasted in my own unit, and I cannot entertain the fears expressed by so many of the opposition that we could not recruit quickly enough today in the event of hostilities breaking out. I was in Toronto the other night at the royal winter fair, and there was a guard of honour put on by the reserve army. I think it indicated the state of training of a good many of the units of the reserve army. The Irish regiment of Canada from Toronto provided the guard of honour for the vice-regal party, and it was exceptionally well done. I think they should be highly praised for their efforts.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I feel that if my own unit, together with several other units in Canada, can accomplish what we have under the existing regulations there should be no reason why other units cannot do equally well. It shows there is nothing wrong with our system, and we know by experience that we have sufficient equipment and material to make the program a success. There are local conditions which affect each unit differently, but surely these can be overcome by those who so successfully overcame the obstacles presented to them in the last war. To those who doubt the efficiency of the training being carried out in both the active and reserve army, I suggest that they arrange with the minister to visit units so that they can see for themselves the efficient way in which the program is being carried out.

By comparison with the N.P.A.M., and having in mind the success which we had in mobilizing the forces at the outbreak of the last war, I am convinced that we are in a far better position than ever before in the history of this country, and that we could mobilize our forces today quickly enough to take care of any emergency.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I wish to offer some constructive suggestions to the government in connection with these estimates, and especially item 250. My suggestions are not made in criticism of what the minister has been doing, far from it. They are suggestions with which I think he will agree once they are presented to him. I am not a military man, but I have seen a great deal of the good work which the department has done. First of all I should like to refer to the book which the department has brought out covering many phases of its activities. One of the matters referred to in it is the union of the services. The United States have had the same trouble. You may remember after the Pearl Harbor disaster, and after the close of the war, they had the same trouble under two or three of their leaders. They tried to unite into one organization the army, navy, air force and other services. We saw what happened there. Since that time there have been effected some changes which have been brought about by the new conditions now existing.

I want to call attention to a book by Lord Vansittart entitled "Lessons of my Life". He was the British ambassador to Germany for fifteen years. In his book he warns the world about the disaster that is surely coming between the east and the west. I say the minister would be well advised to ponder, hearken and listen to what the ambassador has said because he has offered some good constructive advice along these lines. In Everybody's Weekly of November 12, 1949, Lord Vansittart has called attention to the grave danger awaiting the world arising out of our association with the Soviet union, which never intends to carry out anything it proposes.

This is a very important matter. Here we have a representative of the United States and a representative of Britain conferring, with whom? They are conferring with the representatives of the Soviet. The picture shows Mr. Bevin of Britain and Mr. Dean Acheson of the United States enjoying a jest with Mr. Vishinsky of the U.S.S.R.; but the legend under the picture says, "but the time has come to cease 'smarming' Soviet representatives." The heading of the article is "Stop this foolishness" and beneath it is this statement:

> Only fools play cards with notorious sharpers, yet our government continues to make worthless "agreements" with the communist states which are bent on our destruction.

That is exactly correct; and in the article Lord Vansittart goes on to say:

> It is remarkable that the democracies still cannot really wake up to the true nature and intentions of the communist conspiracy. There have been encouraging signs in the United States and Australia, where some of the conspirators have been convicted and sentenced, but in the main the democracies go on blindly and softly preaching and practising "liberty to destroy liberty."
> This was the line taken by the German republic towards nazism and by Czechoslovakia towards communism. In both cases—and in others also—the totalitarian system enslaved the people; yet we still will not learn the lesson that all these insidious and despotic systems are deadly poison, and that all their advocates should be regarded in that light.
> Thus foolishly looking upon communism as a party instead of a conspiracy, the democracies—governments and peoples—always begin to recoil from effective action at the very moment when they begin to nerve themselves for it. Consequently, communism continues to enjoy wholly unreasonable facilities for carrying on its destructive work; and though it sometimes suffers minor setbacks—as in Greece—broadly speaking it is gaining ground, and democracy is losing it.

Then the article goes on to describe where the landslide began. Hon. members may remember that the other day, speaking in a debate on defence, Mr. Churchill said the Soviet were invited to take part in the Pacific war just before the collapse of Japan, and he had not consented to it. He also said that instead of the western allies going right on into Berlin, which they could have captured, they halted a few miles away, at Stressen, and as a result brought about the situation we have seen in Berlin since the end of the war. I need not take time to read Mr. Churchill's speech, but he pointed out that the Russians were invited to join in the war against Japan by the late President Roosevelt and by General Eisenhower, and they came into the Pacific though that had been the preserve of the British and American armies. What did they do there, just three days later? Japan was about to collapse, anyway; but they landed five hundred thousand men in Manchuria about a week before the end of the Japanese war, and finally overran the whole of China, just as they have overrun about three-quarters of Asia. Burma, Malaya, and many other countries in Asia are gone, and there is very little left.

Then Lord Vansittart went on to say:

> Briefly, we must "recognize" communism everywhere, not in the old diplomatic sense but in the modern one—as our inevitable foe. This attitude should be practised not only by democratic governments but by all democratic individuals. For example, British ministers should limit their attendance at communist feasts and festivals to the barest minimum, and should never be photographed shaking hands with, and grimacing at, communist politicians, diplomatists, or other treacherous agents. This smarming only misleads our own people. Truth requires a stern face; let our rulers wear it.
> All this involves a break with past habits, procedures and traditions; but I have long said that we must revolutionize our own outlook, if we are to cope with the attempt at world-wide revolution which now threatens to engulf freedom. The enemy is at our doors—and within them. Why not hit him in time?

I believe that is the truth coming from a man who has had the greatest experience. He goes on:

> I came early to the conclusion that nazism meant war, and coined the phrase "Keep Germany lean."

He goes on to point out that there is the same grave danger of Germany rising again. He was ambassador there for fifteen years, and he knows the people. He warns the nations of the world that Germany may yet rise and be restored as a great industrial and economic nation, and eventually cause a third war. The other day I mentioned these slave camps that are all over Europe. Here is the picture of a map of eastern Europe with the slave camps dotted all over it. There are millions of slaves in these places in the Soviet, the satellite countries of the Balkans and the Far East. All those countries are as much afraid of Germany rising again as they are of the Soviet nation, and we should be aware of that danger also.

Lord Vansittart goes on to say:

> We must revise our former definition of diplomacy. It no longer exists to ensure good relations. The missions of the iron curtain exist everywhere to foster bad relations by promoting subversion and preparing sabotage. Diplomacy therefore no longer consists in drafting treaties, which communists always break even when they have signed them. All that we get by trying to compromise with evil is first a series of unwarrantable humiliations, and then some waste paper.
> This has been the course and outcome of every agreement that we have ever made with the Kremlin, and in particular of the so-called peace treaties with its satellites. We are reduced to constant protests that solemn pledges are being violated in every particular; and in return we receive an insolent smack in the face with Russia's open approval. Why continue to play cards with notorious sharpers? If we ask to be cheated, we must not grumble if we are gratified.
> Let us drop all this, and on no account even try to conclude a treaty with this Russia about this Germany.
> Nothing of this sort is possible, since it is the Soviet intention to dominate all Germany. We should, on the contrary, make our own arrangements with western Germany, regardless of any communist splutters.
> Similarly the democratic powers should make their own treaty with Japan, irrespective of Soviet obstruction. Russia can sign or stay out. I prefer the latter. Yet when the American Secretary of State was recently asked what we would do if the Kremlin pursued its wrecking tactics, he replied that we had not thought about that yet. It is high time that we did.
> Russian prestige has been badly rattled by the election of Yugoslavia to the security council, despite Vishinsky's threats. The ingenuities of our diplomacy should henceforth be bent to shake it still further—not to handclasps and negotiations. Communism is groggy in many parts of its empire; and we have many openings for weakening it, particularly on the economic side.
> Moscow has bitten off more than it can chew. It cannot supply its slave states, which must consequently look west for machinery and raw materials. Do not let us help them out of their troubles. We need not, of course, break off trade relations altogether; but we should be careful to do nothing which might enable communism to cover up its commercial inefficiencies. The greater its troubles the greater its loss of face everywhere, and the greater, accordingly, the possibility of eventually liberating the oppressed.
> Communism insists on 100 per cent servility to the Kremlin of all its members. This caused Tito to kick, and his gesture created a crack throughout eastern Europe. There is no Titoism in China, but we might help to bring it about by a policy which would ensure that communism cannot live up to its promises, or even extricate itself from its dilemmas.

Now, that is the gospel truth. There are three or four other matters to which I wish to refer. I am glad to see that the minister has followed the practice of the United States in issuing a booklet on national defence. I have in my hand the annual report of the Secretary of the United States' Navy, issued by John L. Sullivan. There was a John L. Sullivan who was a champion boxer in earlier times. This booklet sells for thirty cents and is published in many languages. It gives an account of the efficiency of the navy, and is divided into subjects such as aircraft, ammunition, appropriations, atomic energy, chief of naval operations, cold-weather operations, and construction. There are references to many other matters such as the marine corps, what they are doing, fiscal administration and all that kind of thing. It lists the various departments such as the medical service, the naval stations, the national military establishments. I am glad to see that our minister has issued a similar booklet containing a multitude of matters, and dealing with civil defence.

At this point, I wish to thank the minister for giving the opposition a chance to bring these matters to the attention of the house under item 250. It is of course,—Mr. Amery says in the National Review—always open to Canada to become absorbed into the American economy. No doubt that would add to the balanced expansion of the North American continent as a whole. The greater part of the expansion would, however, by the sheer scale and momentum of the United States economy, continue to take place south of the frontier. Statesmen like Sir John A. Macdonald, with his insistence on Canadian east and west development and on effective protection against the United States, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, with his bold initiative in establishing unilateral preference to Britain, foresaw the meaning of Canada's position and of its opportunities. Today these opportunities are far greater. Canada has reached a point in her development when she should take a leading part in the development of the British commonwealth, as well as in the regeneration of Europe, if she but willed it. In Mr. St. Laurent, Mr. Amery well says, she has a Prime Minister with an undisputed majority in parliament and an even more complete hold over French Canada. He has already shown his initiative and originality of outlook in connection with the Atlantic pact, and in his insistence on regional policies. Is it inconceivable that, like Sir Wilfrid Laurier before him, he might take a bold step that would help to loosen the present log jam in the world's economy?

The greatest obstacle to such a move in the direction of building up Canada's position as a leading member in an economic group more than capable of matching the United States is really psychological. I believe that is correct.

I should like myself to see some action taken towards the establishment of a Pacific pact, since the Pacific is the back door into Canada, whereas the Atlantic is at our front door. The Atlantic pact involves about 200 million people, but in the Pacific area there are six or seven hundred million, if southern China were included. Some action should be taken immediately against communist Russia, which has met its match in the west but which is now out of control in the east. In 1938 I called the attention of the house to the fact that from Puget sound to the southern Queen Charlotte islands there are nearly 700 miles of unprotected coast line, and it was only by a miracle that Canada escaped direct invasion after Pearl Harbor.

Canada should take some action to control the east and stop communist Russia from controlling Asia. The Atlantic pact and the Marshall plan discourage the communists in the Atlantic region, but let us not forget that unless we have a Pacific pact all we do at our front door will be of little effect. It will not prevent Russia from overrunning the Far East. There must be a considered plan backed by economic support from the countries that are involved in the Pacific.

General MacArthur has done good work in the Far East, and the United States should take the lead in establishing a Pacific pact. In these modern days when bandits and burglars are so busy in our large cities, one must not forget to lock the back door as well as the front door, and we should remind ourselves that the same condition prevails in considering the possibility of warfare in the Atlantic and Pacific today.

What are Canada's defence measures, even after the signing of this Atlantic pact, and does the signing of that pact give us security in case of a third war? In this debate, I have a right to ask the government to give to the house and the country an assurance that all proper means will be taken to see that our armed forces are prepared with effective plans on land and sea and in the air, for the defence of our country. This should include the re-establishment of the air training plan in Canada, and if it is deemed necessary, such home defence measures as the setting up of a home guard. I am far from satisfied that Canada has real security today, and I am free to admit that so far as our defence forces are concerned we are like Ethelred the Unready. As I said in the debate on foreign affairs on July 26, 1948, there is no use pretending we have any adequate security today. I request the government to give us a clear statement as to what additional security the Atlantic treaty gives us.

For some time after 1945 and for about two years after Mr. Churchill's speech at Fulton, nothing was done to arouse the Atlantic countries to the real situation. Communism was like an unsuspected cancer and its ravages went unheeded. Since last fall the western democracies have become wide awake to the grave weaponless war Russia is waging and they are aware of the grave danger.

Canada has worked with Russia as a neutral, as an enemy, and as an ally, and has done so on three occasions. The first was in 1935, when Hitler was beginning to show Germany and the world the fear of a second war; Mr. Eden went to Moscow and achieved a triumph—previously he had gone to France, Italy and the Balkans—in the matter of a union that included Russia. Mr. Eden, then Lord Privy Seal, was met at the railway station in Moscow by Mr. Litvinoff and also by the British ambassador; and at a dinner given by Russia Stalin drank the health of Great Britain, and the party went to the theatre after.

The second time was in 1941 after Hitler attacked Russia and Russia was welcomed by Mr. Churchill as an ally; and on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Soviet republic a celebration was held in London and the Archbishop of Canterbury prayed for the victory of the Russian army.

The third time of unity was at San Francisco and both the east and west united in the formation of the UNO to promote peace. Why then do they not allow the allies to get behind the iron curtain and to see what is going on there?

I would call the last three years the weaponless war; for the world now, thanks to Russia, is faced with two kinds of warfare. As the atom bomb has been perfected by the United States, the Soviet union has deserved a more powerful treatment. In the cold, brazen, weaponless war—and she conquers without destruction by this method of warfare—ten countries have been scuttled under, and behind the iron curtain others are almost under the shadow of aggression; the entire world is kept in restless fear of destruction. It is something new in warfare, this struggle for survival, and a challenge is given that armed forces are to maintain any challenge, for war is now waged against us. Unless we win the struggle of Berlin we shall not win the larger struggle. We seem to have failed to appreciate what was involved at Berlin. What was involved there was the command of the sea. That is what the issue was at Berlin. You apparently have lost it; and if you do lose it at Berlin, you are going to lose command of the sea on the Atlantic and the Pacific. Their cold war is only one of camouflage, and has lulled the west into a wrong sense of thinking it has security when it has not.

[Mr. Church.]

Never has the House of Commons been faced with graver issues than now. We face the most serious economic disaster, and a very direct military threat, as we go on pretending that we have security. We also err, as does the United States, in taking Britain's supremacy of the sea for granted. There is only one path to take, and our Ottawa politicians will not follow it, namely empire consolidation, which stood us so well in two long wars. Why is any scheme of internationalism, however absurd, preferred and adopted instead of finding real security with our own family members in the dominions and crown colonies? The United Nations are heading us into what I believe will be a third strife, and the west is now no match for the east. Canada should learn that we should follow our own dominions and crown colonies that saved us in two wars and not depend altogether on Washington, although the United States is a friendly nation. Stalin's Russia is just as dangerous to the peace of the world as was Hitler's Germany and, waging a weaponless war, has already conquered huge areas of Europe and Asia. I find an analogy between the failure of the United States and Britain to occupy Berlin and the failure of Hannibal to enter ancient Rome, and Carthage was afterwards destroyed. I note that 38,000 tons of rubber were exported monthly from Malaya to Russia while Canada and the empire got none. I have given this as my opinion: no more goods or services to these countries behind the iron curtain without some promises accordingly.

The entry of Russia into the war had rendered the Japanese military position hopeless. The possession of Manchuria was vital to the Japanese war economy; it was impossible to hold Manchuria against the flood of vastly superior Russian armies. The use of the atomic bomb accelerated at most by a couple of weeks or so a surrender which would have been inevitable. But had it been the Japanese who had led the way with this particular weapon, the effects would scarcely have been of greater military importance than the German use of flying bombs and rockets in 1944. There would have been but few of such bombs available; to have used them the Japanese must have dropped them from aircraft. Attempts to bomb vital Anglo-American bases would have come up against a crushing Anglo-American superiority in fighter aircraft plus radar, and other means of defence. Manchuria is a land of immense spaces. An atomic bomb dropped here or there would have been of no particular importance. The Russian armies would have continued to flood Manchuria. The Anglo-Americans would have continued to push forward their own plans for invasion. The use of atomic bombs by the Japanese would have been a temporary shock but would scarcely have affected the issue or its outcome. The very fact that every new means of attack evolves from older means connotes that the older means of defence can be swiftly improved and expanded to meet the new danger. Whether the new means of defence become available in time depends upon us.

I may say that the British commonwealth and empire must depend on its own strength for salvation as a family of nations. The league of nations, the United Nations, a united Europe, or the latest hope, the Marshall offer—none of these can do for the British commonwealth and empire what it must achieve for itself by co-operation, enterprise and the strength of its own right arm. Let us by all means seek co-operation with nations whose interests and outlook are akin to our own, and whose security would be jeopardized if the British empire were the victim of aggression. But let us turn once more to our own kith and kin within our own empire, and rely upon our own character and resources for the working out of our salvation as a family of nations.

The United Nations so far has been a modern tower of Babel. Canada and Great Britain should not allow their interests to be the plaything of the United Nations. You cannot obtain peace by any such agency. No country will ever allow other countries and the United Nations to settle its affairs unless that country is too weak to defend its own interests, as Canada is by our disarmament.

The future of both Canada and the United States depends on their own peoples. We need the closest and the most absolute co-operation, collaboration and understanding between this country and the rest of the British empire and between Canada and the United States. Our position is of great importance. Our air policy, for instance, should be planned in close consultation with Britain, and we should have an empire security council such as has been advocated. We should now re-establish in Canada the empire air training plan as a security measure in days like these, in addition to this Atlantic pact which I support and which I hope will prove successful.

Never has the House of Commons been faced with graver issues than at present. Canada should rearm. It is almost too late to do so. Our motto in Canada should be that of Oliver Cromwell: put your trust in God and keep your powder dry. And we should feature it as it applies at this hour in world affairs, which are so dark. Empty Ottawa platitudes will amount to nothing, as will depending on the UNO at Lake Success for our defence. I do not forget when Hitler overran Sudetenland, and Czechoslovakia and the streets of Prague. Our policy has been to side with the Ottawa government in their disarmament policy, and that of scuttle, quit and haul down the flag on the seven seas. Canada should not do that. I believe the government of the day has a program which no doubt it will carry out. I believe Canada should at once send to Britain a message of hope and a promise for the future. I have tried the past few years to tell the House of Commons that the British at home and overseas are one great family, and we should remember that Mr. Menzies, then prime minister of Australia, when he addressed the members of the Senate and the House of Commons here, stressed that point. As he said recently in Australia:

> If the price we pay for this second experiment in universal organization is a weakening of our understanding of the importance of the British empire or a lessening of our implicit devotion to it, then the price we will have paid for the United Nations will be almost as disastrous as the price we almost paid for the League of Nations. Do not misunderstand me in this.
> I am saying that it would be the blunder of our lives if in instinctive loyalty to a new world organization completely experimental and almost completely untried we cast away our ancient loyalty which has been the strength of our lives and the rock upon which our houses have been built.

On June 16 last I expressed the very same thing when discussing the estimates for national defence and foreign affairs. I said there was no use our pretending we had such security. It is difficult to understand a great many of these matters. However that is the position I take.

Fortunately the west can confront Russia with overwhelming strength in industry, munitions and manpower, and has established a lead in atomic research which it will be immensely difficult for the Kremlin to overtake. It is our duty to do all in our power to preserve that lead.

Yet, assuming that a balance of power in our favour is maintained, the question remains: Is this sufficient to enable the world to settle down? Is it conceivable that there can really be a secure and contented world while Russia holds half Europe in thrall? Can genuine peace be established while Europe is half slave and half free? Again, is not more than Europe involved? If Asia, besides China and including India, Burma and the East Indies, comes under the Russian grip, can there be world recovery? These are questions for the second stage of the conflict in which we are all at present engaged. When retreat is forced on Russia somewhere, the scene may brighten everywhere.

The main point to remember about the atomic bomb is that its use may depend on the gradual restoration of a more civilized world. Humanity may have to face the question: Which is the less unendurable, a vast physical destruction, or the surrender of the whole of mankind to a diabolical tyranny such as the world has never seen?

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): I regret much less not having read the papers recently because the hon. member for Broadview has been generous enough to give us the benefit of his reading. He made a most interesting speech which I shall send tomorrow to the military experts who are in town, especially to Sir William Slim, British chief of staff. It is important for them to know what is being said in the House of Commons on the subjects of military and external affairs.

I am not going to make a long speech, because everything that could be said about defence matters has been said by some experts whom I see in front of me. I give credit to the minister and his immediate predecessor for having done so well with the Department of National Defence, after all that had happened before. I wish them success.

I cannot do otherwise, however, than make a few observations which came to my mind some years ago, and particularly in November 1944 when the question of conscription was debated. At that time the late minister of national defence, the one who had resigned on the conscription issue, said that there were some weaknesses in the Canadian army in France. This was broadcast throughout the country and the world. Not long afterwards the German offensive thrust to the south causing the death of many soldiers in the American and Canadian armies.

I have often wondered if it would not be better to discuss questions of defence in camera. Expenditures might be mentioned in the house, because they are of interest to the public; but what does the average citizen know about defence? There are some military experts and some civilian experts who have studied the matter; but many people may be under the wrong impression. If defence matters were discussed in camera every one would have a full opportunity to say all he has to say without endangering the security of the country.

Some hon. members may say that would not be democratic. During the war some secret sittings of the house were held to discuss matters of defence, and they brought good results. Not long ago I saw two articles which appeared in Maclean's magazine referring to the U-boats which came up the St. Lawrence river. At the time it happened there was difficulty in calling a secret sitting, because the then prime minister and the then minister of national defence objected. After some discussion however they agreed to have a few secret sittings, which served a useful purpose.

I submit this not only to the Minister of National Defence but to all my colleagues, so that if in future they think the interests of the country would be better served by a discussion in camera it would be up to them to make their representations to whom it may concern.

What appeared in Maclean's establishes clearly that those who at that time said Canada was in danger of being attacked were right. It has taken some years to prove those statements, but the facts are set out in this widely circulated periodical, which quotes the official report.

Even at the time of conscription no one opposed the defence of Canada. The subject matter of the argument was whether it was necessary to defend Canada in Canada, or not. The U-boats coming so far up the St. Lawrence river showed clearly that there was reason for concern.

There was considerable discussion about conscription at the time and Colonel Ralston, who was then minister of defence, resigned because he felt conscription had not been imposed early enough. I should like to know how many men were conscripted for overseas service after the legislation was passed. I had some correspondence with the parliamentary assistant to the minister and he gave me some information, but it is far from complete. I should like the brass hats to work on it and give the committee complete data as to the number of N.R.M.A. men who were conscripted for overseas service after the mobilization act was amended. I received some information, and I translate from a letter in French:

> It has been brought to my attention that a publication entitled, "Canada at War" No. 45 of 1945, published by the wartime information services, contains the information you asked for. According to that article 13,000 men were called up by virtue of the mobilization act and were sent overseas to Europe on D-day. Moreover, 3,000 men sailed for overseas after having signed for voluntary service.

I have a clipping to the same effect. I asked three questions, as follows:

1. On what date did the 3,000 men sail for overseas and from what provinces did they come?

2. From what provinces did the 13,000 men come who had not signed for overseas but who were sent overseas to Europe on D-day?

3. Were they sent to Europe or to Japan, and on what boats did they sail?

I received some supplementary information about the N.R.M.A. personnel who had proceeded to the United Kingdom, as follows:

Military district
1	London, Ontario	1,109
2	Toronto, Ontario	2,301
3	Kingston, Ontario	286
4	Montreal, Quebec	2,060
5	Quebec, Quebec	551
6	Halifax, Nova Scotia	399
7	Saint John, New Brunswick	519
10	Winnipeg, Manitoba	1,344
11	Victoria, British Columbia	1,253
12	Regina, Saskatchewan	1,785
13	Calgary, Alberta	1,229
	Total	12,836

The following ships transported these personnel to the United Kingdom: Pasteur, Mauretania, Aquitania, New Amsterdam and Volendam.

That is not all the information I wanted, but I thank the parliamentary assistant for what he has sent me. It is now possible to talk sensibly about this matter, but it was not possible during the war. Those who were talking against conscription for overseas were described as isolationists and there was hardly anything that was not said about them. They were told they were not good citizens, they were not patriotic and were not doing their duty. The issue at that time was whether conscription for overseas service was actually helpful to the allied cause at the time the amendment was made. My contention was that it was not.

I crossed the floor of the house with other Liberal members because I was not satisfied with the policy adopted by my party at that time. We were called into a caucus to discuss conscription. The caucus was adjourned, Sir John Dill was here in the east block, the day after Mr. King did not return to the caucus and we were told of the quick turnabout, and conscription for overseas was announced as the policy of the government. I still wonder if it was not just political expediency.

I endeavoured to do my duty in the house by protesting against it in order to protect the farmers and those men who were engaged in essential industry. I was greatly surprised to notice in the Windsor station, the Canadian National station in Montreal, and in other places, that posters were put up stating that the men who were prepared to leave their essential positions to go into the army were doing a better job than if they continued in their present positions. Of course, that was a matter of opinion. If we are believers in fundamental freedoms and human rights contrary opinions must be respected.

I view the future with some alarm because of certain things that are being done. We are likely to be at war with any country and we should look at the facts. Lord Carnarvon, who sponsored the British North America Act and who was unquestionably a great man, stated that the only danger to Canada would come from the United States. That was said at the time of the Fenian raids. That great English statesman felt that Canada was in danger from the United States and in his speech he referred to the number of men between the ages of 16 and 30 who could carry arms for the defence of this country.

I think that all hon. members who were opposed to conscription were opposed because they felt that the defence of Canada was not sufficient at the time. Nobody thought of the defence of Canada, although some of our statesmen and leaders of parties were telling us that Hitler had his eyes on Canada, that Canada would be a prize for him, and that he wanted to get hold of this country. I hope the fears of war expressed by the hon. member who spoke just before me, and by others, are exaggerated. I hope so, but I want to make it clear that nobody is opposed to the defence of Canada, and nobody is opposed to conscription for the defence of Canada, provided that the military authorities do not interfere with essential war services in times of war.

Perhaps what has been said by the leader of the opposition and by my good friend from Nanaimo is right. Perhaps there is some exaggeration in it. I am not in a position to say. If they go anywhere in the province of Quebec and ask the people what their views are about the defence of Canada, they will realize that the concern expressed in the house exists in the province of Quebec just as it does in every other province of Canada from Newfoundland to British Columbia. The people want this country to be defended just as well as it can be, and we rely on the Minister of National Defence to do all he can to further that purpose in the national interest. God forbid that we should have another war, but if we do we hope that Canada will be better defended than it was during the last war.

The answer will be made that the steps taken by Canada during the last war served to protect this country against aggression. There are great changes. When Lord Carnarvon spoke of the danger that might come to Canada from the United States, communications were not the same as they were during the last war. Since the last war various means of communication have made such progress that every part of the world can be easily exposed to danger, and requires protection. That being said, I should like to congratulate the minister upon the steps he has taken, and I hope that all the criticism that will be made of his department will be constructive. Those who will criticize may be right or wrong, but as long as constructive criticism is offered in good faith I am sure that all those who do so will render a public service.

Mr. Knight: It would seem that this item forms the basis for a broad discussion of many matters. I am interested in a specific question. I refer to the proposal to build armouries in the city of Saskatoon. I am interested, as are all hon. members, in the welfare of my constituents. The construction of an armoury will provide a good deal of work, and it is a good thing for any city to have such a project being carried on. This proposition is now getting to be somewhat ancient in that responsible ministers of the crown have given their assurance that such construction would take place some time.

I remember it was my pleasant privilege to listen to a fine address by the present Minister of National Defence at a meeting of the Canadian Club, I believe, in my own city. He assured the members of the club that this project was on the books so far as the government was concerned, and that it was merely a matter of time until construction would be commenced. It was my pleasant duty to move a vote of thanks to the minister for his address. I am sure he has forgotten the incident, because after all it would be an unimportant one to him, but I remember saying that when the time came in a year or so I would remind him of that particular speech and that particular promise. That is what I am doing now, and I am also coupling this question with my remarks. What is the status now of that particular project with regard to time of commencement, plans, and the amount of money which will be spent? I should like to know particularly when we can look for such construction to begin.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member for Saskatoon that the situation there has by no means been overlooked. As he knows, I visited Saskatoon in 1947 and saw the situation of the units there and their need for an armoury. I also had discussions with officials of the city which led to the acquisition of a suitable site. There is no doubt about the need of Saskatoon for an armoury. As the hon. member has said, the only question is when. In that respect Saskatoon is in the same position as a great number of other communities across Canada which should have armouries. It is one of the greatest needs for our reserve army. This year we have provided $41 million for construction, most of it for married quarters, although some of it will be spent on operational buildings. For the reasons I gave two weeks ago, we have only been able to begin construction this year on one new armoury, and that is at Sault Ste. Marie. I am afraid I cannot say when it will be possible to begin construction at Saskatoon or any other place. It will depend on how much money is provided for defence during each consecutive year, on how much can be spent on construction, and on how much of the money to be used for that purpose can be spent on reserve armouries. I can assure you that the need for reserve armouries is recognized by the department. It is simply a question of priority. I should like to begin tomorrow.

Mr. P. C. Black (Cumberland): I was greatly interested in the speech of the hon. member for Temiscouata. I agree with him, and I was pleased to hear him declare that today every good Canadian wants Canada fully defended. I think that was the case in the first great war and also in the last war. The only question is whether we should defend Canada on our own soil or in conjunction with our friends and allies meet the enemy where the enemy is. I shall not discuss that any further.

I should like to get information from the minister about new construction for the air force. When the minister introduced his estimates on November 11, he said at page 1664 of Hansard:

> We are continuing to overhaul and modify other aircraft. During 1948-49 we spent $22 million on aircraft. This year I expect the figure will be $45 million.

On the following page he goes on to say:

> Electronic and electrical equipment: All three services use large quantities of radar and other electronic and electrical equipment. We have a large scale program of production of the most modern and high-powered equipment by Canadian firms. The amount provided for electronic and communications equipment in this year's estimates is $19 million.

I am sure hon. members are in agreement with a big program for the department. They recognize that Canada, situated as we are, must have its first line of defence in the air, and that we must be thoroughly equipped in respect to aeroplanes and the services associated therewith. During the last war we had various aeroplane repair plants in the maritimes and one large construction plant in Amherst, Nova Scotia, the centre of the maritime provinces. There we had a record equal to or better than that of any other place in Canada. According to sworn evidence before the war expenditures committee the department received better returns for the money expended in Amherst than anywhere else in Canada. The town provided an airfield at heavy expense. I believe its outlay was greater than that of any other municipality in like circumstances in all Canada. The department expended some four or five hundred thousand dollars in the erection of buildings. Unfortunately—and this is very difficult to understand—those buildings were erected on land not owned by the government and without securing extended lease. After the war it was necessary to either sell or tear down the buildings that had been put up at great expense. The land is still vacant.

I want to ask the minister how much of the $45 million it is proposed to expend in the maritimes on aircraft this year, and how much of the $19 million provided for electronic and communications equipment will be spent in the maritime provinces. Because of our record in the past, because of what we did in the war, because of what we did in connection with the construction of aeroplanes, because of our historic place in Canada, we have a right to a reasonable distribution of these expenditures. In addition, the business and industrial situation in the maritime provinces has been growing worse rapidly. It is far below that in central Canada. We now have a great deal of unemployment. So I suggest there is a special obligation on the part of parliament and the government to see that a full proportion of expenditures are made in the maritime provinces. We should at this time be given a big share.

I should like a statement from the minister showing the distribution of the money to be spent on aeroplane construction work and equipment this year.

Mr. Claxton: The only aircraft or electronic industry in the maritime provinces, as far as I know, is the Fairey plant established at Dartmouth particularly to service aircraft of the naval air arm. It is expected that out of this year's appropriations approximately $1 million will be spent on the planes of that branch of the service.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): That will be for maintenance, and will come under an item other than those to which I referred. That will not come out of the $45 million voted for construction, or the $19 million to be spent on electronic and communications equipment. If that is the situation I again point out to the minister and the committee that once more a great injustice is being imposed upon the maritime provinces, who are entitled to a big share of this expenditure by any standard that could be set up. Because of our record in the last war, because of our record in the construction of aeroplanes, which as I said was the best of any plant in all Canada according to sworn evidence before the war expenditures committee, we are entitled to better treatment than this. Here we are authorizing $64 million this year, after having spent many millions last year, and not a dollar has been expended or is intended for expenditure in our part of Canada.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): First I should like to comment briefly on the remarks made earlier this afternoon by the hon. member for Westmorland. I want to compliment the hon. gentleman and the other members of his unit on the number of members they have and on the training and efficiency of that unit as he outlined it in his remarks. I should like to point out to him also, however, that we have very good units in Calgary and at other points throughout Canada. The things I had to say in connection with the reserve force in no way reflected upon any members of that force. I would remind the hon. gentleman that I am still a member of the reserve myself; and far from saying anything critical of the personnel of the reserves, as was suggested by the hon. member, I paid them a tribute at some length, for which the minister in his later remarks thanked me. I make this statement in order to clear up any misapprehension hon. members may have as to my attitude toward the reserve forces.

I would also suggest to the hon. member that probably I know better than he does whether or not the recruiting campaign in Calgary was a success. I was there, and my own unit took part in that campaign. During one campaign, I believe, we obtained one recruit; during another we got two, and during another we got none; and the other units were in the same position. As a matter of fact in Calgary we get our men just as the hon. member suggested men should be obtained for the reserve army, and as he said they were getting them in his unit; that is, by the men in the unit going out and interesting their friends in the work of the reserve force and bringing them into it.

Now I should like to turn to another matter; the fact, which was brought out on Friday last, that the defence department does not entrust any of its classified or secret work to the film board. Since Friday evening I have carefully read over the debate that took place at that time in connection with this matter. I must say that, as a result of that, the situation is still confused in my mind and I am sure in the mind of everyone else. After reading that over, it is extremely difficult to know what the situation is. There are several questions which require answers in order to clarify matters. As a matter of fact, I believe the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) summed up the situation quite well when he said at page 1983 of Hansard:

> Until the Prime Minister made his statement, I thought I understood the situation. The Prime Minister now says that work is given to firms where assurance is given that secrecy will be maintained. In other words, screening is not required. But earlier the Minister of National Defence said that this work is given to firms whose employees have already been screened. Can we say definitely that firms that are doing the work today have screened their employees? The Minister of National Defence said that they had; the Prime Minister says no; that they only required an assurance.
> Mr. St. Laurent: No, I do not say that they have not been screened; I say that I do not know.

Farther down that page, he said:

> I cannot say that every individual employed by those firms has been screened. As far as I know, we were relying on the firm and not upon a decision of our own;—

As I say, that sums up the general impression left in my mind, and one which is still there as a result of reading this record. I do not know what the situation really is.

At the top of page 1978 the minister said that the screening of the film board had been started, so far as his recollection went, in May, 1949. Just after that, I asked him when the private firms were screened and who screened them. He replied that so far as he knew the screening had been done by the R.C.M.P. He did not know when the screening was done, but he would get that information. That is one of the questions I should like to have answered, when these private firms were screened, who screened them, and so on. In connection with that also, I should like to know who did the classified or secret work for the department up to the time these private firms were screened. Possibly the private firms were screened during the war, and that screening has remained good. If that is not the case, if the screening was done in May of this year, who did the classified work up to the time the screening was done?

There is another phase of this matter which needs clarification. At page 1980 of Hansard we have this statement by the Minister of National Defence:

> When a report is received from the R.C.M.P. or from the Department of Justice with regard to the security of any person in a "vulnerable" department, it is examined by the department concerned. In the case of the Department of National Defence, the examination in the first instance would be by the intelligence officers.

Then later on the Prime Minister stated that all the mounted police did in connection with the matter was to make factual reports. I would take it from that, and from this statement of the Minister of National Defence that the Department of National Defence must have received reports from the mounted police about persons in the film board concerning whose security the film board officials and the Department of National Defence were not satisfied. That question occurred to me on Friday night, and I brought the matter up at that time. I had been having a discussion with the minister and the Prime Minister in connection with exactly what happened when screening was undertaken, what was meant by screening, and so forth.

Near the bottom of page 1982 of Hansard, I said this in connection with screening:

> If that is the situation, then so far as I can see the R.C.M.P. must have turned in to the Department of National Defence information in connection with certain persons in the film board, and as a result of that information the defence department people said, "No, we will not have those people do any secret pictures for us." That is the situation as I see it at the moment. Is that correct?
> Mr. St. Laurent: It is only partially correct. It is not as a result of having seen reports that were unfavourable; it is due to the fact that enough reports have not been seen to say that the whole board is certified for security purposes.

In the Ottawa Journal of November 22 there is an editorial dealing with this matter which quotes some of my statements and that statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) which I have just read. The article goes on to say:

> Is Mr. St. Laurent certain of this? Certain that he has not been misinformed, with the facts being as follows: That the decision of the national defence board to discontinue turning over secret work to the film board came after its discovery that a secret film made for it by the film board actually had been made, or made in part, by people about whom the R.C.M.P. had already turned in "information"? The Journal is told that this is what did happen—precisely what Mr. Harkness surmised to have happened.

I should like the minister to comment on both those phases of this particular question —when was this screening done, who did it, and so on—so as to clear the matter up. From the discussion that took place, the only surmise one can make is that unfavourable reports on film board employees had been turned in by the mounted police, and it was as a result thereof that work of a secret nature was not given to the film board. I doubt very much whether a reputable newspaper such as the Journal would print the statement they have unless they had some information which I have not. The Journal has said "This is what did happen." Certainly, both of those points need to be cleared up.

Mr. Claxton: With regard to the screening, it should be understood that until March 5, 1948, when there was a cabinet directive, screening in the sense in which we are using the word now was not done. The users of classified information were responsible for seeing that adequate security was obtained.

During the war that course was followed by the Department of National Defence with regard to processing film by the national film board and outside agencies.

From the date of the cabinet directive, certain government departments and agencies dealing with classified material were called "vulnerable", that is, they were the ones which required "screening" as regards officials and employees dealing with classified material. In consequence that screening process was carried on in the Department of External Affairs, Department of National Defence and no doubt in the national research council, the Prime Minister's office and other government departments. The Department of National Defence was responsible for the security of its own officers and employees dealing with classified material, and the security of outside agencies dealing with classified material for the Department of National Defence. When we had some classified films to be processed or prints to be made, we caused the employees of Associated Screen News and of Crawley Films to be screened individually.

Mr. Harkness: Excuse me, but the minister says he caused them to be screened?

Mr. Claxton: Yes. We asked the R.C.M.P. It was done by the R.C.M.P. In the case of Associated Screen News there were five employees handling classified material; in the case of Crawley Films, there were fourteen. They were individually screened by the R.C.M.P., and the reports were made to the Department of National Defence, which was satisfied with them. So I was correct in stating that the screening was done; but the Prime Minister was also correct.

Mr. Harkness: Excuse me, but when was this done?

Mr. Claxton: That was done in 1949. The Prime Minister was also correct that we required assurances from these firms and indeed satisfied ourselves that the sections of the firms dealing with our film had been properly isolated from the others; which was possible in the case of these two concerns. The department handling the classified material consisted of only five in the case of Associated Screen News and of fourteen in the case of Crawley Films. Therefore the job was one which could be completed in around a week; and as I say, the result was satisfactory. With regard to the film board, it was not until May, 1949, that it was treated as a vulnerable agency because we referred some films to it for processing.

Mr. Harkness: Excuse me, but does that mean that the screening did not start in the national film board until May, 1949?

Mr. Claxton: You will have to ask the spokesman for the film board with regard to the details of this; but that is what I gather from what I have heard.

Mr. Knowles: Was that word "vulnerable"?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, "vulnerable". There is another word used in connection with security screening and that is "sensitive". You can have a sensitive part in a government department where special attention must be given. These are terms used by the security officials. The screening of the film board was commenced, I understand, and from the way in which they did their work it appeared to be necessary to screen some two hundred. I am informed that that process is still going on.

The reports with regard to the screening of the film board will be given to the minister responsible; that is the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. With regard to the statement in the Journal to which the hon. member has referred:

> That the decision of the national defence board to discontinue turning over secret work to the film board came after its discovery that a secret film made for it by the film board actually had been made, or made in part, by people about whom the R.C.M.P. had already turned in "information"?

my information is that that is not a correct statement of the case as far as the information of the Department of National Defence is concerned. I should add that, in connection with the processing and preparation of films, there is no record anywhere of any leak or of any breach of security.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker—

The Chairman: The hon. member for Cape Breton South has the floor.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I do not want to take the floor from the hon. member for Calgary East, but I hate to see this develop into a family quarrel between himself and the minister. I should like to get in on it myself.

Mr. Harkness: I did not think it was a quarrel; I thought it was a discussion.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member is doing a first-class job of starting a fight. I am also interested in this subject, and I think the minister's explanation is far from satisfactory. While the hon. member for Calgary East asks a great many questions and makes a great many accusations, neither he nor the minister says anything about what is going to be done to cure the situation. It is for that purpose that I get to my feet.

I think there are several things wrong. In the first place, I do not think the Department of National Defence can be effectively and efficiently run by one minister. There is no one man in this country, I do not care how well qualified he is, who can undertake the responsibility of administering the affairs of the army, the navy and the air force on the scale that we are organizing them today. As long as we have just one minister and one parliamentary assistant, we are going to continue to get the kind of thing that we are getting, as exemplified by what has happened on these estimates. It is rather unfortunate that the minister, the Prime Minister and the members of this committee are obliged to get their information from the Financial Post, or some other newspaper, with regard to a matter that directly affects the security of this country.

I am not blaming the minister for not knowing about this matter because he did not know when this matter was raised. Neither did the Prime Minister. While the minister says that there is no suggestion at all of a leak anywhere in the film board or in any other government department, the fact that Kenneth Wilson had that story before the minister, and that it was published in that newspaper two days ahead of the dateline of that newspaper, proves to me conclusively that there is somebody talking in the film board, the minister's department or somewhere else. Otherwise, where did Kenneth Wilson get this story that he had in the Financial Post?

As members of the House of Commons, I think our first concern is to ascertain whether the minister, with one parliamentary assistant, has an impossible job on his hands in trying to keep track of all of the ramifications of this department. In the second place, the national film board does not come under him directly. It comes under the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. I am suggesting that we should determine whether we need more ministers, whether we need that department broken up, or whether we should have sufficient personnel put there to assure us that the responsible minister, coming into this house to answer our questions, has at least time enough to handle the affairs of the department and to know some of the answers, or whether we need maybe another parliamentary assistant for naval affairs and one for the air force who will take some responsibility with regard to answering in the house questions pertaining to the administration of the navy or the air force. I think the minister is in an impossible position in trying to keep track of all these matters.

It was not yesterday that this film board became suspect. We remember the espionage trials. We remember Freda Linton, and the position she occupied on that board. We remember the chairman of the board who is no longer in this country. But the thing I am concerned about with regard to the board is the way the personnel are employed. They do not go through the civil service. I believe the chairman of the board has the right to hire and select all personnel. According to the answer given in the house this morning by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, he is now chairman of the board as well as being the minister responsible for the operations of the board. Because the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is plenty tangled up in housing, I cannot see how he can keep his finger on the technical work that some 500 people are doing, and expect to be informed in the matter.

In my view the board should be brought under the civil service commission. The time to screen government employees is not after they are hired; they should be screened when they are taken in. If the civil service commission were employing members of the film board they would be screened when they were employed. Employees have the right to take part in competitive examinations, at which times they are supposed to give their background; and they are screened on the way in. I think it is an improper procedure to employ 500 people over whose employment the government had no jurisdiction, and then to ask the R.C.M.P. to screen them. These people handled educational films for the Department of National Defence and for other organizations in Canada during the process of fighting a war. In my view the board should be brought within the control of the civil service commission, and they should be screened on the way in. The R.C.M.P. screened them. Who screened the R.C.M.P.? One could go on and on and on with that sort of thing.

My suggestion is that the board should be placed under the civil service commission. It is an imposition to ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to accept the responsibility for the operation of the board, and to be responsible to the house for what it does. With all due respect to his capacity, I do not think he can do that kind of job; it would be an impossibility.

It would be unfair to expect the Minister of National Defence to keep his finger on everything pertaining to defence. I have said that no suggestions were made. I shall make two, the first of which is that there should be a check on defence to see if it is not necessary to have someone to assist the minister in keeping his finger on all the machinery of defence. My second suggestion is that instead of screening employees of the film board after they are employed, they should be screened on the way in. Perhaps the reason we do so much screening lies in the fact that in the whole set-up there are too many patronage appointments. Sometimes the commission appears to me as just a smoke screen behind which people hide in order to make patronage appointments.

Then, with regard to defence matters, and the organization set-up, may I say I believe the minister—or someone for him—has done a good job in the preparation of "Canada's Defence Program", which has been set before us. I am pleased to see that in the report he stresses the fact that it is a defence program. Not only that, but as best he can he tries in this document to dispel references to the inevitability of war. I liked that feature of it.

There can be no defence of this country by ourselves. We would not be able to defend our long coast lines, and our defence program will have to be linked up with those of other countries in the event of this continent or country being invaded. Our link-up with the United States in the North Atlantic pact gives us that assurance. The point upon which I am critical, and which has not been stressed, is that of research. The hon. member for Nanaimo and others have discussed the development of airfields and matters of technical research. I shall not repeat what they have said; but in the breaking down of the defence dollar, instead of giving more of that dollar for research purposes the amount has been cut down by one per cent. This is done in the light of the fact that technical personnel will be expected to fight the next war, and the greatest development will be in the air. The amount allocated last year was six per cent, while this year it is only five per cent. In my view it should be at least ten per cent.

Then at page 25 of the defence program set out by the minister we find something upon which no stress has been placed during this debate:

> In the second world war the Canadian forces had one motor vehicle for every four men and one wireless set for every twelve. All three services use equipment like radar, predictors and other complicated electrical and mechanical devices to a degree that is not commonly recognized. Of the officers and other ranks, no less than 74 per cent require special technical qualifications recognized as such in their service.
> Greatest bottleneck in meeting a future emergency would not be in raw materials or tools or industrial know-how, still less would it be in trained sailors, soldiers or airmen; it would be in trained tradesmen. Steps are being taken to increase their numbers.

I do not know what steps are being taken in central and western Canada, but I do know none has been taken in the maritime provinces. I leave this thought with the minister—because I think he is absolutely right—that there are approximately 260,000 unemployed in this country, of whom most are young and many are service personnel from the last war. While great stress has been placed upon university education, and while the wonderful job done in that direction has been mentioned frequently in the house—and properly so—let us remember that the minister is correct in his analysis when he states that in another war trained tradesmen will be perhaps more essential than service personnel, as we understand them today.

What this country lacks from coast to coast, and has lacked for a long time, not only in the field of defence but in the whole economy of the country, is a well-developed vocational training program through which people would be trained in the trades. While we may try to be a university country, with everyone a doctor, a musician or a journalist, we will still need the hewers of wood and the drawers of water, the people who create the wealth. We are doing very little to develop those people. If the Department of National Defence could augment what is being done in the field of vocational training by the Department of Labour, and the little the provinces are attempting to do, it would be a good defence investment.

While the minister has stated that steps are being taken to provide permanent service personnel with married quarters, the present situation leaves much to be desired. There are still many service personnel right here in Ottawa and in other centres in Canada where there are concentrations of the permanent force, men with wives and children, who are paying $60 a month rent. They are not living in barracks, and they are placed at a terrific handicap. The program in this respect should be stepped up, because we cannot have happy soldiers or other service personnel unless they are in homes where they may have some comforts and are able to meet the rent.

My chief purpose in speaking was to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that I do not think one man can handle the many tasks which have to be handled by the Minister of National Defence. Secondly, I should like to draw attention to the fact that there has been a lot of talk about the film board. I know that this particular group defended that board and advocated increases in their appropriations, but during the past few years there would appear to have been laxity on the part of the government in properly supervising the personnel employed. We owe it to them and to ourselves to clean up the matter as quickly as possible. We should either give the film board a clean bill of health and assure the people of the country that they are working for us and can be trusted, or the whole thing should be folded up until such time as we can do that.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, I should like to supplement the answer I made to the hon. member for Cumberland in connection with the aircraft factory. I should mention that a new English firm has been established at Dartmouth to carry on work in electronics. The utmost consideration will be given to both of these companies.

In replying to the remarks made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, may I say that in addition to the 200 persons in the production department of the national film board who are to be screened first, the whole board of about 500 is to be screened. The hon. member suggested that the screening should take place when people are taken into the employ of the government, but I think he will admit that we have to start at some date with the employees who are already in. We could not discharge them all and re-engage them.

We have been screening the people in the most vulnerable and sensitive departments first, and that operation has been carried on in the Department of National Defence to the point where we have covered all vulnerable places. We do not post any officer or man or civilian employee to any position in any vulnerable place without his first having been screened. The hon. member's point has already been met as far as this department is concerned, and I believe that is the case with all other departments.

Then the hon. member doubted if one minister could handle all the ramifications of defence. I must confess that they keep one with a considerable physique busy for a good many hours a day, but I would point out that this instance can hardly be used as an illustration to support his point. I am responsible for the security of the Department of National Defence and we have taken adequate measures to protect that security. We know of no way in which it has been broken with regard to either films or anything else. Then with regard to this particular matter, I was familiar with it from the time I mentioned in May, 1949, and even before that. There has been no failure on my part as far as ensuring security from the defence point of view is concerned.

I am much obliged to the hon. member for his helpful support with regard to married quarters. I can assure him that we are doing everything possible. If he looks at the progress made I am sure he will see that we in proportion have done more in the way of providing married quarters for our service personnel than has been done by the other countries with which comparisons are usually made. We regard it as of first importance that we should complete or convert or provide by one means or another as many quarters as we can for married personnel so as to provide them with the amenities of life in a good community. That is our objective.

The hon. member made a very good suggestion with regard to the training of tradesmen, a suggestion which is directly in line with what we are doing. Supplementing the vocational work carried on by the provinces and the federal government working in co-operation, last year we started an interesting experiment. We took 200 boys out of the vocational schools of Ontario and gave them special training at Ipperwash camp for six weeks. This was in addition to the ordinary cadet work. They received training in wireless, motor vehicle maintenance and similar branches of the technical services related to the armed forces. If they satisfied the requirements after their six weeks' training they were given a bonus of $60.

We invited representatives of all the provincial governments to attend this experiment and I am glad to say that they all sent representatives. Several provinces sent their deputy ministers of labour. Naturally I cannot speak for the provincial governments but I think I can say that the reactions of those who attended the demonstrations were favourable. We extended the plan this year to include 1,100 cadets to be trained at a number of different camps, and here again we secured the wholehearted support of the vocational schools. Eleven hundred is a considerable number of boys to interest in this work, and we hope it is just a beginning.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Cape Breton South seemed to be a little critical of the way I was dealing with the film board, but I should like to be critical of the way he has handled this matter. I refrained from dealing with the film board as a whole because I thought that that should be done only when the estimates of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply are before us. I was careful to deal only with those aspects of the matter which related to national defence and naturally I was fairly well restricted. The hon. member for Cape Breton South carried on a general discussion of film board matters which I think is actually out of order at this time.

When I spoke before I had only one more question to ask in connection with this film board matter and that was because I was not quite clear as to what the minister had said at the end of his remarks. Do I understand the minister to say that, after reading this quotation from the Journal, as far as the Department of National Defence is concerned they have no knowledge that any unfavourable reports have been turned in on any member of the film board? Do I understand the minister to say that?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Harkness: The minister had no knowledge of any unfavourable report on any member of the film board?

Mr. Claxton: As far as the Department of National Defence is concerned, that is correct. That is my information.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to direct the attention of the minister to paragraph 156 on page 35 of the excellent booklet he has put out. It is stated there that the Newfoundland regiment and the 166th artillery regiment have been authorized to perpetuate their fine records in the first and second world wars. A daily newspaper of St. John's on Thursday, November 17, reports a communiqué issued by the commanding officer stating that three regiments have been authorized and recruiting is taking place. It is stated that those regiments are to be stationed at St. John's, Grand Falls and Corner Brook, but apparently no provision is being made for a unit at Gander and Goose airports. I know very little of defence matters but in my humble opinion a unit of some nature should be stationed at Gander at all times. Possibly we could have an explanation from the minister.

This article gives the strength of the Newfoundland regiment as 380 officers and non-commissioned officers and 632 other ranks. That would appear to be a high proportion of officers. I do not know whether it is correct. The strengths of the other regiments are out of line. The Newfoundland field regiment has 380 officers and 632 men; the 59th independent field squadron, Royal Canadian Engineers, has ten officers and 299 other ranks, and the Newfoundland regiment has 38 officers and 812 other ranks. I presume it is intended to increase the personnel of these units later on.

I feel, in so far as Gander and Goose are concerned, some definite steps should be taken to provide a defence unit at both these places. The stationing of a unit at Corner Brook is hardly necessary, in my opinion, because the United States army based at Harmon field is very close. Even at St. John's there is a large United States base, but there is nothing whatsoever at Gander. I think there is a United States unit at Goose, but I do not know whether or not there is a Canadian unit.

I should like to refer to the position of the naval establishment. During the past war Canada had a large number of naval bases—I suppose we can put it that way—around Newfoundland and Labrador, and also a number of radio stations forming a radio hook-up. To my knowledge a number of these have been discontinued, and an attempt is being made to sell them. I believe some have been dismantled, but it seems to me to be a great waste of money. If they have to be repurchased or other properties bought it will mean a great waste of money. At the naval base at Bay Bulls there was a very fine dry dock. They used to pull corvettes out there when they came for repairs. I believe that has been sold, although word has come to me quite recently that the navy intends to buy it back again. I do not know whether or not that is the position. I think we should have some clarification.

Then I should like to refer to the port facilities at St. John's. I should like to know what the intention is. In the same paragraph it is stated:

> We have also commenced negotiations to acquire the admiralty properties in St. John's.

Does that mean all of the properties owned by the Royal Navy? How far have negotiations gone? Are the properties to be purchased, or is it a matter of care and maintenance? What is the position? They are quite extensive, and I know they cost a lot of money at the time they were put in service.

I wish to discuss two further matters, and then I shall have finished. In paragraph 157 on page 35 it says:

> Negotiations have been entered upon to secure modification of certain of the U.S. rights at the bases leased by the United Kingdom.

I do not know whether the minister can tell us at the present time how far these discussions have proceeded. Can he tell us what modification is being sought? I am sure he is aware of the article in Maclean's magazine recently written by Mr. Blair Fraser. I would say the contents of the article are pretty critically correct, as we say in Newfoundland. There may be some slight divergences, but I would say it is critically correct. I should like to know about these modifications, and whether they have to do with the troubles we are having, as set forth in that article.

The last matter to which I should like to direct attention is this, and I am not sure whether it is proper to raise it at this time. I have been told since coming to Ottawa that communist schools are being openly operated, that they are taking children and indoctrinating them with communist ideas. I believe these schools are well known to the mounted police and to the minister. It seems to me to be a most peculiar situation to have this kind of cancer growth in the country openly eating at the vitals of our whole defence system. No matter what we may feel about freedom of thought and speech, it does not seem to me to be sensible to allow schools of that nature to carry on in Canada today.

Mr. Claxton: With regard to the question asked by the hon. member about the strengths of the units, these strengths are what they are authorized to recruit at the present time. There were no reserve forces in Newfoundland either between the first and second world wars or since the second world war, and since these units are just being organized the strengths naturally are heavy in officer and N.C.O. personnel. These will be needed to recruit and train the rest.

As to the protection of Gander and Goose, as I stated to the hon. member for Nanaimo last week, at Goose there is a considerable force of United States and Canadian air force personnel and servicing units. At Gander there is only a small handful of Canadian personnel.

Mr. Higgins: Only seven.

Mr. Claxton: That is right. It is not part of our immediate plan to put active force personnel especially to guard all air establishments across Canada. If we were to distribute our active force personnel in static defence across Canada we would not be getting on with the other jobs which we think have a higher priority. If an emergency seems likely to arise, or should it arise, then it would be possible to take effective measures promptly to defend such places. As to the location of the reserve force units, the hon. member expressed surprise that one should be located at Corner Brook. Corner Brook is the second largest community in Newfoundland. Its population took a very active part in both the navy and the army in the first and second world wars, and contributed a great number of men.

Mr. Higgins: It is not for defence purposes?

Mr. Claxton: Not for full-time defence. It is for the purpose of organizing reserve units which would be available for use anywhere they were needed, but which incidentally would be immediately available for the defence of Corner Brook or any other part of Newfoundland. That would be their primary purpose. When I was in Corner Brook in July I had the pleasure of meeting representatives of the city, of the Legion, and of the local company, Bowater's Limited. They expressed great interest in the formation of reserve units and promised active support. We thought it desirable to locate units at St. John's, Grand Falls and Corner Brook. We have very good accommodation for the reserve navy and army at St. John's, and we are moving hangars from another location to be used for army and navy training at Grand Falls and Corner Brook.

As to the naval bases, we are still negotiating with representatives of the admiralty. We are not going to acquire all twenty-two properties in St. John's because some of them have already been disposed of to the government of Newfoundland. We are going to take over a majority of them. We are only going to use now those which are useful in peacetime, but we hope to develop later one or two so that they can be put into immediate use in the event of war.

Mr. Higgins: Before you go on, may I ask if any of these units are to become permanent active units?

Mr. Claxton: No, not at the present time. In connection with the operation of the naval reserve division at St. John's, and we hope later at Corner Brook, there would be about thirty active navy personnel, petty officers and men, to assist in training, looking after equipment and the like. At a later stage we hope to have the means of developing one or two permanent defence establishments, in connection with the defence of Newfoundland. The hon. member referred to the base at Bay Bulls. I also saw that base, and having seen it I must say that it was big, indeed an amazing job. But I think the advice followed by the authorities at the time was sound; that is, that it would be a good thing to let some private individual have it and carry it on, and such part as could be usefully employed again in the event of an emergency would still be there to be taken over if necessary, but that it would not be desirable to operate that great establishment in peacetime.

Mr. Higgins: But it has been sold outright.

Mr. Claxton: Yes, but it cannot be taken away; it is too big for that. Such part as might still be useful to help meet any emergency which could arise in the near future could still be taken over.

With respect to negotiations with the United States government for modification of the lease agreements, the modifications we seek are those related to what may be called the non-military rights conferred by the leases, rights of extraterritoriality similar to those conferred by the British government under the stress of the crisis of 1941 at places other than Newfoundland. We believe the rights enjoyed by the United States military authorities in Newfoundland should be the same as we give them under the operation of Canadian laws in other parts of Canada. As hon. members know, these rights are reciprocal. United States forces in Canada have the same rights in every respect as Canadian forces enjoy in the United States. We believe the principle of the declaration of February 12, 1947, should be applied to the Newfoundland bases and our representations have gone forward to that effect.

Mr. Higgins: How far have they gone now?

Mr. Claxton: They are still under consideration.

Mr. Higgins: What about the admiralty property in St. John's?

Mr. Claxton: Discussions are actually going on with a view to lining up the properties we are to take over. There is agreement in principle that we are to take over such properties, and discussions are going on with regard to the actual terms of transfer.

Mr. Higgins: Then just one final question; would there be any comment at all on the matter of communist schools?

Mr. Claxton: That matter should be referred to the Minister of Justice. In referring to this matter the hon. gentleman said "as the minister well knows." I do not know of the existence of such schools in Canada, but that may be because I am too innocent.

Mr. Johnston: I have just one short question to direct to the minister, arising out of a question I placed on the order paper the other day. It was answered by the Department of National Defence on October 31, and had to do with flying risk allowance. I shall just read the pertinent parts of the question and the answers given by the department:

4. Under what conditions is risk allowance given?
5. What is the amount payable?

The answers were:

4. Risk allowance is payable to:

(a) Aircrew officers on the strength of units whose normal function is flying.

(b) Aircrew officers not on the strength of flying units, provided they fly as members of an aircrew for not less than eight hours per month.

(c) Personnel undergoing flying training, for the full period of such training.

Then this is the answer in which I am more interested:

(d) Other ranks who form part of the crews of aircraft in accordance with established quotas, ranging from one crewman for every four two-seater aircraft to four crewmen for each multi-engined aircraft engaged in photographic operations and fitted with Shoran equipment.

5. $30 per month for all ranks.

It has been brought to my attention since I have been in Ottawa, and when I was in Calgary, that aircrew mechanics are compelled in the ordinary discharge of their duties to fly aircraft, but when they do so they do not receive the risk allowance. That was what led me to put the question on the order paper. I should like the minister to tell us whether it is definitely true that these men who in the course of their ordinary duties are required to fly, whether they be aircraft mechanics or others, are being paid that flying risk allowance. I am definitely assured that they are not.

The minister may say, as in fact I pointed out to those who drew this matter to my attention, that the proper thing would be for these people to go to their commanding officers. After having been in this house for so long, however, I know, as the minister knows, that this sort of thing is not done in the air force. Personnel do not go to the commanding officer on such questions. It just is not considered etiquette, and reprisals might be suffered by these men if they were to go to their commanding officers on such a matter. I am told on good authority, however, that there are aircrew who in the ordinary course of their duties are compelled to fly aircraft but are not in receipt of this flying risk allowance the government says is being paid.

Mr. Claxton: I am sure the hon. member has in mind the case of air mechanics who are servicing aircraft on the ground and in the course of testing them go up with the aircraft for a limited period of time and do not get the risk allowance during that period.

Mr. Johnston: But they are up all the time with one aircraft or another.

Mr. Claxton: I shall certainly look into that point. There is a time limit on this as well as a quota, but I shall look into the question and give the hon. gentleman the answer. It may be that there is a class which should receive the risk allowance and which is not getting it, and if they are entitled to it we shall be glad to see that they get it.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): I want to support the hon. member for Cumberland in his protest against the treatment we are being given in the maritimes in connection with these expenditures on military equipment.

Mr. Claxton: Might I just interject that the expenditures on the dockyard at Halifax are very considerable, probably greater than in any other single locality in Canada.

Mr. Brooks: Halifax is very fortunate, but of course that is only one place, and there are other parts of the maritimes in addition to Halifax.

Mr. Claxton: Saint John has a dockyard, too.

Mr. Brooks: I remember that during the war less than two per cent of the expenditures for war supplies went to the maritimes. This is quite in contrast with the statement made by the hon. member for Westmorland, whom I would congratulate on his remarks. He is very proud of his unit, the Princess Louise Hussars, and with very good reason. I might remark in passing that the headquarters of the Princess Louise Hussars is in my home town of Sussex, and we are also very proud of this unit. According to the hon. member, and I think also the minister, recruiting in the maritime provinces has been and is better than in any other part of Canada, and that being so I think we should receive greater recognition in matters pertaining to the manufacture and sale of military equipment.

I was amazed to hear the hon. member compare recruiting now with recruiting before the last war. I remember being in this house before the second war when this department asked parliament for between $30 million and $40 million. At that time many hon. members were opposed to voting that money, and I remember that one hon. member was even willing to reduce the amount to $1. In contrast with that, Mr. Chairman, before the war we find we were trying to carry on with estimates of between $30 million and $40 million, while today we have estimates of $350 million. There is no comparison at all. When the minister said there were as many men in the reserve forces in those days as there are today—well, to me it is quite amazing. We should have many, many more, not only because of the large amount of money that is being expended but because of the better accommodation for the troops and the sentiment in this country which is more favourable towards recruiting than it was in those days.

I believe the minister is quite fortunate, Mr. Chairman, in that he has behind him in Canada today almost a unanimous sentiment so far as military estimates are concerned, something which has never existed in this country before. There is no particular reason for it, but I rather surmise it is due to the fact there is not the same sense of security today as prevailed in this country previous to the last war. My seatmate, the member for Broadview (Mr. Church), has expressed the view on numerous occasions that we were secure because Great Britain had control of the sea. For a hundred years Great Britain was our chief barrier of defence. Today, she is not. For that reason, I believe Canadians today are more defence conscious than they have ever been before.

My principal reason for speaking, Mr. Chairman, was to suggest to the minister that in the training of artillery, for instance, it would be better to have the artillery from the maritime provinces trained in the maritime provinces, instead of sending them to Petawawa. There is a camp at Tracadie, New Brunswick, which was used during the war and I believe it is still possible to train there. I feel that much better results would be obtained if that camp were used instead of wasting time bringing the men up to Petawawa. I say "wasting time" because last summer I believe the men had two weeks for camp. Two days are consumed in the journey to Petawawa, one day is always used after the men arrive in preparing for training the next day, and then in breaking camp another day is lost plus the two days for the return journey, making a total of six days, which is just wasted time. I suggest to the minister that far more men in these units would go into camp, and valuable time would be saved, if my proposal were adopted.

I had prepared a number of matters to bring to the attention of the house, Mr. Chairman, but I do not intend to speak on them this afternoon. The other day I was a little disappointed when the minister spoke of civilian defence. He suggested that civilian defence could be left in abeyance.

Mr. Claxton: No, sir, I did not; the local organizations at the block level could be postponed.

Mr. Brooks: I do not agree with the minister. I believe it is necessary to have local defence committees set up. In time of trouble, I do not believe these people can be trained. The minister said that they would be "browned off", or words to that effect. It seems to me that once they get their training, even though they do become lax or careless, that is something they carry with them and there is an organization available to be called upon.

I was reading an article about defence in Sweden. I have it before me, but I am not going to read it. In that country, they lay particular emphasis on this fact, and have the population in the large centres well trained. I believe we could follow their example.

Mr. Claxton: In answer to the question about training artillery in the maritime provinces, that is receiving consideration. I looked into it myself when it was brought to my attention, and the objections to it are that it would require additional staff, for administration, training and housekeeping, and a splitting up of equipment. It would also prevent the artillery training in Tracadie from having the advantages of association with other arms which they have now in Petawawa where armoured and other units are in training. As hon. members know, every week during the training season there is a striking demonstration of fire power and modern tactics there. The matter is receiving consideration, however.

With regard to civilian defence I did not say we were not going to do anything, even in the matter of local organization. We are moving up step by step from federal, provincial, municipal and then to local organizations. We believe that is the right way to do it. We have not felt it desirable to rush in to the local field. We are going to press forward with that as soon as we can build the desired organization and get the full support of the local authorities.

Mr. Lennard: When I rose the other evening to make an appeal on behalf of the reserve officers, instructors and cadet corps to have their pay exempt from income tax, the minister said that a provision in the Income Tax Act was holding it up, and a formula was needed whereby the pay of those men would not be considered as income. He suggested that if I could get a formula I could solve the problem. Not being a gentleman learned in the law, I do not know the legal forms, but surely a clause could be inserted in the Income Tax Act making it unnecessary for these people to pay income tax on that money. I believe it is a simple thing. The Minister of National Revenue is in his place and I would urge that favourable consideration be given to it. I do not wish to hold this item up, nor do I wish to go over all the ground I covered the other evening, but it is something I feel should be considered.

Mr. Murphy: The other day I dealt with the armouries at Sarnia. I know the minister is familiar with the situation there, so I shall not go over the details. The point I wish to make, Mr. Chairman, is to ask the minister whether a new armoury is in prospect for Sarnia in the immediate future?

Mr. Claxton: No, sir, I could not give that indication. I answered a similar question asked by the member for Saskatoon. About one-third of the members of this house have made such representations. I cannot start giving assurance to one without giving assurance to the other. It is a question of priorities and we shall proceed as soon as the money is available.

Mr. Pearkes: I have been waiting all afternoon to ask these three questions. I have seen it stated that the minister is going to Europe within a short time to attend a conference at Paris. Will he inform the house as to the nature of the discussions which are likely to take place there, the attitude which Canada is going to take, and whether he is going to be accompanied to Europe by any of the chiefs of staff?

Mr. Claxton: At Paris, on November 29, there will be a meeting of the military committee under the North Atlantic treaty; that is a committee of the chiefs of staffs of the twelve powers. Canada will be represented at that by Lieutenant General Charles Foulkes, chief of the Canadian general staff and chairman of the chiefs of staff committee. Since we want to save on transportation costs, I shall go in the plane with him. We shall be accompanied by Air Vice Marshal Hugh Campbell, our senior liaison officer in the north Atlantic security organization and our principal staff officer at Washington, and also by a representative of the navy, Commodore Bidwell. We shall be joined in Paris by Lieutenant General Clark, who is our representative in England, the chairman of the joint staff there, and who is our observer in connection with the western European group under the North Atlantic treaty.

At Paris there will also be a meeting of the defence committee consisting of the defence ministers, which has been called by the secretary of defence of the United States, Louis Johnson who is chairman of the committee. The committee will discuss arrangements in connection with the organization of the north Atlantic regional groups and other matters relating to its work. The proceedings of the defence committee, like those of the military committee, have so far been regarded as secret. I imagine that the proceedings of these meetings will also be regarded as secret and therefore it would be quite improper for me to anticipate what would be discussed there as I think it may prove impossible for me to report on what happens there except in accordance with an agreed statement. However, this marks a further stage in the organization of north Atlantic security under the treaty, and that organization is proceeding rapidly and satisfactorily.

Mr. Pearkes: Thank you. We shall do everything we can to facilitate your departure in time for the meeting on the 29th. There is another question, a rather local one concerning British Columbia. In a return which was tabled at the beginning of October 1 was informed that some 11,800 tons of coal were delivered to the naval establishments at Esquimalt and Royal Roads, that coal was contracted for by tender, and the tenders were let to coal merchants in Victoria. I understand that the coal was delivered in Victoria and was then taken out to the Esquimalt establishments by truck. I am also informed that had the coal been delivered direct to the naval dockyard and unloaded there, possibly as much as fifty cents a ton might have been saved on the costs of that contract. It is of course too late to do anything about the matter now because I expect that the coal has already been delivered, or at least that much of it has been delivered. Might I suggest that the matter be looked into before next year's coal is applied for, with a view to seeing whether it would not be practical to deliver that coal actually to the dockyard and thereby save the trucking expense? All I am asking is that the matter be looked into.

Mr. Claxton: Yes indeed. My note would indicate that the quotation was made for delivery at Esquimalt and the dockyard at H.M.C.S. Naden and at the service college. If that was not done, perhaps we have spent too much money. I will look into the matter. The question makes sense.

Mr. Pearkes: I think it was delivered in truckloads rather than in scowloads.

Mr. Claxton: Perhaps that was paid for by the contractor.

Mr. Pearkes: I have just one more question to ask. Can the minister give me an answer to the question I asked the other day as to how far the moneys may be redistributed within this item? The details are set out back in the pages dealing with the details, and so much money is allocated to the army, the reserves, and so forth. It is all under one item. Has the minister authority to transfer some proportion of that money from the army to the air force or to the navy, or from the active to the reserve forces, or does he have to go to treasury board to get that authority?

Mr. Claxton: I have to go to treasury board. I make a recommendation on the advice of the deputy minister, who gets the material from the service heads. I make a submission to treasury board, and there is no difficulty about it.

Mr. Pearkes: My last question is in connection with the training of medical personnel in the care of burns from radioactive material. Are any courses for the nursing and medical professions being conducted in Canada similar to the courses which are being held in the United States and in England on that subject?

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. Claxton: We have had representatives of our medical services present at those courses so as to get into a position to give that training in Canada.

Mr. Pearkes: We have not yet started it in Canada?

Mr. Claxton: No.

Mr. Pearkes: That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. Harkness: I have several questions with regard to certain specific items coming under the details of service shown at pages 198 and following. As it is now six o'clock, however, I think I had better reserve those questions until later.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Harkness: When the house rose on Friday I had been asking the minister a few questions in connection with the specific items as they appear in the details of services. At that time we were discussing the ones headed "Personnel supplies and services". The minister had explained the increase of $10 million as being due to the increase in the number of personnel in the services—which I rather questioned.

Following that, however, he gave a breakdown, and looking at that breakdown I notice that there was an item of $4,204,000 for the purchase of cloth for the manufacture of undress blue uniforms, for the purchase of arctic clothing, bush-type summer clothing and airborne stores. I can readily see that this very considerable increase could be accounted for in that way. I would point out that the statement the minister made that it was due to the $2,600 per man which it cost to maintain our air force personnel was hardly applicable, because this item dealt only with food, clothing and things of that nature.

I should like to ask some questions respecting the next item in the details of services. This one deals with stores and equipment, and is greater by about $8,500,000. The item takes in stores of all kinds. I note particularly reference to armoured fighting vehicles and spare parts. Is any reasonable amount of that $8,500,000 for new tanks and S.P. guns?

Mr. Claxton: No, nothing at all.

Mr. Harkness: If none of it is for tanks and S.P. guns, then I should like to have a breakdown of what it is for.

Mr. Claxton: The total is $8,649,512, made up as follows:

Signal and wireless equipment	$ 884,467
Increase in requirements for maintenance spare and training equipment, signal and anti aircraft	218,940
Increase in requirements for R.M.C. technical equipment, and maintenance	50,000
Ammunition	220,045
Increase in armaments	1,470,499
Mechanical transport	3,213,703
Engineering equipment	698,837
Tanks, armoured fighting vehicles and spare parts	822,521
Provision for repair of civilian works and shops of that portion of the maintenance load which is beyond the capacity of R.C.E.M.E. workshops	1,070,000
	$8,649,512

It will be noted, as I have said, that there is no provision for new tanks.

Mr. Harkness: Do I understand that this $1,070,000 is for the repair of tanks beyond the capabilities of the R.C.E.M.E. workshops?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, that is right.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fraser: Don't get in a rush.

Mr. Harkness: There is no use for these people to shout "carried". I have several questions to ask, and I intend to ask them. It seems to me that this loud shouting of "carried" by a lot of uninformed opinion in the committee not only does not help to pass the estimates but actually helps to delay them.

Has there been any provision for new types of tanks and S.P. guns in the past year, or during the remainder of the year covered by these estimates?

Mr. Claxton: No, there is no provision whatever.

Mr. Harkness: My only comment is that I think there should be some provision.

Mr. Claxton: Then I would ask the hon. member if he can tell me where he can get the tanks.

Mr. Harkness: I said tanks and S.P. guns, and I do know that there is at least a possibility of getting some S.P. guns of a recoilless model.

Mr. Claxton: We would be glad to hear about it.

Mr. Harkness: The next item deals with Northwest Territories and Yukon radio system. I notice that the sundries item has increased from $14,084 to $206,587. Would the minister give the reason for that? Why is there this fairly considerable increase under sundries rather than under other items in this list?

Mr. Claxton: The first item in that list is printing and stationery, in connection with which there is a decrease of $2,199. The largest item shows an increase in communications services amounting to $194,202. This is due to the inclusion of items such as the construction of antenna networks, wireless repair and maintenance, telephone repair and maintenance, for which provision was made in the 1948-49 estimates. This provides for long-distance tolls, telegrams, cables and the like. There is an increase of $500 in sundries, which is for photographic stores—

Mr. Harkness: I do not want those small items.

Mr. Claxton: Well, I have given the big item of $194,202 for communications services, which accounts for about 98 per cent of the increase.

Mr. Harkness: In view of the fact that this is for increased and improved communication services, does not the minister think it would be better to have that amount included in one of the other items, such as stores and equipment, which must take in a large part of it; or under "Personnel supplies and services" or "Acquisition, construction and purchase"—rather than have it all included under the item for sundries, which makes a poor-looking item?

Mr. Claxton: I think that is a very good suggestion and we will take it into consideration.

Mr. Harkness: The next item is a northwest highway system and I notice that here the cost for fuel is up from $323,983 to $812,830. Could the minister indicate why the fuel cost this year is almost three times as much as it was last year?

Mr. Claxton: This is due almost entirely to an adjustment of the division of fuel expenses as between the United States and ourselves. The United States residual stocks of gasoline at the Whitehorse tank farm which have been drawn on for the greater part of the fiscal year 1948-49 have been exhausted and the requirements for use from Mile 543 to Mile 1221 must be purchased from civilian supplies. As a part of the total take-over from the United States we acquired considerable supplies of gasoline which have been exhausted.

Mr. Harkness: Does that mean that the gasoline used by our engineers in previous years was paid for by the United States army or air force?

Mr. Claxton: We took it over from them and paid for it.

Mr. Harkness: Where would that item appear in previous estimates, or are we to assume that it did not?

Mr. Claxton: We took over supplies of gasoline as part of the bulk settlement with the United States. Those supplies have been exhausted and we have to provide for them in our estimates.

Mr. Harkness: Where did they appear in last year's estimates?

Mr. Claxton: They did not.

Mr. Harkness: In what way did we pay for them?

Mr. Claxton: By a bulk settlement with the United States some years back.

Mr. Harkness: My next question has to do with the personnel supplies item under the air force which is up better than $5 million. What is the reason for this increase? This item covers food supplies, medical stores, clothing and personnel equipment, et cetera.

Mr. Claxton: The comparative figures as between 1948-49 and 1949-50 are as follows:

	1948-49	1949-50
Personnel equipment	$1,153,021	$4,703,937
Barrack, hospital and camp equipment	1,124,094	1,870,430
Food supplies	1,892,800	2,813,032
Laundry and dry cleaning	90,819	102,500
Medical supplies and services	363,822	618,192
	$4,624,557	$10,108,091

There was a net increase of $5,483,534 which arose in part from the increase in the strength of the air force and in part from the fact that up to this year they were using stocks and now have to provide for current requirements.

Mr. Harkness: The largest increase here as in the case of the army seems to be for uniforms.

Mr. Claxton: That is partly related to three things: First, the increase in strength; second, the exhaustion of war supplies; and third, increased scales of issue.

Mr. Harkness: The next item I should like to inquire about is stores and equipment for the air force which is approximately $44,500,000. Was that increase chiefly for new planes and, if so, what planes?

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Claxton: The comparative figures are as follows:

	1948-49	1949-50
Aircraft engines and spares	$ 6,344,892	$27,131,015
Mechanical equipment	787,550	3,327,400
Marine craft	109,958	215,500
Miscellaneous stores	1,880,259	3,590,200
Photographic equipment	163,648	584,100
Armament equipment	200,000	497,700
Ammunition and bombs	149,000	671,300
Signals and wireless equipment	2,768,202	13,407,875
Overhaul of aircraft and engines	5,039,329	12,522,250
	$17,442,838	$61,947,340

That increase in part is due to increased activity, in part again to the fact that we are using up wartime accumulations of stores, and in part to the recognition that we must spend more money on equipment.

Mr. Harkness: From what I could make out from the minister's statement, about $33 million was for engines and spares, but I did not hear any mention of aeroplanes. If there was mention, I did not get it. I suggest with great humility that we shall make greater progress if the minister will give what I would term a straight answer. My question was: Is this increase of $44,500,000 chiefly for new planes? I do not want to know how many thousands are for this, that and the other thing. I want to know whether most of it was for new planes. Apparently some $33 million is for engines and spares. As I said, I did not notice anything in connection with airframes. As a result I would come to the conclusion that a large number of replacement engines and so forth are being bought. Before we leave that I should like to ask the minister if any of this amount was for airframes?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, indeed. If the hon. member does not want figures I do not need to give them and we can save a great deal of the time of the committee thereby. I thought he wanted these details, and therefore I was giving them to him.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I do not want him to give a large number of figures which really serve only to confuse the issue, so many thousands for this, $50,000 for that, and so forth.

Mr. Claxton: Either the hon. member wants the information or he does not. I am prepared to give all possible information.

Mr. Harkness: There is such a thing as confusing the issue by giving a large number of figures. What I want is as straight an answer as I can get to the questions I ask without a large amount of detail, so many dollars for this, and 50 cents for that, which only serves to confuse what we are trying to get at. My next question—

Mr. Claxton: If the hon. gentleman would like to have his answer with regard to new aircraft procurement and production I can tell him that for the all-weather jet fighter XC-100 we are spending $5,500,000 out of this item; on tooling, machinery and manufacturing equipment for the Canadian production of the F-86A we are spending $7 million, and on two helicopters $200,000. Total aircraft procurement and production expenditures provided for are $12,700,000 out of the total I gave before.

Mr. Harkness: My next question has to do with what is listed as sundries. Just as in the case of the army, I notice a considerable amount here. Sundries are up from $2 million to $4,244,000. Once more I should like to ask the minister what is included in sundries. I know that films are included in that item, and I should like to know particularly how much of that $4,244,000 was for films, and also who supplied those films?

Mr. Claxton: I can either give the figures on sundries or not, as the hon. gentleman wants. I will proceed to give them on the assumption that he wants the figures. For special training equipment and films the figure for 1948-49 was $158,627 compared with $354,000 for 1949-50. The figure for fees for special courses was $265,137 for 1948-49 compared with $376,046 for 1949-50. With regard to films the total provided for there is $22,000.

Mr. Harkness: The next item as to which I have a note has to do with the photographic squadron. I see that the estimate for it is up from approximately $868,000 to $1,967,605. Personally I think the photographic squadron can be extremely useful to Canada not only for the defence forces but for other departments of the government. As a matter of fact, I see there is a repayment of $940,000 to the department from the Department of Mines and Resources. I should like to ask the minister how much of the work done by the photographic squadron is performed for other departments and how much is done for military mapping.

Mr. Claxton: That is a very interesting question. We have been conducting a photographic survey of Canada supplementing and completing that already undertaken and carried through by the R.C.A.F. during the lean years from 1924 on. This has been one of the ways in which the R.C.A.F. kept alive during the period between wars. Last year our program was to complete about 800,000 miles of photography, and we exceeded that. This year a corresponding area has been covered, and that is probably the greatest amount of serial photography ever conducted. It is done by the R.C.A.F. using twenty-two planes operating in all sorts of weather.

The results are taken to the photographic establishment at Rockcliffe where they process some 100,000 films per month. Then these are put together in a mosiac and then turned over to the Department of Mines and Resources, which department performs the fundamental work of producing a basic map. That map is developed for various purposes, topographical, mineralogical and military. The map is used as a basis for civil and military purposes, and is used not only by a great number of our government departments but also by provincial government departments, and by the three services. It is a fine demonstration of the way in which government departments work together. This is done by the R.C.A.F. working in the air, by Royal Canadian Engineers working on base marks, and by the Department of Mines and Resources working through their own topographical experts. This is a field in which I venture to say that, through the combination of these elements, Canada takes second place to no country.

Mr. Harkness: I agree with the minister that this particular branch of the R.C.A.F. is an important and useful one. He will possibly remember that some two years ago I urged that greater use should be made of it. I am glad it is getting plenty to do. As regards the division between what you might call work for other departments and straight military operations, I presume it is pretty well impossible to separate that.

Mr. Claxton: That is right. We take photographs for many basic maps. Then they are developed for three or four different sets of civilian purposes, as well as military purposes.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): How much money is spent searching for and locating lost United States planes on the northwest staging route?

Mr. Claxton: It would be impossible to say, and I am sure nobody would want me to say, how much was spent on any rescue mission. We have spent great sums of money on various rescue missions, and other countries have spent similar sums of money on rescuing our personnel. We must work together wherever possible, and we have always done so.

Mr. Harkness: It just happens, Mr. Chairman, that the next note I have down here has to do with the item headed "search and rescue", and I see it is down from $9,200,000 last year to $2,289,000 this year. The question I had noted to ask was, why has this branch apparently been cut to less than one-third of its former activities, from a financial point of view?

Mr. Claxton: There has been no cut; actually the work has been increased. There has been a re-allocation of costs by which direction finding activities, such as loran, have been put in another account, so this figure more closely represents the cost of activities particularly and directly related to search and rescue.

Mr. Harkness: I think that is a very much better way of accounting, and I am glad to hear that it has been done. My next question is in regard to the northwest staging route. The total cost of this is up approximately $1,300,000, but I notice that the fuel costs are down from $630,000 to $291,000. This would seem to indicate much less flying and driving of vehicles than last year, and I wonder if the minister would give an explanation of that.

Mr. Claxton: There was an over-provision last year which has been rectified this year.

Mr. Harkness: I have only one more question.

Some hon. Members: Hurrah!

Mr. Harkness: The cheering which greets that announcement indicates that those who made the noise have no interest whatever in these estimates, but are only interested in getting away from here as soon as possible so they can go home for Christmas. My question has to do with the general position in connection with commitments. At the end of the details I see this note:

> Less—Estimated amount required for commitments nominally to fall due during the fiscal year, in accordance with navy, army and air force programs detailed above, but not required for actual expenditure in that year, $62,500,000.

Then in the general estimates under item 250 we have "commitments for future years of $145,555,382". I should like to know why it is necessary to have two commitments for future years, which is what this amounts to. The department is asking for commitments of $62,500,000 in this year's estimates to be spent next year or some subsequent year; then further authorization is asked for commitments of $145,500,000, also to be spent in subsequent years. Why does it appear in that form; why cannot one item suffice?

Mr. Claxton: The answer is given in paragraph 53 of the white paper, which I shall read because probably it is briefer than I might be:

> Experience has shown that orders for equipment and other services for the armed forces often cannot be completed in the same year in which the contracts are placed. At the same time it is not possible to say just which of such contracts will be completed in the fiscal year. Authority is therefore requested in the estimates put forward by the department to provide for the anticipated program, but at the same time to limit the appropriation to the cash expenditures which it is expected will be made against these contracts. Future years commitment authority is requested to cover contracts for equipment and services which it is known will not be received in whole or in part until after the current fiscal year.

Mr. Harkness: But why is the second item necessary? Surely there can be no question but that if the house is not prepared to vote these further amounts two years or three years from now, or whenever they may be required, they will not be available in any event. In other words the house is always able to vote or withhold money. If the house should be unwilling to vote it the money would not be available, so why provide for it two or three years ahead of time? I still cannot see why the one item covering what might be spent but is not immediately in view for the coming year should not be enough.

Mr. Claxton: I sympathize with the hon. gentleman, but the point is that in order to produce modern naval, military and air equipment a contract must be entered into which may not be completed during the current fiscal year. Take ships. We have entered into contracts this year for the construction of one icebreaker, three anti-submarine vessels, four minesweepers and one gate vessel, the total cost of which will be between forty and forty-five million dollars. It is quite certain that none of these vessels will be completed in the fiscal year 1949-50. It is also quite certain that almost none will be completed in the fiscal year 1950-51. Yet in order to enter into a contract which the contractors will regard as at least morally binding and as having the authority given by parliament through these commitments, we must be able to do so on the assumption that any parliament subsequently elected will honour those authorizations and commitments. Otherwise we could not make a contract running into the future. This is one of the ways by which we may provide a defence program over a term of years, which parliament will know about in advance and provide commitment authority for in advance, but in respect of which parliament must provide the cash year by year.

Mr. Harkness: Would the minister not agree that a contract would be quite as good whether or not this advance commitment is made, because it depends on the particular year when the estimates are voted, whether or not parliament is willing to grant the money? I cannot see any advantage in it.

The minister said people entering into these contracts consider that these commitments give them greater moral value, let us say; but I should think once Canada has entered into a contract for the construction of a destroyer, an icebreaker, an anti-aircraft gun, or whatever it may be, we are going to honour that commitment. It is not necessary for us to vote money two or three years ahead more or less tentatively, in order to do that. My chief objection is that it complicates the estimates, so it is very difficult to tell exactly where we stand. We vote so much money for current requirements and so much for what may be required because the department could not foresee what would happen; then we have another long series of commitments for two or three years from now.

Mr. Claxton: The fact is that parliament cannot provide the cash to meet these possible expenditures in future years.

Mr. Harkness: That is my very point.

Mr. Claxton: But parliament can say that we commit the authority of the government for a future year. That will have some value to the contractor, and I can assure my hon. friend that it also acts as a limiting factor on the department.

Mr. Harkness: The point is that parliament actually cannot commit itself to these expenditures for next year, as the minister just said. We have no power to do that; the money has to be voted each year. That is why I cannot see any value in putting in these items, because they confuse the issue.

Mr. McLure: I am not going to ask very many questions after the barrage that the minister has been up against in the last half hour. I should like to make a short observation. When the estimates were before the committee a week ago, I asked the minister a question about the armouries for Charlottetown and also a naval base. At that time he gave me fair consideration and stated that those would be built in the near future. The total estimates before us for this department amount to $369,985,500, and they are the only estimates out of the whole of the main estimates that have been brought down for which the minister does not ask for a blank cheque to be voted without giving any details. If the minister is willing to take a compliment from a humble member of the back benches, may I say that in this regard his estimates are much superior to the estimates presented for any other department.

It is true that in the estimates for this department there is an item for sundries amounting to $4,695,252, but if one looks at the pages upon which details are given one finds details for all those amounts. The other ministers of the crown bring in estimates containing items amounting to $131 million for which they ask us to give them a blank cheque. I should like to compliment this minister and his department for bringing down estimates for which we do not have to give a blank cheque.

Mr. Catherwood: I should like to ask a question about the imperial war graves commission. I do not believe anyone would question the amount of money spent, but is this for the maintenance of world war I graves or world war II graves or both? In what countries in Europe does this commission work?

Mr. Claxton: This item looks after our contribution to the imperial war graves commission in respect of the great war of 1914-1918 as well as the second world war. The war graves provided for in the second world war are in Italy, France, Belgium, Holland and England. The arrangement under which it is worked out is between the countries of the commonwealth. It was worked out towards the end of the first world war and has been carried on ever since. We have agreed on a common treatment of the subject, so as to afford the maximum amount of respect and reverence for the graves of those who were killed from all the commonwealth countries. We agreed that the treatment should be the same, not only in respect of officers and men but also of those who gave their lives in the service of all the commonwealth countries.

Then, we agreed on a method of administration and of contribution. We have carried through our part in that arrangement. We believe it has worked well in the interests of the memory of those who gave their lives.

Mr. Pearkes: What about the graves of the men who fell in Asia?

Mr. Claxton: I beg your pardon, they are also being looked after under the same arrangement.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Last fall, I came back on the boat with a chap who was a citizen of Ottawa. He had been looking for the grave of his son. I do not remember the name of the cemetery, but he had been there twice and was not able to find a single person who could give him directions. He told me that at the time there was a stick with his son's name on it, which they finally discovered. That was the second trip they had made to England to find their son's grave, and they found it in the same condition as it was the year before. If necessary, I can give the minister the name privately.

Mr. Claxton: I would be very glad if the hon. member did that because that case has certainly not been called to my attention. In the first world war we had some 66,000 killed and in this war 40,000. If there is such a case, it must be of someone like those who were members of an air crew buried outside of allied territory, and whose remains were in the process of removal to some other location. If the hon. gentleman will give me that name, I shall certainly be concerned in following up the case.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am writing the name now. This was in one of the largest cemeteries in England.

Mr. Claxton: In England?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Yes, and I am writing his name now.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, the discussion that has taken place and the obvious impatience of some of the members to dispose of these estimates in itself indicates how desirable it would have been if an orderly procedure before a committee could have been followed. This is only the third time these estimates have been before the house. They were up on November 11, November 18, and now today. Members of this house do not know today what the state of our defence forces is; they do not know their readiness or otherwise to fulfil the part which the Minister of National Defence says Canada has decided it should play in the joint responsibilities that we have assumed.

Hon. members of this house have been given the details as to the cost of certain items. They have been given percentages of training which, in themselves, mean very little unless we examine the details of the units that are involved; the standard and quantity of equipment now in the possession of those units; and the extent of the training in the various weapons they possess. The procedure before a committee makes the process of question and answer much more effective than it can be in this chamber, although I want to say that the minister has indicated his readiness to answer the questions which have been asked.

By the procedure which we are now following, we could not obtain the real facts about the national defence forces of this country in three weeks, let alone three sittings of this house. Three months would probably be the amount of time needed under the procedure which we must follow according to the rules of the house. For that reason, I propose to ask certain questions which indicate the nature of the information which it seems to me we must have if we are to have any idea whatever of the real state of the defence forces of this country.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

It does not help greatly to know that an anti-aircraft gun with its equipment costs $600,000, unless you know how many anti-aircraft guns we have; unless you know what their radar equipment is; their range finding equipment; their directional equipment; their sound range devices; and all the control equipment that goes with a modern aircraft battery, and the training of the men on each one of those instruments that is associated with an anti-aircraft gun.

Unless I am mistaken, I heard a remark in regard to Russia; and I assume that it meant that Russia would like to have this information. The time has come, Mr. Chairman, when we should recognize that the only people we are fooling are the people of Canada if we do not get all the facts with regard to our national defence. Our capacity to assume whatever role we undertake to assume within that great international partnership created by the North Atlantic security pact depends upon the equipment, the training and the suitability of the various units that we have established, having regard to the conditions which we face today.

The Minister of National Defence within a day or so leaves for Paris to take part in discussions there which will, we hope, divide the field of responsibility in a way that will make it possible to economize—and I underline the word economize—in expenditures on national defence so that every dollar spent may produce the maximum results. It is no more possible for the members of this committee to pass real judgment on the extremely large figure which is now before us, without knowing certain of these details, than it would be for the Calgary Stampeders to know whether their season had been well spent until they knew that they had certain players who were going to take their place in the line on Saturday, whether some of the members see the game or not.

After all, it is only an expansion of the same idea. A military organization is a team. In fact, in the United States during the war there came into use a term which seems remarkably appropriate for the whole defence picture. The forces had what they called "combat teams". These are defence teams. Our job is to know whether we have players for every position on that team, whether he has had the training he should have and whether he has the equipment which will carry him through the game.

First of all, let us take the land forces. Statements have been made as to the proportion of our population that is taking its share in the defence forces of Canada. When certain questions were asked, the answer given was that our reserve units had a total enlistment which, in relation to our population, constitutes a higher percentage of the population as a whole in the non-active units than any other nation of the commonwealth. That statement, Mr. Chairman, is absolutely meaningless and it is misleading unless one examines what the situation is in other nations of the commonwealth. Let us take, for instance, the situation in the United Kingdom. Apart from what the views of any hon. member may be in regard to one method of dealing with defence requirements or otherwise, the fact is that the United Kingdom has compulsory military service. Consequently you must examine, in the light of that fact, any figures of proportion of the population taking part in defence; and also you must examine the figures in the light of the responsibilities that are being assumed by the active units in the United Kingdom.

Today the United Kingdom has six and a half divisions fully equipped, ready for service outside the United Kingdom in different parts of the world right from Burma to Hong Kong. She has other units in being, fully equipped. There is a provision that every man or woman having served with the active forces must, on retirement from the active forces, serve for four years with the territorials. These are things that it is essential to know in making any comparison or when we are deciding on what the allocation of our forces should be, and whether we should emphasize one branch of the service or the other.

One of the most important statements that have been made since these estimates were called on November 11, if not the most important one, was the statement by the hon. member for Nanaimo that there should be a drastic reorganization of our defence forces in Canada. He stated then that, while he was not presuming to adopt a precise figure, his estimate of the appropriate relationship between the air force and the land army was three to one. The Minister of National Defence obviously misunderstood what he had said, because he took that statement up and said that if you took the figure that is being expended on the land forces today, and multiplied that by three, you would reach a figure that would be out of the question.

The speech of the hon. member for Nanaimo was perfectly clear on that point. What he said was that there must be a drastic operation, a reorganization, a change in the composition of the units, and that there must be an emphasis on the air force in relation to the infantry, having regard to our possible position in the combined defence organization upon which the peace of the world rests in the years ahead.

Without reducing any of this discussion to personalities, may I emphasize the fact that we are particularly fortunate in having in the membership of this committee some men who are in a position to speak to us with regard to national defence matters. When the agriculture estimates were before us, there were in every part of the committee highly qualified farmers who were able to ask the Minister of Agriculture various questions based upon their own highly skilled experience in that field. When matters relating to public health are before the house, we have in different parts of the house men whose own medical experience gives them special qualifications. Now that we are dealing with national defence estimates, we are in the position of having men here who are able to speak with a high degree of qualification. There is no other man in this committee with the background of experience of the hon. member for Nanaimo. There is no other member of this committee whose personal service has covered so wide a range of military experience. I do not want to make any comparisons but, after all, let us examine the background of this infantry officer, this permanent force soldier, who tells us that there should be a drastic reorganization and a reduction in the emphasis on infantry and an increase in the emphasis on the air force.

Here in this chamber are two men entitled to wear the highest decoration for valour in the world, the Victoria Cross. These are the hon. member for Nanaimo and the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Pouliot: And there is Filip Konowal.

Mr. Drew: I am sorry, I did not hear the hon. member.

Mr. Pouliot: I say there is Sergeant Filip Konowal, V.C., under this roof.

Mr. Drew: I spoke of this chamber—and I think the hon. member will realize that I spoke of this chamber, and no matter how distinguished the service of anyone outside this chamber may be, unfortunately it does not entitle him to come here and speak on military matters.

We have here two members who have that qualification, which is something in itself. But I do wish to point out that the hon. member for Nanaimo, who began as a private in the infantry and who retired with the rank of major-general after having served in two world wars, has been decorated with the Victoria Cross, is a Commander of the Bath, and was awarded the Distinguished Service Order, the Military Cross and the Order of Merit of the United States. There is no other living infantry officer in the world today who is entitled to wear on his breast all those decorations for valour.

I mention that because he comes to us as a member of the House of Commons with that combined experience and tells us, as an infantry officer with many years' experience, that the time has come for Canada to recognize the fact that the role which we must play is one which calls for emphasis upon the air service of this country. That does not mean for one moment that there is any need to lose all the great traditions associated with the different units throughout the country.

I would remind hon. members that drastic operations of a similar nature did take place in the years before the two world wars. The services were carrying forward very much as they ended the war in 1918; and then with a new emphasis on armoured units and larger quantities of artillery and the extension of the engineering services, and of the various technical services, units with long and great traditions in the infantry were changed to the new branches of the service. They retained their names and their association, and have carried that tradition forward through the years since then. The same can be done today.

Many infantry units in different parts of Canada can become reserve air units and carry out various services, not only as squadrons fitted with aircraft, but to carry out the many involved and indirect duties associated with the maintenance of any air force under modern conditions. I refer to radar units, communications units and the other services required to maintain an air force. This can be done.

What is essential is that in examining these enormous expenditures—and they are enormous expenditures—we make sure that there is an allocation of our forces in such a way that we gain the greatest possible value from the money being spent.

For that reason I would like to ask a question, which is the basis of any understanding of our problem in the field of our land forces. I would ask the Minister of National Defence: first of all, in the case of the army, what are the arms of that service today?

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Chairman, before the minister answers I have a word to say. I appreciate what the leader of the opposition has said about the hon. member for Nanaimo, and I have as much admiration for him as has his leader. I remember that during the session before last, when the deskmate of the hon. member was a Canadian-born member of parliament, I said of the hon. member that although he was not born in this country he was more of a Canadian than was his deskmate.

This is to depreciate no one, but only to give an opportunity to the leader of the opposition to understand that there are things about which we agree with him. We agree about the defence of Canada. But as every country will be exposed during the next war, if there is one—and everyone hopes there will not—I submit it is impossible for the Minister of National Defence to answer publicly any technical questions put to him by any member of the house. If the information can be given privately for the satisfaction of any hon. member, it is an altogether different matter.

Sitting here as the elected representatives of the Canadian people, we have a duty to perform, and must act to the best of our ability to represent our constituents. They must have confidence in us. They must understand that in these difficult matters members of parliament must be given a certain latitude. There are things they can tell privately but could not tell publicly and which if printed in the press would not serve the best interests of the country.

Let me give this illustration to the hon. member: If he were a banker would he publish in any newspaper the combination of his vault or safe? He is too much of a businessman to do anything like that. When it comes to matters of life and death, as applied to every citizen of this country and of the world, one must be very cautious about what is said.

I shall not embark upon any technicalities at this time, but I would remind the hon. member and my colleagues that during the war, although I have no military training and do not pose as a man with military experience —and never did—I suggested that the best possible defence for this country would be mobile units which could be brought as quickly as possible from any part of the country to repel any attack, and to defeat the enemy.

This is a simple thing and something which can be said in public, because any possible enemy would think twice before attacking a country defended by mobile units. That is one thing.

There is another thing that concerns me about which I should like to express my feelings. During the last war a large number of parliamentarians considered matters of defence in the light of the defence of the commonwealth as a whole. Since that time this country has signed the North Atlantic pact and a new solidarity exists, not only between the various parts of the commonwealth but between all the countries that signed that pact. It is of the utmost importance that we should know the obligations of Canada under that pact. Again this is something that perhaps should not be mentioned in public, but I think any hon. member who desires information about the commitments of Canada under that pact should have it.

I support the minister and I have confidence in him. If there is a vote on this estimate I shall show my confidence by voting for him. But there should be reciprocity in confidence and I say to him that I am concerned about the commitments of Canada under that multilateral pact.

As I said the other day, and as I suggested many years ago, we should have a bilateral treaty of defence with the United States. At that time the then prime minister, who was also secretary of state for external affairs, said that that was not the time for such an agreement. An agreement was made between himself and the President of the United States, but it was never ratified by congress.

When this country must share matters of defence with other countries I submit that we should retain our sovereignty with regard to the number of people from Canada who will serve for the defence of this or other countries. Many hon. gentlemen have referred to the defence of Canada but they have said nothing about the defence of those other countries which signed the pact.

Canada played a noble part in the last war in supporting the countries of the commonwealth and other countries of the world, but it is important to know what will be done in the future in connection with the defence of the countries who are signatories to the North Atlantic pact. How many men will we send? How much ammunition? What armaments? That information is essential.

I am not ashamed of being a supporter of the government and I am not afraid to speak freely in the House of Commons about these matters of vital importance. If we are to go to the defence of any other country we should have something in return. Canada is just reaching complete sovereignty and her great privilege is to retain that sovereignty in her relations with other countries of the world. We should retain our sovereignty and our independence and should decide ourselves what we are to do. The defence of Canada should not be decided by any other country, either by our friendly neighbour or by the United Kingdom or by the United Kingdom military experts. It should be decided right here by the members of the House of Commons and the Senate.

The leader of the opposition has legal experience. He knows that when a case comes up in court having to do with a scientific or technical matter it is not expected that the judge shall have taken a course in technology or the particular science under review in order to be qualified to decide the case. He decides the case according to his legal experience, the law of the land and his own good judgment. He must be convinced that one of the parties is right in order to give judgment.

This is a somewhat similar case. There are military experts on the other side of the house and on this side of the house. I have the greatest respect for the hon. member for Nanaimo, but I have equal respect for the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Minister of National Defence. Though the Minister of National Defence fought through the war as an N.C.O., no shame should attach to him for that.

The first minister of national defence in the last world war was not even an N.C.O. in the previous war, he was just a private. He was wounded and disabled and was entitled to a pension. He was greatly respected by all. I want the committee to understand that I respect those hon. members who have been mentioned by the leader of the opposition just as much as he respects them, but he should not make a comparison between one of his supporters, who was an officer, and the Minister of National Defence, who was an N.C.O.

Without saying anything against the admirable record of the hon. member for Nanaimo I am not ashamed to say that I support the Minister of National Defence, who was an N.C.O. during the first world war, and I have confidence in him. There should not be conflict between those who have had military service and those who have not. We all have the duty of looking after the interests of the Canadian people as a whole. We should be ready to lay aside those prejudices that existed during the first and second world wars. I rejoiced to hear the hon. member for Nanaimo speak as a true Canadian when he spoke the other day. I congratulate him on what he has said, but he has too much experience to contend that he is infallible. Nobody in this world is infallible. We must make the best approach we can to this matter of common national concern. I will ask the leader of the opposition—and I do so on my own responsibility—whether, all things being said, he would be satisfied to have certain private information conveyed to him in a private way to satisfy his mind so that he will be in a position to tell the Canadian people that he has all the information and is satisfied with it. Then there will be an end to a lengthy discussion. Perhaps, considering the subject matter, it has not been so long.

I want every one of my colleagues to have his mind satisfied as to problems of national importance, and I have enough confidence in them to say publicly that, supported as they are by the votes of their electors in each of the constituencies they represent in this House of Commons, they will never fail to represent their own people as they would be expected to.

The Deputy Chairman: I think it is time I should intervene. All hon. members will admit that the Chair has been extremely lenient in the course of this debate. The rules have been violated on both sides of the house. A few days ago we had a general discussion on the first item of the estimates of the Department of National Defence. The discussion we are having now is a repetition of the general discussion we had the other day, and at times it has even a greater scope than the discussion that took place on the first item. Therefore I ask the co-operation of all members of the committee in confining their remarks to the item under discussion, item 250.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I am not quite able to apprehend the exact meaning of the remarks because I am not aware of what earlier speaker offended against the rules. I may have been out when it happened. During the remarks that I have been making I have been discussing the subject that has been before the house, and I had just asked a question of the Minister of National Defence when the hon. member for Temiscouata made certain statements which I think I should comment on briefly. I find myself in agreement with a great deal that the hon. member for Temiscouata has said. I most certainly am in complete agreement with him when he says that the question of national defence should be decided by the members of the House of Commons and the Senate. That has been my contention since these estimates were called on November 11.

The remarks I have been making have been directed to the hope that we might have the information which would make it possible for members of the house and members of the Senate to reach a decision with some knowledge of the facts. I do not want to have any exchange with regard to the individuals who have been mentioned which would in any way divert the discussion from what is before the house, but I would point out that no reasonable interpretation of any remark I made could under any circumstances be suggested as a comparison, favourable or otherwise, between the hon. member for Nanaimo and any other hon. member in his capacity as a member of the House of Commons. What I pointed out was that in this particular field of responsibility the member who advocated such a drastic change in emphasis in the organization of our defence forces is a man with very wide experience. He started his service as a private, went through every N.C.O. and officer rank, and as a result of that very process as a regular soldier has a wealth of experience which he is able to pass on to us.

No remark that I made was a reflection in any way upon the service of the Minister of National Defence who served most gallantly in the artillery in the first world war. May I say that it is a matter that demonstrates the quality of his service that in that war he was awarded a decoration which I think most members will regard as second only to the V.C. in its recognition of valour. No remark of mine was intended as an unfavourable comparison, and I hope no hon. member will suggest that.

I think, however, that when we are discussing agriculture perhaps a skilled farmer knows a little more about agriculture than somebody else, although we must all exercise what judgment we can when we hear the farmers tell us what the facts are. I also think when it comes to the subject of health, although we must all pass judgment in regard to what is appropriate in the provision of health measures, it is proper that we should have some regard to the experience of those doctors whose qualifications enable them to express an expert opinion. We all must pass judgment. I would make this comment as to a remark made by the hon. member for Temiscouata which it seems to me is the strongest supporting argument I have heard yet in favour of the whole problem being discussed by a committee. He said: If you were dealing with a question of electricity and you were putting it before a judge you would not expect the judge to be an expert electrical engineer. No, we do not; but we do not expect the judge to pass judgment without hearing experts. We do not expect any judge to pass judgment unless he has had the opportunity of having evidence placed before him by those who are able to express an expert opinion in regard to that peculiarly technical subject.

At the present time we are dealing with one of the most complex problems that have ever confronted men and women who are called upon to exercise their judgment, because today the defence forces of this or any other country combine the skill of electrical engineers, metallurgical engineers and engineers of every type, of industrial experts and producers as well as military men in their military formations. Today the defence forces are a combination of every productive and physical capacity of the country. It is for that very reason that, of all the subjects with which we are called upon to deal, no subject so clearly demands expert information before those of us who are not experts are in a position to pass judgment in the high court of parliament.

Let us take a few of the examples. During the last war science brought all its strength, all its skill and all its energy to the production of new devices, and it has not stood still. Today, if we assume our responsibility, we will make sure that within whatever defined field of responsibility we accept the task of preparing defence forces, they will be efficiently equipped in the most economical way, and with the very finest type of arms and equipment that can be supplied. When I say that I would emphasize the fact that in the last war Canada demonstrated that there is no intricate mechanism of war or of peace which the skilled workmen of this country, associated with our technicians and our management experts, are not capable of producing. For that reason we do need expert advice, and that is why I still press my suggestion that a committee would be the appropriate place.

I have interjected these remarks in relation to what has been just said. I would return now to the question I asked before those remarks were made: in the case of the army, what are the arms of that service today?

Mr. Claxton: What does my hon. friend mean, what are the arms?

Mr. Drew: Infantry, artillery, engineers, army service corps, reconnaissance units, and so on.

Mr. Claxton: There are fifteen arms of the army today: armoured corps, artillery, engineers, signals, infantry, army service corps, medical, ordnance, electrical and mechanical engineers, army pay corps, army dental corps, intelligence, chaplain, provost and postal.

Mr. Drew: Then let us take the infantry first of all. What is the present weapon establishment of an infantry battalion on active service?

Mr. Claxton: That information certainly will not be given in this house at this time. That is the kind of information that will be made available to those engaged in training infantry battalions.

Mr. Drew: Well, Mr. Chairman, this merely illustrates the evasion in answers that is presenting a very serious problem. This information is all committed to print. It is available to the armed services, as well as to others. I return to a comparison which will be in the minds of a number of people, no matter what decision may be reached on a motion that is to be presented tomorrow. It is no easier to determine whether a football team is ready for the test it has to meet than to determine whether or not we are really training and equipping our service units, unless we know what weapons they are supposed to have and what weapons they actually have at the present time.

Mr. Claxton: If the hon. member has the information available to him I do not think he should delay the deliberations of this committee by asking for it, because certainly I do not have available, here and now, the establishment of arms, weapons and equipment or the training strengths of the armed forces of Canada. No one on earth could expect me to have that information, either, unless they were determined to hold up these estimates.

Now, sir, we have had some debate of a very general character over a period of three days, during which a number of hon. members have expressed various points of view. On November 18 the remarks of the leader of the opposition covered pages 1934 to 1943 of Hansard; he took over an hour of the time of this house to go through the white paper, without disagreeing with a single proposition in it. In his opening remarks this evening he said the minister had indicated his readiness to answer the questions that had been asked, and as far as I am aware up to this time no single question has been left unanswered. No single question has gone unanswered during the course of this whole debate, and I am prepared to answer all reasonable questions hon. members may put forward with respect to the defence forces of Canada. But if I am to be put through an interrogation respecting the arms manual and other things that are available to people at various levels, then I suggest we are wasting the time of this committee.

The leader of the opposition referred to the hon. member for Nanaimo. I can assure this committee that my respect, and I am sure the respect of all other hon. members, for the member for Nanaimo will not be reduced by anything the leader of the opposition said this evening, because we hold the hon. gentleman in the highest regard. The hon. member for Nanaimo laid great emphasis on the air force, and I agree with him. That is the point; I agree with him. I just differ as to the practicability of providing an appropriation for the air force three times that of the army, at this time or in the immediate future.

In that connection I would point out, as I did before, that in the United States the proportion of expenditure as between the army, air force and navy, is 33·6 per cent for the army, 34 per cent for the air force and 32·4 per cent for the navy. In our estimates for this year, exclusive of defence research and provisions for pensions, our provisions on a comparable basis are for the army 36·4 per cent, for the air force 42·6 per cent and for the navy 21 per cent. In other words while in the United States they have made provision on an almost equal basis, in Canada we have recognized the position of the air force to the extent of giving it prior place by a very substantial margin. It is interesting to note that in the United Kingdom the defence pound is divided as between the army, air force and navy in the proportions of 43 per cent, 29 per cent and 28 per cent. There the air force is in the middle position. It is also interesting to note that in the second world war Canada's great contribution in men was roughly divided in this way: 600,000 to the army, 300,000 to the air force and 100,000 to the navy. So I submit that when the hon. member for Nanaimo, supported by the leader of the opposition, urges greater support for the air force, they are falling through an open door, because we are already doing what they ask and we are doing it to the full extent we believe possible within the limits of these estimates. In future appropriations I would hope, as I indicated when this matter came up on November 18, that this emphasis may be further increased.

This is indeed a complex problem, as the leader of the opposition has said. It has been found to be complex in every country, particularly at this time. We do not claim to know all the answers. We do not claim that anything we do may prove to be ultimately right, because we cannot look into the distant future. All we can try to do, with the help and support of this house and of the Canadian people, is to provide the funds which you and the people think desirable, and then allocate those funds among the three services as best we can. But I do submit that in our recognition of the very important place of the air force we have gone further than the other two countries with which we are so closely affiliated and associated in the most friendly fashion, and we are prepared to go even further.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, first of all may I point out that since we are dealing with an item involving $339 million, I have no apologies for spending an hour in discussing what it implies, nor should any other member. I do not want to say that the Minister of National Defence obviously forgot what I said, or has not read what Hansard records, when he states that I agreed with what is set out in the white paper. I said the white paper gives us no real information as to the state of our defence forces. It gives us a broad picture in general terms, but we do not know the details.

I have asked a simple question dealing only with the first primary unit of our armed forces, an infantry battalion. My question was concerned with the weapon establishment of an infantry battalion on active service. If the hon. members of this house are to know with what we are dealing when they examine these figures, they should have an answer to that question as well as an answer to similar questions about the artillery, reconnaissance units, tank units, armoured units and each of the fifteen branches of the service incorporated in our land forces.

Then, we should know what percentage of weapons they have in relation to that establishment. Without that information we do not know what we are getting for our money, but above all we do not know what we are getting for the defence of Canada. It is a complete mystery, hidden by the answer that it is not in the public interest to give that information. Hon. members of this house have a right and a duty to know that, before they pass judgment. If this is not the place to get the information, then that is all the more reason why we should have a committee where, if it is desirable, any secret matter can be dealt with behind closed doors, following the minister's own suggestion that small committees are desirable in dealing with technical matters.

The minister has said he is not prepared to give that answer. He has not at his disposal the weapon establishment of all the units. I am satisfied that the weapon establishment is in the records that his officials have in front of him now. I would be surprised if they came here without that information. If we are to be confronted with this answer about the infantry, there is no use in pursuing the question further in regard to the other branches of the service. It is about time, however, that the members of this house recognized that they have a responsibility to know what we really have in the way of defence.

Here is a recruiting advertisement that appeared in the press of this country yesterday. It shows an anti-aircraft gun, and at the top are the words, "Science turned their backs on the target." The meaning of those words is that science has made it possible for the men serving an anti-aircraft gun to fire at a target with their backs towards that target. This manoeuvre involves the intricate mechanisms which science has now made available for the control of anti-aircraft guns. No hon. member of this house is in a position to know how effective our expenditure on anti-aircraft guns is unless he knows how many anti-aircraft batteries there are in Canada, fully equipped with the latest short wave radar, equipped with electrical control devices, sound range devices, directional devices, and all the other intricate mechanisms by which these guns are fired. Nor are we in a position to know how effective those weapons are unless we know how many of the shells available for those weapons are fused with proximity fuses.

In order to ascertain the extent to which information is available, I am asking the Minister of National Defence how many shells there are in Canada fused with a proximity fuse?

Mr. Claxton: Not one.

Mr. Drew: Then, we have an answer which suggests that our artillery is totally unequipped to cope with—

Mr. Howe: Then let us pass this item and get on with it.

Mr. Drew: The Pooh-Bah of the cabinet has returned. He is not satisfied with taking the place of the Minister of Justice, he is now taking the place of the Minister of National Defence.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not believe the term used in referring to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is a proper one.

Mr. Warren: Take it back.

The Deputy Chairman: I do not believe the hon. member meant to say anything disrespectful of the minister.

Mr. Howe: Let it go; I love that sort of thing.

Mr. Drew: It is a most flattering term. The Pooh-Bah was everything but the lord high executioner.

Mr. Garson: You are winning the next election for us.

Mr. Drew: It is good to hear that small voice raised again, and in the presence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The members of the house have heard the Minister of National Defence answer, quite correctly, that in this country today there is not a single round of artillery ammunition fused with a proximity fuse.

Mr. Claxton: What countries have?

Mr. Drew: The United States, Great Britain and the nation in which we are so greatly interested at the moment.

Mr. Claxton: How many in each country, I would be interested in knowing?

Mr. Drew: I am not a member of the House of Commons—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I am not a member of the House of Commons of Great Britain, nor am I a member of the congress of the United States. So that there will be more laughter by those who wanted to find something to laugh about, I shall repeat that I am not a member of the House of Commons of Great Britain, nor of the congress of the United States. The members of those two illustrious bodies are in a position to secure the information which we are being denied.

The members of the congress of the United States, which the Minister of National Defence before he became minister thought afforded us an excellent example, are able to secure the most minute details of the organization of their forces, except in regard to those things that are still on the secret list. Proximity fuses are no longer on the secret list. In the closing days of the war proximity fuses were not only an essential requirement for effective anti-aircraft fire; they became an essential requirement of effective land artillery as well. Taken by itself, that indicates the extent to which we are absolutely unprepared in certain branches of the services to meet the tests of modern war.

Since we are not going to get the information about the weapon establishment of those units, I should like to refer to a speech made by the Minister of National Defence on May 2. An effort had been made earlier to obtain a statement about the decision as to the future equipment of our armed forces, but it was not forthcoming. I have heard no statement in the house during the consideration of these estimates which amplifies a statement that was made by the minister in Detroit on May 2. He said that Canada has decided to abandon the rim cartridge ·303 calibre rifle, machine guns of the same calibre, and to adopt weapons of United States standards as well as their communications organization and other details of organization. I am not questioning whether that is wise or unwise. Certainly since that statement was made in Detroit on May 2, I believe we should have information as to the policy of the government in this respect, and when we propose to depart from our present weapon standards and adopt those of the United States.

Mr. Claxton: With regard to the last question, I think I pointed out on another occasion that the question of standardization was dealt with by me on two different occasions in this house, in which I indicated our desire to standardize our equipment with that of the United States and the United Kingdom. I thought that made sense. There has been no change in that policy, there has been no criticism of it and, so far as I know, it has been generally approved. It is, however, difficult of implementation. With regard to the rimless cartridge and the calibre, we have to wait on the determination, by those with whom we work, of their idea of the right kind of calibre. But we are prepared to co-operate with them just as, I am sure, are the armed forces of the United Kingdom and of the other ten countries in the North Atlantic security pact. We believe in standardization. As regards Canadian-United States co-operation, we believe that it is important to work to common industrial standards and common arms standards, and we are working in that direction. There has been no secret about that. It was announced during the war. It was worked on during the war and it has been continued ever since.

As the hon. leader of the opposition said, I referred to this matter in a speech on May 2; and I am sure that substantially he agrees with the general line.

Mr. Drew: I think all hon. members will agree with the desirable features of standardization; but we still do not know just what the plans are other than that they will fit in with the modern adjustment of our forces. The Minister of National Defence is going to Paris to discuss the problem of the part that each of the member nations of the North Atlantic security pact will take in that combined effort. When we meet in the next session there will doubtless be a clearer understanding of the particular task which Canada has decided to undertake.

As to these present estimates, I have already pointed out that near the end of November we are not going to change greatly one way or another the expenditures that are made in 1949 or for the balance of the fiscal year because either the expenditures have been made or the commitments have already been made for the balance of the period. But what has been demonstrated here beyond any question is that when we deal with the estimates in the next session and are really examining them before they are spent, we shall not have the necessary information unless we have a standing committee on the defence services of Canada.

I am not pressing the point further, because the minister has said that he will not answer the question in regard to the weapon establishment of our units. But I say that we definitely have a right to that information, and that when we know more of the general allocation of our forces, certainly the members of this committee should have full knowledge of the weapon establishment of each unit, how far we have gone or how far we expect to go in meeting those requirements of such units as we actually maintain.

As to these figures, we have indicated from the outset that we were not going to oppose them because the commitments have been made. But in voting for these estimates now, we do so recognizing that we have not the knowledge that we should have, that we have been denied information which every member needs if he is really going to pass judgment, and that when we meet in the next session we will insist then upon the establishment of a committee that will give us the information which will make it possible for us to fulfil our responsibilities as members of this parliament.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—

251. Defence research and development, subject to allocation by the treasury board, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $24,439,660, including authority notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $21,679,660 and commitments for future years of $2,760,000 against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditure in 1949-50 will not exceed $21,179,660.

Mr. Pearkes: This item deals with defence research and development and covers an expenditure of $21,179,660 to be made this year. I realize that in the matter of defence research and development undoubtedly a high degree of security will be necessary and therefore if there is one item in which the minister may be rather loath to disclose the details it would be this one. That fact is borne out because no details of this expenditure are given in subsequent pages of the book of estimates. The $21 million to be spent this year, however, of which the greater part has already been spent, is a fairly sizeable blank cheque. It is undoubtedly an item in which a great many members are sincerely interested. I would therefore ask the minister to go as far as he feels he can go in giving us a breakdown of this item, without giving away any military secrets.

Mr. Claxton: Thank you very much. I can give some details, certainly. The defence research board is providing for central scientific and administrative organization—I can give it in round figures, in hundreds of thousands—$5,294,000; Canadian armament research and development establishment, $2,121,000; experimental station, Suffield, $2,301,000; defence research chemical laboratories, $459,000; Kingston laboratory $99,000; Grosse Isle experimental station, $50,000; radio propagation laboratories $686,000; naval research establishment, $563,000; defence research specific naval laboratory, $156,000; defence research northern laboratory, $315,000; a total of $12 million. Then for naval development, $447,000; for army development, $2,258,000; for air force development $6,952,000; a total of $21,179,000.

If I might say a word or two in general, defence research in Canada has been integrated with the work of the armed forces. The chairman of the defence research board is a member of the chiefs of staff committee; and the chiefs of staff are members of the defence research board; also on the defence research board are representatives of the national research council, the universities and industry. We believe there is a very complete integration of activities so as to eliminate duplication. We do not aim to cover the whole field of defence research in Canada. We could not do it with even $21 million. But in co-operation with the United States and the United Kingdom particularly, we are working on the things which are particularly suited to Canadian research either by reason of the personnel we have available or by reason of the industrial development of the country.

If I might refer to some of them briefly, I would mention the Canadian armament research and development establishment at Valcartier, which was especially developed during the war and further extended since, related particularly to the research in armaments, ballistics, propellants and the like, and their work is being carried on. The experimental station at Suffield, as hon. members know, is of course related to bacteriological and chemical warfare. At Suffield we have a great tract of almost a thousand square miles where we have opportunities and facilities for extensive trials.

Then, we are continuing to conduct research with regard to naval activities as they are particularly related to anti-submarine warfare, and we are extending our activities in the more applied field with regard to aircraft and aerodynamics. We provide a number of grants to Canadian universities to promote research. These are carefully worked out in conjunction with the national research council, and are designed to promote both fundamental and more applied research.

With regard to our development program, by far the largest item is that of nearly $7 million for air force development. That is the money being applied to the development largely of the XC-100 at the A. V. Roe establishment at Malton. In each of the last two years we have put a two-year program into one, and that has enabled us to bring the plane to the stage where we hope it may be test-flown in the next few weeks—and test-flown successfully.

Mr. Pearkes: I do not wish to press unduly, but could the minister tell us something about radar development? He referred to it but did not give much by way of detail. Is all the experimental radar development being conducted by Canadian Arsenals Limited or is the department dealing with other firms connected with radar?

Mr. Claxton: A large number of our contracts for radar equipment have been placed through Canadian Arsenals Limited, but sublet by that organization to other Canadian suppliers.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: We will now take up the estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, before proceeding to these estimates, I wonder if I might have the permission of the committee to place on Hansard a message I received from the Secretary of Defence at Washington. This is addressed to me as Minister of National Defence at Ottawa from Louis Johnson, Secretary of Defence at Washington, and states:

> Permit me to express our profound gratitude to the men of the Canadian armed forces whose tireless effort in behalf of their fellow Americans has climaxed one of the most brilliant air-sea rescue operations in peacetime history.
> The destroyer Haida's rescue of eighteen United States airmen symbolizes the highest tradition of mutual co-operation and helpfulness between our services and makes us more than ever proud of the many endeavours in which we have been associated.
> Please convey to all concerned as well as Commander Madgwick and his officers and men of the Haida, this expression of heartfelt thanks and appreciation for outstanding performance of duty.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

401. Departmental administration, $150,820.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, may I first of all congratulate the Secretary of State upon his elevation to that high office.

My complaint with respect to this item is one I have made concerning many others, namely that we have to vote such large sums of money without knowing the purposes for which they are used. While the minister may be following in the footsteps of his predecessors, that is no reason why we should not have a statement concerning the money we are asked to vote.

Here is a department asking for a total sum of $1,913,982. Of this amount there is the sum of $586,290, or about 31 per cent of the total, concerning which we have no details whatsoever. It is not fair to the committee to ask for this blank cheque. Anyone examining the details will find that the items for which blank cheques are asked are in some cases two or three times greater than those for which details are given.

Surely as a committee we should have details of these expenditures. While the Secretary of State may not be able to give us complete information, he could go back to last year's records and tell us where these moneys asked for in blank form have gone.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): Mr. Chairman, I believe the details at page 253 of the estimates are fairly complete.

Mr. McLure: Then we shall refer to it. Let us take the first item dealing with departmental administration. The details set out the salaries of all those who are working, giving a total of $83,945. The next item is a blank cheque for an amount of more than 50 per cent of the sum I have mentioned, and concerning which we have no details.

Then, turning to the item concerning the citizenship registration branch, we find that the salaries for all who are working there total $53,385; and then we are asked for a blank cheque for a sum 175 per cent greater than the sum I have mentioned. The amount given here is $92,385. These are not full details in any sense of the term. We could go on to deal with other items, but I believe what I have stated is sufficient to merit an answer from the Secretary of State.

Mr. Bradley: The first amount of $83,945 deals with permanent employees, and the item for temporary assistance is exactly for that purpose—the temporary assistance we have to get from time to time in the various branches.

Mr. Knowles: On that very point—and this is where some of us came in before—may I support the point made by the hon. member for Queens, and say to the Secretary of State that if he cannot answer my point tonight I hope he will try to be ready to answer it when we reach the item dealing with the civil service commission. If I am correct, the Secretary of State answers on the floor of this house for the civil service commission. I do not think the Secretary of State covered the whole story when he said that this large item was for temporary assistance that has to be hired from time to time because I think many of these people are fairly permanent. I should like to know what the percentage is of permanent civil servants, temporary civil servants, temporary-permanent civil servants and any other classification there may be.

It is not so much a problem of the way it is set out in the estimates, although I do support the hon. member for Queens; it is more a matter of the policy of the civil service commission. When we reach that item I think the minister should be in position to give me the information I have asked for and also state whether any progress has been made toward providing for a greater percentage of permanent employees in the civil service. There are many facets of this problem which are of great concern to civil servants, and rightly so. I do not press for an answer tonight, but I think this is a good opportunity to draw it to the attention of the Secretary of State so that he can deal with it later.

Mr. Bradley: I can give the hon. member the number of permanent and temporary employees in the department, but as regards the civil service commission and its policies I presume we can deal with that when we reach that item.

Mr. Blackmore: I am not so sure that it is best to ask under this item the question I have in mind, but I should like to know why the cost of issuing passports has been increasing at such an exorbitant rate? Two or three years ago you could get a passport for $3, but now a man must pay $5, another $5 for his wife and $5 for each child over 16 years of age. It should be remembered that there are many poor people in the country who are in need of passports and I consider this to be an absolutely unjustifiable charge.

Mr. Bradley: I think that is a matter for the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Blackmore: That department had better be ready.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): As I understand it, this temporary assistance, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, covers a number of employees who are rather permanent but who are not recognized as such. This was the case in Newfoundland when many people were taken into the service during the war but who have not been recognized as permanents. This question arises in every department but I am directing my query to the minister because his department is smaller than the others. The civil servants must be greatly concerned about this, especially as to whether they are pensionable.

Mr. Bradley: Obviously a temporary civil servant is not pensionable. Perhaps this had better be discussed under the item for the civil service commission.

Item agreed to.

402. Citizenship registration branch, $181,770.

Mr. Knowles: Can the Secretary of State tell us how many citizenship certificates have been issued since the legislation was enacted?

Mr. Bradley: I can give the figures for the period April 1, 1948 to March 31, 1949, which are as follows:

Aliens	11,455
British subjects	148
Alien minors whose responsible parents have been granted certificates under the act	283
Doubtful	41
Minors, aliens, who have applied for their own certificates	255
Persons naturalized in Canada prior to the naturalization act of 1914	1,944
Canadian citizens by birth, naturalization, marriage, residence	9,611
	23,735

Mr. Knowles: The minister has not the cumulative totals?

Mr. Bradley: No.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Would the Secretary of State explain the difference between the citizenship registration branch and the citizenship branch, item 407?

Mr. Bradley: The citizenship registration branch has to do with the technical matters connected with citizenship, while the other portion of the branch deals with individual immigrants who come here, whom we propose to make citizens of at the proper time, and who naturally need a certain amount of training and education in Canadian citizenship.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): An immigrant coming into the country would come first to the citizenship registration branch?

Mr. Bradley: He would deal with the immigration branch first.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): But with whom in your department would he deal first?

Mr. Bradley: He would deal with the citizenship branch which would endeavour to train him in Canadian citizenship in so far as they can.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Do I understand that all technical work is done by the citizenship branch?

Mr. Bradley: No, the citizenship registration branch.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): What does the citizenship branch do?

Mr. Bradley: It provides facilities for the teaching of Canadian citizenship to immigrants in so far as it is possible to do it and the immigrant is prepared to absorb the information.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): How would you teach an immigrant to become a Canadian citizen?

Mr. Bradley: I am afraid I am a poor teacher. We provide certain literature, films and other material for the carrying on of night courses and so on. Most of this is done with the co-operation of the provinces. What happens in a school of citizenship in any particular province I am afraid I am not capable of saying.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): If you examine the items on page 253 and so on you will see it is practically all for staff, printing, salaries, and things of that type. If it is an educational feature, there is not very much set out in the details showing that is the main duty of the branch.

Item agreed to.

405. Bureau for translations, $646,445.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister would mind letting item 405 stand for a few minutes. I confess the reason is that one of my colleagues is anxious to say something on it, and he went upstairs to get some of his material. Here he is now.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say something about the item mentioned by my colleague dealing with the bureau for translations. I want to ask the Secretary of State how many translators are used, and of those translators how many are used by the customs and excise branch to translate books which are submitted at customs offices for admission to this country? I am interested to know how many translators are capable of translating languages other than French. I take it most of them referred to here are employed for the purpose of translating from one official language of the country to the other. If we may have an answer to this question perhaps we can proceed from there.

Mr. Bradley: Obviously it is mainly translating from English to French, but the other languages covered will be found in the report of the department. They include German, Russian, Spanish and Italian.

Mr. Knight: Those then are the languages which these translators are capable of handling. I think there was another part of my question that the minister did not answer. How many of these translators are used from time to time by the customs and excise branch for the purpose of examining books in foreign languages for which admission is sought to Canada?

Mr. Bradley: I am afraid the hon. member will have to ask the customs and excise branch that question.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knight: The item is not carried. It is not in the estimates of the customs and excise branch. It is in the estimates of the Secretary of State. I think my question is a reasonable one.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, do I have to stand up all the time to ensure that my question will be answered? I am waiting for my answer. When I get it I shall proceed to stand up again.

Mr. Bradley: Is the hon. member asking about translation or the reading of documents in different departments? All translation is done by this department. If translators or persons familiar with various languages are used in other departments for the purpose of reading documents, or something of that kind, I do not know anything about it.

Mr. Knight: I know something about it, but I want to find out more. Let me make my meaning perfectly clear. How much of the time of certain of these gentlemen or ladies is employed in the capacity of translators from a foreign language into a language which can be scrutinized by the official readers of the customs and excise branch so that they may pass judgment in the matter whether or not the material so translated is fit to be admitted to this country? I hope I have made that clear.

Mr. Bradley: I do not know that I can answer the question. I wonder if the hon. member is referring to other languages than those which I have mentioned, and for which purpose at times I believe outside translators are used on a temporary basis.

Mr. Knight: During the war I think there were three translators who were used for the purpose I have mentioned. These three linguists were able to cover twenty-five languages. They were men who did translating for purposes of censorship during the war years. At the end of the war they were taken over by the Department of National Revenue to do this domestic reading. I have never been able to discover the truth of the matter either by questioning the Minister of National Revenue or so far tonight. I have not been able to get specific information as to the point. I ask the Secretary of State whether since the war we have replaced these men, who were good linguists and top men in their profession, by anyone else who is capable of scrutinizing such material.

We have had a great deal of talk lately in this house and in the country generally about censorship. Much has been said about the admission to Canada of crime comics and books. I am not taking the position that I am advocating censorship. I do not want to be misunderstood about that, but I am interested in the general subject of books. We can do with a lot more books in this country. If we are going to have censorship, if we are going to exclude from Canada foreign language books which are excluded simply through the ignorance of the people who are handling the matter, then I am opposed to that method of doing business. You will excuse me if I am a little heated about this particular subject, but I have been fighting against a stone wall for two or three years, and this is one of those hidden recesses of government which I have not been able to penetrate up to the present time. That is the reason why I thought I would bring the matter up tonight. I notice that the Minister of National Revenue is flattering me by rather earnest attention, and I hope when his turn comes he will be able to give me an answer.

Mr. McCann: I can give you the answer now.

Mr. Knight: I realize that the Secretary of State is new to his position. I do not think anyone will hold it against him if he is not schooled in this particular matter, but it is a subject into which I have been making investigations. So far as I am concerned, I believe that the examination of foreign language books has been quite haphazard. I think a great many of them are worthy of being admitted. A great many of them which are worthy of being admitted are kept out simply because there are not people learned enough in these languages to examine them properly. I also believe the converse is true. We are admitting a lot of stuff we should not be admitting for the same reason. I know for a fact that books which are being denied entry at one customs port are being admitted at others. The whole situation is confused. If you do not believe it, look at the bookstands. I have known of cases when customs officers were simply flabbergasted. An officer is confronted with a foreign book about which he knows nothing.

He may take it to a Greek restaurateur and ask, "Is this book all right?" The Greek gentleman says it is all right, and that is the basis on which censorship is carried out in this country, the basis on which books are either accepted or rejected. It is time that situation was brought to an end. It is time the importation of suitable books into this country was encouraged. It is time we had men at the head of this censorship branch who are qualified by their background, their training, their education and by some elementary knowledge of literature to say what is good and what is bad; and I am not speaking in the moral sense, but rather in the literary sense. If the Secretary of State has no further information for me, however, I suppose we will have to leave it at that.

Mr. Bradley: The only information I can give the hon. member is that we do what translations are done. If any department of the government needs someone to read something in a foreign language, we do not know anything about that. We do the translation and provide them with it. That goes from our department; but I know nothing about anything else.

Mr. Knight: To simplify my first question I shall ask this. Do the translators at present in the minister's department do any work as translators for other departments of government, notably for the customs and excise branch of the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. Bradley: The answer is yes.

Mr. Knight: To follow that up, then, has the minister any idea to what extent or for what periods of time they are so employed? Is it part of their regular duties? Is it done spasmodically? Are they loaned to the Department of National Revenue on occasions when their services are needed? Surely these things should be a matter of simple record.

Mr. McCann: The hon. member for Saskatoon has conveyed an entirely wrong impression both to the house and to the public in reference to the censorship of books that pass through the customs and excise branch. We have within the department people who are capable of making translations, though not in all languages. What the hon. member has referred to had to do particularly with the time we had censorship under the Department of National War Services, of which I was minister for the last year of the war. It was not necessary nor was it economical to retain those people in the service of that department any longer, or to transfer them to the Department of National Revenue, because there was not sufficient work to keep them employed full time.

When the hon. member speaks of a customs officer at a port having to take a book to a Greek restaurant proprietor in order to get a translation, that statement is entirely incorrect. It may be done, but not under the instructions of the department. Any books entering at any port of entry today, as to which there is any suspicion that they break the law because of the fact that they are immoral or obscene, are sent to headquarters in Ottawa. If they are in a foreign language they are translated here, either by translators within our own department or by translators who come under the Secretary of State. So it is not done by any haphazard method. The work is done thoroughly; and if these books break the law by reason of the fact that they are immoral or obscene, they are denied entry.

Mr. Knight: Would I be correct in assuming that ninety per cent of these foreign language books are not examined at all?

Mr. McCann: You would be entirely incorrect.

Mr. Knight: I am glad to hear that. Tonight, for the first time in four years, I am getting some information.

Mr. McCann: Why did you not bring it up under the right department?

Mr. Knight: I have brought it up under the hon. gentleman's estimates with very little success. I do know some books—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, I believe the discussion is taking place on the wrong item. The Minister of National Revenue just stated that the censorship of these books is in his department, and there should be some item in his estimates under which the hon. gentleman can discuss this question. The Secretary of State has said that his department does translations for other departments but that he does not know anything about censorship. So I really think the hon. gentleman should discuss this question on another occasion.

Mr. Knight: I want to make just one last point, as a matter of information rather than a question. The Secretary of State did not have the information, but I can give him the figures for one particular period. At one time in the bureau of translations there were 210 translators, of whom 207 were for French and English, which left a total of three for all the other languages in the world. I do not know whether that is considered a sufficient number to examine the books that are presented for admission, but those are the facts that were given to me. The only way I can find out whether or not those facts are true is to ask the minister concerned, and for having done that I offer no apology.

Mr. McLure: I do not want the Secretary of State to think I am going after him on these estimates, because I know he is new to the department and is only following the procedure that has been laid down. My idea is to warn him that next session we will expect more details in reference to these matters. For instance, in reference to the bureau of translations, at page 255 we see that the salaries amount to $377,970. Directly below that is an item amounting to about seventy per cent of the one I have mentioned, or $251,475, as to which we have no information at all. We are simply asked to vote a blank cheque in this amount. In fairness to this committee I believe that on another occasion, in another year, we should have some explanation of this. We know this item is a wonderful vote catcher for elections, and I notice that this year it is a little larger than usual. However, we shall let that pass for the time being, though in future we shall expect to see more details given, so that we may not be asked to vote blank cheques.

Item agreed to.

407. Citizenship branch, $175,855.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the Secretary of State could now give a little more information in reply to some of the questions which were asked a few moments ago. What kind of persons are employed to do this citizenship work? By that I mean what are their qualifications, and in what fields are they qualified? I think we all feel that this is a pretty important phase of governmental activity, but we would like to know what it is all about. I imagine there is a pretty good story here, if the minister could just tell it to us.

Mr. Bradley: It is mainly liaison work between the new citizens or immigrants and the provincial authorities, particularly in matters having to do with the subject of education. A great deal of the work is carried on by a voluntary organization known as the citizenship council, which as a matter of fact gets a vote of some $10,000 a year from this parliament. I cannot give much in the way of detail about it other than I have already given.

Mr. Thatcher: Will the minister state the reason for the heavy increase in this particular item over last year? I believe most of it was caused by printing, stationery and office equipment. Why would it be so much greater this year than the previous year? The item shows an increase from $8,000 to $88,000.

[Mr. Knight.]

Mr. Bradley: There is an increase of approximately $80,000 for printing, stationery and office equipment. That is due to the cost of printing new pamphlets, the preparation of film scripts which are essential for the work of this branch, and so on. Then there was an increase in the number of radio broadcasts which accounts for the balance of the increase.

Mr. Lennard: How much for radio broadcasts.

Mr. Bradley: Five thousand dollars.

Mr. Thatcher: Is the minister saying that there was $80,000 more printing this year than there was last year? It seems like a fantastic increase.

Mr. Bradley: That is for printing, stationery and office equipment.

Mr. Thatcher: Which is going to be the normal figure in the future, $8,000 or $88,000?

Mr. Bradley: I am afraid I cannot look far into the future, Mr. Chairman. This is a growing country.

Mr. Thatcher: This item has increased ten times in one year. If it is going to increase ten times next year, I suppose it will be $880,000.

Mr. Knowles: I believe the minister has his officials before him, and he should be able to give us some more concrete information in reply to the questions.

Mr. Thatcher: Why would the printing cost increase ten times in one year? I think that is a reasonable question.

Mr. Bradley: I would draw to the attention of the hon. member that there were 150,000 booklets issued this year, for instance.

Mr. Thatcher: What booklets would be issued this year that were not needed last year?

Mr. Bradley: I am not able to tell the hon. member at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: Is that the end of that answer?

Mr. Bradley: That is the end.

Mr. Knowles: I come back to the question I asked a moment ago. It seems to me the house is entitled to know the qualifications of the people who are doing this citizenship work. I am not asking for any names. I do not think it is fair to pull the names of civil servants out on the floor of the house, unnecessarily at any rate. In this branch, there is a director who receives $5,400; an assistant director at $4,980; a citizenship officer, grade IV at $3,600; a citizenship officer grade II at $2,940; and a citizenship officer grade I at $2,400. What are these people—lawyers, musicians, printers or what?

Mr. Bradley: I do not think there are many expert musicians among them, Mr. Chairman. In so far as I have had association with them, I would judge them to be good citizens, well educated and with a considerable ability for organization. I do not think they do any actual teaching, so I would not regard them as teachers.

Mr. Knowles: What do they do?

Mr. Bradley: They organize.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is the minister in a position to say whether anything has been done with regard to applicants for citizenship from Newfoundland? As the minister is aware, there are a number of Chinese nationals who have been living there for the past ten years and who have not been able to apply for naturalization. It is necessary for them to apply under the Canadian Citizenship Act now. Some of them are not very familiar with the English language. This particular vote provides the minister with funds to help them obtain citizenship by giving instruction in the responsibility and privileges of Canadian citizenship. I suppose nothing has been done in Newfoundland about that?

Mr. Bradley: If they have lived in Canada for twenty years they can get their citizenship papers without being able to speak the language adequately. I do not know whether or not the hon. member is referring to that.

Mr. Thatcher: I believe I asked a reasonable question of the minister. Why was it necessary this year to spend eleven times more than last year for printing, stationery and office equipment? He may have answered the question, but I did not understand his answer. Was it because Newfoundland came into confederation? Was it because more immigrants came this year? Why did you have to spend eleven times more money?

Mr. Bradley: The hon. gentleman has asked a question which I cannot answer with the meticulous accuracy that he seems to demand, but I shall do the best I can. As I have said, there was an increase of $80,000, $70,000 of which was for printing booklets, some of which may have reached hon. members. One was called "Our Land"; another was "Our History" and still another, "Our Geography", and so on. Those were distributed in large quantities. As a matter of actual fact, I know there was a substantial quantity sent to Newfoundland and no doubt some of them went to the riding of the member for St. John's West.

An amount of $10,000 was expended for the purpose of educational film scripts. I think that accounts for the $80,000.

Mr. Thatcher: Would you explain the purpose of those pamphlets?

Mr. Bradley: To educate those people who were coming here to be good Canadian citizens. They are newcomers to the country.

Mr. Knowles: I have found out that the people about whom I am asking are organizers, but I should like to know what they organize. I used to be an organizer myself, but I did not get a salary like this. Of course, I was a C.C.F. organizer. I want to know what kind of organizers these fellows are who receive $3,600 and $4,980.

Mr. Bradley: They are officials of the department who are charged with the duty of endeavouring to teach newcomers to this country how to become good Canadians. One may say they are liaison officers between the immigrants and the officials, particularly the educational officials of the various provinces into which those immigrants might go. These officers try to get the two parties together. They provide educational material of various kinds for them. Those are the duties, and I believe these officials are doing a fine job.

Mr. Thatcher: This is the last time I shall ask the minister about this item. It seems to me that last year there were more immigrants than this year, so why would you need $80,000 more this year.

An hon. Member: We are teaching them more.

Mr. Bradley: Because we have been asked for more of these educational booklets and we are doing more work.

Mr. Applewhaite: It would appear from the questions that have been asked during the last few minutes that there is some criticism of the increase in this item. I would suggest that the only criticism which should be made is that, instead of increasing ten times it should have increased twenty or thirty. Hon. members should know that for many years such organizations as the Daughters of the Empire have been urging that we put on something in the nature of a program of citizenship education. Now, economy is all right in its way, but I submit there is little economy in cheeseparing on the education of our new citizens.

Mr. Knowles: May I say I agree one hundred per cent with what the member has said. I hope that, in turn, he will agree with me that we are entitled to have this citizenship program described to us. That is all we are asking for.

Mr. Gillis: I am far from satisfied with the answers that were received from the Secretary of State.

Mr. Knowles: What answers?

Mr. Gillis: On this particular item. The hon. member over on the other side may think that this terrific increase in that particular item is justified. He may know something about it; but the statement he has just made certainly does not give us any more information. It is no trouble to agree with him that an educational program is necessary. But why that terrific jump in one item? The minister stated that three booklets were put out last year: "Our Land," "Our History" and "Our Geography". As a member of this house I have never seen one of them.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You are a good citizen. You do not need them.

Mr. Gillis: We should like to have a look at them. It may have been propaganda. There was an election last year. I know that when the Department of National Defence, the immigration department or any other department puts out any kind of publication, the members of the house are supplied with it. I know I have never seen one of these particular books. I should like to know why the department was hiding them or sending them out to a select group.

Mr. Bradley: I will send one over to the hon. member.

Mr. Gillis: I should be glad to get one. This is a terrific increase. We are not objecting to it if the minister can justify it; but he has certainly not justified it to date. I know that he is not supposed to have the answers. I do not expect him to have them. But I expect his officials who are in front of him to have the answers. In 1946, 1947 and 1948 we were bringing in to this country about the same number of immigrants as we brought in last year. I think the quota stands at about 120,000 a year. If each year up to 1949 the expenditure of that department was $8,000, why the jump to $88,000 in 1949? The minister also states that there is an item of $5,000 for radio broadcasting. I think that is quite high for that department, which is a fairly small one. An expenditure of that kind, without any details given, is in my opinion certainly not in order. The officials of that department should have the answers. How many of these books were sent out? I am not satisfied. I am absolutely unsatisfied with that answer. There is something the matter with somebody when you cannot get more details than that.

Mr. Bradley: I can say this: 150,000 of these booklets were sent out and there were nine broadcasts of a half hour each across Canada.

Mr. Gillis: What was the subject of those broadcasts?

Mr. Bradley: All on citizenship.

Item agreed to.

Patent and copyright office—
409. Patent division, $488,805.

Mr. Thatcher: Will the minister tell us what the reason is for the big increase in this department? There is an increase of $99,000. Will he explain the reason for that?

Mr. Bradley: That is the cost of printing patents.

Mr. Thatcher: What does the minister mean? Does he mean that it costs $99,000 more this year than last year for that?

Mr. Bradley: Yes.

Mr. Thatcher: How many more patents were issued?

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister going to answer the question?

Mr. Bradley: I did not get the question. What is it?

Mr. Thatcher: How many more patents were issued? You say this amount is for printing patents.

Mr. Bradley: It is not the number of patents that were issued. We have started printing these patents, and that was the cost of this printing.

Mr. Thatcher: Formerly you did not print them?

Mr. Bradley: They were not printed before.

Mr. Fleming: If this large increase of $100,000, in round figures, is attributable to the printing of patents—something that was recommended two years ago by the committee on banking and commerce—there must be some offsetting revenue. I presume there will be some small revenue from the printing of these patents; it may not be all outlay.

While we are speaking of this subject of the patent and copyright office, I think the minister ought to give the committee some statement with regard to the progress the office is making in reduction of the backlog. As hon. members will recall, this has been a standing reproach for some time; it is not attributable to the present staff or to the commissioner but to the lack of adequate personnel in times past and, up until this past year, lack of adequate accommodation. I think this committee would receive with a great deal of interest a statement from the minister indicating, now that more suitable and adequate accommodation has been provided and we hope some adequate increase in the personnel available for examination of patent applications, that some really substantial progress is being made in the reduction of that big backlog of patent applications.

Mr. Bradley: Every endeavour is being made to improve conditions. But it must be remembered that the patent office has been labouring under considerable difficulties. In the first place, the war took a good deal of the staff. In the second place, it takes some time to train staff for the patent office, particularly in the department of the examiners. Then we have to get in additional machinery to handle the ever-increasing volume of applications that are coming in to the department. We are doing the best we can. I imagine that in the near future the costs of the department are going to increase and that the revenues will increase also. Did someone ask the revenue for last year, and if there was any offset? The answer is yes, $625,450.

Mr. Fleming: What the minister has said is rather old stuff to those who were in the last house. I think the minister ought to be in a position to give us some figures about the reduction of the backlog. Surely he has some figures of the number of patent applications outstanding, we will say, two years ago, one year ago and now, which he could give to the committee, so that it will have some opportunity of satisfying itself as to whether some reduction is being made in that large backlog.

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fleming: Can the minister answer the question? I asked the minister a question.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, I know; but before he answers, I have a question.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I understand the minister will now give an answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Eglinton.

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Bradley: There is a substantial backlog. The difficulty in catching up with that backlog is that, though we are getting ahead faster, we have more to handle because the number of applications is increasing continually. As a matter of fact, we have to put in more linotype machines over there, and it is going to take some time for us to catch up with the backlog. But there is an ever-rolling stream coming in; that is the difficulty.

Mr. Fleming: Has the minister the figures?

Mr. Bradley: I cannot say that I have, no.

Mr. Knowles: Eleven o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fleming: Not until we get those figures.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow at eleven o'clock we will continue the discussion of Bill No. 144, to amend the Combines Investigation Act. We hope to conclude that in the early hours, and then take up the following bills:

Bill No. 145, respecting the acquisition of the Temiscouata railway; Bill No. 146, to authorize the granting of a subsidy to the government of the province of British Columbia in aid of the construction of an extension to the Pacific Great Eastern Railway; then another, Bill No. 12, to establish the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation; and another small bill, of only one section, Bill No. 174, to amend the Pension Fund Societies Act.

When these bills have been concluded or passed we shall take up estimates, continuing with the Department of the Secretary of State, and then proceeding to mines and resources, justice and labour.

Mr. McLure: All in one day?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I think so.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Demobilization and reconversion—

250. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $547,497,388, including authority, notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $401,942,006, and commitments for future years of $145,555,382, against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1949-50 will not exceed $339,442,006.

251. Defence research and development, subject to allocation by the treasury board, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $24,439,660, including authority notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $21,679,660 and commitments for future years of $2,760,000 against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditure in 1949-50 will not exceed $21,179,660.

Pensions and other benefits—

827. To authorize the governor in council to increase the pension granted to Captain Joseph McNaught MacCallum under the Militia Pension Act effective August 2, 1947, by including for purposes of calculation of his pension the amount of dependents allowance that would have been paid to his wife had she not been a member of the Canadian Women's Army Corps during the period June 30, 1944, to December 6, 1945, $1.

828. To authorize in respect of members of the Royal Canadian Air Force on leave without pay and serving as instructors with civilian training organizations operating under the British Commonwealth air training plan who were killed, payment to their dependents of amounts equal to the amounts such dependents would have received under the Pension Act as amended had such service as instructors been military service in the armed forces of Canada, less than the value of any benefits received by such dependents under insurance contracts which were effected on the lives of such members of the Royal Canadian Air Force by or at the expense of the civilian organizations, $6,690.

Demobilization and reconversion—

829. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services, and to authorize total additional commitments for this purpose of $14,991,500, including authority notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act to make commitments for the current year of $6,661,500 and commitments for future years of $8,330,000 against which additional commitments it is estimated that actual additional expenditures in 1949-50 will not exceed a further amount of $4,778,000.

830. Defence research and development, subject to allocation by the treasury board—further amount required, $3,133,900.

831. To authorize, notwithstanding the provisions of the Army Benevolent Fund Act, and the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, release of $16,415.13 held by the president of the regimental funds board, on behalf of certain non-permanent active militia and reserve units which were not placed on active service during world war II, to the governor in council for such distribution as he may determine, $1.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, November 25, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

HOUSING

RENT CONTROL—CORRESPONDENCE WITH PREMIERS OF PROVINCES

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) I wish to table correspondence between the minister and the premier of Saskatchewan and the premier of Quebec on the matter of rent control.

I understand that a desire was expressed in the house that this correspondence be printed as an appendix to Hansard. If it is the wish of the house, I would so request.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house to have this correspondence printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of correspondence, see appendix, pages 2278-81.)

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 203, for the relief of Odette Therese Gabard Coupal.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 204, for the relief of Ella Maxine Shover Logan.—Mr. Winkler.

COAL

ASSISTANCE TO PRODUCTION IN ATLANTIC MARITIME PROVINCES

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to assist the production of coal in the Atlantic maritime provinces by making loans to producers of coal, and to provide therein for the conditions of such loans and the terms of repayment thereof; to provide further that the aggregate principal amount of loans made to coal producers shall not exceed ten million dollars and that the aggregate principal amount of loans made to any one coal producer shall not exceed seven and one-half million dollars.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL PRICES SUPPORT ACT

PROVISION FOR CONTINUANCE IN FORCE OF SECTION 9—POWERS OF THE BOARD

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that section nine of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, shall continue in force for such period or periods as the governor in council may from time to time fix by proclamation, but shall expire upon the dissolution of the twenty-first parliament.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES PRICES SUPPORT ACT

PROVISION AS TO COMING INTO FORCE OF SECTION 9—POWERS OF THE BOARD

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that section nine of the Fisheries Prices Support Act, 1944, shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-third day of July, nineteen hundred and forty-seven, and shall continue in force for such period or periods as the governor in council may from time to time fix by proclamation, but shall expire upon the dissolution of the twenty-first parliament.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTINGS ON AND AFTER NOVEMBER 26 —WEDNESDAY SITTINGS AS ON OTHER DAYS

Right Hon L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Saturday, the 26th November, 1949, and every Saturday thereafter until the end of the present session, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock a.m., and the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Fridays; and also, that on and after Wednesday, the 30th November, 1949, and every Wednesday thereafter until the end of the present session, the sittings shall in every respect be under the same rules as provided for other days.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a few words to this motion, which has given me considerable thought since I first saw it yesterday in Votes and Proceedings. I am well aware there are certain rules in the House of Commons. Although I am far from being an expert on the rules, I distinctly remember two of them. One is that one may not impute motives, and the other has to do with unparliamentary language. Therefore I find myself this morning under a most strict limitation in what I am about to say.

No rule, of course, can stop any hon. member from thinking. People are not put in jail or otherwise punished for that, yet, in the Dominion of Canada. In thinking about this matter, it occurred to me there might be a coloured gentleman in the winter kindling, if he did not occupy the whole woodpile. Considering the strain under which I am working, that is the most I am permitted to say at this time if I do not wish to commit a breach of the first rule which I mentioned.

As to the second rule, my position is even worse. I will admit my thinking was clothed in language which was extremely unparliamentary. So unparliamentary was it, sir, that I found that with almost every second breath I was calling myself to order. I did not get the obedience that you always get when you use that word. So bad did things become, Mr. Speaker, that I had to use another of your prerogatives: I had to name myself. I know when a person is named in the House of Commons it must be a matter of some shame to him. Then I felt that the house had probably acted in the matter, and upon the appropriate motion I am going to assume that I have been expelled from this house for one day certain, which is tomorrow, the 26th of November.

My shame hanging so heavily upon me, I felt I must get away from Ottawa. I did not think I could take the stares which I would get from hon. members. After all, I like my friends to speak to me, and I thought perhaps I would lose even that favourable consideration. Therefore I have decided to shake the dust—or snow—of Ottawa from my feet and go to the city of Toronto. There I am sure I will meet many of my constituents. I am also quite sure they will forgive me. They might even go further than forgiving me. They might even join me in that well-known cry, "Come on, Stampeders!"

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, what I am going to say will be far less effective than what the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) has just said in his humorous manner. While I think most of us recognize the desire of the government and of hon. members generally to facilitate the business of the house, I think the resolution now before us asks too much of us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coldwell: To sit day after day from eleven in the morning until eleven at night is a strain on all members. We not only have to attend the sittings of the house and meetings of committees; there is also a certain amount of correspondence to be dealt with, and preparation to be made for the business of the house. I think the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is asking too much of the house. Personally I believe—and I know my colleagues agree with this—that in order to facilitate the business of the house some Saturday sittings are unavoidable and warranted at this time. New business is still being placed on the order paper. I suggest to the Prime Minister that he meet the private members of the house part way, and at least have no Saturday night sittings. Members of the house want to get home to their families for the week end. I do not criticize members of the house who will not remain here, but if we sit on Saturdays it means that, with few exceptions, the only members of the house who will attend will be those who come from the far east and the far west. That has been the experience, and it is frequently so even on Fridays. I suggest to the Prime Minister that he modify the motion now before the house and avoid Saturday night sittings.

There is one other point I want to make. If the Prime Minister does not meet the wishes of some members of the house for whom I am speaking, at least this could be done. The motion reads, as on previous occasions of the kind, that the order of business and procedure on Saturdays shall be the same as on Fridays, which means that the hour from eight to nine is reserved for private bills. I do not believe that should be done. I say that, not because I am opposed to any of the private bills—although I am—but because I think if we are asked to sit on Saturday nights we should not make way for private bills when we are really sitting to deal with the public business. I ask the Prime Minister, on behalf of a number of members of the house, not only those of my own party, to modify the proposal and not insist on Saturday night sittings.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to say a word. I shall confine my remarks about this resolution to the hour between eight and nine tonight. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, they will be to the point.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I trust hon. members will not feel there is any desire to have divergent views on this subject between the government and private members. This motion is in the form in which it is usually proposed when it is hoped that parliament is nearing the end of the session. There is no desire on the part of the government to impose its will upon the membership of the house. A large number of members spend the week end in Ottawa. I know that they, like many other members of the house, are anxious to have due consideration given to all the business that has to be completed, but they hope that it may be dealt with in a proper manner without the session extending too far into the month of December.

If it is agreeable to the house to allow the motion to pass, and it seems to be the feeling of a majority of the members that without sitting on Saturday evening the business of the house can be expeditiously dealt with, I am sure the Minister of Public Works will be glad to move at six o'clock tomorrow night that the house then adjourn and resume at eleven o'clock on Monday morning.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am glad you are going to the game.

Motion agreed to.

MERCHANT SHIPPING

PARTICIPATION OF CANADIAN-OWNED TONNAGE IN STERLING FREIGHT CARGOES—ACCIDENT TO S.S. "CHELOHSIN"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): On November 23 I asked a question about reports that an agreement on merchant shipping was being negotiated in Ottawa between the United Kingdom and Canada. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said he would look into the matter and make a reply later. Can the Minister of Transport make a statement today in this connection?

On November 21 I asked a question about the wreck of the steamship Chelohsin which took place on the shores of Stanley park in Vancouver. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said he would look into that matter also, to ascertain whether or not there would be an investigation.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): With reference to the last question, as to the wreck of the S.S. Chelohsin, I have not yet received a report from the registrar of shipping at Vancouver, but I have ordered a preliminary investigation, as is usual in these cases. I shall be glad to advise my hon. friend of the result of that investigation when it is forthcoming.

Dealing with the other question, I should like to say that conversations have taken place between Sir Gilmour Jenkins, permanent secretary of the British Ministry of Transport, and Mr. Clyne, chairman of the Canadian maritime commission, in regard to lack of cargoes available to Canadian flag shipping. The difficulty which Canadian flag vessels have always faced is that they are unable to accept cargoes where the freight is payable in sterling because Canadians must have dollars to pay expenses. Canadians are debarred for all practical purposes from the carriage of ECA cargoes because by act of congress 50 per cent of such cargoes must be carried in U.S. bottoms and the remainder are carried by ships of the recipient nations, of which Canada is not one.

Outside of ECA cargoes, dollar freights are becoming more and more scarce. The problem is not a new one, but has been accentuated by the fall in the freight market consequent upon devaluation. Last year an arrangement was made between the British Ministry of Transport and the Canadian maritime commission whereby the United Kingdom agreed to provide what were in effect dollar freights to Canadian flag vessels, whose owners were members of conference lines, upon the basis of division of cargoes on a conference basis. In addition the United Kingdom agreed to provide convertible sterling for 45,000 tons per month for tramp tonnage. The conversations between British and Canadian shipping experts have not been concluded, but the object of such conversations is to reach an agreed basis of participation of Canadian-owned tonnage in sterling freight cargoes in face of present day conditions.

SHIPPING AND SHIPBUILDING—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): May I ask the Minister of Transport whether it is still the intention of the government to introduce legislation at this session concerning shipping and shipbuilding?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Yes.

HOUSING

RENT CONTROL—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I do not know to whom I should direct this question. On November 3 the minister said that as soon as the order in council in connection with the submission to the supreme court of the question of the constitutionality of the continuance of rent control was approved, it would be tabled in parliament. It was approved on November 16. Can the Prime Minister or the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance say whether it will be tabled?

With the permission of the Prime Minister, I should like to say that I understand the matter is to be submitted to a judge of the supreme court on December 1, to secure the instructions of the court as to the course to be followed. I have seen the order in council, P.C. 5840, and I am wondering whether the Prime Minister would consider setting aside an hour between now and December 1 for the members of the house to discuss this question. It is not my desire to infringe on the rules of the house—

Some hon. Members: Order. Question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am trying to be helpful. There are only two more days during which we can make suggestions as to some of the terms of the submission, a reading of which seems to indicate to me that they are somewhat hypothetical and not fortified with factual circumstances establishing the continued existence of the emergency. I am making this suggestion in a spirit of helpfulness, because after the order in council has been submitted to the supreme court it will be too late to change it.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I can give the hon. member the assurance that a copy of the order in council will be tabled. I shall get in touch with the Minister of Finance to ascertain whether, under the rules of the house, some opportunity for discussing the matter before December 1 can be given.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

BRIEF TO ROYAL COMMISSION ON ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES—QUESTION AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I have now had an opportunity, Mr. Speaker, of looking at press reports to which the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) referred in asking his question yesterday. On the basis of this question and a further question asked by the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), the issue seems to be this: Why, since the chairman of the national film board is a member of the government, was the brief presented by the board not a statement of government policy?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

My answer is this: A brief was prepared and submitted to the members of the board. No adverse criticisms were registered by the board, three members of which are from outside the government service, and it was my understanding that the board concurred in the brief. As chairman of the board I explained that I did not agree with everything in the brief, and that, as a member of the government, I could not, therefore, commit the government to anything it contained. I added that, as the brief was intended for presentation to a royal commission which was expected to make an independent finding, I felt that the commission was entitled to hear views from all quarters. I said that I would not object to the brief being presented to the Massey commission, provided that it was clearly indicated to the commission that it did not represent government policy. I am informed by the chairman of the Massey commission that this view was made clear by the commissioner of the film board when the brief was presented.

In taking that attitude, I felt I was taking a liberal view while reserving the right of the government to formulate its own policies in the light of whatever recommendations might be made by the Massey commission.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to ask the minister whether, when he says he is taking a "liberal" view, that is literally a government view? Were the comments of the minister at the board meeting, and the granting of permission to send this brief to the commission, an attempt to find out what the people thought of the idea?

FOOD

SURPLUS OF CERTAIN PRODUCTS OVER DOMESTIC REQUIREMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): In view of the contradictory statements of the Minister of Agriculture, as reported in the press, is there or is there not a surplus of some food products in Canada today? In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, can the Minister of Trade and Commerce answer the question?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, what my hon. friend means by the word "surplus". Does he mean an unsold surplus or a surplus in excess of domestic requirements?

Mr. Charlton: Just what the word "surplus" ordinarily means.

Mr. Howe: There is a surplus over domestic requirements in wheat, oats, barley and several other products. It is large or small depending on the product.

Mr. Coldwell: What about eggs, cheese and butter?

Mr. Howe: The stock of butter in storage is about normal, and is sufficient to carry us through the winter. The surplus of cheese is small. Our difficulty in connection with cheese is that we have been selling cheese without ageing, and there is a small quantity in stock today that is ageing. Eggs are under contract for the remainder of this year, as is bacon.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

QUESTION OF TRANSPORTATION FOR WESTERN MEMBERS AT END OF SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Will the Minister of Transport say whether or not a decision has been arrived at about transportation for the western members if they remain until the end of the session?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Both the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway officials have been approached, and have signified their intention of assisting the members of the House of Commons from all parts of Canada. When the house rises, additional equipment will be made available to meet the convenience of the members so that they may reach their homes in time for the holiday.

UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): I returned to my office this morning, and I understand that yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) raised the question of unemployment in the Vancouver area. It is true that since last summer some communications from labour and veterans organizations have been received in connection with the development of an unemployment situation in that area. I have directed my officers in the area to keep close watch on the situation, and to consult with interested organizations.

Recently I was in Vancouver, and while the situation does not appear to be as buoyant as it was a year ago, it can be said there is a high level of employment in that area. There are exceptional cases, but at the moment the seasonal drop in employment has been taken care of by the agency which was created for the purpose, the unemployment insurance office. As my hon. friend knows—but I think it is well to repeat it—British Columbia, and particularly the Vancouver-Victoria area, is flooded by people moving from eastern Canada. Since 1941 the population of British Columbia has increased 36 per cent, and the total employment in British Columbia has increased 16 per cent since 1946, which is the highest figure for any province in the dominion.

The member for Vancouver East can rest assured that all the governments concerned with the question he raised will watch the situation closely.

Mr. MacInnis: As a supplementary question, may I ask whether the government has a shelf of public works that could be started quickly if the minister finds the situation deteriorating?

Mr. Mitchell: There is a shelf of public works which the provinces, municipalities and federal government have right across the dominion.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INSTITUTION AND CONDUCT OF PROSECUTIONS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Thursday, November 24, consideration in committee of Bill No. 144, to amend the Combines Investigation Act—Mr. Garson—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Attorney general of Canada may institute and conduct prosecutions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Under this section there are a number of questions that I should like to ask the minister. I shall refer to the particular portions of section 10 of the present act that are applicable. It says that it shall be the duty of the commission to receive and register, and, subject to the provisions of this act, to deal with applications for investigations of alleged combines; to bring to the attention of the minister every such application; to compile information and make studies concerning the existence in Canada of monopolies; to supply any person on request with information as to this act, and generally do such things as are necessary in order to carry out the provisions of the act.

In 1946, with a view to strengthening this act, section 10A was passed, which provides that the commissioner may receive complaints respecting practices alleged to be offences under this act, and may communicate the complaint and such evidence, if any, in support thereof to the attorney general of the province within which the offence is alleged to have been committed, or to the Attorney General of Canada. As was said yesterday by the leader of the opposition, the bill before the committee adds little or nothing to the enforcement of the act. The minister candidly admitted that that was so.

The questions I wish to ask concern enforcement under section 10; for if parliament passes these amendments it needs to be assured, in view of recent experience, that they will be properly and unerringly followed so that we shall not find ourselves in the position of slightly altering the words of a statute and still making the question of enforcement dependent upon the whim, desire or orders of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I should like to know how many investigations have been conducted by the commissioner since October, 1935, under the provisions of section 10. I should like to ascertain what has been done, if anything, to prosecute under the report made in 1945 by the commissioner in connection with the matter of international cartels. A report was brought before parliament and published in the regular way, but, so far as I know, no prosecution has ever been undertaken. Why? The minister contends that the publication of a report by the combines commissioner constitutes a challenge to prosecution.

My next question is: What industries have been investigated since 1946 by the commissioner under the powers contained in this section? Are there at present reports in course of preparation by the commissioner touching certain industries that have been investigated? According to the Financial Post, this week's issue, two or three industries have been investigated, and the reports are now in process of completion. In any of these industries were any promises made by the wartime prices and trade board or by any member of the government that their assistance in production during the days of war would be regarded as insulating them from legal jeopardy?

In regard to these prospective reports I ask the minister these questions: Will they be submitted to the cabinet before they are published? Have any portions of them already been submitted to the cabinet, and if so, under what authority? For there is no provision in the statute for submission to anyone by the commissioner under this section. I should like the minister to advise the committee whether these reports will be expurgated in any way by the cabinet or by any member of the cabinet. I might add that in 1948 the then minister of justice indicated that there was no authority in the minister or anyone else to alter the reports made under section 10.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

My next question is: In how many cases since 1946, when this act was amended, have reports been forwarded by the commissioner or the Attorney General of Canada to the attorneys general of any of the provinces, and to what provinces? Have any of the provinces failed to prosecute on any report indicating a combine in any of the provinces?

Mr. Garson: I think it would be better to say "have any of the provinces not prosecuted."

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister is right. Have any of the attorneys general not done so?

Then there is another matter. Provision for the report to be made by the commissioner under the provisions of section 10 is provided for under section 27, subsection 5. I read it once more merely for the purpose of founding the question:

> Any report of the commissioner or of a special commissioner, other than an interim report . . . shall within fifteen days after its receipt by the minister be made public, unless the commissioner states in writing to the minister that he believes the public interest would be better served by withholding publication . . .

Having regard to all the storm and turmoil of recent days, and the difficulties in which the Minister of Justice finds himself by reason of the interference of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, it might be wondered why the minister did not take up with the commissioner the question of giving a certificate in writing to the minister that in the public interest this report should not be published. It would have been so easy, if the public interest demanded it, for the commissioner, when he delivered that report, to have done so, and the argument would have been over. There is no use in trying to amend a section unless the section as it now stands is being enforced. The minister admits that the amendment will not add to the powers with respect to prosecution.

I have listened with interest to the explanation of the minister about the McGregor report, and have endeavoured to follow him as carefully as I could, having regard to its length. During the period from January until October 22 was not a suggestion made to the commissioner at some time that instead of an addendum he could give a certificate that it was not in the public interest to publish the report? Was such a representation made to the commissioner? If so, when was the first occasion on which this was done? Was the Minister of Trade and Commerce present on any of the occasions when Mr. McGregor was present?

These are questions that have not been cleared up as yet. They are material in ascertaining whether or not section 10 as amended will in fact be carried into effect.

I await the minister's answer to these questions before proceeding.

Mr. Garson: If I have not counted them wrongly, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend has asked me some thirteen questions. I do not know that anything turns on them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister is not an ordinary witness. He is a good lawyer, and he will have no difficulty in following them.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if the number I have given checks with my hon. friend's number?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not have the questions written down. But "thirteen" is a fairly lucky number.

Mr. Garson: I thought perhaps that was deliberate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is significant.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether the Minister of Justice could come down this way a little bit. I do not like asking him to talk louder; he has had to talk a good deal within the last few weeks. If he would just move down—no, not alongside the Minister of Trade and Commerce; that would be bad—but down near the centre of the chamber.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend is usurping the prerogative of running the house. Suppose he leave it to the government. My hon. friend forgets that the government was elected to conduct the public business, not the small group of which he is a member.

Mr. Knowles: I will deal with that matter later. I am just making a request on behalf of the members of the house. As a matter of fact I make it in order to save the Minister of Justice from having to shout so that we can hear him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister had better stay where he is.

Mr. Garson: I will try to shout. When my voice gets tired, I shall let my hon. friends know.

As to some of these questions, Mr. Chairman, I would have trouble if I attempted to answer them from memory. For example, one is: How many investigations have there been since October, 1935? I shall be glad to get that information for my hon. friend.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And table it.

Mr. Garson: I certainly would not attempt to give it from memory, because I might forget one or two.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right.

Mr. Garson: The second question has to do with international cartels. I would have preferred that my hon. friend write his questions, because upon the language in which they are framed may depend his being satisfied with the answers he gets later, and the answers being responsive to the terms of his questions. I shall be glad to get the information for him. I think he will agree, though, that it has no immediate bearing upon this present section. If he will be content that we examine the Hansard report of this sitting and then bring down a return in reply to the questions he has put on the record, I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And incorporate the information in Hansard?

Mr. Garson: And incorporate it in Hansard, yes.

My hon. friend asks: What industries have been investigated since 1946? I think that would go in the same return.

The next question was: Are there any reports in preparation touching industries that have been investigated? At a previous stage of the discussion of this bill I had occasion to say I had been instructed by the commissioner that we did not give out information as to investigations and reports in progress. Personally I would have no disposition whatever to claim that privilege, and I think that I can, within the propriety which the commissioner enjoins upon me, answer my hon. friend's question by referring him to the evidence of the commissioner himself before the prices committee, where he was called upon by the vote of the committee to disclose the reports which he had in preparation at that time. I think my hon. friend will find the report referred to there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have the Financial Post this week publishing the record of the various industries that have been investigated, and saying that the reports will be available on December 31.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, unfortunately, I am not responsible for the reportorial or editorial policy—

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is not editorial.

Mr. Garson: —of any paper.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is Mr. Wilson's statement.

Mr. Garson: Well, I know that Mr. Wilson is a competent journalist, but if he writes a speculative article naming certain dates I am sure we would not consider we were in any way bound by it. I am quite prepared to confer with the commissioner and get the reports. I have them in my mind at the moment, but in relation to the very point that my hon. friend was criticizing me for yesterday, namely, not observing secrecy with regard to my department, I would prefer—

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; at no time did I mention the need of secrecy in regard to his department. What I said was that the minister had lifted the veil on what took place in the cabinet, and indicated that there was lack of solidarity.

Mr. Garson: The same thing applies to these proceedings in the department. If my hon. friend stops to reflect upon the matter for a moment he will realize that in the course of the administration of the combines investigation commission various complaints are received from time to time and are investigated by the commissioner. In the course of that investigation, unless he finds that there are reasons for making a more thorough inquiry leading to a report, he closes that file and respects the confidences which his preliminary investigations have disclosed.

The percentage of cases which result in full formal investigation and report is less than ten per cent of the total investigated. The commissioner tells me—and I have always found him reliable on these matters—that in the interests of and in fairness to those under investigation, and proper administration of the act, it is not desirable to refer to cases under investigation until they reach the stage of a report, unless of course the fact of investigation is disclosed by the industry itself or by court proceedings. But I am telling my hon. friend, so far as the investigations to which he presumably refers are concerned, that I understand the commissioner, in his evidence before the prices committee of the last parliament, was called upon by a vote of the committee to make these disclosures, and he did make them. I have no doubt that that, and the annual report of the commissioner, are the sources of the information which Mr. Wilson has used in his article in the newspaper. In any event I shall be glad to confer with the commissioner—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Only the reports that are in preparation?

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want only the number of investigations; I do not want the identity.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member wants the number of investigations?

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes; but I want the names of the reports now in preparation because they are revealed outside of parliament.

Mr. Garson: Yes. They were revealed first of all in parliament in the prices committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just the investigations.

Mr. Garson: No; there were references to reports. I think my hon. friend will find that that is so.

Mr. Knowles: May I just have one word to help the minister? In his letter of resignation —and it is now public property—Mr. McGregor told the minister that there were two reports in draft form that he hoped to complete before his resignation became effective.

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is right; but I may tell the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that there are two in draft form, but there are other investigations that might fall within the question asked by my hon. friend.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am asking for draft reports.

Mr. Garson: Is the hon. member asking only for draft reports?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes. What are they, and when will they be published?

Mr. Garson: I shall be very glad to give him that. As this discussion develops hon. members will see the importance of my having Hansard to answer these questions, because often the questions change as we go along.

The next question of which I have a note is: "Was any permission given by any member of the government—" That is as far as I took it down. What was the rest of the question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Perhaps I can clear that up. I shall read the excerpt from the Financial Post and then ask the question. I quote:

> Ottawa.—A report by combines commissioner McGregor on the flat-glass industry in Canada is one of two which he hopes to complete before his resignation becomes effective December 31.

It also mentions an investigation into the rubber industry which was held in 1948 and 1949. These are the two reports. The question I asked was whether or not in either of these industries—I have named them now, because they are revealed in the Financial Post—any arrangements were made or promises given by the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. Garson: Well, Mr. Chairman, if there were, certainly I would not know about it, because I was not in the government at the time that is mentioned in that report. The report of the inquiry has not yet been received. It is not in draft form. I do not want to seem to be difficult in these things, but there is no use in any person trying to testify as to facts that he does not know. He cannot possibly be truthful about it.

There is an implication in this question which I think is unfair to the government, namely, that the ministers have been giving exemptions from the law. I have been trying my very best, apparently with great infirmity of language, to make my point clear—that so far as the flour report is concerned—that is the one we are discussing—it was not a matter of anybody giving any exemption or privilege to an industry or to the companies in that industry. As it would be in all instances, it was the case of an industry under the wartime prices and trade board carrying out regulations passed under the War Measures Act, orders made in proper form, calling upon the industry to do certain things which, were they done in time of peace by voluntary agreement, would perhaps constitute an offence under the Combines Investigation Act. By the express terms of the wartime prices and trade board regulations, orders of the board prevailed, in the event of conflict, over any other statute, including the Combines Investigation Act.

The immunity that my hon. friends speaks of is not an immunity which arises out of the promise of any minister or official; it is an immunity which arises out of the terms of the wartime prices and trade board regulations, passed pursuant to a statute enacted by this parliament. That is the law, whether it is stated to be so or not by any minister or by any official.

Mr. Coldwell: To which regulation is the minister referring?

Mr. Garson: There is a multitude of regulations applying to a large number of industries. As I said the other day, at the peak there were eighty odd administrators administering different types of industries throughout the country on behalf of the wartime prices and trade board. In the course of their duties they were directing these industries, under a system of wartime controls, to do certain things. The point is that if any of these things which an industry is thus directed to do happens to be such as might be a contravention of the Combines Investigation Act if done by voluntary agreement, there is not and cannot be any liability under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Coldwell: That is the kind of document we want to see produced here; that is what we have been looking for.

Mr. Garson: I should be glad to produce the orders in council referred to in Mr. Gordon's last memorandum.

Mr. Coldwell: They refer only to the flour industry, but now the minister says there may be regulations affecting other industries.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend wants all the regulations applicable to these various industries, I imagine there would be quite a number.

Mr. Coldwell: Just the ones bearing on this particular point. I think it is something that must be cleared up.

Mr. Garson: I think I see my hon. friend's point. I would refer him again—I have done this once or twice before—to the legal opinion by Mr. Anger that I placed on Hansard. I think he will see there—and this is the point I am trying to make now in affirmative language—the considered opinion of the legal adviser.

Mr. Coldwell: I have read it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says that he has no knowledge of any representations made to these other industries in respect of which reports are now in the course of preparation by Mr. McGregor?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There can be no argument if he has no knowledge, and he is candid in saying so. My next question is this: Will those reports, when produced, be again submitted to the cabinet instead of being published with a view to finding out whether any representations were made?

Mr. Garson: I think the question is an unfair one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Garson: Just a minute, please; let me attempt to answer it. My hon. friend asks if these reports will be submitted to cabinet instead of being published.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, within the fifteen days.

Mr. Garson: My answer to that is unequivocal; they will be published within the fifteen days.

Mr. Howe: That is all you need to know.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Garson: Now—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not all that we need to know.

Mr. Garson: They will be published within the fifteen days, and that is the point we are talking about.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You have—

Mr. Howe: That is all the act calls for.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You have no power of examination.

Mr. Garson: With regard to whether these reports will be submitted to cabinet, certainly they will be submitted to cabinet. The responsibility of the commissioner is to prepare a report with his judgment untrammelled by influence of any kind on the part of the government. When he delivers his report to the government, he is in a sense, to use a legal term, functus officio. He has done his job of report preparing, and his report is delivered as an entity. It should be a complete entity when it comes to the cabinet. The cabinet then has to decide what is to be done with the report—whether patent action will be taken, whether prosecutions will be launched, and so forth, from that point on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But the cabinet cannot decide whether or not the report will be published.

Mr. Garson: No; my hon. friend is quite correct in that. I ask my hon. friend if my answer is not responsive to the question he has asked. Does it cover it satisfactorily?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It covers it.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend's impression of what is satisfactory from his point of view may be different from mine.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not equivocating. Before the minister goes on I should like to say one thing. The Minister of Trade and Commerce made a statement that I want to answer at this stage, arising out of an answer given.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend has asked me eleven fairly complicated questions, one after the other.

Mr. Knowles: Thirteen.

Mr. Garson: Thirteen; I beg your pardon. I am carrying these in my mind and attempting to answer them, and he wants to stop me in the middle of the proceedings to settle some issue that he has with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That is hardly fair to me. He asked if any portions of these reports —I understand he means the reports in preparation—have been submitted to the cabinet, and my answer is, absolutely not.

Mr. Stick: Do you have to answer that question?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Garson: They would be submitted through me. If we had wished to adopt an obstructive attitude all through these proceedings we could have claimed privilege with regard to many matters which were divulged without any question. We could have claimed privilege with regard to Mr. McGregor's letter of resignation. At every stage of these proceedings, however painful it may have been to us, we have made disclosures and taken hon. members into our confidence. We have produced all the facts that we now have. I think that answers question No. 7.

Reports are never submitted to cabinet when they are in course of preparation. No matter what difference of opinion Mr. McGregor may have with the government, he has been a most diligent and honourable servant. He is called upon by the statute to prepare the report on his own initiative, and that is what he has done. It is true that in the course of doing so he kept his minister informed. In connection with the flour report he says that he had the authority of the minister of justice of that time, but he told me that that authority was only oral, not written. It did not need to be given at all. In connection with these reports there is no reference to or consultation with the government by the commissioner as to the text. The whole idea is that he shall be completely independent in the preparing of a report.

I think that answers the next question: Will it be expurgated? Certainly not; nor has the flour report been expurgated in any respect at the instance of any member of the cabinet. Any changes that were made in the flour report, either before or after it was delivered to me, were made on the initiative of Mr. McGregor and nobody else.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister suggested an addendum.

Mr. Garson: I have said that, and I repeat that I did not ask him, directly or indirectly, to change it in any way at all. My hon. friend refers to my having suggested that there be an addendum to the report. My statement was that I was hopeful there might be an addendum. I described in detail how Mr. Taylor, whose name I mentioned, undertook, as a friend and colleague of long standing, to ask Mr. McGregor if he would make an addendum. After considering the matter for about three days, if I remember rightly, Mr. McGregor said that he could not see his way clear to doing that. I want to emphasize again that I never suggested to Mr. Taylor that he do that. I have from beginning to end in that respect at least followed the course of complete propriety.

The next question was: In how many cases since 1946 have reports been forwarded by the commissioner to attorneys general of the provinces? I think I had better bring down a return on that.

The next question is: Have any of the attorneys general not prosecuted? I shall also bring down a return on that.

The next question is: Why did the minister not ask the commissioner for an extension of the period of time for publication?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not an extension—no.

Mr. Garson: For an order of extension. Because, Mr. Chairman, as I have just finished telling hon. members, I have asked Mr. McGregor and told Mr. McGregor nothing in connection with the report that would in any way interfere with his judgment. Under the circumstances, which I have already outlined to hon. members, of the introduction by him of very substantial changes in the report, if he wanted to ask that publication be held up for that purpose, that was one thing; but under these circumstances, dealing with a civil servant whose peculiar responsibility it was to exercise an independent judgment, asking by a minister is one thing and telling is another, and the line between the two may be pretty vague. The only way not to transgress that line is not to get on either side of it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not suggest you should have done that either, but the section provides for it.

Mr. Garson: Yes, I know. That is my answer.

The next question asked why, instead of an addendum, there was not a certificate. There is also a barb in that question. There is an implication in it that I asked for an addendum, and I never asked for one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just suggested one.

Mr. Garson: I did not suggest one, no. What I said was that I was hopeful that one would be available, because I knew of this difference between these high-ranking public servants. I knew there was sincere regret on both sides that they were not able to agree. I will confess this much, that it seemed to me a most reasonable request for one of them to make to the other, that there be an addendum which would at least make clear what the views of these other two men were, so that the whole thing would be one completed document. I repeat, with all the emphasis I can command, that I was not responsible even for suggesting that that be done. It was done entirely on Mr. Taylor's own initiative.

The next question is: Was Mr. Howe present when Mr. McGregor was present on any occasion? I think there was one occasion—perhaps my right hon. friend can confirm or correct this; we have had no chance to consult on it—on which the Minister of Trade and Commerce was present when we discussed the question of the position of an industry under the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When would that be?

Mr. Garson: I could not tell my hon. friend.

Mr. Howe: Why should you tell him?

Mr. Garson: But I can find out for him quite easily, because Mr. McGregor has a record of it.

Mr. Howe: Is the hon. member entitled to know the details of any discussion between ministers? I think my colleague is being far too indulgent.

Mr. Garson: I may be. That is quite true, but I think in a case of this kind it is much better to be indulgent.

Mr. Howe: Some of us want to go home before Christmas.

Mr. Garson: When the propriety of the government's actions is involved, I think the better course to follow is to take the members of the house into one's confidence and give these facts, unless there is some good reason for withholding them, as there is, for example, in the case of a legal opinion upon which a prosecution is to be based. That is an entirely different matter.

I think those are the thirteen questions. If possible I will bring down answers to the others tomorrow in the form of a return.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We want to get the bill through today.

Mr. Garson: I am sure the hon. member for Lake Centre will consent to acceptance of a return on these other matters without holding up the bill. I do not think he means that for a minute.

Mr. Coldwell: I should like to ask the minister how many copies of the report were printed and published, and what steps are taken to distribute those copies? Is the usual number being printed in connection with this report, and are they being distributed in the usual way?

Mr. Garson: I am afraid I cannot answer offhand as to the number of hundreds of copies. It is not very relevant anyhow, because we run off enough to supply all possible needs, and usually have quite a healthy surplus left over. They are issued to the daily and weekly press, and usually then to a selected mailing list. In the present case everything connected with it, press releases and so on, has been put before the house and issued to the press so that there would be complete publicity with regard to it. So far copies have not been sent out to the mailing list, for the reason that the government was not endorsing the report, and on that account was not sending it out in that way. We have plenty of copies, and Mr. McGregor has instructions that it be available to any person who wants a copy.

Mr. Coldwell: Does the minister not think that is inadvisable? Does it not lend colour to the idea that the government does not want the report to get into the hands of the usual mailing list? If I may say so, I think the government is not acting in its own best interests in doing this kind of thing.

Mr. Garson: I can tell my hon. friend that part of the mailing list consists of trade consuls and representatives all over the world where our export flour has to go, and we thought on balance it was just as well not to advertise a report in respect of which the government was in strong disagreement. We thought upon balance it was better not to do it.

Mr. Coldwell: But what about the domestic mailing list?

Mr. Garson: So far as distribution is concerned, it is available to any person who wants to get it.

Mr. Knowles: There are one or two things I should like to say. They relate to the section before us, namely, the giving of additional power to the attorney general, who is the same person as the Minister of Justice. They relate also to the whole question that the committee has been dealing with this morning. It seems to me the additional power—strength, if you will—that the Minister of Justice needs is the strength to stand his ground even when the Minister of Trade and Commerce holds a gun at his head.

Mr. Mitchell: That is not a fair thing to say.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute.

Mr. Howe: Let Hansard show the character of these people.

Mr. Knowles: If the Minister of Trade and Commerce wants to interrupt, I will answer him to his satisfaction before we are through. I confess, despite the fact that I was characterized in the press yesterday as one of the severest critics of the Minister of Justice on this matter, that I have sat here honestly trying to see what the minister has had in mind in declaring time and time again his honest feeling that he had acted honourably in the whole matter. I have known the minister for a long while, and I feel when he makes such a statement there must be something to it. I find it difficult, because there was the plain fact that the law had been broken, but in thinking over—

Mr. Ferrie: It was just stretched, that is all.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member can get into this if he wishes. On thinking over what the minister has said, and in reading carefully his two and a half hour speech the other day, I feel that the only point at which he came even close to what I would regard as a plausible defence was when he said that after he came back from Winnipeg last January and found the race already half run before he was out of the dressing room—in other words that the law already had been broken—he felt that he was in a jam. So what did he do? He says he consulted the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Garson: No, no.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am sorry, but I shall have to raise a point of order. I thought it was understood yesterday a little before one o'clock that we would deal with the clause under discussion. This morning I have been reading the first section of this amending bill, which states:

> The Attorney General of Canada may institute and conduct any prosecution or other proceedings under this act, or under section 498 or section 498A of the Criminal Code, and for such purposes he may exercise all the powers and functions conferred by the Criminal Code on the attorney general of a province.

If my understanding is correct, all we are asking the house to agree to is that the Attorney General of Canada be given the same powers as the attorneys general of the provinces to prosecute in these cases. That is the section which was called yesterday, and the section which was called this morning. I did not want to interrupt this discussion of the flour report, but it is so foreign to this amendment that I do not see how hon. members who themselves blame the Minister of Justice and the government for not following the law can repeatedly refuse to conform to standing order 58, which provides that in committee of the whole discussion must be relevant to the item or section under discussion, and nothing else.

We have had a week of discussion on this. The Minister of Justice, whom I sincerely admire, has been frank with the house in a difficult situation and has done his best to explain his position. We cannot continue with that discussion indefinitely if we are ever to decide whether the Attorney General of Canada is to have the same powers with respect to prosecution as the attorneys general of the provinces. If hon. members do not want the Attorney General of Canada to have power to prosecute, we remain in the present position, under which the attorney general of a province may or may not prosecute. In case a provincial attorney general should not wish to prosecute, we thought the Attorney General of Canada should have that power. Is there anything wrong with this amendment? Is that the principle we have been discussing for an hour and a half this morning? I do not believe it is. So, Mr. Chairman, I would insist that those of us who blame others for not observing the law should at least follow our own rules.

The Chairman: As I ruled yesterday, this bill does not amend the act in the matter of the publication of reports; this section amends the act in regard to prosecutions, and that is all we are dealing with at the moment. There is no amendment before the committee in connection with publication. Therefore, following the ruling I gave yesterday, I ask hon. members to observe standing order 58, which reads:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

It seems to me that sufficient latitude has been allowed, and that from now on this standing order should be strictly observed. I ask hon. members to confine themselves to the first section of the bill, which refers to prosecutions by the Attorney General of Canada, and nothing more.

Mr. Knowles: I would remind the Minister of Public Works that on November 22, when some questions were being asked about this same point, he is reported at page 2059 of Hansard as having said:

> Mr. Fournier (Hull): I understand that when the first section of a bill is called there is usually a general discussion, and I do not see any reason why on this bill we should depart from that principle.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Don't you think we have had that general discussion on the first section? We have been on it for three days.

The Chairman: I think the reference is to a general discussion of the sections of the bill, not to everything contained in the act which is being amended.

Mr. Knowles: Until I rose this morning I had not had a chance to speak on the first section in this so-called general discussion, at the committee stage.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is why we have had the general discussion.

Mr. Knowles: Surely if the general discussion is open to some hon. members, it is open to all, including the hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Ferrie: I would certainly tell you something if I had you in the right place.

Mr. Knowles: I submit that on this whole matter of the powers given to the attorney general, and in the light of the indulgence, if you will, that has been shown by the Minister of Justice in discussing this matter, I should be permitted to substantiate the statement I made a moment ago, that the difficulty in this whole matter is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce held a gun at the head of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am going to object to this trend being continued. I did say in the house the other day, in reply to the hon. member for Lethbridge, that when the first section of a bill is called there is usually a general discussion, though at that time I was speaking to another bill. However, I do not believe it is a general discussion on this bill that the hon. member wants. Look at the three amendments it contains; you will see that hon. members have not been discussing them at all. They have been discussing the flour report ever since the bill was introduced, in spite of the fact that there had been a previous discussion at the time the report was tabled. That discussion is being continued. Everybody knows what is on your mind; the public and press all know what it is. We have explained our position, but hon. members think they are going to get some political advantage out of continuing this discussion for three weeks.

I do not think that is the right way to discuss a bill. The government has brought down a specific bill, and from now on we are going to insist that the rules of this house be observed.

Mr. Knowles: I fully agree that the rules of this house should be observed.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Now, don't start reading the rules.

Mr. Knowles: I also insist that it be recognized, as Beauchesne says in citation 1—and surely it must be important if it is No. 1—that the main purpose of the rules of the house is to protect the rights of the minority against a tyrannical majority. I have not turned up that citation, but I know the spirit of it very well.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I would ask that the word "tyrannical" be expunged from the records of the house. It is not parliamentary.

The Chairman: There is no tyranny at all. I have great respect for Beauchesne, but I also respect the standing orders; and standing order 58 clearly provides that speeches in committee of the whole shall be strictly relevant to the section or item under discussion. That is the rule I have to apply.

Mr. Knowles: I was challenged in regard to a statement I made a moment ago with reference to tyranny. This is citation 1:

> The principles that lie at the basis of English parliamentary law, as Bourinot so aptly says, are: "to protect a minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority . . ."

I submit that when other hon. members have been permitted to take part in this general discussion, and when the Minister of Justice has shown his willingness to reply, for the government leaders now to stand up and say I must not be permitted to take part in the same general discussion, when I am talking about the kind of power that should be given the Minister of Justice to enable him to stand his ground, is using the rules in a completely wrong way.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Well, Mr. Chairman, I must repeat that we have no objection to discussion of any length on a bill. We have brought in this legislation; we think it is good, and we are ready to defend every section of it. But having gone into committee and having had such general discussion as usually takes places, without objection, we think the time has come when, even though we are in the majority, we must insist on the rules being obeyed. At almost every sitting we are reproached for being in the majority. Perhaps that is not entirely our fault; the people had something to say about it. In any event, the minority cannot continue a discussion which is out of order—

Mr. Knowles: I agree.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): —just for some political gain. We are going to insist that from now on the standing orders be observed.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Public Works had better watch out; there may be another point of order here. I agree that the minority must obey the rules just as well as the majority, but the majority cannot impute motives in what we are trying to do; that is against the rules. Our whole aim is to see to it that the laws of the land are obeyed, and I submit—

Mr. Garson: Including the rules of the house.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, and including section 27(5) of the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You see, Mr. Chairman, even on a point of order—

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

Mr. Knowles: When the Minister of Justice was told to withhold the report, he did so.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): —they cannot get away from the political angle.

Mr. Knowles: Political angle, my eye! The plain fact of the matter is that the Minister of Justice told this house that when he consulted the Minister of Trade and Commerce the right hon. gentleman told him that if the minister published that report, he would issue a contradictory statement at the same time.

The Chairman: Order. I have given my ruling, and I ask the hon. gentleman to confine his remarks to the section under discussion.

Mr. Knowles: Very well; there will be another opportunity.

Mr. Higgins: I believe I am in order if I ask a question. I dispute the necessity for the amendment at all, in view of the answer given by the minister to the hon. member for Vancouver East, as it appears on page 69 of Hansard for September 20. The question asked by the hon. member was:

> I should like to ask whether the Department of Justice has taken any action against the companies mentioned in the reports of the investigations under the Combines Investigation Act into the optical and bread business.

At that time the minister replied:

> The answer is that in both of these instances the preparation of the case and the handling of it are in the hands of counsel who I understand are making as swift progress as they can.

Is there any difference in this case? Are the counsel in those particular cases still proceeding without the necessity of having the act amended, or what is the position?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend could not have been following the course of the debate or he would not ask that question. It has been explained several times that when the Attorney General of Canada goes into a province to lay an information under the Combines Investigation Act—in that case the province of Alberta—he does so with the consent of the attorney general of the province and through his courtesy, and all the proceedings are taken in the name of the provincial attorney general. This leaves the whole matter in this position: if at any time it should be considered desirable to prosecute in any province, the attorney general of that province not only could decide not to prosecute, but could withhold his consent, and then the Attorney General of Canada could not prosecute.

Mr. Higgins: Are these other prosecutions continuing now?

Mr. Garson: You mean the bread prosecutions?

Mr. Higgins: Yes.

Mr. Garson: The practice in these matters is to take the report and the many volumes of transcript of evidence upon which the report is based and send them to counsel, and at the same time apply to the attorney general of the province for permission to prosecute. Then counsel goes through that mass of material—my hon. friend, being a lawyer, will realize what that involves—in order to form an opinion, first of all. As a rule that is a written opinion he gives us as to whether it would be worth while to prosecute at all. After he has given that opinion he proceeds to prepare his case, and when he thinks he has his case properly prepared, which requires weeks, he lays his information and proceeds. That is what is going forward in connection with the bakeries report.

Mr. Higgins: Has any information been laid yet?

Mr. Garson: It had not when I last made inquiries.

Mr. Higgins: It was in the hands of counsel on September 15?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Higgins: And no opinion has been given yet?

Mr. Garson: Yes, we have an opinion. That was one of those opinions the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was asking us to produce and table, which for obvious reasons we did not wish to do. Counsel has given an opinion, and among other things we are anxious to get this bill through before we lay an information.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In 1946, when the last amendments were before the house, the then minister of justice was kind enough to accept an amendment that I moved which did away with the necessity of either the Attorney General of Canada or the attorney general of a province laying an information, and restored the right to the individual. I am afraid this amendment will have the effect of nullifying the amendment of 1946, in that it will permit only the Attorney General of Canada, or the attorney general of the province in which the offence is allegedly committed, to take proceedings. Therefore I move this amendment:

Provided, however, that this shall not in any way be deemed to limit the right of any private individual to institute proceedings under this or any other act relating to combinations in restraint of trade.

Unless this is inserted I am afraid the amendment contained in section 1 will have the effect of denying the individual the right to take proceedings.

While I am on my feet I want to say something else. I am not one of those who have an eggshell susceptibility to statements made in the house, but I resent a statement made a short time ago by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I think his statements were uncalled for and unjustified. Because we are contending that the cabinet, above everything else, maintain the law, the Minister of Trade and Commerce used these words: "Let Hansard show the character of these people." I resent that, Mr. Chairman—a member rises and contends that no government is above the law, that the principle of Louis XIV—"I am above the law"—is dangerous, and—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I rise to a point of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): My point of order is the general rule that remarks should be confined to the section under discussion, according to standing order 58.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am directing my remarks to a statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I insist that my hon. friend cannot go beyond the section under discussion merely in order to express some personal sentiment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I say, Mr. Chairman, that it is wrong for any member of this house, much less the minister, who has shown an egocentric contempt of parliament, to suggest that the character of hon. members is in question because they insist that the ministry is not above the law.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt, but I should like the hon. member to confine his remarks to the amendment that is before the committee.

Mr. Garson: May I ask the mover of the amendment if he could indicate the section of the act to which it purports to refer?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Garson: I listened to my hon. friend's remarks as to what the stage of the law is now. While I may have misunderstood him, I certainly would disagree with him if I understood him correctly, because he was referring to an amendment that was made in 1946.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

Mr. Garson: I have here the Combines Investigation Act. It is an office consolidation, chapter 26, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended by—and then there are three statutes, one being chapter 44 of the statutes of 1946. I turn to section 31, subsection 2, of that office consolidation. It reads as follows:

> The Minister of Justice may instruct counsel to attend on behalf of the minister at all proceedings consequent on any information being laid for an offence under this act.

It provides only for the instruction of counsel. In the amendment now before the committee, we are providing, in substitution for subsection 2, section 1, which reads as follows:

> 1. Subsection two of section thirty-one of the Combines Investigation Act, chapter twenty-six of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, as enacted by section ten of chapter forty-four of the statutes of 1946, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:
> "(2) The Attorney General of Canada may institute and conduct any prosecution or other proceedings under this act, or under section four hundred and ninety-eight or section four hundred and ninety-eight A of the Criminal Code, and for such purposes he may exercise all the powers and functions conferred by the Criminal Code on the attorney general of a province.

There is not a syllable in our amendment which in any way transgresses the rights of private people to do anything under the sun that my hon. friend is talking about. It seems to me that his amendment is irrelevant, and that the point which he has made is not valid.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I changed my point of view after listening to my hon. friend. I was under the impression that the amendment introduced by the minister would in fact have the result of nullifying the amendments that were accepted by the present Prime Minister, as minister of justice, on July 3, 1946. What I am trying to do is to make the act workable. I am inclined to agree that the Minister of Justice has made out a case, and I certainly do not want on the statute book amendments that are ineffective. With the leave of my seconder, I withdraw my amendment, because my hon. friend's argument is convincing.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Lake Centre asks leave of the committee to withdraw his amendment. Is leave granted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Diefenbaker) withdrawn.

Mr. Argue: As I understood the minister's reply to the hon. member for St. John's East, the preparation of the case for prosecution—if that is the right terminology—of the bread baking industry is still going on. Will the minister tell me how he can undertake the prosecution of the bread combine when that industry during the war must also have been under the control of the wartime prices and trade board? Furthermore, as I read the reports in that instance in relation to the bread combine, the last offence, if there was one, took place more than two years ago, on September 15, 1947. Does the minister really believe that he could get a conviction at this time?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend's first question was about the bread baking industry. I want to be sure I get it completely. What was his first question?

Mr. Argue: Was the bread industry under the wartime prices and trade board throughout the wartime period, and therefore could not be prosecuted for anything that it did during that period, the same as the flour milling industry?

Mr. Garson: The test is not whether an industry is merely under the wartime prices and trade board regulations. The test is whether the regulations which are applicable to the industry call upon it to do things which might otherwise be offences under the Combines Investigation Act. The difference between the two cases, as I am advised by members of the wartime prices and trade board—and I consulted Mr. Gordon in this connection—is that in the case of the flour report there was that type of order—that is, the subsidy and profit-control arrangement; whereas in the case of the bread report, there was not. The prosecutions therefore can, we think, be successfully taken. We are so advised by Alberta counsel whom we consulted in the case of the bread report. In the case of the flour report, however, apart altogether from the propriety of prosecuting people for doing the things that you direct them to do under one government department, there is grave question whether it would be possible to make out a case at law.

In this connection I think I should point out something that has a good deal to do with the motives which have been imputed to the government, because we have been accused of being too charitable towards certain interests. I would point out to the hon. member for Assiniboia that several of these bakery companies whom we shall be prosecuting are partly or wholly owned by milling companies or are subsidiaries of milling companies.

Mr. Argue: I know that.

Mr. Garson: In the bakery cases, therefore, we shall in some respects be prosecuting the same people that we refrained from prosecuting in the flour case. The difference between the two cases is that in the flour case the industry was doing what the wartime prices and trade board told it to do when it is alleged that it was guilty of an offence under the Combines Investigation Act.

The second point that my hon. friend referred to has been submitted to counsel in Alberta, and he assures us that it is proper to proceed. We are taking his advice, and we are proceeding.

Mr. Argue: But it is more than two years since the last offence, is it not?

Mr. Garson: Perhaps my hon. friend was not in the house when I answered that question the other day; it was raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre. The case referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre was one in which the court decided that on the evidence there was such a continuity of offence that it was not necessary for them to decide whether or not the two-year limitation applied.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have one observation to make on the reply given by the minister, and that is that the time is getting close to the end of the two-year period.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is long past.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): As I read the report of the bread baking industry, the last offence occurred in January or in February of 1948. I should like to have an assurance—the minister was going to make it, but he did not complete his answer—that they are going to prosecute.

Mr. Garson: The best assurance I can give is this: If hon. members will just get busy and put this bill through, we will prosecute right away.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Corporations to be tried without a jury.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, this is a most important section.

Mr. Whiteside: Here we go again—a lawyer's battle.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is not a lawyer's battle. The jury system has been the protector of the rights of the people all through the years. The greatest speeches that have ever been delivered on our heritage of freedom have been delivered on the maintenance of the jury system.

Mr. Garson: Not on behalf of corporations under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is scarcely worthy of the minister. Great corporations and individuals are entitled to the same rights under law.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Corporations cannot go to jail.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, they cannot go to jail, but that does not enter into the question whether or not they should be entitled to a jury. As a matter of fact if I were counsel for the defence in a combines case I should be very much inclined to hope that it was not before a jury. That has been the experience. I am going to quote a few references in a moment, because if you follow the combines cases you will find that counsel for the accused usually try to get away from a jury. One of the outstanding instances—and I do not want to refer to the case unless somebody insists—occurred in 1932. In 1932 one of the greatest combines cases ever fought in this country was tried. There were eighteen counsel for the defence, and about twenty more sitting behind them who could not practice before the bar in Canada. If there was one thing more than another that they wanted, it was to have a trial without a jury.

Some will say to me, as the minister did the other day in his general summary, that the proceedings in these cases take quite a while. If the combine has been detrimental to the public interest, the possibility of the case taking a few more days is scarcely an answer to the question whether or not juries should be done away with in combines cases.

A former attorney general of the United States, now a member of the supreme court of that country, tried on more than one occasion while he was attorney general to depart, ff it was possible to do so, from the constitutional provisions of the United States and to provide for trial before a judge without a jury. In the two minutes at my disposal before one o'clock I cannot quote him, but I shall do so after we resume.

In 1946 Mr. Ilsley said that the greatest deterrent was publicity. He advocated publication of the report, and said that the people as a whole know whether or not their rights are being interfered with. The attitude towards combines changes with the years. It becomes a matter of judicial interpretation. What was an offence thirty years ago may not, in the opinion of a judge, be an offence today. But a jury has that abiding sense of what public opinion is. I feel that taking away the jury in the trials of combines, and the like, is in fact removing one of the greatest and most positive sanctions in the preservation of law.

I cannot conceive that the excuse that it takes a little longer, that it is difficult for juries to understand—this was implied in words of the Minister of Justice—the complexity of some documents, is a good one for the departure from the jury system which I believe is peculiarly fitted to meet the demands of public opinion. Two years ago Mr. Ilsley said that this was the reason for publicity. He said: Give the people the story as to what the commissioner has found. Let them know. Let public opinion be aroused. Let it be created. Let the people realize what is taking place. I was one who took the stand, and was criticized for having done so, that we should not publish the report before the trial because it would interfere with the fairness of the trial. That was brushed aside. The point he made was this: public opinion must be created. Only by public opinion can laws such as the combines laws be maintained.

A judge, with all his learning, still does not have the infallibility that is created by public opinion. Twelve men on a jury trying a matter such as this know what fairness is and what exploitation is, as no judge, removed as he must be by his position from public opinion, can ever know. It is not just a question of law. The judge will instruct the jury on the law. If ever you want to see to it that the law is maintained and that public opinion enters into the maintenance of law, it is in the law of combines.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): May I ask a question? Suppose the verdict of the jury is not in accordance with the law; what will happen?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is exactly where the appeal court comes in.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): In the appeal court you take the case out of the hands of the jury and put it back in the hands of the judge.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You take it to the appeal court on the law. If the law is such that there was no case to go to the jury, the judge would have withdrawn it or directed a verdict of not guilty. But in the elaboration of the facts and the conclusion based on the facts, public opinion must manifest itself before it is tried by jury.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I had just about finished my remarks on this section. The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont had asked me what the situation would be if the facts under law constituted no offence. In that event the judge would direct the jury to bring in a directed verdict of not guilty, because the facts did not constitute an offence.

Mr. Garson: The same as in the dental case.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): That is not really the answer the hon. member gave. If my memory serves me correctly, the hon. member told me that there would be an appeal.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I said, in the event of a mistake having been made.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): The judge is not the master of the verdict; it is the jury.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In the event that a mistake in law was made by the judge, then there could be an appeal. During the noon hour I looked up a famous direction that was given by Lord Bacon to a barrister whom he was inaugurating as a judge. He said:

> That you be a light to jurors to open their eyes and not a guide to lead them by their noses.

That saying of nearly four hundred years ago is a good summary of the functions of a judge and jury.

Mr. MacInnis: Which part does my hon. friend play when he is addressing a jury?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not having occupied the position of judge and having little hope of ever being in that position, I find the question too hypothetical to answer. I had mentioned before lunch that the jury is indeed the conscience of the people in their attitude toward and interpretation in the light of the law of social problems. I mentioned what Mr. Ilsley had said in 1948 and I should like to quote that because it summarizes his view as to the need of publicity in connection with a report under section 27 (5). As reported on page 4919 of Hansard of June 8, 1948, Mr. Ilsley said:

> I submit that it is necessary that there be publicity. At least, it is my contention or submission that there should be publicity. This offence is not at all like an offence that speaks for itself. It is all a mystery. The public has no way of knowing whether there is any combine or not. It is not like theft, bank robbery or any of those other overt or open acts where it is clear that there has been an offence. Here there is just a dark surmise and that is all. If the public is to know anything at all about this, it must be explained to them by the report of somebody who has made an investigation. If you have no provision that that report is to be made public,—

I accentuate these words:

> —there is no possibility of an opportunity for public opinion to operate on governments, attorneys general or ministers of justice. There is no possibility of that; and you have to make a strong assumption that public officials will be fully alive to their responsibilities.

But after all, there is not much difference between the publication of a report by the commissioner and a preliminary inquiry into a criminal action. The commissioner has no judicial power; that is, he cannot himself determine the guilt of the accused. All he can do is express an opinion. The question is how far he should go in expressing an opinion, and whether he should not confine himself fairly well to facts.

I shall now summarize my submission in connection with this section. As I understand the Minister of Justice, one reason he advanced for not having juries in combine cases against companies is the complexity of the evidence, consisting as it must in considerable part of voluminous documents, memoranda and the like. Second, it would require a great deal of time for counsel who would have to read the documents. The minister cited the dental case as an example. He said there were 1,800 documents put in and that it took a long time to read them, and the whole case took some three weeks at the outside.

Mr. Garson: And the crown lost the case.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, but the jury never got a chance, because no facts were placed before them upon which they could convict. I submit that expediency or shortening the period of trial should not weigh in the scales against having a jury.

Another argument was that corporations and not natural persons would be affected. A corporation is a natural person. When corporations are charged with conspiracy under British law or with an offence corresponding with that in section 498 of the Criminal Code, they have an inherent right to trial by jury. In the United States combines must be tried by jury because of the particular provisions of their constitution.

My first point is that no justification or excuse has been shown to abolish the time-honoured body whose responsibility is to determine the evidence. Throughout the years juries have upheld progress. The jury constitutes the public conscience. The jurors represent the community sense of justice. History and experience show that they have by their verdicts protected the individual against unjust and unfair laws. In other words, they have been the upholders of the collective conscience of the community.

Where is there a better type of case for a jury to try than a combines case? The attitude of the law changes over the years. The public conscience changes, and it has changed in regard to combines. There are two different views on the subject. There is the United States view that bigness of itself is an offence. The American attitude is that the size of a business determines in large degree whether or not it is a combine detrimental to the public. The British concept is that bigness of itself is insufficient to found a conviction, and that the detrimental effect on the community must be taken into consideration and proven.

The experience of the effects of big business has shown that a major reason why we have so high a standard of living is the mass production which has resulted from combinations in business that have been not detrimental to the public but actually beneficial to progress. The British concept is that there is detriment in agreements designed to destroy competition, and having destroyed competition they are detrimental to the public interest, in particular to the producer or the consumer. A reading of the authorities in the United States reveals a long record of trust-busting. Since the days of Theodore Roosevelt, there has been a changing attitude apparent in the United States Supreme Court decisions. That trend has finally arrived at a point where, under the recent anti-trust acts, a large corporation is, by reason of size, presumed to be dangerous to the public interest.

In Canada, following as we do the British attitude and concept, the whole basis of prosecution is dependent on proof by the prosetion that what has been done will detrimentally affect the public interest, or is likely to do so. I believe that twelve good men and true, representing as they necessarily must different views, occupations, backgrounds and traditions, when operating in unison on a jury, will represent the public attitude more correctly in regard to alleged detrimental acts charged against a defendant than a judge without a jury. In making that statement no criticism is intended of any judge, or of the judiciary generally. In his position a judge is detached and above the influence of public opinion in the judgments that he renders. Holding that high and exalted position, he must necessarily be. The twelve jurymen are men of the world and men of the community. They know the public interest. I believe this question should be seriously considered before doing away with trial by jury in combines cases in so far as corporations are concerned. In my opinion, doing away with a jury is removing the effective deterrent of public opinion, upon the enforcement of which this legislation is dependent.

Mr. Carroll: I should like to ask the Minister of Justice what judges will try these cases as a result of the amendment? Will they be tried by judges of the district courts in the eastern and western provinces, and in the province of Quebec by judges who deal with speedy trials?

Mr. Garson: No. I apprehend that trials of these offences will continue to be held only before a superior court judge on indictment and trials of corporations, following the passage of this section.

Mr. Carroll: I am not objecting to the amendment as such, but I think the time has arrived in Canada when the Department of Justice and the departments of the attorneys general of the various provinces should move with extreme caution in doing away with the time-honoured system of jury trials. I did not have the privilege of hearing the opening remarks of the Minister of Justice on this section, but in the various provinces there is a system under our civil procedure whereby a judge can, on application, withdraw a case from a jury before trial. It is done because of the facts of the case. If they deal with questions of technique, questions of science, questions of immense calculations of figures, and so on, then if the judge is satisfied to that effect he can withdraw such a case from a jury and try it himself. In many cases the judge will then send for an assessor, or some official of that kind, to assess and calculate, where it is a matter of figures, so that the judge may come to a better conclusion upon such questions.

I have not much doubt that companies acting in restraint of trade would rather not have juries because usually juries are looked upon as being against big interests. On behalf of juries I want to say that I defended criminals in my own province and in one of the western provinces. I prosecuted for the attorney general's department for a good many years, and I was a member of the judiciary where I tried many criminal and civil cases. Only in one instance did it come to my attention that a jury did not arrive at a result which I considered satisfactory in the interests of justice and of everyone concerned. It was the first criminal case I ever defended in the province of Nova Scotia. The man was acquitted and he should have been convicted. He was acquitted, not because of any great intellectual address I made to the jury, or because of any great maxims of law that I presented to the judge and jury. After the trial the foreman told me the reason was that I was a newcomer in the community and not a bad sort of fellow and he said the jury thought they would give us a chance. Nevertheless, I am not convinced that is any reason for taking away from juries the right to try criminal offences.

I am not objecting to the adoption of this amendment. All I am suggesting is that the justice department and the various provincial departments go very slow in doing away with the time-honoured right of citizens of this country, whether they be individuals or combinations of citizens in the form of companies, of being tried by a jury on any criminal charge. I am not sure whether or not it is in the Criminal Code, but in the province of Nova Scotia we have a provision under which the attorney general may request the judge in a particular case to send that case back to the district court for trial. Or perhaps it is the other way around and the attorney general has the right to intervene in order to prevent a person from going to trial before the district court.

At the moment we are dealing with a corporate entity, not an individual. I should think this is the sort of legislation that would be asked for by the big corporations, because generally speaking juries have the reputation of being against corporations. As far as my own province is concerned, I think the people there know pretty well where I stand in regard to combines in restraint of trade and particularly cartels. I am not speaking to this amendment because I think it will be unfair to any particular company that may be charged; but it seems to me that if a company is charged with a crime that flows from the ten commandments of God or from the natural law, it would have an absolute right to the privilege enjoyed by any individual in this country, of having the matter disposed of by a jury. They should not try to get away from that position; they should not ask for any special legislation. I am not suggesting that this amendment has resulted from anything said by any company or corporation in this country that may have been or in future may be charged under this section of the act. I would rather suspect that this has been suggested by the gentleman who has been prosecuting these cases, who has been finding it difficult to get juries to give judgments against those accused.

I should rather think that a corporation or combination of corporations charged under this act would have the right to go to a district court judge and elect speedy trial. If that is the case I do not see why it is necessary to bring in this amendment. I am not so sure on that point; it may be that only persons who are held in jail have that privilege, but I do know that in some cases, at least, companies charged with offences, though not under this legislation, have exercised that option and gone before a judge.

The Minister of Justice has given as the reason for this amendment the fact that in these prosecutions so many intricate matters have to be dealt with that it is better to proceed without a jury. Even so, I believe the department should give consideration to permitting the judge presiding over a trial of this kind the privilege of exercising the prerogative which judges now possess in civil cases, that of taking the case away from the jury and trying it themselves if that course seems indicated. I have no doubt in the world that the present judges throughout this country—I am not referring to those who have been on the bench in the past—would exercise the very greatest care and caution to see that justice was done in these matters.

I had intended to say a word on the next amendment, but perhaps I had better wait until it is called.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, it is a bold thing for one who is not a lawyer to step into a debate that has been carried on by lawyers. As I have confessed to this house in times past, I am only a kind of reformed lawyer, but I should like to say just a word on this because I would hope that even at this late stage it might be possible to persuade the minister to have regard to what has been said by the last two speakers. It may be that juries sometimes make mistakes, but after all the electorate sometimes makes mistakes, too; and even those who feel that the electorate made a mistake do not suggest that the law should be changed to deprive it of its functions.

Speaking seriously, however, it seems to me important not only that the decision in any prosecution should be right, but that the public should accept it as right. In my opinion, there is unfortunately more danger of the public misunderstanding and not accepting a verdict when it is given by only one man who, as has been said already, may appear to the public to be somewhat remote from them, than if the decision were given by a jury. But the real reason I rose was not to express my own view but to present a bit of evidence from a man with vast experience with juries, and this is the last thing I want to say. I remember years ago reading a statement of the late Lord Birkenhead, who you will remember was first of all a great lawyer and finally lord chancellor. As I recall it he said that after trying hundreds of jury cases he thought the juries had been right in every case but three, and that in two of those three cases where he originally thought they had been wrong, subsequent knowledge and subsequent reflection had made him believe them to be right.

That is the view of a man who I suppose would have as much right to express an opinion on juries as any man in our generation. That is extraordinary praise, it seems to me, for this institution which you might say has become part of the pattern of our life. As the last speaker said, it seems to me a pity if, without the greatest and most profound consideration and even hesitation, this amendment should take away this time-honoured and effective institution.

Mr. Garson: I think perhaps the remarks that have been made require a short reply. I am in the rather paradoxical position of agreeing with all the reasons that the preceding speakers have advanced but differing completely from the conclusions they have reached. The reason I differ, I think, is that as I understood their remarks they mainly had to do with the ordinary run of jury cases in which the liberty of the subject is involved. In this case, so far as the withdrawal of the right to trial by jury is concerned, I believe every member of the house is agreed that there would be an overwhelming disposition to maintain trial by jury, which has been granted to people of British descent by Magna Carta and the Bill of Rights of 1689. That is not what we are really concerned with, however, in the Combines Investigation Act. The trying of a corporation by jury is not a time-honoured process by any means; it is a development that has taken place within the last one hundred years.

It requires but a slight amount of common sense to realize that a corporation cannot be tried by a jury of its peers. You cannot impanel a jury of twelve corporations to try a corporation. The real necessity for trying cases under the Combines Investigation Act by a judge alone, arises out of the consideration that was mentioned by the member for Inverness-Richmond when he said there is power now, in cases involving specialized knowledge, to withdraw the case from the jury and turn it over to an assessor or some officer of the crown.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that not only in civil cases?

Mr. Garson: Yes, but the principle is the same. In any case, this is a statutory crime with which we are dealing, really a sort of economic offence.

The real point in connection with these charges under the Combines Investigation Act is that there may be a dozen companies indicted, and the charges may cover a multitude of facts extending over a long period of years. In studying the evidence that is presented, corporate interrelationships of an intricate nature are usually involved, with exhibits running into the hundreds. Then the length of time which a trial takes is considerable. In the Imperial Tobacco case in Alberta the trial lasted for 56 days. When you impanel a jury of busy people, and in my experience jurymen are always busy and are reluctant to be impanelled at all, and then ask them to absent themselves from business for 11 or 12 weeks in order to try the case, you can realize what a burden it imposes on the jury, and that you are not likely to maximize the disposition of the jury to dispense justice by insisting that the jury stay together for that length of time. It is due to these considerations that, not the large corporation, not the boards of trade, as the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond said, but those who are charged with the administration of this act have asked that the option which is now enjoyed by corporations of being tried with or without a jury be withdrawn.

As I did on a former occasion, I desire to emphasize that there is not the slightest suggestion that that option should be withdrawn from any individual accused.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: On division.

Section agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall section 3 carry?

Mr. Drew: On division.

Section agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Mr. Coldwell: Before the title carries, Mr. Speaker, I suggest there are two or three respects in which this act is still very weak, and I should like to call the attention of the house to a few particulars in which we think the act needs strengthening. In order to place my views before the house I shall move an amendment, which I believe it is competent to do before the title carries. In order that I may place the amendment before the Chair, I shall read it and then comment upon it. Of necessity, it is rather long but that cannot be avoided.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis):

That the bill be amended by adding thereto a new section 4, as follows:

4. The said act is further amended by adding the following section immediately after section 31 thereof:

31A. (1) Whenever, from or as a result of an investigation under the provisions of this act, or from or as a result of a judgment of the supreme court or exchequer court of Canada or of any superior court, or circuit, district or county court in Canada, it appears to the satisfaction of the governor in council that a combine exists, the governor in council may issue and cause to be served on any person, an order requiring him to cease or desist from such acts or practices actually proved against him and which in whole or in part constitute the operations of a combine or the processes of the formation of such, and to cease and desist as well from any other act or practice in pursuance of the operations of such combine or the formation thereof, to the extent to which the governor in council shall deem it reasonable or necessary to prohibit.

(2) Any person whom the governor in council shall have so ordered to cease or desist from any act or practice in pursuance of the operations of a combine or the formation thereof, and who thereafter shall omit or refuse to desist from such act or practice, shall be guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars and costs for each day after the expiration of ten days or such further extension of time as in the opinion of the governor in council may be reasonable or necessary, from the date of the service upon such person of the order, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years; and any director or officer of a company or corporation who shall assent to or acquiesce in such omission or refusal by his company or corporation shall be guilty of such offence personally, and cumulatively with his company or corporation and with his co-directors or associate officers.

While it has been placed in legal form, which I am advised is the proper form in which the amendment should be placed, it has a very simple meaning. It means that the governor in council may call upon any corporation or any individual against whom proof exists that they have formed a combination to restrict competition, or to obtain a common price level, or have done other acts which bring them within the scope of the Combines Investigation Act, to cease or desist even before the case goes before the law courts. I understand that such a provision was in the original act, and it is necessary that the government should have this power today. I believe it is in the public interest that an amendment of this sort should be placed in the act. I believe I am within my rights in moving such an amendment now.

Although couched in legal phraseology, and in rather more lengthy terms than I like placing before the house, the meaning of the amendment is quite clear. It is that the governor general shall have the power under this act to call upon corporations, individuals or groups who may be involved in a price-fixing or other combination, to cease and desist from acting as a combination, the one with the other.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is a proper amendment to move at this time. The act is under our consideration, and apparently we are all in favour of reinforcing it in every particular in which it can be strengthened. Under the rules of this house and the citations in our books of rules and order, I think it is quite in order to move this amendment at this time; and I therefore move it.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt the minister, Mr. Chairman, but I would point out that section 3 has not yet been passed.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, yes.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Drew: No. The debate was on section 2 in regard to juries. There has been no discussion on section 3 and it has not been passed.

An hon. Member: It was carried.

The Chairman: It was called and carried.

Mr. Drew: By mistake, Mr. Chairman, you may have called section 3, following the debate on section 2; but if so, section 2 was not carried.

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes.

Mr. Drew: Whether hon. members like the length of the debate or not, let us at any rate keep the debate in some sort of order. The debate was clearly upon section 2 in regard to the abolition of the right to jury trial. That was the discussion right up to the point that the motion was put. If section 3 was called, then it was an error. But there has been no discussion on section 3 at all, and it is an exceedingly important section.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I was following the procedure most attentively, Mr. Chairman, and after section 2 carried I heard the chairman call section 3. Nobody stood up. Section 3 carried. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman called the title and said: Shall the title carry? At that moment the leader of the C.C.F. stood up and said: Before the title carries, I should like to move an amendment.

Mr. Coldwell: That is right.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I think I am stating the facts as they are.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Garson: One is rather reluctant, Mr. Chairman, to embark upon a discussion of a motion of this sort which apparently has had a great deal of thought upon the part of the hon. gentleman who moved it, especially without any advance notice of its contents and without any opportunity of preparing to meet it. But I would suggest, from the casual reading of this amendment that I have had the opportunity to do, that it is inadvisable for us to pass it. What is more, I am seriously of the opinion that it is ultra vires of this parliament to pass. The cease and desist order which my hon. friend has in mind is, as I understand it, a prominent feature of the United States method of dealing with combines and monopolies. But the method which is used in that country is conceived on quite a different basis from the basis of our act. Apart altogether from any question as to whether it is within the power of this parliament to enact—and speaking offhand as I must—it would seem to me that our act would have to be examined in an over-all way in order to accommodate the act as a whole for the insertion into it of this remedy; because a remedy such as this that is granted by any statute does not stand out naked and stark by itself; it is usually associated with a number of other sections which give it support and meaning. On that ground, I think it would be highly inadvisable for this committee to pass this present amendment, on grounds of substance.

But apart from that, when my hon. friend says that this was in the original act, I am wondering if he has not in mind the Board of Commerce Act, 1919, and that this section he is here advocating was a section of that Board of Commerce Act, which, it is true, was enacted as a supplement to our Combines Investigation Act; but it was a supplement with a most unhappy history. The Board of Commerce Act, having been passed by this parliament, was taken to the privy council and was there declared ultra vires. One must bear in mind the fact that our own Combines Investigation Act, upon being taken to the privy council, was debated at great length by competent lawyers; one of them told me that so far as he could judge two of the five judges of the privy council who heard the case seemed in favour of one side, and two seemed in favour of another, while the fifth did not commit himself at all. After a long period of reservation of judgment, the judgment came down upholding the validity of the Combines Investigation Act.

If we were to introduce into this bill any provision such as the one my hon. friend has moved and which is, at the very least, much similar to that of the Board of Commerce Act, I apprehend that it would not only be ultra vires of this parliament to deal with the section that my hon. friend has moved, but that if we were to attach it to the Combines Investigation Act, we would run grave danger of having the whole Combines Investigation Act declared ultra vires. For these reasons I think the committee should not entertain the motion.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say this to the minister. I believe this is an exceedingly important provision and that, if it were used, it would have a salutary effect on the matter of combines and understandings of that description. I should like to see something of this sort written into the act. I am aware of what the minister has just said. My thought was this. In connection with this particular type of legislation, it may be quite within the powers of this parliament to adopt such a provision in our act but it might have to be decided further in the courts.

It is useless to press the motion when the minister takes the attitude that he has just taken. It has been intimated that perhaps this act will be given some further consideration in the not far distant future. What I suggest to the minister is that I would be glad to withdraw the amendment if I had his assurance that in any future consideration of the Combines Investigation Act something of this sort might be considered. Under these circumstances I would refrain from pressing the amendment.

Mr. Garson: I have not the slightest hesitation in giving my hon. friend that assurance, because if we have a re-examination of the act we shall be disposed to consider not only this suggestion but any other good suggestions that come from any place.

Mr. Coldwell: Then have I permission of the committee to withdraw the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister permit a question arising out of the last answer he gave?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I read from "Buchanan's Bulletin", edited by Mr. J. F. Flaherty. It deals generally with the situation and says that next year the government intends to introduce further amendments to curb the commissioner's powers to initiate inquiries and to do away with publication of findings of the commissioner which condemn accused firms before they have been tried in open court with opportunity to rebut, and to provide for the official approval of certain price agreements between competing businesses which do not appear to operate against public interest. In the course of his long explanation the minister said that there were some ten drafts of suggested amendments that had come before him since January last when he became minister. I ask the minister whether or not this report is correct. Two financial papers have suggested that it is the intention to make these changes next session.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I rather resent being placed under the necessity of contradicting every unauthorized report that some reporter or journalist sees fit to put in public print. But in order to allay any doubt upon the matter I do not think I can do anything better than repeat what I said at another stage of this bill, namely, that the present amendments before the house constitute the government's policy and its whole policy with regard to the amendments.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I feel I have as much right as any hon. member to address the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am not going to be shouted down by anybody.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): We cheer you.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The Minister of Justice has just said that this bill represents the policy of the government. That is the first statement of government policy that we have had in this discussion.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend is quite wrong. If he does not want to attend the committee or listen to the debates, and if he has any doubt about it, he can go back and read Hansard and find out.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I feel that the minister must be thinking of someone else, because I have spent more time in this chamber than most hon. members, particularly those on his own side of the house.

An hon. Member: Reading a newspaper.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a point of order, on the title of the bill I do not think we should take a roll call of the attendance in the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I feel that as a member representing Newfoundland I have as much right—

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): On division.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): —to speak here as any other hon. member. The minister of Public Works was cited today. He cited the citation himself and he went back on his own interpretation of the orders of this house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I rise on a point of privilege.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, —

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I will not sit down for you.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the hon. member was in the house when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and myself had the amicable debate. I did not withdraw anything that I had said on a former occasion. I repeated it, and agreed that a general debate is in order on the first section; but I would not agree to a general debate on the title. We have spent a long time carrying the different sections of the bill. Every operative section of the bill has been carried, and we are now on the title. I do not think we should renew the general debate on the title.

Mr. Coldwell: May I rise to a point of order? We are not on the title. We are between the last clause and the title.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Coldwell: According to the rules of the house, before the title is called or dealt with I have the right to move an amendment. I moved an amendment. I also have the right to ask the committee, in view of what the minister said, for leave to withdraw the amendment. I have not yet heard that I have leave to withdraw the amendment. I should like to get that settled because I want to move another amendment before the title is carried.

The Deputy Chairman: May I intervene? I distinctly understood the chairman to say: "Has the hon. member leave to withdraw his amendment?" I understood some hon. members to say: "Agreed".

Mr. Coldwell: I did not hear that.

The Deputy Chairman: Then the chairman went further and said: "Shall the title carry?" At this point the hon. member for St. John's West rose and the discussion we are now having took place on the title.

Mr. Coldwell: No.

The Deputy Chairman: It seems to me that it is my duty now to rule whether or not the point of order raised by the Minister of Public Works is a correct one. I do not think the discussion entered upon by the hon. member for St. John's West can be allowed on the title.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I say a word on that?

Mr. Coldwell: May I pursue the point of order for the moment? I certainly did not hear the chairman ask the committee whether the amendment I moved might be withdrawn.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: I did not hear the word "agreed". When a question is put to the committee it should be put in a tone of voice that we can hear, and the ruling of the Chair should be so made that we can hear it; because, as I say, I was waiting to move another short amendment. I should like to know, Mr. Chairman, whether it is agreed that my amendment is withdrawn.

The Deputy Chairman: May I remind the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, it sometimes happens that hon. members do not hear exactly what goes on. A while ago, while the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was perfectly clear on procedure, the leader of the opposition thought that we were still on clause 2; whereas it had been carried. It just so happens that this time it is the leader of the C.C.F. party who thinks that we are still between the last clause and the title. In this instance the committee must take the word of the chairman. Other hon. members around me heard, as I did, the chairman who preceded me in the chair say this: "Has the hon. member leave to withdraw his amendment?" I heard some hon. members say, "Agreed", and then the chairman said: "Shall the title carry?" It was at that moment that the hon. member for St. John's West rose and that is where we are now.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I rise again, since, having been interrupted, I have not said all that I intended to say. I should like to compliment the Minister of Justice upon his patience up to this point, but he seemed to lose it a moment ago when I rose to speak.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That seemed to be the case when I made the observation that it was the first time I had heard mention of government policy in regard to this matter. It was certainiy the first time I heard him use the expression.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): How many chairmen have we?

The Deputy Chairman: I think some latitude has been allowed to other hon. members and I understand that the hon. member for St. John's West will be brief.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I was going to ask the minister whether he was aware that Mr. McGregor had said that this act should grant power to a court to grant an injunction. That would be in line with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I do not remember where I read that, but I think it was in the proceedings of the House of Commons committee on prices.

Title agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I listened intently to what was happening in the chamber because I had another short amendment that I intended to move. If the acoustics of this chamber are such that the chairman was able to hear a few hon. members say "Agreed" when I could not hear it, then I do not think an hon. member should be prevented from exercising his rights. If that is so, it is a most unfortunate thing. It will simply mean that I shall have to move my amendment on the third reading which will mean prolonging the debate. It would have saved a good deal of time if the question could have been decided now. I repeat that I listened intently and was ready to stand at the proper moment, and I certainly did not hear anything. I certainly do not think we should give third reading today to this bill.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I readily understand the situation in which the hon. gentleman finds himself. Apparently he had an amendment which had been prepared in advance and which he intended to move after his first amendment. I believe the committee would give unanimous consent to allowing him to move that amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar the unanimous consent of the committee to move an amendment at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief because I realize we have had an extended debate on this bill and I wish to thank the house for its courtesy. I should like to move:

That the bill be amended by adding thereto a new section 4, as follows:

"4. Subsection one of section two of the said act is amended by inserting after the word 'commodity' in line two thereof, the words 'or to any service,' and by adding at the end of paragraph (c) thereof the words 'a common or fixed charge for a service or'."

I think there is a weakness in this act because there are certain services of which we have knowledge which cannot be dealt with at the present time. For example, I have seen a radio broadcasting price list covering certain services to be rendered by private stations from one end of this country to the other and quoting exactly the same prices for exactly the same services. I have photographic copies of such lists which contain instructions that the prices listed are to be charged for certain services. If the radio committee had met at this session I intended to bring copies of the price lists issued by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters to the attention of that committee. These are comprehensive lists of charges which the members of the association must observe. That is a combination in restraint of competition in connection with radio broadcasting fees, yet nothing can be done about it under this act.

I should like to give just one more example. The hon. member for Kamloops has raised the question of crime comics. I do not know whether a news vendor's activities would be considered as a service, but I have been reliably informed that these news vendors enter into agreements with agencies to accept an assortment of publications, such assortment containing such things as crime comics. The other day I spoke to a news vendor who is opposed to crime comics and asked her why she had them on her shelves. She told me that she could not help it because she had to take the assortment. Whether that can be regarded as a service or a commodity I am not sure and I do not propose to enter into a legal argument with the Minister of Justice or anybody else regarding that point.

There are other activities which fall into the category of services that are not covered by this act, but I do not intend to deal with them at the moment. I bring this matter to the attention of the minister now by moving this amendment.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the present amendment is as objectionable as the first one moved by my hon. friend, but I think that is the only praise with which I can faintly damn it. The amendments introduced this year come from a combines investigation commissioner of many years' standing. If there had been any problem of the nature visualized by my hon. friend in his present amendment I think it is more than likely it would have been covered by the amendments suggested by the commissioner.

The difficulty with regard to crime comics I do not think can be solved by calling these books a service, any more than you could call flour a service. Whatever may be the fault in relation to crime comics, I do not think it will be cured by my hon. friend's amendment.

Mr. Coldwell: I gave that merely as an illustration.

Mr. Garson: The combines investigation commissioner looked into that aspect of crime comics to which my hon. friend has referred. The information we have received is that the newsstand proprietors are protesting a great deal too much. If they really made up their minds not to take these selections, they would not have to, but in many cases they are happy to take them because the most objectionable ones move the fastest.

One of the difficulties that would be encountered in accepting this amendment is that it would increase greatly the work of the combines investigation branch by saddling it with minor matters. That branch has not too large a staff because in addition to the budgetary aspect there is the fact that it is rather difficult to get properly trained personnel and such a staff might be spending its time better on more serious matters. One thing occurs to me at the moment.

If my hon. friend's amendment should pass, I wonder where the barbers' union would stand if they reached an agreement to increase the price of a shave or a haircut? That would be an agreement to fix prices. The amendment would also include professional services of doctors and lawyers; and, as I understand, every professional body has its tariff. Is that a combine in restraint of trade? Is that what my hon. friend is aiming at? Taking all these grounds on which I base my plea for the rejection of the hon. member's amendment, there is no higher ground than this, that I do not think we should accept it with the reasons he has given in support of it at this time. As in the case of his other amendment, we shall be very glad to consider it on any occasion when we are looking at the act.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I should like to say a word about the amendment in line with what the Minister of Justice has just said. I was out of the house and just came in in time to hear the amendment moved. I should like to ask whether or not the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has considered the whole question of unions under his amendment. I may be wrong—and the minister can correct me if I am—but, as I remember, unions at one time were regarded as conspiracies the same as any other meeting of minds of business people in an arrangement to do certain things. My memory is that unions were specifically exempted from the provisions of section 498 of the Criminal Code. I wonder if the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has thought of that, because I am quite sure none of us would want to have this amendment apply to unions so that they might be found guilty of an offence.

Mr. Coldwell: I think the Combines Investigation Act itself excludes unions.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Under section 498 of the Criminal Code they were excluded before the Combines Investigation Act was ever passed. I am not raising this point critically.

Mr. Coldwell: I did consider it, and I came to the conclusion they were relieved of any responsibility under the legislation now on the statute books. What I am getting at, of course, is certain forms of services. For example, radio broadcasting is a service which is nation-wide and is big business. It is that kind of thing I want to try to get at.

Mr. Garson: I sympathize with my hon. friend's view, but a provision of this sort is not like a rifle that aims at the specific thing my hon. friend has in mind. It is more like a shotgun discharge, and my hon. friend may hit many people he did not intend to hit because it is of general application. Although he may aim it at the radio broadcasting people, to whom he has referred, when it is applied generally it may affect many people he least of all wants to affect adversely.

Mr. Coldwell: The Combines Investigation Act may do that now in any event in other fields. There are a large number of business organizations that one might accuse of being combinations, but the combines investigation commissioner and perhaps the minister himself do not consider there is sufficient evidence to warrant an investigation or the bringing of charges. I think the same kind of liberal —if I may use that word—interpretation would apply, but with a small "l" of course.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I really think you should look into that. I am inclined to believe you are wrong. Exemption for unions was provided under section 498 of the Criminal Code, and I do not think there is anything in the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, section 4.

Amendment withdrawn.

Title agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. McIvor: I should like to say a word. We have had a great debate. There has been a good deal said and a lot thought. There has been plenty of listening, but if ever a man has proved himself to be a true son of the west, it is the Minister of Justice, we pay our tribute to his honesty.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Garson moves, seconded by Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West), that the said bill be now read a third time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Drew: Just a moment. It was not explained that the bill was going to be read a third time today.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, yes. I told the house exactly that last night. I said:

Tomorrow at eleven o'clock we will continue the discussion of Bill No. 144, to amend the Combines Investigation Act. We hope to conclude that in the early hours, and then take up the following bills...

Mr. Drew: That did not mean we were going on with third reading.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That would be the first stage today. We had first reading on one day, and second reading on another day. We have had many days in committee. This will be the only reading of this bill we have had today.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Garson moves that the said bill be now passed and that the title be as on the order paper. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Drew: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

TEMISCOUATA RAILWAY

PROVISION FOR PURCHASE BY GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 145, respecting the acquisition of the Temiscouata railway.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Is the minister not speaking on the bill?

Mr. Chevrier: I feel at this stage I should not be expected to make another general statement. When we were dealing with the resolution I outlined the position of the Temiscouata railway. I shall have some information to impart to the house when we go into committee of the whole, and I was hoping that we could do that as quickly as possible.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, when the resolution preceding the bill was under discussion, it was understood that after second reading the bill would be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I gave that undertaking. When we go into committee of the whole I propose to move that it be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Green: Of course that would do away with the necessity for a lengthy discussion at this stage. I hope the minister will arrange to have some official of the Temiscouata Railway Company called before the standing committee, and also some officer or officers of the Canadian National Railways. In his statement on the resolution stage the minister intimated that Canadian National Railways would be making quite substantial capital expenditures. I think it would be beneficial to have officials of that company called before the standing committee.

I also suggest that the position of the Canadian National Railways in connection with this railway should be made clear and kept clear. It is perfectly obvious that they are being placed in an unfair position. The minister explained that Canadian National Railways had been requested to take over the Temiscouata railway and had declined to do so, but eventually had been instructed by the government to take over that line. As I said a moment ago, it is obvious that they are going to have to make substantial capital expenditures, and that there will be a large increase in the wage bill. I think the minister gave the increase in wages as $140,000, which would amount to an increase of 54 per cent over the wages being paid at the present time. By that increase alone any small profit made by the company would be completely wiped out, and as a matter of fact in 1948 there was a small deficit.

So it is perfectly clear that this railway is going to be a losing proposition for the Canadian National. There may be justification for having the line taken over, but it could only be on the basis of a public service to the people of the district. If that service is to be rendered by the Canadian National that company should not be expected to show any profit as a result of the transaction. During the previous discussion we suggested to the minister that it might be possible to keep the accounts of railways such as this, which the Canadian National is forced to take over, separate from other accounts. I would hope that some such method could be adopted, because obviously it is unfair to expect the Canadian National Railways to show that they are carrying on a businesslike operation when they are forced to take over a railway which is losing money, as the Temiscouata railway is bound to do.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I was surprised at the remarks just made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I admit that this railway is outside British Columbia, but it serves a great purpose and is a national asset. My hon. friend has enough experience and is enough of a businessman to realize that a railway which has survived for sixty years deserves special consideration. It helps the people of my county, and everyone is asking that this action be taken. The company has made great sacrifices to maintain the service for the benefit of the people, but since the shares were subscribed but not paid for in the first instance the company has run into debt because of the interest that had to be paid on loans. But it has done splendidly, and I must congratulate the management and personnel of the company who have done very well.

The other day the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield) said he was in favour of the proposal. He has a great advantage over the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, because he is familiar with the situation. Here we have on the one hand an hon. member who lives just across the river and who knows the railway line as well as he knows his own desk in this house, while on the other hand we have an hon. gentleman who lives thousands of miles away, who has never seen the railway or the country. He takes his magnifying glass and finds some objection to the purchase of that line. Where is Canadian unity in that? When did my hon. friend hear me speak against any proposed expenditures in the province of British Columbia? I have never complained about the millions of dollars that have been spent in his province. I considered British Columbia part of Canada, and that we should be prepared to help it.

Here we have a public service being given the electors of Temiscouata and Madawaska counties, and the hon. gentleman pulls out his magnifying glass and his telescope and says, "Well, we must be very careful about it; it may interfere with the Canadian National Railways." It will interfere very much with the people of Temiscouata and Madawaska if the Canadian National is interfered with in its intention to take over the railway.

That is that. I regret what my hon. friend has said.

Mr. Green: I am not opposing the bill.

Mr. Pouliot: Then my hon. friend should let it pass now.

Mr. Drew: The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) seems unaware of the fact that the minister has said he will move to have this bill referred to committee.

Mr. Pouliot: I do not wish to make a great point of this, but I know the whole problem, and I do not boast in making that statement. I have heard about it for a long time; and if my hon. friend would do Temiscouata county the honour of visiting it—

Mr. Green: Could I have a ride on the railway?

Mr. Pouliot: —he would very much regret having delayed the adoption of this legislation.

Mr. Green: I took five minutes.

Mr. Pouliot: The time seemed so long to me. I can tell my hon. friend I am sorry he was not at Riviere du Loup on Sunday, May 22 last.

Mr. Green: Was there an election meeting then?

Mr. Pouliot: No, it was not an election meeting; it was a tribute to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). The crowd gathered in front of the church; the Prime Minister was there, and he made a very fine speech.

Mr. Green: Now I know it was an election meeting.

Mr. Pouliot: No, it was a family gathering. The Prime Minister was applauded, and was about to conclude; then I took the liberty of saying, "Well, sir, what about the Temiscouata railway?"

Mr. Fraser: Then this was all cooked up ahead of time?

Mr. Pouliot: I shall repeat the words of the Prime Minister, because I wish to thank him personally; the other day, when he was not in the house, I conveyed my thanks through Hansard. I report the incident faithfully. When I asked what about the railway he replied, "Oh, yes". Then he mentioned my name and mentioned that I was like St. Thomas, that I could not believe without seeing, but that my constituents could be sure of him and could believe without seeing, which is much better. There were loud cheers and the the people were very happy, because he announced that the government would do precisely what is being done now.

If it were not a matter of public interest I would not insist upon it. I know the hardships and difficulties that have been experienced by the management in attempting to run the railway. These difficulties were caused by the lack of money to put the railroad in good condition so that it could become prosperous. One cannot judge the importance of the railway by the amount of last year's revenue. Some important improvements are necessary, and I am sure the Canadian National will make a good job of running the Temiscouata railway. Probably before the end of the year it will again be a paying proposition. In the meantime, it will serve the interests of the Canadian National as well as the population of the counties of Madawaska and Temiscouata.

There is another essential consideration, and that is that the Temiscouata railway is the most easterly link between the transcontinental line and the Intercolonial railway, both operated by the Canadian National. It will help the transcontinental section as well as the Intercolonial to have the Temiscouata serving as the hyphen between them. I am sorry that I have not a large map of the counties of Madawaska and Temiscouata to hang under the clock to show the line to the members of the house. Although this railway line is not located in the province of British Columbia, I expect I can rely on the support of my hon. friend from that province. Immediately following this, there is a bill for a railway in British Columbia, and in order to avoid obstruction I suggest that we pair them.

The government is doing quite well for British Columbia, as it is for Temiscouata. I again convey my thanks to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Transport and the officials of the Canadian National Railways. I wish to express my gratitude to the management of the Temiscouata railway and to Mr. Charles Stewart, the father of Bill Stewart of the Canadian Press, a man who has done so much for the railway. I wish to extend my thanks also to Mr. Tom Walsh, Mr. L. N. Ouellet and many others who have sacrificed so much in accepting a rate of pay which was about one-half the regular rate for railway employees who belong to the unions.

It is important also to remember that the Canadian National Railways' management has studied the case. Mr. Fairweather is familiar with it, and the officials have recommended the purchase of the Temiscouata railway by the Canadian National. This would have been accomplished during the days of Sir Henry Thornton if the Temiscouata had not been under the control of the Quebec Central Railway, which was owned by the C. P. R. at that time. The Temiscouata railway was never owned by the C. P. R., but at one time the directors of the Temiscouata were gentlemen who were also directors of the Quebec Central, a subsidiary of the C. P. R. This was the only reason for not amalgamating the Temiscouata railway with the Canadian National at the time the Gaspe railway and other railways in the province of Quebec were taken over, and that was about twenty years ago.

There were many difficulties in the way of improving the service. When Mr. Michaud was the member for Madawaska he knew the situation well, and these directors were replaced by men who lived at Edmundston and Riviere du Loup and who represent the bondholders living in London. These bonds are being purchased by the Canadian National. I would remind my colleagues of one other thing, and that is that the Canadian National Railways will receive value for every dollar spent in purchasing the Temiscouata railway. The equipment taken over is as follows: Five locomotives to handle freight and two locomotives for passenger service; ten coaches; eighty freight cars; eleven miscellaneous units. In 1946 the railway handled 6,814 carloads of freight and 5,551 carloads of lumber or its by-products. In normal years upwards of 50,000 passengers were carried on the railway.

I repeat that it is far from being a losing proposition. If we look into the future we can see that it is bright because the necessary repairs and improvements will be made. They will not be so costly, after all. The member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) said one thing of which I took note, and that is that it is a public service to the people of the district. That is right. It is precisely for that reason that the Canadian National Railways have been so happy to agree to the suggestion made by the residents of the district, that the Temiscouata railway should be turned over to the Canadian National. The people of the district are grateful to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Transport and the government; they will be grateful to all hon. gentlemen who will support the measure and see that it is no longer delayed in passing all its stages.

(Translation):

Mr. P. L. Dubé (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased at this time to commend the government's decision to provide for the purchase of the Temiscouata Railway, which runs through my constituency. Mr. Speaker, I also feel it a duty at this time to congratulate the government for taking over, under C.N.R. control, this railway line which serves a large number of people from Riviere du Loup to Edmundston.

Mr. Speaker, I must also congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) for his efforts in convincing the government of the importance of bringing the Temiscouata Railway under the control of the Canadian National Railways.

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must warn the members that if the minister speaks he will close the debate.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): When this bill was last before the house, I undertook to give the house some information and I think perhaps it might be well to give it before the bill is referred to the committee. I was asked by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) what rolling stock was being taken over. Here is the list. There are 7 locomotives, 5 freight and 2 passenger; 2 motor unit passenger coaches; 4 first-class coaches; 1 combination coach; 2 motor car trailers; 3 baggage, express and postal cars; 33 box cars; 26 flat cars, and 27 other cars in freight service, making a total of 105, plus 18 work equipment units, which is a grand total of 123.

Then I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) wanted to know what amount of money the Canadian National Railways would expend. I am informed that they have in mind an immediate program of rehabilitating the railway which will have to be undertaken at an estimated cost of $1,144,000. This expenditure would be spread over a period of three years.

As I stated earlier, it is my intention to move that the bill be sent to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I think there could be made available on behalf of the Canadian National Railways two of its officers who are quite familiar with the affairs of the Temiscouata railway; I refer to Mr. Fairweather and Mr. Rosevear. As to the general manager of the Temiscouata railway, I understand he has been seriously ill. I will see what can be done to have him called as a witness. If the house will agree, I should like to move that the bill be now referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

PACIFIC GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY

PROVISION FOR SUBSIDY TO BRITISH COLUMBIA FOR CONSTRUCTION OF LINE FROM QUESNEL TO PRINCE GEORGE

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 146, to authorize the granting of a subsidy to the government of the province of British Columbia in aid of the construction of an extension to the Pacific Great Eastern Railway.

Mr. Fraser: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Chevrier: I have no further statement to make. In the resolution stage, I imparted to the house all the information which was available to me. The bill is a simple one. There is a precedent, not recent but many years ago, and in granting a subsidy to the P.G.E. the bill takes the form of other acts by which subsidies have been granted.

Mr. Fraser: Will the minister have this bill referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines?

Mr. Chevrier: I did not think this bill should go to the committee. It is a simple bill. From the reception that it had in the house when it came up during discussion of the resolution, I thought that would not be necessary. I am, however, in the hands of the house. In view of the form which it takes—it has only one or two short clauses—I would think that it would be possible now, if there is no debate while the Speaker is in the chair, for us to go into committee and to dispose of it.

Mr. Pouliot: Although this bill is not for the province of Quebec, I support it wholeheartedly.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I did not intend to speak on the second reading of the bill, Mr. Speaker, because I said a few words when it was in the resolution stage. But I notice that one of the Vancouver papers, in reporting the debate in the house, stated that this subsidy was favoured by all the members from British Columbia with the exception of myself. I want to point out that that is not correct. I did not oppose this subsidy at all. Indeed, I pointed out that the extension of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway from Quesnel to Prince George, the section that this subsidy is to help in building, was approved by all political parties in British Columbia.

I did, however, draw attention to the implications of federal government support. I am convinced that at some time or another we shall have to do with this railway what has been done with the railway in Temiscouata; although I do object to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) putting the province of British Columbia on the same basis as Temiscouata. It is like putting the province of Quebec on the same basis as Sardis or some other little place in British Columbia. Since the matter was debated here last, however, I obtained from the office of the finance minister of British Columbia some information on the financial condition of the Pacific Great Eastern. A great deal of money has been put into it since 1916 when it was started. Its obligations accruing from loans for building and accrued interest since that time amount to over $115 million. Despite the increased revenue that may accrue to the road because of the extension, I am inclined to believe that deficits will continue to increase. As a matter of fact, I saw a communication in one of the British Columbia papers the other day that supported that view. I merely want to put myself on record here as not being opposed to this subsidy. I do not believe I did anything more than the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) did when he spoke on the measure and pointed out the same implications.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If I may, I should like to ask one question before the motion is carried. Unfortunately, for reasons over which I have no control, I was prevented from hearing the discussion on the resolution stage of this bill. Who is responsible for this? Is the province of British Columbia responsible for the construction of the road? When this subsidy has been given, is that the extent of the responsibility of the federal government?

Mr. Chevrier: If the hon. member has no objection to our getting into committee, perhaps I could answer questions then.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Chevrier: May I answer the question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood? The answer is that the government of the province of British Columbia will construct the extension from Quesnel to Prince George. There is no commitment beyond the subsidy for that extension, which is of eighty-two and seven-tenths miles.

Mr. Green: Some two weeks ago in the Vancouver Sun, under date of November 12, there appeared a dispatch to the effect that the P.G.E. would join a new C.N.R. rail hub in North Vancouver, and that there would be a big ocean terminal constructed in North Vancouver. The article begins in this way:

> Construction of a half-mile block of deep-sea piers in North Vancouver as part of a large-scale Canadian National Railways terminal development is under discussion in Ottawa. Plans would also involve extension of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway by the federal government to North Vancouver from Squamish via the Capilano canyon.

Can the minister tell the committee whether any such discussions are taking place, or whether it is the intention of the government either to extend the Pacific Great Eastern Railway to North Vancouver or to assist in such extension?

Mr. Sinclair: Before the minister answers the question I should like to make a comment or two. This, to my mind, is a most extraordinary story by the Vancouver Sun. Some two weeks before that story was published we had a debate in the house, and the able correspondent of the Vancouver Sun accurately reported the debate. Then a week later Hansard found its way to the office of the Vancouver Sun. Their front page story mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was built entirely on the actual Hansard. They quoted the story from Hansard but they completely changed three important words in my speech. I said, "I intend to advocate this course of the Canadian National Railways taking over first of all the Vancouver Harbour Railway and second taking over the Pacific Great Eastern." Despite the fact that whoever wrote the second story in the Vancouver Sun was obviously taking it direct from Hansard they changed my words, "I am advocating" into three words, "We are planning"; in other words giving the implication that the government was actually planning this course. I think the hon. member will agree the story was founded almost entirely on the observations I made. I was not in a position whatsoever to commit the government to any such action. But I will repeat now that it is the hope of the people along the Pacific Great Eastern in my riding from Squamish to Prince George that eventually this railway will be part of the Canadian National system. It is our hope in North Vancouver—and I am glad to have the support of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra—that eventually the Canadian National Railways will take over the Vancouver Harbour Railway and so give the Canadian National Railways local trackage on the north shore of Vancouver harbour.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to enter into a discussion on this, but I think I should answer my hon. friend and say that there is no commitment on behalf of the government, in any discussions in this respect, that are not contained in the bill. The discussions and the commitments were for a subsidy of $15,000 per mile.

Mr. Green: Has there been any discussion concerning subsidy for the extension of the line north to Prince George?

Mr. Chevrier: I think I told my hon. friend when he asked that question earlier that there was not.

OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION ACT

CORPORATION TO TAKE OVER PROPERTY AND EQUIPMENT OF MARCONI AND CABLE AND WIRELESS LIMITED

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 12, respecting the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this bill was recommended by the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. Perhaps I should have indicated to the house that this bill was referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. After careful study by the members of the committee it was recommended to the house without amendment.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Appointment of President and General Manager and Vice-President.

Mr. Green: Is the minister in a position to say who will be the president of this crown company?

Mr. Chevrier: Not at this stage. The bill has some distance to go yet before it passes the two houses and until it has received royal assent I am not in a position to say. In fact, I have not given a great deal of thought to it, but I know there are two or three excellent men in the telecommunications field whom we have in mind for that position.

Mr. Green: When is it expected that the new corporation will be functioning?

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed April 1.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On section 8—Powers.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Can the minister indicate to us the extent of the equipment of communications that will be in the hands of the new corporation?

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry; I did not hear the last part of the question.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Can the minister indicate in most general terms just what in the way of equipment the corporation will have when it has taken over the property of the companies mentioned in clause 8?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. I gave that on the resolution, and it was given in detail in the committee. I have it here. It is quite a lengthy list.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If it has been given that is satisfactory.

Mr. Higgins: I wonder if we could revert to clause 7. It was carried so quickly that I did not have time to ask my question.

What is the meaning of that particular reference to Newfoundland?

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. gentleman mentioned section 7. I do not see any reference to Newfoundland in that section.

Mr. Higgins: I am sorry; it is section 6, subparagraph (b). Telecommunication between Newfoundland and other parts of Canada is mentioned. What is the meaning of that?

Mr. Chevrier: It is in order to take over the telecommunication service between Newfoundland and Canada. Those that exist between Newfoundland and the United Kingdom are not covered in this bill; but there are telecommunications which operate between Newfoundland and Canada.

Mr. Higgins: I am not quite clear on this. Does the minister mean that there are other private companies?

Mr. Chevrier: This information was given by officers of the department in the committee. Perhaps I can repeat it for my hon. friend. When the bill was drafted Newfoundland was not a province. Now it is a province. But the bill has not been amended, because the equipment used for the western end of this circuit, that is from Newfoundland to Canada, is integrated with that used in the external radio communication circuits at Drummondville and Yamaska, covered by the bill.

Mr. Higgins: My recollection is that the last time I asked the question when the bill was introduced the minister told me at that time he was merely taking over the assets of the company. I believe the Marconi Company operate a service apart from the actual building and selling of radio sets. Is it intended that those other activities are to be taken over?

Mr. Chevrier: The only facilities being taken over are those that I mentioned specifically during the discussion on the resolution. In so far as other services are concerned, a firm decision has not been made and this will be left to the directors of the new corporation.

Mr. Higgins: You are not planning to take over the Marconi Company entirely?

Mr. Chevrier: I would not say we are not; I am saying that the decision has not been made.

Mr. Pearkes: I understand that you are not taking over the cable itself. The transpacific cable comes into Bamfield on the west coast of Vancouver island, and then there is another stretch of cable from the east coast of Vancouver island to the mainland of British Columbia. Whose responsibility would that be?

Mr. Chevrier: We are taking over all the external telecommunications facilities except the cable heads that are within our country.

Anything beyond that, any cable extending from the west coast to Australia, Australasia or elsewhere, would not be touched by this bill. The responsibility for that would remain as it now is, under the United Kingdom government, post office division.

Mr. Pearkes: What about the stretch between Vancouver island and the mainland of British Columbia?

Mr. Chevrier: That will remain with the United Kingdom government.

Mr. Green: That is wholly within the province of British Columbia but it would remain the property of Cable and Wireless Limited?

Mr. Chevrier: We are not taking over any cables. As my hon. friend says, it would remain the property of the United Kingdom government.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the minister think it is necessary to restrict this corporation which will be of a considerable size as provided by paragraph (c) of subsection 2 of section 8, which reads:

(c) acquire any real or personal property, the cost of acquisition of which exceeds the sum of fifty thousand dollars—

I am not questioning that, it is the following provision that I question:

—or in any manner dispose of any such property having an original or book value exceeding the sum of five thousand dollars.

It seems to me that that is a narrowing down of the responsibilities of the officials of this corporation in a way that will prove to be a nuisance both to them and to the government.

Mr. Chevrier: The Department of Finance checked the bill carefully and felt that those limitations should be placed upon the powers of the directors. We raised no objection.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Do you not think the Department of Finance is keeping too tight a rein over you?

Mr. Chevrier: Sometimes perhaps we think they do; certainly when it comes to expenditures of money they exercise control.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This is not an expenditure.

Mr. Chevrier: In this case we raised no objection.

Mr. Higgins: When Cable and Wireless Limited is taken over will its schedule of rates be in competition with those of the other cable companies that are operating?

Mr. Chevrier: I would not say that the new corporation will be bringing in a set of rates different from those that exist at the moment. It is not the intention to upset the present position in so far as employees or conditions of employment are concerned, except to make them better if possible.

Mr. Higgins: I was thinking of the cable companies presently in operation, such as the Commercial Cable Company.

Mr. Chevrier: This bill has no provision for rates. The directors are bound by the agreement made with the United Kingdom. The telecommunications board will have jurisdiction over rates.

Mr. Green: Will Canada's representative on the telecommunications board be an officer of the crown corporation?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Green: Would it not be better to have an officer of the corporation represent us on the board?

Mr. Chevrier: The board meets in London, England, and we have over there, in the person of Mr. Tudhope, an officer who is familiar with telecommunication matters. He has represented the government on a number of occasions and he now represents Canada on the board. We feel that we should not change that situation.

Mr. Green: I understand that cables taken in at offices of the Canadian National Railways cannot be sent over these commonwealth wires. Can the minister explain to the committee just why that situation exists? I understand it is to continue for ten or fifteen years.

Mr. Chevrier: I would not think it will continue that long. Canadian National Railways have an agreement with Western Union. I am informed that previously Canadian National Railways gave a pick-up service to Marconi, but there was in their agreement with Western Union a clause which prohibited them from renewing that arrangement. The Canadian National Telegraphs now are pick-up agents for Western Union while Canadian Pacific are pick-up agents for Canadian Marconi Company Limited. The agreement between Canadian National Telegraphs and Western Union is for some years.

Mr. Green: How many?

Mr. Chevrier: I have not that information available at the moment and I am informed that we cannot get it.

Mr. Green: I understand it is to run to some time in the 1960's.

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot say. It may be that Canadian National Railways can revise their agreement, but I am not in position to say. The point is that they are now agents for Western Union.

Mr. Green: Will that not mean that approximately one-half of the cable business from Canada will go via Western Union rather than via this commonwealth organization?

Mr. Chevrier: I suppose it would depend upon where the messages are filed. If anyone goes into a telegraph office and stipulates that the message is to go Marconi, that ends it; but if he makes no stipulation, it will go in accordance with the amount of traffic that the overseas telecommunications has. This is a rather technical matter and I am told that it would be difficult to give an accurate answer because you would really have to look at the picture for at least a month or perhaps more.

Mr. Higgins: During the sealing season in Newfoundland communications are carried on through Marconi and I was anxious to know whether this bill would interfere with those.

Mr. Chevrier: This has nothing to do with ship-to-shore communications.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Power to acquire property of Canadian Marconi Company and Cable and Wireless Limited.

Mr. McLure: The other day in the standing committee I asked a question about section 10 with reference to the Marconi company. The Marconi company will still be a company even after this corporation takes over a certain amount of their property. They are only taking over a certain part of the property, and the Marconi company are not going out of business? They will still exist?

Mr. Chevrier: They are going out of business in so far as telecommunications are concerned, but they are not going out of business in so far as their broadcasting stations are concerned or the manufacture of radios.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Duty to deliver up property.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What is the need to provide for a criminal offence under subsection 2 of section 11? Is there some precedent for that? It seems to me to be an extraordinary action to suddenly introduce a criminal offence into what is an ordinary business transaction.

Mr. Chevrier: The only answer I can give my hon. friend is that I am informed there are cases where, after expropriation proceedings have been taken, people have refused to give up property—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Are there not other means?

Mr. Chevrier: —although it is clear that by negotiation or by judgment of a court the amount of compensation will be fixed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not familiar with the procedure, but surely there are other means of getting rid of a person, especially with the sanctions there would be under this bill. I must say I dislike it very much unless there is a good reason for it. Let me read the section, and I should like members of the house to listen to this. It deals with a person who, properly enough no doubt, is condemned to hand over his property. The section reads:

> 11(1) Where any property is taken or acquired under section 10, the person from whom the property is taken or acquired and every person in whose possession or custody or under whose control the property may be shall deliver up the property in accordance with the terms of the notice.

That is all right. Subsection 2 reads:

> (2) A person who violates this section is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $500 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months or to both fine and imprisonment.

Unless there are precedents of which I am ignorant, I submit that is a most extraordinary procedure. It seems to me to be most high-handed. I would hope very much that it would not be left in the bill.

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot add anything to the reason I gave a moment ago. I am now further informed that this clause has been put in by the Department of Justice.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not sure that satisfies me. I should like to know if there is any precedent. I think we should be entitled to know before we create a criminal offence. I can quite imagine somebody finding he had committed a criminal offence without the slightest intention of doing so. It is not possible for me to believe there are not other perfectly effective means under our civil law. I do not know either the terms or the technique, but surely our civil law is not so ineffective that a person cannot be put off property which he has lost the right to hold. Surely the criminal law does not have to step into a situation of this kind.

Mr. MacInnis: From some little experience I have had with expropriation proceedings I think that is a fairly general clause. It sounds rather harsh, but I believe that is the general clause in expropriation proceedings.

Mr. Green: As I understand it, section 11 must be read with section 10. Section 10 gives the corporation power to acquire property from two companies, Canadian Marconi Company and Cable and Wireless Limited. I may be wrong, but I do not think there is any power taken under section 10 to acquire property from any corporation or person other than the two corporations named therein.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Green: That being the case, I do not see why section 11 is necessary at all, because if you read it you will see it reads this way:

Where any property is taken or acquired under section 10—

That means from one or other of the two companies named in section 10.

—the person from whom the property is taken or acquired—

Again that could only be either of those two corporations.

—and every person in whose possession or custody or under whose control the property may be shall deliver up the property in accordance with the terms of the notice.

If the property belongs to one or other of these corporations then it can be taken over from them, and there is no need to have any provision for fining a person. I suggest the whole of section 11 is unnecessary. Certainly it is not required to deal with either Canadian Marconi Company or Cable and Wireless Limited, and they are the only two owners whose properties are to be expropriated.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I think that is the very reason why the section is put in there. If either of these corporations refuses to deliver up the assets against which expropriation proceedings have been filed, then there should be some clause in the act penalizing them for not so doing. I think there is more reason to have it in the act under section 10 than there would be under section 13.

Mr. Green: Why should not section 11 be worded to apply to these two corporations? They are the only ones from whom you are expropriating. Certainly there is no point in putting in a provision to send a corporation to jail for three months. Subsection 2 of section 11 has been drawn for some other purpose. It must be a general provision which applies in other cases, but it certainly does not apply in this case where you are dealing only with the property of two corporations.

Mr. Chevrier: I think it is clear from section 11 that it applies to section 10, and could not apply to anything else. In so far as imprisonment is concerned, I have no feeling about that, but I think the fine should remain. I would rather see the clause remain as it is, but if it is going to assist the committee I have no objection to removing the provision for imprisonment.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Green: Is it the intention to give power to lay a charge against some individual who has no connection with either of these companies?

Mr. Chevrier: Not under this section. I would think this section relates only to section 10, and therefore only to the officers, servants and employees of either of these two companies.

Mr. Green: Then it is perfectly clear that the provision for imprisonment should be deleted. If you leave in the provision for imprisonment, the next thing that will happen will be that some individual will be summoned to court and faced with the possibility of going to jail. If that is not the intention, the provision for imprisonment should be deleted.

Mr. Chevrier: I have no objection. While we are going on with the other sections, perhaps I can draft an appropriate amendment.

Section stands.

Sections 12 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

On section 15—Loans to corporations.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to ask a question on section 15. Is there any relation to section 14? Section 14 reads:

14(1) At the request of the corporation and with the approval of the governor in council, the Minister of Finance may, from time to time, pay to the corporation out of the unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund amounts not exceeding in the aggregate four and one-half million dollars.

I should like to know whether there is any relation between that total and section 15, subsection 1. I take it section 15 is different because it merely concerns lending moneys. Is there any limitation on that?

Mr. Chevrier: There is a difference between the two. Section 14 provides for sufficient money to take over the external telecommunication assets of both companies, together with the items I have already mentioned.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I see my question is really answered by subsection 2 of section 15.

Section agreed to.

Sections 16 to 19 inclusive agreed to.

On section 20—Corporation may pay certain taxes.

Mr. Green: This provision gives the corporation the power to pay municipal taxes. I wonder how it fits in with the policy announced the other day by the Minister of Finance. Under his plan there is a very limited amount payable, and there will only be about one hundred municipalities which will get any benefit at all. I hope that plan will not be the one followed by this corporation. As I read the section in the bill, the corporation is given power to pay the ordinary municipal taxes, and I hope that is the intention. I ask the minister to clear up that point.

Mr. Chevrier: So far as I know that is the intention. I am sorry I have not got the statement of the Minister of Finance. It was quite a lengthy statement, in which the minister dealt with crown corporations, dividing them in two groups. First were those that were in active business, such as the Canadian National Railways and I think he mentioned the national harbours board. Then he mentioned those partly doing active business and partly rendering social service, like the C.B.C.; and he made a distinction between the two. As far as I know this is going to be an active corporation, and without having the speech of the Minister of Finance before me to see what it covers, I should think the corporation would pay full taxes.

Mr. Green: This corporation will be carrying on a business of its own. It is in fact a business concern.

Mr. Chevrier: I would think so.

Mr. Green: This provision in section 20 appears for the first time in any legislation concerning crown corporations, and I do hope the practice followed will be that set out in the section rather than that contained in any general plan announced by the Minister of Finance, because otherwise this section would be of very little value.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not agree with my hon. frend, because the plan announced by the Minister of Finance does not derogate from what is set out in section 20. If my hon. friend refers to the over-all plan, it does; but in the course of his statement the minister dealt with crown corporations, and speaking now from memory I think my hon. friend will find that he dealt with this situation, so I do not think there will be any discrepancy.

Mr. Green: If that is the case it is quite satisfactory. If the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation is to pay full municipal taxes, of course there can be no objection; and I hope that is the intention.

Mr. Chevrier: That certainly is the intention.

Section agreed to.

Sections 21 to 25 inclusive agreed to.

On section 11—Duty to deliver up property.

Mr. Chevrier: If I may revert to this section, I would ask my colleague the Minister of Public Works to move an amendment to subsection 2, by deleting all the words after the word "dollars" in line 42 of the section, to the end of the subclause.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I so move.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTION THAT CERTAIN PAGE BOYS BE EXCUSED FROM ATTENDANCE THIS EVENING

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to the next business of the house I would direct your attention to the fact that the page boys have been working from ten o'clock in the morning until eleven o'clock at night this week, and that tomorrow again they will start work at ten o'clock. I understand that we could manage very well with a skeleton staff this evening, and I think it would be the wish of the house that the chief page be allowed to select those who must remain in order that the business of the house may be carried on, and permit the younger ones to go home.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

PENSION FUND SOCIETIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND PROVISIONS TO SUBSIDIARY CORPORATIONS

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 174, to amend the Pension Fund Societies Act.

Mr. Green: Is the minister not going to explain this bill?

Mr. Bradley: It is a very simple bill. It proposes merely to extend the benefits of the Pension Fund Societies Act to the employees of companies subsidiary to existing or perhaps future companies created by act of parliament, whether by special act or under the Companies Act.

This act has been on the statute books of Canada for some sixty years, and presently appears in the Revised Statutes of 1927 as chapter 155. The act provides that two or more of the senior employees of a Canadian corporation may form themselves into a pension fund society by the methods therein set forth, and the object of such a society is to create and administer a fund for the purpose of providing pensions for employees of the corporation who have become disabled through disability or age, and after their death to provide annuities for their widows and infant children and certain other relatives. The present act applies, but of course can only cover employees of the corporation itself. With the trend in modern business and the expansion of the ramifications of many of our corporations, in many cases covering a number of subsidiaries the control of the voting stock of which is held by what we might term the parent company, unfortunately under the existing law the employees of the subsidiary company cannot claim any benefits under the society that has been created by the parent company.

In order to enjoy the privileges which they may have under this Pension Fund Societies Act, it is necessary to pass an amendment to the act to bring them within the society that is already in existence under the authority of the parent company. I have in mind one company which has about six subsidiaries and, I understand, is desirous of taking advantage of this act for the benefit of its employees. If that company has to proceed under the existing law, it must create seven societies with seven boards of directors; seven annual meetings; seven sets of books and seven overhead expense accounts. The object of this section is merely to bring the employees of these subsidiaries within the provisions of the act for the purpose of giving them the benefits of the one society.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have not had an opportunity of reading this as carefully as I would have liked in conjunction with the original act. I noticed that the minister said this would apply to companies incorporated under a special act or under the Canadian Companies Act. Under the original act, which is chapter 155 of the Revised Statutes of 1927, perhaps I have not read it carefully enough, but I failed to find those words which the minister used. In other words, I do not find anything to indicate that they are the companies that are covered. Will the minister just direct me to that, because I think it is important to know it.

The second point upon which I wish to touch is that the addition to section 17 of chapter 155 which is provided for in the bill before us introduces certain rights and privileges to officers of the corporations affected. Again it may be that I have not read this chapter 155 carefully enough, but I do not find in it any similar provision in favour of the original beneficiaries under the act. In other words, the members of the parent company should have those privileges set out here for the officers of the subsidiaries—that is correct?

Mr. Bradley: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What I want to be clear upon is this. Is there a similar provision in chapter 155 for those in the parent company, or are we introducing here a change in chapter 155 and merely making it apply to the subsidiaries? I confess to the minister that I have not read this act contained in chapter 155 as carefully as I should like, but I think the point should be answered.

Mr. Bradley: I have not the act at hand, but my understanding is that the parent company will set up a pension fund society for that corporation. There are some twelve or thirteen of them in existence now. Then, in cases where that company or corporation has subsidiary companies, the employees of the subsidiary will have exactly the same rights in the existing pension fund society as those employed directly by the parent company.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is exactly what I thought it meant.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Subsidiary corporations.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Now that I am in order, may I repeat the question, or rather ask the minister to take it as repeated?

Mr. Bradley: Exactly what was your question?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister made a statement in general terms of exactly what I thought was the tenor of the bill, but in reading chapter 155 of the Revised Statutes of 1927 I do not find that is the tenor of it. Unless the minister can answer that definitely and not merely in general terms, then I suggest the section stand until both he and I have an opportunity of looking at it because, at the moment, I am not able to spell out exactly what the minister has said is the tenor of the bill.

Mr. Bradley: I have not the act at hand, and I am quite agreeable to allowing it to stand.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

409. Patent division, $488,805.

Mr. Green: When the house adjourned, I believe the minister was about to answer a question or two that had been asked about this item.

Mr. Bradley: The backlog is 24,532.

Mr. Green: How does that compare with last year?

Mr. Bradley: It is down about 13 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Patent and copyright office—

412. Contribution to the international office for the protection of industrial property, international copyright union office and union for the protection of literary and artistic works, $4,000.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. Bradley: This vote is for the payment of Canada's share of the expenses of the international office for the protection of industrial property, international copyright union office and union for the protection of literary and artistic works. The amount payable by Canada in class 2 is determined by article 23 of the convention.

Mr. Green: Is that under the control of the United Nations or is it a separate international organization?

Mr. Bradley: It is under the Berne convention.

Mr. Green: It has nothing to do with the United Nations?

Mr. Bradley: No.

Item agreed to.

General—

897. To provide for expenses in connection with the bibliographic centre (national library), $18,950.

Mr. Knight: I should like to ask for some detail as to the expenditure of this money. Perhaps the minister would comment on the progress of the plan for a national library, and what the situation is at this time.

Mr. Bradley: I think the objectives of this vote are fairly well set out by a statement the Prime Minister made in the house in reply to a question on Monday, November 14, and which, as reported at page 1711 of Hansard, is as follows:

> The royal commission on national development of the arts, letters and sciences has been asked to consider the "ultimate character and extent" of the national library, and no large-scale developments will take place until the report of the commission has been received. Meanwhile, however, much useful preliminary work can be done. The national library advisory committee, which the government appointed about a year ago, met in March last, and recommended that a bibliographic centre be established without delay. An appropriation of $18,950, included in the supplementary estimates submitted recently to the house, will enable a start to be made upon the organization of this centre within the next few months. The civil service commission will soon invite applications for the first four positions on the staff of the centre, and work on a national union catalogue should start immediately after the new year. To begin with, this catalogue will list the contents of the thirty-five or more libraries in Ottawa belonging to the various branches of the federal government. Later the contents of special collections elsewhere, such as the famous Canadiana collections in the Toronto public library and the Gagnon collection in the Bibliotheque Municipale in Montreal, will be included. The intention is that ultimately the union catalogue should list the contents of every important library in Canada.

Mr. Knight: Would I be right in supposing that this $18,000 would be additional salaries for those four people who are to proceed to do the preliminary work? Is that what I gather from that statement?

Mr. Bradley: It provides for the purchase of indexes, bibliographies and printed catalogues of other libraries, including the library of congress and the British museum, and also for the purchase of catalogue cards, portable microfilm camera copying unit and reader, and other stationery and office equipment. It also provides travelling expenses for members of the national library advisory committee and for members of the staff.

Mr. Knight: I should like to make a statement to the government through the Secretary of State. I think that we are deficient in the matter of education in this country as compared with a great many other countries. When we talk about inequality of opportunity in the matter of education, I think we should talk about inequality in regard to the position of reading matter in the various provinces throughout Canada. If one looks at the statistics, one will find that the libraries in some provinces are stocked very differently, in proportion to population, than they are in others. I am only speaking from memory but in the province of Ontario, for instance, I think there is one book in the public library for each person of the population. That is not at all true in some of the other provinces.

I would suggest that when we are thinking about a national library and national culture some federal aid in the way of libraries would be about as good a thing as this government could do. By that I mean grants to libraries in some of what are called "have-not" provinces, so that the reading opportunities of people, and particularly young people in those provinces, could be equated more nearly to those provinces which can afford a greater supply of books. The building up of large libraries is important, but so is the proper selection, co-operation and expert help which will be available to those outlying libraries from a national institution such as a national library which we envisage here at Ottawa. While I admit that a research library in the capital of this country is a tremendously important thing, I am not prepared to grant that it is the most important work that a national library can do. I think the most important work a national library can do is to aid and to help libraries in those outlying parts so that the great bulk of our population, which after all is not settled in Ottawa, may have the use of these facilities.

Item agreed to.

Public archives—

319. General administration and technical services, $176,393.

Mr. Pouliot: I have just a question or two. How long does it take for a manuscript given to the archives to become public? There are letters from Sir John A. Macdonald. I presume they have been delivered to Ottawa. I wonder whether the correspondence of Sir Wilfrid Laurier has been catalogued. I wonder whether there have been some gifts of correspondence from some other Canadian statesmen. I wonder whether a time is set for the public to read and to study all the correspondence that is given to the archives. If the minister is not in a position to answer now I shall be thankful to him to tell me when he has the information. Those letters are Canadian history. I wonder whether they will interest future generations as much as they interest those of us who have heard about these people. There are very few historians who will go back many years to read correspondence of the statesmen of the past. When we know that, I presume it is more interesting to make a study.

Mr. Bradley: In answer to my hon. friend I may say that most of this correspondence, particularly that of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, is available; but it must be borne in mind that the archivist is in the position of a trustee. I understand the practice is that the documents, particularly those of a personal character, are regarded as not being properly available for a period of some half a century.

Mr. Pouliot: I should like to know, sir, whether the correspondence of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier has been catalogued and if the catalogue is completed. Then I should like to know how much it has cost. My third question is, how many people have been working to catalogue the correspondence of Mr. Mackenzie King, and what will be the cost of it? I should like to compare the cost of the cataloguing of the correspondence of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and of Sir John A. Macdonald with that of Mr. Mackenzie King.

[Mr. Knight.]

Mr. Bradley: I am afraid it would be impossible to give the hon. member the information which he asks. No catalogue exists of the correspondence of either Sir Wilfrid or Sir John. It has all been arranged in order, and any one of these documents is available to anyone who wishes to see it.

Mr. Pouliot: I read in the press that the correspondence of Mr. King was being catalogued, and that the new archivist was brought from British Columbia precisely for that purpose. I should like to know how much it has cost and whether the work has been done in the last two or three years. I should like to know how much the country has paid for the cataloguing of Mr. King's correspondence, which no one of us will be able to read, since we shall all be dead by the time it is available.

Mr. Bradley: The work is going on in connection with Mr. King's correspondence. It is not yet completed. I do not think it would be possible for me just now to give any idea of the cost.

Mr. Pouliot: I will tell the minister I want to have it. An archivist has been brought from British Columbia for that purpose. He was chosen mainly by the late prime minister for that purpose. I want to know it, and I want to know how many people are working on that correspondence, and how much they are paid. If some people are working on it I want to know it, and I have a right to know the whole thing.

Mr. Bradley: We shall try to get the information for the hon. gentleman; but I should like to say, Mr. Chairman, that he is not quite correct that the archivist was brought here for that purpose.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Not correct at all.

Mr. Pouliot: If I was not quite correct—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

ALBERTA NATURAL GAS COMPANY

The house resumed from Friday, November 18, consideration of the motion of Maybank for the second reading of Bill No. 66, respecting Alberta Natural Gas Company.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak in this debate because prior to coming to this house my work had been principally with labour and industry and I hoped that my major address this session would be concerning such matters. However on Tuesday evening the hon. member for Vancouver East said certain things which I felt reflected, not only on the integrity of the British Columbia members but on our desire to serve our province and serve it well.

I am sure the people of my riding have considerable interest in this pipe line matter and they would be happy to see a pipe line built through the Crowsnest pass. I am sure even the coal miners who are producing a competitive fuel, but who are so notoriously progressive in their thinking, would be happy to have such a convenient fuel as gas available for their furnaces and kitchens. I know the people farther west in my riding at Kimberley, Cranbrook and the other smaller towns would be happy to have such a convenient fuel at their disposal.

Previous to rising to speak tonight I undertook considerable research in order to determine if what I considered were the facts were true. I feel that what I am going to say will be as close to the facts as anything I have heard in this chamber during this debate.

On Monday, March 21, 1949, the Pipe Lines Act was given first reading in this house and it subsequently was passed. The purpose of that legislation was to provide for the control of international and interprovincial trade through pipe lines. In order to set up a company under that act it is necessary that a bill pass this house. In other words, the company must be chartered.

Before being permitted to do business the company must prove, first, that they have a definite supply of gas or oil available; that they have obtained the consent of the government of Alberta or any other province to take such gas or oil out of the province; that they have obtained a permit from the Department of Trade and Commerce in connection with the gas or oil which they wish to take out of Canada; that they are properly financed for such an undertaking; and that they have available markets.

In March of the same year a bill was before this house to incorporate the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited. I have gone through that bill thoroughly and nowhere can I find that a route has been designated. That bill resembles almost word for word the bill now before the house to incorporate Alberta Natural Gas Company. I repeat that in neither of those bills is a route definitely designated. Therefore I think it could be safely said that Westcoast Transmission Company Limited could build a pipe line through any territory and in any direction it might choose, provided it obtained the permission of the board of transport commissioners.

As I said, I have conducted some research. In the files of the transport board I found an application which had been made to the board by the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited on May 11, 1949, a copy of which I have on my desk. That application was to transport gas from Edmonton in the province of Alberta to a point in the vicinity of Kingsgate in the province of British Columbia, with a branch line from a point in the vicinity of Kingsgate to cover Trail in British Columbia. I know Kingsgate quite well. It is a beautiful little town which is a port of entry to the United States, but I am sure the population is not large enough to warrant its being a terminal of a gas pipe line.

I know they have not pressed their application for permission to build this pipe line, but I am sure their inactivity in that regard is not merely coincidental with the arguments that are being presented at the present time by those who oppose this bill. The only objection I have heard to the passage of the bill before us is that this company will export gas to the United States if they obtain permission from the transport board. As I have said, the two bills are as much alike as two peas. I could go farther than that and say that they are as much alike as two divorce bills such as those that pass this house so rapidly, although we have had difficulty with them on occasion. But there is one outstanding difference. The bill to incorporate the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited has passed the house whereas the bill to incorporate Alberta Natural Gas Company has not. Now if we have no faith in the board of transport commissioners, our natural heritage is already lost, and to pass another bill to charter another company could have little effect in this regard.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Is the hon. member aware that the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited to which he refers made application to the transport board in September to build a pipe line following an entirely northern route through Canada?

Mr. Byrne: I think that question will be answered by the remainder of my remarks. This present bill may be some indication that the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited cannot meet the requirements I have enumerated earlier. If that is so they would be precluded from obtaining a licence to transmit gas.

Alberta Natural Gas Company

It is significant that the Westcoast Transmission Company, which obtained its charter in March of this year, has yet to receive a permit. They requested that their original application for a permit to construct a pipe line through central British Columbia be withdrawn. Some members put forward the view that a line should be built through the province of British Columbia. It is a point of view with which I certainly wholeheartedly agree. They argued that we should supply Canadian industries first. They should not be so naive. It may be that it cannot be agreed by the companies and the board that such a line is practical, possibly in view of the fact that their markets must be in British Columbia and also in the northwest portion of the United States. If they should find it is impractical to transport gas by one particular route, then an alternative certainly would be necessary. If it were made absolutely statutory that a pipe line to supply such markets must be built in any one particular direction, then if it could not be built at competitive prices there would be no pipe line at all. I say that as long as we are sure the needs of Canada will be served first, regardless of the route, then there must be some alternative.

There is an age-old argument that the railways were built to develop the country regardless of cost. I do not feel that holds true in this case. We must remember that prior to the railways being built there was no other method of transportation unless we consider the covered wagon and the oxcart. I am quite sure hon. members will agree such transportation offered no competition whatsoever to the railways. It must be remembered there is a competitive field in British Columbia and the Pacific northwest. For example, there is the question of coal. I think if I were going to raise an objection to this or any other pipe line bill it would be on the basis that possibly it might deprive some of my constituents of a job, but I am sure they are sufficiently progressive that they would not ask me to take such a stand. We have coal, wood, sawdust, tremendous hydroelectric power, and in the foreseeable future atomic power. If a pipe line cannot be built at a cost sufficiently low to compete with such fuels, then a pipe line will not be built at all.

I was not a member of the house when a charter was granted to the Westcoast Transmission Company, but I understand the bill passed with little opposition. Therefore I had assumed that any other such bills would pass with little opposition, and that even a second or third charter could be granted. It is my considered opinion that anyone opposing the measure at this time is committing an offence against our system either wittingly or unwittingly, and is helping to set up a Canadian monopoly in the pipe line business. We have been asked why we are silent on this matter. I think there was considerable reason to be silent. I felt any comments on this measure were absolutely unnecessary. As I said earlier, however, there were accusations in the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). In that speech he said, at page 2101 of Hansard:

> Somebody is going to have to be paid for the money spent in presenting the petition to parliament. Somebody will have to be paid for the cost of all the lobbying that has been done around here during the past several weeks. I should like to know who is paying for those things and how they are going to recoup themselves if they do not ultimately build a pipe line.

I suppose that would be their business anyway.

> That is something the sponsors of these bills should tell us. That is something the British Columbia members who have so little regard for the welfare of British Columbia that they vote for these bills should tell us. They should make it quite clear to the house just whom they are supporting in this matter, British Columbia or some pipe line promoters.

I consider that a fairly serious charge, and I wish those who hear me now to consider seriously what I am going to say. I think, in the light of all the related facts, I may ask with equal justification whether those British Columbia members who are opposing the granting of these charters are doing so for the welfare of British Columbia; or are they supporting some British Columbia pipe line promoters? One hon. member from the Liberal benches rose to point out he was wholeheartedly in agreement with the opposition on this question. I am very happy there are not more Liberals taking that position because I would say that it is an obviously biased and reactionary position, and if there were more I would be extremely apprehensive of the future of the Liberal party.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of filibustering this bill. I have some pretty strong opinions on the matter now before the house. I want to assure the house, and particularly the member who has just taken his seat, that I have no personal interest whatsoever in the bill, but I am concerned about the principles that these bills are establishing. These pipe lines will not in any way affect the part of the country I represent, but we have seen the development of the resources of that part of the country manipulated over the years in exactly the same way that these bills attempt to manipulate the resources of Alberta.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat is new here. I guess he is completely honest in what he has said, but I can assure him he has a lot to learn about finagling on the part of high finance.

Mr. Fraser: And the government.

An hon. Member: He is honest but he is green.

Mr. Gillis: If I could make myself believe the statement he has just made was correct I would be quite willing to sit down. The act to which he has referred that was passed in April merely gave the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada the right to issue licences to companies such as those mentioned in these bills. If those who desire to establish pipe lines could now go to the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada and have the provisions of this bill implemented by the board, then these measures would not be before the house.

The hon. member also said that the five bills which came in the back door from the Senate at the last session of parliament passed the house with little opposition. There was not much chance to offer any opposition.

Mr. Robinson: You voted for them.

Mr. Gillis: No, I did not. You will find that on April 29, 1949, I am recorded in Hansard as having made some fairly strong statements against them. They came in the back door on April 28 and this house prorogued on April 30. There was little discussion on them in the house. At that time we moved an amendment against them. They were sent to a standing committee, were considered there overnight, and were passed by the house the next morning. My opposition to them at that time was based on the fact that there were members of parliament then in the house who would not be members any longer after a day or two, and had no right to bind the people of Canada or the House of Commons to this type of legislation. Many of them would not be coming back; yet we were saddling the present House of Commons with legislation which I figured, on more mature judgment and with more time at our disposal in which to analyse the manoeuvring behind those bills, would not have passed. They received very little discussion or consideration, but were opposed by this group as strongly as we could oppose them in the time at our disposal; and we moved amendments to them.

The bill now before the house is exactly the same as the one we discussed Tuesday evening, and exactly the same as the four we discussed in April, 1949. I want to stress the point as far as this bill is concerned, and the other four I mentioned, that they are merely stock promotion bills. There is no capital behind them. My hon. friend said that in effect, while opposing bills of this type, we were building up a monopoly in Canada, but in my opinion the reverse is true. It seems to me that the company incorporated under Bill No. 238, the only one with capital behind it, will finish up with the one pipe line in this country. We are asked to pass these other bills incorporating companies with no capital behind them, and giving them the right to go out and sell shares. The people who have the $4,500,000 with which to gamble, the people who were incorporated under Bill No. 238, will buy the stock of these companies and in the final analysis all the stock will be owned, controlled or held by one company. That is what we want to avoid.

I think the history of this country should show us very clearly that the time has come when governments, both provincial and federal, should have some regard to our natural resources. It is all right to talk about free enterprise and smaller organizations operating under charter, but when you are juggling with the natural resources belonging to the people they have a right to expect their elected representatives to see that those resources are protected and developed in their interests, with some control by the legislative bodies of the country to see that they are used as they should be.

As an example I should like to refer briefly to the coal mines of Nova Scotia. When the leases were first given out—in that case there were leases rather than bills —there were half a dozen or a dozen operating coal companies in the maritime provinces. There was competition. They sent out sales agents; they sold coke; operations were carried on as we are led to believe would be the case in connection with the oil resources of Alberta if these bills should pass. But after a few years one major company, Dominion Coal, began to buy the stock of the smaller companies. When they had a sufficient amount of stock the smaller shareholders were squeezed out. They lost their investment, and the industry wound up with one over-all operating corporation. This type of legislation is exactly the same in principle, except that here we are doing it on a national scale.

As far as I am concerned, if I could imagine for a moment that there would be six or seven operating companies with pipe lines in Canada I should say that would be a good development, that would be decentralized control of that resource. But I cannot see it operating in that way. I am as sure as I am that I am standing here that before many years go by there will be one pipe line in this country, owned and controlled by Standard Oil of the United States through Imperial Oil, its Canadian subsidiary. By these bills we are simply legalizing the right of these stock promoters to go out and sell stock, because there is no capital behind them, no money involved at all. The oil companies are the people who have the money. They will buy this stock; there will be one operating pipe line in the country, and that is about all you will ever get out of this sort of development.

My purpose in rising at this time, Mr. Speaker, was to move an amendment. I stress, as we always have stressed in this house, the desirability of public ownership or some public control when this type of legislation is proposed. That is based on long experience with this kind of legislation, knowing the damage it can do and the difficulty of getting rid of it once it is established. When I move my amendment hon. members may vote for it or not, as they like; but if this development goes ahead in spite of the opposition we are able to offer, in the years to come I think the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) will look back at Hansard and say, "Well, I was young and a bit naive at that time, but I can put it down to inexperience; and those fellows were right." I thought I saw signs of the fine hand of the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) in some of the phrasing we heard not long ago. He did not do a bad job, either. In the years to come, if I am not here—it will be because age has defeated me—my hon. friend will be able to read Hansard and I am sure he will say, "Why, my advisers at that time were not so farsighted. The people who opposed that legislation and attempted to amend it had pretty good judgment. I am sorry I did not listen to them." So I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce):

That this bill be not now read a second time but that further consideration thereof be deferred until this house has had an opportunity to record its opinion that consideration should be given to the construction and operation of pipe lines by a crown corporation, or to a public agency owned and controlled by the government of Canada.

To anticipate hon. members who may go to Beauchesne and Bourinot and May and then back to Walpole, I want to say that an amendment similar to this was moved last session by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, Mr. Young.

Mr. Sinclair: Where is he now?

Mr. Gillis: Studying law, so he may come back here and understand Beauchesne. On April 29, 1949, he moved a similar amendment, which appears at page 2775 of Hansard, reading as follows:

That this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the construction and operation of pipe lines by a crown corporation or other public agency owned and controlled by the government of Canada.

That amendment was held to be in order, and was voted upon. I have even softened my amendment a little. That amendment asked that the bill be not now read a second time. I believe that action on this particular bill should be deferred until the house has had an opportunity of recording its opinion. These bills should be sent to a committee. We have lots of time; there is no hurry about this. I am sure every member of this house wants to do the proper thing with these bills. The bill we discussed on Tuesday night, and the one we are discussing now, should be handed to a committee so that the members can meet the people who are sponsoring this legislation. These measures could then be returned to the house with sufficient information to assure the members that they are either good or bad. If the facts are given to the average member, I believe he is reasonable enough to form an opinion that is in the best interests of the people of this country. This amendment merely suggests that we defer action to permit a committee to consider the bill. Later on, we can record an opinion based on the evidence given to us by the people who are capable of doing it, and who have the facts. So far that has not been done.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the amendment moved by Mr. Gillis. All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Amendment (Mr. Gillis) negatived on division.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this measure this evening. I listened with a good deal of interest to the remarks of the member of Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne). He is a new member in this house and I think he meant what he said, but there were some inaccuracies in his statements which will appear as I explain the different facts in connection with this measure.

I believe, as conscientiously as it is possible for one to believe, that this bill should not be passed at this session. I believe that the questions raised by this bill are of the utmost importance, perhaps as important as any questions that will be considered by this house during the whole life of this parliament. This evening I shall try to point out some of those considerations which I believe are of such great importance.

In the first place, it is quite clear that any pipe line which would be laid by the Alberta Natural Gas Company will go to the boundary between Canada and the United States at the first convenient point. From there it will be continued into the United States. There is a possibility that a branch of the main pipe line will be laid back to the Canadian cities on the Pacific coast. There is also a possibility, although I think it is very remote, that a branch line may also be laid up the valley of the Columbia into the district around Trail.

Surely there can be no question that the objective of this company is to get a natural gas and oil pipe line into the northwestern states of the United States of America; that has never been denied. Many hints have been made to the contrary but, in my opinion, there is not the slightest doubt that the purpose of this company is to lay a pipe line to supply the northwestern states of the United States. I know that because about two years ago there were lobbyists in Ottawa, and they came to see me as a British Columbia member. I queried them as to whether this pipe line was to serve Canada or the United States, and they said, "Oh, well, it is to go to the United States but eventually it will get up to Vancouver." That was the plan of the promoters of this company a year and a half or two years ago.

It was interesting to listen to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) describe just where this pipe line was to go. At page 2109 of Hansard he pointed out that there was a natural route for a pipe line through the Yellowhead pass, down through the centre of British Columbia and eventually to the coast cities. I believe that is the route which should be followed by a pipe line. Then he went on to say that there was another route which would start in southern Alberta, and he defined the start of the route clearly. It would start at Pincher Creek, Alberta, and go through the Crowsnest pass to Frank, then into Cranbrook and Kimberley.

At that point the minister began to get quite hazy. He stopped dealing with geographical locations and began to give hazy directions—the sort of directions which if one took to find a place would certainly land him at some other place. It reminded me of being given the wrong directions in the army. He said it would go from Kimberley down the west side of the interior. What he meant by the "west side of the interior" is anyone's guess. At page 2110 of Hansard he said:

> Anyone who knows anything about British Columbia knows that it is a province of mountains and valleys. It would be utterly impossible to put a pipe line through in just one direction. In my opinion the proper way is to go south and then north into the Kootenay and Okanagan valleys, to go from the south to the north.

The minister was going north and south, and then south and north, but the one thing he neglected to say was that the route would go south into the United States, and then there might be a branch line north into British Columbia. His description was so confusing that even the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), who is rather quick at understanding these things, was misled into thinking the minister said the route would go through British Columbia. Actually, the second route mentioned by the Minister of Fisheries is obviously a route through the United States.

I should like to say a word about who is behind this proposed company. I have in my hand a dispatch from the Financial Times of November 25, 1949. It is headed "Natural Gas lines form major group of public utilities". It points out that natural gas lines are now becoming of the utmost importance on this continent, and that they are going to be among the very biggest groups of business. This is not small business we are dealing with at all when we are dealing with these pipe lines. It is business which is going to involve hundreds of millions of dollars and the jobs of hundreds of thousands of Canadians. We are not just dealing with some little side show. This article points out that there is a Westcoast Transmission Company which was granted a charter last spring, and goes on to say:

> Westcoast Transmission Company proposes to export gas to British Columbia and United States areas in the northwest . . . The company's plans, which have been approved by the dominion parliament, call for an all-Canadian route, from north central Alberta through British Columbia and include numerous retail facilities along the way . . . Total mileage 1,100 miles and total estimated cost $170 million.

Then it goes on to describe the other pipe line, the one which we are discussing tonight:

> The Northwest Natural Gas Company, an American concern, expects to export gas via Kingsgate, B.C.—

Which is in the riding of Kootenay East.

> —to the state of Washington. Chances for this company do not appear so good, since its plans call for export of Alberta gas primarily to the United States, without giving consideration, to the same extent as other companies in the field, to the real needs of Canadian provinces. Total cost $100 million.

It also deals with Prairie Pipe Lines Limited, the other company which is seeking a charter, and says:

The Prairie Pipe Lines Limited, whose plans have not yet found the full approval of the parliament at the time of writing, also call for export of natural gas to Washington state and for re-import of part of this gas to southern B.C.

The Northwest Natural Gas Company which, I suggest, is behind Alberta Natural Gas Company—if it is not, let the members who are sponsoring this bill get up and say who is behind the Alberta Natural Gas Company—is a subsidiary of Venezuela Syndicate Incorporated of New York. If hon. members care to look up Moody's Manual of Investments, 1949, they will find, at page 857, the particulars of Venezuela Syndicate Incorporated. We are dealing here in effect with a United States corporation. The natural gas is not to go through United States in bond to another point in Canada, which is the way the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said that the oil was to go from Gretna, Manitoba, to Superior, Wisconsin, and so to Sarnia. That is not the case here. I do not believe it is the case with the oil pipe line either. I think the bulk of that oil is going to the Chicago area. But this gas is not to go in bond through the United States from one Canadian point to another. It is to go to the northwestern United States to develop the states of Washington and Oregon which are in direct competition with the province of British Columbia in practically every line of our endeavour.

Then there is another consideration. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, with that promptness and readiness with which he so often gives assurances which never turn out to be of much value, assured us one evening that he would see to it that Vancouver got this gas before any went to the United States; that Vancouver would be looked after in any event. That of course was an absurd statement. All that the Minister of Trade and Commerce can do is to give or to withhold a permit for the export of gas. Once he has given that permit for the export of gas, he has no way of forcing it back into Canada. We all realize that he is a "big shot" in this government, but he cannot go that far; and when he gave that assurance, he was talking right through the top of his hat. We need some more certain protection. We require to have far more assurance that this gas is going to get back into Canada once it leaves Canada at Kingsgate in the riding of Kootenay East.

That brings me to this further question. If Canada is to have gas and oil lines across the border of the United States, then there must be some international treaty between Canada and the United States, one which would provide in this case that the gas line would come back into Canada; that the United States authorities would see to it that that gas line came back into Canada. If there is to be an exchange as between different parts of the continent—that is, if western Canadian gas is to go into the United States and eastern United States gas is to come into Canada—then that should be set out in an agreement between the two countries. There should also be provision that there would be no interference with the gas going from one point in Canada through the United States to another point in Canada. But there is no such agreement at the present time. I asked that question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in the standing committee on external affairs last Friday, a week ago today. Hon. members will find the questions and answers at page 40 of the reports of that committee. That page, in part, reads as follows:

Mr. Green: My first question has to do with international gas pipe lines. There are some of those lines crossing the boundary at the present time but apparently there are to be others crossing from Canada. Has the department given any consideration to the question of whether there should be international agreements negotiated to cover the installation of those pipe lines? For that matter, are there any such agreements in existence at the present time?

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Mr. Green was good enough to mention this point to me after the meeting this morning—

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is referring to the proceedings of a committee which I do not think has made a report.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has brought to my attention the fact that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) is reading, from the proceedings in the committee, evidence taken in a committee which has not yet reported to the house. I do not think it is in order for him to read the evidence at this time.

Mr. Green: Perhaps I can put it in this way. I will make the statement on my own responsibility—and let the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Cote) get up and deny it if he can—that there is no agreement between Canada and the United States at the present time concerning pipe lines to convey either oil or natural gas.

As a result of this question the Department of External Affairs has just begun to look into that whole field. At the moment the control of these pipe lines that cross the boundary is not in the hands of the United States government or of the Canadian government. It is in the hands of these oil and gas companies. They are setting policy at the present time and the fact that there is no international agreement alone justifies a delay in dealing with these bills.

The minister also said that Alberta must decide. He was very happy that he could evade the responsibility and put it back onto the Alberta government. At page 1599 of Hansard he said:

> And may I say in passing that I am very glad indeed, as a member of this government, that the province of Alberta has relieved this government of the responsibility of making a choice of pipe line companies to do this particular job.

That is not the responsibility of the province of Alberta. It is the responsibility of the Canadian parliament under the system which is being followed. The only sort of measures that the province of Alberta can enact, or any other provincial government, are based on the conservation of natural gas. They might bring in a regulation and say: We will impose this restriction in order to conserve natural gas. But when they go further and use that power to stop the movement of natural gas into another province or into the United States they are exceeding their power. That is not within their jurisdiction. I submit that they cannot control the export of these commodities, and therefore the responsibility rests here with the Canadian parliament.

Mr. McIlraith: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he know how many pipe lines there are supplying oil and gas to Canada from the United States at the present time?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): There is a question on the order paper asking the hon. member that question and he could not answer it this morning.

Mr. McIlraith: I am asking the hon. member if he knows.

Mr. Green: This comes under the department in which the hon. member for Ottawa West is a parliamentary assistant. It would be appropriate for him to rise in this debate and give us that information, and make an argument, if he wishes, on the point of whether the Department of Trade and Commerce is following a wrong policy in connection with these bills. It would be interesting to have an argument from the hon. member.

Mr. Mitchell: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Green: I hope it is going to be "in a kindly way"!

Mr. Mitchell: Yes. Can he explain to me how the people of British Columbia can eat all their own salmon and use all their own lumber?

An hon. Member: Don't be silly.

Mr. Green: Does the minister want them to eat all their own lumber too?

Mr. Mitchell: No, I will leave that to my Tory friends.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You are chewing the rag.

Mr. Mitchell: That is all right.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra permitted the question. I think the house should allow the question to be asked.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): If he will ask it.

Mr. Mitchell: There are one or two things—

Mr. Green: Not a speech.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. member does not want to be parochial. Can the people of British Columbia eat all their own salmon, use all their own lumber, and eat all their own apples?

Mr. Green: The minister has asked me if the people of British Columbia can eat all their own salmon and use all their own lumber. Of course the answer is no.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You learn something every day.

Mr. Mitchell: You could not eat all their salmon.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I would not eat it at all.

Mr. Green: There is another consideration, and it has been mentioned before in these debates. It is very important and I think every hon. member agrees with it. In these charters the route which is to be followed should be set out. That has been the practice in railway charters right from the start. It should be the same with charters for oil and natural gas pipe line companies. The bill under consideration has no such restriction whatever. It gives this company power to install a pipe line anywhere within or outside Canada. In other words, it is given power to put in a pipe line for natural gas or oil anywhere in the world. That is just ridiculous. The route should be defined. There should also have been a route put in the charter of the Westcoast Transmission Company. There is no doubt of that. On this point I agree with the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne).

Mr. Warren: Carried.

Mr. Green: No, it is not carried yet. The reason was that these bills came to this house not in March, as the hon. member for Kootenay East said, but in April. They came up for discussion for the first time on the evening of April 29.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Green: It was around nine o'clock, and they were referred to the committee. The committee sat for about half an hour. The bills came up for third reading the next day, the last day the house sat. I hold in my hand Hansard of that day.

On motion of Mr. Green the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): You did a good job.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I would suggest that those hon. members be permitted to use the only English word they know, namely, "carried".

Mr. Warren: Don't be too smart.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

Public archives—

319. General administration and technical services, $176,393.

Mr. Pouliot: I shall not take much of the time of the committee. Since we are hearing so much being said about Canadian citizenship and about the building of a proposed national gallery, I submit, sir, that one of the most important matters is the study of the history of this country. I knew intimately the first archivist, Sir Arthur Doughty, who succeeded in making so many important historical documents available to the Canadian people. I wonder how many of my colleagues knew Sir Arthur Doughty personally. He and Adam Shortt working together published real treasures of history from the beginning of the country. Anybody knows how difficult it is for anyone to study in the parliamentary library, which is one of the richest in this country, or to go to the expense of going to the archives to take notes there of all the documents on the past history of this country. Doughty and Shortt succeeded in having most important documents published under the title of "Constitutional Papers" or "Constitutional Documents". A few of the documents were published each year in the annual report of the archives, but we now find that some of the most historical documents are difficult to get. The publication of these documents was discontinued, either on account of the war or for some other reason, and the result is that they are not now available to Canadian students. In my humble opinion this publication should be resumed from the point at which it was stopped, in order that all Canadians who want to know something about the history of their country may have easy access to them.

The new Secretary of State is doing very well at the head of his department and I congratulate him. I wish him every success, but I do hope he will give definite instruction that the publication of these historical documents be resumed at the earliest possible date from the time the previous publication was stopped. I make this suggestion in order to promote a greater knowledge of the history of this country by our young people from Newfoundland to British Columbia. Some of these publications are quite difficult to get and perhaps a reprinting may be necessary. Many young people who want to study these things cannot afford the heavy travelling expense of coming to Ottawa. These documents should be available in the home, in the college or wherever it may be necessary in order to promote knowledge of the history of Canada.

Could the Secretary of State tell us how many people have been working at the archives cataloguing the correspondence of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier? What amount was paid for their services? How many people have been working during the last few years cataloguing the correspondence of Mr. King? At the present time historical documents are made available only after fifty years and in my humble opinion they should be available to the people almost immediately. We now have access to the correspondence of Sir John A. Macdonald who died more than fifty years ago and to part of the correspondence of Sir Wilfrid Laurier who died exactly thirty years ago. Sir Wilfrid lived a long time and some of his correspondence, particularly about the Manitoba school question and other matters, should be made available to the public.

Mr. Bradley: As I said this afternoon, the papers of both Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier are in order. As yet there is not a complete catalogue prepared, but any of the papers that are available can be seen by anyone who wishes to see them. All of Sir John's documents are available, but not Sir Wilfrid Laurier's, because some of them are not yet fifty years old.

I think it would be impossible to say just what it has cost to put these documents in order and prepare them for examination because the work was done under votes which included the activities of other public officials. The number of officials first employed in looking after Mr. King's papers was three. That was back in 1946, and the number has since been increased to four.

Mr. Pouliot: How much are they paid?

Mr. Bradley: In 1946-47 they received $3,613; in 1947-48 the amount paid was $8,244; in 1948-49, $10,059; and in 1949-50 up to October 31, $6,680.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank the minister, but I think that is costing much more than the correspondence is worth. I suggest to him that he stop that expenditure now so that any expenditure necessary will be borne by those who will be reading the correspondence. We are being asked to spend money each year in preparing that correspondence but we cannot see it.

Item agreed to.

Civil Service Commission—

50. Salaries and contingencies of the commission, $1,379,143.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to say a few words with respect to item 50. I gave notice to the Secretary of State last evening, when we were dealing with another item in his department, that I would be asking some questions when we reached this item. I felt last night that the Secretary of State did not quite understand some of the things I was saying. I will try to make it more clear tonight. As I understand, there is in the civil service what is known as a quota system. I believe the effect of the quota system is that in the various departments of the government, not just in the office of the civil service commission itself but in all departments, only a certain percentage of the employees can be permanent. The remainder have to be listed as temporary employees. The result is that many people are temporary for years and years. They are permanent in many respects but not legally, and not so far as pension rights are concerned. I should like to know what progress has been made in recent years by way of increasing the percentage of employees who can be classified as permanent. For example, what was the percentage of permanent employees to the entire civil service two years ago? What was the percentage a year ago, and what is it now?

Mr. Bradley: At the present time there are 45,000 permanent employees compared with 77,000 temporaries. In 1948 permanency was granted in 5,715 cases. To the end of October this year permanency has been granted in 4,670 cases. Subject to the conditions which I have outlined, substantial progress in additional permanency is being made.

Mr. Knowles: The figures the Secretary of State has just given indicate that 4,670 have been granted permanency this year. Does he mean by that—

Mr. Bradley: To the end of October.

Mr. Knowles: To the end of October, 1949. Does he mean that that number of people who were previously temporary have been made permanent, or that there have been that many new employees taken on?

Mr. Bradley: That is correct.

Mr. Knowles: Which?

Mr. Bradley: These are temporaries who have become permanent.

Mr. Knowles: How do the figures of 45,000 permanent and 77,000 temporary compare with any year that the Secretary of State may care to give, two years ago or three years ago? He has said progress is being made. I should like to know to what extent.

Mr. Bradley: Roughly about 5,000 a year.

Mr. Knowles: You cannot give me precise figures?

Mr. Bradley: No, I have not got them here.

Mr. Knowles: If I cannot get them I cannot get them. But having asked the question last night, I do not think it is good enough that the minister cannot give us that kind of information after twenty-four hours.

Mr. Bradley: Of course presumably the figures can be obtained, but I did not know how many years the hon. member wished to go back.

Mr. Knowles: I said last night I would be asking the question, and I had hoped the minister would be able to discuss what progress was being made with regard to this percentage matter. I did not call it a quota system last night, but that is the name it is best known by. I cannot figure out now what these percentages are as quickly as I might, but with 45,000 permanent and 77,000 temporary it is no wonder that the hon. member for Queens time and time again when we are dealing with the estimates wants to know why there is such a big item for temporary assistance. But apart from that I do not think it is fair to take on so many employees in that way, and among other things that they should have lesser status at least so far as pension rights are concerned.

Mr. Pouliot: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre must know very well that whenever anyone is employed as a temporary in the civil service he assumes he will be made permanent within a short time.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Pouliot: Oh, yes; it is my personal experience.

Mr. Knowles: How long is "short"?

Mr. Pouliot: Well, that is that. How many were working tooth and nail to get temporary positions during the war, and afterwards remained as permanents in the service when there was a distinct understanding they would be temporary at the time they were appointed? My hon. friend knows that. It is human nature. They accept the position with the understanding that it will be temporary for a year, two years or three years. They can be told not to report at any time, but they take for granted as soon as they join the civil service that it will be for their whole life. It is unfortunate, but it is human nature and cannot be changed.

Besides that, there is something else my hon. friend knows very well. He knows that the minister is piloting the estimates of the civil service commission, but he is not responsible for the civil service commission for this reason. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre and those of his group speak of the merit system. They tell us to leave the civil service commission alone, let them do their work, and do not interfere with the promotions that are made by them. I have a high regard for Mr. Bland, Mr. Nelson and Mr. Boudreau, the new commissioner. I know them well and have a high regard for them, but it has been the policy of the C.C.F. group to build a Chinese wall between the civil service commission and all other departments of the government. The hon. member knows it and will admit it. Therefore who is to blame in that regard? Is it the commission or the minister? The minister is only here to supply money for the civil service commission to proceed with its work. Of course the civil service commission may have very good reasons for not appointing a larger number of permanent civil servants. It is their own policy, and it may be entirely different from the policy of the government.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I think the hon. member for Temiscouata somewhat misses the point. As I see it, the point is that it is unfair to a person who is employed by the civil service to be continued indefinitely on a temporary basis, thus denying him the pension rights which others have. That is the basis of the argument, and I think there is some legitimacy to it. I wonder if the minister can answer this question. If he cannot do so perhaps he can provide the information later. Can he tell us how many civil servants there are still on a temporary basis who have had ten years' service or more with the civil service?

Mr. Bradley: Approximately 40,000.

Mr. Knowles: Is ten years a short time?

Mr. Bradley: In reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I should like to say that sessional paper No. 100C dated November 18, moved by Mr. Fraser, perhaps contains a good deal of the information that the hon. member requires. I notice here that in 1948 in the Department of Agriculture the number of permanent employees was 572, and temporaries 2,003. In the succeeding year the number of permanents was 701, and temporaries 2,629. There was an increase there in both cases. There are some others here I can give him if he is prepared to do a little addition in the matter.

Mr. Fraser: Has the minister the figures for the film board?

Mr. Bradley: I shall see if they are here.

Mr. Pouliot: Before the minister answers may I be permitted to reply to what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. I never said it was fair or unfair that there should be a large number of temporaries. I did not say that at all. I explained what happened in my own experience, and it is impossible to make a general statement about the fairness or unfairness of the number of temporaries unless there is a report on each case, because each is different. I have recommended some of my constituents, who were temporary, for permanent positions; and what has been the answer by the departments concerned? "We will wait until the civil service commission makes a decision about it." The policy of my hon. friends—whether it is right or wrong I am not going to discuss at the moment—is to give the civil service commission a free hand. Therefore how can they place the blame on the government?

Mr. Bradley: In the national film board the number of temporary employees is 577; and permanent employees, 23. Before I sit down I should like to say that the conditions under which permanency is granted to civil servants come under four headings. First, the work of the civil servant in the department must be satisfactory. Second, of course, he must pass the necessary civil service examinations. Third, the work in which he is engaged must be of a continuing and permanent character. Fourth, his permanency must fall within the quota of permanent positions prescribed for this department by the treasury board.

Mr. Knowles: Now, in what the hon. member for Temiscouata has said and what the Secretary of State has just added, we are getting down to what I am talking about. The hon. member for Temiscouata has said that we in this group—and I hope we are not alone in this but that every party in the house takes the same view—feel that a Chinese wall should be built around the civil service commission as far as appointments are concerned, with no political interference. I hope the hon. member for Temiscouata was not crediting that view to us alone; I hope it is the view of all parties.

Mr. Pouliot: I have no power of attorney to speak for anybody else. I just mentioned what I knew from experience.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member said he had found that if he made recommendations to departments that so-and-so be made permanent the reply was that this was up to the civil service commission; in other words the departments do not make the appointments, nor do members of parliament—I hope. That is the way it should be. But government policy and the general policy of the civil service commission surely are matters on which we can comment. Just now the Secretary of State indicated—and I think this is the first time I have heard it from such a high official—that there is what is called a quota system, that the civil service commission prescribes that in the various departments there may be only a certain quota or certain percentage of employees classified as permanent. I think the figures given by the Secretary of State as examples, dealing with a number of departments, have made hon. members generally feel that the quota of permanent employees is really pretty low. If it were to be considered that civil service work is a temporary thing, which is on the way out, one could understand it; but the activities with which the government must concern itself are increasing and will continue to increase as time goes by. We are not going to have fewer civil servants in future than we have now; the likelihood is that we shall have more. Since that is the case I still think it is not fair to ask forty thousand civil servants—I think that was the figure mentioned by the Secretary of State—who have been with the government for ten years or more still to be classified as temporary. I do urge the Secretary of State and the civil service commission in this public way, through him, to try to find some way to increase that quota of permanent employees permitted in each department. I think that would be only fair to the service as a whole, to the morale of the service, and to the employees themselves.

Mr. Pouliot: After what has been said my hon. friend is too logical to blame the Secretary of State for what he considers the small percentage of permanent employees, which results from the fact that a quota has been established by the civil service commission.

Mr. Knowles: I am trying to get at the civil service commission in the proper way.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I do not think anyone is inclined to blame anybody for anything. We are trying to get some facts, which I find very interesting. If we have forty thousand employees of the Dominion of Canada who have been working for us for more than ten years, one must assume that they have a certain degree of competence, otherwise they would have been dismissed. That competence must exist, so surely they have some right to be placed on a permanent basis, like others in the service. The minister has told us that as far as permanency goes they are divided into four groups, those whose work is satisfactory, those who pass the requisite examinations, those whose work is of a continuing nature, and those who are lucky enough to come in under the quota. Can the minister tell us how many of those who are not permanent have failed to achieve permanency for each of these four reasons?

Mr. Bradley: For only one, or for all four?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to know the figures for all four, very roughly, if the minister can give them to me.

Mr. Bradley: The position is that during the war very little was done in the way of shifting from temporary to permanent. Since the war a good many of the openings have been filled by veterans. I believe that is declining in volume now, and I think I can say that the number of changes from temporary to permanent will show a considerable increase in the near future.

Mr. Knowles: A couple of times during the course of my remarks I made the statement that civil servants who have to continue as temporaries thereby fail to qualify for pension rights during those years. Just to get it confirmed may I ask, was I right or wrong in making that statement?

Mr. Bradley: That is correct.

Mr. Knowles: All the more reason for hoping that this process will be speeded up.

Mr. Gillis: I think the subject discussed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre requires a little more elaboration. How did the civil service commission arrive at this quota basis? Ten years is not a long time when you consider the position of many of the employees of this House of Commons. Some of them have been here for twenty-five years, and they are still temporary. They have no pension rights, no security of any kind. They are just getting older and older, and expecting to go out some stormy night and find themselves with no means of livelihood at all. That is not a very nice thing to look forward to after having been employed by the people of Canada. We have forty thousand people who have been working for the government for ten years or more but who are still in the position that they do not know whether or not they have a job; they are temporary employees. They do not come under the superannuation scheme. Perhaps after ten or fifteen or twenty years someone in the commission will come along and say, "You are going to be made permanent tomorrow. You will then have the right to come under the superannuation provisions, but you will have to pay into the fund everything you would have contributed during the last twenty years, plus interest on the money you did not pay, to cover the security you did not have during the fifteen or twenty years you were temporarily employed." Does that not sound rather ridiculous? I should like to see any corporation, large or small, sit around the table with a bargaining committee of a union and try to justify that sort of an arrangement. Does that not mean there is something wrong there? I imagine anyone who is responsible for the administration, and who thinks in those terms, should go and see a psychiatrist; there is something wrong upstairs. We have discussed this time and again. Will the minister tell us how they arrive at that quota?

Mr. Bradley: The hon. gentleman will have to ask the treasury board that question. They will have to answer it because I am unable to do so.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May I give some information on this subject? The number of temporaries in each department can be explained in different ways. The establishment of each department is not only decided upon by the civil service commission after it investigates the needs of the department for permanent and temporary positions, but their report is submitted to the treasury board. The treasury board officials then inquire into the requirements of this department, and decide on the establishment as a whole, as between permanents and temporaries.

Before the war those departments would have their establishments on a percentage quota; some would have seventy per cent permanents and thirty per cent temporaries, and so on. When the war came along, to protect the rights and privileges of those who were in the armed forces, the civil commission made no permanent appointments—perhaps the occasional one, but very few. At that time thousands of temporary employees were hired. After the war the commission and the government of the day applied the veterans' preference, and those men were brought in but could not become permanent without having at least one year of service. The temporaries employed during the war were replaced by veterans, and as the need for permanents developed in the departments those veterans became permanent.

I do not suppose there are two departments in which the percentages as between permanent and temporary employees are the same. I do not think the civil service commission should take the blame for the number of permanents or temporaries in the department because, in the final analysis, they do not make the decision. It is the treasury board that decides.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Under what estimate could we discuss the treasury board?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Why not wait until the Minister of Finance is present? I am answering these questions at the moment because I have been interested in civil service matters, and I am trying to give some help on the question.

Mr. Knowles: Can we ask questions about the policy of the treasury board on the estimates of the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Certainly; I have never heard the Minister of Finance refuse to answer questions.

Mr. Knowles: I have been here for some time but I have never heard the treasury board discussed on the estimates of the Minister of Finance, or on any other item.

Mr. Gillis: I do not know who they are.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If you do not know the composition of the treasury board after the length of time you have been here, you should not be lecturing the new members.

Mr. Knowles: Who are the members of the treasury board?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is the Minister of Finance and five of his colleagues.

Mr. Knowles: Who are they?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The Minister of National Revenue; the Minister of Public Works—

Mr. Gillis: Good, now we know whom to blame.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The minister without portfolio, who was formerly the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Hon. Mr. MacKinnon; and the last is the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Perhaps I am making a mistake in the name—oh, and the Minister of Agriculture. Those are the members of the treasury board. Any time you need further information, I shall be glad to supply it.

Mr. Knowles: We are making progress, Mr. Chairman. A while ago the hon. member for Temiscouata and I had a difference in endeavouring to find out where to go to deal with this quota problem. He finally said that it was clear that we should go to the civil service commission. In one of his answers, the Secretary of State said the civil service commission laid down these quotas to the various departments.

Mr. Bradley: No.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Public Works now tells the committee it is the treasury board that reviews the proposals made by the civil service commission, and that body has the final say as to these quotas.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Certainly.

Mr. Knowles: Then it is a proper matter to discuss on the floor of this house if the decision is made by the treasury board, which consists of five or six ministers who are in this house. It becomes more evident it is a matter of government policy, and I believe we are more than justified in pleading from the floor of this house for an increase in those quotas.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am not telling the hon. gentleman he is wrong in pleading that the number of permanents be increased and the number of temporaries decreased. I am not speaking about that. I am trying to give the procedure which is followed.

Mr. Knowles: You have done very well.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): During this discussion certain things have been said that are not in accordance with the facts. It has been said that these temporaries lose their right to superannuation. If one considers the prevailing rates employees, and there are a number of them in my own department, if they are veterans who have been employed in the department for two years, they are entitled to make a contribution to the superannuation fund. If I am not mistaken those who are not veterans have a right, on the recommendation of the department, to make a contribution after five years' service, and they are entitled to superannuation at sixty-five.

I am told that what I have just said would not apply to temporary employees. I am informed that there is a deduction of five per cent from the salary of temporary employees for savings purposes—

Mr. Lennard: Is that for unemployment insurance?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Part of it is, but when they leave the service that money is returned to them with interest at the rate of four per cent.

Mr. Knowles: Could we be told which department has the lowest quota of permanents and which department has the highest?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The quota may differ as between different branches of the same department.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has told us that these quotas vary from branch to branch and department to department, but some of that information should be available to us. Among civil servants this is a rather sore point. After all, as members of parliament, surely it is within our province to be concerned about the morale of civil servants, and this quota system is one of the things that affect morale.

Mr. McCann: There is always a good defence for every action of the government. My hon. friends of the C.C.F. who, if they could, would have a socialist state in this country, would proceed along the line that everyone who works for the government should be on a permanent basis. The hon. member has asked something about the quota system and I will give him an example by referring to the Department of National Revenue.

The quota of permanents for that department is quite low at the moment, approximately 40 per cent. There is a reason for that. On the taxation side there were as many as 11,600 employees in the department because of the backlog of business that had accumulated during the war years. That backlog of business will be accomplished by the end of this fiscal year and we can carry on exactly the same duties that we are doing now with probably two-thirds of that number or at least with about 75 per cent. I ask hon. members this question, as a matter of good business. Would it have been good business to have all of these employees permanent when we knew absolutely that within two or three years we would carry on the business of that department with 8,000 people instead of 12,000 people? From the point of view of economy and of saving the taxpayers' money, it would have been sheer folly to give those people the idea that at some time or other they would be permanent officials. On the other hand, it is the only means whereby there can be some latitude in weeding out.

All people who work for the government are not of the highest calibre, although in general they are. People who are in private business or in industry have a perfect right to dismiss employees if they are not giving competent service. But once somebody gets into a government department, is in a permanent position, and has become a permanent employee, you are hamstrung and you are tied right there if you try to promote efficiency in the department, because he is in there feeling that he has a comfortable seat for the rest of his life.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Does the minister mean that his permanent employees are inefficient?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. McCann: No, I do not. I think that all of my permanent employees are highly efficient.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Why should that not happen with the others?

Mr. McCann: But there would be no use in giving those who are not permanent employees the inducement that because they had gotten into the department, they could become permanent employees just because they were there. There is not the need for them. As between one department of government and another, if some people are supernumerary, they are transferred. We make a request to the civil service commission to transfer them to another department where there will be work for them. The point I want to make is that from the point of view both of economy and of efficiency it is not in the best interest of the government to have 100 per cent permanency in any department.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Will the minister tell me if they have any difficulty in getting applicants for those various jobs in his department?

Mr. McCann: No, not the slightest difficulty.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I know the readiness of the Minister of National Revenue to answer questions, but I must tell the committee that we are now considering the estimates of the Secretary of State.

Mr. McCann: That is all right. I am speaking as a private member with reference to this particular appropriation.

Mr. Hatfield: I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue how many permanent employees and how many temporary employees are in the customs and excise department.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps I did not make myself clear. I think that some hon. members did not understand quite clearly what I said a moment ago. The Minister of National Revenue intervened in this discussion merely to point out what was temporary employment by the civil service commission, by giving an example within his knowledge in his own department.

Mr. Green: He butted in.

The Deputy Chairman: After he sat down, the hon. member for Charlotte asked a question with reference to the employees in his own department. At that moment I intervened and said that I must stop the discussion and remind the committee that we were now dealing with the estimates of the Secretary of State's department. All hon. members from now on should direct their questions to the Secretary of State. I understand that later on the estimates of the other ministers will be presented, at which time questions may be asked of them.

Mr. Hatfield: How many temporary and how many permanent employees are there in the department of customs and excise?

Mr. Bradley: There are 7,800 temporary employees and 9,000 permanent employees.

Mr. McCann: No, that is wrong too; that is the two departments.

Mr. Bradley: No! There are 5,800 of each.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Which is the right answer?

Mr. Bradley: The latter.

Mr. Hatfield: What is the right answer?

Mr. Green: Nobody knows.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Green: Wait till the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton gets an answer.

Mr. Gillis: I have been waiting.

Mr. Green: Wait some more.

Mr. Gillis: I can do a little bit of talking for entertainment purposes.

Mr. Fraser: No, we want an answer.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Has the Secretary of State completed his answer?

Mr. Bradley: Yes, Mr. Chairman; I said 5,800 of each.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Cape Breton South has the floor.

Mr. Gillis: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I realize that perhaps it is unfair for us to ask the Secretary of State about this matter on this particular discussion; but I think it is a matter that has not been discussed enough in the House of Commons, at least during the period that I have been here.

During the war period it was necessary to extend the departments of government, to organize new ones and to take pretty much what you could get. But I think the time has arrived when this matter of civil servants, how they are employed and what their terms of employment are is one for the House of Commons to give serious consideration to.

I know that the methods of employing civil servants through the civil service commission outside the House of Commons and in a large part of the country leave much to be desired, and that the commission is not considered to be the impartial body that it is supposed to be. The Minister of Public Works, who is not here at the present time, undertook to answer for the Secretary of State; and in my opinion he made a worse job of it than would have been made if he had left the Secretary of State alone. The Secretary of State was not doing so badly. He at least was careful in his answers. But his adviser, when he took over, laid great stress on the fact that the civil service commission did the employing, that the civil service commission set the quotas, and that the civil service commission was all-supreme. Then in the next breath he said that the civil service commission had nothing to do with it, that treasury board is supreme, and that in the final analysis "we five men make the decision".

An. hon. Member: Six.

Mr. Gillis: Five and himself. The civil service commission, I believe, employs approximately 122,000 people. Of those, 40,000 have been employed in some capacity in the government service under the commission for the last ten years. They go back in their employment previous to the war. So the Minister of Public Works cannot write that situation off by saying that, with the veterans coming back, preference had to be retained for them. That 40,000 were employed previous to the war, and they are still temporaries. They cannot become permanent until the treasury board says so. The chiefs of the departments who work with the personnel who are taken in under the terms of the commission know the qualifications of these employees. Why should the final say in determining whether they are essential and should be permanent or not rest with six men who have nothing to do with most of them? That is something which should be corrected. The Minister of Public Works made it quite clear that not for reasons of efficiency but for reasons of economy they say they are not needed, whether departments are crippled or otherwise.

While the Secretary of State indicates that there are some 40,000 temporaries, many instances will be found of people who are only six months, and sometimes less than that, employees of the department under the civil service commission and who are made permanent at very good salaries, while those who are performing essential services drag along for over ten years and never become permanent.

I agree with the Minister of National Revenue that, no matter whether they are designated as permanent or not, if they are not fulfilling the duties of the position that they occupy and there is reason to dismiss them, the fact that they are permanent employees should not interfere with it. I have no hesitation in saying that nobody should be put on a job and be told that he is going to stay there permanently, and because he is a permanent employee he can sit around and do nothing. I do not think it is fair to anyone who has supervision over a department. A certain amount of work has to be performed. The probationary period of an employee should not be longer than a year. The chief of a department and the head of the civil service commission should know in a year whether an employee is good, bad or indifferent. If he measures up and performs his duties he should be made permanent after a year's employment. They should not go along for a longer period than that. The fact that an employee is permanent should not preclude his dismissal if there is cause for it.

The permanent employee who has more security is a much better employee than a person who is sitting around for ten years in an insecure position, not knowing where he fits in. That employee is not much good. I am just a human being, and if I were in that position I would be watching for a better position than the one that I occupied. I would be looking for the time when I would have to get out. There is something wrong with a job or with a person who drags along for ten years and is not entitled to the rights and privileges that are given to other employees in the organization.

We have to do a lot more talking about this kind of thing. Government in Canada is becoming quite a large organization. I have always looked on this House of Commons as a trades union of the civil servants who are employed under the regulations laid down by this house. We are the people who should be protecting them. We make these laws. We should not leave it to any six-man board to have the final say on the future of thousands of people who are rendering essential service in this country; and we should not be keeping them in the insecure position in which they are today, without the provisions of the superannuation allowance. That is all I have to say on the subject tonight. In the future we are going to have a lot more to say about it. I just wanted to say this because I think the Minister of Public Works did not do as good a job as he thought he did. I am sorry he left the chamber.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I am not sure whether a certain private member intervened in this debate as a cabinet minister or whether the cabinet minister intervened as a private member, but I think he succeeded in helping to add to the confusion. He conveyed to me the impression that forty per cent of the employees of his department were on the permanent list; whereas the Secretary of State when he answered the question—I am not sure whether I have the right percentage—gave me a percentage of fifty. The only way to clear up this difficulty and have everything crystal clear is to have the Secretary of State give parliament the quota for every department of government.

Mr. Bradley: I do not know whether the hon. gentleman wishes me to read this, but there are six pages of it. For instance, in the Department of Agriculture, under departmental administration, the quota is 85 per cent; publicity extension, 80 per cent; advisory committee, marketing services, administration, 85 per cent; economics and dairying, 70 per cent. I do not know whether the hon. member wishes me to read all these.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to get the information that is available.

Mr. Bradley: Does the hon. member want me to read it, or will he look it over himself?

Some hon. Members: Put it on Hansard.

Mr. Bradley: I will read the whole thing.

Mr. Lennard: No, take it as read.

The Deputy Chairman: I presume the hon. member has heard the minister say that the document covers six pages.

Mr. Fraser: Put it on Hansard.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I have no objection to its being placed on Hansard, for I think the information should be made public.

Mr. Bradley: I will put it on Hansard.

The Deputy Chairman: Would it be agreeable to the committee to have the document placed on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bradley: The document follows:

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Brooks: There is another matter in connection with superannuation in the civil service that I wish to say a few words about. The superannuation act was amended in 1947 in order to make provision for the superannuation of veterans. A return which I received a short time ago indicates that very few veterans are taking advantage of the Civil Service Superannuation Act. I asked the department how many active service veterans of world war I, who were not in the civil service prior to enlistment, but who had subsequently joined the civil service, applied for superannuation benefits under the superannuation act. This is the information I received. In the Department of Agriculture there were 423 veterans who joined that department after returning from overseas. Of that number only 53 have taken advantage of the superannuation act. I will not give all the departments. In the comptroller of the treasury branch there were 231 in that category. Seventy-three applied to take advantage of the act. In the fisheries department there were 70 and only seven are taking advantage of the superannuation act. In the penitentiaries commission there were 257 returned men and only 43 are taking advantage of the act. I could go all through the different departments. They all indicate about the same percentage. This must surely indicate to the minister that the section of the act which was passed for the benefit of veterans is not really doing for them what it was intended to do.

Is there any intention to amend this act so that it will benefit the veterans, as I am sure the intention was. The chief reason why these men are not taking advantage of the act is that it is costing them far more for their annuity than they should pay. For instance, the act provides that during the time they were overseas they contribute not only their own assessment but the assessment which the government would have to pay. Besides that they have to pay four per cent interest on all that contribution over a long period of years. Many of these men did not join the government service for five, ten or fifteen years after they left the service and the result in many cases is that they are paying $1,000 or more above what they should have to pay to provide for the annuity which the act is supposed to give them. I should like to ask the Secretary of State if this matter has been called to his attention and if it is intended to make proper provision for these cases.

Mr. Bradley: The matter has not been called to my attention. This concerns the superannuation act and would be a matter for the Department of Finance.

Mr. McLure: The details show that there are 171 permanent employees of the civil service commission who receive $495,915. How many temporary employees are there and what salaries do they receive?

Mr. Bradley: At Ottawa there are 493 and in the field there are 77.

Mr. McLure: The details show the number of permanents as 171.

Mr. Bradley: One hundred and eighty-eight are permanent and 382 are temporary.

Mr. Charlton: The figure given on page 122 is 171.

Mr. Bradley: Changes have been made since the estimates were prepared some months ago.

Mr. McLure: Has the head of a department the right to make a temporary employee a permanent employee? The other day I had occasion to go to a department where there were three or four temporary employees who had been employed for four or five years and who were anxious to become permanent. The head of the department told me that it was his prerogative to make those people permanent. I asked him how that would be done and he told me it would be by recommendation to the civil service commission. He told me that it would then go to the treasury board. That is taking the right away from a commission and giving it to government patronage.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Nonsense.

Mr. McLure: If the treasury board makes the final ruling, then that ruling is being made by politicians at the top and not by the commission. If it is made by the head of the department, nine times out of ten he is a political appointee and he would make his recommendation on that basis.

Mr. Bradley: The head of the department may make a recommendation and then the civil service decides on the appointment provided that it is within the quota set by the treasury board.

Item agreed to.

Public printing and stationery—

320. Departmental administration, $60,000.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad the king's printer is in front of the Secretary of State in case he is needed to answer some questions I should like to ask. I understand it has been a practice at the printing bureau, for as long a time as some people can remember, to pay overtime at the rate of time and a half for the first three hours after the regular quitting time and double time after that. If an employee of the printing bureau is called in earlier than the usual time at which he goes to work, that is paid for at double time. The statement I have made as to payment of time and a half for the first three hours after the regular quitting time and double time after that is substantiated by sessional paper 106C which was tabled on April 4, 1949.

My information is that some changes have been made in connection with this matter, or shall I be extremely cautious and say that at the present time there is great uncertainty about the payment for overtime to employees at the printing bureau. It appears that there are a couple of orders in council which may have some bearing on the matter. One is order in council P.C. 1/4646 of September 13, 1949, and the other is order in council P.C. 4840 of September 20, 1949. The first of these orders in council relates to employees at the printing bureau while the second is of general application to prevailing rates employees.

It seems that as a result of these two orders in council certain changes have been made at the printing bureau with regard to overtime rates of pay. As I say, the long-established practice is that the overtime rate began, to quote the language of sessional paper 106C of April 4, 1949, "after the regular quitting time". Whenever that regular quitting time was over, if employees were asked to work another hour or two or three they were to be paid at overtime rates. Apparently as a result of these orders in council it is now the case that, if a man for any reason is not there to start work at the regular time of commencement, he has to work that night or after the regular quitting time, the amount of time that he was late before the overtime rates begin. May I say at the moment I am not arguing the pros or cons of the case. I do not think I need to. I am simply pointing out that a change has been made, and it was made without consulting the employees concerned.

Another point that has been drawn to my attention is that there has also been a change with respect to the rate of pay when employees are called in ahead of time. I understand it has been the custom through the years that, if it were necessary to ask a printer at the bureau to come in ahead of time, perchance because Hansard gets thicker with these all-day sessions, he was to be paid double time for that previous time. I am told they are now being called in ahead of time and are being asked to work any previous hours for straight time.

I have made these remarks in the form of statements. I could have put them in question form, but these are the points that have been drawn to my attention. I believe they are correct. At least there is uncertainty about them, right at this very time. If I am wrong the Secretary of State can get the information from the king's printer and correct me. If I am right it seems to me that the matter should be given consideration. It is not conducive to the best morale amongst working forces to change long established conditions and customs, particularly when they relate to the rate of pay.

Another point concerning which there is dissatisfaction amongst the employees at the printing bureau has to do with the differential between the day rate and the night rate. Some hon. members may recall that I put quite a lengthy table on Hansard last spring having to do with this matter and pointing to the discrepancies between the rates of pay at the government printing bureau and at printing offices in Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal. I may say the reason I name these cities is because the Public Printing and Stationery Act names Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal as a standard for rates at the printing bureau.

As I pointed out when I put these figures on Hansard before, employees at the printing bureau get a little less than is the case in each of these three cities. From time to time under the general practice having to do with prevailing rates employees, the rates have been increased, but there has always been a time lag. Last April, however, a welcome increase came through, but since then there has been a change made in the differential between day and night employees. I believe the previous plan was in existence for a long time. Evidence of the old plan was given in the sessional paper to which I have referred and which was tabled on April 4, 1949. It said that the rate for night work was 25 per cent over the day rate. As I say, that 25 per cent differential has obtained for a good many years. Just recently it has been reduced to 15 per cent. One of the reasons which has been indicated to the employees at the printing bureau for the reduction from 25 per cent to 15 per cent is that 15 per cent is the differential in effect at the printing shop in the patent record office. The answer to that is that over the years it has been recognized, and I may say recognized by the printers in the patent record office as well, that the strain of the work at the printing bureau, particularly during the months when the House of Commons is in session, is such that night work well deserves the 25 per cent differential.

I have done it before, and so have other members, but I think that again we should pay tribute to the efficiency of the printing bureau. Some of the things I am saying may indicate that I am a little bit critical of the king's printer himself because he is the administrative head of the bureau, but I want to include him with all of the employees. I want to say that they do a mighty good job especially when we consider that after these all-day sessions of the house we have the complete Hansard delivered to us next morning together with all the other documents we require. I wish Hansard could record the applause being given my remarks because it means that my statement meets with the approval of members generally.

May I suggest that working at the printing bureau these nights is a pretty tough racket, and that the 25 per cent differential is more than deserved. I should like to hear some explanation as to why it was reduced to 15 per cent, and I hope that it can be restored.

There are one or two other things that are also of concern. I may have to come back to them later but I shall mention them now. One is the feeling on the part of the employees at the printing bureau that the forty hour week should be instituted without delay. I know that at times when printers have asked for a forty hour week, and other trade union workers for that matter, employers have said: All you want is to reduce the number of hours you work regularly so that you can start drawing overtime sooner. Workers in a good many trades, and particularly in the printing trade, have demonstrated across the country that when they ask for a forty hour week it is not for the reason that I have just mentioned. They want a shorter work week so that life may consist of something else than their daily toil. I hope that the government may give a lead in this matter, and the printing bureau would be a good place to start; and soon, I hope.

I understand that some of these grievances about which I have been speaking are issues right at the present time, perchance tonight, over at the printing bureau, while we are discussing them here. I feel it is unfortunate that these labour-management relationships in a plant that belongs to the people of Canada should be handled, as they have been to a large extent, by order in council. That is not the best way to achieve the best in labour-management relations, and it is because it has been done that way, because there is this dissatisfaction at the bureau, that I feel it is necessary to raise these matters tonight. The forty hour week and the labour-management relationship are extremely important but perhaps they are more or less of a long run nature. The immediate sore spots are the uncertainty as to when overtime rates of pay start, and the reduction in the night differential from 25 per cent to 15 per cent. I would be most happy if the Secretary of State could answer these points satisfactorily.

Mr. Bradley: I do not know whether or not I can answer them satisfactorily, but I can attempt to answer them. The hon. member is quite correct on the question of overtime. An employee is supposed to put in his day's work before his overtime begins. If he stays away from work in the morning for an hour or two hours, as the case may be, the rule is he must put in his time that day before his overtime begins. If he is called in ahead of time he gets his overtime that much earlier in the day. As to the night differential, it is quite true that formerly it was 25 per cent, but I understand that in ordinary trade circles it is only 15 per cent, and it has been reduced in accordance with prevailing rates. The question of the forty-hour week is under consideration at the present time, but at the moment I understand that efforts are being made to readjust wages in both Toronto and Montreal, and we are awaiting the result of those negotiations. Then I think we shall be in a position to make a move in the matter.

Mr. Knowles: The minister says my statement with respect to what is now being done in regard to the time that overtime rates begin is correct. I am sorry to hear that. I had hoped he would say there was uncertainty which was being cleared up. May I ask if I am correct in saying that a change has been made; in other words that formerly overtime started, as was indicated in the sessional paper tabled in the spring of this year, after regular quitting time? Is it the case that formerly the hour a man worked by being called in early was paid for at double time?

Mr. Bradley: That is correct. The change was made under order in council P.C. 1/4646.

Mr. Knowles: Was the matter discussed with the employees at all before the change was made?

Mr. Bradley: I should say also that in this order there is no specific quitting time or starting time.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister answer my question as to whether or not this matter was discussed with the employees before the change was made? After all, it is a change to the detriment of the position of the employees.

Mr. Bradley: As far as I know the answer is no.

Mr. Knowles: Well, Mr. Chairman, about all I can say is that this is hardly the way to bring about the best of labour-management relations. Despite the fact that now, across the floor, the Secretary of State is not in a position to meet the points I have raised, I hope the fact that I have raised them in public will mean that they will be given more serious consideration.

Mr. McLure: Is all the government printing done at the printing bureau?

Mr. Bradley: No.

Mr. McLure: Is most of it farmed out? If so, could I have the names of some of the larger concerns to which it is farmed out? How far east do they go, and how far west?

Mr. Bradley: I understand that, as the hon. member says, most of the printing is farmed out. I do not know whether I can give him any names. One of the things farmed out was the annual report of the department, which is not printed yet though it has been in the hands of the printing branch since the beginning of the session. Owing to lack of equipment and staff I very much doubt whether it will be printed before the end of the session. The total amount spent by this department to meet the requirements of parliament and of the departments of government was $7,811,000, including the cost of paper. The amount spent in 1948 for parliament and the departments of government will be found on page 24 of the annual report.

Mr. Lennard: What proportion of that is farmed out?

Mr. Bradley: Of the $7 million?

Mr. Lennard: Yes.

Mr. Bradley: The outside printing amounted to $3,060,214.74, not including paper stock.

Mr. Brooks: What firms did the printing?

Mr. Bradley: I have here a sheet from the public accounts showing the names and the amounts farmed out to each firm where the amount was over $10,000.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On what page of the public accounts?

Mr. Bradley: Page U-7.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to offer one other suggestion to the Secretary of State. I feel that he is not taking as seriously as he should the grievances of these very faithful employees of ours over at the printing bureau. If nothing else can be done to meet their requirements I would suggest that some time —as far as I am concerned it could yet be done this session, but if not certainly it could be done next session—the matter of working conditions at the printing bureau be referred to the standing committee of this house on the printing of parliament. I am not in the position the leader of the opposition was in the other day of having to ask that a committee be set up. That committee is in existence. It meets only about once a year to do a routine job. I am not suggesting that this should be done every year, although that might be a good plan. But certainly once in a while it would be a good idea to have this question referred to that committee, before which might be called the king's printer and members of his administrative staff, together with representatives of the employees.

I am not asking the minister to answer that suggestion tonight. I was glad to note that he nodded his head as I was speaking, but I do not suppose that that commits him firmly to the proposition. In all seriousness, however, I do ask that thought be given the suggestion. I am sure it would be a good idea, and I believe it would help relieve some of the tension that now exists if the matter of working conditions at the bureau could be referred to that committee.

Item agreed to.

322. Canada Gazette, $130,000.

Mr. Cardiff: What is the reason for the increase in this item? I see that in 1948-49 the amount required was $94,980, and there is an increase of $35,020 this year.

Mr. Pouliot: This is an item of expenditure and does not give us any idea of the revenue of the department for the past year, which is in another book. All the cheques for the payment of notices appearing in the Canada Gazette are made payable to the Receiver General of Canada. It is only the expenditures that are shown, therefore, and the revenue is not. This leads to inevitable misunderstandings, as my hon. friend can easily appreciate.

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Chairman, the increase is caused by reason of the fact that the Gazette has been divided into two parts. Part I is now the general Gazette, and part II consists of the statutory orders and regulations.

Mr. Fraser: It would not be due to the fact there are more orders in council?

Mr. Bradley: It might be.

Mr. McLure: What is the revenue from the Canada Gazette? It has a circulation.

Mr. Bradley: For the year 1948-49, there was a deficit of $34,844.

Item agreed to.

324. Distribution of official documents, $95,000.

Mr. Charlton: Last night the Secretary of State told us there were approximately 150,000 booklets printed for his department. Was it not the king's printer who printed those booklets?

Mr. Bradley: Those were printed by the bureau and paid for by the department.

Mr. Charlton: Approximately $70,000 was spent on that particular item, and if the total income of the printing bureau was only half that amount—

Mr. Bradley: I did not say that. I said that the deficit of the department was $34,000.

Mr. Lennard: Then that was not an answer to the question. The question asked by the hon. gentleman was as to the amount of revenue derived from the Canada Gazette.

Mr. Bradley: The revenue from subscriptions was $27,570, and from advertising $59,943.25.

Mr. Lennard: What was the cost of printing and distribution?

Mr. Bradley: The printing and binding cost $97,615.07, while editing and translating cost $9,870.

Mr. Knight: I should like to ask the minister who pays for the printing of the voluminous divorce evidence the members receive. There are only two sources from which payment could be made, either out of public funds or out of the fees that are paid by the principals in those cases. I believe that in either case it is a waste of someone's money. I suppose it is logical and correct from the point of view, I was going to say of history, that some printed record of the evidence in these cases should be available, but I do not understand why copies should be sent to every member.

I do not know of any member who ever looks at one of these reports. Personally, I throw the package in the waste paper basket unopened. If someone is interested in a particular case, I suppose he should be able to send for printed copies of the evidence, but I know of no occasion during the five years I have been here upon which I would have sent for such a copy. It seems to me a waste of someone's money. I should like to know whether it comes out of public funds or whether it is paid for out of the fee that is charged the applicant.

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman is referring, I presume, to the copies of the Canada Gazette which are supplied the members of parliament.

Mr. Knight: No; there are such things as printed copies of the divorce evidence which are sent to our rooms.

Mr. Bradley: Those matters are ordered printed by the house and are paid for by it.

Mr. Knight: The expense of printing that evidence comes out of the public revenue of this country?

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister tell us the cost per year for printing this divorce evidence?

Mr. Bradley: I have not the figures, Mr. Chairman, and of course it changes from year to year.

Mr. Knight: Can the minister obtain the figures for the last year in which the figures are complete?

Mr. Bradley: I believe it would be possible to obtain the information, Mr. Chairman, although it is not here.

Mr. Knight: Can the minister obtain it? Is it obtainable?

Mr. Bradley: I believe we can get it.

Mr. Knight: Will the minister produce it?

Mr. Bradley: I shall do the best I can.

[Mr. Bradley.]

Mr. Knight: Thank you. Before I resume my seat, I should like to repeat that if the cost is met out of public funds, then I consider it a waste of public money.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: The last item is item 854 which may be found in the further supplementary estimates at page 11.

854. Plant equipment and replacements—further amount required, $327,500.

Mr. Knowles: Can the Secretary of State tell us how much of this item is for equipment? On page 37 of the supplementary estimates, I notice the item is broken down into equipment and supplies. Is some of this for new equipment at the printing bureau, and if so what is the nature of the new equipment?

Mr. Bradley: During the war years—and the conditions of the war years exist in a limited way today—it was not possible to purchase new equipment, with the result that much of the machinery of the department has deteriorated to an extent that its replacement is necessary.

Additionally, new production methods, particularly with respect to press work, are being adopted and the absorption of the Victoria island plant and the establishment of the patent printing service have necessitated the purchase of new machinery.

I do not know whether the committee want me to read all the details, but for the offset section for the Victoria island plant the total is $89,501.10. Then there is the duplicating pool in the same place; the cost is estimated at $9,481.50. Then there is the patent printing plant; the cost amounts to $3,186.50 In the printing bureau proper, there is quite a list of articles, the total of which amounts to $194,149.41.

Mr. Knowles: Mainly presses, I take it?

Mr. Bradley: There are various machines; quite frankly, I do not know what some of them are.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

172. Departmental administration, $365,500.

Mr. Drew: Before dealing with any of the items in particular, there is one subject that I should like to mention at this point. I will explain to the Minister of Mines and Resources that, in doing so, I am presenting these views at this time instead of waiting until the appropriate item comes forward; and because of the fact that any statements that may be made with regard to the different distinct subjects that come under the Department of Mines and Resources can be dealt with as each of those headings arises, I would defer any other remarks until those come up in that way.

At this point I should like to speak about the situation which we have today in this country in regard to a large number of our people, namely the Indian population. It seems to me that there is a mistaken impression that the Indian population in our country is steadily decreasing and that, with the passing of the years, the number will become less and less. That is not so. There was a decided drop in the Indian population of this country, from the figure of approximately 200,000 at the time the country began to be settled. As the Indian population, which had been living in the open air, came in contact with the diseases of the white man as well as with the advances brought by the white man, there was in consequence a substantial loss of population in certain areas. Because of the extension of health measures, improvement in the understanding of nutrition and the availability of a better type of food in some cases, the population is now steadily increasing. That is clearly demonstrated by the last accurate census figures of the Indian population of this country taken in 1944, as compared with the figures of ten years before that. In 1934 there were 112,510 Indians, according to the census taken that year of the Indian population. In 1944 there were 125,686, an increase of 11·7 per cent. The estimate of population growth is being maintained on that basis.

This is a substantial number of people living in Canada belonging to a race who were here before the white man came. With the constant increase of health services, the ever-increasing availability of good clothing and good food, and the readier communication with hospitals and other facilities of that kind, it would seem that we may still see a rapid increase in this already substantial population.

There is no use in saying what should have been done at any time in the past. The past is gone. I suggest that the time is overdue for us to find a way of bringing into full citizenship within Canada these people who have demonstrated, by certain individual examples of achievement, that given the right type of education they will make as fine citizens as there are in this country. When I make that rather sweeping observation, I am making no loose statement. My own contact with the Indian population of this country has covered a fairly wide area from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I have seen them not only in my own native province of Ontario, in which I had certain responsibilities in regard to educational facilities that were afforded, but I have seen them right across Canada. I have seen them in the sub-Arctic where the most northerly tribes are to be found. Wherever you meet the Indian population you find striking evidence of the fact that, given education and the opportunity to use that education, and given the surroundings in which they are able fully to associate themselves as citizens in our communities, they are under no natural disadvantage which in any way limits the possibility that they can take their full place wherever they may live. In my native province I have known doctors, lawyers and businessmen of full Indian blood who have made a great success of what they had undertaken. One of the most highly regarded magistrates in Ontario today is an Indian of pure blood who saw service in two world wars and who served as a brigadier in the last war with a very fine record.

I simply offer these individual examples, which include names like that of Dr. Oronoteki of Toronto, a very well-known and famous doctor there in the early part of the century, and other men like him, to demonstrate that we have a responsibility to extend the full opportunity for citizenship which has not been accorded to these men and women with their proud traditions and with their background, which is so closely a part of the whole development of our country.

It is not something that can be done rashly; it is not something that can be done in an unplanned way, because the very type of training that has been given does unquestionably impose some limitations upon some part of that substantial population. But I do not think we can begin too soon to make sure that every young boy and girl of Indian blood in Canada is given the same education as any other person in our country. At a time when we are thinking so much of the full equality of every human being within this and other countries, it cannot be a source of satisfaction to us that today some 130,000 of our people are under limitations which make it very difficult for many of them to accept their full share within our social and economic structure.

The problem is very largely one of education. Education is exclusively under the provincial governments, but it is essential that there be something more than education simply from the academic point of view. The education must be given in surroundings which suggest no limitation afterwards upon the full employment of such advantages as each pupil may obtain from the education he receives, because they must feel while they are being educated that they can employ to the full that education in their contacts and in their lifework afterwards. For that reason I would strongly urge that at the earliest possible moment either a parliamentary committee or a royal commission be appointed to examine this whole problem and to recommend a course which may be followed in cooperation with the agencies of the dominion and the provincial governments which would have some share in tackling this great problem.

I mention a royal commission as an alternative because I know that a parliamentary committee did sit for some time on this subject. It may be that certain difficulties were encountered which prevented a successful outcome of the discussions which took place before that committee. I do not pretend to know what happened, because I have not had an opportunity of personally inquiring as to just what did take place. If for any reason it was found that the parliamentary committee was not the satisfactory procedure to deal with this subject, then I should think a royal commission, which would probably be composed of several commissioners embracing a knowledge of health, a knowledge of education and a special knowledge of Indian affairs, might well be set up to tackle this problem.

I do not want to add anything more on this point than to say that it is estimated we have approximately 130,000 Indians in Canada today. I do not think that any of us can feel entirely satisfied with the situation as it is. I think we have ample proof that given good education under circumstances that implant in the minds of the Indian youth a feeling of full opportunity in this country of ours they can succeed as well as anyone else. Therefore, through you, Mr. Chairman, I convey this suggestion to the minister, and urge that this subject be taken up in view of the evidence we now have that this population, far from diminishing, is steadily increasing, and that the sooner we tackle this problem the more certain we are of doing it before the difficulties have greatly increased the task that is before us.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Mr. Chairman, before we adjourn I should like to say that the Indian affairs committee did do splendid work. There was nothing in the work that has not been satisfactory. While we have not been able to implement all the recommendations of the committee, a great many of them have already been carried out and further consideration is being given to the others. I would not like any suggestion to go forth that the work of that committee had not been greatly appreciated and most satisfactory.

Mr. Drew: Without extending the time I would not want any impression left that I had been expressing a critical comment about the committee, because I said I was not aware of the details. Because of my own association with educational matters I was aware, however, of certain limitations under which the Indians of this country are carrying on at the present time.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On page 7 of today's order paper four resolutions appear in the name of the Prime Minister concerning three new departments, namely, the Department of Resources and Development, the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and a fourth resolution concerning an amendment to the Salaries Act. We should like to proceed with these four resolutions as the first order of business tomorrow. I saw members of the different parties and they agreed that it would not be a very long debate. We may even discuss the three or them at the same time. Then there is another resolution to be found on page 6 of the order paper in the name of the Minister of Finance to amend section 7 of the Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act, 1947. Then we will go into committee on Bill No. 174 to amend the Pension Fund Societies Act. Then there is the second reading of Bill No. 143, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act. I understand that this is to extend the provisions of the act for another year. Then there is the second reading of Bill No. 133, respecting the application of a national trade mark to commodities and respecting the true description of commodities. When those bills have been dealt with we will go into committee of supply and try to take up the estimates of trade and commerce and mines and resources.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): In that order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

Office of the chief electoral officer—

49. Salaries and expenses of office, $39,668.

Civil service commission—

50. Salaries and contingencies of the commission, $1,379,143.

APPENDIX

RENT CONTROL—CORRESPONDENCE WITH PREMIERS OF SASKATCHEWAN AND QUEBEC

MINISTER OF FINANCE

Ottawa, November 9, 1949

Honourable Maurice Duplessis,
Premier of Quebec,
Quebec City.

My dear Premier:

On October 23, 1948, I wrote to you about rent control, confirming the intention of the federal government to ask parliament for powers to extend rental control for a further twelve months beyond March 31, 1949.

In that letter I pointed out that:

"The constitutionality of continuing federal rent control has already been questioned and is now before the courts. The federal government does not wish to do anything to prevent any province from making provisions to deal with the situation that would arise should continuing federal rent control be held invalid and is prepared not only to make available to any province federal rental administration with all available staff, but also, subject to parliamentary approval, to pay the cost of any provincial rental administration for one year."

An exchange of correspondence then took place between us, but your government did not avail itself of our offer. Similarly, no other province requested us to vacate the field of rent control in its favour. Newfoundland, when it joined Canada, retained its own system of rent control.

Accordingly legislation extending rent control to March 31, 1950, was introduced into parliament and received approval.

On Thursday last, November 3, I made a statement in the House of Commons outlining the government's intentions with respect to the further extension of rent control. My statement will be found at page 1433 of Hansard for November 3.

In that statement I said:

"The government has therefore decided to refer the question of the validity of the rental regulations to the supreme court, in the hope and expectation that a decision will be given before the present legislation expires. As I have said, the law officers of the crown are of opinion that the rentals regulations are valid. They are also of opinion that both the law and the facts support the view that it lies within the authority of parliament to extend these regulations for a further period. Counsel will be instructed by the Attorney General of Canada to press this view before the court. The order in council making the reference is being prepared and when approved will be tabled in this house.

If no unfavourable decision is given, the government at the next session will ask parliament to grant a further extension of the rentals regulations. The government intends to continue with its program of orderly decontrol as rapidly as conditions warrant, but we do not believe that this program can be completed before March 31, 1950. Let me make it quite clear that the purpose of clarifying the legal position is not to perpetuate federal rent control. On the contrary, the purpose is to confirm our authority to proceed in an orderly way towards the eventual withdrawal of all controls. This has been our firm policy towards wartime controls in general and rent control is no exception.

Should the supreme court find that the rentals regulations are now beyond the powers of parliament, then of course a different situation arises. I am accordingly writing at once to the premiers of the provinces acquainting them with our intention and offering to assist in the preparation of what might be termed "stand-by" legislation if they wish to present such legislation to their respective legislatures.

After the most careful consideration of all the alternatives, the government believes that this course of action is the best. We believe that gradual and orderly decontrol is the right policy. At any time, however, that policy could be frustrated by an adverse decision of the courts. Such a decision might come at a most inconvenient time when the provinces might not be in a position to act as they see fit in the interests of their residents. By referring the question to the supreme court before the present legislation expires and by giving ample notice of our intention to do so, such a situation can, we hope, be avoided.

I should add that the federal government, of course, continues to stand ready at any time to vacate the field of rent control to any province which makes a formal request to that effect. We do not wish to stand in the way of any province which desires to operate in the field of rent control."

My purpose in writing to you at this time is to draw your attention to this statement of government policy and to offer to assist you in the preparation of provincial rent control legislation. If you wish to avail yourself of this offer, I shall be pleased to arrange to have Mr. Owen Lobley, the rentals administrator, put himself at your disposal.

Yours very truly,
D. C. Abbott

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER
Province of Quebec

Quebec, November 16, 1949

Hon. D. C. Abbott,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

Mr. Minister of Finance:

At the first cabinet meeting held since November 10th instant, I communicated to my colleagues of the executive council your letter concerning federal rent control, dated November 9 and delivered at my office the next day.

Your letter obviously concerns only particular aspects of this important problem. We respect your attitude in the matter without approving it.

Our view is and has always been that rental matters, concerning civil property and our civil code, come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. We are certain that if the rights of the provinces in this matter had been recognized by the federal authorities the situation would have been considerably improved.

For more than eight years the federal authorities have assumed, in this field, powers of an essentially provincial nature. As a result, the situation has become very complicated, and many orders and rulings of the federal rental board have been unfortunate. We are of opinion that had the federal authorities from the beginning consulted the provinces and recognized their rights in this field, we would not today have to deplore an unfortunate situation giving rise to numerous and legitimate protests and causing regrettable confusion.

For more than eight years federal bodies have, in that matter, caused many difficulties and disturbances which could and should have been avoided. After all the harm has been done, after the federal authorities have decided everything and the situation has been bungled and worsened, you say that the province may have some rights. As for us, we consider, as we always have, that these rights are unquestionable.

Eight years after entering a provincial field, you express the desire to submit to the supreme court the question of the constitutionality of the federal action and, at the same time, you anticipate the judgment of the supreme court and complicate the problem if possible still more.

It seems to us obvious that at the approach of winter, when householders are faced with the heavy expense of providing for the heating of their houses, and climatic conditions add considerably to the difficulties, the time is ill chosen to impose additional charges and obligations on the people.

Without any desire to criticize, but simply in order to re-establish the facts, we are of opinion that the central government's persistence in controlling rents has brought about a situation for which that government is undoubtedly responsible and which adds considerably to the inherent difficulties of the problem.

Ottawa has never offered to restore to us the full exercise of the rights which it has assumed in this field; the offers made to us in this matter are conditional, restrictive and, in the end, subordinate to the decision of the federal authorities.

As we declared on several occasions, the present government of the province of Quebec has always been willing to assume its obligations as it has always wished to see the federal government assume its own.

During eight years many federal orders in council have been passed and many rulings issued concerning rental control. All those documents are in the possession of the Ottawa authorities. In our view, it would be proper that we be permitted to make ourselves acquainted with their terms so that we might obtain at first hand the necessary explanations and information.

We thank you for your offer to place at our disposal the services and advice of the federal rental administrator. Without questioning his good faith and sincerity, we must say that we have greater need, in order to familiarize ourselves with the matter, of obtaining the rulings themselves and the federal orders in council.

As soon as we shall have received these necessary documents and have been able to examine them, you may be assured that the Quebec government will without delay take the fairest and most appropriate steps in the circumstances.

Yours sincerely,

M. L. Duplessis

MINISTER OF FINANCE

Ottawa, November 24, 1949

The Honourable M. L. Duplessis,
Premier of Quebec,
Quebec, P.Q.

My dear Premier:

I acknowledge and thank you for your letter of November 16, in reply to mine of November 9, regarding rent control.

May I first comment on one or two of the points raised in your letter.

More than a year ago the federal government offered to vacate the field of rent control to any province which wished to introduce provincial legislation. In my letter to you of October 23, 1948, which contained that offer, I said:

"At the same time the federal government is prepared to vacate the field at any time after March 31, 1949, to any province which may decid to undertake rent control. Normally rent control would come under provincial jurisdiction and is peculiarly suitable for provincial or local administration because of the immovable nature of real property. The federal government is anxious not to stand in the way of any province which believes that rent control can be better undertaken and administered locally.

. . . .

"This announcement of policy is being made at this time so that any provincial government which wishes to do so will have sufficient time to prepare legislation for presentation to its legislature before March 31, 1949."

Again, in a letter to me on November 3, 1948, you asked the following question:

"Does this mean that after March 31, 1949, you will definitely recognize the right and power of the province to establish, or not establish, as provincial authorities judge best, a provincial control on rentals? In other words, after March 31, 1949, will the federal government give the province exclusive power in these matters?"

On November 12, 1948, I replied to this question as follows:

"The government's policy, as announced, is that if after March 31, 1949, under the proposed extension of rent control, any provincial government formally requests that federal rental control be withdrawn in that province, the federal government will announce that it has received such a request and proceed to withdraw its controls at a date to be fixed by the provincial government in the light of the legislative plans of the province. The responsibility for rental control in that province will then rest with the provincial government and legislature."

As you will see, our offer was unconditional, without any qualification whatsoever. I therefore find it difficult to understand the statement in your letter of November 16, 1949, that:

"Ottawa has never offered to restore to us the full exercise of the rights which it has assumed in this field; the offers made to us in this matter are conditional, restrictive and, in the end, subordinate to the decision of the federal authorities."

The federal authorities entered the field of rent control as part of a national policy of controlling prices and wages during wartime. It is generally agreed, I believe, that action on a national basis was in the general interest and essential to the successful conduct of the war. The government has been removing these controls gradually, as it announced it would, and as, indeed, it was bound to do. Broadly speaking, only rent control now remains, and this is also gradually being relaxed.

The reference to the supreme court is for the purpose of establishing whether or not the federal government has the authority to continue with this policy of gradual decontrol. At any time during the past year, however, any provincial government could have requested the federal government to vacate the field of rent control so as to leave that province free to enact its own legislation.

The federal government does not venture to suggest whether or not any province should enter the field of rent control. This is a matter which must be decided by the government and legislature of each province in the light of local circumstances. We have tried, however, to avoid standing in the way of any province which decides to do so.

The province of Newfoundland retained rent control on a provincial basis at time of union. Within the past few days I have also received a letter from

Appendix

Premier T. C. Douglas, of Saskatchewan, stating that it is the intention of the Saskatchewan government to enact rent control legislation in that province, to become effective on April 1, 1950. I have replied to Premier Douglas that the federal government is prepared to withdraw its regulations in Saskatchewan as of March 31, 1950, so as to avoid any possible conflict, and, if it is his wish, to suspend the operation of orders 813 and 814—which make provision for the recently announced changes in maximum rentals—in Saskatchewan so that the status quo will be retained in that province until provincial legislation comes into effect.

You ask for copies of our rent control regulations to assist you in reaching a decision on the matter. I have pleasure in forwarding, under separate cover, copies of all the orders, at present unrevoked, made in relation to rent control.

Yours very truly,

D. C. Abbott

MINISTER OF FINANCE

Ottawa, November 9, 1949

Honourable T. C. Douglas,
Premier of Saskatchewan,
Regina, Sask.

My dear Premier,

On October 23, 1948, I wrote to you about rent control, confirming the intention of the federal government to ask parliament for powers to extend rental control for a further twelve months beyond March 31, 1949.

In that letter I pointed out that:

"The constitutionality of continuing federal rent control has already been questioned and is now before the courts. The federal government does not wish to do anything to prevent any province from making provisions to deal with the situation that would arise should continuing federal rent control be held invalid and is prepared not only to make available to any province federal rental administration with all available staff, but also, subject to parliamentary approval, to pay the cost of any provincial rental administration for one year."

On January 28, 1949, you replied saying that "the government of Saskatchewan is desirous that the dominion government continue to exercise its jurisdiction in this field and to extend the legislation relating to rental control for at least another year". Similar replies were received from all the other provinces, except Newfoundland which, when it joined Canada, retained its own system of rent control.

Accordingly legislation extending rent control to March 31, 1950, was introduced into parliament and received approval.

On Thursday last, November 3, I made a statement in the House of Commons outlining the government's intentions with respect to the further extension of rent control. My statement will be found at page 1433 of Hansard for November 3.

D. C. Abbott

PREMIER'S OFFICE

Saskatchewan

Regina, November 16, 1949

The Honourable Douglas C. Abbott,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Abbott:

Re: Rent control

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 9th instant.

I may say that the Saskatchewan government still holds the opinion expressed in my letter to you of January 28, 1949, that the dominion government should continue to exercise jurisdiction in the field of rent control. Dominion-wide control allows uniformity and other advantages. However, in view of the recent increases that you have announced, we are now of the opinion that if left in this type of dominion control, there will be no effective rent control. Further, you made the statement that:

"The government intends to continue with its program of orderly decontrol as rapidly as conditions warrant, but we do not believe that this program can be completed before March 31, 1950."

This confirms our belief that while your government intends, if jurisdictionally possible, to stay in the field, it will be in name only. The Saskatchewan government is gravely concerned with this problem, and feels that as long as there is as critical a shortage of housing as there is today, with the resultant grave injustice incurred by the people of this province, equitable rent control is a necessity.

We, therefore, believe that rental control should continue; we further believe that it would be most effective if dominion-wide, but as stated, we must express our dissatisfaction with the type of control that your government has indicated it intends to exercise. The government of Saskatchewan is, therefore, willing to accept the responsibility forced upon it and enter the field of rental control. It can, however, do this only if it has the assurance that its legislation will not be declared invalid by the Supreme Court of Canada. The law officers of the crown in Saskatchewan are not at all certain that either you, as the minister in charge, or the federal cabinet, has the power to carry out the offer made in your letter, and I quote:

"I should add that the federal government, of course, continues to stand ready at any time to vacate the field of rent control to any province which makes a formal request to that effect. We do not wish to stand in the way of any province which desires to operate in the field of rent control."

You can perhaps rescind all rent regulations in respect of Saskatchewan, and you can apparently, by order in council, vacate the field entirely. That is dominion-wide, but you do not appear to have authority to confer legislative jurisdiction on one province simply by executive action in rescinding regulations and orders respecting that province.

As a reference is being submitted to the supreme court, I would strongly urge your government to include in that reference a question that will settle this issue of power in yourself or the governor in council to confer legislative jurisdiction on a province by executive action designed to turn rent control over to that province.

It would seem that as long as the dominion has its present emergency legislation on the statute books, any single province, or any number of provinces less than all, is barred from the field.

In the tentative opinion our law officers have given, they have not overlooked the following provisions:

"4. The governor in council may revoke in whole or in part any order or regulation continued in force by or made under this act."

"3. (4) Every order made pursuant to the powers conferred by these regulations shall apply throughout Canada unless otherwise provided therein, but may apply to such area or areas in Canada or to such class or classes of persons or to such type or types of real property as such order may designate."

If, of course, the supreme court holds that jurisdiction lies in the provinces, none of these considerations will arise.

I would further strongly urge that until these matters have been settled, your government should rescind the recent increases announced and retain the status quo while these questions are being decided.

The Saskatchewan government, therefore, provided that this assurance of jurisdictional legality is given, would be prepared to enter the field of rent control. While we are at present preparing stand-by legislation, and while it would take some time to set up the necessary machinery, I would suggest the date of April 1, 1950, as the time at which we could be prepared to enter the field.

Yours sincerely,

T. C. Douglas

MINISTER OF FINANCE

Ottawa, November 23, 1949

The Honourable T. C. Douglas,
Premier of Saskatchewan,
Regina, Saskatchewan.

My dear Premier:

I wish to thank you for your prompt reply to my letter of November 9 regarding the future of rent control.

While the federal government has always believed that its wartime rent controls could not, and should not, be continued indefinitely, it recognized that some provinces might wish to enact measures of provincial rent control under the authority of section 92 of the British North America Act. For that reason the federal government, more than a year ago, offered to vacate the field in any province which wished to introduce its own legislation. This offer, as you know, was repeated again in my statement in the House of Commons on November 3.

You have now stated your intention to introduce legislation in Saskatchewan which will be effective as from April 1, 1950. The federal regulations are accordingly being amended to make them inoperative in Saskatchewan after March 31, 1950—or at an earlier date if that is your wish. There can then be no possible conflict between provincial and federal rental regulations in Saskatchewan, for ours will simply cease to be operative in that province. I am advised that there is no reasonable doubt regarding this point and that a reference to the supreme court is unnecessary.

You also asked that the recent amendments to the regulations which I announced on November 3 be suspended, pending clarification of the legal position and of the introduction by Saskatchewan of rent control legislation. As I have said, any doubt about the legal position seems to be without foundation. The federal government is, however, willing to amend orders 813 and 814 of the wartime prices and trade board, which provide for the changes recently announced, so as to make them inoperative in Saskatchewan. The status quo will therefore be maintained in Saskatchewan until provincial legislation comes into effect on or before April 1, 1950. You will understand, however, that this action was possible only because of your request to us to vacate the field and will be concurrent with an amendment to the federal rent control regulations which revokes them in their entirety in Saskatchewan as of March 31, 1950.

In other words, the position will be similar to what it would have been if your province had acted at an earlier date and was ready to put this legislation into effect now, with this exception, of course, that the federal regulations as they apply to Saskatchewan will remain as they are at the present time, unaffected by the changes recently announced, until your own legislation supersedes them.

Unless I hear from you to the contrary before December 1, I shall assume that these arrangements are acceptable to you. May I repeat my assurance that officials of the rentals administration will be ready to assist in the preparation of your legislation, should you desire them to do so.

Yours very truly,

D. C. Abbott

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, November 26, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Second report of standing committee on external affairs.—Mr. Bradette.

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That votes Nos. 51 to 70 inclusive, of the main estimates 1949-50, and Nos. 766 to 779 inclusive, of the further supplementary estimates 1949-50, approved and reported upon on Saturday, November 26, by the standing committee on external affairs, be referred back to the committee of supply.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Speaker, as a matter of procedure, is this motion not premature before the report of the standing committee on external affairs has been concurred in by the house? It has been presented only today, and I should think until there is concurrence the estimates should not be referred back to the committee of supply. I am not positive of that. Perhaps the Prime Minister has some clear idea as to what the procedure is.

Mr. St. Laurent: It appeared to us it would not be proper to ask for concurrence in the report, because the report approves these estimates, and approval is subject to the right of the committee of supply to vote all public moneys. Concurrence in the report by the house would deprive the committee of its jurisdiction. It follows that the proper procedure is to refer the items back to the committee of supply before the house concurs in the report of the standing committee on external affairs.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO LOANS, EXPENDITURES, ETC.

Hon. Colin Gibson (for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 210, to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Gleason Belzile (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): The bill is a simple one, involving no outlay of money. In the original bill passed in 1944 it was stipulated that the amount that could be lent was $25 million. Of that amount, up to $15 million was limited to loans in the higher category of $200,000 and up. The amount of $15 million has been almost entirely used up. The bill seeks to provide that the aggregate amount of such loans be increased from the $15 million provided for in the original act up to the $25 million.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 205, for the relief of Bernard Rivet. —Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 206, for the relief of Phyllis Elizabeth Campbell Westover.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 207, for the relief of Mildred Blanche Tilson Bell.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 208, for the relief of Ruby Anderson Edwards.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 209, for the relief of Vera Marguerite Abraham Allen Richey. — Mr. Winkler.

HOUSING

QUESTION AS TO WITHDRAWAL OF FEDERAL RENT CONTROL IN MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): In the absence of the Minister of Finance I would address this question to the Prime Minister. If the premier of Manitoba sends a letter to the Minister of Finance similar in content to that received from the premier of Saskatchewan, will the government consider suspension of the pending rental increases in Manitoba?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The policy of the government has been clearly stated in the correspondence which has been tabled. The government of Saskatchewan has expressed its intention of exercising rent control as from a date not later than April 1 next, and has requested that the announced changes be not put into effect in that province in order that they might start from the situation as it exists at the present time. It is the policy of the government to comply with any such request that may come from any of the ten provinces.

Mr. Coldwell: Have any other requests been received so far?

Mr. St. Laurent: Not to my knowledge.

NEW DEPARTMENTS

RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT, MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS, CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolutions:

That it is expedient to present a bill to constitute a Department of Resources and Development with a presiding minister to be appointed by commission under the Great Seal of Canada, with the duties, powers and functions as therein set out, a deputy minister to be appointed by the governor in council, and the necessary officers, clerks and employees to be appointed in the manner authorized by law, with provision also for the transfer of members of the staff of the Department of Mines and Resources or the Department of Reconstruction and Supply to the new department.

That it is expedient to present a bill to constitute a Department of Mines and Technical Surveys with a presiding minister to be appointed by commission under the Great Seal of Canada, with the duties, powers and functions as therein set out, a deputy minister to be appointed by the governor in council and the necessary officers, clerks and employees to be appointed in the manner authorized by law, with provision also for the transfer of members of the staff of the Department of Mines and Resources or the Department of Reconstruction and Supply to the new department.

That it is expedient to present a bill to constitute a Department of Citizenship and Immigration with a presiding minister to be appointed by commission under the Great Seal of Canada, with the duties, powers and functions as therein set out, a deputy minister to be appointed by the governor in council, and the necessary officers, clerks and employees to be appointed in the manner authorized by law, with provision also for the transfer of members of the staff of the Department of Mines and Resources and the Department of the Secretary of State to the new department.

He said: I understand the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) has discussed these three resolutions with the leaders of the various groups in the house, pointing out that they really involve only one matter and that it might be convenient if they were considered in committee at the same time. If there is no objection, I move that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee to consider these three integrated resolutions, dealing with the setting up of three new departments.

Mr. Graydon: In view of the fact that we are merging the three resolutions in order to expedite the matter, it might be well for the Prime Minister to make his statement before the Speaker leaves the chair; then we can discuss these matters in committee.

Mr. St. Laurent: If that is the wish of the house, I have no objection. I thought possibly in the course of my statement some questions might arise which I could answer immediately, but I can make my statement now, and the questions can be asked and answered when the house is in committee.

The main reason for legislation this session in this respect is the necessity of making some permanent provision for the functions now performed by the Department of Reconstruction and Supply. Hon. members will recall that this was one of the measures foreshadowed in the speech from the throne. It was thought at first that the Department of Reconstruction and Supply might be simply dismantled and its existing functions transferred to other departments of government, and in fact that process was under way after the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) assumed his present portfolio. Several of the functions which had appertained to the Department of Reconstruction and Supply were subsequently transferred to the Department of Trade and Commerce.

A year ago, when the present Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) was appointed, most of the remaining functions which that department had inherited from the Department of Munitions and Supply were transferred to the Department of Trade and Commerce, and the functions left in the Department of Reconstruction and Supply were largely those inherited from the original department of reconstruction which had been set up in 1944, plus ministerial responsibility for housing and for tourist activities.

It was understood when the present minister was appointed that the department was a stopgap, as it were, and that at an early day there would be a redistribution of departmental functions. When we began to give consideration to the appropriate departments to which the remaining functions of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply might be transferred, it appeared that the department which had the most closely related functions was mines and resources. That department, however, already was rather unwieldy, and the government concluded that it would not be reasonable simply to add further functions to that department, including what was becoming the heavy ministerial responsibility in respect of housing. It was then decided to redistribute the functions of the two departments in the way we felt would contribute most to efficient administration and expeditious service to the public. There were two branches of the Department of Mines and Resources each of which was obviously capable of providing the focus or nucleus for a new department. They were the mines branch and the immigration branch. As a matter of fact there had been a department of mines previously, which in 1936 was combined with the department of the interior to become the Department of Mines and Resources.

Mr. Green: It never had a separate minister, did it?

Mr. St. Laurent: I would not like to say, because that department went back to 1907, and I would not care to make a positive assertion about the whole of the forty-two years. As the hon. member knows, the Geology and Mines Act provided for the creation of a department of mines. That was a statute of 1907, which has never been repealed; but the sections which provided for the setting up of a separate department of mines were repealed in 1936 when the Department of Mines and Resources was created, and those functions were transferred to mines and resources at that time.

There has been a growing feeling, particularly among those interested in mining, that the importance of the mining industry and of the government's relations with that industry was such that there might well be a minister of the crown devoting most of his time to this field of mines and mining. Then, of course, there are certain surveys of a technical nature carried on by the government, in particular the geological survey, which are closely related to the development of mining. Moreover it was felt that the other technical surveys, such as geodetic, topographical and hydrographic, now administered by the Department of Mines and Resources, would be likely to be more expeditiously administered if included in the department which had the responsibility for the geological survey, and that having these together in a well-integrated department would be more likely to do away with overlapping.

In this connection it is worth noting that the union with Newfoundland added to the territory of Canada the island itself and the large area of Labrador as well, which will add considerably to the territorial scope of the activities of the proposed Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

On more than one occasion in this house there was expressed a growing feeling that the immigration branch had very little relationship to the other activities of the Department of Mines and Resources. It was almost an orphan, perhaps in very good company but not in a company that had any special reason for being interested in its activities. The increasing importance and complexity of immigration required more attention from both the minister and the deputy minister than it was humanly possible to give to the immigration branch, included as it was with the numerous other branches of the Department of Mines and Resources. I am sure that many hon. members have felt that, on occasion, it took more time than appeared to them to be necessary to have matters dealt with in the immigration branch when they had to receive the personal attention of the minister or deputy minister of the Department of Mines and Resources.

It has also been apparent for some time that the relationship between the citizenship branch, under my colleague the Secretary of State, and the immigration branch, under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Mines and Resources, should be as close as possible. The citizenship branch is designed to bring to full citizenship as many as possible of those who immigrate to this country. The scope of the citizenship branch has been expanded since the passing of the citizenship act. It was felt that uniformity of policy and treatment was more likely to be achieved if one minister had the responsibility for both immigration activities and the activities pursued by this branch of the government to bring those immigrants as quickly as could reasonably be expected to full citizenship. It was felt, too, that having these two branches of administration in the one department would be more apt to avoid possible overlapping of services.

Once the decision had been reached to recommend the establishment of a Department of Citizenship and Immigration, it was considered that the minister responsible for this department should, in addition, be given the responsibility for the Indian affairs branch. I believe it is the policy of all members of the house to attempt to have the Indian affairs branch administered in such a way as to bring the original inhabitants of Canadian territory to citizenship as quickly as that can reasonably be accomplished. It was felt that it would have some psychological effect to say that these three activities dealing with human beings, and which are designed to bring those human beings to the status of full citizenship as rapidly as possible, were under the one head. Having citizenship, immigration and Indian affairs in the one department would indicate that the purpose of the activities of that department was to make Canadian citizens of those who were born here of the original inhabitants of the territory, or those who migrated to this country.

It is not intended, of course, that the hospitalization of the Indians will be transferred from the Department of National Health and Welfare to the new department. It is felt that it creates a good psychological effect to leave the impression that the health of the Indians is a matter which is of the same concern to the public as the health of those who enjoy full citizenship in Canada. Once the limits of those two departments were charted, it became clearer than ever that the most important remaining activities of the Department of Mines and Resources and the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, including the administration of the National Housing Act, trans-Canada highway and so forth, were concerned with a single purpose, namely, the physical development of the various aspects of our national heritage.

As those who were here at the time will remember, the purposes of post-war reconstruction were defined by my predecessor, Mr. King, when he introduced the bill to establish the reconstruction department on April 17, 1944, as involving the re-employment of nearly two million Canadians whose activities had been channelled to war activities during the last terrible war; the conversion of wartime industries to peacetime industries; the recovery of markets which had been dislocated during the war period; the restoration of railways, highways, and other capital equipment which had deteriorated during the war; the development of civil aviation; the planning of public works and services and the development of projects to provide alternative employment while wartime industries were being converted to peacetime purposes; the encouragement of new housing, both urban and rural, and the improvement of existing housing. Many of these objectives were the primary responsibility of other departments, and many of them have already been achieved.

The original reconstruction department was to be mainly concerned with co-ordinating the activities of all the departments, but it was to have a special responsibility for the planning of public projects and services, and the development of projects. Later, the responsibility for housing was transferred from the Department of Finance to the department of reconstruction. The last two responsibilities, for public projects and housing, are the main continuing responsibilities of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply. When the present minister accepted the portfolio in November, 1948, he also assumed responsibility for the encouragement and improvement of our important tourist industry. These activities—housing, and public projects and tourist promotion—will fit quite naturally into the activities to be taken over by the new Department of Resources and Development from the Department of Mines and Resources, such as jurisdiction relating to the forest resources of Canada, irrigation projects, and water-power developments not specially assigned to any other department.

I believe we must realize that the development of this country in population and in utilized wealth is proceeding, and is apt to proceed. I believe we shall be making a valuable and necessary contribution to the future generation of Canadians by giving attention at once to proper forestry in Canada. This is a resource that can be renewed yearly. I was impressed by a book I read recently, entitled, "The Coming Age of Wood", by Mr. Glesinger, the chief forestry expert of the international FAO. In this book the author emphasizes, so far as it can be supported, his view that a great increase in the population of the world could still be provided with all its essential requirements if proper attention were given to the conservation and development of the forest resources, and if proper use were made of all the material that there is in a tree. According to the development of his theme, this result would be brought about not only from the utilization of the fibres in the tree, but also from the effect of good forestry on the control of the flow of rivers and streams, and on the prevention of the erosion of valuable top soil. The house will no doubt welcome the introduction of the bill, which is on the order paper at the present time, for enabling legislation to permit this government to enter into agreements with the provincial governments to assist in the development of proper forestry methods throughout the whole country.

The Department of Resources and Development would take over from the Department of Mines and Resources the national parks and various special development projects, as well as the control and management of the affairs of the Northwest Territories, the Yukon Territory and all federal crown lands not specially put under the control of other departments; and in general it would have the co-ordinating of all these activities in which the federal government can engage, either alone or in co-operation with the provinces, for the better development for the future Canada of the great natural resources with which Providence has so bountifully blessed this land.

The scope of this new Department of Resources and Development will be wide and varied. All its activities can properly be described as activities looking to the development of those resources. I can see no reason why it should not become a well-integrated department, and one in which, having all these activities, the services, skill and experience of the civil servants in one branch would be available for assistance in other branches. The broad objective of the government is to establish three departments with clearly-defined and closely-related functions and of manageable proportions.

We feel that this objective will be achieved by implementing the proposals we are now submitting.

To summarize, these departments will have the functions provided for in the Department of Mines and Resources Act, in the Geology and Mines Act, in the Department of Reconstruction Act and in the Department of Reconstruction and Supply Act. Under the bills which will be introduced, if the resolutions are adopted, the acts which I have just named will be repealed. These departments would also have the functions now in the citizenship branch of the Department of the Secretary of State. The bills would provide that they come into effect on proclamation.

It will of course take some little time after the legislation is enacted to have the proper preparations made for the sorting out of these branches; but it would be the intention, as soon as the legislation is passed, to proceed at once to the sorting out of the branches and to the setting up of three departments at as early a date as that can be done. It may be that at the outset no new minister will be appointed, but that one minister will be charged with the responsibility for some one or other of these three departments, in addition to the functions he now discharges.

Mr. Green: Where does the film board go? Does it go to national defence?

Mr. St. Laurent: The film board is not under a department. The film board is a board, and a minister is the chairman of that board. But it is not provided by any statute that it be in any one department.

Mr. Fraser: It is like Topsy; it just grows.

Mr. St. Laurent: It so happens that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is at the present time chairman of the film board; but it is not as part of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply that he occupies that office, but by special appointment.

Mr. Green: I wonder what minister it will come under.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I was going to suggest that it would be more appropriate if questions were reserved until the house goes into committee of the whole on the resolutions.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to make a few brief observations, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the legislation envisaged by the three resolutions which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has described and explained.

First of all, despite the suggestion at the conclusion of the Prime Minister's speech to the effect that this did not necessarily mean another minister of the crown—

Mr. St. Laurent: Not immediately.

Mr. Graydon: —I want to make it abundantly clear that we are not setting up these departments for the purpose of having two of them administered by one minister of the crown; I think the house ought to be fully aware of that fact. A review of similar situations in the past will indicate that a department is never left on the loose for very long without some ambitious minister or new member desiring to be at the head of it.

I think we may as well realize now that we are to have another cabinet minister. I thought the Prime Minister might have cut this Gordian knot; it would have been a simple matter. What he should have said is that all these resolutions and all these changes in departments mean that we want to get a minister from Alberta, and that we want to give him a good portfolio. I am in agreement with the Prime Minister on that score, but I do not think we should describe so many circles in trying to get a minister from Alberta. Alberta deserves a minister; it has been without one for too long. I must say this, however. In the performance of his duties Hon. James A. MacKinnon, who is now in the Senate, did a magnificent job, and I would be the first one to commend him. But, as all hon. members will agree, there is a need for a minister from Alberta, and I suggest to the Prime Minister that arrangements be made for one as soon as possible, so that there may be proper parliamentary representation in the government for that ever-growing province. If there is a province in Canada that has made real progress, particularly in recent years, it is Alberta. It has made tremendous strides.

Mr. Sinclair: Politically, too.

Mr. Graydon: Yes. I know the hon. member is an expert on that, and I shall give him the field. But apart altogether from politics, because that may not be a good indication, the progress made by Alberta has been remarkable, and it should have representation in the cabinet. I do not think it is necessary, however, to take this circuitous route to get it.

When the Liberal government came into power in 1935 we had seventeen ministers of the crown. We now have twenty-one, and we are to have another, which makes twenty-two. Before the Prime Minister starts dividing up departments in order to squeeze in a man from Alberta he ought to consider the numerous applications he must receive every day from members of his own cabinet to be appointed to the other place. That would be an easier way to handle the Alberta situation than the cumbersome method that is being employed. I look across at the government benches and I see men who I am sure would welcome an appointment to the other place. Some of the appointments should not be delayed too long. Instead of making the cabinet bigger, it would be easier in the long run to do that and save the taxpayers a considerable amount of money; we could then have an Alberta minister without increasing the number of ministers.

Of course there is another problem. Every time a new department is set up, every time we have a new cabinet minister, inevitably parliamentary assistants start to come in. We started this in 1943. Many of the parliamentary assistants are such good men that I hesitate to say much about them, except that you can get too much of a good thing, and that is what I am attempting to advise the Prime Minister against at this time.

When the system of parliamentary assistants was instituted in 1943, we had seven. By the time we had arrived at the beginning of the last session we had crept up to twelve. I know it is down to ten now, but that is just a temporary shortage. I believe the supply is much greater than the demand, and I have no doubt the number will creep up again.

When we are speaking about cabinet ministers and parliamentary assistants, we must remember that from 1936 up to the present time we have increased the total membership of the House of Commons by seventeen —from 245 to 262. In that time we have increased the number of parliamentary assistants and cabinet ministers by fifteen. For practically every new member added to the total membership of the house a parliamentary assistant or a cabinet minister has been added. A halt will have to be called to this, because one of these days the public will be asking: Why the necessity for so many ministers and parliamentary assistants at this particular time.

I should like to say a word about the names that are used to describe the new departments. The government must have been at a loss to find suitable names when they were making these changes. To me they are cumbersome and difficult. I was interested in what the Prime Minister said about putting the Indian affairs branch in the new Department of Citizenship and Immigration. The Indians, with their numerous and justifiable claims, will wonder whether there is some significance in their being placed in the same department as displaced persons from abroad, because they have on occasion suggested that they were displaced persons at home. These suggested names are following the general line. As I pointed out in a previous debate, the general terminology applied to our ministries has been cumbersome and clumsy, and also confusing. I should like to impress upon the government the necessity of making the change that was suggested witih respect to "Department of External Affairs".

It is a cumbersome name, and I hope that at the next session the government will change it.

I should now like to refer to the Department of the Secretary of State. What I have to say is no reflection upon the present genial Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley), because these are not personal matters; they have to do with the departments. After all, the Secretary of State is not one of the overburdened ministers of the crown. I know that every minister feels he has too much to do, and perhaps more to do than any other minister. But there are some departments from which work could have been subtracted with a better result than from the Department of the Secretary of State. There are two or three departments that could readily be amalgamated, after a review by the government, thus avoiding an increase in the number of ministers. We are moving toward an unwieldy and cumbersome system of government when in peacetime we increase the number above that which prevailed during the war.

While this great move is being made by the government for additional help, it will at once be recognized how powerful was the argument made by some hon. members not so long ago on going into supply. They indicated that the opposition, no matter how small or large their numbers, are greatly hampered by the fact that they have not adequate facilities for research, and the like. In other words, with added parliamentary assistants, with added cabinet ministers, with heads of departments behind the ministers, the whole parliamentary debating system is loaded in favour of the government. I do not think it is quite fair; I do not think it is quite right. I am not suggesting that the opposition ought to have special favours. All I am asking is that at least the opposition be placed in a position to fulfil properly the functions which the government, parliament and the people expect it to fulfil.

In view of the complex structure of the many problems facing Canada today, there is need for specialized research and assistance in order that they may be properly debated in the house. I defy any member or any minister of the crown, even the Prime Minister, to make an intelligent and comprehensive contribution to debates in the house without having the advantage of research. None of us has sufficient time to spend in research; the cabinet has not the time, nor have others who take prominent parts in the debates of the house. Some sort of arrangement should be made by which the opposition may be given technical assistance by way of research and the like in the preparation of their work in the house. I repeat that in my view the appointment of additional ministers is a step in the wrong direction. Changes could have been made in the cabinet, perhaps through transfer from one post to another, which would have served the purpose equally well, and would have permitted the appointment of a minister from Alberta without delay.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, generally speaking I think the proposal made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for the creation of three new departments is pretty much in line with what should be done. It seems to me only logical that we should have a Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to deal with the technical side of government administration, a Department of Resources and Development to deal with the planning of our development and the use of our resources, and a Department of Citizenship and Immigration to bring both immigration and citizenship into conformity with modern conceptions. To that extent we welcome this proposal.

What I was going to say, however, was that I do not think that should involve the appointment of a new cabinet minister or the enlargement of the cabinet. I have often felt that our present departmental arrangements are based upon a conception of government administration of long ago, and that no substantial changes have been made in the last forty or fifty, or perhaps even in the last eighty years, so far as departmental divisions of power and administration are concerned.

Governmental activities are entirely different now from what they were twenty-five, thirty, forty or fifty years ago. Instead of being merely an arbitrator in the economic life of the nation, or perhaps a sort of policeman, the government is engaged in all kinds of economic and social activities. Those of us who followed the developments during the war, and in the more recent period the development of atomic energy, if I may use that as an example, realize that more and more governmental activities are being pushed—not because of the thinking of the present generation, but because of economic and social necessities.

It seems to me that hon. members generally, and the government particularly, should direct their thoughts to the reorganization of the departments so as to meet more effectively the needs of modern economic and social environment. This is true also of the House of Commons itself. Surely our committees need some reorganization. The obligation placed upon some committees is altogether too great, while other committees never meet. A reorganization of committees of the house should be undertaken, and at the same time some thought given to the reorganization of the cabinet itself, having in mind a reallotment of power so as to meet the modern needs of the present generation.

I think it is a sound idea to give young members an opportunity to receive training in departmental administration, and I am not quite as critical as is the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) about the appointment of ministerial assistants. Already the policy of the former prime minister of bringing in young men to assist the ministers has been largely justified, in the light of the ability of those who have come forward and in some instances have subsequently assumed the responsibilities of departmental administration.

This has been going on for generations in the British parliament. When one thinks of the number of parliamentary secretaries, under-secretaries and the like who have become part and parcel of the British administrative and parliamentary system, and when one realizes that they have gradually reached the stage where the public has had confidence in them, and where a prime minister, whether new or continuing, can look around among those young men and make a selection, I think that in the interest of government efficiency the policy adopted by this government in that connection has been justified by subsequent events.

In my view the placing of matters related to immigration and citizenship under one department of Department of Citizenship and Immigration is a wise move. I was, of course, an immigrant; it is now forty years since I came to this country. It is essential that people who come here as immigrants should be not only welcomed but also taught to value the citizenship of this country, and to have an appreciation of what Canada means to them. My own view is that in every way possible we should endeavour to make our newcomers conscious of their Canadian citizenship rather than of the citizenship they once held. If we do that, we shall build up a more unified country, with less difficulty among those comprising it, so that our population, while cosmopolitan in its origin, may be unified in its conception of Canadian nationality, and its pride in that nationality.

I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister say that our Indian population is to be encouraged more and more to assume its place in the life of our country. It has always struck me as strange that while in New Zealand, for example, large numbers of the Maoris have attained high office in the army and become members of parliament, and so on, and have thus played a great part in the public life of New Zealand, in Canada in relation to the Indians we have had very few instances of the kind. One recalls that many who in law have made real contributions to the life of this country—and there comes to my mind the name of a chief justice of Saskatchewan of a few years ago—in the church, in education and in other fields of endeavour, have had at least a fairly substantial admixture of Indian blood. Therefore it seems to me there is no reason why our Indian population should not be encouraged to take an active part in Canadian public affairs.

I was also interested to hear the Prime Minister speak of conservation, and his conception thereof in relation to the new departments that were being set up and their responsibility in that regard. I think we must give more consideration to this question than we have over the last number of years. I have read, for example, about this beautiful Ottawa valley, where the parliament buildings are situated, once upon a time having great forests of white pine which were cut down, shipped down the Ottawa river to the St. Lawrence and thence across the seas to provide masts for the great sailing ships of other days. Today you can drive from one end of the Ottawa valley to the other and you will have difficulty in finding stands of white pine of any size. They have gone, and their place has been taken by small scrub trees suitable only for firewood or pulpwood.

What is true of this valley is true of many parts of this country. In British Columbia I have seen great logs coming out of the forests on slings, the cutting down of trees and the accumulation of slash that remain. The wastefulness of generations gone by and of our generation is something for which posterity will condemn us. It is up to us to see to it that we provide for conservation.

I remember a short time ago I was driving through a section of Canada a newcomer to this country, from one of the Baltic states. I was asked why it was that there were no trees, why there were only stumps, and why it was that nothing grew here. I explained that the trees had been cut down and nothing had been done to replace them. This person said to me: "For many years that has not been permitted in my country; the cutting of the trees is entirely under the supervision and control of the government". That is particularly true in countries such as Norway and Sweden. I know the difficulty. Whenever any province of Canada endeavours to put into effect a forest conservation policy, the outcry is made that they are interfering with so-called private enterprise. No matter whether we believe in private enterprise or some other sort of enterprise, one thing we owe to our own and to future generations is that there shall not be private exploitation and the denuding of our forest lands and our other resources in the interests merely of the present generation. In Norway, Sweden and the Baltic states forest conservation policies have been in effect for years.

The same applies of course to soils. I was born in a part of Great Britain where the land has been farmed for more than two thousand years, ever since the Phoenicians first came to the shores of the British isles. During the whole of that time crops have been reaped, and today the cropping of that same soil produces far better results than much of the newer soil of Canada. Soil conservation is something we should consider more than we have considered it in the past.

If the reorganization of departments foreshadows a more intelligent policy of dealing with our minority races, our forests and our soil, then it is to be welcomed. I am not convinced, however, as the hon. member for Peel is not convinced, that it is an extension of the number of cabinet ministers or the number of departments that is necessary. While welcoming the new divisions, I rather believe that the government should be considering the reorganization of governmental responsibilities among the cabinet ministers, and the reapportionment of administrative powers among even fewer cabinet ministers than we have today.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add to the debate a voice from this corner of the house. While we are largely in favour of these three resolutions, believing as we do that government administration should be facilitated to the greatest possible extent in order that government may be as efficient as possible; yet we do have some diffidence as to the need for three departments. It seems to me that one of them is justified, while perhaps there is not so much reason for the other two. I believe the resolution creating a special Department of Citizenship and Immigration, and perhaps putting Indian affairs under that department, is a good move. I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when he says that immigrants need to be trained in an appreciation of Canadian citizenship. Not only would the minister be responsible for the general process which takes place as one becomes a Canadian citizen, but also he would have a larger responsibility for the probationary period during which these newcomers to Canada learn something of the opportunities, freedoms and other advantages that Canada has to offer. We are very much in favour of the creation of that department.

We cannot be so enthusiastic about the necessity for the other two departments. My main reason for saying so is that, after all, the natural resources of Canada come under provincial jurisdiction. I recognize there are large areas in the Northwest Territories that geographically come under this government. I am afraid that in a good deal of the work carried on there is considerable duplication as between the government here and the government of the provinces. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said something about forestry in the Ottawa valley. I do not know who is responsible; it seems to me that would be a provincial matter, but his remarks should be directed to those who have the responsibility. Anything that is good, of course, should be continued, but we do have to protect the expenditures of this country to some extent, though I personally am not one of those who care to scrutinize every dollar. As a matter of fact my economic philosophy is one of spending rather than conserving. I believe in spending; that is what makes the wheels of industry go round. It seems to me the philosophy of thrift has been carried to the extreme. However, that is just an aside. With the taxation system under which we are living we have to guard expenditures, because in the final analysis this government is going to make the people pay for everything that is done.

I realize the significance of what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said in respect to the economic and social life of a nation assuming greater and perhaps more important proportions, with the result that someone has to take charge somewhere. Thus it devolves upon the government to extend its administration, which might be the natural thing to expect. But I do not know that I altogether agree with that, for this reason. I believe there is a tendency among nations to build up and create a bureaucracy to do things for people which by their very nature, being human beings, they should be able to do for themselves. I believe the tendency toward bureaucracy exists because we have certain false conceptions with respect to society at large. Governments increase their number; their administration increases in machinery and personnel in the process of building up this bureaucracy. But the human race does not change. How does this all come about? I wonder if we have ever thought of that. Human nature does not change; it is the same as it always has been. We still wear hats of the same size; we still think with the same brains; we still eat three meals a day; we still sleep in beds; we still breathe the air; we get up in the morning about the same time; we go to bed perhaps a little later than our predecessors did. Human nature is the same; man is a free moral agent, and so on. Where does the difference come in? I think the difference arises from the fact that somehow or other there is a design somewhere to render men less free; and believe me, the more government increases—it is government here, government there, government somewhere else—the more that design will become clear. People talk in terms of government, government, government. Well, the more you talk in terms of government the less you can talk in terms of men being free. It might be well for us to reflect a little on this bit of philosophy.

Let me tell you what I think should be done if there is to be any increase at all in services. I believe the ordinary member of parliament should be given additional help. If government administration increases, or if there is to be an increase in administrative machinery, that must apply also to members of parliament. I am sure I speak for many hon. members. I happen to sit here at a sort of forty-five degree angle from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and sometimes I have occasion to look under his desk. I do not think he wears an oversize shoe, but I do not know how he finds a place for his feet among all the books and papers he brings down here and piles under his desk. Perhaps his personal staff should be increased by an extra messenger to carry down his books.

That is just a little sidelight, of course. Let us look at the tremendous machinery involved in carrying on the government. Let us look at the government reports that come to our desks. No member of parliament is able to read them all; there are not enough hours in the day. No member of parliament could read fast enough to be able to read everything that comes to his desk, even if he were to read for twenty-four hours a day.

Here we have the Department of External Affairs, a tremendously responsible department these days, through which we have our connection with the United Nations. Foreign relations is a matter that is becoming more and more important. How much does the average member of parliament know about foreign relations? I am casting no reflection upon members of the house as such, but it is almost impossible to read everything that is issued by the United Nations, coming to us through the external affairs department, and become expert in those matters in addition to looking after our other work.

If the government finds that its increasing responsibilities are such as to require a greater number of ministers and staff and administrative machinery, how much more does that apply to members of parliament. Here we are packed up in little offices. We should have more office space; we should have special and personal research men who can go into these things and boil our work down for us, so that the stature of this house would be raised in the eyes of the public who sit in these galleries. It may be that there are not so many in the galleries this morning because I am speaking; but I believe the real reason why more people do not frequent parliament is that most people believe this is a pretty dull place. It should not be so, and it would not be so if each member of parliament had an adequate staff. I do not mean the mere sharing of a secretary; I mean a research man. I am thinking of someone who could give information about the various subjects taken up in the house, so that the member of parliament could study legislation which at times is very intricate. I sat in the house during the debate on the measures to abolish appeals to the privy council, the revision of the constitution and the Combines Investigation Act; they were extremely involved. The members of the legal profession had quite a tournament at that time.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are just leaning over to tell me to come to order because I am straying from the subject. I shall return to the subject, but I am conscious of the fact that I cannot do all my work and be as expert as I should like to be because the government has not seen fit to give us adequate staff.

I am heartily in sympathy with the resolution respecting citizenship and immigration, but I think the other two—oh, we are not going to hold it up, because it is not that important—could well be put together.

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There are one or two observations, Mr. Speaker, which I had intended to make in committee, but which might be made at this time.

We had a statement from the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) which recalled to my mind a statement about the Prime Minister made by an old friend of his. It concerned the days when the Prime Minister used to appear in court. This man said the Prime Minister really did not have to argue; he just stated the facts of his case but stated them so persuasively that that ended the matter. I believe we have to be on guard against the persuasiveness and charm of the Prime Minister. When he tells us these things, it almost sounds as if they proved themselves.

I should like to make one or two comments which are really a sort of footnote to what the member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) said. The problem of the Prime Minister with respect to Alberta was clearly explained by the member for Peel, and he referred also to the more general problem of the Prime Minister with a huge and successful following who naturally feel they would like to profit in various ways from their electoral success. The Prime Minister, being what he is, finds himself sympathetic to them. His position reminds me of a few lines written by that great philosopher, W. S. Gilbert, who put his philosophy in rhymes which are easy to remember. The lines which I shall read, I suggest, depict in some fashion the position in which the Prime Minister finds himself at the moment:

> There lived a king, as I've been told,
> In the wonder-working days of old,
> When hearts were twice as good as gold,
> And twenty times as mellow.

Then, it continues:

> He wished all men as rich as he
> (And he was rich as rich could be);
> So to the top of every tree
> Promoted everybody.

The Prime Minister, as the member for Peel has already indicated, is in a quandary, in that he would like to make as many appointments as possible that would be pleasant to those who receive them.

It was perhaps a little unfortunate that this additional government expenditure should have been announced this morning, after we had heard from the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) that he was almost in a position to cut down the number of his staff by some thousands. Of course the Minister of National Revenue comes from Queen's university, and I am prepared to believe that, in many ways, he is in a class by himself. Nevertheless I say it is a little disappointing, when we seemed to be in sight of a little economy, to be subjected to a cold douche the next morning. We find that, instead of economy, there is going to be a great deal of expenditure.

It is never popular to talk about economy. I do not hold myself out as any authority, but I should like to read a word or two from the Winnipeg Free Press, to which I understand the government gives ear from time to time. Actually it is written about the trade situation, but there are a few words here which I think apply. The Free Press says this:

—Canada cannot afford to undertake many of the expensive projects which seemed possible before but are now clearly beyond our means.

This, of course, is not one of the projects which the Free Press had in mind—at least I do not think it was. Nevertheless it seems to me that economy is economy, and extravagance is extravagance. If in fact we are setting up a department which is not necessary—and I shall come to that in a moment—then we are in fact extravagant.

I remember a wise remark made by the head of a corporation whom I heard speaking to one of his colleagues who was proposing to add a new department to his firm. He said: "Now, that may be necessary, but do not fool yourself as to what you are doing; you are setting up a new kingdom, and the king will want to have as many subjects as possible." That is true. If it is true in business, where one has the acid test of the profit and loss account, how much truer is it in the public service, where there is no such test, and where the sky is the limit.

I am only going to say a word or two about the departments. I do not think anyone will quarrel about what the Prime Minister said as to the need for dealing with the various matters to which he referred. We hold up both hands for that. It was interesting to hear the Prime Minister say that at one time the dismantling of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply had been considered. As I understood him, he gave an interesting reason for that when he said it had been thought that when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) left reconstruction and supply to go to trade and commerce, he would take many of his functions with him. That, of course, is quite commendable, but I do not intend to pursue it further. I do wish to say that I am glad the Department of Reconstruction and Supply was not dismantled, and we all cordially approve of the minister who was appointed to it.

This point is still left, however, as the hon. member for Peel has already indicated: There are three or four departments, such as defence, national revenue and finance, which have under their control a far wider range of matters, a far more impressive amount of business, than this new department will have. I entirely agree with what the member for Peel said about the Secretary of State. Surely part of this could have been left with him. If in the Department of National Defence there is this tremendous range of business which is dealt with by one minister with deputies, it cannot be suggested that these matters could not have been dealt with in the same way.

I have no desire to take more time than I have. The only point I want to make is that in my opinion this is an unnecessary extravagance. It could have been dealt with another way. However pleasant it may be to elevate a new person to the stature of a minister, what we are doing is setting up a kingdom which will eventually cost this country—and I make a conservative estimate —several tens of thousands of dollars per year.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have always felt that the Department of Mines and Resources should have a thorough psychoanalysis. I have always felt the name was a misnomer, because the department has little to do with either mines or resources. I have often tried to ascertain what the functions of the department are. The estimates of the department come to the house, generally, as those of a minister who has very little to do with the technical matters that are supposed to be handled by it, and the minister is looked upon in the house as just another supernumerary rendering an annual report. I have always felt that this department should have some kind of tightening up. Whether this is the proper way to do it or not, I am not prepared to say.

The arguments that new departments and new ministerial posts are not necessary do not impress me greatly, because anyone who thinks in those terms has not been keeping abreast of the times. You cannot compare the Canada of 1949 with the Canada of even 1939. We are living in a completely different age. The argument against a ministry of trade and commerce is ridiculous, because practically all trade on an international scale today is done between government and government, and it is necessary to have a department for that purpose. Our internal markets also are largely regulated by the government. Where would the apple growers, the wheat growers or the fish industry be if it were not for the fact that a government board is buying up their surpluses and marketing them on an international scale? Whether we like it or not, that is the development; if we are to keep up to date, business will have to be done in that way.

The government is in business, whether some people like it or not. I should like to bring to the attention of the house the extent to which the present Minister of Trade and Commerce has taken the government into business, and rightly so. In the last three or four weeks he has been kicked around in this house a good deal, but I think he has done an excellent job in the field of protecting certain essential services in this country for the people of Canada. I have in mind Trans-Canada Air Lines for example. I do not think we would have T.C.A. if it were not for the fact that we had in the Minister of Trade and Commerce a fairly stubborn person who believed that we should have it. The radio is another example. The measure of public control is, I think, largely due to his activities. Then there is the Polymer Corporation. We are all proud of it. It has done an excellent job. It was thrown together when its creation was absolutely essential. Then there is Canadian Arsenals, and there are other examples that I could mention. I think the minister did an excellent job in that respect.

In order to supervise and properly control these activities, a department is necessary with someone in charge of it who really understands the situation. My only quarrel with the three resolutions that are now before us is this. For example, in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, when a minister is appointed, I do not think the appointment should be made on a political basis; neither do I think that it should be made on a geographical basis. I am not particularly concerned about whether Nova Scotia has a minister or not, or whether Alberta has one or not. But I am anxious that the minister who is appointed to that portfolio shall have the qualifications necessary for proper supervision of the department's activities. The same observation applies with regard to the Department of Resources and Development. As to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, it can be handled by anyone who can read and write. The other departments, however, are technical departments.

I should like to direct the minister's thoughts to another aspect of the situation with regard to the first two departments I have just mentioned. Mines and technical surveys are matters that are dealt with by the provincial governments also. The provincial governments have complete control over whatever minerals may be discovered. They also have a large measure of control in the granting of charters for any development that may take place as a result of these technical surveys. To what extent are we duplicating, federally, the work that is done by the provinces? I have checked on this business to some extent with regard to technical surveys, particularly as to minerals. One reason why I am glad to see that whole subject now departmentalized under some responsible person is this: as far back in the past as research has been carried on by the Department of Mines and Resources, it has served little purpose. I will mention only one aspect of their work—for example, Labrador and Ungava ore. I am informed that reports had been locked in the vaults of the federal department since 1896. Nothing was done about them until some prospector staggered over some ore and thought there was something there; then a survey was made and the archives gone into. There is no use in spending a great deal of money in carrying on that kind of work unless we are going to do something about it. I trust that under the new set-up something may be done about it.

The same thing applies to the Department of Resources and Development, having to do with a matter which also is in the hands of the provincial governments. Unless the federal government are going to enact some legislation whereby their surveys and the development of their resources is to be carried on on a national scale in co-operation with the provinces, it is just a waste of time to set up federal departments and place large staffs in them if nothing is done about the surveys made and the resources discovered. This is something upon which we must make up our minds. I hope that in the future we shall have a minister in charge of these departments who has the tenacity of purpose which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has shown. On occasions he may have shown bad judgment, but I think that any mistakes he has made were honest mistakes. To me at least, as a member of this house for the last ten years, he has demonstrated that he is the kind of person who wants to do something about the matters that he may be administering. I trust that we may have men like him in these two particular departments.

My main purpose in rising was to say that we must not be unmindful of the fact that, with regard to both of these departments, we run into the provincial governments. We should not be duplicating their work. If ministers are appointed, they should have the technical qualifications to carry on the work of the departments and to do it properly. A minister may be placed in an extremely awkward position. Let us suppose that he is Minister of National Defence. There are many technical problems to be handled and many things that he must know something about. Suppose you bring in somebody from Alberta just because he is from Alberta. He may be a farmer, and yet you bring him to Ottawa and make him Minister of National Defence. What respect has his department for him? He is just wandering around there like a ship without a rudder.

Mr. Graydon: What is wrong with the farmer?

Mr. Gillis: Nothing at all, except that he is not a soldier, and knows nothing about the technical questions that he will run into in the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Cardiff: More farmers have become soldiers than have those in any other group.

Mr. Gillis: That is fine. But in the Department of National Defence you must know something about atomic energy and the new weapons that are coming out. Neither coal miners nor businessmen have the technical knowledge which would qualify them to take over a department of that kind and command the respect of the department. The same thing applies to the new Department of Mines and Technical Surveys which is being set up. To have the respect of the department and to make a contribution in that field, the minister, regardless of the part of the country from which he comes, should have the necessary qualifications to determine whether his department is doing a proper job or not; he should not just have somebody writing stuff for him that he reads in the house and that he is not qualified to elaborate beyond the written pages that are given to him. I do not care where the ministers come from. I think they are necessary. I think the idea of breaking up the departments and departmentalizing them is the right one. I only hope that people will be put in there who want to do something about the responsibilities that are being delegated to them in these resolutions.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak very briefly, because the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and others have given expression to some of my views; but I do want to say that I am pleased in the first place to support these resolutions. Because of the explanations given to us this morning by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) I think the proposals are logical and necessary. It has been my experience that many adult Canadians are confused about the functions of certain departments of the federal government. The division of the departments and the naming of them in this way will dissipate some of that confusion. I am of the opinion that the more people we can get interested in the national government, the more people we can have in the country who have an understanding of the functions of the departments of the national government, the stronger our democracy will be.

There has been some reference to the appointment of further ministers. I support the remarks made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. We are a rapidly expanding and growing country, and the functions of government are rapidly expanding. I am all for appointing ministers who are required to carry out efficiently the work of these expanding and increasing departments.

With reference to the establishment of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, the new title is an improvement. As the Prime Minister said, our mines are very important to the federal government, and there is a necessity for co-ordination of the activities of the federal government with the activities of the provincial governments, particularly with regard to the conservation of natural resources, which several speakers have mentioned. In the department as now proposed we will have the majority of the technical staff, I presume, concerned with surveys and dealing with similar problems. There is a staff that is dealing with surveys in the Columbia river, the geological surveys and so on. It is a logical arrangement for that department.

When we come to the establishment of the Department of Resources and Development, of necessity an active minister will have to be appointed to that portfolio. I am all for it, Mr. Speaker, because I believe that if we are to develop our housing program, which is so necessary in this country, our trans-Canada highway system and our country generally, and if the dominion government is to support the development of Canada to the extent that will be required in the years ahead, it will be a full-time job for any efficient minister.

With respect to the establishment of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, I am pleased to see it now, because we have to expand the functions of the department in a logical way. The previous department had to do with natural resources and development. As the Prime Minister said, this department will be primarily concerned with human resources. I think the establishment of a department under which immigration, citizenship and the care of Indian affairs comes under one branch is logical, and I am sure it will appeal to a large section of the country.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I want to make a reference to parliamentary assistants. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) criticized the number of parliamentary assistants that this government has appointed. Personally I am pleased to know that this government is appointing parliamentary assistants. I say that because of my personal experience in this house. They perform a very necessary function. In the first place, it seems only reasonable to provide an opportunity for, shall I say, the brighter and coming young men of the house to be trained in departmental activities with the possibility of being appointed cabinet ministers in the future. I think also that parliamentary assistants are a necessary link between busy cabinet ministers and their officials. They are a necessary link between busy members of parliament and the ministers' officials. From my experience I have found that the parliamentary assistants perform a useful function in this house for members of parliament. I want particularly to mention two that I have had a good deal to do with. In the first instance, I had numerous problems brought to my attention that concerned the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, not during the last twelve months but during the immediate post-war period. I must say that on numerous occasions I found the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply most helpful.

Now, sir, I say this, though I differ from the hon. member politically. So far as British Columbia is concerned we are fortunate that the Minister of Finance has for his parliamentary assistant a man of the calibre of the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair). On occasions I have had to bring to his notice problems from my constituency—because my constituents are a very alert and active people. I have found the hon. member most helpful and co-operative, and most willing on all occasions to do what he could to find a satisfactory solution to the problems that I brought to his department through him.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I simply say this. The final success, the basic success of this reorganization, depends to a great extent not only upon the ministers appointed but on the calibre of the deputy ministers appointed to assist in these departments. I do hope that in this reorganization of the departments the government will give serious consideration to the appointment as deputy ministers of the best men that they can obtain.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word or two before the measure is finally carried. I believe that the move of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), to add to the administrative machinery which will be at his disposal, is sound. It is true, as a number of hon. members have already said, that we need to increase such machinery as the complexity of the lives of our times develops. It must be borne in mind, however, that each department must be carefully instructed to recognize that it is not its function to step into the work which is already being done by the provinces. It must be definitely understood by every cabinet minister that his prime function is that of leadership. He should never get the idea that he is a driver or necessarily a supplanter. One of his main functions is to supply the finance to those who are already engaged in carrying on the work which falls naturally under his department. Not only should he supply finance, but he should supply also technical knowledge, in so far as the dominion has it at its disposal in greater abundance than the provincial governments can have. He should provide for co-ordination among the provinces.

Up to the present time too little realization of that sort of thing has been in evidence. This country is unique in that it now consists of ten countries. If any one of the provinces of this dominion were in Europe it would be a nation with a nation's problems, a nation's capacities and a nation's resources. One of the main tasks of the minister is to bring the activities of these ten provinces into co-ordination, so that there will be no conflict among them, such as has all too frequently developed in times past. I hope the Prime Minister will take care to brief these new men adequately in this respect.

May I revert for a moment to the matter of finance? Let us take the question of Indian affairs. Busy as has been the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Gibson) in the years immediately past, he has had plenty of time, I believe, to supervise the Indians affairs branch to such an extent as to enable him to know pretty well what ought to be done for the Indians. Strangely enough, however, I have had the impression that for about forty years that branch has been restricted in its activities by a sort of financial ban.

It will not matter who is in charge of the Indians if the policy of the government with respect to them is one of cheeseparing and niggardliness. That branch will never be able to do what ought to be done for the Indians so long as that condition exists. To every reasonable person throughout Canada it must be a cause for chagrin, if not mortification, that we have not yet seen fit to give our Indians the old age pension.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member can go into that at this time. The house is discussing the advisability of setting up these departments. Under that heading I do not think the hon. member should discuss government policy.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I have no desire to collide with you in this matter. I would say, however, that unless more money is given to the departments than has been given up to the present time, covering certain activities, we might as well write these new departments off so far as their doing anything effective is concerned, and the enormous expenditures which the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) foresaw will be in large measure money thrown away. I have no desire to launch into any discussion of the Indian question. I mentioned the Indians merely as an illustration of branches of government affected by the reorganization we are now discussing. How one can really be effective in a discussion without using some sort of illustration, I do not know. To my mind the Indian question appeared to be a good illustration of a matter which could have been taken care of without the establishment of new departments, but which for financial reasons has not been adequately handled.

Until we all come to realize that the things we so much desire require the expenditure of money, we shall not make the progress we ought to make. Time and again I have argued that the provinces are able to take care of all the matters coming within their jurisdiction, if they are supplied with money. The sooner we begin to realize that fact, the less we shall be inclined to delude ourselves into thinking that we can improve conditions materially in our provinces and in the nation generally by simply changing forms.

Turning to the matter of forest conservation—and I hope I shall not be declared out of order if I deal briefly with that subject, because others have already done so—

Mr. Speaker: I hope the hon. member will confine his remarks to the advisability of setting up the new departments.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; that is precisely what I am doing. For if the new departments that are being set up do not increase well-being throughout the country, which is going to cost money, my argument is that there is no use in setting them up, and that the money spent in setting them up and maintaining them will be wasted and confusion throughout the country will be increased.

It would appear that anything effective that could be said will be considered out of order, so I shall take my seat.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

The Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee to consider the three resolutions at the same time, or to deal with them separately?

Some hon. Members: Together.

Mr. Green: One o'clock.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Carried.

Mr. Chairman: Shall the resolutions carry?

Mr. Green: No; I wish to ask two or three questions, and it is one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 211, respecting the Department of Resources and Development.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 212, respecting the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 213, respecting the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SALARIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE SALARIES FOR MINISTERS OF RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT, MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS, AND CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Salaries Act by repealing the salary provision respecting the Minister of Mines and Resources, the Minister of Munitions and Supply, the Minister of National War Services and the Minister of Reconstruction, respectively, and by providing salaries for the Minister of Resources and Development, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, respectively.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, the bill which will be introduced if the resolution carries will have only two sections. One provides for the repeal of the provisions of the Salaries Act which now provide salaries for four ministers of the crown at the rate of $10,000 each, and substituting salaries for three ministers of the crown at the same rate. The other section provides that the act is to come into force by proclamation, which will be at the same time as the acts creating the new departments are proclaimed.

Mr. Green: I had two or three questions which I wanted to ask on the other resolutions, but they went through before most of us were back in the chamber. If I may, I should like to ask them now.

The first has to do with the distribution of the various branches. In the present Department of Mines and Resources there is a branch known as mines, forests and scientific services. Apparently it is to be broken up and some of the sections of the branch allotted to the new Department of Resources and Development while others go to the new Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. For example, there are the following branches: the bureau of mines, the dominion forest service, the eastern rockies forest conservation board, the geological survey of Canada, the surveys and mapping bureau, the dominion water and power bureau, the geographical bureau, the national museum of Canada, and the dominion observatories.

Then there are also certain branches which, while they are under the Minister of Trade and Commerce at the present time, would appear to have their proper place in one or the other of the two new departments. One is the dominion coal board, which, it would seem, should be in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. Then there are the national research council, the atomic energy control board and Canadian Arsenals Limited. Can the Prime Minister tell us just how these different sections of the service are to be allotted?

There is one other question. Will the Prime Minister indicate the number of employees there are now in the Department of Mines and Resources, the Department of Reconstruction and Supply and the Department of the Secretary of State, and the number there will be in the new departments after the change? I realize he can only give an approximate figure, but I take it the government has some idea of the size of the new departments.

The Prime Minister did not mention which minister would be responsible for the film board. Finally I suggest that the name "Indian affairs" should appear in the name of the new department, which is apparently to be called the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I am afraid, if that is the name used, the Indian affairs branch of the new department will be regarded by the general public as just tacked on, whereas in fact the two large branches will be immigration and Indian affairs. Each of these branches will have several hundred employees. On the other hand, the citizenship branch is a small one in the Department of the Secretary of State, with, I believe, between twenty and thirty employees at the present time. It seems to me that Indian affairs work will be of such importance that it should be given a place in the name of the department. Perhaps the title would be too long if the three different branches were named—citizenship, Indian affairs and immigration—but, if that is so, I suggest it could be known as the department of Indian affairs and immigration. Those are the two main jobs of the new department. It seems to me it is not right to leave the words "Indian affairs" out of the name of the new department.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, we are going to do our best to please everybody, but we are not going to be able to please the hon. member for Peel by shortening the names of departments and please the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra by lengthening them. As to the suggestion that we drop the word "citizenship" and substitute "Indian affairs" in the name of the new department which will deal with citizenship, it has appeared to us that the real objective towards which we should endeavour to proceed is to make citizens both of the immigrants and of the Indians. We believe that it would be a mistake not to have that fact emphasized in the name of the new department.

Mr. Green: Of course the Indians are citizens now in British Columbia. They have the vote in British Columbia.

Mr. St. Laurent: If they are, they no longer come under the treaty provisions of the administration of Indian affairs, and they can become citizens everywhere in Canada by a declaration that they wish to be withdrawn from the provisions which apply to the treaty Indians. I had the advantage of the friendship of a distinguished member of the legislature of Quebec who had withdrawn from the treaty provisions of the Indian band at Lorette. He had become a member of the legislature representing the constituency in which that reserve is located. So I think it is very desirable to promote to the greatest possible extent the advancement of those residents of Canada to full citizenship. The only thing that might be considered would be to add "Indian affairs" to the other two names given the department. The only objection there would be to the length of the name: citizenship, immigration and Indian affairs.

Mr. Green: That does not do much harm, does it?

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member for Peel does not think we should have to refer to the Secretary of State for External Affairs by that name.

Mr. Graydon: Neither does the Prime Minister.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not disclosing my own views at the present time, but merely commenting on the conflict between the views of the hon. gentleman to whom I am attempting to reply, and those of other hon. gentlemen in the house. Of course a rose would smell as sweet by any other name, but most of us still prefer to call it a rose rather than change to some long and learned botanical description of that beautiful flower.

With respect to the other matters, of course the hon. gentleman realizes that it is going to require quite a delicate sorting-out process to distribute these branches and those who are concerned with their operation in the manner that will tend to the greatest efficiency. Our estimate would seem to show that there might be about 2,000 in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, about 3,200 in the Department of Resources and Development, and about 3,100 in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. That was the calculation made by those who were studying the position, because we were trying to get an idea of what the balance of activities would be.

With respect to the estimates, if the hon. gentleman will turn to pages 28, 29, 30 and 31 I might refer to the numbers of the items. For resources and development, from our best estimate of how the services would be distributed, there would be Nos. 173, 180—

Mr. Green: That is the director of special projects?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes; 180 to 186 inclusive—

Mr. Green: I might point out to the Prime Minister that there is a subheading for each of these, which might make it easier to follow.

Mr. St. Laurent: But under the subheading there are some which would go to the other department. Under the subheading of mines, forests and scientific services branch, Nos. 177, 178, 179, 187 and 188 to 195 inclusive would go to mines and technical surveys.

Mr. Green: There is another subhead for the bureau of mines.

Mr. St. Laurent: The bureau of mines is a subhead, and there we have items 176 to 179.

Mr. Green: Then comes the dominion forest service.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes. The bureau of mines would go to the mines and technical surveys department; from forest service down to geological survey would go to resources and development; from geological survey down to dominion water power bureau would go to mines and technical surveys. At present the dominion water power bureau is listed as one of those branches which would remain with resources and development, though there will have to be some sorting out there because part of that branch is devoted to projects and there is a part which is a service department for the information of the public. The Dominion Water Power Act deals with projects in every section except section 10, which deals with surveys for the information of the public. All the other sections deal with projects, which would remain with resources and development.

Mr. Green: What about the national museum?

Mr. St. Laurent: The national museum would be under resources and development. Mines and technical surveys would have the responsibility of securing the samples, but the displaying of those samples in the national museum would be the responsibility of resources and development.

Mr. Green: What about the dominion observatories?

Mr. St. Laurent: The dominion observatories would be under the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. No decision has been arrived at as yet, but in that case also some of the stations that are now operated by the Department of Transport may have to be transferred. The portion which is a service department for the public we would endeavour to concentrate in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys

Mr. Green: Then I asked about the dominion coal board, the national research council, the atomic energy control board and Canadian Arsenals Limited.

Mr. St. Laurent: The national research council is not part of a department. The chairman is a minister especially designated by cabinet, though not as administrator of a department, as chairman of the research council. The same is true of the film board, and there is no present intention of changing the status of the chairman of that board. No consideration has been given the other three bodies yet, as to whether they would remain with the Department of Trade and Commerce or whether they would be integrated with the new Department of Resources and Development. The question has been raised by the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself, who suggested that it might be possible to have those bodies placed with the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, but there has not been time to go into the matter and reach any decision. In a general way it is the desire to have all these technical services for the information of the public, as to the extent of our resources and how they can be used, under the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Higgins: Arising out of a remark by the Prime Minister a few moments ago, may I ask if the Indians and Eskimos of Labrador have acquired full citizenship? I know this question is not germane to this discussion.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not believe they have. I understand that on a reference to the supreme court the Eskimos were classified as coming under the responsibility of the federal government in the same way as Indians. I do not think the situation there is any different than with respect to the others who are the responsibility of the federal government under the same provision of the British North America Act.

Mr. Higgins: I asked the question because on Thursday another question was answered for me by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I asked:

What medical services have been provided for the Indians and Eskimos of Labrador?

The answer was:

While the federal government has given some assistance in emergency cases, provision of medical services for the Indians and Eskimos in Labrador has been and has continued to be the responsibility of the Newfoundland government.

That is rather contradictory, in a way. While I do not expect an answer, sir, I thought you might perhaps clear it up.

Mr. Graydon: May I suggest to the Prime Minister that it might clarify things if, before the second reading of the bills, the Prime Minister or his department could make some sort of chart showing the various branches that will come under each of these departments. From one remark the Prime Minister made, I take it that these decisions have not all been made, and that may be a bar to what I suggest. It would be of considerable help to the members generally, who have to deal with the branches from time to time, if they knew exactly which minister had charge of these things. It is embarrassing to go to the wrong department.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think it would be helpful to do it at this time because it is in too tentative a form. When the bills are being proclaimed, there will have been orders in council published under the transfer of duties act which will establish quite clearly what the distribution is. Perhaps at that time it would be possible to give charts or statements that will be informative, and that will not likely be interfered with at an early date.

Mr. Graydon: Perhaps those could be distributed to individual members.

Mr. St. Laurent: Whenever that is done we will, of course, be tabling the orders in council, because we have to table all orders in council made under the transfer of duties act. When tabling them, I believe it will be possible to have them accompanied by charts that will be available to all members.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 214, to amend the Salaries Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TAX AGREEMENTS

AMENDMENT OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL TAX RENTAL AGREEMENTS ACT, 1947— INCOME TAX

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend section seven of the Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act, 1947, which provides for payments to the provincial governments in respect of income tax collected from corporations whose main business is the distribution to or the generation for distribution to the public of electric energy, gas or steam, to reduce deductions made in computing the amounts payable for provincial corporation income tax imposed by the provinces who have not entered into tax rental agreements and otherwise to assist in computing the amounts payable.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Sinclair: This resolution seeks authority to introduce a short bill to amend the Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act of 1947. The amending bill will refer to only one section in the act, section 7, under which the federal government and the provinces agreed, in respect of those public utilities engaged in generating or distributing electrical energy, gas or steam, that half the federal corporation tax received from them should be returned to the provincial governments.

According to section 7 there should be deducted from the provinces' half share any increase in royalties or licences which the provinces charged to the power companies after January 1, 1947, when these agreements came into effect, or any new royalties, taxes, or rentals which were imposed on the companies after January 1, 1947, and any taxes levied directly by the provinces on those power companies. Exempt, however, was the five per cent corporation tax which the federal government collects for the provinces under the dominion-provincial taxation agreement. No provision was made, however, to extend that provision to the corporation taxes levied by the provinces which had not signed the agreement. One of the clauses of the amending bill will permit the provinces who did not sign the agreement to be given credit for an equivalent amount of five per cent, so that the deduction will be made to the extent that the provincial corporation tax exceeds the five per cent cent levied by the signing provinces.

In other words, this will be a considerable benefit to the two provinces which did not sign. It will give to them the same benefits as those received by the signing provinces.

The second amendment refers to section 7 also, subsection 4. It was intended to apply this special concession only to those companies engaged in the distribution of power to the public. It was not intended to cover, for example, large industrial corporations such as a smelting company or pulp and paper company which had a wholly-owned power company as a subsidiary selling its power output entirely to the parent company. That was regarded as a normal corporation whose corporation tax would go direct to the federal government. Subsequently it was found that there are public utility corporations in this country which have a somewhat similar set-up under which one subsidiary actually generates the power and the parent company or another subsidiary sells the power to the public. Under the wording of subsection 4 the taxes from these subsidiaries would not be shared by the provinces. It was felt that was unfair, so subsection 4 of section 7 is being changed so that the provinces will receive five per cent of the tax collected from either the subsidiary or the parent company, so long as it is engaged in selling or distributing power to the public.

The third part of the bill provides for returns and special information necessary for the proper administration of the section, and provides for the extension of this measure to cover the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask the parliamentary assistant whether this proposal has been discussed with the two provinces concerned? Do they regard it as equally beneficial?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, I am informed that the finance ministers of the ten provinces are agreeable to this amendment because it means more revenue for them than was provided when they actually signed the agreement. The two provinces that did not sign are now put on an equal footing with the signing provinces. Under the present act Ontario and Quebec, instead of getting their seven per cent of the corporate tax deducted from their fifty per cent of the federal corporation tax, will now have only the excess of their rate over the five per cent rate levied by the other provinces so deducted. There will now be a deduction of two per cent, that is the excess over five per cent which is allowed the other provinces.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have no doubt the parliamentary assistant is right in his feeling that, as reasonable men, they would be bound to accept it. Nevertheless, I am interested in knowing whether this actual proposal has been discussed with them.

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed that the proposal has been discussed with the finance ministers of the provinces. That is the information I was given.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The parliamentary assistant made reference to New foundland. I understand that negotiations are pending for the signing of an agreement between the government of Newfoundland and the federal government. I know that a bill has been introduced in the legislature in St. John's. To what period will this bill apply? Will it apply to past time?

Mr. Sinclair: I believe the various dates in connection with the laws of Canada and Newfoundland were covered by the statute passed last spring. Perhaps I should not speak on this matter, but I would imagine that it would date back to the time that Newfoundland actually entered confederation. As to the other provinces, this covers the period from the date of January 1, 1947, until the end of the present dominion-provincial tax agreement on December 31, 1951. As to Newfoundland, this bill will only include Newfoundland in the same way as have been the other seven provinces which have already signed.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Bradley (for Mr. Abbott) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 215, to amend the Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act, 1947.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOUSING

RENT CONTROL—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT—TABLING OF ORDER IN COUNCIL

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Might I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the house revert to motions for the purpose of allowing me to table an order in council which the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked for yesterday and which I undertook to lay on the table as soon as I could procure it. It is an order in council making the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to the jurisdiction of parliament in the field of rent control for the period now provided for in the existing legislation or orders, and for such further period as parliament may deem to be required to bring about an orderly decontrol.

The hon. member for Lake Centre asked if, before December 1, an opportunity could be provided for discussion on the terms of this order because, the reference having been made to the supreme court, one of the hon. justices of that court is to hear counsel on December 1 in order to give directions as to how the reference is to be proceeded with. The hon. member for Lake Centre wished to have some opportunity to make his views known and to provoke some discussion on the reference before the order goes before a justice of the supreme court.

The matter has been given some consideration, and it has been felt that we could give this opportunity for discussion by moving, at eight o'clock on Monday night, to go into committee of supply and by calling in committee of supply item 92 of the estimates, which is the item dealing with the administration of the wartime prices and trade board. At that same time we would ask also to introduce the other departments which have not yet been called, so that those estimates can be dealt with whenever there is an opportunity for that to be done. If it were satisfactory to hon. members we could move, at eight o'clock on Monday night, to go into committee of supply and, as soon as the Speaker has left the chair, we could call item 92 for the purpose of providing the opportunity asked for by the hon. member for Lake Centre, to discuss the terms of this order in council before it goes before a judge of the supreme court.

Mr. Green: Did I understand the Prime Minister to say that he would then ask to have all the remaining departments put in?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes. There are only three other departments; and I think that at this time they should be in a position to be dealt with. They cannot be dealt with on Thursday, Friday or Saturday unless they have been called on Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday.

PENSION FUND SOCIETIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND PROVISIONS TO SUBSIDIARY CORPORATIONS

The house resumed from Friday, November 25, consideration in committee of Bill No. 174, to amend the Pension Fund Societies Act—Mr. Bradley—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Subsidiary corporations.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): Yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Greenwood made an inquiry as to the construction to be placed on a phrase in the original pension act of 1887 as re-enacted in the Revised Statutes of Canada. The phrase occurs in section 3. The question is as to the meaning of the words:

> . . . of any corporation legally transacting business in Canada, under any act of the parliament of Canada.

One's first mental reaction to that phrase is that it would include companies obtaining a charter from this parliament or companies whose charter was based upon the Companies Act. I think that has been the general impression down through the years. I have made some inquiries, and there is no indication of any application ever having been made to include either a provincial or a foreign corporation within the provisions of the act. The list of corporations which have taken occasion to avail themselves of the privileges of this act includes corporations who either have special acts of their own or who are incorporated under the Canadian Companies Act. For the most part, they are banks. Altogether there are twelve of them. Just what is included in that phrase, I would not undertake to say at the moment. It is a legal question which I presume will have to be answered by the courts should ever the occasion arise. But the act seems to have travelled along for more than half a century without the question ever having arisen. The present bill does not in any way interfere with that phrase at all, the only effect of the provisions of the amendment being to include the employees of any subsidiary of a corporation having obtained a charter within the benefits of this act, without the necessity of forming another pension fund society.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I thank the minister for his answer, and that is all I have to ask.

Mr. Green: Would there be any objection to putting on Hansard a list of these parent corporations, which are taking advantage of the act?

Mr. Bradley: I shall read them.

Mr. Green: Could they be put on Hansard?

Mr. Bradley: Yes, I am quite willing to put them on Hansard.

Mr. Green: One other question: Is there any serious objection by the minister's department to having subsidiary corporations, which are incorporated under provincial acts, included in the terms of the act?

Mr. Bradley: I do not think I can undertake to answer that question just now. It occurs to me that it is purely a legal question which would have to be answered by the courts.

Mr. Green: The minister's department has no objection?

Mr. Bradley: At the moment I do not know of any objection.

Mr. Green: Could we have the list?

Mr. Bradley: Yes. The list follows:

Pension Fund Societies on Record in the Department of the Secretary of State

Name	Year
1. Bank of Toronto	1889
2. Banque Canadienne Nationale (formerly Bank of Hochelaga)	1916
3. Barclays Bank (Canada)	1940
4. La Caisse d'Economie de Notre-Dame de Quebec	1912
5. Canada Packers Ltd.	1939
6. Canada Starch Co. Ltd.	1941
7. Canada Steamship Lines Ltd.	1940
8. Consolidated Mining & Smelting Co. of Canada Ltd.	1940
9. Eastern Townships Bank (no longer in existence)	1889
10. National Breweries Ltd.	1941
11. Royal Bank of Canada	1935
12. Royalite Oil Company Ltd.	1949

Section agreed to.

Export and Import Permits

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND LIFE OF ACT UNTIL JULY 31, 1951

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 143, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that the Export and Import Permits Act was enacted in 1947. It was amended in 1948. Section 14 of the amending act provided that the act would expire on the 31st of March, 1950. The present bill seeks an extension of the act until July 31, 1951. The bill was introduced in the Senate and was considered at some length by the banking and commerce committee of the other place.

I might give a short explanation as to the reason for the choice of the date, July 31, 1951. The bill, as introduced in the Senate, provided for an extension of two years. When it was discussed in committee there a question arose about granting an extension for one year. It became evident in the discussion of that point that an extension for one year only—that is, an extension to March 31, 1951—would necessitate a further amending bill in the next session of parliament. It was thought that difficulty could be advantageously overcome by making the time of expiry of the act July 31, 1951, so that if it were desired again to extend the act the amending bill would not have to be brought in until the second session from the present one.

Originally the main purpose of controlling exports under the act was to ensure that commodities in short supply were available for domestic consumption. To a limited but constantly diminishing extent this purpose is still valid, particularly in the field of building products, if we are to maintain the high level of construction in this country. It is apparent now that the main purpose of the bill is that having to do with strategic considerations, and that is the main reason for the export permits at the present time.

It is essential that the government be responsible for the destinations to which arms, munitions, implements of war, atomic energy materials and other materials of like nature are shipped, and that is the main purpose of export control at the present time.

It will be noted that in the earlier years of the act there were some 542 items under export control. At the present time there are 137 items under export control. I might say that in effect the number of items is really considerably less than that because included in the list are items that we normally do not produce in this country for export. They are of a kind that we import from the United States. Because of their strategic importance I think it is apparent to all hon. members that we would not wish to have them other than under export control, even although we do not produce them ourselves. An excellent example of the type of item I am talking about in that category is carbon black. It is not produced in this country, and yet it is included under export control to ensure that United States carbon black is not exported from this country.

With respect to continuing the authority for import control, the list has been reduced from 67 items under control to 5. It is necessary mainly because of our international commitments. An example of that is tin under the combined tin allocation committee, and rice under the food and agriculture organization.

Mr. Green: What were the other three?

Mr. McIlraith: The items under import control are powdered milk, two items of rice, tin, scrap iron and steel. These are the five items under import control.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask a question? Would it be correct to say that the Export and Import Permits Act in the main now deals with materials having a strategic significance? Would that be a correct statement?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, that is a correct assumption. There are still a considerable number of items other than strategic materials under export control, but they are constantly being removed from export control. The statement made by the hon. member for Greenwood is correct.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Can we take it that from the point of view of ordinary business considerations the act is on its way out, but that strategic considerations keep it in? Is it a fact that only a year and half is being suggested because we hope that we may within a measurable time get rid of it? Is that a legitimate inference to draw from it, or is it, as a matter of fact, so far as the government can say, that they hope to have it continued indefinitely?

Mr. Howe: The legitimate assumption is that we will get rid of it. That is why we keep it on a temporary basis. As my hon. friend says, its application to commerce is coming to an end.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

On section 1—Expiration.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary assistant said that this act was required in order to control the export of war materials. Is there some other method by which the export of these materials is controlled? It seems to me that some years ago, in fact before the war, a bill was passed by the house which gave the government some authority over the shipment of war materials. That was a very live subject at the time. There were quite extensive debates, and I think the bill was in the shape of an amendment to the Customs Act, although I am not quite clear on the point.

Mr. McIlraith: No, I think the discussion to which the hon. member refers was on the 1948 bill amending this act. The act as originally introduced in 1947 did not include all the strategic materials provisions which are now in it. In 1948 the amendment did two things: it added the clauses with respect to shipments to certain areas for strategic reasons, and extended the term of the 1947 act. If my memory serves me correctly, it would be the discussion on that bill the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. Green: The measure I have in mind was brought in about the time arms were being shipped by some countries to Spain. This was during the civil war in Spain, and considerable debate took place in the house about that time. I believe some legislation was passed which gave the government a measure of control over the shipment of arms.

Mr. McIlraith: I am not aware of the legislation the hon. member has in mind, if that is so. All the export of strategic materials is now controlled through the granting of permits under this act.

Mr. Green: The parliamentary assistant has said that this act will be allowed to expire. Probably it will be allowed to expire in 1951.

Mr. Howe: I did not say that.

Mr. McIlraith: The statement was as it affects ordinary commerce. The question of the hon. member for Greenwood was directed to export control in terms affecting ordinary commerce, and the reply was also limited to that.

Mr. Green: The intention is in future to control the export of munitions of war and strategic materials under this act?

Mr. Howe: There are international arrangements on that subject between the United States, Great Britain and Canada. It is known as area control, where certain materials—and there are three lists, I believe, with different grades of urgency—are controlled for shipment to particular areas. While I believe it will not be necessary to extend the commercial application of this act beyond its expiry date, it is quite possible that the area control will be required. That depends upon international tension, and the maintenance of area controls by other governments.

Mr. Green: It is important that the government of Canada should have power to control the shipments of munitions of war to another country. Will that power be maintained under this act?

Mr. Howe: It is maintained under this act. When this act disappears, some other arrangement may be made to continue that control.

Mr. Green: The provision in the Customs Act to which I referred a few moments ago is section 290 which will be found in chapter 24 of the 1937 statutes.

Mr. Isnor: I should like to ask a question in connection with the commercial aspect of the matter as it relates to imports, rather than exports. Has this bill anything to do with permits for the importation of equipment, including machinery and the like?

Mr. McIlraith: No.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL TRADE MARK

APPLICATION TO COMMODITIES—TRUE LABELLING AND DESCRIPTION

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 133, respecting the application of a national trade mark to commodities and respecting the true description of commodities.

Mr. Graydon: Would the minister make a statement?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this bill respecting the application of a national trade mark to commodities and respecting the true description of commodities was introduced in the Senate at the last session of the 20th parliament. It was dealt with by the banking and commerce committee of the Senate at that time, at considerable length. Some slight amendments were made in the bill as introduced. It was then passed by the Senate through all stages, and was on the order paper in this house when parliament dissolved.

It was reintroduced at this session in the Senate in precisely the form in which it had been passed by the Senate at the previous session. The bill has been considered and passed by the Senate without further amendment. It was referred to their committee on banking and commerce at this session, but required to be dealt with only briefly.

The bill itself relates to three subjects, the first of which is the use of the words "Canada standard" or the initials "C.S." as the national trade-mark, following the establishment of commodity standards; secondly, the accurate labelling of commodities; and, thirdly, it provides for the repeal of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act of 1935.

Hon. members will recall that an attempt was made to deal with the subject matter of this bill with the passing of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act in 1935. That act dealt with other matters which are unrelated to the present bill. However, the provisions of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act which related to the national trade-mark, the establishment of commodity standards and true labelling were transferred to the Department of Trade and Commerce in March, 1947.

Experience has shown that the legislation is defective and unsatisfactory for the purpose originally intended. I will refer to these defects in dealing with the particular subjects contained in the bill. The new bill provides a basically new approach to the problems involved and will establish a framework within which these problems can be administered.

There is active business interest in this type of legislation. This is evidenced by the fact that a large number of requests have been received by the Department of Trade and Commerce from manufacturers, distributors, or consumer organizations for the issue of regulations, either with respect to the use of the national trade-mark or to true labelling. Applications have been put forward for the right to use the national trade-mark, but the greater number of the more pressing requests deal with commodities in regard to which more adequate labelling safeguards are desired. I may say that the issue of regulations in response to the requests that are now in hand has been held up by the department, in some cases because the investigational work required has not been completed, but also on the more important ground that the existing legislation has certain defects and does not provide adequate safeguards.

It is not considered that there will be a very rapid development or growth along the development of the use of the national trade-mark. Indeed, it is desirable that this be so, in view of the fact, as hon. members will appreciate, that great care and thorough investigation of each application must be made before the right to use the national trade-mark on any product is granted. It is believed that there will be a real advantage to both the domestic and the export trade in the voluntary adoption by Canadian firms of the use of the national trade-mark under conditions that will properly safeguard the quality of the goods to which the mark is applied.

It should be clearly understood that the use of the national trade-mark by any industrial or commercial firm is wholly voluntary. It is not intended in any way to supersede or interfere with the use of privately owned trade marks, which have been long established or widely known, and represent assets of great value to the individual firms or companies to which they belong. If, however, any firm or company wishes to make use of the national trade-mark, it may do so only on the condition that its product conforms with an approved specification or standard. The extent to which its use will increase depends completely upon the extent to which business firms desire to have a national mark used on their products.

Under the old Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, the minister had the power to regulate the manner of using the mark, but he had no power to prescribe the terms and conditions of use. Further the governor in council had no authority over the national trade-mark. It is felt that all regulations governing the manner of using the national trade-mark, and prescribing the terms and conditions of its use, should be those of the governor in council instead of the minister as it was in the old act. These changes are effected by the present bill.

Further, under the existing legislation, once the right to use the mark had been granted there was no provision whatever for cancelling or withdrawing the right to use it if the right was abused. Under the present bill the governor in council is enabled to make regulations prescribing the circumstances in which the right of any person to affix the national trade-mark to any commodity or container may be either terminated or suspended. The importance of this safeguard will, I think, be self-evident. The potential value of the national trade-mark lies in its recognition in both domestic and export trade as a virtual guarantee of quality.

The establishment of commodity standards is a corollary to the establishment of the national trade-mark. Under the old legislation mandatory standards or specifications may be set up for any commodities, regardless of whether or not it is intended that the national trade-mark be applied to them. In this respect the bill we are now considering makes an important change. The authority to establish a standard or specification for any commodity applies only in the case of products on which the right to use the national trade mark is being sought. Consequently, the standard or specification that may be established for any given product will be mandatory only on those firms applying the national trade-mark to such projects. There will therefore be no compulsory specification or standard that must be observed by firms which are not making use of the national trade-mark.

With respect to the second main part of the bill, the true description of labelling of commodities, it will be noted that the provisions of the present bill are not as wide as those of the existing legislation. In the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act there is power to compel descriptive labelling virtually without restriction. The regulations under the new bill will be mandatory only in the sense that if goods are described on labels they must be labelled accurately and in a manner that avoids public deception. The principal point to be emphasized in this connection is that regulations can only prescribe the manner of labelling if goods are labelled for the purpose of indicating the material content or quality of the commodity or the size or contents by weight or measure of the package or container.

If any individual manufacturer wishes to put out a product without marking or labelling or describing it in advertising for the above purposes, he may still do so. If he does label it, descriptively, for any of these purposes he must label it accurately. The purpose of the bill may be simply stated as follows: In establishing a national trade-mark, it is proposed that this shall be on a voluntary basis only, and the necessity of complying with commodity standards affects only those manufacturers or others who desire to use the national trade-mark. Where manufacturers descriptively label any commodity or container, it must be labelled accurately to prevent public deception.

I might add that when the bill was in committee in the other place there was a rather thorough examination of it, and representations were heard from the retail federation of Canada, the Canadian Manufacturers Association and the Canadian association of consumers.

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, as to this measure I think I can safely say that I thought I was in thorough agreement with the broad principles of the bill, but after listening to the parliamentary assistant's description of it I do not know whether or not I am. We will not argue the fact that we should have a high standard of quality for any goods to be sold in Canada or to be exported. With that proposition we are in agreement. There is also no argument as to the true labelling of goods, but when the parliamentary assistant says that no compulsion is provided in the bill for the labelling of goods for export, I do not know whether I can go quite that far. I think probably there should be some compulsion whereby exporters of goods from Canada would have to meet certain requirements as to standards of quality and these other things. We are all seriously interested in the quality of goods exported from this country, because in order to hold our markets we must see that the quality is such that it will meet the demands of consumers in these countries.

The parliamentary assistant did not say what products the bill would deal with. I am going to say very little, as a matter of fact, but I want to look at the question from the standpoint of agriculture. If the bill has anything to do with agricultural products I want to say a few words about it. We are dependent on export business for the disposition of practically all our agricultural products. In order to secure that export business we must produce a quality that is in demand in the countries to which we sell. If we do not do so, we cannot expect to get the business.

So far as agricultural products are concerned, I may say quite frankly that I do not like the words "Canada standard" or the letters "C.S." The letters "C.S." might mean anything. The words "Canada standard", in my opinion, would mean quite ordinary or average. We certainly do not want products being exported from Canada marked with words that mean no more than ordinary or average. That is particularly so in the case of canned products. They are now graded, and the lowest quality of canned products is referred to as the standard grade. The word "standard" implies that the products are of average or ordinary quality. I do not think it is good enough for us to use such words as a Canadian trade-mark for goods that are being exported or that are being sold in the domestic market. I do not know what other word I would use, and I would not want to suggest one. Surely there should be some better word than "standard". Even though this bill has passed through all stages in the other place, I believe the government should give us an undertaking that it will be sent to an appropriate committee of this house to be further discussed and studied before it passes this chamber.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this measure which is to replace sections 16 to 19 of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act of 1935, which is repealed by section 9 of this bill. I believe this is a good move. I was very glad to hear the parliamentary assistant say the government intends to adopt a new approach to this problem. The act apparently has been inoperative for years, and I am glad to see some evidence that it is the intention of the government to develop this type of legislation.

Before proceeding with my remarks let me say that after reading the trade and industry act of 1935 and knowing the situation in regard to the enforcement of legislation of this kind, I fully appreciate that the machinery and procedures have to be developed rather slowly, and as the result of producer and consumer support. Up to the present time we have done very little in Canada along these lines, as compared to what has been done in the United States. There, through the activities of the federal trade commission, a great deal has been done to develop national standards and the true labelling of commodities. This, I think, is evidenced by the number of investigations and prosecutions that have been conducted by the federal trade commission in recent years.

I understand that originally the federal trade commission of the United States was set up to stop unfair practices in competition and to protect the trade rather than the public. After some years of experience this was found most ineffective, and changes had to be considered.

It was not until 1938 that the United States government legally recognized the need for protecting the public as well as business interests; and I presume that in our legislation there is to be protection for the public as well as for business. This change came about in the United States as a result of the dispute between the federal trade commission and the manufacturers of a weight-reducing remedy which was found to be injurious to health. That company won its case before the supreme court of the United States on the ground that while the weight-reducing remedy might have been injurious to many customers, it never hurt a competitor. Since claims made by the competitors were equally false according to the law, this hair-splitting decision was technically correct, and I understand that was the cause of a new approach to the problem by the commission. The court ruling in that case, which prevented the federal trade commission from proceeding against one manufacturer because all in that field were dishonest, showed the absurdity of the situation and the need for some change in the law.

As a result of that decision the Wheeler-Lee amendment was passed giving the federal trade commission power to act in the public interest as well as in the interests of business. The adoption of this amendment had a great effect upon the advertising and labelling of commodities in the United States. Since that time the commission has done a great deal of work in this connection. According to the figures I have been able to obtain, last year its staff examined some half million advertisements in newspapers, magazines and other periodicals, of which number some 25,000 were noted as containing representations apparently false or misleading. In addition over a million radio continuities were examined, and some 20,000 violations of the law were determined by the federal trade commission. As far as I can discover, during the same period of time in Canada only one violation of the law was dealt with, as compared with more than 20,000 violations in the United States.

This action in the United States was supported by many newspapers, and I mention this because I think it only right to give credit where credit is due. The Christian Science Monitor has been a great advocate of the setting up of fair standards for the manufacture of goods, and the true labelling of those goods in that country, and has consistently supported the efforts of the government in that direction. It was the first national newspaper to emphasize the harmful effect of false advertising on all mankind, and to reject such advertising for this reason rather than because it was damaging honest business.

At this point I should like to say that when this legislation is passed and the government begins to develop its procedures and to gain experience in administration, I trust the newspapers and magazines of this country will give similar support to all measures taken to improve standards and bring about true labelling. In Canada investigations and prosecutions concerning manufacturing and labelling have been far fewer than in the United States, except with regard to the inspection of primary and farm commodities, those commodities which provide the purchaser in the first instance with greater opportunity to know whether he or she has obtained the goods desired. The housewife knows she is purchasing beef. It may be a bit tougher than she anticipates; it might be B instead of A, but she knows it is beef. The same can be said about pork, and the same can be said about lumber. A man knows he is purchasing lumber. He may not be certain of the grade, but at least he can tell that it is lumber. When it comes to bottled or canned commodities, however, very often the purchaser has no conception of what he is buying.

In Canada we have developed an effective method of inspection and grading with respect to primary products and farm commodities, but so far we have done little that has been effective with respect to manufactured products. For instance, under the Livestock and Livestock Products Act we have the inspection of stockyards, livestock, livestock products and poultry production. Under the same act we have inspection of hogs, carcass grading, grading of bacon for export, branding of beef, grading of lamb and mutton carcasses. We also have regulations respecting stockyards, the export of dairy cattle, the grading of unwashed fleece wool, dressed poultry, and the grading, branding and marketing of canned poultry. Under the Meat and Canned Foods Act we have inspection of meats, meat products, horse meat, fish and shellfish intended for canneries. Under the Dairy Industry Act we have inspection of milk, cream, condensed milk, evaporated milk, cheese, ice cream or any other article manufactured from milk or any imitation thereof. Under the Fruit, Vegetables and Honey Act we have regulations for the grading and inspection of fruits, vegetables and honey. Under the Meat and Canned Foods Act we have regulations for the grading and inspection of canned fruits and vegetables. Under the Maple Products Industry Act we have regulations for the grading and inspection of maple products. Under the Seeds Act, 1937, we have regulations for the grading and inspection of seeds. Under the Feeding Stuffs Act, 1937, we have regulations for the branding and inspection of feeds manufactured for consumption by livestock. Under the Inspection and Sale Act, 1938, we have regulations for the grading and inspection of flax fibres. Under the Hay and Straw Inspection Act, 1933, we have regulations for certain standards and inspection. Under the Fertilizers Act we have regulations covering the content of fertilizers and for the inspection of the same. Under the Pest Control Products Act we have regulations for certain standards and provisions for commodities coming under this act. Lumber is also sold according to grades and subject to inspection previous to sale, particularly for export.

I want to emphasize again how far we have developed the inspection and grading of primary and agricultural products, as compared with the inspection, grading and labelling of manufactured products. I find that the Food and Drugs Act is administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare. This service is supposed to protect the public's pocketbook by assuring the customer that he will receive what he believes he is purchasing in the way of food and drugs.

In the annual report of the Department of National Health and Welfare dated March 31, 1948, it is stated that the inspection service of this department reviewed 7,961 radio programs, 2,137 labels and 395 pieces of advertising material. According to the report, after all this examination one prosecution was launched and a conviction obtained. During the same period in the United States, under similar but more advanced legislation, approximately 20,000 definite violations of the law were determined. I think that in itself, Mr. Speaker, is evidence that in this country we lag behind the United States with respect to legislation of this type.

I find also that the Department of National Health and Welfare has a laboratory service which has given some consideration to cosmetic chemistry. I find in this report they have given some study to the analysis of face powders, vanishing creams, and so on. A number of reports from the public regarding violations of the law were received, but apparently there have been no prosecutions to date.

The same department investigates pharmaceutical chemistry. The report says that the Winnipeg laboratory made a valuable survey of headache products including some 80 samples of these products collected throughout the territory. According to the report only 45 fully met the requirements, yet there is no evidence of any prosecutions. A noteworthy collection of ointments was analysed in Montreal, which revealed a considerable amount of misbranding.

Then, with respect to the administration of the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act which, I believe, is an important act, the report states that the annual production of patent medicines in Canada for the year 1945 amounted to $60,330,928. Now that is an amazing amount of the Canadian consumer's dollar which is being spent upon what a good many of the members of this house consider pure trash. I believe it is necessary for any government to do all it possibly can to protect the consumer.

Effective action along these lines, according to reports issued by the United States government, has been taken for a number of years but in Canada we have done very little. Under the legislation existing in the United States, the federal trade commission has investigated hundreds of thousands of products and the question of labelling those products. According to the best evidence obtainable not very much of that sort of work has been undertaken in Canada. I could not obtain evidence of the sort I have mentioned in Canada, but in the United States there are some illustrations of the junk which is on the shelves of the stores. Many of these brands are in Canadian stores and should not be purchased by Canadian people without full knowledge of the facts.

I intend to give a few illustrations of the findings of the federal trade commission of the United States and others throughout the years concerning these commodities, many of which can be found for sale in Canadian stores. I shall deal with the subject under various heads. There are 7 brands of castile soap which, when analysed, were found to contain no olive oil at all, although it is supposed to be one of the basic contents of good soap. In the soap chips there was not sufficient naphtha to have any value as a cleansing agent, although according to the advertisements it is supposed to loosen, soften and dissolve dirt. The best soap can be sold at 20 cents a pound.

Then we come to drugs. I am taking the time of the house to put this matter before the government, because I believe it is important. What about Murine eyewash? You see it advertised quite often. Chemical analysis showed Murine to be essentially a solution of borax in water with a trace of berberin or some golden seal preparation. Furthermore, the formula was found to change from time to time. If you bought your own borax and mixed it with water, it is estimated you could make about a gallon of Murine for five cents. In the container in which it is sold it costs you $1 an ounce, $16 a pint, or $128 per gallon.

The next product with which I wish to deal is Doan's kidney pills. The government of the United States has declared that the claim of this nostrum to cure kidney disease is false and fraudulent, and the courts have upheld the ruling.

I know a good many people who are in the habit of purchasing Nuxated Iron. A dollar bottle of Nuxated Iron was found by the chemists of the American Medical Association to contain less than 2½ grains of iron. The claim that Nuxated Iron possesses great advantages over other forms of iron is the sheerest buncombe.

Then we come to this well-known mother's remedy, California syrup of figs. I know dozens of people who have purchased that with the idea they were purchasing a concentrated syrup of figs. Upon analysis it has been shown that it contains no syrup of figs whatever but is a sweetened syrup of senna.

I turn now to a very old remedy called Peruna. When I was a boy I remember people purchasing this remedy, although perhaps not for the advertised purpose. It has been declared to be a fraud.

I shall now deal with Phillips' milk of magnesia which I have been fool enough to purchase on occasion. We find that the claims made for Phillips' milk of magnesia are absolutely false, and that it does none of the things which the advertisements claim. Phillips' milk of magnesia toothpaste makes the same anti-acid claims as do other dentifrices using milk of magnesia as a base. No alkaline dentifrice can cause the secretions of the mouth to remain alkaline for more than a few moments at a time, hardly long enough considering that the average person uses a dentifrice for but a few minutes a day. This nostrum, therefore, would prove ineffectual even if acids caused tooth decay.

Then I come to Sal Hepatica, that well-known remedy which can be found on the shelves of most drug stores. The federal trade commission declared that Sal Hepatica is not the mineral salt laxative that "corrects acidity"; enables you to "stop that cold instantly"; keeps you "clear-headed, alert"—your healthy normal self; regulates "the balance of body fluids"; frees the intestinal tract of "poisons and toxins"; effectively treats indigestion, fatigue, nervousness and headaches. All those claims were found to be incorrect, and so far the manufacturing company has not appealed the order.

Then we come to that almost historic remedy, Carter's little liver pills. The advertisements seemingly attempt to frighten the readers by representing that constipation poisons the body. The cold truth is, according to the commission, that neither medical nor scientific experts can find any ingredient or combination of ingredients in Carter's little liver pills which will have any influence at all, good or bad, on the liver.

The next is that well-known product Listerine, which is widely advertised. The claims made for Listerine as a mouthwash are just as ludicrous as those made for the tooth paste. Incidentally, the tooth paste does not contain Listerine, which is just as well since it is of no value. Even as a dandruff cure it is valueless. According to bacteriologic tests, $495 worth of Listerine has the antiseptic action of one cent's worth of corrosive sublimate, or $15 worth of Listerine equals one cent's worth of carbolic acid.

[Mr. Herridge.]

We come then to Bromo-Seltzer, and possibly some hon. members of this house have sought some relief from headaches by taking Bromo-Seltzer.

The nostrum manufacturers are prepared to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars to avoid using these hated words, which have already caused them headaches that the regular recommended dose of Bromo-Seltzer will not cure. The discovery that continued overuse of these drugs can lead to mental derangement was made not by the federal trade commission only but by the medical profession of the United States. How many people purchasing Bromo-Seltzer in Canada know the facts concerning that advertising quackery?

Then I come for a moment to tobacco. The advertising of tobacco is extensive both in Canada and the United States. What do I find? Among the federal trade commission's twelve charges against Lucky Strike and Lord and Thomas, its advertising agent, is one objecting to the advertisement referred to in this question: "Sworn affidavits show that among the men who know tobacco best, it's Luckies two to one." That was the reason for the action. The commission's complaint denies this statement categorically, saying that there are no records sworn to and verified by such so-called experts which establish that this statement is a fact. In fact, the advertising is a straight falsehood.

Then we come to Camels. The makers of Camels cigarettes assign to William Esty and Company of New York millions of dollars a year to advertise that the smoking of Camels renews and increases the secretion of the digestive fluids, speeds up the flow of these fluids, increases the alkalinity of the digestion, and has a genuinely beneficial, wholesome and helpful effect on the digestive process. The most glowing ads for vitamins hardly dare claim more. Actually, as the beginning smoker learns, tobacco causes nausea which interferes with digestion. The neophyte's system gradually builds up an immunity to nicotine, as it would to arsenic taken in small doses, but his nausea will return if he uses tobacco to excess.

Then one more illustration on tobaccos before concluding with a remark or so on tooth paste. I want to refer to Kools. The manufacturers of Kools have already agreed to stop claiming that their cigarette constitutes a remedy for colds. Their appealing Mr. Penguin is skating on thin enough ice with the federal trade commission when he implies that Kools are cool. The commission's stand is that a claim like "Always cool under fire" is false on its face because all burning tobacco emits heat.

National Trade Mark

Then we come to a few illustrations of tooth pastes, powders, liquids and so on. As to the makers of Ipana, the federal trade commission brands as false and misleading such ads as this: "If you want the kind of smile you can really be proud of, decide today to switch to Ipana tooth paste and gum massage." Beautiful teeth will not ensure either a beautiful smile or social popularity, the federal trade commission asserts, and reminds the makers of Ipana that the beauty of one's teeth depends primarily upon their conformation, colour and other natural physical features, and that a girl who has buck teeth will not become beautiful by using Ipana tooth paste.

Then we come to Forhan's tooth paste. The only value of Forhan's tooth paste, the commission concludes, is as a not unpleasant adjunct to the use of the tooth brush in cleansing the teeth. The paste is in no respect extraordinary and there is no warrant for designating other dentifrices ordinary or common by way of comparison.

Then I come to Colgate's. Brightness and sparkle of teeth depend upon qualities of tooth enamel and those whose teeth lack these qualities will not acquire sparkling teeth by using Colgate's. Nor can tooth decay be prevented by Colgate's, says the federal trade commission. Food particles that remain long enough to decompose will not be removed by Colgate's "special penetrating foam." The federal trade commission insists the special penetrating foam is plain soapsuds flavoured with aromatic oils, not "special" and certainly not "penetrating."

Then as to Kolynos tooth paste. Kolynos claimed that by using their tooth paste teeth became three shades whiter in three days. The South Bend, Indiana, dental society tested this claim with twentieth century shade guide and out of seventy-three tested, seventy-two showed no change whatever. They further claimed that their effervescent tooth paste would kill 190 million germs in fifteen seconds. The federal trade commission claims there is no germicidal agent in existence which can be put into the mouth and which will kill all bacteria to produce a sterile condition. Rather than fight the charges further, Kolynos accepted the federal trade commission's complaint, and mended its advertising ways.

Just a brief reference to vitamins before passing on to paints and concluding with bread, and drawing my final conclusions. I think it is recognized by most people that the vitamin racket is a tremendous one at the present time. In many instances mothers are prevailed upon to feed their children various vitamin tablets in the hope that they are doing the best for them in the building up of sound bodies, sound constitutions and so on. I am not going to take the time of the house to deal with that matter, except to quote from a famous doctor and poet in the United States who I think approached the question in a sensible and common-sense way. Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, the physician and poet, once declared:

> A pair of substantial mammary glands has the advantage over the hemispheres of the most learned professor's brains in the art of compounding a nutritious fluid for infants.

I must mention paints. The average householder, the average contractor and the average farmer purchase paints at the present time without any knowledge whatever of actually what they are receiving for their dollar in the way of value. We find various paints advertised at various prices. For my own part, on one occasion I painted a barn red with paint that cost me $3.25 a gallon, and the barn stayed well painted for years. Later I paid $5.75 a gallon for paint for another building; that was for another paint which looked identical, and it is peeling off today. In the matter of substances like paints, rubber roofing and commodities of that kind, I say that we certainly need a Canadian set of standards.

In conclusion I just want to mention the question of bread, because it is fundamental in the diet of the Canadian people. I am not going to criticize the makers of good bread in this country. I am one of those who believe in home-made bread. We have home-made bread in my family and I intend to have it as long as possible. One of the reasons I hope this session will conclude by December 17 is so I can get home-made bread as soon as possible.

There are makers of good bread in this country but there are also makers of extremely poor quality bread found in almost every city. If there is any commodity of whose quality the Canadian people should be assured, it is bread because it is the basic diet of the great majority of the working people of this country. In that connection I am just going to read a brief extract from the Christian Science Monitor, of November 12, 1949, because I think it puts in cryptic and brief language the situation as it exists at the present time, and I am sure it expresses the point of view of a good many members of this house. This is what the paper has to say:

> Modern industrialism has ruined American bread. Pick up a loaf in its waxed paper. It's so soft and spongy you can contract it with your hands, mould it any shape you've a mind to. Take off the wrapper and eat a slice. The soft, fluffy centre is like a mouthful of powder puff. The more you eat the hungrier you get. This is what America's staff of life has come to. It's a pretty soft staff . . . Industrial America has glorified bread the way Hollywood has glorified the American girl. Man does not live by bread alone, but it is the foundation of our diet, and our sliced loaves of cotton batting are a weak foundation for anything.

What America needs is bread with crust to exercise the teeth and stick to the ribs, bread to strengthen the heart for the tasks which lie ahead.

I mention that, Mr. Speaker, because, in the application of this act and related acts, I think it is necessary that the government do everything possible to make certain in the first instance at least that essential foods, such as bread, are manufactured purely for the use of the Canadian public.

Before ending I just want to mention the question of barbed wire. It comes to my mind because I know hon. members know me to be a peasant farmer. I am not like one of these huge machine farmers on the prairies with his thousands of acres and his thousands of dollars and huge buildings. I am just a small fruit farmer, keeping a few head of stock, who has made his living not by sitting on a rubber-tired combine but by using a mattock, an axe and a saw, and who works with his hands. But just the same, I do use barbed wire to fence in my fields and my pasture. I think hon. gentlemen who are farmers on this side will agree with me when I say that the quality of barbed wire has deteriorated terribly since the war. Previous to the war we got a heavy grade of good barbed wire which would keep a bull out or in if it was properly stretched. For years now we have been buying an inferior grade. We cannot buy a good grade of barbed wire. You dare not stretch it beyond a certain tightness because it will snap. We have a poor quality of barbed wire in this country at this time, and it is sold at a high price. The government should give some consideration to making certain that when a farmer or anyone else buys a commodity such as barbed wire, which I give as an illustration, he will know that he is buying a quality commodity of a certain standard and of a certain value.

I wish to refer to roofing. A farmer often has to put a roof on the woodshed, on the granary, or on an outdoor building of some sort. Today you have no idea what you are buying. On one occasion I was purchasing roofing and I thought I was getting a high quality roofing. It was supposed to be four ply, or something of that sort. I said: "Give me the best; I want it to last as long as possible." I found out later that I could have got exactly the same roofing—one was red and the other was green—at about $2 a roll less. That is the sort of situation that ought to be corrected in this country. Farming people, working people and others should have some confidence in what they are purchasing. There must be, shall I say, a set of standards established with regard to the essential things required in the building of homes, in development of farms and for all consumer needs.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, if it is effectively enforced, means that science has gained another foothold in the fight against misinterpretations and fraud. I say "if effectively enforced". I do not expect to see sudden action in this connection, because I am quite sure it is going to take time to develop public understanding and procedures on the part of the department.

If this legislation is to be effective, not only must the government through the department administer the act and find procedures, but it must get the support of the Canadian people. It is not going to be effective, and cannot be effectively enforced, unless it receives the support of Canadian producers and Canadian consumers, the very active and intelligent support of the Canadian people.

In this connection there is a splendid opportunity for women's organizations, farm women's organizations, women's institutes, Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire, the Legion Auxiliary and so forth. Women are particularly fitted for this type of work and for keeping a watchful eye on this type of legislation. There is a great opportunity for women's organizations in this country to assist the government in the enforcement and in the development of this legislation. The same applies to trade unions. The workingmen of this country should be very interested in this type of legislation; so should the farm organizations. When they are aware of the possibilities of the further development of this type of legislation this government will receive the active support of the farmers, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and allied farm organizations in developing and administering this type of legislation. The same thing applies to co-operatives, and finally to the individual.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that a democracy is only as strong as the democracy that exists within it, and the democracy that exists within any country is finally determined by the willingness of the individual to accept some personal responsibility in the administration of the law and the development of our society.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I trust that, in the passing of this legislation and in the administration and enforcement of the act, public support will develop to the advantage of the Canadian people. I support this bill, Mr. Speaker, in the hope that the Canadian papers generally will, as I said before, emulate the Christian Science Monitor and other very well-known American papers in effectively supporting the government in the development of this type of legislation. I trust also that it will receive the widespread support of all sections of the Canadian people.

Mr. Green: Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) willing to have this bill sent to a committee as suggested?

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, there is no real objection to it except the circumstances of today. It has been before a committee in the other place where a number of trade organizations appeared and made their representations. It would be a duplication to ask these organizations to come before the committee here. The incidental delay might not be serious if it were early in the session. We should like to get this bill through this session. It was on the order paper last session and it was held over owing to the shortness of time. Therefore I suggest that the discussion take place in committee of the whole and that the bill be passed at this session.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this bill, and I should like to make one or two brief observations. I think every party in this house can compliment the government on introducing the bill, because it is long past due. The protection which it affords is long past due. I suggest to the minister that there should be a provision requiring a manufacturer or producer who asks for a brand to pay fair wages to the workers who produce the article for which the brand is wanted. I believe we should make quite sure that it is produced under the best working conditions possible and, if possible, certified by a trade union that the contents of the package have been produced by fair wages, and fair living and working conditions. I make that suggestion because I think such a requirement should be insisted upon before any brand is given to any firm.

An article can sometimes qualify for the brand when the conditions under which the article was produced could not qualify under the decent standards of living that we are trying to establish in this country. That was amply demonstrated some years ago during an investigation into the working conditions in some of our industries, particularly the clothing industry, and so on. It was proved that the article was good, but the conditions of the people producing the article were deplorable and were condemned wholeheartedly by the findings of that commission. I merely make that remark because I understand another speaker is to follow me and deal with that phase of the question.

National Trade Mark

One other thing I suggest is that the container on which the trade-mark appears shall not be either used or filled again by any unauthorized person. In the part of the country from which I come, the Okanagan valley, we have a product that I have no doubt will qualify for the national trade-mark. In the meantime we have the O.K. brand which is pretty well equivalent to what any other government brand would be. It is well known everywhere that the packages that bear this name are often re-used for inferior quality goods. As a matter of fact, if you care to go down to Elgin street you will find boxes labelled "O.K. Brand Peaches", the very best grown in the Okanagan, filled with apples and tomatoes of rather low grade. That is what I refer to. Therefore, right here in Ottawa, there are people transgressing the method employed by a reputable firm to turn out a good product that they can guarantee. Naturally they expect support from the retailers and consumers in general. The same can be said of many other commodities. I could mention several. It happened especially during the war when certain commodities were in short supply. I refer particularly to a popular sauce from England, which I presume could be purchased in Canada. I saw the container, the bottle in which it originally came to Canada, used over and over again by restaurants all across the dominion. They used the brand name of that particular sauce for a concoction made in their own kitchens, one which was very inferior in quality. So that the label, in that sense, did not mean a great deal.

It is important to protect those people who conscientiously try to live up to the standards which we seek to impose upon them by this bill. When one has done that, and then is victimized through carelessness in the operation of the act, either in the retail or consumer end, we are at fault. I would suggest that there be inserted in the act a section stating that where a container has been used for an article complying with a national standard, and such container is emptied, it be destroyed or disfigured in such a way that it cannot be used again for a similar commodity and so definitely mislead the consuming public.

I would impress upon the minister the responsibility of printers in connection with the supplying of labels. The printing and distribution of labels should be carefully checked. I know that most firms printing labels are reputable, and will sell such labels only to those persons qualified to purchase them. Before a label can be sold to any firm, the firm purchasing such label should produce definite proof that it has the approval of the government to make the purchase. I say this because during the war one could purchase scotch or rye with almost any label one wished; it was the same bottle, but the label was changed to suit the fancy of the customer.

This has been done in connection with other commodities. Men could be found who were willing to print labels by the thousand for sale to anyone. This included even the printing of government seals in British Columbia. Such labels have been sold to people who bootlegged products of inferior quality under the guise of approval by the provincial government.

Firms purchasing labels should give some definite proof to the printer that they are entitled to such labels. I know this would be difficult to do, because people who print the type of labels to which I have just referred usually do it surreptitiously, and are hard to find. They will operate in basements, or quarters of that kind. I would suggest that labels should be made definitely clear and specific as to the contents of the boxes, bottles or cartons on which they appear. The printing on the label which appears on the container of an article offered for sale should not be so small that the average purchaser cannot read it, or have to use a magnifying glass to see the print. Containers should be clearly marked as to their contents; they should be marked in such a way that anyone looking at a bottle or any other type of container may know the contents without difficulty.

May I next refer to bedding, which I imagine would come under a provision of this kind. For some time we in British Columbia have sought a pure-bedding act. Thus far we have not got it, with the result that bedding unfit for use is being sold in Canada. Some years ago—and not many years at that—the state of Washington passed a pure-bedding law whereby old mattresses could not be resold in any shape or form, with the result that dealers in bedding who usually made some allowance for old mattresses no longer had any use for them. The result was that they had an accumulation of these old mattresses which they shipped to Vancouver. In Vancouver the covers were ripped off and the contents pieced together—not cleaned. The mattresses were recovered with new ticking and sold in Vancouver and other points in British Columbia as new bedding. I know this to be an actual fact.

We should have a strict regulation which would refer particularly to bedding, because I am sure many diseases can be transmitted through the use of uncleaned bedding of this kind, whether it be in the form of mattresses, blankets or other bed coverings. Mattresses should be clearly stamped indicating that the contents are brand new and made according to the specifications required to secure a Canada standard label. Naturally only the best and most reputable firms could secure that brand. I will say however that many firms today using cotton in its raw form, whether in chesterfields or bedding, have adopted a system of their own whereby they affix a label stating that the contents are 100 per cent pure, clean and new. This however is done purely of their own volition.

In my view the act should make provision for the control of advertising. As my colleague from Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) has just shown, advertising can be ridiculous and fantastic. These fantastic claims continue to be made regarding many commodities one can think of. So clever are the advertisements that their producers are actually in higher brackets of pay than are the producers of the article the advertising agent seeks to sell. The agent is regarded as the more clever.

An article may be all that is desired, it may be pure and come up to all the required specifications; but from the standpoint of selling that is not enough. It must be glamourized; and for its sale one must secure the services of a man who can, as my colleague says, bring Hollywood into the set-up, and sell something that is not exactly what it is meant to be. Any firm practising wrong advertising or making fantastic claims, whether the product meets with specifications or not, should immediately lose its privilege of having the brand assigned to it. This must be stopped, whether it applies to food products, face creams, toilet products or any other articles. It does not matter what the product may be; the practice of truth in advertising must some day prevail, and this could be a first step in demanding that all who receive labels must conform to fair trade practices in their advertising, particularly that appearing in popular magazines.

One can read these advertisements in magazines today where absurd claims are made. Some time ago in England some of the prominent sections of the press, including Punch and the Daily Mirror, took steps in this direction. The Daily Mirror indicated that it would not accept an advertisement for their paper which they themselves could not back up 100 per cent. For that purpose they had their own staff, which scrutinized every advertisement offered to their paper. If it met with their approval, after investigation, the advertiser was given the privilege of continued advertising.

I would appeal to the press of this country to co-operate with the department in making this bill a successful effort to make Canadian products known throughout the world for what they are stated to be on the labels, the contents being of best quality.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have only two brief observations to make, which will not take long. First I feel the government should be assured from all sides of the house that it will have the support of the people of Canada in pushing the use of the trade-mark "Canada standard" as provided by this bill. When the parliamentary assistant was introducing the measure some of us felt it was too bad he could not go a little further in making these standards more compulsory. I think I know the reason, namely, the difficulty we encounter as to provincial and federal jurisdiction under the British North America Act. I take it, however, the bill is based upon the premise that, if the federal government is going to accord to certain producers of goods the right to use a federal trade-mark, the federal government has the right to indicate the standards that must be met in order to use that trade-mark. If that is the case, then the course for the government to follow, under the constitutional division of powers as it now stands, is to popularize and push this trade-mark for all it is worth. It would seem to me, as one product after another meets the standard laid down and is able to use the letters "C.S.", that the people of Canada would be encouraged to want goods that have that particular mark on them, and in turn that would encourage the producers of other goods to try to meet these standards as well.

I remind the government that during the war under the wartime prices and trade board there was what was called, I believe, a bureau of standards. Under price control it became necessary to see to it that the purpose of price control was not defeated by the quality of goods being allowed to deteriorate. Therefore a bureau of standards was set up, and I am sure members of the government know as well as we do that the women of Canada in particular were most grateful for it. They liked the idea, and they came to feel during the war that, whatever else they might have to complain about, when they bought goods with a W.P.T.B. ticket on them they knew there was some supervision and inspection as to the standard of quality of the particular article. I am sure there is widespread support for the principle of the bill, for the institution of this trade-mark, and I hope that it will be pushed by the department. Some improvements have been made in the new bill compared with the previous legislation. It seems to me it has been made more workable, and I hope that it will not be a measure, as the old one was, that will be more or less buried and become inoperative.

The other thing I should like to say has already been referred to by my colleague, the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones). In this connection I may say to the minister that I should like to offer an amendment to one of the clauses of his bill when we get into committee. I think it will be in order for me to mention it now in the hope that he will have at least that long to think it over, and be able to accept the amendment I propose to make when we reach the committee stage. As the hon. member for Yale has said, it does seem that, when we give the good name of Canada to products that are produced for sale either within or without Canada, we should be sure that that good name does not cover up poor working conditions. It should be a guarantee that, in addition to the goods meeting certain qualifications and standards, the workers who have been employed in producing them have been paid decent wages and have worked under decent conditions. As a matter of fact, it would seem to me that manufacturers would want it that way. Otherwise it would be possible for one manufacturer, who was paying poorer wages, to get the label or trade-mark by keeping up the quality of his goods when another manufacturer who was paying better wages might not be able to get it.

In case anybody raises the constitutional question, it seems to me that the answer is fairly simple. These working conditions would be put on the same basis as the other conditions set out in the bill. The federal government is not laying down mandatory provisions so far as standards of goods are concerned. They are simply saying: Here is our trade-mark; we cannot compel you to meet these conditions but if you want our trade-mark these are the conditions you must meet. I submit if the federal government has the power to do that so far as the standards and qualities of goods are concerned, it has the right to do the same thing with respect to labour conditions. As the British North America Act is now being interpreted, the federal government claims it has no right to invade the provincial field and say that such-and-such must be the general labour conditions, but the federal government has the right, just the same as with the other phases of this matter, to say that so far as this federal trade-mark is concerned we are not giving it unless, conferring as we will be the good name of Canada, we are assured that certain fair and decent working conditions are met.

Just as the bill does not propose to set out in detail what the other standards or qualifications are, I would say that as to working conditions the bill should not necessarily specify them, but that the matter should be left to the governor in council to decide by regulation. This proposal is not one that can be made the subject of an amendment to the motion for second reading, but when we get into committee I shall move an amendment to section 4, the wording of which I have before me, which will give the governor in council the power to lay down the working conditions to be met before the use of Canada's good name is permitted. I hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) may see fit to accept it when that time comes.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—National trade mark.

Mr. Charlton: I mentioned on second reading that, so far as agricultural products are concerned, the word "standard" implied only average or ordinary quality. Would the minister care to make a statement as to that in view of the fact that he was probably present before the committee of the other place when it was considered there?

Mr. Howe: I understand that subject was not mentioned in the committee of the other place. The standards laid down for an agricultural product can only be the standards established by the Department of Agriculture for the particular product. I think we could hardly establish by order in council a standard superior to that maintained by the Department of Agriculture. It would simply be a guarantee that the standards set by the Department of Agriculture are equalled or exceeded by the goods.

Mr. Charlton: Is it considered that the trade-mark will be used for agricultural products or merely for manufactured goods?

Mr. Howe: It would not ordinarily be used for agricultural products. It could only be a guarantee that the minimum standard for that product laid down by the Department of Agriculture is adhered to in the product. That is all it would mean in connection with agricultural products.

Mr. Stanfield: How would that work with respect to agricultural products which were processed?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Howe: If a manufacturer wishes the privilege of putting the brand "Canada standard" on his goods, he must make sure that they come up to the minimum standard set for those goods. The commodity will be tested from time to time in the national research laboratories, and if it is found below the standard the manufacturer will lose the right to use the "Canada standard" mark.

Mr. Stanfield: What about those who do not use the trade-mark?

Mr. Howe: It is not applicable to them. There is no compulsion about using "Canada standard"; it is a privilege extended to people who undertake to keep their goods up to the standard specified.

Mr. Johnston: Would this apply to goods which went out of the country, say to the United Kingdom?

Mr. Howe: If the manufacturer chose to use this trade-mark, probably it would be used on his exports as well as his domestic shipments. All this act means is that if the brand "Canada standard" is put on the package, the contents of that package must be up to the standard set by the government in that regard.

Mr. Johnston: There would be no compulsion on the United Kingdom people to leave that trade-mark on, would there? I have in mind that many of our products go over there without bearing any brand name, and I thought this would be of a great deal of assistance to the purchasers on the other side, who would know they were getting quality goods from Canada.

Mr. Howe: That situation is incidental to bulk buying by the British government itself. It arose in the war years, when the British government were buying in bulk and then refused any country the right to advertise itself on the goods shipped to Britain under those bulk purchase arrangements.

Mr. Bater: Perhaps I am a little late in rising, but in view of what other speakers have said with respect to section 3 I think the difficulty might be overcome if we provided for the use of the words "Canada super standard" and the initials "C.S.S." and then for any grade under that "Canada standard" and "C.S." I think probably "Canada super standard" could be applied to any manufactured article or any commodity produced on our farms.

Mr. Howe: Perhaps we had better establish the grade "Canada standard" a little more firmly before we add any other grade.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I have not been able to remain in the house all afternoon, and I do not want the minister to repeat any explanation he has given already; but I should like to know under what authority or by what practice his department will set up the standard or quality of goods. I want to refer to one commodity in particular; that is, paint. For a good many years there has been a great deal of complaint in our part of Canada with respect to the quality of paints, perhaps more in recent years than was formerly the case; paints that fade in colour, paints that peel, paints that crack and last for only a short time. I have heard many of our older citizens compare the quality of paints used in recent years with that of paints used years ago on our farmhouses and urban dwellings, and they have said that the old paint retained its colour and quality and ability to protect the surface for a much longer time. I believe the use of paint is something that should be encouraged just as much as possible, but the beautification of our whole countryside depends upon the quantity and quality of the paint used, and we should safeguard the users of paint both with regard to quality and with regard to cost. I believe the users of paint have a serious grievance in that they are subjected to the high sales tax of eight per cent. I think the use of paint should be encouraged by removing that tax entirely; and, as I say, those purchasing paint should have some guarantee as to the quality of the product.

My first question on rising was what provision the minister is making for establishing and guaranteeing the quality of commodities such as paints.

Mr. Howe: If my hon. friend will look at section 6 of the bill he will see that it reads:

In addition to its powers and duties under any other statute or law, the national research council shall, at the request of the minister,

(a) study, investigate, report and advise upon all matters relating to commodity standards or specifications;

(b) prepare draft standards or specifications for any commodity or for any grade or type thereof and recommend methods of designating the same...

The standards would be set after study by the national research council and upon their recommendation as to what a reasonable standard might be, and subsequent consultation with the trade itself, to get their confirmation of what would be reasonable to warrant the designation "Canada standard".

Mr. Black (Cumberland): May I ask the minister when it is expected that the provisions of this act will be made effective?

Mr. Howe: As soon as we get it through this house and it receives royal assent, which I hope will be within the next few days.

Section agreed to.

National Trade Mark

On section 4—Regulations respecting national trade mark.

Mr. Knowles: This section reads in part:

(1) The governor in council may make regulations

(a) prescribing the classes and kinds of commodities to which the national trade-mark may be applied and the persons who may apply it . . .

Then follow two or three more paragraphs, after which I should like to read paragraph (d) because it is pretty important:

(d) prescribing the standards or specifications, including those established under any other act of parliament, to which any commodity shall conform if the national trade-mark is applied thereto:

(e) prescribing the implied warranties that application of the national trade-mark to any commodity shall represent . . .

It is at this point in the bill that I should like to move for the insertion of the amendment I referred to when we were on second reading. As I indicated at that time, Mr. Chairman, I think we all understand the premise on which this bill is based, which was set out by the parliamentary assistant to the minister. That is, it is not possible for the federal government to lay down mandatory provisions; but it can say, "Since this is our trade-mark, these are the standards that must be maintained." That is provided for in section 4(1)(d), for example, which I have just read.

My submission is that if it is possible for the federal government to say that those who wish to use this trade-mark must see to it that their goods meet certain standards, it is also possible for the federal government to say that those who wish to use this trade-mark must conform to certain standards in the matter of rates of pay, hours of work and other working conditions.

I must say that some of us feel that the guarantee of good working conditions—and a real super guarantee, if I may quote the hon. member for The Battlefords—is the use of the union label, but it is to be admitted that there are many commodities on which the union label does not appear, which nevertheless are subject to fair wage legislation in the provinces. I would leave it to the governor in council to indicate the standards of wages and other working conditions which should be met, but it does seem to me that we should not put the good name of Canada on goods without being in a position to be able to say not only that those goods meet a certain standard as to quality, but that they have been produced under decent working conditions. So I move that after paragraph (e) a new paragraph (ee) be inserted. My reason for suggesting that it go in after (e) is that paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) are of a positive nature, whereas paragraphs

(f) and (g) are negative in character, and it seemed to me that was where it should go. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton South:

That clause 4, subclause (1), of Bill 133, be amended by inserting therein after paragraph (e) a new paragraph (ee) to read as follows:

"(ee) prescribing the rates of pay, hours of work, and other working conditions under which commodities, packages or containers shall be produced if the national trade mark is applied thereto."

I might say that I took the first words of the proposed amendment direct from the federal labour code and, obviously, the wording of the latter part of the amendment is to be found in other subsections of this same section.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I have every sympathy with the objectives which this amendment is trying to attain, but it seems to me that there would be real difficulty in applying anything of this nature in determining a Canada standard. I believe my hon. friend has put his finger on the essential point when he said that the best label to protect working conditions is the union label. To substitute anything else for the union label would, I believe, meet with serious objection from the labour unions. No doubt the hon. member is aware of the fact that the union label is a bargaining weapon, and a valuable privilege granted by labour unions under certain conditions. I believe that is one objection.

Another objection would be that this would cut across provincial jurisdiction. In effect, it asks us to set a minimum wage and minimum working conditions on a national scale for industries using the "Canada standard" label. I doubt if this government would have the right to do so. Perhaps the Minister of Labour is able to discuss this more intelligently than I can.

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend has mentioned the union label. Many years ago in Hamilton I used to be a delegate to the union label league, and I think I know something about union labels. Is there a union label on the suit my hon. friend is wearing at the moment?

Mr. Knowles: That's right, and I have my union card in my pocket.

Mr. Mitchell: I am talking about union labels. There is a union label on my coat, my vest and my pants.

An hon. Member: Go on.

Mr. Mitchell: I understand trade unions and I know that they are jealous of their labels. The painters have a label; the cigar makers have a label; the printers certainly have a label; the lithographers have a label, and the die stampers. There are over a hundred labels which are given protection by a statute. I believe that statute was introduced some years ago by a Liberal government. I knew some of the prime movers of that statute, and it is rather revealing to look at it. It says:

No union label registered by any labour union may be assigned by any other process of law or otherwise.

That is section 15, subsection 3, of chapter 201, an act respecting Trade Marks and Industrial Design. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, the union label is a bargaining point. It is of use to the trade unions in ensuring good working conditions. I believe my hon. friend was in the printing trade and I am sure he will agree with me when I say that the printers are jealous of their label. So are all other trade unions. I know when I go to get a haircut—I have not much hair—the first thing I do is to look for the union label in the shop. It is a guarantee that the employees are getting good working conditions.

I believe that that is far better than any legislation. The use of this label is not mandatory. I do not take second place to anyone in this House of Commons in my advocacy of good working conditions, but if this amendment were adopted it might create hardships for one section of an industry. Take the canning industry, for instance, with all its ramifications from the production of the base metal to the completion of the cans and putting the contents in the can. As my hon. friend is aware, there are many union labels carried on cans and articles of that description.

I say this sincerely to the hon. member, that he is defeating his own purpose. I am not questioning his sincerity, but he is defeating his own purpose by amending this particular bill in that manner without consultation with some of the labour organizations in this country. I cannot recall any resolution or any demand on the part of labour organizations for this particular type of legislation. By insisting upon this amendment, one may be creating hardship for some well-organized trade that enjoyed good working conditions within an industry. Perhaps in some other industry that was not the case. Organization is the answer to that.

I have never been a great believer in setting minimum wages by law except to protect young people and women engaged in industry. Experience has taught us that when minimum wages are created by law the minimum becomes the maximum. If my friend looks across this country he may find some exceptions, but as a rule it is the case. In the United States, the minimum wage was recently raised from 40 cents to 75 cents per hour in industries under the jurisdiction of the federal government. It is an indication that there must have been a good many people working at substandard rates in the interim between the establishment of the 40 cent per hour minimum and the 75 cent per hour minimum.

I join with the Minister of Trade and Commerce in saying I do not think you would be rendering a service to the trade union organizations of this country by adopting this amendment. So far as I am concerned, I would prefer the union label. I believe it is an indication that the men are free men and are not being dominated by a government. They have negotiated agreements and I think that is the proper way relations between employers and employees should be conducted, particularly in view of the fact there has been an enormous growth in trade unions in Canada during the last ten years.

Mr. MacInnis: I believe both the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Labour are under a misapprehension. If the union label—in other words trade union conditions—is the best proof of the existence of a standard, you do not need to go any further; you have exactly what you want. As I understand it, this is voluntary legislation. The provisions of the bill are not mandatory; that is, we are not stepping in and telling manufacturers that they must do so-and-so. We are merely saying that if you produce a product of a certain quality, the Dominion of Canada will put on that product the hallmark, or whatever mark you call it, of quality "Canada standard"; but the product itself must first of all be of the required quality. If it is not, we have no power under this bill to compel producers or manufacturers to produce a product of the standard of quality that will receive the trade-mark. We contend that the quality may be good and may be of such a standard as to merit this trade-mark quality, but, at the same time, it may be produced under sweated labour conditions. If there is a trade union in the industry where the product is produced, we would assume that that was sufficient proof that it was not produced under sweated conditions.

We carry the same principle into government contracts through the fair wage policy; that is the wage that is accepted in the particular locality. But you might indeed go a little further than that. The Minister of Labour said that he was opposed to minimum wages. But a minimum wage is only required in industries in which the workers are not organized. I know that for years the trade union movement did oppose minimum wages. In 1931, in the convention in Vancouver, the American Federation of Labor went on record as being opposed to unemployment insurance.

Mr. Mitchell: I was there.

Mr. MacInnis: They were foolishly trying to protect the trade union movement. In the old country the trade union movement for years was opposed to family allowances. I am well aware of the background of those fears. But all of the things I mentioned are now accepted by intelligent trade unionists everywhere as being of assistance in maintaining high standards of living and are not a detriment to trade unionism. I quite admit that there may be difficulty in finding a proper wording for a clause of this kind, but I believe that, if we accept the principle of it, it can be found.

Mr. Gillis: I think it is rather unfortunate that the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not discuss with the Minister of Labour the drafting of this bill. If I were Minister of Labour and Canada was preparing to adopt a bill of this nature, I think it would be my responsibility in the field of labour to see that those who produced the goods were also taken care of. I think the minister is in reverse in the statement he has made in this matter.

You cannot produce quality goods under sweat-shop conditions. I have no doubt that the hosiery industry, which is a low-paid industry and somewhat unorganized, can produce silk stockings and that kind of thing, and have them meet the standards that may be laid down. No standards are laid down in this act. It merely says that the research council will prepare specifications and standards. They may be able to meet the standards laid down by the research council; but I think one of the first things which should be done, before we put our trade-mark on any commodity that we are marketing in this country is to see to it that the people who actually produce that commodity are at least getting a fair break in the matter of wages and conditions.

This business of bringing the trade union label into the question is completely irrelevant to this bill. It has not anything to do with it. It is a good yardstick as to whether goods are quality goods or not and that conditions are fair and reasonable in any industry where the workers are organized and are bargaining. But we must not forget that only about 25 per cent of the workers of this country are eligible for membership in a union. The other 75 per cent will be producing most of the goods that we are going to label and say meet the standards laid down by the research council and later adopted, I suppose, by this house. Seventy-five per cent of the people who actually produce the goods are not in a position to protect themselves with regard to a union label.

This measure will not be opposed by any trade unionist in this country if he has any sense, simply because this action in protecting the public, by bringing our commodities up to standard, will assist in the unionization of plants, in my opinion; and that is something that is badly needed at this time. I do not see any reason in the world why the minister cannot write in the clause suggested here, because it does not mean that you must go out and start to organize the workers of this country. It means that you are going to do exactly the same thing for the man who works in the plant and produces the goods as you are going to do for the manufacturer—that is, the decent manufacturer—who wants to produce quality goods. The bill merely states that you are simply going to lay down certain requirements and specifications for his goods. That is going to protect him against the fellow that wants to sell inferior goods. At the same time, if you add this clause (ee), you merely say that we are going to probe the possibility also of decent working conditions, hours of labour and wages in the plants and factories whose goods carry the trade-mark of Canada. There is no reason why that cannot be done. It does not interfere with anyone. It does not mean that you are going to do it overnight, because it is going to take some considerable time to build up in this country a standard product that is recognized even by our own people. I think both things go hand in hand, because you cannot get, under sweat-shop conditions, the kind of goods that you can put your O.K. on.

Mr. Quelch: I do not quite like this amendment because I feel that it may result in a form of discrimination. It reads as follows:

(ee) prescribing the rates of pay, hours of work, and other working conditions, under which commodities, packages or containers shall be produced if the national trade mark is applied thereto.

What would be the result in a canning factory if, in order to pay these rates of wages and maintain certain hours of labour, they felt that they could not maintain the price at which the commodity should be sold? The result would be that they would start to chisel on the primary producer who was supplying it with the commodities to put in those packages. If you put that provision in there, you should also put in: "And shall prescribe the price paid for the products contained in those packages". Therefore, unless that proviso is put in, I would not be prepared to support the amendment. Otherwise, it would just mean discrimination against the primary producer.

Mr. Wright: I think the hon. member for Acadia has misinterpreted the amendment. The amendment states, as he has read:

prescribing the rates of pay, hours of work, and other working conditions, under which commodities, packages or containers shall be produced if the national trade mark is applied thereto.

The tomatoes and corn that go into the can are commodities; and if this amendment were applied, it could be applied to the minimum price, as meaning the minimum price for the agricultural product that went into the can, as well as to the hours and conditions of the labourer who produces the can.

Mr. Howe: No. I must correct my hon. friend there. The mark "Canada standard" on a package means that the commodity itself is standard, but it does not necessarily mean that the fruit, before it was canned, was standard. If we accepted this amendment my hon. friend would hardly wish to take it back into all the components that go into the finished article. I think that would be quite impossible. In any event, what he is asking is that the government prescribe rates of pay. That means we would have to put in a coast to coast rate of pay for a given commodity. There are minimum wage laws in every province, and they are all different in some respect. I do not see how we could set a rate of pay for a commodity, and prescribe hours of work. How could we do that? British Columbia works a forty-hour week, and Ontario perhaps a forty-five or a forty-eight-hour week. How could we say that one would have the standard and the other could not? I think that by accepting the amendment we would make the act completely unenforceable. As the act is written today, if an article is found in the United Kingdom it can be tested, and the test checked against the specifications, and it either complies with the specifications or it does not. But if the article also had to be traced back to its origin and a determination made as to whether fair wages were paid we would have a wholly unworkable act. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will not accept the amendment.

Mr. Knowles: May I say that to prescribe rates of pay, hours of work, and other working conditions would not necessarily involve, at the federal level, all the detail that the minister suggests. For example, it might be solved by simply requiring that the fair wage conditions in the various provinces be met before the label is granted. It might prescribe—and I would so urge—that in certain classes of goods the union label would be the only acceptable proof of proper working conditions. In other words, it does not have to be shown in terms of a wage rate for every class of employee right across the country; it could be done in general classifications. As a matter of fact, something similar to that happens in some of the provinces today where the fair wage legislation hinges in part on what the trade union rates are in a particular industry; and in industries not so well organized some detail is given.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is not as difficult to find a general formula for prescribing working conditions as it is to prescribe qualities and standards for all the different kinds and classes of things that may come under this legislation. The bill provides for that; I think my amendment is even more important. Frankly, I do not feel that the objection raised by the Minister of Trade and Commerce carries weight.

While I am on my feet may I say one word with respect to what the Minister of Labour had to say. He tried to make a comparison between this national trade-mark and the union label, and suggested that the union label was good enough and that we should not have the provision I ask for with respect to the national trade-mark. May I point out, as did the hon. member for Cape Breton South, that there are a lot of goods produced by workers who are either unorganized or are in fields in which the union label is not used. By this legislation what you are making possible is another label called "Canada standard", which sounds good, but which may not—and will not when my amendment carries—guarantee the conditions that the union label is guaranteeing on certain other goods. You will have people going into stores in Canada and buying goods and feeling satisfied with them because they have got the "Canada standard" label on them. People will be asked if they have bought union label goods. They will say: "Yes, I have. I have it here; it has 'C.S.' on it." It will not be worth what the union label is worth, and it will actually be a detriment to the trade union movement in this country to have another label competing with the trade union label, a government label which will not be worth half what the trade union label is worth. I am saying the way to make this "Canada standard" label worth something is to put this kind of clause into the bill and leave it, as the clause says, to the governor in council to work out the proper regulations.

Mr. Mitchell: May I refer to one point? You do not have to use this label to begin with. Let us take the condition of the organized people in industry at the moment. Take this thing to its logical conclusion. Lots of olive oil comes from Greece. My hon. friend smiles. He says, "Let somebody else work it out."

Mr. Knowles: I laughed because I thought the minister was punning.

Mr. Mitchell: No, I am not. I am trying to be sensible.

Mr. MacInnis: There is no harm in trying.

Mr. Knowles: The minister should warn us.

Mr. Mitchell: I think I have as much experience with these things as the average member in the house, especially in connection with minimum wage laws. As hon. members know, I was chairman of the Ontario executive board of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada seven years. Do you want the standard to apply to sugar from the West Indies, for instance? I refer to the people who are interested in the great international movements. Take many other things that enter into it. Some of the things that we are speaking about are basic. I believe the best form of protection is an organization. You can have all the laws in the world so far as I am concerned; when you get the workers organized that is the yardstick of progress. The hon. member for Vancouver East is a member of a street railway union. It would have been just too bad for these street railway men if they had to put this kind of label on the streetcar to see whether a person rode on it or not. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is a member of the printers' union. It would have been just too bad if the printers had to use this kind of legislation to see that they got good working conditions. It would have been just too bad for the miners of the hon. member for Cape Breton South if they had to lean on legislation of this kind. And so on right across the board. As I said before, for defenceless people, for women and young people, it is all right, but I would prefer straight negotiation for grown-up people. The union label is superior to any minimum wage law under the canopy of heaven.

Mr. Knowles: This bill makes it possible for the label "Canada standard" to be put on packages. The minister spoke to me as a printer. As a printer I want the union label on packages.

National Trade Mark

Mr. Mitchell: Why don't you get one on your suit?

Mr. Knowles: But under this legislation it will be possible to put out packages with "C.S." on them, that have not been produced under the conditions required by the printing trades council, to which I strongly object.

Mr. Johnston: Just a word; I would not like to see this amendment pass without saying something on it. No matter what the intent of the amendment is it is the wording that you have to decide on. To start with, I do not think we should try to create an advantage for one class of citizens to the disadvantage of another class. When you look at the amendment closely you find that it says:

> Prescribing the rates of pay, hours of work, and other working conditions, under which commodities, packages, or containers shall be produced if the national trade mark is applied thereto.

It is true that it speaks of commodities, but the working conditions attached to it are three, namely, rates of pay, hours of work, and working conditions. I am all for giving the workingman the advantage of the situation. I want to see him have the highest possible standard of living; but under this amendment, as the hon. member for Acadia said, you can maintain wages, rates of pay, as it is called, the hours of work and the other working conditions. You can keep these at a high level to the detriment of the man who produces the raw materials. I would be most hesitant about passing this in its present form. If the sponsor of the amendment can change it so as to give all parties connected with the production of a product and its processing the advantage which he hopes, then I would be only too pleased to support it. But I can see very clearly that the agriculturist, for instance, who produces garden produce such as peas, corn and the like which go into the manufacture of commodities put in cans, upon which labels are placed, has absolutely no protection. In fact it may work out very much to his disadvantage in the long run. So, when it comes to placing one class against another, I think it is poor legislation. I am of the opinion that labourers throughout the country would view it that way. I cannot support it in its present form.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, may I deal first with what the hon. member for Bow River has said. He still clings to the old-fashioned idea that in order that farmers may prosper the industrialist worker must be kept on a low wage.

Mr. Johnston: No, no, no.

Mr. MacInnis: There was never a more fallacious argument than that. The farmer does not sell his products to other farmers. He sells his products to city people, the industrial workers. If the industrial worker does not get a wage that enables him to buy the things the farmer produces, then the farmer will be poor.

Now for the Minister of Labour; he can draw more red herrings across the trail than any other person I ever met in my life. He talks about the great advantages of unions, organized labour, and he mentions the organization to which I belong, the street railwaymen's union. He has referred to the printers' union, and to various other unions. But all of the labour unions he referred to are in relatively protected industries, in industries in which it is easy for the workers to organize. The people who need protection are not the people who can protect themselves, but those who cannot protect themselves. That is what we are trying to do by this amendment.

It is very easy for the skilled workers, or the workers in industry where there is a virtual monopoly, such as in street railway transportation, to organize. I remember at one time hearing the president of the company for which I worked say that we got good conditions partly because the company's own condition was so precarious that they could not afford a struggle with the union. That is a fact.

What we want is not that those who are strong should maintain good conditions for themselves, but that we make sure that those who cannot maintain good conditions for themselves, because of their weakness, will be protected. It is for that purpose that the amendment is moved. As I said before, there may be some difficulty in wording it so that it will meet the intended purpose; but that should not be beyond the ingenuity of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his most efficient staff.

Mr. Fair: The hon. member for Vancouver East is just a little ahead of the minister when it comes to twisting things, and drawing red herrings across a trail; because no better job could have been done in misconstruing things than has been done by the hon. member for Vancouver East in connection with the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. MacInnis: You put it right, then.

Mr. Fair: The hon. member for Bow River stated distinctly that he wanted the workers to have the very best possible working conditions, provided that they did not have those conditions at the expense of the primary producer. That was stated quite clearly and distinctly and there is no reason why anyone should try to draw a red herring across the trail, or change that condition around.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) negatived, on division.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 4 carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Mr. Charlton: What is meant in paragraph (a) when it states—

Prescribing the classes and kinds of commodities to which the national trade mark may be applied and the persons who may apply it.

Does that refer only to manufactured goods, or does it include processed goods? As I see it, processed goods and primary products are all included; but it is left to the minister to say which ones are affected.

Mr. Howe: It could apply to any commodity, agricultural, manufactured, or anything else, provided the industry asked for the designation, and the government approved and set up the minimum standard. For instance, it could apply to eggs which are graded under the rules of the Department of Agriculture. We could have a Canadian standard egg, if we wanted to. I do not imagine that we would. I think it is more applicable to manufactured articles.

Mr. Charlton: Practically every agricultural product across this country is graded.

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: There is no need for this.

Mr. Howe: Perhaps that is right.

Mr. Charlton: This is what I have asked for on various occasions; if it will mean that the grade on which we are paid is carried through to the ultimate retailer or consumer, then I am all for it. But I do not think it does that. For instance, a side of pork which is graded as a grade A side—does that mean that the consumer will get that particular quality of bacon when he buys it at the store?

Mr. Howe: No, that does not apply to this act at all. We are operating under another act.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to have an answer about wire. Has this act anything to do with the quality of wire being sold? Is it standardized, or is it not?

Mr. Howe: An application has already been made for a standard for barbed wire. There is no standard at the present time. We tried to have this measure passed last year, but did not get it through. The result is that we have no standard today. However, after this is passed the standard for barbed wire can be set if we can work out suitable specifications. If the hon. member buys barbed wire marked as the Canadian standard he will know exactly what he is buying.

Mr. Cardiff: If that is it, then I am all for it, because in the last seven or eight years we have been buying wire which was not worth putting on the market.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Howe moves, seconded by Mr. Fournier (Hull), that the bill be read a third time.

Mr. Knowles: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Speaker: The answer was "now".

Mr. Howe: There are no amendments.

Mr. Knowles: It had second reading today.

Mr. Howe: No amendments.

Mr. Knowles: It had second reading today, and there cannot be more than one reading in a day. Standing order 73.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): By unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: I asked, "When shall this bill be read a third time?" And the answer was "now"—no one dissented. Therefore it has received unanimous consent.

Mr. Knowles: When someone else was saying "now" I was saying "next sitting of the house" at the same time. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: It is moved by Mr. Howe, and seconded by Mr. Fournier (Hull), that this bill be now read a third time. That motion is debatable. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, at eleven o'clock on Monday we will take up, in the hope of passing it on that day, Bill 194, an act to encourage and assist in the construction of a trans-Canada highway. As announced by the Prime Minister, on Monday at eight o'clock we will move to go into supply and call an item in the three remaining departments, the Prime Minister's office, finance and legislation. We will specially call item 92, the administration item for the wartime prices and trade board, so that the discussion requested by the hon. member for Lake Centre concerning the rental control reference to the supreme court may take place. If we conclude the trans-Canada highway bill during the day, I would name the following bills and resolutions that could be taken up, but not in this order: Bills Nos. 64, 65, 120 and 148, and resolutions 16 and 27 on today's order paper.

I move that the house do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 6.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, November 28, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

CANADIAN VESSEL CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

CONSTRUCTION AND CONVERSION OF VESSELS —ACCELERATED DEPRECIATION

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 216, to encourage the construction and conversion of vessels in Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to encourage the construction and conversion of vessels in Canada. The assistance will take the form of accelerated depreciation. Owners who construct or convert vessels in Canadian yards will be entitled to write off their ships in three years if they so wish. The vessels to which the legislation will apply are those as defined in the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. Green: Is there to be legislation providing aid to the shipping industry, as distinguished from the shipbuilding industry?

Mr. Chevrier: This legislation deals with ships as defined in the Canada Shipping Act, and applies to shipbuilding.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CITY OF OTTAWA—CONSTRUCTION OF SHELTERS AT BUS STOPS

Mr. Church:

1. Has the government made any representations to the city of Ottawa with respect to the erection of bus shelters along the routes of its transportation system within the present city limits?
2. If so, with what result?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.

OIL AND GAS PIPE LINES

Mr. Winkler:

1. How many pipe lines are bringing oil and/or gas from the United States into Canada at the present time?
2. How long have they been in operation?
3. How much oil or gas has entered Canada by these sources in that time and what is the estimated value?

Mr. McIlraith:

1 and 2. (a) Two bringing oil: Montreal-Portland pipe line—1941. The Transit and Storage Co.—1912. (b) Two bringing gas: Dominion Natural Gas Co. (Buffalo)—1925. Union Gas Co. Windsor connection with Detroit—1947.

3. Oil—Statistics are not compiled by separate means of transportation. All oil statistics are grouped together regardless of whether they are imported by a pipe line, tanker, tank car or truck.

Gas—Imports—Gas for cooking, heating or illuminating imported by pipe line from United States:

RAILWAYS—EXCURSION RATES, ETC.

Mr. Church:

1. What weekend excursion rates on Canadian railways will be available for the coming Christmas holidays?
2. What will be the charges for berths, lower and upper, and other sleeper accommodation during the Christmas season?
3. Will they be the same as other years?
4. By whose authority have such rates been established?
5. Has the board of transport commissioners approved of them? If so, when?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. Round trip for 1½ times one-way fare.
2. The regular tariff charges for the type of accommodation used between the stations concerned.
3. No.
4. The railway companies.
5. No.

Questions

RADIO RECEIVING LICENCES—PROSECUTIONS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many prosecutions were taken, by provinces, since the first of January, 1949, for alleged neglect to take out radio licences by private persons?
2. What is the average fine levied in each province?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. Prince Edward Island, 139; Nova Scotia, 578; New Brunswick, 199; Quebec, 1,137; Ontario, 4,238; Manitoba, 517; Saskatchewan, 255; Alberta, 363; British Columbia, 147.

2. Prince Edward Island, $1.90; Nova Scotia, $3.30; New Brunswick, $4.80; Quebec, $2.45; Ontario, $2.70; Manitoba, $3.90; Saskatchewan, $4.65; Alberta, $4.15; British Columbia, $2.80.

Only cases for which complete reports have been received in the department are included in this return.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—TAXES

Mr. Isnor:

1. Does the national film board collect any tax on their showing of pictures?
2. Does the national board film pay any business or property tax to (a) the federal government; (b) the provincial governments?
3. If so, what amount was received from this source during each of the years 1946, 1947 and 1948 by (a) the federal government; (b) the provincial governments?

Mr. Winters:

1. No.

2. No.

3. See answer to No. 2.

THREE RIVERS, QUE., POST OFFICE

Mr. Balcer:

1. Are the alterations for the Three Rivers, Quebec, post office being done on a cost plus arrangement or by contract?
2. If by contract, who are the contractors?
3. What is the amount of the contract?
4. Were tenders invited for this work? If so, when?
5. What are the names of those who tendered and what was the amount of each tender?
6. When is this job to be completed?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. By contract.

2. Romeo Martel, Three Rivers, Que.

3. Amount of contract, $668,270. Additional work authorized, $4,160.

4. (a) Yes, by public advertisement; (b) tenders due May 18, 1949.

5. Romeo Martel, Three Rivers, Que., $668,270; L. Massicotte & Careau Limited, Cap de la Madeleine, Que., $679,850; Rosaire Dufresne, Three Rivers, Que., $735,188; Jos. Renaud, Limited, Three Rivers, Que., $737,312; Frs. Jobin Inc., Quebec, Que., $738,349; G. A. Gruninger & Fils, Three Rivers, Que., $748,261.

6. Date of completion, December 2, 1950.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—ST. PAUL, ALTA.—RESIDENCE FOR SUPERINTENDENT

Mr. Dechene:

1. Did the Indian affairs branch of the Department of Mines and Resources purchase a residence at St. Paul, Alberta, recently?
2. If so, for what purpose?
3. What was the price paid for that property, and to whom?
4. Upon whose recommendation was this transaction made?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West):

1. Yes; in the year 1948.

2. For use as a residence for the Indian superintendent of Saddle Lake agency.

3. $7,500 to Mr. Wilfrid Aubin, St. Paul, Alberta.

4. Purchase was made upon the recommendation of the regional supervisor of Indian agencies, Alberta, following a decision by responsible officers that the superintendent should reside in the town of St. Paul.

MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Mr. Knowles:

1. On what date did the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley cease to be minister of justice?
2. Who was the minister of justice from the date noted in question 1 until the present Minister of Justice was sworn in?
3. Who was the acting minister of justice from November 15, 1948, until January 31, 1949?

Mr. St. Laurent:

1. June 30, 1948.

2. Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent was appointed Acting Minister of Justice with effect from July 1, 1948. On September 10, 1948, he was appointed Minister of Justice.

3. Hon. Joseph Jean.

FOOTBALL

REFERENCE TO GREY CUP FINALS—VICTORY OF MONTREAL ALOUETTES OVER CALGARY STAMPEDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Before the orders of the day are called I rise on a question of privilege. Before I got down this morning, which was reasonably early, some very thoughtful persons placed upon my desk this miniature coffin, which bears the single word "Calgary." The only thing they omitted to inscribe was, "Not dead, but sleeping."

I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the Montreal club on their splendid win, and the people of Montreal on their fine sportsmanship in connection with that event. In saying this, however, I exclude one person, the one who yanked my hat off my head and disappeared with it in the traffic. The hat is gone forever. I wish I could give this coffin to that man so that he could put the hat in it; for it is only the hat that is gone.

Mr. Cruickshank: As a westerner, Mr. Speaker, I have an extremely unfortunate financial duty to perform. It arises as a result of Saturday's football game. I cannot see the member in the house to whom I owe the duty, so am I exempt from performing it?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RAILWAY LINE TO ALASKA—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING SURVEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of an article in the New York Times, to the effect that a bill has been passed in the United States congress, known as the Magnuson bill, which bill was signed last week by President Truman, providing for the immediate location survey of a railroad route from Prince George, British Columbia, to Fairbanks, Alaska, and for early provision for the construction of that railroad, of which some eleven hundred miles will be on Canadian soil.

Is the minister in a position to say what negotiations have taken place with the United States government, and what is the present position of those negotiations?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): This question, or one similar to it, was asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on November 18, and he gave an extensive reply.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am aware of what he said.

Mr. Chevrier: In the course of his reply he stated that no appropriation had been passed for this purpose by the United States government; that if and when such an appropriation was passed, and if and when that government made representations to the Canadian government, those representations would be carefully considered. To that statement I have nothing to add.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There have been no further negotiations?

Mr. Chevrier: None that I am aware of.

FEED GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO AVAILABILITY OF SUPPLIES TO EASTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): Owing to the fact that in most parts of eastern Canada we are short of feed grain, could the Minister of Agriculture give us an assurance that sufficient supplies will be available at the lake ports so that the many farmers who have cattle and hogs on the feed lots will be able to have that livestock ready for market?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The only answer I can give is that every effort is being made to have sufficient feed grain available in eastern Canada. Whether it will be available at the lake ports or somewhere else, the hope is that grain will be available for the feeding of livestock.

FOOD

TRADE WITH BRITAIN—QUESTION AS TO RENEWAL OF EGG CONTRACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the Canadian contract with Great Britain for supplying 80 million dozen grade A eggs expires in approximately four weeks, and that there are 580,000 poultry farmers in Canada who are concerned about future markets for eggs, will the minister make a statement as to the prospects for the renewal of at least part of this contract?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member was kind enough to send me a copy of his question. It should be stated that the position in relation to the food contracts is about the same this year as it was at this time in each of the last two years. This is the third year in which discussions with Britain about food contracts have continued until about the middle of December; the understandings were reached about that time in the two preceding years. The position is exactly the same this year, in that we are still discussing contracts with Great Britain for eggs, bacon and cheese. We are not in a position to make any announcement as to the actual amount, or what arrangements may finally be made. We are hopeful that satisfactory arrangements will be made.

CANADA'S POSITION WITH RESPECT TO FAO PLAN FOR SURPLUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Will the Minister of Agriculture make a statement about Canada's policy with regard to the FAO plan to take care of world food surpluses? Some disturbing press reports have been noticed concerning the minister's statement in Washington.

Trans-Canada Highway

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I may say that the meeting of the FAO is still continuing. So far as I know, no decision has been reached as to the plans the nations represented are going to follow. So far as the position of the government and my own position is concerned, I made a complete statement last Thursday which, if the members of the house desired, could be placed in full on Hansard. It would, however, take a considerable portion of Hansard, because it was a thirty-minute speech. It could not be interpreted by the one or two sentences that have been published in the press, particularly since some of the papers left words out of the statement sent to them by the Canadian Press.

Mr. Coldwell: Could the minister table a copy of that speech, so that the members could have access to it?

Mr. Gardiner: That could be done.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

PROVISION FOR FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved the second reading of Bill No. 194, to encourage and to assist in the construction of a trans-Canada highway.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments in moving second reading of the bill entitled "An act to encourage and to assist in the construction of a trans-Canada highway".

Hon. members will understand that this legislation is enabling in character, in that it seeks authority for the federal government to enter into agreements with the provincial governments toward the construction of provincial highways which will join at various provincial boundaries to form a continuous road across Canada from one coast to the other and, as such, constitute a trans-Canada highway.

This project has been envisaged for many years, and it is considered that the time is now appropriate to proceed with it. When first contemplated it was conceived as a highway from Halifax to Vancouver, but it is now proposed that it shall extend from Victoria, on Vancouver island, to St. John's, Newfoundland, and also embrace Prince Edward Island.

The highway, when completed, will remain the property of the respective provincial governments, who will assume their normal highway responsibilities with respect to it, such as maintenance and snow removal. In effect, therefore, this legislation will enable the federal government to assist provinces in highway construction.

[Mr. Argue.]

Nearly all provinces are already heavily engaged in highway programs, and it would be difficult for most of them to assume alone this additional work without some financial assistance. Moreover, the completed highway will have a national aspect in that it will serve to link all provinces, and will enable Canadians to travel from one end of Canada's mainland to the other on Canadian soil by hard-surfaced road. As such, it will play a part in the national economy. Under the circumstances it would appear justifiable for the federal government to contribute up to half the total cost, as the bill indicates.

It is considered, however, that the highway would not be national in scope unless all provinces participated, without which participation the federal government would not be justified in providing this measure of assistance. It was for this reason that we have felt obliged to inform the provinces that the federal government's contribution is being made by reason of the national aspect of the problem, and its participation is contingent upon all provinces entering into agreements with the federal government.

A dominion-provincial conference was held last December, under the chairmanship of the then minister of mines and resources, to discuss this project in a preliminary way; since that time a considerable amount of work has been done by way of working out details and arriving at general agreements with respect to broad principles. Since the project was transferred to the Department of Reconstruction and Supply in March, 1949, officials of the department have visited every province, including Newfoundland, and have had discussions with provincial officials concerned. Subsequently, in August and September, I visited the provinces and discussed policy aspects of the problem with provincial ministers in all provinces but Alberta, where the time at my disposal did not enable me to discuss this problem, but the points have been covered in an exchange of correspondence.

Out of these technical and policy discussions developed certain principles which it was considered might form the basis of ultimate agreements. Moreover, the officials of the department have had discussions with appropriate officials of the public roads administration of the United States, while I, as well as the department officials, have had discussions with the Canadian Construction Association, the Good Roads Association, and other interested organizations, all of whom have been most helpful.

Accordingly, early in September I was able to forward to each provincial government a document containing a number of points which had previously been discussed and which I hoped might ultimately form the basis for agreements which would enable the project to proceed. Some of the suggested terms of agreement were as follows:

(a) that the highway should be a modern, first-class, hard-surfaced road, following the shortest practicable east-west route consistent with the needs of the provinces and Canada as a whole;

(b) that the provincial government would be responsible for the selection of a route in conformity with this definition;

(c) that except in national parks, the province would arrange for the execution of the work;

(d) that the highway, when completed, would remain in each province the property and responsibility of the province;

(e) that the federal government's contribution would be in respect of a two-lane, modern highway;

(f) that the federal government's contribution would be on the basis of fifty per cent of the cost to the province of completing the highway;

(g) that an additional contribution would be made on a fifty-fifty basis of the costs to the province for those portions of already existing highway which would be included in the trans-Canada highway;

(h) that the highway should be completed within a period of seven years;

(i) that all ordinary maintenance costs during or after the period of construction would be the responsibility of the province;

(j) that tenders and specifications for contracts would be subject to review by the federal government;

(k) that inspection of the highway and audit of costs would be the privilege of the federal government.

Suggested standards were also placed before provincial governments, including a width of pavement of 22 or 24 feet, and a minimum right of way of 100 feet. It is recognized, however, that there will of necessity be variations to meet local conditions, and it is emphasized therefore that the various technical specifications were put forward only as suggestions. However, it is our opinion that wherever it is feasible and practicable, the width of the hard-surfaced portion of the road should be 24 feet. Intensive studies have been made, especially in the United States, which confirm what is almost self-evident, and that is that no features of a highway have a greater influence upon the safety and comfort of driving than the width and condition of the surface, especially if the volume of traffic is heavy and moves at a relatively high rate of speed. Many authorities hold that to permit the desired clearance for commercial vehicles a 24 foot pavement is required.

However, all provinces have been building paved highways for many years and have developed standards which presumably meet their needs adequately, and no attempt will be made to impose upon them specifications which are unsuitable for their purposes.

Speaking generally, all the foregoing suggestions were well received by the provinces. There are certain points in which various provinces differ, and there are technical details still to be worked out. Moreover, there is the important matter of route. Some of the provinces have already defined their routes, in accordance with the general definition; but others have not, because of an expressed desire not to proceed to that stage until the federal government's legislation is approved. This seemed like a reasonable view, and we have therefore not been pressing for a decision. However, no province has indicated that it does not wish to proceed with its share of the project.

Hon. members will note that the bill incorporates most of the suggestions I have placed before the provinces; but I should like in particular to say a few words more about the financial aspects.

It is estimated that the total cost of the highway of approximately 5,000 miles will be of the order of $300 million, and the bill provides for the payment of the federal government's share up to a maximum of $150 million. This averages approximately $60,000 per mile for new construction as well as highway already built. Where the problem is one of new work, the approach is relatively simple, and the federal government will agree to pay one-half the total cost, on the basis set forth in the bill. Hon. members will see that where highway already constructed will form part of the trans-Canada highway, the federal government is seeking authority to pay to the provinces half the total cost to the province of the construction of that part of the highway. This will have the effect of making the federal government's contribution toward highway remaining to be completed considerably more than fifty per cent.

Let us take, for example, a province where $20 million would be needed to complete the highway, and where that province has already spent $8 million on portions of highway which will be part of the trans-Canada highway route. The federal government contribution to the new construction would be $10 million plus fifty per cent of costs previously incurred, or $4 million, for a total contribution of $14 million. If the province applies this contribution of $4 million against the cost of completing the highway, federal money in the $20 million expenditure would amount to $14 million, or 70 per cent. On the other hand, the payment for roads already constructed may be applied elsewhere, as determined by the province, but it is my hope that the provincial governments will use it in such a way that the maximum amount of development and the maximum amount of employment will result.

It is natural to expect that the federal government's assistance to provincial governments with respect to this project will be compared to the federal government's assistance to highways in the United States. I would point out, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that there is no wide difference between the United States formula and that contemplated in the bill before the house. In the United States the federal government appropriates certain moneys for highways, and it is allocated to the various states in accordance with a formula which takes into account population, area, and total mileage; but once the allotment has been determined, it is required that the state match it dollar for dollar. The more money made available to any one state by this formula, the more of its own money that state is obliged to commit. Any unused portion of a state's yearly allocation does not accrue to the state but is returned to the federal treasury if not expended on a dollar for dollar basis during the year.

Some hon. members have a tendency to estimate how much money would have been advanced to the various provinces if the United States type of program had been adopted in Canada years ago. In almost the same breath they say that the provincial governments concerned will not possibly be able to meet the financial commitment required of them by this bill. These two views would appear to be contradictory and to overlook the fact that the provinces would have been obliged to match the federal advances dollar for dollar.

Furthermore, I have heard the criticism that a two-lane 24-foot highway is not adequate and that we should be guided by United States practices in this regard. I would point out that the 24-foot two-lane highway is accepted as adequate for most highways through rural areas, and it is noteworthy that in the United States 95 per cent of the rural highways are of the two-lane 24-foot type.

As I indicated previously, there are still some details to be worked out; but these, too, have been a matter of discussion with provincial governments, many of whom have felt that a number of points should be held in abeyance until the federal government has received legislative authority to proceed. It seemed desirable, therefore, that we should go ahead with the legislation and then invite provincial governments to attend a conference of officials and technicians for the purpose of discussing all matters of technical detail, with a view to resolving all such points to the mutual satisfaction of the provincial and federal governments. As I recall, this point has been put to all provinces, either verbally or in writing, and they have agreed; I therefore propose to proceed accordingly.

When the technical details have been resolved, I propose to ask the provincial governments to sign formal agreements with the federal government so that the project may go forward.

Most provinces have expressed a desire to proceed with the construction of the trans-Canada highway in 1950. I propose, therefore, to move forward with the remaining phases so that all outstanding matters may be resolved and agreements signed in order that provinces will be enabled to proceed with the work in the early spring.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Before we move forward this measure, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister if he can now lay on the table of the house the correspondence with the provinces of Nova Scotia, Manitoba and British Columbia. I do not think it will be possible for us to deal intelligently with this important matter, involving an expenditure of $300 million federally and provincially, unless we know under what conditions the different provinces will enter into the agreement. I would ask the minister to table this correspondence. If he is not in a position to table the correspondence with Nova Scotia—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps I should remind the hon. member that if he is asking a question he should be brief. If he is speaking to the motion, of course he has forty minutes.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I want to get an answer from the minister, if I can.

Mr. Speaker: A strict interpretation of the rules would of course mean that the hon. member had spoken to the motion, but I think he merely intended to ask a question.

Mr. Winters: The answer to the question is that I still have not received permission from these provinces to table the correspondence.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Has the minister a definite refusal?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Cumberland desires to speak now, I have no objection.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I want an answer.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this bill is described as "An act to encourage and to assist in the construction of a trans-Canada highway." Everyone in the house is in favour of the construction of a trans-Canada highway, and no doubt everyone in the house also believes that the dominion government is the only authority that can take the lead in bringing about the construction of such a highway. But in the view of the official opposition this bill is very disappointing. I propose to outline some of the reasons why we are disappointed with the terms of the measure. Perhaps I can best begin to do so by dealing with the situation in the province of British Columbia.

We are remote from Ottawa; we are farther away than any inland province, and for many years we have been tremendously anxious to have a trans-Canada highway. As conditions are at the present time, most of our vehicular traffic goes north and south. If a person in British Columbia goes for a drive he goes down to the state of Washington or to the state of California. A very small percentage of our people drive east to Alberta. If they do drive to Alberta or to eastern Canada, the route followed is almost invariably first of all down to the United States, and then on one of the great United States highways until they are south of the destination, when they drive north into Canada.

For us the United States tourist is of great importance. The states to the south of us are wealthy, and a great many of their people like to drive north; therefore the highways in British Columbia mean a great deal to that province. Because of the mountainous nature of the province we have always been faced with high costs in building roads. The need for help finally became so great that in the early thirties, during the regime of the late Lord Bennett, assistance was given by the federal government for the building of a trans-Canada highway around what is known as the Big Bend of the Columbia river. Help was also given on the roads leading from the United States boundary up into the national parks. I believe the same sort of assistance was given to the province of Alberta on the road leading into Waterton national park and through that park up to Banff.

There has been one bad feature about the roads in the national parks, which of course are the responsibility of the dominion government. Restrictions have been placed on the use of these park roads by trucks. I sometimes wonder whether these restrictions are not placed on the roads to help out the railways by preventing freight trucks from going from British Columbia to Alberta over park roads. Whether that is so or not, the fact is that traffic has been impeded by reason of federal regulations in respect to the park roads.

For many years in British Columbia we have believed that there should be a national highways system, not just one trans-Canada road, and that it should include feeder roads from the United States. We realize that such a system could not be completed in a day, but we contend there should be a master plan for a national highways system toward which the dominion and the provinces could be working. That, of course, is what is being done in the United States. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) intimated this morning that his new plan is the same as the United States plan; but I would point out that there is one great difference, namely, that in the United States they have a federal aid highways system—not just one road.

The minister said further that Canada's new road was to be as good as they have in the rural parts of the United States. I do not think that is good enough. I hold in my hand a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in 1948, when he spoke at Kamloops, British Columbia. The quotation is taken from a newspaper dated September 10, 1948. The minister said:

> I am going to keep on advocating the building of a great national system of highways which will make it possible for the Canadian people to travel from one end of this country to the other.

On September 11, 1948, at Nelson, British Columbia, the minister told five hundred people that Canada needs a national highway system and that it should be built and maintained by the federal government. He said further: "All Canadians must fight for such a system. You'll get a southern highway a lot faster if you ask to get all—a system of highways—built, than if you ask for one."

It is evident that the Minister of Agriculture has lost out in this decision. But he is not the only one who believes there should be a national system. That is the first reason for our being greatly disappointed by the present measure.

Another disappointment is that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply cannot tell us today where the route is to go. One would think that after all these months and years the government would have some idea as to what the route is to be. We are asked to pass the measure without having that information.

I have read the letters passing between the dominion and seven of the provinces, and from those letters it would appear that as yet there is no decision concerning Nova Scotia. We have not had the papers from Nova Scotia. It would appear that in New Brunswick the provincial government is advocating a route which would go to the city of Saint John, while the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is telling them they cannot have one.

Mr. Winters: No; that is not correct.

Mr. Green: Well, I suggest that hon. members read the correspondence for themselves. If the minister does not say in his letter that they cannot have one, he certainly gives a pretty broad hint that he is not going to help with a route to Saint John. Perhaps he has changed his mind in recent weeks, but the letters so indicate.

We do not know what the route is to be in the province of Quebec, nor do we know what it is to be in Ontario. Correspondence with Manitoba has not been produced, but judging from the letters from Ontario and Saskatchewan there is not much doubt as to where the route will be in Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Mr. Warren: Would the hon. member work on Ontario to have the trans-Canada highway follow the Ottawa valley?

Mr. Green: I am not in a position to decide where the road should run in Ontario; but were I the minister I hope I would not bring in a bill without knowing what the route was to be across Canada.

Mr. Bradette: Get the province busy.

Mr. Green: I did not hear that interjection.

Mr. Bradette: I said the hon. member should get the province busy.

Mr. Green: I cannot hear it even yet. Probably it does not amount to much.

Mr. Bradette: The hon. member does not want to hear it.

Mr. Green: From the correspondence with Alberta it would appear that in that province the road is to run from Walsh on the eastern boundary, and thence up through Calgary and Banff, including the national park at Banff. Correspondence from Alberta indicates that there has been some tentative agreement between Saskatchewan and British Columbia to that effect. However, the correspondence with British Columbia has not been tabled, therefore one has no way of being sure. From the correspondence with Alberta it would appear that the route is to be as I have indicated. This would mean that it would follow the Big Bend from Golden, around to Revelstoke and Kamloops, and down the Fraser canyon to Vancouver.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Green: The minister nods his head; therefore I take it that is correct.

Mr. Cruickshank: I presume the hon. member agrees as to the possibility of building a trans-Canada highway 24 feet wide; would he agree that it is possible to have a 26-inch pipe line through Canada?

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Fraser Valley knows how I feel about pipe lines.

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes; I do know, and I want others to know it; that is all.

Mr. Green: I think his suggestion is a very good one.

I have pointed out that we are disappointed because we are not being told what the route of the highway is to be. We are further disappointed in being told that it is to be a two-lane highway. It may be that in many parts of Canada a two-lane highway would be sufficient. Perhaps that would be true along the north shore of lake Superior, if the route goes that way; or through some of the mountainous territory of British Columbia. But there are many parts of the highway which will have to be wider than two lanes. Yet we find in the outline of terms sent by the minister to the various provinces that the government will make no contribution for that portion of a road which is wider than two lanes.

Paragraph 5 of the outline of suggested terms of agreements, headed "Two-lane highway", states:

> The federal government will contribute to the cost of a modern two-lane highway. Should a province decide upon a route where local traffic would require a three- or four-lane highway, the federal government's contribution would have to be computed by reference to the cost of a two-lane highway.

In other words a rigid system is set up in the bill under which help will be given for only a two-lane highway.

We are disappointed further in that the assistance given to the provinces in connection with the cost of construction will be to the extent of only fifty per cent or less. The minister intimated in his remarks that the provinces had expressed agreement with the terms he has submitted to them. I am sure however that there has not been agreement as to this ceiling of fifty per cent. For example, Alberta has asked that the payment by the dominion should be 66⅔ per cent. In this connection it is interesting to remember the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture in 1948. I have here also a statement to the same effect by the minister from British Columbia, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew). Upon his return from an election tour a press report of June 15 stated:

> He has come to the opinion that a trans-Canada highway should be a "purely national highway built by the federal government."

Apparently he thought that before the election, but now he too has lost out.

Obviously assistance to the extent of fifty per cent in construction is not enough for some of the provinces. It is not enough for British Columbia, where the cost of building highways is so great. It is not enough for Alberta or for Saskatchewan, and certainly not enough for Newfoundland. We are disappointed that the government has put on this ceiling of fifty per cent in respect of the help that can be given to the provinces.

Another reason for great disappointment is that there is to be no help in maintaining this road. Paragraph 11 of the terms sent to the provinces, having to do with maintenance cost, reads as follows:

> The government of Canada would not be responsible for maintenance charges or for costs of snow removal either during or after the seven-year construction period, except in respect of the portions of the highway through the national parks.

Here is another instance in which this plan is different from the United States plan. In that country the federal government helps with the maintenance costs, but under this bill, once the highway has been constructed the dominion government will have no further interest. What is to happen when there is heavy snow, or when there are snow or mud slides on this trans-Canada highway? Surely it is the responsibility of the dominion government to help to keep the highway in good shape, if for no other reason than to be sure that it will always be a first-class highway. If the dominion is going to sit back and let the provinces carry all the load of maintenance, I suggest that we are not likely to have a first-class highway for very long.

Another occasion for disappointment is that it is to take seven years to complete the highway. The government is working on a seven-year plan. It must be remembered that you can get over the highway right now, but according to this bill it is going to take seven years to change the present highway into a first-class highway. I am reminded of what the United States did when they constructed the Alaska highway. If that country could do a job like that in so short a time, surely Canada could have a first-class paved highway sooner than seven years from 1950.

The bill puts a ceiling of $150 million on the money to be paid by the dominion. Presumably that is to cover the whole seven years. It will include not only what the dominion is going to pay to have the highway improved, but payment to the provinces for what they have spent already on the highway. The bill actually goes so far as to include the costs of the dominion government in engineering fees, salaries, and so on.

I do not attempt to speak for my party on this particular point, but personally I think it is a great mistake to pay back to the provinces what they have expended on highways that are to become part of the trans-Canada highway. Those roads have been built and paid for. It would be wiser to spend the money on improving the highway rather than to pay it back to the provinces. As the minister said today, this money might be spent on some other roads. He expressed the pious hope that if the money were paid back to the provinces it would be spent on the trans-Canada highway, but he then went on to say that he was not insisting on that; that it could be used as they wished. It could be used to build other highways, or to erect buildings, or for any other purpose. In any event there should be a provision that any money paid back under this arrangement shall be used on the trans-Canada highway.

These payments back to the provinces will benefit the wealthy provinces far more than the poorer provinces.

Mr. Cruickshank: No.

Mr. Green: Ontario and Quebec have spent large sums on the highway, and they will be entitled to get back far more money than Saskatchewan and Alberta, and perhaps British Columbia.

Mr. Cruickshank: No, no.

Mr. Green: I cannot get the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) to agree with me all the time, but in any event that is my opinion.

To sum up, the bill is disappointing rather than encouraging, and this after a period of waiting of over fourteen years. I suggest that the reason the bill is in these terms is that the government is stalling on this matter of a trans-Canada highway. It is being used as a project to provide for employment in hard times. I suggest that that is the reason why we have a bill of this kind. I can see the fine hand of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in nearly every line of this bill. When the minister was asked about the trans-Canada highway last year he made this reply, as reported on page 5497 of Hansard of June 19, 1948. The former member for Portage la Prairie asked the question:

Mr. Miller: Is there among the future unemployment relief projects or programs of the government any blueprint for the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. Howe: If we see any sign of widespread unemployment we will proceed to make a blueprint. But at the present time we have not a blueprint and we do not think one is necessary.

On August 10, 1948, the then minister of mines and resources, Mr. MacKinnon, made a speech about the trans-Canada highway, and a press dispatch of that date is headed: "Trans-Canada highway years away: Mr. MacKinnon." Then there was the Liberal convention, and I understand a resolution concerning the trans-Canada highway was put through. The next step was a conference with the provinces which was called in December, 1948. I have here a dispatch from the Vancouver Sun describing the conclusion of the conference. It reads:

Ottawa, December 16—The dominion-provincial trans-Canada highway conference came to an abrupt and unexpected conclusion Wednesday night with provincial delegates experiencing a frustrated sense of little accomplishment.

And again:

The meetings were closed to the public, and the only official statement following it, from the chairman, Mines and Resources Minister J. A. MacKinnon, talked vaguely of "very satisfactory progress" and hoped that "a start would be made in 1949" on a national highway system.

This airy optimism was at variance with the statements from provincial representatives, who blamed the federal government for coming into the conference with no proposals or program.

In March the then minister of mines and resources handed over the trans-Canada highway project to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. In the spring session we were told that there was to be a trans-Canada highway bill, but it did not appear on the order paper until more than two months after the house began its sittings, the date being April 8. Nothing was done at that session. Then during this session we heard a significant statement from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) when he delivered his budget speech and said that the magnitude and timing of the trans-Canada highway was to be given very careful consideration, intimating that the government was not in any great hurry about the highway.

The resolution preceding this bill appeared on the order paper two months ago, but was not called until a week ago, and we are now considering the bill itself in the dying days of the session. This all reminds me of a moving picture of a horse race shown in slow motion. That is how the ministry have been moving with this highway program. They have effectively stalled it over the whole year, although no one in this house or in the country has stated opposition to the measure.

I repeat that all the time the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been in the background; he has had the idea that this should be an unemployment relief project. If the government does not change its tactics in regard to this measure, we may find that development of the trans-Canada highway will be dragged along as slowly as possible.

Even now the government is half-hearted about it and obviously ill prepared. I do not believe the minister has a suitable staff to supervise the construction of this highway; and expert supervision is required. Millions of dollars can be saved by way of specifications if the dominion government has an experienced staff checking on the construction of the highway. Now the departments are to be reorganized, and the next few weeks or months will be spent juggling around the branches, one of which will have to do with this trans-Canada highway. We have an item in the estimates—not in the main or supplementary estimates, but in the further supplementary estimates—for the trans-Canada highway; the only vote I can find. It is item 889, providing $25,000 for preliminary engineering work and studies in co-operation with the provinces concerned. This does not look like speedy action on the highway in the near future. Obviously there is no master plan, no blueprint. The minister does not even know where the road is to go, and no clear-cut policy is being presented to this house, even after all the delay.

The official opposition are disappointed in this measure. We will support it on the basis that half a loaf is better than no bread, but we shall not be content until there is a federal-aid highways system in Canada. This house and the people must not accept the measure which has been brought down today as the final word in the construction of a trans-Canada highways system. We urge that there be no more delay. It is a disgrace that Canadians should have had to wait until 1950 to get action on a trans-Canada highway. Great opportunities have been lost during the fourteen years this government has been in power—opportunities for Canadians to know their country and their countrymen in the other provinces; opportunities for developing Canada; opportunities for extending our means of carrying both goods and passengers. Just think what would have been the effect on transportation costs if years ago we had provided a trans-Canada highway—the effect not only on freight rates but also on passenger rates; great opportunities have been lost for expanding our tourist industry; all because this government would not take the lead.

In connection with this project for a trans-Canada highway system, vision is required. The people of Canada have the vision of a national system. What is required is vision here in the House of Commons. I believe we should have before us at all times the vision of Canada as one of the great nations of the world, with a population of fifty, seventy-five or a hundred million people. The bill we are considering today just does not fit in with that vision in any way at all.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, with the principle of this bill we are in agreement; but coming as I do from Nova Scotia I am not satisfied that any member from that province, with the exception of the minister, can say that he is prepared to have this bill pass in its present terms. I say that because negotiations for a trans-Canada highway have been going on in this country for a long time, and a great deal of work has been done on that highway in Nova Scotia. To what extent it is completed, or what work is still necessary there, we do not know; and until such time as the premier of Nova Scotia is prepared to make available to members of this house the correspondence between his government and the federal government I do not think any hon. member from that province—and there are ten of them on the other side of the house—is in a position to say that the arrangement set out in this bill is satisfactory to the people of Nova Scotia.

Why that correspondence should be considered secret is something I cannot understand. And when the federal government takes the attitude that it cannot make known to this house exactly what are the views of the provinces in this respect, I am led to believe that something is the matter. Why should British Columbia, Manitoba or Nova Scotia take that position? If their proposals are fair and reasonable, or if their objections to the action the federal government is taking have some basis in fact, why should they not be prepared to give that information to members of this house?

This is not a provincial project; whether the premiers of the provinces I have named like it or not, this is a national project. Most of the money will be made available by the federal government before we are finished with this highway, and already a great deal of money has been spent on it by the provinces. That money belonged to the taxpayers, not to the premier of our province and his little cabinet. So before I come to a decision on this bill I want any information that may be in the hands of the minister on this matter, and the correspondence that has taken place between this government and the government of Nova Scotia.

I do not understand why the department should take the attitude that it should withhold the correspondence, because, as I pointed out on a previous occasion, there is no law compelling it to do so. There is a law or practice under which that is done with respect to correspondence between this government and a foreign government, but otherwise it is a question of courtesy on the part of the minister. There may be times when it is necessary to withhold correspondence; some premier may write a letter he would be ashamed to have tabled in the house, and under such circumstances perhaps it would be only fair that the minister should withhold it. But this is a straight business proposition; and before I commit the people of Nova Scotia to the payment of fifty per cent of the cost of this trans-Canada highway, I want to know what value there is in it. I want to know to what extent Nova Scotia is to be reimbursed for what it has spent already on what will be part of this trans-Canada highway—and a good deal of money has been spent there. Much of the highway construction has been completed in that province; but apparently we are not going to get that information.

The attitude of the government would lead us to believe that correspondence between this government and the provinces has not been tabled previously in this house. This is not so. Many times I have sat in my place here and heard a motion go through for the tabling of correspondence with the provincial governments on many matters. Just at random I picked out one. I wanted to get as close to the maritimes as I could, so I have one which had to do with correspondence with the province of New Brunswick—and on a much more ticklish subject, mind you, than the trans-Canada highway. It will be found at page 4492 of Hansard of June 23, 1947. It is a motion by the member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield), which reads as follows:

> For a copy of a resolution moved by the minister of agriculture in the province of New Brunswick, and all correspondence which passed between the provincial minister and the federal Minister of Agriculture or the Department of Agriculture, regarding a fair price on potatoes under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944.

That motion passed unanimously, and it has to do with prices. If the position had been taken that such a disclosure would place the importer or exporter of potatoes in New Brunswick at a disadvantage with his competitors, there would have been some basis for the argument that the correspondence should be withheld. But the motion passed unanimously. Today, when something having to do with the future is brought forward, something which has to do with the spending of public funds in the provinces of Nova Scotia, Manitoba and British Columbia and is vital to the people of those provinces, we are told we cannot see the correspondence.

I am not blaming the minister; he is only a cog in the machine. All he can do is carry out his orders, but I do not think the members of this house should submit to it. I do not believe any member should sit here and say he is going to commit his province to an expenditure of fifty per cent of the cost of this trans-Canada highway, and to the maintenance of that highway, when someone behind the scenes has decided the route by correspondence. The member does not know whether, from a business standpoint, the route is suitable to the province.

I am opposed to this measure until such time as we have an opportunity of seeing the correspondence. I cannot see any reason for holding it back. I might agree with every word the correspondence contained, but I would have to look at it. The government of Nova Scotia is presided over by one man, and he has no right to take the position that the correspondence is not to be tabled. I believe every member from the province of Nova Scotia has a right to see that correspondence. While I approve the principle of the bill, I am going to vote against it until I have heard from the people of Nova Scotia with regard to the project.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): This is the first opportunity I have had of speaking on this subject at this session. I have spoken on it on other occasions, but I believe I would be remiss in my duty if I did not say a few words about it today.

Let me say at once that I believe the minister deserves a great deal of credit for bringing the subject of the trans-Canada highway forward at this time. The question is not a new one in Canada; in fact I believe it has been discussed at every session since I came to this house in 1935.

One of the amazing things that I have noticed on my trips to Ottawa is the lack of a national highway. As I have travelled on the Canadian Pacific railway on my journey to Ottawa I have been amazed to see that sections of highway around the head of the lakes are practically completed. When I say practically completed I mean that there are sections of five, ten, or fifteen miles that are completely graded and gravelled; yet there is no connecting link between those sections.

Mr. Noseworthy: Oh, yes.

Mr. Johnston: The bridges are not even completed.

Mr. Noseworthy: I have been over it.

Mr. Johnston: The hon. member must have had some wonderful means of transportation, or perhaps we are talking about different sections of this highway. I am talking about the sections that are built along the C.P.R. track in the province of Ontario, north of the great lakes. It seems to most people in Canada that this national highway would have been built long ago had it not been for the influence that the railways have been able to exert on those in high places. That should not be permitted, and work on the highway should be commenced as quickly as possible. Therefore I wish to congratulate the minister upon his doing the proper thing. The sooner the road is completed, the better pleased the people of Canada will be.

There is no question about it, sir; we need a trans-Canada highway. Possibly I have travelled the road between Ottawa and the west coast oftener than any other member of this house, with the exception of the member for Battle River (Mr. Fair). I have travelled the road between Ottawa and Alberta no less than fourteen times, and sections of it more often than that. I believe I have a knowledge of road conditions. It is extremely embarrassing for a Canadian, Mr. Speaker, who desires to go to Vancouver, Alberta, or Saskatchewan, to have to go through the United States and then back up into Alberta or wherever he is going. It is embarrassing to have the United States authorities say to you: "Well, why did you come this way?" You must tell them that Canada has not a proper road. Then they laugh, and rightly so, to think that a nation as great as Canada cannot afford a national highway. It is a national disgrace, and the minister deserves a great deal of credit for introducing the subject now.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I am of the opinion we should have an all-weather, hard-surfaced highway across Canada. There are not many of the national highways in the United States that are four-lane highways. Most of them are two-lane highways, so I cannot criticize the government too strongly about that at the moment. I say "at the moment" advisedly. It is a good start; but when the government is negotiating with the provinces, provision should be made now for obtaining a right of way which would permit the construction of a four-lane highway. I do not believe it will be very long before sufficient traffic will be moving on the all-Canada route, particularly in certain sections of the country, to make it necessary to have a four-lane highway. Once the right of way is obtained, it is exceedingly difficult in many places to get a greater width. It would be more efficient and more businesslike to provide for a right of way sufficiently wide to take care of a four-lane highway, so that when the time arrives there will be no difficulty in widening the highway.

Every province is going to benefit by this highway across Canada. I am sure that the people of Alberta will benefit greatly by an east-west road. There is one road now running north and south across our province, and another road is under construction. Before very long we hope to have two complete highways running north and south. These will act as feeder roads to the main trans-Canada highway going east and west. I believe that is true of every province of Canada.

It will be an asset to the people of every province to have this trans-Canada highway. It will be a great tourist attraction, or at least it should be, to a great many people in the United States. It will be a direct benefit to those in the states directly south of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, because tourists will come up into those provinces and cross over the western provinces on a good all-weather hard-surfaced highway.

The trans-Canada highway should be of great importance in the matter of defence. This factor also should be borne in mind when the highway is being built. It is one of the reasons why a moment ago I suggested that when we are acquiring the right of way we should make provision for a four-lane highway.

If the highway is handled properly, it will be an asset also for trucking. I want to mention that particularly because anyone who has travelled the highways in the United States will have noticed the tremendous amount of trucking that goes on over their national highways. In fact in the United States trucking has become such big business that special roads are being built between large centres such as Detroit and Chicago; these are four-lane highways on which left turns are not allowed; if you wish to turn left you must first make a right turn and then go under a subway. These roads are called express highways and are used for the swift movement of motor vehicles of all kinds, including the automobiles of tourists, but particularly the heavy trucks.

We must bear in mind the fact that this road of necessity will be used for trucks and trucking. The government would show exceedingly good judgment if they left this road free for trucking and did not bring it under the control of the board of transport commissioners. One of the reasons why the United States has made such great progress is that free enterprise has been allowed to operate. It is true that if trucking is permitted it is going to affect the railways a great deal, but the railways will have to modernize themselves to cope with the competition which is bound to come.

My mind goes back to the time when we enacted legislation in this house giving the railways an advantage over trucking in the agreed charges; that legislation put trucks at a great disadvantage. Now we are to have a national highway, and if we are to hamstring the trucking business and make it conform with all the desires of the railways, it seems to me that we shall retard the progress of this country rather than advance it.

I was interested in reading an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of Wednesday, November 23, 1949. It is headed: "Present brief in behalf of truckers." Speaking about the competition of trucks and railways, it had this to say:

> The trucking industry yesterday told the royal commission on transportation there is "discrimination against highway transport in Canada."
> Opening its submission before the three-man body investigating national transportation problems, the Canadian Automobile Transportation Association entered these complaints:
> 1. Commercial truckers are barred from the haulage of feed grains from lake ports to inland points on which the federal government pays a subsidy to farmers under a feed-grains assistance policy.
>
> 2. A ban on through hauls by way of national parks against commercial motor vehicles is "intended to protect the railways."
> 3. Commercial motor vehicles are not given fair treatment on the Canadian National Railways ferry linking Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. A previous complaint to this effect had been made by the island government.
> 4. Trucks are barred from carrying most forms of alcoholic liquor from the United States into Canada.
> John Magee of Toronto, executive secretary, delivered the brief for the C.A.T.A., which represents federations in six provinces with a membership of 5,000 trucking firms.

Five thousand trucking firms is no small business; when you consider the amount of haulage that is done by these trucks, you will see that it is exceedingly large business. The proposed trans-Canada highway is to traverse national parks. If the federal government in the future takes the same attitude that it has taken in the past with regard to trucks passing through national parks, then of course they hamstring the trucking business. Trucking on the national highway will just be negligible, because obviously trucks cannot go from one province to another on the trans-Canada highway if they are not permitted to travel through national parks. The present attitude of the government is that they will not permit this haulage to go through national parks. The railways therefore have a decided advantage over trucking. This situation leaves them in a position to dictate charges. We have the same thing now under the agreed charges, where the railway can go to a large company and say: We will haul your freight, provided that we haul it the year round. To large companies such as Eaton's which bring a great deal of freight from the east to the west and have to go north of the great lakes in the wintertime, the railways say: If you do not give us your business all the year, we will not haul it for you in the wintertime.

Mr. Hatfield: They cannot do that.

Mr. Johnston: They do it; make no mistake about that. Under the agreed charges, they do it. That is one of the reasons why our transportation system has been so bad. If we make the condition the same on this national highway, it will be a bad thing for Canada. I think that particular business should be left entirely free and competitive. The railways will just have to modernize their facilities in order to meet the change in times.

Let me say a word about the construction of the national highway. The undertaking that the minister has gone ahead with is no easy thing; it is no simple matter to construct a highway that will stand up. The minister is proposing, at the outset I hope, to build a two-lane highway; that is a good start. I hope he will take into consideration the suggestion I have made of providing for a four-lane highway when the right of way is acquired.

The minister expects there will be about 5,000 miles of highway—and I would assume that judgment is sound—with a total cost of about $300 million, the dominion's share being about $150 million, the federal government to assume fifty per cent of that cost. I am of the opinion that some provinces—and at the moment I am not speaking about Alberta—will not be able to take advantage of this proposal if they have to put up fifty per cent of the cost. We in Alberta of late have been fortunate in obtaining additional revenues through the expansion of the production of oil. But it must be remembered that oil is a depleting asset, and those in charge of the business affairs of that province are well aware of that. Some of the other provinces are not in so fortunate a position. If these other provinces find themselves unable to take advantage of the fifty per cent to be paid by the federal government, and cannot complete their section of the highway, it just means that the highway will be ineffective, because no one is going to travel from here westward to Winnipeg on a hard-surfaced road and then not be able to go any farther owing to the fact that that province was not able to build its hard-surfaced highway. They will go from here to the United States thence to the Canadian west, and leave in that country the money they would otherwise spend in Canada.

The minister estimates that about sixty per cent of the 5,000 miles is already hard-surfaced. He may be correct on that but I am a little sceptical. I think the sixty per cent is a little too high. From here east most of the highway would be hard-surfaced. Whether it is in sufficiently good condition to be used as a trans-Canada highway I am not in a position to say; but certainly from Ottawa west nothing like sixty per cent is hard-surfaced.

The minister spoke of a hard-surfaced top of 24 feet. That would probably be about the average of the hard-surfaced tops of United States highways. But there is one provision I have not seen in the bill, Mr. Speaker, which I think should be considered. When a hard-surfaced highway is built, for safety reasons if for nothing else there should be a four-foot gravel surface on each side of the hard surface so that trucks or cars, if they have a flat tire or have to pull off the road for any other reason, may be able to do so, in safety. This is one of the greatest criticisms I have of hard-surfaced roads, particularly in western Canada. I speak now of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. On nearly all of these highways there is no place by the side of the road to which you can go to make necessary repairs. It is a very serious thing. It would be safe to say that on these hard-surfaced roads at least fifty per cent of the fatal accidents are caused by cars parking on the hard surface. In the regulations that the government are submitting to the provinces they should of necessity make provision for a four-foot gravel section on each side of the highway. I see the minister nodding his head. I presume it will be included in the regulations, and it is a worth-while thing.

Let me come to another aspect of this question, namely, the maintenance cost. The federal government is not undertaking any obligation at all for maintenance. When the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) spoke on this question he referred to the fact that in Alberta we are saddled with a provincial debt which was created by borrowing money to build roads and highways. Many of the roads which were built thirty or forty years ago are completely gone, but we are still paying for them. Since the Social Credit government came into power in Alberta every foot of highway that has been built in that province has been paid for. I do not care how good a road you build, it is going to deteriorate. The minister says that this program is to last for seven years. I venture to say that if this national highway was started tomorrow, by the time it was completed, at the end of seven years, sections of it would have to be rebuilt, depending on the type of soil that you must travel through. This is a major consideration in building a highway. I see the minister shaking his head the other way now. Nevertheless it is a fact that in some sections of the country, depending upon the soil texture, the road will deteriorate faster than in others. I do not care what kind of trans-Canada highway you build, in at least twenty years some major repair work will have to be done on it. The provinces will not be in a position financially to take care of that maintenance in addition to paying fifty per cent of the actual cost of construction.

In all fairness it seems to me that the federal government should assume at least a portion of the maintenance cost, having in mind the fact that within seven to fifteen or twenty years sections of the road will have to be rebuilt. I have never seen a highway yet —and I have travelled over a great number of them—either in Canada or in the United States, parts of which had not to be rebuilt from time to time. I know of one important highway in the United States, forty or fifty miles of which were built four years ago, and last year they were tearing up the whole surface and rebuilding it. They had probably run into some very poor soil, and that section of the road was not standing up as well as other parts of it. What will be the position of the provinces in circumstances such as these? That kind of repair may well be classed as maintenance or upkeep. Neither the maritime provinces nor the western provinces will be in a position financially to carry out these heavy maintenance charges in certain sections.

I do not think I should say a great deal at this time as to the route of the trans-Canada highway. I know that many suggestions have been made to the minister as to where the road should go. It seems to me that when you are building a road like this the governments and people of the provinces should be just about as good judges of the route as anyone can be. Consideration will have to be given to many problems. Certainly one of the important advantages of a national highway will be its attraction of tourists. When tourists come to a country to spend their holidays they want to see something. Among the most worth-while attractions in Alberta are Banff and Calgary, of course, as well as Lake Louise and the icefields. These are attractions which cannot be duplicated anywhere else in the world, and if you have no highway there, you are going to lose business. When I say the route should be left to the good judgment of those in charge of the provinces, I mean just this: that the Alberta people are going to feel that the route must go through Calgary, for the very obvious reasons I have indicated. In leaving a certain amount of latitude in this regard to the provinces, the minister has shown exceedingly good judgment.

Mr. Fulton: So long as the highway goes through Calgary.

Mr. Johnston: Anyone who uses good judgment must of course feel that it should go through Calgary. I shall not argue the matter at length.

I would ask the minister to keep in mind some of the constructive suggestions I have made. These are things which are necessary in connection with the building and maintenance of the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate because I would not like the idea to get abroad that those of us from Vancouver or from British Columbia think that this is a disappointing bill. If it is the opinion of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) that it is disappointing, then I would say to him that I do not think he is representing the view of the people in our province.

In the light of the fact that we have had no formal federal aid in the matter of the trans-Canada highway, although over the years aid has been given to various provinces, this is the most popular piece of legislation that could be introduced by the government at the present time.

By its very nature there are many problems about which the provinces must be consulted. I assume that sooner or later—and I suppose it will be sooner—the minister will be meeting the heads of the public works departments of the various provinces. I hope that the spirit pervades in that meeting which I think should pervade in the House of Commons, namely, that a British Columbian should be just as much interested in the efficiency of the trans-Canada highway as it affects the constituency of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) as in its efficiency in British Columbia. This should be the spirit, because if we are to have a trans-Canada highway we want to have a highway on which we from British Columbia can travel right through to Nova Scotia and the other provinces, and on which they can travel to our province.

One of the greatest advantages will be that of bringing together the people of the various provinces. I assume, however, that the different provinces have varying views as to the importance of the trans-Canada highway. I rather imagine that in Saskatchewan the people think the construction of this highway is advisable, and would like it very much, particularly if they can get some federal aid. For us in British Columbia the trans-Canada highway is absolutely imperative. If we did not receive some federal aid we would have to proceed with the building of it, depending to the extent of one hundred per cent upon our own resources.

I should like to place some facts on record because I take issue very strongly with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra when he says that he is opposed to reimbursement of the provinces in respect of those areas which might be incorporated in the final trans-Canada highway route. I should think that with any reflection at all—and I am rather of the opinion that he will have changed his mind by the time he returns to British Columbia—

Mr. Green: No; I do not change my mind so easily.

Mr. Laing: I suggest that this is the only way in which compensation can be made for the enormous difference in cost in the respective provinces. I believe the figures I shall place on Hansard will be of interest to hon. members from all the provinces, because they show the cost of road construction where we have to gouge out mountainsides, and where the roads hug the hills, with precipitate clearances into rivers from heights sometimes as much as 800 or 900 feet.

We have done an enormous amount of road-building in British Columbia in recent years, and are proud of it. We are particularly proud of the 24-foot Hope-Princeton highway. I am sure if the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra were to go over it with me he would agree that it is ample for British Columbia, and will be for many years to come. I drove over it recently from Keremeos to Penticton in forty-five minutes; not many years ago it would have taken an entire day to make the trip.

Here are some of the figures—and I would ask hon. members to keep in mind the fact that they show the cost per mile, exclusive of hard-surfacing. This is just for the road building, up to the point where it can be hard-surfaced. The cost per mile of the Ashcroft-Cache Creek road was $30,806; the cost of the Chase Village road was $81,689 per mile for a small piece. For the Westbank-Trepanier highway the cost was $50,289 per mile; for only four-tenths of a mile on the Boston Bar road—and how lucky we were that it was only four-tenths of a mile—the cost was $99,000, or at a rate of $247,500 per mile. This was clear blasting of rock; and I would draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that it is part of the trans-Canada highway. The Chum Creek-Squilax highway cost $54,545 per mile. The trans-Canada highway at Robbins Creek cost $166,250 per mile—and all this to draw up the road, without hard-surfacing. We have spent on section A of the Hope-Princeton highway $2,773,127.85, or $104,646 per mile. That was for a distance of 26·5 miles. Section B of the Hope-Princeton highway, for a distance of 56·5 miles, cost $3,371,496.81, or $59,672.50 per mile.

These figures will serve to indicate our problems in British Columbia. Without some reimbursement in connection with the incorporation of these highways in the trans-Canada system, we could not call upon British Columbia to assume fifty per cent of the cost of the remaining unfinished parts.

I hope that the same co-operative spirit, and the feeling of pride in the construction of a trans-Canada highway, will characterize the negotiations between the dominion and the provinces as is being shown in the discussion of this bill. The government, and particularly the minister, are to be complimented most highly upon the introduction of something which will be one of the greatest monuments along the pathway of Canadian progress.

Mr. Gordon B. Isnor (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I say I appreciate the attitude of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) in dealing with the matter from the point of view of the broad benefits to be derived by Canada as a whole rather than from the narrow provincial point of view.

As on former occasions, I listened this morning with keen interest to what the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) had to say as to the attitude of the various provinces. I was pleased to note that without exception all the provinces are prepared to enter into an undertaking such as he proposes. It augurs well for the unity of Canada when we find all the provinces willing to co-operate, so that those in the extreme easterly sections may enjoy the benefit of visits from those in the western and central provinces.

I differ to some extent with the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) in his criticism in regard to the tabling of the correspondence with the provinces. I am not a bit concerned about the question whether the correspondence with Nova Scotia is tabled; in fact I can see advantages in its not being tabled at this stage.

The hon. member for Cumberland is well versed in all aspects of highway construction because at one time he was minister of highways for the province of Nova Scotia. I can remember sitting opposite to him in the legislature, and I recall that he carried on his work in a most efficient manner and conducted the administration of his office in such a way as to make it troublesome for us to criticize him. But I recall, too, what he said in 1932 when a scheme of hard-surfaced roads for Nova Scotia was suggested by the opposition, which included myself. At that time the hon. member said—whether rightly or wrongly the people of Nova Scotia can judge—that he did not think that the province was financially able to undertake such a project.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I stated repeatedly in the legislature that it was a matter of economic necessity to proceed with the hard-surfacing of roads, but that we would have to do preliminary work before that program could be started.

Mr. Isnor: I am glad the hon. member for Cumberland has put that statement on record, but I think the people of Nova Scotia will recall that the statement I referred to a moment ago was made. I recall as though it were yesterday the stand which the hon. member took when minister of highways of that province. He said: "While I appreciate the criticism offered by the member for Halifax, I wish to say that the province of Nova Scotia is not now financially able to undertake a hard-surfacing program of roads such as is suggested." I put that on the record. I am pleased to note the hon. member's progressive thought in regard to the construction of a national highway from the extreme east to the extreme west.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): My attitude has not changed in the years with respect to hard-surfacing, but we had to do preliminary work before undertaking that hard-surfacing.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Isnor: I do not mind the interruptions. I think it is just as well to have this all on the record so that the people of Nova Scotia will know. I am doing this now because of the position in which the hon. member endeavoured to place me a short time ago when he said that I had seduced the Minister of Agriculture—that is the term he used—away from Amherst, Cumberland county, to Halifax. I am not going to make further reference to that, except to say that it is entirely incorrect.

I should like to compliment the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, not only on the able manner in which he has presented this matter to the house, but on the negotiations he carried out with the various provinces. He is now able to report to us that the project is in healthy condition, and he has presented a bill to carry out the plan as outlined.

There is one respect in which I differ with what the minister said in his statement. If we are to undertake the building of a national highway we should start with that in mind. I suggest that instead of a 22- to 24-foot two-lane highway, provision should be made for a four-lane highway—perhaps not right through the whole distance, but certainly in those parts of the country where there is likely to be fairly heavy traffic.

In California and other parts of the United States they started with two, three and four-lane highways, but subsequently they were forced to widen them to six and eight-lane highways. That widening was done at great cost because of the increased value of the property which had to be taken over. We should realize that the first cost is the cheapest, and provide for a four-lane highway where traffic warrants such a width.

I am not going to deal with the tourist question, except to say that I am entirely in accord with the resolution and the bill. I feel that this money will be more than an expenditure; it will be an investment. The results will be shown by the attitude of those who visit this country. Just last evening I heard General Wavell speak over the radio in high terms of the progress made in Canada. We should make sure that we are building something for the future which will be worth while.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Isnor: When the house rose at one o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I had been referring to the fact that I was in accord with the general principles of the legislation introduced by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters). I recall that in 1936 the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who I believe was then Minister of Transport, brought in a transport bill which not only dealt with rail and air travel but also gave the provinces an opportunity to share jurisdiction over the highways. At that time the provinces, quite rightly, took exception to the provisions of part 3 of the bill, which dealt with highways. They felt that highways came strictly within the jurisdiction of the provinces and that for this reason they should not be dealt with by the bill. Subsequently that part of the bill was dropped, and the legislation dealt only with transportation by rail and air, and a portion of water transportation.

I believe the same views are held by the provinces today, except that they are willing to co-operate in a much greater degree. I do not wonder that they have assumed that position, because the proposition that has been placed before them is very generous. Almost any businessman would be prepared to enlarge his business if he had to put up only fifty per cent of the cost; and that is practically what the government is offering the provinces under the terms of this legislation. As a matter of fact they are doing better than that; they are saying, "We will match your contribution dollar for dollar to the extent of $150 million. Then when the work is finished, in seven years, the entire proposition will be yours. You may collect the licence fees, take advantage of the tourist traffic, and derive all the other benefits that may accrue from a national highway." So, notwithstanding what was said by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), who did not see how the Nova Scotia members could vote for this bill, as far as I am concerned I look upon this as a splendid opportunity not only for Nova Scotia but for all the provinces.

In his statement the minister said he did not see how he could go ahead with this project unless all the provinces agreed. I say to him and to the government that they would be quite justified in carrying out the agreement with as few as five provinces, if only that many signified their willingness to take advantage of the legislation. I believe the minister would be well advised to proceed in such case, without waiting for the rest of the provinces to come in. I offer that as a suggestion because the proposition looks so good to me. I really cannot see why any province would hesitate to come under the legislation which was so clearly explained by the minister this morning.

As the minister stated, this is simply legislation of an enabling nature, to permit the provinces to take advantage of the offer if they feel so inclined. It would be wonderful, I think, for Canadians living in the extreme west or in the central provinces who wanted to visit Nova Scotia, that beautiful ocean playground on the extreme east, to be able to travel the entire distance over a Canadian national highway. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) suggested that the road be extended southward to the United States, but I do not agree. We are very pleased to receive tourists from the New England states and particularly to have our native sons who are now living in Boston and the surrounding district pay us visits, but I think our first duty is to provide a national highway which will serve our own provinces.

Returning to the question of the advantages accruing from this highway, as far as the provinces other than Quebec and Ontario are concerned, it seems to me that from a business point of view those other provinces would be well advised to enter into this agreement, because of the great possibility in connection with tourist trade. According to the census of 1941 Quebec at that time had a population of 3,331,882 and Ontario 3,787,655. I think we all appreciate what this means to the other provinces as far as the tourist business is concerned. During the past few years we in Nova Scotia have been very fortunate, in that we have had tourists from every state in the United States. I also noticed them from British Columbia, Saskatchewan and other provinces of Canada. The great majority of western tourists who come to the maritime provinces, however, find it necessary to travel by the southern route, through the United States. It is unfortunate that this should be so, but I am sure that situation will be remedied after this legislation goes through this house and is endorsed, as I am sure it will be, by all the provinces of Canada.

I do not say this in a political way at all, and I would not want the hon. member for Cumberland to think I was doing so; but there has been a wonderful improvement in the tourist traffic in Nova Scotia in the last fifteen years. People have come from all parts of Canada and, as I mentioned a moment ago, from all over the United States to enjoy the wonderful scenery we have to offer in our province; and they all leave speaking in the very highest terms not only of the hospitality they have enjoyed but of our fine highways. I believe great credit is due the premier of Nova Scotia, Angus L. Macdonald, for the progress that has been made in this regard; and again I do not say this in any political sense at all.

In his remarks this morning the minister said this program would cover a period of some seven years. I sincerely hope it will not take that long. I fully appreciate that the construction of five thousand miles of paved or hard-surfaced road is a big undertaking, but we all recall what was done in connection with the Alaska highway. There we have a road sixteen hundred miles long, twenty-four to twenty-six feet wide, extending from Dawson Creek in British Columbia to Whitehorse and Fairbanks, Alaska. In the spring of 1942 that was virgin territory, the only means of transportation a pioneer air route. In November, 1942, it was officially opened for military traffic. So I say the minister may be able to shorten the period of construction, so that instead of seven years we may look forward to seeing this project completed in perhaps four to five years. If that can be done the various parts of Canada will enjoy that much more prosperity from the tourist traffic.

I said I was going to be brief in my remarks, Mr. Speaker. I certainly did not wish to let this opportunity pass, however, without adding my voice to those who have so warmly welcomed the legislation that has been placed before us by the minister. He stated his case clearly, and there was no misunderstanding what the government was prepared to do. I simply wish to accord him my full support.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words with reference to the matter which is before the house. I believe the proposal to construct a trans-Canada highway has received the approval of all members from all sections of Canada. As has been stated by the previous speakers, it is not a new idea. The matter was considered by the provinces and then the war intervened, otherwise I have no doubt that the trans-Canada highway would have been built by now.

I feel that it is a splendid idea to link the provinces of Canada together. The more the people of the various provinces visit one another, the stronger Canada will be. There has not been enough of that in the past. In the province of New Brunswick, we are in a rather peculiar position. Upon looking at the map one can see that this province is the link between the provinces of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and the rest of Canada. Because of this, I feel there are problems facing the province of New Brunswick which are not found in the other parts of Canada. I do not envy the position in which the minister finds himself in attempting to work out the details, because I am sure there will be a great divergence of opinion in the different provinces as to the route of the trans-Canada highway.

During the last election campaign in my own province, as I remember, three different routes were mentioned by the local government. I might say that all three of them went through my constituency, so I was impartial. Just to indicate the difference of opinion as to the route this highway should follow through the province of New Brunswick, I should like to read some of the correspondence in that connection which took place in November of 1948. The deputy minister of public works in the province of New Brunswick, Mr. Barbour—who I might say is one of the most efficient public officials in Canada—replied to a letter from Mr. Wardle of the Department of Mines and Resources. It is dated November 25, 1948, and reads in part as follows:

> It is the intention of the government here to set out the trans-Canada highway as follows:
> No. 2 from the Quebec border north of Edmundston down to Fredericton; thence across the Saint John river and following No. 9 along the shore of Grand lake to Sussex; and thence to the Nova Scotia border near Amherst and to Cape Tormentine for connection to the island.

Evidently that was the decision of the New Brunswick government in November, 1948.

There have been some changes since then, and on January 24, 1949, the Minister of Public Works, the Hon. W. S. Anderson, wrote to the Hon. James A. MacKinnon as follows:

> It has now been found advisable to change the route—

Speaking of the route of the trans-Canada highway.

> —and we suggest No. 2 highway from the Quebec border to Fredericton with a branch into Saint John through Oromocto following route 2A to Westfield and thence into Saint John. Also for the benefit of Nova Scotia and island traffic the trans-Canada highway would cross the Saint John river at Fredericton following route 9 to Sussex and thence through to the Nova Scotia border and connect with the island at Cape Tormentine. This has the effect of lengthening the trans-Canada highway by 2½ miles.

I am sure that must be a mistake. It can be seen from that letter, however, that there was a change and the government felt that there should be two routes from Fredericton; one down through Oromocto, and then what is known as the broad route through Westfield and into Saint John. From Saint John it would follow No. 2 to Moncton. It was also suggested that for Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia traffic, in order to shorten the distance in travelling to those provinces, the highway should follow No. 9 from Fredericton to Sussex and then into Moncton.

The next letter referring to this subject is dated September 29, 1949, written by Hon. W. S. Anderson to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters). It reads as follows:

> As explained before the trans-Canada highway passed through Saint John to Moncton—

He means the route that was laid out when the trans-Canada highway was mentioned some years ago.

—and thence to the Nova Scotia border, but in order to make a shorter route we did suggest No. 9 highway from Fredericton to Sussex in order to cut off distance.

That rather indicates that the government was willing to drop the second proposed route from Fredericton over No. 9 to Sussex, and accept the route from Saint John to Moncton.

On November 4, 1949, the provincial minister of public works wrote to the Hon. Mr. Winters. He was replying to a letter in which the minister of reconstruction set out the general program for the trans-Canada highway. Speaking of the general concept the provincial minister said:

It is submitted that this should be amended to read "the most practical route across Canada and each of the provinces." For reasons set out in my letter to you of September 29 we cannot reconcile ourselves to any route through New Brunswick which will by-pass Saint John.

That became the definite policy of the government. On September 19, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply wrote Hon. Mr. Anderson stating:

The choice of the route of the trans-Canada highway across each province rests with the province.

That is quite a definite statement.

The federal government is of the opinion that it should follow the shortest practical east-west route across each province, consistent with the needs of the province; and that the trans-Canada highway as a whole should follow the shortest practical east-west route across Canada consistent with the needs of Canada as a whole. The federal government's participation in the cost would have to be conditioned upon those factors being given adequate consideration.

On this basis, and as indicated in my discussion with the Hon. Mr. McNair, the federal government would consider appropriate modification from your original submission of January 24 last regarding the location of the highway in New Brunswick. The route on which it is believed that the federal government should contribute (completion costs and back costs) is as follows: Entering New Brunswick from a point on the Quebec boundary north of Edmundston and following highway No. 2 to Fredericton, thence to Sussex over highway No. 9, from Sussex to Aulac through Moncton over highway No. 2, and from Aulac to Cape Tormentine over highway No. 16.

The minister does not definitely state he will not accept the proposition made by the New Brunswick government but he strongly suggests that the route which the dominion government is prepared to accept is the route I have just described.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the minister is going to have considerable difficulty in persuading the different provinces that the shortest east-west route is the one which they must accept. I might also point out that, so far as the province of New Brunswick is concerned, its portion of the trans-Canada highway will carry the cars, trucks and so on from Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and the traffic from the United States which goes through New Brunswick into Quebec, Ontario and the west. The cost of maintenance of the highway in the province of New Brunswick is going to be a heavy one; I think it will certainly be much heavier than in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island and undoubtedly it will be much heavier than in the province of Newfoundland.

The minister used one expression, "the needs of the province", which I think needs some explanation. When the minister speaks again I think he should explain to the house just what he means by "the needs of the province". From reading the correspondence here, it is rather hard to know just what is meant by that expression. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) spoke about the great tourist traffic. One of the needs of our province is more tourist trade. If we are to have a trans-Canada highway for that particular need, it should be built in that section of the province which will induce the most tourist traffic. Another thing that might be considered a need is the shortest route between the larger centres of population. If that is a need, that would have to be taken into consideration. I am sure that the general term "needs of the province" has little meaning at all.

As to the cost, I would also point out to the minister that, like some of the hon. members who have already spoken, I feel that the cost is going to be a heavy burden on the smaller provinces, particularly on our province of New Brunswick. I think we shall have more mileage per capita of population than any other province in Canada. The trans-Canada highway will traverse the whole length of the province of New Brunswick, north and south. This morning the minister said, I think, that the total mileage would be about 5,000. It is estimated that the mileage in New Brunswick will be about 450. I do not know how much it costs to build a mile of hard-surfaced road in Canada today, but I think the average for my province is around $100,000 a mile.

Mr. Isnor: $60,000.

Mr. Brooks: The minister shakes his head. I do not think my estimate is far out. Having regard to the high cost of material and the high cost of labour, I would not be at all surprised if he finds that this trans-Canada highway, 5,000 miles in length, cannot be built for the $300 million which he has mentioned. I am satisfied that in New Brunswick alone it will cost from $25 million to $30 million.

I should like to point out this fact. We in the province of New Brunswick today are the heaviest taxed province in the Dominion of Canada. We have the highest per capita debt. We pay more for our gasoline than do those in any other province. We also pay more for our car licences. If an extra burden like this is added to those already carried by the people, without more assistance from the government, I think it will be exceedingly difficult for a small province like New Brunswick to bear the expense. I think we in New Brunswick have more road mileage, including hard-surfaced and gravel roads, than any other province in the dominion.

I have here in my hand the Canada Year Book, 1948-49; at page 709 there is a statement of construction, maintenance and general expenditures on rural highways, bridges and ferries in Canada by provinces, 1942-46. I am sorry that I could not get the figures for 1948 and 1949, but I think 1946 is a fair year. The construction expenditures in the province of New Brunswick in 1946 amounted to $7,032,089. I will compare that figure with that in the province of Manitoba, in which it was only $2,143,505. Everyone knows that Manitoba is a much richer province than New Brunswick. We all know that the population of Manitoba is perhaps double that of our own province. Yet their cost for highways was just about one-third of what it was in our province. The cost in Saskatchewan in that year was $4,372,502, a little over half as large as ours. In Alberta it was $6,205,275. In British Columbia, a province with many times the wealth of ours, and a population of over twice what it is in New Brunswick, the construction expenditures were $5,887,779 or just slightly more than half what we spent in New Brunswick. I will not give the figures for the larger provinces, but in proportion they work out at about the same ratio.

Then I come to the maintenance expenditures. For the maintenance of our highways in New Brunswick in 1946 we spent $4,144,259; Manitoba spent $1,189,168; Saskatchewan, $1,784,940; and British Columbia, $2,931,839. By comparison, one can see the burden that the construction, maintenance and upkeep of roads is in a small province like ours.

Then, as to administration and general expenditures, in New Brunswick in 1946 the figure was $573,806; in Manitoba, it was $311,227; in Saskatchewan, $165,187; in Alberta, $22,461 and in British Columbia it was $686,319, slightly more than in New Brunswick. I am simply quoting these figures, Mr. Speaker, to indicate to you that the burden which will be placed on New Brunswick is going to be a serious and heavy one.

I think the question of constructing highways comes into the picture. In New Brunswick it is difficult to construct highways. We have many rivers, brooks, streams, hills and other impediments that are not found, for instance, in Saskatchewan or many parts of Alberta or Manitoba. It is going to cost far more per mile to construct the trans-Canada highway in our province than it is in any of these other provinces. In equity, I think that such a province as New Brunswick should receive in compensation from the federal treasury more than the fifty per cent which the minister mentioned this morning.

Another point which I should like to call to the attention of the minister is the width of the road. I think perhaps his statement was such as to indicate that some changes could be made. He said it would be 100 feet. Most of the roads constructed in the maritime provinces are 66 feet wide. Along the border of the road there are rows of trees that have been there from 50 to 100 years. There are buildings right up to the edge of the road. If the minister insists that the road be 100 feet wide, I can see much difficulty in widening the roads through the maritime provinces. These are old localities. The difficulty will be very great.

Another matter which the minister should take into consideration is the question of railway crossings. I do not know how the construction of the road will be carried on in other parts of Canada, but the part that is suggested along the Saint John river from Edmundston to Fredericton has many level crossings. A highway of this kind, which is being built to encourage traffic from one end of the country to the other, should be a safe one. On a public highway of this kind everything should be done to provide for the safety of the people using it. When the minister brings in his final bill I hope that some provision will be made to ensure the safety of railway crossings.

There is another point which should be taken into consideration. I do not know whether this is a problem in other provinces as it is in ours, but when work is provided on our highways the practice has grown up of giving that work almost entirely to government supporters.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Brooks: That is a fact, Mr. Speaker, and we have suffered under it for many years in the province of New Brunswick. If the minister has anything to say about it I know that will not happen. That is the reason I am calling it to his attention now. I hope that the minister will see to it that in the employment that is provided in constructing the trans-Canada highway no preference will be shown to anyone, and particularly in these times when there is such an increase in unemployment throughout Canada. This will be a great opportunity to take up the slack of unemployment which is arising in all parts of Canada, and particularly in the maritimes. I ask the minister to use all his influence to see that no preference in employment will be given on this highway. These are just a few points that I wished to call to the minister's attention. Personally I am in favour of the trans-Canada highway. I think it is a splendid idea. I thought it was a splendid idea some fifteen or more years ago when it was first mooted by the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. The idea of joining our country together in this national highway is good, and I wish the minister every success in what I believe is going to be a very difficult task.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I shall not delay the house very long. First of all I wish to congratulate the minister on this bill, No. 194, to assist in the construction of a trans-Canada highway. I congratulate him on being the first cabinet minister in 1949 to recognize what just about everybody else in Canada has recognized for the last fifteen or twenty years, namely, that the building of the trans-Canada highway is a matter of national importance, and a project for which the federal government should take some responsibility.

I think this is one bill on which we can all agree, at least on the principles of it, regardless of our provinces and regardless of our political differences. This is a matter of great concern to the country, and it is one that I am sure people from all parts of Canada and of all political parties in Canada will appreciate.

There are some things about the bill that I like, and there are some things that I dislike. I am not going to emphasize the things that I dislike because I feel that this bill marks the first step taken by the federal government in the building of a trans-Canada highway. From the minister's remarks I presume he believes that the government can put $150 million into this project over a period of seven years and then pull out of the project entirely. Quite seriously, Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether the minister believes that. I doubt whether he believes for one minute that the federal government can enter upon this project, stay with it for a few years, and then turn it back to the provinces. Let us examine the idea that once the road is built the federal government will bear no part of the cost of upkeep. I am quite sure that once the minister sits down with the representatives of the provinces, once they get down to the serious business of the details of this project, he will find that the federal government, having gone into the building of the highway, will not be able to get out. I recall that many years ago the government took much the same attitude on a grant for agricultural education and technical education. It was to be a grant for a few years, and then the matter turned back to the provinces. Experience showed that once the government had gone into that business it just could not get out. I am quite confident that as time goes on we shall find the present minister, or some other minister, coming back to parliament year after year with amendments to this legislation which will indicate that the federal government is bearing an increasing proportion of the cost of upkeep of the highway.

I welcome this legislation because it is a step in the right direction, and I look upon it as merely a first step, and not by any means one that is finished in this bill.

There are a few points I should like to raise on which the minister can probably give us some more information. I am not quite clear as to how this $150 million is to be allocated to the provinces. In a general way the minister indicated that it would be allocated on the basis of population and on the cost per mile of highway. I am sure the house would welcome a clearer statement, if it is possible for the minister to give it. The house would like to know just what general formula will be adopted in the allocation of the $150 million. I wonder whether the minister can tell us if this $150 million, if it is matched by the provinces, thus making $300 million, will give us five thousand miles of good hard-surfaced highway as he expects. I hope that part of that $150 million is to be used to reimburse the provinces on a fifty-fifty basis for moneys they have already spent on provincial highways that will form a part of the national highway. Has the minister any estimate as to how much of that $150 million will be used to reimburse the provinces for work that has already been done? In other words, can we arrive at any conclusion as to just how much of this $150 million is likely to be spent on the construction of new highways?

He has told us that the question of routes to be followed will be left to the provinces, and, as other speakers have said, in that I agree with him. I cannot blame the federal minister for not wanting to tackle the particular problem of deciding, for instance, whether the highway is to go through the Ottawa valley, or whether it is to go up to Toronto, and then up Yonge street to North Bay. I can quite understand why the minister would prefer to have the provincial authorities settle that problem.

That is only with reference to Ontario. There are other sections of the highway where there will be just as great differences of opinion as to the choice of routes. I am confident the government will have to face in time—and I feel certain the government of necessity will do it in the future—the building of not just one trans-Canada highway following any definite route. There are a number of places all across the country where alternate routes are needed, and where two or more alternate routes have advantages.

I certainly visualize the time when, having spent the $150 million of federal money on the building of one highway—and I am not particular which route that highway follows—we shall then follow that up by building alternate routes. For instance, in Ontario such alternate route might follow the Ottawa valley, or go around by Toronto, Yonge street and North Bay. In northern Ontario it might go through Kapuskasing, with an alternate route following the Canadian Pacific along the north shore of lake Superior. A similar situation has developed in the west.

I believe that in future this condition will have to be met, and not by one highway. The minister and other members of the cabinet might as well make up their minds now—because they will have to do so later—that they are not going to get off by contributing to just one trans-Canada highway following one definite route. There will be considerable national advantage in having alternate routes in certain provinces, and possibly feeder lines from certain points on the United States border so as to make it convenient for American visitors coming to this country to reach the trans-Canada highway. Those feeder lines will be just as important a part of the trans-Canada highway as the main highway itself.

If the minister thinks for one moment that the federal government is going to get away with building only one route, contributing $150 million over a period of seven years, and then pulling out of the project and leaving it to the provinces, he is not taking a realistic view of the situation. Indeed I doubt whether that is the point of view held by the minister.

There has been some comment concerning the authority the act will give to the minister. One section for instance states that the minister's authority will include supervision over the calling of tenders, and gives him the authority to review specifications. I would express the hope that the minister's intervention in this sphere may help to some extent to curtail the degree to which patronage enters into the building of our highways. It is possible that the power given the minister under the act could be used for that purpose. On the other hand it could be used to increase the use of patronage in the building of the highway, in which event we would have involved not only provincial but federal patronage.

Any hon. member who has any knowledge of what has happened in connection with the building of highways will realize at once that there is no one phase of public works that has been more bedevilled by political patronage than the building of our highways. If the minister's help and influence can be used to prevent the injection of political patronage, or to eliminate it even in some small degree, and if he will make a serious and honest attempt to obtain good value for the dollars spent in highway construction, I am sure the country will benefit.

If the minister can give us a little more information as to the formula to be followed in the allocation of funds to the provinces, and an estimate of how much of this $150 million is likely to go back to the provinces as reimbursement for money they have already spent, and how much will be available for new construction, it will be helpful. He might feel free also to give us his own view as to whether he honestly believes the federal government should go into this business for seven years, spend $150 million and then turn the whole thing back to the provinces.

Mr. J. A. Bradette (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, it is with some diffidence that I rise at this time to speak as briefly as possible. However, this is the first time I have spoken in this session.

Before proceeding further may I compliment most sincerely the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters). Speaking in the name of my constituents let me say, "You are doing a wonderful job, young man. You are following in the footsteps of your predecessor and have shown yourself enlightened and progressive in all your activities."

I was somewhat puzzled this morning when I heard my good friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) insinuating that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) might have had some ulterior motives in presenting the trans-Canada bill. If I may speak for myself and for the people I represent, I would say that in the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) we have one of the finest statesmen this country has ever produced. He did a marvellous job under difficult circumstances during wartime. He has accomplished things that have evoked the admiration of the whole civilized world. He has been a great help in placing Canada, industrially, financially and commercially, in her present high position.

Why it has been found necessary in a discussion of this kind to impute certain motives to that worthy gentleman is beyond my comprehension. So far as I am concerned, and so far as northern Ontario is concerned, I believe I speak unanimously for all in that part of the country when I say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is a man among millions who has accomplished things worthy of this country and of the whole civilized world.

Just one word about the fifty per cent contribution. There is no doubt that perhaps next year or within two or three years this legislation will be subject to some changes and amendment and the matter will be up again before this House of Commons for discussion. It is not fixed absolutely because, in dealing with this, time and cost factors are involved that must necessarily be reconsidered. I remember when the Quebec-Chicoutimi road was constructed it was expected that this would cost the province of Quebec $6 million, but up to date it has cost over $20 million and it is not yet completed. We cannot fix an absolutely definite figure for a matter of this kind for the reason that there is so much involved in it. The sum of $150 million is mentioned but it is possible that with the high cost of labour and materials that figure will be increased before the trans-Canada highway is completed.

I should like to say a few words about the routing of the trans-Canada highway. Happily for our people our constituency is in central Canada, geographically speaking, and we are always ready to take a national view of things. We appreciate the problems of the three western provinces in the routing of this trans-Canada highway, and we understand something of the difficulties faced by British Columbia in routing this highway through the Rocky mountains. I know the situation in Ontario and I know something about the problems faced by Quebec and, to some extent, those of the maritime provinces including Newfoundland.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) belongs to a party that is very sensitive about so-called provincial autonomy and provincial rights, but he wants this government to overlap the activities and prerogatives of the provincial governments in connection with highways, a matter which under our constitution comes absolutely within the jurisdiction of the provinces. I wonder what would have been the reaction of the official opposition and its members if the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) when presenting his bill this morning had said that this government had decided on the route of the trans-Canada highway. I would like to have heard what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) would have said if we had attempted to take away provincial rights in that connection. The Liberal party takes a back seat to no other party in upholding provincial rights and maintaining the integrity of the provinces, and it will not change its position on this question.

A project of this kind should be considered as a national project. The trans-Canada highway should be national in scope. If you study the history of our country for the last forty years you cannot help realizing that great advances have been made in the northern sections of Canada, in northern Quebec, northern Ontario, the northern sections of the three prairie provinces and in northern British Columbia. In dear old Quebec during the last thirty years they have accomplished wonders in colonizing and settling the northern sections of that country. At the present time there are half a million of new population in the northern sections of Quebec. Those people are prosperous and comfortable. They have a really balanced economy because there is good land in the clay belt and the mineral resources have only been scratched up to the present time. There is great potential in hydro power and forest production.

The same can be said of northern Ontario, and we know what is taking place at the present time in Labrador. We have only to read the reports of the geologists to realize the great potentials in power and mineral production that are there. The same thing applies to northern Manitoba, northern Saskatchewan, northern Alberta and perhaps to a greater degree to northern British Columbia. If I were not considering this matter from a national point of view I would say that the trans-Canada highway should be routed northward from North Bay to Hearst to Geraldton and so on. But I am not going to argue that that route should be followed because I believe that the statesmanship of the leaders of Ontario is such that a really national route will be decided upon, and that the claims of the section just mentioned cannot be set aside.

When we are discussing the routing of the trans-Canada highway we must think in terms other than those having to do with the tourist business. The tourist business is important, but this is a national matter. Probably we shall not be building another trans-Canada highway for fifty years or more.

The ten provinces and the central government will have to get together and exercise their intelligence so that a truly trans-Canada highway in the full sense of the word can be provided for the Canadian people.

It will not be possible for all the large centres of population to be on this highway. I believe the people of Toronto and many other cities appreciate that situation. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) has said that all these large centres will be connected directly or indirectly with the trans-Canada highway. We should not have parochial or local feelings about this matter. We do not want to set up a cabal that will cloud the issue. We must remember that the trans-Canada highway will serve a great purpose in national defence.

We all hope and pray that war will never come, but we remember what happened during the last war. I remember the central government and the government of Ontario got together in order to build a section of highway from Hearst to Geraldton, and Fort William. This was done for national defence purposes. I repeat that not only will this trans-Canada highway serve national and international purposes; it will serve national defence purposes as well. Let us be logical in dealing with this question. I hope that in dealing with this matter the government of Ontario will have a national and not a parochial approach. I know this is a hard question for the provincial administrations to settle. I know that some people in my section of the country will not be satisfied unless the road goes through there because our claims have logic behind them, but after all I think they will be ready to accept loyally any route that is decided upon that will best serve Canada as a whole. That is the only way that a problem of this nature should be discussed.

One word about the maintenance of the road. We speak in general terms of our national economy and we want lower taxation as far as the federal treasury is concerned. Everyone wants to see expenditures cut down. This total of $150 million is a lot of money. It is not the government's money; it is the money of the Canadian people. Before the trans-Canada highway is completed no doubt the federal treasury will be called upon to pay an extra $50 million or $100 million.

I repeat that I believe in the maintenance of provincial autonomy and therefore I believe that highways should continue to remain under the jurisdiction of the provinces. Otherwise we shall have a duplication of services. Ontario has already constructed large sections of highway that no doubt will become part of the trans-Canada highway and this applies also to other provinces. At the present time the province is maintaining those roads which in many instances are hard-surfaced. The province has the necessary equipment and personnel for winter and summer maintenance. We would not like the federal government to take over any of those activities as there would be overlapping; as far as I am concerned I would strongly oppose anything like that. I want the prerogatives of the provincial government to be maintained in their entirety. But I go further on that score. If after a year or two, or longer, any province or all the provinces find the maintenance load is becoming too great for them to carry, I think it should be in order for them to come to the federal government with their pleas and arguments, and I am sure they would be received with an open mind.

I repeat that as a national parliament we have a responsibility to the people whom we represent to see that the money of the federal treasury is spent through the proper channels. I make that statement deliberately, because while many times we are told how expenditures may be curtailed, at the same time we hear suggestions for even greater expenditures. When a bill of this kind comes along, for instance, even if it proposed to expend three times the amount mentioned here some people would be asking for twice as much again. During the war I was Deputy Speaker and chairman of committees, and at one time I began to keep track of how much the opposition wanted the government to increase its expenditures; but after I reached a total of $5 billion I stopped.

That is the sort of thing we must guard against at all times because, I repeat, there is no mystery as far as governmental expenditures are concerned. The money comes from only one source; that is, the Canadian taxpayer. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), whose remarks are always very interesting, wants this bill enlarged right away. He says the government has been too slow in bringing forward legislation dealing with the construction of a trans-Canada highway, but in practically the same breath he wants the federal treasury to stand the cost of constructing transverse lines running north and south to the United States. Let us complete one big project at a time; then other problems can be considered. But let me repeat that we must have due regard for provincial rights and provincial autonomy in regard to certain matters which are the primary responsibility of the provincial government and highway administration is certainly one of them.

There may be complications with respect to roads already built. That would apply more particularly to the older provinces such as Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Certainly it would apply to Quebec, because you can travel the length and breadth of that province on fine highways. More than that, a few years ago, if I am not mistaken, under Mr. Bouchard, who was then a minister in the Quebec legislature, the construction was commenced of that fine highway called Bouchard boulevard. Now what use is to be made of that boulevard? As far as I can make out it will depend upon the provinces of Quebec and Ontario coming to an agreement. This just illustrates the difficulties that may arise, which can be solved only if the members of all the provincial legislatures work together in a spirit of co-operation.

Then instances may arise where the cost will be either greater or less than in other cases, because you cannot follow rigid lines when working on a project of this kind. There will be many complexities to be met and overcome. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said the government was slow. Well, I don't know. It seems to me this legislation is well timed. Is this not the logical time for it, a few years after the war? Surely no one will contradict me when I say it would have been impossible to start this work during the war. There was a period of six or seven years when it was absolutely impossible to even mention the construction of a trans-Canada highway. At the moment, though there may be local instances of unemployment only a few months ago we actually had over-employment, if I may call it that. The cost of material has been exceedingly high, and as I said a few moments ago we must be extremely careful. We may be budgeting for a trans-Canada highway that we think will cost $300 million, but by the time it is completed the cost may be $500 million.

These are some of the precautions the government must take. The legislation speaks in terms of a period of seven years. Well, I hope it will be completed in less time than that, but there are bound to be obstacles and delays; situations may arise which we cannot foresee at the present time, so that seven years may not be long enough. For a nation acceleration may not be always a good quality. It is true that we must work as quickly and as diligently as possible, but in a matter of this kind we must employ logic and thorough study at all times. Who can say that this fine project may not be completed in five years. Certainly the fact that the legislation mentions seven years is no reason to criticize it.

As to the route to be followed, I know that not a single premier, provincial minister or official of any of the ten provinces will criticize the central administration for not itself deciding upon the route. I am sure all the premiers and their legislatures are prepared to accept their responsibilities as they come along. This morning the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra mentioned that New Brunswick had not definitely decided what route the trans-Canada highway should follow in that province, and there was some question about whether it should go through Saint John. That is one instance showing the difficulties the provinces must expect to face. Once this becomes a fait accompli, however, once the route has been decided upon, I am sure the Canadian people have enough common sense to accept the decision, if not gladly, at least loyally, and in that respect I am sure I can speak for my own section of the country.

When I hear of the proposed expenditure of $300 million for the construction of a trans-Canada highway I am pleased I know that it is a necessary project; I am proud of my country, because we need that national artery which will provide a wonderful means of more closely uniting our ten provinces. At the same time I must think in terms of the colonists, the settlers and farmers of northern Ontario, whom I know so well. Some of them have spent forty years in colonizing that part of our country, and they still have to go through quagmires of mud all summer, and are faced with impossible roads all winter. I like to see cars going along our highways at fifty, sixty or seventy miles an hour, with the people singing and happy. At the same time, having been a colonist and settler myself in northern Ontario, when I am in my own car travelling on our good highways I always have in mind those thousands of settlers and farmers in northern Ontario and also other parts of Canada who, with their wives and children, have to plow through mud and deep ruts all summer. If it had been possible I should like to have seen this legislation include provision for the expenditure of perhaps $25 million for rural roads on a fifty-fifty basis with the provinces. That is just a wish I am expressing, not with any desire to throw cold water on this fine scheme but so that people may realize that this is still a pioneer country and will be such for many years to come, because in northern Ontario, yes in the whole of northern Canada, we have the richest heritage on earth, which so far has just been scratched. The Pre-Cambrian shield offers us the greatest riches any country could wish to possess; that is why I am making these statements at this time.

I am absolutely in favour of the construction of the trans-Canada highway as rapidly as possible; but while that construction is going on I shall always have in mind the many farmers in all our provinces who are suffering through lack of proper roads. I do not say that in a critical way at all, but just in order that this national forum may realize that a section of our population which has done so much for the development of Canada in the last forty years, particularly northern Canada, should receive some consideration from the federal treasury in the near future.

Patronage has been mentioned; and I hope this can be avoided. I know whereof I speak, because in my youth my father, who was engaged in road work, was fired because he happened to be a Liberal. I would not want this to happen to anyone, because it is not Canadianism; it is not worthy of our nation. So I hope there will be safeguards to ensure that no one will be fired, no one will be hired, and no one will be refused a contract because he happens to belong to a party other than that which is in power at the time. Those are the things I know, because no one has been able to accuse this administration of patronage for the last sixteen years, and this is as it should be.

There is one clause with which I entirely agree, and I believe it will be of great help in building this highway. It is the clause in connection with tenders, which states that tenders and specifications shall be reviewed by the minister. I understand that in the province of Quebec there are no standards set for highway construction and no tenders for road contracts. I am not saying this critically, but the federal treasury must insist upon all necessary safeguards in all the provinces so far as contracts are concerned. I repeat that I hope there will be no patronage in the letting of contracts for construction, or in the hiring of workers so far as this great undertaking is concerned. It is necessary to take all safeguards. The Canadian people must be seized of the fact that this is a national undertaking in the full sense of the word, and that it will take the genius and ability of the people of the country to see that it is carried to a successful conclusion.

I believe that is all I want to say at the moment. Before resuming my seat I wish to express the hope that the provincial governments and the central government do not permit themselves to be swayed by the various factions, so that they will avoid having our trans-Canada highway look like that comic strip, the Toonerville Trolley, as it would if it went into all these little corners. We want a highway that will be as straight as possible from coast to coast, one which will exemplify the fine spirit of the Canadian people, and which will show that it is possible for all parties in Canada to get together to give to the present and future generations a link that would mean so much to their comfort, happiness and prosperity, and better understanding.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure and a privilege to follow the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He has one of the most interesting personalities among members I have met during my time in this house. I have always believed in the principle of confederation which I have often said is akin to the principle in the old Cornish battlecry, "Each for all and all for each". I believe that is a good principle on which to base any solution of these grave problems that confront the people of this country after two long wars.

I rise to support, in a general way, the principle of this national project. As a social and economic necessity, it outranks anything of which I am aware, but it is subject to the reservation I always make, that it must be commensurate with the ability of the country to pay. Consideration must be had for the fact that we have taken part in two long wars, and that there are many national problems coming up each day. At the time of Sir Charles Tupper this country was spending $36 million per year, but it is now spending almost that amount in a day. The capacity of the country to pay has to be considered.

I wish to give the government some constructive suggestions in connection with this problem. Some of these suggestions were made by the leader of the opposition, and one concerned the capacity of the provinces to pay the amount named in the bill, fifty per cent of the cost. The leader of the opposition has stated he believes the determination of this percentage should await a provincial conference, and that is correct. Until such time as the various provinces know what revenues they will receive, it would be impossible for them to decide on this economic question.

I wish to deal with some of the economic problems involved in this problem, first from the local standpoint, and second from the national standpoint. Back in 1911 when Sir Robert Borden came into power, he appointed a former provincial cabinet minister, Frank Cochrane, who was then representing a new Ontario constituency, just as my friend does who preceded me in this debate, as minister of railways and canals. Mr. Cochrane had been the Ontario minister of lands and forests. He decided that Toronto's contribution to good roads could be reassessed against the proposed federal road from Montreal to Windsor.

I wish to refer to the problem from a local standpoint. As you know, the city of Toronto was a pioneer in the building of good roads. The other day I referred to the fact that milk and dairy products could not be brought into the city—the children had no milk—because of the bad roads. I proposed a resolution, and we conferred with the county of York and the province of Ontario about it. I urged the city to give a voluntary contribution to improve the highways around our city from the east, the north and west. This embraced all the surrounding communities, including the riding of South York, which a member of the C.C.F. party represents at the moment. The city went into this scheme and, with the county of York, paid the cost of building good roads for fifteen miles around the city.

I am glad to see that the minister has included in the bill one principle which was not contained in the resolution so far as I could see, that provincial governments would be given credit in this national project for any work done towards making good national roads. Now, that takes me back to the Beveridge bill, which was introduced by the United States government. What was the Beveridge bill? I think the principle of it has been copied into this bill. The minister knows a great deal about this problem. I have found him to be a very industrious minister, and one who looks ahead. I believe this Beveridge bill was passed in 1916 or 1917, and the whole of the national project was paid for with federal funds. But it compelled the various states—what we call provinces—to have a standard contract with Washington on a national standard plan. The federal government paid up to fifty per cent. As long as they had standard plans for the highway they could qualify under what is known as the Beveridge national highway bill. It was one of the finest national bills that I think the United States ever had. They were pioneers in the good roads movement. I think that has been explained in connection with the new provision which the minister has in the bill. It makes it a national work.

I remember when the city of Toronto proposed going in on the Hamilton highway, when Mr. Cochrane was the minister of railways and canals. A deputation of us came down to Ottawa; I think the members were from Hamilton, Toronto, Oakville and other places. We met the government to discuss the matter. What was done was this. The city of Toronto went in by agreement with the city of Hamilton and the Ontario government. To do what? To build the Hamilton highway. We were to pay only forty per cent of the capital cost of the work. That did not include upkeep or maintenance. In the contract I insisted on having a term specifying a direct route from A to B. Afterwards the Ontario government appointed what was known as the Ontario-Hamilton highway commission, a provincial government commission. What did they do? They just tacked something on to the agreement and made it retroactive. They compelled the city of Toronto to pay forty per cent of the costs for the total upkeep of the work, which accordingly exceeded by a large sum the capital sum; and it was not to go from A to B direct. It was to make a detour past certain people's farms at a place whose name I just cannot think of now. It went up the lakeshore road, and thence down into the village of Oakville. It was then a village; it is now a town. It went thence along past certain people's farms and it was not a direct route at all. The result was that it added greatly to the cost of the work. In the second place, it was retroactive and it compelled the city, notwithstanding the honourable agreement we had with Hamilton and the Ontario government, to pay forty per cent of the upkeep costs. That should not have been.

Then a deputation from Toronto, Hamilton and other places came down to Ottawa about the matter—the Borden government had come into power in 1911—and waited on the then minister, Frank Cochrane. The minister said this national road was to be part of the Windsor to Montreal national highway, and that Toronto would be recouped its share of the costs, including capital and maintenance. I am glad to see that in the amended bill there is some provision made for it now.

I may say that the public wants to see the correct picture in connection with this national highway. As a municipal officer I found that our city, which was the pioneer on the local end of it and many other national features, was not objecting, although it is the main tax-paying city of the dominion. As far as I can see, we do not wish to offer any opposition provided we are able, which we are now under the new amendment, to get contributions in respect of highways previously constructed. There should be some way of working out that plan in the national picture accordingly.

I shall speak for only three or four minutes more. I am sorry that in the early twenties the national railways, which recently had been taken over by the Meighen administration and united into a national system now known as the Canadian National Railways, and the Canadian Pacific railway were not a little bit more progressive than they were after the first war. I remember in 1920, 1921 and 1922 when we were urging them to go into the motor bus and motor truck systems, they backed up on it and said they had no funds for it. They could not see what the good roads movement meant to these railways. They might have got the cream of the business. Instead of that, they have turned it over largely to private ownership, to the trucks and buses. I was sorry that in any solution of this problem the national railways lost track of that particular matter. The railways were not progressive enough to take advantage of the situation, with the result that they themselves created the situation by which they are done out of the cream of the truck and bus business when they could have had it just for the asking. It would have acted as a feeder to the same railways and would have kept them from going bankrupt and applying for increases in rates as they are doing in various sections of this country at the present time. It would have provided a large revenue for these systems. I am sorry they did not go into it.

As to the annexation of these various districts to which the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) referred, we found that it was far better, instead of annexing these various outside sections of the city—and many of them are in the city now—to give them certain municipal services like water, sewers, good roads, health regulations, police protection, fire protection and the general municipal services. We found that it was better to do that than to annex them, bring them into the city and give them many of the other services which would have been given at the expense of the taxpayers as a whole.

I doubt if there is any city on the North American continent that has contributed more to the good roads movement than our city of Toronto. There is no bigotry in that city. There is a warm feeling for the people of the east and of the west, as was shown last Saturday. I believe that what I say today many others will take up tomorrow. I was speaking to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), through you, sir, the other day about the expansion of the cabinet. I said he would have a cabinet of sixty, and he told me I would not be one of them. I never wanted to be one of them. I point to that consideration. I told him it looked more as though we would have in the cabinet a committee of one hundred; it might go to that. It is the same with other problems. What I say today, probably others will say tomorrow. But that does not make any difference. Our city is one which has been built up by progressive people. They have done something for public health, for good roads and in every way they have shown their appreciation of other parts of the country, as they did last Saturday in a manner which I think will do a great deal of good for the cause which is near and dear to the Prime Minister's heart, namely, unity from coast to coast among the people of this country.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks on this bill. As a British Columbia member I want to express my opinion. I am sorry to say that I entirely disagree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) if I understood him aright in the remarks he made on the trans-Canada highway. It will be admitted by anybody who knows Canada that in British Columbia it costs a great deal more to build a highway than it does in the other provinces of the dominion. I understood the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra to say—and he can correct me if I am wrong—that we should not be recompensed for what we have already spent. I entirely disagree with him.

Mr. Green: May I correct the hon. member? What I said was that money would be better spent on constructing this highway. I pointed out, for example, that under the bill it could be spent for putting up buildings or doing some other work entirely unconnected with the highway. I said it would be better spent in building the highway.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am glad the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has corrected himself, for I still entirely disagree with him. In British Columbia we should have our rights and our fair share of buildings, or any other public project for the betterment of Canada, irrespective of the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Hatfield: Will it go through the Fraser valley?

Mr. Cruickshank: It just happens that I am sitting pretty in the Fraser valley. No matter what route is chosen, it has to go through the Fraser valley. I do not know what route will be chosen for the trans-Canada highway. That is up to the provincial governments. We have just completed 88 miles of construction within the province of British Columbia which is known as the Hope-Princeton highway. Unfortunately in the last couple of days part of it was washed out in the storm. It cost us $12 million, which we in the province of British Columbia paid. It may or may not be used as part of the trans-Canada highway. That is up to the provincial government. The route will be either the Hope-Princeton highway or the Cariboo highway. One of these routes must be used as the trans-Canada highway. We in British Columbia paid for all that construction. I disagree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I think we should be recompensed for it. I am not begrudging anything to the prairie provinces at all, but obviously for $100,000 you can build far more miles of a highway across the province of Saskatchewan than you can across the province of British Columbia. They do not have the mountains to contend with; they do not have the obstacles that we have to contend with. I do not know which department this comes under; I presume it comes under the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), since almost everything is under his department. Therefore I hope he is listening to me. I believe that we in the province of British Columbia should be recompensed for what we have already spent in building this road through the Rocky mountains. Obviously it costs us more to build highways through our province than it does in any other province in Canada.

If this highway is to be built on a fifty-fifty basis, which I do not think is right—I think the federal government should pay more than fifty per cent—then we in British Columbia are entitled to more than fifty per cent. I repeat that we in British Columbia should be recompensed for what we have already spent on what must be the ultimate route to the Pacific coast. No matter what route is chosen it must go through that canyon, and we have built that ourselves.

Never mind your public buildings. If we are not entitled to our share, if we do not get our share of public buildings, then there is something wrong with the British Columbia members who do not see that we get it. The money that we have spent on this highway which will be part of the trans-Canada highway should be repaid to us, even though it was spent prior to the construction of the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, with what the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) just said I am in hearty agreement. Anyone who has gone over the roads which have been built with almost incalculable toil and expense by the British Columbia people would have to agree with what the hon. member said.

I think that the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) did the country a service when he put on record some of the costs which have been involved in constructing these roads, which really are fine roads, in the province of British Columbia. I do believe that British Columbia should be recompensed. Even if they wanted to spend some of the money in clearing off debts which they have accumulated in building these roads I see no reason why they should not be allowed to do so. We are all going to benefit by the improvements which British Columbia makes in her roads as part of Canada.

I desire once more to congratulate the minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on initiating this policy of systematic aid to the provinces in building roads. It is one thing to talk about things; it is another thing to begin to do them. These men have begun to do things. That is what I always respect. My father used to say to me when I talked overmuch around home: "Son, talk is cheap, but it takes money to buy whisky." He never used any whisky, but he used the illustration. So now we want to begin to do things in Canada, not talk overmuch about them.

I agree with the minister that the provinces ought to be recompensed, as he said in his speech this morning, for the amount of money which they have spent on building roads which will ultimately become a part of the trans-Canada highway—I would say a trans-Canada highway system, because I am quite sure it will not be very long before everyone will come to realize that there must be a system of trans-Canada highways to service the vast areas which constitute Canada. I also agree that the provinces ought to be free to spend the money as they choose. All one needs to do once more is to look at what British Columbia has done or at what Alberta has done to be impressed with the fact that these provinces have known how to spend money wisely. They have known what constitutes desirable achievement, and they have attained it. I agree too that the provinces ought to come to agreement on the route. These routes are purely a provincial matter. It will be said: Well, suppose the provinces do not agree as to which routes ought to be constructed. This constitutes one of the most cogent arguments in support of a system of highways. I have no doubt that the provinces of this dominion, if given a chance, will do those things which ultimately are in the best interests of this nation.

On November 21 I advocated a system of highways comparable with the national interregional system of the United States. I still think that suggestion is worth careful consideration.

I cannot share the minister's opinion that the help being offered by Canada at the present time, or that which was offered in the past, in any way compares favourably with the assistance the United States has been giving the states in the matter of constructing highways.

Even granting the fact that that nation is very rich and populous, Canada has fallen far short. I believe hon. members will be interested in having some facts which have been gathered from page 253 of the World Almanac and Book of Facts for 1949. It states:

> The federal works agency reported highway construction in the United States in 1947 cost $1,154 million or 63 per cent more than in 1946. Costs, however, were higher in 1947 and physical volume increase was only 43 per cent. The agency said construction on federal aid-highway programs in 1947 accounted for more than half the costs or $586 million. State work amounted to $246 million and construction at the local level $322 million.

In his budget message to congress on January 10, 1949, President Truman said that the forest roads and trails under the Department of Agriculture in 1948 accounted for $18 million of expenditures. In 1949 it was estimated it would be $26 million, and in 1950 it was estimated at only $3 million. Apparently that type of road was tapering off. He pointed out that the Alaskan and Indian roads under the Department of the Interior in 1948 actually cost $7 million, while in 1949 they were estimated to cost $19 million, and in 1950 to cost $28 million.

He pointed out that the public works administration, under the federal works agency, in 1948 actually cost $331 million, whereas in 1949 the estimated cost was $444 million and in 1950 the estimated cost $501 million. Included in the 1950 estimate of $501 million is $470 million as grants in aid to the various states for work construction.

In his budget message President Truman said, as reported at page M-59:

> Even with this high level of federal aid, our highways are not being improved as fast as they wear out, nor are they being modernized to the extent required by postwar traffic conditions. Nevertheless present high costs and the limited capacity of the construction industry make it undesirable for expenditures in the fiscal year 1950 to exceed the estimated level of $501 million.

Those figures, and the quotation, indicate the attitude the United States is taking in respect of this whole matter of the construction of highways throughout that country. I believe their conditions are fairly accurately or properly comparable with the conditions obtaining or shortly to obtain in this country. Therefore, as I said, I cannot share the minister's optimism when he states that Canada is doing anything comparable with what the United States is doing.

Here are some further considerations which add weight to my conviction. I have before me some figures which show federal aid in the United States between 1929 and 1948:

Year	Amount voted	Per capita vote
1929	$ 84,500,000	·69
1930	163,000,000	1·32
1931	147,578,800	1·19
1932	262,000,000	2·10
1933	548,935,700	4·37
1934	245,284,508	1·15
1935	415,472,489	3·27
1936	143,286,687	1·12
1937	138,500,000	1·08
1938	222,333,333	1·71
1939	225,118,188	1·72
1940	150,666,667	1·10
1941	183,791,667	1·38
1942	364,150,000	2·70
1943	256,449,085	1·88
1944	30,000,000	·22
1945	(Not given)	(Not given)
1946	535,265,000	3·71
1947	525,000,000	3·65
1948	525,000,000	3·51

I believe the minister and all other hon. members will agree that this indicates a much greater increase in expenditures by the United States than even this relatively generous bill proposed by the minister envisages for Canada. It is in my opinion only fair that the federal government should contribute far more generously, more consistently and perhaps perennially for road-building in Canada than the minister appears to have in mind at present. The appropriations the Canadian provinces would have received if they had been receiving a similar per capita appropriation during the years for which I have given the United States figures may be computed by multiplying the populations of the various provinces by the per capita rates I have given. Anyone who would take the trouble to look into the population figures and make these computations would be astonished at the amount of money Canada ought to have given the provinces, but which has not been given to them.

As a whole Canada has dealt rather stingily with the provinces from beginning to end, if the comparisons which I have are accurate—and I believe they are. In comparison with what the central government of Australia has done for the states of that dominion, Canada's achievements I would say are genuinely shabby. The computation to which I shall now refer has been made by one who is thoroughly competent to make it. I shall not give his name, but I believe his figures are accurate—he believes they are.

He says that the average yearly payment by the dominion to the provinces from grants out of total revenues for the years 1868, 1878, 1888, 1898, 1908, 1918, 1928 and 1938 was 4·35 per cent. That is, the dominion gave the provinces altogether 4·35 per cent of the moneys taken in as the grand total revenue during those years. From the grand total revenue in 1941 the dominion paid to the provinces 2·20 per cent. From the grand total revenue in 1946 the dominion paid to the provinces 3·73 per cent.

Contrasted with this the average yearly payment by the commonwealth of Australia to the states from their grand total revenue for the years 1927 to 1945, a period of eighteen years, was 16·07 per cent—16·07 per cent as against something like four per cent. That makes Canada's contribution look like small potatoes.

I should like to say something now about what Canada has done and about the money that the dominion government has taken away from the provinces under the taxation agreements that were consummated with seven of the provinces in 1947. These figures are given in a return tabled by the government in the House of Commons on April 26, 1948. During the fiscal year ended March 31, 1948, the dominion collected the following taxes from the seven provinces:

	Personal Income Tax	Corporation Income	Excess Profit	Succession Duty
Prince Edward Island	$ 1,236,995	$ 686,984	$ 328,478	$ 54,361
Nova Scotia	15,492,763	7,711,449	4,756,529	1,206,125
New Brunswick	11,853,532	6,414,309	4,194,833	625,048
Manitoba	33,095,159	16,300,637	14,592,878	790,287
Saskatchewan	22,893,141	4,665,839	4,938,309	699,272
Alberta	30,858,199	9,127,855	6,684,201	1,003,977
British Columbia	66,517,175	48,621,456	26,510,672	2,747,214

What did the dominion do with all that money which they collected from the provinces? That is an interesting question. The amounts paid by the dominion government, exclusive of the statutory subsidies which would have been paid anyway during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1948, were as follows:

Prince Edward Island	$ 1,635,189
Nova Scotia	10,033,372
New Brunswick	7,821,817
Manitoba	12,661,301
Saskatchewan	13,681,361
Alberta	13,205,173
British Columbia	20,289,281

In that time the dominion collected from the seven provinces a total of $344,607,659 and paid out $79,327,497 in compensation, or for every $434 collected by the dominion from the provinces it paid back $100. Pretty fine business for the dominion government.

Mr. Laing: What federal expenditures in the provinces are included in the figures given by the hon. member? There would appear to be something wrong with the hon. member's figures because I know there is a great deal more money than $20 million, as indicated, going into our province.

Mr. Blackmore: I listed the payments to the provincial governments to replace the revenue which they would have collected had they collected those taxes.

Mr. Laing: You were not including the federal expenditures in the provinces?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. Blackmore: Not by any means. It must be borne in mind that these are not the only heads of revenue. The dominion gathers from the provinces customs tariffs and sales tax which add greatly to the costs of the provinces. Then there are other imposts. I do not think I was at all unfair in the figures I have given.

I do not think there is any argument to be advanced against a free and generous participation by the dominion government in the construction of roads in Canada. Once more I congratulate the minister and the Prime Minister and the government, and I think I shall have to include the Liberal party, upon having initiated this system of federal aid to the provinces.

There are three main points which I think need to be stressed in considering this subject. First, Canada should spent much more money on the construction of roads as well as upon the provision of a good many other services in the provinces. Second, Canada should plan and construct a system of highways all over the country in conjunction with the provinces. Third, Canada should allow the provinces to spend the money.

There are several questions which I think this house and the country would like the minister to answer if he has the facilities at his disposal to obtain the information and make the computations before we finish discussing the trans-Canada highway. First, how much money has the Canadian government contributed to the construction of highways since 1920 in each province of Canada?

Second, how much has each of the provinces spent on highways during the same period?

Third, why did the minister choose this amount of $150 million rather than $10 million more or $10 million less? In other words, what was the criterion by which he arrived at the amount of $150 million? Did he suppose that that amount was particularly appropriate or did he just pick that figure out of the blue?

Fourth, has the minister considered a system of highways throughout Canada and has he formed any opinion as to what such a system would cost?

Fifth, can he give any reason why the government should not make up to the provinces for what they have lost in the past because of federal neglect in connection with highway construction? Can he offer any logical reason why the federal government, realizing its past error even at this late date, should not begin to make restitution as an indication of true repentance for misdeeds in earlier days?

Sixth, can the minister state the amount of money the dominion has expended on highways since 1900? This would cover roads to national parks and in national parks which the dominion has constructed.

Seventh, is there any reason why Ottawa should not bear the cost of upkeep occasioned by unusual situations such as that in Alberta in connection with the Alaska highway brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) on November 21 and that in New Brunswick brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) this afternoon?

I think matters of this sort should be carefully recognized and studied and weighed, and allowed for.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the house for its patience in once more listening to a talk from me on this subject, dear to my heart, as I believe it is dear to the heart of every hon. member here. I hope that as a result of our deliberations we may formulate a plan and policy under which we shall be able to provide our country with the kind of fine highway system everyone dreams of, which, I believe, will greatly help to increase the prosperity and happiness of our people during the coming years.

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few remarks on this bill. First of all, I should like to thank the government for this legislation which is so generous to the provinces. I also desire to compliment the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) on the clearness of the explanations he has given us in connection with this measure. I am aware that, as a trained civil engineer, he is particularly fitted to assume the responsibility of such a project.

If my information is correct and also if what I have read from time to time is consistent with the facts, all provinces or a majority of them would accept the generous bill introduced by the federal government. The stand taken by most members who have made some observations this morning and this afternoon shows that it is admitted in principle that this bill is in the best interests not only of the country at large but also of each province.

I think it would be quite unnecessary to dwell at length on the touristic, economic and military advantages offered by this bill. That is why I was astonished this morning by the statements of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). He brought forward so many objections that, although he finally agreed with the principle of the bill, one could have inferred he was against the measure as presently proposed. Actually the hon. member would have the federal government pay one hundred per cent of the construction costs and also pay costs of maintenance.

Well, under the circumstances, it would be easy to infer that in letting the federal government pay one hundred per cent of construction costs, and later pay for maintenance, it would be a recognition of the federal government's jurisdiction over this highway. Although I am neither a lawyer nor an expert on constitutional issues, I think we all agree that the question of provincial roads, legally speaking, belongs exclusively to the provinces, even if provincial roads have to be used in part for the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Speaker, I now ask the house again, hasn't the Liberal party always shown that it aims to protect provincial autonomy, that it will not change its attitude as one hon. member, apparently expressing the opinion of the Progressive Conservative party, did this morning? We have always maintained the same policy in respect of provincial autonomy. The minister, in his talks with the provincial premiers or the provincial ministers of highways, has always been careful not to encroach upon provincial autonomy. This bill, as all members will agree, is another striking example of the eagerness of the Liberal party, which has been attacked on various occasions, to maintain and protect provincial autonomy.

I hope that the press, especially that of the province of Quebec, will spread the news that once again the Liberal party is giving tangible proof of its absolute respect for provincial autonomy.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was critical about another aspect of the measure. He asserted that the seven-year period was too long for the construction of that highway. I do not claim to be an expert in the matter, although as a civil engineer I have had some experience in road-building. However in the opinion of specialists, contractors would be unable, with their present set-up and equipment, to build this road in less than ten or twelve years. That period could possibly be reduced to six or seven years, if the provincial authorities preferred to secure the services of contractors from other provinces. As everyone knows, every province—and especially Quebec—keeps a jealous watch over its autonomy. I believe it would be very difficult to use contractors from outside to do the work. That is my answer to the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. The seven-year period is entirely logical, but time alone will tell more conclusively whether it should be extended since we lack the physical means to complete the work in such a short time.

In this respect, I believe that, without in any way dictating to provincial authorities, it is quite proper for a member of this house to stress, in the course of such a debate, the interests of his constituency. Hon. members, and more particularly the Quebec representatives, know that in 1940 or 1941 that province started to build a highway on the south shore between Quebec city and Montreal. This boulevard, named after Sir Wilfrid Laurier, has many good points. For instance it is 160 feet wide, which incidentally makes it well in keeping with the provisions of the bill now before the house. It could therefore serve as a splendid extension of the trans-Canada highway.

May I suggest to the hon. minister that in his future discussions with the ministers of the provincial departments of highways, he should point out to the minister of highways of the province of Quebec the advantage of selecting this splendid road begun in 1940 or 1941, but discontinued later on. National interests would be well served if this section were to become part of the trans-Canada highway, since it would be completed sooner and at less cost. In addition, it would reduce the distance between Montreal and Quebec by fifty per cent.

This route would provide many advantages to the city of Montreal and the surrounding district. However, we feel it would provide even greater advantages to the Quebec, Gaspe, North Shore, Charlevoix, Lake St. John and Chicoutimi districts.

I do not wish to labour the point, but I hope the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply will put forward all the arguments in favour of this route, in which my hon. colleagues from Lotbiniere (Mr. Lapointe), Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert), Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Cloutier) and Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cournoyer), as well as those from that part of the south shore of the St. Lawrence are greatly interested.

I am not doing this for political reasons, but it does seem to me that this is an excellent occasion to show all the advantages of this route. I therefore consider it to be my duty to explain these advantages to the house.

Mr. Speaker, those are the few remarks which I wanted to make. I would have liked to address the house in English, but, unfortunately, I only had a few minutes during the noon recess to prepare these remarks.

Such a bill well demonstrates that the Liberal party is not furthering its particular ends in this matter, and that the construction of this highway is intended to foster the economic development of all the provinces. We are showing once more our desire to work in the interests of the nation as a whole. I hope that the highway ministers of the other provinces will approach this matter in a spirit similar to ours for the good of the country as a whole.

(Text):

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in common with the other members who have taken part in this debate, I wish to congratulate the minister on his presentation of this bill. I do hope that a trans-Canada highway will be built as a result of this move. I should like to point out, however, that the position of the government today is quite different from the position it took at the dominion-provincial conference on highways last December. In this connection I have previously pointed out that the western provinces understood the federal government would be prepared to pay one hundred per cent of the cost of construction of the highway.

I was sorry to hear the minister state that the provision calling for every province to agree to pay fifty per cent of the cost before work could be undertaken in any province would still apply. I noticed that the minister said he felt sure most of the provinces would start construction work in 1950. I am sorry he could not give the house assurance that all provinces would commence construction in 1950. In my opinion the $150 million provided by the bill will be found inadequate. I question, too, the wisdom of paying the provinces for part of the cost of the work they have done on the trans-Canada highway since 1930. I should like the minister to give us the figures to show what each province has spent on its portion of the trans-Canada highway from 1930 to date. It seems to me that such a provision might result in an unfair distribution of a large part of the $150 million. It would seem to me that it might be an encouragement to some of the provinces to do little work on the trans-Canada highway. If a province knew it had $10 million or $20 million coming to it for work undertaken since 1930, then it might use that money for other services or in other ways than building roads.

I should like to deal, Mr. Speaker, in particular with one statement the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply made in introducing this measure. He said that the pattern followed by the government in relation to the trans-Canada highway was similar to the pattern followed in the United States, and that the federal government would pay fifty per cent of the cost of construction. I wish to point out that the formula and policy followed by this government in respect to the trans-Canada highway is much different from the highway program being followed by the United States government. I need only mention that this government does not propose to pay one dollar to the provinces to aid in the construction of secondary or farm-to-market roads.

The government does not propose to pay fifty per cent of the total cost of taking the trans-Canada through some of our large urban areas. Certainly, the program and pattern followed by the government of Canada with regard to highways is far different from the program followed in the United States. Another example of the difference in attitude is that the introduction of a bill which will provide some money for the construction of a trans-Canada highway comes thirty-seven years later than the initial highway program undertaken by the United States in 1912.

The United States has a good highway system, as all hon. members are aware. According to the public roads administration annual report for 1948, the United States has a primary highway system totalling 231,977 miles. If Canada had a primary federal highway system which would give us the same number of miles of road per capita as exists in the United States, we would have 20,878 miles. The most that the trans-Canada highway will represent is approximately 5,000 miles.

The next great difference between the program of this government and the program in the United States is that in the United States the government has already contributed towards the construction of a secondary federal highway system composed of farm-to-market roads, school bus roads and rural mail delivery routes. The secondary system in the United States totals 377,622 miles of road. If this government made a contribution to the provinces of Canada to give the same number of miles per capita in a secondary federal highway system as the United States has, we should need to have a system composed of 33,986 miles of road. The total highway system in the United States as of June 30, 1948, towards which the federal government paid a portion of the construction costs, amounted to 609,599 miles. If the Canadian government did exactly the same thing as the United States government, on the basis of our population the federal government should contribute to a highway system composed of 54,864 miles of road. The 5,000 miles of road in the trans-Canada highway will amount to only one-eleventh of a highway system that is necessary to give Canada the same number of road miles per capita of population. If we compare that trans-Canada highway seven years from now, and if we assume that it is built and completed, then the federal government seven years from now will have aided in the construction of a total number of road miles equalling only eight-tenths of one per cent of the total highway system in the United States to which the United States government has contributed.

Another way that the proposed legislation varies greatly from the legislation in the United States is that no consideration is given to the increased cost of taking the trans-Canada highway through our large cities. I might quote a sentence from the same booklet that I have already mentioned. On page 9, in relation to the interurban roads in the United States, it says:

> Provision of federal-aid funds specifically for urban improvements and the emphasis that has been placed on the construction of expressways as the only solution of the traffic problems for larger cities have led many cities to substitute bold and direct methods for ineffectual procedures that did not produce results.

The ineffectual procedures within urban areas that did not produce results within the United States in the past are exactly the kind of procedures that this government contemplates continuing in this legislation, since it does not propose to help the urban areas to take the highways through the cities.

As I have already said, this legislation does not propose to pay even one dollar toward the cost of secondary or farm-to-market roads. I should point out that the policy followed in the United States has resulted in 2,699 counties, or 88 per cent of all counties in the United States, embarking on a program of road construction within their counties, and that within the three years following the war $373,814,000 was paid from the federal treasury in the United States for the construction of secondary or farm-to-market roads.

In the fiscal year ended June 30, 1948, in the United States 6,432 miles of road were added to the federal highways system and 11,419 miles of road were added to the secondary or farm-to-market road system. In the United States federal contributions to secondary roads in that year were almost two to one as compared with those to the federal primary system.

The minister made the statement that the federal government in the United States is paying to the various states in the union not more than fifty per cent of the total cost of road construction.

I should like to read to the house some of the statistics shown in table 6 of this same report which sets out the total costs of road construction of various types in all the states and then shows the amount of federal contribution to that construction. The first state is Colorado. The total cost of construction of all primary roads in that state within the fiscal year ended June 30, 1948, amounted to $10,006,688. The federal government paid $5,799,640. Total contributions from the federal government to the construction of secondary roads amounted to some $2,087,808 of a total cost of $3,682,202. Within the state of Colorado, that year, $4,059,395 was spent on a highway system within the large urban centres. Of that $4,059,395, the federal contribution amounted to $2,587,152. The final total cost of road construction in the state of Colorado for that year amounted to $17,748,285, of which the federal government contributed $10,474,600; or for each $41 advanced by the state of Colorado the United States federal government advanced $59.

In the state of Montana, the total cost of all roads for the same year was $17,404,689; federal contributions amounted to $10,568,873 or a ratio of $61 to $39. Sixty-one per cent of the cost of construction of all roads in Montana in the year ended June 30, 1948, was paid by the federal government.

In New Mexico, the total cost of all road construction in 1948 was $12,623,954; the federal contribution was $8,045,461. In that year the federal government paid to the state of New Mexico 64 per cent of the cost of the construction of all roads in that state.

In the state of Wyoming in the same year the total cost of all roads was $9,178,227; the federal contribution, $5,972,801. As its share of the cost of construction of all roads in the state of Wyoming for that year the federal government paid 65 per cent.

In the state of Arizona, in the same year, the total cost of all road construction was $8,823,178; the federal contribution was $5,824,907. In that year the federal government paid 66 per cent of the cost of all road construction in the state of Arizona.

The last state I wish to mention is Utah. In that year the total cost of primary road construction was $4,151,691 of which the federal government paid $3,038,871. The total cost of secondary highways was $2,733,167, of which the federal government paid $2,032,511. In the state of Utah for that year the total cost of all roads amounted to $6,884,858, of which the federal government paid $5,071,382. In the state of Utah within that year the federal government paid 74 per cent of the construction costs, not of one highway running across the United States, or even of a federal primary highway system, but of the main interstate highways, the secondary roads, farm-to-market roads, school bus roads and rural mail delivery roads.

I fear, Mr. Speaker, that the government's formula under which it will pay only fifty per cent of the cost is not a formula that will assure the building of the trans-Canada highway even within a seven-year period; and that formula does not take into account the needs of the various provinces, the difference in construction costs, the size of population, the area and other factors which are taken into consideration in the United States formula. I rose, Mr. Speaker, mainly to point out that the minister was incorrect this morning when he said that the pattern followed in this legislation was similar to the pattern followed in the United States. I would ask him to attempt to influence his colleagues, if he can, to bring in an adequate highway program that will meet the needs of the Canadian people, irrespective of the part of Canada in which they may reside.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure the whole country—

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Casselman: Mr. Speaker, may I point out to you that an arrangement had just been made, with the Speaker who was in the chair before you relieved him, that the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) would have the floor next.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Perhaps I should point out to the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman) that I saw on my list the name of Mr. Stuart (Charlotte) above the name of Mr. Fulton. If an arrangement has been made I shall be pleased to recognize it. Therefore, if the hon. member for Charlotte does not object too strongly, I will call upon the hon. member for Kamloops to take the floor.

Mr. Casselman: I move that in accordance with the arrangement made the hon. member for Kamloops be now heard.

Mr. Sinclair: Put the question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): I do not think there is any need for me to put the question. I think I can decide. If the whip of the Progressive Conservative party is agreeable I will decide now that the hon. member for Kamloops may speak.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Before the hon. member speaks I should like to say a word. For half an hour I have been trying to get the floor. I do believe that with a hundred and ninety Liberal members in the house and sixty or seventy opposition members a government member should be given a chance to say a few words.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Perhaps I should add to what has already been said. Before I took the chair I had seen the hon. member for Charlotte rise at least three times. As hon. members know, a certain practice is sometimes adopted for debates on second reading of a bill, whereby a list of speakers is made in advance, and the Chair usually follows that list. The only reason that I called on the hon. member for Charlotte to speak was that there was no other indication, so far as I was concerned, that any arrangement had been made. The whip of the Progressive Conservative party can see from this list that above the name of the hon. member for Kamloops there is the name of the hon. member for Charlotte.

A point of order has been raised by the hon. member for Charlotte and it will deserve consideration. When speakers' lists are made in the future I know that hon. members will co-operate with the Chair. After all, I have just taken the chair to replace my predecessor. I am sure hon. members will co-operate with the Chair in this instance. Since it has been brought to my attention that an arrangement had been made, of which I was unaware, I will call upon the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: May I refer to the point of order which has been raised? I think it would be proper to point out that the arrangement made with the Speaker while he was in the chair was that the order of speakers now being followed should be followed. In addition I might point out that since the last member of the official opposition spoke two members of the government party have spoken; therefore I do not think it can be alleged that any predominant position, even on a numerical basis, is being given to the members of the official opposition.

Speaking now to the subject matter of the bill before the house, I am certain that all the country will be glad to know that the government has now accepted the principle of federal responsibility for providing aid in the construction of a trans-Canada highway, for that acceptance is given its final form and proof in the bill which we are now considering. But at the same time I think that the country will regret the fact that this bill represents only a limited acceptance of that principle; the acceptance in this case of even the principle of providing aid to the one trans-Canada highway being limited by the features that it will be extended for only seven years and that the total amount of the aid is limited to $150 million, and for the reasons pointed out by the speaker who has just taken his seat that that amount may not be sufficient to build a first-class highway. It is also limited by the feature that no share of the cost of maintenance is to be provided by the federal government.

I also believe, Mr. Speaker, that the country will regret the fact that there has been only a limited application, or a limited acceptance of the principle which is widely accepted throughout the country, namely, that there should be federal responsibility for the joint construction and maintenance of a first-class highway system in this country. I think that is the main weakness of the bill, as is evidenced in certain particular aspects of it to which I should like to refer later.

However, as I said at the outset, I think the country will be glad that we are going as far as this bill goes, if for no other reason than that it has taken us so long to get even to the point where we are beginning.

This matter first came before the parliament of Canada in a concrete way as far back as 1912, thirty-seven years ago, when the government of Sir Robert Borden introduced a bill to provide for federal aid to the provinces for the construction and maintenance of highways. It is interesting to observe that that bill passed the house. It was accepted in principle in 1912 by all parties in the house, but it was defeated in the Senate, where, at that time, there was of course a Liberal majority. For that reason the bill did not become law. Exactly the same bill was introduced in the house again in 1913. On both of these occasions the bill was introduced by the minister of transport of the day, and it had exactly the same fate. It was accepted in principle by both parties in the house. The Liberal party, which then formed the opposition, stated explicitly that, although there were some features of the bill which they did not approve of, they did agree with the principle of the provision of federal aid to the provinces for the construction and maintenance of highways. But again the bill was defeated by the overwhelming Liberal majority in the Senate at that time. The matter fell into discard during the war years from 1914 on, and it was not until 1919 under another Conservative government that the first highway aid bill finally passed both the House of Commons and the Senate and became law, providing for a limited measure of assistance by the federal government to the provinces for the purpose of constructing roads.

At that time it did not embrace merely the contemplation of one cross-country road. It was a general provision that the federal authority should aid the provinces in improving the general standard of the highway system of the country. Then, as the house knows, considerable money was spent under the provisions of the 1919 act, and further money was spent during the depression; but again the matter fell largely into disuse during the past war. In that respect it is interesting to compare our position with that of the United States, which started in 1916 with their federal aid system, and which during the war years, instead of allowing it to fall into disuse, provided for a substantial increase in the amount of federal aid to be paid out for their highways.

In 1944 they passed a statute in which they provided that for three years there should be a very substantial increase in the amount paid by the federal government in connection with the national system of interstate highways. So we have taken from 1912 to 1949 to make a real beginning on this question of a trans-Canada road, and even now, in 1949, we are beginning well back of the point where the United States started in 1916, because in that year they laid down the basis of their federal highways system.

It is that principle upon which I submit we should be starting now, instead of on this very limited policy of providing a limited measure of aid for one trans-Canada road. There are one or two general principles I should like to suggest to the minister, because I feel that obviously he is interested in the matter and will be most anxious to see this beginning extended, and the program of which he is to be in charge expanded under a general highways system.

I would suggest first that the provision of adequate transportation in Canada is a national problem. I am sure it is scarcely necessary to develop that point beyond stating that it has been recognized as such by the initial steps taken by the federal government to provide Canada with adequate railway facilities. In those days of course highway transportation was not the chief means of transportation. However, now that it has become as important to the maintenance of our economy as has our system of railways, I feel we should extend the horizons of our thinking and take the same responsibility federally for providing adequate highway transportation as we took so many years ago to provide adequate railway transportation.

It is always to be borne in mind of course that at the present time the statutory responsibility for the construction and maintenance of highways is provincial. Therefore the second principle which it seems to me it is important to bear in mind in this connection is the necessity of working out an integrated dominion-provincial road program throughout this country. That of course is one of the chief difficulties in the evolution of any federal highways system. I think all will agree that that difficulty has been approached along sound lines in the present bill in so far as the limited scope of that bill is concerned. In it the matter of picking a route for the trans-Canada highway is to be left to the provinces, the dominion agreeing to make its contribution on a stated basis toward the construction of that route when the provinces have decided upon it.

Although a satisfactory start has been made, I should like to point out that I do not think even in that respect the bill goes as far as it should go, because the federal contribution is limited to fifty per cent of the cost of construction, and provides nothing at all for the cost of maintenance. Surely this is an unrealistic point of view. The government is prepared to invest $150 million for the construction of a first-class trans-Canada road. Is it reasonable that when that road has been completed the government should take no interest whatever in its maintenance, no interest in the protection of its investment? I do not think that is a reasonable or businesslike attitude. In my view this does not involve any lack of confidence in the willingness or anxiety of the provinces to maintain the roads themselves.

The simple fact is that we have here the achievement of a very important measure of co-operation, where provincial and federal authorities are together going to build a trans-Canada road. Surely then the same co-operation should be extended in maintaining that joint investment, preserving the investment of the two parties. I submit it is not fair to leave it to the provinces alone to bear the enormous cost of maintaining this joint investment.

This leads me to the next point I should like to discuss, which is the main weakness of the bill. That weakness all stems from the fact that the bill deals only with a specific feature of the general highways problem of the country, namely, the question of a trans-Canada road, and makes no attempt whatever to solve or even to begin to solve the general problem of providing an integrated highway system throughout the country. So that I would say the main failure of the bill is that it does not provide any basis upon which we can move forward in a systematic development of a highway system in this country.

Secondly, it fails to provide for the integration of the roads programs of the various provinces. For purposes of comparison may I here read the provisions of section 60 of the United States legislation providing for a national system of interstate highways. As has been pointed out, the first start made in the United States was a federal-aid system of highways, the basis of which has already been described. Then they gradually extended that concept of federal aid to include what is called the national system of interstate highways. Section 60 of their federal statute which deals with highways reads as follows:

> There shall be designated within the continental United States a national system of inter-state highways not exceeding forty thousand miles in total extent so located as to connect by routes, as direct as practicable, the principal metropolitan areas, cities and industrial centres, to serve the national defence, and to connect at suitable border points with routes of continental importance in the dominion of Canada and the republic of Mexico.

So that there are three features in this national system of highways: First it is to connect by as direct routes as practicable the chief metropolitan centres in the United States; secondly, it is designed to serve national defence; and, thirdly, it is to connect at suitable border points with routes in those countries bordering on the United States.

This conception of their highway system has led to that magnificent system of highways which we see and from which we benefit every time we drive in the United States; and it is that system of interstate highways which is responsible for the fact referred to by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) that the federal contribution to the total cost of highway construction is greatly in excess of the fifty per cent contemplated in our legislation.

I feel quite certain that we shall not have made any effective beginning in solving our highways problem and in meeting the requirements of an adequate road transportation system for the future development of this country until we have made a beginning along the lines of the system which has produced such magnificent results in the United States.

The third weakness which I find in the present bill stems from the same basic fault. I refer to the limitation of time during which this fund will be available, and the limitation on the total amount which will be available. Various reasons put forward this morning by the minister seem to indicate a strong possibility that the $150 million will not be sufficient to complete a first-class trans-Canada road. As he pointed out, some of the provinces may take quite a substantial proportion of the money coming to them to reimburse themselves for amounts paid out on previous road construction. Consideration must be given to the increased cost of highway construction, particularly along the rocky areas of Ontario and through the mountains of British Columbia. There are some 400 miles that would have to be traversed through the Rockies, the Selkirk, the Monashee, the Cascade and the coast ranges by any interprovincial highway in British Columbia. The increasing costs of road construction might well exhaust this fund before the objective was reached.

It may therefore be found that the funds provided are not sufficient to complete an adequate trans-Canada route and also that the time limit of seven years will not be sufficient. The government may have to come back for an extension of time or for an increase in the amount, and I hope they will not hesitate to do so if it is necessary. I assure the minister, or any other minister who may be administering this matter, that I will support such a request.

But why not avoid that likelihood? Why not lay the basis now by legislation providing for the development of an adequate system of national highways within Canada along the lines of the system in the United States? We should now lay the basis and then progressively take the necessary steps for the completion of such a system. The first step might well be the construction of a trans-Canada highway, and then other steps could be taken within the framework of the general project as provided by the legislation.

That opportunity is offered to us today and should be taken when the matter is foremost in the minds of the people. The requirements of the country indicate the necessity for such a program. I regret that a beginning has not been made in the bill before the house, but since it is better to have something than nothing at all, I shall support the bill even though I feel it is inadequate.

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, the debate has progressed favourably up to this point. Speakers representing almost every province have taken part and as a representative of Queens in Prince Edward Island I feel it my duty to make a few remarks on the bill before us. It must be most gratifying to the minister who is sponsoring this bill to find that very few, if any, hon. members are opposed to its principle; in fact, they would seem to be in accord with every particular. No doubt that is why the minister wears that $150 million smile.

I had thought that some hon. members would have had some little complaints to register, and it appears to be up to me to register one small complaint. This is more of a personal nature rather than against the trans-Canada highway bill. When a minister and his staff visit a constituency on behalf of the federal government to deal with local or provincial officials, I submit that the representative of that particular constituency should be called in to some of the conferences at least. I want to suggest that when any minister comes to our province in the future the elected representative should be called in to some of the conferences even though he may not take part in some of the fine political manoeuvring. That would be a good thing for all parties.

I am not saying that without reason because I, along with my colleague, the other hon. member for Queens (Mr. Douglas), represent Liberals, Progressive Conservatives and the C.C.F. party. For future reference I should like to place on the record a letter which I have received and which shows that I represent those interests. This is dated October 25, 1949, is addressed to myself, and reads:

Dear Mr. McLure:

Please let me first—and then on behalf of those associated with me on the staff of the Liberal Advocate, convey heartiest congratulations on your personal triumph at the polls on June 27.

Liberalism has won a great victory over the forces of reaction and socialism, so as an elected member of the twenty-first parliament, we look to you to see that the interests of the common man are maintained in a true liberal way.

You have our very best wishes, and we assure you of our services at all times to bring to your constituents your viewpoint, and any other items which might be of interest in support of the Liberal cause.

Kindest personal regards,

Yours very sincerely,

G. H. Holton

That gentleman is the managing editor of the Liberal Advocate, established in 1936 and which is published in the interests of the Liberal party. The address is 28-30 Wellington Street West, Toronto 2. There is a postscript to that letter, and like the postscript to a woman's letter it seems to be the most important part. It reads:

We are anxious to have this publication go into as many homes as possible. So if you would appoint one or more representatives in your riding, we are prepared to offer a generous contract.

Having read that letter, I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

AGRICULTURAL SURPLUSES—GOVERNMENT POLICY WITH RESPECT TO MARKETING

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I have a matter of some urgency that I should like to raise at this time. In his reply to me this morning with respect to FAO policy, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was not prepared to make a statement on the marketing situation with respect to agricultural products. In view of the minister's attendance at the FAO conference, which will continue this week, I feel that it would certainly be in order to have a discussion in this house in relation to the policy of the government with respect to the marketing of farm products.

I believe there is a serious and growing surplus of many agricultural commodities in this country. I believe further that we should have a discussion in this house, during which the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) should make clear to us the policy of the government in relation to future markets for our agricultural commodities.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member can bring this matter forward at this time. In any case the Minister of Agriculture is not in his seat, so I do not see what the discussion will get the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Of course it is not necessary that the Minister of Agriculture should be in his seat. If the matter the hon. member wishes to discuss relates to any item in the estimates it would not be in order, but if it does not relate to an item it appears to me that he would be in order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): At the beginning of the session the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture were before the house. Items 23 to 29 dealt with marketing services, and those items were debated for almost an entire day. So I believe the subject is closed, since those items were carried by the committee. I think the hon. gentleman is not in order now in discussing this subject, which has been debated by the house already.

Mr. Wright: The items dealing with marketing services have been adopted; but since their adoption the Minister of Agriculture has attended a very importance conference in Washington having to do with the disposition of surplus agricultural products. So I believe the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) is in order in raising this grievance on going into supply this evening. It is the privilege of any hon. member to bring up any grievance he may have on the motion to go into supply.

Mr. St. Laurent: Perhaps it may not be necessary to have a ruling as to whether or not the discussion is in order. On Friday I announced, and it seemed to be unanimously accepted by the house, that this evening we would move to go into committee of supply and would call item No. 92, dealing with the wartime prices and trade board, so that there could be a discussion of the matter of rent controls. All hon. members seemed to agree that this should be done; and I would ask the hon. gentleman if he would not permit that arrangement to be carried out at this time, reserving the discussion—if there can be a discussion within the rules of the house—on the attendance of the Minister of Agriculture at the FAO conference until another time. Of course if the discussion is in order it would be strictly within the right of the hon. member to continue it now, but when the announcement was made on Friday evening it seemed to be the unanimous view of those hon. members who were in the house that this evening we might deal with the other matter. So I would hope that the hon. member would allow that arrangement to be carried out.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not think the government is in a very good position in suggesting that this was arranged last Friday evening. A few weeks ago the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) moved the adjournment of the house in order to discuss a certain matter of urgent public importance, and on Your Honour's ruling the motion was denied because there would be an opportunity to bring up the matter on going into supply that day. When the amendment to the supply motion was voted on the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) spoke to another question, namely the combines investigation of the flour milling industry. There is an item in the estimates under which the combines investigation branch could be discussed. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce was in order at that time I am quite sure this is in order now.

Mr. Argue: If I may reply to the Prime Minister's suggestion, I know the house is anxious to debate the matter of rent control, but I certainly would not anticipate that the matter I propose to raise would be discussed all evening. I do point out that it is a time-honoured right of any member of parliament to rise on the motion to go into supply and voice any grievance he may have. My grievance has to do with the problem that is developing in connection with the marketing of agricultural surpluses.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is not going on with his discussion at this time it will not be necessary to give a ruling; but in any event I am not ruling that the discussion would be in order. I refer hon. members to Beauchesne, third edition, citation 467, which states that the discussion shall not relate to any decision of the house during the current session or to any item in the estimates. It has been pointed out that the items dealing with marketing services were carried, but I would refer hon. members to the further supplementary estimates, where there are a number of items under that heading. Accordingly, if this discussion does relate to an item in the estimates, I doubt if it would be in order at this time. It may not be necessary to give a ruling, however. Shall I put the motion?

Mr. Argue: I want to make my statement at this time, and unless you rule me out of order I shall proceed with it. I point out that there is no item in the estimates covering this whole question.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me the items dealing with marketing services do cover the question the hon. member is raising at this time. The purpose of the rule is that discussions on the items in the estimates shall not take place in the house. I believe there will be full opportunity for the hon. member to discuss this item very shortly on the estimates, so I would rule that he is out of order in discussing it at this time.

Mr. Argue: Then I appeal your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

A point of order having arisen as to whether a discussion relating to the agricultural marketing service was in order on the motion of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) to go into supply, I ruled that the discussion was out of order in that it related to an item in the further supplementary estimates. From this ruling the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and others have appealed.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Demobilization and reconversion—wartime prices and trade board—

92. Administration, $2,986,825.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): First, Mr. Chairman, may I thank the Prime Minister for affording the house this opportunity to discuss order in council P.C. 5840, which provides for the submission to the Supreme Court of Canada of a certain question in regard to the right of the federal authority to legislate by order in council or under regulations of the wartime prices and trade board under the emergency powers, to which reference has been made on a number of occasions. It was because there was such an agreement that we voted as we did a few moments ago. That arrangement having been made, apparently with the unanimous consent of the house, we endorsed it.

I should like to refer for a moment to this order in council. It is a long one, containing seven and a half pages. It consists in large part of a chronological statement setting forth the successive stages in emergency power legislation since 1945. In part it incorporates the speech made in the house on November 3, 1949, by the Minister of Finance, and it ends with the question that is submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada. That question is to be found on page 8, and reads as follows:

> Are the wartime leasehold regulations ultra vires either in whole or in part and if so in what particulars or to what extent?

To begin with I submit, sir, that that question does not meet the situation at all. The succeeding paragraph reads as follows:

> Therefore His Excellency the Governor General in Council, under and by virtue of the authority conferred by section 55 of the Supreme Court Act, is pleased to refer and doth hereby refer the following question to the Supreme Court of Canada for hearing and consideration.

I will not now go on to discuss what has been done nor the allowances that were given by the Minister of Finance to increase rentals on and after the 15th of December. At the moment I will consider exclusively what this order in council means, although I am fully aware of the feelings of many hundreds of thousands of the people of this country who today fear what will happen to them with the approach of the Christmas season. I do not propose for the present to deal with the hardships and the suffering that will ensue.

What I asked for the other day was an opportunity to discuss this order in council and the submission to the Supreme Court of Canada. I believe this is the first time since I have been in the house that an opportunity has been given by the government to discuss an order in council with a view to making suggestions relative to an amendment to it. I am not going into the authorities. They were all summed up recently in a case well known to the Minister of Justice—it was heard in his own province—and generally to all members of the bar. I refer to the case of the Canadian Wheat Board and the Manitoba Pool Elevators, as reported in 1949, 2, Dominion Law Reports, at page 537. Summarizing that case in the words of Mr. Justice Adamson, this is what he said:

> What then is the nature of the "danger," the "peril," or the "emergency" necessary to give jurisdiction to enact such legislation?

By "legislation" he means legislation by the dominion parliament, or under order in council, that results in invading property and civil rights. Then follow these significant words:

> And what evidence of it is there? An emergency may be public or private. A public emergency may be local or provincial. What is necessary to justify such legislation is a national economic emergency of such dimensions as to imperil the nation, and one which would be judicially recognized in the same way as a state of war is judicially recognized.

My first point is that this order in council will be the entire reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. From beginning to end it contains not one word setting forth the facts upon which the dominion government and its counsel will rely in regard to the extent of the emergency. Having regard to the authorities, that immediately opens the door to a serious danger, in the absence of evidence to establish an emergency, by the declaration that the legislation is in fact ultra vires, and the rental orders in council will end.

I ask the government this question through the Minister of Justice. Why was this order in council worded in such general terms? Why was it not supported by evidence setting forth the necessity of such legislation or a justification for it as emergency legislation? Certainly it was not a lack of space, because the speech of the Minister of Finance on November 3 is incorporated in it. Nowhere is there anything placed before the court that sets forth the vital facts that are fundamental, namely, that there is a continuing emergency, and furthermore that that emergency will be in existence on March 31, 1950. If it is not certain that this legislation is lawful now, would it be lawful after that date? Nowhere is there any suggestion of an emergency or a continuing emergency. It must be a matter of knowledge to all hon. members in every part of the house that across this country several hundred thousand Canadians regard this situation with trepidation and fear. That there is any agreement among hon. members that there is an emergency is rather denied by the fact that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, when speaking on March 28, 1949, as reported in the Globe and Mail of March 29 and in the Montreal Gazette of the same day, to a delegation regarding the general question of housing and rental, said:

> Housing was primarily a matter for the provinces except in the case of a national emergency and while the government believes there was still a great need for houses the need would not constitute an emergency.

That statement was made some four or five months ago. The declaration by a minister of the crown, as it is worded at the present time, sir, and without supporting evidence, if one were of a suspicious turn of mind, which I am not, would lead one to think that it had been deliberately worded in that way and unsupported by anything to suggest an emergency.

The next question I should like to ask is, why the indirect wording? Why not a direct wording setting out that it is being supported by evidence to justify an emergency? There is something more. When it is submitted to the supreme court how long will it be delayed before the people as a whole will know whether or not this legislation is within the power of parliament to enact by order in council? A few weeks ago we were asked in parliament to rush along the legislation making the Supreme Court of Canada the final court of appeal. The Supreme Court of Canada will not be the final court of appeal in this matter for the following reasons. The submission has already been made. I again read the second to last and operative paragraph:

> Therefore His Excellency the Governor General in Council, under and by virtue of the authority conferred by section 55 of the Supreme Court Act—

And that is the section which provides for submissions—

> —is pleased to refer and doth hereby refer the following question to the Supreme Court of Canada for hearing and consideration.

We passed the Supreme Court Act. One of the sections provides for the supreme court being the final court, and that section—the new section 54—has been passed by the Senate. Why has not royal assent been given to that act? There would be no difficulty about that. All you have to do is to bring down the deputy to His Excellency the Governor General.

Section 7 says:

> Notwithstanding anything in section 3 of this act, an appeal from or in respect of a judgment pronounced in
>
> (a) a judicial proceeding that was commenced prior to the coming into force of this act, or
> (b) a reference made by the governor in council or by the lieutenant-governor in council of a province prior to the coming into force of this act, lies or may be brought as if that section had not been enacted.

In other words, this order in council dated November 16 provides for submission to the supreme court. The Supreme Court Act could have been assented to and brought into effect by proclamation. Then this would have been final—the first case of the Supreme Court of Canada.

That, we thought, was the idea. Indeed, one member of the press gallery in an article dated November 4, 1949—I refer to Mr. J. A. Hume—said in part:

> The government plans early proclamation of legislation abolishing appeals to the judicial committee of the privy council in London, as just approved by the House of Commons and Senate.
> Such action will mean that the proposed supreme court reference on the constitutionality of continuance by parliament of domestic rental controls beyond their expiry date on March 31 next would be submitted to the court here for its final judgment.

Why was not the Supreme Court Act assented to?

The result now is this, that no matter what the supreme court decides, and it will not be sitting I should think before the middle of January or early in February—because it will not be until December 1 when there will be a submission to the court for direction—the supreme court will meet and, we will suppose, hand down its answer. Perhaps it will say that it is within the legislative competence of parliament to extend rental controls. Well, then, any of the provinces can appeal, and you have uncertainty which will go on for a year or more—uncertainty, procrastination and postponement.

That, in my opinion, seems to be the reason that the order in council is drawn as it is. And one can imagine the uncertainty which will continue. Today fear stalks everywhere in our country, because of what was done on November 3. And now that fear is being accentuated by the uncertainty which will follow for a period of eight or ten months before the matter is finally decided in the privy council.

I ask the government this: Why were they so anxious and why did they act with such acceleration to have the Supreme Court Act amended in order to make it the final court, if the very first thing that comes up to be submitted to that court, one of the most important things to come before the court, is to be brought before it and then has to go on to the privy council in the event of appeal?

Surely it was not by inadvertence that that condition arose. I do not know of any member who was ever aware of the fact, until it came out by the veriest chance, that the order in council had been passed on November 16. I know it was not tabled in parliament. And you will remember that when the Minister of Finance made his speech on November 3, he said this:

> The order in council making the reference is being prepared and when approved will be tabled in the house.

It was approved on November 16. I believe it was last Friday that I asked a question about this order in council, and whether it would be tabled. It was tabled the next day.

Sir, is there any reason why the uncertainty and confusion should be continued, with the delay and chaos which will result? We have made the Supreme Court of Canada the final court. The government was in a terrible rush to have that effected. Would it not be possible to give to the Supreme Court of Canada, of itself, the last say? Why carry a case such as this over to the Old Country, to the privy council.

When we on this side of the house suggested that on constitutional matters appeals to the privy council should be retained the answer was, "We must be supreme in this land. Let us have our autonomy. We are an independent nation". Yet the very first thing that comes up, one of the most important matters that could be submitted to any court, leaves open the door to appeal to the privy council, with the result that this uncertainty, this chaotic condition that today exists, when one does not know for certain whether the dominion or the provinces have jurisdiction, will be continued almost indefinitely.

I suggest that another order in council should take the place of this one. If the government wants finality in this matter there should be another order in council setting out in detail the nature and the particulars of the emergency upon which the court should determine whether in fact there is an emergency. For in the last statute passed by parliament carrying on the rental controls until March 31, 1950, there is no mention of emergency in that preamble, as I read it.

Let us have royal assent to this Supreme Court Act. Then submit it to the court, and have finality, instead of having hanging over the heads of hundreds of thousands of Canadians a fear today that I doubt has been equalled at any time in the homes of the people in this dominion.

I do not know what hon. members on the government side find, but wherever I go people say to me, "We do not mind paying some increase, but allowing for the increase provided for has brought fear to us".

That being so let us know now, once and for all, exactly what powers are arising out of the war and in consequence of emergencies arising from the war. And, in addition, I think there might be incorporated, in addition to redrafting the question to the supreme court, which is worded in such a way that it looks as if the cart is placed before the horse —"Are the wartime leasehold regulations ultra vires either in whole or in part, and if so in what particulars and to what extent"? —a rephrasing, stating, "Are they ultra vires, and if not in what particulars?"

The wording, I think, would almost indicate a suggestion that some of them were ultra vires. Further, I think the point raised by the premier of Saskatchewan in his letter of November 16 might also find its way into that order in council, namely:

> I would strongly urge your government to include in that reference a question that will settle this issue of power in yourself or the governor in council to confer legislative jurisdiction on a province by executive action designed to turn rent control over to that province.

What I have advanced in this connection has been done for one purpose, to have finality brought to this matter. Over the last two years some of the inferior courts have held that this type of legislation is beyond the powers of parliament or beyond the powers of the executive, of the governor in council under order in council. Let us bring finality to this matter which is of importance to what I imagine is the majority of people in this country. Let us not, as a result of the possibility of there being a further appeal to the privy council, leave hanging over them the uncertainty that will follow for another five, six or eight months.

Those are my suggestions. I thank the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for the opportunity afforded to hon. members to place their views before the committee and to attempt to bring this matter into clear perspective. This is the first time that we have had a chance to discuss an order in council as is done in the British House of Commons. I think this represents additional evidence of the fact that we are returning to the democratic principles that prevailed before the war and which during the war were not followed at all times because of the necessity of concentrating power in the government during that period.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Chairman, may I join with the hon. member for Lake Centre in urging the government to review its order in council and make the reference to the supreme court, not only more specific but on somewhat broader lines. This is a matter of great importance to the Canadian people. Thousands of men and women across this country are anxious because of the drastic increases in rent that are permissible under the policy announced by the Minister of Finance on November 3. In common with other hon. members I have had a number of communications from people from one end of this country to the other, some in the city of Ottawa and some as far away as Vancouver and Halifax. All these communications inform me, as I am sure other hon. members have been informed, of the difficult circumstances in which they will be placed when these drastic increases are permitted to come into effect.

On November 3 the Minister of Finance evidently expected that rentals on a higher scale would go into effect and would remain in effect for a considerable time. I should like to quote from page 1434 of Hansard of November 3, 1949, where the Minister of Finance is reported to have said:

> Nevertheless, it seems probable that rentals might well settle eventually at a level substantially above the present maximum levels provided in our regulations. Sooner or later the adjustment must be made, and as I have said, it is our policy to permit this adjustment to be made gradually rather than abruptly.

I do not know what is the minister's definition of "gradually", but if increases of from 18 to 22 per cent are gradual increases, then my interpretation of that word is somewhat different from that of the Minister of Finance.

With regard to the order in council, I rise mainly to suggest that the proposal made to the government in the letter of the premier of Saskatchewan should be given serious consideration and the reference which he suggests should be included in the reference to the supreme court. If we are making a reference we may as well have all doubts cleared up at the same time. I have made some inquiries and I find that not only the legal advisers of the government of Saskatchewan but other lawyers seem to believe that the doubt expressed is well founded.

The question whether we have power to confer legislative jurisdiction on one province or on any number less than all should be referred to the supreme court. I am not a lawyer and I do not profess to be able to disentangle all the legal matters in connection with a constitutional problem of this kind. I know the minister may say that there does not appear to be any doubt as to the ability of the government to do this; but if there is doubt the question should be placed before the supreme court so that it can be decided beyond any uncertainty.

No province undertaking rent control within the province should be subjected to the risk of its legislation being declared ultra vires because one or less than all the provinces have been granted the right to pass rent control legislation by order in council and not by specific legislative action of this parliament.

The present situation is that this parliament has passed legislation which removes rent control from the provinces, a position which the premier of Quebec has been challenging ever since it was done. Rent control was placed in the hands of the federal authorities and taken out of the hands of the provinces. At the present time the legislation is applicable to all the provinces.

Mr. Abbott: Except Newfoundland.

Mr. Coldwell: Except Newfoundland. I was thinking of the provinces as they existed when the legislation was passed. The legislation affected all the provinces that were provinces when it was adopted. Of course this parliament always has the right to amend its own legislation and by legislation to exclude any one province or any number of provinces from the regulations made under a statute which it has adopted.

But the question is this: Has the cabinet, the governor in council, the right to override a statute and exclude one province without having legislative authority from this parliament to make such exclusion, such distinction or such variation? I should like the minister when he replies to point out whether he considers that, under that part of our legislation giving authority for rent control, under legislation adopted by this parliament, the right to exclude one province is conferred upon the governor in council.

The point is that while the governor in council can make rental regulations inoperative in a single province, does that also give the right to the provinces to enter the field by provincial legislation when federal legislation exists claiming, rightly or wrongly, overall jurisdiction in this particular field? As I have said already, I have been advised by some legal men whose opinions I respect that there are some doubts with regard to the granting of authority by the governor in council without amending the legislation under which the governor in council proposes to act. It seems to me, then, that if there is any shadow of doubt in this connection the point should be referred to the supreme court for a ruling, or on the other hand that the federal government should ask this parliament to amend our legislation to meet the needs of one or more provinces which desire to exercise rent control provincially.

It may be possible by order in council to vacate the field of rent control on a nation-wide basis and thus by implication confer jurisdiction on all the provinces at once. That, however, seems quite different from the present proposal to confer jurisdiction on one province while jurisdiction under the statute is retained by the federal government in respect to all the other provinces. In order to avoid confusion and perhaps new difficulties or hardships the point should be referred to the supreme court for an opinion. I take it no single province wants to be placed in the position, after having made arrangements to institute rent control, after having passed the necessary legislation in that regard, of running any risk whatsoever of having that legislation upset at any time in the future.

I want to say one other thing to the minister. He has stated that in order to give any province—and Saskatchewan already has requested it—time for its legislature to pass the necessary legislation, the action of the federal government in removing or varying rent control in that province will be deferred until and including March 31 next. I suggest to the minister that having given that assurance to one province and having invited other provinces to come under the same arrangement, if they wish to do so, he should give all the provinces an opportunity to call their legislatures, and should defer the effect of the announcement he made until at least, and including, March 31 next. If this were done the provincial legislatures, which are usually called after Christmas, could meet and consider the situation and advise their governments accordingly.

This is one of the most serious steps in decontrol to be undertaken by the government since the war ended, and I do not think there is a single member of this house who does not realize that many thousands of people are going to be gravely affected. As I said, I have received a very large number of letters; in fact I do not think I have ever received more letters on any subject than on this matter of rent control. I have before me one that I am going to read in part, just to give the house an indication of the way some people fear they are going to be affected by this decontrol measure. This letter is from the father of a large family, who wishes me to withhold his name. I am under no obligation to table the document and do not intend to do so, of course. But may I comment that I frequently get letters of this description pointing out the difficulties under which Canadian men and women are working, and quite often I get the same request: "Please do not mention my name, because if it were known that I had written to you on this matter I would lose my job." That is stated in this letter. When we talk of the four freedoms, when we talk of the democracy and freedom in this country, I say it is a blot upon our democracy and freedom that so many men and women fear, rightly or wrongly, that they will be penalized for expressing an opinion which they hold.

Mr. Sinclair: If the hon. member would permit one question in this very connection, if he feels that way why has the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre a question on the order paper asking the Minister of Finance to give the names of all persons who have written him on this very subject?

Mr. Coldwell: The purpose of the question asked of the Minister of Finance by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is to obtain the names of corporations, of governments and others—

Mr. Sinclair: And of persons.

Mr. Abbott: Individuals.

Mr. Coldwell: —who have written to the minister. But when we ask for the tabling of communications the minister always says he will table them when he has consent of the government concerned, if it is an intergovernmental communication.

Mr. Abbott: I can tell my hon. friend that no governments and no corporations have written to me on this subject.

Mr. Coldwell: Neither the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre nor I, nor indeed any member of this house, I believe, would ask or expect the Minister of Finance or any other minister to table a letter he was specifically requested to keep confidential because of the danger to the individual concerned.

Mr. St. Laurent: Neither would he venture to read it in the house if he were not prepared to vouch for the person who wrote it.

Mr. Coldwell: Just a moment; I want to say this. Under the rules of this house an hon. member who reads a document here vouches for it. That is all that is required. I am vouching for this document, and that is all that is necessary. That is the proper procedure, for if that were not so a member of parliament might jeopardize many individuals in this country whose communications to him should be placed before this house in the language of the writers. I do not propose to be intimidated in my intention to read part of this document tonight.

Mr. St. Laurent: If the hon. member tells us he has a communication from someone whose name he will not disclose, and that he will not table the document, I object to its being read. It is not in order to come here and ask for the attention of the house in order to express the opinion of someone who will not even be identified. If the hon. member wishes to make the opinions expressed in the letter his own, he may do so, because we know who he is and we know what importance should be attached to the opinion he expresses. We do not know what importance should be attached to the opinion of an unknown person, who wishes to remain unknown.

Mr. Coldwell: I have always tried to abide by the rules of the house, and I intend to abide by the rules of the house in spite of the lecture I have received from the Prime Minister.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not lecturing the member, I am raising a point of order.

Mr. Coldwell: Those who have been here as long as the Prime Minister and I will know that I do not put spurious documents before the house.

Mr. St. Laurent: I know that.

Mr. Coldwell: I stand behind anything I say because I believe it. I am going to read citation 316 of Beauchesne, second edition:

It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the table of the house, if it can be done without injury to the public interest. The same rule, however, cannot be held to apply to private letters or memoranda. On the 18th May, 1865, the attorney general, on being asked by Mr. Ferrard if he would lay upon the table a written statement and a letter to which he had referred on a previous day, in assuming a question relative to the Leeds bankruptcy court, replied that he had made a statement to the house upon his own responsibility, and that the documents he had referred to being private, he could not lay them upon the table. Lord Robert Cecil contended that the papers, having been cited, should be produced; but the Speaker declared that this rule applied to public documents only.

That citation is taken from May, thirteenth edition, page 329.

Mr. St. Laurent: Will the hon. member look at citation 306. The citation to which the hon. member has referred deals with a request on the following day for the production of something that had been alluded to, evidently without objection, the previous day. The decision was that it did not have to be tabled. What I am objecting to is the reading in this house of something we are told will not be tabled, because a person does not wish his identity to be known. I rely upon citation 306.

It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I have read that citation a good many times. I am going to say to the Prime Minister that the document I have before me does none of those things that are forbidden. It does not comment upon or deny anything said by a member, or express any opinion reflecting upon the proceedings within the house. All it does is to put before the house the case of an individual who is being victimized by the drastic increase in rentals permitted by the announcement of the Minister of Finance on November 3.

Mr. Sinclair: I should like to return to the original point of order I raised. The member for Rosetown-Biggar has not said why he refuses to give the name of the person writing this letter while, at the same time, he supports the demand of his colleague that the Minister of Finance give the names of the people who have written to the minister, both for and against the increases in rentals.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I should like to quote citation 265 in Beauchesne, third edition. It says:

It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

If one reads the next three succeeding citations, one finds it is out of order to read a letter that one is not prepared to vouch for during any debate. I do not know what objection the member for Rosetown-Biggar has to filing the letter upon which he is relying as authority. He has done that before in this house.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I appreciate the help the hon. member for Yorkton has given, but I would point out to him that citation 265 in Beauchesne, third edition, is citation 306 in Beauchesne, second edition, which was quoted a moment ago by the Prime Minister. It seems to me that the member for Coast-Capilano has put a question to the member for Rosetown-Biggar instead of raising a point of order. He asked a question of the hon. member, so his point of order was not a point of order.

Mr. Sinclair: My question was not answered.

The Deputy Chairman: That is a matter for the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to decide.

Mr. Coldwell: What is your ruling on this question, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: I should like to quote citation 280 from Beauchesne, third edition.

The point of order, that a member should lay on the table a document which he quotes, should be taken when reference is made to the document.

So far the hon. member has made reference to a document, but has not said very much about it. Some hon. members seem to know more about the document than the chairman does. The member for Rosetown-Biggar has a document in his hand, but as yet he has not quoted anything from it.

According to what has been said and under citation 306 of the second edition of Beauchesne, I think that the point of order raised by the Prime Minister is well taken. If an hon. member quotes from a letter he should disclose its source. See Beauchesne, third edition, citation 270. Unless he desires to take the words and make them his own, he should, I think, disclose the source or table the letter. That is my ruling.

Mr. Coldwell: During the fourteen years I have been here, Mr. Chairman, members have quoted from letters. In my recollection, this is the first time this interpretation has been placed upon either the citations or the rules. I have known of no hon. member who has been made to table the document.

Some years ago, I remember, the hon. member for North Battleford quoted from a letter at great length. She laid it upon the table and the Speaker ruled that this was not a document for the house, so it was returned to her. I remember distinctly that she was told she need not have placed it on the table. I am not going to insist on this matter tonight.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, before you dispose of this question, there is one point I should like to raise, because I believe there is one angle to the question which may have been overlooked.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. leader of the opposition referring to the point of order upon which I have ruled? My ruling is not debatable. The hon. member may appeal if he so desires.

Mr. Drew: It may not be debatable, but if you would permit me to point out something, it may avoid a ruling which may cause some embarrassment. The rule to which reference has been made refers to any opinion reflecting on proceedings in the house. I believe that is the part which governs. Obviously, this letter refers to action that was taken in regard to rent control, and that was a proceeding by order in council, not a proceeding in the house. Consequently, I submit it is not governed by this rule.

Mr. Coldwell: I am not going to prolong this discussion on the point of order. I wish to say that there was absolutely no reflection on any procedure in this house in the document I was going to read. All I intended to do was to place before the house an example of the hardship that is caused the father of a large family, and the manner in which the food for that family would have to be reduced. The man, a veteran of two world wars, a man who has served his country well, today has not the opportunity either of feeding and clothing his family properly or of housing them as they should be housed; and that is a condition which is widespread across the country at this present time. All I am going to say now is that I hope that one day this matter will come up when the Speaker is in the chair; at that time I can assure you that such a ruling will be further discussed.

I want to close my remarks now by making the plea that I made with regard to the expansion of the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada, in order that there may be no doubt. Since the Minister of Finance has extended to April 1 the time for a province which will assume rent control as of its own power and of itself, I make the plea that that be done in order to give all the provinces of Canada and all the legislatures an opportunity of discussing this question. I want to say to hon. members that with the increase in the cost of living and the possible drastic increases in rentals, many a humble family in this country will not spend a very merry Christmas.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): While this discussion was opened up on going into supply, Mr. Chairman, I think it must be remembered that the only matter now before us to discuss, and which can apparently be acted upon, is the reference by the government of an issue to the Supreme Court of Canada. But from the remarks that have already been made it would appear that the Prime Minister opened up this subject with the idea of affording an opportunity to discuss the issues to which this order in council relates.

The hon. member for Lake Centre has pointed out the obvious limitations in the wording of the terms of reference. In the copy of the order in council which I have before me, and which runs to eight pages, the actual terms of reference are found only at the last part of page 7 and the beginning of page 8, everything before that being a recital. The real issue that is referred to the Supreme Court of Canada is contained in less than four lines in the question: Are the wartime leasehold regulations ultra vires either in whole or in part and, if so, in what particulars or to what extent?

Since we did not have an opportunity to discuss the recent changes at the time they were announced in the House of Commons, I think that on this occasion, in seeking to impress upon the government the necessity for a different type of reference, we should also point out exactly what has occurred and why the reference should be in different and wider terms. It will be recalled, particularly by those hon. members who sat in the house in the last parliament, that this subject was under discussion in March last; and on March 22, the act which has been described as the omnibus act was before the house.

It should be recalled by all the hon. members who are considering this subject at the present time that we are not discussing a rent control bill and that we are not discussing any specific piece of legislation dealing specially with rents. We are dealing with one of the continuing powers carried forward from the war under the Transitional Measures Act which was discussed by parliament last March. That bill carried forward emergency powers over rents, prices, steel, lumber, wood supplies generally and over a number of other things. That act had the effect of continuing for another year the sweeping emergency powers under which the government, by order in council, could deal with these subjects that were mentioned in that Transitional Measures Act. At that time, with other members of the house, I pointed out the difficulties that would arise unless there were introduced a bill dealing in clear and explicit terms with the problem of rent control. I would quote only briefly, to indicate the nature of the discussion which took place, from page 1767 of Hansard of March 22 last. This is from what I said at that time:

> In many ways this rent control measure by government dictate is adding to the difficulties and preventing the building of satisfactory rental housing. We have urged over and over again that a rent control bill be introduced which will give tenants defined and assured legal rights and at the same time encourage the building of housing and apartments for rental purposes.

That is the parliamentary way to deal with this subject. That, Mr. Chairman, was the view that we expressed at that time. We asked that a bill, which could become the law of this parliament, be introduced, clearly defining the rights of tenants and the rights of landlords, letting each know exactly where he stood under enforceable laws. It will be recalled by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that, along with other members of the House of Commons, I pointed out at that time that we were being asked to continue these sweeping emergency powers without any attempt being made by the government to define what the emergency actually was.

Then there is another point which the members who were sitting in the house at that time will recall. A judgment referring to one of these emergency measures had just been given by the appellate court of Manitoba. At that time the Minister of Justice went to some pains to point out that this high court of parliament is in a position to declare whether there is or is not an emergency of the nature that would support action of this kind; and that very point was, in fact, discussed in the judgment given by the appellate court of Manitoba and to which I have referred. I mention that for this reason. It should be recalled that last March, when this general omnibus bill was before the house embracing not only rent control but all these other emergency measures, we pointed out that if the house were prepared to pass legislation then tenants and landlords should sit down with a law which clearly stated their rights, and they would know where they were for a definite period; but that the continuing of this list of indefinite emergency powers would only create the very type of confusion that has arisen.

In spite of the arguments we put forward at that time this parliament was asked by the government to declare that there was an emergency, because it was necessary to declare that in effect if this sweeping bill was to be passed, and that decision was made.

It seems a strange thing at this time, Mr. Chairman, to come forward and say: We are going to ask the Supreme Court of Canada if there is or is not an emergency of the nature that would support the rental measures, but we are not going to say anything at all about the rest of the emergency measures that are carried forward in the same legislation. If there is an emergency that supports the continuance of these measures, then that same emergency must support the continuance of the other measures, and the same is true in reverse.

It seems to me that if a question is going to be asked of the Supreme Court of Canada it should be as to whether the bill that became law last spring to continue these emergency powers was in fact intra vires of the parliament of Canada. The question that is asked in this instance might not relate to the effectiveness of the legislation at all, but simply to the question whether the particular regulations passed by the government were or were not ultra vires of this parliament, and we might be left in the very confusing position of having a decision by the Supreme Court of Canada on something that still would not tell us whether the government has the power to deal with this particular subject under the amendments to the Transitional Measures Act which became law last spring.

We must remember as well what took place between the time of the passing of the law and the time that these new regulations came into effect. I grant that certain statements are made from time to time in public speeches that may not be made with the same consideration that would be given to statements in the house; but nevertheless they are undertakings so explicit that they cannot be misunderstood. The present Minister of Finance said in Montreal on June 23, and I quote now the parts that are in quotation marks in the report carried by the Canadian press of that day: "In the future as in the past the Liberal government will see that the rights of both tenants and home owners are protected." Other speeches of the same kind were made, and undoubtedly the assumption was that the rights, as established last spring, were to continue in that way. It will be recalled that on November 3, at a quarter to eleven, the Minister of Finance asked the house for unanimous consent to make a statement, without giving any indication of the nature of the announcement he was going to make, and I gathered from—

Mr. Abbott: I said it had to do with rent control.

Mr. Drew: At the time, yes, but nothing was said as to what the details were or as to whether it was to be an abandonment of rent control.

Mr. Abbott: If the leader of the opposition is making a point of it, unanimous consent could have been refused.

Mr. Drew: Of course, as far as that is concerned, one will realize the difficulties that the members were under, and not only the members of the opposition, for one of his fellow members from Montreal only the night before had assured a public meeting that there would be no change in the rent control measures of this beneficent government. Therefore I think one might fairly assume that the announcement that was made on that Monday night was as much a surprise to the supporters of the government as it was to the members of the opposition, and it was of course a complete surprise to everyone that these sweeping changes were to be made. I am sure it must have been a surprise to the hon. member for the Mount Royal division who had felt so confident the night before that the changes were not going to be made.

Mr. Macnaughton: I should like to make a correction. I did not say that the rates would be the same. I simply indicated that I believed the government would probably continue rent controls, which is entirely different.

Mr. Fraser: Trying to mislead the public.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Drew: I am not suggesting that the hon. member for the Mount Royal division in any way attempted to mislead the public. He was answering certain questions at a public meeting in Montreal.

Mr. Macnaughton: At a private meeting.

Mr. Drew: It was not so private as not to be fully reported by the Montreal Star on the following day. I was not at that private meeting. I am merely reading from the report in the Montreal Star. If it was not a surprise to the hon. member for the Mount Royal division, then of course he can inform us; but I gather from the nature of the statement that was made at that meeting that the announcement of the minister on November 3 was a surprise to him as it was to us. But I would point out that the statement of the Minister of Finance did not come at that time with any opportunity to debate the wisdom or otherwise of those particular measures. I do suggest that the government by opening up this discussion tonight is apparently willing to reconsider the nature of the reference which should be made to the Supreme Court of Canada. I would also urge that the government reconsider the order in council which was announced in this house on the night of November 3.

It will be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that the announcement made that night has already been changed in many respects. There have been numerous clarifications. The word "clarification" is the official description of the changes which have taken place.

Mr. Abbott: In the first place there was no order in council, but I suppose that is a detail.

Mr. Drew: I stand corrected. It was even worse. It was an order of the wartime prices and trade board which was announced by the government.

Mr. Abbott: If my hon. friend wants to be correct, it was an amendment to the rental regulations, in the same way it has been made ever since the rental regulations were put into effect in 1941.

Mr. Drew: Yes, and the very way they were put into effect last spring when we pointed out the kind of confusion that would result from the continuance of that practice. I am pleased to have been reminded that this is not an order in council, that it is simply a decision by officials appointed by the government—

Mr. Abbott: A decision of the government implemented by an amendment to the regulation.

Mr. Drew: An implementation of an amendment to the regulations but announced by the minister in this house.

Mr. Abbott: And announced in the house before the regulations were amended.

Mr. Drew: Yes—at least the execution was not carried out before it was announced. There was at least that measure of correctness in the procedure.

Now, so far as those regulations are concerned, no matter what involved procedure may be taken, the government will not question its responsibility for them. The minister announced them in the house; and in doing so he took the responsibility of informing the people of Canada what would occur.

No sooner had those regulations been announced than there was objection right across Canada. And no sooner was that objection made manifest than these clarifications began to appear. And they have greatly changed the effect of the regulations. Many of the landlords who thought they were going to do certain things were disappointed when they found that these advances related back to a figure some years ago; and many of the tenants were only slightly more satisfied when they found what the net result of the arithmetic really was.

What actually did occur however was that these very substantial increases were permitted at a time in the year when it would be most difficult to make any adjustments, where any tenant wanted to find other accommodation. It came at a time of the year when this would be most difficult. Perhaps it was too much to expect that this could have been announced last spring when the transitional measures bill became law. That would have been the proper time to have made the announcement, a time when people are changing their tenancies; and the new tenancies could have been related to these very substantial changes.

It is still some time before these new regulations come into effect. Either the government is in doubt about its powers, or it is not. It did not indicate any doubt last spring. In fact it suggested that those who raised any doubt were raising specious objections to this measure that was before the house. If the government is in any doubt about its powers, then it should not make these changes at this time, or permit them to be made. If the government want to deal with this in an effective way, and do in fact want to find out what the position of the provincial governments will be in regard to it, then let them invite the provincial governments to come together and discuss with them this whole situation. But let them defer any action until after that is done.

Now do not let me hear the ridiculous suggestion that the dominion government proposed that the provinces take this over. A letter was written to the provinces last spring—

Mr. Abbott: A year ago last October.

Mr. Drew: —indicating that the dominion government was willing to pass this over, at a time when they were continuing to exercise emergency powers over other matters, in a way that made it impossible for the provincial governments to exercise effective control over rentals.

Mr. Abbott: I am sure my hon. friend wishes to be correct. The letter was written to the provincial governments last October—four months before the government asked for the extension of the powers.

Mr. Drew: That is quite consistent with what I said. I said that the letter was in effect—

Mr. Abbott: You said "at a time".

Mr. Drew: And the law was in effect at the time.

Mr. Abbott: I understood my hon. friend to say that the letter was written at the time we were asking permission to extend the law. That was not correct. It was a year ago last October.

Mr. Drew: It was before that.

Mr. Abbott: Five months before.

Mr. Drew: These are the war powers that were carried forward and in effect then, and the letter was written.

Mr. Abbott: I just wish to have the chronological order right, that is all.

Mr. Drew: As a matter of fact I can quite realize that the Minister of Finance must try to find some measure of satisfaction in saying something about this subject that is not related to the actual substance of the subject itself, because that is the one thing he does not want to discuss. And I am simply pointing out—

Mr. Abbott: I will discuss it all right.

Mr. Drew: I am simply pointing out that there was an offer made by letter in a very general way, and there was no consultation with the provinces by bringing them together to discuss their powers in the only way agreements could be reached at any time with provincial governments in matters of this kind, and the only way in which satisfactory results can be produced.

This has been done in a way that has created confusion for both tenants and landlords. And I can only repeat that, in regard to the regulations themselves, if the government is in genuine doubt about its powers, then let it postpone the operation of these changes which were announced to the house on November 3 until the matter can be fully considered, after this reference has been made.

If on the other hand the government has no doubts as to its powers, then let it go ahead and exercise its responsibilities, but open up this matter for discussion, and give an opportunity to deal with it before the decisions are made—not after.

Coming back to the question of the order in council which asks the Supreme Court of Canada to find out whether or not these regulations are ultra vires of the powers of this parliament, or of the board which passed the regulations, may I repeat that if there is any doubt as to the continuance of the emergency upon which the Transitional Measures Act is based, then the reference should be as to the Transitional Measures Act itself and not as to regulations passed by a board responsible to the government. Let us deal with the law, and not simply with the emanation from that law. Then we shall have a clear decision upon which the government can act, and which will give members of the House of Commons as well as tenants and landlords throughout the country some knowledge of what their position really is.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, before my colleague the Minister of Justice says a word about the legal question involved concerning the order in council, perhaps I might be permitted to say a word in connection with policy in reply to some questions raised by the leader of the opposition, and the leader of the C.C.F.

First I should like to put the record straight as to the chronological order in which the government has attacked this question of decontrol of rentals. On October 23 of last year—that is, October 23, 1948—I wrote a letter in substantially the same terms to all the provincial premiers. I have not that letter at hand, because I did not think it would be necessary to quote it tonight; however, in the letters which I wrote to the premiers recently in connection with the new announcement I quoted from that earlier letter.

On October 23, 1948, as I say, I wrote to the provincial premiers pointing out that the dominion government had entered the field of rental control along with price control, wage control and other controls as a wartime measure, as part of an over-all control system; it being considered that it had no constitutional power to remain in the field indefinitely and was under obligation to proceed to the decontrol of rentals as well as of other controls as rapidly as circumstances would permit. To that end it indicated to the provincial governments that they should give consideration at that time to entering the field if in their judgment they felt it was desirable to do so. Here is what I said to the provincial premiers, and I quote from my letter to the premier of Quebec of October 23, 1948:

> At the same time the federal government is prepared to vacate the field at any time after March 31, 1949, to any province which may decide to undertake rent control. Normally rent control would come under provincial jurisdiction and is peculiarly suitable for provincial or local administration because of the immovable nature of real property. The federal government is anxious not to stand in the way of any province which believes that rent control can be better undertaken and administered locally.
> This announcement of policy is being made at this time so that any provincial government which wishes to do so will have sufficient time to prepare legislation for presentation to its legislature before March 31, 1949.

For reasons which no doubt seemed wise to them no provincial government came forward and suggested that it would introduce rental control legislation. The dominion government in February or March of this year, feeling that a condition still existed which justified it in going before parliament and asking for an extension of its power to continue to exercise rent control, discharged that responsibility and the bill to which my hon. friend referred was passed. In the letters which were tabled the other day, that offer was repeated. I should say that in the meantime the new province of Newfoundland had come into confederation. Newfoundland had had a rental control system in force before that time and it has continued to exercise its own control over rentals.

Then as to the matter of policy. As I said a moment ago, the federal government feels that it has no constitutional right to continue indefinitely in this field, that it has no right other than to continue to decontrol as rapidly as circumstances will permit. As hon. members know, more than four years after the end of the war we were out of all the major controls; we are out of price control, we are out of wage control, and we are out of most of the other controls. In fact I think steel control is pretty well the only one left.

If anyone could give me a good reason why we should continue to exercise control over one relatively small group in the community, the owners of housing accommodation, I wish he would give it to me because no one has given it to me yet. Everyone has said that there is going to be hardship involved if the apparently large number of tenants have to pay higher rents, but that is no answer to me as to why four years after the war the central government in Ottawa should assert the right to continue to tell one small group in the community what they shall receive when they do not attempt to control anybody else.

No one on the other side has attempted to answer that. Hon. members on the other side have made a lot of demagogic appeals about the hardship that is going to be involved. They have read from letters from people who in some cases are going to find it hard to meet these increased rentals. But that is no way of solving the problem. It is not solved by the dominion government continuing to occupy a field in which its powers are definitely limited.

All I am saying on the grounds of policy is that the provincial governments of this country had an opportunity last fall to adopt rental control legislation if they wished to do so. Up to the present time only one province has indicated its intention to do so. As far as I am concerned, and as the Prime Minister suggested the other day, any province which wishes to do so may come forward and say that it intends to do so, and it will get the same treatment as the province of Saskatchewan.

I am not going to deal with the legal matters raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre, because my colleague the Minister of Justice will do that; but it seemed to me it might be appropriate at this stage for me to say a few words in addition to what I said a week or ten days ago as to the reasons which prompted the government in taking this action.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, there is just one point that I think should be brought forward before we have the explanation by the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Finance has pointed out correctly that letters were written to the provincial governments in October, 1948. At the time the transitional measures bill came before the house in March, 1949, it was known to the government and to members of this house that the provincial governments were not going to come in and therefore the transitional powers with the inclusion of rent control were continued by this government with the knowledge of that fact. That legislation continues in effect until March 31 next.

The views that have been expressed by the Minister of Finance could have been much more appropriately expressed at the time that bill was before the house. If those are his views, rental control might have been dealt with upon that basis at that time. But instead of that, rental control was continued by the provisions of a bill that will be law until March 31 next and therefore the remarks that have been made seem to be inapplicable to the situation.

The suggestion has been made that if the government is in doubt it should review the changed situation and withdraw its new regulations until it has an opportunity to examine into the matter. The fact is that these changes have been made at the very worst time of year that they possibly could have been made.

Mr. Noseworthy: I wonder if the minister would answer one further question following the statement he just made? In view of the fact that the government has been in this field up to the present time and has expressed great concern about that one section of the community which is being discriminated against in a way no other section of the community is, will the minister tell us why it is so essential that rents should be increased at this time and why the government cannot wait until March 31?

Mr. Abbott: That is a matter of opinion. I pointed out to my hon. friend that the earliest date at which any monthly rental can be increased is February 1 next, which is some ten months after the last extension of rental control and, if my memory serves me correctly, some sixteen months after the last authorized increase in rentals. The dominion government, being under obligation to proceed with a decontrol policy, felt that in announcing its intention it should indicate that it really meant to decontrol. That is what is being done in increasing the authorized rental ceilings.

I want to take exception to one remark made by my hon. friend, inadvertently I am sure. He said that the government is showing special consideration for one group in the community. That is not the case. The government endeavours to be as fair as it can to all groups in the community.

Mr. Noseworthy: I did not intend to imply that the government was showing favouritism; I was simply calling the minister's attention to his own statement that he felt the government was discriminating against one particular group in the community.

Mr. Abbott: By continuing it indefinitely it would be.

Mr. Noseworthy: Does the minister not feel, in the light of the confusion that is likely to arise over the question of jurisdiction, that it would be in the best interests of our entire economy if this increase could be withheld until that matter is cleared up?

Mr. Abbott: I am going to let the Minister of Justice answer that legal question. If I might answer it directly I would say that I do not think there is any difficulty on the legal question as to the respective jurisdiction of the dominion and the provinces in the case which has been cited by the leader of the C.C.F.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to me the Minister of Finance threw out something in the nature of a challenge, and that challenge should not be allowed to go unanswered. Indeed that is the reason both my colleague the hon. member for York South and I have risen in our places at this time. The minister said that from this side of the house not one reason had been put forward as to why the government should remain in the rent control field. When we cite the condition of Canadian families—

Mr. Abbott: I should like to correct my hon. friend, if I may. What I meant to say, if I did not make it clear, was that no good reason had been advanced why there should not be an increase in the authorized rental ceilings.

Mr. Knowles: It is the same thing. As I was about to say, when my leader seeks to read a letter from a typical Canadian family, or when any of us lay before the minister some of the scores of cases which have been brought to our attention of the hardships Canadians are suffering today, I do not see what is wrong in asking that the Canadian parliament should do something to try to prevent those hardships. That should be our job. Since the minister threw out his challenge I have hastily glanced over the order paper, and the fact is that half or more of the items on the order paper now are designed to meet particular needs or particular problems either of certain groups of Canadians or of the Canadian people as a whole. That is what parliament is for, to try and help people lead the lives it is possible for them to lead in this country. When under present economic conditions you superimpose upon the burden so many people are having to carry the added fear of higher rentals, and the fear as to where this thing is going to end, people do write these heart-rending letters concerning the experiences they are undergoing. They do not know how they can carry on; they ask us for action. They think this is a democracy; they think the purpose of parliament and government is to meet the needs and wishes of the people.

On looking at the order paper I see legislation having to do with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the National Housing Act, the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, amendments to the Veterans' Land Act, changes in the Income Tax Act, amendments to the Agricultural Prices Support Act and the Fisheries Prices Support Act. All these are matters of public policy, and all these measures and amendments are being brought forward because of certain problems facing this section or that of the Canadian people. Well, scores and in fact hundreds of thousands of Canadian people are facing a real problem right now in view of this announced increase in rents; and I say one case, let alone the hundreds of thousands that now exist, should constitute sufficient reason for this parliament to ask that these increases in domestic rentals should not be permitted at this time.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Does the minister not think that if we retained these rental controls for another ten years we would have the same hullabaloo then?

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend's opinion is as good as mine on that point, but I would agree; I should think we would.

Mr. Noseworthy: You will if you do not build more houses.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wonder if I might be permitted to deal with some of the points raised by speakers on the opposition side of the house. The leader of the opposition made the statement that either the government is in doubt about its power or it is not. I suggest that by no more complicated a device than reading the order in council which is the subject of this discussion he could have set at rest any doubts he might have had on that score.

As my colleague the Minister of Finance has indicated, government policy with respect to this rental matter is that of orderly decontrol; but inasmuch as our jurisdiction in this field, which ordinarily would be with the provinces, is based upon the continuation of an emergency arising out of war, it is quite obvious that with the lapse of time after the end of hostilities the factual basis for the exercise of federal jurisdiction becomes less and less. Therefore when we address ourselves to the question whether it is possible to complete a program of decontrol by March 31, 1950, we reach the opinion, stated in this order in council, that we cannot complete that program by that time. Then in spite of the fact that we have no doubt ourselves as to our legal position, since we shall be taking a step which will extend these emergency measures for a year from March, 1950, it would seem that not out of an abundance of caution but out of a reasonable amount of caution we should submit this question to the court upon a reference. In case there should be any doubt as to our own view I would refer my hon. friend the leader of the opposition to page 5 of the order in council, of which I think he has a copy, where the speech of my colleague the Minister of Finance is quoted in these words:

> May I say at this point that the advice which the government receives from its law officers is that the existing federal regulations with respect to rent control are valid.

Then further down:

> As I have said, the law officers of the crown are of opinion that the rentals regulations are valid. They are also of opinion that both the law and the facts support the view that it lies within the authority of parliament to extend these regulations for a further period. Counsel will be instructed by the Attorney General of Canada to press this view before the court.

So there is no doubt as to the view of the government. We think we have the power and that these regulations are valid. It is only of a very proper caution that—some four years after the end of the war, as my colleague has pointed out—we think that before we extend these powers for a further period of one year we should have them passed upon by the court.

The leader of the opposition asked why, in the order in council establishing a reference, we should be bothering with the wartime leasehold regulations. He said this matter arose under the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, and asked why we did not refer the act itself to the court. I must apologize to the legal members of the house, because these are elementary principles of law, but I suggest that the first thing the dominion parliament requires in order to exercise jurisdiction in a field that normally belongs to the provinces is some type of wartime emergency such as we have here, a set of facts upon which to base its jurisdiction. Once it has those it passes a law, which in this case, as my hon. friend correctly says, is the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act. Then, pursuant to that statute, the governor general in council passes certain regulations.

When we submit to the court the question whether these regulations are ultra vires, that submission embraces first of all the question whether the governor general, in passing the regulations, has acted within the ambit of the powers given by the statute, and secondly whether the statute itself is within the powers of parliament. So it is quite idle to draw the distinction my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has attempted to draw, between the regulations upon the one hand and the act upon the other in a reference such as this. The two of them are, for the purpose of a reference of this sort, inseparable.

Mr. Drew: May I ask the minister a question in that respect? Under the present terms of reference would it not be possible that, for some reason, the regulations might be ultra vires although that part of the act under which the regulations were passed might be intra vires? If the question is directed to the act itself, no such doubt could exist.

Mr. Garson: I believe my hon. friend is right in saying that it might be possible that the governor general in council, in invoking the powers given by the act, could exceed his authority. That would make the regulations invalid, although the statute itself might be quite valid. If the act itself be invalid, and my hon. friend seems to raise that question, then I should imagine that those who were attacking the orders in council would say that, although upon their face the orders in council were a proper exercise of powers which the statute purported to impart to the governor in council, yet the act itself was beyond the powers of parliament and was therefore invalid. Then they would say that, since the act was invalid, it was invalid for the governor in council to pass any orders in council under the purported powers granted by the act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If in fact, as a result of this reference, the court should come to the conclusion that there is no power in respect of the leaseholds, then will that not cast doubt on the other controls which were covered by the emergency powers act, such as the steel control?

Mr. Garson: Not if the court's findings are based upon the view that the governor in council, in passing the leasehold regulations, has exceeded the authority granted by the act.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said that there might be some insufficiency or difficulty in the act authorizing the governor in council to implement this arrangement which is under negotiation between the federal government and the Saskatchewan government. If that be so I should think that, inasmuch as this arrangement will come into effect some time later, it would be a simple matter, since we must apply within sixty days after the meeting of the 1950 session of parliament for an extension of this authority, to take the necessary statutory authority at that time.

From the government's standpoint, Mr. Chairman, and particularly from the standpoint of the Department of Justice, this discussion has been worth while. We have had the benefit of the views of such eminent lawyers as the hon. member for Lake Centre, and of some of the legally minded laymen of the house, in suggesting the various considerations that we might take under advisement in connection with this reference. I should like to congratulate my hon. friends upon the very useful statements they have made in this debate. We are greatly indebted to them for those suggestions, in spite of the fact that I have a sufficient feeling of confidence in the deputy minister and his advisers that I believe it probable they have considered each of these alternatives now suggested and have rejected them in favour of the course which is set out in P.C. 5840. The fact that they may have done so does not in any way lessen our gratitude for those suggestions that have been made.

In dealing with those suggestions, I hope my hon. friends opposite did not cherish the illusion that I was going to come here to debate these legal points with them, because I am in a much different position, as minister, than they are as members of the opposition. If they discuss, in terms of legal generalities, a number of abstract principles of constitutional law they are not discussing—at least I am charitable enough to assume they are not—a matter that is sub judice, which is contrary to the rules of this house. But if I considered their suggestions as alternatives to the course we have adopted in this order in council, I would be under the necessity of outlining the case that we are going to present to the Supreme Court of Canada. In that event I should certainly be offending the rules of this house which declare that it is improper for a member to discuss a matter which is under consideration by the courts.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt, but I had understood that the purpose of this debate was to make it possible to place suggestions before the government prior to the time this matter came before the court. If it is not before the court, it cannot be sub judice, so if that is the situation the Minister of Justice would be under no greater limitation than we would be.

Mr. Garson: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that when the order in council has been filed with the registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada, the attorneys general of the provinces have been served, and in due course an application will be made to the court for direction as to the filing of the record and the setting of a trial date, the matter is certainly sub judice. I believe my hon. friends have in no way offended that law. I do not believe there was a syllable in what the leader of the opposition said that would have a sufficient bearing upon the reference to make it objectionable from the standpoint of the rule I have just mentioned. If I discussed the virtues of the course which we propose to follow in presenting the case to the supreme court, as an alternative to the suggestions which have been put forward by members of the opposition, then I would most assuredly be discussing the pith and substance of a matter which is sub judice.

Regardless of the rules, Mr. Chairman—and I think I am clearly barred by the rules—I believe I would be derelict in my duty in doing that, because parliament was never intended as a forum for a preview of some case that is to be tried in the courts. This legislative body would be discharging a judicial function by prejudging the matter which is now before the courts. For that reason I regret that I cannot reciprocate the interesting suggestions that have been made by my hon. friends opposite. I can assure them in all sincerity however that there is not a single suggestion that they have made that will not be taken into careful account at once with the deputy minister and his advisers, as well as those who are going to act in presenting the case to the supreme court.

In closing my remarks, I wish to express our appreciation and thanks to those who have offered these suggestions, for I have no doubt that many of them will be exceedingly valuable to us.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Possibly we shall get back to something now, Mr. Chairman. I ask the minister—and this is not sub judice—why it is that the Supreme Court Act making the supreme court the final court has not been given the royal assent, so that in this case the final decision would be in that court. In that connection I ask the minister: Have the Supreme Court Act amendments received the royal assent? If not, and he says the matter is now sub judice and has been since November 16, is it not a fact therefore that under the amendments that he himself introduced some weeks ago this matter is appealable to the privy council?

Mr. Garson: On the set of facts that my hon. friend cites, the answer is yes; but the fact of the matter is that, so far as the federal government is concerned, there will be no appeal.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the reason that this act has been held off so long from having the royal assent? There was a great rush to get the Supreme Court Act amendments passed through the house. Why the delay?

Mr. St. Laurent: I think I should answer that question, Mr. Chairman. Diligence has been shown in getting that business completed just as diligence has been shown in getting all of the business before parliament completed, because it is not the intention to have this session go on for ever. The act in question was passed in the other place since a royal assent took place; and a request has not been made to His Excellency to ask his deputy to come down for the purpose of giving the royal assent to that bill, because it will not come into force upon the granting of the royal assent but only at such time as it is proclaimed. It has been the intention of the government, when proclaiming the act, to proceed at once to carry out the provisions of the act and to increase the number of judges from seven to nine. At this moment we are not prepared to make those nominations.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

PROVISION FOR FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Winters for the second reading of Bill No. 194, to encourage and to assist in the construction of a trans-Canada highway.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): I will not keep the house long, Mr. Speaker, because there has been a considerable amount of debate on this bill in connection with the all-Canada highway. I think it has been fairly well covered. From this corner of the house in the Social Credit group the leader, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), spoke on the matter when it was in the resolution stage. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), who has made a special study of this matter, has given two major speeches on it. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) has spoken on it. There is therefore not a great deal left for me to say, but I think I should put in my little ten cents' worth.

I know that it is not a particularly popular course to follow in this house for one to proceed now to make any recommendations as to the route the highway should take. Nevertheless, I am going to run the chance of becoming unpopular and suggest that, with regard to Alberta and British Columbia, the route should be through the southern portion of Alberta, through Lethbridge, through the Crowsnest pass and in that direction. The reason I am saying this is that I believe special factors enter into the picture. A road built along that route would make beautiful and convenient connections with the various highways in the United States. This would facilitate tourist traffic coming into Canada and going up to the beauty spots of the rockies. Another matter to be considered with respect to the route which the highway should follow is the population: How many people will the highway serve? While I have not all the exact statistics on this matter, I believe that the route going through the Crowsnest pass and the southern part of British Columbia would serve a larger population compared with other routes through Alberta and British Columbia.

Another matter is the length of the road in mileage. I believe that that route is perhaps one of the shortest ones. I agree, however, with the hon. member for Lethbridge and others who have spoken that we must think not merely in terms of one coast-to-coast highway but of a real system of federal highways in Canada so that no matter what route the main highway may take, all other routes will be served.

There is one matter that I should like to bring to the attention of the house, and it has been mentioned before. I cannot quite understand why the government are proposing a seven-year period for the construction of this highway. I am not an engineer and I am therefore not going to attempt to argue all the details of construction that may be necessary; but for the life of me I cannot see why it should take seven years to build that highway. I recognize that if one contractor or one construction company were to begin at Halifax and eventually end in Vancouver, it might take even seventy years. I do not believe that is the way the highway will be built. I believe that many construction companies will do the work according to the contracts awarded them for the building of this highway. I cannot see why it should take seven years. I just wonder whether the government may think that there is a depression lurking somewhere around the corner, and that in order to absorb the shock of unemployment they will propose a seven-year period and use the all-Canada highway for that purpose. That is the only answer that I can think of. If that is going to be so then I say the government is not tackling the highway problem at all. They are simply making future plans to assist in a possible situation which they think might develop.

In previous speeches that have been made I noticed that the minister has been congratulated a good deal for introducing this measure and deciding to build this coast to coast highway. I do not want to be unkind, but I am not going to congratulate the minister at all, because I do not believe that he is the one particularly responsible for initiating the move. I am going to suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that some of us have been advocating an all-Canada highway for a good many years. I suppose hon. members stood up in this house before many of us ever came here and recommended an all-Canada highway. In the fourteen years that we have been here we have advocated it over and over again. I am particularly reminded of the fact that some months previous to the last election the leader of the Progressive Conservatives—perhaps he was a little premature—made the announcement—if it was not he then it came from the Progressive Conservative convention; I am not certain of the origin of it, but I know it came from Progressive Conservative quarters —that if they were elected they would pursue a policy that would give Canada an all-Canadian highway. He had not mentioned it very long before the government arose and stole his thunder. They announced that they were going to build this highway, placing emphasis upon the fact that they were in office and were in a better position to build a highway than some party that was not yet in office. They put the matter in the hands of the then minister of mines and resources, a greatly honoured gentleman who now sits in another place. Pressure began to be placed upon him for the highway to take a certain route which would cover his constituency. Perhaps considering that the highway might not go through his constituency they recognized that they were in a bit of a jam. What did they do? They moved the all-Canada highway from the jurisdiction of the Minister of Mines and Resources and put it into the hands of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, who did not live in northern Alberta, but lived away down here in the maritime provinces. Therefore that little political fence was hurdled.

Then came the election. The Liberals had stolen the thunder of the Progressive Conservatives. They were elected, and now they have to bring down a bill, and everyone in the house rises and congratulates the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply on his vision and his courage in introducing this bill. So much for that.

I want to know why it is going to take seven years to build this highway? The only thing I can suggest is that they expect a period of unemployment. They will get their picks and shovels out. They will bring in all the unemployed and say: "Here you are. Here are your picks and shovels. The engineers have gone out. Now we shall give you a job to do."

I might say that while the leader of the Progressive Conservatives did advocate this highway previous to the election, there is one point that we have lost sight of, namely, that the Conservative party, under the late Mr. Bennett, when he was prime minister of Canada, was one jump ahead of them all. He started an all-Canada highway, but—there is a "but" in there—he started it not because Canada needed an all-Canada highway. That was not the purpose of the highway. There was a depression and vast unemployment. The purpose of the highway was to put the unemployed people to work. So he gave them picks and shovels and put them out in the northern part of Ontario to dig their way through the bush, at, I am told, $5 a week. A portion of that highway was referred to this morning by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston).

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) said that he had travelled all over it. He did not travel all over it because he did not know it was there. I will tell you why he did not know it was there. After about fifteen or twenty years the trees have grown up in the middle of the highway. There are trees in the middle of that highway with trunks almost as large as the circumference of my body, and that is getting larger and larger at about the same rate as the trees get larger and larger.

Mr. Bennett started to build that road and every time it came to a river it stopped. Of course the unemployed could not build bridges very well. It took expensive engineering skill to do that, so the highway stopped. If you wish to go over the highway you will need a puddle jumper to jump over the rivers and streams where the highway stopped. When you are going along in a train you can see the highway more or less close or farther away as the case may be with trees growing up in the middle of it. I am wondering whether the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) is going to follow that same highway. Part of the work may be done, but I am afraid that he will have to rebuild it. If he follows it he will at least have to cut all the timber off it and he will have to build bridges and so forth. I shall leave that for him to do. The fact of the matter is that governments have monkeyed around with this all-Canada highway for many many years and still we have not one.

Now we are about to have one, and it is going to be seven years before the ultimate objective will be realized. For the life of me, with modern road-building machinery such as we have in Canada, I do not see why it should take more than three or at the outside four years to build that highway. Let us get started at it and have the highway built as soon as possible.

A good deal of it is already built by the provinces. Whether the parts now built will meet the specifications the minister has in mind, I cannot say. I will say this, however, that there are portions built which I am sure are better than the specifications the minister has. We have some mighty fine roads in Alberta—and I might as well put in a plug for my native province. I will say, too, that some portions of roads I have seen in British Columbia will match any to be found on the North American continent—perhaps not in width, but certainly in the travelling conditions offered by those highways. While there are not many of them, some which have been built recently would be a matter of pride to any country.

I travelled a small portion built in the last couple of years just this side of Cranbrook in British Columbia, and I am going to say that if the minister wishes to travel on a beautiful piece of road he should try that piece. While it is only about fifteen miles in length, he will think he is travelling on a piece of glass. The engineering skill has been marvellous.

I believe that is all I have to say. When the minister builds this highway I wonder if he will tell us just why he considers it will take seven years. For the life of me I cannot see why it should.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Drew: Just one point before the question is put: I wonder if the hon. member who has just spoken would tell us the type of tree that grows a trunk as big as his body in fifteen years. If he would tell us, I am sure it would be most helpful to those who are interested in forest development.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I intend to make only a few brief observations on the bill, most of which are occasioned by what was said by a previous speaker.

I rise to support the principle of the bill, and to say that I listened with great interest to the statement of the minister when he introduced it. I believe it is safe to say that finally the government has reacted to some extent satisfactorily to public demand across Canada for the commencement of this work.

I have one or two criticisms of the bill, while supporting it in principle. My first criticism is that I am sorry the bill does not provide for a trans-Canada highway system. While that may not be possible immediately, I am of the opinion that in starting this most important legislation for the Canadian people we should have had in the bill a provision for a trans-Canada highway system. I find that is what organizations throughout British Columbia had been asking for. As I said before, while it may not be possible to do these things immediately, we should have made provision for them and have indicated to the people of Canada that the government intended over a period of years to develop a trans-Canada highway system.

I think the necessity for such a system is obvious when we listen to the discussion concerning the various routes suggested across Canada. It is only natural that a province will favour a district in which it is interested. We in British Columbia are particularly interested in three routes, namely the Crowsnest pass, the Big Bend or central route, and the Yellowhead pass route. No matter which one is built first, there can be no question that the three routes will have to be built eventually, if British Columbia is to be served satisfactorily so far as a trans-Canada highway system is concerned.

I heartily support the Crowsnest route and I believe that it is the most suitable and should be built first. I shall not discuss that question now in detail, because the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) spoke at some length in support of it, and there is no need to repeat his argument. I do think however that in dealing with this matter we should approach it not from the standpoint of this or that route, but rather as Canadians hoping to see at least one trans-Canada highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Then, while we are seriously concerned with the percentage the federal government will pay, we must realize that finally, while the federal government pays a certain percentage and the provincial government a certain percentage, the whole of the expense comes out of the taxpayers' pockets. Therefore as our first objective we should have a trans-Canada system.

When approaching a matter of this kind I am inclined to set limited objectives, something reasonably possible within the reasonably near future. On that point I disagree with the bill, because I believe provision should have been made for a trans-Canada highway system, although only one route is to be proceeded with at the present time. When we have a trans-Canada highway system complete and serving all the areas of Canada satisfactorily, it will be time then for the federal and provincial governments to get together to arrange for the building of satisfactory farm roads.

I am pleased to see in the bill a provision for a fifty per cent payment to the provinces in respect of money already expended for the building of portions of highways which will become part of the trans-Canada highway route. I believe this will tend to equalize the great differences in the cost of building highways in the various portions of Canada.

I may have misunderstood the minister, but I would suggest that the fifty per cent returnable to any province on account of money formerly expended for the building of a portion of the trans-Canada highway should be earmarked for future highway construction in that province. I am of the opinion that in view of the large amount of money spent by the provinces which will be included in the trans-Canada highway when its final location is decided upon, and in view of the large amount of money to be repaid to the provinces on that basis alone, the $150 million will soon be found insufficient to complete the work. If we develop a trans-Canada highway system probably it would have been more sound to have made provision whereby the federal government would have paid seventy-five per cent and the provincial governments twenty-five per cent, as is done in respect of other legislation in which the federal and provincial governments are interested.

I was glad to hear the minister's statement with regard to standards and from what I was able to hear I think satisfactory standards have been established at this time. Naturally in the mountains those standards will be different than in the prairie provinces and other parts of Canada where road building is easier and traffic heavier. It must be remembered that when you come to construct a highway in mountainous country with its rock cliffs and things like that you multiply the cost of construction manyfold by every additional five feet in width. We must have different standards, not only with regard to width but with regard to grades and curvatures.

There is one thing I should like to draw to the attention of the minister, a thing which has been overlooked in the past by provincial governments when undertaking highway construction. You see examples all across the country where narrow bridges are used to connect two wider sections of highway. It is most necessary that all bridges be built to standard so that they will serve for many years to come.

I think one member stated that a one hundred foot allowance was too wide for certain portions of the maritime provinces. If we are going to have a satisfactory highway in the mountainous regions in many cases the allowance will have to be five hundred feet because of the angle of the slopes and so on.

One other hon. member referred to the necessity of connecting up the various cities in Canada, but I am not in agreement with that. If we are going to build a satisfactory trans-Canada highway that will provide a through route it must be built in the best location possible whether or not it by-passes any particular city, village or town. It will be quite easy for any city, town or village to construct connecting links.

These are all the observations I want to make at this time except to express again my regret that this bill, which is the commencement of something that will eventually develop into a very large project in a few years, does not provide for a trans-Canada highway system.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, in the remaining few minutes before eleven o'clock I should like to answer some of the points that were raised this afternoon. I should like to start with those raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra who as far as I can determine is the only hon. member who opposes this measure. He suggested that certain action should have been taken and it was his view that no bill should have been introduced until a route could be defined. He imposed certain other limitations with respect to maintenance, standards, length of time allowed for the building of the highway and the provision of back payments toward meeting costs already incurred. I can say without qualification that if we had tried to do what the hon. member suggests we should do there certainly would not have been a bill of any kind. If we had gone to the provinces and asked them to define a route, if we had made that a condition of the federal government before bringing a bill before this house, I leave it to the judgment of hon. members as to whether there would have been a bill. If he is in favour of a highway, as I gather he is, I feel that other approaches would be necessary on his part to achieve it. The hon. member for Cape Breton South also expressed doubt that a bill should have been introduced until a route had been defined.

Mr. Gillis: I want to put the minister straight on that. I said no such thing. I said that I was not prepared as an individual to even support the principle of this bill until I knew the views of the province of Nova Scotia. As far as the route is concerned, I did not mention it. I merely said that I wanted that information before I was prepared to vote for this measure.

Mr. Winters: I recall what the hon. member for Cape Breton South said and I still feel that if we had tried to conform with his wishes with respect to this matter there would have been no bill.

Mr. Gillis: The minister is absolutely wrong.

Mr. Winters: At any rate I want to thank the hon. member for putting off the speech he had prepared to give on the resolution stage, permitting the bill to be introduced and making that speech today on the second reading. I thank the hon. member for Bow River for the most constructive speech that he made. He appeared to have a good grasp of the problem as I see it and his remarks were most helpful.

The hon. member for Vancouver South said that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was not speaking for his constituency. Then at one stage the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said that he was not speaking for his party. After having spoken to the provincial authorities I am convinced that he was not speaking for the provincial government. I think hon. members will have a difficult time in deciding just whom he represents. I wish also to thank the hon. member for Cochrane for making a most statesmanlike speech.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will try to pass this Bill No. 194, to encourage and to assist in the construction of a trans-Canada highway. We will then continue in committee on Bill No. 142, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944. There are two resolutions which are Nos. 19 and 13 on today's order paper which we should like to pass along so that the bills may be distributed. If time permits we will take up Bills Nos. 64, 120, 185 and 148.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, November 29, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

CITY OF BROCKVILLE

DISASTROUS FIRE IN BUSINESS SECTION—ASSISTANCE FROM UNITED STATES—CO-OPERATION OF OTHER AGENCIES

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, and if I take longer than usual in stating my question I would ask your indulgence, sir.

I should like to tell the house very briefly a story of co-operation and courage that keeps alive one's faith in human nature.

Last Saturday at midnight a fire broke out in Brockville which at one time threatened the entire business section of the town, but, through superhuman effort, was confined to one city block. In spite of the heroic efforts of the Brockville fire department it was soon found that to control the fire was beyond the power of one department; therefore urgent appeals were made to other centres, whose response was immediate.

The first to arrive were the fire fighters from the Royal Canadian Regiment with army equipment. Almost immediately firemen and fire trucks from Prescott, Athens and Smiths Falls were on the scene, and, as soon as they could be ferried across the St. Lawrence river, a pumper, aerial ladder truck, crew and special police force from Ogdensburg, New York, arrived. Seamen from the Canadian navy sloop Oriol, which happened to be in port, joined forces with the firemen, soldiers and citizens, so the fire was ultimately brought under control by complete municipal and military aid and international co-operation.

Fire fighting is always hazardous, but with the temperature at almost zero it becomes an almost unbearable ordeal. Throughout the night a group of young women kept the fire fighters supplied with hot coffee and sandwiches, while others were on hand to crack ice off the fire fighters' coats, helmets, gloves and boots.

Fortunately no lives were lost and no serious injuries suffered, but nearly one hundred persons were made homeless.

On Sunday morning appeals for assistance were made from all the pulpits of the Brockville churches, and at one o'clock Mayor W. Fred Reynolds spoke over radio station CFJM to ask for money, clothing and other necessities. By five o'clock on Sunday afternoon the receiving centre had been moved no less than three times in order to provide greater accommodation for the mass of goods that started to pour in, and by nine in the evening half the second floor of the city hall looked like a department store. In addition, the sum of $2,500 had been received in cash donations, and I am told the fund is now over $6,000. One farmer arrived with two dozen eggs, and emptied his purse, which contained $1.03. An elderly woman donated $1.85, and said that it was all she had at the moment, but that she would give more on Wednesday when her pay cheque arrived.

The generosity of the people of Brockville exceeds the bounds of any possible expectation; and what applies to Brockville extends to the entire district, which includes several communities in northern New York state. Truly the cardinal Christian principle, "love thy neighbour" knows no international boundary in North America.

A disaster such as Brockville has just experienced brings out, in no uncertain way, the best in all of us, regardless of race or creed, and serves to make us proud that we are Canadians and fortunate enough to live on the continent of North America.

I should like to thank the Prime Minister, the Acting Minister of National Defence, and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence for the prompt and sympathetic attention given the request that certain huts at the Royal Canadian Regiment camp be made available to the municipal authorities at Brockville. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that these huts will serve a most useful and humane purpose in looking after the temporary housing needs of the hundred men, women and children who were made homeless as a result of the worst fire in the history of Brockville.

HONEY

NATIONAL HONEY WEEK—NEED FOR INCREASED CONSUMPTION

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I should like to inform the hon. members that this is national honey week. In their offices they will find samples of honey supplied by the Canadian beekeepers' council. Owing to the loss of export markets, producers are facing difficult marketing conditions. If each Canadian would consume a half pound more honey per year, some of the marketing problems would be solved.

NATIONAL TRADE MARK

PRESS REPORT OF REMARKS OF MR. JONES IN DEBATE ON NOVEMBER 26

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen there is a report of a statement made by the general manager of the Ottawa board of trade which refers to my speech on the bill to establish a national trade mark. I am charged with being unfair to Ottawa merchants. The article states that I implied that there was a general practice among Ottawa merchants of misleading the public by using well-known containers to hold inferior products. Such a statement is incorrect.

I mentioned that stores on Elgin street used containers bearing the "O.K. brand" label to hold a local product of inferior quality. My contention is that a container bearing the name of a well-known brand should not be used for any other product. Even today those containers are still on display, filled with other than Okanagan produce. The article in question makes the statement that I said merchants filled containers with these products, and marked them as coming from the Okanagan valley. What I did say was that Okanagan valley containers were refilled with other, and in the case under review, inferior, quality produce. I shall be pleased to supply Mr. Cairns with the evidence if he so desires.

The other point with which I wish to deal is the charge that I was derelict in my duty in not bringing this matter to the attention of the house earlier in the session. May I point out that a perusal of Hansard will show that I dealt with this matter earlier in the session, but so far no action has been taken. I did not at any time, nor do I now, suggest that the practice is general among Ottawa merchants.

May I repeat that the principle involved in my speech is that containers marked with a well-known brand name should not be used again, once the original contents which fulfilled the specifications of that brand have been emptied out.

FOOD

TABLING OF SPEECH DELIVERED BY MR. GARDINER AT FAO CONFERENCE, NOVEMBER 24

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay on the table a copy of a speech which I delivered before commission I, the fifth session of the FAO conference, at Washington, D.C., on November 24, 1949.

Mr. Tustin: I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the minister's speech, which has now been tabled, would be of great interest to the agricultural producers of this country, and I suggest to him that he request that it be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gardiner: I made the suggestion yesterday that I was satisfied to have that done, but no one seemed to take me up on it.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house now wish that the speech should be printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Mr. Coldwell: I did not quite hear the proposal, because someone was speaking to me at the moment. Is it that the minister's speech should be put on Hansard?

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say that while members of the house might find it valuable to have the speech thus recorded, I do not like to see an expansion of Hansard to include speeches made outside the house. If that is done, we shall soon be in the position of the United States Congressional Record, which is full of that kind of thing.

Mr. Gardiner: I agree with that statement; and I will go a little bit further and say that I do not think it is proper to insist that speeches made by ministers outside the house be tabled in the house. But I am quite satisfied to have this one tabled.

An hon. Member: It is for your own defence.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

TABLING OF ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ASKED BY MR. DIEFENBAKER ON NOVEMBER 25

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wish to lay on the table the answers to certain questions asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the debate on the Combines Investigation Act on November 25 last.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

PROVISION FOR FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES

The house resumed, from Monday, November 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. 194, to encourage and to assist in the construction of a trans-Canada highway—Mr. Winters—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Green: Apparently there has been an agreement with some of the provinces as to the route of the trans-Canada highway. Will the minister tell us what routes have been agreed on?

Mr. Winters: There has been no agreement on routes, and I am not in a position to say what routes have been defined by the provinces.

Mr. Green: Can the minister not tell us that with respect to any of the provinces?

Mr. Winters: There have been routes under discussion, but there have been no agreements with respect to routes.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Agreements with provinces.

Mr. McLure: Can separate agreements be made with each province and separate amounts paid, or will each province get the same amount or percentage of what the road costs? It would appear from this section that a separate agreement could be made with each province and separate amounts paid to each province.

Mr. Winters: There will be separate agreements with each province, but the same formula will be used throughout.

Mr. Argue: According to the minister's statement, in the reference to the standards for certain provinces a stone base was called for, of a strict minimum of nine inches. Can the minister say whether or not he intends to follow this standard closely? In Saskatchewan, for example, it is almost impossible to find stone to crush for such a stone base; and even now we are facing a problem in getting adequate supplies of gravel. On the prairies would a gravel base not be suitable, rather than a stone base?

Mr. Winters: As I said in my statement, we shall not insist on any specification that is not acceptable or practicable in any one province. The specifications I mentioned were simply suggestions in order to provide the basis of an agreement.

Mr. Fraser: Has the Department of National Defence made any recommendation as to the construction of the road so that it could be used for heavy military vehicles? It should be designed for that purpose, as well as for the handling of tourist traffic. In the case of war we would have to use it. That is why construction in the United States is uniform all the way through.

Mr. Winters: The provisions with respect to construction and other such matters have been made with the full knowledge of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Hatfield: I understand that this act calls for a two-lane highway. Will the foundation be laid for a four-lane highway? Have culverts been built for a four-lane highway?

Mr. Winters: This proposal contemplates a two-lane highway.

Mr. Fraser: Has any consideration been given to police patrol of the highway, or allowing the provinces—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fraser: It is a matter that has to do with maintenance. Has anything been done in this regard? With the radio patrol, if anything happened—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fraser: Those who do not know anything about maintaining a highway would be wise to keep quiet. If there is an accident on the highways in Ontario, with the radio control from provincial police stations a car can be at the scene of the accident within a few minutes. Is something of the kind contemplated for this highway? It should be, because we shall have accidents on it, no matter what happens.

Mr. Winters: According to my understanding, the normal patrol arrangements on the provincial highways will prevail.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister whether it is the intention that the provinces will first complete their construction and that under the provision for acceptance by the minister, if it is found to conform to the standards laid down, the contribution of the dominion will then be paid? Or is it intended that the payments will be made as the construction progresses?

Mr. Winters: There have been no agreements reached, but we would hope that new work would go forward first.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask whether the federal government fair wage provisions will apply to contracts in connection with the construction of the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. Mitchell: I think my hon. friend had better direct his question to the provincial governments.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Mitchell: Just sit down.

Mr. Knowles: I was going to try to stop the minister from saying something worse.

Mr. Mitchell: That may be true, too. My hon. friend clearly understands that jurisdiction in this matter rests with the provincial governments.

Mr. Knowles: That is right.

Mr. Mitchell: And there are reasonable stipulations in regard to these matters. We have a federal fair wages policy which deals strictly with federal works. I think it would be far better if my hon. friend directed his question to the various provincial governments.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am not surprised at the answer given by the Minister of Labour. As a matter of fact there is some sense to it; but I have a case upstairs on which I am working; it has to do with a worker in Manitoba who is working on a contract which was let by the federal government. When he tried to get the vacation with pay stamps provided by provincial legislation in Manitoba, the contractor for whom he was working said: "This is a federal government contract, and provincial legislation does not apply." The case is, one might say, sub judice —I am still writing about it to the various authorities. But the fact of the matter is that that sort of thing does happen time and again. People fall between these two jurisdictions. From the way in which this clause is worded we may run into the same thing. We may have contractors not living up to the provincial labour requirements, and using as an excuse the argument that they are working on something that comes from the federal government.

Mr. Mitchell: Oh, no.

Mr. Knowles: Hon. members on the other side say "Oh, no"; but that is the sort of thing that happens after these bills are passed. I do not blame the government for it, Mr. Chairman, but when we move an amendment the members of the government look at it with the most powerful microscope they can get, to see if they can discover some little flaw in it. But when we suggest there might be a flaw in the wording of their bills, they say, "Oh, no; it can't happen that way." I am telling the government that this sort of thing does happen. I should like to be sure that the work on this trans-Canada highway will be done under fair wage conditions, and that there will not be any passing the buck between federal and provincial authorities with respect to that phase of the matter.

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to put myself on record as supporting the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I do not think this matter should be dealt with with the hilarity and lightness that is displayed by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house. It took us a long time to get a fair wage clause in government contracts. We should like the fair wage clause in government contracts to apply to all contracts. I do not know whether I am right or not, but my understanding is that the fair wage clause applies to all federal government contracts, or to any federal government assisted contract. If that is so, it should apply in this instance. If it does not apply to a contract in which the federal government assists, it should apply, because the federal government should not supply money that is to be used in construction or manufacturing where unfair working and wage conditions prevail. We should make it clear that when the federal government assists any project it does so on the understanding that fair wages and fair working conditions apply. These conditions are not particularly onerous, because they are the conditions that apply in the locality. They are not conditions arbitrarily imposed. There is a formula for working them out.

I suggest that hon. members on the opposite side, who appeal to workers for support at election time, take this matter seriously and see that these fair wage clauses are in the contracts.

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Chairman, just to keep the record straight may I say this? The hon. member for Vancouver East said that it took a long time to establish the principle of fair wages and working conditions. Let me say to him that that took place before his time and mine. I think it was in the year 1900. The political party that laid down that principle was the Liberal party. My hon. friend knows that the wage structure across the nation is not the same in every province. In British Columbia they have a comparatively high wage structure, probably the highest in the dominion. I think people engaged in public works in that province would wish to see the prevailing conditions in Vancouver or in British Columbia generally adhered to. I feel certain that if we had a national approach to the problem we would object to the wage structures in some of the other provinces. My hon. friend can rest assured that the provincial people, who have jurisdiction in this matter will see to it that the legislation and regulations affecting fair wage conditions in effect in their respective provinces are adhered to.

Mr. Gillis: I cannot agree with the minister when he says the Liberal government was the first government to recognize the principle of fair wage contracts in agreements. That is true in theory, but it was not until the war contracts of 1939 and 1940 were let that the government gave effect to the fair wage conditions so far as federal government contracts were concerned. As the hon. member for Vancouver East pointed out a moment ago, some of us in the house were fighting for these things thirty years ago. It is true that we recognized the principle, but it was never put into effect. Unless we are prepared to follow out the mechanics laid down by the government in federal contracts during the war, we shall slowly get back to where we were when the matter was just a theory. It was put in the contracts during the war.

We are not asking that any of the wage schedules in the provinces be upset. All we are asking is that when the federal government lets a contract, the contractor be obliged to conform to the wages and conditions established by the provinces. It must be remembered that conditions are not the same from section to section in a province. There is a differential. If a contractor is putting the highway through a certain section of the province, and the provincial government has set out a fair wage schedule, the least the contractor should be obliged to do is to conform to the law applicable in that particular section.

The minister knows well that since the war there has been difficulty with federal contracts. I brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of Transport since the present session in regard to federal works projects in my own community, where there was no difficulty during the war, although a lot of construction work was carried on. The contractor got out from under, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggested, by saying that the provincial laws had nothing to do with it; that it was a federal contract. The Minister of Transport in this case stated clearly that once that contract is let, it is the responsibility of the contractors to establish the wages and conditions they see fit. A clause should be written into the contract providing that the contractor, in matters of labour, employment and wages should conform to the standards set up in that particular part of the country. Nothing would be upset at all; it would be simply writing something into the contract to avoid difficulties in the future.

I know that in the letting of federal contracts early in the war there was a complete upset right across the country. In my own section of Canada one of my main jobs was running from one works project to another in an effort to iron out difficulties with truck drivers and labourers as between federal contracts and provincial laws, and all that kind of thing. We do not want to get back to that. We are merely asking that the practical machinery established during the war—because once it was established it worked well—be used. These contracts are not yet let. It is not necessary to have a special provision in the bill. But if the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply and the Minister of Labour could get together and have a little talk I am sure there would be no trouble in writing into the contracts a clause in which it would be asked that contractors conform to provincial laws in this regard.

Mr. Fulton: We should have some understanding of the method of determining the amount of contribution. If the total amount is limited to $150 million for seven years, it means a little more than $20 million a year. There are ten provinces. With the federal contribution of fifty per cent, this allows for a yearly average of construction of roughly $40 million. Again on a straight numerical basis this is an average of about $4 million per year per province.

We know the difficulties of construction in some parts of Ontario, for instance, and British Columbia. It is possible that merely in carrying out their own highway program a province might wish to do more than $4 million worth of construction in any year. What is to be the position? Is there to be a limit placed on the construction that any one province may carry out in any one year? How is the apportionment among provinces to be made? Suppose one province, with this in mind, does a lot of construction early—let us say $20 million or $30 million in a year; then are not the other provinces in danger of having less of the share of the $150 million, if they do not get in at the start? Will that not be the position, unless they know there will be a basis of apportionment, and what that basis is to be? What has the minister in mind in that respect?

Mr. Winters: The money will be spent as the work is done. There will be no attempt to allot on an annual basis, or break it down by provinces in relation to the expenditures that we think should be incurred. Nor will there be any attempt to spread out the $150 million over seven years. The seven-year period provision was put in there largely at the request of certain provinces which felt that, having regard to their present heavy highways program, they could not take on the additional work of the trans-Canada highway and complete it in a shorter period of time. The federal government is prepared to go ahead as quickly as the provinces wish to do so, and the expenditures will be in direct relationship to the mileage of work completed.

Mr. Fulton: On that basis it would be advantageous, would it not, for any province to get as much done as it could, and as quickly as it could, in order to secure as large a slice as possible of the $150 million.

Mr. Winters: That is a matter for the provinces to decide. We are open-minded in our approach to the problem. I should think, though, that there would be no need for any province to try to do its work at once in order to receive payment from the federal government under the terms of this act.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I can understand the minister's hesitancy about finding a route for the trans-Canada highway. It is a ticklish problem, no doubt. I should imagine, for instance, that in Prince Edward Island the trans-Canada highway would run the whole length of the island; is that correct?

Mr. Winters: As I have said, the route is a matter to be determined by the provinces.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): One would expect, from the fact that they can determine the route, that it would run the length of the island.

Mr. Winters: Perhaps I should say, to clarify the point, that we felt it necessary to state a definition suggesting the shortest practical east-west route consistent with the needs of the provinces and Canada as a whole.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I understand that. Of course when the minister mentions Victoria as the western terminus, I am sure he appreciates the fact that Victoria is the most easterly point of Vancouver island. I do not think I have to refer to the hon. member for Nanaimo to substantiate that fact. A substantial portion of the island lies to the west of Victoria. If the government of British Columbia defines a more westerly part of the island as the end of the trans-Canada highway, will the federal government be prepared to accept that?

Mr. Winters: I should think the hon. member would find the definition fairly comprehensive.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): It would be wide enough, would it?

Mr. Drew: The question raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni indicates some of the problems which are bound to arise. I can understand his visualizing the possibility that the Malahat drive would be part of the trans-Canada highway—and certainly no one would appreciate more than I would the opportunity to go over that drive. It does, however, indicate the scope of the problem, because in each of the provinces questions arise as to the direction of the routes, north-south as well as east-west. In voting for this bill I wish to have it clearly understood that I regard it as nothing more than a statutory declaration of intention. That is all it is. I hope no one will leave this chamber in the belief that simply by passing this bill, we have solved the problem of building a trans-Canada highway. The fact that this decision is put in statutory form expresses the wish of members of the house that the government proceed to confer with the provinces in order to determine how it is to be done. Unless that is kept clearly in mind, serious difficulties will arise, and they were emphasized by the remarks made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. Having had some background of experience in this respect, I strongly urge the minister that with the statutory declaration indicating that it is the wish of all members of parliament that a trans-Canada highway be proceeded with, any further attempt to deal with the matter by correspondence be abandoned until the provinces meet together and settle an over-all plan.

I would remind the minister that when attempts were made to make separate deals with the provinces in regard to tax arrangements, it brought anguished public statements from even provincial premiers who had most strongly supported the idea of entering into those agreements. If separate arrangements are made, based upon different standards and different widths and different procedure for determining the prior cost of segments of highway which were completed before the new arrangement was entered into, then the whole structure will be one which will proceed by progressive—and progressive is hardly the word—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Drew: —by unsatisfactory piece-by-piece dealings instead of by a clear, bold plan which all accept as the one under which they are going to work. I want to emphasize the vital importance of bringing the provinces together once this act is passed so that round-the-table arrangements may be made to the end that the representatives of Newfoundland on the east and British Columbia on the west may be aware now, instead of at some later time, of variable factors which will apply in respect to the arrangements in any particular province. It will save the minister a lot of trouble, and it will assure the satisfactory development of this great project.

Mr. McIvor: I think actually the leader of the opposition is convinced that this young minister is going to see this thing through. He can rest assured that the minister is not going to take a job like this and then throw it down.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, I should like to know if tentative arrangements have been made with regard to the route in Prince Edward Island. The starting point must be Tormentine in New Brunswick. The next link is the Abegweit, which crosses the Northumberland strait. When that is included in the highway we shall have the fulfilment of one of the terms of union of 1873. Then we reach Borden. It has been suggested by the minister that the highway should follow the shortest route to the capital; therefore the road would run from Borden through Victoria, to Crapaud, and then direct to Charlottetown, thereby saving fourteen miles as compared with the hard-surfaced road which is now in use. This route would necessitate a new bridge in order to cross the North river, because the old bridge farther down is not suitable for present day traffic. The North river bridge would be built at Brighton, and the road would then go directly into the heart of Charlottetown.

I understand that some leeway has been given the provincial government, because since I left in September they have opened up a highway from Brackley road to the lower North river with a hundred foot right of way—something new in our province. The rumour is that this highway is to be finished as part of the direct route from Borden. If the minister knows anything about these rumours, I should like him to tell us so we can give a little further consideration to this.

Mr. Winters: I know nothing about these rumours. In reply to the leader of the opposition, I would simply refer him to page 2330 of Hansard of November 28, 1949, where I am reported as having said:

> It seemed desirable, therefore, that we should go ahead with the legislation and then invite provincial governments to attend a conference of officials and technicians for the purpose of discussing all matters of technical detail, with a view to resolving all such points to the mutual satisfaction of the provincial and federal governments.

Mr. Fulton: The minister gave a clear answer to the question I asked; in which he said that there is no intention to limit the amount in any one year. I think this should receive further consideration. Carried to its logical or possible conclusion, it means that any province in a less fortunate financial position than the others, any province that is not able to start work as early or to pursue it as aggressively as other provinces, might in the end receive nothing, or virtually nothing, from this $150 million. I am almost certain that the minister will be asked to give some assurance at the proposed conference that this will not happen. While there is no provision in the bill to which I could suggest an amendment in this regard, the minister will I hope consider this point and, at the conference he proposes to call, be ready to propose some safeguards against anything of the kind.

Mr. Green: The reference the minister made yesterday was a conference of officials and technicians. Is it not the intention to call together the ministers from the different provinces? It would appear from the minister's statement that this is to be a technical rather than a policy conference.

Mr. Winters: A conference was held last December. When the provincial authorities assemble for a conference to discuss details, it will be the privilege of any provincial minister to attend if he wishes to discuss those details. I have no doubt that there are some who will wish to do this. The conference we envisage now will be one relating to matters of technical detail. I believe this has been brought out in the house, and it reflects the views of hon. members as to the next point of procedure. Following the conference we will determine what the next step will be toward implementation and the signing of agreements.

Mr. Drew: I had thought I had ended my remarks on this matter, but I am seriously alarmed by the statement just made by the minister. First of all, let me say most definitely that the conference last December was not a policy conference. No policy was decided upon; no policy was even considered. The fact is that the provincial representatives who met here last December all went away questioning the value of coming here when no real program had been put in front of them. They went away without any real knowledge of what was intended. Nothing was decided, from the policy point of view, which would make it possible to bring in the experts to work out the technical details which of necessity must be related to an integrated plan.

I urge upon the minister that he reconsider his statement that the conference he proposes to call will be one of technical experts. The first meeting should be one by governments, if this act is to be the basis of a successful development of this project. I repeat that the first step is for the governments to meet at the government level to determine the procedure by which an over-all plan may be arrived at. It is only then that the technical experts can usefully discuss what is to be done.

Mr. Bater: Mr. Chairman, after listening to the remarks made this morning I have come to the conclusion that it is about time the hatchet was buried by the different parties in this chamber and by the federal government and the governments of the different provinces. Personally I feel that there is no cause for alarm. I consider that this highway project is the greatest project ever considered in the history of our dominion. It is something that has been awaited for many years. I have every confidence, that when the conference is held, any differences of opinion will be set aside, and that the individuals who will gather together to solve the problem and start the wheels moving will adopt principles of tolerance, sacrifice and responsibility, and get along with the job.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I have a press dispatch here which appeared earlier this month in the Veterans Advocate. It reads in part as follows:

> It had been planned to hold a dominion-provincial trans-Canada highway meeting in Ottawa, but that project has been abandoned in favour of individual meetings with the provinces.

Has it definitely been decided there will not be a meeting of representatives of the different governments in a nation-wide conference? I believe the minister of public works of British Columbia expects that there will be a further conference. Frankly I am surprised to learn today that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is planning to call in only technical officials from the provinces. I urge that he give consideration to having a meeting of the ministers of public works of the different provinces. There is time yet to change his plan in order to have such a meeting, and it seems to me a meeting of that kind would be much more likely to produce results. The technical men would also be present. I wonder whether the objective will be attained simply by calling in the technical men and leaving the ministers at home. They are not likely to come if they are not specially invited.

Mr. Winters: I do not think that this should be a point of contention at all. In my opinion the plan has developed as far as it has by a process of co-operation. I have talked or written to the representatives of every provincial government. I have spoken personally to all but one, as I said in my statement. In those conversations we decided what the best course of action should be. We felt the first stage should be to bring down the legislation, and then to get together and discuss matters of technical detail. That is a point on which there has been agreement between the provincial governments and ourselves on the ministerial level, if you wish to call it that. After that has been done, and all points have been resolved, we shall have to decide what the next step should be towards the signing of agreements so that the work can be got under way.

Mr. Green: Is it the thought that there may be a conference on the ministerial level after the meeting of the technical personnel has been held?

Mr. Winters: The invitation to provincial governments to attend a conference to discuss technical details will of course be directed through the provincial minister concerned. He will be invited to come himself or to send one of his officials to discuss technical points. The minister will be entirely free to come. For the information of hon. members I think I should say that so far no letter has gone out, but one is being prepared and will be sent in the near future. After that conference has been held, I am sure we shall be able to decide in a spirit of co-operation what the next step should be.

Mr. Green: In the Vancouver papers which arrived yesterday there are two questions raised. One is as follows:

> A stumbling block to be removed, however, on this route is the operation of commercial truck transports through the national park areas which the road traverses. So far the federal government has not permitted this.

I mentioned in my remarks yesterday that for many years there had been objection to trucks not being allowed to use freely the highways through the national parks. The article goes on:

> Another point on which B.C. seeks clarification is construction of the highway through towns and cities. Present federal plans call for building the road only to municipal boundaries.

I do not believe that press statement is correct, but will the minister clarify these two points?

Mr. Winters: The matter of commercial traffic through public parks is an important point, and it is one that is under discussion. I have nothing further to add at this time, except to say that it is a good point.

Mr. Green: Is that not entirely in the control of the dominion?

Mr. Winters: Yes, it is. As to the second point, concerning the arrangements through municipalities, we have told the provincial governments that the normal relationship between the provincial government and the municipality with respect to payment for highways will prevail, so far as that is possible.

Mr. Green: What does the minister mean by that? In the terms which were sent out to the provincial governments the minister said that the dominion government would not pay anything in excess of the cost of a two-lane highway. Does that also apply through towns and cities? In other words, if the street is 66 feet wide and the province is contributing to the construction and upkeep thereof in the municipality, will the position be that the dominion government will contribute only up to the width of a two-lane highway?

Mr. Winters: That is what is contemplated at the moment.

Mr. Noseworthy: Can the minister give us an estimate as to how much of the $150 million will be required to reimburse the provinces for work that has already been completed on sections of the highway?

Mr. Winters: I do not think I could give anything that would be of any value, because the routes have not yet been determined.

Mr. Argue: I think section 4 is the most important one in the bill. It is the section concerning which a great deal of the discussion has already taken place. It is the provision whereby the federal government's contribution to the building of the trans-Canada highway will amount to no more than fifty per cent. I was particularly glad to see the stand taken by the leader of the opposition and the leader of the Social Credit party when they pointed out that a fifty per cent contribution is too low to assure the building of a trans-Canada highway within the seven-year period. If the highway is to be built within a reasonable time, the contribution of fifty per cent should be increased, so that there will be a greater incentive for each province to undertake construction within its own boundaries. The minister has said the building of the trans-Canada highway is contingent upon all provinces signing agreements. With a contribution of only fifty per cent I would say that the cost may be too high for some provinces to proceed.

I was greatly impressed by the speech of the leader of the Social Credit party. He pointed out that even for a province as wealthy as Alberta the contribution required from the province for the building of the highway within its boundaries will be a serious burden on the provincial treasury. If this is so in Alberta, certainly some of the maritime provinces, and likely the province of Saskatchewan, will have even greater difficulty in attempting to match the federal contribution dollar for dollar. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the fifty per cent contribution be increased to seventy-five per cent. If the federal government's contribution is increased, I believe that each province will be able to go ahead with the construction of a trans-Canada highway in the near future.

I should like, therefore, to move an amendment, Mr. Chairman, seconded by the member for Saskatoon. The amendment is as follows:

That clause 4, subclause (2), be amended by deleting therefrom the words "fifty per centum" and by substituting therefor the words "seventy-five per centum."

This amendment will in no way increase the expenditure made by the federal government under this act. The expenditure to be made under this act is covered by clause 7, which states that the aggregate of all expenditures shall not exceed $150 million. All this amendment would do is to change the formula, so that the provinces could undertake construction. I admit that it might mean a reduction in the standard of the highway; I do not know. It would at least assure the building of a trans-Canada highway, and it would establish the principle that the federal government should make a greater contribution.

The federal government has found that in many cases, such as old age pensions and housing, it must make a seventy-five per cent contribution to enable the provinces to fulfil their obligation. The same principle should be applied to the building of the trans-Canada highway. If the government really desires the highway it should be prepared to pay seventy-five per cent of the cost, while the provinces contribute twenty-five per cent.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, obviously the amendment is out of order, since it calls for an increase in the expenditure of public funds.

Mr. Knowles: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in his statement that the amendment is obviously out of order, has not taken even a moment to think about it. I ask you, sir, and members opposite to take their time in considering this matter. It is quite clear that the amendment is in order. May I remind you, sir, and all hon. members, of the statement my colleague the member for Assiniboia has just made, namely, that clause 7 of the bill sets a ceiling on the amount of money to be spent under this bill. If the bill is passed without this amendment, the total amount of money to be spent will be $150 million. If my colleague's amendment carries and the bill passes with the "seventy-five per centum" in clause 4, the total amount of money to be spent by this government will still be only $150 million. All this amendment does is to relax the terms upon which the federal government is making the money available.

If I may illustrate by using a figure, in order for a province to secure $3 of federal money now, it has to match it with another $3.

If my colleague's amendment carries, in order for a province to get $3 of federal money, it would have to match it with only $1. As my colleague has stated, it might result in less money being spent on the highway, but at least it would make it possible for the highway to be started, and it would establish the principle of a three to one contribution.

On Saturday last the member for Rimouski, who is parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, introduced a bill to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act. The amending bill was introduced without any prior resolution. In introducing it, the parliamentary assistant explained why there was no prior resolution. He said that it was not a money bill—that is did not involve expenditure. The member for Coast-Capilano is now nodding his head up and down. The member for Rimouski said that the Industrial Development Bank Act sets a ceiling of $25 million. All that his amendment did was to relax the terms on which a portion of that money is to be made available. He said that because it did not change the ceiling of $25 million, it did not involve an increase in expenditure. Mr. Chairman, the cases are completely analogous.

The bill before us sets a ceiling of $150 million, and the purpose of my colleague's amendment is to relax the terms on which that federal money is to be made available to the provinces. I submit that members opposite cannot claim one rule for the government on Saturday, and apply another rule to the opposition on Tuesday. If on Saturday it was in order for the member for Rimouski to say that his amendment did not involve an increase in expenditure, because it left the ceiling where it was and merely relaxed the terms on which that money was made available, I submit it is in order today for the member for Assiniboia to move an amendment that leaves the ceiling at $150 million, and merely relaxes the terms on which that money is to be made available.

I could go further, Mr. Chairman, and read from pages 510 and 511 of May, but I will simply paraphrase it. On those pages it says that once the resolution preceding a bill has been brought in with the royal recommendation, no amendments can be made that go beyond the terms of the resolution; in other words no amendment can exceed the scope of the royal recommendation. May I remind you, sir, that when the minister of reconstruction brought in the resolution preceding this bill, it did not specify any plan of contribution. There was no mention of a fifty-fifty basis. The rule is quite clear that when the house is in committee on a bill, any amendment to the terms of the bill can be made, provided it does not go beyond the terms laid down in the resolution which was laid before the house with the royal recommendation.

I turn to the resolution, which is on page 2023 of Hansard. It reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to encourage and assist in the construction of a trans-Canada highway and to provide for this purpose that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply may enter into agreements with any provinces providing for the payment by Canada to those provinces of contributions in respect of the cost of a trans-Canada highway; with provision also for the employment of temporary engineers, technical officers and other employees for the purpose of the act.

The proposal to which the governor general gave his approval—that is what counts in these matters—was a plan which involved contributions couched in general terms. When the royal recommendation was received, the resolution did not mention a fifty-fifty basis, or any other specific plan. So long as we stay within the terms of the resolution, we are in order, and that is precisely what this amendment does.

But I come back to what I said before, Mr. Chairman, that not only are we staying strictly within the terms of the resolution but we are at this point moving an amendment that does not involve an increased expenditure of money, any more than the amending bill did which the hon. member for Rimouski brought in on Saturday last. I submit that if the rule applies one way for the government on Saturday, it should apply in the same way for the opposition on Tuesday.

Mr. Howe: I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that no explanation of mine is really needed with regard to the specious argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. MacInnis: It is not specious at all, and the minister knows it.

Mr. Howe: May I point out that the purpose of this bill is to build a trans-Canada highway from coast to coast at an estimated cost for the project of $300 million. The appropriation made here is intended to cover the government's share of the project. It is obvious that if the government's contribution is raised from fifty per cent to seventy-five per cent, additional funds will be required. Whether they are appropriated in this bill or not is immaterial. The motion represents an additional drain on the treasury of Canada, and therefore it is clearly out of order.

Mr. MacInnis: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that this bill stipulated the building of a trans-Canada highway that would cost $300 million.

Mr. Howe: No, I did not.

Mr. MacInnis: There is no such stipulation in the bill. The stipulation in the bill is that the federal government will provide up to $150 million. It does not say that that is for completion of a highway, either. This amendment does not increase the amount that the government will spend. It may reduce the amount that the provincial governments may spend, but it certainly will not increase the amount that the federal government will spend. For that reason it is absolutely in order, as every hon. member of this committee should know from the clear explanation of the rules given by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Sinclair: I should like to speak to the point of order. To begin with I support the contention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the purpose of this bill is not to grant $150 million to the provincial governments for road construction. The principle of this bill is to construct a trans-Canada highway to the specifications given by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply in his speech on second reading. Section 4 and section 7 are of course related in that respect. Under section 7 and section 4, when taken together, the fifty per cent contribution of the federal government is estimated at $150 million, which means that the cost of the highway is $300 million. Therefore when the hon. member for Assiniboia raises the percentage provided in section 4 to seventy-five per cent, that means seventy-five per cent of $300 million.

An hon. Member: No, it does not.

Mr. Sinclair: The result would be that section 7 would have to be amended to read $225 million.

As to the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that this is an exact analogue to the remarks of the hon. member for Rimouski on Saturday, I want to point out that there is a great difference. The Industrial Development Bank Act provided for an expenditure of $25 million, but that sum of $25 million could be available for loans for approved projects on which, incidentally, the government makes profits. In that bill there was the initial provision that for a certain period only $15 million should be available for these loans; and the bill proposed by my colleague was to provide that the remaining $10 million which had already been authorized by the first act should now be made available for these loans. There is no similarity whatsoever between what was moved by my colleague and what the hon. member for Assiniboia is now trying to do.

Mr. Fulton: Speaking to the point of order, it seems to me that the point just put forward by the parliamentary assistant, the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, is not well taken. Here we have a bill which authorizes the expenditure by the federal government of $150 million. That is all the bill does with respect to money.

Mr. Sinclair: It is a bill to build a trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Fulton: The expenditure of $150 million is the only authorization with respect to money which the bill contains. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia does not vary in any sense the over-all commitment for the expenditure of money which is provided by the bill. It changes the details as to how the money will be spent, but it does not change the over-all commitment. It does not upset the balance of ways and means, or impose upon the treasury, if accepted, the obligation of raising further money by taxes, because the government is still committed to the expenditure of only $150 million.

The matter introduced into the argument put forward by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and repeated by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, raised an entirely new question. It raised the question whether $150 million is going to be sufficient to finish this highway. That is not involved in the argument or in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia. Since the resolution and the bill, as to ways and means, is limited only to the expenditure of $150 million, and the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia does not vary that amount, I submit that the amendment is in order.

Mr. Byrne: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I certainly cannot see how it will be possible for the dominion government to be assured of a trans-Canada highway which includes Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, and, as I believe was suggested this morning, Vancouver island from north to south, unless they are assured that the provincial governments are going to pay fifty per cent of their share, as was outlined by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply yesterday.

When he moved the second reading of this bill, the minister indicated that there would be certain specifications that would have to be lived up to. They may vary in different provinces, but we shall at least have a two-lane highway and not a cow trail; that was the intention of the bill. The cost is estimated at $300 million, and that is the basis on which this committee is discussing the entire problem; the federal government is proposing to pay $150 million.

If it is determined that the provinces are going to pay only $75 million, then we have a $250 million highway and not a $300 million highway. At least we are cutting down from $300 million. Therefore we shall not have the highway that is anticipated by the $300 million figure. In order to ensure that there will be a two-lane highway from coast to coast, this government will ultimately have to pay more than $150 million, if it has been determined that the provinces are desirous of cutting down on the contract. I cannot see how the group that are putting forward this amendment can be so narrow in their outlook on the whole question, and I submit that it is out of order.

Mr. Fulton: There is a citation here to which I think your attention should be directed, Mr. Chairman. It is found in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, starting at page 165, paragraph 559:

> The constitutional principle which vests in the crown the sole responsibility of incurring national expenditure, forbids an increase by the commons of a sum demanded on behalf of the crown for the service of the state. This principle, however, is apparently disregarded when the recommendation of the crown is given to a resolution empowering the expenditure of public money which, framed in general terms, places no limitation on the amount of expenditure to be authorized by the resolution.

The resolution on which the bill is based is drawn in general terms; it places no limitation upon the amount of money to be spent to implement the resolution. It has already been read, and therefore I will not repeat it, but I would refer you, Mr. Chairman, to page 2033 of Hansard, where the resolution is recorded.

The point of order therefore is this. In our contention the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia will not in fact increase the amount to be spent by the federal government; it will still leave it at $150 million. But even if it did, and even applying the arguments of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, the resolution being framed in general terms and placing no limitation upon the amount of money to be spent, according to citation 559, to which I referred you, sir, the amendment would still be in order.

The Chairman: The bill is a money bill. It provides for the expenditure of money. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia increases the financial responsibility of the government. The amendment, if agreed to, would place upon the shoulders of the government responsibility for increasing the amount of money to be spent. An amendment of that kind cannot be moved by a private member. I refer hon. members to citations 453 and 458, third edition of Beauchesne.

The proposed amendment would place upon the government an increased financial responsibility, and cannot be moved by a private member. Therefore I rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Knowles: Because I believe that citation does not apply at all, I must appeal your ruling to the house.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

> When Bill No. 194 was under consideration in committee of the whole, Mr. Argue moved that clause 4, subclause 2, be amended by deleting therefrom the words "fifty per centum" and by substituting therefor the words "seventy-five per centum." The chairman ruled the amendment out of order on the ground that it increased the financial responsibility of the government.
>
> Whereupon Mr. Knowles appealed from the ruling of the chairman.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

> Mr. Dion, chairman of the committee of the whole, reports that the committee was considering section 4(2) of Bill 194, to encourage and to assist in the construction of a trans-Canada highway. Mr. Argue, seconded by Mr. Knight, moved that said section 4(2) be amended by deleting therefrom the words "fifty per centum" and by substituting therefor the words "seventy-five per centum."
> The chairman ruled the amendment out of order in that it increased the financial responsibility of the government. From this ruling the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and others, appealed.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

And the house having resumed in committee:

On section 3—Agreements with provinces.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Is there an understanding with each of the ten provinces indicating that they are prepared to enter into agreements under this legislation?

Mr. Winters: No, there is no understanding.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): If one province refuses to enter into an agreement, will that mean that the whole undertaking will be blocked?

Mr. Winters: I do not think it is fair to anticipate that situation. In our public statements we have said that this is a national project, and if all the provinces do not participate, it will not be a national project and would have to be considered in that light.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Will the agreements with the provinces indicate the termini of the trans-Canada highway in the respective provinces?

Mr. Winters: That will be one of the things defined in the agreements.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What is the proposal with regard to branch trans-Canada highways? When the original trans-Canada highway was laid down in Nova Scotia, one of the terminals was at Louisburg, in the eastern portion of the province. As I have said on other occasions, the trans-Canada highway should go to Cape Breton in order to tie up with the highway in Newfoundland. Will this particular branch road in Nova Scotia, and the highway in New Brunswick which connects with Prince Edward Island, be considered as parts of the trans-Canada highway, and will payments be made to those provinces in connection therewith?

Mr. Winters: Any highway that becomes a part of the trans-Canada highway will be considered when provincial assistance is being given.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): That road would be considered as a branch of the trunk road in the province?

Mr. Winters: Not necessarily. It will depend upon what Nova Scotia decides in respect to its trans-Canada highway. If it decides that the highway should run from the east coast of Cape Breton Island to the New Brunswick-Nova Scotia border on the west, payment will be made accordingly.

Trans-Canada Highway

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Has the minister received any authority since yesterday to lay on the table the correspondence with Nova Scotia? We are being asked to approve a policy involving the construction of 5,000 miles of trunk highway, representing an expenditure of $150 million of federal money and $150 million of provincial money, and this correspondence is being withheld. If the minister has not received any authorization since yesterday, I would ask him to lay on the table of the house that portion of the correspondence emanating from the federal government and his department. I should like to have that portion of the correspondence laid on the table.

Mr. Winters: I have still received no permission from Nova Scotia to table the correspondence. In reply to the request that the federal government table the letters originating with it, I believe it would be unfair to the province, on the ground that the letters from the federal government would clearly imply what is contained in the letters originating with the province of Nova Scotia, and thus such action would not conform to the spirit of the wishes of the government of that province.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I do not agree with the minister. He is making commitments on behalf of parliament involving a major policy and a very large sum of money. I feel that we are entitled to know what commitments he has made to the province of Nova Scotia or to any other province, the correspondence with which has not been laid on the table.

Mr. Winters: There have been no commitments, nor will there be any until the agreements are entered into.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): If there are no commitments, there are proposals made by the minister to the respective provinces, and I should like to have a copy of them.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Does the minister refuse to lay the correspondence on the table?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, of course.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to have the "yes" from the minister.

Mr. Winters: I have no power to act on behalf of the government of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Knowles: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. Abbott: Open a law office.

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister need not scowl, because it is the same point of order he raised last night, except that in this instance the citation supports my contention. Last night the Prime Minister wanted the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to lay on the table private letters which he was citing.

Mr. St. Laurent: I deny that positively. I made no attempts to have any private correspondence laid on the table. I said that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, having declared frankly that he was not prepared to lay the letter on the table or to say from whom it emanated, was not in order in reading it to the house. I objected to the reading of the letter. I did not ask that it be tabled.

Mr. Knowles: It amounts to the same thing.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles: You would think those members who want to go home for Christmas would not interrupt so much.

Mr. St. Laurent: I may inform the hon. member that if he wants to stay here for Christmas, we will oblige him.

Mr. Knowles: I don't mind. It is the nation's business we were elected to attend to.

The Prime Minister raised a point of order and objected to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar reading a letter which he was not prepared to lay on the table. During the course of the debate on the point of order the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar read citation 316 from Beauchesne, second edition.

The Chairman: Order. That was decided yesterday; it is finished.

Mr. Knowles: I am now rising on a point of order, namely, that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply has refused to meet the request of the hon. member for Cumberland to lay on the table a public document which he has cited, namely, his own letter.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Knowles: Citation 316 reads:

> It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the table of the house, if it can be done without injury to the public interest. The same rule, however, cannot be held to apply to private letters or memoranda.

The rest of the citation is there, but I do not need to read it. It makes it clear that it does not apply to private letters or memoranda, but that it does apply to public documents. Perhaps I should have read the rest of the citation, because it refers to letters to which a minister of the crown had referred in the United Kingdom parliament.

Mr. Winters: To the best of my knowledge —and I think I am correct in saying this—I have never referred in the house to letters I have written to the government of Nova Scotia in this connection.

Mr. Knowles: There has been a lot of talk about it.

Mr. Hansell: I should like to ask the minister a question. The effect of an answer which he gave a few moments ago was that it would not be fair to anticipate something or other. When the government brings down legislation of this kind, it appears to me they should anticipate every possible angle. My question to him may involve some anticipation. The amount that the federal government is putting up is fifty per cent of that which each province will provide. Suppose a province cannot put up the required fifty per cent. What is going to happen? I have it in mind that the provinces already have certain plans prepared for highway construction covering a number of years, or at least for the next couple of years. Is it possible that these provinces may hold up the trans-Canada highway program because they have no additional money to apply to the program contemplated by the present bill? If they use their money for trans-Canada highway construction, then I am afraid a good deal of secondary road work in the provinces will go by the board for a few years.

It is one o'clock, and perhaps I have said enough at the moment. The minister can reply later. I should like to say a little more on this point.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Hansell: To revert to what I was saying when the committee rose at one o'clock, it is proposed to spend $150 million on this highway over what might consequently prove to be a period of seven years. The provinces will put up fifty per cent of the cost, which will mean another $150 million coming from the provinces. I see a difficulty in that.

Supposing the provinces have already made plans for a highway program to cover the next two or three years. I believe some of the provincial governments look several years ahead, and plan accordingly. I shall give you an example of what I have in mind. Suppose when construction of the trans-Canada highway commences a province has decided to spend $10 million on its over-all highway program; so much is allotted to first-class, hard-surfaced highways; so much for second-class gravelled highways, and so much for third-class or market roads which are only graded. This program calls for an expenditure of $10 million for that year. The dominion government then says it proposes to spend $5 million in that province on the trans-Canada highway in that year. The provincial government may say that will mean we shall have to get another $5 million from some place. We have already planned a $10 million program, so where are we going to get this $5 million. We cannot raise that much. Has the government anticipated a situation of that kind? What will they propose if that happens?

I am afraid that in such a situation the province may say, "We will have to cut our program in half and take $5 million from what we proposed to spend in some other part of the province, and put it on the trans-Canada highway so that we can get $5 million from the federal government this year". I rather favoured the amendment that was proposed by the member for Assiniboia, because if the provinces are to put up fifty per cent, will it not mean that they will have to depreciate part of their over-all program for municipal and secondary roads which are needed. In some cases, perhaps the provincial population needs those roads more than the trans-Canada highway. I know what happens in some of these provinces, because I live in one of them. Alberta has some good hard-surfaced roads, which were built in the hope of encouraging the tourist trade. We will not criticize that. There are some people, however, who do not live near those highways and they say, "What about us?" Those people live there all the time, and have to take their stock or grain to market. The tourist does not live in that province. Whether or not the criticism is justified, I am unable to say; but if any province, because of lack of funds, has to divert funds from its highway program in order to back the dominion government in building the trans-Canada highway, then there may be trouble brewing from certain sections of the public.

I should like to know whether the minister has anticipated any such thing, and how that situation will be met. I know the minister can say he has confidence in the provinces; he has always received co-operation from them and does not expect such a situation to arise. I should like some expression from the minister about that.

Mr. Winters: There were quite a number of suppositions in the statement made by the hon. member for Macleod. He said something about the provincial governments backing the federal government in its approach to this problem. From the outset I have felt, and I believe the members of the house have felt, it was the other way around; that the federal government was backing the provincial governments in the construction of projects that would be theirs upon completion. I have no doubt that the provinces will be able to program their highways during the next seven years, so that they will be able to take full advantage of the assistance being made available by this bill.

Mr. Johnston: I should like to say a few words about this matter, but I am not going to make any extended remarks. I believe it is generally recognized that what we want in Canada is a permanent highway. If I were the minister, I would not consider for one moment anything that would lessen the standard of our roads. I believe that is one thing about which we must be extremely careful. We must see that every portion of the highway is built up to the required standard, so that it will last.

There has been a good deal of talk about the fifty per cent contribution by the federal government and fifty per cent by the provincial government. As I said when I was speaking the other day, I believe that the percentage contributed by the federal government is too low. I suggested that a 66⅔ per cent contribution by the federal government would be more appropriate. I shall not argue about that, because I think the government has decided on that amount. When the provinces meet, perhaps they will be able to thresh that out with the federal government. The contribution of fifty per cent by the provincial government is going to bear heavily upon some provinces. I am thinking of the province of British Columbia, in which this road will have to be built through the sides of mountains. A great deal of the work to be done is going to be done through solid rock, and that is likely to be expensive.

On the other hand, British Columbia has a decided advantage. In the first place, the problem of drainage is almost negligible, while the problem of drainage for road construction on the prairies is a considerable item. After the capital expenditure has been made for the construction of this road through the rock in British Columbia, that road should be good for one hundred years. It will be built on a rock foundation. There are sections of British Columbia through which the road might run where repair work would be required, and I wish to speak about that. Those would be the sections in which the rivers flooded.

A good illustration of what I have in mind is the new road just completed from Hope to Princeton. If I recall correctly, newspaper reports state that a large portion of that road has been washed out. I want to speak about that particularly. After this road has been built across the prairies, it will not last nearly as long as the road constructed through the rocky sections of British Columbia. The federal government contributes fifty per cent of the capital cost of the construction of the road through that rocky section. We hope they will be more generous and raise it to 66⅔ per cent. After the road has been constructed on the prairie, and certain sections of British Columbia which probably have the same type soil, a tremendous amount of money will be needed for maintenance. Supposing the section of the road from Princeton to Hope were considered as part of the trans-Canada highway, and the federal government had made its contribution of fifty per cent. Now a large section of that road is already washed out. Who is going to rebuild it? We want a trans-Canada highway which is going to be permanent. Aside from the contribution made toward capital construction, I think that in all fairness the federal government should contribute fifty per cent of the maintenance charges. I am not saying that to put the federal government on a spot or anything like that. There does not need to be any alteration of this bill. But the point is that unless some provision is made whereby there will be co-operation with the provinces on the financial basis in regard to maintenance, we are going to run up against some serious difficulties.

There could not be a better example of that than the road from Hope to Princeton. I had the pleasure of going over part of that road this year before it was completely constructed, and believe me, it was a tough engineering project; but there was a beautiful road there. Now a great storm comes along and overnight it is washed out. As the bill now stands, the federal government has made no provision to assist British Columbia in rebuilding that section which was washed out, through no fault of their own. As to this highway, I am not going to criticize the government too much—and I emphasize the word "too"—on the fifty per cent financial contribution toward capital expenditure, but I am going to criticize it most severely for failing to put in the bill a provision whereby it will contribute fifty per cent of the maintenance. That is a serious thing, and we should take it into consideration now.

Mr. Green: Subsection 2 of section 4 puzzles me a bit. It reads as follows:

> The contributions paid to a province under this section shall not exceed fifty per centum of the cost to the province of the construction of the highway as determined by the governor in council.

Does that mean that the governor in council can decide, first, what figure is to be taken as the cost of construction and, second, what proportion of that cost is to be paid by the dominion? I think that is the meaning as the section reads; in other words, it means that the cabinet is taking the final decision as to the cost of the road built by the provinces and as to what percentage of that cost will be paid by the dominion. Will the minister explain the intention with regard to that clause?

Mr. Winters: The clause is intended to enable the federal government to provide fifty per cent of the cost of construction of a highway; the costs, and what determines costs, to be determined by the governor in council.

Mr. Green: In other words, the cabinet have the final say as to what the road costs the province. That is not a matter of agreement between the dominion and a province.

Mr. Winters: It is more a matter of what items go into costs. Once it has been established what items go into costs, it is clear under the terms of this bill that the federal government will pay half.

Mr. Green: Is the government planning to pay the same percentage of cost to each province or will one province get fifty per cent and another province get say thirty-five per cent? Is it the intention that they shall all get exactly the same percentage of the cost of construction?

Mr. Winters: That is the intention, Mr. Chairman, yes.

Mr. Higgins: I should like to ask the minister if he has received a proposal to dam the strait of Belle Isle. This is entirely on the highway question. If he does not know about it, I will explain it to him later. Perhaps he has received a request. The only other matter about which I wish to ask is this. What happens in the event of a province signing this agreement and not carrying out the agreement within the specified period whereas some other province completes the full agreement? Does the province that completes the agreement get paid whereas the first province, we will say, spoils the whole scheme?

Mr. Winters: It is proposed to pay for work completed; and as the work progresses and the mileage is completed to the standard required, payments will be made.

Mr. Higgins: What about the damming of the strait of Belle Isle?

Mr. Winters: I do not believe that matter comes within the ambit of this bill.

Mr. Higgins: I am quite serious, Mr. Chairman. I notice that there is a press dispatch of November 28 which reads as follows:

> The Saguenay chamber announced that it has sent on to the federal government a resolution asking that trans-Canada highway plans include a 900-mile road along the St. Lawrence north shore from Quebec to Blanc Sablon.
>
> The resolution recalled that the theory of blocking the strait of Belle Isle, nine miles wide at Blanc Sablon, has been discussed in Quebec province.

Has the minister received any such request?

Mr. Winters: No, I have not.

Mr. Higgins: Does he propose to do anything about it, if he does?

Mr. Pinard: Before this clause carries I wish to say a few words in support of the remarks that were made yesterday by the hon. member for Levis. I think that the minister will not be surprised if I agree with the suggestion made by my colleague that in negotiating with the province of Quebec or rather with the government of the province of Quebec the minister should insist that the Sir Wilfrid Laurier highway which commences in my constituency form part of the project of the trans-Canada highway. In addition to offering many other advantages, this highway is I think in keeping with the spirit of the legislation which is to make provision for building a road by the shortest route from east to west in each province of Canada. I believe that every member from the district of Montreal, as well as every member from Quebec, will agree that the shortest highway from Montreal to Quebec must go along the south shore. This will not be denied even by those who favour the suggestion that a trans-Canada highway must go through Three Rivers. Even if this trans-Canada highway goes through the home town of the Quebec premier, I think the autonomy of the province of Quebec will be preserved just the same.

There is another advantage in using the Sir Wilfrid Laurier boulevard in this project. There might be brought about a solution to the problem of tolls on the Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges, which span the St. Lawrence at Montreal. I have just a word or two to add to that, Mr. Chairman. I think the minister would not allow the users of the trans-Canada highway to be forced to pay tolls when they cross these bridges in order to reach the Sir Wilfrid Laurier highway.

In conclusion, I suggest that in discussing an agreement with the province of Quebec, the minister should realize that the spirit of the legislation would be preserved if this good road were used. It was begun during a Liberal regime in the province of Quebec and I think the minister would be well advised if he would allow this road to continue, in that way adding to the project one section of good highway.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: May I say to the hon. member for Portneuf that if he wishes to reply to the remarks made by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville, he could perhaps more appropriately do so on section 5.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Chairman, my remarks will not be lengthy. I just do not agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat when he says that the shortest way will be through Laurier boulevard. The shortest way would be on the north shore, especially through Three Rivers and through my home town on the north shore of the St. Lawrence. Because of the announcement made yesterday about an important discovery in my county it would be wiser to go through the north shore, to Three Rivers and Quebec.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Some latitude has been allowed to discuss the route. Under no section of this bill can the route be discussed. From now on I would ask hon. members to confine their remarks to the clause under discussion, which is clause 4, "Contributions to provinces."

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): That is why I am rising.

The Deputy Chairman: I call on the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: Why the necessity for the words in the last part of subsection 2 which read as follows: " . . . as determined by the governor in council?" The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra asked a question about this and I am uneasy over the minister's answer. The subsection reads in full as follows:

> The contributions paid to a province under this section shall not exceed fifty per centum of the cost to the province of the construction of the highway as determined by the governor in council.

I can see no reason for these words, because section 3 of the bill clearly lays down the procedure which will be followed in determining the cost of the construction, and that cost has to be determined in accordance with the agreement arrived at between the dominion and the respective provinces. The agreements provide for, among other things, the right of the minister to inspect the tenders for the construction of the road; the right of the minister to inspect the road while it is being constructed; the method of determining the cost of construction; the amount of the contributions and the examination, inspection and audit of all construction costs and accounts. Therefore the method of determining the costs of construction is covered in the agreement. In addition, the minister has the right to inspect the work while it is in progress to make sure that it is being carried out efficiently, and to examine all contracts, and so on, and make certain that there is no room for overexpenditure or careless expenditure.

In view of that clear right of supervision which is given, and the provision for determining the costs of construction in the agreement, it seems to me that it would be quite unfair and unnecessary to give the overriding power to the governor in council under section 4 to determine what is the actual cost of construction. I would be inclined to recommend that the words should be taken out of the bill, but before doing so I would be much obliged to the minister if he would let us know why he considers these words must be in the bill.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): I do not want to add to the difficulties of the minister, which seem to increase with every minute of the discussion. There is one well recognized fact. After the Rockies, the most beautiful scenery in Canada is to be found in the Matapedia valley and on the Gaspe peninsula. I have the honour to represent the Matapedia valley, but not Gaspe. I will not ask the minister to see to it that the highway goes through Matane; but, as I understand, it is the entire responsibility of the provincial governments to decide on the route to be followed. If the minister considers one fact, so far as our part of the country is concerned there is a road already through Matapedia on the way to Campbellton in the maritimes. That has already been built. It will be much easier to go from Riviere du Loup to Campbellton, and then to Edmundston, where my colleague was recently elected, and we should see that that route is followed if we have any influence whatever with Mr. Duplessis in Quebec.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister answer my question?

Mr. Winters: The provision for determination of costs by the governor in council was put in the bill as an added safeguard. I think it is pretty evident that where payments are being made of the order contemplated by this bill every precaution should be taken, and in fact every right is reserved by the governor in council to determine what the costs are.

Mr. Fulton: But the right to examine and to safeguard against extravagance is contained in section 3. It is provided there that the right will be exercised under the terms of the agreement. Presumably the agreement has to be arrived at by negotiation.

The provision that the minister has in mind to safeguard the expenditures of federal funds could be inserted and should be inserted in the agreement, and that is what is contemplated in section 3. That having been done, and the provinces having carried out their obligations in accordance with the terms of the agreement, it seems to me that it is not right, nor is it necessary, to insert a further provision which gives the governor in council the right to override or to veto or to disregard the costs as determined by the agreements and say, we determine that some other amount has been the cost of construction. Will the minister not agree that section 3 gives him adequate powers to safeguard against extravagance and to supervise the terms, methods and standards of construction?

Mr. Winters: No. I feel the provision is one that is necessary in the bill.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister give us some idea as to the proportion of the $150 million to be spent under this bill that will be spent under clause 4? I think the reason I ask this question is quite clear. This morning the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the purpose of the bill is to build a trans-Canada highway from coast to coast, at an estimated cost of $300 million for the project. One of the minister's objections to our proposals to increase the percentage to seventy-five per cent was that in his view it would defeat the purpose of the bill. My point is that if a large percentage of the $150 million is spent under sections other than section 4 it will simply mean that we shall not get a $300 million highway, and that would defeat the stated purpose of the bill. I think it is a fair question to ask whether $100 million, $125 million, or what amount, will be spent under section 4. Clearly if the whole $150 million is not spent under that section we shall not get a $300 million highway. I think it is fair to ask how much of a highway we are likely to get out of this bill.

Mr. Winters: I think I estimated on the resolution stage that it is now possible to go from one end of Canada to the other on sixty per cent hard-surfaced highway. If one estimates that the remainder of forty per cent is to be built new, then one can get some idea of that approach by assuming that we shall pay half the cost of reconstruction. I would not like to venture a guess as to what the new construction would average across Canada, but I would say that it would be somewhere between $60,000 and $80,000 a mile, on the average. It would not be relevant now because the routes have not been determined, but it gives hon. members an idea.

Mr. Knowles: I hope the minister will watch me closely, because I do not wish to put words in his mouth. Did I gather that only about forty per cent of this money will be spent on new highways? The minister used that figure, but I do not wish to misinterpret what he said. Nevertheless he pointed out that at the present time there is sixty per cent of hard-surfaced highway. All of us do not agree, but the implication was that we need to build only the other forty per cent. So it looks as though the proportion of that money to be used to build new highway, forty per cent of $150 million, will be matched by a similar amount by the provinces, but that is all that will be spent on new highway.

Mr. Winters: No, I would not think that would be a fair conclusion. I do not wish to be in the position of giving the house information that will not be borne out by developments. I wish to make it clear that the routes have not been established. There are undoubtedly many places where there is now hard-surfaced highway which will have to be completely rebuilt. I do not know about that. I would say a great deal of the money will be spent on new construction.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Contributions in respect to highways previously constructed.

Mr. Hatfield: Will any part of the trans-Canada highway started in 1931 be accepted from the provinces as part of their share of this plan?

Mr. Winters: It might be. That is not a limiting qualification. If the provinces choose to put the trans-Canada highway over the route selected in 1931, we will not object to it. But we are not saying that they must do it.

Mr. Hatfield: Then we are going to have part a super-highway and part a super-cowpath?

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, I wish to get a little information, because probably my province is somewhat differently situated. Prior to 1930 we did not have a single yard of hard-surfaced highway in our province. During the thirties the Bennett government put into effect the building of certain portions of highway in different counties of the province. These were completed and paid for by the federal government.

In 1933 the Bennett government started what is now to be called this super-highway, and built from Borden a section of solid concrete for two and one-tenth miles. That was the beginning of what is now planned as the trans-Canada highway. This road, built of solid concrete, cost the federal government $48,000 for the two and one-tenth miles. Then, following that, in 1935 the Bennett government hard-surfaced the highway from Hunter River to Rustico, a distance of ten and a half or eleven miles, at not one cent of cost to the Prince Edward Island government.

These highways are still there. Prior to that time very few highways were built by the federal government. During wartime, however, some highways were built. The province would not be entitled to any definite payment for any that were built prior to 1935. They would not get fifty per cent of that back again, and then make a double payment.

However, the point I am making is that after 1935, and down to the present time, we have built 225 miles of hard-surfaced highway in our province. The hard-surfaced highway I mentioned, from Hunter River to Rustico, was purely a federal project, and the upkeep of it, of course, was turned over to the provincial government. All our highways built from that time—and the balance would be about 175 miles—would now come in for the fifty per cent payment from the federal government, when this bill goes through, and they begin the building of the trans-Canada highway. Am I correct in my understanding of this?

Mr. Winters: No, Mr. Chairman; the bill states quite clearly that with respect to a road already built the federal government will contribute to the cost to the province of the construction of the highway. So the amount paid by the federal government will be related to moneys expended on the highways already built by the province.

Mr. Wright: Where a grant will be made to a province for roads already constructed, is there any provision that they shall go ahead and do any further building at all on this trans-Canada highway? It seems to me that a province could conceivably, under this agreement, be paid for 500 miles of road which they have already constructed, with no obligation on their part to go ahead with any further work, or any connecting link of the trans-Canada highway. What provision is there for protection against that possibility?

Mr. Winters: There is no provision in the bill. The provinces can spend as they wish the moneys made available to them for work already carried out on the trans-Canada highway route.

[Mr. McLure.]

Mr. Wright: That seems to be a strange national highway plan, indeed, whereby we say to a province, "We will make you a grant of fifty per cent of the cost of a 500-mile highway you have already constructed in your province, with no obligation at all on your part to go ahead and complete the trans-Canada highway within your province." It seems to me this government should be protected by seeing that this plan is national in scope, and some provision should be made whereby provinces would have to co-operate at least to some extent by spending some money, themselves, to make the highway a trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Winters: The hon. member must keep in mind that some of the provinces have done more highway building than others. It would not be fair to those provinces to ignore that fact. I think the hon. member must know there is no province in Canada that will not be required to do a considerable amount of work on any route which will ultimately become the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Wright: There does not seem to be anything in this section to bear out what the minister has just said. There is no provision that any province shall have to construct any highway. The section states simply that this government will give to the provinces a grant of fifty per cent of any moneys they have spent on a section of the road which they may desire to be part of the trans-Canada highway —and without any obligation on their part to go ahead to complete any links which may be needed to complete the trans-Canada highway. Some provision should be made to protect this government in its objective of getting a complete trans-Canada highway. Great expenditures are to be made under this legislation.

Mr. Winters: I do not think the hon. member's fear is a valid one. This is an act to encourage the construction of a trans-Canada highway and if the work in any one province has not visualized an east and west route across the province then it is most unlikely that compensation would be paid for such work.

Mr. Green: This section deals solely with construction already done on roads which may be chosen as part of the trans-Canada highway. Can the minister tell us whether there are to be any agreements between the dominion and the provinces with regard to payments to be made for construction work already done? The act provides that agreements shall be entered into between the provinces and the dominion with regard to new construction, but I should like to know whether there will be agreements covering compensation for old construction.

Mr. Winters: That will be a matter of agreement with the provinces.

Mr. Green: Has an estimate been made of the amount that will have to be paid to the provinces for old construction? One would think that in arriving at this total figure the dominion government would have made an estimate of the amount of money that will have to be paid to the provinces for the construction of roads that become part of the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Winters: That depends entirely on the route selected.

Mr. Green: There are not a great many different routes. There are only three routes mentioned in British Columbia and one would think that the minister's officials would have made some estimate of the amount that will have to be paid to the provinces for old construction.

Mr. Winters: The officers of the department have been discussing with the provincial officials matters such as that, but until the route is determined nobody will be in position to say just what should be done.

Mr. Green: Can the minister not give us an approximate figure of what will be paid to the provinces for old construction?

Mr. Winters: No, I am sorry I cannot do so at this time.

Mr. Green: I think this is most important. Much has been said about the spending of $300 million to build a trans-Canada highway, but that is not the true picture. Any money that is paid to the provinces for old construction work need not be used for the further construction of a highway. Even if a province should spend the money that is paid to it on the trans-Canada highway, it still means that the dominion's contribution toward new work will be reduced by that amount. For example, if $50 million is paid to the ten provinces for work already done, then the dominion's contribution to new work will be only $100 million because of the ceiling provided for by the act. Therefore the total amount spent by the dominion and the provinces will be $200 million, not $300 million.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Green: I am referring to the money that will actually be spent on the highway from now on. There is not the slightest chance of $300 million being spent from now on to improve the highway because a large part of the money to be paid by the dominion will be paid to the provinces for old work. The total amount that will be spent on the highway during the next seven years is bound to be considerably less than $300 million because of what will be paid to the provinces for old work. I am sure the minister will agree that that statement is correct.

It is most important for us to have some idea of how much the dominion is going to pay the provinces. We will then know how much the dominion will have left of the $150 million to spend for new work. There is another fact that should be kept in mind. There is absolutely no obligation on the part of the provinces to spend on the trans-Canada highway what they receive for old construction. They can spend it on other highways, on government buildings or on anything they wish. The minister has said several times that he is not going to insist that the money paid to them shall be used only for this highway. If I am incorrect in that I wish the minister would correct me.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is repeating the argument he made the other day which was answered very ably by the hon. member for Vancouver South. There is no province in Canada which stands to gain more from this section than British Columbia. In the past British Columbia has tried to provide a first-class trans-provincial highway out of provincial funds. There may be other provinces which have not tried to do this. The argument of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is that British Columbia should be penalized because it has been progressive in providing a first-class highway within the province which will become part of the trans-Canada highway. The cost of constructing that highway will, under the agreement to be signed, become part of the cost of constructing the trans-Canada highway.

The province of British Columbia has expended this money in the construction of a first-class road across the province and it will be very glad to have paid back to it half the cost of that highway construction which may be incorporated into the route chosen for the trans-Canada highway. I am sure that our province will immediately use these proceeds to pay its half of the work which is yet to be done. I think this is a most reasonable provision. It certainly is a provision that will be of great help to our province.

The very example used by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra shows how impossible it would be for the minister to answer intelligently the question he asked. The hon. member has stated that there are three routes in British Columbia and then he wants an estimate of what will be paid to the province for the road already along the route. The hon. member knows that there is a very great deal of difference between the work already done on the Vancouver-Yellowhead route, the work done on the Vancouver-Kamloops-Kicking Horse route and the work done on the Vancouver-Crowsnest pass route. Only when the provincial government of British Columbia decides which route is going to be the route of the trans-Canada highway can any estimate be made of what has been expended in the past by the province.

As a British Columbia member I want to say that I think we in British Columbia are most fortunate in having this provision. Road building is very expensive in our province and it is only fair that the great amount of good road building which has been done by the provincial government on a trans-provincial highway, in the last ten years should be rewarded, and not penalized as it would be if payments were to start only after the agreement is signed.

Mr. Green: Fortunately I am not in the position of having to take second place to the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, or any other member from British Columbia, in my concern for my own province.

Mr. Sinclair: That is your opinion.

Mr. Green: I suggest that he and the other Liberal members from the province of British Columbia show that their first concern is to rush in to back up the government rather than to try to get some further benefit for British Columbia, and they have demonstrated that on more than one occasion.

Mr. Sinclair: I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra cannot cast aspersions upon members of the Liberal party from British Columbia. Liberal members from that province are as much concerned with its welfare as any others. I would also remind the hon. member that on the 27th of June last the people of British Columbia in great numbers showed their faith in the Liberal members, and in the policies of the Liberal party.

Mr. Green: I think a good many of the people of British Columbia have had their eyes opened since that time.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond raising a point of order?

Mr. Goode: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will please understand he is not speaking for the member for Burnaby-Richmond. I raise that point of order. He mentioned something about Liberal members not speaking for their province. I will speak for my province when the times comes, and any time the occasion arises.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. Green: I suggest the result of this policy may be that in the first place there will be so much money paid back to the different provinces that there will not be sufficient left in the dominion's grant to complete a first-class trans-Canada highway. I also suggest to the hon. member for Coast-Capilano that he would help his province a great deal more if, instead of getting up and saying "me too" to the proposal for a trans-Canada highway, he got up and advocated that the dominion should pay fifty per cent of the maintenance costs of the highway. In British Columbia the maintenance costs will be far higher than in any other part of Canada because of the mountainous nature of the province. Nevertheless we are to get no help whatever with the maintenance of the road. I should like to point out to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply that the provincial government of British Columbia this spring passed an act entitled an act respecting trans-Canada highways. It is provided therein that:

> 2. The lieutenant governor in council may from time to time:
>
> (a) Either alone or in conjunction with the government of the dominion institute and carry out such measures as may from time to time be considered practicable and necessary for the construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of trans-Canada highways—
>
> Plural.
>
> —in so far as they may be within the province;
> (b) Enter into any agreement with the government of the dominion with respect to provision for payment of a portion of the costs incurred by the government of the province in constructing, reconstructing, and maintaining trans-Canada highways in so far as they may be within the province.

The act provides for the sum of $5 million. The minister has not yet made clear what will be done in the case of reconstruction. I believe that some of the proposed trans-Canada highway in British Columbia was washed out a day or two ago. Where such damage is done and reconstruction is necessary, under the measure now before the house will the dominion give any help, or will that be solely the responsibility of the provincial government during this period of seven years?

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Green: I am not directing my question to the hon. member for Coast-Capilano. He is not an authority on the subject.

An hon. Member: You can't take it.

Mr. Green: I am asking the question of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply.

Mr. Sinclair: I want to pursue the point further just as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra wanted to pursue it. I am speaking now because the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra flung out a challenge with regard to the cost of maintenance in British Columbia. I want to tell the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that the government, following its election pledge, is doing just what it said it would do, that is aiding in the construction of a trans-Canada highway. It is doing it not because of the nattering and nagging of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, but because of the counsel and advice of Liberal members and associations across Canada. We say that the federal government is to be complimented for stepping into a field which after all is legally—and the hon. member is a lawyer of sorts—within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

An hon. Member: Pretty weak stuff.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, normally I do not mind what the hon. member for Coast-Capilano says in the course of a debate, but when he makes an insulting remark of that type, that an hon. member is a lawyer of sorts, I ask that he withdraw it.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, I will very gladly withdraw. Apparently he is not even a lawyer of sorts.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: I would ask the hon. member for Coast-Capilano to modify his remarks.

Mr. Sinclair: In deference to you, Mr. Chairman, I will modify my remarks.

Mr. Green: He has not withdrawn the remark.

The Deputy Chairman: I understand that the hon. member withdrew, and then he made an additional remark which I have just asked him to modify.

Mr. Green: He said he would modify it, but that is all he said.

Mr. Sinclair: I will not modify it; I will withdraw it. Getting back to my point, which was interrupted by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, we regard this measure as a great forward step. The federal government is now entering a field, which after all is a provincial one, and is generously saying: Yes, we will provide half the cost of a trans-Canada highway out of federal funds. We have not in our party these little minds which say: Oh, yes, this is good, but if we were in power we would do more; we would also pay half the maintenance cost. Members who have been in the house for ten years know that one of the standard methods of obstruction of the Tory party on any measure is to say: Yes, but if we were in power we would do a little more. I think on June 27 the people of British Columbia, as well as the rest of Canada, gave a pretty clear indication of approval of the policies of this government, and a part of that policy was assistance in the construction of a trans-Canada highway.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, could we not get back from British Columbia to the House of Commons in committee considering this bill? The purpose of the bill is to provide half the cost of a transcontinental highway. There are some provinces where there are portions of roads that may be used as a part of the transcontinental highway. It is intended that, with respect to those portions, their value as a part of the transcontinental highway will be taken into account so that the provinces may be reimbursed for a portion of what is already in existence, but not exceeding fifty per cent of its cost. There are some portions of road in the province of Quebec that may be a part of the transcontinental highway, and which are already hard surfaced. I do not think they would be up to the specifications required for the transcontinental highway. It may be that they will be worth a certain portion of what it would cost if there were nothing there, but it is only that portion that will be taken into account, and all that will be a part of the agreement with the province.

The province will determine where the highway is to go. Engineers will then determine how much has been done that is of value as a part of the highway and is up to the specifications required by the contract. For that value the governor in council will determine certain reimbursement to the provinces not exceeding fifty per cent of what it originally cost in any event. That is the scheme, and all this is to be a part of agreements with the provinces. We do not want to step into their field and tell them what they shall do or where they shall do it, but we say: If you want us to contribute to it as something that will be of national value, you have got to build it to a certain standard. If you like you can make it better than that standard, but you have got to build it to a certain standard, and it is only the portion of the cost up to that standard towards which we will make a contribution.

I do not believe we can have any estimate at this time, because a moment ago the hon. member listened to two of my good friends from the province of Quebec. One of them wanted the highway to be built on the south shore of the St. Lawrence, and the other wanted it to be built on the north shore of the St. Lawrence. There are some roads there which would be of some use as part of a transcontinental highway, but they were not built at the same time. The widths are not the same, and the curves are not the same. Many of the portions over which I have travelled would have to be improved to bring them up to the standard that will be required in our trans-Canada highway.

Until there has been a determination of where it will be, and an examination by provincial and federal engineers to determine the worth of existing portions of the road, or what it might cost to make a new road, we cannot have any estimate of how much will be spent in that way. In any event, it cannot be more than half the original cost. That clause was put in because it was felt it should not be more than the cost, and costs are apt to be higher today than they were when some of these portions of the road were built. We put that in as the ceiling, and the rest is to be determined after investigation by the engineers of its worth as an element in the national highway.

Mr. Green: The amounts are still indeterminate. One portion will be paid to the provinces for the work they have done, and another portion of this $150 million is for new construction. The government is not in a position to say roughly how much of each there will be?

Mr. St. Laurent: The government is not in a position to say, because it will depend upon the physical examination, made by competent engineers, of the work that has already been done. It was felt that would be the only fair way of dealing with it. You could not expect the province of Nova Scotia, for example, which has a lot of good highway that was built at great cost, to enter into a contract which would disregard that. If the province of Nova Scotia still has to make some outlay, it will want the value of the highway already constructed to be taken into account in estimating what it shall receive as its fifty per cent.

Mr. Green: The cost of what has already been made may run into a good many million dollars. Does the Prime Minister not believe it will run as high as $75 million or $100 million?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not know. I travelled from one ocean to the other, but most of it was by rail. I do not know how much good highway there is. I do know there is a good deal that has to be done if we are to have a good highway from one ocean to the other.

Mr. Green: I mean that the amount that has already been spent by the provinces on the highway may be as high as $75 million or $100 million.

Mr. St. Laurent: It will not necessarily be the amount that has been spent; that is the ceiling. The value of what has been produced may be as much as $50 million in a $300 million undertaking; I do not know. It is the value of what has already been produced that will be taken into account.

Mr. Green: Are the provinces to be paid on present values, or on the cost of the road when it was built?

Mr. St. Laurent: It must not be more than the cost, but it need not be the whole cost. I know of certain portions of highway in my province for which it would be quite unfair to pay half the cost because, as a portion of the trans-Canada highway, the value would not be anything like half of its original cost.

Mr. Green: Will the minister of reconstruction answer the question I asked a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, as to whether or not the dominion would pay half the cost of reconstructing the road if a portion should be destroyed during the seven years?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I believe each case would have to be considered on its merits. The extent of the destruction would have to be determined. I do not know anything about the particular case the hon. member raises, but that is a point that has to be considered.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for being genial enough to recognize me on my fifth attempt to gain the floor. This is not a beauty contest between the provinces, but is a national scheme to attempt to put Canada on the map, so to speak. A Canadian cannot go from one ocean to the other unless he goes through the United States. We paid for the Alaska highway. The Tory party seems to find many difficulties in the way of building a national highway across this country of which we are going to be proud.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Just let me speak, I am not through.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member knows that when he rises to discuss a clause—

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): If you will sit down a minute, I will take the floor.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I should like to remind the hon. member that he must discuss clause No. 5.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): I am about to do so. If you will sit down, I will take the floor.

The Deputy Chairman: This clause relates to contributions in respect of highways previously constructed.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): The gentleman asked two questions of the minister. He asked how much of the $300 million would be involved in paying expenditures on highways already constructed, and how much money would be available for the reconstruction of highways. I would suggest that this is no time to discuss how much money has been spent. We do not know. We do not even know how much we are going to have to budget for in the future. In other words, we should have a balance sheet from the provinces showing the expenditures they have made towards a national highway system. Then, we should have an assessment of what it will cost to complete that highway system and turn it into a trans-Canada highway. I humbly submit that this is no time to discuss money, when we have not those figures. A declaration was made by the minister, but we do not know whether it will go beyond that or whether it will go below that. I suggest that this discussion should end there because, after all, it is not a question of determining what has been spent by the provinces, nor is it a question of determining what the federal government will contribute in the future, until that assessment and balance sheet are available.

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to say one or two words on this matter. I would remind the committee that, except for intervening on points of order, this is the only time I have spoken on this bill during the long discussion that has taken place. I did not rise to speak, for two reasons: One is that I do not know a great deal about highways, and from the discussion I believe the hon. member who preceded me said the most effective word that has been said so far, that is that we do not know. We know very little about what the cost of this highway is going to be.

Another reason for my failure to speak is that I am not in the fortunate position in which many members of the house find themselves. They have had the advantage of an education, which enables them to hide their ignorance under a plethora of words. I have not had that advantage, so when I do not know anything about a subject I have to keep quiet. I do take issue, however, with a point that was made by several speakers, including the Prime Minister, that in this bill we were undertaking to pay half the cost of a trans-Canada highway. That, in my opinion, is not correct. We are undertaking to pay half the cost of a trans-Canada highway if that highway can be built for $300 million. We are limiting our contribution to it to $150 million. It is quite possible that that amount will not complete a trans-Canada highway. In addition to that, I think that the important thing in this connection—and I do not think we should hesitate to say it—is that we have at last started on the project. Having started on it, I rather think that we shall not leave it uncompleted, no matter who may be the government when this road is finally completed. Without reflecting on the part that anyone has taken in the debate so far, I think that we could dispense with a great deal of the debate on details about which we do not know much, inasmuch as the surveys have not been made which would give us the necessary information. As I say, I think we could leave that matter alone, and in that way we would get on faster with our work.

Mr. Noseworthy: As I understand this clause, the federal government proposes to reimburse the provinces for those sections of the highway which become part of the trans-Canada highway, in accordance with their value to the trans-Canada highway. From there on the government proposes to match dollar for dollar the expenditure of the provinces for new construction. What I want to ask the minister is this. Did he discuss with the provinces or did he take into consideration the possibility that instead of turning back say $10 million to a province to reimburse it for what it has already done, the federal government should make a beginning by taking the $10 million that the province has spent and saying: Here is $10 million to match what you have spent, to be spent on the trans-Canada highway under the supervision of the federal government as provided for in the act; and when that is done, from there on we will go dollar for dollar with you up to whatever amount the government decides.

In the Ontario correspondence I notice that the Ontario government claim to have spent $50 million on what they consider is the Ontario section of the trans-Canada highway. Let us suppose that the Ontario government is to get a grant of $25 million for their part, to reimburse them for what they have done. To my mind, it would advance the cause of the trans-Canada highway much better if the federal government made available for construction and improvement of the trans-Canada highway in Ontario whatever amount they might decide was coming to the Ontario government, under that project, and from there on go dollar for dollar with the province for new construction. Was that phase discussed or considered, or what is the minister's opinion?

Mr. Winters: That was an involved question, Mr. Chairman; I lost myself once or twice in it. I think the question was intended to find out whether or not money paid back to the provinces would be required to be applied against the completion of the highway. Was that it?

Mr. Noseworthy: My point was this. Instead of turning back $10 million or $15 million to the province in order to reimburse it, the federal government should take that money and spend it in that province on the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Winters: The provincial government in question is free to do that, Mr. Chairman; and in fact, I would imagine that in most instances it will do just that and apply to the completion of the highway moneys that will be reimbursed to it for work already done.

On section 6—Temporary employees.

Mr. Green: This section provides that the employees having to do with the trans-Canada highway are to be temporary ones; at least that is the way I read the section. That seems an unusual provision to put in a bill of this sort. Can the minister explain why that is done?

Mr. Winters: The reason is that this is a project of a temporary nature. It will be one that will require terms of office of varying lengths of time. From the start to the finish the project is of seven years' duration; but the work in the various provinces will differ in length of time taken. It seems that the best way to tackle the job would be to have temporary rather than permanent employees.

Mr. Green: In effect, then, this provision is written into the act because the government expects to be right out of the trans-Canada highway business at the end of seven years?

Mr. Winters: This is a particular bill to do a particular job. Beyond that, I do not care to comment.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—National parks.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us the approximate amount that will be required in the national parks to bring the roads in those parks up to the trans-Canada highway standard? They, of course, come entirely under the dominion?

Mr. Winters: No, I cannot answer that question, for two reasons. The first is that I do not know the route the highway will take. I do not like to refer back to that matter again; but the fact of the matter is that I do not.

Mr. Green: That is a good alibi.

Mr. Winters: It is not an alibi. It is a fact. The other reason is that I have not complete information on the condition of the roads through the national parks.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Report to parliament.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to ask the minister when we shall get information with respect to agreements entered into with certain provinces. I am particularly interested in Nova Scotia. A great deal is being expected of us in passing this bill involving a seven-year program, contribution by the dominion of $150 million and total expenditure of $300 million. We have a minimum of information coming from Nova Scotia. I would ask the minister when the agreement that he enters into with the respective provinces will be made public or will be made available to us, and when an announcement will be made as to the designating of the routes in the respective provinces.

Mr. Winters: I should imagine that most provinces will announce their routes once an agreement has been made. With respect to the tabling of the agreements, I can say that once the agreements have been finalized and entered into I shall have no objection to tabling them.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Any province can keep it dark. I hope the minister will not keep it dark from us.

Mr. Church: I notice that the last clause does not provide for a time limit. Is it fifteen days? Within what time is the annual report to be laid before the house? Will it include all matters in which rulings have been given accordingly under sections 8 and 9? Section 9 reads:

> The minister shall annually lay before parliament a report of all proceedings under this act for the preceding fiscal year.

It does not give a time limit. What is the time limit on this? Is it thirty days or ten days for the annual report?

Mr. Winters: As the hon. member has said, no time limit is specified in the act. I therefore would not wish to give parliament any undertaking beyond that contained in the act, and that is that an annual report will be tabled.

Mr. Church: Will it be a full report? Will the annual report include all the rulings given under this legislation?

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENTS PROVIDING FOR JOINT OPERATION OF HOUSING PROJECTS AND LOANS TO HOME OWNERS

The house resumed from Tuesday, November 15, consideration in committee of Bill No. 142, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944—Mr. Winters—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Terms of contract.

Mr. Fleming: Section 2 has a number of subsections. I suggest first of all, Mr. Chairman, that you might call the subsections. If you do that I think it may contribute to the orderliness of the discussion.

I wish to make this observation, Mr. Chairman. Subsection 1 is a belated step in the right direction. I am glad to see that progress is being made, because it has always seemed unfair that, as the law stood before, a man who was trying to assist himself by helping to build his own house was in fact being penalized in comparison with the man who was perhaps not making the same effort or was not able, for one reason or another, to do so. I hope that this particular provision, along with others, will be brought into effect for that reason as soon as possible.

Mr. Johnston: There is a question or two I should like to have cleared up. When discussing this matter in the house the other day, or even prior to that, I had occasion to ask the minister some questions regarding it. These questions were answered by a return which may be found in Votes and Proceedings, No. 14. Among the questions asked was this one:

> Under the National Housing Act integrated housing scheme is there a regulation covering a 25 per cent holdback of the proceeds of a joint loan to the builder building for sale?

The answer was a very decided no. The answer reads as follows:

> No. However, under the 1949 integrated plan the builder is required to transfer title to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at the floor joist stage of construction and is required to trustee with the corporation the purchaser's deposit or down payment. When the property is completed and the builder has executed a transfer of title to the purchaser the conveyance to the corporation is then cancelled and the purchaser's down payment is paid over to the builder. Prior to release of the trusteed deposit to the builder steps are taken to ensure that he has paid all carrying charges on the property up to date of completion, including interest on advances made under the mortgage loan, taxes and fire insurance premium; otherwise the equivalent of such carrying charges are deducted from the trusteed deposit.

The point that I wish to make is this. The minister stated definitely that there was no regulation regarding the 25 per cent deposit. That is borne out to a degree by the pamphlet which was issued by the integrated housing plan. My mind goes back, Mr. Chairman, to the bill that we passed the other day on Canadian trade-marks. This integrated housing plan of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation appears to me to be somewhat similar to a Canadian trade-mark. Therefore when people see this pamphlet issued by a government corporation they should be able to put some reliance in it, just as they can rely on goods which have been processed and which have a Canadian trade-mark upon them.

When I look at this pamphlet I find it says: "The integrated housing plan". The pages are not numbered, therefore I cannot give a page number; but the heading says: "Release of the customary builder's holdback". Let me just mention that for a moment, Mr. Chairman. Without doubt anyone would think that there was a holdback; otherwise why the heading? The following paragraph says:

> In the case of loans made under the integrated housing plan, there is no sales' holdback. However, a sum equal to the amount specified in the Mechanics' Lien Act of the province in which the project is built is generally retained until thirty-one days after the completion of the unit.

I do not know whether the minister misunderstood what I intended when I asked the question. I asked him:

> Under the National Housing Act integrated housing scheme is there a regulation covering a 25 per cent holdback of the proceeds of a joint loan to the builder building for sale?

He might have taken that to mean at this moment, and he said "No", which would be in accordance with this little pamphlet I quoted from. According to the pamphlet it would be correct, but according to the title it would be wrong. The hon. member for Battle River asks me what the name of the pamphlet is. It is called: "The Integrated Housing Plan." It is published by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, Ottawa, Canada, and the marks on it are RCM-3. The heading of the paragraph to which I referred reads: "Release of the customary builder's holdback". My question to the minister is: Was there a regulation governing that holdback? I am putting it in the past tense now.

Mr. Winters: No, Mr. Chairman, there was no holdback of which I am aware.

Mr. Johnston: The minister is qualifying it.

Mr. Winters: I am qualifying it. I am speaking from memory now. I do not recall any holdback.

Mr. Johnston: The minister has his officials in front of him. I want to get the point definitely established because there is a contradiction. I want to know whether there was a regulation governing that 25 per cent holdback. The minister ought to be able to ascertain definitely that there was not.

Mr. Winters: The answer is no.

Mr. Johnston: I mentioned the trade-mark in which the people of Canada place their faith. I hold in my hand a pamphlet issued by a government corporation, and it gives certain information. That information is given to the prospective purchasers. Surely they ought to be able to put some reliance in the statements issued by the government. The minister says "No".

Let me read from another pamphlet. The hon. member for Battle River asks me what the name of this one is. Do not let me confuse you: the name of this one is exactly the same as the other one. It is called "The Integrated Housing Plan, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation." This is published by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, Ottawa, Canada—RCM-3. It is exactly the same book, except that this one was issued when this housing project, particularly the one in Calgary, was under construction, and at a time when a great many other projects throughout the country were under construction.

The other one is a recent publication. Let me read from this one—and, incidentally, it has the stamp on it of the parliamentary library. That was the only place I could get it. I sent to Central Mortgage and Housing for the other one, and got it; but that was not the one with which I was concerned.

Now I turn to article 7, which deals with the same thing, and I read this heading: "Release of the customary builder's holdback". It is exactly the same heading as appears in the other pamphlet. But listen to what I read now:

Under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation regulations—

[Mr. Johnston.]

Under the regulations, mind you—

—a proportion of the proceeds of a joint loan to a builder building for sale is withheld until the house has been sold to a satisfactory purchaser. In the case of loans made under the integrated housing plan, the holdback is released on completion of the unit.

Now, I ask the minister again: Is there a regulation covering that?

The Deputy Chairman: I would ask the hon. member what he was reading from.

Mr. Johnston: It is a little confusing, I admit. The first time I read in regard to this subject was out of a booklet entitled "The Integrated Housing Plan" issued by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, Ottawa, Canada—with the identifying letters RCM-3 appearing thereon.

Mr. Blackmore: Is there a date ?

Mr. Johnston: No, no date on it. In that booklet it states very distinctly, in the heading of paragraph 7: "Release of the customary builder's holdback". Then the following paragraph goes on to describe that heading, and states that there is no holdback.

It was at that point I asked the minister if there was a holdback, or a regulation covering holdback. He told me at that time there was not. Then I took another booklet, just exactly the same heading, and issued by the same corporation. And under the same paragraph 7 the heading starts out in exactly the same way,—"Release of the customary builder's holdback". But in the paragraph following that it states definitely—well, just let me read it again so that there will be no misunderstanding—

Under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation regulations, a proportion of the proceeds of a joint loan to a builder building for sale is withheld until the house has been sold to a satisfactory purchaser. In the case of loans made under the integrated housing plan, the holdback is released on completion of the unit.

I want to know now from the minister if there is any regulation covering that holdback.

Mr. Winters: No, there is no regulation covering that holdback.

Mr. Johnston: Well then, can the minister tell us this: Why is this government-authorized pamphlet, issued by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, given out to the public? When they buy a house they see there is a regulation holding back 25 per cent for their safety. Then the government tell us there is no such regulation. What are the public going to expect? What can they expect? What security have they, when they rely upon a statement of the government, for their protection, when they buy these houses? They assume they have behind them a reliable organization, such as the government. Then they find they are fleeced out of every cent they have got. When they try to get restitution the government says, "That's just your tough luck. There was no regulation. Although we said there was, that was just to kid you. Now there is none."

This is an exceedingly serious situation. The other day we passed legislation to place a Canadian trade-mark on goods processed in this country, so that when the people of Canada see that government stamp on it they will know they are getting something worth while. Yet, here the government put out a publication, with their stamp on it, and it does not mean a thing. In fact, it is a lie, which has been admitted by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I think I should say I have admitted nothing of the kind.

Mr. Gillis: It is a typographical error.

Mr. Johnston: Well, then, would you tell me which of these booklets is the authentic one? Which is truthful, and which is the lie?

Mr. Winters: I would ask, if the hon. member wishes me to pursue it further, to have the booklets sent to me, at which time I shall be glad to look them over.

Mr. Johnston: I had some difficulty getting them. However, I shall be pleased to do so, if the minister will undertake to send one back to the library, where I am charged for it.

The Deputy Chairman: I would point out to the hon. member for Bow River that the more appropriate time to discuss these booklets printed under the authority of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation would be when the estimates of the minister are before the committee of supply. I offer that only as a suggestion, because from his reply it would appear that the minister does not have at hand all the information pertaining to these booklets. When the estimates are before the committee the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will be here.

Today we have before us an amending bill which does not deal with the administration of the housing act. The section before the committee is somewhat limited in scope. I am not saying the hon. member has no right to discuss the two booklets, but I do suggest that since he wants all the information the more appropriate time to get it would be when the estimates are before committee of supply.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I have no desire at all to hold up the bill. I do wish to get the information, however, because it is exceedingly important, so far as I am concerned. I am not asking the questions out of idleness, nor do I ask them to embarrass the minister. I have a very definite purpose in mind. Perhaps I need not go further than that in my explanation. I have completed that part with respect to the leaflets.

I would now turn to an answer I received in reply to another question. I believe this would be the most appropriate time to ask it, because I do not know of any vote in the estimates under which it could be discussed—unless, of course, the administration item. While I am on this subject I have only one more question to ask—and then I shall not interfere for some time with the progress of the discussion.

Mr. MacInnis: Progress?

Mr. Johnston: It is progress in the construction of houses, in the long run, I hope. The other question I want to ask arises out of a series of questions I asked some time ago. The first question and answer were as follows:

> Under the N.H.A. integrated housing scheme is there an inspection and/or an appraisal fee of $20 permitted?
>
> Yes.

The next question and answer were as follows:

> If so, what work is to be performed in order to earn this fee?
> When completing an application for a National Housing Act loan the applicant agrees to pay an appraisal fee of $20 for which the lending institution makes an inspection of the site and completes an appraisal of the proposed property. The lending institution inspects the property at various stages of construction to assure that standards under the National Housing Act and the plans and specifications are being substantially followed and to determine the extent to which mortgage moneys may be advanced to the borrower.

My other questions were as follows:

> If so, what work is to be performed in order to earn this fee?
>
> Must this $20 fee apply to each individual's property?
>
> Must there be a properly written inspection and/or appraisal form made for each individual's property before this fee is chargeable?
> To whom is the fee payable?

If the work is performed for the $20, I have no kick, but in many cases the work is not performed and that is why I am objecting. I am not going to hesitate to name the mortgage company I have in mind because I do not want it to become confused with others which are performing what I would call a legitimate service. The Manufacturers Life has received these $20 payments and they have not raised a finger as far as inspection is concerned because there is not yet a board laid on the lots. However, they have charged $20 as an inspection fee. They have a number of houses to build and the fee of $20 is charged in every case, whether there has been construction or not. That amount is charged on the individual mortgage. As I say, no inspection work has been done because in some cases there is only a basement. There could not possibly be any decision as to whether the plans and specifications have been followed. It looks to me like plain highway robbery. People are being fleeced out of their money and that should not be permitted.

I would rather see an inspection fee of $100 charged, provided qualified inspectors were employed and were carrying out their duties properly. I do not think that would be too much to pay to see that the houses are built according to the plans and specifications. I am not criticizing the size of the fee; I am criticizing the niggardly way in which it is earned.

As has been pointed out, it was not earned at all, it was just a clear case of stealing. It would be worth while to have a proper inspector inspect these buildings. If that were done the government would save money and so would the people. The other day the hon. member for Halton said that he did not see why the minister should be so cautious as to bring forward amendments which the whole house except the hon. member thought were worth while in order to safeguard people who are taking advantage of this National Housing Act. The hon. member referred to the little affair in Calgary which caused all the commotion, but that is not so. The conditions that exist in Calgary exist all over Canada. All the hon. member for Halton has to do is to pick up the daily newspaper and he will see that they exist right here in Ottawa.

Why? As I have said so many times, it is that the government has not competent inspectors. The whole blame right here in Ottawa can be laid to that fact. I am not critical of the $20 inspection fee. As I say, I would gladly make it $100 provided a proper inspection was made of these places. It is not too late for the minister to take that into consideration and see that these inspectors really earn their money. It would save the people of this country millions of dollars and would save the government a lot of headaches.

Has the minister an answer to my first question with regard to the twenty-five per cent holdback? He has seen the pamphlets and I am sure he agrees that I read them properly, and I should like some explanation.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Mr. Winters: I have been listening to the hon. member and I have not had an opportunity to read the pamphlets. I shall do so during the recess at six o'clock and give him more information after we resume at eight o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, as a guidance to the committee will you state whether you are calling the subsections seriatism, because if you do not I am afraid we are going to become very confused. Section 2 has ten subsections which cover a wide variety of subjects, and I suggested therefore that they be called subsection by subsection.

The Deputy Chairman: I have considered the hon. member's suggestion and I have come to the conclusion that if it were agreeable to the committee we could proceed according to the titles in the margin. For instance, the title to subsection 1 is, "Terms of contract", under which you have paragraph (a) and subsection 2 and subsection 3. Then the next subsection covers additional loans by the corporation to home owners and home purchasers. If it is agreeable we can proceed in that way.

Mr. Fleming: I do not think that would cover the point. The first marginal heading covers a number of different points.

The Deputy Chairman: If the committee is agreeable we can take it subsection by subsection.

Mr. Gillis: Am I right in understanding that section 1 has been carried and we are now dealing with section 2, subsection 1?

The Deputy Chairman: That is correct.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to get some information with regard to co-operative housing, which is something new in the act.

Mr. Winters: That comes under subsection 6.

Mr. Gillis: I want to get certain information from the minister as to those cases where owners are building their own homes and obtain loans under the National Housing Act. I am particularly interested in the co-operative angle because most of the building is done on that basis in the section of the country from which I come, and will be in the future. A group secures a parcel of land, and the individual builds his own home. Under the amendments to the act I understand the government intends to allow a certain percentage of the loan for the labour put into the building of the home. At the present time a person building his own home cannot secure the percentage of the loan allotted for labour until such time as the house is completed, or the project in the case of a co-operative. That places the group and the individual in a position where they must secure other credit.

The dealers who supply lumber and other materials in these communities are not large, and they are obliged to carry a huge volume of credit which they are not really able to handle. Can the minister tell me whether under the proposed arrangement the percentage of the loan allowed for labour can be supplied at any stage of the construction of the property instead of waiting until it is completed? It places the individual or the group in an awkward position, and also works considerable hardship on the suppliers of the necessary materials to build houses.

Mr. Winters: I gather that what the hon. member is seeking is something in the nature of an advance. There is no provision for any such arrangement under this measure.

Mr. Gillis: I am not seeking an advance at all. At the present time you lend up to eighty per cent, but in addition to that, where a person is building his own home, or a co-operative is carrying on a project, they do the building themselves, thus eliminating the labour cost. Nevertheless they cannot secure the portion of the loan granted for the labour performed until the whole thing is completed. That is what is holding them back. I do not know what the percentage is. It places the group or the individual in a position where they must secure additional credit from the suppliers of materials. When there is considerable building of that kind, it places dealers in a position where they cannot provide the necessary credit. Could some arrangement be made whereby whatever you lend to pay for the labour cost could be included in the original loan in order to enable them to carry on with the building, instead of having to wait until the thing is completed?

Mr. Winters: Under the normal arrangements of mortgage financing there is enough held back to enable the home to be completed. It is also difficult to tell how much owner-labour content is in the house before it is completed. It is a difficult thing to bring forward something within the limits of normal mortgage lending to meet the point the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. Gillis: I am not pressing it. I merely mention it because I have had letters written to me. If by saying what I have said I cause people to think about it, it may result in the act being made flexible enough to take care of that particular angle. I know that the Nova Scotia housing act works that way. It is an excellent co-operative housing act, but if the federal legislation is to supplement that kind of housing I think it should be made to conform as closely as possible with the Nova Scotia act. I know that in the section of the country from which I come housing is not a problem today for the simple reason that in the past ten or fifteen years many houses have been constructed under the Nova Scotia act. I have recently received letters on the subject from people who are getting stuck on that kind of thing, and it was suggested to me I might bring up that particular angle at this time so that those administering the act may think about it.

Mr. Winters: Of course the hon. member raises a good point. I know something about the Nova Scotia act, and I know it has worked well. Where bulk loans, if I may call them that, to co-operatives are being considered we feel there is something to be done. The technique is difficult to work out, but the corporation is working on it, and we hope we shall be able to do something in these cases.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I believe what I have to say can be said on this section, and I will say it now because I shall not be able to say it on the other sections. I want to stress the point made by the hon. member for Nipissing the other day about rural districts. In the past the housing act has not been of great help to such districts. It is all right to say that they are composed of farm owners, and on every farm there is a house, but that is not the only kind of dwelling there is in the rural communities. I have in mind my own county where there are about eight or nine parishes in which there are both farmers and industrial workers. Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that in those districts the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has not been very helpful. I do not mind writing letters to the corporation or to the minister, and I do not mind making trips every week, but the time that elapses between the first request and the refusal is enough to discourage anyone. In practice it hardly works, especially in rural districts composed of both industrial workers and farmers who want to build their own houses.

They are not helped by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation nor by the lending institutions, which apparently do not believe that they should give assistance in rural districts. Probably that is because they are scared they will not get their money back later on, but I think the inhabitants of rural districts are as honest as those living in the urban centres. They want to repay their loans, and I ask that they should be given an opportunity to benefit from the new law. I think it is a great improvement, but if the minister or the government or the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation do not give more favourable consideration to the rural districts than they have in the past there will be the same result. The act will be inoperative, and it will cause great dissatisfaction, particularly in my constituency. We cannot rely on the provincial housing law. So far as I know it has not worked at all in my county, but the people can say almost the same thing so far as the federal government housing legislation has been concerned in the past.

I would not want to have the same answer given to me in the future, and that is why I am asking the minister to give the matter careful attention. I would ask the minister to try to impress upon the lending institutions that they should give more attention to the requests made by the inhabitants of rural districts. I hope the minister will pass the word along to the central mortgage corporation, so that my people will profit from this act. Then we shall be able to tell our people that, through this law, the federal government is helping them to become proprietors.

Mr. Winters: On that point, I might say that the lending institutions lend where they wish, and do not lend where they have no desire to lend. For that reason section 31A was put in the National Housing Act to enable Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make a direct loan. The corporation has, in fact, gone into the field, and made a number of direct loans where lending institutions would not operate.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Do you mean under the authority of the housing act?

Mr. Winters: Yes, section 31A of the National Housing Act.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): In my district there has not been much progress in that direction. The results are not very good.

Mr. Johnston: Section 2, subparagraph (1) (a) reads:

> a joint loan shall be made only to the person (in this section called the "home owner") who owns the land or is a lessee thereof under a long-term lease, and intends to occupy the house or one of the family housing units thereof, or to a builder who intends to sell the house to a person (in this section called the "home purchaser") who will own and occupy the house or one of the family housing units thereof;

When these joint loans are made to the builder who is building to sell, what control is there over that money?

Mr. Winters: The control is that the advances are made only as progress is made; that is the control over the money.

[Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf).]

Mr. Johnston: Is my understanding correct, that no amount of this mortgage money will be given out by the lending institutions, or the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, except as progress payments on that particular site?

Mr. Winters: That, Mr. Chairman, is correct.

Mr. Johnston: I might say that is going to be an improvement, because that is definitely not the way the lending institutions have been operating in the past.

Mr. Winters: That is the prevailing method at the moment, and has been for some time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Johnston: I wish to tell the minister, Mr. Chairman, that is not the way money was loaned on the Bow River construction project. People who had assumed a mortgage of $6,000—I am just speaking from memory now but I have the figures in my office—became fully responsible to the mortgage company for that amount. There was sufficient money available to complete the house, but when the company went broke the proceeds of the loan had been spent, and the only part of the house that had been built was the basement, walls and roof. The contractor had spent about $7,000 or $8,000, and was held liable for that amount. The lending institution had advanced the contractor money on the project as a whole, to complete other houses. The money from one man's mortgage went to complete another man's house, but the first man is still liable for the mortgage. If the minister is going to adopt the method he has suggested, it is not similar to the method followed in the past.

Mr. Winters: The method is the same. In certain cases I presume overadvances have been made, but that does not detract from the method I have outlined. It is the method laid down in the agreement.

Mr. Johnston: I take it, then, that the lending institution will become a trustee for that man's mortgage money until his house is completed. Is that it?

Mr. Winters: No, that is not the case.

Mr. Johnston: What else could it be? I may have used the wrong terms, but I think "trustee" would be the proper term to apply in such a case.

Mr. Winters: No, it is the normal mortgage practice to advance money against the progress of the building.

Mr. Johnston: But if the money is advanced and no progress has been made, then certainly the man who has the mortgage is in a difficult position. I would think that the lending institutions should become trustees for that man's loan, and that no moneys should be advanced until the house has reached a certain stage. Then whatever amount is estimated as having been expended for materials would be taken out of the loan and given to the builder as a progress payment. Such a procedure might be the customary way, but it is not the way the matter has always been handled in the past. The minister may say that is an exception, and that might be true, but it is a difficult proposition for the man who is in that position.

Let me deal a little further with the loan to the builder, and the security for that loan. The government is becoming a partner in these lending institutions. Remember the building is not sold as yet, but the builder has secured a loan. He is building this house to sell. Can he just throw up that building any way he likes, or are precautions taken to ensure good buildings?

Mr. Winters: There is the inspection requirement to which the hon. member referred before.

Mr. Johnston: Excuse me if I am a little bit dense, but I do not know what you mean by the "inspection requirements".

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Middlesex East and the hon. member for Sudbury also wish to ask the minister questions. I think the member will agree that he has had a good share of the minister's attention during the last few minutes. Perhaps he could return later with these questions. When he does return, I would ask him to speak to the clause under discussion. I have given a good deal of latitude, but I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the subclause under section 1.

Mr. Johnston: I should like to pursue this point, Mr. Chairman, but if there are others who wish to speak I have no objection to permitting them to do so.

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member was about to conclude his remarks, he may continue.

Mr. Johnston: I cannot say that I am, Mr. Chairman, but I do say I am relating my remarks to this particular section, which deals with the security on these loans. I am concerned about these loans. If you wish to recognize someone else, however, it is all right. The minister was about to answer my question concerning inspection.

Mr. Winters: As I understand, we are on section 2, subsection 1, which is simply a matter of changing a definition to make clear the difference between a home purchaser and a home owner. The corporation wishes to have a clarification of the act to differentiate between a man who purchases a house built for him by a builder, and a man who undertakes to build his own house. That is all this section purports to do.

Mr. Johnston: That might be, Mr. Chairman, but this section does deal with loans being made to builders. I think it is the duty of members of this committee to see that government moneys are properly protected. You will recall that there are some cases in which the government and the taxpayers of this country stand to lose some money, because there are proceedings now before the court. I think we should be cautious and see that the public moneys that we are spending are properly taken care of. That is the point I had in mind in asking this question.

A moment ago I asked the minister what precautions were taken and he said that they had inspections to safeguard the advances made. But I want to get at it in a different way. When we are lending this money to a builder, and he is starting to build a house, has the government any control over the way that house will be built; and if they have any control what is that control in order to safeguard the money which we are granting under this section?

Mr. Winters: If the hon. member wishes to discuss that matter under this section, I would say that the loans under the National Housing Act are made jointly by the government and the lending institution, it is true; but the loan is administered by the lending institution which sees to it that the advances are made as progress is made on the building of the house. It sees to it also that there is an inspection of the house.

Mr. Johnston: In order to safeguard construction of this house and in order to safeguard our investment, does the lending institution—and I use that term in the broadest sense because it includes Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—have plans and specifications that must be followed by the builder in building this house, in order to see that the money is properly spent?

Mr. Winters: In the first place, the hon. member is not correct in grouping the government and the lending institution.

Mr. Johnston: They guarantee twenty-five per cent of the loss, do they not?

Mr. Winters: They are entirely separate in operation, and the lending institution administers the loan. There are certain minimum standards, and inspections are made to see that those minimum standards are substantially met, as I told the hon. member before in reply to a question he placed on the order paper.

Mr. Johnston: These minimum standards must be followed by the contractor. Is that right?

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Johnston: Suppose he does not follow these minimum standards. What action would be taken? The minister told me a moment ago that they had an inspector. Probably I should add this comment. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has an inspector also. That inspector inspects the loaning company. Then the loaning company has an inspector who is supposed to inspect the building, for which inspection he receives $20. That inspection of course is not always carried out. What I want to get at right now is this. On this inspection, is there anyone to see that the builder carries out the plans and specifications which are approved, not by the loaning institution but by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Mr. Winters: That is the function of the lending institution. If they feel that the house in question is not built to the minimum standards, they are free to withhold advances or they are free to cut down the amount of the loan.

Mr. Johnston: Does the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation approve those plans and specifications?

Mr. Winters: Yes, those plans are approved, for general standards, by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Johnston: Can they be changed without the consent of—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am afraid it is not realized that this is an amending bill. We are not discussing the principle of the National Housing Act but rather the amending in certain particulars of certain sections of the National Housing Act. I do not think any of this discussion we are having now is relevant to section 2 (1). I will ask the hon. member again to confine his remarks to the subclause that is under discussion.

Mr. Johnston: Where would the remarks be appropriate, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: The subclause was previously read by the minister, and the minister pointed out to the hon. member that the discussion was not exactly relevant. Notwithstanding these warnings, I have allowed the discussion to go on, as the hon. member will agree, for quite some time. I am quite agreeable to being patient and to giving all the latitude that is necessary; on the other hand, I must ask that the hon. member's remarks be strictly relevant to the subclause under discussion.

Mr. Johnston: Whereabouts would they be proper, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: I think perhaps when the estimates of the minister come before the committee.

Mr. Johnston: The Chairman says "perhaps". Would that be the place? He may not be presiding then.

The Deputy Chairman: As the hon. member knows, it is not customary for members, from their seats, to question the Chairman.

Mr. Johnston: It is merely for clarification; because you, sir, may not be Chairman at that time.

The Deputy Chairman: I suggest that the hon. member has only to read the subclause to realize for himself what is relevant and what is not.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): At this moment it is difficult to know whether the questions I wish to ask and the remarks I wish to make are going to be relevant in all cases, but I hope that you, Mr. Chairman, will be as lenient with me as you have been with other speakers.

The city of London is no different from most of the other communities in Canada; we are suffering from growing pains. One of the difficulties that I have encountered is between the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the insurance company that is making the loan, the contractor and the owner or the owner-to-be. It would seem that the crux of all the difficulty is the inadequate inspection from time to time. As the purchaser of a home, because of the fact that it is a Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation project, with the government behind it, I expect that it is going to be all right. Purchasers are disappointed when they find that such is not the case.

There are some difficulties. I must admit that in London the type of housing that is being built is I think superior to that which is being built probably anywhere else in Canada, according to what I have heard. But these small difficulties occur. Possibly if better inspections were made, those difficulties would be ironed out. But when a number of complaints were given to me about these particular homes, and when I took the matter up with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and with the insurance company, each of them passed the buck. They said: This was done two or three years ago, and the timber shrinks, and that is the reason that these difficulties occur.

I just want to point out what happens when a man applies for a loan for a home under the National Housing Act. I am going to read three paragraphs that are on the application and questionnaire. The first is as follows:

> Borrowers and purchasers must make their own arrangements with the builder or vendor of the house and must not assume that their interests have been or are being looked after by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the lending institution making the loan.

I do not suppose that one in a dozen actually knows that paragraph is in there. Then there is another paragraph which reads as follows:

> The lending company collects from the borrower $20 for the appraisal of the property and a minimum of four (4) inspections of the house during construction. These inspections are to see that C.M.H.C. standards are complied with, and to determine when progress advances may be made on the mortgage. They do not assure a full architectural or engineering inspection to see that all details of the plans and specifications are complied with.

What is the use of hiring an inspector if he does not look after these things? The last paragraph reads:

> There have been instances in the past where borrowers and purchasers have made no contract with the builder and made no inspections of the house because they relied on the fact that they were getting "an N.H.A. house." This is a warning to borrowers and purchasers that they must make their own contract with vendors or builders and look after their own interests and inspections in the building or acquisition of a home.

That lets the lending institution, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and everyone else out from under. The only man who is going to be responsible is the man who buys the house. When he moves in and finds these defects he is troubled about them. I maintain that when a man accepts a house an itemized list should be made of all the different things in the house, and then an inspection should be made and each of these items checked off so that when the man takes the house he has agreed that it is as it should be. The owner and purchaser should sign that acceptance document. If the person who is acquiring the property did that he would know where he was, and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the lending institution would be protected.

I want to say a word or two about integrated housing and prefabricated housing in London. Generally I think they are doing a good job. In fact I know of instances where from $700 to $1,000 is being saved to owners of these particular houses in London; but still these defects sometimes show up and they cause bad feeling, shall I say, between the builder, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and the purchaser. One of the advantages they are finding there is a saving in taxes and insurance. Perhaps that is not possible under some other plans. I just want to mention what Central Mortgage and Housing had to say when I complained of some of these defects. One of the things I complained about was the wiring, and this is what they say:

> The electric wiring could no doubt have been improved—

I complained about the defect of switches on the stairway. They would not work both ways. If you were upstairs and wanted to turn on the light downstairs it would not work. This is the reply I got.

> The electric wiring could no doubt have been improved but it would fall into the category of a "frill" as mentioned above.

I think that is a necessity in every properly-wired house. This is their second comment:

> It is quite possible that there may be a few visible leaks in the cold air ducts, after being installed this length of time. In the process of wood drying out there might be a tendency of it pulling away from the metal duct. However, the average new home owner expects minor defects like that and usually it is no trick for a minor repair.

To say the least, I think that is a silly statement. I do not agree with it.

Then there was the question of ice forming on the steps. I complained of that. Their comment was:

> In so far as entrance steps are concerned, we considered they were adequate, and again one must consider the price at which these houses were sold.

It does not cost any more to put a cement step in right than it does to put it in wrong. When I took it up with the lending institution this is what they said:

> In spite of what is said on this form, we do our best to give reasonable consideration to any difficulties that borrowers may have.

I do not want to go into all the details, but it was just as I mentioned in the beginning, namely, passing the buck. The man has his house and nobody is going to do anything about it. There are defects there but he is stuck with it and nothing can be done. As far as humanly possible we should encourage the people to own their own homes. That is very desirable in this country. We want a country of property owners. They are the backbone of the country. Let us do all we can to foster that. The hon. member for Nipissing mentioned that in his speech a few days ago.

When speaking on the resolution stage of this bill the hon. member for Spadina made a reference to subsidized housing, and hoped that it would be brought into effect. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Montreal

Gazette of November 11, 1949. They quoted from the big green book of the Department of National Revenue, released on that day. The heading of the report is as follows: "Report shows only 540 farmers in Quebec assessed for income." The remark I want to make is that all the other farmers in the province of Quebec will be paying for subsidized housing in any city to which it is applied. I do not think that is right.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps I should make a statement about inspection. I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member, although I think they are considerably wide of this section; but in the circumstances we are all glad to have them. I think he would expect me to say with respect to his remark about passing the buck that the normal assumption of responsibility and the expectation that people will assume their normal responsibility is not, in my opinion, passing the buck. It seems to me, though, that there has been a great tendency for people to expect some departure from the normal relationship between the purchaser of a house and the builder of that house or the mortgagee, whichever the case may be; and if that relationship does not obtain in all respects the first recourse is to the government. Then, if the government does not come in and bail out the home owner, the immediate charge is one of passing the buck.

This is quite a long statement on the inspection procedure, but in view of the fact that the point has been raised I think I should read it.

For the most part loans under the National Housing Act are made jointly by approved lending institutions and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The arrangement between the lending institution and the corporation is set down in an agreement between them which deals with the administration of the loan, both during the process of construction and thereafter during the period of repayment. The lending institution takes charge of the administration of the loan and the agreement provides that during the period of construction the lending institution shall inspect the house as often as will reasonably ensure that the owner or builder is properly and faithfully carrying out a work of construction in accordance with the plans and specifications approved by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The agreement specifies that such inspections shall, in any event, be not less frequent than:

(a) once at or before the laying of the footings,

(b) once at or before the time when the roof is completed,

[Mr. White (Middlesex East).]

(c) once prior to the process of lathing or its equivalent, and

(d) once on completion of the house.

In addition to the above-mentioned inspections the agreement provides that the corporation may make additional inspections, and the corporation in fact does, from time to time, follow through on inspections of houses which are being financed jointly under the National Housing Act for the purpose of seeing that the terms of the operating agreement are being fulfilled.

I should like to make it clear that in the matter of inspections no attempt is being made to shift responsibility from the corporation to the lending institution or vice versa. The government feels that the inspections which are made are not intended to provide full architectural inspections and supervision. The borrower pays $20 for the appraisal of his lot and the inspections which are made. A full architectural inspection and supervision of the house would normally cost not less than $150.

We have endeavoured to make our position clear to borrowers under the National Housing Act, and have printed on the questionnaire, which is the first document that a prospective home owner sees, and the sales form, which is the first document that a prospective purchaser sees, a warning which deals with the corporation's position regarding inspections. For the information of hon. members I should like to read the warning as it appears on the documents I have mentioned:

IMPORTANT

Warning to Borrowers or Purchasers

Borrowers and purchasers must make their own arrangements with the builder or vendor of the house and must not assume that their interests have been or are being looked after by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the lending institution making the loan.

That is the same section as was read by the hon. member for Middlesex East.

In the case of a purchaser of a completed house, the purchaser must satisfy himself that the house is up to the standard that he thinks he is getting.

In the case of a purchaser of a house under construction, the purchaser must himself see that the portion built is up to the standard he thinks he is getting, and that the remainder of the house is completed as arranged between him and the builder.

Borrowers likewise must make their own arrangement with a contractor and see that the house is built according to the plans and specifications which have been agreed upon between the borrower and the contractor.

The lending company collects from the borrower $20 for the appraisal of the property and a minimum of four inspections of the house during construction. These inspections are to see that C.M.H.C. standards are complied with, and to determine when progress advances may be made on the mortgage. They do not assure a full architectural or engineering inspection to see that all details of the plans and specifications are complied with.

There have been instances in the past where borrowers and purchasers have made no contract with the builder and made no inspections of the house because they relied on the fact that they were getting an N.H.A. house. This is a warning to borrowers and purchasers that they must make their own contract with vendors or builders and look after their own interests and inspections in the building or acquisition of a home.

The National Housing Act is designed to provide credit to assist prospective home owners in acquiring their homes, credit which cannot be obtained through normal commercial channels. The interest rate is lower than the prevailing rate and the terms of repayment of the loan are much more favourable than those normally given. To add the responsibility of making complete architectural inspections upon the lenders would impose a burden almost impossible to discharge, and most certainly would increase the over-all cost to the borrower resulting from the discharge of such responsibility.

As hon. members know, since 1935, joint loans have accounted for approximately 100,000 units. This has meant 400,000 inspections at least so far. In the year 1949 there are being built under the National Housing Act at least 30,000 units, calling for 120,000 inspections.

It seems to me that we can go no further on the inspections than we do at the present time and at the same time take all steps possible to inform borrowers of their responsibilities and ours in connection with this problem.

Mr. Gauthier (Sudbury): I should like to compliment the minister and his officials upon this section in the bill, namely the one referring to home owners. This very day I received a letter from the minister as a result of my drawing his attention to a certain case in Capreol concerning a man earning $3,800 a year, who had applied to all the lending institutions in the country and could not get a loan to build his own home. This man is certainly in a position to be a home owner in Canada.

I believe the section before us will take care of a matter of that kind. I do not like situations such as that of the man in Capreol who had to go 150 miles to get help with his house. Sudbury is one of the most thriving cities in Ontario. It is sixth largest in the province; yet there is no office of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation there. Despite this, we find them in many smaller centres of Ontario where I should think they would not be as necessary as they are in Sudbury.

In Sudbury we have I believe the largest payroll for individual men of any city in Canada. Many of our men are earning from $300 to $400 a month. These people want to become home owners in Sudbury, and they have no way of finding out how they can get those homes. They are refused the help of lending institutions—why, I cannot say. This is more serious than one might think. I am one who was refused the help of a lending institution. I am also one who is paying monthly to the national housing administration in Canada for my own home. But I was refused my home until such time as I refused to take "No" for an answer from these big financiers. I came to Ottawa and discussed my problem with the officials here. The man who was in charge of the national housing administration in 1938 told me that if those lending institutions did not accept my application they would not receive any more applications from anybody else. He believed I was certainly one who could comply with the regulations surrounding the buying of a home in my town of Sudbury.

Next morning upon my return to Sudbury the representative of the lending institution was waiting for me, with a taxi, at the station, to take me home, and to tell me that I was going to be given a loan. He did not have to do that, because I had already been told that the day before in Ottawa.

This goes to show that these lending institutions are not serving the purpose and the spirit of national housing in this country. They are taking the cream of the loans in all sections. Furthermore, I would add that they zone certain sections of the city because they have streets in these localities in which they own real estate; and if you do not build a home in that section you cannot get a loan through these people.

I do not think Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation should or will stand for any of this. Let me say to the minister now that the sooner his department establishes an office in Sudbury, the better. In three or four months they will have no regrets for having done so, because there are many people there who are able to come within the regulations and build their own homes.

Mr. Catherwood: Mr. Chairman, I shall try to confine my brief remarks to this section of the bill. May I associate myself with others in thanking the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply for having brought this bill before the House of Commons. It is a step in the right direction, and I believe it will accelerate the building of homes throughout Canada.

One angle of the bill, however, I think will not work out as satisfactorily as might be hoped. I refer to its application to the smaller towns and villages throughout Canada. Under the old act we could negotiate an additional loan up to $1,250 as a second mortgage. That, of course, is not possible under the new. All hon. members realize that the lending value depends upon different factors in different sections of the country. The rental value of a property may depend upon the amount of money a wage-earner makes, and also upon other factors. The lending value in the small towns and villages is not as great as the lending value in the cities. As we all know, the basic loan is 80 per cent of the lending value and consequently people in the towns and villages are not going to be able to secure as much money by way of loans.

Apparently the lending institutions are not willing to go out from the cities in order to negotiate loans in the small urban centres. The reason is quite apparent. The cost of inspecting and supervision of a property 50 or 60 miles away from the office of the lending institution is considerable. But this is something that could be overcome. I believe the minister has a humanitarian feeling for the people across Canada. The housing situation in the cities is quite acute but I think at times that is over-emphasized. There is a housing shortage in the towns and villages where a large proportion of our population reside.

As the hon. member for Eglinton told us the other night, this is a social problem of great magnitude. As he said, this should be a pilgrimage to a happy land. I am quite sure the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply will take this matter into consideration. I think it was the hon. member for Lambton West who stated the other evening that the interest rate on loans should be reduced to three and a half per cent. I am sure the minister will take that into consideration also. So if by sound legislation we can remove every obstruction and impediment that will interfere with the construction of homes for our people, we will win the acclaim of our citizens from sea to sea and justify by this action alone the sittings of the house for this fall session.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to support the remarks of the two previous speakers with respect to the service given by the lending institutions to the small towns and villages.

Mr. Winters: These remarks have nothing to do with this particular subsection. If we are going to get into a general discussion we should revert to the proper section. We are now on section 2, subsection 1.

Subsection 1 agreed to.

[Mr. Catherwood.]

On subsection 2.

Mr. Fleming: There are two phases to this subsection, one having to do with the percentage and the other having to do with the lending value.

So far as percentage is concerned I can understand that a flat rate of 80 per cent has the virtue of simplicity, but I do not think that is what dictated this amendment. I fancy the reason the government is proposing to depart from the present standards of 95 per cent for the first $2,000 of lending value, 85 per cent for the next $2,000, and 70 per cent for everything above that is that houses in the low-price range are not being built today. I should like to ask the minister if calculations have been made to indicate how the 80 per cent will compare with the present basis of granting loans. My impression is that it will work out just about the same, but perhaps the minister has some figures on that point.

I turn now to the question of lending value which in many respects is a vital matter. There is not much use our preparing great plans to help house construction if we are going to write down the lending value. Lending value is defined in subsection 23 of section 2 of the act as follows:

> "Lending value" means the estimated cost of construction or cost of conversion, or the appraised value, whichever is less, of a house or housing project.

In other words, in the case of a new house, "lending value" as defined by the act is the estimated cost of construction or the appraised value, whichever is less. I have said before, and I repeat, that the interpretation which has been placed upon lending value in the administration of this act has subtracted greatly from the intended effectiveness of the act. We know perfectly well that the definition put upon lending value by those responsible for the administration of this act has not borne a direct relationship to the cost of construction today.

This is not the first time this matter has been discussed. The minister's predecessor was pressed on this matter more than once, and his answer was that there would not be any departure from the practice of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, that they were not going to measure lending value in terms of the cost of construction. While building costs have been steadily mounting during the lifetime of this act, lending value as interpreted by those responsible for administering the act has not risen proportionately.

I think that those responsible for administering the act have been putting too much emphasis upon the fear of inflation in housing values. They have been more bent upon avoiding loss in connection with lending operations than they have been on making this section fruitful in the construction of new homes. The administration can reduce the effectiveness of the act if they are not going to measure the lending value in terms of modern costs of construction. I say that there should be a more sympathetic interpretation of lending value in the future than there has been in the past; otherwise we are going to see much of the effectiveness of this act taken from it by those responsible for the administration.

I think the minister is prepared to concede that costs of production have been rising, although they have reached some measure of stabilization in recent months, and those responsible for administering the act should be ready to abandon this fear of inflation which has apparently beset them in the past. I urge upon the minister a change of heart and a change of emphasis in connection with this matter.

There are many people who have good reason to complain that they have received less by way of mortgage loan under this act than parliament intended they should receive. I think the reason for that has been unsympathetic administration. I ask the minister to make up his mind and perhaps give the committee assurance that from now on lending value is going to have a direct relationship to the cost of construction and not to some fictitious figure which has the effect of writing down the lending value.

Mr. Winters: With much of what the hon. member has said I agree. He has said that a certain attitude with respect to lending value has been taken by those administering the act. He thought that the administration in some respects was throttling the intent of the act. In fairness to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, I think I should say that the government has at all times been informed by the corporation of these matters of administration, and they have carried the judgment of the government. I feel the time has come for some revision of the attitude towards lending values, and in that I am in entire agreement with what the hon. member has said.

Mr. Noseworthy: Does Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation determine the lending value of the property, or is it the company that lends the money?

Mr. Winters: They are joint loans, and the decision is a joint decision, but the lending institution predominates in the loan, and it would have the greater voice in the decision.

Mr. Noseworthy: Would it not have practically the controlling voice? Is it not true that the lending company decides whether it will lend anything, and how much it will lend, regardless of what the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has to say?

Mr. Winters: In agreements and arrangements between the lending institution and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation there is no point of difference with respect to that problem.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister be kind enough to deal with the first point I raised? I asked a question about how the 80 per cent is going to compare in the future with the way the blended percentages have worked out up to the present time.

Mr. Winters: The 80 per cent will be approximately equivalent to the average loan under the present arrangement, and the extra one-sixth under the new arrangement will have the effect of reducing the amount of the down payment required by approximately one-half.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 3.

Mr. Fleming: I do not think anyone will object to increasing the period in question to thirty years provided at least two conditions are present. One is sound methods of construction and the other point is one on which I now ask assurance that it will not be overlooked. The section as it stands now contemplates that there shall be protection of the area by community planning and appropriate zoning restrictions. No reference is made to that healthy safeguard in the proposed amended form of the subsection. It may be unnecessary, but I would ask the minister for his explicit assurance that that necessary form of protection is not going to be overlooked, and that due emphasis will be placed upon protection by means of community planning and proper zoning restrictions.

Mr. Winters: As the hon. member has said, subsection 3 of section 2 may give the appearance that we are abandoning the principle of the desirability of community planning and zoning. This is far from the case because in the ordinary operations of loans under the National Housing Act the areas in which loans are made are limited to those which are stable and have every possibility of remaining good residential neighbourhoods during the term of the loan.

The limitation now contained in the act, that loans for a term exceeding twenty-five years but not in excess of thirty years shall be limited to areas protected by community planning and appropriate zoning restrictions, presents administrative difficulties. With higher costs of construction and the larger loans provided in the amendments, it is likely that longer terms of amortization will require that the debt service on the larger loans be kept within a reasonable percentage of the owner's income. Debt service includes principal, interest and taxes. Generally the corporation is unwilling to approve an individual as a satisfactory home owner where the debt service exceeds 23 per cent of the owner's income.

There are a number of communities which are quite satisfactory from the residential point of view in which there is no approved community plan. The practicalities of the situation are that in some cases in these communities a thirty-year amortization is required. Provided that there are adequate zoning restrictions and the location is satisfactory, there is no reason why loans on a thirty-year basis should not be made. I question the advisability at this time of using the limitation to a shorter term of amortization as a method to force municipalities to approve a community plan. There are more effective ways of achieving this end without imposing a hardship upon individuals whose circumstances make a thirty-year loan desirable.

I may say that in considering applications for loans under the National Housing Act an area rating is considered. The basis of this rating takes into account all features relating to the community. If the rating is high there is no reluctance in proceeding with a thirty-year amortization. If, however, the rating is low, amortization will be restricted to fifteen or twenty years. In principle we believe that the community planning restriction has much merit. From a practical point of view, however, we believe that administrative procedures can better achieve the purposes of the present limitation.

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to point out that what has just been said raises one of the serious objections to the National Housing Act. It limits loans to people with relatively high incomes and stability of occupation or work. The kind of housing that is most needed is that for people who have not high incomes, and who have not any great assurance of continued work. Where loans are made it is usually in a high-class district in the community. In our cities there are numerous working class districts, as they are termed, and it is impossible for people living there to get a loan under the National Housing Act, no matter how good the character of the individual. Steadiness of employment, even if the wage is not high, should be a factor in obtaining a loan under the act, but I do not think that applies at all unless there is an assurance of a certain level of income. As a matter of fact, the National Housing Act as it has been operated up till now helps those to build homes who most likely could do so without the National Housing Act at all.

Mr. Winters: Just before six o'clock I think I should say that one of the greatest limiting factors in the areas the hon. member for Vancouver East has just mentioned is the unavailability of land. I would say to him, however, on a more encouraging note, that the dominion-provincial arrangements contemplate scope for operation in those fields.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRAIRIE TRANSMISSION LINES LIMITED

The house resumed from Tuesday, November 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benidickson for the second reading of Bill No. 119, to incorporate Prairie Transmission Lines Limited, and the amendment thereto of Mr. MacInnis.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, when one of these bills was last before us, I made a number of references to what the legal position was. In this House of Commons, we have gone on the assumption that a statement made by the Prime Minister that the export of gas in Alberta was purely a matter for the provincial government was true; but with great respect and deference, I have ventured to disagree. For a moment I should like to speak about the statements that have been loosely made, not only loosely made but falsely made if they included myself, to the effect that I was taking part in a filibuster. My immediate answer to that is that—I see some amusement registered by the member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford). I think he should stay with his cheese production, and not stick his nose into things he knows nothing about. The fact is that I made a speech on the other bill, and tonight I am making a speech on this one. That will be the end of my efforts, irrespective of amendments or anything of that kind.

In my own favour, I think I may safely say that that can scarcely be called a filibuster; particularly when the gas we are talking about originates in the province in which I have lived for over forty years, and I am really interested in what happens to that gas.

The hon. Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) made a speech on one of these bills. He is not only the hon. Minister of Fisheries, he is one of my oldest, closest and best-regarded friends. He made some reference to statements which I had made, and suggested that I did not know what I was talking about. He began by saying that I referred to only one pipe line, and I quote his words as they appear at page 2019 of Hansard:

> Then he went on to say that this pipe line should be built on Canadian soil. I think he should be asked to give us his authority for making such a definite statement to the house.

I made that statement, and now I give my authority. I begin by giving you, Mr. Speaker, a statement made by Mr. Dixon in the evidence given before the Senate on one of these bills. I am afraid I must confuse these bills to some extent, but the principle is exactly the same. This is the man behind the other bill, and at page F-3 he said this in answer to a question by Hon. Mr. MacKinnon:

> No, that would be utterly impossible. You could not finance the line. This is the way it will have to be regulated. We shall make contracts to sell gas in Vancouver, Seattle and Portland, and we shall have to have sufficient gas for the entire market or the line will not be financed. If the gas should play out, which is inconceivable, Vancouver would naturally get the last gas.

I read that slowly and quietly to you, because those are the words of the man almost entirely responsible for that bill. The member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness), when this particular bill was before the house, read a statement—required by statute—from the newspapers in Calgary, which said definitely the route was through Kingsgate into the United States, on to those American cities and then to Vancouver at the tail end of the line. Now, Mr. Speaker and hon. members, I am not going to abuse any company. I pause to make this statement with respect to the bill we passed last session. I think we acted like schoolboys. We did not make a proper examination of that bill, and my responsibility is the same as that of the other members in this house. May I say that if the board of transport commissioners, before whom that company is now, imposes a condition that the line be built on Canadian soil I shall welcome it. I do not want to leave any doubt in anyone's mind as to why I am adopting the position I am.

Then, in further support of my answer to the statement made by the hon. Minister of Fisheries, that they wanted to allow the prospective company's lines through to Vancouver—it was three lines, I think—

Mr. Mayhew: No, I mentioned two.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): —two gas lines, I read the statement of Mr. Connolly, who is a king's counsel, and who appeared before a Senate committee. At page C-5 he said this:

> It is necessary to include the United States market because the limited market available in Canada would not, in itself, support the cost of a pipe line from any of the known Canadian natural gas fields to Vancouver.

I have quoted to you statements made by spokesmen of both these corporations, who were speaking with full authority. They demonstrate that there will be no gas line except one which will take care of this whole market. There can be no doubt of that. In that testimony, there is a good deal of evidence as to the quantities which will be required over a twenty-five-year period. It amounts to so many trillions of cubic feet that it staggers me. I notice something which I thought amusing in the evidence given before the committee, and that is that in London a trillion is a million million, while in New York it is a hundred thousand million. In other words, the word "trillion" has two definitions in the mathematics of those two countries. When the committee was finished, it did not appear to be definite whether they were using the London measurement or the New York measurement. So I leave that because the Minister of Lands and Mines in Alberta, Mr. Tanner, made a statement the other day which we have all read. He said that there would be no export of gas from Alberta unless the supply in Alberta were assured for fifty years. That is quite a statement to make, but what does it mean? Frankly, in my judgment, it does not mean much. Who is to prognosticate the progress in that province and who, therefore, can do any more than guess how many trillions of feet we need to have now, using either measurement, to take care of that province for the next fifty years?

The minister asked me where I got my authority for that statement. I have quoted to him the top officers of one of these companies. Then may I say to him that I have further authority, and I do not mean second-hand information. I have authority from the firm of Ford, Bacon and Davis of New York city, the largest engineering firm in the world, who told me it was utterly silly to think of more than one pipe line to this one market from the oil fields of Alberta. I will not mention the gentleman's name but I saw him some little time ago in the hotel in which I think the minister and I are both living. If he wants further authority, I will give him privately the name of a man who stands all by himself in North America as a gas engineer. He assured me of the same thing. If that is not enough, I want to give him the names of two prominent senators who certainly are not of my political persuasion. One is Senator Farris.

Mr. Howe: Order.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The other is Senator Turgeon. Am I out of order, Mr. Speaker? If I am, I will stop; but I did not think that I was. May I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that I was merely answering a question put to me by his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew). I hope there will not be another cabinet split over that. Let us try to get along without that necessity.

The hon. member went on and gave us these routes. Then he said that they should follow the routes taken by the Canadian National Railways and the Great Northern Railway. Into this I have also made some inquiry, but I want to ask my good friend the Minister of Fisheries a question. In the mountain section all railways run through tunnels. They run through tunnels only because there is no overland route. In their evidence before the Senate, these people say that they expect to carry this gas at a pressure of 750 pounds as opposed to the pressure at sea level which we all know is fifteen pounds. I should like to ask the minister how he would like to travel through a tunnel on a train knowing that he has a 24-inch gas line underneath him carrying gas at a pressure of 750 pounds. Connaught tunnel is five miles long. This is on the C.P.R. One can just imagine what would happen to the minister and the rest of the train if there was some accident with respect to the gas carried at a pressure of 750 pounds through these tunnels which are on all these railways. It is not a matter of the C.P.R. or anything like that.

Mr. Rowe: There is nearly that much pressure under the minister now.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The hon. member suggests there is that much pressure under him now. I think there is more than that on him, not under. Then the minister said:

> As Canadians we should be supplied first with the gas we need and then, just the same as with anything else, we should export our surplus. If we have a surplus of gas and oil then I say we have every right to export it unless we want to build a fence around ourselves and become isolated from everybody else.

In that statement let me compliment the minister. He has put the truth simply and forcefully and much better than I might ever do it myself. Then he went on and, speaking of me, he said:

> I should like to tell the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) that, when the first oil field was drilled in the province of Alberta, when people thought it was a wild gamble and there was no oil in the Turner valley, some of my money was invested in that project taking a long chance.

I think the minister will admit that he did it, as I will admit that I did it; and how many thousand other suckers, including myself, were pinched in on that particular occasion? I am sure he will remember this incident, because he was in Calgary then. The name of the company I have forgotten, but it was operated by a fellow by the name of Buck. I think the Minister of Fisheries was probably in that show too.

Mr. Mayhew: No, I was not.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The minister was smarter than I was.

Mr. Howe: Black Diamond.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I remember that show well. There was some gas in this hole. A number of us enthusiasts went down there. Buck had salted the well with machine oil. There is no doubt about that. So enthusiastic were we that we—I even in my Sunday clothes—stood under it, stunk like a skunk and had this stuff poured all over us. We thought Mr. Buck had a big well. I am glad the Minister of Fisheries was not in there. But I gather that the Minister of Trade and Commerce might have had a share or two.

I think I have finished dealing with the speech of the minister. He mentioned, as other people have, the word "monopoly". In the first speech I made in connection with this matter I too said there could be, economically, only one 24-inch or 26-inch pipe line. In his evidence, Mr. Dixon admits that it must be at least a 26-inch pipe line. In the carriage of gas, if you have a 12-inch line it will carry so much; and if you have a 24-inch line it carries five times as much. In other words, you just cannot say 4, 8, 12, 16, 24 inches and so on. You must remember that the gas takes in the whole circumference of the pipe, and a 24-inch line will carry five times as much gas as a 12-inch line will carry.

What is our position out there with respect to gas? I have read the telegram. I am anxious that my Social Credit friends should know this. I have read the telegram from Mr. Manning. I have read the statement made the other day by Mr. Tanner, the minister of lands and mines. Both of those gentlemen are fine and able men. What have they said? They have said that they have a policy of Albertans first, Canadians second and other people third. These are their priorities. In my judgment nobody in the world, at least none of us who come from there, would dare dispute that simple statement. But Mr. Manning did say that he was not opposed to the incorporation of other companies, thereby having a better chance for bids to do this particular job. Neither will I dispute that.

We have before us two applications. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is a great authority on these matters. The other night I heard him say—and I am sure he meant it—that he controlled the export of gas beyond Canada. I agreed with him; I still agree. But to be realistic we must know that when this tremendous amount of money has been spent we have a situation confronting us that means something. One gas line company frankly admits that in the event of a breakdown or a shortage Vancouver will be at the end of the line and will suffer first because of the contracts they will have made with the northwestern United States and clearly and most important with the cities of Seattle and Portland. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to pause here because I am leaving the filibuster business out. I want to pause and ask hon. members this question: Do they want that, if the main scheme can be accomplished in some other way?

I have read the evidence very carefully. We know that we have been told that five lines were looked at by one company. We have been told by Mr. Dixon that to build a line on Canadian soil, that is just north of the border, would cost $20 million more than if it crosses at Kingsgate, runs through the United States and turns up with the last bit of gas to Vancouver. I wonder, sir, whether hon. members will not pause and consider. Is it not more worth while that Mr. Dixon, a man from New York, described as an engineer and geologist, and I am sure he is, should build a line through Canada? Is it not much more important to us that Canadians should have the advantage of that line rather than save Mr. Dixon $20 million? The sum of $20 million is not a great deal in a $125 million proposition. Roughly that is to be the cost of this project. So far as I am concerned—I do not go to Vancouver often because it rains out there all the time—I do not care how much it costs Mr. Dixon, but I do care about Vancouver being on the front end of this pipe line and not on the tail end of it. That, Mr. Speaker, is the simple problem that hon. members have to decide when this comes to a vote, and I have already promised that I shall not further hinder that vote after I have concluded my remarks this evening.

What is the position? I am trying to bring this thing down to what we are going to vote on, because we shall vote on it some day. I am going to tell the house this because I am anxious to justify myself completely in regard to the attitude I have taken on these bills. I begin by saying, suppose someone came here and asked for a charter to build a railway and did not tell us where the railway was to go. He would be laughed out of the House of Commons. I do not think I shall hear a voice dissenting from that statement. If hon. gentlemen have not seen the last issue of Fortune magazine I would ask them to take a look at some of the maps in it showing the underlying gas lines in the United States. If they do so they will see that they are infinitely more plentiful in certain areas than are railroads. The underground pipe lines of the United States, both gas and oil, have a far greater mileage than all the railways in the United States. The last issue of Fortune may be procured in the library. I had it for only a minute or two. It shows the tremendous development. In other words, the development of gas as a fuel is far ahead of coal or of fuel oil. The curves on the graphs in this magazine show that the price of gas is infinitely more on a level line than either of the other two, which are going up. Those of you who burn oil and coal even in your houses will know the truth of what I speak. It would be very interesting for hon. members to look at Fortune magazine to see the expansion of the pipe line business, which has now become a major business in the United States. It will become so in this country.

I am not one of those who believe that in Alberta we have all the gas in Canada. I am certain we have not. I know that in the Peace river area, particularly of British Columbia, they have lots of gas. Incidentally, within the last ten days in that country, the Pacific Petroleum Company—I do not mind mentioning their name—have brought in two excellent gas wells across the British Columbia border. I think they are in the constituency of the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray). I may be wrong about that. I am anxious that we should not fail to give this matter proper consideration. Let us have some facts with respect to the whole problem, because we are only on the doorstep of the development of the oil and gas industry in Canada.

We come now to what I think is our real problem, and in my judgment our only problem. The other night I mentioned what a tremendously useful purpose this line would serve in northern Alberta and in northern British Columbia. At the moment these areas are undeveloped. Let me put it this way. The development could be infinitely greater if they had some form of energy such as natural gas. I am not insisting on that route or that company or on any other company, but I am saying—and perhaps this is what we shall vote on—that we are going to vote on whether this is or is not a Canadian line. I for one will oppose anything which is not a Canadian line.

I pause to take up the answers to that question. The answers so far given are that we have the board of transport commissioners. We have the province of Alberta with certain authority, and they will not permit this or that because they have announced as a policy Albertans first, Canadians second and other people third in priority.

What are we doing here? We saw fit to pass—and everybody has agreed with that—a Pipe Lines Act. The principal provision of that act is that people going to do that must procure their charter by private act of this parliament. But for that, anybody could go to the Secretary of State and get letters patent with a big red seal, and green ribbons hanging down from it, permitting him to incorporate a company of any description—the only exception being that the company be not incorporated for illegal purposes. In other words, you could not incorporate a gambling club, as such. But for any other divisions of human activity you can get incorporation from the dominion government, simply by procuring letters patent.

We saw fit to change all that. We saw fit to say that in connection with a gas line they must come to the House of Commons. Why did we do that? We did it in order that this House of Commons—this thing being of such importance—should make an examination of the problem or proposition which was submitted.

Now then, if we today are to incorporate gas pipe lines without knowing where they are going, or over what route, we become nothing but a rubber stamp—just the same rubber stamp as used by the Secretary of State when we could incorporate for any purposes at all. Surely that is true. Surely there is no argument against the simple statement I have made.

Mr. Speaker: Order—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I conclude by saying this—I saw you getting nervous, sir, and I think I have come to my conclusion at about the same time. We passed one pipe line bill last spring, and I think we were foolish. I am content, because that is the company about which some people in this House of Commons have been circulating the rumour that I am in that picture. If I were outside I would know what to call them—and I do not see anybody where I am looking at the moment.

But I do say this, that I am content now to say that the transport board in dealing with their application, which will come up within the next month or two, should put in that permission the proviso that that company must complete their line on Canadian soil. I am quite content and happy that that should be done.

And so I say to the sponsor of this bill—and they are both together, both this bill and the other one—that if they will take a little piece of paper, and put on it only one line, saying that this company shall build this line between Alberta and Vancouver, and that it shall go on Canadian soil, I will join in making it unanimous with all the members of this House of Commons; and that bill will not meet with any more trouble, and we shall not have any more stupid, silly and false charges of filibustering in connection with this matter. That is all I have to say.

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I do not wish to interfere, but the hon. member did speak on this bill just ahead of me the other night. But if the house wishes to give unanimous consent—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understood the Minister of Fisheries wanted to ask a question.

Mr. Mayhew: I wish to make a short statement—

Mr. Casselman: No.

Mr. Mayhew: —to point out I spoke on the amendment the other night. I have not yet spoken on either bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister of Fisheries is correct. He spoke on the amendment, but he has not spoken on the main motion. When the main motion is called the Minister of Fisheries will have the right to speak. I believe I am correct in that. The hon. member for Moose Mountain.

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words on this pipe line bill I realize it may be said, when I have finished, that I did not know what I was talking about. However, I am going to say a few words. My constituency may not be interested to any great extent in where these pipe lines are built. However, I am not going to take very much time in holding up this session, or this bill—because I am quite anxious to get home. And, Mr. Speaker, I have a home to go to.

It may be suggested that I am on the wrong side of the fence. And that reminds me of a letter I received from a very good friend in my constituency—one who happened to be a C.C.F.'er. He congratulated me upon my first speech in the House of Commons, and upon a radio address I had made. He said, however, that he thought I should stay on my own side of the fence, and that was agriculture.

Mr. Sinclair: On a point of order, according to page 2111 of Hansard the hon. member for Cape Breton South moved an amendment to this bill, and that was the last order of business before eleven o'clock on the evening on which the debate continued for three hours. Then the hon. member for Calgary West began to speak. So the Minister of Fisheries was quite correct in saying that he had not yet spoken on the amendment—on this amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I do not wish to deprive the hon. member of a right to speak; but my recollection is that the hon. member for Cape Breton South moved an amendment to one of these bills which I, with regret, as I always have on such occasions, ruled out of order. Then—

Mr. Knowles: It was voted on.

Mr. Speaker: No, I did not rule it out of order. The amendment was voted upon, and did not carry. There was not a recorded vote. The amendment at the present time is the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). The record I have in front of me shows that the Minister of Fisheries did speak on the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On the point of order, you are absolutely correct. It appears on the page of contents—"Mr. MacInnis, amendment; Mr. Sinclair; Mr. Church; Mr. Mayhew; Mr. Gillis; Mr. Smith (Calgary West)". On my motion it was then adjourned. It is all there.

Mr. Sinclair: The last item was a motion by the hon. member for Calgary West.

An hon. Member: You are wrong.

Mr. Knowles: On the point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have again referred to the record, and I have before me Hansard for November 22. It is true, as the hon. member for Coast-Capilano states, that the hon. member for Cape Breton South did speak immediately preceding the hon. member for Calgary West. But at that time the hon. member for Cape Breton South was speaking to the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver East. The hon. member for Moose Mountain.

Mr. Cruickshank: On the point of order—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is the hon. member for Coast-Capilano trying to stage a filibuster to talk it out?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Moose Mountain.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): I, too, would like to see a Canadian route in connection with this pipe line bill. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has been referred to as the big shot in the government but I think that should be taken as a compliment. The other evening some hon. members said that the minister was talking through his hat. I do not picture him as being the type of man who talks through his hat; I picture him as being a wise and experienced gentleman. He differs from some hon. members of this house. He is not fond of hearing his own voice. I do not think he told us all that we would like to know, provided he has the information. We want to know where this pipe line is to go. Possibly he has satisfied himself that it will be good for Canada as a whole.

The outlook in Alberta is particularly good and we in Saskatchewan, the next province, rather surmise that we have gas resources also. However, these have not been developed but rather discouraged in Saskatchewan as outside private capital has either gone around our province or flown over it to land in Alberta. It might be said that we have lots of gas in Saskatchewan, but it is different from the gas that will be going through this pipe line. Hon. members will realize that we have eliminated that to some extent.

Saskatchewan should be entitled to this gas if it needs it for industrial or other purposes. Our products are mostly agricultural and we are bound to suffer if we cannot find markets at good prices. Private enterprise should be induced to build up industry in our province. Many hon. members of the house had the opportunity of going through the Studebaker plant in Hamilton and I do not think anyone will suggest that that plant could not have been located in Saskatchewan provided we had the gas and other essentials.

This gas pipe line should be built on Canadian soil. It has been said that the Alberta government has the power to say where the pipe line shall go but I do not know whether they have. After Alberta is served the gas should be made available to the rest of Canada and this parliament should have the right to say where it will go.

It has been suggested that the board of transport commissioners have the right to state where it will go and I do not know whether that is correct. If they have that power then I suggest that it is quite possible that they will insist on an all-Canadian route. I do not know all the members of that board but I do know Mr. Patterson from Saskatchewan who was recently appointed. If the other members are the same kind of men I am sure that they will state where the pipe line is to go.

I do not know whether this bill is going to be talked out and I am not going to spend much more time talking about it tonight. But if it is talked out I presume it will be brought up at the next session. I hope that when it is it will be stated in the bill that the pipe line shall follow an all-Canadian route.

Mr. W. D. Wylie (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that I should permit this bill to pass without saying a few words. I support entirely the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). I feel that hon. members of this house should know just where this pipe line is going. If some hon. members do not know where they are going, that is their business, but I submit that we should know where this pipe line is going. We should know also just who is sponsoring this bill. I should like to read out those who are listed as sponsors.

Mr. Speaker: I would remind the hon. gentleman that on second reading it is not in order to refer to particular sections of the bill.

Mr. Wylie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Canadian needs should be satisfied before any gas is permitted to go to the United States. Until we are satisfied as to that I do not think we should approve of this bill. I think every hon. member is familiar with the natural gas possibilities in Alberta. There appears to be a lack of natural gas in other provinces than the province of Alberta. Nevertheless we must stick to the bill seeking to establish this pipe line.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Wylie: As I have said in the house on many occasions, we in Medicine Hat and the surrounding district, and I may also say in southern Alberta, are much concerned about a bill of this kind. In the early years we had gas wells that were sunk right in the city of Medicine Hat, you might say.

An hon. Member: Lots of them.

Mr. Wylie: Yes, we had lots of them. You are right; we had lots of them. What happens today?

An hon. Member: You are here.

Mr. Wylie: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the help I am getting from Liberal members on the other side of the house because we never had as much natural gas in the house as we have today. Speaking seriously, the natural gas situation at the present time in southern Alberta is beginning to become rather critical. It is beginning to get worse, to the extent that, so far as Medicine Hat is concerned, we have to drill wells nine miles from the city. What does that mean? It means higher taxes. If that does not mean anything to the Liberal members, it means a lot to Social Crediters. It is costing us more in taxation. We have got to pipe the gas from these wells to the city.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Wylie: It means a lot to every resident of southern Alberta.

An hon. Member: They exported you, too.

Mr. Wylie: They would not want the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) in Alberta. If we had him in Alberta we would have no gas left because he would have consumed it all.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Wylie: I appreciate all the help I am getting, considering where it comes from. In a serious vein, I should like to say that we believe we must be careful about the exportation of gas from Alberta. We must see that the other provinces of Canada are supplied with gas.

Mr. Byrne: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Wylie: Certainly.

Mr. Byrne: Does the hon. member know that the Westcoast Transmission Company, the company which has obtained a pipe line charter, cannot be stopped by this house from building a pipe line to Vancouver by way of the United States if the board of transport commissioners determines that it may do so?

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, yes, they can; you had better read the act.

Mr. Wylie: We are not discussing that pipe line at the present time. May I say that we in Alberta do not object to having a few companies in competition with each other. We never have objected to that, but I think when a bill is passing through this house we should know where they are going to build the line. We should know whether the pipe line is going to go directly from Alberta to British Columbia or whether it is going to go through the United States to British Columbia. I think that is our main concern at the present time. I am most surprised that a British Columbia member should rise and ask the question he did a few minutes ago. May I move the adjournment of the debate, Mr. Speaker?

On motion of Mr. Wylie the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock, and the hour for private bills having expired, the house will resume the business it was considering at six o'clock.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENTS PROVIDING FOR JOINT OPERATING OF HOUSING PROJECTS AND LOANS TO HOME OWNERS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 142, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944—Mr. Winters—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 2, subsection 4—Additional loans by corporation, to home owners and home purchasers.

Mr. Winters: Before six o'clock the hon. member for Bow River asked me a question concerning two pamphlets issued by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation having to do with the integrated housing plan. He will notice one of the pamphlets is dated July, 1947, and the other one June, 1948, and thus supersedes the former. The hon. member points out that there is a difference in these two pamphlets in respect of holdback. This is quite true because the terms and conditions of the integrated plan were changed which occasioned the issuing of a second booklet. The hon. member refers to a holdback of 25 per cent. We have no knowledge of such an amount because the usual holdback, where it is applicable, is in an amount of 15 per cent, not by regulation but in accordance with the appropriate mortgage practice.

It may be the hon. member is making the point that holdbacks in the case of houses built by the Bow River Construction Company should have been available for the benefit of home owners. I would point out that, even if the holdback were available, its purpose is not for the benefit of the home owner. The contract of the home owner is with the builder, and the lending institution looks to the house itself for its security. The discussion is quite academic, however, because the integrated housing plan was completely changed early in 1949 with title to the houses being transferred to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at the joist stage. This change in the arrangement, although generally unacceptable to builders, has had the effect of protecting the position of the purchaser. The new plan requires that all down payments be trusteed. Under present arrangements, if trouble arises such as is described by the hon. member for Bow River, there is full protection to the purchaser of the house under the integrated housing plan. These changes, although improving the position of the home owner, have had the effect of greatly reducing the volume of houses produced under the integrated plan.

I hope that this answers the question of the hon. member. I do feel there is little purpose to be served in further debating what holdbacks were required two years ago, particularly when the holdbacks were not for the benefit of the individual purchasers in whom the hon. member is so interested. The hon. member also asked me whether there were regulations in respect of holdbacks in connection with the integrated plan. The National Housing Act requires regulations approved by the governor in council. I confirm that there are no regulations in this respect. The use of the word "regulations" in the pamphlet dated June, 1947, is a general one, and refers to mortgage procedure rather than to the formal regulations as required under the terms of the National Housing Act. I quite readily admit, Mr. Chairman, that the word in that sense is used loosely in the pamphlet. I should like to return the pamphlet to the hon. member.

Mr. Johnston: I wish to thank the minister for his statement. I believe it is going to be of value to have that on the record. I should like to thank him further for the improved conditions in the administration of the housing act since he has been minister. I think there has been a great improvement, and it is going to be of great assistance to those who are building under N.H.A.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister give some information to the house on one or two points I have in mind? At an earlier stage, the leader of the opposition pointed out that under this additional lending feature presumably the rate of interest will be the same as under the present N.H.A. mortgages, 4½ per cent. In Ontario, the rate of interest charged by the provincial government on second mortgages has been 3½ per cent. Has any consideration been given to that feature?

My second point is, has there been any discussion about the possibility of having Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation take over, by assignment or purchase, these Ontario mortgages?

[Mr. Winters.]

The third point is, will the minister make a statement to the house to explain how the repayments are going to be applied as between the N.H.A. loan and these additional one-sixth loans?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, on the matter of interest, that was one of the subjects discussed with the province of Ontario. Having regard to all the circumstances, it was felt it would not be desirable to introduce an interest rate lower than the prevailing rate of 4½ per cent.

With respect to the matter of assimilating the Ontario mortgages, that too has been a matter for discussion but no decision has been reached. It is not a matter under active consideration at the moment.

With regard to the problem of assimilating the additional loan into the basic loan, it will be amortized over the period of years provided under the act.

Mr. Fleming: One other question: On the following page, Mr. Chairman, there is part of the final subsection of section 2 of the bill. These clauses that are printed on page 3 are simply parts of subsection 4 of section 2. Under clause 6 (a) we have a reference to the terms upon which loans may be made to co-operative associations. One of the stipulations contained in (a) is, that the instrument of incorporation of the co-operative association and its bylaws are to be approved by the corporation.

I should like to ask the minister what tests it is the intention of the corporation to apply in determining whether the instrument of incorporation of the co-operative association, and its bylaws, meet their approval.

Mr. Winters: It must satisfy the corporation, Mr. Chairman, that it is a bona fide co-operative, that it has power to hold land, build houses and undertake any of the other functions that a genuine co-operative would undertake. It must not in any sense be a speculative venture that will result in anything short of a proprietary interest by each co-operator.

Mr. Fleming: The minister's remarks about the test are very general. Can he be more specific? At the moment I am interested in having some knowledge of what the tests are which, inferentially, are to be approved by this house in legislation, without having them before us in precise form. I presume there will be regulations to define those tests.

Mr. Winters: This section reserves the right of the corporation to determine the financial standing, the financial structure, and whether or not it is the type of co-operative that will result in houses, and which will carry out what it purports to be in presenting itself as a co-operative.

Mr. Fleming: May I summarize those tests the minister proposes to apply? The first is to find the corporate power to undertake a housing enterprise of that kind; the second would be to prove financial ability to undertake a project of the size proposed. Does that correctly summarize the tests that the corporation will apply?

Mr. Winters: Yes, and the others set forth in the act which require—

Mr. Fleming: I am not speaking about the others that are set forth in the act.

Mr. MacInnis: Before we leave subsection 6, I have a question which would come under this heading. Credit unions are becoming fairly strong financially in Canada, and I am wondering if any requests have been made to have credit unions designated as approved lending associations under the National Housing Act?

Mr. Winters: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I understand there have been some, and approximately six or eight have been approved as lending institutions.

Mr. Noseworthy: Am I correct in understanding that the conditions applied to loans to co-operatives will be on the same basis as other loans, that is loans made by approved financial organizations?

Mr. Winters: That is right, sir, yes.

Mr. Noseworthy: Has the government taken into consideration the question of making loans to co-operatives at less than 4½ per cent or at the rates, for instance, upon which loans are made to limited dividend companies?

Mr. Winters: Yes, that was fully considered and was not deemed advisable on the basis I mentioned when I made my speech on second reading.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsections 5 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Loans and losses paid out of consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Fleming: There is some information I should like to have on section 5, Mr. Chairman. By this section it is proposed to increase from $100 million to $300 million the amount of money available under part I of the act, for loans on houses to be occupied by the owners. Will the minister state, first, what amount has been actually drawn to date under the provisions of part I out of the consolidated revenue fund; and, second, what is the estimate of the requirements for the next year or two? Will he give an indication of what that estimate is, because it will include not only the loans hitherto available under the National Housing Act but also the one-sixth loans.

Mr. Winters: Approximately $86 million has been drawn against the $100 million formerly specified in the act. On the question of how much it is estimated will be used for next year, I do not feel now that I am in a position to estimate that amount.

Mr. Fleming: With all due respect to the minister, that seems to me an extraordinary statement when he is asking the house, in effect, for an additional appropriation of $200 million to be made available under part I of the act, from that one source alone. The minister has indicated that out of the $100 million that have been available for the past five years a total of $86 million has already been drawn, leaving I take it approximately $14 million on hand. The government is now asking that the house make available an additional $200 million. Surely that amount was based on some estimate as to the need and some estimate as to the amount to be required within the next one, two or three years. This committee, I take it, just does not vote $200 million without having some idea as to the need of it.

Mr. Winters: I find estimates of this nature, Mr. Chairman, are something that come up some time hence and are held against one. I would think, though—first making the precautionary statement that it is difficult to estimate this figure—that perhaps an amount of $100 million might be required over the next eighteen months.

Mr. Fleming: On what number of houses is that based and what average loan per house; that is, the original loan under part I plus this one-sixth provided in a previous section.

Mr. Winters: I would think that would cover around 35,000 houses. Hon. members will bear in mind that apart from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation's share in the joint loan, there are contingency funds which also require certain moneys.

Mr. Fleming: Does the minister mean to say that 35,000 houses are expected by the corporation to require assistance under part I over the next eighteen months?

Mr. Winters: I would say that 35,000 would apply more to a per annum basis than the eighteen-month basis.

Mr. Fleming: I wonder if the minister will just reconcile those figures for us? The figure that he gave us was a requirement of $100 million over the next eighteen months and the 35,000 houses, I understand now, are houses that will likely be built with this assistance in 1950. Is that correct?

Mr. Winters: That is correct.

Mr. Fleming: Then what proportion of the $100 million is expected to be required in 1950 to provide the financing for the 35,000 houses?

Mr. Winters: I think the hon. member will feel that those figures have already been reconciled. I said the $100 million amount would be a rough estimate of what might be required over the next eighteen months. I also ventured the guess that there might be 35,000 units built within the period of the next year. That includes the joint loans plus the houses built on direct loan by the federal government under section 31A of the act.

Mr. Fleming: I must ask the minister if he will try to be a little more informative and a little clearer in these explanations that he is giving. If the $100 million is the expected requirement for the next eighteen months, will the minister tell us what portion of the $100 million he expects to be required in the next twelve months to provide the financing required to construct those 35,000 houses that he has told us about; and if the 35,000 houses cover more than those that he expects to be built under part I of the act, will he tell us what number are estimated to be built or expected to be built under part I? After all, it is part I we are dealing with under this appropriation of an additional $200 million. We do not vote that, I trust, without information.

Mr. Winters: I think I have given the best estimate I can, Mr. Chairman, under the circumstances. If the hon. member wishes the $100 million on an eighteen-month basis translated into the number of dollars on a twelve-month basis, it would very evidently be $66,666,666.66. I do not want anybody, however, to take that as a hard and fast figure.

As to why it is not possible to give a more precise estimate, I would say that it is not possible at this stage to forecast what the result of the additional one-sixth loan will be.

Mr. Fleming: It should be possible for the minister to announce his objective. We are interested in objectives. We have not much confidence that the goal of meeting the housing needs of the Canadian people is going to be reached unless the government has some objective to give us. Up to the moment, with all respect to the minister, we have been left to draw conclusions from figures and to bat these figures around without yet having any clear conception of what is the government's goal. Here the government is asking for $200 million. Surely the committee is to be given some idea as to just how the government proposes to put this act to work so that a case is made out for that money as being required. There is not going to be any disposition on the part of the committee to deny the money for this purpose if the committee is told that that money is going to be available to be turned into the construction of houses; but if you take the minister's figures for the cost—35,000 houses to be built under assistance of this kind in the next twelve months and $66 million to be required for that purpose—that means, as I take it, that the amount per house is not going to be as large as most of us thought was going to be required. According to my perhaps doubtful mental arithmetic, it would mean something under $2,000 per house.

I do not think these figures add up; because you are not building houses today under conditions in which $2,000 a house provides something like 88 or 90 per cent of the value of the house. This afternoon the minister gave us to understand that the houses that are to be built under part I from now on are houses that are going to be a little more expensive than the cheaper houses because the 80 per cent lending value is going to work out, he said, about the same way as these blended percentages work out at the present time, 95 per cent on the first $2,000, 85 per cent on the next $2,000 and so on. Surely we can have some clear information on the subject. Will the minister tell us whether the 35,000 houses he is talking about are houses to be built under part I alone.

Mr. Winters: Yes. That estimate of 35,000 houses, Mr. Chairman, is for part I alone. I want to emphasize again that it is only an estimate, and under the circumstances I am not going to tell the committee that we will build 35,000 houses. The estimate my hon. friend made of $2,000 is substantially correct, but that is only the government's portion of the joint loan.

Mr. Fleming: If the government is going to apply a loan value with some relationship to the cost of construction, and if the new provision for the adding of one-sixth to the previous loan allowed under part I is to have some effect, then that will mean that the kind of houses that the government expects to build or to assist in building under this part I would be houses having a value of about $2,400 each. You are not building houses like that today. These figures just do not add up. You cannot reconcile the figures the minister has given to the committee tonight. The minister being the honest and sincere man that he is, it seems to me that it is patent that no real thought was given by the government, before they brought down this legislation, either to the goal to which they were working or to the necessity of giving to the house anything that looks like a case for the additional money, the $200 million, that is being asked for. In effect we have not got any figures. We have those vague estimates which have been drawn from the minister tonight. They do not bear any relationship to the cost of construction today. On the strength of that the committee is asked to provide $200 million. I emphasize again that there is going to be no disposition on the part of any hon. member to be niggardly or penny-pinching in the provision of money, if the government will put that money to work in the building of houses. But surely by the ordinary dictates of common sense and under the rules of parliamentary responsibility, the committee is entitled to something more than it has been given tonight to justify the appropriation of $200 million.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in the point raised by the hon. member for Eglinton. When I spoke on the resolution stage of this measure I referred to it. I referred to a return which I received in April, 1949. One of the questions I asked was:

> How many houses (family units) were constructed with financial assistance under the provisions of the National Housing Act, during the year 1948?

The answer I received was:

> The number of housing units completed in 1948 with financial assistance under the provisions of the National Housing Act was 11,939.

My second question was:

> What was the total amount of financial assistance?

The answer I received was $101,642,194. On that basis I calculated that the average assistance per house was $8,512. If the minister expects that some 35,000 houses are to be built during this year or next year, with assistance on this basis I do not think that $200 million will be too much. But then I am at a loss to understand the difference between the figure that I received, namely, $8,512, and the figure that the minister gave tonight, namely, some $2,400 a house or something like that. Will the minister try to explain the difference between these two sets of figures?

Mr. Winters: The hon. member is referring to the question he asked with reference to the number of houses receiving financial assistance under the National Housing Act during 1948, and the answer was 11,939. That, I find, is the correct answer for the number of houses built in 1948, under the terms of the National Housing Act, 1944.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the figure of total assistance of $101 million odd be correct?

Mr. Winters: That too of course is the figure given the hon. member in the same reply. I have been informed that the figure is correct.

Mr. Noseworthy: Will the minister tell us on what conditions a part of the $300 million may be lent directly by the government to co-operatives or builders?

Mr. Winters: No, I cannot estimate that.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is this $300 million a revolving fund? When the money is paid back does it go back into the fund again, and is it lent over and over again?

Mr. Winters: No, this is not a revolving fund.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What happens when the people pay back the money?

Mr. Winters: The money is paid into the consolidated revenue fund, which is separate from this fund.

Mr. Noseworthy: I am not clear on the answer to the question I asked. Surely there are certain conditions under which the government may lend money directly to builders or to co-operatives in the event of lending companies refusing to lend money. What are these conditions?

Mr. Winters: That is covered by section (33) (a) of the National Housing Act. But my hon. friend asked me to estimate how much of this $300 million would be applied, and I cannot estimate that amount.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Payment of losses.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister say how long it is since this section of the act was proclaimed? Can he give us some figures as to the extent to which it has been used? How many home improvement loans have been made, and what is the aggregate amount?

Mr. Winters: The home improvement section of the act has not been proclaimed. The home extension section has.

Mr. Knowles: So far as the total amount of the $125 million is concerned, are they together?

Mr. Winters: Yes they are.

Mr. Knowles: The act does not differentiate as to how much of the $125 million should be for home improvement and how much home extension?

Mr. Winters: No, it does not.

Mr. Knowles: How much has been used up for home extension?

Mr. Winters: I am informed that it is approximately $300,000.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask whether there is any intention to proclaim the home improvement part of the act?

Mr. Winters: It is intended to proclaim that section of the act, but at the moment certain types of hardware are still in short supply, and until they become more generally available it is not intended to proclaim that section of the act.

Mr. Knowles: The minister says that only $300,000 has been used thus far. I am not sure whether we are on clause 6 or 7, but they both deal with the same section of the act. The amount allotted is $100 million. It is now proposed to raise that to $125 million, and thus far only $300,000 has been used. If it is not going to be proclaimed it seems an unnecessary increase. My hope would be that it is going to be proclaimed soon, and put to use.

Mr. Winters: It seemed logical. We are increasing by 25 per cent the amounts that can be advanced against home improvement and home extension. So it seemed logical at the same time to raise the total amount provided for under the act.

Mr. Fleming: The minister's statement a moment ago, that since this section was first put on the statute books five years ago, providing that the sum of $100 million be made available for the purpose of loans under part IV of the National Housing Act, a total of $300,000 has been used, makes it perfectly clear that section 7 of this bill is just so much eyewash. Parliament is being asked to enact a solemn farce by voting an additional $25 million on top of the $100 million that is already mentioned, when over the past five and a half years a total of only $300,000 has been used.

Will the minister, in the face of this extraordinary and amazing statement, be good enough to tell the House of Commons on what basis the government arrived at this calculation of an additional $25 million required, over and above the $100 million already available? Let him give this committee all the information that was compiled and put before him before he undertook to sponsor a bill asking for an additional $25 million on top of the $100 million already available?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Winters: The same ratio prevails. It was felt that the amounts that could be expended under home improvement and home extension should be increased to compensate for increased costs, and that the total amount available should be increased in the same way, and according to the same ratio.

It is true that the amount advanced against home extension has not been as large as my hon. friend thinks it should have been; but the fact is that the demand for loans for that purpose has been met. If and when the home improvement section of the act is proclaimed, I have no doubt that the demand will be such that the amount of money voted will be required in a very short time.

Mr. Fleming: The minister's explanation has not subtracted anything from the extraordinary features of the discussion thus far. The one reason the minister has given to the committee for asking for an additional $25 million on top of the $100 million is that he is working it out in proportion. The minister has demonstrated an extraordinary sense of proportion, in saying that because there has been $100 million provided in the act for the last five years, and the basis of the individual loan is now to be increased by 25 per cent, therefore he says "Let us work it out in proportion, and we will add an additional $25 million." Mr. Chairman, is not this an amazing demonstration of government legerdemain? They have used $300,000 in five and a half years; and now, just to satisfy a sense of proportion, they are going to ask the House of Commons to boost the amount provided for from $100 million to $125 million.

Would not one have thought it only reasonable to expect that the government, before coming forward with this request for an additional $25 million, would have sat down and asked themselves, "How much have we used? Have we any right to ask the House of Commons to put another $25 million at our disposal, when we have not used more than a fraction of the first one million, let alone the $100 million now available?"

This whole thing is just so utterly ludicrous and farcical that it is hard to believe that it could happen in this Canadian parliament in this year of grace nineteen hundred and forty-nine. I think this whole episode demonstrates that what we are doing now is to enact a solemn farce.

Mr. Winters: I am sure the hon. member did not listen to what I said, or he would not have made those remarks. This is a provision against the time when the home improvement section will be proclaimed. As I said before, once it is proclaimed it is anticipated that the demand will be such that this money will be required in a very short time. Surely he cannot criticize a type of foresight which tries to provide for such contingencies.

Mr. Fleming: I shall make only one observation in reply to the minister, that at the rate the government has been moving under part IV of the National Housing Act, he and I will both be old men—probably in our graves, and long since forgotten—before the government of the day comes anywhere near to needing that additional $25 million.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can the minister say when he is likely to have it proclaimed, because it seems to me it would be helpful in reducing the housing shortage. It would be easier to put on additions to houses than to build new ones.

Mr. Winters: The current shortages are of plumbing and heating equipment, which constitute the bulk of expenditures on home improvement. The supply situation now is that plumbing and heating hardware suppliers are just barely able to keep up with the requirements for new housing. When we can go beyond that, and service more than new housing units, then consideration will be given to proclaiming the home improvement section of the act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I cannot help sharing the astonishment expressed by the hon. member for Eglinton. It does seem to me that after creeping along for several years we are now suddenly going to break into a wild gallop. While I think we all do wish substantial and speedy progress to be made, it does seem to me that to jump from $300,000 over a period of years to this noble figure which has been mentioned does call for an explanation, as the hon. member for Eglinton has said.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fleming: No.

Mr. Knowles: Unless the minister is going to answer that, I would like to ask with respect to the $300,000—that three-tenths of one per cent of the money that has been used thus far—how much of it was used for urban home extension, and how much for rural home extension.

Mr. Winters: I am informed that the whole amount was used for urban home extension.

Mr. Knowles: Were there any applications for rural home extension?

Mr. Winters: No.

Section agreed to.

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Corporation may undertake projects jointly with provinces.

Mr. Fleming: I suppose section 9 can be regarded as, in some respects, the most important departure in the bill from what has been the scope of the housing act up to the present time. The minister on an earlier occasion has very properly indicated that there is no thought in his mind of compelling the provinces to do things, but that his intention is that the act shall be administered with a view to assisting in co-operative endeavour with the provinces to find a solution in this particular branch of the housing field.

He is asking that $50 million be made available for this purpose; and if the provinces, all of them, meet their share—and if the appropriation is really used, and is not left to be forgotten as in part IV of the act—then I suppose we can expect a total expenditure of about $75 million. That, of course, will depend upon the extent to which all the provinces feel that they are financially able to participate with the dominion government on the terms contemplated by section 9 of this bill, the new section 35 of the act.

Lest hon. members may have formed the impression that all the provinces are just waiting to participate on these terms, I think it only right that we should have regard at this time to what the provinces themselves have said, particularly in view of the desirability and indeed the necessity of getting our feet on the ground on this problem, instead of running away with our heads in the clouds, as has been done with regard to this bill on some previous occasions by some hon. members.

I refer to the correspondence exchanged during the past year between the minister and the governments of the provinces with reference to this subject. I am going to refer only to the correspondence with two of the provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan, because the governments of those provinces have written letters which I think should be before the committee. I do this in order to test some of the optimism that has been expressed by hon. members in connection with this bill.

According to the correspondence with Alberta I gather that when the minister made his statement in the house on September 21 the premier of Alberta made a public statement—the terms of that statement do not appear in this correspondence—which was apparently in rather critical terms. Thereupon the minister wrote to the premier of Alberta on September 24 expressing regret at his statement and saying that it must have been the result of some misunderstanding. He made reference to the correspondence which had been exchanged, and then on September 30 the premier of Alberta replied by letter from which I should like to quote as follows:

I, of course, do not know the contents of the press report reaching Ottawa but the statement I made to the press here was to the effect that I deplored the federal government's action in committing the provinces to participation, probably at heavy financial cost to the provinces, in any scheme not submitted beforehand for the approval of the provinces. I made no comment on the housing plan as such.

I have no hesitation in reiterating my objections to any plans requiring participation by the provinces and which is announced officially before the provinces have an opportunity to discuss and consider provisions of the plan at a round table conference. This is not the first time this has occurred. My own feeling in respect to the proper procedure is that in any plan formulated involving participation of the provinces, particularly financial participation, the federal government should call a conference of representatives of the provinces, submit the plan, invite discussion and by this means arrive at conclusions mutually satisfactory. It then would be time enough to announce the plan publicly.

In particular reference to the housing plan, even though the provinces are committed to 25 per cent of the costs, the provinces were given no opportunity to express favour or otherwise, or even submit alternative suggestions for joint dominion-provincial efforts to solve housing problems. It was our understanding your recent trip across Canada was of an exploratory nature to personally obtain information on the housing question and that this was preliminary to the calling of a meeting of dominion and provincial representatives to work out specific measures for coping with the problem.

Mr. Winters: I wonder if the hon. member would read my letter.

Mr. Fleming: The letter that preceded this one?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: It is a rather lengthy letter.

An hon. Member: Read it.

Mr. Fleming: It would do certain hon. members some good if they did a little reading. They might be contributing more to the debate than they are by making these useless interruptions.

I am quite prepared to read the minister's letter if he is serious in asking that I do so. However, I could state the gist of it, if that would satisfy him. As I have said, the minister wrote on September 24 to Mr. Manning and regretted that any misunderstanding should have occurred. He refers to the correspondence that had been exchanged and which started on March 7.

Mr. Winters: I ask the hon. member to be good enough to read my letter as I think it will be helpful to hon. members.

Mr. Fleming: I am quite prepared to do so, but I want to make it clear that it is being done at the minister's request. I take no responsibility for the time involved, because it is a two-page, single-spaced letter. It is dated September 24, 1949, and reads:

Dear Mr. Manning:

Statements attributed to you by the Canadian Press following my announcement in the House of Commons on the 21st September would lead me to believe that there must be some misunderstanding. If this is in fact the case, I would like to submit the following record of correspondence and conversations between the Alberta government and the federal government in the hope that it may serve to clarify the situation.

March 2, 1949: The Prime Minister wrote you, enclosing my letter to him, the theme of both being that the federal government would welcome for consideration any suggestions or proposals your province might have with respect to its housing problem.

March 7, 1949: You acknowledged the Prime Minister's letter, stating that his communication was being brought to the attention of members of the government of Alberta.

April 8, 1949: I wrote you, stating that I would be absent from Ottawa during the period April 8 to April 25, and stated that if Alberta cared to submit suggestions in writing, they would be given early and full consideration.

July 30, 1949: I wrote you, setting forth my intention to visit Edmonton on August 23, and stating that I would welcome an opportunity of discussing the housing problem with you or your appropriate ministers.

August 5, 1949: The Honourable Mr. N. E. Tanner, acting premier, replied to my letter, stating it was unlikely that you would be available on the 23rd August, but that he had arranged for me to discuss the problem with the Honourable Mr. A. J. Hooke.

August 23, 1949: In company with Mr. D. B. Mansur, president, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and Mr. R. L. Elliott, private secretary, I had a full and pleasant discussion with the Honourable Mr. Hooke, who, as I understand it, stated that he was not able to express any definite views on behalf of his government but that he would bring the subject to the attention of his colleagues and inform them regarding our talk. At that time the proposals which were set before the House of Commons later on the 21st September were discussed quite fully.

September 1, 1949: I wrote to the Honourable Mr. Hooke, extending my appreciation for the opportunity to discuss the problem with him and expressing the hope that it would lead to a more comprehensive approach to the housing problem generally.

September 13, 1949: I wrote to the Honourable Mr. Hooke, outlining and crystallizing the discussions I had with him on the 23rd August and stating that I proposed to make a statement in the House of Commons along the same lines on or about September 20.

September 21, 1949: I wrote the Honourable Mr. Hooke, enclosing a copy of the statement I made in the House of Commons on that day.

It is regretted that what appears to be a misunderstanding should have developed. I can assure you that it was most certainly not my intention or the intention of the federal government to proceed in this matter without first exchanging views with the government of Alberta. I was of the opinion that all possible steps had been taken to this end, and I was very pleased with the co-operative attitude reflected by the Honourable Mr. Hooke during our conversation.

It is my sincere hope that if there is a misunderstanding, this letter will serve to correct it. Moreover, if you would care to discuss the matter of housing more fully, I would welcome the opportunity.

Yours sincerely,

Robert H. Winters

I am glad to read that letter in order to accommodate the wishes of the minister, although I do not see what bearing it has on the point I was making with regard to the letter of the premier of Alberta which followed. The premier of Alberta replied six days later to the minister, as I have read. It was made quite clear by the premier of Alberta that notwithstanding the exchange of correspondence, notwithstanding the conferences, it was his understanding that there would be a general dominion-provincial conference. On that point I ask the minister to be good enough to state what is the plan of the government with reference to consultation with the provinces.

I turn now to the province of Saskatchewan and I should like to refer to a letter written by Mr. Sturdy, minister of social welfare, dated September 23, 1949. This letter is a lengthy one and I should like to quote only two paragraphs. The first is on page three and reads:

2. It may be generally assumed that the poorest provinces, such as Saskatchewan, will have difficulty in getting loans and that in any event they will have to pay the highest rates of interest for loans. It also may be generally assumed that the poorer the province the greater is its need for satisfactory housing. While the 75 to 25 sharing arrangement will put the provinces in a better borrowing position, it can be predicted with certainty that Saskatchewan will experience difficulty in obtaining moneys. Since the dominion can secure funds at more favourable rates than the provinces, particularly the poorer provinces, some assistance should be provided by the dominion government to aid the provinces in procuring loans.

I invite comment by the minister on that statement of the position of that province. Then Mr. Sturdy adds this:

From our exchange of communications I believe we can mutually appreciate the complexities involved in the dominion's housing proposals. These will, undoubtedly, be multiplied after more consideration has been given them by this and other provinces. Therefore, we would ask that there be a dominion-provincial conference at the earliest possible date to make uniform and to finalize these details. It is to be hoped that the same amicable relationships which have characterized your discussions with the provinces on housing to date would prevail throughout such a conference.

The Deputy Chairman: I should like to ask the hon. member what relationship he sees between the documents he is reading from and section 9 of the bill?

Mr. Fleming: It is related to the new proposed section 35 which contemplates agreements between Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, on the one hand, and the governments of the provinces, on the other hand, by which capital costs and profits and losses will be shared seventy-five per cent by the corporation and twenty-five per cent by the province concerned. It is related to the question whether that section is going to be fruitful in effecting agreements, because it is quite patent that nothing can come out of it except by agreement between the corporation and a province, or more than one province, and I should like to indicate what are the expressed views of certain provinces as to the possibility of agreement in the face of the difficulties that confront them in the way of entering into an agreement to assume a twenty-five per cent share of capital cost and possible losses.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member not anticipating difficulties which perhaps may not arise at all? I understand that he is quoting from correspondence that has been so far exchanged, and he wants to make the point that, according to that correspondence, opinions have been expressed indicating that perhaps future agreement may be difficult to reach. That may be the point that the hon. member is trying to make.

Mr. Fleming: That is not the only point, Mr. Chairman. I had just about finished reading. As a matter of fact, there is only one more paragraph I was proposing to read from one other letter written by the president of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in reply to that letter. These matters are directly relevant because either we are legislating in a manner that is going to be really effective for the purpose that parliament approves, or in a manner that, as suggested here, may be defeated by reason first of all of the failure to call a general conference. Two provinces have indicated they understood a conference was to be called, and that they considered such a general conference necessary. The second point is that at least one province has questioned whether it has the financial means to enter into agreements on these terms.

The Deputy Chairman: I must tell the hon. member I do not think that a discussion as to the advisability of holding a dominion-provincial conference on this question is relevant to the section that is now before the committee.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I suggest with respect that, if two provinces say that in their opinion the proper avenue to reaching an agreement between the corporation on the one hand and the province on the other is by means of a dominion-provincial conference, it is a perfectly relevant consideration under this section. As a matter of fact,

I had not intended to say anything more on that aspect than I have already said. I was asking the minister for his comment on that question. For my part I am not saying that a conference is necessary at this point, but nevertheless if such a conference would help to bring about agreement then I think the minister should either take steps to call such a conference, or give the reasons why he thinks some other method of achieving agreements may be more effective.

At the moment my point is that I, in company with all members of the house, want to see agreements reached that will put the new section 35 to work.

The final extract—and this is just a paragraph—is from a letter dated October 4, 1949, written to Mr. Sturdy, in reply to the letter from which I have just read extracts, by Mr. Mansur, the president of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. This touches on a point that has already been discussed. He says:

> In your paragraph twelve you comment upon the needs in the rural areas. The dominion-provincial arrangement now proposed is designed to assist in meeting needs in communities of, say, 5,000 population and up. If special steps are required to relieve housing conditions in rural areas, I believe that other techniques had better be adopted. Certainly the present arrangement was not patterned for such a purpose. Without in any way minimizing the desirability of better housing conditions in the rural areas, I think you would agree that the shortage of housing falls with heaviest incidence upon the urban areas. It is in that sector that the sharpest increase in the population has taken place.

As to the subject of agreements, I have respectfully asked for the minister's comment first of all on the method by which agreement is to be sought. In the second place I ask what, if any, consideration is to be given to provinces which claim that they may not be able to afford to enter into agreements. In the third place, dealing with the needs of rural areas, about which we have heard something in this debate already, if the legislation is as indicated by Mr. Mansur in his letter and is not intended to bring any benefit to rural housing, then I should like to ask whether the government has in contemplation any plan that will supply needed help to rural housing?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member apparently is of the opinion that formal agreements will be required between the provinces and the federal government before this section of the act will become operative, whereas the actual agreements contemplated are with respect to particular projects. I believe the provinces share with us the view that conditions vary so much from province to province and project to project that they can best be discussed with the particular province concerned.

Mr. Fleming: I infer that there will be no general conference.

Mr. Winters: We will determine how this section can be used to the best effect, and we are going to make available to provincial governments the facilities of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as they may require them. The provincial governments are fully aware of that, and at the moment nothing beyond that is contemplated. As to the ability of a province to pay, I think the hon. member will agree that is a matter beyond the jurisdiction of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply as it applies to this act. The financial position of a province with respect to its ability to pay is something that would have to be discussed between the appropriate ministers. As to the matter of the act being applied to rural areas, my view is that this section of the act will apply wherever the provincial government and the federal government jointly determine and agree that something can be done to provide more housing.

Mr. Knowles: I want to say one or two things, and the minister will correct me if I have not understood him properly. I take it what is involved under this section is not a series of overriding dominion-provincial agreements but rather specific agreements with respect to each project.

Mr. Winters: That is correct.

Mr. Knowles: That agreement may be between the dominion government and a provincial government directly, or it may be between the dominion government and an agency designated by a provincial government. In any case what is involved is each particular project on its own.

Mr. Winters: That is correct.

Mr. Knowles: Moving on from there, may I ask the minister to take a minute or two to tell us how this thing is going to work, and what the formula is for it. It is a pretty important section. Some of us are anxious to see it pushed for all it is worth. As I understand it, it is under this section that houses will be built in some cases for rent and in some cases for sale with the possibility of an element of subsidy. It is clear, is it not, that that element of subsidy arises by reason of such loss as is sustained in getting the project under way? It is clear, is it, that such loss is sustained 75 per cent by the federal government, and 25 per cent by the provincial government? Now, in the case of houses for sale, who sells them and who determines the price? I have in mind the fact that there is a possible element of subsidy in the sale of such houses. In the case where houses are rented, who rents them and who determines the rental? Is there any formula, any set of conditions, that determines who can rent these houses? I am asking these questions sympathetically. I am interested in seeing this section in force. I would be glad if the minister would give us some indication as to how it will work. One more question: what is the relationship between this section of the act and the slum clearance section?

Mr. Winters: This section of the act, Mr. Chairman, provides for the two governments jointly entering into a number of types of projects. First of all, it contemplates the assembly of land and services, and may not go beyond that. Another phase of it is that it enables the provincial and federal governments jointly to build on the land thus assembled. The houses built thereon may be sold or they may get into a rental position. From the outset, we have taken the view that the federal government does not wish to go further as a landlord, and that in any arrangement contemplating rental the management will be on a local basis. There will be some local housing authority.

We have said further that we wish to see as many houses as possible pass into ownership. We recognize that there are places where rental is required, and where people are able to pay economic rentals, economic rentals will be charged. The project will come under the management of the local housing authority. There is a further possibility that there may be rental housing required where the prospective tenants may not be able to pay economic rentals, in which case some underwriting of the losses might be required. We have said that we are prepared, jointly with the provincial governments on projects that are mutually acceptable, to underwrite those losses to the extent of 75 per cent federal money and 25 per cent provincial money.

In answer to the last question, about the relationship between this section and the slum clearance section which is already in the act, I would say that the two sections are entirely separate. That does not mean, however, that this section cannot be made operative with respect to a site that has been cleared and made available under the slum clearance section of the act.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the minister for the explanation he has given. Is it quite clear that these local housing authorities that will be set up to administer the renting of these houses will not sustain losses at that level? The losses will be sustained on the 75-25 basis between the federal and provincial governments?

Mr. Winters: Yes, sir, we have said that the relationship will be one in which the federal government will sustain 75 per cent of the loss, and the provincial government 25 per cent of the loss. How the provincial government wishes to handle that loss with respect to any arrangement between the municipalities and others is up to the province. The basic arrangement is 75 per cent by the federal government, and 25 per cent by the provincial government.

Mr. Knowles: The extent to which losses may be sustained in connection with the houses on a rental basis will be largely determined by the rents that are fixed. Who fixes those rents?

Mr. Winters: Those rents will be fixed by agreement involving the federal government, the provincial government, and the responsible housing authority for the area concerned.

Mr. Knowles: On reading subsection 6, clause (e), it would seem as though the governor in council had power to fix those rentals. I take it from what the minister has said that the governor in council merely confirms, as it were, the rental and other arrangements made by agreement among the three groups concerned. As the act reads, it looks as though the governor in council could fix those rents, but the minister says it will be done by agreement among the three groups?

Mr. Winters: I do not think either approach is mutually exclusive, if I may use that expression. I believe the governor in council reserves the right to determine the type of arrangement that shall be entered into, even though the arrangement may be a matter of agreement between the provinces. What I have said with respect to the federal government's willingness to enter into an agreement with the provinces for sharing losses, or any of the other arrangements, stands.

Mr. Knowles: I want to thank the minister for the answers to those questions. Is it clear that it is possible, say in the slum areas in my constituency—there are areas there that need new housing badly—for us to get the advantage of both the slum clearance section and this section 35? In other words, could the land be assembled, and the loss sustained in clearing that area paid for to the extent provided in the slum clearance section, and then have the local housing authority build subsidized, low rental housing in that area under section 35?

Mr. Winters: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is envisaged, again subject to the mutual agreement between the province and the federal government.

Mr. Knowles: I hope it will come soon.

Mr. Higgins: I have two brief questions. The minister is aware of what is known as the St. John's housing corporation. Does section 9 cover the operations of that corporation? Is it privileged to get financial assistance under it?

The other question is, under what part of the act, the amendment or the original act, has the provincial government of Newfoundland made arrangements for slum clearance?

Mr. Winters: I believe the hon. member, in effect, asked two questions. The first was whether or not this act empowers us to deal with the government of Newfoundland with respect to housing developments in St. John's. I would say that the power is there; the legislation would enable us to do that.

With respect to the second question, as to whether or not there is provision in the act to take care of slum clearance in St. John's—

Mr. Higgins: As to whether application has been made under the original act or under this amendment.

Mr. Winters: The hon. member talks about an application having been made. I should say that the premier of Newfoundland has discussed the problem with me in a general way, but beyond that no formal application has been received.

Mr. Higgins: No decision has been made by you?

Mr. Winters: We have not been asked as yet to make a decision.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to clear up a few points with regard to what my colleague has said about this section. It is rather difficult to approach the matter in view of the answer just given by the minister. I would certainly ask his sympathetic consideration if the subject ever comes to his attention. I understand the minister has been in St. John's, and has seen the conditions prevailing in certain sections of the city. There is a historical explanation of those conditions.

St. John's was destroyed by fire in 1846, and wooden houses were built. In 1892 half the city was destroyed by fire, and the half that remained—which covers about 50 acres —is in a bad condition owing to overcrowding. During the first and second world wars, people went to live in areas known as Southside hill and Blackhead road. The area is really in a scandalous condition. No interest is being taken in these people. In two sections of the city at least there is certainly a need for a housing project. If I could describe truthfully the condition—

The Deputy Chairman: I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the clause under discussion. His remarks must be strictly relevant to the clause.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Surely, Mr. Chairman, when we are speaking on a housing project we must say why it is that we need one. I hope the minister is not objecting to my drawing these things to his attention. He may have forgotten them in his hurried visit, but I am closely associated with them. I have been closely associated with these conditions for a great many years.

The Deputy Chairman: That cannot be done under this section. We are now discussing section 9.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The minister said it could. He told us that a slum clearance project could be considered under this section because it is a project arranged between—

Mr. Winters: No, Mr. Chairman. I think I should clarify that point. I said that slum clearance and this section could be regarded as complementary projects. But this section has nothing whatsoever to do with slum clearance as such. Slum clearance is covered under an entirely separate section of the National Housing Act.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Since the minister gave me that answer some time ago, I have read the section and I think the position is this. The governor in council may make an arrangement with the municipality in regard to slum clearance. But under this section which we are discussing now a project can be arranged between the province and the central housing authority with regard to the housing project. What are we going to do with the people who are living in these terrible, distressful conditions? Are we not going to do something for them? I feel a great responsibility personally, and I should imagine that the minister would be sympathetic toward people in this position.

Mr. Winters: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I must say that while I am most sympathetic, and while we should like very much to do the greatest possible amount of good with the slum clearance section of the act, yet I feel obliged to say that the slum clearance section of the act is not under discussion at the present moment.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am not really discussing slum clearance only, Mr. Chairman. Suppose we say that there is a certain area there that is a slum, that it is discreditable, that we are ashamed of it, and that we want a new housing project. My friend the hon. member for St. John's East referred to the housing corporation. I presume I am not out of order when I speak of the housing corporation, because that has to do with the wealthiest class in the community. They have been provided for. Hundreds of houses have been built for them and millions of dollars have been spent for them, but nothing has been done for the poor. What I am recommending is that we should have a housing project for poor people as well as for those comfortable people who are employed in the government services in high positions and so forth. You do not need to take down the old houses and replace them by new ones. You can go out into some of the area which was acquired by the housing corporation of St. John's and put down a new housing project where the children of these poor people would have recreation facilities near their homes and where they could live decent lives, something which they cannot do at the present time.

I had hoped, Mr. Chairman, that I would be able to specify to a greater degree than I have been able to do the terrible, degrading conditions under which the people live in parts of St. John's. I hope, at any rate, that these words will leave a mark and an impression upon the minister's mind and that, if the matter should come to his attention, he will remember what I have said and give it sympathetic consideration.

Mr. Fleming: There is one question I wish to ask before coming to the series of points as to interpretation which I shall ask the minister to clear up. Are we to understand that this section provides for subsidized housing?

Mr. Winters: I think I have made the government's position on that matter quite clear on more than one occasion. We have said that if there are circumstances in which the provincial government and the federal government together feel that an element of financial assistance—call it subsidy if you wish—is required, we are prepared to share the losses on the basis of 75 per cent federal government expenditure and 25 per cent provincial government money.

Mr. Fleming: The minister's answer is quite clear, Mr. Chairman. I do not know why he did not simply say: Yes, it is subsidized housing. That is the simple substance of what the minister said.

Mr. St. Laurent: We do not have to use your language.

Mr. Fleming: I do not think he needs to feel so sensitive about the Prime Minister's feelings with regard to the use of these words "subsidized housing".

May I come now to some points of interpretation. In subsection 1 of the proposed section 35, in the fourth line there is reference to "agency". The section reads in part:

> The corporation may pursuant to agreements made between the government of Canada and the government of any province undertake jointly with the government of the province or any agency thereof . . .

That is to say, an agency of a provincial government. Are municipalities, for this purpose, to be regarded as agencies of the provincial government?

Mr. Winters: No, they are not. That word is put in there to cover agencies such as the Ontario housing corporation.

Mr. Fleming: My next point is with regard to subsection 4 and the provision of $50 million. When I spoke a few moments ago I think my mental arithmetic was faulty when I said that with the corresponding assistance from the provinces this would create a fund of $75 million. It will call for maximum contributions by the provinces of $16,666,000, giving an aggregate of $66,666,000. May I ask the minister upon what estimate this figure has been arrived at and how far it has been estimated that this figure will go? How long will it last? What is the government's objective?

Mr. Winters: In effect, this is a working fund. The financial arrangements will rely upon moneys voted by parliament, as I think subsection 5 says. This envisages a situation whereby the building of houses is a continuing operation and where moneys are required until such time as parliament can vote further moneys. It is a working fund to provide for that purpose. The moneys voted by parliament will then be turned back to this fund so that it is maintained at the level of $50 million.

Mr. Fleming: Has the minister anything to tell the house about the objectives? Within what space of time is it expected that the $50 million will be put out to work under this section?

Mr. Winters: It is expected that there will be an appropriation in the 1950-51 estimates. It is contemplated that this $50 million will carry us over until such time as money is available from any such vote. By that time we shall be in a position to know just to what extent projects under this section will go forward under agreements with the provinces.

Mr. Fleming: Am I to understand that this $50 million is an interim fund which will provide what may be thought necessary until April 1, 1950, and that from that point on a specific appropriation will be sought by the government from parliament?

Mr. Winters: That is right.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fleming: No. I have several other points on which I should like interpretation. I should like a little more information about the $50 million, and the use the government is making of it. Have any estimates been prepared now as to how soon this money can be put to work, and as to how soon agreements can be negotiated on specific projects? Have any specific projects been submitted to the government by the provinces in anticipation of the enactment of this provision?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, the money, I presume, will be available immediately this bill receives the royal assent. No specific projects have been formally put to us envisaging the passage of this legislation; but some of the provinces have indicated that they are very anxious to proceed, and immediately this bill passes we shall enter into discussion with them.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister be good enough to turn to subsection 6? There are some points on which I should like to ask for light. For example, 6 (a) empowers the governor in council to make regulations with reference to certain subjects, prescribing the type of land which may be acquired for housing purposes and the maximum purchase price that may be paid for such land. May I say here that I should have thought that that had a direct bearing on slum clearance; because surely one of the purposes that some hon. members at least attach to this section of the bill is that it would be used for redevelopment projects, and redevelopment projects surely do not contemplate simply the assembly of vacant land for the purpose of housing projects, but rather such projects as the one which the Prime Minister saw in Toronto last year, namely, the Regent park project, which he acclaimed as a landmark in housing.

There are very definite shortcomings under section 12 of the act in the assistance that the dominion gives toward the cost of slum clearance projects. Perhaps the minister will correct me if I am wrong, but under that section I should have thought that subsection (a) of this new section 35 was to be created for the purpose of making possible redevelopment projects such as the one I have spoken of, which involves slum clearance.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, this is a very broad section. There is really very little, if any, limitation on what the two governments, provincial and federal, jointly can do. There seems to be a tendency for hon. members to feel that there is something about this that is not consistent with the slum clearance section of the act. There is no reason why the slum clearance section cannot be applied if so required on property acquired, cleared and made available for rebuilding. Then it is straightforward to envisage that this section can be applied, using the appraised value of the land, reserviced, if necessary, housing built upon it, and the costs shared on the 75 per cent 25 per cent basis set forth.

Mr. Fleming: The minister's answer, while it may be consistent with the one he gave a moment ago to the hon. member for St. John's West, does not seem to me to be consistent with the provisions of this section. I think the section is much more remedial than the minister now indicates it to be. It has been my hope that the minister would have been prepared to tell us that he intended to put this section to work. This section contemplates regulations prescribing the type of land that may be acquired for housing purposes. The minister's last statement seems to resolve itself into this, that under section 35 you can assemble land, provided it is vacant. That is clear. But he also says that if you have old substandard houses on land and you need a redevelopment project you cannot apply this section 35 in the first instance. What you then must do is to apply section 12 first. The land must be acquired under section 12, and then section 35 will come into operation. If that is the situation, Mr. Chairman, I am afraid there are going to be very great and unnecessary difficulties in carrying out redevelopment projects, for section 12 does not go far enough in providing needed dominion assistance for the purpose of clearing slums and building redevelopment projects, because these redevelopment projects by their nature contemplate the clearing of land that has these old substandard houses on it. If it comes down to this, as the minister indicates, that the only help for these redevelopment projects, the only help in the acquisition and the clearing of the land must come under section 12, and only after that is done can section 35 come into operation, then, Mr. Chairman, he is leaving me with a very disappointed feeling about his intention with regard to this provision of the act. Surely, there is nothing in the fair rules of interpretation of the language of this subsection that entitles the minister to say that it must be confined to the acquisition of vacant land. How can the minister interpret land in this section as narrowly as that? Cannot the minister tell this committee that it is the government's intention to use provisions of this kind for redevelopment projects that will bring about the clearing of slums and substandard houses?

Mr. Winters: I think it is clear, Mr. Chairman, that where there is a section already in the act, namely, section 12, providing for the redevelopment of land, it is not intended that this section should apply. There is no reason why the two sections cannot be complementary, however, as I said before.

Mr. Fleming: It just comes down to this, Mr. Chairman, that the fifty per cent assistance the dominion gives under section 12, with a view to the acquisition of land for the purpose of slum clearance, is something the dominion contributes to on a much lower scale, than the seventy-five per cent which it contributes under section 35 to the projects that are contemplated there. Unless the government is prepared to extend the remedial provisions of section 35, or terms equal to those, to the slum clearance provisions under section 12 of the act, then we are not going to get slums cleared. I am not the only member of this committee who construed the minister's statement and the language of this section as including redevelopment projects, which are the really essential factor in the long-term approach to housing conditions in Canada. However, the minister has said so and one can only express one's very great disappointment that that is the interpretation the government is putting on this section and at the way they are watering down what appeared to be sections of this act to which we could look hopefully for some benefits.

I come now to subsection (b), namely, the type, maximum costs and rentals of housing units that may be constructed. Will the minister be more specific as to exactly what the government has in mind with reference to the subjects of this subsection?

Mr. Winters: For example, I might say that the government does not propose to apply this section to houses that cost $25,000. We have to exercise some measure of control and this section gives us that privilege.

Mr. Fleming: What are the maximum costs—

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, some hon. members have a queer idea of expediting business.

Mr. Weir: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Howe: We are in no hurry.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister what maximum costs are contemplated?

Mr. Howe: Take all the time you want.

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of Trade and Commerce is getting into this. I want to tell him—

Mr. Howe: Let us talk about that for a while.

Mr. Fleming: I will tell him that he will make a contribution to expediting matters if he keeps out of it.

The Chairman: The hon. member asked a question. The minister should be given an opportunity to answer it.

Mr. Howe: The financial critic will now speak.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fleming: Is not the minister going to answer the question?

Mr. Gardiner: You have wasted forty minutes already in a useless attempt to block the bill.

Mr. Winters: We would be in a better position to determine the type of housing required after we have had an opportunity to explore the field with the provinces.

Mr. Fleming: But surely the government has done some exploring of the field. They know surely by this time what kind of housing is needed, and which they intend to assist in constructing. Is there not any idea in the government's head on the subject?

Mr. Howe: Don't answer that.

Mr. Winters: We made it clear from the outset—

Mr. Howe: He couldn't understand it if you spelled it out.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce would assist by keeping quiet.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Acadia.

Mr. Quelch: Could the minister state what the rate of interest will be under section 6 (d)?

Mr. Winters: The money will be advanced on the basis of long-term dominion bonds and long-term provincial bonds, subject to a nominal carrying charge.

Mr. Quelch: What will the rate of interest be? It seems to me that the government is placing in the housing scheme a very severe handicap when they maintain the rate of interest as high as they are under this act. I was interested in a press report appearing in the Christian Science Monitor of November 16, 1949, which states, under the heading "Low interest rates held rehousing aid"—

Mr. Bernard E. Loshbough, administrator of the Connecticut housing authority, stated:

"The housing plight of moderate income families is being met in a manner completely unique to this country. Low interest rates constitute the tool through which these houses are being made available to families, making too much for public housing ventures, yet not making enough to pay the current high rents or building costs."

Connecticut's plan of action was based upon a mortgage interest rate of only one and one-half per cent, made possible by state-backed credit. Thus lower interest rates constituted the crux of the over-all Connecticut plan of providing for new housing.

Surely if the state of Connecticut is able to use its credit to provide money at the interest rate of one and a half per cent, the government of Canada, with the Bank of Canada at its disposal, should be able to finance the housing scheme at a very much lower cost than four and a half per cent interest.

I quite realize that the minister himself is not in a position to provide the money at that rate, but the government of Canada is. He should approach the government to try to provide money at a rate of interest which will really make it possible to have low rental housing in this country.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fleming: No. The minister would assist in shortening the debate if he would be a little more explicit about this matter of maximum costs under section 6(d). Surely the matter has been considered by him. As soon as this bill becomes law presumably regulations will be promulgated under the terms of the very section we are now called upon to enact. This is a matter of importance, because I think the house is concerned to see this section put to work to provide houses in a category where houses are most needed. Would the minister tell us what maximum costs are contemplated by the government?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, as I have said before, this is a matter of agreement between the provinces and the federal government. We have approached the problem from the outset only to help the provinces solve the problems which are normally regarded as being theirs. It should therefore be logical to expect that the provinces will have a good deal to say about the type of housing that will result in any of these projects. I would, of course, like to see housing that costs the least possible money, and at the same time would result in houses which would be a credit to the municipalities in which they are built.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fleming: The minister has not told us about maximum costs at all.

I turn to paragraph (c) and find reference to—

(c) the number of housing units for which commitments may be given.

I was surprised to find that term in the bill, because it suggests that there may be a ceiling in the government's mind. Exactly what limits have the government in mind when they are asking power to make regulations prescribing the number of housing units for which commitments may be given?

Mr. Winters: That section contemplates particular areas. It is conceivable that in some areas it might not be desirable to build all the houses that somebody may wish. Since the federal government is a participant, it should have the right to have some say in the matter.

Mr. Fleming: I thought it was obvious that the government would have to have some control over the particular number of houses in any particular project which are to be approved. But that is not what this section says. This does not refer to the number of houses in any particular project or any particular area. It prescribes in (c) for the number of housing units for which commitments may be given.

The only possible interpretation that can be put upon that is the number of housing units that may be approved under section 35. The interpretation that the minister has just given, if it is put forward seriously, just wrenches the meaning of plain words.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps the minister will answer my question. Perhaps the minister would answer my question this way—if he would indicate that there is no—

Mr. Gardiner: What do you think about it? Tell us that.

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of Agriculture is interesting himself in it, too? I think if they will just—

Mr. Gardiner: I may interest myself a lot more.

Mr. Fleming: If they will just leave the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply alone —these two big men of the cabinet—he will do very well. He will get along better without their assistance.

Will the minister tell us that there is no ceiling in contemplation by the government under these provisions, and that so long as the need exists, the need will be met, so far as the legislation that we are now enacting will meet that need?

Mr. Winters: This simply reserves the right to the federal government to make regulations. In reply to the hon. member's specific question, the answer is that we are not contemplating any over-all ceiling on the number of housing units to be built.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Winters moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express a few words at this time, for a minute or so, because I was stopped—

Mr. Howe: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Herridge: —under section 2(a) by the Chairman in committee at that time—and I think most improperly. That section had to do with the provision for home owners in connection with the purchasing of homes. I just wanted to speak along the lines which had been followed by the two hon. members who preceded me and who were allowed by the Chairman to speak. I think I was perfectly in order but I was not allowed to say what I wanted to say at that time. Therefore, I shall say now what I intended to say then.

As I understand the principle of this bill, it is intended to provide more housing for Canadians. I support what was said this afternoon by two or three hon. members who said that they were of the opinion that those who live in small towns, in small villages and in rural communities do not receive from lending institutions the services they should receive under this act. I have had that very experience. I know that the small villages, the small towns and the rural communities in my constituency are not receiving the service they should receive from the lending institutions which operate under the act. I know of many good hard-working artisans, workmen, business people and others who have made applications for loans, who are well able to meet the payments on a decent type of house but whose applications have been rejected, mainly because they live in small towns, small villages or unincorporated areas.

From what I can gather, the objections of the lending institutions to lending money to people living in small towns, small villages and rural areas are, first, that they do not consider it to be a particularly good investment where the community is small and industry is not highly developed; second, they claim that quite often there is poor fire protection; third, they claim that the cost of inspection is greater.

With regard to the first objection, I contend that they are entirely wrong. Some of the most stable communities we have in this country are the small communities which stretch from one end of the country to the other. When it comes to poor fire protection I can speak from experience when I say that the small communities in my own constituency, particularly those with voluntary fire brigades, have a lower rate of fire loss than the larger centres. When they complain about high inspection costs I think they are failing completely to serve the Canadian people as they should. The lending institutions do very well under this act and I do not think they should be permitted to skim the cream and not serve the rural communities as they should.

In my opinion they are taking a cold-blooded business view of this question, without any sense of their responsibilities to Canadians as a whole. In order to illustrate my point I should like to refer to what has happened in Nakusp, the village close by to where I live. This is a village of 750 population in the Arrow lakes. It is surrounded by wonderful scenery. It has a permanent forest industry based on a provincial forest which by means of selected logging will produce an annual yield of over thirty million board feet of lumber forever. In addition there is a well-established agricultural industry. This is a stable community which the people themselves have built up over the years.

In order to illustrate the financial strength of this small community and its position as a risk, I should like to mention some of the things that have been done by these people who want to have the opportunity under the act to borrow from lending institutions. This village of 750 people has a legion post with 25 members who have built and paid for completely a $20,000 community hall. They have built nine-hole golf course at a cost of between $5,000 and $7,000. They have built and paid for completely a $50,000 water system that supplies every house and nearly every farm in the district with water for domestic and irrigation purposes. They have built a $45,000 twenty-two bed hospital. They have a voluntary fire brigade with a $7,500 modern fire engine; in all $10,000 worth of equipment.

I give that as an illustration of the development of a small community. It is in these small communities that democracy prevails to a greater extent than in the larger centres. When this unincorporated village decides to take action it is done by getting the board of trade, the women's institute, the farmers' institute and the Canadian Legion representatives together. This is only one illustration of many that I could give of the small towns and communities in my constituency that are not being served under this act by the lending institutions.

In my opinion we should do our level best to further the development of our small communities, and that is not being done under this act. It is in the small communities where the greatest opportunities to build homes and bring up families to the best advantage are to be found.

I support the arrangement for dominion-provincial co-operation in the building of subsidized housing. We are hopeful that this will produce results for industrial workers and those who live in the larger centres. We are hopeful that the opportunities provided under the act to co-operative societies to borrow money for the building of houses will be fruitful. But I want to emphasize that under this act as it is being operated at the present time the small towns, the small villages and the rural communities of Canada are not receiving the service they should. I urge the minister to investigate this situation so that the provisions of this act will be available, not only to those in the larger centres but to those who work in and build up our small towns, small villages and rural communities. I am speaking on behalf of the rural folk who have been denied the service that they should receive under this act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

COAL

ASSISTANCE TO PRODUCTION IN ATLANTIC MARITIME PROVINCES

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to assist the production of coal in the Atlantic maritime provinces by making loans to producers of coal, and to provide therein for the conditions of such loans and the terms of repayment thereof; to provide further that the aggregate principal amount of loans made to coal producers shall not exceed ten million dollars and that the aggregate principal amount of loans made to any one coal producer shall not exceed seven and one-half million dollars.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Does the minister intend to make a statement now?

Mr. Howe: This is a matter which can be better understood with the bill before us. I could make a statement and have the debate on the resolution, but I think it would have to be duplicated when the terms of the bill are available. I suggest to hon. members that the resolution be passed tonight so that the bill may be distributed tomorrow. I have a statement to make, but I would prefer to make it with the bill before us.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Speaking for myself, that will be quite satisfactory.

Mr. Gillis: I am interested in this resolution and the bill that will follow, but I see no point in discussing it until we have the bill before us.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 217, to assist the production of coal in the Atlantic maritime provinces.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VETERANS LAND ACT

PROVISION FOR MODIFICATION OF CURRENT AND FUTURE CONTRACTS, ETC.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Veterans Land Act, 1942, for the following among other purposes:

To make the benefits of the act available to veterans in receipt of pensions for disabilities which are not the result of service but were incurred during service; to provide conditions under which modifications may be made at the request of veterans in current and future contracts made thereunder; to provide conditions under which adjustments may be made with veterans who have surrendered their contracts, and for the absorption of past abnormal building costs.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Fraser: Is the minister going to make a statement now?

Mr. Gregg: I have a statement to make, but as in the case of the preceding resolution I think everything is to be gained by having the bill passed around. The intention underlying the resolution and the oncoming amendment is a very simple one. It is, by simplification and providing greater flexibility, to make that very excellent legislation, the Veterans Land Act, more valuable to the veteran settled under it, and thus to the country at large. I shall be glad to make a fuller statement when the bill is before the house for second reading.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gregg thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 218 to amend the Veterans Land Act, 1942.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move the adjournment of the house. I think it is too late to start anything else.

Mr. Knowles: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up the following bills: Nos. 64, 65, 63, 62, 120, 185, 148, 175, 210 and 215. I am not sure of the order, but I will try to have the ministers here.

Mr. Fraser: You are quite an optimist.

Mr. Drew: Can the minister indicate which will be called first?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The first two will be the two measures concerning the Department of Justice, Bill No. 64, an act to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, and Bill No. 65, to amend the Judges Act, 1946. The next will be Bill No. 63, an act respecting the inspection of fish and marine plants; then Bill No. 62, an act respecting forest conservation; Bill No. 120, respecting the incorporation of purebred livestock record associations; Bill No. 185, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act; Bill No. 148, concerning the Canadian National Railways, and providing for a deficit, I believe; Bill No. 175, to amend the Excise Tax Act; Bill No. 210, to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act; Bill No. 215, to amend Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act, 1947.

Mr. Drew: Will there be government business all day?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, yes. There is no hour for private bills tomorrow.

Mr. MacInnis: Did I understand the minister to say that the bills will be taken in the order in which he read them?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): For the first two in the morning.

Mr. MacInnis: The point I want to make is that I do not think the first two will take the house very long. Can the minister tell us the order in which they will come the first thing tomorrow?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I can give four bills. There will be the two justice bills I have mentioned. The third item will be an act respecting the inspection of fish and marine plants, and the fourth will be an act respecting forest conservation.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, November 30, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—INCOME FROM COMMERCIAL ADVERTISING

Mr. Diefenbaker:

What is the total income of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation from advertising in each of the years 1940, 1945, 1948 and for 1949 to date?

Mr. McCann: The income accruing to the corporation from commercial advertising was as follows:

Fiscal year ended	Amount
March 31, 1940	$ 773,521.89
March 31, 1945	1,639,159.97
March 31, 1948	1,842,558.29
March 31, 1949	2,217,129.91

AMUSEMENT TAXES

Mr. Isnor:

1. In what years did the federal government collect amusement taxes?
2. What was the revenue for each of the years the amusement tax was collected?
3. Did the provinces collect amusement taxes during the years the federal government collected same?
4. If so, what revenue was collected by the different provinces for each year?
5. What revenue has been collected by each of the provinces during the years since the federal tax was removed?

Mr. McCann:

1. The amusement tax was imposed in so far as moving pictures were concerned on May 19, 1941, and on other forms of amusements effective July 1, 1941. This tax was repealed May 19, 1948.

2.

1941-42	$ 7,710,360.89
1942-43	10,778,384.84
1943-44	12,018,950.29
1944-45	12,283,988.04
1945-46	13,387,340.55
1946-47	14,551,637.33
1947-48	15,368,632.34
1948-49	2,482,837.18

3. It is understood that some provinces did collect amusement tax during the years the federal government collected it.

4. No information.

5. No information.

HOUSING—NORMANDVILLE PLAN, THREE RIVERS, QUE.

Mr. Balcer:

1. What was the total cost of building by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation of the Normandville plan, Three Rivers, Quebec?
2. How many houses were built?
3. What was the individual cost of the 4-room units?
4. What was the individual cost of the 5-room units?
5. What was the individual cost of the 6-room units?
6. Are these houses for sale presently?
7. If so, how much is asked for each type of house?

Mr. Winters:

1. Project known as Terrace de Normandville, at Three Rivers, Que., was built by Housing Enterprises of Canada Limited at a total cost of $499,787.47.

2. 57.

3. Average individual cost of 4-room units, $6,504.60.

4. Average individual cost of 5-room units, $8,152.95.

5. Average individual cost of 6-room units, $10,536.67.

6. Yes.

7. Sales prices are as follows: 4-room units, $6,300 and $6,400; 5-room units, $7,300 and $7,750; 6-room units, $8,800.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—PRODUCTION OR DISPLAY IN WASHINGTON, D.C.

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Are there any persons producing for or displaying films of the national film board in Washington, D.C.?
2. If so, what are the names of such persons; giving the salaries and expenses of each of them since January 1, 1949?

Mr. Winters:

1. There is no member of the national film board staff stationed in Washington, D.C. A library of Canadian films, established by the board and formerly operated by a staff member, exists and is now under the administration of the Department of External Affairs.

2. See answer to No. 1.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—INTERNATIONAL SERVICE

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What was the total cost of operating the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation international service for 1948?

Questions

2. What is the estimated total cost of operating the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation international service for 1949?

Mr. McCann:

1. Fiscal year ended March 31, 1949, $1,437,524.68.

2. Fiscal year ended March 31, 1950, as per vote No. 305, $1,781,850.

PUBLIC WORKS—CONTRACTS FOR PURCHASE OF SPONGES

Mr. Knowles:

1. Since January 1, 1949, how many contracts have been made by the Department of Public Works for the purchase of (a) sea sponges; (b) synthetic cellulose sponges; (c) wool sponges?

2. With reference to each such contract, what is the name of the supplier; what are the types, sizes and quantities of sponges supplied, and what is the contract price for each such type, size and quality?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. (a) None, (b) none, (c) one.

2. (a) The Casselman Company, (b) Mediterranean sheep's wool, (c) 8-10 to the pound, (d) 500 in quantity, (e) $1.31 each, making a total of $655 for prime No. 1 quality sponges.

WASHING MACHINES—IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Lennard:

1. How many washing machines were imported into Canada from the United States from May 1, 1949, to October 31, 1949?

2. What makes and how many of each make?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Electric operated, 103; power operated, except electric, 19; hand operated, 1.

2. Information not available.

FUR PELTS—IMPORTS FROM RUSSIA

Mr. Lennard:

1. How many pelts of fur-bearing animals were imported into Canada from Russia during the past ten months of 1949?

2. How many of each variety?

Mr. McIlraith:

1 and 2. Persian lamb, 1,440.

DEPARTMENT OF RECONSTRUCTION AND SUPPLY—EMPLOYEES

Mr. Courtemanche:

How many persons are in the employ of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply at present?

Mr. Winters: 121.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—DISCRIMINATION AGAINST CO-OPERATIVES

Mr. Coldwell:

1. What was the name and address of the manufacturer referred to on line 30 of page 5 of the annual report of proceedings under the Combines Investigation Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1947?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

2. What was the name and address of the co-operative which was discriminated against in this instance?

Mr. Coldwell:

1. What was the name of the manufacturer referred to on line 23 of page 7 of the annual report of the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1948?

2. What was the name and address of the co-operative discriminated against in this instance?

Mr. Coldwell:

1. What are the names and addresses of the manufacturers referred to on line 4 of page 12 of the annual report of the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1949?

2. What is the name and address of the co-operative which was discriminated against in this instance?

Mr. Coldwell:

1. What was the name and address of the manufacturer referred to in line 20 of page 7 of the annual report of the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1948?

2. What was the nature of the restrictive clauses referred to in this instance?

Mr. Garson: The four preceding questions, standing in the name of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, seek the disclosure of information which for a great many years it has been contrary to the practice of the combines investigation commission to disclose. I regard the information as privileged, and I would ask my hon. friend to withdraw the questions.

Mr. Coldwell: I have every confidence in the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act. If the practice in each case has been as the minister has stated, I am quite willing to withdraw the questions.

Mr. Speaker: These four questions standing in the name of Mr. Coldwell are withdrawn.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Argue:

1. What are the names and addresses of all persons employed under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in Saskatchewan in the year 1948-1949?

2. What sum of money was paid to each person as (a) wages; (b) sustenance; (c) mileage; (d) other allowances?

3. At what rate are (a) wages; (b) sustenance; (c) mileage; (d) other allowances paid to inspectors?

NORTH SYDNEY, N.S., RAILWAY TERMINAL WHARF

Mr. MacLean (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. Have the plans for the new railway terminal wharf at North Sydney been completed?

2. If so, when will tenders be called for this work?

CIVIL SERVICE—PERCENTAGE OF PERMANENT APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. How many nonpermanent civil servants have been in the service (a) 10 to 15 years; (b) 15 to 20 years; (c) 20 to 25 years; (d) 25 to 30 years; (e) over 30 years?

2. What percentage of the quota of permanencies allowable in the civil service has been filled to November 1, 1949, in each department and unit?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

INCOME TAX—TRADE UNION DUES AND TEACHERS' FEDERATION FEES

Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of all correspondence in the possession of the Minister of National Revenue, dated since June 8, 1948, having to do with refunding any overpayment of taxes made possible because of the exchequer court decision relating to the deductibility of trade union dues in the years 1945, 1946 and 1947; also for a copy of all correspondence from the same date, in the possession of the Minister of National Revenue and/or the Minister of Finance, having to do with government policy in relation to the deductibility of trade union dues and teachers' federation fees from taxable income for the years 1948 and 1949.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that if this motion carries it should be subject to the reservation that communications which are marked "confidential and personal," and also that correspondence between individual taxpayers and the department, which by virtue of the secrecy provisions of the Income Tax Act cannot be disclosed, be not included.

Mr. Knowles: Letters regarding policy can be produced.

Mr. Graydon: There will not be any letters produced.

Mr. Speaker: Carried, subject to the reservations made by the Minister of National Revenue.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INCREASE IN REFUND PAYABLE IN RESPECT TO PRIOR SERVICE BEYOND MAXIMUM PENSION PERIOD

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 64, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARIES, TRAVELLING ALLOWANCES, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 65, to amend the Judges Act, 1946.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I have a very few words to say on this bill, and I think it would be better to say them on the motion for second reading.

When the bill was in the resolution stage I referred to a press report of a statement alleged to have been made at the meeting of the bar association by the chief justice of the province of British Columbia in regard to judges' salaries. The chief justice of British Columbia advised me that he made no such statement. The item I read from the press is quoted in the letter that the chief justice wrote me, and reads as follows:

> At the convention of the bar association at Banff, the statement was made by the chief justice of the province of British Columbia that salaries of judges are entirely inadequate and not in keeping with the dignity of superior courts.

The chief justice says that he did not make any such statement. He says that at the bar convention it was recommended by a special committee that the salaries of the puisne judges of the Supreme Court of Canada be increased to $25,000 a year, and that the salary of the chief justice be proportionately increased. On a motion to refer that report back, the chief justice, according to his letter, said that he did ask, not for any increase in judges' salaries, but that the salaries of superior court judges in the provinces should be brought more in line with those of the justices of the Supreme Court of Canada. That is the point that was made by the chief justice of British Columbia. Since he took the trouble to draw it to my attention, I thought I should bring it to the attention of the house.

Just one other word on the proposed increase in salaries mentioned in the bill. I emphasize only what I said when the bill was in the resolution stage. If I can make it any stronger than I made it then, I shall endeavour to do so. I do not believe it is anything short of a scandal that at this time we should be raising salaries that are of the proportions of supreme court judges' salaries, when hundreds of thousands of people throughout this country are being paid meagre salaries which are not going up but falling every day. I asked some questions on the unemployment situation in the dominion in the last two months as compared with the same period last year and I received figures which indicated that unemployment was approximately twice as great as it was last year. This means that twice as many people will be compelled to live on the meagre benefits from unemployment insurance. Because of that they will have to accept a lower standard of living. But here we are increasing salaries which in my opinion are already high enough.

The point made by the Minister of Justice when this matter was up for discussion before was that when they are appointed to the supreme court the judges are asked to give up certain things and perhaps make sacrifices by leaving their homes and taking smaller incomes than they received in the practice of their profession. I am not sure that there are not compensating factors for anything of that kind that may take place. The position of a justice of the supreme court is an honourable one. The honour itself is worth something, and the salary which goes with it is surely not inconsiderable. Not only is there the salary, but there is the pension. As long as they live, the justices of the supreme court receive a pension of two-thirds of their salary after they retire. When they die, one-third of that substantial pension goes to their widows. There are very few widows among the people with whom I associate who are left in that very fortunate position. I suggest to the House of Commons that if we want to improve the standard of living of the people of Canada we should begin at the bottom, and not at the top.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I can understand the attitude of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and the ideas he has expressed. However, we are setting up a supreme court which is indeed to be the highest court in this land. If ever there was a time when we should endeavour to secure the best possible men for the bench, surely that time is now, when the supreme court has become the court of last resort.

I am not unmindful of the facts set out by my hon. friend, and I am not at all certain that this present time is the most propitious for bringing into effect these very considerable increases. Having regard to powers it will now have, I do not think anyone will consider it presumption on my part if I suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that in making appointments to the supreme court the first qualifications should be the highest integrity and ability, and also that no suggestion of political fitness as a major basis of appointment should be allowed to creep into appointments to that court.

I thank the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for his obvious agreement with what I now say; for if we are to raise this court to the dignity and honour it must have in order to discharge its vast responsibilities, then above everything else ability, capacity and a sense of justice must characterize the appointments made to that bench.

In the United States—and I mentioned this on one other occasion—in order to guard the standard of their supreme court provision was made for approval of appointments by the Senate. No doubt that system is inapplicable to our form of government, but it does ensure that appointments shall not be made that cannot pass the criticism and examination of that distinguished legislative body, which so often places the public good above private and political concepts. Unless in every appointment made to the Supreme Court of Canada qualifications transcend every political consideration, a blow will have been struck at the court from which it will not soon recover.

I believe the time has come to have only one court in this country known as a supreme court. It is most difficult for the laymen, if indeed it is not for the lawyer, to understand why in one province there is a supreme court while in another there is the court of king's bench. The time has come to amend the law so as to provide that there shall be one supreme court in Canada, so that when a judgment is given by the supreme court it will be generally known that it is the Supreme Court of Canada, and no other, to which reference is made.

The next point I make in connection with raising the standard of the bench—and I speak without any desire to arouse antagonism—is one which I suggest the minister might very well consider. Judges ought not to serve on royal commissions which have a political background. The inherent danger in the appointment of judges to royal commissions political in nature is that our judiciary is thereby undermined in the opinion of the people. I am not referring to royal commissions the purpose of which is to solve economic problems; I have in mind, for instance, the coal commission, which was presided over by the present hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll). I refer to royal commissions which have been appointed as a result of political criticism. It is my belief that the judiciary should not be called upon to serve on such commissions.

This matter was before the house in 1927. Mr. Bennett, who subsequently was president of the Canadian Bar Association, dealt with the matter from a nonpartisan standpoint. In 1927, when this act was before the house, he said, among other things:

> Sometimes we have made appointments that have been political in their character. That is true; both sides have done it. It has been the reward sometimes for candidates who have run elections. Men have run elections, gone into a campaign, faced a constituency and said: Well, this is the only sure way by which I can get a judgeship. I know of cases like that, and so does my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and I regret to say that in every province in Canada you will probably find on the bench one or two men whose appointments have been made solely because of the services they have rendered of a political character.

He went on to make this statement:

If you are to have justice administered efficiently and faithfully, if you are to have confidence in the judges of our courts, to rely upon their judgments and to feel that the differences between labour and capital and the great issues involving property and men's liberties, privileges and lives are honestly and justly dealt with, it can be done only by attracting to the bench men with the qualifications and attributes to which I have alluded.

That was in 1927. I remember well hearing the present Prime Minister, speaking before the Canadian Bar Association, express himself in sentiments very much the same. I think I speak for hon. members of the legal profession, as well as those outside of it, when I say that the people are asking that the appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada shall be such that the most benevolent political eye will not be able to discern qualifications based in part on political fitness.

We have set up a body that is to deal with the lives and the future of Canada, that will have the difficult task of settling major jurisdictional problems that arise between the dominion and the provinces. If this court is to discharge these vast responsibilities, above everything else it must be a court that merits and deserves, by reason of the fitness of those appointed to it, the custody of the future of the Canadian people. With all the power I can give to my words I ask the government that in making these appointments they select men who enjoy the respect of people everywhere in Canada, men whose honour and capacity is above reproach. If the government will do this, they will go far towards laying the foundation for the type of Supreme Court of Canada that the Canadian people wish to have.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, this bill emphasizes the need of a legal committee of this house. Such a committee should have been set up long ago. I remember when my former leader appointed a committee to advise on and consider the revision of judges' salaries. At that time the government was having a great deal of difficulty in securing properly qualified men to fill vacancies in the high courts and other courts throughout the country. The committee recommended certain changes in the salaries and expenses of the judiciary.

This country has been well served by the large body of members of the bar who in the past have done so much for Canada in the matter of the administration of justice. Under the British North America Act the organization of the courts is a provincial matter, but the dominion pays the salaries and retiring allowances.

This bill provides that the salary of the chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada is to be increased from $20,000 to $25,000 and the salaries of the other judges from $16,000 to $20,000. The number of judges of the Ontario court of appeal has been increased by Ontario legislation from seven to nine. The judges who go out on circuit are doing good work, but they have to put up with considerable hardship in connection with hotel accommodation and other matters. Most of the hotels are constantly filled to capacity and these judges have great difficulty in securing suitable accommodation. I think the minister should make some allowance for this branch of the work.

The need of a legal committee has been demonstrated during this session. Three-quarters of the time of the house has been taken up in debating the principles of legal bills. We should not make a political football out of the administration of justice. This prevents the minister from filling vacancies and getting members of the bar to give up their private practices at great cost. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) represents that large body of men who are giving their time to this particular branch of work at great cost to themselves.

I am doubtful if the provision to increase the number of judges in the Ontario court of appeal from seven to nine is a wise provision. Ontario legislation has increased the number of judges of the high court from fourteen to sixteen. At one time the judges of the court of appeal had to reside in Toronto. It is difficult to obtain housing accommodation and at the present time one of them, owing to lack of housing accommodation, does not live in Toronto, even during court sittings.

We have a very able young supreme court judge who is now sitting in Ottawa, Mr. Justice G. A. Gale. He is a friend of the Speaker and of many other hon. members. He used to be in the firm of Mr. G. W. Mason, treasurer of the Law Society of Upper Canada, and is able to conduct cases in such a manner that his ability has received widespread recognition throughout the country. He is only one of a number of younger members of the bar who have taken up this work in Ontario at considerable cost to themselves.

Some arrangements should be made to provide allowances for these judges who travel on circuit. There are no houses available in Toronto, and like everybody else they are forced to pay two or three times the ordinary value for a house. The increase in the number of judges of the high court of Ontario will provide some assistance for the judges who are now bearing the burden and the heat of the day on circuit throughout our province. Further assistance should be given in the way of travelling expenses. I do not see why the municipalities should have to pay all this when our judges are dealing with national work, and with 200,000 orders in council passed by this government.

I hope some arrangement will be made for consideration of this bill by a legal committee, because that is the only kind of body that can properly deal with it. Members of the bar, the judges and the attorneys general of the provinces could appear before that committee and give their views on these subjects, which are largely provincial. Under the British North America Act the organization of our courts is a provincial matter, and the dominion provides salaries and pensions for those who take up this most important work.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is just one suggestion I should like to make. I do so partly because the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has suggested what I think would be a desirable change in terminology.

While I am on my feet, however, but without taking the time to repeat them, I want to support the views expressed so well by my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). I feel it is not proper to increase both the salaries and the pensions of persons in these higher brackets when the government finds it so difficult to do the same thing for people in lower brackets. If this measure did only that, we would oppose it. We are in the position of having to accept the bill, because we recognize the need for an increased number of judges, but we shall shout "on division" as a protest against these increases in salaries already high.

The suggestion I should like to make as to terminology relates to the word "puisne". I suppose, like "Newfoundland", there are half a dozen pronunciations of it. I understand the correct pronunciation is "puny". It does not sound to me like a very complimentary title to give a judge. Certainly the salaries and pensions that go with being "puisne" are not puny. I wonder if consideration should not be given to changing that word to "associate". After all, that is what these justices of the supreme court are, other than the chief justice; they are associate justices. I would hope that, when consideration is given to the suggestion of the hon. member for Lake Centre, consideration will be given also to the suggestion I have made.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, most of the matters which have been referred to this morning were discussed at some length when the bill was in the resolution stage. I do not intend to traverse the ground again at any great length, but a few points have been raised this morning to which I think some attention should be paid.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has suggested that there should be only one supreme court in Canada, and I think there would be none who would dissent from that view. May I point out to my hon. friend, however, that the naming of provincial courts is a provincial prerogative, and there is nothing that we in this House of Commons can do to change the name of the supreme court of Ontario except by making representations to the government and the legislature of that province. I would be quite in accord with doing so, but I think this is one of those dominion-provincial matters in connection with which it would have to be done tactfully. If we were to arrogate to ourselves, as one might infer from my hon. friend's remarks, the privilege of saying what the names of the provincial courts shall be, then we might not—

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no question of that at all.

Mr. Garson: —we might not produce the result he had in mind.

The hon. member also said that judges should not be appointed as members of royal commissions. Almost instantly we can see that there are certain disadvantages in the appointment of judges to royal commissions. Nevertheless upon further examination of the problem one can see great advantages in having them so act. After all, most royal commissions exercise judicial functions to a greater or lesser degree, and usually to a greater degree. The idea some people seem to have that the judicial function is something anyone with reasonable capacity can exercise without previous experience or training is a wrong one. Therefore when we have to look around in Canada for the most suitable members of royal commissions, judges are eminently fitted as candidates for such posts because of the fact they have been trained in exercising the function which is the chief function of a royal commission.

[Mr. Church.]

I think my hon. friend will agree with the observation I am now making, and perhaps will concur in my present agreement with the view he has expressed that in the face of the general problem the only thing a prudent and wise government can do is to balance the advantages against the disadvantages, and endeavour to secure the best of judicial talent for royal commissions, while at the same time not appointing judges to commissions which are likely to become the subject of political controversy.

As to the matter of salaries, I am greatly indebted to the hon. member for Lake Centre for the emphasis which he has placed upon the necessity of obtaining the very best talent that can be secured for the Supreme Court of Canada. I wonder whether we realize that, as a result of the supreme court amendment bill which we passed a few weeks ago, in a sense a new court is being established with greatly increased responsibilities and jurisdiction. The position of a final court of appeal is not only quite distinct and different from that of any other court in the country, but it is also quite different from the supreme court as it has been up until the present time, because it is now the court of last resort. The new court is to take the place of the privy council, which by general consent is one of the greatest appellate tribunals in history, and I suppose certainly the greatest appellate tribunal in the world today. We must remember that the function of deciding the law of our country in the last resort, which we are now turning over to the supreme court judges, was well described by the Earl of Carnarvon at the very time the Supreme Court of Canada was first set up. In doing so he used these words:

> The supreme appellate authority of the empire or the realm is unquestionably one of the highest functions and duties of sovereignty. The power of construing, determining and enforcing the law in the last resort is, in truth, a power which overrides all other powers since there is no act which may not in some form or other become the subject of a decision by the supreme appellate tribunal.

If we have any doubts as to the importance of the function which the court of last resort exercises in this or any other country, we only have to look back upon the effect which certain decisions of the privy council have had upon the constitution of our country. With respect to many judgments of the privy council, I venture to suggest that if any legislative body in Canada had attempted to achieve the same results by legislative action there would have been a tremendous outcry. So when we are setting up, as we have done, a court of last resort in Canada, it is not only preferable and advisable but imperative that we should secure the very best talent, men of the highest integrity, because there can be few responsibilities in Canada the proper discharge of which will be more important to the welfare of our country than those of the chief justice and judges of the Supreme Court of Canada.

This being so, and having regard to the fact that all those likely to be suitable candidates for appointment to such a court are men in the high income brackets, while we have always expected them, and I think must continue to expect them, to make a substantial financial sacrifice by accepting appointment to this court, there is a certain salary to which we must reconcile ourselves if we are to induce mature lawyers of the highest ability to leave their home communities and come with their families to a new environment in order to serve upon the Supreme Court of Canada. It may be that the amount we are now providing is not enough; but whatever the figure may be that is considered enough, the fact that it is more than we pay some other official in Canada, or more than is earned by the general body of taxpayers in Canada, I suggest is irrelevant to the problem we are considering here.

Canada is not the only country that has to face this problem of offering salaries sufficient to induce lawyers of mature age to leave their home cities and their friends in order to serve upon a supreme court in a capital city. In the United States, for example, in spite of the egalitarian tendency in the matter of salaries, which is far stronger than in Canada, there is still a wide difference in this regard. In some departments there you may have a chief with twenty-five or thirty assistants, and there will be a difference of less than $50 between the salaries of the chief and his assistants, as in the interstate commerce commission, for one example. In that country, however, in spite of the egalitarian tendency to which I have referred, the associate judges of the supreme court in Washington are paid $25,000, whereas judges of the federal district courts of appeal, presumably men who after their appointment would usually remain in the communities in which they had been practising, receive $17,500, and the judges of the federal district trial courts are paid $15,000. So there is quite a wide spread.

If we are to secure the discharge in a proper manner of a function of government that has been described in the terms I previously quoted from the Earl of Carnarvon, we must not approach this matter in any penny-pinching spirit. For some time I acted as treasurer of a province, and I was not noted then as a spendthrift; but there are cases in which one can be penny wise and pound foolish, and I think this is eminently such a case. The total amount we propose to spend upon the supreme court for the proper discharge of one of the most vital functions in our body politic is not in any sense exorbitant; it never has and never will be. The course we propose in this bill is wise, prudent and economical, a course for which we solicit the support of every hon. member of this house, regardless of party.

I should like to conclude with just a reference to the emphasis laid by the hon. member for Lake Centre—with which I am in entire agreement—on the suggestion that in appointments to this court political considerations should not be permitted to carry weight. In fairness to this government, however, I think I should draw to the attention of the hon. member the fact that within recent years there have been cases, which I think it would be invidious for me to identify by name, of appointment of judges who are now ornaments of the bench and who were appointed by this government in spite of the fact that they were of the opposite political persuasion—

Mr. Drew: You perhaps knew more than we did.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How many of them were there?

Mr. Garson: —and whose appointments have been generally commended by the communities in which they serve, and in fact by the whole country. I agree that it is certainly advisable in all cases, and essential in appointments to the supreme court, that the major test that should be made concerning any candidate is with respect to his legal ability and integrity and judgment. Certainly that is the policy that will be followed in such appointments.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Salaries of judges of Supreme Court of Canada.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Mr. Drew: In his concluding remarks the minister pointed out that the supreme court would have new duties resulting from the fact that it now becomes the final tribunal, not only in the ordinary civil cases that may come before it but also in the constitutional cases which in so many instances were previously decided by the privy council. I think it would be well for hon. members to remember that the functions of that court have not yet been clearly defined so far as its constitutional responsibilities are concerned. For this reason I have some concern about the time at which this bill comes before us. The number of judges required to make that court an effective tribunal for all cases that may come before it, and the salaries necessary to attract the type of men who will give this judicial tribunal the very highest possible standing, to some extent relate to the new responsibilities that are to be accepted, and the extent to which these responsibilities will impose additional burdens upon the court. Hon. members of this committee do not yet know what is going to happen in regard to a large number of those constitutional cases which are called for decision by this court. In examining this bill and the arguments that have been put forward, it is necessary to remember that most of the constitutional appeals have related to matters of provincial concern. We do not yet know how those appeals are to be dealt with. That decision can be made only after consultation with the provinces. Undoubtedly it will be one of the first subjects discussed when the provincial governments meet the representatives of the dominion government on January 10. We do not yet know whether the provincial governments will ask for some other form of tribunal, or whether they will ask for some special procedure in relation to these cases.

While supporting without reservation the statement that it should be the desire of every one of us to raise the Supreme Court of Canada to a position of recognized preeminence in the judicial field, I have some concern about being called upon to express at this time an opinion as to the size of that court and the salaries that are required. It might have been advisable to defer the decision until after the meeting with the provinces, so that if agreement is reached, as we all hope it will be, the decision could be made with knowledge of the kind of procedure that is to be adopted in regard to the whole field of constitutional decisions.

I do not think, however, that there appears to be any question that this bill is to be adopted at the present time. I can therefore only reiterate what I have already said and what others have said: Let us hope, as Canadians, that the appointments which are made will give every Canadian reason to be proud of the Supreme Court of Canada. At the same time, in view of the observations I have made, I also urge that the representatives of the dominion government, when they meet the representatives of the provinces, bear in mind that the decisions then made will have a continuing effect upon the status of the supreme court as our final court of resort in constitutional cases.

I have no thought of reviewing debates which have already taken place, but it will be remembered that one of our objections to a partial amendment to the constitution and a partial procedure for amendment of that constitution was related to this very fact. Some appeals can now go to the Supreme Court of Canada, and some—probably the largest number—can continue to go to the privy council, until there has been this joint decision. Let us hope, whatever procedure is followed as a result of the conference which opens on January 10, that we are not to have two types of constitutional appeal, but that our constitution will be one and indivisible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the minister in a position to say when the supreme court will in fact be set up? The press has reported as to whom the two appointees will be.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): They do not know.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. Whether that be correct or not, I do not know. But will the minister say when he expects that the court will be set up, so that it will in fact be proclaimed to be a final court?

Mr. Garson: I am sure that anyone listening to the question which has just been asked, and to the speech of the leader of the opposition which preceded it, and who carried in his mind the remarks made yesterday in the matter of the rent reference, must see what a difficult position this government is placed in as a result of the advice which it from time to time gets from the opposition. On the rent reference, I understood that the hon. member for Lake Centre was complaining because the government had not had the Supreme Court Act amendment bill assented to and the whole matter set up so that the rent reference could go to the supreme court in such a way that there would be no appeal to the privy council. Today the leader of the opposition is suggesting that we should not deal with the Supreme Court Act amendment until we have a conference with the provinces. Then the hon. member for Lake Centre wants to know when we are going to bring the Supreme Court Act amendment into effect.

Mr. Casselman: You have many worse troubles than that.

Mr. Garson: May I say to these gentlemen who tender this inconsistent advice that we do not intend to reach a decision about these matters while we are preoccupied daily with an eight-hour sitting of the house and are trying to do our departmental work in the other two hours. But taking into account all the excellent pieces of inconsistent advice that we have received from the opposition, we shall endeavour to reconcile them all and to reach, at as early a date as possible, a decision with regard to the matter of the appointment of the supreme court judges and the organization of the court on its new basis.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Minister of Justice has in recent days proven that he belongs to a group to whom inconsistency has indeed become a virtue. I can understand his feelings when he endeavours to find inconsistency between the two views expressed. The view I expressed the other evening was that the reason the Supreme Court Act amendment had not been brought into effect might have been that the government wanted to postpone indefinitely a decision whether or not they in fact had the power to continue rent control. They left the door open in that regard, having informed the house that it was most necessary to get that bill through quickly so that the final court could be set up.

Mr. Garson: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Garson: If we postponed organization of the supreme court until after the dominion-provincial conference, as was suggested by my hon. friend's leader, would we not inevitably become involved in a privy council appeal in a certain set of circumstances if the rent control reference were made to the supreme court before that time?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is exactly it. The court will not sit until the middle of January, or possibly February. That was the point I was making the other night. Why draft an order in council and place it in the hands of the court before the court is a final court? The minister could have brought the whole question of rent control before the dominion-provincial conference, which could have determined the nature of the question to be submitted, at the same time protecting the constitution and the rights of the provinces. Then he could have made his submission to the final court. There is nothing inconsistent in that.

What the minister did in connection with rent control is this—

The Chairman: Order. We are discussing a bill to amend the Judges Act to increase the salaries of judges; that is all. We are not discussing a bill to amend the Supreme Court Act. That has been done.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, you did not notice the departure from the rules when my hon. friend was the one who was committing the breach.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Lake Centre started the debate.

Mr. Garson: On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman, my departure from the rules was in my endeavour to answer the question which had been asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I now ask the minister why the secrecy? Why did he not tell the house when the court is to be set up?

Mr. Garson: I have just finished telling my hon. friend.

The Chairman: Order. That question refers to the Supreme Court Act; it does not refer to the bill to amend the Judges Act. The question we are discussing is a matter of salaries; that is all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Your ruling is final, sir; therefore one can only accept it.

The Chairman: If you accept it, do not discuss it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: At the same time I have a right to assert, with the greatest deference, that if my hon. friend can break the rules, there is no reason why an hon. member on this side cannot do so.

The Chairman: My ruling is not debatable. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Mr. Gillis: I have a few remarks to make on this question.

An hon. Member: You had better be careful.

Mr. Gillis: I am always in order on these legal points. I am not opposed to increasing judges' salaries as such, but I am certainly not in accord with the reasons given by the Minister of Justice for doing so. He argues that in order to attract the best people to that particular field you have to pay them a high salary, and so forth, and so on. In going through life it has been my experience that you do not buy brains and judgment. You either have it or you have not. To justify the increases in salary on that argument is wrong, in my opinion. I have always found that the persons who have qualifications, ability and principles are generally those who are working for their living, because they believe in the principles they are working for, and they are not for sale. That has been my experience.

I want to leave this thought with the Minister of Justice. The taxpayers of Canada as a whole are the ones who will pay the salaries that we are setting now. Sitting here as an ordinary individual, who has no legal training, the thing that strikes me is that ninety-five per cent of the people who will pay the salaries will never be in a position to receive any of the super-justice dispensed by this particular body. They will never get before that court. Large corporations, provinces and others who are aggrieved and who have the necessary finances and can pay the fees required to employ legal talent, are the ones that this court will function for. On one occasion in the house I said—and I know there are over eighty lawyers in the house—that you can get as much justice as you can buy. Everyone raised the cry that that was a reflection on the judiciary. It is no such thing. I have never cast any aspersions on the judiciary. I made that statement, and it is a statement of fact. In order to get before this supreme court you will have to pay. I suggested to the previous minister of justice, Mr. Ilsley, that in looking over this whole legal set-up and the matter of dispensing justice, improvements should be made in the courts where ninety per cent of our people see justice dispensed, namely, in the magistrates' courts. These courts certainly do not give the average person in this country very much confidence in the way justice is meted out.

I am not opposed to getting the best men possible for these positions, but I do not agree with the idea that the best man possible for any position is the man who has his talents for sale, and sticks to that particular angle of it. People in certain positions should receive a large enough salary to get along on, and some in some positions require more than others.

During the Minister of Justice's tenure of office I should like him to give attention to the county courts, to which the ordinary citizen who is aggrieved and who has the finances may go. If he has the finances he is reasonably sure of getting some kind of balanced decision there. When the minister is looking at the question I wish he would take a look at the magistrates' courts. If he does I think he will agree that a large percentage of our young people who, because of lack of judgment in many instances, are thrown into penitentiaries for a year or two years, come out with a very bad picture in their minds as to the way in which justice is dispensed. Many of them carry on with that feeling. I suggest that the whole question of justice goes back to the courts of first instance. While it may be all right to get supermen for the super-court, it will not do the ordinary citizen of this country very much good unless he has the finances to get before it.

Mr. Garson: I do not think I should let my hon. friend's observations pass unanswered. With the spirit of his reasoning I am in complete accord, but with great respect, I think that he has some of his premises wrong —some of his facts. For example, my hon. friend said that ninety per cent of the citizens of Canada could never get into this highest court of the land, and therefore they are in effect uninterested in the judgments which it renders. I suggest to my hon. friend that while many of this ninety per cent may not get into the highest court in the land as litigants, their lives are being affected every day by the interpretation which is placed by the highest court in the land upon, for example, a division of legislative powers between the dominion and the provinces.

One of the things we have to bear in mind is that it is not only by legislative action that the constitution of a country can be amended. When the fathers of confederation said that all the residuary powers in the country were to be exercised by the dominion, and the privy council in effect over a period of time interpreted property and civil rights within a province as being so wide as to include some residuary powers, they accomplished a change, and I think my hon. friend, being a practical and sensible man, would be the first to agree with me that any change of that kind, which is created by a court of last resort, goes to the hearthstone of every person in the country, no matter how humble he may be. This being so, the humblest man in Canada has a far greater interest in the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada than in some of the intervening appeal courts, because in the last resort it will be the Supreme Court of Canada which will interpret what the law of Canada shall be. The magistrates' courts and the high courts of the provinces, and the like, apply, in relation to the principle of stare decisis which we discussed at such great length on another occasion, the law as determined in the Supreme Court of Canada. With regard to the hon. member's observations as to magistrates' courts and the like, I am sure that upon reflection he will recall that they are all set up provincially, and that if any reforms are required in that direction his observations should be addressed to the provincial authorities.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I always like to hear the hon. member for Cape Breton South. He is the iconoclast of the house. He clears up these images so that they can be seen.

There is only one thing which I believe the minister missed. Up until the time of the amendment to the Supreme Court Act this year a poor man could not get to the supreme court. He could go to the privy council in forma pauperis; in other words, he could apply to the courts for permission to go there, no matter how poor he might be. Provision was made this year, however, through an amendment introduced by my hon. friend, whereby anyone in this country, however humble, however poor, and despite his inability to meet the cost of litigation or the security for costs, may go to the Supreme Court of Canada, except so far as his constitutional freedoms are concerned, by simply making the necessary application. This was a step forward. My hon. friend asks where he would get counsel to argue the case. Well, no matter how eminent counsel may be, from my experience they will take anybody's case, regardless of fees, where a matter of injustice has been established. Today any person can go to the supreme court. Lack of finances does not now keep him back, and I am sure counsel could be found to take a case.

Mr. Gillis: I agree with everything the minister said, but he started off on the wrong foot by misquoting me.

Mr. Garson: I am sorry if I misquoted the hon. member; certainly I did not intend to do so.

Mr. Gillis: He said that I had said the average citizen is unaffected by and not interested in decisions of the supreme court. I did not say that, because I know he is. I am satisfied with the discussion thus far. It was my intention merely to focus the attention of the Minister of Justice upon the fact that justice does not begin in the supreme court; it has its beginning in the courts of first instance. If you are lucky you will get justice; but I could mention many cases coming within my personal knowledge in which people had good cases but lacked the necessary financial backing to follow them up. I shall not say anything further on the point at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister comment upon my suggestion to change the word "puisne" to "associate"?

Mr. Garson: I was trying to be polite and not comment upon it. The fact that my hon. friend is not aware of the tradition attaching to the use of this word is not in my opinion a good reason for changing it. The word is not synonymous with "puny", in any sense. Among those who use the term it is generally understood as having a meaning the equivalent of the word associate. I can see no reason why it should be changed.

FISH INSPECTION ACT

FISH AND FISH CONTAINERS—MARINE PLANTS—EXPORT AND IMPORT REGULATIONS

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 63, respecting the inspection of fish and marine plants.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Regulations.

Mr. Applewhaite: Mr. Chairman, this is the pertinent section of the bill. I should like to make some brief observations and ask one question.

I have received from the Pacific coast representations which indicate that the industry as a whole not only welcomes this bill but welcomes also the regulations which will be adopted thereunder. Bearing in mind that, speaking roughly, the industry consists of two main parts, namely, the fishermen, and the fish houses and processing plants, may we have the assurance from the minister that when the regulations under this provision are being prepared, both sections of the industry will be given ample opportunity to make recommendations and representations with regard thereto? I am not suggesting for one moment that the government should turn over to the industry its power to make regulations. I am asking that, with a view to the drafting of workable and practicable regulations, consideration be given to both branches of the industry, so that we may have the assurance that the regulations will be based upon commercial standards and not solely upon laboratory, abstract and scientific principles. We want the assurance that they will be workable and devised for the protection of the industry as well as of the consuming public, either in this country or, as in this instance, the country to which the goods are exported.

I can assure the minister that under these circumstances he will find in all branches of the industry on the Pacific coast that his act and the regulations will be lived up to in spirit and to the letter.

Mr. Mayhew: Mr. Chairman, I have already agreed with the industry that they would have an opportunity of discussing regulations with us before they are put into effect. The hon. member is asking that the fishermen, and others not definitely in the industry, have the same privilege. I can assure him they will, although we must have the last say. It is our belief that if we are to have regulations which will be operative and serve the industry to the best advantage, they must be regulations which all sections of the industry understand, and in the fulfilment of the purpose of which all sections of the industry will co-operate.

Mr. Carroll: Is it only fish to be exported to foreign countries that will be subject to this inspection?

Mr. MacNaught: It applies to interprovincial trade as well.

Mr. Carroll: I think it should apply also to fish that are caught, processed and used in a particular province.

Mr. MacNaught: As my hon. friend knows, that is a matter of provincial concern, and we hope that the provinces will pass enabling legislation so that the desired effect can be obtained.

Mr. Carroll: It should be the concern of the Department of Fisheries, because this parliament can pass ancillary legislation. The conditions here are somewhat similar to those which obtained in the apple industry in Nova Scotia. Apples that were to be sent to England or other places were inspected, but those consumed in the province were not, and the result was that the people in the province got very poor apples.

Mr. Higgins: This bill has been studied by a standing committee of the house, by the fisheries council of Canada and by the fisheries board of Newfoundland, and was given the approval of all those bodies. I can see no need of considering the matter further. It would appear that the bill will be of great value to the fisheries of this country, and it is something that we have needed for some time. I do not think we should spend too much time in discussing it.

Mr. MacNaught: I think it should be pointed out that paragraph (e) was amended in the standing committee.

Section agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

Sections 5 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On section 12—Marine plants. Conditions for export.

Mr. McLure: I think a further statement should be made with regard to this section. We should be told what regulations will be prescribed.

Mr. MacNaught: No regulations have been drawn up as yet. This section will permit the department to enforce regulations in connection with the export of marine plants, particularly Irish moss. As the hon. member for Queens knows, for some time past there has been a voluntary inspection of Irish moss. The industry, and the people dealing in Irish moss, have asked that there be compulsory inspection. We hope to prepare regulations to be submitted to the industry for approval, and they will then be proclaimed and carried out. It is important that proper regulations be prepared, otherwise this industry may be lost to the maritime provinces.

Section agreed to.

Sections 13 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

On section 17—Appointment of inspectors, etc.

Mr. Anderson: I should like to compliment the minister upon this most worthy bill. I am sure that the people all over Canada, and especially those in Norfolk county, from which I come, approve the provisions of this bill. At Port Dover we have what I understand is the largest fresh water fishing fleet in the world—and in saying this I am not trying to advertise Port Dover. I urge upon the minister that he consider having a resident of Port Dover as inspector at that point.

Mr. Mayhew: The hon. member's letter was received only this morning. I assure him it will be given careful consideration.

Section agreed to.

Sections 18 to 21 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADA FORESTRY ACT

FOREST PROTECTION AND EXPERIMENT, CONTROL AND MANAGEMENT

Hon. Colin Gibson (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 62, respecting forest conservation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I want to make a brief statement on the purposes of this bill. The bill is a short one; nevertheless it is of great importance to the future welfare of this country. As I stated at the resolution stage, the bill repeals the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act and provides new legislation more in line with present needs and the present policies of the government.

The principles of the bill were discussed fully in committee, and from the support that was received, both in the house and in the press, there is no doubt that this measure carries with it public support. Canadians are gradually realizing that while we have in this country vast forest resources, they are resources that can be either carelessly dissipated, or conserved by proper management to provide a perpetual source of revenue throughout this country. Indeed I go further and say that without proper management, not only will we eventually lose our forests, but, through failure to protect our watersheds, large areas in this country will become unfit for production.

Those trained in forest management have long recognized these facts and have provided warnings, but adequate steps to carry out a constructive forest policy can be undertaken only through the co-operation of the dominion and the provincial governments, backed by public support. As is well known, under our constitution natural resources come under the jurisdiction of the provinces, and already some of the provinces have taken steps to adopt an enlightened program for dealing with their forests. In Ontario General Kennedy prepared a report on conditions in that province. In British Columbia Chief Justice Sloan, sitting as a commissioner, held an inquiry and brought in an excellent report on the forest resources of that province. I should like to be able to deal extensively with these reports, but will confine myself to a few extracts which to my mind clearly indicate the extent of the problem with which we are faced.

Chief Justice Sloan states:

> Our forest industries have been living on an expenditure of forest capital that has taken hundreds of years to accumulate at no cost to industry. The time has now come when we have to plan to live on forest interest and maintain our capital unimpaired.

He points out there are some people—he calls them conservationists—who consider the preservation of our forests as the only means of preventing their exhaustion. By "preservation" he means the prevention of any cutting. Chief Justice Sloan also points out there are operators who regard the forest as a mine to be exploited and abandoned. He suggests that both these extreme philosophies must give way to a proper concept of conservation which provides for the intelligent utilization of our resources of virgin timber, and the adoption of means to ensure new growth to take the place of the trees that are being harvested. In order to accomplish this he recommends, amongst other things:

1. Fire protection must be greatly increased.
2. The rate of planting denuded areas of productive forest land must be greatly increased.
3. Logging methods must be regulated to prevent destructive exploitation, and to ensure full regeneration of cut-over lands.
4. New systems of tenure and taxation need to be formulated to encourage private forestry and to remove causes compelling liquidation.
5. There must be a more intensified research in the practice of silvicultural methods.
6. Facilities and funds must be provided for extensive forestry research.

This is a responsibility that faces every province. It is a program which entails heavy expense, but an expense that is small in relation to the revenue derived from our forest industries. It could be said that, as our natural resources belong to the provinces, they should be responsible for their protection, but this overlooks the fact that the dominion, quite apart from all other benefits, derives considerable revenue from our forest industries and the subsidiary industries that they sustain. We undoubtedly have an obligation to assist the provinces, and to do so in a way that will contribute most to the common good.

During the course of the debate in committee when we were discussing the resolution preceding the bill, many statements were made which demonstrated the interest of members in the subject of forestry, but in some cases they also indicated that some members do not altogether realize the extent of the work at present being carried on in our forestry division. For example, one member stated that my department "had no experience really in regard to forests", and suggested that we should consult the provinces, overlooking the fact that until 1930 the dominion had direct control over 33,000 square miles of national forests. While in 1930 the government handed over our natural resources in the west, including our national forests, to the four western provinces, we by no means eliminated our dominion forest service. It continued to operate very efficiently, in spite of the limited appropriations that were available, and through close and continued co-operation with the provinces has been able to provide most useful services.

By maintaining three forest products laboratories and five forest experimental stations, much valuable information has been secured. If any of the members wish to visit our forest products laboratory in Ottawa, I am sure that they will find it just as interesting as I did when I visited it for the first time.

Through district offices established across Canada, close contact is maintained with the provincial authorities. In addition, during the summer months thirty-one forest survey parties have been in the field compiling information on such subjects as forest inventories, fire danger research, regeneration, and the growth and yield in various forest regions. Many of these parties have been working in provincial areas securing data which is available to both the provinces and the dominion. By means of air photography, and by using new techniques developed in the department, considerable information has been secured as to forest resources.

I think hon. members will agree that all this is good as far as it goes, but I do not think anyone believes that it is sufficient to provide adequate protection for the forest resources of Canada. I mentioned a few moments ago the limited appropriations, which were reduced from $1,427,000 in 1930-31 to a low of $241,000 in 1934-35. Since then our appropriations for forest services have been gradually increased until we have in the estimates today the sum of $1,418,000 for 1949-50, and additional sums provided for special projects amounting to nearly two and one-half million dollars.

It was in 1943 that eight of the provinces submitted a brief outlining recommendations for a forestry program, some of which have already been partly implemented. The provinces recommended first that the dominion government grant assistance to the provinces for forest protection, including protection against fire, insects and diseases; second, that the dominion government consider the advisability of intensifying research on forest problems; and third, that the dominion government give special consideration to the whole question of conservation and proper utilization and management of forest resources as a permanent national forest policy.

I have said that some of these recommendations have already been partly implemented. The forest insect control board was set up in 1945, consisting of representatives from the forestry branch, the Department of Agriculture, and the provinces, and appropriations for forest entomology were increased from $70,000 a year to $1,087,000. At the present time this board reports to the Department of Mines and Resources, while the research work in forest entomology is undertaken by the Department of Agriculture. A forest entomological laboratory at Sault Ste. Marie was built by the province of Ontario, and in 1945 was equipped and staffed by the dominion government. A new forest pathological laboratory is also being completed at the Sault with dominion funds, and is being staffed by the dominion. This will be, I may say, one of the most up-to-date laboratories of its kind in the world.

Our forest products laboratories carry out research to promote the more efficient use of our forest resources, to prevent waste, and to provide new uses for species of wood now used only to a limited extent.

Fire of course provides the great hazard that annually destroys millions of dollars' worth of timber, and this is a danger that must be faced by the dominion and the provinces together. I think hon. members will be interested in the statistics for 1948, which show that 23 per cent of all fires were started by smokers, 18 per cent by lightning, 17 per cent by camp fires, 12 per cent by railways, 11 per cent by settlers; and 19 per cent were attributable to various other causes. In the same year, 1948, there were 5,368 forest fires in the provinces, and the total damage, including fire-fighting costs, is estimated at more than $8,500,000.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): If I may interrupt the minister, what percentage of the fires was caused by smokers?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Twenty-three per cent.

When a fire starts in a forest it can be controlled only if early warning is received and if it is possible to reach the fire quickly with adequate equipment. To combat fires we require roads which make forest areas readily accessible, extensions to our telephone and radio communication, fire-fighting equipment, and additions to our forest ranger services.

The provinces themselves have not found it possible to provide sufficient facilities to deal with fires, and would welcome dominion assistance. I may say that approaches already have been made by some of the provinces to open negotiations under the provisions of this legislation. The bill itself does not set out any definite forest program, as that can be worked out only in consultation with the provinces; but it does authorize the department to enter into agreements with provincial governments, with other departments of our government, and with private interests. Such agreements can provide for research programs which will avoid duplication or overlapping and at the same time make assistance available to the provinces to enable them to carry out constructive forestry programs. Already we are working in co-operation with the province of Alberta to protect the forests on the eastern slopes of the Rocky mountains. Not having such a bill as is being considered today, it was necessary to adopt a special act to provide for this assistance. In the future it is hoped and expected that through this measure progressive policies can be developed and put into operation not only for the protection but also for the development of our forest resources.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): The general subject matter of this bill is perhaps one of the most important with which this house will be called upon to deal. The working out of the details of course will have to await the arrangements made with the provinces, though many things are being done now under agreements between the dominion and provincial governments.

It does seem to me that everything possible should be done to impress upon the minds of our people the immense importance of protection of the forests. There is not only the damage to the soil which results from excessive cutting or the burning over of areas which are not replanted; there is also the loss of water power and the very great danger that fire or excessive cutting may result in communities which have been built up around the production of forest products being left without the raw materials necessary for that purpose. Right across Canada there are many examples of ghost towns which were once prosperous communities, but which found themselves ultimately in that position for no other reason than that the forest resources within the immediate area had been cut away to a point where economic supplies of wood were no longer available.

The minister has pointed out that the limitation of cutting is of necessity a matter for the provincial governments to deal with. Nevertheless a great deal can be accomplished in developing a better understanding of the obligation upon every citizen and every visitor to this country to avoid endangering these great continuing crops which today provide the largest single dollar value in the production of this country.

The minister has given the figures for 1948, and the percentage of fires resulting from various causes. It happens that I have the figures for 1949, which have just been prepared by the province of Ontario. They indicate the damage being done by certain types of fires, and undoubtedly call for an educational program in which our service clubs and other similar organizations can play an extremely important part by reason of their opportunity to place these ideas before the people.

As an example of the continuing nature of this damage I point out that in Ontario alone in 1949, according to the departmental records, there were 1,762 forest fires. The causes of those fires are interesting. They were as follows:

Lightning	451
Campers	421
Smokers	370
Settlers	164
Railway operations	139
Road construction activities	53
Logging operations	51
Incendiarism	28
Mining operations	6
Prospecting operations	5
Undetermined	74

These figures, I think, would represent a relatively uniform pattern right across Canada, and it will be seen that most of the fires were the result of carelessness. On the other hand the number of fires caused by lightning is an extremely important consideration to which I think we should direct our attention in discussing this subject.

On motion of Mr. Drew the debate was adjourned.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF SUMMARY—SEPTEMBER 1, 1949, TO OCTOBER 31, 1949

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I may have the unanimous consent of the house to revert to motions, I wish to table a summary of orders in council passed during the period September 1 to October 31, 1949.

The previous summary was tabled on November 18. Like the previous summary, this one does not include a summary of the treasury board minutes.

LIVESTOCK PEDIGREE ACT

SIMPLIFYING OF PROCEDURE FOR INCORPORATION AND AFFILIATION OF ASSOCIATIONS, ETC.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 120, respecting the incorporation of purebred livestock record associations.

Mr. Drew: Explain.

Mr. Gardiner: It has been suggested that I explain. This bill passed the Senate in the last session, came to this house just before parliament was dissolved and was not discussed in this house. But on that occasion it passed through the Senate. It went to a committee in the Senate and was discussed fully there. This session it has gone through the same process; it has been in the Senate. It was introduced in the Senate, went to a committee, was discussed fully there, and has been referred by the Senate to this house. Instead of going into a lengthy discussion of the measure on second reading, I would suggest that it might be acceptable to the house to have it go to committee and that we have our discussion, if any, there. I make that suggestion in order to speed up the handling of the measure.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO ELIGIBLE AREAS

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 185, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Blocks ineligible for award.

Mr. Argue: Before section 1 is carried, Mr. Chairman, I should like to state to the minister my views on the substance of subclause (a) and ask for his opinion on what is proposed in that clause. The minister was unable to attend the meetings of the committee on agriculture, and for that reason there was no one there to give an explanation of government policy.

The amendment to the act reduces from a block of nine sections to a block of six that area which may be removed from a township that is eligible for prairie farm assistance. It reduces the average yield in the block which may be removed from something over fourteen bushels to anything over ten. My point is that within this six-section rectangular block, when it is removed, there may be one or two farmers with a crop of less than eight bushels per acre and therefore a crop failure according to the provisions of this act. I do not believe that any farmer within an eligible township, and who has a crop of less than eight bushels per acre, should be removed from the provisions of this act. I think it is discriminatory to remove any farmer on that basis.

I want to point out that in the committee we tried to have this section amended so that no farmer within a six-section block should be taken out of an eligible township if his yield was under eight bushels per acre. I would point out that in 1947, while there were 2,644 townships eligible under the act, only 17 part townships were removed. I might further point out that the departmental official, Mr. Matte, gave us some interesting information when he said that the board of review went over the experience they have had with 300 townships. He found that there were just three instances in which a block of six sections would have been removed. In these three instances there was just one farmer with a yield of less than eight bushels per acre. If this provision could be changed so that no farmer would be excluded from getting the bonus if he had a yield of less than eight bushels per acre it would certainly cost the government very little money, perhaps just a few hundred dollars. As the departmental official, Mr. Matte, said, in the 300 townships only one farmer was excluded. Therefore if this provision was changed to that extent it would cost the government only two or three hundred dollars to give a bonus to a farmer who has in fact a crop failure.

I know the minister has done a great deal toward improving this act, and I think it would be a small change and I should like to have his views on it.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, although I was not able to be present in the agriculture and colonization committee I did read all of the evidence that was taken there, and therefore I am well aware of the views which the hon. member for Assiniboia holds. The opinion which is held is one which I have been trying to remove from the minds of persons in western Canada generally ever since the act was enacted in 1939. We do not make payments to anyone because of the small or large amount of wheat that he may produce on an acre of land. That is not done. And to put up the argument at any time that, because a man has only eight bushels of wheat to the acre, he ought to have payment is not in accordance with any part of the principle of this act. The act simply says that we use the yield of wheat on the land in a township for the purpose of finding out whether it has been dry or not. We do not make payment on the basis of wheat. A man does not have to grow any wheat in order to get payment. A man does not have to grow any grain at all in order to get payment. A man may have nothing but grass with livestock running on it and he will still get payment. Payments are not made on the basis of wheat at all. We take the yield of wheat only to find out how dry it has been in a certain area. And when we find that it has been so dry that the average yield of wheat in a township is eight bushels or less, to the acre, when wheat is at the present price, we say that payment ought to be made to every farmer in that township.

In so far as this particular section is concerned, as I said before, when the average yield was more than fourteen bushels to the acre then nine or more sections of land in a rectangular form might be removed from the benefits of the act. It was found by experience, and from the criticisms of the municipal associations, that we had not given sufficient thought to the matter when we put in nine, whatever the figure should have been, because there is no way you can get a rectangular block of nine sections unless it be three by three. Therefore that was not a very good figure to have taken.

In this particular amendment we say six instead of nine. And when it is six it is one strip up one side of a township, or it may be two by three running directly away from the ineligible area, or it may be two by three running up and down alongside the area. There are quite a number of ways in which you can figure six townships and still get it rectangular, as against a number that you can figure out with nine. Then, of course, the condition with regard to the greater numbers is much the same. It could be twelve; it could be some other figure and still be rectangular. But the reason for changing from fourteen to ten is that the act as it stood was operative up to twelve bushels to the acre until wheat rose in price from down around 50 or 60 cents up to over 80 cents. There is one section of the act that is not operative at all and has not been operative since wheat passed 80 cents a bushel some years ago. That part is the section which provides for payments between eight and twelve bushels. Payments are made there only when the price of wheat is under 81 cents. When it is over 80 cents it cuts out altogether. That again is just a means of figuring out what the returns are that a farmer is likely to get in an area. While that was operative we said fourteen bushels to the acre was the point at which you started to take land out of an eligible township. We have been operating with the section in during the last few years, and there was no way of taking land out until it got up to that particular level, with the result that many sections of land were permitted to remain in where the yield was not below eight bushels to the acre on the average. Therefore, criticisms were made that some people, who had very high yields not only of wheat but of oats and barley or very good grass crops, were getting paid at a time when some other people were not being paid. We have simply reduced it down to having the same relationship to eight now as it had to twelve before. It is ten now before you start to take it out as against eight when it comes in. It was fourteen before as against twelve; so that unless we get down to the point where we are getting 80 cents a bushel for our wheat there will be no reason for having to figure any change.

The only other thing I should like to say about the matter is that I think the argument that was put up by hon. members of the committee against the proposed amendment of the member for Assiniboia, and which resulted in its being voted down when it was before the committee, is a sound argument, namely, that not only are you starting to make payments on the yield of wheat that an individual has, but you are trying to base this legislation more or less on an individual basis. I know that in the committee hon. members from other parts of Canada were desirous of knowing what is a section. It is about 640 acres of land. What is the size of a farm in western Canada? I think the impression was given that a section of land is about the size of a farm. That of course is not correct. In western Canada the average-size farm is more nearly a half-section of land than a section. As a matter of fact it is under three hundred acres. A short time ago I had occasion to look at our own figures to find out how many farms there are in Saskatchewan that have two sections or more of land. It is less than two per cent. In other words, this idea that farms in western Canada are big carries us away sometimes. On the average they are not as big as some people think they are. The average farm is much smaller than was suggested the other day. While you would not be getting down to an individual basis if you made it a section of land, yet you would be getting down to a unit so small that it would not meet the purposes that are fundamental in the act itself. One of these purposes is that a man should not be encouraged to stay on land that is never going to produce a good crop at any time. In order to emphasize what that means I shall give the committee a few facts with regard to the area where the payments have been highest.

Take a block of land in the southwestern part of Saskatchewan, with its west boundary on the boundary of Alberta and its east boundary, No. 4 highway, running north from the United States border through Swift Current, crossing the Saskatchewan river at Saskatchewan Landing, directly north of Swift Current; and take as the north boundary the South Saskatchewan river, and the south boundary the United States border—in that area there are 369 townships. In that area there are only three townships which have received payment in only one year out of the last nine years. In that area there are only four townships which have received payment for only two years, and only one that has received payment for only three years. Then, there are 14 that have received payment for four years, and 31 that have received payment for five years out of nine. That is just slightly more than half the period. There are only 69 townships in that block of 369 that have not had payments for more than five years. In other words 300 townships in there have had payments five years or more.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, in Saskatchewan—in that one block in Saskatchewan. Those who prepared the act had in mind two things, one of which was to assist the people in remaining on areas where it is very difficult for them to remain until such time as we can work out some plan to have them resettled. The other was to determine, by getting information just as we are getting it today, what areas ought to be resettled.

I believe there will be very little doubt in the minds of most people that when an area has had payments for five years out of nine—and 31 of these townships received them five years out of nine, 82 received them six years out of nine, 114 received them seven years out of nine, 75 received them eight years out of nine, and 29 received them nine years out of nine,—there is no doubt that someone should begin to arrange some plan to have them resettled rather than continue paying to keep them on.

Therefore I say it is not desirable to have a section put into the bill which says that if a man is living on a piece of land with a yield of less than eight bushels to the acre he ought to be paid, no matter what his neighbours are getting off their lands. He may be living on a sandhill. It may be that he is not utilizing his land to the best advantage, as some of his neighbours are. There may be many reasons. But we are not paying on the basis of what he produces in wheat; we are paying on the basis of what it is possible for him to do because of the climatic conditions in the whole area in which he lives. We desire to have the act maintained on that basis, rather than to have it put on an individual basis in the sense that some people will be paid, while others are not, on a basis different from that on which others are being paid.

Mr. Argue: I agree that the attitude of the government has always been that this act should not be placed on an individual basis. I also differ from the minister in his belief that it should not be placed on an individual basis. I do agree that something has to be done, and very soon, to take care of people farming in the area the minister has just mentioned.

I do not want to go outside the act in the discussion but if the government is interested in doing something to remove people from the provisions of the act, so that they will not have crop failures year in and year out, then of course it should do something about irrigation. However I am not suggesting at this time that the purposes of the act be changed.

The act applies only when there is a township with a crop failure and, if there is a township with a crop failure, then it can be applied to half townships with crop failures and thus, on a basis of rough justice, to people in a township or a half township. All I asked under paragraph (a) was that the minister should see that one or two farmers who are discriminated against at the present time should be allowed to get payments.

While I am on my feet I should like to deal with paragraph (b) of section 1, which deals with bringing into an eligible township a block of land outside the eligible township and lying within an ineligible township. This provision used to be applied to a rectangular block of nine sections, and has now been reduced to a rectangular block of six sections.

I point out to the minister that when he takes in a rectangular block he is very likely taking in some farmers who have more than eight bushels to the acre and, beyond question, he is leaving out many farmers in the ineligible neighbouring township who have a yield of less than eight bushels of wheat to the acre. I do not wish to leave the impression that I do not know a farmer can be paid for a crop failure, even though he does not grow wheat. Wheat is taken only as a yardstick by which payments are made.

In the committee I suggested that the clause be changed, and that instead of adding to an eligible township rectangular blocks of a given size the government should add to the township a section or string of sections contiguous to the eligible township, so long as the yield in those sections was less than eight bushels to the acre.

The minister added strength to my argument when he pointed out that there are more half-section farms in western Canada than farms of any other size. My suggestion was that after an area has been declared eligible the department should go on from there and add on sections of land—not individual farms—but sections of land in which the yield of wheat was less than eight bushels to the acre.

Irrespective of the government's attitude or the purposes of the act as set out by the minister, I say without fear of successful contradiction that the farmers of western Canada are interested in having the payments made on an individual basis. They are interested, particularly after a township has been declared eligible, that the individual sections of land outside the township may be included.

With that in mind, in the committee on agriculture I offered an amendment. The chairman of the committee said that the committee did not have the right to change the bill, but that after it was passed in committee we might tag on to it certain recommendations to the government. Therefore my suggestion would not even have changed the bill, but would have merely brought to the attention of the minister the majority opinion of the committee on agriculture, had that recommendation been accepted. My amendment was that the committee recommend that the government consider the advisability of amending Bill No. 185 by deleting subparagraph (b) of the proposed new section 7, in section 1 of the bill, and substituting therefor the following:

(b) Where a section of land lies within an ineligible township and has a side that lies alongside an eligible township or is a section which lies alongside an eligible section or a corner of which touches the corner of an eligible township or an eligible section, such section of land shall be eligible for award as though it were a complete township.

If that recommendation had been made to the government and if the government had changed the bill accordingly it would mean that farmers alongside an eligible township who had a crop failure because of drought could become eligible under the act. The yeas were Argue, Bryce, Fair, Wright. The nays were Bennett, Blue, Corry, Darroch, Dumas, Elderkin, George, Hetland, Jutras, Kent, Laing, Leger, MacKenzie, McCubbin, Murray (Oxford), Richard (St. Maurice-Lafleche), Roberge, Studer.

I would like to point out that the Conservatives on that committee were not responsible for the defeat of my amendment. I do not think there were any Conservative members from western Canada present when the vote was taken. The Conservative members from eastern Canada apparently felt that they did not have sufficient information to judge whether my suggestion was a good one or not. There were four yeas and eighteen nays, and among those eighteen nays was the hon. member for Maple Creek and the hon. member for Humboldt. How members of the agriculture committee who came from Saskatchewan could vote against a suggestion that a recommendation be made to the government to improve the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is entirely beyond me.

I could not understand the vote of the hon. member for Maple Creek because a large part of these payments have been made in his constituency. I know it is said that the rural municipal association wanted this amendment and I think it can be said that they thought it would be a step in the right direction. I venture to say that there are not a dozen farmers in the dried-out areas of Saskatchewan who would vote against the suggestion I made in the committee.

Here is what the hon. member for Humboldt said in the committee, and I quote from page 11:

> Mr. Chairman, I do not think we should change it very much; as a matter of fact, I do not think we should change it at all. This is a thing that we have been asking for over the years, and now that we have it here in the form in which it is before us, I think we should accept it.

As I have said before and as I say now, the present act does not go far enough. I am sorry the Liberal members of that committee did not support my amendment. If it had passed it would not have defeated the government, it would not even have criticized the government; it was merely asking the government to consider whether or not the act could be broadened to include farmers who have a crop failure. Irrespective of whether the minister is satisfied with this act, I am not, and I shall raise this matter at every session of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member who has just taken his seat has referred to the agriculture committee and lest there be any misunderstanding in that connection may I say that I attended in that committee during the forenoon and expressed myself with regard to his suggestion. I believed that it was something that I could support and that it should be sent on as a recommendation. However, I was not present when the vote was taken. The debate on the combines matter was going on in the house and I felt that I had some responsibility in that connection and could not be present when the vote in the committee was taken.

Having said that, there are one or two matters I should like to ask the minister about. I think the amendment does meet a situation about which there has been criticism over the years. Personally I have felt that some change along this line should be made and that as far as possible the aim should be to have the payments made on an individual basis.

At all times I have endeavoured to be fair and have said that I thought it would be impossible to make these payments on an individual basis without a substantial increase in the amounts presently deducted from the producers. In order to be in position to bring to the attention of the committee certain suggestions in connection with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act amendments, and to keep this matter non-political, I wrote to various municipalities in my constituency.

In the southern part of my constituency there are large areas which have had continuing drought such as was referred to a moment ago by the Minister of Agriculture. Year after year there have been crop failures such as the hon. member for Maple Creek referred to in his first speech in the house. These areas require consideration from all parts of Canada in order that the people living there may be assured that they will at least have an opportunity through assistance given under this act to prepare for the next year. The minister says, "Why don't they leave?"

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Words to that effect, or that something should be done to remove them.

Mr. Gardiner: I said that we should do something to resettle them, not necessarily that they should leave the district.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That something should be done. But while that thing is being done, and it has not been done—

Mr. Gardiner: A lot of it has.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —every consideration should be given to making the payments as nearly as possible on an individual basis. The minister has referred to the size of the farms in Saskatchewan, and what he says about the average size is correct. I should like to quote from the letter I received from the municipality of Willner. This reads:

> When the Prairie Farm Assistance Act first came into operation the average farm unit was about three-quarters of a section. It now appears that a farmer needs from one and a half to two sections if he is going to own a full line of power machinery. As a result of this the limit of 200 acres imposes a hardship on many farmers.

In that particular area the farms are fairly large in acreage and one complaint is that with the law as it is today the qualification requirements are such that they work an injustice on those who are farming the larger tracts. Generally speaking, the information from the municipalities, which I intend to bring to the attention of the minister, indicates that they believe that crop insurance is not possible because the premiums would be too high.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask what is the largest town in Willner? I just want to find out.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would say the largest farm—

Mr. Gardiner: The largest town.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Davidson is the largest town and, as the minister knows, farming operations in that area are on a large scale. The usual letter is along the lines of the letter I received from the rural municipality of Rosedale at Hanley. The letter was submitted to the reeve and the councillors, and the council is of the opinion that the amount of the award should be substantially increased. There is the same recommendation from the rural municipality of Dufferin at Bethune. They set forth in their recommendation the amount of the increase, which is approximately $1 to $1.50 an acre. The rural municipality of Touchwood at the eastern end of the constituency, which is not affected to the same degree, suggests that the area of qualification be reduced to six sections, very much after the fashion of the amendment before the house. The rural municipality of Big Arm also asks that, so far as possible, the qualification be reduced to an individual basis. The rural municipality of McKillop at Strasbourg asks for an increase in the amount paid. In no case is the increase asked for an exorbitant amount. It runs from 50 cents to $1 an acre. These in general represent the consensus of the rural municipalities in an area that over the years has been subject to the danger of recurring drought. The only exception to that is the eastern area around Punnichy.

I pass on from there to a matter on which I have received correspondence as late as today. I should like the minister to answer a question that I will propound to him based on what is now taking place in the province of Saskatchewan. A series of mass meetings are being held during the present week, beginning on the 28th of November at Hodgeville and continuing in various parts of the province, regarding payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. They are extensively advertised. The areas in the southern part of the province are those to which the minister made reference a moment ago when he gave statistics of certain townships that for a period of seven successive years had received payments under this act.

As I said a moment ago, these meetings have been extensively advertised in the press, and are given widespread publicity in the Western Producer. The situation in many of these areas of central and southern Saskatchewan is more serious than it has been since the days of the thirties when drought swept everything away except hope and determination on the part of those living there. These farmers are meeting together for the purpose of having some provision made by parliament for a temporary increase in benefits for this year under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Several farmers in different areas have written to me, apparently without collaboration, intimating that the government has under consideration the raising of benefits for this year under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act by $1 an acre under legislation to be introduced before the end of this session or at the next session of parliament. I should like the minister to say whether or not consideration is being given to an increase of $1 an acre, which would be most helpful at this time and would be uplifting to the spirit of these people, who find themselves today under the conditions that were so eloquently described by the hon. member for Maple Creek in a speech to which I have already made reference.

That is one of the matters coming before these meetings. Apparently those responsible for organizing them are doing so in a widespread area. The second thing they are asking is whether or not, having regard to the failures they have suffered, consideration is being given either under this act or outside it—I presume it would be within the purview of this act—to the supplying of farmers in these areas with seed wheat at reduced prices in order to enable them to carry on and face the next year with at least the opportunity of again challenging nature, as they do in these areas, by seeding crops in the springtime.

I know in my own constituency registered seed grain is being offered by municipalities at $2.40 a bushel. Prices are very high for seed barley. The farmers in these municipalities are asking whether or not, having regard to the fact that in these areas there is an emergency condition so great in scope as to merit national attention, the government has in mind the granting of either of the requests to which I have made reference. These are matters that transcend any consideration of party, or the location in the house which any hon. member occupies for the moment. They are matters which affect all members from Saskatchewan. As I see it, being a question of national moment inasmuch as the drought areas affect a population of 150,000 or 200,000 people, these are matters about which I am sure the people living in these areas would like to have some assurance from the Minister of Agriculture as to what is going to be done.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, when the bill was discussed before on the motion for second reading, I expressed certain views on behalf of this group, and I may say that my views are just the same today as they were then, notwithstanding anything that took place in the standing committee on agriculture and colonization. I regret that I was unavoidably absent from that committee at the time the bill was being discussed. First of all I notice the minister takes exception to the suggestion that the average size farm would be a section or more. He may be correct in so far as the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta generally are concerned, but it is not true as regards the area in Alberta coming under the act. For instance, three-quarters of my constituency comes under the act, and I would say the average size of the farms would be well over a section, and is more likely two or three sections. That is the area to which the act applies. We are not interested in areas in the province that do not come under the act.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask my friend one question? Will he not admit when these farms are organized into much larger units those doing so eliminate themselves from the act? They do it quite deliberately.

Mr. Quelch: I did not get the minister's point.

Mr. Gardiner: The amount you can draw under the act is limited to 200 acres of cultivated land. When a man reorganizes his farm and extends it to cover two sections, he does so because he thinks he is going to be better off with two sections of land, in view of the conditions under which he is living. In other words he is assisting in the resettlement and reorganization of the area, just as the government is assisting; and he knows what he is doing when he does it.

Mr. Quelch: I did not say the average amount of cultivated acreage per farmer was more than a section; I said the average size of a farm is over a section. That would include a great deal of pasture land because, as the minister knows, in that area it often takes around two thousand acres of land to pasture sixty head of stock. But that farmer would still be eligible under the act for assistance on up to 200 acres.

Generally speaking, as I said on second reading, I think the P.F.A.A. is a good act. I think these amendments are going to improve it. On the other hand they do not remove some of the main criticisms we hear against it. I want to deal with the first two amendments contained in this bill. First is the amendment to section 7(a). Would the minister say the real purpose of this amendment is to deny the bonus to a farmer who has suffered crop failure within an eligible township? I think he will agree that is not the purpose, but that the purpose is to deny the bonus to a farmer in an eligible township who has over ten bushels to the acre.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, no, it is not. It is to deny to a farmer in an area of six sections or more the right to come under the provisions of this act because of the fact that he is not living in an area which is now said to be in the same position as a full township in relation to all the terms of this legislation. He is living in an area where the average yield is more than eight bushels to the acre; that is why he is denied this assistance. It has nothing to do with his individual position.

Mr. Quelch: Nevertheless the yield in those six sections must be over ten bushels to the acre. As I pointed out on second reading, under this section farmers residing in an eligible township with a total crop failure have been denied the bonus, not because they were residing in a district where the yield was good but simply because they happened to be adjacent to a small block that had a good yield. Surely the minister must agree that a farmer residing in a township where 28 sections of land, we will say, have had a total crop failure should be considered as residing in an area where there has been a large degree of crop failure, and therefore should be entitled to the bonus. In that case the minister could not suggest that we are asking for the bonus for a farmer just because he happens to have a poor piece of land. That is the general condition. The yield on the six or nine sections is not to be taken as indicating the general condition in that township. If a farmer suffering a crop failure happens to be unfortunate enough to reside on one quarter of that six-section area, I should say he would be far more entitled to the bonus than the farmer who happened to have his farm adjacent to a small block of land where there was a crop failure.

I give the minister this example, which happened in the Rumsey area. A township had been declared eligible; then in one corner they found six sections with a yield of around twenty bushels to the acre. They could not take out those six sections because the minimum number was nine. So they added three sections that had practically a total crop failure, but still the average was above fourteen bushels. The minister must admit that it was hardly fair to include the other three sections. I took up the matter with the P.F.A. officials here, who said it was very unfortunate but that as the act was worded they had no alternative. Therefore I suggest that under this amendment those officials should be given power to use their discretion in determining whether or not certain sections should be denied the benefits of the act.

I noticed that in committee the assistant director under P.F.A.A. said this very seldom happened. Well, it seems to me that whenever it has happened it has been in my constituency, because several such cases have been drawn to my attention. I took up two of them with the officials here at Ottawa, but when I found I could not get anywhere I did not bring any more up. However, I know of several instances in my constituency where this has happened, and I imagine it has happened elsewhere as well.

When this bill was being considered in committee the hon. member for Battle River moved this amendment:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in this section, no section of land having an average of less than eight bushels to the acre shall be denied the bonus in an eligible township.

That amendment was ruled out of order, and later was voted down as a recommendation; yet I am satisfied that a majority of the Liberal members from western Canada were in favour of it. I had been discussing it with them in the lobby and found that they approved it; but they found themselves, I suppose, in the unfortunate position of having to agree with the ruling of the government. How could anyone from western Canada disagree with that amendment? It is based upon a sound principle; it is fair, as I am sure the minister himself would be the first to agree. It would not provide for the payment of a bonus to a man just because he happened to have a piece of sandy land. It would provide the bonus to a farmer because a majority of the land in the township was in the same fix as his piece of land. It seems to me very unfair to deny the bonus just because a man happens to be adjacent to five other sections that have a high yield. Surely the fact that he is adjacent to thirty-one sections of land that had a crop failure should be a better argument for giving him the bonus; and on that basis it defeats the very argument made by the minister.

With respect to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia, in committee, had I been there I would have supported it because it was an attempt to get away from that rectangle which the minister seems to love so much.

Mr. Gardiner: A section is a rectangle. You cannot have any other kind of farm in western Canada but a rectangle, no matter on what basis you put it.

Mr. Quelch: But you can have two or three of these sections which are not in a rectangular block. You could have five. Can the minister explain why six sections can be eligible, yet a block of seven may not be? It would be a bigger area. Surely an L-formation should be just as eligible as a rectangle. In my opinion the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia was good, because there again I am sure the minister would not argue that the amendment would put it on an individual basis. Under that amendment the section or sections would have to be adjacent to another block of land that had been declared eligible.

It is always hard to make a farmer understand why, when land on one side of the road allowance is eligible, he should be denied the bonus simply because he is on the other side of the township line. That is something the farmers cannot understand; yet in spite of these amendments that situation quite often arises. I suppose these amendments will go through in their present form, but I hope the minister will give this matter further consideration, to see whether or not the two points we have brought up can be taken into account. We are supporting the amendments because, as I said before, they go in the right direction; they improve the act, and though the amendments themselves may not go as far as we would like to see them go, as long as they are in the right direction we shall give them our support.

Mr. Gardiner: I think the last point brought up by the hon. member should be dealt with, because when this bill was drafted a year ago it contained a provision which would have met the requests that have been made by the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Acadia. The meeting held in Regina a year ago last June, which was referred to in committee when this bill was under consideration, was attended by representatives of the three prairie provinces, and also by representatives of the municipal associations of those provinces. At that meeting these two amendments which are before the house were discussed, and also a third amendment. The third amendment was based upon the idea that the federal government is not the only government that is responsible for giving assistance to people who are in difficulties. The argument put forward was the argument that has so often been put forward in the house, namely, that when the responsibility was all on the province and Ottawa did not acknowledge any responsibility for the situations—and they did not down until a recent date—we did at one time say that until twenty-five municipalities were in difficulty in a province we would not take any responsibility. When twenty-five municipalities were in difficulty we considered that the problem was too big for the provincial governments, and then we would consider doing something about it. That was in the days before I came to Ottawa; but having been in the government of one of the provinces that suffered most, I know fairly well what was the position that was taken.

Then when it came to a matter of removing responsibility, we said right down until about the middle of the thirties that as soon as it got down to the point where there were ten municipalities—not ten townships but ten municipalities, each of them having nine townships in it which need assistance—then the dominion government had nothing more to do with it and the provincial government and the municipalities had to take care of the whole problem. That was the practice prior to 1939. Then in 1939 we brought in this bill. At the time the bill was brought in we submitted the question to the provinces as to whether they desired to co-operate with us and pay some money into the fund, just as the federal government was paying money into the fund, in order to take care of all the persons that might be in difficulties in the area. All I can say at the moment is that in spite of the fact that it was not in all cases the same governments that are there now, the governments that were there then were not satisfied to enter into the plan on that basis. So what we did was to bring in this bill, and what we said in the house when we put it through was that we were going to ask the people of all Canada to help in making assistance payments in the full townships, and that the remainder of the area should be left to the provinces and the municipalities to take care of, as we thought that the district would be small enough then for them to take care of it.

Everyone here knows the history of it. The municipalities and the provinces did just what they nearly always do. They say: When once the dominion government get into a field of this kind they will eventually be forced to do it all, so we will just let them do it. I presume that is the attitude that has been taken, because I have met them many times and discussed the question with them. The last time we discussed it was a year ago last June at this meeting in Regina that I referred to. At that meeting the representatives of the provinces agreed that we should put in this act an amendment which would state, in effect, that the dominion government would be prepared to accept from each of the provinces a payment which would be proportionate to the amount of land that they were asking to have taken care of as against the amount of land that we were taking care of; and that if that were done, then they would recommend to us the taking in of these areas round about the areas eligible for payment, and having recommended that they be taken in, they would pay in their proportionate amount which, as has been stated by some of the members, would be small.

It has been argued that the amount the federal government would have to put in, in order to take care of these extras, is small as compared with the amount that we are now putting in. What we argued was that the amounts the provinces would put in under these circumstances would be very small as compared with the amount that we ourselves would be putting in. Then it was understood that this recommendation would be taken back to the governments of the three provinces and that they in due course would inform me as to whether or not they desired to have that amendment and whether or not they were prepared to carry on under it.

As I stated a moment ago, a bill with that provision in it was drafted a year ago; and since a year ago I have had letters from all three of the provinces saying that they were not prepared to recommend it or to carry on under it. That is the only reason it is not in here now. It could have been brought in and it would have been brought in for the purpose of making it possible to take care of the very areas that are being talked about. Some have said: Why not make it an L? If you make it an L, you will still have a township in the corner of the L, and in all probability everybody will come along and say it should be taken care of. It does not make any difference what form, shape or number you put in, there will always be that road allowance where the crop will be just about as bad on the other side as it is on this side. Our hope was to settle that question so that we would not have to explain to all the other people in Canada who are helping to pay for this assistance that they are not paying for it all, but that the province is also putting a certain amount of money in; and I still hold that is the only solution for the problem that is continuously put up by the hon. member for Acadia and by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I would suggest to both of them that they have much greater influence than I have with the governments back home. If they can just persuade those governments to allow the other amendment, which would have been the third amendment on this occasion if they had not objected to it, if they would just agree to that other amendment—and we do not think it would cost them a great deal—we will get rid of all those political speeches such as the one we heard a few moments ago.

I do not know that it is proper to take a division of opinion in a committee such as the one to which this bill was referred, bring it up here and say this member voted that way, the other member voted the other way, I voted so and so, and base an argument on that. Either it is right to do the thing that was suggested or it is wrong to do it. I think we are all prepared to argue this matter out in the country in the same way as we argue it in the committee or as we argue it in the house. I do not know what other members have found but as for myself—and I naturally come in contact with this argument more than anyone else—I have never yet met with a group of farmers, either behind closed doors, or out in the open, who have not agreed, after the argument was all over, that the position I am taking now in this committee is the correct one and the one that I should continue to take, so as not to put before the house propositions which might be opposed by other parts of Canada because they are not reasonable. I think that these provinces should be prepared to come forward with a certain amount of money and put it into the treasury—and it would be small—and justify the position that other people are taking all over Canada. If they did so they would be making it possible to deal with the small blocks without compelling other parts of Canada to bear the entire burden.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I asked the minister some questions.

Mr. Gardiner: I am sorry, but I did not answer the questions of the hon. member for Lake Centre. The first question was as to whether any consideration was given to paying a dollar an acre more or some larger amount. Was that it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: Consideration was given to that, of course, before these amendments were agreed to. But these amendments are the result of consideration given by the government. That is, we think this is the extent to which we should go at this time in any case in making amendments to this particular bill. That was done after discussing all the representations for higher amounts and every other representation that has been made. As for the length to which the government would have been prepared to go, I did not have the opportunity of testing them out fully on it because the provinces backed out of the arrangement we thought we had made a year ago last June, but I think we would have been permitted to go that far in amending the bill if there had been any point in doing so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What does the minister mean by "that far"?

Mr. Gardiner: In making it possible to have taken in these areas that are around the edges of what is already in, by the provinces paying a small amount into the fund. What was the other question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The other question referred to assistance in procuring seed grain.

Mr. Gardiner: It involves the same principle. This government has never intentionally provided seed grain to any of the western provinces or to any other province. We have had applications since I have been in the Department of Agriculture from I think every province in Canada for assistance in connection with the provision of seed, and we have always taken the position that that is a provincial responsibility. It is true that back in the thirties we assisted the provinces in getting lines of credit so that they could provide the seed, but the seed has always been provided by the provinces. We did get into some controversy when the credit was not being met by some provinces as to whether we should pay, and in some instances we probably did have to pay, but it was not intentional. There was no intentional action taken at any time by this government to provide seed. The action has always been taken by the provinces. We take the position that the direct relationship is farmer to municipality and municipality to the province. In connection with seed, up to now we have never gone by that in any of the provinces of Canada.

The other matter of providing assistance in other directions is looked at in this way. We have taken the position that the assistance which we give under prairie farm assistance is our share. This year it runs to some $17 million. The provinces have set up a plan to take care of providing seed, feed and other supplies to farmers. They tell me that they are paying, I think, half of the amount of the freight to those who are making demands in other directions. The provinces have said it is impossible to give assistance to the full amount that is being asked. We have replied that we think we are paying our share through P.F.A.A. Therefore I doubt very much whether when they are all through the provinces will have paid $17 million out in the undertaking. When they are all through they will still be quite short of paying out $17 million. In Saskatchewan about $3, and in Alberta it would probably be about $2, will be put up by the federal government for every $1 that is put up by the farmer. Therefore we think that of this amount we shall pay $3 for every $1 that the farmer puts up. For that reason we shall probably be putting up about two-thirds of the $17 million. I doubt very much whether the provinces will get anywhere near that amount in the assistance that they are giving. We are simply suggesting that there is a possibility of their giving more assistance, and they have not denied it at any time.

They discussed the question with us. We have turned it back to them with the suggestion that if they think any more is required the provinces ought to be able to pay it in view of the fact that the fund is putting up this $17 million. And that is the way the discussion has ended.

Mr. Knight: The minister referred to various meetings with farmers in the province in which he found the farmers in general agreement with him on this subject. I was going to suggest that perhaps his stand on this matter was not as definite at some of these meetings as it is in the house where he has responsibility. However, I did not rise to speak politically. I merely rose to back up the argument of my colleague, the hon. member for Assiniboia, who has said the things that I myself would have said if I had been as well qualified to say them, because this particular hon. member has an intimate knowledge of the subject. It is fitting, too, that I should follow, at least for a moment, the path of the hon. member for Lake Centre, because geographically I start where he leaves off. His constituency and mine join at the town of Hanley, which this year is in the middle of an area which is affected by the various disadvantages which have affected farmers this year.

I should like to back up the plea of these hon. members. From that point which I have mentioned the township line runs east and west. From Hanley we go straight up my constituency towards Saskatoon city through a part of the farm land which is so very seriously affected this year. It has been just one thing after another. No doubt the minister knows about the early frost in June which cut the wheat completely down to the ground. That might have been all right if it had been followed by rain which would have caused stooling out.

As the minister well knows, the crop in 1915 was one of the best crops we have had in the province of Saskatchewan. Unfortunately, this year, while it started out somewhat similarly, it did not follow the path that the weather followed in 1915. The rain did not come in the same quantities and so we had the condition that now obtains.

The next particular thing was the grasshopper. I remember driving from my town to the town of Dundurn once this summer and stopping in the car to let some of my family who were in it watch these grasshoppers cross the road by the million. I looked over the stations in both Dundurn and Hanley where the farmers were working night and day mixing the grasshopper poison and scattering it about the fields.

The districts up along the Beaver creek where the land is sandy are a particular problem. Whether or not people should make an attempt to farm that land is not my particular business here, but my plea is for some assistance to the people who are trying to eke out a living in that particular part of the country. This year these people will be almost wholly dependent upon the grants which they receive of $2.50 an acre if their yield is below four bushels of wheat to the acre and $1.50 per acre if the crops are from four to eight bushels.

I should like to join with my colleague who pleaded for more generous assistance, both in regard to the amount of money paid and in regard to bringing this grant to a more nearly individual basis.

I should like to draw the minister's attention to something that might solve part of this problem for that particular part of the country, namely, co-operative irrigation schemes which are being tried there, and which I think should have assistance both from the federal government and from the provincial government. I refer to projects where water is being pumped out of a branch of the south Saskatchewan river onto this flat land adjacent to the country east of Dundurn. I think that irrigation project could form a good testing ground for the later and larger irrigation scheme to which we have so long looked forward.

Mr. Fair: It is not my intention to take up many minutes of the time of the committee because what I wanted to say has been very well said by the hon. member for Acadia. I want to endorse his remarks wholeheartedly. A statement was made by the Minister of Agriculture on which I should like to get some more information, namely, the amendment that has been discussed by the provinces with him, and which he says they have recently refused to agree to. If the minister has a copy of that amendment perhaps he could read it to us and also tell us who have refused to agree with it. I feel that the request which I made to the committee the other day, and also the request which was made by the hon. member for Assiniboia, are reasonable and would relieve much of the dissatisfaction that exists at the present time.

On many occasions the minister has agreed to amendments being made to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act since it was first introduced in 1939. To a very large extent these amendments have done away with dissatisfaction with the act. There is one matter that has not been mentioned here today that I think should be mentioned, namely, the amount per acre below four bushels and between four and eight bushels. At the present time we are receiving the same rate as when the act was brought into force. With present production costs the amount should be increased considerably because there is no relationship whatever between production costs today and those of ten years ago.

Because we have been asking for a settlement on an individual basis, and because we have agreed in the past to a reduction of the area, the minister may be able to convince his colleagues and also treasury board—I always have difficulty in remembering the name of that organization, because lately I have been thinking of them in different terms, which might not be parliamentary—that we should have what we have been asking for, and what we asked for in committee.

If the minister wishes to use the amendment I moved, members in this group would have no objection whatever. He would have our wholehearted support.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister replied to the two matters I brought to his attention. In regard to the emergency situation in Saskatchewan, apparently there is to be no increase in the amount per acre allowed under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, nor any change in the policy heretofore existing whereby responsibilities in connection with seed wheat and seed grain rest upon the provinces.

I say no more than this, that the situation in Saskatchewan is serious. The number of acres subject to drought conditions approaches the darkest days of the thirties. While he was speaking I received from a farmer in that area a letter in which in part he says:

> As you know, our crop year is practically a total loss. Three years before this it was poor, also. We cannot see how to carry on. I have to buy all my feed and some seed. I cannot do it on a bonus of $500.

Apparently that is the sum represented by $2.50 per acre. He continues:

> I want to suggest that you point out to the members in the House of Commons how inadequate a bonus of $500—

That is, at $2.50 an acre—

> —is, now that the prices of things we have to buy are three times what they were when P.F.A.A. came into existence.

This letter is from Hawarden, Saskatchewan, dated November 28, and indicates, in summary, the feelings and fears of the farmers in my province, particularly in the southern part.

They are not unmindful of what parliament has done for them over the years; they realize what was done. However, their situation today is so serious that I do hope the minister will give reconsideration to the whole question of increasing the amount of the payment this year, under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, as an emergency measure, and also doing something to co-operate with the province.

I am not now arguing as between dominion and provincial responsibilities. All I do is say what hon. members from all parts of Saskatchewan will say if they speak on the subject, particularly those members from the central and southern parts. They will say as I do that the situation is serious, that fear haunts the homes of the people there, and they are asking that something be done, whether it be by the dominion government or the provincial government.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I offer a suggestion which may be of some value. Adjoining the boundary of British Columbia are many millions of acres of fertile and well-watered land not now occupied. It occurs to me that if there is a dustbowl in parts of Saskatchewan, where the farmers cannot grow more than five or six bushels to the acre, the minister might very well consider moving whole settlements of them up into northern British Columbia, where the land is available, where people can grow 50 or 60 bushels to the acre.

There is only one drawback, namely, that of transportation. I do say, however, it would be better to spend $17 million a year to provide highways and railways to the new, well-watered and fertile valleys of the Peace river country of British Columbia than $17 million a year handing out doles to farmers in drought areas in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Harrison: Mr. Chairman, the suggestion has been made from the opposite side of the house that possibly some members on the government side from Saskatchewan had been subjected to coercion in agreeing to the amendment contained in the bill now before us. Let me say on my own account that there was no coercion whatsoever. Indeed, I was one of the members from Saskatchewan who pressed upon the minister that this amendment be made.

I cannot agree entirely with what has been said by the hon. member for Assiniboia in suggesting that the one-section provision is the answer. A good reply to that was advanced by the minister, and I do not think I need add to it to any great extent.

I can understand that the hon. member for Assiniboia may be in a position where all his farmers come under the provisions of this legislation, and that therefore he is keenly interested from that standpoint. I would point out to him however that we are not all in that position. For instance, I happen to be in a position quite similar to that of the minister, so that I have to look at both sides of the question.

Part of my constituency must of necessity require the benefits of this legislation. That is necessary if they are to continue farming. But there is another section in my constituency who would rather have the P.F.A.A. passed off into the limbo of forgotten things. When hon. members press for the individual basis I would urge them to consider that there is another side to the picture. There are other people who are not very keen about this, and if this were pressed right through to the last ditch it might end up by their losing what they have.

Mr. Argue: You would not oppose it, though, would you?

Mr. Harrison: The one section, do you mean?

Mr. Argue: You would not oppose it?

Mr. Harrison: I would in this respect, that I believe the minister is correct when he says that the province has some responsibility in the matter. The party opposite has been advertised and is well known in Saskatchewan particularly as a humanitarian party. If they believe in helping the individual—and that is humanitarianism—then I suggest they should put their system into practice. They would do well to urge some co-operation by way of effecting an agreement with the federal Minister of Agriculture, as he pointed out this afternoon. They would do well to look into such an agreement whereby individuals might be taken care of. That, it seems to me, is a much better system than the one of forcing the whole responsibility on the dominion government. As I say, it is not the responsibility of this government.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member has said that if certain members pursued the P.F.A.A. too far there might be certain farmers in his constituency who would oppose its extension.

Mr. Harrison: Not farmers in my constituency but members in this house as a whole.

Mr. Argue: I have asked the hon. member if he would oppose it.

Mr. Harrison: Oppose what?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: Would you oppose the extension of the P.F.A.A.?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Studer: Mr. Chairman, those of us who are interested in the crop failure situation will be glad that the government has introduced these amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. These amendments have been discussed in committee. As I understand it, the intention of this bill is to iron out the inequalities that have existed in this crop failure plan in the years gone by. An effort is being made to benefit the greatest number of farmers without a system of individual payments.

As I understand it, if we had a system of individual payments, under our constitution, that would have to be the responsibility of the provinces. As it is, and as has been pointed out by the minister, the dominion government now makes a contribution toward assisting the provinces in fulfilling what might be their responsibilities in connection with crop failures in the various parts of the country. This amendment will make it possible to give assistance to more farmers who have little or no crops while fewer farmers who have crops will receive smaller payments than they have formerly received. I believe everyone will be in favour of having that situation continue. Almost 100 per cent of the farmers will come under this act after this particular amendment has been agreed to, and, if there is any way to bring in even more, there will be nothing in the world to stop this House of Commons from approving additional amendments next year or at some other time.

The hon. member for Assiniboia seems to be worrying about where the member for Maple Creek stands on this question. There should be no doubt about that whatsoever. I cannot remember a single meeting during my election campaign at which I did not state that there would not be a system of individual payments. The peculiar thing is, that I am here while the individual who said he was in favour of individual payments is not here. As has been pointed out, we want something with which all the people of Canada will agree. Why bring forward something that will create difficulty in other parts of the dominion, because after all, the whole dominion is contributing to these payments? Why bring up something with which all the people cannot agree, something that perhaps will take away some of these benefits?

I think the hon. member for Assiniboia will be doing the people in his constituency a favour if he considers all the aspects of this situation, instead of introducing just one thing that may bring in an additional vote for him. When I say an additional vote I am referring to the fact that he has placed on record the details of the vote in committee. I have no objection to that being done; it may be an improper thing to do, I do not know. If it is, I can assure the house that we are used to improper things being done in Saskatchewan as far as politics are concerned.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, I would point out that the report of the agriculture committee has been placed before this house and therefore it was entirely in order to quote from that report.

Mr. Studer: That is fine. I said I had no objection to anything being done and we will continue on that basis. I do not think anyone from the drought area can help agreeing with what the hon. member for Lake Centre has said, and what some of our C.C.F. friends have neglected to say, with regard to placing before this House of Commons full details of the dire needs of the people in these areas who have had successive crop failures.

I say again what I said some time ago, that some of these people are ready to move away when there is some place to which they can go. The hon. member for Cariboo referred to the productive lands in the Peace river area of British Columbia. I cannot recall any particular invitation having been extended to these people in Saskatchewan by the government of British Columbia, but if our people are invited to go there, I am sure some of them will consider that invitation.

Some of these people have suffered four, five, six or even more complete crop failures. With the cost of production as it is and comparing the situation with what existed in 1939 I think we can easily visualize the position of these people. They are looking to the dominion government for some consideration. They do not ask for anything when there has been only one crop failure; if I had a little crop last year and no crop this year, I know I can carry on. But where there has been a succession of complete crop failures I think the dominion government should come to the rescue. Saskatchewan is a "next year" country. Next year if conditions are right and these people can seed normal crops, who knows what contribution they will be able to make toward the welfare of our country, as has been amply proven in the past. I again ask the government to give every consideration to these people in the drought-stricken area.

Mr. Fair: Would the minister be good enough to place on the record the amendment which he said was suggested last year and to which certain people in the provinces refused to agree to this year, and at the same time tell us who those people are?

Mr. Gardiner: As I said when I was speaking, it really never got to the point where it was an amendment before the house and therefore I cannot put on record any amendment as such. The meaning of the proposal has been put on Hansard at least four or five times previous to last session. I think it has been put on the record every session that this question has been discussed since 1939. Every municipal association in western Canada to which I was writing has been given the details of this.

The proposal is that the provinces ought to pay at least a share into the fund which is created, first, by the farmers paying in and, second, by the dominion government paying in. Taking the whole area, the dominion government pays about $3 for every dollar paid by the farmers; in Saskatchewan they pay about $4 for each dollar; in Alberta, about $2 for each dollar; while in Manitoba the farmers pay considerably more than the dominion government. We have said that we think the provincial treasuries should subscribe something. We have told them that if they come along and ask us to take in the individual areas about which people are complaining all the time—that is an individual here and an individual there—if they will come along and suggest that those individuals should be brought under the act and will undertake to pay their proportion of the money involved, then we shall be quite prepared to administer the fund or pay into the fund and let them administer it so far as it affects those people.

That is what we have been saying for ten years and not one province has accepted it, no matter what government has been in power. It finally reached a point a year ago where we thought they had accepted it, but that acceptance was to be conveyed to me in the form of a letter from the governments when their representatives had explained it after going home. I do not know whether or not they explained that, but after waiting for six or seven months I wrote to the governments, explained the matter to them, indicated what had been discussed and agreed to, and asked them whether they had any objection to this amendment being put in the act and whether they would comply with it if it were put in. I got the answer from all three of the prairie governments, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, that they did not want the amendment. These are the facts with regard to it, and I am simply suggesting if we want to take care, by means of this legislation, of all the people who are entitled to be taken care of because of drought conditions in the west, and desire at the same time that the provinces should shoulder their share, then we might do better to bring our pressure to bear upon the provincial governments, and get them to accept the idea contained in the amendment. I do not think it would cost them much money to pay them all, just as my friends say it would not cost us much money, but it would at least acknowledge a principle which is to the effect that, where responsibility in the first instance rests upon the province, they should at least pay a part of the cost.

Mr. Wright: The minister stated there was a meeting of the officials of the provinces with the officials of his department concerning the amendment. Who are the officials involved in the conference?

Mr. Gardiner: The chief representative of the municipalities is now a member of this house. He was chairman of the committee on agriculture when this question was discussed the other day.

Mr. Wright: He was not there as a representative of the government.

Mr. Gardiner: He was there as the representative of the municipal organization of the three provinces. Mr. Campbell, now premier of Manitoba, was there. Mr. Nollet, minister of agriculture for the province of Saskatchewan, was there, and I believe also his deputy minister. There were similar representatives from Alberta. I am not able to name the individuals, but I can get that information from the record. It was representation at the same level from the province of Alberta, and I was there representing the dominion government.

Mr. Argue: Before the clause carries I should like to say one word. I want to disagree with the minister when he suggests that provincial governments should go into a crop failure insurance scheme. One of the things we have seen over the years in Canada is that every provincial government has more responsibilities than it has funds with which to adequately discharge them. The federal government has ample funds and should be increasing its responsibility rather than asking the provinces to do so. Therefore I would oppose any move by the government to try to drag the province of Alberta, the province of Saskatchewan or the province of Manitoba into a crop insurance scheme. I think it is time that the federal government accepted greater responsibility by way of increasing benefits under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act just the same as I think it should accept greater responsibility in other matters.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

CANADA FORESTRY ACT

FOREST PROTECTION AND EXPERIMENT, CONTROL AND MANAGEMENT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West) for the second reading of Bill No. 62, respecting forest conservation.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, at one o'clock I had just been speaking of the nature of the forest fires we have been experiencing in this country, and I was pointing out the different types of fires that are encountered. The largest percentage of fires is caused by carelessness of some kind. That carelessness is not something which simply affects the people who may be immediately in contact with whoever has been careless; the consequences may be very far-reaching.

While we are dealing with the bill before us at the present time, I should like to take this occasion to make the suggestion that consideration should be given to an amendment to the Criminal Code to provide adequate penalties for those who carelessly start these fires. At the present time section 513 of the Criminal Code provides penalties for those who wilfully set fire to forests or to other areas, but I believe the penalties connected with this type of carelessness should go beyond wilfully setting fire to forest areas. In the case of people carrying firearms penalties are provided for those who handle weapons recklessly or in such a way that damage may be caused as the natural or reasonable result. As to forest fires, the extent of the damage that may be caused in this way, and the actual threat to life as well, is so great that in examining the whole problem I think consideration should be given to a provision under which people could be adequately punished where there was actual reckless disregard of the safety of the forests, and consequently the safety of other people and of immensely important property.

I mention fires because this is a particular field in which there can be effective co-operation between the dominion and provincial governments. I doubt if there is any single problem connected with our forests today in which there is such a wide divergence between the different provinces as to the facilities available for fire protection under the control of the provincial departments. Under such agreements as may be worked out within the terms of the bill, there are possibilities that I should like to place before the minister which I think may have far-reaching results in dealing with this great problem.

At the present time some provinces have extensive arrangements for constant supervision of the forest areas by means of air patrol. Some have no such arrangements at all. The fire hazard varies, of course, in different provinces according to the type and concentration of the forest areas, but in every province there are areas which require supervision. The cost of maintaining and servicing an adequate air fleet for this purpose is undoubtedly too great for some provinces; and if there is to be provision for air patrol worked out by arrangement between the dominion government and the provinces, then I suggest that consideration be given the possibility of a general plan of air supervision which might be provided in co-operation with the Royal Canadian Air Force. The type of flying that would be done undoubtedly would provide excellent training for many pilots over those areas where they might be called upon to fly under service conditions. At the present time the Royal Canadian Air Force is doing mapping in some of the northern parts of the country. That work, and the type of skill required, would be somewhat similar to air patrols such as I have mentioned, and I believe consideration might well be given to having this type of work done under arrangement with the provinces by one organization that would be brought into service in this way.

Two types of air service are required to do an effective job. One is the constant watch for the outbreak of fire; the other is the actual fighting of the fire once it is discovered. Once a fire has been discovered it is of the utmost importance that aircraft be available, heavy enough to carry to the area as quickly as possible fire-fighting equipment such as pumps and many other items, together with men to fight the blaze. In the discussion of this subject I think consideration might well be given to the organization of two separate groups, one of which would carry out patrols for the purpose of spotting fires as soon as they occurred, the other an organization which for want of a better word might be called air commandos, who would be ready to go into any area and be dropped by parachute with pumps and various other fire-fighting equipment which would enable them to deal with a fire at the earliest possible moment.

I mentioned the different causes of forest fires for a particular reason, in addition to my desire to emphasize the carelessness that causes many of them. I think many hon. members will be surprised to learn the high percentage of fires caused by lightning. Almost invariably those fires start on high, inaccessible ground, which is where lightning usually strikes. Often these fires will start in old, dry stumps on top of a hill, which may be some considerable distance from the nearest place where water may be pumped by hose. It may take a considerable time to reach that point, and in the time it takes men to get there the fire may gain considerable headway, particularly if the forest is dry and a wind is blowing. This suggests the use of equipment with which it would be difficult for any single province to carry out the necessary experiments at the present time. I believe there would be a great chance of stopping many fires before they spread too far if we had an adequate number of helicopters well placed across the country, so that when a fire was spotted on inaccessible high ground a helicopter could go in and drop men, or perhaps put out the fire itself by the use of chemical bombs. Successful experiments already have been carried out along this line, which have demonstrated that a great deal can be done in this way. The employment of modern methods like these, however, require a much larger airborne fire-fighting force than can be maintained by any single province, and I should think this would be one of the most useful fields of discussion when dealing with this problem on a broad basis.

Another field for co-operation, in which the association between the dominion and provincial governments can be very useful, is in the inventory of forest areas by aerial photography. At the present time the province of Ontario has almost completed such an inventory of its total forest area through a system of photography similar to that carried out in mapping operations. Together with the necessary ground examination, this makes it possible to get an exact inventory of the amount of timber of every kind available for development. At the present time there is an agreement between the federal department and the department of lands and forests in Ontario under which the provincial government is doing the actual air photography and those photographs are being turned over to the dominion government, which is producing them in the form of maps that will provide all the essential information from which a complete inventory can be made. That, I should think, would be extremely useful in every province of Canada.

The other field in which co-operation can be most effective is that of research. Tremendous damage has been done our forests through insect infestation on a very large scale. It may be a question as to whether these insect epidemics have not caused as much damage as fire itself. Throughout the Gaspe peninsula today, for instance, you can see dead birch trees which obviously have been killed by insect infestation. Throughout great stretches of Ontario you can see dead spruce which have been killed by spruce budworm infestation. In other parts of Canada other types of trees have been killed by other insects, such as the sawfly. There is a great opportunity for research in that field.

As a layman, I cannot help wondering whether some of these things are not the result of the unbalance that man creates in nature. I cannot help wondering whether nature does not step in when one type of tree is taken out and other types are left standing; because you generally see these epidemics start in areas in which particular types have been heavily cut. It may well be that this is simply an expression of nature's attempt to restore the balance of trees which originally grew in those areas.

In any event, whatever the background is, these epidemics are recurring ones. The recent spruce budworm epidemic was not the first we have had. We have had serious epidemics in recurring periods for many years. There have been other epidemics as well. If through the research that is being carried out, and which the minister indicates is to be extended by co-operation with the provincial department, these epidemics can be stopped, many millions of dollars' worth of valuable timber will be saved; but what is more, the basis of employment of many thousands of men will also be preserved as a result of that research.

It will not be the role of the department to deal directly with such matters as types of cutting and things of that kind because those are essentially under the provincial governments. Nevertheless, the matter will come up for discussion because the type of cutting and the way in which the slash is left will have a bearing on fire protection and on the other things that will undoubtedly come under the joint supervision of the various governments.

In dealing with this question it is essential that real education in regard to the forest problem be given to our people generally throughout the whole country. Much of what is said publicly is often based upon some particular interest. I can recall some of the strongest statements made upon forest conservation by those who had a direct interest in some particular type of forest exploitation. I know that some of the most appealing statements in regard to preventing some particular type of cutting in favour of another type of cutting have been put forward by the worst timber pirates we had in this country. I mention this fact in connection with this measure because it is extraordinary the attention that is sometimes paid to statements which are made by those who have a particular axe to grind. I know that those who live in the forest areas have had some experience in this respect.

On the other hand, there are those who are earnestly trying to deal with this problem. The minister has mentioned the important contributions which have been made to an understanding of this vital question, including the report prepared by General Kennedy dealing with this subject in the province of Ontario and the report prepared by Chief Justice Sloan in British Columbia, dealing with the problems in that province. Each of those reports applies fairly generally to the whole problem throughout Canada. By co-operation, many of the recommendations that are put forward in those reports can be carried out across Canada under agencies that might be set up through the joint action of these governments.

I should just like to repeat that I believe one of the greatest opportunities presented by this bill is that of working out a system of adequate air supervision of our forest areas and the setting up of a highly-organized, mobile force of air commandos who will be able to go into any area that is threatened, without any regard to provincial boundaries and who, upon the report by the wireless of the district of a fire that requires attention of this kind, will be able to bring men from strategic points in that area and deal with it before it has spread out and become a menace to the standing timber which is of immense value to our economic future, or before it threatens or in fact destroys whole communities, as they have been destroyed in the past.

I should think this bill would commend itself to every hon. member. Employed in a spirit of co-operation with the provincial governments across Canada, this bill may be the beginning of a solution to a problem which has been causing great concern to everyone. If an effective method of dealing with fire and an effective method of dealing with these epidemics can be worked out, then we can really hope for the ideal of a perpetual supply of forest products for the industries that are based on that great source of raw material.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): When we were debating this measure in the resolution stage, Mr. Speaker, as was quite proper, nearly all of the members from British Columbia took part in the debate. I did not do so at that time, partly because so many spoke and partly because I knew there would be another opportunity. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said, this is a measure which is welcomed by every member of this house; and the greater the understanding that hon. members have of what forests mean to Canada and of what the liquidation of those forests means, no matter how that liquidation may take place, the more they will welcome the measure.

If I may say so without having the minister think that I am being critical, this is indeed a measure that is long overdue. I am not saying this to criticize the minister now for bringing in the measure or to suggest that he or the government were delinquent in their duty in not bringing it in before. If there is blame, I imagine it is blame we must all share.

Perhaps the people of no other country in the world inherited so vast a forest wealth as the first people who came to this country. In every province from the Atlantic to the Pacific there was a great deal of forest land. Perhaps the magnitude of our forests is some excuse for our disregard of its protection. When our ancestors came to this country and settled in the Atlantic provinces, and in the two central provinces, the forest was indeed considered an enemy. It was something that had to be subdued or destroyed before they could begin to make their clearings on which they expected to produce the food necessary for their existence. The unfortunate part of it is that this attitude remained long after the time when there was sufficient land available for the growing of food.

As I said, every province had its forest wealth. Every province, too, has large areas that are unsuitable for producing anything but forests. This is even true of my own native province of Prince Edward Island, where perhaps every acre can be cultivated. Yet, even in that province, large areas of land are so poor that they should never have been cleared of trees. Many of these sections are now reverting to forests because the land has been left fallow. In my opinion one of the first things that should be undertaken under this measure is a survey to ascertain the land that is suitable for the growing or production of nothing else but forest of some kind.

All provinces have an interest in forest conservation. But my own province of British Columbia has the greatest interest in conservation, as I shall show in a moment. In that province a very small amount of the land area is suitable for agricultural production. A few years ago I saw a report of a speech by the chief forester of British Columbia. He referred to forest surveys that were made during the past thirty-five or forty years. The first survey was about 1910, and the forest cut at the time was about one billion board feet, and it was estimated that we had a forest reserve sufficient to last us for three hundred years. In another ten or fifteen years another survey was made and at that time we were cutting about two billion board feet a year, and the estimated duration of the forest reserve had dropped in the interval to about a hundred and fifty years. Shortly after that we had another survey made and the annual cut had risen to about three billion board feet and the reserve had dropped to between thirty and fifty years. That indicates the terrific pace at which the forests of British Columbia have been, and up to the present time are being, liquidated. That is one of the things that I hope this measure will put an end to.

I do not exactly know how they measure it, but the total land area in British Columbia is said to be about 234 million acres. In figures that I received from the department of lands and forests the land has been classified as follows: About 75 million acres, or one-third of the total area, is good forest land. About another 82 million acres, approximately another third, is scrub forest land. Then there is another third, about 72 million acres, which is mountain top, barren, swamp and water. What I should like hon. members to note is that out of that total area of 234 million acres only 4·7 million acres is agricultural land, about 2 per cent of the total. It is no wonder then that the people of British Columbia are what one might call forest conscious. We realize the importance of the forests to us and how essential our forests are to the well-being of our people.

However, despite the importance of our forests to our people, up until recent years we have squandered them with reckless abandon. In that regard I do not suppose we have been any more prodigal with our forest reserves than the other provinces. But there is this difference: after our forest is taken away we are not as fortunate as some other provinces. With us there is no arable land left that can be used for the growing of food.

Since Chief Justice Sloan made the report referred to this morning by the minister, a start has been made to change from this rapid liquidation and substitute for it a plan of forest control. How effective it will be I do not know. One of the difficulties suggested to me by people who ought to know is the large amount of money required for the various aspects of conservation. So far as the provincial government is concerned, the revenue they receive from forests is direct and it shows up, as the saying is, like a sore thumb. But the federal government gets several times as much revenue out of the forests of British Columbia in an indirect way, such as income and corporation taxes. I am bound to say, however, that during the last few years the provincial government, even by direct means, should have got more of the forest wealth than they did. These figures before me, and they are authentic, show an increase in the value of forest products from $88 million in 1939 to $364 million in 1948. I am satisfied that if the provincial government had gone about it they could have obtained a larger amount of money directly for forest conservation than they did obtain, and particularly in the last few years.

I would hope that through this measure British Columbia would receive through the federal government a portion of the large amount of revenue which comes from the exploitation of the forest wealth of that province. I think I need say nothing further. When I first thought of speaking I had thought I would make a more extended speech. But much of what I intended to say has been said by members who have preceded me, and some of it by the minister himself. I would conclude by saying that I hope the minister now in charge of the bill, or whatever minister may be in charge of it, will take seriously this matter of forest conservation. I hope he will realize that we have not much time, and that the process of rehabilitation, even when carried out with energy, is going to be a long, tedious and expensive task.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I was happy to hear the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) say that the bill should commend itself to every member in the house. I would say it does much more than that; it commends itself to everyone outside the house who knows anything about our forests and their requirements.

Since the bill was introduced I have received many letters from the lakehead, especially from Fort William, commending the minister upon having introduced the bill. While one letter did say that it should have been brought in twenty-five years ago, the minister is not responsible for that because he was not here at that time. He is here now, and he has measured up to his job.

Forestry graduates in Fort William have made some suggestions which, I believe, should receive the consideration of the minister. At the lakehead we have three large pulp and paper mills east of Port Arthur, two in Port Arthur and two in Fort William, one of which is the largest paper mill in the world.

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh no.

Mr. McIvor: That may be going a long way, but it happens to be true. We believe that suggestions from that area should be heeded. The chief of these suggestions is that we should have an experimental station in the area of the lakehead, and a committee to gather data which could be sent on to the minister. They commend the minister for the details of the bill. We will back him to the limit, and give him all the details we can. However, the sooner this bill is passed, the better.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a few moments to draw your attention to the program of reforestation already carried out, which I do not believe has received proper recognition by the house.

Last spring we welcomed Newfoundland to the Dominion of Canada. In the reading room of the House of Commons we see on the the walls the design of a tree which represents the former nine provinces, and the Yukon. I submit another tree should be planted in that forest that is Canada, so that Newfoundland may have the recognition that is her due.

May I offer my congratulations to the minister upon the introduction of the bill. While it may be late, it is not too late. It has been estimated that the fire and insect loss to forests in Canada runs to something like 800 million cubic feet a year. It has also been estimated that the wastage from logging and sawmill industry operations runs to something over 900 million cubic feet a year, which is greater than the fire and insect loss.

Something should be done to control the wastage brought about by these industries. I cannot add much to the debate, because it seems to me practically everything has been said. The program of reforestation is vital to the agricultural areas of western Canada. Experiments have been carried out in the United States where they placed a line of timber across the dustbowl, as a result of which it was found that the lands in that area have not only been brought back into production but the flood hazards of the Mississippi have been lessened.

I believe we would do well to use the Scandinavian countries and Germany as a model in any reforestation program we might undertake. In addition to the wastage of valuable timber land each year, we must also consider the wildlife in those forests. The trapping industry in Canada is something over $20 million a year, and hunting and trapping licences bring in a revenue of about $4 million, with the additional $100 million from tourist traffic.

With all these in mind I submit the following items should be considered:

Surveys should be carried out to increase our knowledge of the forest inventory. This could be done both on the ground and by aircraft.

Sustained yield forest management should be applied.

Further efforts should be made to control loss by fire, insects and disease.

Forest operators should be rigidly controlled and allowed to cut only mature trees.

An extensive reforestation program should be enforced and attempts made to cut down sawmill waste.

An educational program should be instituted to encourage a greater feeling of responsibility on the part of the public.

This is all I have to say at the present time, but I do want to congratulate the minister and say that I hope this is only a beginning of greater co-operation in this respect between the dominion and provincial governments.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, first may I say that I think this bill is timely; in fact I think that someone should have had the foresight to have introduced a bill of this nature into this house some thirty years ago. Thirty years ago last February I started some timber operations of my own. Shortly afterward the industry ran into a slump and certain areas were not cut to the extent that we ordinarily would have cut. Many of the trees were considered to be too small to cut. I happened to get the deed to a small area and it might be interesting to hon. members to know that since that time I have taken off two crops of timber. We kept out the fire and we did not cut too small and therefore were able to do that.

Under the regulations governing timber permits in Ontario you cannot cut under thirteen inches at the stump, six inches at the top and a two-log tree. I think those are good regulations and if they are carried out my experience is that you will be able to crop each timber berth about every 25 years.

Forest protection and conservation is not just a matter of keeping out fire or planting new trees. Many other things enter into this matter, such as water conservation. The public should be educated to a greater extent in fire prevention, timber conservation and so on. A reforestation plan is being carried out in my own area and a number of the operators have been planting trees during the past few years. The provincial government has made a practice of plowing up the ground before planting new trees, but my experience has been that the trees grow better when planted in underbrush or where there are smaller trees. Some means should be devised under this legislation, probably next year or the year after, for taking over certain areas that have been cut and replanting them rather than clearing up fields for replanting.

It is necessary that we retain our forests if we are to conserve our water. The levels of lake Michigan, lake Huron and Georgian bay are down some 20 feet. Some people blame this on the Chicago water steal, but in my opinion the water just is not coming from the inland lakes. In my country the inland lakes are not filling up as they used to, and the levels of the streams are getting lower each year. The great concrete dams that were built, I suppose by the Department of Public Works, a number of years ago are not filling up. I am reminded of the farmer who died and left his son with a good farm and large buildings. But the son did not take care of the farm and soon he had no grain to put in his barns. That is what has happened to these dams that were built many years ago. I know of many small streams in which speckled trout used to be found but today they dry up in the summer. This is especially true in those areas which have been cut over, where too small trees have been cut or where fire has prevailed.

The minister stated that there are five laboratories in operation, but apparently they have been lax in their operations or perhaps they did not have sufficient equipment. Some 20 years ago all the tamarack in this country died and no one knew why, and no one knows yet why that happened. In the last two or three years our balsam trees have been dying. As you drive along the highway you will notice them all red. Neither the dominion nor the provincial laboratories have been able to tell us whether this is due to a grub or to a disease.

Then we have the sawfly menace, the budworm menace and the pinworm menace, and so far we have received very few facts about these dangers to our timber. The pinworm bores a hole just about the size of a pin, hence its name, but it operates in sawn lumber as well as in trees. In an effort to counteract this the lumbermen use a poisonous dip but this affects the hands of the workers, especially if they have become scratched. I do not know the best way to handle this, but I think the dominion government should work with the provinces and develop a program of reforestation and research.

This legislation is a step in the right direction and if properly followed up can prove to be a major step, not only in the conservation but in the development of the resources of this country. In addition to what is provided by this legislation, efforts should be extended by all governments to align public opinion behind a forestry conservation program. The agricultural and hydro-power development industries of this nation have a vital stake in the forests of the country. Although only indirectly related to forestry, these industries are directly affected by any disturbance of the natural balance of the soil vegetation and water levels. The interdependence of a sound forest conservation program and the progress of electric power development in this country in itself justifies the provisions of this legislation.

In addition to conservation I should like to see the government next year—if not next year, as soon as possible—by means of the research facilities which it now possesses extend greatly the research in the field of greater utilization of the so-called weed species. There exists today a big field for the greater utilization of logging and saw mill waste. In the ordinary saw mill operation sawdust represents six to eight per cent of the timber handled. Then the timber blocks and other waste must be taken care of. Many mills in Ontario, and I think this applies to British Columbia and some parts of Quebec, burn all the slabs produced. The use of electricity and gas has reduced the use of slabs for home use, and today they are being either buried or burned.

At the present time I believe there is a shortage of trees for planting on waste farm lands in some areas of Canada. I know this to be a fact in Ontario because in planting trees myself each year I have not been able to secure enough from the forestry department of the province to plant the number of trees I would have liked to. I have been getting quite a few, however, and probably they are developing more, although I do not know. I suggest to the minister that some plan of that sort should be worked out in conjunction with the provinces, or by the dominion alone. As public opinion becomes more conservation conscious, it is only natural to expect the demand for young trees will increase, and I suggest early action be taken to assure an adequate supply of trees for reforestation.

Aside from secondary incomes derived from the forests by means of trapping, tourist trade and water power, this industry yields in excess of a billion dollars annually. Unfortunately the amount of money put back into the industry to conserve these resources has been very little. I should like this legislation to be a forerunner of action that will result in $50 million a year being put back into the industry by the federal and provincial governments, and the industries directly and indirectly concerned. That is all I have to say on the bill at the present time. I am very much in favour of it.

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a moment. It has been said that this legislation is twenty-five or thirty years overdue. I suggest the knowledge that has been given to us in the house today in connection with this measure is four thousand years too late. If the inhabitants of the world four thousand years ago had known the extent to which wood could be utilized for the maintenance and supply of so many things we require, we would not have very much difficulty in the world today so far as our economics, our clothing, our food and our shelter are concerned. The section of the bill that intrigues me is that part which provides that the governor in council may establish and maintain laboratories for the better utilization of forest products. I want to bring to the attention of the minister and his technicians, perhaps more to them than anyone else, a statement which I found a few days ago in a book entitled "The Coming Age of Wood". It reads:

> Wood is inexhaustible. The forest is not a mine that eventually will be depleted, but a crop land. Provided—

The emphasis is on the proviso.

> —trees are harvested as a crop and the forest is sustained by proper management, wood will forever yield all the material the human race can conceivably require.

The author undertakes to prove the proposition which he enunciates in the first chapter. He certainly does so to my satisfaction, and I believe to the satisfaction of any person who may care to investigate the book.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up much of the time of the house in discussing this subject. I think everyone approves of the bill and is in accord with its principles. Coming as I do from the province of New Brunswick, we are naturally very much interested in lumbering and forestry conservation. Lumbering is one of our most important industries, and when it is not in a prosperous condition the people of New Brunswick are not prosperous. The enemies of forestry conservation have been mentioned, and I think probably man could be named as the first. I think he has done more to destroy the forests of Canada, as he has in other lands, than all the budworms and other pests that we could mention. Nevertheless I am sure he is slowly learning the necessity of conserving this great gift.

Some forty-five or fifty years ago it was realized in our educational institutions, and particularly in the university of New Brunswick, that it was necessary that people should receive more education so far as forestry is concerned. At the university of New Brunswick in the city of Fredericton, we established the first forestry school in Canada. That school has prospered for the last forty-five years. Graduates from the university of New Brunswick have gone to all parts of Canada, the United States and many parts of Europe to assist in the work of reforestation and the spreading of a general knowledge of forestry.

One of the members from British Columbia spoke a few minutes ago about the chief forester of that province. The first chief forester of the province of British Columbia, Mr. Caverhill, was a graduate of the university of New Brunswick. The present chief forester of British Columbia, Mr. Orchard, is also a graduate of the same university. I say these things to indicate the work that has been done. I might also say that the firm of Price Brothers of the province of Quebec, a large lumber concern, for the past number of years has been giving scholarships at the forestry school and sending students to that university. Just last year five scholarships were given in Great Britain for forestry training, and the students were sent to the university of New Brunswick.

I quite agree with what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said this afternoon, that it is most difficult for the smaller provinces to properly protect their forests from fires. I think the suggestion he made that we might use aeroplanes and helicopters is a good one. In many parts of the province of New Brunswick we have now established fire towers, and they have been of great benefit in spotting fires and directing fire fighters to the vicinity in a short time. I also think further education is needed. I was greatly interested a short time ago to read in the February number of a publication issued by the Canadian Forestry Association an article suggesting that more Canadian films should be used to educate our people in forest conservation and similar matters. The article reads:

> Motion pictures as an aid to forestry education are an important medium employed by the Canadian Forestry Association. During 1948, Canadian Forestry Association's own motion picture and lecture tours, its film libraries and co-operative tours recorded an attendance in all Canadian provinces of 400,000 men, women and youths, French and English.

They go on to say:

> It is regrettable to report that all the major motion pictures, in the 1948 program, dealing with forest management, forest protection, soil erosion, water and wild life were purchased by Canadian Forestry Association in the United States and adapted (and translated for Quebec) in Canada.
> The principal producer of forest conservation films on this continent is the United States department of agriculture.

This article goes on to suggest that the Canadian film board might very properly take a prominent part in the production of such films. I offer that to the minister as a suggestion which I believe should be given careful consideration.

I was interested in the remarks of the last speaker and also those of the hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. Hodgson) with respect to the use of lumber by-products such as sawdust, slabs and so on. I should like to direct attention to the efforts in this connection of a former member of this house, Mr. J. L. O'Brien, in Northumberland county, New Brunswick. Mr. O'Brien has installed equipment and developed a process at his plant on the Miramichi river by means of which not only the sawdust but the slabs and even the bark are used. In other words he is using one hundred per cent of the log. This is more or less of an experiment, on which Mr. O'Brien is spending a good deal of his own money, but he believes it will be successful. If such a method can be developed by him I am sure it can be used in the industry right across Canada. It is interesting to note that in the past only fifty per cent of a log has been used, with the slabs, the sawdust and the waste making up the other fifty per cent. That is a tremendous loss, which I hope may be eliminated as a result of the work of the organizations being set up under this legislation.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to say a word on this matter, Mr. Speaker, and I shall try to conclude before six o'clock. Strangely enough the largest logging camp in the British empire happens to be in my riding, which is a rural constituency. The largest cedar mill is also there. But that is not what I rose to say.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Why do you say it, then?

Mr. Cruickshank: When an hon. member from the maritimes, who is afraid to say anything unless he is going to gain something out of it, is prepared to stand in his place and talk as I am talking, I will sit down for him, but not until then. I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) will agree when I say that the man who has done most for forest conservation in British Columbia is Hon. T. D. Pattullo, a former minister of mines and for twenty years premier of that province, who I am proud to say is celebrating his golden wedding anniversary today.

I do not always agree with my socialist friends, as I probably shall not agree with them tonight. I do not always agree with some of the leaders in the lumber industry, but I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that though we admit we are twenty-five or thirty years late we believe we in British Columbia lead in forest conservation; and for once I want to speak for private industry. No one in Canada is doing more for forest conservation today than Mr. H. R. MacMillan, of British Columbia, who is doing it with his own money.

I want to congratulate the minister on this bill, which I think is excellent. I believe the idea is right. After all—and I hope some of my fish friends from the maritimes will listen to this—our forests are one of the greatest assets of the country. During the war fifty-five per cent of the lumber that England required so badly came from British Columbia; put that in your pipe and smoke it. I do not mind these interruptions from someone who knows what he is talking about, but I did want to get this off my chest. British Columbia is very proud of what it is doing now. We welcome any assistance we may obtain from the federal government, and again I want to pay my respects to the former premier of that province, who had so much to do with forest conservation.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If I may make a suggestion, in committee on the first section there is usually a general discussion. The discussion on the motion for second reading has been going on for some time, and I wondered if the hon. gentleman would permit us to get into committee and make his remarks on the first section of the bill.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, if it is understood that I may speak generally.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Herridge: I take the time of the committee, Mr. Chairman, to speak at this point on this bill because I represent a large number of people who have been particularly interested and concerned with forest conservation for a considerable period of years; in fact I represent a number of people who have led the way in British Columbia in advocating forest conservation principles. I am also rather anxious to make a few remarks and present a few of my ideas to the committee on this bill because I myself have been particularly interested—I should say that it has been a hobby of mine since 1909—in the preservation of a tract of timber and its operation on a permanent yield basis.

I have read this bill carefully and I am pleased to note that it contains some substance and provides the machinery for this government to do something effective in the future in the field of forest conservation. In passing I must say that I listened with great interest this morning to the minister's statement on the second reading of this bill and was pleased indeed to hear in that statement of the intentions of the government and of its plans in connection with this bill.

Some people are considered to be patriots because they wave the flag and make a show by outward and visible demonstration of their loyalty to a country. But in my opinion a person who makes every effort to see that the actual resources of a country are preserved, in forests, in soil and in water, is fulfilling one of the first requirements of being a patriot and a true citizen.

Since the resolution was first introduced I find that support for this bill is widespread. I have had a number of letters from constituents who are interested in the forest industry and who have expressed great pleasure at seeing this bill come before the house. In reading the press and various magazines I have also noticed that there is a great deal of outspoken support for the government's purpose as expressed in this bill.

In dealing with this question of the conservation of our forests, we have three important questions to ask: What is our present position, what is our objective, and how can we attain that objective? Before making a few personal suggestions as a result of experience in British Columbia, I am first of all going to deal briefly with the situation as it is in that province, because naturally I am better informed on conditions there than on conditions elsewhere; and having been a member of the provincial legislature of British Columbia for some years, I have followed with great interest the work and have had quite a close association with some of the forestry officials of that province.

In order to proceed with my argument I find myself repeating three sets of figures that were given by a previous member, but I do so in order to give a true picture while speaking at this time. We find that the total land area of British Columbia is 234,403,000 acres. The land area capable of producing commercial timber is about 75 million acres, although included in that figure is some land that might only produce marginal timber. The area of land which is incapable of producing commercial timber is 154,678,000 acres; agricultural land, 4,702,000 acres. That means that we have 32 per cent of the total area which is capable of producing timber of some type; 66 per cent is incapable of producing commercial timber and 2 per cent of the land area of British Columbia is suitable for agricultural purposes. From those figures hon. members can clearly understand the great importance of the forest industry to British Columbia.

From the latest figures I have been able to obtain, it is estimated that there is at present 280 billion feet of accessible timber in British Columbia. When I say "accessible", that is a rather relative term because it changed with the introduction of machinery. By that I mean timber that can be taken out with modern equipment at a profit at this time. Timber which is now accessible was considered strictly inaccessible when I was a boy when it had to be hauled by horses for a long distance.

The main causes of forest depletion are logging, destruction by fire, insect pests, diseases and what we term windthrows. I am interested to note that according to the latest figures I can get for British Columbia the depletion by logging in that province averages 3½ billion board feet per year. That is the consumption of our timber resources on account of logging. The depletion by fire averages 300 million board feet per year. The depletion from insects and disease averages over 400 million board feet per year. The total annual depletion of our accessible forest wealth in British Columbia at the present time is nearly 4¼ billion board feet. That is an impressive figure.

Chief Justice Sloan, in his report relating to the forest resources of British Columbia, published in 1945—to anyone who is interested in a careful study of forest resources, I would recommend the reading of that report—estimated on the basis of the present rate of depletion that the coast stands of timber would last as follows:

	years
Douglas fir	31
Hemlock	92
Western red cedar	85
Spruce	87
Silver fir or balsam	176
White pine	35

Interior stands were estimated to last as follows:

	years
Douglas fir	72
Western hemlock	225
Western red cedar	84
Spruce	101
Silver fir or balsam	1,184

We are quite safe in that direction, so far as silver fir is concerned.

	years
Lodge pole pine	167
Larch	46
White pine	37
Yellow pine	30

From these figures, Mr. Chairman, you can see that the interior of British Columbia represents a much better picture than does the coast area.

These figures that I have given illustrate the British Columbia situation clearly and I think they are indicative generally of the position with respect to our forests in Canada as a whole.

For a few moments I want to deal with the question of utilization. As we understand it, logging waste is the proportion of the tree that has marketable value which is left in the woods, such as sound logs, butts, breakages and unused tops. From a study made in 1932 by J. H. Jenkins and F. W. Guernsey, it was found that nearly 20 per cent of merchantable timber was left in the woods of British Columbia as logging waste. This alone means that 750 million feet of merchantable timber is wasted in the woods each year in British Columbia. I therefore suggest that there is a great opportunity here for the federal and provincial governments to carry out experiments similar to what was termed the Ladysmith experiment conducted by the Comox Logging and Railway Company, the Powell River Company and the British Columbia provincial forest service. In my opinion the solution to this question will mean the establishment of new grades for recovered material and concessions to logging operators and lumber companies so far as royalty and stumpage are concerned.

I want to deal very briefly with saw mill waste. The fact that about 20 per cent of the wood volume per acre is now being wasted during logging operations must lead us to consider what happens to 80 per cent of a tree that arrives in a mill. A study of fourteen different coast mills by the same company, J. H. Jenkins, in 1928 revealed the fact that about 30 per cent of Douglas fir logs and 33 per cent of hemlock logs were lost in the slabs, edgings and sawdust. They lost approximately 30 per cent in the manufacturing plus 20 per cent in logging. That means about 50 per cent of the volume of the trees cut in British Columbia are lost in logging and manufacturing. By the time they arrive at the mill there is a further loss owing to the uneconomic utilization of logs through poor equipment. There is quite a place, Mr. Chairman, for a study by the federal government or by co-operation between the two governments, of the use of proper equipment in the cutting of timber in this country. Then again there is a further loss through the lack of markets for low grades and from the lack of use of, shall I say, by-products left in the bush.

What I mean by the lack of markets because of the failure to utilize low grades I could illustrate in this way. When the trimmer saws are operating in the saw mills you very often see two by fours, two by sixes or other dimensions of timber cut from a log having a slight wane on one corner, which prevents it being used for house building, and as a result of this wane one often sees two feet, four feet or six feet of this dimension timber trimmed and wasted.

If we were utilizing our timber properly as they are in Great Britain and Scandinavia that two by four or two by six or any dimension of that type could be used in such buildings as garages, or outside structures where you do not intend to use any interior sheeting.

Then, Mr. Chairman, there is a considerable loss of timber in the use of high-grade logs for dimension timber, and so on, owing to the variations in the market and the lack of experience. I have visited a number of small mills and portable mills and have found, for instance, No. 1 cedar logs being cut up for two-inch and three-inch cedar planks or No. 1 Douglas fir logs being cut into shiplap and material of that type, when those fir logs should be used entirely for fir flooring, furniture materials and high-grade lumber. Therefore I wish to make a few suggestions to the minister for his consideration to promote the greater utilization of logs. I suggest it would be an excellent thing for the government to investigate the possibilities for more efficient types of saw mill equipment to overcome the present loss of timber caused by the inserted tooth saw. We have the inserted tooth saw and the solid saw. The reason the inserted tooth saw is used is that it is much easier for the average man to use. It does not require a skilled man to sharpen the saws, skilled mechanics and so on. The inserted tooth saw causes an excessive amount of waste in sawdust when sawing. Also inefficient carriages and wasteful edging cause losses. There is no question about it. Anyone who has followed the lumber industry in this country throughout the years, particularly the smaller mills and the portable mills, will realize how little advancement we have made in efficient sawing equipment, especially when we compare it with the advances that have been made in other directions so far as machinery is concerned. I would suggest to the minister that there is a great opportunity there for a study of saw mill equipment, particularly as it applies to small mills and portable mills. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that further study of the utilization of saw mill waste for the manufacture of furniture, household equipment and box materials could be given serious consideration.

Anyone who has been associated with the lumber industry will realize that possibly the greatest amount of waste occurs in the smaller mills or in the portable mills where the owners are unable to use that waste because of being some distance from the local market and because of the lack of capital to purchase these things that are required to utilize the waste, the machinery and so on. That is a subject which could well be studied.

I have not seen the machines but I have been told that in Scandinavia, in parts of Germany, and in other parts of Europe there are in use, or were in use previous to the last war, some very efficient saw mill equipment operated on the band saw principle which can be operated with very low power. In the lumber industry power cost is one of the chief obstacles to the small mill operator. The small chap who has a small timber holding or who buys his logs from wood lots on the farms, or has small timber holdings which he operates, finds that power is one of the bugbears. I suggest that the minister's department could give serious consideration to investigating these types of saw mills, which are of the band saw type. I have been told by a lumber operator that in Sweden they have a type of band saw which is utilized in this way. The farmer takes a two-foot log, puts it on the carriage and heads it into a series of small band saws. He then goes and milks the cows, does his chores, goes to bed, and gets up in the morning and the machinery is so timed that he would have a couple of dozen inch planks ready for farm use. I think that should receive some attention from the minister's department because it would be a great help to farmers in this country, and particularly to small lumber operators, to be able to cut lumber with low powered engines.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the department give consideration to the development of the co-operative purchase of machinery between small mills. The trouble is that waste occurs because there are, as in my own district, dozens of small operators wasting a high percentage of the log after it reaches the mill, in addition to the woods waste, because they have not the capital to purchase this machinery. I suggest that some consideration should be given to the co-operative purchase of processing plants, and to getting firms interested in the building of centralized processing plants in which the waste from a number of portable mills could be taken and processed. I suggest that the minister's department could very well investigate the possibilities of markets for by-products. Our timber has been so plentiful until recent years that I am of the opinion not sufficient serious consideration has been given to the question of by-products from the lumber industry. Consideration of assistance should be given toward the cost of transportation of these products to markets. In some districts particularly that might mean the introduction of special rates by the railroads or shipping companies, as a result of government intervention. That may seem a sort of unusual suggestion, but I can illustrate. In my district, if we had a special rate for say cordwood going from the Arrow lakes to the city of Trail at a lower rate than the present rate it would be a great help. At the present time you can barely ship wood to cover the cost. If there was a lower rate in effect for that wood, that is a rate of say $10 a car less, small operators would be induced to use up a great deal of timber which is now left in the bush to rot. I advance that as another suggestion to the minister's department.

Then there is the question of consideration of tax concessions to promote the greater utilization of timber in the woods and at the saw mill by both the federal and provincial governments. While on the surface this may appear to mean a temporary loss of revenue to the federal or provincial government, I maintain that if we are able to utilize our natural resources to much greater advantage it is in the end a total gain to the community.

I wish now to discuss several aspects of forest protection. I have been interested in the subject for many years. In my time I have done a good deal of fire fighting, and I could tell some most interesting stories as a result of my experiences. However, I shall not do that but shall confine my remarks to the subject at hand because, Mr. Chairman, I must tell you that I live in great fear of you.

There has been a great improvement in this respect in British Columbia in recent years owing to the increase in the use of aircraft, lookouts and suppression crews in fire fighting. I say that the government of British Columbia and the forest service of that province deserve a great deal of credit. I have seen that service develop throughout the years to a point where it has now become particularly efficient.

I believe it was before lunch that the leader of the opposition suggested that there could be co-operation between the Royal Canadian Air Force and the forest services of the various provinces with a view to having the R.C.A.F. patrol for forestry purposes. That may be possible in some sections of Canada, but I do not think it is possible in British Columbia because it requires the use of a light type of aircraft to travel between the high mountains. It would involve great risk to fly a heavy plane low between mountain peaks, and ranges.

In that connection I suggest there is room for further research as to the types of equipment used in fire fighting. A suggestion was made by a previous speaker which I wish to endorse. He pointed out that the lack of roads and trails into our forest areas had up to the present time constituted one of the biggest handicaps in the matter of successful fire fighting owing to the time taken to reach the point where the fire is actually burning. I do believe something should be done between the federal government and the provinces to extend the roads into forest areas, and where roads are not possible trails so that pack horses could be used.

I further suggest the possibility of a greater use of chemicals in the early stages of fighting forest fires. There is the possibility that that subject might be further investigated, because chemicals are light, can be packed easily and can reach almost inaccessible places. That question should receive further consideration.

I will deal only briefly with the question of the control of insect pests and disease. A great deal of excellent work has been accomplished by the science service of the Department of Agriculture in this connection. I should like to express my appreciation of the work that branch has been doing, because I have come in contact with some of the science service men and the work they have been doing. My suggestion to the minister would be that more funds are required to carry on the necessary work.

Secondly, there should be co-operation between the federal and provincial governments, universities and industry to a much higher degree. More publicity should be given in our universities and schools with respect to this aspect of forest conservation.

I come now to the subject of forest management and silviculture. While federal and provincial officials have given attention to the question of forest management, reproduction, regeneration and the rate of growth, a great deal more will have to be done in this connection before a sound and effective policy is developed.

In that connection, and in order to be as brief as possible, I should like to quote from the recommendations of the royal commission on forestry in British Columbia in 1945, headed by Chief Justice Sloan:

> The future existence of our forest industries depends upon the intelligent management of our forest land to insure its continued productivity. No industry that continues to deplete the source of its own raw material can hope to survive without providing for the future replenishment of that material.
>
> If our forest heritage is to be preserved instead of destroyed we must think of forest production in terms of renewable crops, not only for the growing of wood, but for the perpetuation of all those manifold benefits which the forest has bestowed upon mankind.
> Our basic fundamental and vital forest problem is to see to it that our forests are perpetuated for the use, profit and pleasure of our future generations. If we fail in this objective then the economic future of British Columbia will present a very dark and dismal picture. Fortunately it is not too late to plan now for the future, but the sands are running out and the time is now upon us when the present policy of unmanaged liquidation of our forest wealth must give way to the imperative concept of a planned forest policy designed to maintain our forests upon the principle of sustained yield production. Our forest land must be regarded as a source of renewable crops and not as a mine to be exploited and abandoned.

I quote again from the report of the same commission:

> In 1910 a royal commission was appointed to inquire into forestry matters in British Columbia and an important recommendation was contained in the report of the commission relative to the forest revenue. It reads as follows:
>
> "Your commissioners regard the income from royalty on timber as differing essentially from any other form of revenue in the province. Such receipts should be regarded as capital—not as current revenue. We have no hesitation in recommending that the amount so received, large as it may appear, should be expended by the government for the protection, conservation, and restoration of our timber resources. With our present knowledge regarding re-afforestation to treat these receipts as other than capital would be utterly unsound in principle and might produce disastrous results in the ultimate impairment of the public estate."
> It is regrettable to have to record that for thirty-five years this recommendation has been consistently ignored and disregarded by succeeding governments.

That recommendation was made thirty-five years ago, but until quite recently even the government of British Columbia took no action in that respect. Thirty-five years of neglect! I emphasize this point, because federal and provincial governments draw a large revenue from the forests. A greater percentage of that revenue must be returned for the conservation and protection of our forests, on the part of both the federal government and the provincial governments concerned.

The public estate has suffered impairment during the last thirty-five years from the lack of funds essential to forest management. The public interest requires that this state of affairs should no longer continue.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Ample money must be voted under this act if it is going to have any effective results. I find that in Canada in 1946 there was a total expenditure of $30 million on forest management, research and forest problems. The federal governmnt spent $2·6 million, the provincial governments $10·7 million, and private industry $16·4 million. That makes a total of $30 million. The Canadian Forestry Association recommends that by 1955 we should have a total annual expenditure on forest management in Canada, divided between federal and provincial governments, and private industry, of $100 million.

I should like now to make brief reference to the research carried on by the Vancouver forest products laboratory of the dominion forest service. I recognize the excellent work being done by that laboratory, with its timber mechanics division, its division to investigate utilization and seasoning, wood preservation and timber pathology division and the wood chemistry division. I understand that now they are experimenting with the production of gas from wood and have had some very interesting results, although I am told that at the present time it cannot be produced at an economical price. I give all credit to the men working at the Vancouver forest laboratory, but I should like to criticize the government to the extent of saying that too few people in Canada know just what that laboratory and the other laboratories investigating forest products are doing. I understand that their findings are published in certain trade and lumbermen's journals and a few other publications, but there are hundreds of people operating small mills, logging operations or engaged in educational work who know nothing about the excellent work being done. I suggest that greater publicity should be given to the work of these scientists who are working on our behalf.

If we are going to have a sound, effective policy there should be a widespread educational program. When you discuss these matters with Scandinavians or Europeans or people of the British isles you discover that behind the law is a great consciousness on the part of the people of the necessity for conservation. The spirit of conservation prevails. If we are going to get the co-operation of the Canadian people for the maintenance of government-sponsored forests across this country we must start to educate in the elementary schools and proceed right through to the universities, not forgetting many types of adult organizations.

In addition to forest management and forest conservation, we require an over-all conservation policy because forest conservation is only one facet of a national conservation program. I suggest that there is great need for an interdepartmental committee on conservation to be made up of forest engineers, agricultural scientists, meteorologists, members of the hydrographic service and other related departments such as the national film board. Conservation should be approached as a whole, not in tidbits.

I recommend to the government that they work in close co-operation with the Canadian Forestry Association, the Canadian Association of Forest Engineers, the Agricultural Institute of Canada, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and other bodies and organizations of a technical or popular nature that are interested in the development of this program. I do not know to what extent this co-operation exists at the present time, but I believe it is necessary to involve the people in the day-to-day administration of their own affairs if they are going to be administered in a democratic, efficient and effective way.

In conclusion I stress the need for education, organization, co-operation and sufficient funds for the development of a satisfactory and complete conservation program in Canada.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Chairman, I cannot help but comment that in the general approbation that has been given to this bill by members of all parties the words "progressive conservation" have been used a number of times, and I am reminded that the party of which I have the honour to be a member uses the word "progressive" in its title. Progressive conservation cannot be anything but a good thing for Canada and that is why this party agrees with it.

I was rather taken aback by a remark this afternoon made by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond who said that this bill was 4,000 years too late. I do not believe the Liberal party was in power at that time, but if they continue with their present progress they may be able to keep up that position in the years to come. At all events we cannot blame them for not having introduced this bill at the time the hon. member suggested.

Mr. Carroll: I made no such statement, that the bill should have been introduced 4,000 years ago. What I did say was that certain of the information we were getting concerning this matter of forest conservation was not known to the people of this country 4,000 years ago.

Mr. Higgins: I beg the hon. member's pardon. I thought the Liberal party was in power 4,000 years ago.

An hon. Member: It just seems that long.

Mr. Higgins: Be that as it may, good things will mature and if any party could bring such a bill as this one before us I am sure it would be the Liberal party, it having been in power since 1935.

No one can dispute the value of a bill such as this, but in considering this bill I think we should realize the great background of our pulp and paper industry. With all due respect to some of the hon. members to my left who seem to think that there is no need for such a bill, I would point out that the pulp and paper industry is responsible for the earning of some $800 million each year. That is a greater production than that of the mineral industry or our wheat and grain industry. Coming from the part of the dominion from which I come, I had always visualized wheat and grain production as being Canada, but when I saw the figures I began to realize that it is all wood, and I do not mean it is solid all through.

The pulp and paper industry is first in employment, first in the wages paid, first in value of production, first in the value of exports and first in capital expenditure. All in all, it is a wonderful industry. But that is only part of our woods industry. There is the logging, such as that carried on in the constituency of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. But speaking only of the pulp and paper industry we can realize the necessity for a bill such as this.

This is the first time that I have attempted to take the hon. member for Fort William to task and I certainly do not like to take a man of the cloth to task, but when he says that the largest pulp mill in the world is in his constituency I would remind him that the largest single pulp mill in the world is located in Corner Brook, Newfoundland. The greatest single day's production of newsprint in the world occurred at that plant not more than three or four weeks ago. We are very proud of that fact. Of course we have a lot of wood, cod, and everything else down there. If I remember correctly, I believe the hon. member for Wetaskiwin remarked today about the fact that in the reading room there was a symbolic tree and all the provinces had branches on the tree except the poor new province.

An hon. Member: We will get one for you.

Mr. Higgins: I shall not name the hon. member over there, but I believe it was suggested by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin that we should have a new tree. I suggest that when we have a new tree it should be a big tree and not altogether "Smallwood". I am not going much further into this matter, but I want to say that I agree with the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond when he says that trees are a crop. Trees very definitely are a crop, and they must be harvested and treated as a crop. That is why, as a person to whom wood means so much—and I do not mean "Smallwood" either—I say that we have to regard the trees of Newfoundland as a crop for harvesting, and the same thing applies all over the dominion.

For that reason the bill is going to have particular significance. My leader mentioned fire protection today. I do not know whether or not it is so, but possibly your newest province is in the lead in that it is wiser with regard to fire protection. We have found that one of the chief causes of fire is railroad engines, and as a result of that we converted our engines so that they could use oil. That is not going to be very popular in Cape Breton, or possibly in some other parts of the country, but it would appear to me that in territories where there is wood and there are also railroads, it should be compulsory for railway engines to use oil.

In your youngest province we are proud of the fact that we are not too far behind you so far as management is concerned. I should like to quote briefly from a reprint of a Financial Post editorial of July 2, 1949. It is written by John D. Gilmour, who apparently is recognized as an outstanding authority among Canadian foresters. First of all he said:

> Except for Newfoundland and Quebec (which lead Canada in forestry matters) forest industry does not control fire protection.

I think that is correct. I should also like to read a few more paragraphs to be found further on in the editorial. They are:

> Newfoundland, Canada's tenth and newest province, can show the best all-round record in forest management. Here most of the forest areas are held in perpetuity by the two pulp and paper companies. There has been a minimum of government interference. Unlike the alarming decline in the forests in other parts of Canada, Newfoundland now has considerably more timber than it had fifty years ago. This has been due to better fire protection, a better system of land tenure and proper control of cutting by the companies.
>
> Both companies have a stake in Newfoundland forests, and have taken greater care to see that their raw material is managed to give a sustained annual yield. Anglo-Newfoundland Development Company was operating on a sustained yield basis before 1926. Bowater's Newfoundland pulp and paper mills in its recent expansion refused to permit its mill capacity to exceed anticipated pulpwood supplies cut on a sustained yield basis.
>
> The oldest permanent sample plots in Canada are in Newfoundland. I was one—

He refers to himself.

> —who laid them out in 1921. They have been carefully studied and measured every five years since then. And they have produced a great deal of useful information already and will continue to do so.

[Mr. Higgins.]

That, Mr. Chairman, should be a lesson to the older provinces of Canada that the newest province, which depends so much on the pulp and paper industry, appears from what I have heard to be much further ahead than the rest of the provinces of Canada. I believe the bill envisages many great protective measures, and I refer particularly to section 6. I shall not read it because all hon. members have it. If this particular provision of the bill is enforced it appears to me the minister really has something, if he wants to push it, that will be of great benefit to the whole Dominion of Canada. I may appear to suffer from chronic "gimmies", but I want to ask the minister for something once again, inasmuch as we have our own little worries and troubles in Newfoundland. The minister envisions the establishment of research bureaux under this measure, and as there is none in the maritimes at the present time I would ask him to establish one of these new research bureaux in Newfoundland to service the maritime provinces.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Chairman, I feel, as was said this afternoon, that this measure is probably one of the most important pieces of legislation introduced in the house for many years. As so many have said, that is particularly true because it is so long overdue. I am quite sure the minister will agree with me when I say that it is a great challenge to whatever minister is charged with the responsibility of administering Canada's forest policy. I think it is recognized that forestry is Canada's biggest business, but I often wonder whether the Minister of Finance really appreciates that fact. Many times representatives of the industry have come to Ottawa to discuss taxation policy with the Minister of Finance and his officials, but unfortunately they were never able to establish as good a case of poverty during the prosperous war years as the mines were able to. As a result the officials of the Department of Finance have never given the problem the attention which it certainly merits.

I should also like to say to the minister that I hope forestry will not be relegated to a minor branch of some kind within a service under the new departmental set-up that is being inaugurated. I think forestry well merits the recognition of having a branch assigned to it in order that the chief forester of Canada may be able to make his reports direct to the minister rather than through another departmental head who is probably not familiar with the intricate problems involved in forestry. The bill certainly gives ample powers to the minister, and I hope that the forestry department will look around in Canada and try to accumulate a staff of first-class men, which I can assure him is very difficult to obtain.

I understand that within his department he has one economist working on the problems of forest economics. It is a study and field in which a great deal of pioneering can be done. I was particularly glad to learn from the minister that a man was employed in his department in that capacity. It is also most important that we have taxation studies. Timber is treated altogether differently from any other natural resource in Canada. Under the income tax set-up that has prevailed in the past, it has not been possible for a man to obtain capital gains without taxation if he should happen to own his own timber. The only way a man could make capital gains, if he owned timber over a long period of time, was to get out of the timber business, something that I am sure the minister will agree is most undesirable. In order to take capital gains and get the money that is necessary to replace the timber that he is cutting, it has been necessary for him to sell it inasmuch as that was the only way available to him to secure the capital gain.

There is another point that has never been recognized by the taxation department. I refer to the fact that in the timber business, entirely different from anything else, there is an uninsurable risk. There is the danger of fire to the capital timber which one owns, and also the danger of destruction by insects. I am quite sure that if the minister consults the taxation experts in the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue he will find that the timber people of this country have been given no consideration for that very definite expense which they must incur.

In this legislation we are giving the minister power to enter into agreements with the provinces. He can go to a province and say, "We are interested in your problems of fire and insect protection". I would not want to put this on a coercion basis, but if we are going to contribute to the cost of this work by the provinces I believe we should be consulted, let us say, as to their methods of taxation. Certainly there is no use in the timber people applying to the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue for some lightening of the taxation load, only to have the provincial governments come along and take up whatever slack or relief has been afforded. I believe the taxation of timber and saw mills in Canada should be done on the basis of consultation between the federal and provincial governments.

Men with a knowledge of forestry and its economics are very scarce in Canada. Most of them have received university training. The only way they can follow their profession is to accept employment with the large companies. Those large companies usually have their own policies, and to a certain degree they can dictate to the foresters what they shall say in regard to reforestation and other economic problems. It must be recognized, of course, that any company employing foresters must exercise reasonable control over them, to see that they do not speak their mind too bluntly on matters having to do with the provincial administration of forests. In discussing this problem with foresters all over the country it has occurred to me that very few of them are free agents. Many would like to get up and speak their minds, but sometimes it is not altogether in the interests of their employers that they should be quite so blunt or brutal as the situation may require. If within the federal forestry structure we could employ some of these really capable men, they would be able to give us first-class, unbiased advice. The federal government, of course, is not primarily interested in royalty revenue; to a great degree its revenue comes in the way of income tax, but I am sure foresters employed by the federal government could give us much better opinions on these problems than it is possible for us to get at the present time.

We often speak of reforestation. I believe one of the most effective ways of seeing that reforestation was carried out in Canada would be to amend the Criminal Code. It should be a criminal offence if, when a man logs a square mile of timber, he does not make arrangements to re-seed it with trees or follow other methods to ensure that a second crop of timber will grow there. I know that sounds like very harsh treatment, but my logging experience has led me to believe that the practices we have followed in the past have resulted in the many thousands of square miles of denuded timber limits we see right across this country.

As far as the utilization of forest products is concerned, I thought the hon. member for Kootenay West offered an excellent suggestion when he said one reason the small operators particularly cannot utilize all the timber products was because they lacked capital. I see we have now moved into the field of loaning large sums of money to the coal industry. I have no doubt that is a very worthy project, but I believe something also could be done for the timber industry. This might be something the forest economists in the minister's department would look into. At the present time a pulp mill which will utilize forest waste costs a minimum of $10 million. I would hope that the research branch of the department might explore the possibility of erecting some sort of small plant which would convert the final and complete pulp product, which I believe would be a wonderful contribution. If for the expenditure of $25,000 or $50,000 a process could be worked out which would enable the small operators to utilize the waste which at present they either throw into the water or burn, it would be a wonderful thing.

Another very important matter the research department might well look into is the removal of bark from trees. I was very interested the other day to learn that one of the minister's scientists had discovered a method of doing that, by injecting some liquid into a tree which would cause it to shed its bark within six months. That is a worth-while and useful project, and I would hope that further experiments might be carried out in that regard.

As far as conservation is concerned, I think we all agree that insect and fire control are of paramount importance in this field. So often, of course, people who are not familiar with timber matters assume that we should limit our cutting of mature forests. Personally I think that is a wrong policy. Economically I believe our mature timber in British Columbia, for instance, is perhaps worth more today than it ever will be again. I can see the vast possibilities that lie ahead in the field of metallurgy; and I think probably we should cut our mature timber as we require it. One fact often forgotten is that when a forest is mature it is no longer growing, in which case if you cut it and make sure another crop is planted you are certainly increasing the forest production of Canada.

In conclusion I should like to congratulate the minister on this bill, which gives him a great opportunity to do something really worth-while for Canada; and I am sure he will live up to the challenge.

Mr. Ferrie: I could speak on this matter for hours, I believe, but I am going to say only a few words. Pretty well half of my constituency is forest; and the great destroyer of our forests is fire. I suggest to the minister that just as soon as a fire is put out a bulldozer should move in and replanting should commence; otherwise grass grows and another tree comes up that does not belong there at all, so we do not have the forest we want. The idea is that we should replant as quickly as possible. The same thing would apply when some insect pest comes along and kills a great many of our trees. Let the bulldozer move in and push those trees out of the way. They are no use to anyone; they are simply firewood, and a nuisance. The best thing to do is go ahead and replant in such a way that our soil and water will be conserved. Nature has a wonderful way of doing things that man cannot match.

I want to tell the minister I am very pleased that he is coming in with this bill. It is something that is badly needed; the provinces cannot handle it, while the dominion can. We want reforestation, particularly in those lands that have been burnt over and are no good for anything else. The grass is growing there now, and that grass should be bulldozed off and the area replanted with trees.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Forest products laboratories.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister say what arrangements will be made to see to it that the information obtained as a result of this research is made available to all the people in the business, the big operators and the little ones, right down the line?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The government already, of course, is operating some forest products laboratories and the information is being as widely distributed as possible through the trade journals. Problems arise in the forest products industries, and these industries often apply to the laboratories asking to have some problem examined and some investigations made. Our laboratories undertake that work and do what they can to find a solution.

Several of the members have spoken about the need for research concerning the use of waste products. The laboratories have been doing that research. They have been finding uses for sawdust, for bark, and using tannin from the bark of the trees out on the Pacific coast, finding ways of preserving the stumps of logs so that fungus will not get in, and destroy probably a foot of the log. The research laboratories are doing a great deal of that work and they are passing out as much information as possible to the industries concerned.

Mr. Herridge: Has any work been done with respect to developing more efficient machinery for smaller mills and making investigations as to the type of machinery in use in some of the European countries?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): No. I do not think our research laboratories have been doing any work on producing machinery for smaller mills. I can make further inquiries and let my hon. friend know. But certainly I have not seen it myself, and I do not think that so far that has been attempted.

On section 6—Agreements with provinces.

Mr. Fleming: I am particularly concerned about subsection (c), under which the minister would derive power to—enter into agreements with any persons providing for economic studies of forest resources or forest industries, forest research and demonstrations and the operation of forest products laboratories.

There are some associations that have been doing a great public service; they are associations not of a public, but of a private nature, but they have nevertheless performed a useful public service and have contributed much in the way of educating the public to the value of our forest resources and the need for conserving them. I should like to ask the minister if such associations are to be regarded as coming within the scope of the expression "persons" in this clause, so that the minister would have power to enter into agreements with them, in that way taking more direct advantage of the work that such associations are doing and particularly of their educational work which could be assisted through the medium of such agreements. I hope the minister will be in a position to give assurance that such organizations are to be regarded as persons within the scope of this clause, and that it is his intention to enter into agreements with such associations just as far as possible.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): In this section "persons" would include associations, as my hon. friend suggests, and corporations; so that we can work out plans together with various individuals, organizations or corporations, in which joint efforts will be useful. For example, there is a case that I know of in which one individual had a large forest plantation that he had developed himself. We arranged to have the right to go in and do some cutting there and also to make measurements throughout this timbered area so that we would be able to make a record and keep track of the growth and development of that forest. That was done by agreement with an individual in that case. We have done it also with certain corporations, and it is planned to continue on that basis.

Mr. Fleming: I thank the minister for his answer. Is it contemplated that in such agreements the government may be contributing to educational campaigns to be carried on through such associations? The campaigns of course would be subject to the approval of the minister.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): That could be done. I think that probably the educational campaign would be worked out in conjunction with the provinces, as I feel that the greatest benefit could be derived by a joint campaign of the dominion and the provinces. But there is nothing to prevent an agreement being made with associations, such as the forestry associations, to expand the amount of publicity that is being given to this subject.

Mr. Knowles: I imagine there are many more square miles of forest area under provincial control than there are under federal control. It therefore becomes extremely important to the efficient implementation of this act that there be satisfactory agreements with the provinces so that the purposes of this act may be carried out. Can the minister tell us, from any advance discussions he may have had, what the chances are of a fairly universal set of agreements?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): In my opening remarks today I said that we had had a brief submitted by eight of the provinces—that was before Newfoundland became a province—suggesting that we should adopt a joint forest policy. Already I have even had feelers from some of the provinces suggesting that we start negotiations under the terms of this bill when the bill is passed.

Mr. Knowles: Good.

Mr. Fraser: In the suggestions from the provinces with regard to fire protection, has any definite plan been put forward? What I am getting at is this. If a fire broke out in Ontario, for instance, would the dominion government have its own equipment or would that all be provincial equipment?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): That would be arranged under agreement with the province so that a joint protective system can be worked out in each province.

Mr. Fraser: The minister means a joint program. The dominion government would not have any equipment at all? It would all be provincial?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I cannot say that until an agreement is entered into. That must be worked out with the provinces.

Mr. Fraser: It could be different in each province?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): It could be different; it might be the same in many of the provinces and different in some provinces, but that has to be worked out separately and we have not had any discussions with the provinces up to the present time as to the form of any agreement.

Mr. Fraser: What I am getting at is this. The dominion government is in better shape to supply a plane-carrying service for fire-fighting equipment. Having regard to the fires we had in Ontario and Quebec last year, I know that one of the difficulties was that of getting equipment in to those different spots. I think the dominion government could do a wonderful service in that regard if it had helicopters that could carry the equipment and drop it in a small space.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The hon. member for Kootenay West asked a question about saw mill equipment. I have just had a note sent to me from one of my officials stating that studies in saw mill equipment and technical work will be got under way in the coming spring. Preliminary investigative work leading up to this study has already been completed.

Mr. Herridge: I want to thank the minister for his answer. We shall get some interesting information from those studies. While I am on my feet I wish to mention my firm belief in the necessity of building up a national forest protection consciousness as a result of education in the schools. To illustrate, Mr. Chairman, in my own district of Kootenay West years ago before the children were taught these subjects in the schools, before they had lecturers from the Canadian forestry association coming around, there was little thought of the forests with respect to fire; there was little regard for reporting of fires caused by lightning. Today in the interior of British Columbia as soon as lightning causes a fire any child who is old enough to appreciate it, when he sees the fire, is so conscious of forestry protection that he will go to the nearest telephone or to a person's home and make every possible effort to notify the proper officials so that the department can take action.

As against that we have a large number of tourists who come from the United States cities and our own cities. It is amazing to notice the lack of forest protection consciousness among both the adults and children. They throw cigarettes around in the moss without any realization of the danger. In many instances fires are started in our district—in most instances as far as human agencies are concerned—by people who have lived in the cities and are out camping or fishing or enjoying themselves in the woods and who start fires because they do not understand the necessity for forest protection. I wish to emphasize the necessity of bringing that home particularly to the children who are brought up in the cities of this country by education on the need for forest protection.

On section 8—Expenditures.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister indicate the amount that is expected to be spent per year under this act? Can he also tell us what is anticipated by the last part of the section, which reads:

. . . or out of moneys received through donation, bequest or otherwise.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Mr. Chairman, I cannot say what money will be appropriated by parliament next year for the purpose of this legislation. I certainly hope we shall have a considerably larger amount voted than we have had in the past. The second part of the paragraph deals with moneys received through donations, bequests or otherwise, for the purposes of this act. It is hoped that if any bequests are made we shall be able to use that money for the benefit of forest protection.

Mr. MacInnis: Is there an amount in the estimates for forest conservation under this legislation this year?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): No, there is nothing in the present estimates for that beyond what we have been using for our own forest services.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 148, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures made and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1949, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I think the parliamentary assistant is most anxious to make a comprehensive statement on this matter and I should not like to deny him that privilege. We ought to give it to him now.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, so far as a comprehensive statement is concerned, I made a very comprehensive statement on November 4, when the resolution was presented to the house. At that time there was an extended debate which went far beyond the provisions of this bill, including, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will recall, even a discussion of railway pensions. At the moment I have nothing to add to what I said then.

This bill is a straight financial bill to implement the unanimous recommendation of the sessional committee on government-owned and operated railways which was made last spring. This bill actually provides for the financing of these capital expenditures. The second provision is for a revolving fund on which the railway can draw if current expenses should be greater than current revenue.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There are one or two questions I want to ask the parliamentary assistant. Will he explain one or two points with regard to the practice in these advances? We are aware that there are large government advances to the national lines on which they pay interest. I should also like to know just what the practice is with regard to the advances for capital expenditures and other purposes on the one side and advances for deficit purposes on the other.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps the hon. member will wait until we get into committee when we can have a better opportunity to answer questions.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Shall I repeat my question?

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member for Greenwood asked the interest rate charged by the government on these two different types of advances?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, that is not exactly my question. I asked whether the railway was required to pay interest on all advances, and I divided them into two, advances for capital expenditures and things other than deficits, and then the advances for the purpose of making up the deficit.

Mr. Sinclair: The interest rate on the advances for capital expenditures varies between one and two per cent according to the actual length of the loan. There is no interest charged on the advances for deficits or for current account.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not criticizing it at all. I am just interested in knowing what the reason is for that differentiation. Is it just because it is partly by guess and by God, as it were, that you do not want to load the railway up with interest on advances or deficits, and that you just pay them that amount year by year and forget them? Is that the reason, or is there some more scientific reason?

Mr. Sinclair: The great difference is, of course, that the advances on capital expenditures are made until such time as the market is judged right for floating a loan at advantageous rates, and sufficient sums are accumulated on which to float an issue. For example, the last issue was seventy million dollars floated at 2⅞ per cent. Obviously if the government did not charge some interest on that it would be to the railway's advantage to prolong indefinitely the floating of such a loan for capital expenditures, and so avoid the payment of interest. On the other hand advances, so far as deficits are concerned, are advances against a deficit which is eventually going to be paid by the people of Canada anyway. So there we would be just charging interest to ourselves.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Just as a matter of interest, and for the record, what is the amount on which interest is being paid at the present time? If the parliamentary assistant has not the figure available I shall not press for it, but perhaps he has the figure showing the net deficit since, let us say, 1932, when the revamping took place. I have here a statement showing the figures from 1936 to 1946. During that period there are several years when it was operating at a profit and others when it was operating at a loss. I shall not hold up the committee, if the parliamentary assistant has not the figure readily available. I can get it later.

Mr. Sinclair: Does the hon. member wish me to put on record the actual cash deficits each year?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Just the cumulative figure.

Mr. Sinclair: We have not the cumulative figure, but we have the figures for each year. They are also to be found in the report of the sessional committee this spring.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): For reasons with which we are all familiar, the national railways must take over branch lines from time to time. Is any adjustment made, or do they just have to take that and bear the burden, whatever it may be? Is there any attempt to make any sort of adjustment?

Mr. Sinclair: No. Once a branch line is taken over it becomes a part of the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways system.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not suppose any attempt is made—perhaps none could be made—to follow through after that time, so as to keep track of the results of that operation? I should imagine that would be almost an impossible accounting proposition.

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There is no attempt to keep it separate.

Mr. Sinclair: It is just part of the Canadian National Railways system.

Mr. Fraser: Are there any outstanding perpetual bonds at seven per cent or are they all taken up?

Mr. Sinclair: I understand there are no seven per cent bonds now. There are about $10 million of perpetual bonds.

Mr. Fraser: What is the rate of interest?

Mr. Sinclair: Four per cent and five per cent.

Sections 2 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—When revenue of Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries insufficient to meet operating and income charges.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, I believe the matter I wish to bring to the attention of the parliamentary assistant is relevant to this section, judging from the marginal note describing it. An evening newspaper contains the following Canadian Press dispatch:

> A federal court today ordered the civil aeronautics board to hold up action on the request of Trans-Canada Air Lines for a new route in the United States . . .
> The court's action might mean many months' delay in putting into effect a portion of the new civil aviation agreement signed last June 4 by Canada and the United States.

This agreement was signed some months ago. Under it Canada received certain rights from the United States and the United States received certain rights from Canada. Canada has implemented what she promised to do. Apparently however the United States has failed to implement her portion of the agreement. Naturally that is going to affect the revenue of Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Colonial Air Lines by means of a court action are trying to prevent Canada from reaping the benefits of the agreement we signed on June 4. Is the minister or the government prepared to take some action to see that the United States lives up to her part of the agreement? I understand from the newspaper report that the transport board may be summoning Colonial Air Lines to appear before it some time in the future. I hope that will be done, because if one side of an agreement is not kept I do not think the other side should be kept.

I suggest that not only should the contract of Colonial Air Lines be cancelled, but if the United States is not going to carry out her agreement we should cancel her rights at Gander. This is something which should be cleared up tonight before we go any further with this matter affecting Trans-Canada Air Lines.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Thatcher: No, I would like to have an answer.

Mr. Sinclair: As I said at the beginning, this is a purely financial bill implementing the recommendations of the sessional committee on government-owned railways which sat this spring and dealt with the budget of the Canadian National and Trans-Canada Air Lines. The hon. member's question might best be asked in that committee when he has before him the president of the Canadian National and of Trans-Canada Air Lines. It is not a question which the Minister of Finance or his assistant is competent to answer, or indeed should answer under this section.

Mr. Thatcher: If some action is not taken the deficit will be much greater. Is the government going to insist upon the United States carrying out its part of the agreement under the terms set out on June 4?

Mr. MacInnis: What could be a better time to deal with this matter than when we are discussing a bill which provides the money to carry out the operations of Trans-Canada Air Lines? Surely the parliamentary assistant is not serious when he says that the best time to open this discussion is on the estimates of Trans-Canada Air Lines. When will that be? Will it be next spring? The committee met last spring, but much business has taken place since that time.

Mr. Sinclair: I would repeat that this bill is founded on the budget of the C.N.R. and associated railways which was presented to the committee this spring and was unanimously approved. That alone is the purpose of the bill. When the hon. member for Moose Jaw attempts to discuss matters of actual operation and running rights in the United States I suggest he is far from the authority of the Department of Finance, so far as implementing the recommendations of the sessional committee on the C.N.R. budget is concerned.

Mr. Thatcher: I maintain this deficit will be larger if something is not done in this particular case. I am not criticizing this government; I am criticizing the government of the United States, because in failing to carry out the terms of the agreement they are trifling with the friendship of a friendly nation. I suggest the United States is acting like the nation which time and again they criticize, and I should like to see this government take some concrete action to cause something to be done in the present instance. We are being kicked around, and I do not like it.

EXCISE TAX ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 175, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Stamp tax on cheques, etc.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister tell us what revenue is derived from the stamps on cheques? For years postage stamps have been used and only a few revenue stamps are used by the banks and financial institutions. Is there any way to check this?

Mr. Sinclair: The only way would be to check the actual cheques which have been cancelled and see which ones had excise stamps on them and which ones had postage stamps.

Mr. Fraser: Apparently the Post Office Department is receiving considerable revenue which it should not have.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps it is, if you regard it as a separate concern, but it is all public revenue.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—When person deemed to have manufactured, or produced watch, etc.

Mr. Fleming: Sections 5 and 7 are related for the purposes of the matter I should like to raise, which has to do with the imposition of an excise tax on the assembly of watches, clocks and certain kinds of jewelry. If I am correctly informed, this has become the subject of litigation as well as having been agitated by correspondence with and representations to the government. I understand that this litigation is pending and I am concerned as to whether this legislation will not cut right across the issues involved in the pending litigation which directly concerns the government.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member has put his finger on an amendment which I propose to move a little later. It is quite true that a case involving sections 5 and 7 is now before the courts, but I would direct his attention to the fact that section 14 provides for the coming into force of sections 5 and 7. When that section is reached I propose to have a minister move an amendment which would change the present date of March 23, 1949, to November 10, the date when first reading was given to this bill. There would then be no retroactive effect which would have a bearing on the cases before the courts.

Mr. Fleming: May I express my complete gratification at that announcement.

Mr. Fraser: Has this amendment been made because hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of watch parts have been imported into Canada during the last few years?

Mr. Sinclair: This section is necessary because we are replacing the old retail purchase tax which was on the finished product. If we are going back to the manufacturing level we must define what is manufacturing. There is no doubt that a firm which does the whole job of making a case and the works is manufacturing a watch, but there was doubt whether a firm which assembles works and cases, whether they be imported or not, is a manufacturer. In order that there be no doubt it is provided in sections 5 and 7 that the assembly of these parts will be regarded as manufacturing.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Excise tax on wines.

Mr. Sinclair: I have an amendment to this section as follows:

That section 6 of Bill No. 175, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act be amended by striking out the last two words in subparagraph (a) and substituting therefor the words "absolute alcohol by volume." Similarly, that in subparagraph (b), the words "of absolute alcohol by volume" be inserted immediately after the words "seven per cent."

We wanted the definition to be the same as that in the Food and Drugs Act and that is why the amendment was moved.

Excise Tax Act

On section 12—Schedule III amended.

Mr. Wright: When this bill was in the resolution stage I moved an amendment suggesting that ice cream should be exempt from excise or sales tax. At that time the parliamentary assistant classed ice cream as a dessert and stated that it would be unfair to exempt it from tax when such things as jellies had to pay the excise or sales tax. Upon making inquiry I find that schedule III of the Excise Tax Act exempts the following, among other foodstuffs:

Bakers' cakes and pies including biscuits, cookies or other similar articles;
Flour including pastry, cake, biscuit and similar mixes;
Fruit, fresh, canned, frozen, dried or evaporated;
Jams, jellies, marmalades, and preserves;
Peanut butter.

If those things are not desserts then somebody has been fooling me for a long time. I submit that ice cream should be exempt. We are faced with surpluses of certain agricultural products for which we are anxious to obtain markets and one way in which surplus cream can be disposed of is in the manufacture of ice cream. I have certain figures which indicate the amount of cream going into ice cream production. The production of ice cream during the current year will require the equivalent of 450 million pounds of milk, whereas the annual average utilization of milk for this purpose during the period 1935-39 amounted to only 115 million pounds. To illustrate the importance of this trend, it might be pointed out that, on the basis of the 1935-39 per capita consumption of ice cream, this increase in utilization represents a milk equivalent of approximately 13 million pounds of butter or 26 million pounds of cheese. Under the circumstances it would appear logical to deduce that this development has made a substantial contribution to the diversion of milk away from products for which there is a contracting demand, thereby reducing the quantities of products which would otherwise be subject to the price support policy of the government.

During the past five or ten years there has been a tremendous increase in the amount of milk used for the production of ice cream, but this has reached a peak and levelled off. At the present time there is a slight reduction taking place in the use of milk for ice cream purposes. There is a surplus of cream and milk products in the country today for which the government will have to take some responsibility. We have some 73 million pounds of butter in cold storage, and 48 million to 50 million pounds of it are under the control of the government. We also have large quantities of powdered milk. There is a market in Canada for these surpluses, and we are discouraging the use of them by continuing to place a sales tax or excise tax on a food product. It is not a luxury; it is something which every kid uses every day.

Mr. Fraser: Young and old kids.

Mr. Wright: Young and old, as my friend says. It is a wholesome food product. Someone has just reminded me that the parliamentary assistant was responsible in some measure for bringing in a substitute for some of our good butterfat, thus creating the circumstances under which we are accumulating surpluses. Now he refuses to recognize ice cream as a wholesome food product. He claims it is a dessert, something that is in the same class as jello or some of these other things which have very little food value. I urge the parliamentary assistant to give consideration to the placing of ice cream on the free list so far as sales tax or excise taxes are concerned. It is something which the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has asked for; it is something which the cream producers of Canada have asked for; and it is something to which this government, if it believes in encouraging the production of wholesome dairy products, should give consideration.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member for Melfort does not quite recall the substance of my argument. My argument was not that ice cream was a dessert so much as the fact that the bulk of ice cream is used as a confection. The figures I have from the national dairy council show that 40 per cent of all the ice cream sold is in the form of cones. Another substantial percentage is sold in the form of sundaes and all these other confections which may be purchased at soda fountains. There is a further use of ice cream, but at the present time it is the smallest one, its use in the home as a dessert. I pointed out at that time that many desserts are still subject to sales tax, and those are articles which are used entirely as desserts and not as a confection. It is for these reasons that the sales tax on ice cream has been continued. So far as the amount is concerned, it has been calculated that the actual sales tax paid on an ice cream cone is one-sixth of a cent.

Mr. Charlton: If that be the case, it should be easy enough to arrange to take the tax off bricks of ice cream and let it remain on bulk.

Mr. Sinclair: That would get back to the very difficult problem of having the retailer sort out what part of his sales are in that form and tax free and what part are over the counter and taxable. That is exactly what I tried to explain to the house we are now seeking to do in this new sales and excise tax structure, to have four easily recognizable groups all levied at the manufacturer's level in order to avoid the difficulty of collecting the tax at the retail level, and also the annoyance and inconvenience to the retailer himself.

Mr. Wright: I have listened to the statement that the tax is only one-sixth of a cent on a cone. One-sixth of a cent is not very much, but one-sixth of a cent means a lot to the people who are selling ice cream. If they have to absorb the one-sixth of a cent, and are not making a profit in the sale of ice cream cones, they are going to push some other article instead of ice cream. That is what is happening. The margin has become so narrow for the people who are handling ice cream that they are substituting and pushing some other article. The result is that sales of ice cream are tapering off. We are losing a market for a valuable dairy product, and in another department of the government they are stepping in and paying a subsidy. Where the government is supporting the prices of dairy products, it seems to me it would be only good business for them to remove the sales tax on these products in order to provide a better market for them. That would be just sound business.

Mr. Sinclair: I could not follow one part of the hon. member's argument. Did I understand him to say that milk sales, that is, all milk, butter, cheese and ice cream, are four times what they were in 1939?

Mr. Wright: No. The amount of milk used in the production of ice cream in Canada is four times what it was in the 1935-39 period. That was the amount used last year in the making of ice cream, but it is now tapering off.

Mr. Sinclair: I would think that was a pretty powerful argument to show that the tax on ice cream has not hindered the production and the sale. I think any other industry would have welcomed a 400 per cent increase in sales of their product over the same period.

Section 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Coming into force.

Mr. Sinclair: This is the section on which the minister will move the amendment about which I spoke in answering the hon. member for Eglinton. The amendment is as follows:

That subclause (2) of clause 14 of bill 175 be amended by striking out the words "second day of May", and substituting therefor the words "tenth day of November."

That is the date when this change first became public knowledge by reason of the first reading of the bill.

Mr. Howe: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On schedule I.

Mr. Sinclair: There is one small amendment to the schedule reading:

That schedule I to the said act be amended by deleting the proviso to section 4.

Mr. Howe: I so move.

Mr. Sinclair: We are deleting the proviso to section 4 which imposes a minimum tax of ten cents on each of these lighters. That was a part of the old act when there was a 25 per cent retail tax. With the tax now reduced to 10 per cent this ten cent minimum becomes quite an impost, so that provision at the end of section 4 of schedule I is to be removed by this amendment.

Mr. Fulton: What is the reason for that?

Mr. Sinclair: The old act had a 25 per cent retail tax plus the provision that no tax should be less than ten cents. Now with the greatly lower rate of tax, 10 per cent at the manufacturer's level, there are obviously many lighters whose price at the manufacturer's level will be less than a dollar, so the ten cent minimum means a much higher rate than ten per cent and so it would become a pretty heavy impost. Therefore we are removing it completely so that there is no longer any minimum.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Fraser: As to section 7 of schedule I, coin, disc or token operated slot machines and vending machines, etc., should those not be separated? The 10 per cent is all right for those that are used as vending machines, but as to the ones which are used as games of chance—I believe in some municipalities they are barred entirely—I think the government would be wise to put the tax on a little higher level.

Mr. Sinclair: As I explained before, this is a matter of getting all our excise taxes down to one level, 10 per cent. It would not be helpful to take one out. I might point out there is one exception under section 3, toilet soaps. Before this budget the tax was 5 per cent, and with all the present reduction it was not thought appropriate to raise the tax on just one item. That is the one exception, but so far as coin operated machines are concerned they are a part of the general lowering of the 25 per cent rate down to a 10 per cent rate. If, as the hon. member says, various municipalities regard these machines as undesirable I presume they have the right to ban them. As far as this act is concerned, however, inclusion of the machines in this 10 per cent rate is part of the whole excise tax structure, which is now 10 per cent.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO LOANS, EXPENDITURES, ETC.

Hon. J. J. McCann (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 210, to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Proceedings in name of bank.

Mr. Drew: Is the parliamentary assistant not going to make a statement in regard to this matter?

Mr. Belzile: As everyone knows, Mr. Chairman, the Industrial Development Bank was incorporated by an act of the Senate and House of Commons in August, 1944. The purpose of this institution, in brief, was to extend financial assistance to small and medium sized industrial enterprises in Canada which might reasonably be expected to prove successful, but which because of their size or other special factors were unable to obtain necessary financing from other lenders on reasonable terms and conditions.

The bank was set up as a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada. Directors of the Bank of Canada are directors of the Industrial Development Bank. The governor of the Bank of Canada is president of the Industrial Development Bank. The share capital of the bank was fixed at $25 million, all subscribed by the Bank of Canada. The Industrial Development Bank may also issue debentures, not guaranteed by the government, up to a maximum of three times its capital and reserve, but no such securities have yet been issued.

At this point, a brief review of the bank's operations during the five years of its existence may be of some interest. In the period up to the end of the Industrial Development Bank's fiscal year on September 30, 1949, the bank had dealt with 1,960 applications for financial assistance. Of these, 613 were withdrawn by the applicants because they had obtained financing elsewhere or for other reasons, and 657 were refused by the bank as unjustifiable risks. The number of applications authorized was 690, for a total amount of $46,341,210. Of these credits a total of 437 were still on the books of the bank at September 30, 1949, for a total in current authorized credits of $32,154,946, of which $23,573,729 was actually outstanding at that date.

Of the credits which have been granted by the bank during its five years of operations, 120 had already been repaid in full, involving a total sum of $7,102,613. Including repayments on account, the bank had already been repaid $11,737,746 out of total disbursements amounting to $35,311,475 during this period.

As the annual reports made by the bank to the Minister of Finance show, the bank's loans and investments have been distributed geographically fairly well in the same pattern as total industrial development in Canada.

The last published annual report, as at September 30, 1948, shows that the bank had met its operating expenses out of its income in the four years of operations up to that date and in addition had built up a reserve for losses of $300,000 and a reserve fund of $783,612. Actual bad debts on loans and investments had been very small, amounting to only $34,340 up to that date. The annual report for the bank's fiscal year ending September 30, 1949, together with its audited statements, will not be available until about December 10 next, but it is understood that this good record has been maintained.

As mentioned earlier, the Industrial Development Bank's facilities were expected to be sought mainly by small and medium sized industrial enterprises. To ensure that the major part of the bank's resources would be available for the smaller undertakings, subsection (2) of section 15 of the act of incorporation was included. This subsection had the effect of limiting to $15 million the aggregate amount of financial assistance which the bank could extend in amounts exceeding $200,000 for any one enterprise.

Since 1944, there has been a very considerable increase in the costs involved in projects for industrial capital investment, which is the typical purpose for which Industrial Development Bank credits are made. In consequence, a project which on the basis of 1944 costs would have involved financing from the Industrial Development Bank of less than $200,000 may, under existing conditions, involve substantially more and therefore come within the limitations of subsection (2) of section 15 of the act.

At September 30, 1949, of the $32,154,946 in current authorized credits on the books of the bank, $19,519,801 was in individual credits for amounts not exceeding $200,000 and $12,635,145 was in credits for amounts in excess of $200,000. Partial repayments on account had reduced the amount of net authorizations over $200,000 to $11,227,888. This type of application is one with which the bank continues to be asked to deal, and would fairly soon result in the $15 million limitation preventing the bank authorizing credits of over $200,000 to industrial concerns which met all the other requirements of the bank and did not have access to reasonable credit facilities elsewhere.

The proposed amendment to subsection (2) of section 15 will relieve this situation by increasing the limitation on credits exceeding $200,000 from $15 million to $25 million. At the same time it is obvious that in view of the fact that the act enables the bank to provide financial assistance up to a total of at least $100 million, an increase from $15 million to $25 million in the limit on loans over $200,000 will not interfere with the granting of smaller credits, since $75 million would be earmarked for that field in comparison with current authorizations of $19,519,801 at September 30, 1949.

It is also recommended that several other minor amendments be made at this time.

One amendment will make it clear that while the bank is an agent of the crown, nevertheless actions may be taken by or against the bank in its own name rather than by proceedings instituted in the name of the Attorney General of Canada or by petition of right against the crown.

Another amendment will permit the bank to make credit available if the board of directors of the bank is satisfied that the applicant is about to undertake an enterprise which is "an industrial enterprise", as defined by the act. Under the present legislation the determination as to whether a particular enterprise is an industrial enterprise would in the final analysis have to be determined by the courts.

Another amendment is to permit the bank to make a loan where money has been invested by some other person in the enterprise so long as the board is satisfied that the amount invested by others affords reasonable protection to the bank. This amendment broadens to some extent the concept of the investment to be considered as junior to the bank's investment.

Another amendment is to clarify the application of one section of the bill concerning the program in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Fleming: I am not quite clear, Mr. Chairman, whether you called section 2.

The Deputy Chairman: We are now on section 1.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): If I understood the parliamentary assistant to the minister correctly, this is a five-year operation. Is that correct?

Mr. Belzile: Yes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): And the bank has made 690 loans?

Mr. Belzile: Yes, 690.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That would be one loan every two days of its existence, or less than that. Is that right?

Mr. Belzile: Less than that.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What staff has this bank?

Mr. Belzile: At September 30, 1948, there were 92 employees; 48 were men and 44 were women. The staff comprises experienced bankers, industrial engineers, lawyers, chartered accountants, insurance men, and the ordinary clerical help.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): We have 90 employees of this bank engaged in making one loan every two days? I made it quite low. Every couple of days these 90 employees are able to make a loan. That is the net situation, is it not? Is that correct?

Mr. Belzile: That is correct.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): It is merely a matter of simple mathematics. Now I gather that you want to increase the loaning facilities. Do you intend to increase the staff? If one applies simple mathematics, one will see that you are going to have more people than you have loans, before you are through, without any trouble at all. Is that not correct?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No.

Mr. Belzile: I do not think it will be necessary to increase the staff; but I wish to add that the kind of business that the bank carries on involved the employment of a rather large staff. Every risk of the bank is verified by meeting the prospective borrower at his place of business.

Mr. Drew: They are screened, are they?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): All right. How much money does it cost, in expenses, to loan $1,000?

Mr. Belzile: I shall have to look it up for 1948.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I doubt if these questions are in order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, yes.

Mr. Knowles: They are quite in order.

The Deputy Chairman: We are now on section 1 which amends the act by adding thereto the following subsection:

(3) Actions, suits and other legal proceedings in respect of any right or obligation acquired or incurred by the bank may be brought or taken by or against the bank in the name of the bank in the same manner as if the right or obligation had been acquired or incurred on its own behalf.

Mr. Green: This is general discussion.

The Deputy Chairman: I note that the hon. member for Calgary West wishes to have some information, and I will not put any limitation on his questions. I would merely hope that he would confine his remarks to the section under discussion.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): May I immediately suggest, Mr. Chairman, that your slightest hope is my command. As a matter of fact, all I was doing was answering the explanatory statement made by the parliamentary assistant to the minister. It strikes me that when we are loaning money, it is a matter of some importance to know how much it costs us. Make it $100,000. Then when you have done that, in order that you may have the assistance of your co-parliamentary assistant—he may look this up—I should like to know what proportion of the loans of this bank have been made west of lake Superior.

Mr. Belzile: Answering the last question first, I wish to state that in 1948, 25 per cent of the loans were made in British Columbia and 8·5 per cent in the prairie provinces.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is, the three of them?

Mr. Belzile: Yes. Ontario got 27·7 per cent; Quebec, 34·1 per cent; and the maritimes, 5·3 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: Are those percentages as to the number of loans or as to volume?

Mr. Belzile: As to volume; total gross of authorized loans.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Then will the parliamentary assistant to the minister tell me how many loans of this $200,000 type were made west of the great lakes?

Mr. Belzile: Altogether there have been 21 loans over the $200,000 limit.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): How many were made in the province of Alberta?

Mr. Belzile: I have not that information.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Could you make a fairly intelligent prophecy or guess?

Mr. Belzile: I cannot guess that.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Forgive me, Mr. Chairman, but not yet. As I understand the explanation just given, you intend to increase the amount of capital which you may loan and which remains I think—if my hearing is correct—at four times the amount of capital of the bank and reserves. Am I correct so far?

Mr. Belzile: That is right.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Then where is the bulk of this money going? Do you anticipate that the percentages you have given me will probably continue?

Mr. Belzile: Probably.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): All right. Then we will suppose that a man living in the city of Calgary borrows some money. We are not good borrowers out there; but let us take the richest man I know. He might be able to borrow $20,000. Will the parliamentary assistant tell me how much it costs the Dominion of Canada to loan him $20,000?

Mr. Belzile: Last year the bank loaned a total of $17,535,918.49.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Let us take it as $18 million in round figures.

Mr. Belzile: $18 million.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What were the general expenses?

Mr. Belzile: General travelling expenses amount to $10,000. I will give the figures in thousands. Rental and other costs, $30,000; depreciation on office equipment, $4,000; telephones and telegrams, $8,000; office supplies, $12,000; directors' fees, $3,000; auditors' fees, $6,000; other operating expenses, $9,000; pension fund and unemployment insurance, $33,000; and salaries, $265,000.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What is the total?

Mr. Belzile: The total is $398,000.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): It took $400,000 in round figures to lend $18 million. The interest payments on these loans are how much?

Mr. Belzile: Five per cent.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Have you ever figured out how you are doing?

Mr. Belzile: We are making money. Last year the profit before deducting appropriations was $994,000.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You are charging nothing for the money you borrowed. You borrowed it at what price?

Mr. Belzile: The money was subscribed by the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I realize that, but how much did it cost you? How much did the money cost you which you lent? In other words, you are losing money, are you not?

Mr. Belzile: The government is borrowing at 2·5 per cent, 2·75 per cent actually, and on treasury notes they are paying 75 cents on a hundred dollars.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What is the length of time of these treasury notes as compared with the time of the loans you are making? You cannot make a comparison of rates of return unless you make comparisons of the time that the loans are made or that the borrowings on behalf of the bank are made? I am merely trying to find out how you made out. I hope you did well; I do not think you did.

Mr. Belzile: It is a very risky business, because we are doing business in a rather marginal field, whereas the other banks go in for long terms of four, five, six or seven years. The ordinary investment houses would not contemplate the possibility of issuing debentures for that rather short term.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The parliamentary assistant refers to banks making loans for four, five, six or seven years. That is one of the things that chartered banks cannot do. You cannot go into a chartered bank and get any substantial loan from that bank except on the stock on your shelves or something of that kind. In Canada you cannot borrow from a chartered bank on the real estate that your company owns. Let us take one of these major companies such as the Minister of Fisheries owns who sits behind the parliamentary assistant. He cannot borrow money from a bank on the real estate that he owns. That is one of the things that a bank cannot do. The only way that a person in industry can borrow money from a bank is under section 88.

Mr. Belzile: Yes, but they are not short-term loans.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Why is the parliamentary assistant talking about four, five, six or eight years that the chartered banks make loans for? They cannot do that unless they are breaking the law. There is no doubt about that. Does the parliamentary assistant not think that that is a complete answer to the statement he made a moment ago when he was talking about marginal loans and had to do something different from what a bank does and said that they made loans of money on four, five, six or eight years credit. They cannot do that.

Mr. Belzile: I did not say that. I said that the banks would not touch such risky money.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): At 5 per cent. I am borrowing money on my insurance policies at 4 per cent.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): With great respect, Mr. Chairman, I should like to know—

The Deputy Chairman: With great respect, if I may—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Then it is mutual.

The Deputy Chairman: I hope it is. It certainly is as far as I am concerned. I should like to point out to the hon. member that if he will read the marginal note he will see that clause 1 deals with proceedings in the name of the bank. The hon. member has been asking questions which would be more appropriately asked on clause 2 which deals with loans, investments and guarantees. I have given him some latitude but I want to make it clear that some other hon. members may think that we are on clause 2. I maintain that we are on clause 1. If the hon. member wishes to question the parliamentary assistant further perhaps he will wait until clause 1 is carried, unless he wants to ask some questions dealing with proceedings in the name of the bank.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, I agree with you and bow accordingly, if that is the word we use. If the questions I asked on clause 1 cover clause 2 then we shall not lose any ground when we get to clause 2 because we shall finish with it that much more quickly.

I want to make it clear, sir, that while I bow to your ruling I was merely asking questions that arose out of and were in reply to the statement made by the parliamentary assistant. In view of the fact that you are one person that I do not wish to get into difficulty with I shall wait until clause 2 is called and then I shall do it all over again.

Mr. Knowles: Has there been any occasion in the experience of the bank that has made clause 1 necessary?

Mr. Belzile: When the bank has had to take legal action it has been a matter of concern to lawyers as to whether the action should be taken in the name of His Majesty in the right of the crown or in the name of the bank. In fact, action is always taken in the name of the bank but with some apprehension that the defendant might successfully plead that the action should have been taken in the name of His Majesty. To remove doubt on this point and to enable the bank to sue in its own name it is proposed that subsection 3 be amended in such a way that the Industrial Development Bank can sue in its own personal name.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Loans, investments and guarantees.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Now that we are on clause 2, sir, I am going to assume that you heard me when I was out of order on clause 1. I am not going to repeat what I said. The point I am trying to make is that I do not think you are making very much money. Some people think that you are losing money, but I have nothing to do with that. I am quite unable to add, and when I come to multiplication I am just floored. There is no doubt about that. I know what 8 per cent is, and I know what 5 per cent is. I know what you are paying. Would it not be infinitely simpler, and would it not save the taxpayers of Canada a great deal of money, if they gave our present banking authorities the right to make the loans that we are making, thereby saving ourselves a tremendous amount of money in administration costs? That is a fair question, and I wish the parliamentary assistant would answer it.

Mr. Belzile: Actually the report of the bank shows that a clear profit of $95,000 in round figures was made on its operations last year.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): There is nothing in that to show what they paid for their money.

Mr. Belzile: The aim of the bank is not to make money, but to help industrial enterprises or firms which could not otherwise obtain money.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): As a matter of fact the chartered bank is in the same position.

Mr. Belzile: The chartered bank will not provide credit for capital expenditures. They will not lend money to build a plant or to buy equipment and machinery.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is the difference between Canadian and American banks. I know that. Don't teach me the ABC's of this business. They can do that. Would it not be better—and please forgive me for speaking loudly—would it not be much better and would we not save ourselves a great deal of money if, with a small committee and using the chartered banks, we backed the enterprises now being backed by the so-called industrial bank?

The moment that anyone in the House of Commons suggests that you might save a little money in staff, then, from the Prime Minister down, from the other side of the house they say that we are attacking the civil service. Let them say it. I am attacking them, if necessary—if by dispensing with this new thing, which is only five years old, we can have this done for nothing by other banks who will simply reap the interest charges which they were established for, and thus save ourselves a great deal of money.

I hope I am not being facetious. All I am trying to ask is this: Is there not here an excellent opportunity to save expense? If you run a chartered bank or a corporation or something of that kind you pay out to staff only what you think is necessary for the operation of the business. If one department of that business can be operated by another department—and you may think I am hard-hearted in suggesting this—they run the thing as efficiently as they can. I do not think anyone who accuses me or anyone else of being opposed to the civil service would back that opinion by saying we are wasting our money.

Is it not true that it could be done much more simply and at much less expense? All you need to do is pass on these loans, back them and save all the administrative costs we are now spending.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Even if I did not receive an answer—and I think I was entitled to one—I have nothing more to say.

Mr. Belzile: The answer is that this is government policy.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Oh boy, that's one for the book.

Mr. Fleming: There is a feature in connection with the new section 2 which I should like to discuss. By subsection (2) it is proposed to increase from $15 million to $25 million the aggregate of the amounts of the loans or liabilities of the bank, and of the expenditures by the bank for securities held by it.

The law at the present time contains an absolute prohibition in respect of this aggregate. It is to be found in section 15 (2) in these words:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in subsection 1 of this section, the aggregate of the amounts of the loans or liabilities of the bank, and of the expenditures by the bank for securities held by it specified in the next succeeding subsection shall not at any time exceed fifteen million dollars.

The annual statement of the Industrial Development Bank indicates that the amount outstanding by way of loans, investments and guarantees as of September 30, 1948, was $20,616,443. The statement of the bank as of September 30, 1949, appearing at page 4430 of the Canada Gazette for November 12 shows the amount outstanding by way of loans, investments and guarantees to be $23,605,030.

It will be noticed that I have not said anything about current authorizations. I am taking the figures of the amount outstanding. We are not talking about the capital of the bank. The capital of the bank is $25 million. That has not anything to do with this question, nor has the fact that the amount authorized is in a sense a revolving fund, because money has been coming in by way of repayment of loans.

The fact of the matter is that the statute at the present time contains an absolute prohibition upon any operation of the bank whereby the aggregate of the amount of the loans and liabilities of the bank and of the expenditures by the bank for securities held by it under section 15 (3) shall exceed $15 million. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant could help us in that.

Mr. Belzile: On September 30, 1949, the end of the fiscal year, $12,635,145 was in credit for amounts in excess of $200,000.

Mr. Fleming: What was the total amount outstanding? What I am getting at is the figure that corresponds to the language of section 15 (2). In other words I want the aggregate of the amount of the loans or liabilities of the bank and of the expenditures by the bank for securities held by it.

Mr. Belzile: That is $12,635,145.

Mr. Fleming: I have difficulty in relating that figure to the published figures of amounts outstanding, because while the statements issued by the bank may not be intended to be related specifically to the aggregate of the amounts of the loans or liabilities and of expenditures of the bank for securities, nevertheless the bank statement does indicate quite clearly that the amount outstanding includes loans, investments and guarantees. That figure is shown at September, 1948, as $20,616,443, and at September 30, 1949, a year later, as $23,605,030.

Mr. Knowles: If I might presume to help out the parliamentary assistant, it seems to me that the answer to the hon. member for Eglinton is that subsection (2) of section 15, which he read, applies a ceiling of $15 million only upon the loans to be made under the next succeeding section.

Mr. Belzile: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: The next succeeding subsection, which is subsection (3), is the subsection under which loans of amounts over $200,000 are made. The over-all ceiling on loans to be made under the act is set out in section 14, which says that the aggregate of the total direct liability of the bank, and so on, and so on, shall not exceed three times the aggregate amount of the paid-up capital and the reserve fund.

In other words, if the bank has $25 million capital, its total loans could be $75 million; but the loans of $200,000 and up cannot exceed $15 million.

Mr. Belzile: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: Now, may I ask a question. When the parliamentary assistant was discussing this phase of the matter earlier—and I think some on this side of the house joined in the suggestion—reference was made to the ceiling being four times the amount of the capital. Section 14 of the act reads:

> The aggregate of the total direct liabilities of the bank, including bonds and debentures issued by the bank, and of the total contingent liabilities of the bank in the form of guarantees given or underwriting agreements entered into by it, shall not at any time exceed three times the aggregate amount of the paid-up capital and the reserve fund, for which provision is made hereinafter.

When the parliamentary assistant was speaking earlier tonight he referred to an aggregate total of $100 million and explained that was four times the $25 million, whereas it seems to me it should be only three times the $25 million. In other words, the ceiling is $75 million unless there is something else in there.

Mr. Belzile: That reference was to another section of the act under which the bank is authorized to borrow up to three times its capital.

Mr. Knowles: It adds that to the original $25 million and that is where you get the $100 million.

Mr. Belzile: Yes.

Mr. Green: How much has been lent in loans under $200,000? I understand the total loans of $200,000 and over was about $12 million.

Mr. Belzile: The total of loans of $200,000 and less is $19,519,801.

Mr. Green: Apparently one of the purposes of this bill is to increase the amount that can be lent in loans of $200,000 and over.

Mr. Belzile: Yes. There is no change in the provisions affecting loans of $200,000 and under.

Mr. Green: Will that not mean that there will be that much less available for the smaller loans?

Mr. Belzile: No.

Mr. Green: There is a ceiling of $75 million for loans of all sizes.

Mr. Knowles: It is $100 million now.

Mr. Green: If the ceiling for loans of $200,000 and over is raised from $15 million to $25 million will that not mean that the amount available for the smaller loans will be reduced by $10 million?

Mr. Belzile: There will be no change in the discretion of the bank to make loans of less than $200,000 because the money is available now out of profits, reserves and capital funds.

Mr. Green: The money is available for the smaller loans?

Mr. Belzile: Yes.

Mr. Green: My point is that the total that could be let out in the way of small loans would be reduced by $10 million?

Mr. Belzile: The aim of this amendment is to make money available for the larger loans.

Mr. Green: Why is it desired to make more of these larger loans? All these loans are riskier than the ordinary bank loan. As I understand the practice, the only loans made by the Industrial Development Bank are those which the commercial banks cannot or will not make. The applicant for a loan is first interviewed by his bank and then is referred to the Industrial Development Bank. The larger the loan the more chance there is of there being a larger loss. The original act was intended to help the small man, and I refer the parliamentary assistant to the recital which reads:

> Whereas it is desirable to establish an industrial development bank to promote the economic welfare of Canada by increasing the effectiveness of monetary action through ensuring the availability of credit to industrial enterprises which may reasonably be expected to prove successful if a high level of national income and employment is maintained, by supplementing the activities of other lenders and by providing capital assistance to industry with particular consideration to the financing problems of small enterprises:

It seems strange that we are now being asked to provide $10 million more for large loans which will reduce the aggregate available for small loans. I think hon. members who were here in 1944 when the original act was passed will agree that it was intended to help get industry on its feet after the war, particularly to help to get the small man established. It was never intended to be a permanent lending institution down through the years. But by this bill we are expanding the business in large loans, and restricting the possibility of making the smaller loans. Why is that being done? Is there a greater demand for loans of over $200,000? Why is the bank asking for this particular power which seems to be contrary to the intent of the act as originally passed?

Mr. Belzile: The bank caters particularly to the small-sized industrial enterprises. The individual or company which needs $200,000 for plant expansion is not a particularly large business. A small lumber mill worth $200,000 may want to expand by another $200,000. When it buys a few planing machines and a band saw it will have used up the $200,000 right there. There has been a considerable increase in capital cost since 1944. It has been found that a prospective borrower who could expand his plant for $150,000 in 1944 or 1945 will now need $200,000 or $225,000 to buy the same machinery. That is why the bank is asking an increase in the limits imposed by the original act.

Mr. Green: It is now being provided that the bank may lend to an individual or company where somebody else has invested money in the enterprise. Under the original act a loan could be made only to a man who was putting in his own money or to a company which had sold its shares to an individual. In other words, the original idea was to help the man or company who had put his or their own money into an undertaking. We are now going a step further and giving power to lend where an investment has been made by others, where there is other money in the business. The Industrial Development Bank will simply be one creditor among one or more other creditors. Why is it necessary to branch out into that type of loan? It will not be as good a loan and I was wondering why the bank wants to branch out in that way. There is one other point which I will raise after the parliamentary assistant answers.

Mr. Belzile: No, I do not interpret clause 2 in the same way as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. By "person" I imagine he refers now to section 15, subsection 1, paragraph (c)—

Mr. Green: That is right.

Mr. Belzile: —which reads:

> The amount invested or to be invested in the industrial enterprise by persons other than the bank . . .

The money invested by the owners, being persons other than the bank—

Mr. Green: No, that is not it. That is the way the act read originally, and of course no one can quarrel with the original terminology. Here is the explanation given in the explanatory note:

It also permits the bank to make a loan where money has been invested by some other person in the enterprise so long as the board is satisfied that the amount invested by others affords reasonable protection to the bank.

The wording of the new clause (c) is "by persons other than the bank", which means that you can have a second or third creditor. The parliamentary assistant said that in his statement explaining the bill. He also said that the Industrial Development Bank was to get priority over other creditors. I should like to have an explanation as to just what the situation is. I do not understand why the bank should ask for this wider power.

Mr. Belzile: Of course the bank lends money only on first security to the owners of the enterprise. Section 16 of the original act stipulates that:

The bank may take, accept or acquire and may hold collateral security of any kind and in any form for the repayment of any loan, made or guaranteed by it under this act, and without limiting the generality of the foregoing—

The bank may take stock, bonds, debentures, warehouse receipts and bills of lading, goods, wares and merchandise, mortgages or hypothecs. You have to be the owner of these rights if you want to transfer them as collateral security to the bank.

Mr. Green: That does not deal with the case of a second creditor. If the bank is to have the right to loan, where there are other people who have loaned money to the business, then at least there should be a provision written in the clause that the Industrial Development Bank will get priority over these other creditors.

Mr. Belzile: The hon. member has read the explanatory note, but I think it should be read in conjunction with paragraph (c). The explanatory note reads:

It also permits the bank to make a loan where money has been invested by some other person—

That is as stipulated in subsection (c), "other than the bank".

Mr. Green: That is not right.

Mr. Belzile: And so long as the bank is satisfied that the amount invested by others than the bank affords reasonable protection to the bank.

Mr. Green: I am very much concerned about this because I am quite sure the parliamentary assistant is not interpreting the amendment correctly. The explanatory note says:

The amendment permits the bank to make credit available if the board is satisfied that the applicant is about to undertake an enterprise and that the enterprise is an industrial enterprise.

That was the effect of the old provision.

It also permits the bank to make a loan where money has been invested by some other person in the enterprise so long as the board is satisfied that the amount invested by others affords reasonable protection to the bank.

The wording of the new section is clearly for that specific purpose. The proposed amendment to section 15 reads, "where in the opinion of the board", and then it sets out certain things. A person must be engaged in an industrial enterprise, credit is not otherwise available, and then paragraph (c) reads:

The amount invested or to be invested in the industrial enterprise by persons other than the bank . . .

They make it broad so that it covers both the man who is in the business and anyone who is lending him money in addition to the Industrial Development Bank. Paragraph (c) goes on to read:

—and the character of that investment are such as to afford the bank reasonable protection.

There may be some good reason why the bank wants that additional power, but why is it trying to make these loans where there are other creditors?

Mr. Howe: I have had some little experience with these loans. I think it covers the case where a man, a returned soldier we will say, has undertaken to start a small business, has borrowed from his father and his relatives and obtained a sum which he thought was sufficient. It later develops it is not sufficient and he goes to the Industrial Development Bank and asks for help. His business is already mortgaged to his friends, and under the old act the bank could not function. I think this simply gives the bank freedom to take security in that kind of situation.

Mr. Green: Would the bank get prior security?

Mr. Howe: I think so. Of course it would be a matter for the bank to arrange, but generally speaking in a situation of that kind, as my hon. friend knows, the last man in gets the preferred position.

Mr. Wright: I have one question I wish to ask the parliamentary assistant. In the original section 2 of the act the definition of "industrial enterprise" is as follows:

"Industrial enterprise" means a business in which the manufacture, processing or refrigeration of goods, wares and merchandise or the building, alteration or repair of ships or vessels or the generating or distributing of electricity is carried on.

Can a co-operative qualify as an industrial enterprise for the purpose of carrying on these various businesses, and if they can how many loans have been made to co-operatives for this purpose?

Mr. Belzile: I think a co-operative can obtain a loan if it is an industrial enterprise according to the definition.

Mr. Fleming: And incorporated; it would have to be incorporated.

Mr. Belzile: It has to have some kind of incorporation or registration.

Mr. Wright: Is there a branch of this bank in the three prairie provinces?

Mr. Belzile: Yes, there is a branch in Winnipeg.

Mr. McLure: I think it is my turn now.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. As the hon. member knows, the Chair must see members of various parties.

Mr. McLure: You saw me before sufficiently to make me sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I saw the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. Then I proceeded to see the hon. member for Melfort who rose before you. Now I proceed to give the floor to the senior member for Halifax.

Mr. Isnor: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief. If the hon. member for Queens will be patient, I will not keep him waiting very long. I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant about the definition of "industrial enterprise". In order to make it a little clearer, I have in mind an operator of fishing vessels which fish in the far north. They are manned by sailors from Newfoundland and the other maritime provinces, and because of the sealing industry they produce oil. To our way of thinking the production of this oil is an industry, but up to the present time there has not been a clear-cut interpretation, so those who would like to borrow money either for the purchase of fishing boats or for the overhauling of machinery have not been able to do so. I feel there should be a clearer interpretation of the term "industrial enterprise" than we have had up to the present. While I am on my feet may I add that because we do not have a representative closer to the maritimes than Montreal it is rather difficult to get the interpretations that we would sometimes like to have.

Mr. Belzile: I am informed that fishing enterprises of the kind which have been described by the senior member for Halifax have obtained loans.

Mr. Isnor: That is fine; then I shall be safe in telling those who have made application that their loans will be granted, so those who are fishing or sealing in the far north not only will be able to carry on those enterprises but will be able to make any necessary alterations to their ships.

[Mr. Wright.]

Mr. McLure: Is the Industrial Development Bank a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Belzile: That is correct.

Mr. McLure: Then is that why Prince Edward Island has not been able to get any loans through the industrial bank following the withdrawal of the Bank of Canada from that province? Where is there a branch of the industrial bank in the maritime provinces?

Mr. Belzile: There is no branch of the bank in Prince Edward Island, but money has been loaned in that province.

Mr. McLure: I want to get this straight. Is the Industrial Development Bank a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Belzile: It was organized as such.

Mr. Gillis: I want to ask if the Industrial Development Bank has an office anywhere in the maritimes.

Mr. Belzile: No, sir; not in the maritimes. The Montreal office serves the Atlantic division.

Mr. Gillis: As usual everything east of Toronto is written off. What is the function of the Industrial Development Bank? Is it to help create new industries, or just to assist in the expansion of existing industries?

Mr. Belzile: Both.

Mr. Gillis: I ask that question because I had occasion to make some inquiries about a year ago. I know quite a number of applications were made by people such as those described by the parliamentary assistant, people who wanted to put a little capital into a small industry; but none of those applications were granted. I received letters asking me to find out why that was so, and my inquiries revealed this. I was told by an official that the bank was not created for the purpose of assisting in the establishment of new industries but rather to assist in the expansion of existing industries. I asked specifically why the loans in which I was interested had been rejected. The answer was that the people applying did not have sufficient credit. I asked what credit was necessary, and was told that if they could go to a bank and have the bank sponsor them for $10,000, $15,000 or $20,000, if they had the collateral to support that kind of loan and got the endorsation of a bank, they could get a loan from the Industrial Development Bank. Well, if they had that kind of credit they did not need the Industrial Development Bank.

Personally I do not think it serves any purpose. I was in the house when this bank was set up, and this group supported it as a move in the right direction. We were led to believe that it was to provide the kind of credit that would not be provided through the chartered banks, that it would make funds available for the establishment of small industries where the persons concerned did not have the necessary bank credit to carry out the undertaking. I was quite satisfied that it was a step in the right direction. I visualized many small industries springing up in the maritime provinces, but when I made inquiries the information I obtained was that it was not intended for that purpose; so I do not know just what purpose it does serve. Certainly it serves no purpose in the maritime provinces. It does not even have an office there; if you want to make contact at all you must write to Montreal. If this is part of the national bank I think there should be an office or a representative in each province.

Mr. Knowles: Under the act as it stood, and as it is amended, the words "the bank may lend or guarantee loans" appear. Can the parliamentary assistant tell us, as at any stage, how much of the money the bank has out is from the funds of the bank itself, and how much is by way of guarantee?

Mr. Belzile: The bank authorizes a credit but does not disburse it immediately. Let us say it authorizes a credit of $100,000 to build or enlarge a plant. The bank does not disburse the $100,000 right away, but only as the work progresses.

Mr. Knowles: That is interesting, but I do not think it quite answers my question. From this wording I understand that the bank may make or guarantee loans. Does that mean that, in some cases, on the basis of the bank's guarantee the borrower goes to some other institution, say a chartered bank, and borrows the money?

Mr. Belzile: No. After having authorized a credit the Industrial Development Bank could endorse a note.

Mr. Knowles: We are getting close to an answer now. What percentage of the liabilities of the bank—or is it assets?—are in the form of these guaranteed notes?

Mr. Belzile: Looking at the reports I do not think there are any such guarantees.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the bill was given second reading only this evening, and many hon. members were not here. I suggest that it should not be put through two readings in the same day, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow at eleven o'clock we shall take up first the third reading of Bill No. 65, to amend the Judges Act, 1946; then third reading of Bill No. 210, to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act; then Bill No. 217, to assist producers of coal in the Atlantic maritime provinces; Bill No. 195, to amend the Surplus Crown Assets Act. Then we shall take up the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. When we finish those estimates we shall take up Bill No. 218, to amend the Veterans' Land Act; then resolution No. 10 on today's order paper, and Bill No. 200, to amend the Customs Act.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 1, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONGRATULATIONS TO MR. POULIOT ON THE TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF HIS ELECTION TO PARLIAMENT

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa): Before we begin today's proceedings there is a matter in which I know hon. members will be interested and which I should like to mention at this time. Today we have in our midst an hon. member who is celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary of his election to the House of Commons. I am sure that all hon. members would wish that I extend, on their behalf, our congratulations to that hon. gentleman, and our best wishes for the future. He was elected for the first time in December, 1924, and I believe that he is among the three or four who have been continuously members of the House of Commons since that time. On behalf of hon. members I therefore wish to extend warmest congratulations and best wishes to our friend, Jean François Pouliot, member for Temiscouata.

Some hon. Members: Speech.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Sir, I thank hon. members most sincerely.

CRIMINAL CODE

PORTRAYAL OF CRIMES—BILL NO. 10 TO BE FIRST ORDER OF BUSINESS AFTER ROUTINE ON MONDAY NEXT

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, when Bill No. 10, to amend the Criminal Code (portrayal of crimes) moved by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), was before the house, I suggested, as reported at page 1041 of Hansard:

> . . . that we approve of the principle of this bill on second reading. Then when it gets to committee we should leave it there until we have secured from the attorneys general of the provinces, who have the responsibility of enforcing this section, the invaluable suggestions of their prosecutors as to the form that this amendment should take in order to prohibit crime comics and also make the whole of section 207 more enforceable than it has been.
> In addition I should like to get the views of our committee on the revision and consolidation of the Criminal Code. We have already had a subcommittee of that body working on this section, but I should like to have the views of the whole committee.

We have now received from the attorneys general all the provinces except one some very excellent advice and information. We have also received from our own committee the information required, and but for the fact that the hon. member who introduced the bill has been away for a while we would have brought this matter up before. Unfortunately the bill, which is now in committee, is a private bill, and therefore has no special priority. In view of all the circumstances hon. members might be willing to give unanimous consent that so far as this bill as concerned we should pass a motion to give it that priority which by common consent, when it was last before the house, we agreed it should have. Therefore I should like to move, seconded by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Gibson:

> That on Monday, December 5, 1949, the order for house again in committee of the whole on Bill No. 10, an act to amend the Criminal Code (portrayal of crimes) be the first order of business after the conclusion of the routine proceedings of the house, notwithstanding the provisions of any standing or other order.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

R.C.A.F.—NO. 10 REPAIR DEPOT, CALGARY

Mr. Harkness:

1. Has the Department of National Defence adopted a plan to move No. 10 Repair Depot, R.C.A.F., from Calgary?
2. If so, what are the reasons?
3. If not, is such a scheme under consideration?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Such a proposal is being considered as an element in over-all planning on an inter-service basis.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE—U.S. FUNDS

Mr. Argue:

1. What were Canadian earnings of American dollars for each month since January 1, 1947?
2. What were Canadian expenditures of American dollars by months for the same period?
3. What were Canadian reserves of gold and United States dollars for each month of this period?

Mr. Belzile: The following figures show gross receipts and payments of U.S. dollars and gold by the exchange fund and other government of Canada accounts. They do not include receipts and expenditures offset through authorized private bank and intercompany accounts. They include Canadian gold production and transactions in gold and U.S. dollars with countries other than the United States. They also include all receipts and payments of U.S. dollars on capital account except for U.S. dollars borrowed by the government of Canada and used or set aside for retirement of U.S. dollar debt.

HOUSING—ARMY—BARRIEFIELD, ONT.

Mr. Hodgson:

1. Did T. A. Andre and Sons, Kingston, Ontario, receive a contract in 1948 to build houses for the army personnel at Barriefield?
2. If so, how many houses were built?

[Mr. Belzile.]

3. What was the total cost of this contract?
4. What was the average cost per house?
5. How many tenders were received for this project?
6. What was the amount of each tender, and from whom were they received?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Yes.

2. 50.

3. $417,800.

4. $8,356 each.

5. Three.

DANISH BUTTER IN GOVERNMENT STORAGE

Mr. Catherwood:

How much of the Danish butter imported last spring and the previous fall, if any, is still in the government's hands?

Mr. McIlraith: None.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

OLD AGE PENSIONS—MEANS TEST

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the government received at any time since July 1, 1949, representations calling for the elimination of the means test from the old age pension so as to make possible collective bargaining for industrial pensions along lines similar to industrial pension plans recently put into effect in the United States?
2. If so, has consideration been given to such representations, and what is the result of such consideration?

IMMIGRATION

COUNT JACQUES DE BERNONVILLE—QUESTION AS TO DEPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources. What steps are being taken to ensure the deportation of de Bernonville?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It occurs to me that this is not a question that should be asked on the orders of the day.

COLONIAL AIR LINES

MONTREAL-NEW YORK SERVICE—ORDER OF AIR TRANSPORT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I am sorry I was not able to give him notice of it. Will he make a statement concerning the press report that the air transport board is going to ask the Colonial Air Lines to show cause why their licence should not be suspended?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I do not know that I need make a statement in connection with it. The house is familiar with what has been going on in this regard in the United States. By virtue of the bilateral agreement, the air transport board has a perfect right to issue a show-cause order. I understand that the chairman of the board, or some member of it, has given the press a complete statement, which I have not seen, but I did see the report to which my hon. friend refers. All I can say is that the board, under the authority of the Aeronautics Act, has issued a show-cause order which I understand will be heard on December 12.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARIES, TRAVELLING ALLOWANCES, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 65, to amend the Judges Act, 1946.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the third time and passed.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO LOANS, EXPENDITURES, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 210, to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

COAL

ASSISTANCE TO PRODUCTION IN ATLANTIC MARITIME PROVINCES

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 217, to assist producers of coal in the Atlantic maritime provinces.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill provides authority to lend money to producers of coal in the Atlantic maritime provinces for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of production through expanded and modernized mechanization.

The report of the royal commission on coal, submitted to this house on January 31, 1947, gave considerable attention to coal mining methods in this area. The report stressed the necessity for extended mechanization, particularly in the largest producing area, Cape Breton, if the industry was to increase efficiency in production. The coal mining industry is one of the mainstays of the industrial economy of the maritime provinces, and consequently vital to our national economy. The coal produced in that area should supply a substantial part of the requirements of the central provinces.

It has been an established policy to assist this coal to find markets in the central provinces through the payment of subventions, and the assistance necessary has been based upon the costs of imported coals.

There has been an impressive advance in the efficiency of production and processing in the competitive foreign coal producing areas as a result of the mechanization of most of the operations of mining coal. This improvement has been reflected in the comparative costs and has made the competitive position of Canadian coal more adverse, as well as increasing the cost of assistance.

The physical conditions of our maritime coal seams have not permitted the rapid and comparatively easy development of new methods and machines that have resulted in such an improvement in the American fields. It is also not possible to develop as specific and certain information on the extension of the seams as is the case in the United States, since in Cape Breton, the seams extend out to sea and cannot be proved by drilling in advance. It may be noted also that as coal mining advances further seaward, the labour and the cost continually increase.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gillis: I am interested in this statement, but the minister is making so much noise I cannot hear all the other conversation.

Mr. Howe: These facts have made it clear that, if this vital industry is to play its full part in our national development, or perhaps if it is even to survive, a program of modernization and mechanization is necessary. Such a program should result in a general reduction in the cost of coal production through the increased output of coal per man-day worked.

For some time the dominion coal board has been giving serious consideration to the provision of loans to assist the Canadian coal industry to improve efficiency. The board has recommended to me that loans be granted for mechanization and modernization to companies engaged in the production and processing of coal in Canada, if the operation of these mines is vital to our national economy. The provision of such a loan is in the national interest. The proposed bill will cover these recommendations.

The provision of this assistance will enable those operators who qualify for participation to increase efficiency, to improve their product and substantially to reduce their costs. These results will, in turn, improve the competitive position of these coals in the subvention area, and consequently should reduce the amount of annual subvention assistance.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, this is one subject in which I am particularly interested. Were I not to make some comments on it, I could scarcely justify my presence here.

Coal mining is the basic industry of the province from which I come. Let me say that while I am not opposing the bill I should like to give the minister and the house some insight into certain aspects of this form of assistance, as I see them. I might easily rise in my place and say that I agree with the bill and that everything is fine. But was it not George Bernard Shaw who said some time ago that the way to get at the merits of a question is not to listen to some fool who has said he is impartial, but rather to develop a good argument on the subject, both pro and con. While I agree with the bill, I am not impartial, and I shall attempt to give the minister the other side of the story.

[Mr. Howe.]

I am particularly interested in the mechanization of these mines; but before we go into that aspect of the matter I should like to emphasize the fact that the real problem, as I have known it in the past, has not been one of production from those collieries but rather one of marketing. That has been the problem in the coal industry of Nova Scotia for the last thirty years. To overcome that difficulty the government instituted a system of subventions. While they have been of some help, they have certainly never put the Nova Scotia product in competition with United States coal in either the Ontario or the Montreal market.

The steps taken by the government within the past few years were practical steps toward the solution of the problem. The subvention arrangement back in the thirties, while it did not solve the problem, was of considerable assistance. It was a practical step in the right direction.

One of the most important steps taken by the government toward finding a solution to the problem in Nova Scotia was the establishment of the coal board. I have said the question is one of markets. The provincial government, which has supervision over the industry, has no control over markets. When the coal board was set up it was given certain definite functions. Not only was it to administer subventions, but under the terms of reference under which the board was to operate, in addition to supervising the financial arrangements as between the federal government and the industry, it had also the responsibility of probing markets. So far it has not functioned as efficiently in that field as I should have liked to see it function.

Only recently the coal board held meetings in the coal producing areas that will be affected by this bill. The union, which maintains a first-class research department and keeps in close touch with all phases of the industry, presented a brief to the board which emphasized this question of markets. I am not going to read the whole of the brief, because no doubt the minister has seen it; but there are just one or two things I should like to bring to his attention.

As I said a moment ago, I have never considered this problem from the standpoint of production; I have always considered it from the standpoint of markets. The union made the following observation on page 3 of the brief:

> As of course your board is aware, the Nova Scotia government informed the royal commission on coal that in its judgment Nova Scotia could produce nine million tons of coal annually, and that four millions of this output would have to be sold in Quebec and Ontario.

This bill is designed to increase production through mechanization, but the basic problem is not production; it is markets. The coal control that was set up during the war considered the problem in the same way. They considered that the problem is the means to be adopted to provide markets in adjacent areas, for surplus coal, but in discussing this matter with the union the coal board has taken the position that their function is not to provide markets; it is to attempt to find a solution to the problems of the industry from the standpoint of production.

Markets which this industry has had for years are being lost to United States coal. A return was tabled in reply to questions which had been asked by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) with regard to markets for Canadian coal. The questions asked were as follows:

1. What quantity of United States coal has been imported for use by the Canadian National Railways, Atlantic region, for (a) the calendar year, 1948; (b) the year 1949 to October 1?

2. What quantity of American coal is on hand for use by Canadian National Railways at Campbellton, New Brunswick?

The following answer was given:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. (a) 272,625 tons; (b) 151,282 tons.

2. The stockpile at Campbellton includes coals of Canadian and United States origin. Quantities are not separated, but United States content is estimated to be about 18,248 tons.

Those figures covered the present year and last year only. For a long time Canadian National Railways have provided one of the normal markets for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick coal. This return supports the contention I have been making, that additional financing to bring about increased production will not prove of any material value to the industry unless steps are taken to zone the normal markets in the section of the country we are talking about. I leave that thought with the minister.

This bill is to provide loans to aid in mechanization of the mines. I am not opposed to mechanization as such, but the term is used rather loosely. The mines in Nova Scotia have been mechanized ever since I have known them. Machinery cuts the coal, bores into the coal and transports the coal from the faces to the surface, but it is all operated by compressed air. The additional mechanization that is being talked about is in the form of heavy cutting and loading machinery located at the working face. I have no objection to taking the pan shovel from the man who works in a coal mine, because I broke my own back for twenty-six years using one. I will welcome the placing of machines in the mines to do that type of work, but this same proposal to electrify the mines was made fifteen years ago.

I objected to that being done in mines such as we have in Nova Scotia. The company which operated the mine in which I worked fifteen years ago proposed to put in heavy cutting and loading machinery. We did not object to the machinery as such; we simply pointed out the problems that would have to be solved. The mines in Nova Scotia are the most gaseous of any mines on this continent, and there is great danger that a spark from one of these machines or from a broken cable might blow the cover off the mine. We felt strongly about the matter, and wanted some assurance that the equipment would be safe.

I took an active part in opposing the electric machines because of the danger entailed. We discussed the matter with the provincial government and asked that we be given assurance, first, that the electrical equipment would be reasonably safe, and second, that provision would be made to take care of the displacement of manpower that might develop. When you put in machinery of this type you are faced with the problem of safety underground, as well as the social problems above ground in connection with what is to happen to the investment in churches, schools and homes when men are displaced from employment.

We could get no assurance on these two points, and we would not permit the machinery to go in. That was fifteen years ago. We did not base our objections at that time on imagination only. We went back to what had happened in the British mines which had been electrified for a long time. We secured reports made by royal commissions which had considered the question of electrification underground. I have the report of one commission here, but I do not intend to quote from it because I have read it a thousand times. I used it at that time. This particular commission sat continuously for three years in order to ascertain the reason for the terrific fatal accident rate in the British mines as compared with the low rate in the mines of France. When this commission reported in 1938 it stated clearly that the reason was the electrification of machinery at the working face. The use of electricity within 300 or 400 yards of the working face is reasonably safe, but no one can say it is absolutely safe.

You have a different condition when you shove a huge electric machine that throws an arc right up to the working face. At that point there is the possibility of gas, and also dust, which will cause one of the worst explosions possible when ignited. By doing that you create a dangerous problem. This commission reported that the difference between the French and English rates was that the equipment in France was driven by compressed air, whereas there had been an increased use of electricity at the working faces of the English mines. They did not withdraw the machinery. They wrote a lot of safety precautions into their act.

I know the minister is not responsible for conditions in any of the collieries, but under the bill the minister assumes the responsibility of seeing that as the result of these loans, the developments are sound from a financial point of view and also from the point of view of increasing production. The minister is taking that responsibility. In addition I think he should assume responsibility for the question of safety, in order that, where electrical equipment is to be installed, conditions in the colliery will be reasonably safe. Nobody can say they are absolutely safe, but they should be reasonably safe before money is used for that purpose.

The minister is not a mining expert, and I think he should have a mining engineer in his department who understands the whole problem, and who would be able to advise him as to equipment. There is a rush to improve production. The coal operators in Nova Scotia have a new general manager, and every time there is a new general manager he has to make a name for himself. In the rush for profits, and because of his desire to build up his prestige in the industry, he might overlook such little things as the safety of the man who actually produces the coal.

I am not too sure about the ability of the provincial government to handle the situation. They are a little too close to the operation. I think someone in the minister's department or on the coal board should be able to examine any colliery where electrical equipment is installed and be able to say to the minister that the equipment is reasonably safe in that particular colliery. It is a responsibility and obligation that someone should assume. I have seen mine explosions, and they are not pleasant. I have gone through a war, and I would rather go through two wars than a mine explosion. It can happen very quickly and simply. Unless precautions are taken, we may find ourselves, in the rush to improve production, in the position of blowing the cover off one of these mines and possibly involving a thousand people with it.

At the present time there is some of this equipment operating in one of the collieries. I should like to bring certain points to the minister's attention with regard to the investigation in Great Britain. In most of the cases where there was an accident because of gas or dust being ignited, it happened because of a broken cable. These cables are supposed to be equipped with safety switches a certain distance from the working face so that if anything happens to the cable on the other end the switch will blow and cut the power off. In most of the cases where they had difficulty in Great Britain the switch did not work. It is somewhat of a coincidence, but I noticed recently a press dispatch in a Sydney, Nova Scotia, newspaper dated November 8. On the sixteenth of last month the union was discussing the problem of safety in one of the mines where they have installed electrical equipment, and their approach to the problem was from the point of view mentioned in the report from Great Britain—the fact that the switches did not work. Let me read part of a dispatch from Glace Bay, dated November 18:

> Investigation into the failure of safety devices to operate in connection with the mechanical equipment in No. 20 colliery will be conducted Saturday, it was stated at tonight's meeting of Phalen local.

That happens to be my own local of the mine workers union.

> During the regular session of the local union members expressed alarm at a number of incidents that have occurred in the mine recently. The cable carrying electric energy to the mechanical equipment has been found burning on several occasions, it was said, and at times fires were found near the damaged cable. Andrew Conron, president of the local—

And so forth. Right at the present time there is definite proof that in the colliery where they are making the initial tests with that type of equipment they are having some difficulty with regard to the electrical power and the failure of the safety devices to work, just as was found in Great Britain in the period from 1935 to 1938. I am mentioning this to the minister so that he may have some understanding of the new problem of safety that is being created by mechanization. When they refer to mechanization now they merely mean they are replacing compressed-air-driven machinery with machinery powered by electricity. That is the only difference.

Gas conditions are bad in most of the collieries, but I can say that No. 20 is one of the worst I have ever been in from the point of view of throwing off gas. It is one mine where they could not afford to have a fire of any kind. They are just lucky that they spotted them and put them out. The type of mining has changed completely. For the benefit of the minister I want to say when these mines were mapped out the strata were developed for an entirely different type of mining. Places were driven sixteen or twelve feet wide, and two men would work in them. The pressure on the roof five or six miles under the Atlantic ocean is terrific. You have to timber it close to the face. The roofing and pillaring operation was a technical job for two experienced miners. It could be made safe because the men who carried on the operation had only that space to look after. Now they are getting away from that, and the strata have been developed in such a way that the main supports are left in place to look after roof conditions and so forth; but when you start to install heavy machinery it means that the faces may be three times as wide. It means that the timbers cannot be kept within eighteen inches of the face. That is the way I had to keep them when I worked there.

Today that is done away with. I looked at that operation last December, and as a practical miner I would not work in or around it. It appeared to me they had cast aside all the safety conditions that it took us twenty-five or thirty years to achieve under the Nova Scotia Mines Act. If there is to be a different type of mining in the future, we must be prepared for the new conditions that will be created. The machinery will drive places forward a lot faster and will open up wider faces. With that comes the problem of the releasing of a lot more gas than there is in narrower places. Airways will have to be carefully looked after. When you pump air from the surface a thousand feet down a shaft and through one mine, it is really an underground world today in No. 2 mine. Harbour seam, No. 20, is about 450 feet above that again. A tunnel is drifted up on a one per cent grade, and there is another underground world opened up there. You have to drive all the air down the main airway, through the old mine and back up the tunnel, and it has to ventilate all these working faces. It is a problem which will have to be carefully studied, because under no circumstances is a mine reasonably safe unless a sufficient amount of air is pumped in.

I mention these things to the minister because the solution of the problem is not just as simple as making loans to the company to allow them to go ahead and increase production. The question of markets will have to be taken care of. If the Nova Scotia government is right, if the union is right which is doing research work on the problem, and if the figures are correct that were given a moment ago as to the displacement of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick coal on the Canadian National railways, then someone has to do something about the question of markets. At least we could have the markets that belong to us economically. I think we could compete with the Americans in that market, but evidently we are not doing so; somebody is falling down on the job.

In my opinion the matter of markets should be one of the main responsibilities of the coal board; and under the terms of the legislation setting up that board I believe it has that responsibility. But when I see the Canadian National using United States coal I am not satisfied that the matter has been handled properly. Mind you, at the time that happened our mines on the mainland of Nova Scotia were working only two or three days a week. If loans are to be made for the purpose of mechanizing and electrifying these mines, the question of safety must be considered. The minister should see to it that the social problems and hazards created by the new development are also considered by some competent person in his department.

I have said I favour the bill. I think it is an improvement on subsidies. I hope it will not interfere with or displace subventions; I do not think it will. The payment of direct subsidies on production without supervision, as was done during the war, in my opinion served no good purpose except to build up the balance sheets of the companies. I believe the loan arrangement is practicable; and if the coal board, with competent personnel, exercises some supervision and scrutiny in matters of safety and the social problems that will be created, on somewhat the same basis as that on which the financial arrangements are looked after, I believe this bill will be a step in the right direction and will help us get at least somewhere near competition with United States coal in the Quebec and maritime markets, which are normally ours. I do not believe the problem ever will be really solved, however, until the question of markets is dealt with by zoning those which are reasonably economical for our coal both east and west.

Mr. C. T. Richard (Gloucester): I believe the minister is to be complimented on having introduced this legislation, which will be welcomed in New Brunswick where coal production, though small, plays an important part in our economy. We do not produce a great quantity of coal, probably not much more than half a million tons. The amount is insignificant, I know, when compared with the coal production of Nova Scotia; yet that small production provides employment to some six or seven hundred people.

That is not all, however. Coal produced in New Brunswick provides the only means by which we may obtain electric power, and that is the important part it plays in our economy. The New Brunswick electric power commission is the largest distributor of power in that province. It has a capacity of about 87,000 horsepower, of which only some three or four thousand horsepower are produced by hydro, the remainder being produced by coal-burning units, one of which is located at the mines at Minto, another at Chatham, and another at Saint John. Today these three units consume over 200,000 tons of coal, or about fifty per cent of the coal produced in New Brunswick. It is the intention of the power commission to establish another unit at Grand Falls and to double the capacity of the unit at Chatham, which will mean that the commission will require some 400,000 tons or about four-fifths of the coal produced in our province. Naturally this will mean that the coal operators will have to increase their production in order to keep up with the requirements of customers other than the power commission.
