I would hope that by modernizing and mechanizing the smaller mines in New Brunswick we might be able to reduce the cost of production and thereby reduce the cost to the power commission, thus enabling it to provide electric power to every section of our province. Today that power is expensive. The coal alone costs the commission about ·6 cents per kilowatt hour; yet that cost is justified by the use made of that power in the rural districts and small towns and cities. As I said before, we have no potential hydro power to develop, and this seems to be the only way we can obtain the electric power which is so essential to our economy. This legislation will enable the operators to increase their production and at the same time increase the number of men employed. It will also give us an opportunity to obtain cheaper electric power from our coal-burning units.

I hope that we in New Brunswick will derive more benefits from this legislation than we have received under the subsidy system. Personally I do not believe in subsidies; I think this is the proper way to develop our industries. I note that the bill is to be proclaimed by order in council. I trust that proclamation will not be delayed unduly, because conditions in New Brunswick are none too good just now. We have been hard hit lately. As a result of the sudden devaluation of the British pound our lumber industry is not operating to the same extent as in former years, and we have lost our pit prop market. Unemployment is increasing, as the figures disclose; and we hope that legislation such as this will help maintain and increase employment and better conditions throughout New Brunswick.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, this bill is based upon the doctrine of bonuses, subventions and subsidies for this very important industry. I am not going to discuss at length what has been done in the past, but I should like to make one short reference. This bill deals with the producers of coal in the Atlantic provinces. The first session I was in this house I introduced a motion which was discussed for three days. At that time I said we were a very cold country. There were pictures in the New York Times showing Canada sitting as a Lazarus at the feet of the coal barons of Pennsylvania. Following the discussion of my motion a committee was appointed, of which the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll) was chairman.

I always thought that if the maritime members had shown a little more co-operation on this question we would have had some redress years ago. This is an extremely cold country. The year before last, it was necessary to use coal for heating purposes for eight or nine months. As I said in 1922, why should we be sending about $56 million in wages, as the amount was then, to the Pennsylvania coal barons? There is an abundance of coal in the maritimes and Alberta. The province of Ontario wanted to use this coal, but since I have been a member of the house protection has prevailed in the form of bonuses, subventions and subsidies.

This bill will aid the producers of coal, and that is good. It exempts them from some of the provisions of the Income Tax Act. The bill contains a provision to allow the governor in council to pass rules and regulations, as to how and when it should apply. I do not believe that is a very good principle for us to follow. As I said, this bill is based on a policy of bonuses, subventions and subsidies. It is therefore a national question, and these provisions should be applied to the producers of coal in Alberta. There is no doubt about it, the provisions of this bill will serve a useful purpose by way of assistance to the coal producers.

The motion I proposed for a national fuel supply was that all coal should be mined under the British flag, whether from Wales, the maritimes or Alberta. When we have an abundance of coal in this country, why should we send all those wages to another country? The price of coal has gone up by leaps and bounds. In 1922 anthracite coal from Pennsylvania was $6 a ton. There was a demonstration of Welsh coal at the Canadian National Exhibition. In 1915 a boatload of coal came from Swansea, Wales, during the time of Stanley Baldwin, and the coal was dumped on the dock at Ashbridge's bay, which is in my constituency. This boatload of coal proved that it was an economic way to deliver it if we had the coking ovens for it. I believe this is a national problem. The object of the bill is to assist the producers of coal in the Atlantic maritime provinces. My motion of 1922 provided an embargo on coal and a fund to aid coking ovens for coal mined and coked under the British flag. I believe the time is not far distant when we shall have to go further than we have gone. So far as possible, we should use coal from the other agencies I have suggested.

I remember when the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond first entered this house in 1922; he was chairman of a committee, appointed after two days' discussion of my coal motion, and he did a great deal along these lines. He has taken a keen interest in this matter. Do not forget that the doctrine on which this bill is based is a system of bonuses, subventions, and subsidies, and that is the only way we can solve our fuel supply problem. It does not matter where the coal deposits are in Canada, I believe the day is not far distant when further aid will have to be extended to coal producers and coking ovens.

Back in 1922, the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond made a splendid report on the coal problem. The only member who rose to support it here was Hance Logan, then a member of parliament, who was afterwards made a senator. I believe there were only two government members who rose in support of the principle of a national fuel supply at that time. Then the head offices of Dominion Coal were moved up to Montreal, for some reason or other, instead of being kept in the maritimes where the situation was so acute. During the first war, I travelled on a special train around lake Erie ports with Sir George Bury of the C.P.R. to inspect the coal depots. During the early days of the first world war there was a coal famine in our city, and the people were suffering a great deal from it. I believe you were overseas at the time, Mr. Speaker. It was a deplorable state of affairs. Even those who were ill found it hard to get a bag of coal during the winter of 1917. The winters are severe in this country, and this winter will be no exception. With the price of coal going up to $22.50, and giving indication of advancing to $25 and with the fourth coal miners' strike of the year in the United States, the winter will be even more difficult.

We want to use maritime coal in our city, and I believe the coking ovens should be adapted to it. I believe there are about 700,000 tons of anthracite coal in the ship channel at Ashbridge's bay now. The mild fall allowed the supplies to accumulate. Formerly that area was a marsh. We have used Welsh coal and Alberta coal in those coking ovens, but we also need maritime coal. The school board wants to use it, and the city wants to use it. Everyone wants to assist the minister with this program, because this is an important industry. I do hope something will be done at this session; otherwise it is going to be too late. There should be some direct and immediate aid to the producers in the manner indicated, and I believe the principle should be extended to the coal producers in Alberta. We should apply the doctrine that all coal should be mined under the British flag, whether it is in the maritimes, Wales, or Alberta.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a word about this bill, which proposes to grant assistance to the coal mining industry of the maritimes by way of loans. I believe I can say that we support this bill, because the coal mining industry in Canada is in none too good a position. Any assistance that can be given to the industry generally should be looked upon with some degree of favour.

In introducing this measure, the minister indicated that it was in the "national interest" —that was the expression he used. I am at once reminded of the pleas that have been made in this chamber for many years for a national coal policy; that would be, indeed, in the national interest. Over the years, speakers in this house have urged a national coal policy, but it is not so easy to determine what that national coal policy should be. I must say that I have attempted to arrive at a satisfactory answer to that question, and just as I feel that I am on the verge of a solution, I find that I just do not quite make it. There is difficulty in arriving at what would be a good national coal policy in Canada, because there are so many intricate things involved. It is very easy to suggest that we should have a national coal policy, but it is another thing to suggest what that policy should be.

I do not want to be unkind, but during this session I have been waiting for the leader of the Progressive Conservative party to rise in his place and indicate what he would regard as a national coal policy. The reason I have been waiting is that we had the pleasure of welcoming the hon. gentleman into our part of the country a few months ago. I was fortunate in having him come into my own territory. I say I was fortunate because I believe his visit to my constituency had some effect on bringing me back to this house. When he came into our part of the country he was privileged to speak at a meeting at High River. I do not know whether someone had whispered something in his ear about the coal deposits in an adjacent territory; in any event he said in his speech that day, as reported by the press, that if the country looked with favour on his party, that party would tackle this coal problem and really do something about it. I have been waiting for him to rise, and I think I shall have to wait a long time before he will be able to make any concrete and acceptable suggestions as to how this problem can be tackled. It is not easy.

I have read a good many reports by commissions that have sat on the problem of the coal mining industry in Canada. I have tried to make a study of them. When I was elected to the House of Commons in 1935 I looked over my constituency. I was not a businessman; I was not a farmer. I was not anything, I suppose. But I found that in the southern part of my riding there was a tremendous coal mining industry. Another part of my constituency dealt with ranching, and another part of it was almost entirely wheat farming. I was not a rancher; I was not a coal miner, and I wondered why my constituents had ever sent me here. I thought: to be an efficient member I shall have to study some of these things. I got hold of all the material I could find, and began to do that. I tried to wade through the mass of material put out by the various commissions that had sat in days gone by, to determine what I might propose in respect to the coal mining industry. Perhaps I have gained some knowledge of the situation. I will say that not one of those reports concluded with a definite and satisfactory recommendation as to an overall national coal policy. If they could not recommend any real solution of the problem, who am I, or who is anyone else, to say that a satisfactory recommendation can be made? I simply say that the problem is a huge one.

The present bill will be of some assistance in relation to a fraction of the problem. In the past the government have met the problem of the coal mining industry by a sort of piecemeal method. I am not saying that in a derogatory way, because personally I cannot see that they could have done very much more than they have done. As I say, the problem is tremendously complex.

There are some questions I should like to ask about the present measure, but I shall reserve them until the bill is in committee. When this legislation is set up to give assistance to the coal mining industry of Nova Scotia I trust that it will not be a matter of putting money in a bag with holes in it. We must take a long-range view of this matter, and, in the assistance offered by this legislation, attempt to bring the industry to a point where it will be placed on its feet and enabled to resume operations over the years with confidence. If we do not do that, in a few years' time the industry will be coming back to us for more help, or for something else, and a little more assistance will be added piecemeal to what has been done over the years.

I have some reservations in my thinking in respect to the way in which the coal mining industry of Nova Scotia has been carried on in the past. I wonder whether those who are responsible for the industry have done all they possibly could to keep the industry on a solid financial footing. Have they done all they could? If they have not, then the minister should make it perfectly clear to the industry that they must so manage their affairs that they will be worthy of assistance in times of emergency.

I have a coal mining industry in my constituency. In our area of southern Alberta and eastern British Columbia it is bituminous coal mining. The companies operating in these areas have not had the assistance that some other coal mining areas have had. It is true they have had some assistance. I must not forget to say that we have been assisted materially by the government's subvention program in respect to the transportation of coal. It has enabled the industry to reach a market that otherwise they would not have been able to reach. But even though they have been assisted by way of subventions, I believe I can say that the companies there have so managed their industry that they have been willing to take some of their profits and to plow them back, thus reducing what otherwise would have been a higher dividend to the shareholders.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Do you not think they have done that?

Mr. Hansell: Yes, they have. That is what I am saying. I do not know whether that has been done in connection with the Nova Scotia coal mines. Perhaps it has been; I am not as familiar with the situation there. I do know, however, that the bituminous mines in southern Alberta and eastern British Columbia have reduced their dividends to a minimum. They have taken that money and plowed it back into their own company by way of capital expenditures, installation of more modern and efficient machinery, and the like.

The coal mining industry there is in a precarious position. I believe I could say that to a greater or lesser degree it is operating on a shoestring, and in a few moments I shall produce figures to show it. Other factors come into the picture which cause us some disturbance. The discovery of oil in Alberta on a larger scale has meant that much of the market that previously had been available is now beginning to fade because much of the coal had been mined for the railways. The railways are now gradually converting from coal-burning to oil-burning locomotives, a fact that is giving the industry a good deal of concern, not only from the standpoint of the companies themselves being affected, but because of the possibility of its creating an unemployment problem. That is one condition now appearing on the horizon that is giving us a good deal of concern.

With the possible loss of this market they must turn to markets other than the railways. This means that the demand from consumers is for a higher grade of product. What does that involve? It involves the spending of many thousands of dollars for improved cleaning equipment. And before the story is completely told, large sums of money may have to be put into that industry.

I make these observations simply to remind the minister that since he is now proposing a bill for the assistance of the Nova Scotia coal mining industry, he may be called upon for similar assistance to help the coal mining industry in other parts of Canada—and I speak particularly of that portion of it which is in my own territory—when because of adverse circumstances in the industry they are confronted with financial problems.

I say to the minister, and because he is a reasonable man I believe he would agree, that since he has introduced this bill to assist the Nova Scotia coal mines—

Mr. Brooks: May I interrupt the hon. member? He has repeated throughout his speech that this bill is to assist the industry in Nova Scotia. It is to assist the industry of the maritime provinces; and we have coal mines in New Brunswick which need assistance.

Mr. Hansell: I assure the hon. member I did not want to leave New Brunswick out of the picture. I was thinking in terms of Nova Scotia, but I am sure New Brunswick is just as important as any other part of Canada. I thank the hon. member for reminding me of my error. My view is that it is a good thing to assist the coal mining industry wherever it requires assistance. In my further observations I shall try to remember to refer to the maritime industry rather than to the Nova Scotia industry. I am sure the minister will look with some degree of favour upon requests for assistance from the coal mining industry in other parts of Canada.

I should like to make some brief observations concerning the solvency of the coal-mining industry in Canada. The figures I shall use may not be exact, but I use them in an effort to present a general picture. Figures are strange things. One can clutter up one's speech with so many figures that the subject matter becomes lost—indeed, even Hansard becomes lost when too many figures appear on its pages.

There may be some who would take the view that because a million-dollar coal mining company operates in some part of the country, the coal mining industry is making tremendous profits. In this respect the coal mining industry is no different from any other. When one reads a balance sheet and finds that a company has made so many thousand dollars in a year, or, if it is a large corporation other than coal mining, so many million dollars, he begins to say: What an industry! Just imagine those capitalists making so many millions of dollars in one year! But when one boils down the facts as to how much a company might have made on one unit of production, whether it be in the automobile industry, the textile industry, or some other, it presents an entirely different picture. A small slip one way or the other on the profit per unit may make the difference between making a million dollars in the year, or losing a million dollars.

We must look at the coal mining industry in a similar fashion. On their balance sheets they may be able to show that they make so many thousand dollars per year. But how much per ton do they make? Perhaps that figure would give a different picture. People in eastern Canada who burn domestic coal have to pay a high price for it. Some may say: Someone is making a pile of money on this coal, when we have to pay $15 or $20 a ton for it.

Let us look into that, so far as the bituminous mines are concerned. I have before me the report of what has come to be known as the Carroll coal commission of 1946. Anyone who wishes to familiarize himself with the coal mining industry would do well to read it carefully. It is a voluminous report, but there is an education wrapped up in it. I am not going to comment on the report itself, but I will say that if anyone takes the trouble to read it he will become acquainted with the coal mining industry.

On page 272 of the report, reference is made to profits that have been earned by the Alberta and eastern British Columbia bituminous coal mines. I have summarized these figures. Ten companies made an average profit of 23·5 cents per ton, but two of them made profits of from 30 to 53 cents a ton. Leaving those two companies out of the picture, the remaining eight companies made an average profit of only 16½ cents per ton.

Mr. Gillis: How many tons did they produce?

Mr. Hansell: I referred to that a little while ago. They may have produced a good many thousands of tons and in the end made some profit, but I think my hon. friend will admit that if the cost of production went up just 17 cents a ton they would be facing a loss of half a cent per ton on the thousands of tons they were mining. That is something we have to keep in mind, and that is the point I am trying to make.

It has been said that the cost of production in strip mining as carried on in western Canada has been tremendously reduced. I think it can be granted that the cost of carrying on this type of mining is less than the cost of other types of mining, but it is shown on page 274 of the report that the average profit per ton for strip mining was 20 cents, an amazingly low figure.

On page 279 of the report, reference is made to the ancillary operations of coal companies, and it is indicated that this is one thing that helped to keep the coal mining industry aboveboard. This paragraph reads:

> A very large proportion of the revenue of most companies is derived from sources other than the actual mining of coal.
> Over the fifteen-year period the combined net earnings on coal mined of all companies amounts to $790,088.35, or one-half cent per ton on all coal sold. From other sources the coal companies earned $21,671,440.72, or 12 cents per ton.
> These sundry revenues arise from the operation of light and water utilities, through rentals of buildings, apartments, houses and hotels, sale of foreign coal, production of coke, briquettes and by-products, and from investment earnings.
> Revenues included under this heading, however, are definitely connected with, and are attributable to, the coal operation, as they emanate from the townsites in which the mines are located and from the investment of reserve and surplus funds set aside or earned throughout the history of the companies.

I thought that would be an interesting paragraph to place on the record. I should like to refer now to page 281, and quote a paragraph which deals with the profits made by the industry. It reads:

> The foregoing general review, supplemented as it is with related material on most of the mining companies in Canada, clearly indicates that the operations of the industry as a whole have not been too profitable. Involving an investment which at the end of 1944 amounted to approximately $83 million and in respect of sales of 180 million tons over the fifteen-year period, the Canadian coal industry has had a return of approximately 10 cents per short ton. While this is the over-all result, a geographical distribution of these figures shows that the eastern companies (maritimes) sold 52 per cent of the coal and only made a net profit of one-third cent per ton, while the western companies (Saskatchewan to British Columbia) sold 48 per cent of the coal and realized a profit of 19½ cents per ton. These figures are before any provision for depletion.

[Mr. Hansell.]

> The foregoing results are after including production subsidies paid by the emergency coal production board and other governmental assistance totalling approximately $15 million, of which approximately $13,800,000 was paid to the eastern companies and $1,200,000 to the western companies.

I skip just a small portion and continue:

> It is only fair to observe that subsidies paid by the emergency coal production board were in considerable measure due to the wartime price ceiling policy.

Now I should like to put in a plug for private enterprise. Nowhere in this report is there any recommendation that the nationalization of our coal mining industry would solve the problem. If anything, the report would lead us to believe that the commissioners were adverse to the nationalization of the coal mining industry in Canada. Even the minority report by Mr. Morrison, one of the commissioners, indicates that the nationalization of the industry would not solve the problem.

I shall have a few questions to ask when the bill is in committee. We favour the measure because we believe the coal industry of the maritimes is in need of assistance. I repeat that we may ask the minister to look with some favour upon the taking of a similar step in respect to the western coal mining industry if the necessity arises.

Before I sit down I should like to compliment the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) for his able speech. He is from the maritimes, and he has spent most of his life in a study of the coal mining industry, having played a very important part in it. He speaks with some authority. No doubt the minister will take into consideration what he has said, and perhaps will also give a nod to what I have said.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this important legislation. First of all may I compliment the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the government upon the steps which they are prepared to take to improve and assist the coal mining industry of the maritime provinces. The industry is a basic element in the economy of the province of Nova Scotia. Any steps which are taken to assist it are of the utmost importance, not only to the actual areas in which the coal mining operations are undertaken, but also to the province as a whole. For this reason all hon. members from Nova Scotia, no matter what constituencies they represent, are interested in legislation of this kind, and are prepared to support it vigorously.

I do not think hon. members generally could appreciate the basic purpose of the present legislation without some further comment on the question of production and markets which was raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). He said that in his opinion the problem was really one of markets and not of production. He views the present legislation as attacking the question of production and not the question of markets. My view is that the two questions of production and markets are so completely interrelated and interdependent that they cannot be separated, and that the purpose of the legislation and its results will affect both production and markets. I think the truth of this is demonstrated when we consider just what a market is. After all, a market is simply a place where there is a demand for a certain commodity, and where you can sell your product at a price which is competitive with the alternatives available in the same area.

The purpose of mechanization and the improvement of production in the mines of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and other parts of the maritimes is not only to increase the volume of production but also to reduce the unit cost. That has a direct relation to the ability of the maritime producers to place their product in the areas which they can serve, at a price which is competitive with the other coals and heating and power facilities that are available. It is my belief and contention that the purpose of the bill is to permit the production of coal in the maritime area at a lower unit cost so that the product of our mines will be available and will compete more readily with United States and other coal.

The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Richard) said something a few moments ago which illustrates the point I have in mind. He spoke of the production of electric power from coal in the maritime area. One of the drawbacks has been the high cost of the coal required to run steam plants. If the result of the bill is that coal will be available in sufficient quantities, and at a low enough unit cost to make the production of electric energy from steam power more economical, then the mines and the miners will benefit together with other users of electric energy in the maritime area.

I think that the bill is a basic and really constructive measure. Whether or not it will achieve its purposes depends upon a number of factors. The operators of the coal mines will have to take advantage of its provisions, and they will have to see that their operations are conducted on a proper businesslike basis. The coal miners will have to co-operate to see that the new facilities which are made available are used for the benefit of the operations generally and in the public interest. Last but not least, the operators and the various governmental agencies interested in the production of these mines reaching markets must continue the necessary activities to see that the production is used to the greatest possible extent in the areas to which it can be properly transported and put to economic use.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken on this subject at different times in the house, not on the present measure but with respect to the coal situation generally in my own province. I was indeed pleased to hear the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Richard) champion our cause. I am particularly interested in the subject because the small industry which we have in the province of New Brunswick is partly in my constituency, and partly in the constituency of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg). As the hon. member for Gloucester pointed out, the coal industry of the province is small, and produces not more than 500,000 tons a year; nevertheless it is most essential to our whole economy.

The area around Minto has grown into a large and populous centre, and it depends entirely on the coal industry. To show how much the area has increased in size, may I point out that last year one of the largest schools in the province of New Brunswick was built at Minto. The Minister of Veterans Affairs was there to lay the cornerstone. The school cost over $1 million, and before that they had a large consolidated school which was one of the finest in the province. Both schools will be used to capacity. The area is very important; and it is necessary that the coal mining industry of this province be maintained in order that such communities as Minto may continue to be prosperous, and also, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Gloucester, in order that our whole economy may be maintained.

This morning the minister said this legislation was intended to assist in the subvention area. I assume he means the maritime provinces, and that New Brunswick will be included as well as Nova Scotia. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Brooks: We have not always shared in the benefits that have been given the maritime provinces, as I have pointed out on various occasions previously. We have been discriminated against when you consider some of the benefits that have been given to Nova Scotia—and that has applied particularly to subventions. In New Brunswick we have obtained very little if any benefit from coal subventions, since under the act only coal exported from a province receives that benefit. We export very little coal from New Brunswick, and as a result Nova Scotia coal, which receives the subvention, can be brought into our province to undersell our coal at almost every point. In Campbellton, Chatham, Bathurst and many other parts of New Brunswick, coal brought from Nova Scotia can be purchased for less than New Brunswick coal, as a result of the subventions paid by this government. That is why I am anxious to see that this legislation does not discriminate against the New Brunswick coal industry.

I was interested to hear the hon. member for Gloucester say that an electric generating plant was to be established at Grand Falls. As I remember it, some land was cleared at that point last summer and the right of way for a railway spur was obtained, but nothing more was done, and I understood the project had been abandoned. I was pleased indeed to hear the hon. member say that the undertaking has not been dropped, but that the development is to go ahead, since that will mean a larger market for our coal, which in turn will benefit the coal producers and miners of my constituency.

I do not intend to say anything further with respect to this legislation except to point out once more that the market for New Brunswick coal is limited almost entirely to our own province; and, as was pointed out previously this morning, our whole economy, which is based upon the production of electricity, depends upon the success of our mining industry. I might add that our pulp mills obtain a great deal of their coal from the Minto mines. In past years we also sold to the railways; but as the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) pointed out earlier, quoting an answer to a question I placed on the order paper not long ago, United States coal was a strong competitor in the market provided by the Canadian National Railways.

If this legislation will help us hold the market in our own province provided by our electric plants, our pulp mills and the railways, and will give us some assistance which will enable us to produce our electricity at less cost, I am sure it will be a very great benefit to our people. I hope, as I said a moment ago, that we shall not be discriminated against in this instance as we have been in the past with respect to subventions, and as we were during the war with regard to other legislation affecting maritime coal mines.

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): I should like to take a few moments to emphasize the necessity for these loans to the mining companies of the maritime provinces. The coal mining industry of Nova Scotia has had its good times and its bad times. During the first world war the ships of the principal operators on Cape Breton Island were commandeered, not by our own government but by the British government, and as a result those operators lost the markets they then had in Quebec and Ontario. Then came subventions, which did help to a certain extent in their regaining and perhaps expanding the market in the central provinces.

There is, I think, rather a wrong idea abroad concerning subventions. Men who thought they knew something about it have told me that the amount paid in subventions went into the exchequers of the coal companies. That is not so. The money is paid to the railways to try to make it possible for maritime coal to compete with United States coal in certain of the central markets. There is no doubt at all, however, that subventions gave the coal companies a great uplift, because the more coal they sold, if they were making a profit, the better for themselves and for those employed in the industry.

In world war II the trade with the central provinces was again interrupted, not by the commandeering of ships but by the presence of German submarines in and near the St. Lawrence river. In that case, however, the coal operators took time by the forelock and did a very good job. They had certain contracts to fulfil in connection with supplying coal to the central markets. Before the war started, when it was imminent, they went out and arranged with coal operators in the United States that their contracts in the central provinces should be fulfilled, in the hope that when the war was over they would be able to retain those customers. I do not know how that worked out, but that was one thing the coal companies did in an endeavour to retain their market in this country.

I said I was going to give some reasons why it is absolutely necessary that these loans be made if our coal industry is to survive for any extended period of time. Coal production in the maritime provinces has been going down. It dropped during the war. Various reasons were given for that loss of production, some of them good and some bad. One reason why coal production went down was that the very best coal miners in those provinces—great boys, great men, great Canadians, great Britishers—threw down their picks and went to the defence of this country. When the coal companies asked selective service to replace those miners—I am not casting any slurs on the labour department—they were supplied with men who knew nothing about coal mining, and with whom the miners in the pits were almost afraid to work.

So far as subsidies are concerned, the coal companies in the maritime provinces never received subsidies as such, except during the war. These subsidies were given for exactly the same reason that subsidies were given the other great industries of this country—to help production and to keep the companies on an even keel, so that they could carry on their operations with the same profits they were getting before the war. I should like to say that large subsidies were paid to the coal companies in the maritimes and in the west, but large subsidies were paid also to practically every producing industry in this country.

There has been some talk about production, and I am glad that the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) brought to the attention of the house the question of supplying coal to the railways in the town of Campbellton. I am going to suggest some reasons for the existence of that condition, and how I think it might be remedied.

The great competitors of maritime coal in the markets of Canada are the United States mines. As compared with the maritimes, the production capacity of these United States mines is tremendous—and I am speaking of those companies that do compete with our maritime coal companies. The conditions under which operations are conducted in Cape Breton—yes, in the province generally—are extremely difficult. Eighty-seven per cent of the coal produced in Nova Scotia today is taken from submarine areas. In perhaps the greatest producing mine of all, coal is mined 3·9 miles from the shore. I should not be surprised to find that operations had been extended another quarter or half mile by now.

The distance those coal operators may go is about five miles, I understand, and there must be about 4,000 feet of coverage in order to make the operation safe. I believe that has been one of the main drawbacks in connection with operations in these places. Another great drawback—perhaps because the operations were not properly planned—is getting the coal from the mine face to the surface. In not all cases is the coal mined 3·9 miles from shore, but where it is, it is quite a distance. Fast and efficient transportation is one of the things to which particular attention must be given in the maritime mines.

Before coming to the question of productivity of the various mines in the United States, from which coal comes that competes with our coal, may I give some figures on the man-day production so far as transportation is concerned. I am speaking of transportation from the mine face, or wherever the coal is loaded, to the tipple or to the bankhead. The man-day production in the United States is 50 tons per day. It was difficult to make any computation of a comparable figure for the maritime provinces, but a fair calculation is that 10 tons per man-day is average. That is the amount that a transportation man in the mines of the maritime provinces could handle, as compared with the 50 tons a man could handle in the United States mines which compete with maritime coal in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

The Dominion Coal Company and its subsidiaries do supply eighty per cent of the output of coal in the maritime provinces. I understand that the real basis for indicating what the production is, is the man-day production in these mines. Leaving out what I have said about the transportation matter, I should like to put some figures on the record, Mr. Speaker.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Carroll: When the house rose for the noon recess I was discussing production in the coal mines of the maritimes. I intended to make some reference to the production capacity of the United States mines whose products are in competition with maritime coal. Before doing that may I say that in 1937 the production of the mines of Nova Scotia amounted to 7,226,954 tons. In 1944 the production had fallen to 5,745,672 tons. That was not owing to the lack of markets, because in those days we were not producing sufficient coal to fill the markets of the province of Nova Scotia. Since that time our coal production has increased somewhat. In 1948 the coal production of Nova Scotia amounted to 6,430,991 tons, and of New Brunswick, 522,136 tons. The production in New Brunswick had increased from 361,184 tons in 1945 to 522,136 tons.

I want to say a word about man-day production. In 1945 the man-day production in the coal mines in Nova Scotia had fallen considerably from the pre-war average. In 1945 production per man-day in Nova Scotia was 1·58 tons. In New Brunswick it was 1·72 tons. In 1948 the man-day production rose to 2·19 in Nova Scotia, about 50 per cent, and in New Brunswick to 2·42 tons.

Perhaps it might be well to put the whole Canadian man-day production on the record. On Cape Breton Island, Nova Scotia, the man-day production in 1934 was 2·54 tons. In 1939 it was 2·60 tons, and in 1944 it was 1·73 tons. I have indicated how it has risen since. In New Brunswick in 1934 it was 1·33; in 1939, 1·42 and in 1944, 1·47. In Saskatchewan in 1934 it was 5·12; in 1939, 5·85; and in 1944, 8·66. That tremendous production in Saskatchewan was due to the fact that it was mostly stripping operations. They have pretty deep seams to strip.

Here I want to recognize the fact that the little mines in southern Saskatchewan, I believe in Estevan, not only undertook to mine coal but established their own markets. They went into the city of Winnipeg. I do not know whether it was through their own company or through subsidiaries, but at their instance they created their own market by having installed central fire-heating plants, powered by coal. I believe that was one of the best things I saw in my trip through Canada a few years ago.

In the Drumheller area of Alberta, in 1934 the man-day production was 3·73 tons; in 1939 it was 3·94, and in 1944, 3·58. In the Mountain Park area in 1934 it was 3·75 tons; in 1939, 3·71, and in 1944, 3·87 tons. In the Cascade area of Alberta, in 1934 it was 3·09 tons; in 1939, 3·21, and in 1944, 4·34. In the Crowsnest area of Alberta, in 1934 it was 3·07; in 1939, 3·84 and in 1944, 3·67. In Crowsnest, British Columbia, in 1934 it was 3·97; in 1939, 4·38 and in 1944, 4·23. On Vancouver island in 1934 it was 1·82; in 1939, 1·84 and in 1944, 2·03.

It will be seen that the man-day production in the western provinces is much higher than it is in the maritime provinces. The real difficulty there is of course markets and the availability of markets. I understand that even today the domestic coal users in northwest Ontario are supplied by Alberta coal, which I think is a very good compliment to subventions, because that is the only way that those western mines could be made competitive in that area.

I now turn to the situation in the United States so far as production is concerned. I refer to the states whose products are competitive with maritime coal—West Virginia, Kentucky, Pennsylvania and Ohio. In 1934 the man-day production in West Virginia was 4·73 tons as compared with 1·97 in the maritimes. In 1939 it was 5·51, and in 1944 it was 5·61. Instead of their man-day production decreasing during the war, it went up. I think it is fair to say that it went up on account of the mechanization and the improvements in the underground transportation systems in these mines.

In Kentucky in 1934 the man-day production was 4·33; in 1939 it was 4·68, and in 1944 it was 5·08. In Pennsylvania in 1934 it was 3·98; in 1939 4·77 and in 1944 5·28. In Ohio in 1934 the man-day production was 4·23; in 1939 5·35 and in 1944 6·77. I do not think anybody is putting forth the contention or the argument that it is as easy to mechanize the maritime mines as it is the mines in these states to which I have referred.

I now wish to say something about the prices that are charged for United States coal coming into our Canadian markets. For some time there was a coal stabilization board which stabilized the coal output of certain states at a certain price. I understand that that board has gone out of existence. I think that some method, co-operative or otherwise, should be developed with the coal industry in the United States. For example, the mines there that have the greatest production per man-day can get their coal out at a very small cost, but they are allowed to set the price for coal that comes into Canada, instead of making the price uniform for that state, because there are many mines in those states in which it costs more to get out the coal. I do not know whether anything can be done about that or not, but it is something that I thought I should bring to the attention of the minister.

With reference to markets, there are other competitors of coal in this country so far as fuel and power are concerned. I think it is a good thing. I believe there are some people in this country who are concerned about our reserves of coal. What I do know is that there are enough reserves of coal in Nova Scotia to pay off this debt in the usual fashion.

Perhaps I have some old-fashioned ideas about the fuel problem; but it is my belief that the good God has placed on the earth, in the sky and in the sea all the natural resources that will be necessary for the use of man until the end of time. Of course those resources will have to be harnessed and made useful by the ingenuity and scientific experience of man.

In the old days in my province wood was the only fuel we had with which to warm ourselves. Occasionally power was produced through the use of windmills. Then wood became scarce, and coal was taken from the ground. Coal then became scarce, with the result that oil and hydroelectric power have come to the forefront. Now we are confronted with the greatest force of all. I understand that in about 1955 atomic power will be harnessed to a point where it can be used to do the work formerly done by coal, oil and all other means of power. Especially will that be true in our large industries.

After hearing the discussion in the house yesterday one could not help concluding that it is a great pity so much of our wood has been burnt. Speaking about my own province I would hope that in a very few years every domestic consumer of coal would be able to use it as a fuel, instead of wood. In this way the farmers of Nova Scotia will be able to crop the old spruce tree and put it to some of the uses for which it was intended.

I have said that there are other fuels and power competing with coal. There are. I do not wish to be critical of any of the coal companies in Canada, particularly in my native province. I must say however that if the coal companies down there had paid more attention to the preparation of their product, especially for domestic use, their markets would not have to be extended or sought far afield. That is one respect in which they were lax, namely the preparation of their coal for domestic use.

It was about fifteen years ago that a small company down there, I believe it was the Bras d'Or Company, undertook a program of giving to the people of Nova Scotia a coal which could be used in their own homes. Not only did they clean it, but they oiled it. It was that action which brought the matter to the attention of other industries in that part of Canada.

This is not the first time that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe)—but not as the minister of that department—has come to the rescue of the Nova Scotia coal industry. In 1945 the Acadia Coal Company was in distress and losing money. Mr. Gordon who was at the head of that company felt there was one procedure which would be helpful in that situation.

Formerly there was down there an old-fashioned town by the name of Thorburn. It was burnt-out, so to speak. However in that vicinity there was another good seam of coal known as the McBean seam. The Acadia Company came to the department headed by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce and placed their plan before him. They wanted to borrow money, and offered a plan indicating to the minister that if they were supplied with sufficient money they could open up and mechanize the mine so that the Acadia Coal Company would be placed in a position whereby instead of losing $100,000 a year they would make a small profit.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce is not susceptible to ideas unless they are well supported. In other words, if I may use a common expression, he is from Missouri. Not being satisfied, what did he do? He placed at the disposal of the coal company the services of an expert engineer from the United States who, after looking over the field, endorsed the soundness of the economics in the situation. Treasury board did not hand out money, but proceeded to guarantee a loan to the extent of $750,000 from the banks.

Let me assure the minister today that that action was greatly needed, particularly in the county of Pictou. Indeed I think the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McCulloch), in the event of the passing of the minister before the hon. member, should constantly pray for the repose of the minister's soul.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): How soon should we start praying?

Mr. Carroll: A good deal has been said about markets. In what he said the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) was quite right: we do need markets. Our securing of markets however must always be premised on the assumption that we can secure cheap coal. That is the first important point. We see therefore that production enters into the picture of markets. We may have all the production in the world, but if we cannot have it at competitive prices, cheaper than we are getting it today, we shall not be able to secure the markets.

I say our markets will come when through our methods of production we are able to get cheaper coal. Only today I was informed that two months ago there was available in Ontario a market for 500,000 tons of industrial coal, but the maritime operators could not supply it. They were competitive, but they did not have the coal—and that is where production enters into the picture.

I can remember that in 1938 there was a tremendous cry throughout the country to get coal into Ontario. An industry in Hamilton gave a contract to the Dominion Coal Company in that very year—and with the possibility of future orders—for 15,000 tons. The company could not supply the order, because their production was not sufficient.

I say therefore that production must be the initial step in the situation—and it must be cheap production. Some years ago it so happened that a commission was set up in this country to look into the situation in connection with coal. I believe it was intended that its investigation should be purely factual, so that it might bring to the attention of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce—not so much to the attention of the coal industry—what was necessary to give us a satisfactory national coal program. This has something to do with the situation to which the hon. member for Cape Breton South referred this morning. Everything possible should be done in the mechanization of these mines to protect the lives of those who go down into the mines to dig the coal.

One of the first things that we attempted to find out was what could be done in the maritime provinces to safely mechanize the mines. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said that we would have to get a man who knew something about safety measures as well as production. We did get a man who was recommended by a certain coal organization in the United States and by John L. Lewis, the head of the United Mine Workers of America, a Mr. Young. This gentleman went into the whole situation.

The minister of industries, not acting in the capacity of villain in which he was painted the other day but as a Canadian keenly interested in this country, obtained the services of Mr. Wheeler, a gentleman who had been loaned to the British coal control to see what could be done in the mechanization of mines over there. I do not know whether it was necessary to frighten the parliamentarians over there, but anyway this gentleman was brought to Ottawa and in conference with Mr. Young went into the whole question of mechanization as it affected production and safety. Their report does not appear in full in the report of the commission, but I imagine it can be found in the files of the mines department or some place down there anyway.

In the meantime a small-scale mechanization was decided upon in connection with these mines, what was called a short-term plan. This was concurred in by the engineers I have mentioned. The Dominion Coal Company anticipates that within five years 40 per cent of its daily output of over 7,000 tons will be from totally mechanized mines. The company estimates that the productivity of these mines will be increased by five tons per man-day and, with the return to pre-war productivity in the other mines, the over-all unit production will be 3·5 tons per man-day on an 18,000 tons daily output. The company considers that this program will cost about $2,500,000, excluding the necessary outlay for a preparation plant. Old Sydney collieries believe that its two mines can be totally mechanized and that their productivity can be raised to five tons per man-day. The company's plans anticipate that this will be accomplished within a period of five years at a cost of a little over $1,000,000 excluding provision for preparation.

That work has been undertaken in those two mines, and as a matter of fact, so far as the Old Sydney collieries are concerned, it was undertaken two years ago. Mr. Gordon, general manager of the Dominion Coal Company and its subsidiaries, I think is the most progressive, the most courageous man who has ever occupied that position. He is a man of great vision.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What is the production per man per day after the two years?

Mr. Carroll: The last figure I got for 1948 was 2·6 tons.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): No progress.

Mr. Carroll: That is the over-all production. In those particular mines it is much more. Mr. Gordon was not satisfied with having to pay tremendous prices for coal loaders and that sort of thing which would have to be imported into this country and he went down to Washington and organized the situation so that this equipment will be manufactured in the Trenton steel industry at Sydney.

The other day I picked up a clipping which makes a reference to these mines I am talking about, the Old Sydney and the No. 1-B, which reads:

> Dominion Coal Company has just installed a new 1,800 h.p. mine hoist for its No. 1-B colliery, Cape Breton island. The new hoist and another like it at the colliery are the most powerful hoists ever built for underground service in any colliery in the world.
> The new 70-ton hoist will pull 17 full cars of a gross weight of 110,000 pounds on a fairly steep gradient at a speed of 1,350 feet per minute.

Then followed something that made me feel good and should make everybody in Nova Scotia feel good:

> It took over a year to build the new hoist at the Trenton Steel Works of Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, another subsidiary of Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation. After tests, it was recently stripped down and shipped to Cape Breton for installation.
> The giant hoists are required because of the increasingly greater depth at which subterranean mining is being carried out.

That is one of the things that Mr. Gordon proposed three years ago and it is one of the things that he has carried out in connection with the small plan. But a long-term plan has been submitted by the two engineers I referred to, it being prepared in consultation with the mining engineers of the coal company and with another engineer from the west who was there at the time. This will cost a tremendous amount of money. It will require the continuous efforts of a skilled staff for several years to develop the engineering data necessary to determine whether the erection of a full-sized cleaning plant is warranted. However, as I said a moment ago, I am not going into that over-all plan. I have no doubt in the world that it is the intention of the company to go ahead with that over-all long-range plan.

This morning there was an item read by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) who knows more about actual coal mining in this country than anybody else I know. He has spent many a hard tiresome day in the mines, and many a hard tiresome hour walking back a mile and a half from the actual mining operation to the surface. He drew the attention of the house to the fact that at Campbellton in the Atlantic region there are tremendous piles of coal that have been purchased from the United States. I think there is something rotten in the state of Denmark so far as that is concerned, but there is no doubt about the facts. It is not as large a quantity as last year, but it is there because of the fact that certain coal was dumped in this country about five or six months ago—the practice may be continuous—and sold to the Canadian National Railways at a very low price. I do not want to contradict the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), but there are no subventions on maritime coal going into the Campbellton area. Therefore if the United States sells coal there at a much cheaper cost than Nova Scotia coal, or other maritime coal, the competition is not met by subvention. I do not know much about subventions at the present time, and as a matter of fact never did, but I do not think there is any subvention paid on Nova Scotia coal competing with coal produced in New Brunswick.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is very much misinformed because ever since a subvention has been given there has been one on Nova Scotia coal coming into New Brunswick. I know that for a fact, and I think the minister will bear me out.

Mr. Carroll: It was just about two years ago that I got the information. I do not know whether I am right, but in any event I am not contradicting the hon. member. We had a meeting in Fredericton a few years ago and that very question was raised. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, to have overstepped my time, but particularly on behalf of the province of Nova Scotia and the island of Cape Breton I am very thankful to the government for the assistance they are offering to the companies. It is not an indication of failure on their part. It is a loan to the coal companies. I want to thank the government for that, but I feel down to the bottom of my heart—it is not out of my mouth yet—that the two gentlemen who are responsible for it are the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and our minister from Nova Scotia (Mr. Winters). A few years ago they were two in one. The present minister from Nova Scotia was assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. They were two in one. I do not know whether it was at that time that the Minister of Trade and Commerce made his assistant aware of the interests of the coal industry in the maritime region, but we are indebted to these two gentlemen for the present measure.

The other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce was variously described as a hero and a villain. I do not care in what capacity he was acting in this regard so long as he has not hurt the government and the country. I do not care whether he was a villain or a hero. I think he was acting as a real business executive. He is following the same role that he carried on during the war when the production of Canada was taken from nothing to a place where it was the envy of the world. He may have been a villain in the eyes of Germany in those days because he took quick steps to put the Germans in their place, and to keep them there at least for some time to come.

I want to say one word more, and perhaps it should be addressed to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Gibson). I shall be at his door in a short time, and I hope that he will have his geological and survey officials co-operate with the mines department of Nova Scotia as to mining methods and everything else. I hope a complete survey will be made of the west coast of the island of Cape Breton which happens to be in the constituency that I represent. We have coal there, but the trouble in the past has been that the people who had control of the coal did not mine it properly. They were given too much leeway. That is why I am asking the Minister of Trade and Commerce to interest his friend, the Minister of Mines and Resources, in this matter, or whoever may be the new minister. I hope the result will be that they will put at the service of the mines department of the province of Nova Scotia not only geologists but also technical advisers to see if something cannot be done for the purpose of bringing the industry to life again in that particular part of the province.

Mr. P. C. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I represent the second largest coal producing centre in eastern Canada, the county of Cumberland. On behalf of the coal miners, business people and all other residents of that county, I want to express appreciation to the minister and to the government for introducing this legislation. I also want to express my appreciation to the members of the house for the good will they have shown towards the coal industry of the maritime provinces on the present occasion and previously. We are fortunate today in having the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) with us. He has as intimate a knowledge of the operations of the coal industry in Nova Scotia as anybody. He has the advantage of having rubbed shoulders with the miners of Nova Scotia, and he knows their viewpoint. We are fortunate in this discussion in having in the house the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll) who has lived in the coal mining areas. He made a study of the industry over Canada, and after two or three years of investigation his royal commission brought down a report, which contains a great deal of information. Nothing much of a practical nature has been done with respect to it as yet, though I believe this legislation is along the lines of that study and in accordance with the views of the people associated with the coal mining industry in eastern Canada.

This industry is faced with great problems, problems of production, freight and markets; and over the years there has been the problem of human relations. To have this industry built up and put upon a sound basis would mean a great deal to our part of Canada. The federal government is going to do some financing, but the money will be paid back because the loans are made to these coal companies on the basis of ordinary industrial loans, to enable them to make improvements and install equipment they might not be able otherwise to obtain. But even if this should cost the federal treasury ten or twenty or fifty million dollars, most of that money would eventually return to central Canada, because a large proportion of the purchases made by the people of Nova Scotia and eastern Canada generally are made here.

For a long time in Canada we have needed a fuel and steel policy; I think everyone agrees that this is necessary. I have been associated with this matter in one capacity or another for twenty-five years. Relations between the workmen and operators twenty-five years ago were about as hostile as they could be. The coal operators in those days were hard-hearted, and did not have the sympathy for the viewpoint of the workmen that they should have had. Efforts were made to break the unions and discourage the miners. I and those associated with me took the stand that the miners were entitled to belong to a union of their own choice; and we supported them in that respect. Legislation was passed and regulations were drawn up to protect and benefit the miners. As the years have gone by I believe the attitude of the operators has changed, so that today there is far more good will toward the workmen and their point of view than there was twenty-five or fifty years ago. I am sure we cannot make a success of that great industry unless we have the confidence and good will of the workmen. Theirs is a hazardous occupation, and over the years they have paid a high price in accidents and fatalities in the operation of these mines. The protective measures have been greatly improved, but there is still much to be done; and no matter how much is done, there is always a great hazard in coal mining.

The coal mines of Nova Scotia are publicly owned by the people of that province. Years ago, in the days of Sir Charles Tupper, they were taken over from the then owners in England, and they have been leased to the operators. Personally I believe the areas leased were too large, and that it would have been much better for the industry and all concerned if this wholesale leasing had not been done. I believe with the government, that this is not an industry that should be operated by any government. It should be operated by private enterprise, under strict supervision.

The hon. member who preceded me spoke of the number of tons raised per man-day. A few years ago that figure was very much lower than it should have been, and I am pleased to note that there has been some improvement. The workmen were blamed for that condition, but they were not at fault. Perhaps there should have been a little more good will on their part at times; perhaps we should not have had some of the strikes that occurred. But many of the best workmen were attracted to other branches of industry, or were told that they should enlist in the services. For this reason many left their places in the mines, where they could have given better service even than on the field of battle. Inexperienced men took their places; the morale of the workmen deteriorated and the production per man was reduced. The workmen were not to blame for that situation, but it stands to their credit.

In recent years increased freight rates have made the delivered cost of the fuel higher, and the payment of subventions started in the early 1930's has been absolutely necessary to enable us to market the quantity of coal we are able to produce. That policy will have to be continued for many years, perhaps to an even greater extent than in the past. It is recognized in Nova Scotia that if we are to have full production in our mines it is necessary that we market yearly in central Canada from three to four million tons of coal. That cannot be done unless there is cheap water transportation and rail subventions. If the Chignecto canal were built and access given to Northumberland strait the shipment of coal would be made easier and transportation costs would be reduced.

There are in the county of Cumberland two of the large coal fields, Springhill and Joggins-River Hebert-Maccan-Chignecto-Fenwick. Springhill is one of the best fields in Canada with the highest quality of coal, running over 14,000 b.t.u.'s. It has been operated for many years, and they have gone down from eleven to twelve thousand feet. One seam is nine feet thick, pure coal; another is six feet thick; another is four and a half feet; and there are other seams in that area. In Cumberland county we produce about six hundred thousand tons per year. In the Joggins-River Hebert-Maccan-Chignecto area there are several seams from sixteen inches up to three feet and more. There are experienced managers and workmen in those mines so that even with those thin seams, production per man has been higher than at any other mine in Nova Scotia. The b.t.u.'s of the coal from that field are not as high as the coal in the Springhill area, but it is splendid domestic coal. These mines should be equipped with washing plants in order to remove the impurities from the finer coal, and I believe that is a contribution which should be made by the federal government. This would increase the quality of the coal produced in that area and widen the markets.

Competition for markets has always been keen, especially during times of depressed business conditions. Back in the thirties, the mines were operating only one or two days a week. There was a surplus of hydroelectrical power which was not being used by the paper mills; and in industry that electrical energy was placed under boilers, and took the place of coal. In those days, there was also the competition of coal coming from overseas, which was brought to this country in the form of ballast. As business conditions improved, the market widened out. It is considered necessary to continue subventions, and to secure a market for three million or four million tons of coal in central Canada.

Maritime coal is now faced with competition from oil. Many domestic establishments are using oil today, whereas in previous years they had to burn coal. It is discouraging for the maritime provinces to find that the Canadian National Railways have been purchasing such large quantities of imported coal. This replaces the coal available in the maritime provinces, and the practice is one that should not be continued. The maritime provinces were disappointed also when it was found that the Prince Edward Island car ferry was equipped to burn oil. This replaced 25,000 or 40,000 tons per year, which it was considered the maritime producers should supply.

There should be some development in connection with making chemicals from coal. So far, that has not taken place in Nova Scotia. Coal from the maritime provinces has been shipped in the roughest, cheapest form. Industries were built up in Germany, Great Britain, and to some extent in the United States, for producing chemicals, gasoline and oil from coal. As I have mentioned, washing plants should be established in the River Hebert-Joggins fields, in order to purify the coal, and get a higher percentage of carbon and more b.t.u.'s.

If the maritime provinces are going to compete for the coal market in central Canada they must receive assistance. A cheaper grade of coal might be used in the manufacturing of electric power. In the west, there is a cheap source of power in the form of oil and gas. This oil and gas was partly paid for by the maritime provinces when they contributed in purchasing the land from the Hudson's Bay Company. I believe the federal government should make contributions towards the utilization of cheaper grades of coal in the maritime provinces for the generating of electricity. This would provide that cheap power which is necessary if the maritime provinces are to compete with the other parts of Canada.

Another factor to be considered, Mr. Speaker, is the preservation of American exchange. The more coal we can produce in Canada, the less United States exchange will be required in Canada. I believe this country will be rewarded if the proposal to finance and fully develop the coal-producing mines of Nova Scotia is approved. This is a desirable and necessary proposal. No doubt it should go farther than it does, but I believe the plan the minister is undertaking is essential to the welfare of the maritime provinces. Once again, I express my appreciation to the minister, and to the members of the house, for what is being done.

Mr. Gordon B. Isnor (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. One of the western members told me that if I spoke on this question and took more than two minutes, we would not get this $10 million. I am most anxious to see this bill go through, and for that reason I am going to stay within the two-minute limit.

As one of the members from Nova Scotia, while not directly from a coal-producing area, I want to say that the effect of this bill will be felt throughout the whole province of Nova Scotia, as well as the other maritime provinces. For that reason we are certainly in favour of its early passage. It is a step which should have been taken years ago, as the member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll), who is an authority on the question, and our friend from Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), mentioned.

The main factors entering into this problem are production and markets. Perhaps transportation is a third item, but unless you have production it does not do much good to have markets, as has been clearly shown. I believe we can produce the markets through the sales organization of the biggest company in the coal industry, which produces 87 per cent of the coal produced in our province.

I wish to touch on one or two items that have not been mentioned so far as I know. We have 19 coal operators in Nova Scotia, the largest of which is the Dominion Steel and Coal Company, which produces 87 per cent of the coal. As the member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll) mentioned, the production per man-day is about 1·97 tons.

Mr. Carroll: Two point one nine.

Mr. Isnor: Two point one nine; that figure has gone up since I made a note of it. I mention that because it is estimated that with this new machinery there should be a daily production of something slightly over six tons per man. Production is the all-important question, because increased production naturally lowers your overhead costs and puts you in a position where you are able to meet the competition with which you have to contend. That is the one point, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to place before the house. We produce the second largest amount of coal in Canada. Alberta produced 8,826,239 tons in 1946. We produced 5,425,898 tons. We feel that that could be increased to eight or nine million tons a year at a lower price. If we did that we would be in a position to compete to a greater extent in the markets of central Canada. Someone has already told me that my two minutes have more than expired, and I shall take my seat.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, because of certain remarks that were made earlier I wish to make some comments on the bill and the scope of the provision contained in it. The purpose has been stated to be an improvement of the producing methods of the coal mines of the maritime provinces. The provisions are very wide. They simply state that the minister, with the approval of the governor in council, may enter into agreements with the coal producers to carry out undertakings designed to increase the efficiency of the operations of the coal producers by means of mechanization. Subject to the provisions as to how interest is to be computed and as to the time that repayment is to begin and the placing of a first charge upon the assets of the producer, everything else is upon a wide-open basis at the discretion of the minister. For that reason I should like to point out what I do think we should begin to consider more seriously here in Canada in seeking the most effective use of the very large coal resources we have, and particularly those coal resources in the maritime provinces which have been causing some difficulty for some years from the point of view of economic production.

Speaking earlier in this debate one hon. member said that on another occasion outside this house I had spoken of the way in which the use of our coal could be increased. I do not intend to enlarge upon that statement at this time, because we are dealing now particularly with the improvement of producing methods in the coal mines of the maritime provinces by making it possible to improve mechanization in the coal production of these mines. I do suggest, however, that the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) has put his finger on one way in which a great deal of this coal could be used. Today a very large percentage of the industrial production of the world, and particularly in the highly developed industrialized countries, is based upon a supply of electric energy. The use of coal is still the basis of electric production to a very considerable extent in most countries. We sometimes forget, particularly in the central provinces, in British Columbia as well as in Alberta and Manitoba, that most countries do not possess the great water resources that we do for the production of electric energy. The fact is that in most countries of the world today electricity is obtained primarily from coal, lignite, peat, fuel wood or some other obtainable fuel, and not based upon water supply. The great producers of electric energy before the war, namely the United States, Germany, the United Kingdom, France and Soviet Russia, produced most of their electric energy from coal, lignite, peat, or other fuels. Therefore we should look to the use of coal for the production of electricity in the most economic way in those areas where there are no great waterfalls which can provide electric energy.

In Europe, and particularly in Germany and Russia, shortly before the war highly successful developments had taken place in the production of electric energy by burning low-grade coal under ground and producing gas from which electric energy was produced at costs almost comparable with hydroelectric energy. Whether coal be converted to electricity by an underground process of that kind, or whether it be carried into the great burning furnaces of electric plants beside coal seams through continuous chains of hoppers, or whether it be used in any other manner, I do believe that in the maritime provinces there are great opportunities for the employment of coal for the production of electric energy which could then be carried easily to every part of the province for the purpose of industrial production as well as the various domestic uses which would add to the comfort of the people of every part of the maritime provinces through the possibility of obtaining electric energy at a lower cost than they pay today.

This is not in any way in the realm of theory. In the sub-Moscow area of Russia there is a tremendous electric power plant using low-grade underground seams for the production of gas, which is then turned into electricity at very satisfactory cost levels. When I say that I do not mean satisfactory on the evidence of the information furnished by Soviet engineers, but on the evidence of engineers from Canada who have visited that project.

What procedure is used is of course something to be worked out by engineers who will examine the possibilities in each particular area; but it does seem to me that when we are considering the use of public funds to improve the productive value of the coal that we possess, either in the maritime provinces or elsewhere, we should be at the very vanguard of research in this field. After all, Canada is today in the very forefront in the production of hydroelectric energy. With our enormous coal resources placed in areas which are in many instances distant from the points where the coal will be used immediately, it undoubtedly is desirable to reduce it to the most easily transported form of power that there is.

There is another field of research which I suggest should be contemplated when a subject of this kind is under consideration. In Europe, through pressure of necessity, science had found ways of converting coal into textiles and into many of the things in daily use in the homes, offices and factories. Doubtless there are a number of hon. members here who had the opportunity to attend the world's fair at Paris in either 1937 or 1938, and if they did they will recall that in the German building there were demonstrations of the use of coal for such an infinite variety of useful purposes that it challenged the imagination and opened wide the possibilities to every country which has resources of coal such as we have.

Perhaps we might remember that Germany, which came so close to dominating the world through the use of vehicles moved by internal combustion engines, relied almost entirely upon liquid fuels produced from coal. In addition to the possibility of converting coal into electricity there is also the possibility of liquefying coal and converting it into gasoline and oil, and other liquid products of that type. The German air force and tank force, which came so dangerously close to success in the last world war, relied almost entirely during the greater part of the war upon fuels provided in that way.

In the very nature of the expanding use of gasoline from crude oil obtained from the ground, and the steady consumption of existing supplies which within the measurable future will undoubtedly exhaust certain fields, the cost of that type of fuel is likely to increase to a point where we should be contemplating the use of coal for the production of fuel of that kind in the not too distant future.

I have mentioned these things at this time because the bill before us contains a wide-open provision for assistance to coal producers for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of their production by mechanization. I suggest that mechanization of that kind need not mean only mechanization in the actual hauling of the coal in its solid form, but also mechanization of another kind which would use coal for other purposes.

There is in the bill another feature which interests me, and that is that while $10 million is available as a total amount, the figure indicated as the limit to any one producer is $7,500,000. That would seem to be a large percentage of the total figure. It might be interesting to have the minister inform us if at the present time there is in fact any tentative arrangement in existence which indicates the necessity for single advances of that nature, in relation to the total of $10 million of advances to be made.

I am sure every hon. member supports the idea of mechanization in coal production. I should hope however that in supporting the idea of improving our coal production methods we might also urge that Canada lead the way in the scientific use of our coal resources in the best interests of our people.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): May I have a copy of the bill before we proceed to discuss it?

The Deputy Chairman: Does section 1 carry?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to have a copy of the bill.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I do not think it is fair to carry this section until we have a chance to look at the bill.

Mr. Howe: The bill was distributed two or three days ago. I think the hon. member has it on his file.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. Isnor: Does paragraph (c) which defines "project" include the treating of coal, apart from the production of it?

Mr. Howe: Yes, it includes washing and polishing plants—the entire mechanization from the mine to the finished product.

Mr. Isnor: Does it include the carrying out of research in the research centre at Dalhousie, which is paid for by the company?

Mr. Howe: No, it would not. The purpose of the bill is to improve the efficiency of coal-mining in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Brooks: And New Brunswick.

Mr. Howe: I meant to refer to the maritime provinces. The purpose is to prevent the maritime industry from being priced out of its market. The costs of mining are steadily going up, while the costs of competing coals are tending to fall. The gap is being met at the present time by subventions, but these are getting too large for comfort. We hope to lower the cost of producing maritime coal and to lower the cost of subventions now required to allow that coal to move to market.

Mr. Carroll: If a coal operator wishes to have a preparation plant, might this loan be used for that purpose?

Mr. Howe: Yes. I have already discussed with the premier of New Brunswick, in a very general way, a preparation plant for the Minto area. That particular area seems to lend itself to that solution; which is quite within the terms of the bill.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): How many projects will have the opportunity to get the loan?

Mr. Howe: We have received only one well-rounded project, and that is the project for the mechanization of the mines of the Dominion Steel and Coal Company. That company has spent three years in preparing its projects. It has brought in outside engineers to check the plans worked out by its own operators. An expert has been retained by the coal board to examine its proposals. We have today only one project, which runs to a total of some $15 million, and calls for the mechanization of all the mines of the Dominion Coal Company.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Black (Cumberland): That is the one operation where you propose to lend $7,500,000.

Mr. Howe: Up to that amount.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Have any proposals been made with respect to other smaller operations?

Mr. Howe: We have received none, except that we have discussed in a very preliminary and tentative way a project for a treating plant for the Minto mines.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Would it be possible to have a washing plant for the preparation of the finer and poorer grades of coal, such as those produced in the Maccan area, which then could be made into briquettes? Has the department given consideration to the construction of a briquetting plant in which all the operators in the area could process their coal?

Mr. Howe: That would hardly come within the scope of this bill. There are many briquetting plants in Canada but all are privately owned. This bill is simply to improve the method of bringing coal out of the mine and preparing it for market.

Mr. Brooks: That would include strip mining.

Mr. Howe: Stripping is already a mechanized operation.

Mr. Hansell: We have been told that this bill is to cover any coal mining operations in the maritimes, but is it not really to assist one company which is somewhat in financial distress?

Mr. Howe: I would ask my hon. friend to recall that that one company produces well over 80 per cent of the coal mined in the maritimes and for that reason it is logical that the relief for that operation would be somewhat in proportion to the size of its production. We have discussed, although only in a preliminary way, this matter of a washing plant with several of the small operators in the Minto area. We shall be delighted to discuss a project with any operator in the maritime provinces. The $10 million is sufficient for any operation that we have been asked to assist in at the moment, but if it should prove to be insufficient we will come back to parliament and ask that the appropriation be enlarged. The original figure was $15 million, but it was decided that the prospects for mechanization did not warrant an appropriation of that size at this time.

Mr. Brooks: What is the estimated cost of the mechanization in the Minto area?

Mr. Howe: That project has never really been studied. As I say, it was discussed only in a preliminary way. My hon. friend will note from the terms of the bill that the money advanced has to be paid back and that there must be a private investment along with the public investment. Until such an arrangement can be worked out no estimate of the cost would be warranted.

Mr. Brooks: Are the operators or the provincial government negotiating with the minister?

Mr. Howe: There have been no negotiations. As I say, there were preliminary conversations no more than two or three weeks ago. I think the provincial government will follow up the matter with the operators and advise us if it is their wish that a project be undertaken in the Minto area.

Mr. Brooks: Nothing definite has been decided?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Wright: Has some estimate been made of the extent to which this mechanization will reduce the cost of production? What saving will there be in the cost per ton?

Mr. Howe: It is difficult to know that with any certainty. My hon. friend will notice that the loan is to be repaid at the rate of 30 cents per ton on every ton of coal mined with mechanization provided by this bill. I should think that in the Nova Scotia area the savings will average from $1.50 to $2 per ton.

Mr. Johnston: It is expected that with mechanization these mines will be able to produce coal at an economic figure and pay back the loan?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Johnston: By reason entirely of mechanization?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Hansell: Is it anticipated that there will be new companies in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick which might be granted loans under this bill?

Mr. Howe: The bill is not intended to provide for new companies. I doubt if there is room for any new companies as the better seams are already under development. The purpose of the bill is to improve present mining operations.

Mr. Hansell: I believe that in other parts of Canada companies have been organized but because of certain difficulties have not started operations, and I was wondering how they would fare with this bill. Will they have a right to come to the government for similar assistance? I do not know the maritime coal situation as well as I do that of the west, but is it anticipated for instance that loans will be made for the construction of railroads?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Isnor: A moment ago the minister stated that this bill was intended to assist only privately-owned coal companies. The Inverness Coal Company in Nova Scotia is operated by the province and I should like to know if they would come within the terms of this bill?

Mr. Howe: We have not been asked to consider that and I should not like to give an answer until such a request is received.

Mr. Isnor: It is possible that that company might be taken over by private interests. Would it come within the terms of this bill as a continuing company?

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend will note that before a contract is entered into the coal board and the minister must be sure that the company can put up at least one-third of the expenditures and be able to refund the debt on the due date. If the mine in question can meet those specifications, it might be considered, but perhaps that is a big "if".

Mr. Hansell: Has the minister been approached in the last year or two by any company with respect to the building of a railroad into a coal mining area?

Mr. Howe: That question is hardly necessary, because I remember a rather merry evening in the house when that whole subject was before us and when the applicant was sitting in the gallery. I think my hon. friend took part in the frolic, so I can say "yes".

Mr. Bryce: When you talk about mechanization do you mean that the coal-cutting machinery which is operated by compressed air is simply to be changed to electrical operation, or is entirely new machinery to be installed to work wider and deeper seams?

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I am not as well able to explain this as my hon. friend's deskmate, but great strides have been made in the process of mechanizing coal mines in the post-war years. The hon. member knows that it was thought before the war that the mines of the United Kingdom were not subject to mechanization, and he will also know that great sums have been spent on mechanizing English coal seams with a consequent considerable reduction in the cost of mining. He also knows that new mechanization methods have been introduced into the United States mines within the last two years. New types of cutters and loaders have come into use. It is my understanding that the mechanization of the Nova Scotia mines will follow the latest technique that has been developed in the United States and the United Kingdom since the last war.

Mr. Bryce: I want to thank the minister for that information. I am only drawing on my own experience. I never was a coal miner, but I did a lot of work in the pits in connection with coal-cutting machinery and that sort of thing. Quite recently I was speaking to some of those connected with the British mines, and the machinery there is quite different from what it was in my day.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question. As I understood it, a moment ago the minister in response to a question which had been asked said that the loan would be available if it was approved by the minister and the dominion coal board.

Mr. Howe: And by cabinet council as well.

Mr. Drew: So far as I can see the dominion coal board is not called upon to approve the loan.

Mr. Howe: That is technically true, but the coal board advises the Minister of Trade and Commerce in all matters affecting coal, and the authority of the minister is exercised through the agency of the dominion coal board.

Mr. Drew: The only reason I mention it is that I want it to be quite clear that the bill gives the authority to the minister to make an advance, and the only place where the dominion coal board comes in is in determining the cost for the purpose of fixing the terms of repayment.

Mr. Howe: I think it is usual in cases of this kind that the minister and cabinet council shall have authority to decide on the project; but, as I say, the coal board is the agency of the minister in this matter.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to ask a question as to what the situation will be if coal producers mining the smaller seams agree to install a washing and briquetting plant in order to remove impurities and increase the b.t.u.'s of the coal. Nothing they could do would tone up the whole coal operation in that area to a greater extent than the installation of such a plant so that the poorer grades of coal might be improved and made marketable for domestic purposes. If they agree to undertake such an operation either singly or jointly under this legislation, would it be practical for the department to co-operate with them?

Mr. Howe: The coal board will certainly study a proposal of that sort, and if it is found to be within the limits of the act I think it will qualify. I mentioned briquetting. That is a little different from the mining operations that the bill is intended to assist. Most briquetting plants are built with private capital and are operated as a separate industry, but nevertheless I am sure the coal board would be glad to study any proposal put forward from the maritime provinces, and if it can be fitted into the act it will then qualify.

On section 3—Loans to producers.

Mr. Ashbourne: While the bill is before the committee I should like to point out to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that considerable delay has been experienced by schooners and auxiliary craft at North Sydney in procuring cargoes of coal for Newfoundland, and possibly also for other parts of the maritimes. I should like to point out the seriousness of this at all times, and particularly during the latter months of the year when it is most important that stocks of coal be provided especially for the northern part of Newfoundland before the close of navigation. As I understand it, the practice is that these vessels arrive at North Sydney, book their cargoes, and then if a large steamer arrives the smaller auxiliaries have to wait.

There may be half a dozen or a dozen of these smaller craft which will carry 200 to 250 tons of coal each. They have to wait while a large steamer comes in and fills up with possibly 3,000 tons. I think this practice needs to be investigated. I heard of a case recently where one of the prominent firms of Newfoundland had to take off a boat from the coal-carrying run in order that another charter it had to carry fish south might not be prejudiced. On account of the delay which this vessel would likely experience at North Sydney, they could not take a chance on sending her back there for a cargo of coal. It may be that additional loading facilities are required, and perhaps another pier, but I should very much like the Minister of Trade and Commerce to look into the matter and see whether or not greater dispatch cannot be achieved so that the expediting of these cargoes of coal can be speeded up. I am sure the people of Newfoundland would be most thankful for his attention in that regard.

Mr. Howe: The problem mentioned by my hon. friend is squarely within the responsibilities of the dominion coal board. Now that it has been called to my attention, and to the attention of the board, I assure him that an investigation will be made and steps taken to ensure that adequate supplies of coal can move to Newfoundland.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to ask the minister what will be the terms of the loan. For how long a period will it be and what will be the rate of interest?

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend is now referring to section 4.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Section 3 deals with the loan.

Mr. Howe: Section 4 mentions the rate of interest and the term of the loan.

Mr. Hansell: I think section 3 is a good one. It would seem that those charged with the administration of it are going to see that the coal mining companies are run on a sound and efficient basis. If those in charge of the granting of loans find that companies are not so organized, I fancy they will not get a loan. The section looks good if it works out properly. A lot can happen to a company of this kind to render it inefficient. Subsection 2 (d) reads:

> That the coal producer is following sound and reasonable policies as to dividends and will repay the loan and interest as provided by the agreement.

Would the minister care to say what he thinks would be a fair rate of dividend? I think that information should be given because there are companies operating without assistance which are cutting their dividends in order to operate efficiently. Would the minister care to give us an answer?

Mr. Howe: A fair dividend depends entirely upon the current earnings of the mine and the extent to which those current earnings depend upon subventions or other government assistance. Generally speaking I would think that if the government is co-operating to finance improvements, dividends certainly should be limited to preferred dividends, and preferred dividends should be paid only if they are well earned under normal conditions, without government assistance.

Mr. Hansell: Would the government have anything to say as to what the amount of those dividends should be? Would the government insist that they be reasonable during the time of amortization? What would be the position?

Mr. Howe: The government has the right to determine the conditions on entering into the agreement. It is one of the conditions of this bill that the dividend policy shall be reasonable in the light of all the facts, and the agreement made is bound to touch upon the matter of dividend payments.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Terms of repayment.

Mr. Hansell: It appears to me that the rate expected to be applied to the repayment of loans, that is 30 cents per net ton, is pretty optimistic. This morning I placed on record from the report of the Carroll commission the approximate figures with respect to profits per ton in the coal mining industry of Canada. In its conclusion that report placed the profit per ton for the entire coal mining industry at about 10 cents. I should like to know how this figure of 30 cents is arrived at. I do not mind that figure being in the bill, because the sooner they can pay off the loans the better; but I do not see how it can be expected that the operators are going to be able to pay dividends, pay interest on the loans and still show a profit of 30 cents a ton to be applied on the principal, unless unusual circumstances prevail in connection with a particular company. What this means is that the assistance they are given by way of loans in order to mechanize and modernize their mines is expected to enable them to sell coal at a profit of something considerably more than 30 cents a ton. To me that appears rather optimistic. Suppose they are not able to meet that payment of 30 cents; what happens then? Are we going to write off the loan as a bad debt eventually? Would the minister inform the committee just how that figure of 30 cents was arrived at? It could not have been a guess; actuarial genius must have been at work in order to arrive at that figure.

Mr. Isnor: Perhaps before the minister replies I might ask a question along the same line. I had my finger on that figure of 30 cents, and wanted to get some information about it. Taking the main operator, who is entitled to borrow $7,500,000, with an output amounting to 87 per cent of the total, if my quick calculation is correct that company would have an average production of roughly 4,500,000 tons, and would repay the loan in something like six years. My figures may not be correct, but if they are this would appear to be quite a burden upon the company, bearing in mind that they should not increase the price to the consumer in order to make up this 30 cents.

Mr. Howe: The 30 cents is fixed as a reasonable part of the saving that mechanization will produce, to be used for amortization of the government loan. This is not the first loan of the kind to be made in the maritime fields. Back in 1944 or 1945 we were asked to guarantee a bank loan to mechanize the McBean seam at New Glasgow. The hon. member for Pictou was very active in promoting that proposal, and the loan was made. We guaranteed a loan of $730,000, and the terms of repayment provided that the loan should be liquidated in quarterly instalments of $36,500 over a five-year period which I believe works out at the rate of roughly 25 cents per ton of coal now being produced from the seam. Those payments have been made on the due dates, and by this time I rather think the loan is pretty well retired. Generally speaking, unless mechanization effects substantial savings in the cost of mining coal we had better not go ahead with the bill. If this legislation will not produce savings that will permit amortization of the loans at the rate of 30 cents per ton, I would not bother with it. My hon. friends speaks of paying this amount out of earnings. That is a little different to paying it as amortization. Earnings are subject to taxation and are quite different from amortization provided for under the terms of the bill.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I agree with what has been said by some hon. members. In our area, with the smaller seams, I believe they rarely make a profit of 30 cents per ton on their operations, and that figure would seem to me to be excessive. The operations the minister has referred to are financed by a wealthy company, Dominion Coal Company, which has great assets of one kind or another and is able to meet such charges in its ordinary financial operations. It is much more difficult for some of these smaller companies to do so. While I know they would be glad to get the loan paid off as quickly as possible, it seems to me that it will be a pretty severe hardship on them if a profit of 30 per cent is to be taken as a first charge on their operations.

The minister says he would not be interested in a loan of this kind unless the companies were prepared to meet this condition. I want to point out to him that in carrying on coal mining operations there is continuous development and continuous expense in connection with the replacement of machinery, the sinking of deeper shafts, putting in new workings and so on. While a certain tonnage may be taken out on which a profit will be realized, that profit is put back into new machinery or further operations; so it would seem to me that 30 per cent—

Mr. Howe: It is 30 cents per ton.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): It seems to me that is a pretty heavy burden to impose on many of these operations that will be looking to the department for financial assistance.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to ask the minister a question concerning subsection 3. From what he said about the Minto area I rather gather that there it would be a joint undertaking of the different operators, who are all carrying on in a rather small way. The minister said he had discussed the matter with the premier of New Brunswick, and I thought it might be a joint operation.

Subsection 3 provides:

> A loan shall be secured by a first charge or mortgage in favour of His Majesty on the mine and equipment in respect of which the loan is made or on other property of the coal producer or by such other security as the minister may approve.

Suppose that this is a joint operation, and one operator's mine was clear while another was encumbered; is there some way that is being worked out with the local government? When it says "other security", I take it that means that the local government might give security for the operator in that area? Frankly, I would be afraid that the coal mines in the Minto area were not clear of encumbrances. Is there some way this could be made to apply to them?

Mr. Howe: The recommendations that have been made for improving the Minto field include a washing and cleaning plant. This would probably be a custom plant. By that I mean a plant that would take in anyone's coal, and clean it at so much a ton. The mortgage could only be on the plant itself; the mines could not be involved.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member for Macleod put on the record the amount of the per ton profit. Those figures did not impress me very much.

Mr. Hansell: I got them from the commission's report.

Mr. Gillis: They still do not impress me. The major portion of this money will be lent to Dosco, which is a $29 million per year corporation. I believe the minister's audit department ought to consider the fact that this company has 29 subsidiary operations hooked on to the coal industry. It is so easy, with such a large organization, to divert profits from one company to the other, and hide them. I believe the minister will have to watch that no items, except those entering into the cost of producing coal, are considered in the current year in relation to this 30 cent charge which the bill contains. As the member for Cumberland suggested, development work and other such things should be charged as a capital cost, and not be charged against the cost of producing coal.

In the past, if a million dollars was spent on development, instead of charging that as a capital cost over a period of years, it would be charged against the cost of producing coal in that year. I do not think there is going to be any difficulty with the bill. The minister has handled subventions and subsidies for coal for the past eight or nine years, so I believe he is familiar with the policy of those who will be borrowing the money. He will know their methods of manipulation. I do not believe there will be any difficulty on that score.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Depreciation allowance.

Mr. Low: Will the minister give us an example of what is meant by that clause 5? I believe I know, but I should like to make sure.

Mr. Howe: The repayment of the loan is to be treated as accelerated depreciation. In other words, when the payment is made for any year, the portion of the earnings which represents the repayment of this loan is not subject to taxation. So far as the funds that are advanced privately by the company are concerned—that must be at least one-third of the expenditure—those funds are not subject to the accelerated depreciation. So far as the funds representing the repayment of the government's loan are concerned, such funds will be allowed accelerated depreciation.

Mr. Low: Am I correct in assuming that holds good only in so far as the portion of their original investment that has not been written off is concerned?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Low: I am wondering where the companies stand who have made provision out of their earnings for mechanization improvements and so on? In the past, some of these companies have put sums into a reserve, on which they have had to pay taxes under the Income Tax Act. Is the minister not making a provision here which might be looked upon as discriminatory by such mines as have made provision for their own mechanization?

Mr. Howe: Frankly, I believe the answer is yes. We admit that this is discrimination in favour of the Atlantic maritime mines. The reason for it is that we do not see any other way of providing for the future of the maritime mines. These mines are in jeopardy today by reason of the constantly rising costs and the competition from lower-cost United States coal. United States coal is dropping in price. As I said, the gap is being bridged presently by subventions from the government.

In order to make it possible for these mines to remain solvent, we are extending a privilege to them which has not been extended to the western mines, except in the war period. During the war we did allow accelerated depreciation on new developments and equipment installed in the western mines. Perhaps when this job is finally completed there will not be much difference in the treatment between east and west.

Mr. Low: Now that the minister had introduced these principles, with which I agree,—I think it is a splendid thing, even though it is discriminatory—I think the minister should consult with his colleagues the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue to have this privilege extended to other mines in Canada. It is the only way they are going to be able to meet their situation in the years to come. In many western mines, we know there is a need for further mechanization in order to cut down costs and enable them to compete in central Canadian markets. This is an excellent way of helping them do it, by extending this same principle of accelerated depreciation to these mines in other parts of Canada.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I cannot quite agree with my hon. friend as to the perilous state of the western mines. I believe the latter have built themselves into a good financial position, and are operating profitably. In normal times, accelerated depreciation is a privilege that must be granted sparingly. It is a form of discrimination, if you like. To my mind it is not a great concession, because after a mine has written off all its depreciation it has no more to write off, and the owner has to pay taxes on all his earnings. Whether it is a good thing for a company to accept accelerated depreciation, and use up its depreciation fund in a short time, rather than to pay normal depreciation and draw on the fund for a longer time, is a matter upon which companies have their own views. Some take one view and some another. Nevertheless, it is government policy to keep the depreciation practice of all industries in Canada on the basis prescribed in the Income Tax Act. This maritime provision is a deviation from that principle.

Mr. Hatfield: I should like to ask the minister if this loan is to be used for production machinery only, or can it be used for grading machinery or something of that nature?

Mr. Howe: This can be used only for mechanization that will improve the efficient production of coal.

On section 9—Annual report.

Mr. Hansell: I have a point I should like to raise. We had a discussion some time ago in respect to the submission of reports. I note that this clause says that the report shall be laid before parliament within three months after it has been prepared or, if parliament is not in session, within fifteen days after the commencement of the next session.

Three months is quite a little while. Perhaps we could shorten that up considerably. Why should it lie around for three months? Would the minister care to comment on it?

Mr. Howe: Frankly, I am wondering that myself. I think it could very well have been three weeks, but whether it is worth while amending the bill I do not know. If my hon. friend insists we may put through an amendment. It is pretty late in the session.

Mr. Hansell: Since I have never had the glory of having an amendment accepted in parliament I may just as well not insist that this amendment be made; it isn't that important.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SURPLUS CROWN ASSETS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS CROWN ASSETS BY CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 195, to amend the Surplus Crown Assets Act.

He said: In my opinion this is a bill of no great importance. It is a tidying up bill. In June, 1944, the house passed the Surplus Crown Assets Act to set up a corporation to dispose of surplus war materials. The corporation was formed and it has carried out its work. It has sold goods producing a gross revenue to the crown of $462 million. The disposal of war equipment surplus as a result of the war is pretty well finished, but the corporation is still receiving declarations of surpluses at the rate of about 280 a month from various departments, and from the armed services. The corporation controls a good deal of real estate acquired during the war, which it has not yet been able to sell, and it still has to collect some $31 million of accounts outstanding. It is quite obvious that the corporation must carry on for a considerable period, but it does not need all the machinery that was used when it was carrying out its war duties.

The purpose of the bill is to simplify the corporation, to dispense with the crown assets allocation committee, which is required by the present act, and to streamline the act to allow it to carry out its duties to the extent that is required under present-day conditions.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

[Mr. Hansell.]

On clause 1—Definitions.

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two questions to ask. I shall first of all be a bit critical because the public accounts committee was not set up this session to give us an opportunity to call witnesses in connection with the War Assets Corporation. The procedure and practices of the corporation were criticized by the Auditor General in the report of March 31, 1949, in which he said:

> I have examined the accounts of War Assets Corporation for the year ended March 31, 1949, and have obtained all the information and explanations I have required. The procedures and practices of the corporation were not of such a nature as to permit establishing by examination of records maintained that all assets received for disposal had been fully accounted for.

There is another matter that I should like to bring to the attention of the committee. Why cannot the Canadian Commercial Corporation look after the selling of these surplus assets as well as do the buying? It has an organization already set up. It is true that in industry there is a purchasing department and a sales department, but they more or less deal with the commodities of one industry. Here we have to purchase for eighteen departments or more, and it would seem reasonable that the sale of surplus goods could be handled by the same agencies. In industry the products are related, but in this instance the products are unrelated and cover a wide range of articles. I feel that it would be better business, and the government would do a better job, if it were handled by one government agency, and if the buying and selling were done under the one head.

Mr. Howe: That is not the experience of the department. The buying is one job, and selling the vast accumulation of unrelated products is another job. At one time the War Assets Corporation had over ten thousand employees located in all parts of the country. Its staff has been reduced to about 160 employees today, and the volume of work is decreasing; nevertheless the new sales that will be made in this current year represent a return to the crown of some $11 million. It is big business, business for a staff that is specialized and used to evaluating the kind of second-hand material that this corporation deals with. That is totally different from the experience required by the staff of the purchasing corporation.

Mr. Knowles: This first clause does some of the things which the minister referred to when he outlined the purpose of this bill. For example, it gets rid of the surplus crown assets allocation committee and makes one or two other administrative changes. I see, Mr. Chairman, that you are looking at the clause and trying to see where these things are.

If you take this clause and compare it with the section of the bill for which it is a substitute you will find that it leaves out such an important part of the machinery as the surplus crown assets allocation committee. If the purpose of the bill is, as the minister indicated, simply to tidy up the work of surplus war assets, it would seem reasonable to eliminate some of the machinery and get things on a more simplified basis. On the other hand, as indicated by subparagraph (b) of this clause and the other clause to which it refers, the name of the organization is being changed. The word "war" is being left out and it is being made to appear as a more permanent organization. In fact, the minister has just said that there are still 280 declarations of surplus per month.

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: It does look as though this body will stay in existence for some time. As a matter of fact the very change in the name makes me wonder whether, instead of its being an organization merely for the disposal of surplus war assets, it is becoming an organization that can dispose of crown property at any time and on any terms.

That being so, I confess frankly—although the minister may be able to set aside my fears—that there are one or two things which concern me. Section 1 (e), when compared with the corresponding paragraph in the original act, gets rid of the necessity of orders in council in certain cases. The minister is aware of that; I need not read it. In other words this bill puts more power directly in the hands of the minister himself.

The minister has already said that this bill gets rid of the crown assets allocation committee. Formerly there were three bodies connected with this matter, namely, the corporation, the committee and the minister. The committee was a body to advise the minister. Now the committee will be gone, with just the minister and the corporation remaining. And later on we shall find that the minister has power to delegate his authority to the corporation.

As I say, all this is reasonable, if this job is just about over, or if it is a case of just tidying up. But if what we have here is the setting up of a peacetime crown assets disposal organization, it seems to me we should ask why the necessity for orders in council is being done away with, and why more power is being put in the hands of the minister, and this minister in particular. I have other questions relating to other sections.

Mr. Howe: This is intended to be a permanent disposal organization.

Mr. Knowles: It is permanent?

Mr. Howe: Yes, permanent. Prior to the war there was a disposal agency centred in the Department of Finance; but in effect each department of government had its own disposal arrangements, subject to the approval of the disposal officer.

The problem has grown a good deal with the years. As I say, the war itself has created problems which will be with us for many years, collections being made representing some $31 million. Some of these payments are not due for several years. The government has decided to make the surplus crown assets disposal agency a permanent instrument of government; and this bill is for that purpose.

Mr. Knowles: That being so, I feel I should press my question as to why a change has been made doing away with the necessity for orders in council in certain cases before property can be declared as surplus crown assets.

Section 2(f) of the act, of which section 2(e) in the bill is the amending section, states:

> (f) "surplus crown assets" means property that has been
> (i) included in a report made to the minister under section three; or
> (ii) declared by the governor in council to be unnecessary to satisfy the requirements of the government department by which it is kept, administered or controlled; and > has not been subsequently deleted from the report with the consent of the minister or disposed of pursuant to the provisions of this act.

The new subsection 1 in the bill before us amends section 2 of the act by getting rid of paragraph (f) and substituting the new paragraph (e) which reads as follows:

> (e) "surplus crown asets" means the property that is included in a report made to the minister under section three and has not subsequently been deleted from the report with the authority of the minister or disposed of pursuant to this act.

The principal difference between those two paragraphs is the elimination of the necessity under certain circumstances for orders in council in order that goods be declared surplus. Would the minister tell me why the orders in council are being done away with and why greater power is being placed in the minister's hands?

Mr. Howe: I think my hon. friend has overlooked one word.

Mr. Knowles: The word "or"?

Mr. Howe: Yes, the word "or". As a matter of fact all the surplus has been declared on the report made to the minister under section 3. We have never used orders in council to declare surplus, and it is not necessary under the old act. Departments could do it that way if they wished; but it was so much simpler to do it the other way that that is the way we always followed. And since declaration by the governor in council has never been used in the past, there is no use perpetuating the method.

Mr. Knowles: The minister may not always see eye to eye with me, and he may think I always want to fight with him, but I accept that as a satisfactory answer—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: —even though there seems to be some amazement at my doing so. Another question has to do with paragraph (c) in the amending bill in which a number of crown corporations or other bodies are exempted from the definition of "government department". I notice that the Polymer Corporation is not mentioned here. Is there any significance in that omission?

Mr. Howe: No. The corporations mentioned are self-contained corporations owning their own assets, and the sale of whose assets would normally go into the funds of the corporation concerned rather than into those of the receiver general. My hon. friend will appreciate that all the moneys recovered by crown assets corporations are paid over to the receiver general. However, in the case of the Canadian National Railways, the railway is a separate corporation and would naturally recover funds arising from disposal of its property. The same is true of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Bank of Canada, the Industrial Development Bank and Trans-Canada Air Lines. All are self-contained corporations.

May I say, Mr. Chairman, that I believe I have overlooked a duty—and I hope the committee will bear with me in my omission. I had intended introducing an amendment to section 1 of the bill which would include among the corporations excluded the national harbours board. Again, it is a trustee of certain funds as a self-contained corporate body. I would ask my colleague to move this amendment.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That section 1 of the bill be amended by adding the words "or the National Harbours Board" immediately after these figures "1937" in line 21 at page 1 of the bill.

Mr. Howe: I hope my hon. friend will not tell me I am breaking the rules—because I think I am.

Mr. Graydon: That applies to paragraph (c).

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: I have no objection to the amendment. What I have to say can be said now as well as back on the clause, so may I return to the point I raised earlier, using Polymer Corporation as an example.

Section 2 (c) states that "government department" shall mean a department of the government of Canada or a board, commission, corporation or other body that is an agent of His Majesty in right of Canada, but does not include—and then it sets out the Canadian National Railways, The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Industrial Development Bank, Trans-Canada Air Lines and, after this amendment, the national harbours board.

The point I am trying to make is this: Should not Polymer—which is a government corporation—be added in the same way as the minister has added the national harbours board to the other exceptions, such as the C.N.R. Is not Polymer, like the C.N.R., a self-contained corporation?

Mr. Howe: There is a difference. The Polymer Corporation is really a management corporation. The capital assets of the Polymer Corporation are owned directly by the crown; it has no capital assets of its own.

Mr. Knowles: That being so, the Polymer Corporation might qualify as a government department, under this amending section.

Mr. Howe: Sale of its production would come under section 3, subsection 2, paragraph (b).

Mr. McIlraith: I think the hon. member is thinking of the production of Polymer Corporation. If he will look at section 3, subsection 2, paragraph (b), I think he will find that the point is covered. The corporation is responsible for the disposal of capital assets, but the production is excluded from the operations of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

Mr. Graydon: I should like to inquire about the difference in status of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the Polymer Corporation. A moment ago the minister indicated that one reason why Polymer was not included in the excepted corporations along with C.B.C. and C.N.R. was that the title to the assets of Polymer was in the crown. Is it not true that the title to the assets of Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is also in the crown?

Mr. Howe: The assets of Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are vested in the corporation itself. As my hon. friend will remember, that corporation obtains from the public purse loans which are subject to repayment. The shares of C.B.C. are owned by the crown, but C.B.C. owns its own assets.

Mr. Graydon: I am glad to be corrected on that point because I thought the crown held title to the C.B.C. property.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend will recall the tax disputes that have occurred as to whether the property is crown property, and I think the courts have held that it is the property of the corporation and subject to taxation.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Repeal.

Mr. Knowles: This section repeals sections 5, 6, 7 and 8 of the original act and does away with the crown assets allocation committee, which formerly advised the minister in connection with these matters. Why does the minister feel that that committee is no longer necessary?

Mr. Howe: In the early days of disposal certain assets that were declared surplus by one department could be used by another department and the purpose of the crown assets allocation committee was to make sure that there was not a use within the government for articles declared surplus. Certain procedures were set up on the recommendation of the crown assets allocation committee which are no longer necessary for the type of disposal carried on today. Further advice on the procedures is not necessary as the procedures are well established. The work of the crown assets allocation committee had dwindled to the point where no one would attend its meetings because there is nothing of interest going on. This results from a definite change in the character of the assets being declared surplus.

Mr. Knowles: It is all being left to the minister.

Mr. Howe: The minister does not worry about that particular problem.

Mr. Green: What is the reason for the exceptions that have been made? It is provided that the Department of Mines and Resources may dispose of some of its own lands and properties, and the same with regard to the Department of Transport.

Mr. Howe: The operations of the Department of Mines and Resources in the Northwest Territories are exempted. Those operations have been carried on by the department for a great many years and the department has a staff there capable of handling problems of disposal in that area. Similarly, the Department of Transport has been dealing with surplus lands acquired in the building of canals, particularly the Welland and the Soulanges canals. The department has outstanding leases on properties and it was not thought well to disturb operations that have an historical background.

Mr. Graydon: What proportion of government assets will be covered by this particular legislation and what proportion will be beyond the purview of this legislation.

Mr. Howe: I think it will be at least twenty to one in favour of operations within the act. I do not know what the future will be. Certain patterns of sales are excluded, but they do not amount to any great sums. There are a number of small transactions which require a particular staff and a particular background to handle efficiently.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Renumbering.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has just given the reasons for doing away with the crown assets allocation committee which formerly provided the machinery for transferring surplus assets from one department to another. Do I take it that this whole business will now rest with the minister? This section provides for a new paragraph (d) which is listed under the powers of the minister and reads:

(b) approve the transfer of surplus crown assets from one government department to another, subject to such terms and conditions as he may consider desirable.

If you look back to the enacting section you will see that the "he" in that section is the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Does this section mean that from now on all deciding as to how goods will be transferred from one department to another will be done by the minister? "He" is Howe.

Mr. Howe: I am told that transfers between departments are not current at the moment, but if one seems desirable it can be done simply by a resolution of the board of directors of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. The class of material being declared surplus today is largely worn out and discarded material which is not likely to be required by another department of government. If it is required, it can be transferred by ministerial action without calling the board together.

Mr. Knowles: That answers my question. The power to effect these transfers will now reside in the minister.

I have another question on this clause. Paragraph (e) is being reworded to read:

(e) authorize a government department to dispose of surplus crown assets in such manner, upon such terms and subject to such conditions as he may consider desirable.

Here again it is the Minister of Trade and Commerce who may do this. The old paragraph read:

(e) empower a government department to sell surplus crown assets upon such terms and subject to such conditions as he may consider desirable.

The section is being changed so that the minister may approve of the disposal of surplus crown assets in such manner as he may consider desirable. Does that mean that things may now be given away rather than sold?

Mr. Howe: No, Mr. Chairman, it does not mean that. We will say the Department of Public Works declares something surplus that the corporation believes has no sale value. The amendment empowers the minister to authorize the Department of Public Works to dispose of it themselves, and the same with any other department. It simply gives the minister responsible for the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation the right to authorize another minister to carry out his own disposal in a particular case.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Delegation of minister's powers to corporation.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, this looks like another of these tidying-up clauses. What is envisaged in the authority that is given the minister to authorize the corporation to do all of the things now provided for under the act, remembering that the committee is gone and there are no more orders in council? All we have now is "he"—the minister.

Mr. Howe: What is my hon. friend's conclusion?

Mr. Knowles: I think my implication is clear. It seems to me that through the whole of this bill our good friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, is just getting more power than he had before—and that was a lot. Here is one place where it seems that, in addition to the power he gets himself, he now has authority to delegate his power to a board. It is quite a piece of tidying up, isn't it?

Section agreed to.

Sections 8 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

On section 15—Coming into force.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister give percentage figures as to the war assets the corporation is disposing of compared with the peacetime goods it may be disposing of?

Mr. Howe: It is difficult to say, because one merges with the other. The principal source of material handled by the corporation is the Department of National Defence. It is difficult to say whether its surpluses are war material or material acquired since the war. Considering worn-out clothing, it is hard to say whether it was worn out in the war or since the war. My hon. friend will appreciate that it is very difficult to make a division.

Mr. Knowles: But the bill has no other purpose than to continue the necessary job which arose because of the war and prompted the setting up of War Assets Corporation?

Mr. Howe: That is correct.

GOLD MINING

AMENDMENT OF ACT RESPECTING EMERGENCY PAYMENTS TO OPERATORS—PRODUCTION OF GOLD IN CONCENTRATES

The house resumed from Friday, November 4, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West)—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act in respect to the manner of calculating the amount of assistance that may be paid operators of gold mines, as prescribed by the act; also to empower the governor in council to prescribe by regulation, in the case of a mine producing gold in concentrates during one period and not producing bullion from such concentrates until a later period, the time when the gold shall be deemed to have been produced and the manner in which the cost of production thereof shall apply.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This morning I spoke to the members of the different opposition parties to see if we could allow the resolution to pass in order that the bill may be introduced and come up on Saturday. The members most interested told me they had no objection, and that they could speak on Saturday or the next time we take up second reading of the bill.

Mr. Graydon: That is also my understanding, with one qualification. We expected that the Minister of Mines and Resources would make a statement on the resolution stage.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): He did make a statement when it was first introduced. The minister made a statement on the resolution at that time.

Mr. Graydon: There is no further statement to be made by the minister now?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Not at this time.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Fournier, Hull (for Mr. Gibson, Hamilton West) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 219, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

413. Departmental administration, $468,107.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce make a statement to the house on the international situation with respect to trade and commerce as it affects Canada?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Chairman, it is customary from time to time for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to discuss the present economic situation and forecast the future. I have been doing both every year since 1944, and in the process I have been accused of being Canada's No. 1 optimist. However, at the moment I have no particular regrets about any statement I have made throughout that period. The statement I am going to make now represents, in my opinion and that of the officers of the Department of Trade and Commerce, a fair estimate of the situation we are facing today and expect to face during the next calendar year.

The Canadian trade picture for 1949 has, on balance, been favourable. While there has been some decline in sales to traditional markets, Canada's exports in terms of dollars will be about as high as last year, while imports will be slightly higher. In a period of readjustment following the abnormal conditions of the last decade, we have been able to maintain our export trade at an extremely high level and to dispose of our major surpluses. The necessary adjustments so far have been made without any real dislocation of Canadian industry; in fact the general level of economic activity in the country as a whole has continued to improve. The year 1949 has been a prosperous one for Canada, and national production, income, employment and consumption will be higher than last year. The strong domestic market that has developed from our recent industrial expansion and high level of domestic prosperity has been an important factor in offsetting to some extent the loss of overseas markets. For example, exports of motor vehicles have been reduced sharply with exports this year at some $40 million below 1947. Yet the home market is now absorbing close to the maximum output of this industry, with the increase in domestic sales about double the fall in exports. In cotton textiles and in electrical equipment the story is similar.

Our exports are a major factor today as they always have been in the past, and Canada's prosperity is dependent to a large extent on the state of world trade and more particularly on our trade with the United Kingdom and the United States, our two largest suppliers as well as our two largest customers. I should like to deal first with these two countries before going on to some of the broader issues of international trade.

During the past year a concerted effort has been made by the Canadian government, as well as that of the United Kingdom, to help Britain and the rest of the sterling area earn enough dollars to remain large-scale customers for Canadian goods. Because of the lack of other sources of dollar revenue that were available in pre-war years, these countries depend more and more on their direct sales to dollar countries to pay for their imports from those countries. In other words, the United Kingdom's exports both to Canada and to the United States have become a most important determinant of what she can afford to buy in these two countries. The success of the measures taken to increase our imports from Britain is apparent from the trade figures. In 1947 our exports to the United Kingdom exceeded our imports from there by $564 million. In 1949 the deficit on merchandise trade will be reduced to about $375 million. For the sterling area as a whole, the gap will have been cut by over 40 per cent.

In terms of dollars, the increase in our purchases from the United Kingdom has been substantial. In 1946 we were importing about $140 million worth of goods. Imports for 1949 should be in excess of $300 million. While some of the rise has been due to price changes, there has also been a definite increase in volume. In relation to our population, I think these figures are significant. During the past year, on a per capita basis, we were buying British goods at the rate of $24 for every person in Canada. The comparable figure for the United States is only $1.40.

Turning now to our trade with the United States, we find that our imports from that country have been increasing, an indication of the continuing high level of business activity in our own country. The unbalance in our trade is not, however, as great as it was in 1947. In that year the unfavourable balance amounted to nearly $1 billion. In 1949 our adverse merchandise balance will be larger than last year but will only be about half the 1947 figure. Increased exports to the United States have played an important part in improving our American trade picture. Nevertheless an excess of imports over exports amounting to $500 million is a matter of some concern and creates a problem for us. In 1949 over 70 per cent of our import requirements came from the United States.

I think we will all agree that a high level of imports is an essential part of Canadian foreign trade. This does not exclude the possibility of increased Canadian production in a number of items. In recent years we have found that we are able to produce many goods that we had formerly imported. At the same time a very large volume of imports is necessary to maintain the flow of raw materials to our factories, to help provide the building materials and machinery and equipment for our record investment program, and to satisfy the high demands of the Canadian consumer. A substantial volume of imports is associated with a high level of prosperity in this country. We are therefore interested from the point of view of our exchange and dollar problems, not in reducing the amount of our imports, nor necessarily increasing it, but in changing the source from which some of these goods are obtained.

We have attempted by every means at our disposal to accomplish the necessary adjustments in our external trade balances by means which will expand the total volume of our trade. I have on many occasions explained that Canada's trade policy is to sell more to the United States and to buy more from the United Kingdom and other European countries. There is an important aspect of this policy which I wish to stress, and which is of great importance to domestic industry in Canada. It is no part of our policy to increase over-all imports as such. Canada's normal level of imports is sufficient to provide the outside world with enough Canadian dollars to buy our exportable goods. What we need is a redirection of our trade so that we shall approach closer to a balanced position both with the dollar countries and with the sterling area.

[Mr. Howe.]

Our own position in this regard may perhaps be explained most clearly by contrasting it with that of the United States. Much has been said in recent weeks by our friends in the United States about the traditional lack of balance between their exports and their imports. It is their avowed intention for the future to accept a higher level of imports from other countries so that the outside world can afford to buy their goods. There is no counterpart of this problem in the Canadian situation. Our problem, to repeat, is one of redirecting our trade to achieve better regional balances. If we could buy more of the commodities we need from the sterling area and from the countries of western Europe, the benefits would be twofold. First, we would improve our United States balance of trade; second, we would help our non-dollar customers to earn more dollars with which to maintain their purchases of Canadian products. A better bilateral balance in our trade with individual countries would help to stabilize Canada's exports.

During the past year, Canada has participated in a number of international efforts to deal with the problem of world trade. Together with thirty-two other nations at Annecy we took part in the second round of negotiations under the general agreement on tariffs and trade. The concessions gained, as they become effective, help to improve our trade with a number of countries in such commodities as wheat, forest products, hides and leather goods, codfish, aluminum, lamps. As you know, the three major trading countries of the world met last September in Washington. As a result of these discussions, the foundation has been laid for a co-operative approach to our mutual problems on the part of the United Kingdom, the United States and ourselves. One important development has been the American government's firm stand in support of increased imports into the United States and the need to get rid of the obstacles that now exist. Only recently, Canadian officials took part in discussions on specific difficulties in customs administration, which were a follow-up of the tripartite talks.

In the period that lies immediately ahead, numerous changes may take place in our foreign trade as well as on the home front. Individual exporters are already encountering difficulties. We are, however, in a strong position to meet any adjustments that may be necessary in our economic life. The Canadian economy is operating at an exceptionally high level. It is a flexible economy, and can adjust itself to new situations.

Canada has the resources, the equipment, and the skills needed to produce goods that are needed in the markets of the world.

By any standard, 1949 has been a good year, and the outlook for 1950 is also good. It is too early to forecast, with any degree of accuracy, the general level of activity that will prevail in 1950, but there is every reason to believe that it will be not very different from 1949. We can, of course, look forward to some falling off in foreign trade totals. There will probably be some easing of price, coupled with some reduction in physical volume. Agricultural crops are, on the whole, lower this year. For example, wheat is down from 393 million bushels last year to an estimated 367 million bushels this year; oats from 359 million bushels to 316 million bushels; and barley from 155 million bushels to 120 million bushels. Agricultural items bulk large in our trade totals. However, assuming a continuation of a satisfactory level of general business activity in the United States, it is a reasonable expectation that we shall be able to continue to dispose of the surpluses of our primary production.

It must be acknowledged that our exports of a variety of manufactured products will be reduced but, as in the year 1949, this should in most cases be offset by the continuing high domestic demand.

The other main pillar of the Canadian economy is capital investment, and here again, while it is too early to forecast in terms of dollars, it is clear that capital investment will continue at a high level—probably not much different from that of 1949. To realize the truth of this, one has only to think of the tremendous investment now being undertaken in connection with western oil, and the transportation of that oil; of the extension of iron ore operations in Steep Rock and of the plans for the development of Labrador iron ore, the beginning of which may well take place next year. Then there is the continuation of the very substantial development of hydroelectric projects in various parts of Canada; the titanium development in Quebec, as well as public projects such as the trans-Canada highway. Some adjustments will undoubtedly have to be made; some production patterns may have to be altered, but the underlying strength of the two main pillars of our welfare—exports and domestic investment—show promise of a satisfactory level of employment and income in Canada in 1950.

Mr. Argue: I listened with interest to the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I hope that the prophecies that he has made will be fulfilled next year. While we can point out with some justification that our world trade position is satisfactory now, nevertheless I feel that our trading position is anything but satisfactory to certain sections of our population.

The problem Great Britain and the other sterling areas have in attempting to reduce dollar purchases has resulted in a severe reduction in the sale of many Canadian commodities to Great Britain and other European countries. That reduction in markets will be felt most keenly by certain segments of our population. We do know we are finding it increasingly difficult to maintain markets in Great Britain for fish products, timber and tobacco. I do not wish to deal with those matters at length, because I feel that there are many members in the house who are better qualified to discuss those particular aspects of our trade position than I am.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Argue: I am sure the committee listened intently to the statement given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon. I am glad that the minister is still optimistic about our trade situation for the coming year, but I am afraid that that optimism cannot be shared to the same extent by large sections of the Canadian people. We do know that at the present time we are finding difficulty in marketing many Canadian products. The timber industry is finding difficulty because Great Britain is short of dollars with which to purchase her normal supply of timber. We know that the fishing industry is having difficulty at the present time in marketing its products. We know that the tobacco industry has lost the British market to a very large extent. Statistics show that within the first eight months of the year 1947 exports of flue-cured tobacco from Canada to Great Britain amounted to eighteen million pounds; but for the same period of this year the export of flue-cured tobacco has dropped to eight and a half million pounds.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I am sure my hon. friend wants to be accurate. Exports this year are $8,500,000.

Mr. Argue: I will accept the minister's correction, but I can tell him that I got my figures from the dominion bureau of statistics publication on Canadian exports and I was very careful to check for their accuracy. It spoke about pounds in the first eight months of this year.

Mr. Howe: I am sorry; perhaps the hon. member is right.

Mr. Argue: If the minister knows he is right I will accept it.

Mr. Howe: I was giving the figure for the full year. I noticed that the hon. member mentioned only the first eight months. I daresay the figure for the full year would be twice the amount he mentioned. The price of flue-cured tobacco is about 50 cents a pound. I daresay the hon. member's figures are correct for the first eight months.

Mr. Argue: The first eight months of 1947 and the first eight months of 1949.

This afternoon the minister made the statement that he was reasonably sure Canada could dispose of surplus agricultural products in 1950. I hope he is correct. I think he and the Minister of Agriculture should have conferred because the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture at the FAO conference would lead anyone to believe that he feels that indeed Canada is facing a very grave situation in respect to markets for agricultural products. I shall quote from page 2 of the speech of the Minister of Agriculture, which reads as follows:

> Our monetary difficulties today threaten to reproduce the situation which existed twenty years ago; a lack of that free movement of food from those with food to spare to those in want . . .

Again:

> We, in turn, must find some other natural markets for these products or shrink our production of them because the United Kingdom has not the dollars with which to buy.

All through the speech he spoke of increasing agricultural difficulties. Certainly the Minister of Agriculture has in mind the fact that today Canada has large surpluses of many agricultural commodities, and we may indeed face great difficulties in trying to obtain markets for them.

The situation in respect to agricultural products is not greatly different from the situation in respect to timber and fish products. I saw a report in tonight's Ottawa Journal from Pembroke, Ontario, which read:

> The Canadian Splint and Lumber Corporation, one of Pembroke's largest industries, will be forced to close down on Friday, December 16, because of the British dollar shortage, the Journal learned today.

Therefore we are indeed facing grave difficulties in finding markets for many of our products. We have difficulty in finding markets for apples. We know that we have a surplus of cheese, and according to press reports while we may expect a contract with Great Britain for another fifty million pounds of cheese next year, the price will be reduced from thirty cents a pound to between twenty-five cents and twenty-seven cents a pound.

We know that we have on hand in Canada a huge quantity of evaporated milk for which there is no adequate market.

I do not feel that in the future we can look with any surety to the United States taking our surplus products. According to figures published by the United States Department of Agriculture, in 1947 the United States farmers had a net income of $18 billion. The net income of United States farmers is running at approximately $14 billion for the present year, so it would appear that there is likely to be a drop in agricultural income in the United States within that two-year period of some 22 per cent. If the United States farmers are having difficulty maintaining their net income, surely we cannot have any real expectation of being able to market increased quantities of agricultural products in the United States in the future. Already we have observed a trend in which the prices of agricultural commodities in Canada are dropping.

The Canadian index for farm products was 263·9 in August, 1948. That index has dropped to 249·3 in September of this year, a drop of 14·6 within that time.

I believe that markets for livestock and dairy products are essential for more reasons than keeping the farmers' income high. An adequate market for livestock and dairy products means that farmers can engage in diversified agriculture, and diversified agriculture is necessary if we are to maintain agriculture on a permanent basis, and if we are to maintain the fertility of our soil. But while we are facing a surplus of some livestock and dairy products and while I do not believe that we are facing an imminent surplus of grain, nevertheless in the grain situation throughout the world there is already apparent a trend which should lead us to give this matter a great deal of consideration.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce quoted the crop yields for this year. It seemed to me that he was taking some satisfaction from the fact that we had reduced yields of our various grains because it would likely prevent a surplus appearing with which the government would have to deal. If we look at our carryover stocks of grain we find that the carryover of wheat was 98·7 million bushels, 21 million bushels higher than the year before.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I am sure my hon. friend wishes to be accurate. What did he say the carryover of wheat was last year?

Mr. Argue: I said 98·7 million.

Mr. Howe: He is entirely mistaken. I do not mind his quoting the party line, ascribing motives and talking of depressions and one thing and another, but I do wish he would be accurate in his figures.

Mr. Argue: These figures were taken from the quarterly statement on grain, issued by the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. Howe: It is not true. They are not correct.

Mr. Argue: I shall give the committee the figures as I have them, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce can correct me where they are wrong. The carryover of wheat was 21 million bushels larger this year than at the same period a year ago. The carryover of oats was 59·1 million bushels as compared with 47·9 million bushels a year ago, an increase of 11·2 million bushels. The carryover of barley was 29 million bushels, a decrease of 2·4 million bushels; the carryover of flax was 10·7 million bushels, an increase of 7·3 million from the year before; the carryover of rye was 12 million bushels, an increase of 11·1 million from the year before.

The general picture with regard to our carryover on July 31 of this year in relation to our carryover of grains a year ago was that while our carryover did not constitute a huge surplus, nevertheless it was above the average as compared with the year before.

If we are going to have adequate markets for grain, then the British market in that regard is most important. The domestic policy the British are following in relation to the production of grain in that country is certainly of vital interest to the farmers of Canada. The British are following a policy of producing more and more of their own food at home. I hope the minister will accept these figures, because they were taken from a United Kingdom information office publication.

Mr. Cruickshank: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Cruickshank: I shall take it for granted that the figures he has given are correct. Has he any remedy or suggestion to offer to correct the situation?

Mr. Argue: I am glad the hon. member has asked that question, and I shall answer it later.

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes, in about an hour.

Mr. Argue: Do not be so impatient. Great Britain is increasing agricultural production at home. In the year 1948-49 she produced 37 per cent, by calories, of the food she consumed, as compared with 31 per cent pre-war. Bread-grain production in Great Britain in 1948-49 was 44 per cent above the pre-war figure. Her production of other grains was 98 per cent above pre-war.

So in addition to an increase in the carryover of grains in Canada we find Great Britain increasing her own production of grain. Along with that she has undertaken bilateral agreements with other countries for the purchase of large quantities of grain. For example a year ago she signed a bilateral agreement with the U.S.S.R. for the purchase of 750,000 tons of coarse grains. According to a speech made in February by Mr. Harold Wilson, president of the British board of trade, the U.S.S.R. delivered that quantity on time —indeed delivered a quantity slightly in excess of the 750,000 tons. A press report since that time tells us that Great Britain has entered into a bilateral agreement with Russia for the purchase this year of a million tons of coarse grains.

In addition to the bilateral agreements Britain is making for the purchase of coarse grains outside Canada, the countries of Europe taken together are importing less grain now than they did pre-war. May I quote to the Minister of Trade and Commerce one paragraph from page 29 of the FAO publication entitled "World Commodity Problems":

> Europe, which normally took 90 per cent or more of the world coarse grain exports, took less than 7 million tons in the past two years as compared to 11 million tons before the war. Stocks of coarse grains in the four export countries were 24 million tons larger than a year earlier.

Thus Europe is now taking greatly reduced quantities of grain as compared with the quantities purchased before the war. The chief exporting countries have had on hand this year 24 million tons of coarse grain more than they had on hand a year ago. The United States does not provide us with a market for increased quantities of grain, in my opinion, since in that country they have a large carryover.

According to an article in the Christian Science Monitor of September 15, stocks of corn in the United States amounted to 550 million bushels and stocks of wheat to 150 million bushels. We find an increased average carryover of all grains in Canada this year, with Great Britain increasing her domestic production of grain and entering into bilateral agreements for the purchase of grain from countries other than Canada. We find too Europe is now buying less grain than she did before the war.

If this trend continues I am fearful lest we may have a surplus of grain in this country in the not too distant future. The farmers are interested in knowing at the earliest possible moment what the government's policy is going to be for the 1950 crop in relation to wheat prices, and the prices of oats and barley. The Canadian wheat board operates under the Minister of Trade and Commerce. There has been a five-year pool with an initial price now paid to producers of $1.75 a bushel. Throughout a large part of that period our farmers were selling wheat to be processed into flour and baked into bread to be sold in Canada for less than the amount our wheat was bringing in many other countries of the world.

During part of that period we were selling large quantities of wheat to Britain at prices less than those at which we were selling wheat to other countries. Farmers feel they have made a real sacrifice during that five-year pool. Nevertheless they have welcomed the pool. They believe in stability and they are now asking that the government maintain the wheat board legislation and that they be given another pool period. I would hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce can maintain the same initial price next year. In view of the sacrifices our farmers have made I say they should be guaranteed the present initial price for another five-year pool period.

We come now to the government policy in relation to coarse grains. We know that year in and year out farmers have advocated the closing of the grain exchange, and have advocated that the wheat board handle oats and barley in exactly the same way it handles wheat. Certainly in June, when the announcement was made, farmers believed that oats and barley would be handled by the wheat board and would be completely taken off the speculative market. They were disappointed to find that while the wheat board is the sole buying agency for oats and barley, the grain exchange is still being used in the sale of oats and barley.

The Saskatchewan wheat pool convention meeting at Regina in November, according to an article appearing in the Leader-Post on November 7, passed a resolution asking the federal government to place oats and barley under the wheat board in exactly the same position as wheat. That resolution was passed unanimously.

I would suggest that when the Minister of Trade and Commerce is deciding upon an initial price for oats and barley next year he should keep in mind establishing a price which bears a fair relationship to the initial price for wheat. At my own elevator point the farmer gets an initial price for the wheat he delivers of $1.58½ per bushel, but for barley he receives only 67 cents and a fraction per bushel. Those initial prices do not bear reasonable relationship one to the other.

I believe the initial price of barley should be two-thirds the initial price of wheat, while the initial price of oats should be one-half the initial price for wheat. Unless there is a fair relationship between these initial prices the farmer is going to have a hard time determining what to seed because he has no way of knowing what the final payments are likely to be.

We are not at all sure that we will have adequate markets for our grain. At the present time our wheat market depends to a large extent upon United States dollars being made available to Great Britain for the purchase of Canadian wheat. There is no assurance that those dollars will continue to be made available. Despite all that was said by ministers of the government during the election, that the C.C.F. were talking more blue ruin and that there was not going to be a trade crisis, we found that just a few weeks after the election there was a real trade crisis. Great Britain announced that she would be cutting her purchases in the dollar area by 25 per cent. That was important to Canada. A British dollar crisis means a Canadian trade crisis. When Great Britain is short of dollars then the Canadian farmer may well face a market crisis in the not distant future.

Britain has been entering into bilateral trade agreements with many countries. Up to the present she has signed almost forty such agreements and has established sources of supplies of food outside the dollar countries and outside of Canada. The permanent loss of the British market will mean serious difficulties for Canadian agriculture. We are facing difficulty in marketing cheese, in marketing apples, and we have large stocks of evaporated milk on hand. I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to check the figures I am going to give because I believe they are right.

As of October 1, 1947, we had on hand 16·4 million pounds of evaporated milk; on the same date this year we had on hand 56·6 million pounds, an increase of 40·2 million pounds. We have stocks of butter amounting to approximately 70 million pounds. It would be nice if we could sell our butter surplus to Great Britain, but we are not likely to be able to do that. Great Britain has bilateral agreements with other countries for the purchase of butter. She had a contract with Denmark for the year ending September 30, 1949, for the importation of 130 million pounds. Denmark has agreed to deliver to Great Britain 75 per cent of her butter surplus up to a maximum of 330 million pounds per year. If we had the chance to ship to Great Britain only a small fraction of the butter that she is buying from Denmark under a bilateral agreement there would be no talk of a butter surplus in Canada.

We are not just losing, we have already lost the British market for a great many of our agricultural products. I admit that the British market has been reasonably good for wheat and cheese, although there is some talk of difficulty in getting a cheese contract for 1950 of the same size and at the same price. But let us consider our bacon exports to Great Britain, and the figures I give are taken from the dominion bureau of statistics publications. Exports of bacon sides and hams in the first eight months of 1947 to Great Britain amounted to 168·6 million pounds; for the same period this year the exports amounted to 28 million pounds, a drop of 83·4 per cent.

Mr. Howe: Was that from a lack of contracts?

Mr. Argue: No, that was from a lack of government policy. The farmers of western Canada will produce 160 million pounds of bacon for Great Britain if the government will establish contracts over a period of years instead of from one year to the next, and leading to one crisis after another. In that same period in 1947 we shipped 8·8 million pounds of dried eggs to Great Britain; in the same period this year we shipped 3·8 million pounds, a decrease of 56·8 per cent.

Mr. Howe: Was that from a lack of contracts?

Mr. Argue: I suppose that will be a periodic question. Our farmers are willing to produce bacon and eggs and milk and apples and almost any other commodity for Great Britain if they can be assured of a market year in and year out. The policy this government has followed has brought about a reduction in the British market to the point where our farmers have entirely lost confidence.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is it not true that the socialist government in Great Britain have not been able to finance the purchase of our goods?

Mr. Argue: In my opinion, we have lost our markets in consequence of the policies followed by this government and the United States government, and not because of the policy followed by the British government. I should like to go on and quote more statistics to show how this government has maintained our British market, and I can tell hon. members opposite that the figures get worse instead of better.

Our exports of shell eggs in 1947 amounted to 29·7 million dozen; in the same period this year we exported 8·7 million dozen, a drop of 70·7 per cent.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why?

Mr. Argue: We have a surplus of milk in Canada at the present time. Our exports of whole milk powder to Great Britain in 1947 amounted to 232,000 pounds; this year we shipped exactly nothing.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why?

Mr. Argue: A drop of 100 per cent.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why?

Mr. Argue: I could tell the hon. member for Fraser Valley but I do not think he is capable of understanding.

Mr. Cruickshank: Maybe not, but why?

Mr. Argue: In 1947 we shipped 16·9 million pounds of evaporated milk, while this year we shipped no evaporated milk at all, another drop of 100 per cent.

Mr. Cruickshank: Again why?

Mr. Argue: I tell my hon. friend that in 1947 we shipped 16·3 million pounds of salmon; this year we shipped 922,000 pounds, a drop of 94·4 per cent.

Mr. Cruickshank: Again why?

Mr. Argue: In 1947 we shipped 448,000 barrels of apples to Great Britain, and this year we shipped not one barrel, a drop of 100 per cent.

Mr. Cruickshank: Again why?

Mr. Argue: Our shipments of dried apples to Great Britain dropped 100 per cent. Our shipments of canned apples dropped from 11·3 million pounds in 1947 to 2·6 million pounds in 1949, a drop of 76·8 per cent. We shipped to Great Britain in 1947 2·6 million bushels of potatoes, and this year we shipped no potatoes in that period, a drop of 100 per cent.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why?

Mr. Argue: In 1947 we shipped 12 million pounds of poultry, and in the same period this year we did not ship any.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why?

The Chairman: Order. I would ask hon. members to allow the hon. member for Assiniboia to make his speech.

An hon. Member: He said he was going to tell us why an hour ago.

Mr. Argue: I do not mind how much noise hon. members make on the other side of the house. These are cold statistics, and I would ask my Liberal friends from the province of Saskatchewan if they do not think that is a serious drop in the British market. I should like to read a press report of a statement by the Minister of Agriculture, which is to be found in the Leader-Post of June 24, 1949. The article reads:

"There is no evidence to support the contention of M. J. Coldwell, C.C.F. leader, that Canada is losing the British market for food," Agriculture Minister Gardiner said here Thursday night.

The Minister of Agriculture said we are not losing the British market. If we take the average drop in the last two years for all these commodities with which I have dealt, we have lost the British market to the extent of more than 90 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Argue: I might ask hon. members opposite why, since the Minister of Agriculture said that we are not losing the British market.

An hon. Member: Remember New Zealand.

Mr. Sinclair: What did New Zealand do?

Mr. Argue: The British people have not wanted to reduce their purchases in Canada, and they have only reduced them because they are short of dollars. They have proceeded to negotiate bilateral trade agreements with many countries. While their purchases of bacon in Canada have dropped precipitously in the last two years, nevertheless in the last ten days the British Labour government was able to announce an increase in the bacon ration from three to four ounces per week.

Some hon. Members: Election.

Mr. Argue: Because they have been developing other sources of supply.

An hon. Member: Denmark.

Mr. Argue: This year they have proceeded to get 20 million pounds from the Netherlands, 40 million pounds from Eire, 40 million pounds from Poland and 100 million pounds from Denmark, a total of 200 million pounds.

Mr. Knight: It is not a joke.

Mr. Argue: It was not a joke to the hog producers of western Canada when they found hog prices from August until September, a period of four weeks, dropped by $4 a hundred. You cannot blame that drop on the British government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cruickshank: Whom are you going to blame it on?

Mr. Argue: I blame it on Canada Packers and some of the other packing companies.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Cruickshank: What a joke!

Mr. Argue: I am sure there is no employee of the British Labour government buying hogs in the province of Saskatchewan. In that province, as in every other province, there is just the packing industry, which is controlled by a few large corporations.

An hon. Member: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. Argue: Let us look at the British purchases of eggs. In spite of the fact Mr. Strachey has announced that Great Britain may not renew the egg contract with Canada, the British are not going without eggs. This year they have bilateral agreements for the purchase of 21 million dozen eggs from the Netherlands, 13·5 million dozen from Poland, and 81·3 million dozen eggs from Denmark, a total of 115·8 million dozen eggs. We would like to have the British egg contract renewed, but whether or not it is, Great Britain has been able to develop other sources of supply.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: This interruption will give him another forty minutes.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have only asked if he will permit a question.

Mr. MacInnis: He does not mind answering anyway.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to ask a question, but if he does not want to permit me to do so—

Mr. Argue: I am ready to answer the question.

Mr. Cruickshank: Did the government of Great Britain decrease the horse meat contract in any way, shape or form?

Mr. Argue: That question is one that you would expect from the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. Wright: That is what he was raised on.

Mr. MacInnis: Ask the member for Leeds about evaporated milk.

Mr. Argue: In spite of the interruptions, the fact remains that Canada is facing serious marketing problems.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: Hon. members of the house may laugh if they want to. I do not mind, but the farmers of western Canada do not think that the present market prospects for agricultural products are a laughing matter.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear.

Mr. Argue: I should like to suggest to the government that it undertake a different policy. I was hopeful, from a statement the Minister of Trade and Commerce made this afternoon, that perhaps the government would make some changes in its trade policy. If I understood him correctly, he said that a better bilateral balance of trade would mean a better over-all balance of trade. In other words, if our exports to and our imports from the United States, and our exports to and imports from the United Kingdom are more nearly balanced, it will be a good thing for world trade. I suggest to him as a positive measure that he should do for the government of Great Britain exactly what he is asking that government to do for Canadians. Our government is asking the government of Great Britain to sign bilateral agreements for the purchase of Canadian agricultural products. I suggest that we as a nation should be prepared to sign bilateral agreements with Great Britain for the importation of British manufactured products. I can tell the minister that in western Canada there is an organization which I believe might be of some help to the government in this regard. I refer to Canadian Co-operative Implements Limited.

We have a huge market for agricultural implements in western Canada, and at the present time a great percentage of them must be imported from the United States. If we could change our imports of agricultural implements from the United States to Great Britain, I believe it would not only help Great Britain to solve her dollar problem but would also help our agricultural producers to maintain the British market. I believe if this government would sit down with officials of the British government and officers of Canadian Co-operative Implements Limited arrangements might be made under which a considerable quantity of British agricultural implements could be brought to Canada and sold by C.C.I.L. throughout the western provinces. Our farmers are interested in purchasing British implements, because they believe that to be to their own advantage; and I believe everything possible should be done to facilitate the importation and distribution of such implements.

We have all read the statement the Minister of Agriculture made to the FAO conference at Washington. The minister realizes that Canada, together with other major exporting nations, is likely to be facing agricultural surpluses in the near future. Such references are made time and again throughout his speech; but while eighty per cent of his remarks dealt with the surpluses that may be imminent, he had very little in the way of concrete proposals to remedy the situation. I know the FAO proposals may have their shortcomings; but I believe any international arrangement which would enable us to get rid of our surplus products should receive the full support of this government. So, if other nations agree, I hope this government will be prepared to advance its share of the money required by the FAO for the purchase of agricultural surpluses.

If the government does not do any of these things, and even if it does, I believe there is need for a further extension of price support legislation. If we do not get another egg contract with Britain our poultry producers are going to need assistance through a price support arrangement. The Saskatoon Star-Phoenix reports that within the last two weeks the price of grade A eggs in that city has dropped by 11 cents a dozen. So I say that if we do not get an egg contract with Great Britain the government should support the price of eggs in order that our poultry producers may be assured at least a minimum standard of living.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member has now spoken for forty-five minutes.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Chairman: Order. I gave the hon. member a few minutes more to make up for interruptions, but I believe he has now exceeded his time.

Some hon. Members: Unanimous consent.

Mr. Argue: I believe I am quite in order, but in any case I shall conclude in just a moment.

Mr. Adamson: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, is it not a rule of the house that if an hon. member speaking in committee is interrupted he has a further forty minutes?

The Chairman: If he resumes his seat; but the hon. member has not resumed his seat; he has only forty minutes.

Mr. Adamson: I thought when the hon. member for Fraser Valley interrupted, the hon. member who is now speaking did resume his seat.

Mr. Cruickshank: Just a moment; I did not interrupt, if I may correct the junior member from the mining district. I requested permission to ask a question.

Mr. Adamson: But during that question—

Mr. Cruickshank: Go back to the stock market.

Mr. Adamson: —the hon. member did resume his seat.

Mr. McCusker: May I suggest that the hon. member from Toronto be given a private hearing.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not believe the interruptions were such as would give the hon. member a further forty minutes, but I suggest that the committee give him an opportunity to finish his remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On a further point of order I would suggest that the hon. member for Regina City make his interjections from his own seat.

Mr. Argue: I thank the committee for this indulgence, and I shall be through in a moment. I was just saying I believe it is of great importance that the government should establish price support legislation for the most important agricultural commodities. If there had been a guaranteed price for bacon at the local delivery points we would not have seen a $4 drop in the price of grade A hogs within the period of a few weeks.

Since we are experiencing difficulty in selling many of our agricultural products, and probably will continue to experience that difficulty, and since the government have not taken the necessary steps to move our agricultural surpluses to the hungry people of the world, I suggest there is something else they might do that would be of great benefit to the Canadian people. I believe there is a place, in respect to certain commodities, for what I might term a consumption subsidy. We have large stocks of milk and butter on hand. We may have great difficulty selling our eggs before very long. These are protective, highly nutritious foods, and certainly it is in the best interest of our nation that Canadians should consume as much butter, eggs, cheese and milk as possible year in and year out. At the same time, in the interests of agriculture it is necessary to have adequate support prices; and a consumption subsidy would permit people especially in the lower income groups to make increased purchases of those commodities and at the same time guarantee our farmers a decent income.

At the present time we see huge surpluses of farm commodities looming on the horizon. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has said that a better bilateral balance of international trade would help world trade, but the fact is that the government has not taken adequate steps to bring about that balance. So I hope that the government will now take the necessary steps to increase our purchases of British products so that a market for Canadian timber, fish and agricultural products may continue to exist in the United Kingdom throughout the years to come.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, trade, the subject which is engaging the attention of the committee at the moment, is of the highest importance to all Canadians. The prosperity of Canadian agriculture is a matter of concern not simply to the Canadian farmer but to everyone in this country. The strength and buoyancy of our exports are likewise matters of concern to all Canadians. There is no country the wide world over whose people have a greater interest per capita in the maintenance of export trade than Canada. It has been said times without number that one out of every three Canadians—sometimes it is put as high as three out of every eight—depend directly upon the exports of this country for their livelihood and employment; and in passing it might be observed that of the other two-thirds a goodly number depend for their livelihood upon the purchasing power of the one-third who owe their employment directly to our export trade. I add, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a new situation. It has always been so in Canada.

I begin with this general observation, sir, that the approach of all thinking Canadians, the approach of this House of Commons, and the approach of the government to this subject should be characterized by a sense of realism. The time has long gone by when this House of Commons, or the Canadian people, are going to be cajoled into a sense of unending security by bland statements from the Minister of Trade and Commerce at Ottawa. We who have heard statements from the present Minister of Trade and Commerce in times past will be on our guard against easy optimism.

Mr. Howe: The country was on its guard, too.

Mr. Fleming: What country?

Mr. Howe: The country was on its guard during the recent elections.

Mr. Fleming: I am going to have something to say about the recent election, Mr. Chairman, and the way in which some ministers were responsible for the Canadian people forming conclusions that were not based upon facts. I am not referring only to the deliberate suppression of reports on the part of the government that the Canadian people ought to have had, although that was a factor. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, of course, played a leading part in that act of suppression.

The Chairman: Order; that statement is out of order.

Mr. Fleming: The same Minister of Trade and Commerce played a leading part in certain statements in reference to the trading position of this country, which I propose to mention now.

I begin with an incident that occurred in this house on April 25 last. At page 2520 of Hansard, you will find a statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in reply to a question. It reads as follows:

> The present state of our markets in the United Kingdom is quite normal.

It was on that statement, a statement that could not possibly be made to harmonize with the facts, and on similar statements during the campaign that the minister and his associates won the election.

An hon. Member: It is a good statement.

Mr. Fleming: A good statement? It is a statement that cannot be harmonized with the facts. If a good statement is one that serves the purposes of the government, regardless of the facts, no matter how far that statement flies in the teeth of the facts, then of course it was a good statement. It served well the partisan interests of this government but, sir, it did the greatest violence to the facts. It was not a matter of more than three weeks—

Mr. Ferrie: Our wheat is all gone, anyway.

Mr. Fleming: Your wheat is all gone, anyway? If the hon. gentleman is interested in wheat, I am prepared to tell him it is high time he worried about the wheat markets of this country.

Mr. Ferrie: I am not a bit worried.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member is not worried. There is a typical remark coming from a government supporter. Is it any wonder that this gentleman, and others of his political stripe, are not worried when they hear airy statements from the ministers opposite, which are intended to create a sense of optimism but which do not fit the facts.

A few weeks after the Minister of Trade and Commerce made this extraordinary statement in the House of Commons on April 25, I heard the minister's opposite number in the government of the United Kingdom, the Right Hon. Harold Wilson, president of the British board of trade, make a comment in the city of Toronto on the state of Anglo-Canadian trade. This was the very thing the Minister of Trade and Commerce was talking about on April 25, when he said that the state of our markets in the United Kingdom was quite normal. What did Mr. Wilson say? These are his words:

> We have reached a critical situation in Anglo-Canadian trade.

Mr. Wilson did not make that statement merely in this country, but on his return to the United Kingdom he delivered a radio broadcast on Anglo-Canadian trade. In the course of that broadcast, he made this statement:

> Nineteen forty-nine is a year of crisis in our trading relations with our sister country across the water.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce said there was no crisis, yet within a couple of weeks thereafter the president of the British board of trade says Anglo-Canadian trade has reached a critical condition, and that 1949 is a year of crisis.

Mr. Sinclair: Labour government.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, and what about this government?

An hon. Member: Good government.

Mr. Fleming: It was a party to telling the people of Canada that there was no crisis when, in fact, there was a crisis of emergent proportions, sir. Hon. members opposite know well that, by some strange coincidence, there were emphatic denials right up until June 27, from the Minister of Trade and Commerce and others of his political ilk opposite, about the existence of a trade crisis in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Cruickshank: What did the people say?

Mr. Fleming: It was not more than 48 hours later, that the full impact of the crisis was exposed to the view of the Canadian people. You will remember that it was only a matter of two or three days after June 27 that the British government made its announcement of the forthcoming drastic curtailment of imports from Canada. There may be some gullible members, sir, following the government in this house. There must be a good deal of gullibility, if you take the sum total on the government benches; but is there any one of them, sir, who is gullible enough to believe that that trade crisis was created after June 27? They know quite well, sir, that the trade crisis was existent throughout the spring and the election campaign, but this government managed—as it did in connection with other matters—to suppress it until after June 27.

It will be remembered that Sir Stafford Cripps made this announcement in the early days after June 27. I refer to a comment by an official of the Department of Trade and Commerce in Ottawa on July 15 concerning that announcement, which is reported as follows:

> He estimated on the basis of Sir Stafford Cripps' announcement in London cutting the United Kingdom's 1949 dollar purchases by 25 per cent, Canada would lose by $60 million to $80 million this year. "If the slashes continue, then next year—1950—will be the crucial year," the official said. A continued

25 per cent cut next year in Canadian exports to the United Kingdom would mean the loss of more than $100 million.

You will remember, sir, that the full purport of the statement by Sir Stafford Cripps was that the reduction of purchases from Canada and the United States, which he found it necessary to make, amounted to no less than $400 million per annum. This is a matter that no Canadian dare contemplate without the gravest misgiving. I say, therefore, sir, that this whole question must be approached, not in the airy sense of optimism and jaunty complacency of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but with adequate knowledge of the hard realities of the situation—for hard realities there are in this trading situation facing Canada. It is of the most momentous concern to all Canadians.

Sir, it is in that spirit of realism that I approach this problem, not in the spirit of unwarranted optimism, and certainly not in a spirit of unwarranted pessimism, because I am a great believer in the future of this country. I take second place to no man in my faith in the future of my country; but I think it is the first duty of every Canadian who loves his country to be a realist in appraising the strength of the forces that confront Canada today. Among her trading problems—

Mr. Cruickshank: And holding up pipe-line legislation.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I have only this comment to make on the reference made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley to the subject of pipe lines. If he were at one end of that pipe using his lungs and his voice there would be no need of pressure anywhere else in that pipe.

Mr. Cruickshank: A very good comeback, if I talked as much as the hon. member for Eglinton. He is talking all the time.

Mr. Fleming: What is the present situation? I make no apology for giving these figures to the committee. I know that statistics make a speech seem rather dry. Perhaps mine does not need the figures to make it dry; but I can appreciate the great desire of some hon. members opposite to avoid facing these figures. I wish to give some comparisons to the committee. These are government figures, of course.

You will understand, Mr. Chairman, that I am referring only to our commodity trading account figures. In 1948 our trading deficit with the United States was $283 million. In 1949 it has risen to $446 million.

Mr. Howe: How much was it in 1947?

Mr. Fleming: For the first nine months, which is the period I am comparing, our trading deficit with the United States in 1948 was $283 million. In 1949 it is $446 million.

Mr. Howe: I was asking what it was in 1947.

Mr. Fleming: I have not brought the 1947 figures down with me. I should be glad to give them to the minister—

Mr. Howe: I think they would spoil the hon. member's story.

Mr. Fleming: Oh, no, not at all, Mr. Chairman. The minister would very much like the committee and the country to forget the situation that we are confronted with today. He would be very happy if the minds of the people of Canada could dwell away back two or three years ago when the trading situation of this country was not nearly so serious as it is today. I am concerned about the situation today, and I wish the minister were more concerned about it, or more candid in voicing his concern about it.

The unfavourable trading deficit with all non-commonwealth countries in 1948 was $149 million; in 1949, it is $317 million. Our favourable balance with all countries in 1948 was $225 million; in 1949, $72 million. I think the most significant figures among those that I have just read are first of all the increase in our trading deficit with the United States. It has risen in the first nine months of this year compared with the first nine months of 1948 by $163 million. It rose from $283 million to $446 million. That in itself presents a problem of staggering proportions. And, sir, our position with the United States in respect of trade is a problem that must engage the attention of this house as it is engaging the attention of those in Canada who have been studying the outlook for our foreign trade.

These figures alone do not tell the whole story, because while to commonwealth countries we shipped more than we purchased from them to the extent of $389 million, our deficit on trading account with non-commonwealth countries was $317 million. This favourable balance, sir, to which I have referred, of $72 million in the first nine months of this year is significant not alone in the fact that it represents a very substantial reduction as compared with 1948—actually it is less than one-third of our surplus on commodity trading account in 1948. But, sir, let us also consider how the purchases of the commonwealth countries—I am speaking now particularly of the United Kingdom—are being financed at the present time.

Thanks to the European recovery plan there is in these figures of purchases by commonwealth countries from Canada a total of $293 million in round figures, all provided out of funds supplied by the United States. That represents in itself practically our whole trading surplus with the United Kingdom. In other words, our favourable trading position with the United Kingdom is due entirely to the European recovery plan financed by the United States. How long we may expect that to continue no man dare prophesy, but the moment it is withdrawn, as we can see from these figures, immediately our trading surplus with the United Kingdom vanishes.

Along with that, loans provided by this parliament are being used by the United Kingdom at the rate of $10 million a month. And these same figures for the nine months include $90 million provided by this parliament for financing purchases by the United Kingdom in the Canadian market.

It would be very well at the same time to put due emphasis upon the fact that the figures I have quoted are figures of commodity trading. In measuring the over-all situation we must also take account of the fact that this country is paying interest and dividends to persons in the United States. Figures in the last Canadian calendar year show that $230 million was sent out of this country on that account.

We must therefore so devise our trading policies and so create a favourable trade balance elsewhere that we may be in a position to continue to make those payments on our obligations in the dollar area.

And, sir, we will do well to remind ourselves also, in considering these figures of Canadian export trade, that while we are glad to see every dollar which appears in these Canadian export figures, these figures are on the basis of inflated dollars. And we should remind ourselves more directly than did the minister in his remarks this afternoon. These figures do not represent volume increases in proportion at all. I should like to quote a paragraph to the house from the October issue of the Canadian Statistical Review at page 5, where it states:

> The value of gross national product, according to an estimate recently published by the bureau—

That is, the dominion bureau of statistics—

> —was $15,450 million in the year 1948. This is 13·7 per cent above the $13,591 million for the year 1947 which, in turn, was 13·8 per cent higher than the 1946 figure of $11,936 million. Price rises were more influential than volume in these increases.

The same applies with equal force to the figures on export trade. As a matter of fact that was recognized by the department several months ago when it cautioned against treating 1949 current figures as being capable of direct comparison with the figures of earlier years, because the current figures are in inflated dollars which do not represent corresponding volume increases. And incidentally the minister would do well to remind himself of that fact when he is talking about 1947 figures. "Price rises were more influential than volume in these increases."

What are the policies of governments abroad? What are the policies particularly of our two principal fellow-traders, the United Kingdom and the United States? Their policies are of the most direct interest to all Canadians. The policies of the United Kingdom government, whatever may be the circumstances facing that government which in their view justify the course they are taking, are nevertheless policies that must fill us all in this country with grave misgivings as to the future of our markets in that land.

I have already referred to the drastic curtailment of imports from Canada which was announced by Sir Stafford Cripps just after the election in this country. What has happened since? We have seen the United Kingdom government announce devaluation—a very drastic devaluation which necessarily makes it more difficult for the United Kingdom to purchase from Canada because their pounds are exchangeable for fewer dollars to purchase our products.

That was one factor. But there are other factors in the situation. One of these is the policy of bilateral agreements which the socialist government in Great Britain is pursuing. It is true they have expressed regret in doing so, but the fact remains that they have been pursuing policies of bilateral trade which are harmful to Canadian interests. Canadians would do well to remember that the commodities that are the subject of these bilateral trade agreements are in many cases commodities that we in Canada are producing and would gladly sell to Great Britain.

Let us remember that three years ago this country had twenty-three contracts with Great Britain for the sale of food to that country. Yet today we have only four, three of which expire at the end of this year. Our wheat contract expires next July.

In 1948 United Kingdom purchases from Russia increased by $79 million, her purchases from Poland by $30 million, her purchases from Hungary by $15 million, her purchases from Denmark by $61 million, while at the same time her purchases from Canada fell by $67 million. Can Canadians sit back and contemplate this situation with any measure of equanimity? Dare the government contemplate that situation and remain idle in the face of it, or refrain from pursuing more effective measures than they have been following?

It is with the greatest regret that I find it necessary to comment upon some observations made by socialists in the United Kingdom concerning purchases from Canada. Unfortunately these utterances have been increasing in number in recent months. It was in September last that Mr. Wyatt, a socialist member of the United Kingdom parliament, undertook to say in the House of Commons at Westminster that the United Kingdom was paying for Canada's dollar deficit in international trade. He told his people that the United Kingdom parliament should insist upon Canada accepting payment in sterling for her sales to the United Kingdom. Presumably he meant blocked sterling. Other socialist members in the old land have taken up the cry, and similar statements have been emanating from socialist members of parliament at Westminster from time to time since. Those statements however reached a sort of climax when probably the most radical member in the cabinet of the United Kingdom, the Right Hon. Aneurin Bevan, undertook only a month ago to say, during a debate at Westminster on the subject of devaluation, that if the United Kingdom stopped buying from Canada—and I am quoting his words—"what is a British financial crisis would become a Canadian crisis".

With all due respect to the sources from which those statements come, I think it is well that some should remember—and I am sure no Canadian likes to refer to these facts —that Canada has sought to be generous in her trading relationship with the United Kingdom during and since the war. Our Canadian wheat farmers have accepted prices under the wheat agreement which were substantially below the price brought by wheat on the world market. We have made substantial gifts and have provided substantial loans to the old land.

We do not mention these things in any invidious or carping spirit. We say this only in the hope that those who are responsible for shaping the trading policies in the old land today will bear in mind that Canada has sought to do her part to rehabilitate the trading ability of the old land. At the same time we ask those who are shaping those policies in the United Kingdom to remember what Canadian food producers strove to do for the British market during and since the war, and that it would be a betrayal of the Canadian food producer to close the door to the entry of Canadian food products into the United Kingdom today. That is a fair attitude for Canada to take in trading approaches to the United Kingdom, and it should be recognized as of first importance in shaping the policies of the Canadian government.

This parliament would like to know the outcome of the conference held in the United Kingdom in October in which the deputy minister of trade and commerce and the deputy minister of agriculture participated. We want assurances that the Canadian food producer is not going to lose that market which he has served so well. We would like to know what steps are being actively pursued at the present time to preserve that market for the Canadian food producer.

An amendment was introduced by this party on a recent occasion—I am not going to refer to the debate—which asked this government to pursue steps to bring about a conference of commonwealth countries to consider trade. That proposal was rejected by this house. But another opportunity is offering. There is to be a meeting of ministers of the commonwealth countries in Colombo, Ceylon, in January. When his department's estimates were being discussed in the standing committee on external affairs recently I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs if trade matters would be discussed. His answer was that no decision had been reached about the discussion of trade matters. I urge upon the government that there is nothing more important which that conference could take up, no subject of more lively concern to the whole commonwealth and certainly to this country, than our trading relations with the commonwealth countries.

The situation is fraught with the gravest dangers for Canada if we continue to place more and more of our trading eggs in the United States basket and fewer and fewer in the baskets of the commonwealth countries. Warnings have not been lacking. Warnings have been offered to the government by those to whom the government should have been glad to listen. Months ago the Canadian Exporters Association made a submission to the Minister of Trade and Commerce containing this statement:

> Since the beginning of this year the foreign sales representatives of our member firms have reported a very serious drop in sales in their long-established British empire markets. This falling-off of export sales, in many cases right down to zero, is so alarming—

That was months ago.

> —that the association deems it advisable to bring the matter to the immediate attention of your department.

Urgency is the keynote of that statement. Here is another statement in the same submission, and I remind you that this was made to the minister months ago:

> Canada finds herself today in the peculiar situation, as the sole member of the British commonwealth unable to trade more or less freely in empire markets, which have become increasingly important to Canada in the development of her world trade. Canadian firms have spent a great deal of effort and huge sums of money to develop markets in these countries. They have become dependent upon these markets for a considerable part of their production and many thousands of Canadians have relied upon them for their livelihood. Unless some action is taken with alacrity Canadian exporters feel that they might be faced with the permanent loss of the empire markets, which would inevitably mean distress and unemployment in Canada. As a matter of fact, some of our members already report that it has been necessary to lay off some employees because of the present unfavourable situation in sterling area markets.

The Canadian Exporters Association went on to say that they feared unemployment was beginning among the dock workers at Halifax and Saint John; today we are seeing Canadian bottoms sitting idle in those Canadian ports. Today's issue of the Ottawa Journal contains a dispatch from Pembroke stating that the dollar shortage will force the Canadian Splint and Lumber Corporation, one of Pembroke's largest industries, to close on December 16, because of the British dollar shortage.

So far as our trading relationships with the United States are concerned, we will not forget that this government stood by passively and watched the flight of dollars to the United States in the long months before November, 1947, when they finally moved to put into effect their austerity program. The same Minister of Trade and Commerce who sits opposite tonight in his airy, optimistic way said that those restrictions would be in effect only a matter of months. When he was asked later what he meant by months, he proceeded to tell the house that that meant a year. The fact is that those restrictions have already been in effect for over two years and we have no indication that the government proposes to demobilize them. The indications are that they will be intensified because of the existing situation.

I wish there were time to develop some of the thoughts I had hoped to bring out at this time, but as I have but five minutes left I should like to point out the danger of counting on the United States as a market for our exportable surpluses and the danger of trifling with the growing loss of our markets in the United Kingdom. So far as our markets in the United Kingdom are concerned, I remind the committee that for the past 80 years goods having a high labour content have predominated in Canadian exports to other British markets. At the same time Canadian exports to the United States have consisted uniformly of goods of low labour content. In 1946, 77 per cent of Canadian exports to the United States had a low-job value, while at the same time 85 per cent of Canadian exports to the sterling area were in the high labour-content category. In this way the sterling area provided direct employment for approximately 1,250,000 Canadians, while the United States provided employment for probably one-fifth of that number.

My concluding remarks will be in the form of a warning of the danger of relying, as we are today, on United States markets, and I ask the committee to bear these facts in mind.

1. The Canadian and United States economies are similar and, therefore, competitive. They are not complementary, and therefore there can be no thought of integration of the Canadian economy with that of the United States. That would be fraught with the greatest economic and political danger for all Canadians.

2. The United States cannot purchase the goods and services formerly taken by the sterling area except in the particular circumstances of very great world-wide shortages which would allow them to sell abroad their own surpluses of the same materials.

3. The United States soon will be in the position of having unsaleable surpluses on the domestic market in nearly all lines. United States productive capacity has increased an average of 60 per cent in ten years while its population has increased only 12 per cent.

4. The United States cannot increase the purchases of the materials which she does take from Canada on a scale sufficient to compensate Canada for the loss of employment in the industries exporting to the sterling area. If the United States were to double the purchases made in Canada in 1948 and if we were at the same time to lose all our sterling area markets, Canada would be left with unemployed that some have estimated might come close to one million.

5. Integration would end all reason for the maintenance of the vast majority of the United States branch plants in Canada which now have a capital value of over $2,000 million.

6. "Integration", therefore, would be accompanied by a de-industrialization of Canada and the emigration of profession and industrial classes.

7. If "integration" were finally completed, Canada would be left with a primary-products economy which would be required permanently to maintain a position similar to that of the United States of seventy-five years ago.

The situation is fraught with the greatest danger. What is needed on the part of the government is a sense of realism, of candour, of honesty with the Canadian people, and above all a sense of pressing urgency.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief. Strange to say, I agree with something the hon. member for Eglinton has said. The only difference between myself and the hon. member for Eglinton is that I do not feel capable of speaking for forty minutes every day on each subject that comes before the house. I do not feel that I have a knowledge of all subjects that come before the house, but apparently he does. I do not have the privilege of speaking for the minister, but I can speak for the private members of British Columbia and say that we believe in the hon. member for Eglinton's argument as to a trading balance. We believe that where you want to sell you must be willing to buy. I want to bring to the attention of the hon. member for Eglinton, and of the people of Ontario, the fact that he came out to the province of British Columbia and tried to sell—

Mr. Sinclair: When?

Mr. Cruickshank: Prior to the 27th of June.

Mr. Sinclair: Nobody bought.

Mr. Cruickshank: They were not willing to buy. I want to say to the hon. member for Eglinton that in each and every riding where he spoke in the province of British Columbia the Liberal doubled his majority. I am informed the same form of salesmanship took place in Ontario. I do not want to delay matters, but when the hon. member for Eglinton has what I would call the audacity to criticize the policy of this government, with the mandate it received in his own province on the 27th of June, I think he has gone one step too far. So far as I am concerned, I will be delighted to contest my riding or his any day that he wants to ride on the record of the present government.

Mr. Argue: I rise on a question of privilege. The Minister of Trade and Commerce disputed the carryover figures I gave in relation to wheat. I want to say to him that those figures came from the Canadian Coarse Grains Quarterly Review of August, 1949, published under the authority of the hon. gentleman, and the figures are to be found on page 9. The paragraph containing them reads:

> With the exception of barley, stocks of Canadian grains in all positions at July 31, 1949, were well above the totals at the end of the 1947-48 crop year. Total stocks of Canadian wheat at the end of the 1948-49 crop year were 98·7 million bushels, an increase of 21·0 million over the July 31, 1948, revised carryover total of 77·7 million bushels.

Mr. Quelch: I do not intend to speak at any length, but there are a few points I want to deal with concerning our international trade problems. There is no doubt that today a great deal of concern is being felt by people in different parts of Canada as to the international trade situation. Statements made by responsible ministers of the crown and officials add to that fear and increase the confusion in the minds of the people regarding our problems and their solution. I want to congratulate the hon. member for Assiniboia upon the very constructive speech he made in dealing with these problems. I noticed that hon. members opposite did not seem to appreciate his speech, and I want to point out to them that they cannot hope to laugh off a problem. You cannot find a solution by laughing it off.

Statements appearing in the press at the present time show that once again, as in the 1930's, we see on the one hand surpluses of goods piling up and on the other hand masses of people starving for the want of those goods. I should like to quote one or two press dispatches. There is one in the Manitoba Co-operator which reads:

> At the same time leading economists of member countries will wrestle with what FAO director general N. E. Dodd describes as the "terrible paradox" which finds farmers in some lands threatened with ruin by plenty while millions in other lands are oppressed by hunger and poverty.

Then again:

> On one side of the gap stand consumers, many of them desperately hungry, eager to have more of the things they need, eager to earn more to pay for them as fast as they can. On the other side stand producers, afraid that if they produce as they can and would like, they may drown themselves in unsold surpluses.

I also think the speech made by the Minister of Agriculture before the 5th session of the FAO conference on November 24 should be carefully read by all members. I congratulated the Minister of Agriculture upon a speech that he made before the Canadian chamber of commerce in London, England, in December, 1948. I thought it was a very fine speech. I only regret that he did not make a similar kind of speech during the election campaign. I must admit I helped him out by quoting it quite profusely in my constituency. Again he has made what I consider to be another fine speech, and again I say it is a pity the speech he made before FAO was not made during the June election campaign. I want to quote briefly from the speech, starting on page 1, and reading as follows:

> The review of the world food situation prepared by the council of FAO presents a disturbing picture. Parts of it, in fact, must raise the question in the minds of many as to whether FAO's goal of a better nourished world is likely to be realized, at least in the foreseeable future. The picture presented in that report shows that, while total world agricultural production has regained pre-war levels, it has not kept up with increasing world population, and that the supplies available per person are still below pre-war levels. Even more serious, however, is the fact that although production gains by countries are unevenly distributed, monetary difficulties are threatening to prevent freedom of movement of foods and other necessary products from "surplus" to "deficit" areas. This, in turn, might easily lead to a slackening of the productive effort in some countries and an increase in cost which may deny food to the people of other countries.

Further down:

> This threat of accumulating food supplies in some parts of the world while people in other parts of the world are underfed must evoke unpleasant memories in many of us . . . Our monetary difficulties today threaten to reproduce the situation which existed twenty years ago, a lack of that free movement of food from those with food to spare to those in want. And unless some way can be found of solving this problem we cannot hope for that "all-out" effort by exporting countries that is needed if the people of the whole world are to be adequately fed. In other words, it is difficult to persuade a farmer to produce more food for the hungry in some other land if he sees no likelihood of its ever getting to the people who need it—if, in short, it is likely to remain on his hands.

Further on there are these words:

> Unless a concerted effort is made to restore trade and payments equilibrium, the persistence of present difficulties threatens to reverse the trend towards freedom from want. It would compel some of the largest surplus producing countries to restrict their agricultural output and deficit countries to expand their production at any cost.

It seems to me that is the great danger at the present time. In spite of the fact that the production of food is insufficient to meet the needs of the world today, surpluses are starting to pile up already; and of course, as the Minister of Agriculture points out, if surpluses start to pile up in a great producing nation the producers of that nation are bound to begin to curtail production. No industry can continue to expand its production unless it has an expanding market. If it did it would simply mean that it would be headed for bankruptcy.

I do not think anyone would try to argue that farmers in Canada today are making an all-out effort to expand production. No one could reasonably expect them to do so, because they have no assurance that in future they will have a market for their production at reasonable prices. Then statements made by the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and by the FAO tend to put a doubt in the mind of the farmer as to whether or not he can afford to expand his production, because no farmer is going to increase production in order to create a surplus which will force down the price of his commodity. But as long as we have starving people in the world, as we are told there are today, there can be no justification for reducing production; and it would be an act of criminal folly on the part of any government to encourage any lessening of the production of food while at the same time there are starving masses of people in various parts of the world.

As my reason for saying the farmers have grounds for fear that their markets may be limited, let me quote one or two press dispatches. First I refer to a Reuters dispatch of last month:

> British bacon imports from Canada in 1950 will depend on the dollar situation and on the volume of goods and services Britain can sell for Canadian dollars, food minister Strachey told parliament yesterday . . .
> At Ottawa it was learned that the Canadian government already has been informed that the United Kingdom will buy less bacon from Canada in 1950 than she did in 1949.

Statements like that appear day after day in the Canadian press. I quote another:

> The British chancellor of the exchequer told a London press conference that Britain is considering switching over to European sources of supply for some of the foodstuffs she formerly purchased from Canada. He specifically mentioned eggs.

Then in the Wheat Pool Budget of November 8 I find this statement:

> John Strachey, British minister of food, in the course of a speech made at Coventry, England, stated that the British government may reduce its purchases of wheat from Canada after July 31, 1950. He is reported to have said the reason therefor is that Britain cannot buy with dollars it hasn't got.

Whether or not we agree with those statements we must recognize that as long as these statements continually appear in the press they are bound to have a depressing effect upon agriculture; and when the Minister of Agriculture makes such a statement as he delivered before the FAO conference it is bound to give rise to a great deal of concern. I want to congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the speech he made recently before the export association at Montreal, in the course of which he clearly pointed out Canada's international trade problem. I quote from his statement, as it appeared in the Montreal Gazette:

> If Canada, without further loans, is to hold her current trade status with Britain after the termination of Marshall plan aid in 1952, then Canada must increase purchases from that country by an annual $365 million.
> That is approximately the trade balance in Canada's favour. In the year ended last September, Canada bought from Britain $325 million worth of goods and sold $691 million.

Then further down:

> On the other hand Canada's balance was adversely affected by trade with the U.S. While Canada shipped $1,550 million worth of goods in the same twelve-month period, she imported about $2 billion. The $450 million deficit was collected from the rest of the world through Marshall aid dollars.
> "Obviously, our policy must be to export more to the U.S. or alternatively to buy less from that country."

I think the question people are interested in having answered is, just what is the government doing to bring about that balance, the need for which the minister pointed out? In that speech he went on to say that in Canada we have a shelf of projects under consideration by the government for the purpose of helping to maintain or build up effective demand in this country, but of course on the other hand we must realize that building up effective demand in this country will not provide a market for our wheat. Therefore we must be prepared to accept imports from other countries in payment for that wheat. Of course if we maintain a high effective demand in this country there will be a demand for the imports that can be brought here in exchange for our wheat. But, as the minister pointed out, we have something in the neighbourhood of another $365 million of imports we will have to bring in from Britain, before we establish a balance and we will either have to sell more to the United States or buy less from that country. That is one of the reasons we in this group have not opposed the idea of exporting oil and gas to the United States once our own needs are satisfied. We need dollars in the worst way, and certainly that would help relieve the difficult dollar situation we are now facing.

The point the government do not seem to appreciate is that the situation which has developed today is the inevitable consequence of the international trade and financial policies which they fostered immediately after the war. Time and again in 1944 and 1945 we of this group stressed the fact that if we wanted to sell to the nations of Europe we must be prepared to accept payment in the currencies of the European countries, and then use that currency to buy their goods. Yet every time that matter came up in the house we had the minister of finance of that day insisting that when we exported to Europe we must be in a position to obtain dollars in payment, in order to meet our debts. Just let me quote from Hansard for April 11, 1946, at page 764. Mr. Ilsley said:

> . . . we must be able to use the proceeds of our exports to the United Kingdom and the continent of Europe in paying our own bills and debts in the United States . . .

Then on April 16, 1946, at page 919, I asked this question:

> Will Canada be prepared to accept goods from the United Kingdom in repayment of loans? How will the United Kingdom maintain convertibility of the pound if Canada and the United States do not provide the United Kingdom with dollars by purchasing British goods to the extent of the British credit?

Mr. Ilsley replied:

> . . . it is not necessary that there should be adverse balance of payments as between Canada and the United Kingdom in order to enable the United Kingdom to repay the loan . . . She can pay for Canadian goods by exports to other countries as well as to Canada. Under a multilateral trading system and convertible currencies—

If that is the solution, why do we not adopt it? If it is so simple that all you have to do is maintain a multilateral system and you can balance your trade, why after four years is this multilateral system not in operation? The government know very well that you cannot have a multilateral system of trading when you have an unbalance as between the dollar and sterling areas amounting to something in the neighbourhood of $6 billion; and it is nonsense to talk about the convertibility of currency as long as that situation exists. At that time the minister of finance was thinking in terms of those years before the war when Britain had large credits she could draw upon from India, Egypt and other countries. Those nations had surpluses in their dealings with the United States, and they paid their surplus dollars to Britain. Those days are gone. Today both India and Egypt are heavy creditor nations of Great Britain, so that actually Britain is having to pay pounds to those countries instead of receiving dollars. So it will be quite evident now, even if it was not evident to the government at the time, that the only solution is, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce said in Montreal, to expand our imports from Europe and, on the other hand, to either sell more to the United States or buy less from the United States to make up our deficits with that country.

Now, the Marshall plan has been helping to balance international payments for the last few years, but the Marshall plan ends in 1952. Everyone is wondering what may happen after 1952. ECA reports that Europe will not be in a position to balance her trade by then; she will still face large deficits. We are being warned now by the European nations that they will have to drastically reduce imports from this country, not because they want to, not because they do not desire our goods, but simply because they have not the dollars to pay us. Just so long as we insist upon payment in dollars instead of accepting goods from those countries, they are bound to take that action.

I was somewhat interested in a statement that appeared in the Wall Street Journal of November 18 as to what will likely be the successor of the Marshall plan. If this proposal is put in operation, then I believe Canada will be facing an even more serious situation than she is facing at the moment. The article reads as follows:

> Aim to finance over million tons of grains, tobacco, cotton and fruit yearly.
> The state and agricultural department are evolving a large scheme to get rid of America's mounting farm surplus by shipping them abroad at a loss . . .
> Barter U.S. commodities would be traded at cut price valuation for foreign strategic material. Permission to do thus has already been voted by congress.
> Under this proposal private exporters would sell certain over-plentiful commodities abroad, accepting payment in foreign money. The U.S. government would then give the exporters dollars for his alien paper.

I point out, Mr. Chairman, that if the United States does that, and we refuse to do likewise, then we are going to be left holding the bag. This group has been advocating that plan for the last five years. We have insisted that, if we are really interested in putting international trade upon a sound basis, then we must be prepared to accept payment in the currency of the importing nation. That would be absolutely justified, because international trade is the exchange of goods. The only thing we need with which to buy European goods is their currency. If we really intend making international trade what it should be, we do not need to get dollars from Europe; we can accept their currency and buy their goods with it. Then there will be no difficulty in balancing our trade with Europe, and Europe will not have to curtail purchases from this country because she has not got dollars.

The former minister of finance would have argued that we must receive dollars to meet our deficit with the United States. I would say it is not the responsibility of Europe to make up our deficit with the United States. It may be argued that there is a large dollar content in the goods we ship to Europe, but there is also a large dollar content in the goods that Europe ships to Canada, because Europe has to buy a great deal of raw material from the United States. The one would balance the other. I would say it is our obligation. At Montreal, the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out that was the situation, that we would have to balance our trade unilaterally with the sterling area and unilaterally with the dollar area. In the future, we could not expect to get dollars from Europe to make up our deficit with the United States.

I only wish the government had recognized that fact back in 1944-45 because, had they done so, they would not have been so keen on signing international monetary agreements such as the Bretton Woods agreement, and the non-discrimination clause in the Geneva trade agreements. I am not attacking the Geneva trade agreement as a whole, but I do strongly attack that so-called non-discrimination policy which denies a nation the right to determine its own source of supply.

In this group, we have always felt that international trade should represent a reciprocal, and mutually agreeable, exchange of goods and services between nations; not an exchange of goods for money. Hence, creditor nations must, in the future, be prepared to accept goods and services in exchange for credits held by them in other countries. We feel that, until such a system has been adopted, nations must have the right to determine their source of supply for imports, in order to protect their own balance of payments. We also oppose any attempt to bring about the free convertibility of currencies, or the adoption of the gold standard.

In order that a balance of international payments may be achieved, we advocate the following procedure: An exporting country should accept payment in credits in the importing country, which it would have to clear directly or indirectly, by purchasing that country's goods or services. If it failed to do this, then under a statute of limitations, any credits still outstanding after a specified period would be cancelled. It is interesting to note that that suggestion, that a statute of limitations should be invoked, has been made by the London chamber of commerce, a body of men who have probably had more experience in international trade than any other body in the world.

It is interesting to note also that Maynard Keynes, in his original proposals, recognized the need for some method of forcing a creditor nation to accept payment in goods, or alternatively to forfeit the payment of those credits. We feel that this will make international trade an exchange of goods and services, and will place the responsibility for achieving a balance upon both parties trading together. I know that many people will argue that a system of trading of that kind would be bilateral and, therefore, undesirable. It would be a simple thing, however, to put that on a multilateral basis by establishing an international exchange upon which credits held in one country could be traded for credits in another.

We feel that this trading should be executed at a fixed rate of exchange, based upon the relative value of the currencies as determined by their purchasing power internally. For example, if this country exported a million dollars' worth of goods to Britain and only needed half a million dollars' worth of goods back, we could then trade that half million dollars' worth of goods through the international exchange to France for half a million dollars' worth of goods from that country. Then, France would accept the goods we had coming from Britain, and that would put the trading on a multilateral basis. It would be an exchange of exports for imports instead of the currency of the exporting nation. In that way, it would be a comparatively simple matter to maintain a balance of trade.

Any nation that refused to accept imports in exchange for the credits it had established would be making a gift to that nation because, if over a period of time they refused to accept imports, under a statute of limitations that credit would be wiped out. That was one of the main arguments we had against the Bretton Woods agreement; it had a strong pro-creditor bias. It placed the full responsibility for balancing trade upon the debtor nation instead of placing it equally upon the creditor and debtor nation. If a proposal such as I have outlined were adopted, it would be placing pressure upon the creditor nation as well as upon the debtor.

I noticed that the Minister of Agriculture refers to the proposals put forth by the FAO in his speech delivered before that organization. At page 5 he says:

> Canada, therefore, is prepared to give serious consideration to any international action designed to attain production and distribution of food. From this point of view we are interested in the proposal advanced by the director-general for an international commodity clearing house. While endorsing the principle underlying this proposal we are not in agreement with the means which, it has been suggested, are necessary to reach the objectives.

Then, the minister concludes with these words:

> In conclusion, we in Canada agree with the United States and the United Kingdom that suggestions should be considered by a working committee. The Canadian delegation will co-operate in every possible way on such a committee.
> We hope that out of this conference will come a suggestion that we can all agree on.

It is very unfortunate that so far nothing has come out of that conference. There were proposals for setting up a world pool of food in order to get food from surplus countries to needy countries, but as the Minister of Agriculture said, in so far as Canada was concerned, they were not prepared to agree to the proposal. There was one very interesting feature in the proposal, namely, that surplus food could be sold from that pool to countries and payment accepted in their own currency. I look upon that as a forward step, and there does seem to be a growing recognition of the fact that if we want to expand international trade we must make it an exchange of goods to the mutual advantage of all, and therefore be willing to accept payment of our exports in the currency of the importing nation. We have had that suggestion from the London chamber of commerce of Great Britain. According to the Wall Street Journal that is going to be done by the United States after the end of Marshall aid. The FAO are suggesting such a proposal. Therefore I would urge upon the government that they give careful consideration to that suggestion because if after Marshall aid ends the United States exports her surpluses and receives payment in part in the currency of the European nations she will take markets away from Canada and we are going to be left holding the bag. I hope the government will take action before the situation gets any worse.

Mr. Howe: For the information of the new members who may be bewildered by this debate I may say that opposition parties have been making these speeches since 1944 in every successive session, and if they will go back through Hansard they will find no change in the nature of the speeches.

An hon. Member: Nor in the attitude of the government.

Mr. Howe: Perhaps not.

Mr. Fleming: And the government has learned nothing.

Mr. Quelch: And our prophecies were borne out.

Mr. Howe: Just to bring the position of our trade with the United Kingdom into perspective let me give the committee the trade figures back over the years. Take the year 1929, the most prosperous year between the two wars: our exports to Britain in that year were $290 million. Take the year 1933, which is perhaps the worst year in that period. Our exports to Britain were $210 million.

Mr. Quelch: Marshall aid is helping now.

Mr. Howe: Never mind what is helping us now. Perhaps I can put these figures on Hansard without too much interruption. Take 1938, the most prosperous year in the thirties. Our exports to Britain were $339 million. In 1939 they were $328 million; in 1947, they were $751 million; in 1948, $686 million; and in 1949, which is not completed, they will be well over $650 million. This is the way in which we are losing our exports to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Quelch: The minister will agree that Marshall aid is providing the dollars.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend has the idea that we should go back to the primitive days and exchange goods instead of using money as a medium of exchange.

Mr. Quelch: No. I said that we should accept the currency of the importing nation, which is a totally different thing.

Mr. Howe: The hon. member said a lot about exchanging goods. Modern civilization has found that a good way to exchange goods—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. May I remind hon. members that they must not interject or ask questions of an hon. member who has the floor unless they first obtain his consent.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, so much for the over-all situation. Judging from these figures I have quoted one would hardly reason that we are losing our trade with Britain. Let us take the individual commodities. What about wheat? I think we are in grave danger of being oversold on wheat from this crop. After the first of the year the government s going to start advertising to farmers asking them to please deliver all the wheat they possibly can as early as they can for the balance of this crop year so that we can deliver that wheat on commitments already made.

What about oats and barley? There again our sales are getting ahead of deliveries, and we are rather worried that we may be getting into an oversold position on oats and barley. What about flax? An hon. member spoke of the great surplus of flax from last year. We did have an unusually heavy carryover. That flax is moving out, and we are just wondering whether we shall have enough flax to run us through the current year and take care of the export commitments.

What about bacon? I am not too proud of our position in bacon. We contracted with Britain to furnish a quantity of bacon in the year 1949, and we are actually delivering a pretty small proportion of that contract. There are two sides to a contract. Some people may say that Canada is in a very happy position, but I do not think that the United Kingdom, which holds the other end of the contract, is so pleased with our deliveries on the bacon contract; and that also holds for the egg contract we made for 1949. That contract is still current, and we are still in a very serious deficit position in our delivery of eggs.

No one has said anything about beef. The beef prices in the Winnipeg livestock market reached the highest point within the last two or three weeks that they have reached for many years. Speak about other products. If there are large unsold surpluses I do not know what they are. But what is our trade position today? The Minister of Trade and Commerce cannot sell products that we have not got, and I do not know of any unsold surplus products that we have. Someone may mention dried milk. Perhaps we have dried milk. If we have an oversupply of dried milk, perhaps the remedy would be to sell milk in some other form which is readily saleable today.

We speak of butter, and compare the figures for butter this year and last year. The Department of Agriculture tells us that the stocks of butter on hand at the present time are just about enough to see us comfortably through the winter. May I remind hon. members who compare these figures with the figures of last year that last year we had to go abroad and import butter to carry us through last winter. That is the position of our exports today. Anyone who finds in them a great threat to the future of this country must view the situation with very jaundiced eyes indeed.

I hear hon. members speak of realism. Well, my experience with that phrase is that it is a synonym for pessimism. It is a great phrase used along St. James street and Bay street. The realistic view is always the pessimistic view. I am accused of being a great optimist, but I believe in making statements according to the facts which are laid before me. I have done that consistently and I have done it again this evening. I think that when next year rolls around and we look back upon the statements I have made tonight it will be found that they will be in just about the same position as they have been ever since 1944. In the past I think my predictions have been found to be fairly accurate.

Mr. Wright: As a farmer I certainly hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is right in what he has just predicted. However, that is not the feeling that prevails in most rural areas in Canada. Certainly it is not the feeling out in Saskatchewan when just within the last month the price of eggs dropped 11 cents a dozen and the price of pork 4 cents a pound.

Mr. Howe: Was that drop due to a lack of outlets for the pork and the eggs? Was it not because the price of eggs got very far above the floor set by the British contracts, and the same with bacon?

Mr. Wright: A farmer out there is receiving at the present time about 28 cents a dozen for No. 1 eggs, and I do not think that is a price at which he can produce eggs at the present time. The minister gave certain figures with respect to our exports to Great Britain; I believe the figures were $648 million worth of exports. He did not point out that the price of those exports today as compared with the earlier period—in the twenties or thirties—is about twice as much. He did not give the volume. Certainly the volume is not as great now as it was then.

Let us look at the period between the two wars. We tried for years to build up our markets with Great Britain on pork products and dairy products. We established a grading system in this country for bacon. We established a grading system for our dairy products, and we tried to produce an article which would be acceptable to the British market. We tried to build continuity of supply for that market, because there are two things the British market demands: one is continuity of supply and the other is quality of the product.

We were reasonably successful. By 1939 we had built up a reasonably good market for cheese, bacon, apples, honey and certain other products of our farms and our fisheries. Then the war came along, and we found suddenly that that market was tremendously increased. We had become the only supplier. Encouraged by the government, the farmers of this country went into increased production so that they doubled and trebled their production of those agricultural products for the market in Great Britain.

I do not think anyone expected we were going to be able to maintain all of the market we had established during the war, or that we were going to be able to continue to supply the quantities we supplied during the war. But we did expect, and certainly the agricultural industry in this country had a right to expect, that we would retain at least the major portion of that market. But when the war was over we found that the market slipped away from us.

Someone asks why. Liberal members across the way were shouting "why" only a few moments ago. The reason is perfectly obvious. When the war was over we found that the market we had created there had been created through loans we had made to Great Britain. We had given away a billion dollars' worth of our products produced in this country. When the war was over those loans were cut off. I do not think it was good policy to cut them off as quickly as the United States did—and we followed closely in her footsteps.

Great Britain had not the money with which to make purchases. She could have bought on a time basis, if we had been prepared to continue to give her credit. But, knowing well enough that she would never be able to repay those credits, she did the only honourable thing and tried to get in on a cash basis. She tried to get goods where she could exchange goods. But we refused to enter into a bilateral agreement with her on agricultural products.

It is only two months ago that our Prime Minister went down to the United States and speaking at Troy, I believe it was, he offered a bilateral agreement with the United States in the matter of arms—war materials. Surely if we can make a bilateral agreement for the purposes of war we should be able to make a bilateral agreement with Europe to feed the people. If we are going to have peace in the world, and if we are going to build a world which we can hope to improve and from which we hope to eliminate communism, then we had better get wise to ourselves.

Mr. Howe: I would suggest to my hon. friend that we have had bilateral agreements in bacon and eggs for several years—and for several years we have not lived up to our part of it.

Mr. Wright: We did not have a bilateral agreement; that was the trouble. What were we taking back from Great Britain? If we had been taking back goods from Britain we could have been exporting to Britain.

Mr. Howe: We had a bilateral agreement in which we agreed to exchange bacon and eggs for money. The money was forthcoming, but the bacon and eggs were not.

Mr. Wright: And why were they not? They were not because we never had any agricultural policy in this country under which the farmers had known for more than one year at a time what they were going to have to produce. I am certain that if we had had contracts for a period of four or five or six years, with any feeling of security, on the part of those engaged in agriculture in this country, they would have produced the goods to meet that market. When they were told during the war that they would have a market at such and such a price for their goods, they produced the goods in this country; and we can continue to produce them.

Agriculture does not wish to shut down shop. We want to continue in production. Every farmer is anxious to produce. He does not like to see his buildings lying idle when he has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to create those buildings. He would like to see them filled.

Mr. Howe: Why does he not fill them?

Mr. Wright: But so long as he has not the assurance of markets he is not going to produce. He is not just foolishly going to produce in abundance, knowing that if he does he will get no price for the thing he produces. That is what happened in the past.

I have here an editorial taken from the Rural Co-operator, and it says, "Must we farmers march on Ottawa again?" That is the feeling in rural areas of Ontario with respect to the marketing of our agricultural products. They say in this article that we should be exchanging our goods with Great Britain, giving her an opportunity to ship to this country.

I believe it was the hon. member for Fraser Valley who only a few moments ago asked a question about the price of goods that could be shipped to this country. Well, British tractors are selling here today for $200 to $400 less than our own tractors produced in this country. Someone may say, "Well, why are they not being shipped here? Why are we not buying more of them?" But to establish a market for tractors or farm machinery in this country you have to build up an outlet for that machinery. You have to build agencies to supply repair parts. No company will come to this country and spend millions of dollars to establish those agencies unless they have some security for a number of years. They will not come unless this government is prepared to guarantee that they will be protected in this market and that they will have long-term agreements.

If we want long-term agreements we can get them in Great Britain. Make no mistake about that. But let us remember that, as regards our markets in the United States for agricultural products, they are not worth the snap of a finger. If tomorrow the United States were to adopt the Brannan plan with respect to floor prices under agricultural products, what would happen to us in Canada? Under the Brannan plan they propose to guarantee prices to their farmers according to the average price in the ten-year period from 1938 to 1948. Then they would put their agricultural products on the market and sell them at whatever they would bring. Our agricultural products going to the United States would sell, not at the floor price guaranteed to the American farmer, but at the competitive price at which those articles would sell on the American market. It would knock the bottom right out of the market in this country for agricultural products so quickly that we would be back to where we were in the thirties, and we would be back there inside of three or four years.

Those are the problems facing agriculture in this country. It is all right for the minister to get up and say that we have no problem, that they are not only Canada's problems, but that they are world problems. That is not good enough. It is not enough to say that because they are world problems we cannot do anything about them. That is what we said in the thirties. We said they were world problems and that we could not do anything about them. The result was that we went through ten years in which we sat here and starved in the midst of plenty, and the world starved.

This is just plain common sense. We have to meet our own problems. We cannot wait for the rest of the world to solve our problems for us. Our country must do something for itself. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has the ability; he is familiar with these problems. But I do not think he is justified in getting up and giving us such an optimistic story when he knows that conditions are serious, and that world trade today is in a serious condition. The minister knows that.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend reads too many newspapers.

Mr. Wright: Well, perhaps I do read too many newspapers. Perhaps that is the only way the people of Canada can get their information—through the newspapers. And if we are wrong, then it is the press of this country, the minister says, that is to blame for the feeling of doubt in people's minds as to whether there are markets for all the agricultural products we can produce in the next few years.

He says we have a market for wheat. Yes, we have a market for wheat as long as the British agreement lasts and ECA funds last. When the world agreement comes into effect in 1950 and we have to sell our wheat to Europe and other countries for dollars, where are they going to get those dollars? They will be available only if by that time we are buying sufficient of the goods they produce to supply them with dollars. Either that, or we shall have to make credits available to them.

I do not think these problems can be solved by any one method; a variety of methods will have to be used. We shall have to work along every possible line in order to try to solve these problems and create trading facilities throughout the world. I think the hon. member for Acadia outlined some good ideas in the speech he just made with respect to credits. I do not pretend to be a financial expert, but I do know something about conditions and I do know that in the world today there is a need of trade. I am sure the minister will agree with that.

We will not get that trade by being optimistic, by sitting down and saying that everything is lovely. The only way we will get it is by working at it. I think the minister would be doing a service to the country if he told us what was being done in an effort to solve the problems that face the world today so that those people who might be depressed will have a better idea of things as they exist and not just accept everything as being lovely. There is an old saying that everything is lovely and the goose hangs high. Unfortunately the farmers of Canada have been the goose and have been hanging high for too long and something will have to be done about it.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, the seriousness of the problem facing agriculture is almost beyond description. Back in the days of 1937 and 1938 we had just arrived at the position where we had a fairly decent market in Great Britain. As previous speakers have said, we had graded our products to the high standard that we thought the British people wanted. We were getting that business up to the point where we thought we were doing a good job.

When the war occurred everybody across the country thought that prices were going to go up, because that is what had happened in the previous war. The farmers prepared themselves to increase production, granted with some idea of making a little more money, but mainly to be patriotic and supply the food needed by our soldiers and by Great Britain. The farmers of this country were proud and happy to do that.

But what happened in 1941? At that time the government brought in its price control policy before farm prices had had a chance to rise to a level comparable with the rest of the economy. The prices of agricultural products were frozen at a low level. It was then found that in order to get production up to the point where we could supply a certain amount of food to Great Britain subsidies would have to be paid. Subsidies were necessary in order to encourage the production of more food in order to supply the hungry nations of the world. Production was increased accordingly to a point higher than it had ever been in the history of this country. Farmers were working with half the help they had before and producing twice the quantities of food. That just shows what can be done in this great nation when our farmers are encouraged to do it.

Then what happened? In 1946 and 1947 the subsidies were taken off, and the farmers were blamed for the increases that occurred in the prices of food. The consumer thought he was being gypped. He had become used to low food prices during the period of price control and when the subsidies were taken off the farmers were blamed for the increases that occurred.

There was a complete lack of foresight on the part of the government in not making contracts for more than one year and in not signing them until November or December. The farmers did not know what they were going to receive for their products until November or December in the year previous to the contract year. Did that make for increased production? I contend that it certainly did not. All the farmers had before them as an incentive to produce was a big question mark. They were given no encouragement. They were not told until the last minute what they were going to get for their products and production began to decrease because of this uncertainty.

Then in addition the farmers were being followed to the abattoirs, to the elevators and to the creameries by the income tax officials to find out what they were getting. Many farmers in the west had not been used to doing too many chores. Production was increased during the war by farmers increasing their hours of labour, but the time came when they began to stop working overtime to look after their pigs and other animals because no consideration was given for the long hours they worked on their income tax. They said they were not going to do that when they did not know what they were going to get for their produce, and the result was lowered production.

That is the position our farmers have been in for the last four years. No encouragement was given to them. They were told that if they would take less than world prices for their agricultural products during the war, which most of them were happy to do, they would be guaranteed the English market after the war was over. We were guaranteed that by the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Actually those lower prices were paid in order to maintain the government's price control program. We took those lower prices on being promised that at the end of the war and following the war the contracts with England would be maintained at a reasonable level.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Have the farmers of Canada ever been as prosperous as they are at the present time in the whole history of Canada?

An hon. Member: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. Charlton: That is the same sort of question as was asked a few minutes ago when it was said that the farmers' income was higher than it had ever been in history. It was said that our exports are worth more in dollars than we have exported for years, but no mention has been made of the volume of exports. The value of goods today is practically three times what it was in those years. No wonder we are getting more money. But are we getting more net income? Of course not. There is a tremendous difference between gross and net income. It is more in gross income but the gross does not pay off the mortgage.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Then the hon. gentleman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Charlton: You will have a chance to make your speech after I am finished.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I asked a question and I should like to get an answer.

Mr. Lennard: He does not have to answer.

The Deputy Chairman: It is up to the hon. member who has the floor to decide.

Mr. Charlton: What has happened as our production has gone down? England, in order to get enough food, was forced to make bilateral agreements with various other nations, even nations behind the iron curtain. She was forced to buy where she could sell her products. If we were able to supply England with as much bacon, for instance, as we supplied previous to the war, we would have maintained the bacon contract; but owing to the fact that the government did not have the foresight to look ahead a few years, instead of just considering the situation at the moment, our production was allowed to decrease to a point where we could not supply what they wanted. England had to go elsewhere to get her food. There has been some controversy about the word "top-heavy" being in front of the word "surplus". Whether or not a surplus is top-heavy, it is a surplus, and if there is a surplus in the country then it is bound to affect the domestic price.

Mr. Howe: A surplus of what? What have we surplus? I should like to know about it so that I can sell it.

Mr. Charlton: I ask the minister what these surpluses are.

Mr. Howe: You tell me what they are.

Mr. Charlton: I do not need to tell you. I think you should know.

Mr. Howe: I do not know of any.

Mr. Charlton: According to your own publications there are various surpluses, and I think probably it will be important to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce the question which I intend to do later on. As I said, there are surpluses, whether or not the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture think there are. The Minister of Trade and Commerce answered a question of mine the other day and said there were surpluses. Is he now going to say there are not?

Mr. Howe: I made a difference between surpluses over domestic requirements and unsold surpluses. I asked the hon. member which he meant, and I do not know yet. Perhaps he will tell me now. Which is it, a surplus over home requirements or unsold surpluses?

Mr. Charlton: What is your definition of a surplus?

Mr. Howe: There are two definitions of "surplus".

Mr. Charlton: What is your definition of a surplus?

Mr. Howe: I think my hon. friend is an artful dodger on that question.

Mr. Charlton: I am asking you that question. What is your definition of "surplus"?

Mr. Howe: My definition of an unsold surplus is a surplus that remains unsold. My definition of a surplus in excess of domestic requirements is something quite different. If my hon. friend will tell us which surplus he is talking about, we can follow him. I cannot follow him at all. I have been trying to make sense out of his remarks up to this point, and I have failed totally.

Mr. Charlton: That is one man's opinion.

Mr. Howe: I think it is generally accepted.

Mr. Charlton: I do not care whether or not the surplus is unsold. It is a surplus. How long are you going to hold it? What about the surplus of skim milk powder you are holding? Is that not a surplus? Are there not surpluses of apples?

Mr. Howe: I do not know of any.

Mr. Charlton: Is there not a surplus of cheese?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Charlton: Why did the government buy 14 million pounds?

Mr. Howe: The government bought it because we needed a little aged cheese to sell in markets that were accustomed to being furnished with it.

Mr. Charlton: Has that not been done previously?

Mr. Howe: Not for several years.

Mr. Charlton: Have we not sold aged cheese to Great Britain?

Mr. Howe: Not in the last several years. We sell it right out of the creamery.

Mr. Charlton: I think there has probably been quite a bit of aged cheese going to England in the last few years. I will say this much, that our cheese exports this year will be less than they have been at any time in the last fifty years, and a good deal less than they were in 1938 and 1939 just previous to the war. The same thing is true of bacon. I want to ask the minister a question now and I will be finished. I want to ask him to give us the export figures for various agricultural products in 1938 and 1939, and again in 1948 and 1949. I think the pre-war and post-war figures will provide a fair comparison. I think he will find in various instances the figures for 1948 and 1949 are less than they were in 1938 and 1939. I do not want dollar figures; I want volume figures. Until the government takes a much more serious attitude than apparently many members on the opposite side of the House of Commons took tonight, during a previous speech, when they apparently thought this was all very funny—

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. McIlraith: It was not the problem we thought was funny; it was the speaker.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Charlton: There were humorous remarks and laughter from various places in the house; as a matter of fact I thought it was disgusting.

An hon. Member: Get a soapbox.

Mr. Charlton: I should like to have the minister give me the figures for the various agricultural products in the years 1938 and 1939, and particularly cheese and bacon, because they are two of the most important products, apart from wheat, that are exported to Great Britain. They are two of the products which we could export in sizable quantities to that country, especially cheese. The government has bought surpluses of some products and is holding them in storage, particularly powdered skim milk and butter.

Mr. Howe: We own no powdered skim milk.

Mr. Charlton: I did not hear what the minister said.

Mr. Howe: I said we have no powdered skim milk.

Mr. Charlton: Tell me how much powdered skim milk is being held in the country. You should have those figures.

Mr. Howe: I don't know.

Mr. Richard (Gloucester): What is this, a quiz?

Mr. Howe: Carried.

Mr. Charlton: The minister should have those figures.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend is making the speech. Why does he not get the figures? They are a matter of record. I have not the record here. If my hon. friend wants to use the figures he knows where to get them.

Mr. Charlton: I have them upstairs.

Mr. Howe: Then why not use them?

Mr. Charlton: I think it would be well to have the minister put them on the record. That is why I ask for them. If he cannot give us those figures now, I think he should get them.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps we should not carry on this discussion. The minister can consider the request of the hon. member and give an answer later.

Mr. Blackmore: It is regrettable that the large numbers of members who were here not so very long ago shouting "why" and "what are you going to do about it", have all disappeared. We are now probably getting to the time when we might find out something to do about it. In the first place, in a general sort of way it looks like the sheerest kind of common sense, if there is an abundance of goods in the world and an abundance of productive capacity, that it ought to be possible to let everybody enjoy some of that abundance. There must be a solution somewhere if only the person rises who has the idea what to do, and if only the rest of us will have sense enough to listen to him. There must be a solution somewhere.

There is something we can do about it beyond what we have been doing up to the present time. That ought to be obvious, especially when you bear in mind that the United States, for example, is deliberately planning to limit production on so wide and systematic a scale in respect of so many commodities by actual limitation of acreage in the coming year. Bearing that in mind while there are at least a billion people in the world on the verge of starvation, one must be struck with the fantastic grotesqueness of the whole situation. That ought to make everyone in this house and in every other legislative assembly rather humble about the matter, so that at least they would be prepared to listen.

This debate, I think, has taken a rather unexpected turn. We have been debating something we hardly expected to discuss under this item, but I am rather glad. I was just telling my seatmate that all the things I came here prepared to prove have been acknowledged, and what we have done is to go on from there.

I think the first thing it would be well to spend a moment on is this question of why we in Canada now have shortages in agricultural production, about which the two previous speakers had a good deal to say. At the risk of repeating some of their statements may I give what I think is the reason.

In the first place during the war, in 1943 and 1944, my constituency was literally covered with hogs. The people of my constituency can produce hogs today just as well as they did in 1943; and they are just as willing to produce them now as they were then. Why is it that you can hardly find a herd of hogs from one end of my constituency to the other today, whereas it swarmed with hogs in 1943? I should like the hon. member for Fraser Valley and some of those other smart boys over there on the Liberal side to tell me why it is we do not find the hogs that we saw in 1943 and 1944. When they finish explaining that they will have the answers they were shouting for and laughing because they did not get. What was it that caused the hogs to be produced in 1943 and 1944? In the first place everyone was pretty certain there was going to be a tremendous demand for hogs for an indefinite number of years; they were reasonably sure of a market. Everyone was fairly certain that because of the war there would be a relative scarcity, and that prices would be reasonably good. The third point was that in 1943 and 1944 we had not learned that a government of the Dominion of Canada could be so unutterably stupid as to tax people for additional production. We actually had not had it forced upon our attention that you could get in charge of a country a group of men so completely lacking in intelligence as to do that very thing; so that if a man worked all day producing wheat, and spent two hours in the morning before going out to produce that wheat, in milking cows and taking care of chickens, and then spent two hours after his work producing wheat, to produce butter and eggs and hogs, the government would penalize him for performing that fine service. But we had that forced upon us by example after example, by stupid ministers of finance and national revenue standing up in this house year after year defending that sort of procedure and being rather proud of it.

Well, in those days we Social Crediters told them just what they were going to get; and they got it.

They finally convinced the people there was not a bit of use working overtime to milk twelve or fourteen cows; that all they would be doing was producing butter for Ilsley, or for Abbott, or for whoever happened to be finance minister in charge. Human nature is just about the same in this country as in England or the United States. No man is going to wear himself right out producing extra goods if he gets nothing in return.

By the way, I am only too happy to answer questions if I can hear them, but I would ask hon. members not to be so cowardly as to mutter them just loud enough so they can be heard by Hansard but not loud enough so I can hear and answer them.

Mr. Howe: I had not asked the hon. member a question, but I shall do so now. Were the farmers very much bothered with income tax back in the early thirties?

Mr. Blackmore: We did not have income tax in the early thirties. The trouble then was that the more hogs and cattle you produced, the poorer you got. I will give the minister an actual example. My own family were in the business of producing beef and hogs. I grew up to that kind of thing; I am quite accustomed to it, and I know what it takes to make a little money. In 1932 one of my brothers came in and said, "We have sized up the whole situation as far as our year's work is concerned." At that time we had about 150 head of good cattle, pretty well bred Shorthorns. He went on to say, "We have made allowance for everything that goes into the production of cattle, and we are just $5 worse off for every cow we have on the range"; and all the cows had calves.

What was the reason for that? The reason then was that we were in a depression. We have not now got into a depression yet, but we are going to get into one if we keep on with the stupid practices in which we are engaging now. If that is done there will be a depression very soon; then we will have Liberals across the way asking, "Well, what caused it? What are you going to do about it?" Yet they will not listen when we try to tell them. That was why in 1930 people were not doing the very best that could have been done; but they were doing very well in my area, producing at a loss as long as they could stand it. I hope that answers the minister's question in that respect.

And now I come back to the question of why we are having shortages.

In the first place, we have had uncertain markets. In the second place, we have had uncertain prices. Then we have had an income tax structure that has penalized men for doing the things the country wanted them to do, that is, for producing hogs and milk and eggs and butter and all the other good things we needed. Those are the main reasons we now do not have the production.

We must recognize, of course, that we have had some bad years. This year, for example, we had crop failures over a considerable area of the prairie provinces. We lost tremendously in the production of wheat and in many other lines of agriculture; but taking the country from coast to coast in a broad sort of way, generally speaking we could have produced pretty well, if only we had not discouraged our producers by utterly lunatic systems of finance.

That is the first thing. Now I think I shall pass from that aspect of the question after saying only this: If the government of Canada wants production it must do the things that any person fourteen years of age, with common sense, would say should be done. That is, make it possible for a man to earn and keep a little money if he produces something extra. We have not had enough sense even to give a farmer an allowance for the work of his wife in milking cows, feeding chickens, and so on. We have not had enough sense even to make that provision under our income tax laws, so close have we come to the borderline of imbecility in following a financial course that is fantastic and incomprehensible.

Now I wish to turn to another aspect of the question. It has been well brought out in the quotations read by the hon. member for Acadia from the speech by the Minister of Agriculture at the FAO conference that the minister recognized that ours was a monetary problem. I wonder if the Minister of Trade and Commerce will recognize now that our problem is monetary. Will he recognize that our main problem is a monetary one, as his colleague the Minister of Agriculture said in speaking to the FAO conference? Will he recognize that the problem facing the world today is a dollar problem?

Mr. Howe: I will admit that the main obstacle to the kind of trading we would like to do is the inconvertibility of currency. Does that answer my hon. friend's question?

Mr. Blackmore: Very well; the convertibility of currency is a monetary problem, though fundamentally there are other considerations underlying it, such as the production and sale of goods and all that sort of thing. We need not go into those, though I believe I know them and could name them without trouble. The first thing for us to recognize in approaching this problem of international distribution, getting the goods that we can produce in such abundance on this continent into the hands of people on other continents who cannot produce abundantly, is that the fundamental problem is one of money.

Now then, what can we do about money? Where are we going to get the dollars? In order to point up the need for money, let us turn for a moment or two to what Canada did for Great Britain during the war. I am quoting figures which I believe are correct, because they appeared in the report of the Canadian Press from London dated November 26, giving the details of Sir Stafford Cripps' speech. In 1942, he says that Canada gave Great Britain a billion dollar gift. If we could give Great Britain a billion dollar gift during the war, why can we not give her a billion dollars to help win the peace? We shall let any Liberal man who thinks he can answer that question think about it tonight, and answer it tomorrow. If we could give Great Britain a billion dollar gift during the war to help her buy our goods, is there any reason why we cannot give her a billion dollars today? If a billion dollar gift helped solve the problem of getting rid of our surplus goods during the war, then it is conceivable it would help to get rid of our surplus today.

In 1943 Sir Stafford Cripps says Canada gave Great Britain a $700 million interest-free loan, together with Canadian supplies valued at more than $2 billion. Then, after the war, we gave Great Britain a credit of $1,250 million. That is what we were doing to help Great Britain buy the goods we could produce during the war. Why is it that we have decided, now that peace is here, we cannot do anything like that? I invite every Liberal in this house to be ready to answer that question tomorrow. Why is it we have the idea we cannot advance loans like that to Great Britain any longer? We could do it when we were under the stress of war. It is a question that needs serious thought, and a serious answer.

If that was the way to solve the problem in war, then it is probably the way to solve the problem in peace. Immediately a question will be raised as to where all the dollars will come from. I do not want to become involved in a lengthy discussion, but before I make my next statement, I should like to say that the world is up against a crisis. The minister can be as optimistic as he wishes in the house—I do not blame him for being optimistic before the country. May I say that I have the highest regard for the minister. If there is any man in Canada who should be given the greatest measure of appreciation and gratitude, it is the Minister of Trade and Commerce. While I am on this little aside, I may say that if the Conservative members of this house want me to respect them, they will have to stop making insinuating and sneering comments against the Minister of Trade and Commerce. This man has done too many great things for this nation to have anyone make insinuations or slurs against him. I may say that anyone who wants to debate that question can get on the floor and I shall deal with him.

Mr. Knowles: A little while ago you said he was stupid.

Mr. Blackmore: I am not saying that he was the one that was stupid; there are other people having to do with finance who just take the cake for stupidity at every turn they make.

While the minister can be optimistic just as much as he desires in the house, we should recognize that that is not the opinion held by people who are well-informed; who are not speaking politically or desiring to cheer up the country. I should like to refer hon. members to the interim commission of the international trade organization, reporting on the Geneva agreements on tariff and trade, signed in Geneva in 1947 by 23 nations. In a report called "Attack on trade barriers", it says:

> World trade is today facing a crisis of perhaps unprecedented gravity. Even now, four years after the end of the war, there is no sign of a restored equilibrium, and present indications point to a deepening of the unbalance and a sharpening of the issues involved.

Hon. members who are interested can get the Christian Science Monitor dated September 6, 1949, from the library and read that in an article entitled "Continued aid for Europe seen possibility until 1952". It is a Reuters dispatch from Geneva. I believe we can accept that as definite. Let us not try to put the picture in beautiful colours, but face the actual situation which confronts us. What are we going to do about this unbalance?

The only nations in the world who are in a position to do something about it are the "have" nations. Two of the greatest "have" nations in the world are Canada and the United States. I believe all hon. members will agree with me in that respect. If those two are the great "have" nations, then they have it within their power to do something about the dollar problem, while nations like Great Britain, Greece and Turkey are helpless to do anything really effective about it. It will rest upon us as an inescapable responsibility to do something about it. What are we going to do? Are we to sit here idly talking about our inability to take care of our own affairs, in a nation pouring out abundance, while letting less fortunate nations in the other parts of the world continue to suffer?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It is eleven o'clock.

Mr. Blackmore: I shall continue from this point tomorrow, Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The first item tomorrow will be third reading of Bill No. 195, the Surplus Crown Assets Act; the second item will be Bill No. 145, an act respecting the acquisition of the Temiscouata railway; third, the four small bills under the name of the Prime Minister, Bills Nos. 211, 212, 213 and 214, which relate to the setting up of the three new departments and appropriations for salaries. There is a small bill, No. 218, an act to amend the Veterans' Land Act, and then we will go into supply to take up the estimates of National Health and Welfare, the Post Office and Mines and Resources.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, December 2, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Fourth report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Breithaupt.

TEMISCOUATA RAILWAY

BILL NO. 145 TO BE CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE THIS DAY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it was announced last night that after the third reading of Bill No. 195 the next order of business would be Bill No. 145, respecting the acquisition of the Temiscouata railway. I was under the impression yesterday that that bill had been reported from committee, but as a matter of fact it was reported only a moment ago. If the house will give unanimous consent, I move, seconded by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Gibson):

That Bill No. 145, an act respecting the acquisition of the Temiscouata railway, be considered in committee of the whole this day, and that standing order 21 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

COLONIAL AIR LINES

CANADA-U.S. BILATERAL AIR AGREEMENT—ORDER OF AIR TRANSPORT BOARD

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), and again today the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), have asked or given notice of questions concerning the position of the Canada-United States bilateral air agreement. There has been some discussion of it in the house and outside the house, and in view of its importance I feel that perhaps a statement should be made at this time.

The bilateral air agreement entered into between Canada and the United States in June of 1949 is a continuation of the original air agreement, with some changes. Among the new features three United States air carriers were granted traffic rights at Gander on the north Atlantic route and have been exercising those traffic rights under temporary permit pending action on their applications for regular foreign carrier licences from the air transport board. The applications of two of these carriers, Transworld Air Lines and American Overseas Air Lines, were approved by the board on December 1, and yesterday licences were signed accordingly. The application of the third carrier, Pan-American, has been approved in principle, and the licence will be signed on receipt of certain minor amendments which that carrier has indicated it is sending forward.

The United States government was also granted traffic rights at Edmonton on two routes, the first a transborder route from Montana, and the second a through route from the United States to the Orient. Applications have been received from Western Air Lines and from Northwest Air Lines respectively for licences for these routes. It is expected that these applications will be dealt with in the relatively near future.

On the Canadian side, in connection with the new routes granted to the Canadian government, the United States government has issued a permit to Canadian Pacific Air Lines for the exercise of traffic rights in Hawaii on its route to Australia. The Trans-Canada Air Lines application for traffic rights in Florida on its Caribbean route is now being heard by the United States authorities, and will, it is expected, be dealt with within the next few weeks.

On the third new route granted to Canada between Montreal and New York, Colonial Air Lines has opposed an application to the United States authorities for a permit and has succeeded in action in the United States courts which prevents the United States authorities from proceeding with a permit for Trans-Canada Air Lines.

That is what brought about the issue of the show-cause order which was given yesterday by the air transport board, and for which the hearing will be held on December 12. Colonial Air Lines will at that time be given full opportunity to indicate on what grounds it believes its permit from the air transport board for the service between Montreal and New York should be continued.

I should like to point out that this order of the board is one between the air transport board and Colonial Air Lines, related to the permit issued by the board. The actions or policy of the United States government are not involved, and the Canadian authorities are fully satisfied that the United States authorities have proceeded in good faith in relation to the bilateral agreement between the two countries. It does not involve any question of intergovernmental relations in the field of civil aviation between Canada and the United States, which have always been on a close friendly and co-operative basis.

Mr. Thatcher: Did the minister say that permanent rights have been granted by Canada before the Americans carry out their part of the agreement?

Mr. Chevrier: Permanent rights were granted to the two companies I mentioned, Transworld and American Air Lines; and permanent rights have also been granted to Canadian Pacific Air Lines and, I am informed, are on the point of being granted to T.C.A. on its Caribbean route, so far as our rights are concerned.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Can the Prime Minister indicate to the house what will be the agenda for the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference in January?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There has been no agenda prepared. The purpose of the invitations sent to the premiers of the provinces was to meet with us to discuss the possibility of agreeing on a satisfactory method of amendment in Canada by Canadian authorities of such parts of the constitution as cannot be amended by the provincial legislatures or by the dominion parliament alone.

DOUKHOBORS

UNLAWFUL ACTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—QUESTION AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, based upon a telegram I have received from the officers of the railway labour organization at Nelson, to the effect that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is being notified that until such time as suitable steps are taken to ensure the safety of men engaged in the operation of trains under threat of Doukhobor bombing—

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member should read the telegram; he should ask his question.

Mr. Herridge: In view of the situation that exists in that area at this time, can the minister assure the house that the federal government will extend all possible co-operation to the provincial government for the protection of these railway workers and other citizens?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think that in order to convey a correct impression to the house I should give an answer which is perhaps a little longer than is usual in these cases.

The constitutional responsibility for the enforcement of law and order in any province is entirely that of the provincial government. This responsibility has always been recognized by the provinces. It was so recognized by the province of Saskatchewan when dealing with the unlawful actions of Doukhobors in that province.

We have been at all times and are now desirous of co-operating in any way we can, so long as it is distinctly understood by everyone concerned that in doing so we are not assuming responsibility where we have no power. We do not want to be placed in any such position. We are extending our co-operation purely as a result of a desire on our part to be as helpful as we possibly can to the British Columbia government and to Canadian citizens in British Columbia.

Early in the present year we sent to British Columbia, at the request of the attorney general of that province, some twenty members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to deal with the situation existing there at that time.

With regard to these latest atrocities in British Columbia, we have been asked by the attorney general of British Columbia, and latterly by the premier of that province, to co-operate. We have done so, and we appointed former Deputy Commissioner Meade, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who is now on superannuation but who knows more about this problem than any other man in the force, to confer with Commissioner Shirras, of the British Columbia provincial police, as to the further steps that might be taken to meet the situation outlined in the hon. member's question.

CITY OF OTTAWA

SUGGESTED CONSTRUCTION OF SHELTERS AT BUS STOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works what action will be taken in connection with the question I asked the other day about the construction of shelters at bus stops in Ottawa.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): The hon. member asked if the department or the government had written to the city of Ottawa about the building of shelters at bus terminals, and according to our files the answer had to be no. That was the only answer I could give, because I did not want to leave the impression that we had communicated with the city.

I am informed that this is a matter under the authority of the city of Ottawa, not the federal government. We are ready to co-operate in the putting up of these shelters, but I could not commit the government to do things in Ottawa which do not come under our jurisdiction.

Mr. Church: I suggested that you forward my question to the civic authorities and the Ottawa Transportation Commission.

SURPLUS CROWN ASSETS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS CROWN ASSETS BY CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the third reading of Bill No. 195, to amend the Surplus Crown Assets Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

TEMISCOUATA RAILWAY

PROVISION FOR PURCHASE BY GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 145, respecting the acquisition of the Temiscouata railway.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT

CREATION OF NEW DEPARTMENT—TRANSFER OF STAFF FROM MINES AND RESOURCES OR RECONSTRUCTION AND SUPPLY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 211, respecting the Department of Resources and Development.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is one matter in relation to this bill which it may be difficult to deal with under a strict interpretation of the rules, because it involves a reference to another bill. I ask your indulgence, sir, that I may point out what appears to me to be a limiting aspect of this measure, the purpose of which is to set up a Department of Resources and Development.

The bill defines the duties and powers of the minister, and the scope of the activities of the department. Sections 5 and 6 prescribe the broad application of the act. Section 5 relates to the development of forest resources, irrigation projects, national parks, the archaeology, ethnology and fauna and flora of Canada, as well as tourist information and services, housing and the trans-Canada highway. Section 6 provides that the minister shall have the control and management of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, and of crown lands.

There is a similar bill to create a Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. Already something has been said about the setting up of additional departments, and it was argued on the resolution stage that it is not desirable to increase departments simply for the purpose of finding a place for another minister. It is not sufficient to let the matter stand there, because if another department and another minister are needed for the business of Canada, then all members should certainly support a bill which is put forward for that purpose. I suggest that the creation of these two departments is likely to lead to a certain measure of inefficiency and wholly unnecessary duplication, as well as a loss of effort, which is the best possible reason for considering the advisability of the functions of the two departments being incorporated in the department which might then be properly called the Department of Resources and Development.

After all, mines, and technical surveys of our mining or other areas, definitely have to do with our resources, and most important resources. There is no sound reason for separating mining from the Department of Resources and Development, which is to have incorporated in its title the appropriate word "development", because many of the functions of the officials and civil servants attached to the two departments must necessarily be carried out in the same area and be based upon the same type of knowledge. Officials and civil servants who are called upon to go into the Northwest Territories, into the northern areas of Canada from one end of the country to the other, or into the forest and lake areas where mines are found and where technical surveys will be carried out, will be covering precisely the same ground. I submit that the creation of these two departments, instead of being a move toward efficiency, is a definite move towards duplication and is a waste of effort.

Resources and Development

My comments would not have the same validity if the government were charged with the responsibility for the development of resources; but it is not. It has a broad supervisory relationship to all resources, whether they be mines, forests or anything else. Under our constitution as it stands today, and as I believe it will continue to stand, the development of resources is exclusively a provincial responsibility. Over the years most important work from a technical point of view has been done in connection with mining, forestry and other resources by federal government officials, and it has been of great assistance to the provincial departments in carrying out their responsibilities. There is every reason why a province charged with the responsibility of developing mines needs a department dealing exclusively with that activity, because they need field men, men with highly skilled background, who are able to assist in the development of the mines of their own areas.

In the case of forests the provinces, having exclusive responsibility for the actual development thereof, must have separate departments to deal with an undertaking so large in scope. Over the years they have built up highly skilled staffs which deal efficiently with these problems. One of the things we should be on guard against is the setting up of departments which bit by bit, human nature being what it is, will seek to acquire responsibilities which only create unnecessary duplication, not only between provincial and dominion departments, but also between departments of the dominion government itself.

I submit there is not a single activity in the two bills setting up the Department of Resources and Development and the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys which could not be handled much more efficiently by one minister, who could make full use of his staff so that trained men going down the Mackenzie, to the Hudson bay area, Ungava or any other part of the Canadian northland, would be able to carry out the duties that involve co-operation with provincial authorities without the necessity of another man being sent back to cover precisely the same ground hundreds and in some cases thousands of miles from the office in Ottawa.

Let us see exactly what the function of the dominion government is as to mines. So far as the dominion government is concerned, the most important thing is what it does not do, rather than what it does. It is infinitely more important that the dominion government avoid any limitation of mining development by unbalanced or excessive taxation which has no regard for the fact that mineral resources are a wasting asset. It is much more important that there be no restrictions on the free market for mineral products, that there be no control which limits this highly speculative and challenging type of development, than it is to set up a new group of officials who will find new reasons for making it more difficult to carry out this adventurous but extremely important task. The duties properly related to the department of mines are such that they can be successfully carried out by a minister who is dealing with the whole broad picture of resources in Canada.

Surely we must look at this matter from the practical point of view. A minister is charged with responsibility; he has a deputy minister, his officials, his technical staff, and other employees. A minister of resources has before him a map showing all the rich resources of this vast country. How much better it is that one minister examine that map, so that if he is sending a group of individuals to some distant point, another minister in another department, who is looking at another map showing our resources, will not be sending another group to examine the same problems in the same area.

Every hon. member here will recall the broad outline of the report of that great statesman in the United States, Mr. Herbert Hoover, when he examined the governmental structure in the United States. Significantly enough, he was a well-known Republican and was appointed by a Democratic president to carry out this survey, because of his wide experience in the administrative problems of government. This commission under Mr. Hoover found almost incredible duplications of service. His report is filled with the record of officials going out to do similar jobs in the same areas. It indicated the possibility of saving, not millions but billions, in the over-all administration of the United States government. We have before us the kind of thing in respect to which a commission, or a committee of this house, examining the administration a year or five years from now, would say: These two departments never should have been separated. Any commission examining this from the point of view of administrative efficiency and simplicity would say that the department has not jurisdiction over the actual development of the resources. It has the responsibility of bringing together the federal government and the provinces in joint efforts in their common fields of interest. For example, in the case of highways, it has the responsibility of passing enabling legislation under which broad agreements can be reached in respect to activities that cross provincial boundaries. It would be said also that there was a measure dealing with forest resources, under which the provinces could be brought together to co-operate in research, in forest protection, and in fire prevention.

I feel sure that any commission examining the structure of government a year or ten years from now would say that this is wrong from the point of view of administrative efficiency. I am not going to move an amendment, because the government must assume the responsibility for the definition of the administrative tasks that are to be performed. Unless the Prime Minister is convinced that the contention is sound, and that he should act upon it, no amendment will produce any further result than the argument that is put forward. This is not a case in which an amendment should be proposed simply for the purpose of having the views of the members recorded, which is the usual purpose of an amendment when it is recognized that it cannot be sustained.

In all earnestness, I urge that these bills be allowed to stand. The bill now before us should be amended by incorporating in it the powers included in the act respecting the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. The addition of one or two sections to this bill will give to this proposed new department the wide supervision of all resources that the name, mines and technical surveys, includes. We would then have one businesslike, efficient department under a minister who could have charge of the resources of this country; and, with the imagination of a man with feeling for Canada, he would be able to make the most effective use of the civil servants working under him. If this is not done, let us all recognize the fact that the two departments will continue to increase in numbers and in the extent of their authority. From time to time groups of people from these two departments will be meeting at Aklavik or at the head of Hamilton inlet and one will say to the other: Well, boys, we did not know you were here; what a lucky chance that we have met! They will ask each other what they are doing, and they will find they are each doing precisely the same thing.

I urge upon the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, that he realize what any commission would do if it examined this measure. Let us deal with this now instead of at some later time.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I wish to call the attention of the minister to the duties, powers, and functions provided for in this bill. It is the most important bill we have had before parliament for some time. So far as the parliament of Canada is concerned, its jurisdiction is found in these various subsections to which reference has been made.

There is no doubt that in this country we have the greatest natural resources of any country in the world, and they are much coveted by others. The wealth of our forest resources is untold. Future generations will criticize this parliament if immediate steps are not taken to preserve the heritage we have in the forests. I agree with the suggestions my leader has made in this connection. It is linked up with the tourist trade. Many forest fires are caused by careless people. We should realize that these fires are destroying the by-products of wood and interfering with employment. The minister is right in utilizing paratroopers in fighting forest fires.

Speaking of irrigation and the development of water power, since I first entered this house I have always contended that Canada should have a national policy in this regard. We are one of the richest countries in the world in potential hydroelectric power. It is estimated that 45 million horsepower is available, and only about one-seventh of it has been developed, part of which is only seasonal. For many years we have been hearing about irrigation projects. I am sorry to say that little has been done in that regard, on either the prairies or in other parts of Canada. The development of irrigation is only in its infancy.

For many years I have suggested that there should be a national park in Ontario, linking up the crown property on the Ottawa river, the Rideau lakes, the St. Lawrence river, the Trent canal to the Severn river, around Muskoka, and the lake of Bays, the Parry Sound district and Georgian bay, up to the Maganatawan river, and through new Ontario to the head of the lakes. These are all properties held by the crown in the right of the dominion or the right of the province. There is no reason why Ontario should not get a share of these parks. At the moment there is a small park near the St. Lawrence, and another up on Pelee island; but there is really no national park in Ontario. This results in the loss of a great deal of the tourist trade. I believe the time has come when, without expense to the country, we could link up the crown properties I have suggested around the great lakes and inland waterways of the province of Ontario. A hotel system could be developed along with it, and Canada could be made something like Switzerland. There would be winter sports and all that sort of thing. It would mean a great deal of business, in winter and summer alike, to the people in this country.

Mention has been made of tourist information and services. We have received only a small part of the wealth which we should receive from a proper development of the tourist trade and kindred services. For a great many years this country has not received proper advertising along those lines.

In connection with housing, I am sorry there is no cheap land in Toronto. There used to be a Toronto district including Peel, Ontario, and York counties. Land was available at $6 per foot within the city limits, and now it is as high as $65 a foot. There is not even land available for people to build houses under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation schemes. There is no steam suburban service such as Montreal has. I shall not go into that in detail this morning, but it is not a luxury; it is an economic necessity. When you find there is only one train a day out of some of those places in York county, and without commutation service, then it is another matter. Western Ontario, and especially the Niagara district, is suffering untold loss owing to the choked and cramped railway facilities available. We seem to be spending a great deal of money on our United States affiliation of the Canadian National, but not within Canada.

I shall not refer to the trans-Canada highway bill this morning, but I believe it will have to be read in conjunction with this particular bill. The other morning I was glad to hear the minister say that as pioneers in the good roads movement the provinces and municipalities which have gone ahead with this work will be recompensed.

I commend to the house the general principle of this bill. We have a great asset in our natural resources, and with the duties, powers and functions the minister now has, we should be able to start to develop them.

Mr. J. A. Bradette (Cochrane): I should like to say a few words with respect to the remarks made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). His objection to this bill is based upon what might be called the overlapping of departmental activities as between the federal and provincial governments. So far as my own section of the country is concerned, which is highly mineralized, the people are satisfied with the government policy implied in this bill. I believe the same thing can be said of the mine owners. There is no doubt that in a federated state one must look for some amount of overlapping. No one would say that because we have a minister of agriculture in each of the provinces, the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa should be abolished. The same thing applies to mining.

[Mr. Church.]

I do not believe the leader of the opposition would say that there has been overlapping between the central government and the province of Ontario so far as mining is concerned. There is no doubt that the national research bureau, as well as other departments of the government—

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but, to keep the record straight, I most emphatically state that there has been duplication.

Mr. Bradette: No doubt there has been, but that is something we must expect in a federated state. No one would say that because there is some duplication in a provincial department, the federal department should be abolished; that is the point I am making. I was going to say that even the department of mines in Toronto—and I know whereof I speak—has benefited from research that has been undertaken by the central government; and this applies to several other activities. The same applies to forestry. It is true that the Northwest Territories have not the forest resources that we have in Ontario, but there is no doubt that the department of forestry has developed information which is useful in all parts of Canada.

I know something about the necessity for setting up this department, and I can say that it is a step in the right direction. The mining interests in Canada are satisfied with the proposal that has been put forward. I have not the time to present the briefs and recommendations that have been placed before me during the last ten years, urging the federal government to establish a special department for mining on account of its great importance in our economy. The leader of the opposition stated the position correctly when he said there was a mutual interest in the federal and provincial aspects of mining.

A few years ago, when the Canadian dollar was brought to parity, there was an immediate request from the gold mine owners who were primarily interested. I received dozens of telegrams and telephone calls stating that the action of the government would harm the production of gold in Canada, and that some remedial measures should be taken. The department of mining is a necessary department, and a proper one for the federal government to administer. In common with the leader of the opposition, I do not believe in extravagance. Surely we do not need a Hoover commission in Canada; our situation is not comparable with that which prevails in the United States. There may be some departments that are overstaffed, but, so far as I am aware, there are very few of them. I believe there is a method of liaison among all these departments and the provincial departments. For instance, there is the Department of Justice and the Department of the Secretary of State. They fulfil a purpose which has to do with the application of justice in Canada. But who will say there is overlapping in these departments?

I am voicing the sentiment of my section of Ontario when I say that I am entirely in agreement with the formation of the three new departments. Here and now I want to compliment this administration upon forming the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. They will have their hands full if they want to look after the northern part of our country and the mining interests of Canada as a whole. The activities which will be undertaken in the future by these new departments will undoubtedly prove to be of great benefit in the development of our natural resources on a national scale.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): On behalf of the people of northern British Columbia, Mr. Speaker, may I say that this new department will be perfectly welcome. In the north, and particularly in the Northwest Territories, there is great need for such a department as this. I have been down to Aklavik and, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said, others may go there. It is amazing that in the Northwest Territories there should be such an abundance of natural wealth of which there is no record at the present time, here or elsewhere.

The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) says that the province of Ontario has more timber wealth than the Northwest Territories. That is a doubtful statement.

Mr. Bradette: I did not say that. I said that we had great natural forest wealth.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I beg the hon. member's pardon; I thought he had made the definite statement. There is vast timber wealth in the Liard, Mackenzie and Yukon river areas, timber limits that have never been surveyed or officially noted. Tremendous forest fires destroy much of that timber, and when one realizes that we have no department to look after those resources, one cannot help being concerned. It is true that we have civil servants whose work has to do with these matters, but we should have a department headed by a minister who would be responsible for this work. Think of all the gold and other metallic wealth which has been taken out of that part of Canada, the quantities of base metals that are known to exist—and many of these areas are mapped by the surveys and mapping bureau—and the great wealth of oil and petroleum at Norman Wells and elsewhere.

I have gone along the Mackenzie river and have seen the oil running out from the shores into the stream. I have seen a gas well up beyond Norman Wells which has been burning since Alexander Mackenzie passed through there in 1793. All these vast resources should be utilized.

The leader of the opposition objects to the creation of a mines department. Yet great progress and prosperity in the province of Ontario began with the development of new Ontario and the great mineral resources there, and the creation of a mines department in Ontario. The hon. gentleman has brought into the discussion the name of a former president of the United States. I am sure if Mr. Herbert Hoover were a Canadian and a member of this parliament, he would advocate the creation of a department of mines in Canada, because he is one of the most distinguished mining engineers alive today. I am therefore anxious to see this new department started.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, during our election campaign we emphasized the importance of the development of our natural resources. I venture to say that the bill now before us represents progress. The new minister may be in the house, and I suggest to him that north of the lakehead there is a large clay belt that is supposed to be rich in natural resources, especially oil. I compliment the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on being progressive in this respect.

Mr. Drew: I wish, Mr. Speaker, to correct a possible misapprehension. I was not suggesting any limitation of activities in regard to mining; on the contrary, I emphasized their importance. What I was suggesting was that the mining activities and the mining development under a mining branch associated with one minister of resources would be more efficient than a separate department of this kind. I was emphasizing, rather than doing otherwise, the importance of the development of these great resources under a system that would be businesslike.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think any of us misunderstood the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I think we all understood that he was anxious, as are all of us in this house, to adopt the most efficient methods to promote the use of the great natural resources with which our country has been so bountifully blessed. As I see it, the only difference of view in this respect was that the leader of the opposition felt that this work might be more efficiently done under one department than under two departments. I thank the leader of the opposition for his constructive suggestions, and I thank the other hon. members who have participated in the debate. I think it has been shown that we are all anxious to do that which will ensure the most efficient job in providing for the development and use of these resources.

I can assure the leader of the opposition that the matter of having these activities provided for by the two bills, No. 211, dealing with resources and development, and No. 212, dealing with mines and technical surveys, was carefully considered, and it was felt that it would be desirable to have two ministers responsible for those activities. One of them, the Minister of Resources and Development, would be principally concerned with the works and undertakings in process, whether for the federal government or in collaboration with the provincial governments. Many undertakings will require close collaboration between the federal and provincial authorities in order to bring about that measure of development which will be of benefit to the country as a whole. It was felt that all matters having to do with the physical works required to promote that development should be under one department, and that this would be quite enough to engage all its time and attention. It was felt that there should be another department which would be more in the nature of a service department, one which would be concerned with the making of scientific investigations which provide the data used sometimes by provincial administrations but oftener by individuals or groups of individuals who make them the foundation of their enterprises. This is the division that has been attempted in these two bills. The objective has been, on the one hand, the promotion of the physical works required to bring the resources into use, and, on the other, the scientific investigation which is necessary as a preparation for development work. In considering these bills hon. members will find that this is the line of demarcation that has been drawn.

The assistance of the Department of Mines and Resources has been sought for a number of years by those who have interested themselves in this highly speculative activity, as the leader of the opposition has described it, the results of which, however, have been of tremendous benefit to the Canadian economy. There has been pressure for a long time to have a department that would be specially concerned with the preparation of the basic information and data upon which the mining industry could rely when engaging in this highly speculative activity. There is no desire or attempt to invade the provincial field. However, all hon. members know that the services provided by the federal government with respect to surveys, assays and analyses have been of tremendous value in channeling properly these speculative activities, the results of which are of such benefit to us all.

I gave the approximate figures of the staffs in these two departments—something of the order of 2,000 to 3,000 in each; and I am sure the ministers and deputy ministers who will be charged with the responsibility of those departments will have, not overlapping jobs but full-time jobs, and that it will be in the public interest to have one of them specially concerned with pressing forward the works undertaken and the other concerned with the gathering of information and scientific data that will induce others to proceed with additional works of development.

It is in the interests of the development of these resources and their being brought into use for the improvement of the living conditions of all of us that these activities should be prosecuted with the greatest possible vigour and intensity. I hope it will appear reasonable to hon. members that there should be these two departments, the one pushing ahead works already undertaken, and the other preparing the field for vast new undertakings.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Sections 1 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On section 9—Department, minister and deputy minister substituted.

Mr. Knowles: This section indicates that the new Minister of Resources and Development will carry out the functions of the various other ministers referred to in acts at present on the statute books. When the commission revising the statutes does its job, will it make the necessary changes so that we shall get rid of some of these complicated references, or shall we carry forward this sort of procedure indefinitely?

Mr. St. Laurent: There were references in the revised statutes of 1927 to legislation going back certainly as far as 1907, and perhaps farther. I should hope, for the convenience of all who might have to refer to the statutes, that the commission will find it possible to bring these together, to suggest the repeal of these old statutes and have in the new acts relating to the several departments of government something comprehensive that will indicate the whole of the functions and responsibilities with which they are charged, thus making it unnecessary to refer to more than one act for each department.

Mr. Knowles: I realize it is the work of the commission, but I am glad to have the Prime Minister's statement in the matter. For example, only a few days ago we passed a measure concerning the trans-Canada highway, in which we gave certain rights and powers to the Minister of Mines and Resources. Today we are passing a bill to do away with the Minister of Mines and Resources as such. It is that sort of thing which I think might be tidied up.

Sections 10 and 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Annual report.

Mr. Knowles: This section states that the minister shall submit to parliament, within thirty days after the commencement of the first session of parliament in each year, a report showing the operations of the department during the year then last preceding. As the Prime Minister knows, a similar section appears in most acts of parliament. Certainly there is one like it in every act constituting a department. What happens if the minister fails to carry out this provision?

Mr. St. Laurent: As a matter of unavoidable necessity it has frequently happened that departmental reports have not been tabled within the required fifteen or thirty days. They are tabled just as soon as they can be obtained from the printer. I have never heard any complaint voiced in the house about tardiness in bringing down such reports. It frequently happens that, because of congestion in the government printing bureau, reports are not available for tabling at the times specified in the acts.

When these bills were being considered by the cabinet a note was made to have the revising commission consider all these departmental acts so that there may be a uniform section in each, and to have it read that the reports be tabled within a certain time, or as soon as they can be obtained from the king's printer.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad to hear the Prime Minister make that statement. All hon. members I am sure want to be generous, even to the members of the present Liberal government—although the Minister of Justice did not think we felt that way toward him in connection with another report. It seems to me, however, that we should not pass laws containing provisions, even as formal as this one, which it is thought will not be complied with. If law is law, it should be observed in all cases, and particularly by ministers of the crown. I hope this matter will be straightened out so that there will not be delays which certainly amount to failure to comply with the provisions of the law.

The Prime Minister has said that sometimes delay is the result of difficulty in obtaining printed documents from the king's printer. I would remind him that this year we had an example of delay on the part of the king's printer that did not interfere with compliance with the law on the part of the minister concerned. I refer to the public accounts and the report of the Auditor General. The law provides that, if parliament is sitting, the report must be laid on the table on October 31. On October 31 the Minister of Finance rose in his place and said that he did not have a printed copy of the report, but would table a typewritten copy. The report was thus made public, the press had access to it, and the law was observed. As a matter of fact, some of us did not get our copies until a few weeks later, but that did not mean that the law had not been carefully complied with by the Minister of Finance.

As the Prime Minister is probably aware, there have been four or five cases this session in which delays have occurred, and in not one case did the minister or the parliamentary assistant, when laying the report on the table, indicate that there was delay, explain it, or apologize for it. For instance, the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the year ended March 31, 1949, should have been tabled, according to section 7 of the Department of Trade and Commerce Act, on October 6; it was not tabled until November 23, seven weeks late. There was no explanation or apology.

Similarly the Canadian Maritime Commission Act provides that the report must be completed not later than June 30 and must be laid on the table within fifteen days after the opening of the next ensuing session of parliament. In other words, that report should have been tabled by September 30 of this year. It was not tabled until November 24, eight weeks late. Again nothing was said by way of apology or explanation. Something else having happened in this connection this year, which is very well known, it is natural that I should begin to wonder whether these requirements are being complied with; hence the discovery of the information I am now giving.

The reports of the auditors in connection with the Canadian Farm Loan Act and the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act—I mention these two acts together, because the auditing is done at the same time—should have been tabled by September 30, according to the provisions of those two acts. They were not tabled until October 11, eleven days late.

In the case of the report of the Department of the Secretary of State, a much shorter period of time is allowed by the act. It should have been tabled within ten days after the meeting of parliament, which meant not later than September 25. But it was not tabled until November 18, a delay of eight weeks. I realize that none of these delays was as serious as was the delay in the tabling of the McGregor report on the flour milling industry; nevertheless that is the law as it stands. I have all of these sections before me, but I have not taken the time to read them. In the four or five cases I have mentioned there has been a nonchalant disregard of the law by laying on the table of the house reports that were from eleven days to eight weeks late.

As I have said already, the Minister of Finance made it clear that the law could be complied with even when the king's printer has not produced the printed copy. I urge that more care should be taken to observe laws of this kind. The proposal which the Prime Minister has made as to uniform procedure should be acted upon. I would go one step further and say that even after that is done, if a minister finds it is impossible to comply with the law to the extent of presenting printed copies of the report in question, he should do what the Minister of Finance did. The Minister of Finance is not always a hero of mine, but in that case he kept the law. If a minister cannot keep the law, he should at least explain to the house what has happened, and I am sure that in such circumstances the house would be generous. Since we are making laws which we expect the people of Canada to observe, I think they should be observed by the government as well. Surely that is not asking too much.

Section 13 agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I intend to ask a minister to move an amendment to the schedule deleting the reference to two acts.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That the following words be deleted from the schedule: "Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act, R.S. 1927, 78"; "Northwest Game Act, R.S. 1927, 141."

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The first act was repealed the other day by the Canada Forestry Act, and the second act was repealed during the 1947 session, but the repeal was not proclaimed until last year, and they got into the schedule in error.

Schedule as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. St. Laurent moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I should like to ask the unanimous consent of the house to third reading this day. I understand that standing order 73 provides that every bill shall receive three separate readings on different days, but perhaps at this stage of the session unanimous consent could be given, unless some hon. member has a speech to make on the third reading.

Mr. MacInnis: I suppose the same request will be made with regard to all these bills that are before us. I have no objection to this being done, provided it is not taken as a precedent and becomes a custom. My reading of history has convinced me that no majority was ever so large that it could be magnanimous. A minority always has to protect its rights.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that motion for third reading has been made, a procedure to which I do not think hon. members will object, I should like to exercise my right to make a few comments in regard to one matter that came up in the course of discussion. I wish most emphatically to go on record as saying that I believe it is only a question of time before someone examining these two departments will come back with a recommendation that they be one department.

I should like to deal with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). I recognize that the hon. member is keenly interested in mining, as all of us are, whether we live in a mining constituency or not. The hon. member said he felt sure that if this was the United States, Mr. Herbert Hoover would be the first to suggest that there be a department of mines. I think the hon. member left the impression that there is a department of mines in Washington. There is not, and Mr. Hoover did not recommend that. On the contrary his recommendations all involved simplification of departments. Mining activities are under the department of the interior at Washington. That department embraces most of the subjects covered by the two bills now before us. For instance, the Department of the Interior at Washington covers mining, the bureau of land management—which is all land—Indian affairs, geological surveys, land reclamation, park services, fish and wildlife, and a number of other details, including technical surveys and matters of the kind which are embraced in these two bills. There are additions, but I only wish to emphasize now, because I am certain the matter will come up for discussion again, that those who desire the efficient development of our mines would certainly wish to have it done in a way that will bring the greatest possible information to the public.

We are not dealing directly now with a department of mines. We are dealing with a measure which I suggest could have been amended to include mining activities. If we had done so we would have followed the practice that is followed in Washington. When I say that, I do not mean that we should follow the pattern of Washington. I raise the question because of my belief that the inquiry conducted into the administrative structure of their government was a most important one. It was at that point that the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), who is keenly interested in the whole subject, suggested that they would not think of not having a department of mines at Washington. They have not a separate department of mines, and for the very good reason, in my opinion, that the whole subject should be embraced under one ministerial head, with different branches dealing with the various subjects related to the resources of the whole country.

I intend to say nothing more, other than that the vote on third reading will be on division. I have urged that there be an amendment to the bill, purely for the purpose of seeking to produce the most efficient results. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has put forward reasons, which appear sound to him, why there should be separate departments. I simply wished to indicate why I feel it would be better if it were not done in this way, and also that in the United States they do not follow the practice of having a separate department.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I say that the hon. member's knowledge of the geography of Canada is slightly confused, because I am the member for Cariboo. My people would be most disappointed if they thought I was representing Cochrane.

Mr. Drew: I was not referring to the hon. member for Cariboo, but to the hon. member for Cochrane. I understood he had spoken about the Hoover commission. If it was the hon. member for Cariboo, I wish to make it clear I knew he was the member for Cariboo, and I shall be glad to have that corrected.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Drew: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the third time and passed.

MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

CREATION OF NEW DEPARTMENT—TRANSFER OF STAFF FROM MINES AND RESOURCES OR RECONSTRUCTION AND SUPPLY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 212, respecting the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I want to deal briefly with this bill, without repeating the remarks I have already made as to the consolidation of the two departments.

It must be remembered that the mines department of the dominion government deals with the broad problems of mining and information related thereto; it is not responsible for the direct development of the resources except to the extent that such information may contribute to the desired result.

Mr. St. Laurent: Perhaps the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) would add that it deals with such mines as may be in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

Mr. Drew: Yes, such mines as are outside of existing provincial areas, and there are some increasingly important mines in that region. Having said that, I want to emphasize the fact that the department in Ottawa has been the source of extremely useful information which has been the basis of discoveries of the utmost importance. The most romantic and dramatic story of discovery of mines in Canada was that concerning the finding of the Eldorado mine on Great Bear lake. Many people have forgotten, if they were ever aware of the fact, that the records in Ottawa played an extremely important part in the discovery of that mine. This may well be remembered in setting up the organization under the new terms of authority.

When those who intended to seek minerals in that area were about to set out on their expedition, they came to Ottawa to find out what they could about records of mineral possibilities in the Northwest Territories. They examined the original records of Samuel Hearne, who had covered the area in the eighteenth century when he was going through the Northwest Territories in the Great Bear lake region and on to the Arctic. He described evidence of rich minerals he had seen on the face of jutting rocks on the shore of a lake which at that time had no name, and which in fact did not appear on any map of Canada in anything approaching its actual shape until the early thirties. It was only then that any map existed which showed the actual shape of Great Bear lake, one of the largest bodies of fresh water in Canada.

From Hearne's description and the type of promontory outlined by him, they decided to look for the great promontory where he had recorded this rich outcrop so many years before. What was found was the very thing Hearne had discovered one hundred and seventy years earlier. The gossan that was seen from the aircraft led the prospectors to the very point that had been described, toward which they were first attracted by what they had seen in those early records available in Ottawa. From that discovery came not only a great and important mine, but also a substantial contribution toward the production of the atomic bomb in the last war. I mention this to re-emphasize the vast importance of detailed information. We have advanced a great distance from the time Hearne travelled those waters in a canoe to the point where another important mining area was discovered through the opportunity to examine air maps of northern Manitoba. The development of the rich mineral resources in the God's lake area came about through an examination of air maps of that district which showed promising indications of what have turned out to be very productive mines. There is an accumulation of information through the years that can be of immense importance in the development of those areas; and as surveys are carried out, as survey parties report their information, and as the various indications of mineral possibilities are brought back to Ottawa, I urge that all this information be indexed in the satisfactory way in which it has been done up to now, and also that something be done to encourage an interest in that information on the part of those who at some future time may find these resources a matter of practical interest.

I say this because I know that many people directly interested in the discovery of mines have never had occasion to think of searching these records for suggestions which may be contained in the information there available. With the new scientific developments that tell us so much about what lies beneath the surface of the earth, these records are becoming more useful; and I urge that in addition to carrying forward this work at an ever-accelerated rate from the point of view of information, every practical step be taken to encourage, in the minds of young people in the mining technical schools and the engineering branches of our universities, an appreciation of the vast storehouse of knowledge that already has been accumulated here and will be accumulated in the years to come.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

[Mr. Drew.]

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Knowles: Again I am looking for information. We in the opposition have not access to expert advice in order to get some of these answers; but just looking at this bill as a layman it seems to me to be in a different category from the one we passed a few moments ago. With respect to the department created under that bill, it seemed to me that while it has a new name, it is really one of the present departments being continued with added responsibilities, with the result that it is a substantial and responsible department. Under this bill, however, we seem to be taking things away from a department which has been under the direction of a minister. The Department of Mines and Resources has had to do with mines, immigration, Indian affairs and so on. Although this is a question, I shall put it in the form of a statement and hope to get the answer in one way or another. It seems to me that this department is being whittled down until it does not compare with the others in terms of responsibility. Can the Prime Minister or his assistant give us some idea of the amount of work in this department as compared with that in the department we set up a moment ago, or, indeed, as compared with that in the departments of the government as a whole? It seems to me that my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, made an apt suggestion the other day when he proposed that the whole government administration should be surveyed with a view to determining whether the work is being evenly and properly distributed.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Without entering into a general discussion covering all the departments of government, let me indicate the difference between these two departments. The new Department of Mines and Technical Surveys will have about 1,800 employees during the winter season. It will be considerably larger during the summer months, when the survey parties are out. According to present estimates, the budget will amount to about $15 million, exclusive of the assistance given under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. Therefore I suggest to the hon. member that this is not a department which is being whittled down, but that it is a very substantial department. It will carry on all the functions of the mines and resources department, except those which are being transferred to resources and development.

Mr. Knowles: Then can the parliamentary assistant tell us how many employees the old Department of Mines and Resources had, and what was its annual budget? And could he refer to one or two other departments, just for purposes of comparison? I would not ask him to do it for all the departments.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The present Department of Mines and Resources has had as many as 7,200 employees in the summer. The number is considerably higher in the summer than it is in the winter. The new Department of Resources and Development will have about 2,700 employees during the winter, and its budget will run to about $26 million. The hon. member can see, therefore, the relative importance of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and the Department of Resources and Development. As to the other departments of government, I suggest that the hon. member look at the estimates. I have not the details before me at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: I think the parliamentary assistant made a mistake, of which I shall not take advantage; naturally I would not do a thing like that. He gave the lower figure for the new department, the figure for the winter, as 1,800. Then he gave the maximum figure, in the case of the old department, of 7,200. In fairness to himself and in fairness to the departments I think he should have given the other figure as well, so we could make a proper comparison. With regard to those figures, if we are taking a department that had 7,200 employees and cutting it down to a department with only 1,800, I think my phrase "whittling down" would not be inappropriate.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): But the hon. member has overlooked the number who will go into the Department of Resources and Development which is now being set up.

Mr. Knowles: But that does not answer my query, whether we are not leaving this one as a rather small department as compared with the others.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The three bills before the house are somewhat comparable, both as to budget and as to number of employees. When we come to the next bill it will be found that the number of employees is 3,100, and the budget is about $19 million.

Mr. Gillis: I agree with what the leader of the opposition has said with respect to this department; I referred to this when the bills were introduced. Looking over the estimates one would almost think we were beginning to develop a system of technocracy in this country. From end to end of the estimates, in public works and every other department of government, it is engineers, engineers, engineers. I am wondering to what extent this Department of Mines and Technical Surveys will duplicate the work done in the provinces. Each province has a department of mines which has its engineers and geologists and is doing a practical job of work in connection with our resources. With all the engineers and geologists we have in the mines department in Ottawa, certainly we must be duplicating a great deal of the work done by the provinces. From the start I did not see that this was necessary. I believed it was necessary to unscramble the Department of Mines and Resources in order to find out what many of its branches were doing; but in my view the creation of another department, with another minister and a lot more engineers and so on, in order to duplicate a great deal of the work being carried on by the provinces, is quite unnecessary. This minister, whoever he may be, is going to have a pretty good job. I suggest to the Prime Minister that he should get this minister a whistle such as they have on peanut stands, so he can blow it occasionally and let us know he is around.

I have gone all through these estimates and had a look at the provisions for engineers and other technical men in our departments, and I think that handing over our resources to these people merely adds up to technocracy. I suppose, and hope, that the Department of Resources and Development will be presided over by an engineer, such as the present Minister of Reconstruction and Supply; and I think mines and technical surveys logically belong to that department. If that minister is to be in charge of the development of our resources he should have under his direction those working on the resources from a geological standpoint and otherwise. I cannot understand why they should be separated. My conception of this department always has been that it contains a group of experts who are pioneering, who are not duplicating the work done by the provinces but who have knowledge of our frontiers and are pushing them back, gathering information which the provincial departments are not gathering and making that information available to them. But I cannot visualize the department, as I have come to know it since I have been in Ottawa, carrying on that sort of work.

I agree with what was said by the leader of the opposition, in his emphatic way, that this department should come under the other one. It is unnecessary to create a new department. Some hon. member says that Hoover would tell us we should have a mines department. Well, we have ten mines departments in this country; and from my contact with that department in my own province I know it is doing an excellent job. There is no information I may want with respect to the resources of that province that I cannot get there, without having to come to Ottawa for it. If I were looking for some information in connection with the Yukon, naturally I would come here. I believe it is a waste of time and money to create another department such as this. It should be handed over to the Minister of Resources and Development.

Mr. Applewhaite: I think it is my duty to the people of northern British Columbia whom I represent to support the move for a separate department of mines. Prior to the last war it was a common thing—I was going to say it was a popular pastime, but I do not want to be facetious—for organizations interested in mining to pass and send to Ottawa resolutions requesting this government to set up a department of mines under a minister who would have no other responsibility.

I would suggest to the opposition that the importance of the work a government department can do is not necessarily to be judged entirely by the number of employees it may have on its pay roll, but rather on the results it may achieve. Considering the fact that we have responsibility for geological surveys, and that mining is a matter of nation-wide concern, I think this department with its own minister is definitely justified. Where I shall be opposing the Prime Minister is when he endeavours, as I hope he will not, to saddle the minister of mines with several other departments. I can assure the house that if the federal department of mines does the job which it is expected to do, and which is there for it to do, the expenditure will be amply justified and the minister will be a busy man.

Mr. Herridge: For some years investigations on the Columbia river have been conducted by a joint engineering board, and a large number of technical surveys have been undertaken. Some of those surveys were undertaken by the Department of Mines and Resources and some by the Department of Public Works. Will the adoption of this legislation mean that in future all those surveys will come under the direction of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): If these bills pass, the investigations referred to by the hon. member will come under the direction of the Department of Resources and Development.

Mr. Knowles: Is the parliamentary assistant now in a position to complete the information he was giving me a short time ago? It seems to me that in fairness to all concerned he should not leave on the record the statement that the present Department of Mines and Resources has had 7,200 employees at the peak, in the summertime, whereas the new Department of Mines and Technical Surveys will have as its minimum number, in the wintertime, some 1,800. Is he not in a position to give us the minimum number of employees in the old department, as compared with the 1,800 in the new one?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The minimum number of employees of the old departments in October was slightly over 7,500. They will be divided between the new departments approximately 3,100, 1,800 and 2,700, so they would add up to about the same figure.

Mr. Knowles: That does not answer my point.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Further duties.

Mr. Drew: This section sets out broadly the duties of the minister in a number of fields, and contains one paragraph that I think should receive the attention of every hon. member who is interested in avoiding duplication, and in the efficiency of a number of public services that are now available. Under the words "the minister shall", paragraph 6 (d) says:

> . . . make such chemical, mechanical, metallurgical and other researches and investigations as are necessary or desirable to carry out the purposes and provisions of this act and particularly to aid the mining and metallurgical industry of Canada.

At an earlier point in the discussion of these two bills it was suggested that there is no duplication between dominion and provincial activities in these fields. There is great duplication. It is difficult to estimate how great the annual loss may be through unnecessary duplication and the blank spots which are left because of the fact that there is no effective co-ordination of our many research activities. Here in Ottawa there is the national research council, with its large buildings and its extensive facilities. In Toronto, for instance, there is the Ontario research foundation, which is associated with the provincial government and is carrying on research which is quite as extensive and which in some ways covers a wider field. There are also the research activities of our great universities across this country. There are important industrial, mining and forestry organizations with elaborate research establishments of their own. The duplication is great. I say that as a result of a report that I have read on the subject.

But what is equally serious is that, through lack of co-ordination of our research activities, much research which should be carried on is not being carried on at all. Quite as important as the avoidance of duplication of research in this or in any other field of public responsibility is the allocation of research tasks which will make certain that everything is done that needs to be done. In adopting section 6 and bringing research in this particular field under the minister of mines, I would strongly urge that steps be taken to work out a procedure for the undertaking of research activity which has never at any time been carried out in this country.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I draw attention to the work done by the university of British Columbia in research, inasmuch as the hon. gentleman has referred to the universities. I would point out that right across the country they do not duplicate but rather add a third service for the development of these great mineral resources. The university of British Columbia has carried on research and has turned out experts and technicians who today are largely responsible for the management of the mining industry in British Columbia. I will not mention the names of the various technicians, but they are the result of the training given in the university of British Columbia.

Mr. St. Laurent: May I say just a word in that connection. As the leader of the opposition knows, there already is a substantial measure of collaboration among the provincial departments, the universities and this branch of the present Department of Mines and Resources. From my own experience as a lawyer before I came here I know that concerns for which I was acting would go to the provincial department, to the universities in the province of Quebec or to the federal Department of Mines and Resources. It frequently happened that their experimental work was done here in the Department of Mines and Resources, but at their cost. On other occasions some of their technicians were allowed to come and use the facilities in the mining branch and to get the assistance of the officials in that branch in conducting assays.

I fully agree with the leader of the opposition that it will be one of the responsibilities of this department to see to it that there is available to everyone the fullest information as to where it would be most convenient for him to obtain the kind of services that will foster the development of the undertaking in which he is engaged.

Mr. Drew: I agree with what the Prime Minister has said about the availability of these services. The procedure he has mentioned of carrying out, in co-operation with mining or industrial organizations, research activities for which these organizations pay, is of great importance. I should prefer that there be no lack of recognition of the need for more effective co-ordination.

I may say that, in one particular case into which I was inquiring, I found that three distinct research groups were working on a problem related to one aspect of mining development within an area of about twenty square miles. I do not think there is any secret about it. One was being carried on by the Ontario research foundation, one by the university of Toronto, and one by an industrial organization, without any of them knowing that others were doing precisely the same thing in the same field. By consolidation of their activities they were able to effect great savings. That principle applies to the whole field. What has been said by the hon. member for Cariboo with regard to the university of British Columbia is abundantly true. Every one of our universities has done a great job. But in the field of pure research, the allocation of tasks by some co-operative body that is associated with all research activities could effect great savings and increase the beneficial results of research in this country.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

CREATION OF NEW DEPARTMENT—TRANSFER OF STAFF FROM MINES AND RESOURCES AND SECRETARY OF STATE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 213, respecting the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Drew: Just a moment; I assume some explanation is to be given as to the general purpose of the bill, and I should think this would be an excellent occasion for a brief summary of the government's policy at this time in regard to immigration.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to set up a department which will be charged with citizenship, immigration and Indian affairs. The matter was discussed at the resolution stage. It was stated then, and I now repeat, that the object in all these activities is to make Canadian citizens of those who come here as immigrants, and to make Canadian citizens of as many as possible of the descendants of the original inhabitants of this country.

As hon. members are aware, the responsibility for immigration and Indian affairs was heretofore with the Department of Mines and Resources, and the activities with respect to citizenship were with the Department of the Secretary of State. During the war period and in the years immediately following, immigration into this country was quite restricted, and has been increasing from year to year. There is a probability that there will be an increasing number of persons admitted as immigrants into this country to share with us the advantages and responsibilities of developing the resources of Canada.

With respect to our residents of Indian descent, happily for the last several years there has been a change in the previous trend. That trend had been toward a diminution in numbers. This however has been reversed to a point where there is now an increase in the number of residents of Canada descended from the original inhabitants of this country. With the additional health services being provided for them, I believe that trend will become definite, and that we may look forward to a steady increase in the number of residents of Canada descended from the original inhabitants.

That being so I believe it would be the desire of all of us that everything possible be done to facilitate the development of a condition in which they might be expected to take their place in increasing numbers in our Canadian citizenship. All hon. members know of individual cases where descendants of the original residents have abandoned the protective provisions of the Indian Act and have become Canadian citizens. We know of the contribution they have made to Canadian national life.

I am sure it is the desire of all of us that everything within reason which can be done to further that movement should be realized. As hon. members know, there have been a great many requests for the setting up of a department which would deal with these human resources of the Canadian nation, and the sole responsibility of which would be the proper development of those human resources.

That is the purpose for which the government is suggesting to the house the establishment of a separate department to assume that responsibility and to discharge the functions required to bring about as expeditiously as possible the integration into the citizenship of this nation of as many as possible of those who come here as immigrants and of those who had resided here and who are descended from the original residents.

It is for that purpose that the establishment of the department is suggested. Then, as to the government's policy with respect to immigration, I do not know that I could add very much to what was said by the former prime minister in his statement to the house on May 1, 1947, which is to be found at page 2644 and following of Hansard for that session, and the statement I made to the house on March 11, 1949, concerning the modifications that had been made to the regulations in connection with the admission of immigrants.

A large number have been admitted to this country in the last couple of years. There have been a considerable number of those unfortunate persons who were in displaced persons camps in continental Europe. I think that, generally, they have fitted themselves into Canadian life without very much embarrassment to any of our Canadian people. It is my view that our experience in that respect has demonstrated that, while it was principally on humanitarian grounds that these people were admitted to our country, they will ultimately prove that the bread we cast upon the waters is returning to us.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a few words in the debate on second reading of this measure. I am wondering if the reasons for many of these changes in the matter of setting up additional governmental departments are not similar to those which I expressed when the resolutions were before the house last Saturday. I know the government and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) are making strenuous efforts to establish a case for an extra minister of the crown, but I think it boils down to this, that the argument is for another minister more than it is for the necessity of an allocation of duties among the various departments. I should like to repeat what I said before. I think the government ought to have said to the house, "We want another cabinet minister and are taking this means to provide the extra portfolio." The arguments that have been offered have been circuitous and in some cases not very sound in respect to the need for an extra portfolio such as is envisaged by this legislation.

I think most hon. members will admit that immigration has been a very important part of governmental work and I know many have felt that a deputy minister of immigration would perhaps be desirable and acceptable in view of the importance that branch has now assumed. At this point I should like to pay a tribute to the present director of immigration, Mr. Jolliffe, who has been identified with this branch for so many years and who in so many instances has exercised fairness and judgment and common sense in dealing with the problems of immigration. I think his attitude meets with the approval of most hon. members, regardless of what section of the house they occupy. Now that the new legislation is before us I do not think that I would object strenuously to the setting up of a really important department to deal with immigration with a proper deputy minister at its head.

However, this was not my main reason for rising at this time. I think this shuffling of the ministry so far as the allocation of work is concerned is wholly unjustified at this time, particularly with respect to citizenship. While I am in certain agreement with the Prime Minister about citizenship and immigration going together, still I do not like the idea of this branch of government being separated from the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley). In saying what I intend to say I intend no reflection upon the Secretary of State, but the fact remains that in this shuffle the Secretary of State is having something taken away from his department when perhaps something should have been added. I would hope that this would be taken into consideration by the government in making any move.

The portfolio of the Secretary of State—there are some others I could name as well—does not entail the effort and labour that some of the other portfolios do. If we are going to have more portfolios, then I submit the government is in duty bound to consider whether the present allocation of work among the ministers of the crown is proper. I do not think it is, and I do not think parliament thinks it is. It would now appear that we are to have 22 ministers of the crown. Twenty-one would seem to be sufficient and perhaps might be considered too many. We have left the war and transitional periods behind and I fancy the public in general would like to see some retrenchment rather than expansion in the number of portfolios in the government.

I should like to have the Prime Minister's assurance that this shuffling about will not mean an additional cabinet minister. I think that is something the public would like to know and I ask the Prime Minister to give us that assurance before the debate concludes To me it seems to be merely a matter of having the work and services properly allocated and distributed among the available ministers of the crown. While this objection may not apply to the other two instances with the force that it applies to the present instance, I think that should be considered. There is perhaps much that can be said in favour of having these two branches of the government combined in one department, but if it is going to mean another minister I think that could be avoided by a proper allocation of the duties having to do with citizenship and immigration. I think that with the present members of the cabinet the Prime Minister will find that the work will be in good hands.

I should like to impress upon the government the great desire that some of us on this side have to see to it that the cabinet is kept within bounds so far as numbers are concerned. No doubt a great many representations have been made to the Prime Minister with regard to men who it is felt ought to be in the cabinet, but I suggest that with his large following he should steel himself against the idea of adding to the number of cabinet ministers. I should like that to be taken into consideration because I think it is out of joint with the times to add another cabinet minister, at least until those who are holding portfolios in the government find that their duties are such that they are overworked and have no available time to handle these extra departments. I repeat, I should like to have the assurance of the Prime Minister at some stage that this will be done.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the necessity was with regard to the other two departments that have been created by the legislation that preceded this bill, but I feel it is not only appropriate but desirable that immigration and citizenship should be in one department. I am glad that there is a bill before us for that purpose. I always found it to be a rather curious situation when writing about matters of immigration that I had to write to the Minister of Mines and Resources. It did not seem to me it was a very appropriate situation. Furthermore, and again expressing no opinion as to the necessity for any new department, I believe the Minister of Mines and Resources had too many different kinds of departments under him. I do not know if it would serve any useful purpose to follow the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) in the reasons he gave for creating this new department. It occurred to me when he was speaking that it is easier to be strong when you have no pressure put upon you, and when you are not confronted with temptation either through pleas or anything else of that nature. The person who is free from temptation and pressure can indeed be strong, but whether or not he can take credit for that I do not know.

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I think all members of the house will be pleased with one particular feature of the bill. I refer to the fact that the Indian affairs branch is being given a somewhat larger place in the new department. I sincerely trust the new minister who is appointed to take charge of the department will give this great problem the attention which it merits. As the house knows, a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons was set up in 1945 to examine the Indian Act. As a member of that committee I think I can say with fairness that some excellent recommendations were made to the government in the final report of the committee, and also that a good many changes were suggested in the Indian Act which up to this time have not been implemented.

I am not going to be entirely critical of the delay that has been occasioned by the study of the proposed legislation by the Department of Justice. I realize it is a far-reaching measure, and that a great deal of study and thought must be given to it. Nevertheless I sincerely trust that when the new minister takes charge of the new department he will take aggressive steps to see that the bill is taken out of the hands of the Department of Justice and brought forward to the House of Commons. I hope the next session of the house will see the revised Indian Act introduced.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is one feature of the bill which I should like to mention. I think the provision as to immigration is one which should be given careful examination when the department is being organized because we either have a policy in regard to immigration or we have not. If we have a definite policy it should be clearly understood, and the activities of the department should be carried on in relation to whatever the stated policy is. One of the greatest problems that face those who seek to come to this country through the immigration agencies now in operation is the difficulty of obtaining the various requirements to come here without a measure of assistance that is usually not available. If we are actually seeking to facilitate the entry of immigrants of a certain type to this country from different lands, then we should at the same time make it as easy as possible for these people to be able to carry out what they desire to do provided they meet our standards.

One of the biggest problems of the immigrant is to find out what he has to do in getting a passport, satisfying the medical requirements, exchanging his money, meeting the various conditions that must be met, and obtaining his transportation. In so far as there is set forth a clear policy that can be interpreted, and at the moment we have none, then it should be interpreted in practical results at the other end in a way that will assist those who are seeking to come here. There is no difficulty whatever about bringing together under one roof in every great centre through which immigrants will pass all the facilities that will make it possible for them to arrange to come here without having to go all over the place in a large city which they are perhaps visiting for the first time. This has been done, and although it is not being done today it can be done by our own department of immigration. The administration of every one of these various requirements can be brought into a single office so that immigrants can come in, pass their tests, be examined, and have that office provide everything for them, including transportation. That would then facilitate arrangements at this end for meeting them and helping them to find their new homes. I strongly urge that in setting up the new department these simple but necessary and effective provisions be made for those who are going to be permitted to come to this country.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the Prime Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I do not intend to say very much. I merely wish to state again that it is not easy to please everyone, and I should like to refer hon. members to the plea made by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) in 1947 for what is now being done. Hon. members will find his speech recorded in Hansard for July 11, 1947, at page 5430. The hon. member persisted in the same views and expressed them again in the house in the month of October, 1949, during this very session. Hon. members will find what he had to say in that respect at page 545 of Hansard of the 5th of October, 1949. I might read one or two paragraphs. He said:

I should like to refer briefly to our Department of Mines and Resources. In this department in Ottawa we have some of the best mineralogists, engineers, geophysicists and geologists to be found anywhere in the world.

He was developing the idea he had expressed two years before in saying that the Department of Mines and Resources had become a receptacle for various tag ends of business. He went on to say:

Immigration really is a full-time job, because it is one of the most important problems facing Canada today. In my opinion it is wholly wrong to place immigration in the Department of Mines and Resources and thus divide the duties of the minister between immigration and mining. Both matters require a great deal of attention, and the minister cannot give undivided attention to either. The qualifications for both these jobs are entirely different.

Further on he said:

I am sure they—

He refers to hon. members.

—will admit that no one department should have both mines and Indian affairs under its jurisdiction. Indian affairs is a completely different subject which has nothing to do with mining.

Further on he had this to say:

In my opinion the centralization of the department of mines under one roof, making it solely a department of mines—not a sort of wastebasket into which all sorts of other difficult problems can be thrown—and giving it the most modern equipment possible, is one of the first things that any central planning board for Ottawa or for the national capital plan should consider.

That was not a solitary opinion of the hon. member. So important a newspaper as the Toronto Globe and Mail, commenting upon the announcement that this was to be done, said on the 14th of November:

Potentially the most far-reaching of the new federal cabinet changes is the creation of a Department of Citizenship and Immigration. These two broad functions are naturally allied in administration. The government is to be commended for having set up machinery which should enable a minister to devote his full time to developing our human resources.

The Toronto Telegram, another newspaper known to some of those who thought it fitting to criticize today, had an article in its issue of November 23 commenting upon the announcement that had been made, and its title was, "This reorganization long overdue". I shall not take time to read other editorials, but I give these as two indications that even when anyone claims to belong to a certain party his views may not be the same as those of others who also claim to be of that party.

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) wants me to give the house the assurance that there will be no additional cabinet minister charged with responsibility for these matters following this reorganization which, according to this newspaper, is long overdue; but he is asking me to go further than I am prepared to go at this moment. I would not care to do more than give him the assurance that I will not place him in the embarrassing position of having to refuse the new portfolio that is to be created.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): In closing the debate the Prime Minister did not refer at all to Indian affairs. I wonder if he has any comment to make in that connection.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think I would have anything to add to what I said in moving second reading. I think we are all happy to note that there has been a change in the trend; that while for many generations the Indian population was decreasing in number, in the last decade or so it has been increasing, probably as a consequence of better sanitation and health services. That trend has become decided; all these Indian groups are increasing in numbers, and I think it fitting that the greatest possible care should be given their health services, educational services and all the others factors which might assist them in finding their place in the citizenship of the country. I should think also the aim of the administration of Indian affairs should be to entice and prepare as many as possible for the assumption of the dignity and responsibilities of full citizenship in the Canadian nation.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I had referred to the bill, also, and I wondered if the Prime Minister had anything to say as to the introduction of that bill at the earliest possible date.

Mr. St. Laurent: This is a matter that has given my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources much concern. I know he has been pressing the preparation of that legislation, but within the last three or four weeks we were told that the Department of Justice would not have it ready for introduction at this session. It is a complete revision of the whole Indian Act. The work done by the committee on Indian affairs was voluminous and is proving very useful, and the department is trying to prepare a revision of the act that will embody many if not all of the constructive suggestions brought out in that joint committee. I can assure hon. members that the minister was anxious to have it ready for this session. The matter came up for discussion many times, but finally we were told that it was not possible to have a proper bill ready in time.

Mr. Drew: May I briefly refer to the Prime Minister's suggestion that it took very little to satisfy some people. That was very noisily demonstrated following his remarks at that point. I must say that I hope no embarrassment will be caused his supporters by reason of the fact that he is now taking the very excellent advice of two newspapers about which some of his supporters in Ontario have not been so complimentary in the past.

I wish to refer seriously, however, to one aspect of the creation of a Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the placing of these matters under another minister. I deferred these comments because I had just been informed of something that emphasizes a point I wish to make, and that I attempted to make in my earlier remarks on second reading. To whatever extent this country is prepared to receive immigrants from other lands, then in this complex period in the development of our modern society we should not ask those immigrants when they arrive here to work out their own problems without adequate assistance in regard to those things about which almost inevitably they will know nothing at all. I mentioned previously the desirability of simplifying the procedure at the other end so that when people go to London, Paris, Rome or any other large city in Europe, perhaps for the very first time, they may find that in one place they will be able to carry out all the details that are necessary for them to come to their new home.

More than that is needed, however. When they arrive here it is not enough that they simply be handed booklets telling of our currency provisions, giving a map of the country, and certain explanations of our habits and customs. It is essential that we set up an effective mechanism to really help these people find themselves in the places where they can get the kind of work for which they are suited by their past experience. This is particularly true in the case of those who do not speak either English or French. In those cases it is essential that adequate provision be made to inform those people in their own language exactly what they must do in order to find suitable occupations.

Just today I saw an illustration of this point which emphasizes the need for carrying our whole immigration and citizenship machinery further than it has yet gone. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police have investigated a report from Thessalon that six Italian immigrants were left for 29 days, without proper food or clothing, in a broken-down lumber camp 70 miles north of that northern Ontario centre. This press dispatch further indicates that the Ontario provincial police had investigated this situation first, and had explained that these people were wholly unprepared to meet the conditions which confronted them. It is reported that the deputy minister of lands and forests in Ontario said that these men were apparently completely inexperienced with Canadian bush conditions, and the food they took into the camp was not enough for the hard work to be performed. As a result of this, the men nearly starved.

Incidents of this type are happening too often. They are happening because there is no machinery set up to effectively guide these people; not to say what they must do, but to assist them in finding the sort of work for which they are suited. They should be helped to equip themselves to meet the conditions they are going to meet. This applies not only to the people coming from the lands I have mentioned, but also to those whom we describe as d.p.'s. Those d.p.'s have gone through experiences that justify every consideration on our part. If these people have satisfied our tests as to admissibility, then the very kind of experience through which they have passed will give them reason to be among our best citizens, so long as we receive them well when they come here. From their own experience, those people know what freedom really means. Except for those who are deliberately planted here as communist agents, they are the most vigorous anti-communists we shall have in our community, so long as we really welcome them with an effective procedure of assistance when they arrive here. I strongly urge that, with the creation of this new department, we have an efficient and businesslike system for helping those whom we are going to receive in Canada.

We should receive them without the slightest suggestion of directing either their work or how they will live. We should assist them, not only in getting to places where the type of work for which they are qualified will be available, but also in meeting the conditions they will face, particularly if they are far from the settled communities to which they are accustomed. We are fighting communism, and everything for which it stands, on the wider field. Most of those who come here from other countries are coming because of their belief in freedom. One of the ways in which we shall most effectively make sure that they continue to believe in freedom and our democratic system, so that they will become the excellent type of citizens for which their background fits them if they have an opportunity, is to help them when they arrive, to encourage them in every way to feel that we are really welcoming them as citizens of Canada. This procedure would prevent any poisoning by communist doctrines, and would make them good citizens once they have decided to make this their home.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Chairman, if I may I should like to obtain clarification of the position of the Indians and Eskimos in Newfoundland. I believe the Prime Minister will recall that I addressed a question to him the other day, but I did not expect an answer at that time because he was not prepared to give it. There are a number of questions arising out of preliminary statements that were obtained in 1947. If it is permissible, I should like to have those questions answered now.

In 1947, sir, there was a meeting between the delegation from the Newfoundland national convention and a committee of the cabinet. A special committee of the delegates and of the committee of the cabinet was set up to deal with Indian and Eskimo problems. A preliminary statement showing the position of Newfoundland Indians and Eskimos in the event of union can be found on page 102 of volume 2 of the report of meetings by the delegates from the national convention of Newfoundland and representatives of the government of Canada. It states:

Under the Indian Act, Indians and Eskimos in Canada are regarded as one race for purposes of administration. In the event of Newfoundland becoming a province of Canada, the Indians and Eskimos of Newfoundland and Labrador would be the sole responsibility of the federal government and, under existing legislation, would be entitled to benefits and would be subject to regulations which include the following:

I am not going through them all, but I shall deal with the pertinent ones. No. 1 reads as follows:

Free education, provided through day schools and boarding schools. Where boarding schools already exist subsidies ranging from $165 to $300 per pupil per year are paid.

I should like to know if that is so.

2. Free medical services including hospitalization.

I know that cannot be correct because I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question at page 2149 of Hansard. His answer is as follows:

While the federal government has given some assistance in emergency cases provision of medical services for the Indians and Eskimos in Labrador has been and has continued to be the responsibility of the Newfoundland government.

There is a definite contradiction on that particular point.

At page 103 of the volume from which I have been quoting, it is stated that the provincial governments in Canada do not contribute in any way to the support of the Indian population.

I continue to quote from the report of the meeting between the delegates from Newfoundland and the cabinet:

3. Family allowances on the same basis as white population and applied in the normal way wherever possible.

I believe those allowances are paid, but I do not know how.

4. Land reserves for settlements and trapping lines are set up, by arrangements with the provincial government.

I do not believe any such provision has been made.

5. Free conservation projects, fishing projects, handicrafts and other aids are undertaken in their behalf.

I do not believe anything has been done in that connection.

6. The federal government sets up trading posts, where there are no satisfactory arrangements for trading by private interests. This is done to help Indians eventually to buy and market co-operatively themselves.

I shall not refer to the other matters of land tax, income tax, or their right to use intoxicating liquors; I think that is natural.

Indians do not receive old age pensions but relief for the aged is provided.

That is the statement we were given in 1947. I do not know whether the position has changed since that time, but I feel certain from what I have heard that many of these provisions have not become effective. It may be through an inability to carry them out, but I would appreciate the Prime Minister or the Minister of Mines and Resources clarifying the position, if that is a fair question, because I have received some questions about the matter.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, that is a fair question, Mr. Chairman. The answers that were given at that time, as to the effect of the Indian Act, were correct. As the hon. member knows, those general acts in Canada do not apply to Newfoundland until they have been proclaimed. Negotiations are proceeding between the department responsible at the moment and the Department of Mines and Resources, with a view to proclaiming the Indian Act in Newfoundland, and attempting to determine what parts of the Indian Act it might not be appropriate to proclaim.

It is our understanding that so far such Indians as there were in Newfoundland were a part of the general community. Now there is a question as to whether it will be preferable to put them back under the restrictions which exist under the Indian Act and give them the benefits of the Indian Act or to allow them to continue as general members of the community with the ordinary rights and responsibilities of citizenship. Those are matters which are under consideration at the present time and it is because of the fact that the Indian Act referred to in these answers has not come into effect under the terms of union that there is this apparent discrepancy between what is the practice at this moment and the terms of the answers that were given on the assumption that the Indian Act would be in force.

Mr. Higgins: If the act is proclaimed, I take it that medical services will be given free to the Indians. I cannot understand this answer of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Possibly he might clarify that. He says they are going to continue to be given.

Mr. St. Laurent: If the Indian Act is proclaimed, an administration of Indian affairs will have to be set up; and that administration would have to provide in the territory over which it has jurisdiction the same services that are provided for groups of Indians in other parts of Canada.

Mr. Higgins: The province is carrying it on at the present time. Is that the idea?

Mr. St. Laurent: That is because up to the present time the Indian Act has not been proclaimed and because there has not been found common ground with the government of Newfoundland as to which parts it would be practicable to attempt to apply and which parts would not fit the existing situation.

Mr. Higgins: When will the act likely be proclaimed?

Mr. St. Laurent: Those negotiations are in process and I think the officials are proceeding diligently to try to get the basis of a common understanding as to how the situation can best be taken care of.

Mr. Higgins: That is fine.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I want to say just a word in support of the idea advanced by the leader of the opposition. I refer to the treatment of d.p.'s after they have come to this country. First, however, I want to pay my respects to those concerned and to convey my thanks for the courtesy and fairness with which I have always been treated by Mr. Jolliffe and Mr. Smith in the offices down there; but there is an incident that I wish to mention, and it is one which I have heard is duplicated in many places.

I refer to the unkind treatment which people not familiar with our language are receiving in some of our offices. In Calgary we have a fine man at the head of the office, and he is doing a splendid job. I know that the department cannot carry to all its employees the idea that they should be purveyors of peace, light and justice; but in that office a certain incident occurred. I speak of this particular case because it concerns a d.p. woman who came out here and happened to get a job as a maid in my daughter's house. She could speak no English. She now speaks English quite well. She stayed her year, so there is not a word of criticism about her. Her husband was anxious to join her, and I took some part in arranging that he should come. I had to do that because this woman of about thirty years of age was received in that office with rudeness which was almost brutal. My daughter went down with her, obtained an interpreter and herself received extremely rude treatment there. The papers were thrown at them and they were told "Fill these out, but who is going to pay for it?" and so on. That was none of their business at that moment. I am not blaming anyone in the department but I am making a suggestion. Bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, the effect upon poorer persons, lacking the ability to speak the language, when they are received in that manner. The effect may last throughout the time of their residence in this country.

I have no doubt that bulletins have been issued from the head office but I am making the suggestion that perhaps a little more care should be taken to see that the civil servant who makes the actual contact will be a little bit more patient and will have a little bit more kindness in his soul; because these first impressions made on people of that type may be lasting ones, I fear. I do not intend to discuss communism, but dissatisfaction is the ground in which it grows. It seems to me that we should have some schooling for these people who first make contact with these immigrants who come to our shores.

Mr. St. Laurent: I thank the hon. member for mentioning this matter. A training in courtesy is given to these employees of the department of immigration. I am told that over 30 million cases have been handled by the officials of that department. That figure surprised me, and I was given this explanation. It includes even our American friends and neighbours who often come here several times. But over a very long period during which 30 million cases have been handled by officers of the department, there have been only fifteen cases in which, discourtesy having been reported and investigations having been made, it was found that the facts required a reprimand to the official concerned.

But I think that any Canadian who knows of any case of discourteous treatment in circumstances such as those referred to by the hon. member for Calgary West would be doing a service to Canada by bringing it to the attention of the department here. We all realize that the impressions made by our public servants on those who come here either as immigrants or as visitors should be a good one, in keeping with the mentality and the habits of the Canadian people. Those who represent the Canadian people in the contacts of officialdom with immigrants or visitors should give a proper impression of the kind of people Canadians are. When any of them do not do that, I think it would be a service to have the conduct of the delinquent brought to the attention of the department for which he acts, so that the circumstances may be investigated and a repetition prevented.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I entirely agree with the Prime Minister. In this case I am pleading guilty. I did not bring the matter to the attention of the department. It is my fault that their attention was not brought to it. I made inquiries as to the individual, found that he had a wife and family, that he would have difficulty in getting along, and that if I had reported this incident he would have been fired. I am at fault. I just could not do it; that is all. I am glad to hear about these courtesy schools. I would not want to be the cause of some poor chap losing his job. He might have been tired or something like that; but I know of the facts of which I speak.

Mr. Knowles: Believe it or not, Mr. Chairman, this is a bouquet, and if it is not spurned, I may offer another one in a few moments. A few nights ago when we were discussing the estimates of the citizenship branch a number of questions were asked from this side of the house to which there seemed to be some difficulty in getting answers, if I may put it that way. Hon. members who were in the house at that time will recall that we got almost to the point of having a bit of innocent fun out of it. However, after it was all over, I, for one, did feel that some things that were said but even more so some things that were not said were unfair to the citizenship branch.

Since that time I have had drawn to my attention the booklets referred to that night, which have been published, and the kind of work the citizenship branch is doing in the field of helping immigrants to learn the English or French language, and to help them to learn about our land, our history, our political set-up and all those things that are a part of our Canadian tradition.

From what has been drawn to my attention it seems to me that these people are doing an excellent job. It is the sort of story we tried to get out the other night. At this time I should like to pay tribute to what is being done, and to express the hope that in the new Department of Citizenship and Immigration the excellent work being carried on by the citizenship branch will be pursued.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Deputy minister.

Mr. Knowles: As I said a moment ago, if my first bouquet was not spurned I would have another one to offer on section 4. It seems to me that when this section is passed it will present a problem for the government, the answer to which I do not know, because it will have to make up its mind in which department to put the present deputy minister of mines and resources. Tributes have been paid to people in the immigration branch, in which I wish to join, but—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): He goes into the pie department.

Mr. Knowles: —I should like also to pay tribute to the work being done by the present deputy minister of mines and resources. I do not know which department the Prime Minister has in mind for him. He could do a good job in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, he would be most valuable in the Department of Resources and Development—

Mr. Graydon: Or household economics.

Mr. Knowles: Yes—oh, excellent, in household economics. But I think if I had any say in the matter—not that the Prime Minister is asking me for it—I would like to see him in this human department, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I do wish to say, however, that we are most pleased with the excellent job the present deputy has been doing.

Mr. McLure: Subsection 2 refers to "officers, clerks and employees". Figures given the other day show that at the present time in the Department of Mines and Resources 2,000 civil servants are employed, and that in addition there are a large number of temporary employees, amounting to about 5,000. We have no definite figure as to how many are employed. Some check can be made however by considering the amount of money paid to temporary assistants.

When the new department is set up will all the employees be civil servants? Will it be necessary to carry the employees who are described as temporaries? I understand the civil service commission will make a number of appointments. Why not let it make all the appointments and take this matter away from government patronage? My understanding is that today to a great extent these temporary employees are used in matters of political patronage. When the new department is set up I suggest that all appointments should be made by the civil service commission, thus making all the appointees civil servants instead of having a large number of temporary employees.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I refer to some temporary employees in the northern sections of my constituency. Every summer survey parties proceed out either on boundary locations or to lay out townships and they employ numbers of young men from the range country and the villages to serve as packers, cooks and surveyors. I would suppose they are temporary employees. I am sure there would not be any political significance in the employment of these men who are doing heavy work. They go out to fight the black flies and mosquitoes, and work all summer for the Canadian government, receiving very little pay for it.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Duties, powers and functions of minister.

Mr. Harkness: This would seem to be an omnibus section which assigns to the new department those functions which formerly came under the headings of naturalization, citizenship, Indian affairs, immigration and colonization, "and not by law assigned to any other department of the government of Canada".

I have in mind the health and hospitalization of Indians and Eskimos, which comes under the Department of National Health and Welfare. It seems to me a considerable amount of duplication of effort, and difficulties of one kind and another are bound to arise because that part of the Indian administration concerned with health is under one department while the remainder of it is under this new department.

Is there no possibility that matters related to Indians and Eskimos be placed under one department? It could be either in the Department of National Health and Welfare —and in my opinion that is where it should be—or in this new department.

Mr. St. Laurent: Formerly the health services were with the Indian affairs branch. When the Department of National Health and Welfare was set up it was felt that the services of the personnel of that department could be used for the administration of the health service of the Indians, and that there would be a saving by having them perform those duties rather than have a separate health service in the Department of Mines and Resources.

My impression is that that has proved to be the case. The Department of National Health and Welfare would not be able to dispense with many of its civil servants if it did not have this responsibility with respect to the health service of the Indians, and it would mean a larger staff if this health service were handled by two separate departments.

I can assure the hon. member that, if it were found that placing the health service for the Indians in this department would cut down the expense, that would be done; but the advice we got was that there would be less duplication by having these health services administered by the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Harkness: If that is correct, I would agree that the Department of National Health and Welfare is the proper one to handle the health of Indians and Eskimos. But has any consideration been given to putting the entire Indian affairs branch under the Department of National Health and Welfare? From what I have been able to gather there would seem to be a certain amount of duplication and certain minor difficulties due to the fact that one part of the Indian administration is under one department and the remainder under another. Perhaps, as I said before, the Department of National Health and Welfare should handle the whole thing.

Mr. St. Laurent: There might possibly be some other services that could be handled by the Department of National Health and Welfare—for instance, the education of the Indians. There are administrative problems to be considered. The Indians have quite extensive resources that are administered for their benefit. Many of these material problems are not of the kind dealt with by the Department of National Health and Welfare and it would require something different from that set-up to perform the administrative functions that are necessary. On the whole it was felt that a proper division would be to have the health services the responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare and to have the band funds, the band lands and the administration and distribution of treaty money the responsibility of a department that was organized as a sort of business administration department.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Would the Prime Minister not consider making the title of this department "the Department of Citizenship, Immigration and Indian Affairs"?

Of course that makes a rather long title and it might be difficult if we had to address the minister as the minister of citizenship, immigration and Indian affairs, but I think the Indians themselves might feel that a certain prestige would follow if that name were included in the name of the department.

Mr. St. Laurent: The suggestion was made in the resolution stage, but it was felt that, in view of the other suggestion that the title of the Department of Secretary of State for External Affairs should be shortened, we should not be creating another department with a long title.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SALARIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE SALARIES FOR MINISTERS OF RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT, MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS, AND CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 214, to amend the Salaries Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Salaries of ministers.

Mr. Graydon: After the Prime Minister's generous statement of a few moments ago I think it will be understood that I have no pecuniary interest in this matter, but I should like to ask him what this shuffling of cabinet positions will really mean in dollars and cents to the Canadian people?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member will see, this bill provides for the repeal of four salaries and the establishment of three salaries. The salaries in the case of two positions that existed before have not been paid for the last two or three years, and the new salaries will not be paid until the appointments are made. The hon. member asks for an estimate of the additional expense. There will be the salary of a minister when the acts are proclaimed and a minister is appointed and there will be a deputy minister who may or may not be someone at present in the service of one of the three departments concerned, mines and resources, reconstruction and supply or secretary of state. The salary of a deputy minister is generally somewhat larger than the salary of the head of a branch, I think generally at least $2,000 or so more. I do not think other civil servants will be required. I have looked over the details in the estimates and I would hope that with a careful examination of the activities that will have to be performed it might be found that there are enough civil servants in the existing departments to discharge the responsibilities of the new departments. I cannot be any more specific than that. Inevitably there will be the salary of a minister and the salary of a deputy minister, if that position requires the appointment of an additional official, or the difference between the salary of a deputy minister and the salary being paid to an existing official.

Mr. Graydon: That would mean the additional amount would be the salary of the new cabinet minister and the difference between the director's salary and that paid to a deputy minister, plus the salaries that would have to be paid to civil servants by virtue of the new portfolios being set up. I think the experience in most departments is that, when you appoint a chief, human nature being what it is he tends to set up an army to lead. I am not suggesting that there is any more desire to do that in one section of the country than there is in another, but I think it is up to parliament to see that that is not always done.

I know the Prime Minister has in mind the appointment of a minister from the province of Alberta. I reiterate that that is a matter which deserves commendation because after all that province is deserving of cabinet representation on a very high scale. There are problems by way of development and progress requiring the close attention of someone in the government in succession to that very important figure who is now in the other place, the Hon. James A. MacKinnon. I suggest to the Prime Minister that the question of providing a cabinet minister from Alberta surely ought to be able to be handled without adding more expense by way of another portfolio. I do not want to repeat the necessity of keeping the cabinet down to a reasonable size, but I am most serious in suggesting that I think we can go very much further than public opinion would prompt us to go by expanding the cabinet ranks at this time.

Mr. Knowles: In this section the salary of each of the ministers, whether we are giving it or taking it away, is $10,000. In the estimates we find in each case that the salary and motor car allowance of the minister are listed together as $12,000, and it is indicated that the total amount is statutory. Can the Prime Minister tell me whether the provision for the motor car allowance is provided by statute somewhere else than in this act?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, a provision was made in the estimates of 1931 for a motor car allowance for any minister of the crown. I believe hon. members will find the reference in Hansard of August 1, 1931. The same question presented itself to me, and I asked to be assured that nothing else was necessary so that if and when any minister was appointed there would be the same provision for him as for any other member of the cabinet. I was shown a vote in August, 1931, which makes provision for the allowance of $2,000 for every member of the cabinet for that year and for future years.

Mr. Knowles: This may be only a technicality, but I confess it puzzles me a bit. I think the Prime Minister understood the point I made before, namely, that the full $12,000 is listed in the estimates as statutory. In other words, both the salary of $10,000 and the motor car allowance of $2,000 are provided by statute.

Mr. Abbott: A vote is a statute.

Mr. Knowles: There is no question about the $10,000, but is the item of August 1, 1931, a statute? The Prime Minister called it an estimate.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is a vote which is a statute because it is voted in the schedule to which effect is given by the appropriation statute of that year.

Mr. Knowles: I shall look it up some time.

The other question I wish to ask has to do with the salaries of deputy ministers. How are they provided? One of the reasons I ask the question is that on looking through the estimates I find that, although every minister has the same salary, whether it is the busy Minister of Finance or somebody else, so far as deputies are concerned there is quite a variation.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Is that under statute, by order in council, or how?

Mr. St. Laurent: Deputy ministers are appointed by order in council, and the statute authorizes the governor in council to fix the salary of these appointees. That is provided in this case by section 4 of the bill we have just passed. Subsection 1 of that section reads:

> The governor in council may appoint an officer who shall be called the deputy minister of citizenship and immigration who shall be the deputy head of the department and who shall hold office during pleasure.

All other officials are appointed according to law, that is to say, by the civil service commission.

Mr. Knowles: It is section 4, subsection 1, of the previous bill which gives authority to appoint the deputy of that department, but—

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. St. Laurent: But no salary can be paid until an appropriation has been provided.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, it comes in the estimates, but they do vary from about $10,000 to $15,000.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, that is so.

Mr. Abbott: Up to $17,500.

Mr. Graydon: Is the floor $10,000 and the ceiling $15,000?

Mr. Abbott: $17,500.

Mr. St. Laurent: A report was made by the Gordon commission on the appropriate salaries for these officials appointed by order in council who are not subject to the Civil Service Act. I will not say that a ceiling and floor were provided, but each department was listed, and a suggestion was made as to what would be the appropriate salary for that department. If the hon. member will look at the Gordon report he will see that the situation in each department was examined and a recommendation made with respect thereto.

Mr. Graydon: I take it from what the Minister of Finance says there must be at least one deputy minister who is getting more than the cabinet ministers.

Mr. Knowles: They do the work.

Mr. Abbott: Of course this is public knowledge because the report was tabled in the house. The president of the national research council and the deputy minister of finance are on the $17,500 basis.

Mr. Graydon: That means they are worth more than cabinet ministers.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: On the same understanding.

Bill read the third time and passed.

VETERANS LAND ACT

PROVISION FOR MODIFICATION OF CURRENT AND FUTURE CONTRACTS, ETC.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 218, to amend the Veterans Land Act, 1942.

Mr. Brooks: Did I understand that the minister was going to make a statement on the bill?

Mr. Gregg: I am prepared to make a statement either at this stage or in committee, as the house prefers. I am in the hands of members of the house.

Mr. Gillis: I imagine it would be better if the minister made his statement now. Many of us have speeches to make.

Mr. Gregg: I am happy to comply with my hon. friend's wish. In presenting the resolution I stated that the principle behind it was greater simplicity and flexibility in administration. Certain doubts have arisen as to the existence of statutory authority in the act as it now stands for the putting into effect of some things which ordinary business and agricultural practice would indicate to be desirable and to be in the best interests of veterans under the act and the country at large. The proposed changes are for the purpose of removing these doubts, and also to permit the administration to cope with certain conditions which did not exist, and could not have been easily anticipated, when the act was originally framed. As hon. members will recall, that was back in 1942. Probably the most important improvements proposed by this bill are those designed to permit the director to effect the sale of property on behalf of a veteran, and to permit the redisbursement of the sale proceeds for the purchase of other property, or for improvements to the veteran's property when that appears to be in the best interests of the veteran and when at the same time it will improve or maintain the security under the contract. The changes proposed will make it legally possible to carry out normal business transactions, and will assist the veteran in the improvement of his property; and consequently, of course, will improve his chances of success.

The bill provides ample safeguards against transactions of a purely speculative nature. A sale and substitution, where the whole property is involved, will not be permitted more than once. Any surplus created as a result of the transaction will be applied to reduce the veteran's debt. Sales will be made only on a cash basis, except where the director requires the property for the settlement of another veteran and the first veteran is willing to part with it at its appraised value. For example, the bill will make possible the disposal of matured trees, surplus buildings, sand, gravel or minerals and reinvestment of the proceeds in improvements such as new buildings, fences, the clearing of land and so on. It will enable the sale of part of a property, not well suited to the enterprise, and the purchase of more suitable adjoining land, thereby improving the veteran's unit. It will permit the sale of the entire property where it is found unsuitable or where the veteran has been moved by his employer to another part of the country, and the use of the proceeds for the purchase of another property suited to the veteran's needs and requirements. It is believed that this will do much to improve and round out properties, and will make it possible for a veteran settled under the act to continue his settlement when and where circumstances make a move to another locality imperative or desirable.

Somewhat related to the first proposal mentioned is one which will permit the director to release to a veteran part of a property which, at the time of the contract with the veteran, represented value substantially in excess of that required to protect the director's investment. This situation exists of course, where the veteran made a substantial payment of his own money at the time the property was purchased, or where the veteran had a sizeable equity in the property for one reason or another before he approached the Veterans Land Act for assistance. The bill will permit the release to a veteran, at his request, of that part of a property which represented surplus value in excess of the price paid at the time the property was purchased.

I know a number of hon. members have received complaints from veterans who have been unable to secure refunds consequent upon the sale of their properties at prices equal to or greater than the sale prices to the veterans. As explained to the veterans so affected, the trouble here lay not with the administration but in the wording of the act. I am sure hon. members will be glad to learn, therefore, that changes here proposed will remove the legal difficulties which exist in that regard.

Hon. members will also recall that in order to have as many homes as possible ready and available for our service men and women on their return from overseas, an extensive building program on small holding project properties was inaugurated early in 1945. Owing to conditions which existed at that time the cost of these houses, including the necessary remedial work which was much discussed in this house, was substantially higher that what was considered to be their true value. To ensure that these houses would be available to veterans as soon as completed and at a fair price, cabinet approval was given for their sale at a price which would represent value rather than cost, such price to be fixed by a committee composed of the deputy minister of my department and the director of the Veterans Land Act. After these sales were made questions arose as to the validity of this procedure and of contracts made in accordance with it. One of the proposals in this bill, therefore, is for the purpose of curing this possible deficiency and of ensuring that veterans who hold agreements for sale for properties, the sale price of which was less than cost to the director, may be given a good and sufficient title in accordance with the terms of their existing contracts.

The other changes proposed are mainly for the purpose of removing any doubts that may have arisen as to the exact meaning of some sections of the act, and to broaden the scope of some sections which experience has shown to be unnecessarily restrictive.

Hon. members, of course, are fully aware of the ramifications of the land settlement operations carried on under the Veterans Land Act and, I am sure, will all the more readily appreciate that the act as originally enacted could not have been designed to meet all contingencies which might arise during those operations. I might add here that these amendments are brought forward by the administration, of course in co-operation with the veterans most vitally concerned as well as the veteran community and those interested in agriculture generally, to provide a greater flexibility in the administration of the act. As may be expected, since the act was passed in 1942 experience has shown the need for supplementary provisions to cope with many real problems; and it is to the solution of these problems that this legislation is mainly directed.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, the minister has taken a short time to explain this bill, and I think has made its purpose clear to most of us. He said the object of the legislation was to give the administration of the act greater simplicity, and that he thought these amendments were in the best interests of our veterans. He also said that the act as originally adopted did not meet all the contingencies that have arisen since. That, of course, is true of most veteran legislation. We have found as time has gone by that practically all the veteran legislation needed to be amended at some time or other.

For this reason, as I have stated in this house on previous occasions, I feel there is great need for a committee on veterans affairs. I offer no apology for bringing up this matter again, though I have mentioned it already on a good many occasions. I do not think any committee of this house could do better work, or any committee in the past has done better work, than a committee on veterans affairs. If these contingencies that arise all the time could be discussed in such a committee, and if suggested amendments to legislation could receive such consideration, I think they would be given far more attention than is possible here, in the last days of the session. That may not have been as necessary in connection with this legislation as in connection with other acts, but I think the general principle is sound. So I hope when another session is called the government and the minister will agree that it is advisable to set up this committee.

The minister said that new difficulties were arising all the time, in spite of the elaborate set-up we have spreading all over the country. I agree with that statement. For instance, while I believe our educational program has been a great success, we all know that some men who attended universities probably would have been much better off on farms, or taking technical training. If a man wishes to take up some other work than that in which he is now engaged, this act makes provision for him to do so. I have no doubt there are many men who went on farms who have found that they would have been better engaged in other work. I believe the act makes provision for meeting this contingency as well.

While I was going through the act, I noted many points. For instance, there is a new provision in this act so far as eligibility is concerned. Provision is made for a man to change his locality. The act was rather rigid previously, and the man who took a small holding in Toronto or some other city, then found he was transferred to Ottawa, Halifax, or Saint John, found himself in difficulty. Arrangements can be made now, however, for him to sell his property in Toronto and purchase another in Halifax.

The minister spoke about the small holdings. Frankly, I think most of the trouble with the Veterans Land Act has been in the small holdings branch of that department. I remember there were grave doubts in the committee as to whether the Department of Veterans Affairs should go into the housing business. As the minister has pointed out, there was a scarcity of houses. A great number of returned men were looking for houses, and this practically compelled the Department of Veterans Affairs to undertake the housing proposition. There has been a lot of criticism of these small holdings, especially from veterans who took up properties near large cities, who found that the minimum of one-half acre was not satisfactory. I believe this fact, in itself, has kept a great many veterans from establishing themselves under the small holdings provisions of the Veterans Land Act. I believe that is something which could be investigated by the minister's department.

I was interested in reading a report of the Department of Veterans Affairs for 1948. It contains one paragraph which I think sets out this problem quite well. It says:

> The agricultural development of small holdings along the lines visualized by parliament is a responsibility challenging the best efforts of the administration.

I have no doubt that the efforts of the administration have been well challenged, but there is a grave question in the minds of the people of this country as to whether this challenge has been met.

> Involving as it does the development of a new way of life and its integration into the economic and social set-up, very careful thought and planning is necessary, and follow-up over a long period is essential for success. Results to date are most encouraging in spite of the fact that to many settlers the acquisition of a small holding was, in the first instance, only with the idea of getting themselves a home.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that was the main idea in the mind of a great many veterans. I feel also that there were many veterans who, having a permanent job of some type, felt they would like to carry on some farming activity on the side. At first they were quite enthusiastic, but they found there were other obligations which interfered with it. Some of them found they would like to entertain themselves at some amusement, such as ball games, playing golf, and so on. On many of these small holdings it will be found that, while a small garden has been put into operation, much of the land is not being used at all. I believe the act does provide that, if a man has too much land, he can sell part of it through the board to someone else who desires to build on it.

There was another matter which was frequently mentioned in our committee, and that was the legal costs to the veteran, and the long delay which was often experienced in transferring property. In some cases it was thought that the costs were too great. In certain localities a few lawyers seemed to have a virtual monopoly on this work for which they obtained large fees. I believe the minister's department should carefully investigate this matter to ensure that, so far as the local end of these transfers is concerned, they are put through as quickly as possible.

Another point which should be mentioned, which has a bearing on this situation, is not so much a problem of the veterans affairs department as of the postmaster general. I have received complaints from men who have settled on veterans' farms, as well as other people in the locality, that the lack of a daily mail service was keenly felt. I know that veterans are often inclined to leave a community in the country in which it is impossible to have a proper mail service. As I say, this is not the responsibility of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, but I hope he will take it up with his colleagues. Neither a farmer nor any other person living in this country should have a poor mail service. I believe the post office system is out of date. The Post Office Department demands that there be four persons per mile before giving a daily service. This regulation is reacting against many of the people living in the country, as well as against many of our returned men.

I do not think there is anything further I wish to say, Mr. Speaker. I do give the bill general approval, and I think it will correct a good many mistakes and shortcomings in the old legislation. I shall close on the same note on which I started, and that is that, while there are not so many veterans' problems to be brought to the attention of the house now, still the veterans of this country feel they are entitled to a standing committee of this house. This would enable the veterans in the house to deal with veterans' problems. Bills such as this, upon being brought before this House of Commons, would be referred to this committee and given careful consideration.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, in 1946 section 9 of the Veterans Land Act, 1942, was repealed and a new section 9 inserted. It set forth the conditions under which veterans could receive assistance in setting themselves up on the land, and providing themselves with the necessary equipment. This loan is repayable over a period not to exceed 25 years.

There is one matter in this connection which I desire to bring to the attention of the minister. Perhaps it applies solely to my own province of Saskatchewan. In that province farms of large acreage have been springing up on a co-operative basis. Some of them are managed entirely by groups of veterans. I understand that the individual veteran on such a farm has been able to receive his grant; that is to say, as an individual, even though he is part of the co-operative enterprise, but apparently the veteran on a co-operative farm is not entitled to the loan other veterans receive who buy a farm upon an individual basis. My plea to the minister is that the act should be amended so that this condition would be changed. The aid in the form of loans now available to the individual should be available to the individual even when he has partners in the enterprise. In Saskatchewan there are large acreages of land which are now available; and when I say there is land available, I mean improved farms. There are farms there running into one or two thousand acres; after all a farm of sixteen hundred acres is not exceptional in Saskatchewan. These farms are too valuable to be purchased by the average individual; and at any rate they represent an acreage too great to be taken care of by a single purchaser. I think some of these farms could form the basis of the kind of co-operative enterprises that I have described and which have already been set up, and could be purchased by groups of veterans so inclined, provided that they have the necessary financial resources. My plea to the government is that this money should be available to these people so that they could purchase such farms. I know that the soundness of the security is a matter of importance to the government. I think, however, that the soundness of the security would not be impaired but rather enhanced by any such arrangement, by carrying out the co-operative idea rather than the idea of individual ownership.

These veterans could establish themselves under favourable conditions with partners of their own choosing who would be congenial to them. The overhead expenses of these farms could be cut down, as they are now being cut down on those which have been established on the same basis, by the assistance which they could give one another in their work and by the use of machinery owned in common. A congenial social life—something which, by the way, is important in those large areas, having regard to the climate we have, particularly in the winter—would be available, something which is now impossible on the average individual farm. That is one of the reasons why some of our rural population in Saskatchewan spend most of their winters in the nearest town. They want to enjoy the company of others of their own kind.

I mention these matters because I believe they should appeal to the government from the point of view of an enhanced rather than a lessened security for the return of the money lent, as well as from the point of view of rehabilitation of veterans under favourable conditions, thus affording an additional prospect of success. I am sure that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) has had many cases of men breaking down under certain conditions—solitude and plugging along alone—whereas groups of men, following the old tradition of the army, get along a good deal better if they are surrounded by some of their buddies. I think that this matter might be the subject of discussion in a committee on veterans affairs, and I should like to back up the plea of the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) that such a committee be set up and that that be one of the subjects referred to it.

[Mr. Knight.]

In this connection, I may say that there is a man who I think could be useful to such a committee as a witness. He is Mr. Chapman, who is now director of co-operative farming in Saskatchewan. I believe the Canadian Legion in Saskatchewan and the co-operative farm conference have gone on record as favouring this particular proposal of mine. The minister may know—and he can tell us if he will—whether representations have been made to him, and to what extent such representations have been made to him in this regard. At any rate, that is my plea. I hope the government will give consideration to this matter of making these loans under the act available to veterans farming or wishing to farm on a co-operative basis.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I was not in the chamber when the minister spoke; I was attending a meeting of a committee. But I may say that, generally speaking, I am in favour of the amendments contained in this bill, although it appears to me that as a result of these amendments we are possibly getting further and further away from the original purpose of the Veterans Land Act, having regard to veterans and small holdings. The original idea was to settle a veteran on a small holding, with a house, so that he might use that land in order to supplement his income. As a result of these amendments he may perhaps dispose of the land and just have the house left. That certainly was not the original intention of the Veterans Land Act. Nevertheless, if it is to the benefit of the veteran to do that, I personally would not object.

To me there appears to be some confusion in these amendments as to whether or not a veteran is entitled to recover his down payment when land is sold. We shall, however, have a chance to ask questions on that point when we get into committee on the sections.

There is one other point that I hope the minister will be able to discuss, although perhaps it really does not come under this bill. It is the matter of whether or not veterans may be eligible for the grant when they settle on crown lands; and I am speaking particularly of the special areas. I have taken this matter up with the department on several occasions but so far have not been able to get a satisfactory answer. I have been told that the matter is under discussion. In view of the fact that last spring letters were written stating that a certain decision had been reached, and that action would be forthcoming in the near future, I hope that the minister will be able to clarify that point.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): Just before the house goes into committee, Mr. Speaker, may I say I do not think that the motion for second reading of this bill should pass without somebody saying a word in appreciation, first, of the legislation itself and, second, of the manner in which it has been administered by the department under the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg). I do not think any words of mine could describe the fine results that have been achieved under this legislation better than the figures, which I should like to put on Hansard, as to the actual number of houses which have been built under the Veterans Land Act in the various areas of Canada.

Under the individual housing program of the Veterans Land Act, up to September 30, 1949—and this will be the date for all the provinces that I will mention—in Nova Scotia 313 houses were built; in Prince Edward Island, 96; in New Brunswick, 364; in Quebec, 921; in eastern Ontario, 2,419; in western Ontario, 1,931; in Manitoba, 474; in Saskatchewan, 203; in Alberta, 725; and in British Columbia, 1,304. In the providing of adequate inexpensive housing for the veterans of this country I think that is an achievement of which this parliament and the government can be justly proud. I did not think it was proper that the motion for the second reading of the amendments to this act should pass without something being said in this regard.

While I am on my feet I should like to comment on two or three of the observations of the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks). He stated that in his opinion the department had had a great deal of trouble with small holdings. I believe it is true that certain troubles were experienced; but the department, the minister and the responsible officers did not shrink from those troubles. The manner in which they were met has in great part been responsible for the tremendous success of this legislation.

In addition the hon. member repeated the argument that there should be a committee on veterans affairs. All members of the house who were here at the second to last session of the last parliament will remember the work done by the veterans affairs committee at that time, and also the work done by previous sessional committees on veterans affairs. The day may come when a sessional committee may have to be set up; but I do think there is no need at the present time for a permanent standing committee on veterans affairs. I for one approve of the government's decision not to take that step.

It does seem to me that these repeated urgings from the official opposition for the setting up of various permanent committees indicate that there must be in that party a feeling that we should get away from the principles of parliamentary government and accept the principle of committee government, of which I do not approve.

Mr. Brooks: Is the hon. member aware that practically every veterans organization in Canada has requested the setting up of a parliamentary committee? It is not the urgings of the opposition, at all; it is the urging of the veterans themselves.

Mr. Dickey: The urgings we hear in the house are those of the opposition, and I presume they are responsible for the principle underlying the suggestion they make.

Mr. Brooks: It is the veterans.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the house for long, but I do wish to give my support to this bill and the amendments it proposes to the Veterans Land Act. I am pleased to note that the Department of Veterans Affairs, particularly, is willing to bring in amendments arising from experience, with a view to making legislation work to the better advantage of the veterans. I should hope that some other departments of government might learn a lesson from the Department of Veterans Affairs and recommend amendments to legislation when such legislation does not work out satisfactorily, or requires amendment.

I would support the proposal of the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) that at the next session of the house we have a special committee on veterans affairs. As the hon. member has said, I believe that is the wish of all the major veterans organizations in this country, and such a committee would play a useful part in assisting the government in the further development of veteran legislation.

I am pleased to see these amendments because I believe they will be beneficial to some men in my constituency. I have known of men taking up some holdings under the act, and then having to transfer their employment, or having to transfer their locations of residence because of health reasons, employment reasons, or for some other unforeseen cause. For that reason I am sure these amendments will assist a great many veterans in Canada and correct a situation which requires correction.

I could not take my seat without again emphasizing my hope, and the hope of the veterans I represent, that the government will see fit in the near future to reduce small holdings to half an acre, and make it possible for thousands of veterans to take advantage of this excellent legislation. I am pleased, too, to see the qualifications for application under the act extended to this group of pensioners who are pensioned on account of disability received in any theatre of service.

That is all I have to say at the moment.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on this section. I did not say anything when Mr. Speaker was in the chair, because there were certain questions I wanted to ask.

In my view this is a good bill, and makes the act more workable than it was before. It does raise certain questions, but before going into those I should like to comment on the general principle of these small holdings, and the idea behind them when the act was passed in 1942. Many hon. members here today served on that committee, and they will know that the idea of small holdings as it was put forth at that time was not intended as a housing scheme. It was only after the veterans began to come back from overseas, and the scarcity of houses developed, that the scheme became a housing scheme. It seems to me there is a difference between the two, but that as yet the department has not been able to resolve that difference.

There is a demand for housing and a demand for small holdings. In between the two we have many holdings the classification of which it is difficult to define. I believe the department will continue to have difficulty until there is some amendment in the act to distinguish between veterans housing and small holdings. The setting up of that division may offer some difficulty. However, unless there is some division there will always be that marginal ground where it will be difficult to decide what veterans should do with their holdings—whether they should be able to dispose of part of them, or whether they should be retained as part of the holding of the veterans.

The veteran now on a small holding may sell part of that holding. There are many veterans who have holdings of two or three acres. If they subdivide and sell part of those holdings, immediately there will be a demand on the part of veterans coming in under the act to get holdings smaller than the two or three acres available at the present time. What is the position to be in that connection?

If under this amendment to the act the subdividing of a small holding is allowed, then quite rightly other veterans who may be coming under the act will ask for smaller holdings. They will ask for a reduction to the half-acre holdings.

I should like also to say a word with respect to the matter raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon. That is a problem we are going to meet in certain parts of Canada as time goes on, the matter of large farms going on the market for sale. In my own constituency I know of several large farms of five, six or seven sections, in good areas which, because of the desire of the owners to retire, are going on the market. It is good land; but no single veteran can hope to purchase that amount of land. Where a group of veterans wish to get together to form a co-operative in order to farm some land that might become available under section 9, they could purchase it and operate it more successfully than they could as individuals. I think some consideration should be given to amending the act to allow that development to take place. It is a natural development that is going on and if it is successful I think it should be encouraged. I have some other questions with regard to other sections which I shall bring up later.

Mr. Gregg: I wonder if the hon. member for Melfort would mind if his questions were answered under section 3? Perhaps that would keep things more in order. This section merely brings the provisions of this act into conformity with the amendment to the Pension Act in so far as pensioners' applications are concerned.

Mr. Hatfield: Why should a veteran who has a position in a town or city have to go outside the limits in order to take up a small holding?

Mr. Gregg: I should like to deal with that question under section 3.

Mr. Brooks: How many more veterans does the minister think will be brought in under the new qualifications for eligibility?

Mr. Gregg: It is impossible to make anything like an exact estimate. As hon. members realize, veterans have made application from time to time and have been told, "We are sorry but we cannot do it under the present act; perhaps some day it will be amended". I think we can form a pretty good guess when we consider that approximately 2,200 pensioners were listed as having service of less than one year. It would be a fairly small percentage of that number, perhaps somewhere around 100.

Mr. McLure: When a veteran has exhausted his re-establishment credit and qualifies for land under this legislation must he pay back all the credit he has received?

Mr. Gregg: That matter does not properly come under any section of the bill, but I shall deal with it now. This bill does not change that situation at all. A veteran is permitted to repay his re-establishment credit and then apply under the Veterans Land Act. That provision was in existence before and it will continue.

Mr. McLure: I have in mind a veteran who has made an application which has been accepted. He had seven years' service, all of it overseas with the exception of six months, and he is being asked to pay back some $1,400. He has a little business established in a country village and he wants to build his house there. However, he was told that he would have to go out a mile or two and buy three acres of land. That would be detrimental to the carrying on of his business. Another complaint is that the longer service a man has had, the more he must pay back. Of course, he has received a larger re-establishment credit, but there seems to be discrimination as between the man with long service and the man who came in only at the last moment. Would there be anything under this bill that would reduce the amount that a man would have to pay back? In this case this man will be forced to sell his business in order to get started again.

Mr. Gregg: There are no provisions for that in this bill. While I do not want to do it now, I think I could convince my hon. friend of the equity of the present provision. However, it does not properly come under this bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Determination of cost to director.

Mr. Wright: This section provides that the cost to the director shall not be less than the amount actually expended. I believe there have been occasions when the director has had to sell property for less than the actual cost. This section would seem to preclude that possibility and I am wondering if its provisions will be retroactive. There have been properties where the cost has been written down because of an increase in the cost of materials and that sort of thing.

Mr. Mutch: Is the hon. member referring to the small holdings?

Mr. Wright: Yes.

Mr. Mutch: This is not the section, but provision is being made to ensure that the write-down shall not be charged against the property.

Mr. Blair: In cases where there is no agreement as to the value of the land and property and where a valuation has been made by an official of the department, is there any appeal or can a valuation be obtained from another party?

Mr. Gregg: As my hon. friend knows, in each region the Veterans Land Act administration has the benefit of excellent advisory committees. While there may not be a formal submission of an appraisal by our official, nevertheless our field superintendents consult with the advisory committee in forming appraisals.

Section agreed to.

Mr. Gregg: In dealing with the questions that have been asked under this section perhaps I may take the last first and then deal with the others. The hon. member for Melfort, the hon. member for Acadia and the hon. member for Royal have all referred to the idea behind these small holdings. I should like to make it abundantly clear that there is no withdrawal from the original idea. It is true that in the days of demobilization in 1945 and 1946, when it was more vital even than it is now to get demobilized men under cover, an amendment was made by order in council to the regulations of that day to permit the obtaining of blocks of land in the vicinity of large centres and breaking them into half-acre lots which became known as projects or subdivisions. A good deal of difficulty was experienced in getting equipment and skilled help to build the houses for these lots. After looking over the record I am free to state that the motive of having a small place in which to live in the country did not at that time carry a great deal of weight. In 1946, I believe, that was reversed and the regulations went back to two and three acres where it now stands.

The value of the original small holding idea has been pointed out this afternoon. I think we are beginning to come to a realization of it. Some hon. members may have seen reports of a competition which the director conducted within the last twelve months, for small holdings both in subdivisions and on individual settlements across the country. That, as well as many other things, including the remedial steps taken with regard to houses, helped to raise greatly the morale of many veterans settled under this provision of the act. During the present month, while things are reasonably quiet in the work of the administration of the Veterans Land Act, there is being carried on in Ottawa what I tell the director is a young college. Senior men and their assistants from every section of Canada are taking a three-weeks course. Those providing instruction in that course are drawn from many fields of activities having to do with agriculture, horticultural and small holdings. Now that we have had the plan back on the two and three acre plan for a goodly period, it is evident that there is great and continuing interest in this particular way of life that was visualized in 1942 when the small-holding idea came into effect.

For instance, let us take the first year, 1945-46. Approved applications for small holdings numbered 2,318. I admit the war ended that year, and consequently it took a little while for veterans to decide what they wanted to do, but in the first six months of the 1949-50 year there have been 1,808 approved applications for small holdings. If it continues on the same basis there will be 3,616 this year, or a good many more than the first year of demobilization. Of course the same thing can be stated as to those going on dominion and provincial lands. The rise there has been much more marked because it took some little time to get under way.

The other point which was made by most members who spoke was an expression of concern whether the provision under this section for the sale of a part of the property might result in its being reduced to a very small lot. The answer is no. The director will only have authority to allow the veteran to sell a portion of his property when the remaining portion is not less than the amount he would otherwise be required to have. It does not change the acreage position in any way whatsoever.

Mr. Gillis: Will the minister tell us what the special qualifications are whereby a veteran can qualify with two acres? The normal requirement is three, is it not?

Mr. Gregg: It is based upon the current value of the land. If the land with a suitable supply of water is worth $500 an acre or more, it may be two acres, but if under $500, the minimum is three acres. The director has a twenty per cent discretion.

Mr. Gillis: There is another point that is quite important. You are changing section 9 (a) of the act and adding a section to it for the purpose of modifying the general terms. What I have in mind is that when a veteran establishes himself on a small holding—

Mr. Gregg: Excuse me, but it is not taking out one and putting another in. It is adding another one.

[Mr. Gregg.]

Mr. Gillis: You are adding to it. When a veteran establishes himself under the small-holding section he signs a contract with the director to the effect that he must remain on that particular section for ten years. Otherwise, if he is obliged to move before the ten-year period is up, he does not get the write-off of 25 per cent that he would if he remained on the land and completed all the terms of the contract. Perhaps that was all right in theory when we started, but in practice it is working a hardship on those who are obliged to move through no fault of their own. For example, I have in mind a case where a soldier working for an oil company established himself on that basis, and then was ordered to another part of the country after being there for three or four years. He is placed in the position that he has to refund the 25 per cent, and thus loses the benefit of that particular provision of the act. The amending section provides a modification whereby, in the event of his being obliged to move, he is permitted to make arrangements with the director to sell the land to another veteran who may qualify. According to my reading of it, the director is then enabled to help the man who is forced to move in the place where he is going. I wonder whether that will be of any help in connection with two or three cases I have in mind.

For example, an employee of an oil company is shifted outside Canada, and the regulations do not apply where he is going. Perhaps he has cleaned up his loan in four years, but nevertheless if he moves and hands back the property he is obliged to repay the 25 per cent plus interest. This may be a borderline case, but several of them have been brought to my attention. While the act helps to some extent in the circumstances where a veteran is moving from one part of Canada to another and is successful in getting another veteran to take over his place, it does not help the veteran who is shifted outside Canada. Is there any administrative latitude that might be granted in such a case? I cannot read it into this change.

Mr. Gregg: As my hon. friend points out, everything else being equal, this enables a man who moves to another part of Canada to secure another property there. I hope the hon. member will not ask me to interpret the legal words used in the bill to achieve this.

Mr. Gillis: I wouldn't understand you.

Mr. Gregg: I can assure him the law officers of the crown have "vetted" it carefully. They assure me it will do the trick. As to the man who must move outside Canada, it is granted that we cannot do the same thing because we cannot get land in the place where he is going, but I think my hon. friend is wrong when he states that he has to repay to the director the conditional grant he would have got if he had remained on the property for ten years. He does not pay it back because he never had it. The conditional grant was promised him after ten years as an inducement, if you like, for him to adopt this kind of small-holding life, to try to get people out of the cities and interested in that type of property. If a situation arises where he cannot carry through he is no worse off than he was, but he has not qualified for the additional grant.

Mr. Gillis: I should like to get that clear in my own mind, because I may have to explain it to someone else. Say the value of the property was $15,000.

Mr. Gregg: Keep it small; the limit is $6,000.

Mr. Gillis: I just said $15,000 for a start. Say $5,000. Under the terms of the contract the veteran is obliged to pay $5,000 less 25 per cent, which is written off when the mortgage is finally burned. In the event of circumstances arising such as we have described so the veteran has to hand back the property, does he pay that $5,000 one hundred per cent, or does he hand back the property to the director less the 25 per cent? He is allowed that in the transaction if he remains on the property for ten years; but if he leaves that property before the ten years are up does he lose that 25 per cent?

Mr. Gregg: He would lose the conditional grant because he would not earn it. If it is a $6,000 property the conditional grant normally would be $1,400; and if he carried through the contract, at the end of ten years the conditional grant would be his. But he cannot do that; consequently he loses it because he has not lived up to the terms required.

Mr. Gillis: He is really serving a ten-year sentence, and would there be any possibility of lessening that sentence? It would be quite all right if he was earning his living on the property as a regular farmer, but his means of livelihood are outside, so I do not think it is reasonable to say that the grant is conditional upon his remaining there for ten years. Could that not be knocked down to a shorter period?

Mr. Gregg: I would not like to follow that through in all its details, but in actual practice such a man would be paying under his contract a very modest rental, if you called it a rental instead of a payment on his property. When he has to make that move, he has made certain payments which of course are credited to his account. More often than not when he makes the move all the worry in connection with the liquidation of the contract falls upon the director. In other words, if the veteran leaves the property within the ten-year period the terms of the conditional grant have not been met.

Mr. Wright: I should like to carry that just a step further. Supposing within the ten-year period this veteran moves from Vancouver, we will say, to Ottawa and gets another property under the Veterans Land Act. Does he qualify for the grant here? He has to buy the property under the Veterans Land Act, and it has to be a similar property in order to qualify.

Mr. Gregg: Yes. The wording of the section in the bill covering that point may appear a little obscure; nevertheless that is fully provided for and is one of the reasons why these amendments were brought in.

Mr. Wright: On the other hand if he cannot obtain a property here under the Veterans Land Act and has to buy a city house because he cannot wait to obtain something under the Veterans Land Act, does he get that grant?

Mr. Gregg: If he is sold on the idea to the extent of wanting a second property under the act there is every likelihood that he would be able to get it. If that should be absolutely impossible, however, he would be in the same position as the man who went to the United States or somewhere else outside Canada.

Mr. Cardiff: Take the case of a veteran who bought a farm and, before the ten-year period was up, found it did not suit him, paid all he owed on it, and then sold it. He does not owe the government or anybody else a cent. If he buys another farm is he entitled to re-establishment? The man to whom I have reference bought a farm and paid for it in a matter of two or three years. He paid the government everything he owed; then he sold the farm and now wants to buy another. Is he entitled to re-establishment in connection with the second farm?

Mr. Gregg: Not in the ordinary course. The director has authority, for good and sufficient reasons, to assist a veteran to improve his condition, but the veteran would not be entitled to go on repeatedly buying and selling farms on his own. Under the terms of the act the director has authority to dispose of a veteran's property and assist him to obtain another property better suited to the needs of the man, but that would be done in a relatively few cases.

Mr. Mutch: In the case mentioned the veteran could not get title in less than ten years; before that time he would not have earned his conditional grant. Therefore the property could only be sold by the director on his behalf, which is a proposal contained in this legislation. If this proposal carries, that could be done once, but only once. The director and the veteran cannot go on buying progressively better farms, and get into the real estate business. He could make a complete switch once within the ten-year period, but he could not pay it off in three years and get title without sacrificing his conditional grant because he would not earn his conditional grant in less than the ten-year period.

Mr. Gregg: In reply to the hon. member for Cape Breton South and several others I should have added, taking the case mentioned by the hon. member, that when the man does clear up his contract with the director and moves to another part of Canada where he is not able to get settled, he then is in line to receive his re-establishment credit.

Mr. Cardiff: Then I would ask the minister what difference there is between those two propositions. The man to whom I have reference bought a farm, sold it and paid back everything that was coming to anybody. Now he wants to buy another farm. What is the difference between his position and that of the man you referred to just now, who moved to another part of the country?

Mr. Mutch: He bought the first farm on his own?

Mr. Cardiff: No, he did not; he bought it under the Veterans Land Act, and paid back all the money that was required by anyone. Now he wants to re-establish himself on another farm.

Mr. Gregg: I do not want to discuss hypothetical cases. If the man was happily re-established on the first farm and then decided to sell it, it is doubtful whether the country should be expected to re-establish him again, except under very special circumstances for which provision is made in the bill.

Mr. Quelch: I wonder if the minister could give any breakdown showing what use the veterans are making of their small holdings of land. If he has not that information could he at least say what percentage of the veterans are obtaining any revenue from their small holdings? The purpose of my question is to find out how quickly we are realizing the purposes of the act.

Mr. Gregg: That is a difficult thing to interpret in figures at this early stage, because as I see it these small holdings have a much greater potential value than has been realized so far. It is intended to provide him with elbow room so that, perhaps during a period when he is not able to get as high a wage as he is now, he might develop some skill or do something on that property that would bring him in revenue. I can say further that, as a result of the judges' report on the competitions in the small holdings this year, I was surprised at the number of veterans who have made some use of their land.

Mr. Brooks: What percentage would you say?

Mr. Gregg: It is difficult to be precise, but more than 50 per cent of the veterans across Canada have already made use of more than a reasonable amount of the land, either in productive capacity or in gardens, lawns and that sort of thing.

Mr. Wright: I should like to support the member for Cape Breton South in his plea to the minister for veterans who have left these small holdings through causes that are not under their control, such as employment, sickness or something of that kind. I believe this ten-year sentence, as an hon. member put it, should be reduced to five years. It seems only reasonable that, when these people have to move because of circumstances over which they have no control, they should not lose the conditional grant that they got for the ten-year occupancy.

I was glad to hear the minister say that it was a bit difficult for him to understand the wording of parts of this act, because I found that, too. I should like to get an explanation of clause 4 of section 3. It reads as follows:

> Where under this section the surplus or any portion thereof is applied in reduction of the cost to the director,
> (a) an amount that bears the same proportion to such surplus or portion as the contract sale price bears to the cost to the director of the land, improvements and building materials, or
> (b) seventy-six and two-thirds per centum of such surplus or portion whichever is the lesser, shall be applied in reduction of the amount owing under the contract, and for the purposes of subsection four of section nine the total outstanding cost to the director shall be reduced by the amount of such surplus or portion.

Can the minister or his assistant put that into language which the ordinary member understands?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I knew I would get caught on that one. Would my hon. friend be willing to have me put on Hansard an example of that, and if the bill happens to go through tonight, I would be glad to discuss it with him when my estimates come up.

Let us say that a sale is made to the veteran under subsection (1) of section 9 of land which cost the director, say, $6,000, and later, at the request of the veteran, the director sells a portion of the property for $1,000, the formula will be found to apply as follows:

Cost to director of land		$6,000
Contract sale price—10 per cent down payment	$ 600
Plus ⅔ of $6,000	4,000
Value of portion of property sold		$1,000

We have the proposition then of X being as to $1,000 as $4,600 is to $6,000, or 4600/6000 of $1,000 equals $766.67. In other words, the veteran's contract debt is reduced by $766.67. This is the ordinary case. I do hope that my hon. friend will be able to make out that formula tomorrow morning, but I assure him it is quite all right.

Mr. Wright: I am grateful to the minister for giving us time until his estimates come up to study the matter, because I cannot understand it now.

Mr. Noseworthy: I should like to call attention to one matter which has been mentioned a number of times during the debate on this bill. One of the most frequent complaints from veterans I meet in the city of Toronto concerns the size of small holdings. The one amendment I think is needed most is an amendment that will restore the small holding to its original size, particularly adjoining a metropolitan area. The price of two acres anywhere near the city of Toronto is too high. If the veteran can purchase the land at a price he can afford, he has to go so far out of the city that getting back and forth to work becomes impossible.

If the minister and his department could give some consideration to reducing the size of that holding, especially near metropolitan areas, it would make it possible for veterans who are working in the city to acquire a small home just outside the city, along with half an acre of land. They could grow some vegetables to help out the family budget. I believe I have had more requests regarding the possibility of getting a half acre than for anything else under the act. This provision affects the veterans living near the large cities.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I wish to mention the same point as the member who has just spoken. In the county of Middlesex, I find there are some half-acre plots available. In some of the villages near my constituency, I find that the requirement is for a larger acreage. This means that one veteran can go out of the city of London, purchase a half acre and secure the benefits of the act, while a veteran living in another village is unable to do that. This does not seem fair. Under present circumstances, I believe a half acre is large enough. If the veteran feels he wants to expand later, he can buy more acreage as he needs it.

While I am speaking about these small holdings, I should like to say that many of the veterans deserve a great deal of credit for the way they have improved their property in the county of Middlesex.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I should like to ask the minister about the point mentioned by the member for Royal, that is the long delay in getting legal transactions through the department. In the past it has been the custom to blame these delays on the lawyers. As the minister knows, if there is no question about the title, there is no reason for the lawyer to hold the matter up. I would be glad if the minister would take the province of Ontario, since it is the only one with which I am familiar, and tell us how many departments there are in Ontario and just how an application goes through. Will he explain what causes the long delay?

Mr. Gregg: I hope, and it is not just a pious hope, that the long delays are not as great as they were before. Will the hon. member accept my promise to bring forward a complete reply to his question when my estimates are before the house?

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Can the minister say what would be the average time taken for an application to go through after its acceptance?

Mr. Gregg: I should not like to make an estimate, but I will get one for my hon. friend.

I should like to comment on the two suggestions made a moment ago. Those proposals of course would reverse the original intention of the act, but that is not the main point. I would look at the matter with a good deal of concern if the Minister of Veterans Affairs were forced to go into the housing business. Might I suggest to both hon. members that they look quite carefully into the terms of the legislation now brought forward by my colleague, the minister of reconstruction, with regard to housing and which I think will help to take care of the problems in the metropolitan areas which they mentioned.

Mr. Noseworthy: It is not so much a matter of housing; a half acre of land adjoining a city is entirely different from a house in the city. A great many veterans would like to get just outside the city, yet near enough to get back and forth to work without having to travel fifteen or twenty miles, as in Toronto. It is not just a case of getting a house; it is a case of getting a home and a bit of land on which they can do some gardening and augment their income. It is more than a question of a house.

Mr. Warren: It is not often that I trouble the minister. I think that is a suggestion which ought to be considered. I have had some problems of that nature in my riding. It is not always easy to get three acres of land close to your work. You might be able to get half an acre. If it is good land, you can grow a great quantity of vegetables on half an acre of land, provided that you are willing to work. If it were possible to give that help to a veteran who would build a house of his own in his spare time—as could easily happen if he had the necessary energy and ambition —on half an acre of land, I would be in favour of giving it.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Termination of contract by agreement.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): If the sale is made, will the minister say just how the proceeds will be divided?

Mr. Gregg: Hon. members will observe opposite section 5 the explanatory notes which are quite brief. In the act machinery is provided for the termination of contracts of veterans who are in default, and all such situations must be examined by the provincial advisory board before termination proceedings are completed. It sometimes happens that a veteran is ready to dispense with the formal procedure and is prepared to give a quit claim deed to the director with respect to his interest in the contract. That is where he volunteers and is quite willing to do so without any pressure whatsoever. The purpose of this amendment is to relieve the director, under such circumstances, of the need to go through the long formal procedure that I have mentioned.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): In a case like that, if the veteran is agreeable to having the contract rescinded and if the director in due time disposes of the small holdings and there is no loss, does that mean that the veteran who is no longer under V.L.A., and did not receive any rehabilitation grant, would then be entitled to his rehabilitation grant?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, he would be entitled to his rehabilitation grant.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Is there anything in this amendment or in the act that distinctly states that he is entitled to his rehabilitation grant?

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

Mr. Gregg: It is in vogue now.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): In this act?

Mr. Gregg: No. It does not require to be incorporated in this act.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I am glad to hear the minister say that, but I do not know of any place where it is stated that he is entitled to that.

Mr. Mutch: Perhaps I could answer that question. You will remember, Mr. Chairman, that there were three possible ways of receiving rehabilitation benefits and each of those was exclusive of the others. The only way that a veteran gets benefit under the small holdings section of the Veterans Land Act is to earn his conditional grant. If he did not earn his conditional grant by staying on the land long enough to earn it and fulfil his contract, he does not receive any rehabilitation benefit at all under this act. He might then elect to get his credits. If the time had not elapsed, the fifteen months, he would alternatively be entitled to an educational grant.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): If you follow that up, Mr. Chairman, where the land goes back to the veteran and there is a loss of $300 on the resale, would that in any way affect the amount of rehabilitation grant? Would that $300 be deducted from his rehabilitation grant or would he get his full rehabilitation grant as if he had never made application under V.L.A.?

Mr. Mutch: I should not like to answer that question without checking, but I believe that it would depend on whether or not it was held that he had by his negligence contributed to the loss. It would then be apportioned.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Surplus on resale to be paid to veteran.

Mr. Wright: I should like to ask the minister whether subsection 3 might not be amended. It reads:

(3) Where the contract between the director and a veteran was rescinded or otherwise terminated and it is established to the satisfaction of the director that

(a) the property described therein did not deteriorate in value owing to wilful neglect by the veteran during his occupancy, and

(b) failure of the veteran to observe the terms of his contract was due to his physical disability, or ill-health of his family, or his general unfitness to farm, or the unsuitability of the property, and that as a consequence thereof the veteran is in necessitous circumstances, the director may, with the approval of the governor in council, refund to the veteran his initial down payment in whole or in part.

I think the words "and that as a consequence thereof the veteran is in necessitous circumstances" should be taken out. It seems to me that we are bringing the means test into this legislation in a way that is done in no other section of the act. Where the other conditions obtain, where the land has not deteriorated in value, and where the failure of the veteran to observe the terms of his contract was due to physical disability, or ill health in his family, or general unfitness to farm, or the unsuitability of the property, he should be entitled to the 10 per cent refund without having to prove necessitous circumstances. I would ask the minister seriously to consider eliminating these words, "and that as a consequence thereof the veteran is in necessitous circumstances".

Mr. Quelch: I would agree wholeheartedly with the hon. member for Melfort. That is the point to which I was referring when I spoke on second reading. It seems to me that a veteran should certainly be entitled to the refund of the down payment unless it can be shown that the property has deteriorated as the result of his wilful neglect.

Then again, I think that paragraph (b) of subsection (3) should be widened a little bit. It contains these words, "or the unsuitability of the property". What about the case of the veteran who has suffered, we will say, two or three total crop failures as the result of hail? If he is going to lose his farm, at least he should have the down payment refunded because he will be in a bad financial position if he has to give up farming as a result of continued bad luck. I am referring only to conditions over which he has no control. If it is as the result of a series of crop failures, not of poor farming, or to hail or other misfortune that he has to give up farming, then I think he should be entitled to a refund of the down payment because he is certainly in need of it.

Mr. Gregg: I think both my hon. friends will agree that probably we make progress slowly. I believe the words underlined, "or the unsuitability of the property" represent a step forward—a very long step forward. I think it might even be stated that the case suggested by the hon. member for Acadia involved unsuitability in the location of the property, and that that caused the circumstances he mentioned. I am sure he will agree that those who administer the act will interpret that faithfully and well. I should like to have that provision stand as it is at the present time anyway.

Mr. Quelch: Why retain the words "in necessitous circumstances", so long as it is not due to wilful neglect? Why should he not get the refund?

Mr. Gregg: There is no answer; but it was in before and I do not wish to change it at this time.

Mr. Wright: It is six o'clock, and I think the minister should think it over during the recess.

Mr. Gregg: It has been thought over and discussed at great length.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps this section might be allowed to carry; there are only a few more.

Mr. Quelch: We are on section 7. I should like to ask a question about subsection 2 (c), which refers to taxes and costs of insurance and repairs paid or incurred with respect to such property by the director since the date of rescission or other termination. Just how far can the director go in connection with making repairs to a property? As the minister knows, many farms that are bought by veterans have a number of buildings in a bad state of repair. Does that mean that the director can repair all the buildings into shipshape condition, when they were not in a good state of repair when the veteran bought the land? If the land sells at an increased price owing to the fact that the veteran has put a lot of improvements on it, surely he should be in a position to benefit from those improvements.

On the other hand, if the director has a free hand to carry out all kinds of repairs on the buildings, he might use up any profit left on the transaction. Repairs should extend only to the extent of putting the buildings back into the condition they were in at the time the land was bought.

Mr. Gregg: Is the hon. member referring to the situation where receipts from the sale of a piece of property may be used to repair buildings?

Mr. Quelch: No. Section 19 (1) states:

Where a contract made by the director with a veteran is rescinded or otherwise terminated and any property that was sold by the contract is re-sold by the director for more than the amount owing under the contract, the surplus shall be paid by the director to the veteran.

(2) For the purposes of subsection one the amount owing under the contract is the aggregate of—and so on.

Mr. Gregg: That is just to restore the property to the condition it was in before.

Mr. Quelch: That is all?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, that is all.

Section agreed to.

Sections 8 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister have an office consolidation made of this act? It would be most convenient to hon. members, in view of the amendments.

Mr. Gregg: Yes. May I thank hon. members for their co-operation in getting this bill through.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

ALBERTA NATURAL GAS COMPANY

The house resumed from Friday, November 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maybank for the second reading of Bill No. 66, respecting Alberta Natural Gas Company.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, when the house was considering this bill a week ago I had not quite concluded my remarks. I suggest to you and to hon. members of the house that the test which should be applied to these private bills granting charters to build a pipe line should be this: Is the proposed company going to give the greatest possible service to the Canadian people?

The company under discussion in this bill, to be known as the Alberta Natural Gas Company, does not meet that test. The proposal is to run a pipe line from southern Alberta, through the Crowsnest pass and thence into the United States. We are told that they hope to bring it out again at the end to serve Vancouver, which would then be at the end of the line. It should be made perfectly clear that that plan means that this company will serve, first, the interiors of Idaho, Washington and possibly Oregon; second, the United States west coast cities of Seattle, Tacoma and Portland; and, third and last, the Canadian west coast will be able to get whatever surplus is left.

I have here this week's issue of U.S. News and World Report. The heading of the article to which I am referring is, "Canada: Oil's new hot spot." A map appears with the article illustrating the oil boom now at flood tide in Alberta and spilling over into Saskatchewan and possibly reaching Manitoba. It shows a pipe line under construction to the southeast from Edmonton to Superior, Wisconsin, and it shows a proposed pipe line to the southwest, again from Edmonton, running into the state of Idaho, thence into Washington and thence to Seattle, Tacoma and Portland. That is the way the United States are looking at this business.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I think in fairness the hon. member should read the contents of the article, which states that it will supply British Columbia markets.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member should refer to newspaper or magazine articles having reference to the present debate.

Mr. Green: It is only natural that this pipe line should serve the northwest states because the company behind this bill is a United States company, the Northwest Natural Gas Company, which is an affiliate of Venezuela Syndicate Incorporated of New York. The first interest of this company is the Pacific northwest states, not the province of British Columbia.

Since I made my speech last week the Vancouver Sun of November 24, 1945, has arrived which contains an article datelined at Calgary and reading as follows:

> Northwest Natural Gas Company has asked the Alberta natural gas and conservation board for an adjournment of its hearing for permission to export gas to points outside the province.

I point out that that is an application made to the Alberta authorities by the Northwest Natural Gas Company. The article continues:

> This company, which has plans to bring Alberta's gas to the coast by a southerly route through the United States, has run into difficulty in the House of Commons, in its move to get federal approval for incorporation.
> Previous to this sitting of the house it had requested Alberta to hear its application on November 28. Now the application might not come up until after the end of the year.

They are waiting to get this bill through the house.

> British Columbia's government and many residents have gone on record supporting Westcoast. A line through northern British Columbia and Alberta would build up the sparsely settled districts in both provinces, they say.

There is no doubt at all who is behind this application for a charter. It is a United States company which is planning to serve the northwestern states. I suggest that the line should be through British Columbia to the coast, and I do not care which route it follows provided that it goes through Canadian territory. If there is any surplus it can then be sent on to United States west coast cities. Nobody could have any objection to that.

If that plan were followed, instead of this pipe line serving the interior of the northwest Pacific states, the American Pacific coast cities and finally the west coast of Canada, we would have the interior of British Columbia served first, then Canadian west coast centres and finally United States west coast cities, if any surplus was available. I need only point out to hon. members that when we were discussing the trans-Canada highway this week everyone insisted that it should go through Canada; no one suggested anything else. Surely we should do the same thing with this natural gas pipe line.

I suggest that some delay is advisable before a decision is reached on this point. A question like this should not be settled in the dying days of this short session; time should be available to determine how Canadians can best be served by this pipe line. Then thought should also be given to having placed in the charters the route to be followed. I repeat the argument I made before, that there should be written right into the charter where the company has to lay out its route. Further, an attempt should be made to negotiate with the United States. If this pipe line or other pipe lines have to cross the boundary and then come back into Canada, we have no assurance they will come back unless there is a treaty with the United States. It is ridiculous to leave it to a private company to make the arrangements. Once the pipe line crosses our boundary we lose all control, and the only way we can get any control at all is by having a treaty.

I also believe consideration should be given to writing more controls into the dominion legislation. There should be some method of controlling the rates to be charged by the pipe line companies. At the present time there is practically no control over a natural gas pipe line under the dominion Pipe Lines Act. Time should be taken for public opinion to crystallize on the broad question. It involves more than natural gas and oil. We shall be faced with the same decision in connection with our iron ore in Quebec and Labrador. There is a great issue to be settled by the Canadian people. My party and I believe in conserving Canadian resources for the use of the Canadian people.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Green: No, not at the moment. I will answer it if I have time. We believe in conserving Canadian resources for the use of the Canadian people rather than the policy of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) which is that of being liberal with these great resources so far as the United States is concerned.

Just think how the people of the United States will laugh at us when they learn there is a difference of opinion in Canada as to whether Canadians are to be looked after first. The Americans have built a great nation. They have built the most powerful nation in the world, and they have done so primarily by looking after their own interests first. They have never hesitated to see that their own interests were protected, and Canada should do exactly the same thing. The only way Canada will ever become a great nation is by seeing that we look after Canada first. I suggest that by allowing these pipe lines to be built through the United States rather than wholly through Canadian territory we are not looking after the Canadian people. We are giving the people of the United States a chance to build industries, to provide employment, and also unfortunately to attract our young Canadians to the United States for the purpose of taking that employment. That is what will happen if a development of this type is allowed to go through. Therefore I move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black):

That the word "now" be deleted and the words "this day six months hence" be added at the end of the question.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, I was paired, but had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds): I move, seconded by Mr. Lafontaine, that this question be now put.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I did not intend to take part in this debate. As a matter of fact, in spite of the discussion, this is the first time I have spoken on the motion, and my record can be checked to prove that. I am getting a little advice from the cabinet ranks, which I appreciate. I appreciate advice from anyone. If my friend wants to give me advice, I shall sit down for a moment.

I have been accused of taking part in a filibuster. I should like to make my point quite clear. Generally, I speak too quickly, and I appreciate that fact. I have no connection in any way, shape or form with the Westcoast Transmission Company, whose bill was passed last year. I have never attended their meetings, have no shares in the company, and only know one of the directors by sight. In common with the member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), I resent some of the remarks that have been passed. All right, the more interruptions I get, the quicker it will be nine o'clock.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The rubber stamps can't take it.

Mr. Whitman: It sounds like a stampeder.

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and we were proud to be stampeders; we can take defeat as well as victory. The other night I listened to the only member who, in my opinion, knows anything at all about oil. In so far as I know, we have one mining engineer in this house, but no geologist. We have the member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) who, for forty years, has lived in the oil country. He has invested his money in it, and has acted on behalf of oil companies. He knew what he was talking about, but not one member of the government nor any other private member does know what he is talking about.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): How much do you know?

Mr. Cruickshank: I thought I heard some bright remarks from that small district in the maritimes. The only thing they are noted for in the maritimes is that they catch some lobsters, and some they send to parliament. Someone near me mentioned crabs. In my province, we are very fond of crabs which are found in the Pacific ocean. Perhaps you would like to know how we catch these crabs. I shall tell you. We go around with a net or with a spear—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was not strictly in order, but I think perhaps he was provoked to speak on a subject that is not in order. If hon. members will not interrupt him, I believe he will address himself to the question.

Mr. Cruickshank: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think the words from Holy Writ would apply, "Forgive them, they know not what they do". It has been suggested, Mr. Speaker, that we were staging a filibuster. I do not think I can be accused of staging a filibuster, because this is the first time I have spoken on this motion. I spoke for five minutes on the amendment. If I had any connection with the filibuster, I would have no shame in saying so. I have very good reason for not being ashamed of staging a filibuster. I well remember when the sponsor of this bill before us tonight spoke for 41 minutes to talk out a resolution. His voice became extremely husky just about nine o'clock.

I remember, too, when the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) moved an amendment for old age pensions, another parliamentary assistant spoke for 27 minutes about the poor old people—how they suffered, these poor old pensioners, and what we want to do for them; how they need help, and so on—until nine o'clock. Do not talk to me about filibusters. I was accused by a member from British Columbia, which I did not particularly like—oh, I like him personally a great deal. I should like to quote from page 2254 of Hansard:

> One hon. member from the Liberal benches rose to point out he was wholeheartedly in agreement with the opposition on this question. I am very happy there are not more Liberals taking that position because I would say that it is an obviously biased and reactionary position, and if there were more I would be extremely apprehensive of the future of the Liberal party.

An hon. Member: Who was that?

Mr. Cruickshank: I quoted the page of Hansard. It was the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne). Now I want to quote the hon. member for Kootenay East on another matter which is equally important. I am referring to this because a direct reference was made to me. Unfortunately I am the only Liberal member, or at least the only member on this side of the house who is in favour of an all-Canada route, apparently, but I want to quote the hon. member for Kootenay East on another matter. This is on the deduction of union dues for income tax purposes. I wonder what his fellow members of his union think—

Mr. Sinclair: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member is in order in quoting a comment made in a debate of this session that has been closed, and made by an hon. member who is not here tonight.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Cruickshank: I cannot read it, if you so rule, Mr. Speaker; but I do not take my rulings from any parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is referring to another debate in this session on another subject, he should not do so.

Mr. Cruickshank: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the rule is that the hon. member cannot quote the material, is it not? But surely he may refer to it.

Mr. Speaker: I think the rule is that he cannot do indirectly what he is not allowed to do directly.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is a good old rule of law but in this house it is more honoured in the breach than in the observance.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am willing to bow to any ruling, Mr. Speaker, even if I have to have the obvious objections to an all-Canada route from some of my fellow British Columbia members. When a charge is made against me, am I to understand that I cannot refer to the action of a so-called representative of union labour? If he is not here tonight, why is he not here? He is paid $6,000 a year, the same as I am.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Mitchell: I rise, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Sinclair: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Mitchell: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: One of the hon. members had better sit down.

Mr. Mitchell: I do not think that is fair and reasonable. Many hon. members are absent. Perhaps they are at committee meetings. I do not know. The leader of the C.C.F. is not here, and I do not say that disrespectfully. The leader of the Conservative party is not here, nor is the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

Mr. MacInnis: Neither is the leader of the government.

Mr. Mitchell: That is what I say. I do not think it is fair and decent for the hon. member to speak as he has. If my hon. friend wants to talk about pipe lines, let him do so and let him be decent and fair as every hon. member in this house should be.

Mr. Sinclair: I want to speak to this point of privilege. The hon. member for Kootenay East is attending the British Columbia convention of the International Mine and Smelter Workers' Union; for the past three years he has been president of the Kimberley local. I think he is doing his duty as a union man in attending that union meeting and the miners of British Columbia would want to have their miner member of parliament attend.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am getting a good deal of assistance from those in the government and those who would like to be in the government. Now that the explanation is given to me, may I say that I think the hon. member for Kootenay East is where he should be and I withdraw the remarks I made with regard to his not being here tonight, which were forced on me by a junior member from my province. I withdraw the remarks. The hon. member is where he should be. I hope he will explain to his fellow union members why he was in favour of the exemption of union dues one minute and yet ten minutes afterwards voted against it. At least I think I can claim that I have been consistent in my stand in connection with the pipe lines.

It is an easy matter to talk the bill out. If we wanted to talk this bill out, we could talk on it for a week. Like the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), however, I have no intention of doing so.

An hon. Member: Sit down and let us vote on it.

Mr. Cruickshank: Some members from British Columbia have their own privilege, their own right and their own duty to their respective ridings, Mr. Speaker. Incidentally, if I in conjunction with some other members have done nothing else, I have contributed greatly to the financial success of the Chateau Laurier and the Lord Elgin hotel. I have also contributed a good deal in my small way to the legal profession. The lawyers have been down here for three weeks going back and forward between the two hotels and the parliament buildings with regard to these two pipe line bills, lobbying against building a line through Canada; but they have not visited room 565 as yet.

As I cannot quote from these copies of Hansard, Mr. Speaker, I will put them away. As I say, I think that any member of this house will give me credit for consistency, in that respect being unlike some other so-called union members. I am going to quote just one editorial from a paper in my riding. I want to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, if I may—and repeat a remark that has been made before—that there are not eighteen people in British Columbia who are in favour of the United States route. The obvious answer is that out of eighteen members from that province, they could not get a solitary member to sponsor the bill. I defy any member from the province of British Columbia to rise in his place tonight and tell me of any organization in his riding that is in favour of the United States route. Of course they cannot do it. They are afraid to do it.

I will just name one organization. Wait a minute. I have some documents here; I have a great many of them but I do not want to take up the time of the house in referring to them, Mr. Speaker, because I do not want to delay the proceedings. I have one document from a northern riding; it is from the board of trade of Prince George or Fort George; there are so many Georges in that northern country that need to be developed, and there is apparently no desire on the part of some to develop them. But this is from the board of trade demanding an all-Canadian route, or rather it is from the associated boards of trade. I could take the time to read it to you, Mr. Speaker, but I do not want to delay the house. The associated boards of trade of the Fraser valley and the lower mainland demanded a route that would serve the best interests of all Canada.

I am just going to read this. I do not like to boast. It is seldom that I mention Fraser Valley in this house, but we have a fine riding there that needs to be developed. We have some five fine newspapers. To the best of my knowledge there are two weekly-newspaper editors who are members of this House of Commons. There may be more, but I know there are two. One of the newspapers in my riding, in two out of three years, won the Mason trophy as the best weekly newspaper in the Dominion of Canada. I am proud of that fact. I am just going to read you a little editorial in answer to one of the members, who talks one way and votes another way five minutes afterwards, with regard to union dues. I am going to answer him by just reading from the newspaper, the Fraser Valley Record of November 16, 1949. It mentions me, of course, and in all modesty I do not like to mention myself if I am sure that somebody else is going to do it before I do. I want you to note this, Mr. Speaker, as I want some of these other British Columbia members to note it. The heading is "Develop Canadian Payrolls First". I will read this because it should be of vital importance to some of the members from the province of British Columbia. It states in the headline "Develop Canadian Payrolls First". Now, let me go back, before I go on to read it. Last year I was interviewed—I was lobbied—"Don't sell our logs to the United States to be cut into lumber and put into pulp. Let us cut them in Canada. Let us produce lumber in Canada. Let us produce large payrolls and develop Canada."

Then the poor fishermen, the members of these unions, had an opportunity to sell their fish in Seattle at a higher price than the Canadian canners would pay for them. These same interests came to me saying that we must not sell our fish there, that we must not sell our fish in Seattle—"Let us can them in Canada. Keep Canadians at work and develop Canadian industry". These are the same individuals who are today opposing the development of Canada by an all-Canadian pipe line route. That is only incidental, but it is very typical.

It reminds me of the old saying that it depends on whose ox is being gored. I shall now read this article from the Fraser Valley

Record dated November 16, 1949—and I think I am justified in repeating the heading: "Develop Canadian Payrolls First". It states:

An interesting mixture of B.C. members, including of course if it was interesting, Fraser Valley's own George Cruickshank—

And I am very glad that is in there—

—co-operated in the house on Friday night to "talk out" a natural gas pipe line bill. B.C., and all Canada for that matter, should be very pleased that they did. The company had already admitted in Senate committee that it favoured routing its pipe line via United States to the Pacific coast, ostensibly to reduce construction costs.

The Pacific coast cities south of the border, under this proposal, would get Canadian gas first and, if Vancouver, New Westminster and the Fraser Valley ever got any gas at all it would presumably only be through a branch line.

For too long the west at least has been allowing its resources to be shuttled over the border in an unfinished state. In this condition we provide only the minimum of employment to mine or cut or catch the particular resource. The big industrial payrolls that result from manufacturing or processing these products go to enhance the wealth and prestige of our neighbours and competitors.

Let us not make the same mistake with this new resource. If industries are to be developed with the aid of this product let them first be developed in our country. If we have some gas to spare, let the branch lines be run across the border.

To the four B.C. members who joined in Friday night's filibuster, representing Liberal, C.C.F. and Conservative faiths, we say "good work."

Let me see an editorial like that from one of the other ridings.

Mr. Speaker: If I may interrupt the hon. member, I would refer him to paragraph 265 in Beauchesne, third edition, which reads as follows:

It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

I do not think the hon. member should continue to read the article.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On the point of order, the Prime Minister of this country today in the house read articles from the Toronto Daily Star and the Toronto Telegram without any difficulty whatsoever. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) is doing nothing different from what was done this morning by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Church: Nine o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know the incident to which the hon. member for Calgary West refers. However, I am reading from Beauchesne, third edition, which is recognized as an authoritative work on parliamentary procedure. If the hon. member for Calgary West had brought to my attention the reading of newspapers by any hon. member, reflecting upon the proceedings in the house, I would have brought it to the attention of the hon. member who was reading.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I do not think you were here at the time. I am perfectly certain if you had been you would have enforced the rule against the Prime Minister just as you would against any other member in the house. That is what I, and this party, think of you as Speaker of the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: If an article was read this morning, then perhaps I should allow some latitude to the hon. member for Fraser Valley this evening. Under the circumstances I shall allow him to continue.

Mr. Cruickshank: If I have offended, I am sorry. I should like to read from the Chilliwack Progress about the "great Cruickshank", but for fear of transgressing the rules I will not read it. But I can assure you, sir, and through you all members of the House of Commons, that ninety-eight per cent of the population of British Columbia approve of my consistency in this attitude.

Mr. Casselman: Nine o'clock.

Mr. Cruickshank: And I have never heard any member with the audacity to get up on the floor of the house and say that he has any support from any other section.

On motion of Mr. Cruickshank the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

252. Departmental administration, $794,605.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Chairman, some two weeks ago in the house when we were discussing a resolution presented by the hon. member for Eglinton, in which he asked for a committee on health, a debate on health matters ensued. At that time we had an opportunity to discuss matters of health in Canada. Unfortunately the Minister of National Health and Welfare was not in his seat at the time, because he was absent on other important business.

The opportunity to speak on health matters is usually limited to three or four hours toward the close of the session; yet it is one of the most important matters debated in the House of Commons. During the debate on the resolution offered by the hon. member for Eglinton I placed before the house certain important statistics showing the state of national health in Canada, and suggested certain remedies for that condition.

There is no occasion to repeat the statistics I gave at that time, but the brief summary I placed on record concerning our national health served to show that the picture at the present time is not reassuring. I pointed out the change that had taken place in the last two or three decades in respect of the principal causes of death. I attempted to show that the diseases which formerly headed the list as causes of mortality had changed, and that such diseases as old age, heart disease and cancer were now at the top of the list, and were the leading causes of death in this country.

The diseases I have mentioned should have the attention of all workers in the field of public health. While they may not contribute to a rise in the mortality rate they offer a challenge to the research workers of this country.

In a previous debate I mentioned the prevalence of mental diseases and drew attention to the shortage of hospital beds for these cases. We could also debate other matters such as sewage disposal, contamination of water and so on. These are important matters that should be brought before this house. I drew attention to the need for more housing space, the necessity for the rehabilitation of disabled persons, the high accident rate in this country; these are things that should be discussed when national health matters are being considered.

There are no statistics available with regard to the rehabilitation of disabled persons, but we can take into consideration tubercular cases released from sanitaria, cardiac or heart cases, the blind and the enormous number of those mentally afflicted, and those who have been physically handicapped by accident or disease. Many of these people are invalids who require care and support, and in spite of the progress we have made in finding new ways to rehabilitate those who are handicapped, they still pose a problem. We still have many obstacles to overcome and there is still much to do.

We do not feel that the situation is entirely hopeless because new weapons are now available in the fight against disease and suffering and we have every reason to believe that national health can be raised to a level higher than that which exists at the present time. If each province and the dominion take the proper steps to put into force and use the new knowledge acquired from research in the last twenty years, the condition in so far as this country is concerned will be corrected. But it will require sound planning, it will require adequate financial support, it will require courageous leadership, and it will require above all the active application of the products of research. There is no doubt that there has been marked improvement in the health of this country. As each province has control of its own health matters we should congratulate the leaders of those provinces upon the splendid improvement that has been brought about in recent years.

As I have pointed out several times, there are two matters which should be kept constantly before us in the consideration of health matters. The first is the necessity of opportunity for treatment and the second is the urgent necessity of applying the results of research, whether in the matter of treatment, hospitalization or prevention. The opportunity to procure treatment in the early stages of a disease is most important. Hospitalization is often beyond the means of a large part of our population.

The cost of hospital accommodation has increased greatly in the last three or four years, although there were signs of increased cost during the war. There has been an increased tendency for people to seek hospital treatment. This is a most expensive item in the budget of every family. There is a reason for this in the fact that it is difficult to obtain help or nursing services in the home. Any one of us can picture the financial blow it is to one of moderate means when faced with a large bill for hospital treatment and accommodation.

This sort of treatment is more expensive for certain types of disease and the facilities for hospital treatment that we have are inadequate to cope with the emergency which exists at the present time. Hospital accommodation is particularly inadequate in the case of mental diseases, tuberculosis and incurables. At the present time many incurables are occupying beds in public wards of hospitals. It is true that they are receiving care and treatment, but our hospitals are short of accommodation and these people are occupying beds which are urgently needed for acute cases.

While the results of research in the last decade have accomplished wonderful things it should be pointed out that some of the newer types of treatment are very expensive, but even though that may be, it is highly necessary that all our people have the advantage of the new products of research. The new product cortisone for the treatment of arthritis, a disease which has been referred to in this house many times and we are watching with interest the clinical results of the administration of this drug. We hope that this will prove the answer to arthritis which has baffled our research workers and which leaves behind a trail of suffering and chronic invalidism.

There are four objectives we should keep in mind. First, the control of infections; second, health education; third, sanitation; and, fourth, preventive services. In the past those four objectives have produced marvellous results and in order to obtain the best results we should see that those objectives have been attained in every section of our country. In the last four years remarkable progress has been made in health education and it is important in carrying out any scheme for the betterment of health conditions in Canada that our population should be educated, not only in the prevention of disease but on how to take full advantage of early diagnostic measures which may be available to them.

Take cancer as an example. Early signs and symptoms of this disease may often give warning to a patient who has read about it or who has attended lectures and knows something of the symptoms. If he feels that something is wrong he should have an opportunity to attend some clinic or see his own physician and have a proper diagnosis made. Warnings may be noted by a patient at an early date but if they are neglected it means a great deal in the further treatment of the disease.

Voluntary agencies are doing a splendid work in health education. At the present time the Kinsmen are putting on a mass X-ray program in Ottawa and free X-rays are available to the citizens for the diagnosis of tuberculosis. Even though only a few cases of tuberculosis are found, a great work will have been done. These people will be able to seek early treatment, and if they are infectious they will be removed from the population thus hindering further infection by this terrible disease. There may be some variation in the statistics for various parts of the city as to those who are infected, but in so far as the final result is concerned the importance of getting the patient under early treatment in the first stages of the disease cannot be overestimated. I congratulate the Kinsmen or any other service club working in this field.

Poliomyelitis or infantile paralysis is still a problem for research work. We sincerely hope that research in poliomyelitis will advance to the point where we can get control of this terrible, crippling disease. In providing free hospitalization for sufferers from poliomyelitis, my own province of Ontario has been a pioneer in this work. Many of those who might otherwise have been crippled are able to make a complete recovery owing to hospitalization with physiotherapy and other measures which are used by way of treatment to prevent crippling. It saves a great many of these young people from being permanently crippled.

Over the years it is certainly true that wars have stimulated research, and the means by which lives can be saved have been developed in that time of stress. We have found out a great deal about the treatment of disease, surgery and preventive measures. Even if we had the assurance that there would be no more war, we should intensify our efforts to destroy disease and suffering. I should like to think that some time in the future a healthy world may mean a peaceful world. It is essential that health in our dominion be deemed as important in peace as in wartime.

I cannot discuss these matters without bringing to the attention of hon. members again the increasing number of admissions to mental hospitals. I talked about this matter at the time the other resolution was before the house. I cited statistics and proved to the house that our mental population was increasing faster than our general population. It is most unfortunate that in all the provinces of Canada there is a marked shortage of beds for mental cases. It is a curious fact that mental diseases which cause so much suffering and confusion have received so little attention from preventive medicine until the last few years. Psychiatry is now taking its proper place, and there has been much added to our knowledge and treatment of these diseases. We are now able to provide intensive treatment with excellent results. It is not my purpose to discuss this at this time because it has previously been debated in the house, but there was a time in the treatment of mental disease when all the treatment amounted to was custodial care.

There will always be huge problems to be solved in the field of national health, and as present problems are solved others will arise to take their place. We must be ready to meet any change in situation and to keep pace with the times. We must face the matter realistically day by day, and we must have courage and determination to build for the future in the interests of the people of Canada.

I now come to the question of the administration of the health grants. These were introduced on the 14th of May, 1948, by the former prime minister of this country. I again take issue with the Minister of National Health and Welfare, as I did last year, regarding the manner in which publicity is given to the press and over the radio in connection with these grants, and particularly those to hospitals. Hospitals are now in a serious financial plight, and added to the troubles which they already bear is the serious and alarming shortage of beds. I again point out to the minister that health is primarily a matter within the jurisdiction of the provinces. Over the years it must be admitted that the provinces have done marvellous work in the field of public health, which was mainly accomplished by their own initiative and with their own resources. In the accomplishment of their great work they have done little or no advertising. The work was performed quietly. They felt that the work in the provincial field performed by the departments of health of the various provinces was the job they should be doing.

There are many other agencies which are also responsible for the achievements which have been made up to this time. Certainly not all of the progress made to date has been due to the Department of National Health and Welfare. I again point out to the minister that advertising, no matter in what form it is displayed, has not been part of the traditions of the medical profession, or of any other agency interested in healing. Nurses, physicians and surgeons, hospital executives, and voluntary agencies have toiled over the years in the interests of the people for the elimination of misery and suffering. The minister is learned in another profession, but he has never been schooled in the centuries old traditions of the medical profession and those who have been associated with the science of healing.

I may say, Mr. Chairman, that it is becoming distasteful to read and to listen to the publicity given his department which is flaunted before the public as if health departments and health grants had never before existed. I give you an example of this type of publicity. The Globe and Mail of December 1, and I may say most of the other daily papers, but I specially mention this one, carries an article with the headline:

Ottawa grant $560,000, Martin praises hospital.

The Sick Children's Hospital of Toronto is a wonderful institution, and throughout the years has been doing marvellous work in the care of crippled children and those ill from other diseases. There are many people, not only in Toronto and the province of Ontario but also in the whole Dominion of Canada, who are grateful for what has been done for their children by the Toronto Hospital for Sick Children. It has been supported by the city of Toronto and the province of Ontario, and by donations from people throughout the province and the Dominion of Canada who are aware of the great work being done by the institution. They are aware of the wonderful work that has been accomplished in dealing with children, and we are all sympathetic with it.

I understand the cost of the extra accommodation required at the present time will be $12 million. The province of Ontario has made a grant of $2 million. The city of Toronto has made a grant of $1 million, and the Department of National Health and Welfare has made a grant of $560,000. There is a demand, not only in Toronto and Ontario but throughout the whole country, to provide further accommodation. No doubt such accommodation is going to cost a great deal of money. I cited the fact that it will cost about $12 million, but any person reading the headlines which have appeared in the press lately would be led to believe that it was a project of the federal government and of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

It would seem that every grant made by the department for hospital construction is the occasion for a rash of publicity in the press and over the radio. I congratulate the minister on backing up the financial appeal in connection with this hospital. I think it is a very worthy object; but on the other hand I think I have read or heard of every grant given under his administration, either over the radio or in the press. Evidently the minister does not believe in the old scriptural adage of hiding his light under a bushel.

I have not seen any references to the grants given for hospital construction by the province of Ontario, though those grants were in existence before May 15, 1948, when the federal grants were brought in, and are larger than the grants given by this government. While I am speaking on these grants I want to quote from page 6179 of Hansard for June 30, 1948, where the minister was being questioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green):

Mr. Green: May I ask a question? Who is to make the decision about where the help is to be given? Is the dominion taking that responsibility?

Mr. Martin: Oh, no . . .

Mr. Stephenson: As I understand it, the grant will be made by the dominion to the provinces as a lump sum. A municipality desiring assistance will have to make application to the provincial government. The federal government does not intend to allocate any moneys to any particular hospitals.' That will be decided by the province. Is that right? In other words, where a particular municipality is asking for some assistance for a particular hospital—

Then the minister interjected:

Mr. Martin: They should write to the provincial government.

Mr. Stephenson: —the minister's position is that they should write to the provincial government?

Mr. Martin: That is right.

It has become very tiresome to hear all this fanfare and publicity every time a grant is made. It would seem the minister has some desire to emulate Little Jack Horner in the children's story, because every time he sticks in his thumb and pulls out a plum he addresses the public and says, "What a good boy am I! Look what I have done!"

When I come to the question of a health policy for Canada, this is part and parcel of the policy of every political party in this house. We may not have the same ideas as to how we are to accomplish it, but we are all striving toward and looking forward to the same objective. The cost of hospitalization is high at the present time, and is becoming very difficult for people to pay. Anyone who has had experience in these matters knows how difficult it is to get a hospital bed even in the city of Ottawa; and this condition exists right across the country. Over the last week end I tried to get a patient into hospital, and I was told that the place was simply jammed and there was no accommodation whatever. It is a serious situation, sir, when a person who is ill and requires hospitalization and treatment is unable to obtain a bed in a hospital.

I mentioned the cost a moment ago. It is becoming beyond the means of the average person to pay for hospital care in a public ward, let alone a private room. Take a man in ordinary circumstances, living on his salary and owning his home. If he is faced with the cost of lengthy hospitalization for some member of his family he will probably end up with a mortgage on his house to pay the cost, and will have suffered a financial blow from which he may never recover. It is becoming more and more necessary that we take some forward step to implement some kind of plan that will give relief in this direction.

On political platforms during the last election campaign we heard a great deal about a health plan. We even heard the blame for the absence of that health plan laid on the doorstep of certain provinces. Not only during the period before June 27, but also in the Leeds by-election contest between the Progressive Conservatives and the Toronto Star this was brought prominently to the attention of the people by members of the Liberal party in this house. They were told that the failure of certain provinces to reach an agreement was the reason for the lack of any such plan.

In dealing with this matter of a health plan I liken the minister to an old-time practitioner who has been called in to treat a patient. After he has treated him for some time the family become anxious, because he does not admit that the disease is new to him. So he says, "Well, just keep on giving him doses of my special soothing syrup at regular intervals, and some time within the next three or four years I may find a cure." It is part of the policy of this party to initiate a health plan for the people of this country. It is all very well to keep stating that a health plan is part of the policy of this government, but I point out to the minister that the very things we hope to eliminate by the introduction of such a plan are in existence at the present time. There is no holiday, Mr. Chairman, from misery and suffering.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I am sure we have all listened with keen interest, as we always do, to the remarks of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair). He always brings to the debate, on health matters particularly, the experience he has gained as a medical doctor and also a very obvious interest in the welfare of our people.

We are glad to note that the estimates of the department for this year, which are now before us, are up by some $19,402,227 to a new high of $396,348,311. I suppose some will say it is an old cry on the part of some of us, but I still think it is basically true that if this amount of money indicates the proportion of our national wealth that we are prepared to spend on the work of this department, we have not yet become sufficiently health and welfare conscious in this country. I realize that this is not the grand total. In fact I read with interest some weeks ago the report of a speech by the minister in New York, I believe, in which he made the statement that we were now spending in Canada close to a billion dollars a year on health and welfare. I was interested in where he got that figure, in view of the fact that the total for his department is less than $400 million; but on more closely reading the report of his speech I gathered that he had in mind the amounts spent at all levels of government, and perhaps amounts spent privately as well.

Basically the problem in connection with health and welfare is a financial one, to put it in the terms we understand most readily; but the problem is even more basic than that. The fundamental question is, do we value the health and security of our 13 million Canadian people sufficiently to plan the use of all our resources so that a sufficient portion will be set aside to take care of all our needs in the field of health and welfare. The present minister should, and I hope he will, do his share of fighting within the cabinet of which he is a member for an ever larger proportion of the national income for this purpose. If before I am through I say some things that are a bit critical, I hope he will realize that we on this side of the house are trying to be helpful, and that we are backing him up in his claim that more of the wealth produced in this country should be diverted to improving the health and security of our people.

In connection with the whole question of health, we welcome every little step forward. I am sure that the minister will recall the enthusiasm with which this group greeted the announcement of the Prime Minister in May, 1948, even though we knew at the time it failed to go as far as had been indicated in the previous pronouncements of the party. Nevertheless, I feel that I must say again that, in our view, the steps that have been taken with regard to health are just a beginning. In fact, they must be criticized as woefully inadequate.

As I see it, there are three things that the people of our country need before we can say that we are diverting a sufficient proportion of the wealth we produce to the care of our health. First of all, there must be the necessary personnel and equipment. There must be the doctors, nurses, dentists, technicians and all the people who work in the health field. Along with those people, there must be a sufficiency of hospitals, clinics and laboratories, to which patients may go and in which research work may be undertaken. Until we have a sufficient supply of personnel and equipment to take care of the health needs of our people, there is no room for the boasting that has been so aptly characterized by the member for Lanark (Mr. Blair).

As I see it, in addition to having doctors, hospitals and facilities, there must be ways and means to enable our people to get the medical services they require. In other words, it is no use having the best trained doctors or the best equipped hospitals, if our people cannot afford to go to them. That means we must make some real strides in the field of health insurance. I shall not go into too much detail on that subject at this moment, because there is an item for health insurance studies, and when we reach it I should like to ask the minister some questions. I am afraid they are the same questions that have been asked from this corner for many years. I hope, however, we shall receive more satisfactory answers this year than we have had in the past.

The whole point of health insurance is to make it possible for our people to be in a position where they can afford the services that should be provided. The idea of health insurance is to spread the costs around. No one in this chamber tonight, and the same is true of any collection of people of this number, knows which of us will need hospital or medical care within the next few months or next year. It is a certainty that a percentage of us will need it. It so often happens that the need hits those who can least afford to pay for it, and vice versa. Surely, it is the civilized, common-sense thing to do, to plan the provision of medical and hospital care on some over-all basis, so that we shall be able to avail ourselves of those services.

I feel that both of those requisites I have discussed so far, the provision of personnel and equipment, and health insurance to enable our people to pay for the services that should be available, are of extreme importance. I am not satisfied, and I think that is the view of all Canadians, not just the view of a person in political opposition, with the pace of the progress we are making. The member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) has had something to say about hospital construction, and the shortcomings there are in that phase of the matter. I have already indicated that the answers we have received in the past with respect to health insurance suggest that progress in that field is particularly slow.

In addition to having personnel and equipment, and having health insurance to enable our people to pay for medical and hospital services, it is also the case that a large section of our people need to have sickness benefits. By "sickness benefits" I do not mean merely insurance to enable the people to pay hospital and doctor's bills, but a benefit to take the place of the pay envelope which so often stops in time of illness. I know that there are people in our country, no doubt some of them in this chamber, to whom this whole idea of the community concerning itself in the health and welfare of all, this whole idea of social security, is somewhat repugnant. The plain fact of the matter is that in our modern, highly complex industrial economy, no man liveth unto himself; no one is able to provide for all the things that can happen to him beyond his own control. It has become true that we stand or fall together. The sooner we move forward along the line of these common-sense ideas in the field of health, which I have tried to outline, the better it will be for all concerned, and for the nation as a whole. I feel very strongly that that is the position that should be taken by this government in the field of health; that we should get all we can in the field of personnel and equipment, that we should get health insurance on the statute books of this country without delay, and that there should be sickness benefits for our people in time of illness.

When I mention the latter subject, it does go further. It calls for an over-all social security program, towards which we must move as rapidly as we can. For the moment,

I was trying to relate it particularly to the whole question of health. As I have indicated, however, this whole question does go over into the field of social security which falls within the jurisdiction of the same minister. Once more, I feel that it is not just a matter of something someone says because he is in political opposition, but it is a plain statement of fact that our people are not satisfied with the snail's progress that is being made in the field of social security, particularly with respect to old age pensions. In that connection, Mr. Chairman, while the question of old age pensions is a many-sided one, including such aspects as the amount of the pension, the age of the recipient and the means test, I should like to concentrate a few moments of my time tonight on the means test. It seems to me that there is no excuse for going any further in the life of this parliament without that old age pension means test being removed. Oh, I know there was a time when it was thought to be a perfectly proper part of the old age pension legislation. But that day disappeared at least five or six years ago. As the hon. member for Lanark has said, we have reached the point where all political parties in this house advocate the removal of the means test from the old age pension. Not only is it the case that all political parties advocate it, but from my contacts with people back in the constituency and in the city from which I come, and from the number of letters that I am receiving on the subject, I am convinced that the means test is now the most obnoxious feature of the old age pension as it stands.

Mr. Martin: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I have a duty in conducting these estimates through the committee. I do not want to interfere with the generality of the hon. member's discussion, but I suggest to him that we are now on the general item. There are specific items covering the matters with which he is now dealing. I do not rise to suggest that he should not go on, but I rise to point out that, inasmuch as the hon. gentleman himself is familiar with the rules and practices of the house, it might be better for him to wait until we reach the specific item that he wishes to discuss. What the hon. gentleman has said thus far has been fairly general but I suggest that, as to the particular item he is now on, we could deal more specifically with it when we come to the specific item which will be reached in due course.

Mr. Knowles: I am not quite sure whether the minister is raising a point of order or whether he is just making a suggestion.

Mr. Martin: I am just making a suggestion. I do not think I need to raise it as a point of order. I just make the suggestion. I am sure it will commend itself to the hon. member because there is no man who knows the rules better than he does.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to me that the minister's objection could hardly be raised as a point of order. After all, the item before us is the general administration of the whole department; it is not the general administration of the health branch or of the welfare branch. There are those items in the estimates as well. No objection was taken to my good friend the hon. member from Lanark making a general speech but nevertheless one in which he mentioned specific things such as the health grants and so on. It would seem to me that it might be better if we went on.

Mr. Martin: We shall have two debates; that is all.

The Chairman: I think we should avoid the duplication of debates. We should not have two or three speeches on the same thing. In order to avoid that, it would be better to wait.

Mr. MacInnis: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, we are discussing now the administration not of the health branch or of the welfare branch but of the Department of National Health and Welfare. The matter of old age pensions is a part of welfare. If you are going to rule out welfare, the next person who gets up and talks about health will have to be ruled out too; because on the basis on which you rule one out, you must rule the other out also. It is not a question of whether there is going to be one debate, two debates or three debates. It is a question of whether on this item you are going to allow such a debate on this subject as we have had on all other items, that is, covering the whole department.

Mr. Knowles: In addition to what has been said by my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the practice of the house is fairly well established that on the first item of a department a general discussion is permitted. I would remind you, sir, that when we were on the estimates of the Department of National Defence we carried that general practice to quite an extreme. The first item in that department was a specific one, No. 239, grants to military associations, etc.; but because it was the first item there was no question, and we had a discussion on national defence that ranged all over the world. I would think that it might actually facilitate discussion here to follow the same practice.

The Chairman: I did not make any ruling. There is no point of order before me.

Mr. Knowles: That is fine. Then let me carry on.

Mr. Martin: But I suggest that the hon. member bear the suggestion in mind.

Mr. Knowles: I might have been through if you had not interrupted.

What I was saying, Mr. Chairman, was that in the remarks I want to make now with respect to old age pensions I am concentrating on one phase of the subject. I feel that the amount should be higher. I feel that the age limit should be brought down. But at the moment I think that, to our Canadian people, the most obnoxious feature of the Old Age Pensions Act is the means test. I think that one of the reasons it is particularly obnoxious is what was done in the session just before the election. You will remember that at that time the amount of the pension was increased, and that move was most acceptable; but the ceiling on the total income that pensioners could have was left where it was. That had the effect of actually reducing the amount of other income that pensioners can have before their pensions are reduced.

For example, it used to be that a single person could have $20 a month other income before his pension was reduced. Now a single person can have only $10 a month other income before his pension is cut down. It used to be that a married couple could have $30 a month between them by way of other income before they suffered a reduction in the amount of their pension. Now a married couple can have only $10 a month other income, or $5 each, before the amount of their pension is reduced. I think the minister will have to face the fact that it is largely because that amount of other income was narrowed as it was that people have become more incensed than ever over the means test. The fact is that a great many more persons than formerly now feel the effect of the means test and it comes fairly hard.

In addition to that, the cost of living has continued to rise and our older people have found it even more difficult to live as the months have come and gone. They are now finding that it costs them more to rent quarters in which to live, and all of these things have added to the burden on our old people. While, with thousands of them, the real issue is a larger pension, still it is also true that with a great many thousands the means test is the issue, and it is the feature that seems so particularly mean. Even if they are suffering as a result of it, people try to understand the government's not being able to raise the pension to a higher amount. But they simply cannot understand the meanness of the means test which places a penalty on people for such thrift as they have been able to exercise. In addition to that, there has been brought to our attention in recent months the collective bargaining for pension rights that has gone on particularly in the United States where some firms have granted pensions to their employees as part of what they are working for. But in those cases the pension is related to the old age pension or the social security benefit provided in the United States. For example, some of the companies there have now provided that their employees will get, when they retire, a total pension of $100 a month. But it is understood that that pension is made up of what they get from their government social security plus an amount from the company to bring it up to $100 a month. Trade union workers in this country know that there is no point in their trying to get that kind of an arrangement here because if they did get a decent pension out of their employers, the means test would prevent them from getting the old age pension on top of it.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Does he not know that, in the pulp and paper industry of this country, at the age of sixty-five years all employees of a given number of years' service receive exactly that sum of $100 a month—and that is in Canada, let alone the United States.

Mr. Knowles: I know that; and in addition to that there are a number of other employees who get reasonable pensions from the industries for which they work. But their total number in relation to the industrial population as a whole is a very small percentage.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I can give the number. There are 1,500,000 workers in the Dominion of Canada who are subject to pension privileges from industry in Canada.

Mr. Knowles: I did not bring my figures on this phase of the matter with me tonight, because I have put them on Hansard before.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You did not need to; I just gave them to you.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member is now indicating the number of people who are contributing to pension plans at the present time?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Yes.

Mr. Knowles: I question his figure, and in addition I would point out that he does not say—no doubt he does not know, because it would be hard to find out—the extent to which this pension plan to which they are contributing will be adequate for those people when they reach retirement age.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You mentioned $100 a month; that was the reason I interrupted.

Mr. Knowles: Granted. But my point is that such plans in the industrial field as are not adequate simply deny to these people the chance to get the old age pension, because of the means test.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Agreed; I do not argue about that.

Mr. Knowles: We are on the same tack, then. For example, there are today in the constituency I represent a great many retired railway workers who receive small pensions from the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National. In hundreds of cases their pensions are just enough to keep them from getting the old age pension. They see that other people who did not contribute to a pension plan are able, because they have nothing, to get the old age pension. These people who are receiving the pension to which they have contributed do not object to the other fellow, who needs it, getting it—not by a long shot. But they do feel that, since they have helped to build up the wealth of this country, and have paid taxes and the like, they should have the same privilege.

I urge upon the minister therefore that this is an extremely important issue which must be settled without further delay. During the election campaign of last May and June, to which reference is often made when debate in the house gets a bit warm, a great many members said they would fight for the elimination of the means test. I heard many Liberal candidates in my province say that that was one of the things they wanted to fight for—that the means test must go.

I have here an advertisement which appeared in the Vancouver News-Herald of June 13, 1949, advertising the candidacy of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. It says:

> I will fight for a contributory retirement pension plan for all persons over sixty-five as a right. Pending the establishment of the foregoing act, I will fight for old age pensions to be paid to men of sixty-five and women of sixty without a means test, the pension to be large enough to ensure an adequate standard of living.

That is typical of the sort of thing that private Liberal candidates said throughout the country. What have they done about it since they came here? I want to be fair and say that you could not find a clear-cut promise like that in the official advertisements of the Liberal party which came from head office. The official advertising talked of what the party had done in the past. But the local candidates in the individual constituencies knew the score, and they made promises of this kind.

My hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party made the same sort of statements, and so did Social Credit candidates. Certainly it has been our position in the C.C.F. for a long time. Well, what are we waiting for? It is unanimous. We all say that the means test is particularly iniquitous and that it should go. All right, let's get rid of it now.

I hope the Minister of National Health and Welfare in replying to this will not simply say, as he has said so often and so nicely in the past, that this still remains one of the objectives of government policy. We have had answers something like that ever since the failure of the dominion-provincial conference of 1945-46. The minister knows that one of the green book proposals at that time was that old age pensions should be raised from what they then were to $30 a month, and that it should be paid to all Canadians seventy years of age and over, without the means test. In addition to that it was to be paid 100 per cent by the federal government.

I suppose one can give a little credit to the federal government and say that they are now paying $30 of the $40 pension to those who are drawing it in full. But by keeping the means test on many people do not get it in full. And it must be remembered that the cost of living has gone up a great deal since that proposal was made in August of 1945. That was a very commendable proposal; it brought hope to the hearts of many people. I would remind hon. members of the time it was made—two months after an election. The election was in June 1945, and in August, with the next election four years away, the government made the very interesting and worth-while proposal that the old age pension, so far as those seventy years of age and over were concerned, should be paid 100 per cent by the federal government, and without the means test.

We have reminded the minister of that proposal every chance we have had since that time; but the best we have been able to get from the minister, with his big broad smile, is that it still remains an objective of government policy. Well, let us not have any more of that this time. Let us not be told again that this change hinges upon a dominion-provincial conference and negotiations.

I am afraid that if we are not able, by hammering away, to get something done at this session or the next session, and if the government can get away without doing it now, what will happen is that in the next election we shall have the issue of dominion-provincial relations out on the hustings, with some provinces being blamed for the government's not going ahead with its promise of 1949 or its promise of 1945.

Let the Minister of National Health and Welfare tonight, when he talks about this question, face the fact that, so far as the members of the House of Commons are concerned, we are unanimous. We want the means test done away with. We represent in that demand the views of our Canadian people from coast to coast. Let the minister not hedge about it; let him not be an artful dodger, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce called someone last night. Let us not have the statement that it is the objective of the government. Just let him tell us when it will be done, and nothing will have such complete and unanimous support from the House of Commons as the announcement I hope the minister will soon make, that the means test is to go.

Mr. Beyerstein: Mr. Chairman, in looking over these estimates for the Department of National Health and Welfare it is obvious that provision has been made for almost everything except some allowance for incurables. I would remind the Minister of National Health and Welfare of the extreme necessity for some system of allowances for those unfortunate people who have lost their earning power through accident, through injury or through some incurable disease. Provision has been made to some extent for old age pensions and for family allowances. Grants are to be made to the Canadian Welfare Council, the Health League of Canada, the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, the Victorian Order of Nurses and several others which I shall not mention. These are all worthy causes that are entitled to grants, but I suggest that the cause of the incurables is just as worthy of consideration.

Many of these people are not entirely helpless and with a little assistance they could do much toward earning their own living. I have here the Montreal Standard of November 19, 1949, which has an article dealing with leathercraft for tubercular patients. It gives the details of one patient who has been taught to manufacture handbags, wallets, belts and other articles and is thus able to earn his own living. There is no reason why we should not give assistance to these people in that way. Alberta has taken the lead in providing training for the victims of poliomyelitis, but we should go further than that.

This is more than a provincial matter. The unfortunate victims of these diseases and accidents are Canadian citizens and it is the duty of the federal government to provide means whereby they can be rehabilitated to earn their own living, or to provide allowances so that they will not have to depend on others for assistance. I urge the government to bring in a plan whereby these unfortunate people can be cared for.

Mr. Croll: Mr. Chairman, I listened with close attention to the hon. member for Lanark who told us that the minister had his finger pretty well on the pulse of the people, and for a few minutes I should like to outline to the minister what I consider is in the minds of the people at the present time. I intend to devote myself entirely to the question of pensions and I assure you that I shall not speak again when the item covering pensions is being considered.

I want the minister to know that at least in my opinion the question of security pensions has become one of immediate importance on the domestic scene. Workers in this country are daily becoming more security-minded. They are thinking in terms of pensions, health insurance and retirement plans. I feel sure that they are prepared to let the state assume a greater responsibility for their lives, whatever risk that entails; I feel that the risk is negligible. I submit that the wider your social security, the more secure is your democracy.

In connection with old age pensions the people are particularly disturbed about the means test. They feel that under present circumstances the means test makes the old age pension a handout. It requires the recipient to acknowledge his poverty and is a throwback to the poor laws of the last century. One writer has described it as penalizing thrift, invading privacy, and socially objectionable. I believe the vast majority of the Canadian people are unalterably opposed to the means test, and I share that view with them. I take this opportunity to reiterate my opposition to it, an opposition which stems from my very inception into public life.

The people are interested not only in individual security; they are interested in collective security. There is a feeling which I share that industry has an obligation to take care of the depreciation of the human machine in the same way that it makes provision for the depreciation of the plant machine. United States industry has already committed itself to industrial and private pensions. Making due allowance for a time lag, the workers in this country are now entitled to and must get the same sort of security pension.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): And are getting it.

Mr. Croll: They are not getting it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): They are indeed.

Mr. Croll: They are getting pensions of a sort.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am sorry, I thought that was what you meant.

Mr. Croll: I should like to point out to the committee some of the statements that have been made by people who deal with pensions. According to the Toronto Star of September 30, 1949, George Burt, top man of the United Automobile Workers of Canada, said:

> Pensions are the number one issue on our program this year.

Then Pat Conroy, referring to pensions, said:

> This is a good start in laying the foundation for adequate social security for our workers. We have advised all our unions to include pension plans in their program this year.

Then George Burt made a further statement on September 14 that they were determined they would not accept anything less than the results of the negotiations in the United States.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is not a government pension.

Mr. Croll: I am leading up to that. I point out that it will be impossible to refuse a pension to a Ford worker in Windsor when a Ford worker in Detroit receives it. It will be impossible to refuse a pension to a General Motors worker in Oshawa, when a General Motors worker in Pontiac receives it. They are both doing the same work, under the same conditions, for the same company.

I am aware that our pension problem is constitutionally involved, and that is one reason why I am speaking out tonight. A dominion-provincial conference is to be held some time in January. Not only must matters of jurisdiction and constitution be studied and discussed, they must be resolved. Unless we are able by the next session of parliament to give guidance and leadership in the matter of pensions we shall leave ourselves open to piecemeal, hodgepodge, unsatisfactory systems which will cover this country like a crazy quilt. I point this out to the minister. Pensions in Canada today lack uniformity. In the future if they are hammered out by collective bargaining they will in some instances lack stability. They will have the tendency to create problems for us rather than solve them. In the end they may not even give the security that they set out to give. What I am saying to the government tonight is that they must give leadership in the pension field. The government must set the pattern for a basic adequate pension. I know it is a great responsibility, and it calls for leadership now.

It may be that some people in the country think that we have gone too fast and too far already with social security. I do not share that view, and I do not think there are many who think that we should not now have a contributory form of old age pension. I am not one of those who are particularly disturbed by what happened in New Zealand a few days ago. What is good will remain, and it is hard at this distance to diagnose exactly what did happen. Nor was I disturbed when South Africa changed governments and took on a fascist tinge. I am more impressed by, and I think I shall learn more lessons from, the referendum on old age pensions that took place in the state of California, and the direct vote on the welfare state which took place in the state of New York. Both of these are much closer to the thinking of our people. As to contributory old age pensions, private and industrial pensions and health insurance, we have not gone far enough nor have we gone fast enough. Certainly there is need for integrating and co-ordinating the various systems that now exist, and which must be augmented by contributory old age pensions. It is true I have always been a partisan with respect to social security. Nevertheless I emphasize and want to impress again upon the government the importance of deciding on an all-embracing social security program which will give broad leadership in the confused problem of pensions. If we do not give leadership, if we continue to bicker over constitutional rights, the workers will take the solving of the problem upon themselves, and will hammer out the very best deal they can make.

Every member of the house realizes that industrial pensions have burst suddenly upon the United States scene. We have got a little time, and we can use it by doing some hard and fruitful thinking. Are we to have a contributory old age pension immediately? Are we to have industrial pensions, at least where companies are subsidiaries of United States companies, on the same basis as they have them in the United States? If industrial pensions are to be supplemented pensions, as they are in the United States, then I ask: supplementary to what and at what age? We must realize that we really have not got a basic pension in Canada. We must do something to bring that about as quickly as we can. All I have to suggest is that between now and the time we meet again in two or three months the government should apply itself and do some hard thinking upon the very important problem with which we are now faced. We must find some solution for it; it must be solved in some way. We cannot just let it go along in any fashion at all, because we will find we will pay for it in years to come a price that we may well regret.

I repeat, my chief purpose is to point out that these are the two problems that require a solution as quickly as possible. I trust that whatever I have said will at least bring them to the forefront. I hope when we meet once again at the next session the government will have something to propose to us and to the people of the country in order to give them guidance and leadership on this most important social security program.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to speak tonight on old age pensions, and I only do so for a moment because I have another subject I wish to discuss with the minister. I point out to myself and to others some difficulties that must be in the government's way in bringing in an over-all plan covering contributory old age pensions for everybody without a means test. I know that actuaries can give an answer having regard to certain schemes which are in vogue in many industrial companies, and which are growing daily. The hon. member for Spadina referred to Detroit and Windsor, and as we know there is a controlled subsidiary carrying on in Windsor in the province of Ontario. We know that history proves that what is adopted in one place so far as industrial relations are concerned is surely adopted in the other, and today they are on practically an even basis in the matter of employee treatment.

I am not big enough or smart enough to tell the minister how to treat outstanding pensions in our railways, banks and industrial companies. The hon. member for Spadina will recall that the concession at Detroit was only made a very short time ago. In other words, he is also aware that, so far as labour is concerned, the question of remuneration has changed largely from one of wages to one of security. One need only take that great union, the United Mine Workers of America, which was perhaps in the forefront of the new labour effort. I am not deriding it at all. If one believes in collective bargaining one must believe that strong unions are entitled to bargain, and if they do not get assistance from governments they must use the only weapons they have. When I hear somebody has gone on strike I am not one of those people who immediately condemn them. I know they are using perhaps their only and certainly their best weapon to get what they think is their fair share from the earned industrial dollar. Together with the hon. member for Spadina I am and have for some time been in favour of a contributory pension which will look after not only organized labour but all our people, and particularly the white-collar workers who have no one to speak for them in this country because they are not organized.

You know, when John L. Lewis proposes something it is very easy to say, "Oh, that man again". Perhaps we use language a little more lurid than that; but if we are to be fair we must remember the condition of the miner in the United States and Canada before John L. Lewis rose to the top of that organization. To the shame of everyone, employer and public at large, those miners existed in a state which was disgraceful. Everything they got was obtained from the company store; they paid such prices as the company cared to charge; and until very recent years they lived in what were called company houses. I dislike lurid language, but they were practically wage slaves of the employers. Lewis now has a big head and thinks he runs the world, but I cannot help remembering the great advance in the comfort and incomes of the people who followed him.

I have already said I had no intention of speaking on the matter of pensions, but I do want to deal with one other subject, not in any super-critical fashion but in the hope that when the minister takes part in this debate he will deal with it at some length. I refer to the disease known as arthritis, on which I have had something to say every year since coming here in 1945. It may be that what I say tonight will be repetitive, though I hope not.

You can look at this matter in two harsh ways, if you like. The first is from the point of view of the time lost to the nation by people suffering from this illness. The figure given by the minister last session was 600,000 people suffering from that disease; I do not mean crippled, but suffering to the extent that they are unable to carry on their duties normally and earn a living, irrespective of the field of endeavour in which they were engaged. I assume that figure has increased since it was mentioned early last spring; but since that time I have had an experience which, if I were to consult only my own feelings, I should say I wish I had never undergone. Having interested myself in this matter I went to the town of Banff, where I went through a hospital. It was not a large institution; I would not think there were more than seventy to one hundred people in the whole place.

Mr. Martin: That would be Dr. Robinson's hospital?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Dr. Robinson and his two sons are operating that hospital, and the father was good enough to take me through. I might add that this was after the election in June. There I saw things that would wring the heart of anyone. I am not going to mention many of them, but I wonder how many hon. members have gone through an institution like that. You are introduced to a patient who may be in bed or sitting up or perhaps even walking. The first thing that would occur to any of us, having been introduced, would be to shake hands; but when I put out my hand to a dear old lady I found she could not shake hands with me. All she could do was put her fist in my hand. Both hands were so tightly closed with this terrible disease that they were simply fists, and of course immediately I saw the swelling in the knuckles and joints.

I will admit that I was rather taken aback. I had been talking about this illness in the House of Commons. I knew the odd friend who was suffering from it, and had sustained a considerable dose of it myself. Then I went on and Dr. Robinson took me to a verandah, where I saw a little girl six years of age with the most beautiful face I have ever seen. I do not think I am exaggerating in that statement, because we all know that suffering often creates beauty, particularly in children. There she was with both legs and both arms utterly useless, with no development whatever. That child was in a condition from which, of course, she could never recover, so great was the hold the disease had taken upon her.

Then I saw a boy, to whom I spoke for quite a while. He was seventeen years of age, and looked fine. He shook hands with me and seemed quite happy. I said to Dr. Robinson, "I thought these were all arthritics." He replied, "Just a moment," and pulled down the blanket. Then he said, "Look at that knee." That seventeen-year old boy had a knee as big as a child's soccer ball. By that time I was pretty well sunk; but the doctor said, "Would you feel it?" I thought that I was being a little forward, but the lad laughed and said, "I don't mind, Mr. Smith," so I took my fingers, as I had seen the doctor do, and rapped that knee as I am rapping the desk now. It was solid bone. That boy of seventeen years was crippled for life; there was nothing they could do with that leg except cut it off. There just was not and is not anything known to science which would be of any help to that young fellow.

Then I talked with the three doctors there. Since then I have talked with others, including my good friend from Lanark. As I understand it, the medical view is that we have advanced to the point where much can be done by way of special exercises and that sort of thing for people suffering from this disease but not completely crippled by it. But—and I make this statement with some timidity—as yet there is nothing known in the world about the cause. I know there is a kind which is not unusual; that is the traumatic type. Some of you who have played football may have a knee or some other joint which was injured, and an arthritic condition may immediately result. But as far as my inquiries have gone there just is not anything known about the origin of the rheumatoid kind, particularly where the disease is muscular. It appears to resemble rheumatism; that is where the phrase "rheumatoid arthritis" came from; but as yet we have found out practically nothing about it.

I am happy to learn that at an institution which I visited a little over a year ago some fine men have developed something which is called cortisone. It is developed in such minute quantities that it is not available as yet for the ordinary person, although I was happy to see in the newspaper the other day that these people were good enough to give Canadian research people some of it. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe our Canadian research people received a small portion of this drug in order that they might do some work on it. I believe it is derived from a gland in hogs, but you have to kill more hogs than can be killed in Chicago to get enough of this thing. The world is now searching, therefore, for something from which this drug might be produced synthetically.

Mr. Martin: Would the hon. member permit an interruption? This is an important matter, and I do not think I am over-exaggerating when I say that. I remember on one occasion I made a statement in this house, as a result of which many letters were received from many people who were suffering from this illness. As a result of that I thought that thereafter, whatever I would say about it, would be said only after the most careful consideration. There may be some people in this country who will form a judgment, from the last remark of the hon. member, that would not be justified under all the circumstances. I know he shares with me the desire to refrain from stating any more than the actual situation. I am not criticizing, but I felt if I did not say something now these remarks would be misconstrued and raise false hopes, at a time when I think the situation requires clarification. I propose to do that at the first opportunity.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I appreciate the interjection of the hon. minister, and I shall now try to see to it that nothing in my remarks will raise those false hopes.

I was just about to say that this drug is, in no sense as yet, a cure. The most that one can say about it is that it does give temporary relief. I believe that is what the minister had in mind. I believe a great deal more work has to be done upon it. It cannot be regarded as a cure, or even a palliative for general use. I believe, Mr. Minister, I have gone as far as anyone can go in endeavouring to protect you from what you might have feared.

Mr. Martin: I think your statement is extremely helpful.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Thank you. I mention that to show that successful work is being done, and I hope that some day there will be a corrective medicine for arthritics which will be what insulin has become for the diabetic. We well remember that insulin was not produced in a moment. It was produced after great study and research by Canadians working in the university of Toronto laboratories.

I turn now to this: Surely, there must be some way we can find the cause. It is not good enough to say that if you get this disease we can relieve those pains. I know a little bit about arthritic pain. The hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Robinson), if he were here and could rise on that arthritic knee of his, would agree with everything I have said up to the moment. I hope that when the minister takes up this subject he will devote some time to telling us what we in Canada are doing, not only in attempting to relieve a condition that is not permanent, but with respect to finding the cause. Mr. Chairman, the minister has nodded his head to indicate he is going to speak, so I shall conclude my remarks.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I thank the hon. gentleman. While I had intended to make a statement with regard to these matters at a later time, in view of the importance of this matter mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) I believe I should make that statement now so that his remarks will be associated with mine, having in mind the danger I mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Can I say anything more? I shall do so if you desire.

Mr. Martin: No; what the hon. gentleman said was very helpful. There is a tremendous amount of interest, not only in this country, but all over the world, in the discovery of cortisone. As my hon. friend will see, we in the department have shared that interest in this problem with the people, and with the medical profession generally.

During the past year, medical research scientists have discovered that two new drugs, ACTH and cortisone, seem to have extremely valuable results in the treatment of a number of diseases. It should be emphasized that the work that has been carried on now for some months is still in the experimental stage, and no final decisions have yet been reached on the full effects of these drugs, or of the illnesses and diseases for which they can effectively be used.

In April of this year, Dr. Philip Hench of Mayo clinic gave a public demonstration to medical scientists of the effects of the use of cortisone on arthritic patients. The results were almost miraculous, and because of this the drug cortisone has been associated popularly with arthritis. It should be emphasized, however, that this drug has not yet proved itself even for this single disease. It should also be emphasized that it seems to show promise for other diseases also.

I may say that I have had the advantage of personally talking—with Dr. Cameron, my deputy minister on the health side—with Dr. Hench and Dr. Kendall, both of whom must share the glory of what is undoubtedly a discovery of the first importance. It was shortly afterwards—after this research carried on by these two men—that the announcement was made about the drug ACTH, which seems to show similar promise, not only for arthritis but for other diseases. I must point out, and I say this with great emphasis, that both Dr. Kendall and Dr. Hench asked me whenever we made our statement—they asked the surgeon-general of the United States when he made his statement and the Merck Company, who will have something to do with it—to indicate that both ACTH and cortisone are in extremely short supply. At the present time the quantities available are not even sufficient for experimental purposes. There is no immediate prospect that the quantities that can be produced will exceed the needs of research workers, who are finding out the full effects of these drugs and subjecting them to prolonged tests. Both compounds are extremely difficult to produce. It has taken many years for research chemists to discover the various stages essential for their preparation. For example, the synthesis of cortisone requires several months and thirty-seven individual stages of preparation that can only be carried out by highly skilled steroid chemists.

The history of ACTH goes back to the early 1920's when Dr. P. E. Smith in the United States discovered the influence of the anterior pituitary gland on the adrenal cortex. In 1933 a Canadian scientist, Dr. J. B. Collip, now dean of the medical school at the university of Western Ontario, prepared a comparatively pure extract from anterior pituitaries which was capable of replacing the pituitary gland in its power of influencing the adrenal cortex. Among many other scientists active in the development of ACTH, another Canadian, Dr. C. N. H. Long, formerly of McGill university, worked with Sayers and White at Yale university in obtaining purified ACTH from sheep and swine anterior pituitary glands. This discovery was simultaneous with that made by Li and Evans at the university of California. In 1948, Dr. C. H. Li and Dr. H. M. Evans worked out an analysis of ACTH to show that it possibly could be produced synthetically.

ACTH can be produced from the pituitary glands of sheep, cattle and swine. Swine glands have been shown to be the most productive. Other sources are under investigation.

Preparations are now actively going forward in the Department of National Health and Welfare, in the food and drug division, to set up acceptable assay standards to check the potency of ACTH produced in Canada or imported into Canada.

The story of cortisone is similar to that of ACTH. It was in 1925 that Drs. Rogoff and Stewart of Harvard university showed that an extract of the adrenal cortex of animals would prolong the survival time of animals that had had their adrenal glands removed. In 1930 Hartman, formerly of the university of Toronto, and Brownell; and Swingle and Pfiffner independently discovered a method of extraction of the adrenal compound cortin which served as the basis for commercial production.

Because of what is undoubtedly going to be a matter of the greatest importance, in making this statement I wanted to put on record the participation of some of our own Canadian medical scientists. In 1934, the Connaught Laboratories of Toronto was one of the three laboratories that pioneered in the production of cortin which is used in the treatment of Addison's disease.

The story of the development of cortisone is long and involved. This can be understood when it is realized that cortisone is simply one out of twenty-eight different compounds that have been isolated from the adrenal cortex. Among the many scientists in the United States and Canada who contributed to the development of cortisone, the name of Dr. E. C. Kendall of the Mayo clinic is perhaps best known. I would want to say at once to him and to Dr. Hench that I am quite sure I speak for the Canadian people when I say that we have learned of the development of this story with the greatest interest, and our gratitude to them will of course know no bounds. We appreciate the great collaboration, the promise and the actual help that has been given in making certain guarantees that production, if and when that takes place, will be available to Canada.

Among Canadians who have made important contributions to the development of cortisone are Dr. R. D. H. Heard and Dr. J. S. L. Browne, both of McGill university; and also Dr. Hans Selye of the university of Montreal. The contribution made by these Canadian scientists to the development of cortisone is similar to that made in the development of ACTH by Dr. J. B. Collip, now head of the medical school at the university of Western Ontario, and Dr. James Campbell of the university of Toronto. Dr. L. I. Pugsley, chief of the food and drug laboratory in our own department, was coworker with Dr. Collip when he prepared a substance which was one of the steps towards the development of ACTH.

In the food and drug laboratory of the Department of National Health and Welfare, in addition to Dr. Pugsley there is Mr. W. D. Snair, who took his M.Sc. degree with Dr. James Campbell of the university of Toronto whom I have just mentioned. As a result, this department is now going forward actively with plans to establish assay techniques to check both cortisone and ACTH. There are a number of sources for cortisone, some well established, others in the experimental stage.

Now I simply want to say one or two further things in connection with this matter. On Monday last, Merck and Company Limited, with head offices in this country and in the United States, announced at Rahway, New Jersey, that it believes increased production of cortisone will enable it to supply various teaching medical centres with limited quantities for research purposes. The company has noted that cortisone shows promise of relief of certain types of arthritis, acute rheumatic fever and certain other diseases and that the compound will be available after January 1. I must clearly indicate the position, because already requests quite naturally are coming in from all over the country asking for some of this cortisone.

I can say nothing about the future, but at the present time what quantity will be available to us—and it will be made available to us after January 1—will be solely for experimental research purposes. But every effort that we know how to make is going to be made to see if there cannot be acceleration of the process of production and of research into further uses. We have established contacts with a number of medical men who are expert in this field and who have had contacts with Dr. Kendall and Dr. Hench and the scientific committee that has been established in the United States. I want to give to hon. gentlemen and to this country the assurance that no effort is going to be spared to do all that can possibly be done through this department, more particularly through Canada's research scientists on whom the development really rests. No effort will be spared. I hope perhaps before the end of next week to say something further in that connection but at this stage I feel that I should await the result of certain conferences that are taking place elsewhere before I make that announcement.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister one question in connection with that statement? Perhaps I should say: Is it fair to ask him if he could indicate any of the other diseases that it is thought that either of those drugs might help to cope with?

Mr. Martin: I could, but I do not think it is desirable.

Mr. Knowles: I will not press the question.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Before the hon. member speaks, may I suggest that we report progress because we have to present a committee report to the house, and I see it is nearly eleven o'clock.

Mr. Gillis: Then this item will stand?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Before that is done, on a question of privilege, may I call the attention of the hon. member for Calgary West to a report put out by the dominion bureau of statistics with regard to pension plans. I admit that the report is for the year 1947, but it is the latest one available. It was published only this year. It shows that the total number of employees in all industries covered by pension plans is 629,233. That is a far cry from the million and a half the hon. member mentioned a while ago. I thought that since I questioned his figure I should give him the source of my information.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On the question of privilege, if I am wrong I am sorry; but as a matter of fact the pulp and paper industry has come in since that time, and there are at least three or four hundred thousand engaged in that business. So it may be that when we get to 1949 I shall not be so far wrong.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Second report of the standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cleaver.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up as the first item of business the amendments to Bill No. 12, ot establish the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation; then we will take up Bill No. 215, to amend the Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act, 1947; Bill No. 219, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act; Bill No. 200, to amend the Customs Act. Then we will go into supply and call the estimates of the Department of Labour, reconstruction and supply, national revenue and mines and resources; and from eight to nine private bills.

Mr. Green: I would suggest to the minister that there should not be a sitting tomorrow night. We have had a very heavy week, sitting eight hours each day. After all, we are here to do the business of the country, and it is a difficult matter for the parties in opposition to do their work properly if the house is going to sit on Saturday evening. We have to have some time to prepare for the work which will come up.

I do suggest the house should not sit tomorrow night. I believe if that sitting is dispensed with we shall make better progress next week. We are all just as anxious to get home as are the members of the government; but the situation is that it is simply impossible to carry on efficiently under this pressure, unless some time is given to prepare the work.

Mr. Knowles: It is inhuman.

Mr. MacInnis: May I add my voice to that of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, and ask the minister to adjourn at six o'clock tomorrow night. I do not think he will make any more progress by keeping us here for the evening; because we are being worn ragged here twelve hours a day—and we have other work to look after as well. If the minister insists upon keeping us here I am afraid that in the temper we shall be in he will not make much progress. I would suggest therefore that, for harmony all round, we be allowed to have the night off.

Mr. Low: May I add my voice to the pleas which have been made to the house leader. I think that if we sit tomorrow until six o'clock we shall have done a pretty fair week's work; and I would ask that he be just a little sympathetic.

Mr. Knowles: The government should make it unanimous.

Mr. Gillis: The house leader might do this: There are the faithful fifty who spend every night here; why not get another shift from the crowd who are not here. Let them sit tomorrow night.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I shall certainly call the remarks of hon. members to the attention of the Prime Minister. When the motion was passed by the house it was understood that we would sit on Saturday nights. On the first Saturday we did not sit during the evening—

Mr. Knowles: That would be a precedent.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am not too sure about that. At all events I hope hon. members do not expect a definite answer tonight. At some time tomorrow I shall tell the house what the decision is.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, December 3, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

PORTRAYAL OF CRIMES—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCIAL ATTORNEYS GENERAL AND OTHERS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table correspondence between the provincial attorneys general and others, and myself as Minister of Justice, relating to Bill No. 10, dealing with crime comics.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES COMPENSATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR COMPENSATION IN ACCORDANCE WITH P.E.I. ACT

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Transport) moved the first reading of Bill No. 220 (from the Senate), to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTION AS TO SATURDAY EVENING SITTING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Can the Minister of Public Works or the Prime Minister give an answer now as to whether we sit tonight?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the answer to this question can be given by the Minister of Public Works or by the Prime Minister. A resolution having to do with sittings on Saturdays was adopted by this house, and to depart from the terms of that resolution would require the unanimous consent of the house, not merely the consent of the Minister of Public Works or of the Prime Minister.

I think hon. members feel that a great deal of public business has been transacted this week, in a manner that did not slight the consideration it was proper to give to that business. I am sure that hon. members are anxious to have due consideration given to the remaining public business, and that it be dealt with as expeditiously as may be consistent with their responsibility to see that it receives proper consideration.

I imagine that it will be much easier this afternoon for hon. members to give unanimous consent to adjournment at six o'clock if they feel at that time that the progress made during the week has been continued during the day. I suggest that a request for unanimous consent be made at six o'clock, and I hope that what will have been done in the course of the day will make everybody feel it is appropriate to give that unanimous consent.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to press the point, but I suggest it is desirable that hon. members know in advance if the house is not to sit this evening, so that they may make their arrangements accordingly. It should be remembered that members of parliament are human beings, with human associations and contacts. If we are not to sit tonight, a resolution to that effect could be adopted unanimously this morning. If we are to sit, it would be helpful to hon. members to know it now.

Mr. Knowles: Would it not also be fair to the staff that they should know now or not later than three o'clock whether or not we are to sit tonight?

Mr. Drew: If there is not to be a sitting tonight, the decision, if it is to be helpful to hon. members, should be made known this morning. Otherwise we might just as well sit tonight. The motion might well be put now.

Mr. MacInnis: I think we had better take the statement of the Prime Minister at its face value. I suggest to the leader of the opposition that he make his plans to go to a show tonight.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

IMMIGRATION—JAPANESE NATIONALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to ask the Secretary of State when I may expect a return to an order standing in my name which was passed on November 21, 1949.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I have made inquiries about the matter, and there is some delay in obtaining the information because of the absence of one of the officials of the department in connection with his duties. We shall have it for the hon. member as soon as possible.

DOUKHOBORS

UNLAWFUL ACTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—QUESTION AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think it is desirable I should make a statement with regard to the latest developments in the matter of the Doukhobor situation in British Columbia.

Following a further blasting of a section of the Canadian Pacific railway in west Kootenay, British Columbia, Commissioner S. T. Wood, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, received a telegram from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police officer in command in British Columbia relaying a request from Commissioner Shirras, British Columbia provincial police, for ten experienced investigators to proceed at once to assist his force in west Kootenay, as he considered the situation serious, and C.P.R. train crews have threatened to discontinue operating trains unless police protection is provided. Furthermore, a request from the provincial government for assistance to this force was to be made officially to me as Minister of Justice within the next day or so.

Commissioner Wood thereupon took the responsibility, in which he has my complete approval, of ordering ten experienced investigators from the prairies and from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police personnel in British Columbia to report without delay to the provincial commissioner at Nelson, B.C. The copy of the instructions of Commissioner Wood to the officer commanding in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police office in Vancouver is as follows:

> Officer commanding, R.C.M.P., Vancouver, B.C.—Retel second instant, officers commanding Edmonton, Regina and Winnipeg have been instructed to detail three experienced detachment men respectively to proceed at once to Nelson to operate under the commissioner of the British Columbia police in connection with Doukhobor depredations. They will advise you time of arrival. Please expedite official request from the British Columbia government to our minister for assistance of this force on the understanding that the British Columbia government will pay all expenses. You are to detail one experienced investigator to report to Nelson to British Columbia police.
> S. T. Wood

The significance of the stipulation that the British Columbia government should pay all expenses is not so much the amount of the money involved as the continued assertion upon our part of a disclaimer of responsibility. We have neither legal authority nor legal responsibility, and we wish, while extending the fullest possible co-operation, to have it remain clear that we are assuming no responsibility in a situation in which we have not been involved, even in the matter of extending co-operation, unless it has assumed critical proportions.

[Mr. Bradley.]

OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION ACT

CORPORATION TO TAKE OVER PROPERTY AND EQUIPMENT OF MARCONI AND CABLE AND WIRELESS LIMITED—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 12, respecting the Overseas Telecommunication Corporation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the Senate has passed Bill No. 12 with minor amendments which are purely drafting changes designed to improve the form of the bill. There is an amendment to section 3, subsection 6, substituting "board of directors" for "directors". An amendment to section 3, subsection 7, simply deletes "solemnly and sincerely" from the form of oath mentioned therein. An amendment to section 8, subsection 1(a), inserts the words "any or" before "all", in the interests of clarity. An amendment to section 14 rearranges and renumbers the subsections in the interests of conciseness. An amendment to section 18 substitutes the words "the corporation" for the word "it", in the interests of clarity.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

TAX AGREEMENTS

AMENDMENT OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL TAX RENTAL AGREEMENTS ACT, 1947—INCOME TAX

Hon. J. J. McCann (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 215, to amend the Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act, 1947.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

GOLD MINING

AMENDMENT OF ACT RESPECTING EMERGENCY PAYMENTS TO OPERATORS—PRODUCTION OF GOLD IN CONCENTRATES

Hon. Colin Gibson (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 219, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not set myself up as an expert on gold, but there are one or two aspects of this bill on which I wish to comment briefly.

In effect the bill proposes to continue the subsidizing by the federal treasury of certain gold mines. When the original act was introduced some months ago it received widespread support in the house. In some cases the support was reluctant, but most members agreed with it. The purpose of the original measure was definitely and clearly set out. I should like to quote from the report of the administration of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, published by the Department of Mines and Resources. On page 7 I find the following:

It was designed primarily to assist the high-cost or marginal mines to continue in operation . . .

I ask hon. members to note that it was designed to assist high-cost or marginal mines. I remember the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) speaking in the debate along the same lines. At page 2702 of Hansard of April 6, 1948, he said:

It—

The bonus.

—should enable many mines to avoid closing down . . .

That statement was certainly clear, and the objective of the legislation was specifically stated to be the subsidizing of low-grade mines.

I must say that with that objective I agreed in principle. I thought it was sound then, and I think it is sound today, for the government to give such aid to low-grade mines. But while we are looking at these amendments to the act I think we should analyse the effectiveness of the legislation to date. Have only low-grade mines been subsidized? On the surface at least it would appear that others received assistance also. From April of last year to August 31 of this year the taxpayers of Canada have subsidized the gold mines to the extent of about $12,500,000. A fair percentage of this money went to marginal mines, and with that no one will quarrel. United States dollars have been earned; men have been employed; communities have been helped. But at the same time, under this legislation several million dollars apparently have gone to mines that are anything but low-grade. Subsidies have been granted to companies that are among the wealthiest in this country. We find that money has been paid to some corporations which had substantial profits in the past year, and which have paid out dividends in some cases amounting to millions of dollars. When this legislation was passed originally I do not think most hon. members had any idea that this would happen; certainly I did not.

To give one or two illustrations, take McIntyre Porcupine Mines. On March 31 this company had net current assets of more than $21,600,000. In the last fiscal year it earned net profits of $2,425,000 and paid dividends of $2,405,000; yet the federal treasury gave it a subsidy of $386,000. In view of the robust financial position of this company, I ask the minister how he can justify the payment of such a huge subsidy from the federal treasury.

Then take Hollinger Consolidated Gold Mines. Its assets in the last fiscal year were $7,775,000; its net current assets were almost $2,800,000; it had a net profit of $1,110,000 and paid dividends of $1,109,000; yet the government subsidized it to the extent of $886,000. Dome Mines last year earned over $2,114,000, paid dividends of $1,947,000, had total assests of $16,735,000; yet the taxpayers of Canada subsidized it to the extent of $257,000. Teck-Hughes Gold Mines had net current assets of $1,232,000 and total assets of $9,000,000. Last year it paid out in dividends to its shareholders $721,000; yet it received subsidies amounting to $100,000.

I could go on and give numerous other examples. The point I wish to make is that under this legislation a good many needy gold mines have been assisted, but at the same time some extremely wealthy companies have been given subsidies which so far as I can see were not justified by their financial position. A good many companies which by no stretch of the imagination could be said to have needed that assistance were given it.

On September 19 of this year the government devalued the Canadian dollar. In effect that meant the price of gold went up from $35 to $38.50. Surely that was a final reason why the government should have immediately discontinued subsidies to these wealthy corporations. Certainly the companies themselves have been amazed at the generosity of the government, because according to newspaper reports they thought that when the dollar was devalued the assistance would either be decreased or cut out altogether. I believe they treat this subsidy as a sort of windfall, and are genuinely surprised that it has been continued.

My point is that special assistance to marginal gold mines in Canada is one thing, but assistance to wealthy corporations is quite another. I believe it should be discontinued. I find this policy of subsidizing these wealthy companies all the stranger in view of the past attitude of the government toward ordinary subsidies. I have sat in this house for some years now and have heard most of the cabinet ministers, not once but a dozen times, say they are opposed to the principle of peacetime subsidies. For instance, as far back as April 21, 1947 the former minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, said, as reported at page 2252 of Hansard:

> I think the general view of the government is that we should withdraw from subsidies as far as possible and as soon as possible . . .

There was the case of the milk subsidy, and we have seen the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and others consistently oppose housing subsidies. Time and again the government has opposed subsidies which might have brought down the cost of living. Therefore I find it strange that the bill now before us should propose to subsidize companies which, in my opinion at least, do not seem to need that assistance. I do not see any consistency in this kind of policy. I know some of my Liberal friends would resent it, and perhaps with justification, if I were to say this legislation was discriminatory, or that it was legislation for a privileged group; but if the bill passes in its present form, that is exactly what it will be.

I repeat that so far as this group is concerned we do not oppose subsidies to marginal mines. However, we likewise believe that subsidies to other than marginal mines should be immediately discontinued.

Mr. J. A. Bradette (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I cannot let the statements just made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) pass without saying a few words on this subject. It seems strange to me that the party to which the hon. member belongs should be at times unfair and antagonistic to gold mining. They do not seem to realize what it means to our whole Canadian economy, not only to northern Canada but to every province of the confederation. The gold mining industry of this country does not want any handout. The hon. member apparently has forgotten that the prices of all other metals, precious or otherwise, have gone up since the beginning of the war. He will not deny that the prices of nickel, copper, steel, lead, zinc, aluminum and all other metals have increased greatly, while the price of gold has been fixed by the United States treasury at $35 an ounce and has not been changed for a good many years. Apparently the hon. member has not read the explanatory note to this bill, from which I should like to read a few lines:

> The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act provides for payments to gold mines to assist them in defraying part of their post-war increase in cost of production during the designated years 1948, 1949 and 1950.

It is true that this legislation has helped the marginal mines, but it was also meant to help gold mining in general. Coming as I do from northern Ontario, I would not be in favour of subsidizing mines where the cost of production is too high, or in which the ore would not be exploitable or the ores of too low a grade. At the same time the hon. member cannot deny that the cost of producing gold, the same as any other metal, has increased by at least seventy-five per cent. The cost of labour has increased; the cost of material has gone up, but the price of gold has remained static. If today the mines were receiving $10 an ounce more for their gold, there would be no need for a measure of this kind.

I remember when the Canadian dollar was brought to par a few years ago. I received many telephone calls from companies in my district, for instance from the Spruce Falls newsprint mill at Kapuskasing, the Abitibi Pulp and Paper Company, and others, telling me that they were going to be hurt by that action. I said they would not, because the price of newsprint, of sulphite, of pulpwood and so on was flexible and was not fixed, while the price of gold was in an entirely different position.

I want to compliment this administration because they have understood the situation in connection with gold mining. Personally I am against subsidies, because I believe they camouflage both the real cost of living and the cost of production. But you could not call this a subsidy, because this situation has to be dealt with, and in a different manner from any other. The hon. member must realize that as far as gold mines are concerned the price of their product is strictly controlled, while the prices of all other products, such as milk, butter, steel, manufactured goods, or whatever you wish to name, have increased tremendously in the last few years.

Surely an industry that has given so much to the whole of our national life should be able to obtain some consideration from the government without unfair criticism. My hon. friend mentioned the dividends paid by the Hollinger mine. Does he realize that Hollinger is a low-grade mine? It is only because of the efficient management and working of this mine that they are able to pay these dividends. Has the hon. member taken the trouble to analyse what he calls the enormous profit of the Hollinger mine? Does he know the number of people who hold shares in this mine, and the heavy capital investments? Does he know that they are not paid a high rate of interest but a reasonable return on their investment?

The same thing applies to the McIntyre mine, which is only a few yards away from the Hollinger mine. It has higher grade ores than the average mine, therefore the dividends have been a little higher than those paid by Hollinger. Why take a national forum such as this to attempt to create the impression that this important industry has been exploiting the federal treasury? I do not believe that that is fair. It is not my duty to defend the gold mining industry, because it needs no defenders. As a member who has represented for nearly a quarter of a century this great section of the country called the Porcupine, I know whereof I speak, and I am aware of the great benefits that accrued from this industry to every section of our population.

I remember when the McIntyre mine had to buy c.o.d. their lumber and all other required material. As in any other mining venture, they had to take a chance and invest their money, and believe me, it has not always been a winning gamble. If they are receiving dividends today, I do not see why these sinister motives should be imputed to them. I am speaking about these things feelingly, because I believe all our people should have justice from the central administration. I am astonished to hear a statement of the kind made by a practical member such as the member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). A few years ago the same statement was repeated by a member in that group; he said that the gold mining industry was a sheltered industry. The gold mining industry is not sheltered, and does not want government protection; it only wants fair play.

I believe the passing of this bill is only fair play to the gold mining industry which means so much to the whole of our national economy. Its maintenance and future expansion will be important factors in Canada's prosperity.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I heartily support the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). He has firsthand information, and knows what he is talking about. During the depression there was no source of employment which could be compared with the gold mines in the north. I thank the hon. member for his statement.

Mr. H. A. Hosking (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, as one who spent ten years underground at these northern Ontario gold mines, I should like to ask the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) if he has any idea how long it takes before a mine is in a position to pay dividends. It is impossible for a mine to sink a shaft, drive drifts, put in the raises, or employ any number of men before a period of from three to five years. As this subsidy is given to encourage development, I should like to point out to the member from the west that this is commendable legislation. It will provide employment during the next three or four years, when no doubt employment will be scarce. It will have a beneficial effect on our national economy, and I think it would be a shortsighted policy if we were to do anything that would curtail this development and thus lower employment in this country.

We all know that during the depressed years the gold mines were the greatest source of employment. For any party to suggest that we should discontinue legislation which would create jobs in from three to five years is not sensible.

Mr. Thatcher: I am sure the hon. member did not hear me correctly. I did not suggest anything of the kind. I think this legislation for marginal mines should be kept on the statute book, but I do not believe—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Moose Jaw should be allowed to complete his statement.

Mr. Thatcher: The hon. member suggested that I wanted this legislation discontinued. That is not so. So far as the marginal mines are concerned, this group believes it is excellent legislation. The only thing to which we are objecting is that this aid is given to high-profit mines.

Mr. Maybank: Without closing the debate, I should like to point out that these amendments are made particularly to take care of clearly marginal cases which had not been dealt with in the first act. We believed it was the intention of the house to take care of those mines, and that is the purpose of these amendments.

Mr. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): I should like to say a few words on this measure, arising out of the remarks made by the member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). I am afraid the misconception has arisen because of the reference to marginal mines rather than to marginal ore. The real intent of the bill is to encourage the production of gold in Canada. No matter how economists may rank the place of gold on the world exchange, there can be no doubt of the great value of high gold production to Canada in our foreign exchange problem.

There are two ways in which we can expand our gold production: by giving incentive to the small mines, giving them financial backing which will enable them to do extra exploration work, or—a much quicker way—by giving assistance which will encourage the larger mines to mine marginal ore. I am referring to ore which these mines have blocked out underground, but the marketing of which at a profit is doubtful. That is one of the two functions of this gold mining assistance act. While these are called subsidies, they would be much better regarded as incentives towards production. They act as an incentive to the small mines to explore and find new ore bodies, and to the large mines to bring to the surface the marginal ores which they would otherwise by-pass and leave below ground for all time. The large mines would take out the ore on which they could make a profit, and by-pass these large blocks of low-grade ore.

The success of this policy is shown in a report which no doubt the hon. member has seen. A subsidy was paid on the production over two-thirds of the base year. Last year it was paid on ninety per cent of the gold production in Canada—that is, from the primary producers. If there had been no increase in production over the base year, that subsidy would have been paid only on thirty-three per cent of the gold produced in Canada.

The whole of the hard rock mining industry has welcomed this act; and even the base metals mines, although they do not share in the subsidy, have welcomed it. They say that anything which encourages the gold mining industry encourages all hard rock mining, because gold has always been the lure for prospectors.

I can speak with some measure of authority, because a month ago I attended a meeting of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, and there was widespread appreciation of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act and what it had accomplished in its primary purpose of increasing gold production in Canada.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): As I see it, the crux of this question is whether the government has a policy of subsidy for the gold mining industry alone, or whether the sentiments expressed by the parliamentary assistant express government policy as applied to all industries. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) made it quite clear that he was quite satisfied that the marginal mines or mines under development should be given assistance until production begins. The figures he put on the record, however, clearly indicate that a large percentage of the assistance has gone to corporations that did not need it.

My particular approach to this problem concerns the government policy of no subsidies. I believe the government has made its position in this regard quite clear. In 1945 a production subsidy of approximately $8 million per year was provided for the coal mining industry, and that also was an incentive bonus; it was for the purpose of increasing production. But in 1945 the then minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, made it quiet clear that as far as the government was concerned they were through with that type of subsidy; it was no longer their policy. Early in 1946 when a subsidy of approximately $5 million was necessary to avoid upheaval in the mining industry in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance in this house were answering those of us who were arguing for that amount of subsidy in order to avoid a strike in the industry and enable both producer and operator to get back to a peacetime economy, they said: Oh, no; that is against government policy. The result was that these subsidies were withdrawn at that time and we in Nova Scotia went through a five months' strike in the industry which cost the communities in and around the coal mines millions of dollars, and they have not got over it yet.

I was surprised, therefore, when a few days ago a bill introduced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce was passed which changes the subsidy policy to one of loan with regard to the coal industry. They say: No subsidy, but we will lend you money to develop; you pay that money back at a certain rate of interest. Certain stipulations are also made in that bill to see that the money is spent in such and such a way. If "lend" is the policy of the government with regard to the coal mines, and many of them are submarginal, and if "lend" is their policy in equipping them for increasing their production, why is that not the policy with regard to gold mining? Why should we have one mining industry in Canada receiving mother's allowance and another mining industry—which in my opinion is more essential to the economy of this country—denied that subsidy arrangement and put on a straight loan arrangement?

I am not arguing against that loan arrangement, because when people borrow money under a certain contract they will perhaps use it more carefully and get the greatest amount of good out of it. But you cannot have one policy for the gold mines in northern Ontario and another for the coal mines in eastern and western Canada. If there is any industry that would justify subsidies, it is the coal mining industry. You are not importing from the United States $200 million worth of gold a year, but you are importing that amount of coal each year from the United States to Canada. If we in this house were alive to our own interests we should be creating incentive bonuses for the purpose of developing our coal industry in order to avoid the terrific drain of United States dollars from this country.

I have all the sympathy in the world for the hon. member (Mr. Hosking) who said he worked underground. But I want to tell him this: I do not think any of this money will benefit the man who works underground in these gold mines in central Canada.

Mr. Bradette: Dont be too sure about that.

Mr. Gillis: I have been through that section of the country. It is the only industry in this country that has not a union contract with the members who work underground. Even the rudiments of democracy that are applied in every other basic industry in this country have been refused by the gold mining operators of central Canada. They are not concerned about the men who work underground.

Mr. Bradette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the operators of the mines are concerned about the workers who work in the gold mines in Canada.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) speaks with some knowledge of the gold mining industry. I wish he would give a little of it to the house once in a while rather than a straight relief plea for an industry that does not need it.

My objection is this, Mr. Speaker: If this government has a policy of no subsidies for any other industry in the country, it cannot justify the policy of subsidies for the gold mining industry.

Mr. Gillis: The wealthy ones.

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale): I should like, Mr. Speaker, to answer in part the argument we have just heard from the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). It appears to me that he has completely ignored an important point made by the hon. member for Cochrane, namely, that the price of gold has remained static. In the gold mining industry you have a special case in which, for special reasons, the government have determined that the price of the product will remain static; and in a world of increasing costs, they have decided to give assistance to it in order that it can produce the product that it is considered desirable for the country to have. As long as the hon. member for Cape Breton South ignores this point he will never be able to give a clear and fair presentation of the case to this house.

As to the coal mines and the importation of coal from the United States, surely the hon. member for Cape Breton South is aware of the fact that a large amount of the coal which is imported from the United States is anthracite, whereas the coal produced in his own constituency and thereabouts is bituminous, and in any event we are not in a position to compete with that imported coal.

I make these two points, Mr. Speaker, because I think that the hon. member for Cape Breton South, not deliberately but perhaps inadvertently, did not give a clear and fair presentation of the case to this house.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, while I possibly cannot speak with as much authority on the subject as can the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), I do know something about gold mining. I worked in the gold mines for a considerable number of years. I have had occasion to visit every nook and corner of the gold mines of northern Ontario. I am fairly well acquainted with the management and the representatives of the workers in those mines.

Like the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), I want to make it clear first of all that personally I am not opposed to this bill. We are not opposed to assisting mines whose ore is of such a low grade that without some government assistance it could possibly not be mined at a profit. I think we are as appreciative as is the hon. member for Cochrane of the importance of the gold mining industry to northern Ontario and to the towns and municipalities of that part of the province. I cannot find my heart bleeding over the need of Hollinger, Teck-Hughes, McIntyre and some of these other mines which consistently over the years have been able to pay dividends that total up to about $2 million a year, and often more. I feel that the shareholders of those mines have not done too badly for themselves, either in point of dividends or in point of the increased value of their stock. I can well recall when the stock of some of these mines which is selling at $20 a share today could be bought for less than a dollar. The shareholders who have been fortunate enough to hold the majority of the shares in these mines have not done too badly. I would say that by and large they have done much better than either the men who work underground in the mines or the municipalities in which the mines are situated.

If I were asking for a subsidy for the gold mining country, in addition to that which is paid to mines that actually need it in order to put them on a paying basis, it would not be for Hollinger, McIntyre or Teck-Hughes; it would be for the towns of Timmins and Kirkland Lake and the townships of Tisdale and

Teck. Over the years these townships and municipalities have contributed the services that the mines themselves would have had to provide if the townships did not provide them. These mines have been able to pay dividends to their shareholders because the taxpayers of the municipalities—

Mr. Hosking: May I ask a question?

Mr. Noseworthy: The hon. member may make a speech after I am through. The taxpayers of these municipalities have been providing educational facilities, fire protection, water, and all the facilities that go with municipal life, which these mines themselves would have to provide were they situated in unorganized territory. Over the years the government has profited by the fact that the municipalities were providing these services. The government has been taxing these mines without permitting taxes paid to the municipalities to be deducted before their federal taxes were paid. Were these mines situated in unorganized territory they would have been able to deduct every cent of taxes paid for the provision of the services before paying dominion government taxes. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that that is the place where subsidies for the gold mining industry are required, and not for the wealthy mine. Subsidies are required in the municipalities that are providing the services which help to make profits for these mines possible.

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): I want to say a few words on this bill, and I would ask hon. members to look at it in this way. The government did a good stroke of business when they enacted the gold mining assistance act. I shall cite only three examples—Dome Mines Limited, Hollinger Consolidated Gold Mines Limited, and McIntyre Porcupine Mines Limited. In the case of Dome Mines Limited the government paid assistance to the amount of $1.27 per ounce. In the case of Hollinger they paid assistance to the amount of $2.37 an ounce. In the case of McIntyre Porcupine Mines they paid assistance amounting to $1.93 an ounce. The gold which was produced by these different mines was worth $35 an ounce. Therefore for each ounce of gold the government paid these mines respectively $36.27, $37.37 and $36.93. I think the government made a very good deal all through, and by helping the other mines which were producing gold at very high cost they helped also the people in the towns which were developed by these mines.

I feel sorry that the legislation which we are studying today is not going further. It should be extended for three years, to encourage the development of new gold mines; because we know that by encouraging prospecting for gold mines we also encourage prospecting for base metals, and base metals are certainly very important.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): I have always deplored the enormous waste of energy represented by the production of gold. It is a commodity that rarely performs any useful service, because even in the early days there was far more gold than was needed to meet commercial needs. On the other hand, I do realize that so long as there are people and nations who actually desire to accept gold, it is definitely to the advantage of Canada to produce it so that we can export it and get goods and services in return.

While it is argued that gold mines are getting a special privilege in receiving a subsidy, we must not lose sight of the fact that the price of gold today is being held down at a much lower figure than would be the case if it were turned free. That is being done, of course, under the international monetary fund. It certainly would be to the advantage of the sterling area today to have gold turned free. It would make it possible for the sterling area to bring about a far better balance in international payments if the price of gold were allowed to rise to the price that it would reach if it were released from the international monetary fund. I suppose the members of the international monetary fund could accomplish that if they exerted a certain amount of pressure. It is easy to realize why the United States opposes such action; it is because the United States is the main purchaser of gold today. But I do believe that so long as the price of gold is held down under the international monetary fund the gold mines are justified in receiving a subsidy, because gold mining is one of the few industries today that has a ceiling on the price of the commodity it produces. That ceiling was set many years ago. Since that time the price of everything else has gone up. The price of gold has been held down. For this reason I think there is a justification for the subsidy.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): I am going to take only a moment or two because in a row of this kind I think it is often wise to have an outside referee, and that is the position I am going to try to assume.

I think we were all in favour of subsidies to marginal ore rather than marginal mines, as suggested by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair). If this money is going to the big mines or the small mines for the production of marginal ore which might otherwise be by-passed, the expenditure is completely justified. I am not concerned about the question whether somebody made a million dollars out of a certain mine. I am not concerned about the fact that stock was once $1 and is now $20. We all had the opportunity to buy it. Nobody prevented us from doing that. If it started at $1 and it is now at $20 it was because of the effort put into it by the people who owned it, and I am all in favour of that, irrespective of what the increase might have been. But surely the government that brings in these amendments, and that has been responsible for the operation of these subsidies, knows that they have been going to the development of marginal ore. If that is not so, then the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) is right. But remember, even if they make a million dollars, or whatever the amount is, they make it out of mining gold. Because they are making money no one has the right to ask them to work some property on which they will lose money. To my mind the thing is just as simple as that.

Being an amateur in gold mining I assume that these bonuses have been given to Hollinger and the big shots for the production of gold. I assume they have been given for the production of more gold in this country, which we all admit we need, on the same basis as the subsidies which have been going to the smaller mines. If my assumption is correct, then there is no argument among any of us on this particular problem.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out the value of the gold mining industry in relation to agriculture. Pioneers came into the Cariboo country and opened up a number of very profitable mines. In due course some of the mines were depleted, but these people remained to carry on dairying and mixed farming. Today they are shipping from the southern part of that area certified seed potatoes all over the world, and they also have a lively dairy industry. There are prosperous lode and placer mines there today which provide a home market for the farmer.

There is one other way in which the gold mining industry can be assisted. I refer to the building of roads and trails into the mines and a revival of the dominion-provincial arrangements of some years ago by which this was done.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Sections 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Mitchell (for Mr. Gibson, Hamilton West) moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

VALUE FOR DUTY OF GOODS IMPORTED—INQUIRIES AND INVESTIGATIONS, ETC.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 200, to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Governor in council may order that import duties be disregarded.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, this section is in general terms, but as it is short I shall read it:

(5) The governor in council may order that import duties of a country of export shall be disregarded, in whole or in part, in estimating the value for duty of goods of any kind imported into Canada from a country specified in the order.

During the Senate debate on this bill Senator Hugessen said:

I am advised that West Indies rum and Irish whiskey are imported in large bulk quantities by England, that they are aged and bottled in England, and thereafter are exported to Canada.

Senator Hugessen went on to explain that the same was true of other wines and sherries, and he intimated that the bill was intended to deal with that particular situation. At the end of his explanation Senator Hugessen said that the class of commodity sought to be covered by this legislation might vary from time to time. I am advised that the reason for this change is mainly, if not exclusively, that given by Senator Hugessen. I am not suggesting that the legislation can be amended at this late date, but I am wondering if it would not be possible for the minister to indicate that that is what is intended, that the section will be used for that purpose.

It seems to me to be most undesirable to have a section in a statute as wide as this. After all, it will throw considerable uncertainty into business. If in fact it is intended to cover this one case I hope the minister may see fit to give a firm assurance that that is what is intended.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, I feel that I can give the assurance that what is indicated by the hon. member for Greenwood is the purpose for which the section is intended. Perhaps I could put on the record the main purposes of this bill, in order that there may be a clearer understanding when we are discussing other sections.

The purpose of section 1 is to make it possible to disregard, in the determination of value for Canadian customs duty, all or part of the import duties of the country of export. At present the inclusion of these figures in the calculation of the value for duty is said to be not only unfair but also a deterrent to the export and sale to Canada of certain British goods at a time when trade between Britain and Canada is so vital to both countries and when international agreements are being drawn up to remove unreasonable administrative barriers to international trade.

In determining the value for duty of domestic products of Great Britain entering Canada, the Canadian customs, by law, disregards the internal excise taxes of the exporting country; but should the goods exported from Britain not be of domestic origin, Canadian customs have to include in its determination of value for duty the amount of import duties applicable in Great Britain, even though such duties had never been applied to the goods.

The explanation is that a lot of these goods come from other countries to Great Britain, are put in bond and actually do not pay these taxes, which for the most part are luxury taxes. They are then processed and shipped to this country. According to the act we do not regard those taxes that are put on there, but we have to take into account for customs purposes, when the goods come into Canada, not only the price of the goods but the duties that are levied in Great Britain.

There is an obvious anomaly here between the excise taxes and the customs duties which is most striking when the import duties and internal excise tax of the exporting country bear a direct relationship, and equal or nearly equal each other. The ultimate result of the present method of determining value for duty is to cause an increase in the figure on which the Canadian sales tax—I ask hon. members to note this—is applied; for, as is generally known, the sales tax on imported goods is based on the value for duty as established for customs purposes. The application of the tax on this basis obviously increases the price to the customer.

The proposed amendment is merely an extension of the principle in the law by which excise taxes of the exporting country are disregarded in determining value for duty in Canada. Import duties of the exporting country could, under this section, be treated in a similar manner when such action is deemed advisable by the governor in council. Thus any anomaly or unfairness would be removed and the goods enabled to be entered and marketed at competitive prices.

I think I might also deal at the present time with the principles of the other sections of the bill. Sections 2 and 3 provide for the repeal of certain sections of the act which still contain titles of offices which have been abolished, and for the substitution for these sections of a more uniform and standardized wording in line with modern drafting principles. These proposed amendments carry no substantive changes of law. It is only a tidying up process.

With reference to the fourth section of the bill, it is an amendment which is intended to make an appeal procedure available to the innocent owner of a vehicle or vessel seized and confiscated under the Customs Act, which at the present time disregards entirely the question of ownership in such cases. This provision is similar to section 169(a) of the Excise Tax Act, which was enacted in 1934 in order to enable the innocent owner, mortgagee or lien holder to appeal to the courts to protect his interests or equity in the vehicle seized. I think it will be seen that the present law rather creates an injustice to the innocent owner of a seized automobile which has been used for smuggling purposes. Perhaps some acceptance corporation or other person has a lien against the vehicle. When it is seized it becomes forfeited and is sold, and the person who has a lien, or who has not yet been paid for the vehicle which has been confiscated, suffers the entire loss of his equity in it. The purpose of the amendment is to give that person or corporation an opportunity to appeal to the courts to protect his lien.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand the minister was good enough to say he can give me the assurance I asked for, and I am grateful.

Mr. Thatcher: Can the minister say whether or not the United States and British governments intend to take similar action in respect to our goods? I understand that when we ship goods to the United States we run into many difficulties of this kind. Have any representations been made to the United States asking for similar legislation?

Mr. McCann: Not that I know of. The question what they regard as the invoice value for duty purposes is not a matter of concern to us. We do not import as much goods into Canada for reprocessing and resale, and bearing heavy excise taxes, luxury taxes and customs duties, as we attempt to take care of in this particular instance so far as Great Britain is concerned. In Great Britain, for instance, they import liquors. They also import silk sheets or silk squares from Italy. Of course that is a luxury item, and there are high luxury taxes on it in Great Britain. Then they carry out further processing of the goods by printing, colouring or placing some sort of figures on them, and they are re-exported to Canada.

Another example is a line of cosmetics. If we were to add the taxes and customs duties they impose in order to collect revenue on the basis of the imported value, and take that as the invoice value on which customs duties would be collected in this country, we would be doing something unfair to them. We would not be promoting our general policy, namely, the encouragement of trade between Great Britain and Canada. Our own domestic manufacturers will not be affected in the slightest so far as competition in these articles is concerned.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By unanimous consent.

Mr. McCann moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

142. Departmental administration, $735,337.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): I desire to speak briefly, and largely about one aspect of the labour question which I think will develop as I proceed.

It is very late in the history of the world to review industrial relations between capital—and I still like that word—and labour. I begin by reaffirming a belief, which I have held for many years, and which I have proved by my actions, in the unionization or organization of labour in industry. I arrive at that conclusion from some knowledge of the question, and it seems to me also from sheer reason.

We all know that the organization of labour into unions has done much to improve their position, in Canada as well as in other countries. There was a time when labour was regarded simply as an intake product in whatever industry labour had to be used. For a long time industry fought the organization of labour. I am happy to say that in Canada that day has long since gone. I think industry has learned that it is better off when labour is so organized. There are still a few who endeavour, as we heard this morning, to stop the organization of labour in various plants. Fortunately they are few in this day and generation. I frankly admit that errors have been made in union policy, but the general good that has come to the community through such organizations far outweighs any mistakes that were made in times gone by.

We may compliment ourselves that in this country today we have practically no strikes, and very little unrest in the ranks of labour. In discussing the estimates that are before us we shall wish to know a number of things which I have no intention of discussing now; but we might remember that the taxpayers of this country are paying a tremendous sum of money in this connection. This year it is $49,629,156, an increase of $806,567 over last year; but perhaps the explanations may wait until we are considering the estimates item by item.

I wish also to pay a sincere compliment to organized labour in Canada on what it has done with respect to communism. Labour has purged itself much better than it could be done by any law passed by this or any other government. The men who led that battle and who received much abuse, some of it physical, in reaching that great objective, are worthy of the highest commendation this house can give them.

I should like also to try to destroy the fiction which is in the minds of many people in this country, as a result of which communism comes to their thoughts whenever labour is mentioned. It is true that labour provides a field in which that vile thing might grow; but let us not think for a moment that labour itself is the chief source of communists. It is not. The chief source of communists, I am sorry to say, is among well-educated people, many of them in our institutions of learning, people who should know much better. I am anxious to go on record definitely as saying that while progress was made in a fruitful field—and we all know the reasons for that, highly uninformed as some of these persons are—the leadership had to come from somewhere else; and it came from well-educated people in this country rather than from labour itself.

I am going to say nothing more, Mr. Chairman, except that we shall examine the estimates and be sceptical about an increase of almost a million dollars. Today the administration is not faced with the problems it had to deal with last year or the year before. I am happy to know that all of us in this house played some part in the creation of what might well be called a labour code in Canada. No one in this house can claim the entire credit for that, because, as the minister well knows, and as I credit him with having said, it was threshed out by a large group of people from this house who were aiming to do only one thing, that is, something which might be valuable in settling labour disputes and quieting unrest and disaffection among those of us who work with our hands for our living.

Now I have finished, and shall content myself with an examination of the estimates item by item.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Chairman, I am very happy to be able to associate myself with almost everything the hon. member for Calgary West has said. As a matter of fact the first thought that came to my mind as the minister and the committee prepared to deal with these estimates was to congratulate the minister and the country on the very few labour disputes we have had during the present year. Compared with the difficult times the minister had in previous years I think he has had a very easy time of it lately. I hope he does not grow too fat and complacent on it, because if he has had an easy time there are others who have not had it quite so easy.

I was glad the hon. member for Calgary West mentioned the steps taken by labour bodies to lessen the influence of communists in their organizations, and I want to point out that this was no easy task to undertake. It meant that people had to be dealt with because of political opinions. It is not so very long ago that I heard responsible leaders in the labour movement say, and quite correctly at that time, that they would not interfere with a man's position in the labour movement because of his political opinions, no matter what those opinions might be. The sad thing about communists, however, is that we cannot deal with them as we would deal with ordinary people, because they do not act as ordinary people do. That is the position with which the labour movement was confronted, and it took a great deal of courage to handle it in the way it was handled.

The principal reason why I rise to speak on these estimates is that I have been receiving communications from various parts of Canada, and particularly from the province of British Columbia. I am concerned about the unemployment situation this winter in my province, and what is to be done to meet it. I do not want it to be taken that I expect an unemployment situation of huge proportions, or on a scale such as we had during the depression years. I do not think we shall have that this winter, but unemployment worked a great hardship among the people of British Columbia last winter. The situation will be considerably worse this winter. I believe that will be so, not only in British Columbia but right across Canada.

Hon. members will have noted that I put questions on the order paper recently, which were answered on November 24, that is, less than two weeks ago. I asked as to the comparative number of persons receiving unemployment insurance in September and October of 1948 and 1949. While the number is not particularly large, the increase this year over last is, to me, alarming. I shall give the figures to hon. members so that they may have them in mind. In 1948 the number of persons receiving unemployment insurance totalled 44,000 in September, and 55,000 in October—I am giving the round figures. In 1949 the figures were 83,000 in September and 105,000 in October—that is, they had almost doubled.

This is only the beginning of the decline in employment. I have noticed that in other years unemployment reached its peak in February or March, and then began to drop until about August. I asked a similar question about new applications received for unemployment insurance in September and October of 1948 and 1949. We find the same situation. In September, 1948, there were 28,000 new applications; and in October, 38,000. In September, 1949, there were 51,000, and in October, 69,000. It seems to me that is a steep increase in the number of those making application for unemployment insurance. These figures do not include unemployed persons who are not covered by unemployment insurance, and a large number of the workers are not covered.

Representations were made to me by the British Columbia command of the Canadian Legion, and by the two central labour bodies in Vancouver. I have noticed that the Canadian Legion is running advertisements in the daily papers in Vancouver to draw attention to the situation. Will the minister say whether any preparations are being made to provide assistance to those unemployed employables who have exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits?

I should like to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that it will be harder for the municipalities to look after the unemployed who are not receiving unemployment insurance, not only because of their numbers but because, in almost every city, the welfare agencies have found it more difficult to raise funds this year. Then again, we must remember that the unemployment insurance benefits are hardly sufficient—I said hardly sufficient, but I think I can make it much stronger than that. With the present prices, they are not sufficient to maintain a family. Assistance must come from some other source. I should be glad indeed if the minister could give some assurance to the committee that the government is planning for this need.

I believe the committee should be informed that less food is being purchased now than during 1947. The volume of food sales is lower than in 1947. I believe most of the members receive the Financial Times. In the copy which came to my desk yesterday, there is a chart showing the trend of food sales in 1947, 1948, and 1949. The sales in terms of dollars showed a steep increase—from an index figure of 90 to 120 since the beginning of 1947. In physical volume, however, the trend has been the other way. As a matter of fact the graph forms a triangle. Beginning at 90, one leg of the triangle goes up to 120 and the other goes down to almost 80. This indicates, Mr. Chairman, that the standard of living is going down, and that it is exceedingly important that this winter the government should, either by financial assistance or by providing work projects, ease the burden on persons who are unemployed. It should also ease the burden of the municipalities concerned, because they will not be able to handle the situation which will shortly confront them.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, does the minister wish to answer the member for Vancouver East now, or does he wish to continue the discussions?

Mr. Mitchell: It is generally understood that on the first item the members make their speeches. I am assuming that my hon. friend is ready to burst into song, so I shall sit and listen to him.

Mr. Gillis: Yes, it would be a shame if the minister got away too easily. As the hon. member for Vancouver East indicated, he has been getting away very easily this session. However, he has worked hard in the past.

Mr. Mitchell: This is the result of the good work.

Mr. Gillis: There are many things that could be said in a general way on the minister's estimates, but I think a good deal of it can be reserved for the items as we come to them.

A great deal of progress has been made in the Department of Labour since I first came into the house, if one just stops and thinks back; and there is no harm in recalling exactly what has taken place in the last ten years. I know that the Department of Labour today is about a hundred per cent more efficient than it was when I came into this house in 1940.

Mr. Low: See what you have done for it.

Mr. Gillis: It was not necessarily what I did, or what the minister did. He has been fortunate in getting into the department persons who know a great deal about the problem and are anxious to do something about it. The credit goes to no one person, but if any credit is due to an individual I would give it to the deputy minister. The deputy minister is the brains of any department. In addition he must have a flexible minister. Either the Minister of Labour is flexible or the deputy minister is a good diplomat, because he has been responsible for getting a good deal done. We on this side of the house of course have provoked their thoughts, pushed them along and perhaps given them some ideas.

When I came into the house in 1940 we had no Unemployment Insurance Act. Today we have such an act, and I think it is working reasonably well. It needs some jacking up here and there, but we shall reserve discussion on that matter until we come to the item dealing with it. The national employment offices across the country, which have been built up under the machinery in connection with the Unemployment Insurance Act, are a valuable asset if they are used for the purpose for which they were intended. During the war these offices had the right to direct employees and the right to file the requirements of the employers. During the war I think they did an excellent job in directing employees and assisting people to to go from one section of the country to another where there was employment in the particular trades in which they were interested. Since the war these offices have lost that function.

The employment offices have an excellent set-up. They have registered all unemployed who come under the act, and the trades or jobs for which they are fitted; but they no longer have the right to direct employees, and the employer is under no obligation to register his needs. From close contacts with those offices I know that they are working under a handicap in that respect. Many unemployed are not registered because they do not come under the act, and they are wandering around in a circle, whereas if they could go to these offices and get direction, the officers would be performing a much more useful function.

In 1940 we had no national labour code. We now have a code which is national in scope. We have at least established the principle. But that act also, in my opinion, requires some amendment. We have not only suggested amendments but we have moved bills in the house. I think it requires an amendment to provide that the Canada labour board shall be in a position to enforce the act by initiating prosecution when an infraction of the act is committed. I am not going to argue that point again. I maintained it on two occasions in the house by moving a bill. I still hope for that amendment. I am reasonably sure that at some time in the future such a provision will be written into the national code.

I think the act also needs amendment in the matter of the voluntary revocable check-off. I think that too will come in time. It is the minimum measure of union security that we can hope for in legislation. It would be of great benefit to the trade union movement across the country.

A definition of employees is necessary. There should be a broader definition than is there now; because an employer is in a position to put a fairly wide interpretation on the present definition of an employee who is eligible for membership in a union under the code. He can classify practically anyone in a plant or factory as being ineligible because he is engaged in a confidential capacity. I am not going to argue that point now either. The arguments are on the record. I know that the labour department know what they are. In time I think we may be able to cure the code in that respect.

The most important question that today faces the Department of Labour and the workers of this country generally is the matter of industrial pensions. The main emphasis across the country in every section of labour, be it organized or unorganized, is the necessity of security against the time when they are no longer able to provide for themselves. Last night in the committee on the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare, I listened to a discussion on industrial pensions and their relationship to that department. I did not take part in it because I felt that it was out of order. I believe, however, that it is the responsibility of the Department of Labour to lay the basis for some uniform national scheme of industrial pensions.

Right now there are a great many disconnected schemes. Industry after industry is establishing some kind of scheme of its own; but in my opinion there can be no solution to the problem on that basis. As I have previously pointed out in the house, an industry such as the pulp and paper industry in Canada can provide a decent pension, and they have done so. They pay $100 a month after a certain number of years' service; they protect the widow after the husband passes on; they have an excellent scheme. They can handle a scheme of that kind because the industry has the income with which to do it. But there are hundreds of industries in this country, some small and some large, which have not the income, through profits, to set up a decent pension scheme. They are essential industries, but they do not make large profits. The great majority of the workers of this country work in the kind of industry that cannot provide an industrial pension for them.

Another thing that focuses attention on the problem is the policy of industry itself. Since the end of the war they have taken the position that they will not employ anyone over forty years of age. If a man who is forty years of age is out of work today, and has not some specialized training, he will not be taken on by any industry in which the labour is fairly heavy, such as the mining, steel or automobile industries. He will not receive employment. There is growing up in this country a group of thousands and thousands of men who in the past have contributed something to some industry, who get out of work for some reason or another and cannot be employed. The heavy industries have taken the position that when a man is sixty-five years of age he is pensioned off. In most cases where that takes place, particularly in the mining industry, there is no contributory system of pensions. The companies have established some schemes of their own which are non-contributory. It is something they pay themselves as a gratuity. It cannot be called a pension. It is based on twenty-five years' service and on a small percentage of the last ten years of employment when earnings were the lowest. It amounts to about $15 a month up to a maximum of $57 or $60 a month. But in that scheme the over-all average, as applied to steel and coal in Nova Scotia, would run around $30 a month. That is nothing to look forward to. The man is back on relief.

The Canadian Congress of Labour have taken this position. To continue to probe the matter and to find a solution as from industry to industry in Canada means that all you will succeed in doing will be to set up the differentials in pensions that exist in wage rates across the country at the present time. That is what will happen if a contributory scheme of pensions is established. On the other hand many industries cannot provide any pension at all. My considered opinion is, and has been for a long time, that the only way you can establish a fair retiring allowance for industrial workers in this country and for white-collar workers is to recognize the principle of social security.

I believe the department is now working on this question. I know the minister has one of his officials in Nova Scotia lecturing on industrial pensions. I do not know what the scheme is, but the minister will likely refer to it later. Now that the labour department has begun to gather statistics on the problem, the minister should consider this aspect of it: the only way to answer the question for the workers across this country —I do not mean just those who use a pick and shovel; I mean civil servants and all those who are white-collar workers in industry—is to establish a social security tax. I am not going to say what the amount should be. Everyone in the country should pay a tax, and it should be earmarked as a retiring allowance and set to one side and supplemented out of the consolidated revenue fund. The employer and the employee would contribute to it. The worker would then know that when he had worked for a certain number of years in industry he would be paying a special tax. I can assure the committee that nobody would object to a special tax for that purpose. It would be on a national basis. There would be one administration, and competent people in the annuities branch could work it out, thus eliminating the wasting of millions of dollars by industry in the maintenance of administrative staffs to work out the small and inadequate pensions that exist today.

The one thing that keeps most people in life worried and sends them to an early grave is insecurity. The average worker can pay only enough by way of insurance premiums to guarantee his family that at least there will be sufficient money to bury him when he dies. He is worried all the time on that score. At the convention in Toronto a year ago the Canadian Congress of Labour changed a resolution they had on industrial pensions to read the way I have suggested. They said that from then on the labour organizations should concentrate on a drive to sell the federal government the idea of a national social security tax to provide retiring allowances to workers in every industry and in every profession. I do not say what the contribution should be, but in my opinion that is the only kind of contributory scheme of pensions that will work, and it is the kind of thing that most people are thinking about and working for in a piecemeal and disjointed way at this time.

I do not expect the minister to say that this kind of thing will be done. I am speaking about it now so that people may think about it. If we are honestly of the opinion that something should be done in that field, I think that is the only way it can be done. It would answer the question of old age pensions, which we are wrangling about all the time, and the means test. The workers of this country do not want charity. When they retire after producing the wealth of the country they do not want to have to go to some charitable organization and qualify for the means of existence. Because of the means test in old age pensions, they are up against that very thing. Somebody has to come in and ascertain whether, because of the clothes in your cupboard and your living accommodation, you should receive something which is on the basis of charity. If my suggestion were adopted, that would be overcome.

On the other hand, large contributions are made to charitable organizations for the purpose of looking after the aged, the infirm and the afflicted. Nobody wants to accept the kind of charity which is handed out by the Red Cross, the Blue Cross, the White Cross, and all of these other organizations. Nobody wants to end his days by having to accept charity on that basis. In my opinion the only way to eliminate it is to give people a chance, by way of a special tax, to contribute to a national scheme and place the money in the hands of a competent administration that can work the matter out on an actuarial basis and determine exactly what the employee's contribution would be, what industry's should be and how much should come out of the consolidated revenue fund. Make it not just another tax, but a social security tax set to one side for that purpose. It would be pretty much a duplication of the unemployment insurance fund. It might be handled by that department. I do not think it would require additional staff.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, when we took recess for lunch I was making a few general observations. I was elaborating on the question of industrial pensions, which I consider to be one of the objectives of the labour program. I am not going to repeat what I said previously, but I wish to add that I think Canada is in a good position to make a judgment on this particular development.

We have the experience of the commonwealth countries to draw from, as well as those of another country which is closer to us and whose economy is pretty much the same as ours, the United States.

But I think what is happening in the United States is proof positive that the establishment of pension plans by industry is not working out. The mine workers were the first union to have a pension of $100 a month established, but the net result has been the creation of one of the greatest obstacles to industrial harmony between employer and employee that has arisen since the establishment of the labour movement. Any industry which cannot pass along to the consumer the additional cost of such a pension plan will not be able to carry it out. When the time comes that they cannot pass it along to the consumer, difficulties arise. The pension plan established by the mine workers worked for one year while it was in the embryo stage, but during the last year there has been a continual disruption of that industry in an effort to maintain the pension of $100 a month.

I think this is a fair indication that we cannot follow along that road with any degree of success and hope to maintain harmonious relations between labour and management. Within the past few months the steel industry in the United States have established a pension plan, and I know they will have great difficulty in trying to maintain it. The automobile workers in Canada are following the pattern set in the United States. In my opinion the only way it can be done in this or any other country is not to pass the cost along to the consumer, but to establish a national security plan which will be supported by contributions by the worker, the employer and to some extent from the consolidated revenue fund. The plan should have the efficient administration we now have in the annuities branch. I know this will not happen tomorrow, I know there will be much difficulty in selling the idea to members of the government, but someone or some group must be looking forward in the field of social legislation and be ready to support it.

I shall not make any further general remarks, but there are many small problems that will be discussed when we reach the appropriate items.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Chairman, under this general administration item I should like to deal with another branch of the department, the training branch. First of all I should like to compliment the minister and his officers upon the excellent job they have done in vocational training. There are two schools of thought about education; there are those who believe that education consists chiefly of academic training, and there are those who are interested in vocational training. I was an academic teacher for close to twenty years. I taught in schools where the great majority of the pupils came from industrial homes, and I have learned to appreciate the need and the value of training that our boys and girls are getting in the vocational schools.

According to the report of the department, from the inception of the dominion-provincial training plan in 1937 up to March 31, 1949, there has been an enrolment of 918,740 pupils, close to one million young people who have been benefited by that training during those years. In the last fiscal year the enrolment in these courses was 23,891, with an expenditure of $9,133,300.

I should like to deal briefly with the different types of vocational work that has been carried on. First I want to express my regret that the province of Ontario did not take advantage of the youth training plan over the years. However, last year they availed themselves of the $50,000 that was allotted for youth training which was used to aid students in colleges, universities, nursing training schools, and so forth.

In the field of supervisory training, I note with the same regret that Ontario has indicated that this will be discontinued during the coming year. The report indicates that great assistance has been given in supervisory training, particularly during the past year. Last year three provinces were allotted money, but in no case did a province use the full allotment. Of the $9,000 allotted to Ontario for supervisory training, the province availed itself of only $2,534. Of the $9,000 allotted to the province of Quebec, the province availed itself of $5,867. Of the $3,000 allotted to British Columbia for this type of training, the province availed itself of $1,080.

According to the report this money was used for the training of industrial supervisors and personnel officials; education in job relations and job methods; to aid job safety institutes, and for conferences pertaining to these subjects. There is a great need, particularly in the industrial provinces, for the type of work the act is designed to support, and I feel that this need is as great as it ever has been. Again I regret to see that the province of Ontario has indicated its intention to discontinue that field this year. I notice that the training given to the armed forces, which during the past year absorbed over $3 million, will not necessarily be carried on because that particular phase of the work is completed. I was hopeful that the minister would be able to secure the $3 million for his department in order that it might be transferred to other fields of education, but I see no indication in the estimates of that being done.

There is another phase of work carried on by the department in which I am interested, the training of unemployed persons. Here again I notice in the report that, while money was available to all the provinces for the vocational training of unemployed persons, there were three provinces in Canada which did not avail themselves of that assistance, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and Ontario. I gather from the report, however, that the training of unemployed personnel was carried on in the province of Quebec to a large extent with assistance from the federal government in the regular vocational schools of the province. Once again I am at a loss to know why, with the number of unemployed increasing in the province of Ontario, the provincial government has not availed itself fully of the assistance for the training of unemployed persons through the regular vocational schools of the province.

Before I deal with the financial assistance given to vocational schools, there is another point in the report to which I wish to refer, the replacement of depreciated equipment within the vocational schools of the country. I find there was a total amount of $259,600 approved by the minister for replacing such equipment in our technical schools, but there were certain strings attached to that. The act gives the minister authority to refund to certain schools 75 per cent of the cost of equipment purchased by them from War Assets Corporation up to the total amount of $259,600 approved by the minister. The report goes on to say that few claims have been sent in by the schools to which funds were made available, and that total payments up to the present time have been $73,423 as against the $259,600 allotted. Of the $73,423, $25,584 was paid during the last fiscal year to one school in Nova Scotia, two in Ontario, three in Saskatchewan and three in British Columbia. I note the reason given why more of these funds were not used is that War Assets Corporation has been able to supply little suitable equipment.

While the minister is speaking on his estimates, I should like him to tell us why it was that War Assets Corporation was able to supply so little equipment to our vocational schools. I cannot believe the reason is that such equipment did not exist. During the war years I had the privilege of visiting a great many of the war industry plants in Ontario. I know something about the type of equipment used in our vocational schools, and I am confident there must have been a great deal of war assets equipment that would have been suitable for use. Because War Assets Corporation was able to supply very little I note that the provinces have only been able to avail themselves of $73,423 when the department had an amount allotted of $259,600.

I want to touch briefly on two major fields in which the department is contributing so far as vocational training is concerned. One that I overlooked is apprentice training. From the report it is evident that valuable work has been done in that field. During the fiscal year ending March, 1948, 6,286 apprentices have been assisted under the act, 3,659 of them in the province of Ontario. I also notice that for the year 1949 there has been a considerable drop in the number of apprentices who received assistance under the act. I am quite sure the minister will want to give us some explanation why there is a decreasing number of apprentices taking advantage of the privileges afforded by the legislation.

The department's greatest assistance to vocational education was in the direct contributions made to the provinces for regular vocational training in their schools. An agreement was made with the provinces whereby there was to be an annual outright grant of $10,000 to each province, which was not to be matched. It was an outright gift to each of the provinces to be used by them in vocational education. A grant was made over a ten-year period of $1,910,000 which was to be used in the development of vocational education, and there was a special contribution of $10 million to be allotted among the provinces for capital expenditures on the building and equipment of vocational schools. There is no question but that the assistance given has aided the advancement of vocational education across Canada. I am sure that the minister with his background is probably as sympathetic to the development of vocational education as any other hon. member in the house.

I would like to call to his attention this report, which indicates that as a result of those direct grants given to the provinces prior to April 1, 1948, in addition to the schools which had been assisted there were 116 schools either completed, in process of completion or approved by the department for assistance under this act, which means that fifty per cent of the cost of constructing and equipping those 116 schools across Canada would come from these funds. In his report the minister told us that in addition to those 116 schools there were 79 new buildings or additions to existing buildings planned by municipalities, which would be built without assistance from the department.

I want to bring to the attention of the committee a resolution which was adopted by the vocational training advisory committee, a special committee set up under the act to advise the minister and the department with respect to its administration. At its meeting on October 4, 1948, that advisory committee called attention to the fact that since this act came into force in 1945 the cost of building and equipping vocational schools had increased greatly, and that the original amount voted for this purpose fell far short of achieving what those who put through this legislation had in mind. As a result of increased construction costs, fewer schools could be built than the government and the department visualized in 1945.

In view of that condition the committee recommended that a further grant of $5 million be made by the dominion for capital expenditure, to be distributed on the same basis as the earlier capital grant; and that annual grants should be increased from $2 million to $4 million. The committee felt this would be effective in carrying out the objectives of the department as set forth in the original act. I have looked through the estimates for this year and find that while the department has been able to reduce its estimates for vocational training by some $3 million because of the fact that it is not required to provide that training for those coming out of the armed forces, there is nothing in the estimates to indicate that this recommendation of the advisory committee has been accepted. The report to which I am referring states that as of March 31, 1949, those recommendations were still under consideration.

As I have already indicated, I am quite sure the minister personally is very sympathetic to this work. I am convinced that if his wishes could prevail in the cabinet the recommendations of this committee would be adopted. So I want to say, not so much to the minister as to the other members of the cabinet who help determine government policy and government budgets, that here is one field where government money can be spent to good advantage to assist the boys and girls of this country. This is one field in which there is no quarrel with the provinces. One feature of these vocational training grants is the way in which this government has been able to co-operate with all the provincial governments in the field of vocational education. I am assured by provincial educational officers and by officers of the minister's department that there has been nothing but the utmost co-operation in this field.

There are communities where vocational education is badly needed. I think of the community from which I come, the township of York. There we have an industrial population of close to one hundred thousand, with somewhere around four thousand boys and girls attending secondary schools. There we have no vocational school or vocational class of any kind. These thousands of pupils, coming from industrial homes, can get only an academic education leading to matriculation. In that community only about ten per cent of those who enter the secondary schools continue through to grade XIII, and less than two per cent of the pupils proceed to university. That is the sort of community where there is a crying need for vocational education. The township of York is one of the suburbs of Toronto. Most of the large business firms are located in Toronto, and much of the money of that community is spent in that city. Toronto derives taxation from all the large industrial and business centres, which are supported by the suburban communities. The schools of my community derive their support almost entirely from two sources, the assistance given by the provincial government and the taxes on the homes and properties of that area.

It had been planned to build a vocational school there to accommodate a thousand pupils. Today in the township of York there are well over a thousand pupils who would attend a vocational school if one were available. They were unable to get their plans to the department here before the expiration of the period for application. As a result the best that community can do without aid from the federal government will be to construct a school for five or six hundred pupils instead of a thousand, a school without a gymnasium or an auditorium, and without much of the equipment that is absolutely necessary for a vocational school. Were the department or the government to take into consideration the recommendation of this vocational advisory committee, and to include, if not in this year's estimates certainly in next year's, the extra moneys recommended, the community of York township, and many of these other 70 communities across Canada who are undertaking to build vocational schools without any federal assistance, would be able to build better schools in those communities. Those schools would be able to carry on that particular type of work more effectively.

It was my desire to call this matter to the government's attention, and I hope to hear from the minister when he speaks, whether or not his department has taken this recommendation into consideration; and whether or not they are likely to have included in the estimates grants that will make it possible for many of these communities across Canada to get further assistance.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): A discussion on the estimates of the Department of Labour automatically brings to mind the question of standards of living, because the welfare of labour is so vitally concerned with standards of living. I have been interested in the discussion thus far, and I was particularly interested in the contribution made by the member for Vancouver East and the member for Cape Breton South. Perhaps I did not see just as deeply into the general current of the thinking of those gentlemen as I should have, but it seems to me they were advocating policies which were contradictory. I do not raise these matters to criticize the hon. gentlemen, for whom I have a high degree of esteem, but merely to point out the need for some other kind of thinking.

The member for Vancouver East fittingly brought to the attention of the house a chart, which he found in the current issue of the Financial Times. This chart indicated that whereas the expenditure of labour and people generally on the needs of life had increased from 90 to 120 since 1947, yet the actual amount of goods which those people had been able to purchase had dropped from 90 to approximately 80. This is a solemn warning to the members of this house, as representatives of the community of Canada. Something must be done about that. Obviously, if the trend continues, a disaster of one kind or another will result.

Evidently the member for Vancouver East had in mind some measure for reducing the cost of living. I am in hearty accord with him in that objective. This immediately poses the question of how this cost of living is to be reduced. How are you going to bring down the retail prices in Canada? It is well known that if the labouring men strike to raise wages, immediately there will be another spiral of increased costs. If the labouring men do not strike, but continue with the wages they are now receiving, and the prices continue much as they are, then a generation of young Canadians will almost assuredly suffer far more seriously than this house would care to contemplate. Some means of bringing down that cost of living, then, is the thing for which we are looking. I am sure there is no one in Canada more anxious to find a formula that will satisfactorily accomplish that objective than the Minister of Labour.

The member for Cape Breton South cal d for a tax upon everyone for the sake of social security. At one time, he had in mind industrial pensions. The experience of the United States with that sort of thing, which he related, was not a happy one. This was particularly true of the coal industry.

I rather doubt that there is anyone in the house today who, in his heart, would not favour some sort of universal pension for people after about 55, when they can be absorbed no longer in industry. I should like to see a straight vote of the members of parliament, in which they would be entirely free from political consideration, just to ascertain whether there is anyone in the house who would not favour universal pensions such as I have described. I do not believe that, by secret ballot, the nays would be very numerous.

My question is, how are we going to get that universal pension? Where will the money come from? The member for Cape Breton South, a man of sound judgment, wide learning and great ability, as I have said, advocated a universal tax. It must be obvious to the member for Vancouver East and the member for Cape Breton South that if there were a universal tax the following things would happen: If the tax were upon industry, then industry would have to raise prices which would have a result directly opposite to that which the member for Vancouver East desired.

Mr. Gillis: I do not agree with that.

Mr. Blackmore: It will be necessary for the hon. member to establish that point.

Mr. Gillis: They are throwing that much and more away now.

Mr. Blackmore: I do not think a scientific examination of the facts will bear out the member's contention. If the tax were levied upon the workingman, which he apparently envisages, then there would be a reduction in the amount of money those men would have to spend. This would destroy part of our internal capacity to consume, and would tend to destroy the possibilities for employment in industry. Again, this would be the exact opposite of what the member for Cape Breton South and the member for Vancouver East would favour.

If the government made a contribution towards this universal pension, then according to present government thinking the money would have to be raised by taxation, which would in turn raise the cost of living all over the country and decrease consumer purchasing power. It would be a good thing for those hon. gentlemen, the members of their party, and our Liberal and Conservative friends, to give a considerable amount of thought to this question during the next few months.

Mr. MacInnis: If those factors would apply to increases in taxation in the way suggested by the hon. member—I do not want him to think I am asking this question with any sinister purpose, but it falls within the argument he was making—would not the same thing apply to the increase in indemnity which the members of parliament voted for themselves in 1945 or 1946?

Mr. Blackmore: Undoubtedly, it would.

Mr. MacInnis: That should be a reason for refusing it, then?

Mr. Blackmore: It will apply to every tax which is levied by the dominion government to raise additional revenue to provide additional public services or social services, which everyone in the house advocates. That is the situation confronting us in Canada. Is there not some way of avoiding the whole difficulty?

May I just stop the review here for a minute to point out that the hon. member for Cape Breton South is virtually advocating a dividend for all. I fancy there is no member in the committee who does not recall the amount of jeering that took place and the superior attitude that existed toward the idea of a dividend for all. When fourteen years ago I first came into the house, any suggestion of a dividend for all was met with an almost violent reaction. In fourteen or fifteen years I believe we have come to the point where practically every member of the house favours a dividend. We have therefore made some progress, have we not?

If we can determine now where the money is coming from with which to pay the dividend, then our thinking can go forward another milepost. What the hon. member for Vancouver East really has in mind is what the Social Crediters call the just price, which is brought about by a compensated discount which reduces the price to the consumer. The hon. member for Vancouver East is therefore well along his way toward progressive thinking as Social Crediters look upon it. I rather think that most members on both sides of the house, both Liberals and Conservatives, would favour a reduction in price by a compensated discount, for the Liberals used it with regard to many commodities during the war, and with great success. It is too bad that they did not continue so to control price after the war. They seemed to assume that as soon as the war was over all further problems in regard to price had ceased. In reality, those problems had only just begun. No proposal has yet been brought forward for the systematic reduction of prices, notwithstanding the fact that prices are just torturing people from coast to coast in Canada. What the hon. member for Cape Breton South was advocating was a dividend for all or at least a dividend for all those who had found it necessary, for one reason or another, to leave industry.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

May I suggest to the members of the committee and to these two good gentlemen and their colleagues in parliament that money can be obtained out of production. I have heard them, in some of their moments of illumination, state that financing would be done out of production; but what they seemed to have in mind was out of taxing production. The thing our generation must realize is that you do not need to tax production in order to get money. If the producers are producing ample goods, let them produce the goods and let the government use the goods as a basis for money. In this way a government can finance projects out of production without injuring the producer or the consumer. Once this committee learns that, and once the government learns that, with all the high ideals that are actuating the government and the opposition today, Canada will be on her way to an era of prosperity and happiness that we have dreamed about in times past but have never dared to hope we would realize.

It will be necessary for me to read one or two short excerpts from men whose opinions might be expected to command the respect of the house. I am reading now an excerpt from an article in the Financial Post of October 5, 1940. The article is entitled "Putting Over the Next War Loan." It is by Professor A. F. W. Plumptre of Toronto university. Here are some words that might be of some value to the members of the C.C.F. and to the other members of the house. He says:

> There are some general matters of theory which must be kept in mind in preparing for the next war loan. It must be remembered, primarily and seemingly paradoxically, that the government's object is not to get money but merely to reduce the public's spending.

I am still astonished that no one, except Social Crediters, has seen fit to discuss in the house that remarkable statement. Now may I quote a little bit more. Further on he says:

> The government can always "get money" because it may, as an alternative to borrowing or even to taxation, create the required funds. This it can easily do nowadays through the leadership of the central bank and the co-operation of the chartered banks. In this way $200 million were created in this fashion last autumn.

No matter how orthodox the Minister of Labour may be, no matter how highly distasteful it may be to him to consider matters pertaining to—

Mr. Mitchell: Don't be orthodox; be sensible.

Mr. Blackmore: I am glad the minister said "sensible". I will hold him to that word.

An hon. Member: Not too strictly.

Mr. Blackmore: No matter how sensible he may be, I think he must have some respect for Professor Plumptre's remarks.

Mr. Mitchell: I do not care who he is; if he is making the implication my hon. friend is trying to make, I think he is wrong, even if he is a professor.

Mr. Blackmore: In other words, the minister just cannot be sensible about anything with respect to money.

Mr. Mitchell: Let me just say this to my hon. friend: If it is not hard to get, it is not money.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mitchell: I know that my hon. friends say "oh, oh"; but a printing press never in all history raised a potato or grew a blade of wheat.

Mr. Knowles: What about the hair on your head?

Mr. Mitchell: Yours too.

Mr. Blackmore: You see the situation, Mr. Chairman. The minister cannot possibly see any means of improving the financial and economic conditions of Canada except through taxation. In other words, if we in Canada once get to the point where we have more production than the people in Canada can buy, the minister must throw up his hands in utter helplessness, and go down into a vast depression from which no one has any idea as to how we shall ever emerge.

Mr. Low: Then look at his labour problems.

Mr. Blackmore: I wish he could once come to realize that the thing that makes a nation wealthy, the thing that ought to make a nation prosperous, is production; and that when you get to the point where you are producing in a country more food, clothing, shelter and everything than you need, then you have reached the point where everybody should be able to go into a sort of Garden of Eden and have all that he needs.

Mr. Low: But you should make money hard to get.

Mr. Blackmore: But here is where the minister's theory will lead him. Just as soon as we get to the point where we have more production than we can consume, then prices begin to fall, production begins to fall off, employment falls off, and people go onto the unemployment lists just as they were in the 1930's. When the income of all the various producing organizations throughout Canada falls you cannot get as much in taxes from them, and the result is of course your revenues fall off. They come down to a mere dribble compared with what they were in the war, and the minister has not a single idea as to what to do about it. It will be hard enough for him to get money, all right; there will not be very much money then.

The minister likes to be sensible. Will he tell us whether the money that he was able to get during the war when revenues were at a high level, were buoyant, as the Minister of Finance would say, was just as good as the money that he could get during the depression? It was a lot harder to get during the depression. I think the minister will agree the money during the war was just as good, if we could have kept prices down, as the money which we got during the depression, which was hard enough to get. I do not think I should say any more along that line. I just wish to draw to the attention of the committee the fantastic paradoxes that the minister has got himself into by insisting on being a sensible man, and yet maintaining that in a state you cannot create money.

Mr. Low: He wanted to have fun.

Mr. Blackmore: I realize he wanted to have some fun but it was a useful bit of fun to me. I think I shall refer to it once in a while. I quoted from Professor Plumptre's remarks to the effect that the Dominion of Canada itself created $200 million in the year 1939, and created it out of nothing.

Mr. Low: That was not good money.

Mr. Mitchell: I do not want to prolong the discussion but I say to my hon. friend that Germany created a billion dollars in 1923 and there were a quarter of a million suicides the year after. I was there; I know what I am talking about.

Mr. Blackmore: The minister reminds me of the Hon. C. A. Dunning, a former minister of finance who was in the house when I first came. You could not begin to talk of these things when Mr. Dunning was here without having him protest. The answer to what I am saying is not to bring in Germany's unfortunate experience, which can be explained easily enough. It is not appropriate that I explain the German inflation. I know about it. I know what caused it, and it was not the kind of thing that the minister implies. The simple fact is that Professor Plumptre tells us in definite words that $200 million was created out of nothing in Canada in the year 1939.

Mr. Low: And got the war started.

Mr. Blackmore: It was created after the war started. To save your life you could not have created it before the war started. If we had suggested to Mr. Dunning that he could create money he would have thrown up his hands in horror and would have almost fainted, because it would have caused inflation he would have said. When war came on created money did not cause inflation. It could be created for war. Is it not an amazing thing that it cannot be created for peace?

I think it is particularly appropriate to discuss this matter under the estimates of the Department of Labour because it affects the workingman and the production of the country more than any other single matter. As I said the other night, surely when we have our productive capacity right now at the point where we can produce more than we need, and are beginning to worry about where we are going to sell our products, the time has come to begin to think about amending our financial theories.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the hon member permit a question?

Mr. Blackmore: Gladly; more than the hon. member can ask.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I shall ask only one. The hon. member referred to Mr. Dunning. I wonder whether he has looked up the budget of early 1939, because if he does I think he will find that Mr. Dunning's views on the proper use of credit encouragement were perfectly—what shall I say—constructive. At the same time I think his views were perfectly consistent with the views which he held throughout and with the views later held by his department. I think it is only fair to that very distinguished former member of this house that that should be said.

Mr. Blackmore: Far be it from me to disparage Mr. Dunning, and far be it from me to disparage any good man. Yes, Mr. Dunning had correct ideas about finance and the expansion of credit. The trouble was that that good man did not know how to make them work in peacetime. The hon. member for Greenwood can contradict that if he wishes. The good man did not know how to make them work in peacetime. Let me put a question to the hon. member for Greenwood. He is a good man and very anxious to get at what is right. Let me ask him this important question. Between September 20, 1929, and September 30, 1933, $932 million was withdrawn from circulation in the Canadian economy, $932 million that the people needed to finance their business. From a financial point of view it was the withdrawal of that $932 million that caused in Canada, or accentuated, the depression. Can the hon. member for Greenwood answer the following question? If he can answer it—I know he cannot—I should like him to do it now. If he cannot do it now let him take time to think it over and we shall talk about it next year. The question I ask is this: Will he give us an idea of how the government of Canada between 1930 and 1933 should have proceeded to put back into circulation that $932 million, the withdrawal of which was disastrous to the Canadian economy?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I certainly landed myself into something when I asked my question, but I do not want to let it go entirely by default. I say this, as I have said before; I think we have all learned something since the early thirties, and I think that if a situation like that appeared again governments would be more constructive than they were then. Do not let anyone think that the ignorance or lack of knowledge was all on one side. We all shared that condition and we are all perfectly right to say that we have learned something since.

Mr. Low: Wonderful.

Mr. Blackmore: That is very good. If the hon. member for Greenwood would only just take the house into his confidence and give us an idea of what would be the nature of the constructive measures so that we could learn something of what he would do.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not making the speech; I am just answering the hon. member's question, and I am perfectly willing to say, as I have said before—there was an instance of it given, as I told the hon. member a few minutes ago. If he will look at the budget speech of 1939 he will find, if I remember correctly, that there was an instance given of it then. A stimulation of credit was brought forward by the finance minister of that day. I think I shall let the hon. member make the rest of his speech and I shall make mine at another time. I apologize for having intervened.

Mr. Mitchell: If I might rise to a point of order, we have been very tolerant. We have listened to a lecture from my hon. friend about funny money. If we are not careful we shall have a lecture from the next speaker on the birds and the bees. Someone else will get up and talk on something else. An hon. member close to me says that he has some sheep killers in his riding and he could make a speech on that subject. I think we have been very tolerant, sir.

Mr. Low: That is hard labour.

Mr. Mitchell: That is true. It might do some hon. members good if we had some hard labour. I think we should get along with my estimates.

Mr. Blackmore: Since the minister wants me to discontinue I do not care to carry on. May I suggest that twenty-five hon. members could rise in their places and advocate different forms of taxation increases, and the minister would not object; but the very minute that someone rises and advocates a policy which does not require taxation, immediately the minister wants to cut that discussion off, which once more raises a very serious question as to the genuine good sense of the minister.

I am going to ask the hon. member for Greenwood one question and then I shall thank you, sir, for your indulgence in this matter. I do not think it is out of order because the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Vancouver East were not called out of order because they advocated taxation. I am advocating a way of raising money without additional taxation. I am going to ask the hon. member for Greenwood a question and he can answer me now or he can give the answer when he makes his speech at a later time. Would he have favoured having the R. B. Bennett administration create say $500 million of debt-free money and spend it into circulation in reduced prices or in the payment of subsidies to primary producers? If he would, then indeed he has been learning.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I can answer that very easily; the answer is no. I agree with the Minister of Labour when he said that the printing press never produced anything that we can eat or wear.

Mr. Blackmore: I am thankful the hon. member for Greenwood raised the question. His answer shows conclusively that he has not learned one single thing, that he would be just as helpless as were those who ruled in R. B. Bennett's time when it came to putting back into circulation money to compensate for the $932 million which were withdrawn from circulation by the banking system between September 30, 1929, and September 30, 1933.

Mr. Low: The only difference between the hon. member for Greenwood and the hon. member for Lethbridge is that the hon. member for Greenwood wants the printing presses to turn out bonds.

Mr. Blackmore: The difference between the hon. member for Greenwood and myself is that he still thinks in terms of scarcity while I have learned something about how to enjoy the abundance that can be produced. I thank you once more for your indulgence. I shall discuss this matter a little later on. Before taking my seat may I say that unless we can solve this problem of distributing the abundance we can produce, unless we can so manage our money that we can have more of it the more things we produce, then we are just getting ready for the greatest depression of all time.

Mr. Gordon B. Isnor (Halifax): Mr. Chairman, I shall keep in mind the suggestion of the Minister of Labour that the next speaker should not speak of the birds and bees. I do not propose to follow the hon. member for Lethbridge in his Social Credit theories as I have not reached the state of prosperity that apparently has been reached by the hon. member. I am going to endeavour to be practical and deal with just one or two items.

I was pleased to note the broad manner in which the hon. member for Cape Breton South approached this question of social security. The hon. member and I do agree with each other once in a while. However, I am just wondering if labour did not go a little too far in pressing for pensions to begin at sixty-five years of age or earlier and thus bringing about a situation that is affecting labour itself. I throw that suggestion out to the hon. member so that he may think it over. In the next breath I want to say that I am in accord with the general principle as announced by him of social security for all. In this connection I should like to quote from a memorandum presented to the dominion government by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada on March 24, 1949, as follows:

> We desire to call attention to the increasing difficulty being experienced by those over forty years of age in securing employment. The Department of Labour has recognized this unfortunate condition and is doing a creditable job in its campaign for the "over forties." There is, however, a growing evil that must be recognized. A major factor in the resistance of industrial and commercial enterprise to the hiring of persons over forty years of age is the establishment of private pension plans in many industries.

I pause there for a moment to bring that statement forcibly to the attention of the minister. There is an ever-increasing demand for industrial pension schemes, but I submit that these should not be carried to a point where they become a burden on industry and thus defeat the purpose intended. I feel that a contributory scheme as suggested by the hon. member for Cape Breton South is on sounder ground. There should be a three-way contribution by the employee, the employer and the government, in much the same way as unemployment insurance is carried on. If that scheme is adopted I feel that we can look forward to the day when all those employed in industry and other types of employment will have that sense of security which they look forward to. The memorandum continues:

> The government itself is a contributing factor as it too refuses to bring employees under the scope of the Civil Service Act for similar reasons if they are over thirty-five years of age. However beneficial these limited pension schemes may be, they are acting as a deterrent to the employment of many persons over thirty-five years of age and thousands over forty years of age and are a real obstacle to the mobility of our working force.

I am going to ask the minister to pay particular attention to my next thought, which has to do with the type of employee we refer to as temporary or casual, the man who has reached the age of sixty-five years and even though he is not entitled to civil service benefits nevertheless is told by the government or others that his services are no longer required. During the war, order in council 4840 was passed to make it possible to continue that type of person in the employ of the government by extending his period of employment from year to year. I submit that the Minister of Labour should review that order in council and extend its provisions so that this type of person may be kept on until he reaches the age of seventy years.

There is a large number of employees who have given the best years of their lives to the government, but when they reach the age of sixty-five years they are told that their services are no longer required. The government is one of the large employers and I do not think it is fair that it should adopt this means of dispensing with the services of loyal employees, not because they are inefficient but simply because they have reached the age limit of sixty-five years.

There is another class of employee who I feel is discriminated against in respect to unemployment benefits. I refer to the waterfront worker. The port of Halifax is not looked upon as being an all-year-round port or place of employment. Our port is open winter and summer alike while other ports on the St. Lawrence are frozen up for the winter months. It is during the five months of the winter season that we can give employment to a large number. But what happens? As I recall, they must work 180 days out of one year as prescribed by the act. Otherwise they are not able to secure the benefits.

I suggest to the minister the limit of one year should be extended to two or possibly three years in which they can work the 180 days necessary to qualify for the benefits of unemployment insurance. I believe the minister is familiar with my representations in the past, but so far as I know no definite action has been taken up to the present time. I know that the waterfront workers of Halifax and other ports are waiting for a favourable decision from the minister as to this matter. I am hoping that he will consider today a good time to tell one of the members from Halifax that he need no longer worry in this respect, and that he can go back and tell the waterfront workers that the matter will be adjusted so that in the future the 180 days will extend over a period of two or three years.

I want to compliment the minister and his officials on the manner in which they have endeavoured to take care of older employees. Some time ago they issued a news release dealing with this matter in the following words:

> In recent years there has developed a considerable tendency for employers to emphasize youth in their selection of new employees. With the steady increase in the life expectancy of the average person, the proportion of our population forty-five years of age or older has reached approximately one-third. While older workers are found to lose or to leave their employment somewhat less frequently than their juniors, once they are out of work they are increasingly difficult to replace in jobs. These older workers possess desirable qualities of maturity, experience and stability. Their permanent retirement from employment would constitute a serious loss to the individuals concerned as well as to the national economy.

That emphasizes what I had in mind in bringing this matter to the attention of the minister. I feel that, while you have taken a step to make the situation known to employers, government branches have not taken advantage of your good advice to continue in employment the type of person to whom I have referred. I am pleased indeed to note that the hon. member for Cape Breton South recognized the fact that these large concerns do not always make the profit which he and his colleagues in the C.C.F. group are so apt to say that they do. He recognized it because he stated that he felt it should not be passed back entirely to the industry.

As I stated a moment ago, I feel that it should be a three-way proposition. Speaking personally for a moment, I know from experience that to get the best results from your employees you must give them a feeling of security. If you can create in their minds a feeling of future security, then you are going to get better results from them. A few years ago I inaugurated a pension scheme on a non-contributory basis which applies to all my employees over twenty-five years of age and up to fifty-five. I feel they would be more interested if they were contributing on a three-way basis, as I mentioned a moment ago. We also have the Blue Cross health plan which is a great factor in satisfying our help that they are being looked after. To my way of thinking, it is not an expenditure but rather a good investment, and I get a good return for it.

I feel that large firms which have endorsed and entered into pension schemes look at it in the same way. Therefore I am happy to support those who are advocating that we enter into a very much broader scheme of contributory social security measures. I could go on to deal with the system they have in the United States, but I know the minister is quite familiar with it, as he is with the workings of all labour organizations. I stated I proposed to speak only briefly, and I am going to leave these points with the minister in the hope that he will remedy one or two, and particularly the waterfront situation which I had in mind when I rose to address these few remarks to the Chair.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with the hon. member for Halifax in his endorsation of the hon. member for Cape Breton South advocating industrial pensions. I see the need for such a plan. Frankly, I tried to understand the argument of the hon. member for Lethbridge, which I presume was against the suggestion. It may be that I have not been here long enough, but I did not follow his argument clearly enough to understand what he was talking about. Possibly that may be because I am more accustomed to maritime language, and the language of the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the senior member for Halifax is quite direct on the point. I do not feel any necessity to labour the matter any further.

Mr. Blackmore: If the hon. member will permit me to put the record straight, may I say that I am entirely in favour of pensions. The only difference between me and the hon. member for Cape Breton South is that I favour a different method of financing them. It should not be done by additional taxation.

Mr. Higgins: I do not think it needs any further explanation. We are all agreed on the principle. It is only a question of how to finance it. It seems to me that the principle enunciated by the hon. member for Cape Breton South is a fair and reasonable one, and one that is easily understandable and workable. It is a three-way system involving contribution by the employee, contribution by the government and contribution by the employer. All the money that is being frittered away at the present time in numerous pension schemes all over Canada would be much better employed if it were controlled in some manner by the state, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South suggested. No workman wants to have to take an old age pension. It is a form of dole. When a workman finishes his period of labour he has earned the right to be kept. No matter how frugal a workman may be, it is very seldom that he is able to put by sufficient money to be able to keep himself when he is no longer able to work. The ordinary decent workman does not want to have to receive an old age pension, and he should not have to in a country such as Canada which is capable of producing sufficient money through the sale of its produce to ensure that all the people of the country will have the right to live out their lives in happiness, particularly when they come to the time when they are no longer able to produce.

For that reason I feel that the minister would do well to investigate the matter carefully. I know that for many years the hon. member for Cape Breton South has been connected with labour matters in a practical way. He has studied the subject carefully and he speaks with full knowledge. My own connection is comparatively short, and therefore my endorsation would not mean a great deal compared with his. But I point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that this policy has been adopted already by the party of which I have the honour to be a member, so with that endorsation I think we are all in agreement.

I am particularly worried about the situation that is developing in the province of Newfoundland, and that is what I want to direct the minister's attention to this afternoon. Hon. members are aware that we had hoped to substantially reduce the cost of living in our province as a result of confederation with Canada. The official cost of living index as at September 4, 1948, stood at 184·8. The same index as at September 3, 1949, was 173·4, showing a drop of 11 points. But that is not the real position at all; we all know that figures obtained in this manner are not the most reliable. I submit quite honestly from my knowledge of what has happened that if our cost of living has been reduced by five per cent that is as much as it has dropped.

Right now we are faced with growing unemployment all over the island. Recently the premier announced with a great flourish of trumpets that he would soon be making a statement concerning the iron ore of Labrador. Two days later he made that statement, and said work was going to be provided for ten thousand men. I am still worried, however, because the Financial Post of December 3 has this to say with respect to that announcement:

> New financing for Labrador-Quebec iron ore development from six major steel companies as announced this week by Jules R. Timmins . . . will be followed by an immediate start on the 360-mile railroad . . . Work this winter will be on the tote road—not the actual rail line.
> But it won't mean an immediate "10,000 new jobs for Canadians" as heralded this week.

That is very unfortunate; but we are also faced with the problem of secondary industries closing down. Only this week in reading the Newfoundland newspapers I saw that five secondary industries had closed within the last week or two. These include a mattress manufacturing plant, a shoe factory, an underwear factory, a clothing factory and a paper bag company. It is true that they do not employ large numbers of people, as compared with the big factories up here on the mainland, but every person who loses his employment makes the situation that much more serious. At the present time some five thousand workmen are in receipt of a kind of dole. It is supposed to be work, but actually it is a dole. They work a forty-eight hour week for $13.20, the theory being that they are to work for two months and then qualify for unemployment insurance. I do not know how that will work out, and I should like to ascertain whether that will be possible. These men work one day and give the next day's work for nothing; they do not get paid for the second day. I do not believe they will be able to work long enough to qualify for unemployment insurance. Just imagine, in this great country of ours, people getting $13.20 for a whole week's work. The only thing that can happen, the obvious thing, is that the family allowance cheques will be used for purposes not intended by the act. There is no question at all about it; it has to be that way.

Another matter I am afraid I will have to raise in this house is one I mentioned some time ago when I asked the Prime Minister what action was being taken with regard to the increasing unemployment in Newfoundland. At that time the right hon. gentleman replied that federal works were going to be expedited. Well, as far as I am concerned there is no question about the works being expedited, but this unemployment does not exist in only one part of my province; it is all over the country. The major centres such as Corner Brook and Grand Falls would not be as severely affected. I noticed this week that the plant at Grand Falls is going on a five-day shift, while the sulphite mill at Corner Brook is getting ready to close; but those centres are not so badly affected as the capital city and the settlements around the coast. The public works that are to be undertaken and some of which are actually under way in order to combat unemployment have been allocated by districts, and the district of Burin-Burgeo is to receive $109,735.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, when my estimates are before the committee the hon. gentleman will have ample opportunity to speak about public works. Now we are discussing the labour estimates; and I would not be ready at this time to answer questions because my officials are not here.

Mr. Higgins: I am not going to ask any questions. I have the answers in a return I received the other day.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): But these matters should be brought up on my estimates, when I will have all the answers to any questions which may be asked. I do not think it is in order to discuss my estimates on the labour estimates.

Mr. Higgins: I am discussing unemployment, and surely it is proper to draw attention to what is happening down there and the need for such works in a particular district. Is there any objection?

The Chairman: The hon. member must discuss the estimates of the Department of Labour.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): There certainly is an objection to a discussion of my estimates at this time.

Mr. Higgins: Then without asking any questions I shall simply point out that of an expenditure of $359,000, only $11,000 has been allocated to the constituency of St. John's East.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Probably that is because it has less unemployment.

Mr. Higgins: That is not where there is less unemployment. The two constituencies of St. John's West and East are to get $40,000 between them, and those are the two districts which did not elect Liberal candidates. That is why so little money has been allotted to them; I cannot see any other reason. We do have unemployment there, and I am drawing this to the attention of the Minister of Labour to see if something cannot be done to take care of that unemployment. I am not asking for answers from the Minister of Public Works, but I do advocate most earnestly that in the distribution of unemployment assistance, which the Prime Minister suggested was being done through expediting public works, at least they should be distributed all over the island.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On another point of order, Mr. Chairman, public works is not the department which was set up to deal with unemployment. If the hon. member reads the act he will see that our jurisdiction is confined to public buildings belonging to the federal government and to works along the coasts and rivers. There is no suggestion that my department should put up post offices or other buildings in order to relieve unemployment. That is not the purpose of the public works department.

Mr. Higgins: I am not talking about that. I say these public works should have been distributed fairly.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We can discuss that on my estimates.

Mr. Higgins: I am quite aware of that. I am merely bringing this definitely to the attention of the minister because of our position in Newfoundland. During the depression years the incidence of tuberculosis became very high. If in that province now we are to have unemployment, with people unable to obtain food, the tuberculosis that we have been trying to control as best we might will make great inroads on the population again. Only recently I read in one of the Toronto newspapers that some resident of that city objected to people from Newfoundland coming up to this part of the country without being X-rayed. He said that before confederation they had to be X-rayed, and now they are coming in there without being X-rayed.

The Chairman: Order. I do not think the hon. member is speaking to the item.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member is certainly far away from matters concerning the labour department.

Mr. Higgins: If I am, I shall conclude in a moment. I am only asking the question with a view to ascertaining whether some other assistance can be given to combat this unemployment which is so rampant.

Mr. Mitchell: I should like to tell my hon. friend that since April, 1949, until today, this department has spent approximately one million dollars in unemployment insurance in the province of Newfoundland. It is running at the rate of $53,000 per week right now, and that is not chicken feed.

Mr. Higgins: I am not saying it is not. I am saying that most of these unemployment insurance benefits have now expired, and the people who were receiving them are still out of work. Under the plan for union, the people who were out of work were given six months' unemployment insurance, which is now exhausted, and those people still have not found work. I am not ungrateful for the benefits we have received under confederation; I am not unmindful of that. I would be obliged, however, if the minister could answer my question on unemployment conditions in my province.

Mr. Thatcher: I only want two minutes of the minister's time. I should like to ask him—

Mr. Mitchell: I should not do this. Everybody is bursting forth into song, but perhaps that is because it is Saturday afternoon. I thought we would have a discussion on broad principles, such as those discussed by the member for Cape Breton South and the member for Vancouver East, when they talked about communism in trade unions. I thought such speeches might be delivered on the main item, then the questions could be asked on the various items. It is a physical impossibility for me to remember all the points raised by my hon. friends this afternoon. I shall do the best I can to answer them.

Mr. Thatcher: I thought the minister wanted to save some time, and that is why I said I would only take two minutes.

Mr. Mitchell: I know my friend's two minutes.

Mr. Thatcher: There is one point which concerns the municipality from which I come, and that is relief costs for unemployment. I took this matter up with the minister before, and he has definite views on it. Possibly his views are right but I do not believe so. Back in the depression years, a great many municipalities in Saskatchewan and across Canada went bankrupt because they were keeping so many people on relief. The costs of that relief were almost prohibitive.

Once again we are starting to see unemployment in various sections of the country today. As yet it is not serious, but it may become serious. Various municipal councils are worried about the fact that the federal government is not paying part of the costs of keeping those people today. The minister will say that we have unemployment insurance today, and rightly so. It is a great step forward since the last depression, but only a step. After a few months the unemployment insurance benefits are exhausted, and those people have to draw the dole. At the present time, the only source from which that assistance comes is the municipality or the province.

My point is this. Within a month or two, we are having a dominion-provincial conference, and surely that would be the appropriate time to discuss what can be done in sharing the costs of relief between the three levels of government. I feel very strongly, Mr. Chairman, that relief or welfare costs of that sort are not the responsibility of the various municipalities. I warn the minister of something he knows better than I do, and that is that unless the federal government is prepared to pay some part of the relief costs we are going to see hundreds of municipalities in bankruptcy again when the next depression comes. Moose Jaw had 6,000 people on relief out of 20,000 in the thirties and went bankrupt. Swift Current and Prince Albert went bankrupt. I do not want to see that happen again.

I am hoping the minister will offer some solution at the dominion-provincial conference, which would enable the federal government to help pay a part of that cost.

Mr. Mitchell: I want to say this to my hon. friend right away, that I think I know something about conditions that existed in Saskatchewan during the years he was probably at school. I do not say that disrespectfully. The finances of the province of Saskatchewan have never been better in their history; employment in Saskatchewan is as high as in any province in the Dominion of Canada at the moment. The hon. member talks as though we were standing on the brink of a precipice.

Mr. Thatcher: No; on a point of order, I am afraid of what may happen if another depression comes.

Mr. Mitchell: The trouble with people who express such opinions is that they are afraid the sun will not shine tomorrow morning. During the war I had to listen to complaints about the shortage of manpower. This government was criticized because some men had the courage to go and fight, so that freedom, as we understand it, could endure. I went through that. Ever since the end of the war, these people have been predicting such terrible times.

In my department, I have a research staff. The year before last, they predicted fairly accurately what employment conditions in the Dominion of Canada would be. They predicted fairly accurately what would happen last year, and I expect the same will be true of this year. It may be that the third time their judgment will be wrong, owing to some possible international complication; I do not know. I think the best way to ensure bad conditions in the country is to keep on talking about them. I shudder to think what would happen to this country, or to freedom as we understand it, if, during the war years, the people who had the responsibility which some of us bore had taken the negative position which some of my hon. friends take upon occasion. I am hopeful. I am an optimist, like the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am not looking forward to the conditions which some people predict for this country. I have never taken that view. I take the opposite view, and I think it is a good thing that most of the Canadian people share my view.

Mr. Thatcher: Perhaps the minister did not understand me. I quite frankly admit that I am surprised that the government has done as well as it has since the war in keeping full employment. I am surprised, and I admit it. But that does not mean that we should not profit from our experience in the last depression. The various city councils are writing to the members to say they are worried about relief costs growing to a greater extent than they can afford. All I am suggesting to the minister is that we should prepare for a depression in case it does come. I hope it does not arrive. These municipal councils are worried. The minister will see a great many municipalities go bankrupt once again unless some federal source of revenue is available to help carry these relief costs.

Mr. Mitchell: Does my hon. friend know what the relief costs were in Moose Jaw last month?

Mr. Thatcher: No, I do not.

Mr. Mitchell: I thought so.

Mr. Thatcher: My city council wrote asking me to take this matter up with the minister. I am sure he does not resent it, because he knows I am doing what I was asked to do. They are quite concerned because Moose Jaw was one of the cities which did go bankrupt. It is one of the cities which is on the borderline now, and substantial relief costs would put it into bankruptcy again.

Mr. Knowles: It was my intention to make a speech on this item, but I am prepared to forgo it, providing I can protect my right to speak on matters having to do with fair wage provisions and so on, on item 144 and on some of the other items. That is all I want to say, except for one other point; I had hoped that the minister might answer some of the questions that have been asked. He will probably deal with them as we come to the items if we remind him about them.

I do not, however, see where he might answer the questions asked by the senior member for Halifax with respect to the question having to do with the employment of people over forty, except on this item.

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): I do not intend to speak for long, Mr. Chairman. If you cannot say what you want to say in twenty minutes, I believe you should not get on your feet.

Mr. Harkness: You have been getting up at the wrong time, then.

Mr. Mitchell: I believe that also. More people talk themselves out of this place than ever talked themselves into it.

Mr. Harkness: Give us a demonstration.

Mr. Mitchell: Just look at me. The first question raised by the hon. member for Calgary West, the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Vancouver East was with regard to communism in trade unions. I think that events have vindicated the position taken by all parties in the house on that problem when we framed the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, leaving it to the trade unions themselves to discipline these people within their own ranks, having regard to the educational facilities that are provided by adopting a policy of that description. I think it is far better to do that than to pass laws such as those that are in force in some countries, although we were strongly advised to do so. My hon. friends who have lived in the same atmosphere as I have lived practically all my life know quite well that you cannot declare an organization illegal, particularly when you are dealing with communists who have no morality whatsoever, and where they change the name of their organizations every day in the week to suit their purposes. I think it might also be truthfully said that the industrial conditions in this country have vindicated the sound common sense shown by all of us in the framing of that legislation. Everybody did not get his own way. As I have said before, this is the genius of our constitution which is based on the spirit of compromise.

The question of industrial pensions was mentioned, I believe, by the senior member for Halifax and by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I am speaking now as an individual. I think the position taken by both of my hon. friends is a sound one, in that once you make an agreement with a private employer for a pension scheme, there is no guarantee that that business will be in existence ten years from now. I do not care who it is, there is no guarantee. A representative of one of the largest corporations in North America came to see me not long ago, as both sides have been coming to see me for advice or otherwise—and sometimes otherwise.

Mr. Knowles: Which did they get?

Mr. Mitchell: They got the best advice I could give them; and I might say that it does not cost them anything. You can get a great deal of advice that you pay plenty of money for; you can get advice of the character that you want to hear, and you pay well for it.

Mr. Knowles: "If it is not hard to get, it is not worth anything" is the minister's motto.

Mr. Mitchell: I agree with my hon. friend that there is no guarantee that the largest corporation in North America will be in existence ten years from now. There may be mistakes on either side that will send these companies into liquidation, and all their schemes will fall to the ground. Do not forget this fact also. No one yet has ever sat down and figured out, on the basis of the purchasing power of the dollar, whether the economy of North America can stand a pension plan of $100 a month. What I mean is this. I have been in trade unions when we set up insurance schemes, with all the best intentions in the world, and found that we reached a stage where the schemes were proved to be actuarily unsound in the light of experience. That is why I believe in the contributory system under the state itself.

I think that what we all should do is this. All these things must be paid for. I think the recipients should know the cost before they go into any undertaking of that description. In my judgment, there is a limit to taxation of the individual. I am not speaking as some people do. I am speaking of the individual and the producer; that is who pays. In all these schemes of social welfare, it is a matter of distribution of the national wealth. Following the suggestion of the hon. member for Lethbridge, if you get the old printing press out, you can guarantee any amount of pension; all you have to do is to turn the handle. But in so doing you reduce the real value of the pension that was promised when the scheme went into operation.

I cannot quarrel with the approach of the hon. member for York South to the question of education. I can truthfully say that I arrived in Canada on Wednesday evening, got a job on Thursday morning, and have never been out of work for one day since then. As I have said before, I may have been fortunate, but I came with a good trade in my hands. Somebody must do the work in a nation. Everybody cannot go to university. More fools come out of universities than ever came out of technical schools.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Take that back.

Mr. Mitchell: No, I will not take it back. The woods are full of what I call economic and financial crackpots, and in my judgment they got the world into more trouble than the working people ever did. One need only go to some of these international conferences and take a look at these international gypsies who roam around all over the world from conference to conference. That is why I am a great believer in technical education. Recently I was in Vancouver when they opened a magnificent technical school there. Strange to say, I opened a technical school in Victoria. I thought I would never live to see the day when a technical school would be opened in the city of Victoria. That just shows the development that has taken place; and in every province in Canada I think it has been quickened by the leadership given by the parliament of Canada in connection with technical education. My mind goes back to the establishment of the first royal commission on technical education. I knew some of the members of that commission which brought about the Vocational Education Act and made possible to a large degree the establishment of technical institutions in Canada.

In passing let me say also, if I may be permitted to do so in a humble way, that I was secretary of the national labour supply council, which worked out the principles underlying the war training that was given. After the fall of France in 1940 in co-operation with the municipalities and provinces, we set in motion a scheme that made possible the education, in a technical sense, of the men and women engaged in war industries and also those in the armed forces. I pay this tribute to the three divisions of government—the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion. I think it is only fair to say that in passing.

Most of the other matters will come up in detail on the estimates.

Mr. Noseworthy: What about the increased grant?

Mr. Mitchell: What grant is that?

Mr. Noseworthy: The grant recommended by the council.

Mr. Mitchell: Do you mean the resolution you read?

Mr. Noseworthy: Yes.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend can rest assured that, as far as I personally am concerned, I will see that it is considered by the government. I will play my part in that regard. I think that is all I shall say at the moment. I have spoken in general terms of the basic principles raised by my hon. friends in this discussion. I do not know whether I have missed anything. If I have, perhaps they will remind me of it when we get into the items.

Mr. Isnor: What about the question I asked?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. member is speaking of the longshoremen.

Mr. Isnor: Yes.

Mr. Mitchell: The question is being studied at the moment.

Mr. Isnor: And favourable consideration is being given to it?

Mr. Mitchell: Well—

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister answer the other question asked by the senior member for Halifax? He asked whether the Department of Labour was drawing to the attention of other departments of government his recommendations with respect to the employment of people over forty.

Mr. Mitchell: That is generally understood. I would say that I do not have to draw it to anyone's attention. Everybody knows the problem. I think it can be said that through the unemployment offices great strides have been made in an educational way to assist those older people in obtaining employment, and also the handicapped. We have gone a long way in the last ten years in that regard. May I say also that employers lack judgment when they will not employ a person because he is forty years of age. In most cases the person is married and has all the stability that goes with that. They are trying to raise a family. I hope that the discussion here today will raise the question in an educational way right across the dominion.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not mind the Minister of Labour being vague in answering questions and in being adept at covering them up with aphorisms, maxims, clichés and all that sort of thing.

Mr. Graydon: Those are big words.

Mr. MacInnis: I have been associating with government departments for a long, long time. I know how far you can get in a government department if you have not a university education, in spite of all the fools that come out of the universities.

Mr. Graydon: It is contagious.

Mr. MacInnis: You cannot come in contact with people without partaking somewhat of their character, although I hope I shall not get like the Minister of Labour. What I object to the Minister of Labour doing, and what he is not going to get away with, is this. When I draw to his attention the growing unemployment situation in the province from which I come, and which he cannot deny, he says that I am hoping for a bad unemployment situation throughout the country. That is a vile slander which I am not going to take from the Minister of Labour or from anyone else. I am just as good and as reasonable a citizen as the Minister of Labour, if I am not quite so comfortable, and my word and my character go just as far with those who know me as those of the Minister of Labour. I am just as much in favour of order and stability as he is. Perhaps I can see more clearly, because when I go home to my constituency and people call up and ask if they can come to see me to talk about their old age pension, the need for employment assistance or about a dozen and one different things that the poor need, I am so close to them that they can reach me without a telegram that I need not answer if I do not want to.

Mr. Mitchell: I want to say this to my hon. friend. I think he took too much upon himself. I was casting no reflection on the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. MacInnis: A reflection should not be cast on anybody.

Mr. Mitchell: I am speaking in the singular now, not in the plural.

Mr. Knowles: Is that because of your university education?

Mr. Mitchell: I have not done so badly without one.

Mr. Higgins: I should like the minister to answer my question. Perhaps I did not frame it very well. Under the present scheme of work in Newfoundland will the workers be eligible for unemployment assistance? If so, how long will they have to work before they can get it?

Mr. Mitchell: Newfoundland, of course, is under a special arrangement which was made when they came into union. The sum of $3 million was voted this year.

Mr. Higgins: I thought it was $2 million.

Mr. Mitchell: An additional million appears in the supplementary estimates, making $3 million. With regard to the public works program to which my hon. friend refers, I have not a great deal of knowledge of it except what I have read in the newspapers. The hon. member can rest assured that the people who qualify under the regulations will get the benefit just as though they had made the 180 payments which individuals make in the rest of Canada.

Mr. Higgins: They work one day free, and that is what I was asking about.

Mr. Thatcher: Perhaps the minister will answer my question. If he has answered it I did not understand him. Will he say whether the government will consider at the present time paying any portion of relief costs? If they will not, will they consider discussing the matter at the dominion-provincial conference? Or is it a closed subject at the moment so far as the government is concerned?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend is asking me to do something that I cannot do. The chain of correspondence is not between the federal government and the municipalities; it is between the federal government and the provincial government. There is nothing evasive about that. The municipalities are the children of the provincial governments. I could not tell him whether it is to be discussed at the conference. That conference has to do with the respective powers of the dominion and the provinces and the amending of the British North America Act. In that connection I have my own views on some things.

Mr. Thatcher: So far as the government is concerned it will not consider any portion of relief costs.

Mr. Mitchell: I have not said that.

Mr. Thatcher: You are not paying it, then?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Thatcher: I should like an answer.

Mr. Mitchell: I am not sticking my neck into that noose, and that is understandable.

Mr. Thatcher: I do not think it is an unreasonable question. Municipalities in Canada have substantial relief costs. They would like to know whether the federal government will pay some share. Will the minister say that the federal government is considering paying a portion of relief costs at the present time? Yes or no?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Thatcher: No.

The Deputy Chairman: May I point out to the hon. member that he has asked the question three times.

Mr. Thatcher: I know, but I have not received an answer.

The Deputy Chairman: The minister has answered three times. I do not know when we are going to stop.

Mr. Thatcher: Will the minister answer?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member is not satisfied with his answer.

The Deputy Chairman: Sometimes it is difficult to obtain the answer that one would like to get.

Mr. Thatcher: Then I take it the minister will not answer.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. member can stand there until the resurrection, but I have answered him.

Mr. Thatcher: What was the answer?

Mr. Mitchell: The answer is that I am not the government; I am merely a member of the government. I cannot speak for the government.

Mr. Thatcher: Cannot the minister say yes or no?

Mr. Mitchell: As you get older you learn, my boy.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Has the minister any statement to make with respect to the unemployment situation in Nova Scotia and in New Brunswick as compared with a year ago? The impression I get from the information that comes to me is that there is a general deterioration in employment in Nova Scotia. In some sections the situation is alarming. What reports does the minister get from that part of Canada?

Mr. Mitchell: As my hon. friend knows, there are spotty unemployment conditions in the maritimes. A special committee has been set up to study the matter. I can go that far with my hon. friend.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Are any plans under way to provide more employment in those spotty places in that part of Canada? Have any steps been taken to transfer the people who are out of employment in those spotty places in Nova Scotia to other parts of Canada where employment is available?

Mr. Mitchell: I will answer the last question first. We have endeavoured to do that several times and have not been very successful. Apparently they like to live in Nova Scotia rather than in other parts of Canada, and I can understand that from what I have seen of some parts of the province.

[Mr. Thatcher.]

Item agreed to.

143. Annuities Act, $785,871.

Mr. Knowles: The minister will recall that in April, 1948, the government passed an order in council changing the interest rate with respect to annuities which had the effect of increasing the cost to the purchaser. A little later in that session there was a debate on a bill to amend the Annuities Act. That debate was not concluded because in due course the Minister of Trade and Commerce moved the adjournment of the debate and it was not resumed.

During the course of that debate and also another debate with respect to the Annuities Act which we had on a motion to go into supply, the action of the government in raising the cost of annuities was opposed quite forcibly. On June 30, the last day of the session, the minister announced that at the next session a special committee would be set up to deal with the Annuities Act. When the next session came along I asked him if it was intended to carry out that promise. The answer I received was somewhat evasive. However, when I asked the same question at the beginning of this session there was nothing evasive about the answer. The minister's answer was quite clear and direct; he said no. I felt, and so said at the time, that that was breaking a definite promise because the minister had told us in plain language on June 30, 1948, that a special committee would be set up. It looked as though the promise to set up a committee grew out of the discussion on this matter and the dissatisfaction that was felt regarding the increased cost of annuities. I think it was unfair, I think it was a mistake, and it certainly was a broken promise for the government not to go ahead with the setting up of that committee. I am going to ask the minister now if consideration will be given to setting up such a committee at the next session.

Mr. Mitchell: I do not think the hon. member should be too quick in talking about broken promises. A man may say a thing but in the light of experience it may turn out six months later that he was wrong. I have a recollection of what I said at the last session.

Mr. Knowles: And the session before that.

Mr. Mitchell: We went through an election and my hon. friend will remember that it was a very hot summer. I do not know whether he suffered from the heat, but I certainly did.

Mr. Knowles: It was pretty warm out our way.

Mr. Mitchell: I guess it was. My hon. friend will remember the reduction in the interest rate from 4 to 3 per cent. I was informed at that time by my actuaries that unless that reduction was made there would be a deficit of $150 million in the fund in the course of the next ten years. It was pointed out that at that time government bonds were paying 3 per cent and it was felt that you could not differentiate between two classes in the community. It was suggested that the insurance companies had made representations, but if they did those representations were not made to me.

It is a great responsibility to have under your direction trust funds belonging to other people. I quite appreciate that it might be argued that the people of Canada can pay if mistakes have been made, but I do not think that that is the right approach to it. I have always taken the view that these annuities should be on a sound actuarial basis as far as was humanly possible. There are many arguments that can be advanced in connection with the interest rate, but it must be remembered that the cost of administration is paid by the Canadian government. My hon. friend can rest assured that this question along with others is being studied at the moment.

This has been a short and heavy session and, in the very nature of things, first things have had to come first. As the government, we had to take the responsibility of introducing legislation which we thought could be passed during this short session. I hope it will soon be over; otherwise we shall have a Christmas tree on the floor of this House of Commons. I am hoping that we shall all get home for Christmas.

Mr. Knowles: The minister did not answer my question. I asked about the committee; I did not ask him to defend the action taken by the government in the order in council passed in April, 1948. He has tried to defend that action, which I think was indefensible. I am willing to argue the point; I am also willing just to state that I think that action was wrong. But I am asking whether consideration will be given to setting up the committee which was promised on June 30, 1948.

Mr. Mitchell: I would say yes.

Mr. McLure: Are these annuities sold by salaried salesmen or commission salesmen? I notice there is an item of $324,000 paid as commissions.

Mr. Mitchell: They are sold on commission.

Mr. McLure: No salaried men at all?

Mr. Mitchell: No.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Many people throughout the country know very little about this system of annuities and I wonder if the minister would not consider putting on an extensive advertising campaign. Most of the farmers throughout the country know nothing about this system of annuity. I suggest that the billboards, the radio and other advertising media be used.

Mr. Mitchell: A total of $50,000 is being spent this year for advertising.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I hope some of it will be spent in the northwestern part of the country.

Mr. Harkness: I endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Cariboo. I think much more could be done to make the people of this country aware of this annuities scheme. How successful has the scheme been during the past year? Has there been any decrease in the annuities sold due to the reduced interest rate? I notice there is a small increase in the appropriation but that would not necessarily indicate that more business is being done.

Mr. Mitchell: Since the reduction in the interest rate there has been a decrease of around 50 per cent, speaking from memory.

Mr. Harkness: That would seem to be sufficient indication that the reduction in the interest rate was a mistake as far as this scheme to enable people to secure their own old age is concerned. The committee which was asked for should certainly be set up early in the next session so that it could go into this matter and possibly recommend that the interest rate be increased or other measures be taken which would increase the popularity of these annuities. I think all will agree that the more people who take advantage of a scheme such as this and thereby look after their own future needs, their own old age, the less burden there will be upon the taxpayer and the state.

Mr. Mitchell: I want to say this to my hon. friend, if I may, that at the moment at 3 per cent, with the administrative cost borne by the people of Canada, it is the cheapest form of insurance in the dominion.

Mr. Johnston: I remember quite well when the interest rate was reduced. I was opposed to it then, and I am opposed to its continuing at a low rate now for the very obvious reason that it is the only form of investment in which the ordinary man has a chance to put his money with the hope of providing for his old age. There is no other form of investment available to the ordinary man. The ordinary man is not in a position to lend moneys on house mortgages. The mortgage companies, loan companies and insurance companies are so organized that they can lend their moneys at 6, 7 and 8 per cent.

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Johnston: Almost anywhere.

An hon. Member: Five per cent.

Mr. Johnston: Come on out to the west.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): It is 5 per cent in Calgary.

Mr. Johnston: The point is that these institutions are so organized that they can do that. At the moment I am not saying whether or not it is the right thing, although I can very easily do so. I think it is decidedly too high, but the point is that the ordinary man is not in a position to do that. Annuity investment was the only thing available to him in order that he might provide for himself in his old age. The very fact that the business in annuities has dropped practically 50 per cent, as the minister has just indicated, shows that the ordinary person has been deprived of that form of security. The very purpose of annuities was to give these people the assurance that they would be taken care of in their old age. Fifty per cent more people are going to be dependent on some form of charity in their old age because the government reduced the interest rate, and thus prevented them from taking out insurance in the form of annuities.

It is true they can purchase dominion government bonds and get 3 per cent, but it is not always easy to get hold of them. Government bonds do not go on paying interest in perpetuity for the safekeeping of the individual. Annuities were the only form of saving for such individuals, and now they have been deprived of that because the interest rate was lowered. I fully support having a special committee at the next session of the house to go into the question of annuities once again in order to see if it is not possible to reinstate the interest rate so that our people will be encouraged to invest in them to take care of themselves in their old age instead of having to rely on charity. I think it would be a fine thing if a committee were set up at the next session of parliament to go into the matter most thoroughly.

Mr. Brooks: Business has decreased by 50 per cent, and I should like to ask the minister why it is that the number of employees in that branch of his department has increased from twenty-eight to thirty-seven. I notice that where there were five principal clerks before there are now six; where there were two clerks, grade 4, there are now five; where there were four clerks, grade 3, there are now seven; where there was one clerk, grade 2, there are now six; and where there were two stenographers there are now three. I wonder why there has been such an increase in the personnel of the branch and at the same time a great decrease in the business.

Mr. Mitchell: The answer to that is quite simple. We are trying to develop a group plan, and the staff was necessary to survey group insurance.

Mr. Brooks: Less work, more employees.

Mr. Mitchell: Not necessarily.

Item agreed to.

144. Fair wages, conciliation, industrial relations, industrial disputes investigations, including the administration of legislation relating thereto, and for activities re promotion of co-operation in industry between labour and management, $308,617.

Mr. Knowles: When we were on the administration item I offered to omit my general speech, at the same time protecting my right to raise a couple of matters on this item which are related to it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Are you going to make a general speech now?

Mr. Knowles: No, it will be quite specific.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I was going to ask you to excuse me if you were.

Mr. Knowles: No, I would much rather have my friend from Calgary West remain here. I assure him I shall deal with a very specific matter, and I think he will support what I say. The other day I referred to the fact that there are times when workers on federal government projects have difficulty in getting the full advantage of provincial labour legislation. I said I had a letter upstairs. The quickest way to deal with the matter is to read the letter.

Mr. Mitchell: Could you outline it?

Mr. Knowles: It would take longer to outline it than it would to read it. It is addressed to Mr. D. Swailes, M.L.A., at Winnipeg, and was written to him by the Hon. Charles E. Greenlay, minister of labour of the province of Manitoba. It is dated November 2, 1949, and reads:

Dear Sir:

I have your letter of November 1. Provincial legislation cannot bind the Dominion of Canada, hence the Manitoba Vacations with Pay Act cannot be "violated"—

The word "violated" is in quotation marks; that is an interesting use of that word.

—by military authorities in their employment of civilian personnel. It is my impression that some unions have been able to negotiate with the military authorities for voluntary recognition of benefits accruing under provincial legislation. Where the dominion voluntarily undertakes to meet standards appearing in provincial legislation and regulation, the provincial authorities acquire no status to enforce these standards; therefore correspondence on the subject should be addressed to the dominion department concerned.

Yours very truly,

Charles E. Greenlay,
Minister of Labour

I recognize the constitutional position implied in that letter, but it seems to me that, in view of the fact we have reached the stage where we have fair wage provisions, the federal government should lean over backwards to see to it not only that such provisions are lived up to but that the rights accorded to workers in the provinces are fully enjoyed when they are engaged on federal projects. This has to do with work under the Department of National Defence. Surely it is the job of the Minister of Labour to try to persuade his colleagues, the heads of the other departments, to go the whole way in seeing to it that provincial rights accorded to labour are met when people are working on federal projects.

The particular matter in hand was the implementation of the Manitoba Vacations with Pay Act. Since it has been said today that the minister has not so much to do these days, I urge him to interest himself in the matter, and to try to get provincial rights accepted without question and recognized on all federal projects.

Mr. Mitchell: I should like to point out to my friend that I have plenty to do. It is a misstatement of fact that I have not much to do.

Mr. Knowles: I merely had in mind the fact that it was said several times to the minister this morning that he was not having as difficult a time as he had a few years ago.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He said he had been lazy in the last year.

Mr. Knowles: I thought it would be a good idea to keep him on his toes. I turn now to a matter concerning which I have had correspondence with the Minister of Labour. It grew out of my receiving from the president of the Winnipeg and district trades and labour council, Mr. Andrew Murphy, a copy of a letter which he wrote to the Minister of Labour on October 24. It is a long one so I will summarize it. The burden of the letter was that certain government bus contracts had been withdrawn from a union shop in Winnipeg with which contracts had been placed during the war years, and they were being given to a non-union shop in the same city. Mr. Murphy asked the minister to use his good offices to see that dominion government contracts were placed with union shops paying good wages rather than with non-union shops. I wrote the minister on October 26 endorsing the representations made by Mr. Murphy, and had a reply from the minister dated October 29 in which he said:

Dear Mr. Knowles:

In reply to your letter of October 26, I would say that I have heard from Mr. Murphy on the subject matter of your letter and have acknowledged his letter and expressed my thanks for the trouble he has gone to in putting the matter before me.

I wish to also thank you. Of course you will realize that the matter does not come within the purview of my department. Nevertheless, having your views will be helpful.

Yours sincerely,

(Signed) Humphrey Mitchell

As the minister will realize, that letter did not tell me very much. I felt that at least he could have found out which department of government had placed these contracts, and I had dared hope he might go still further and try to persuade whatever department it was to continue to place contracts with the union shops concerned, as they had been placed during the war. So I wrote the minister again on November 2, in reply to his letter of October 29, asking this question:

Could you advise me which department it is that has placed these contracts?

The minister wrote me in reply on November 5:

Dear Mr. Knowles:

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of the second instant with further reference to representations made by the president of Winnipeg and district trades and labour council concerning a government contract placed with an automobile and truck body plant in Winnipeg.

I am sorry that I am unable to inform you as to the department of government which has placed the contract in question. This department receives information as to the number and aggregate value of contracts for supplies and equipment awarded by the Canadian Commercial Corporation, post office, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, etc., which are subject to the government's fair wages policy in respect of such work. However, these reports do not contain any breakdown showing the exact type of contract or information as to the recipient firm which would enable us to identify individual contracts.

Yours sincerely,

(Signed) Humphrey Mitchell

I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I was disappointed and in fact annoyed that the minister, having had this matter brought to his attention and being the minister who should be interested in taking steps to see that the government's fair wage policy is lived up to, could not find out for me even after three letters, one from the president of the Winnipeg and district trades and labour council and two from me, which department had placed these contracts. It so happens that the letter I just read mentions the very corporation that did place the contracts, as I have since found out. In order to find out, however, I had to go through the routine of putting a question on the order paper and in due course, today as a matter of fact, sessional paper No. 168 was tabled. The Secretary of State had to write to every department of government asking if they knew anything about these questions I had asked; and from this file of correspondence it turns out that the contracts concerned had been let by the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

If I am not mistaken that corporation comes under the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am going to send this sessional paper across to the minister in order to save time. I asked about the contracts in question for the years 1947, 1948 and 1949, and the information makes it quite clear that in November of 1948 the last small contract was let to the union shop concerned—the one which had given good service during the war, and that beginning in November, 1948, substantial contracts began to be let to the non-union shop in question, which since that time have amounted to a total of $472,866.89.

I do not know what the minister's answer will be. He may tell me that I should not ask him to interfere in what is done by his friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but I remind him that he is the Minister of Labour; he is the man who should see to it that the fair wage principles that have been established are lived up to. As a trade unionist surely he should be interested in seeing to it that work of this kind is left with a union shop, as was the case previously. This was not an instance in which the Winnipeg and district trades and labour council asked that contracts be transferred from one shop to another. They were simply asking that the contracts be left where they had been all through the war years. I would appreciate it if the minister would deal with these matters now, for it does seem to me that he has some responsibility in connection with them.

Mr. Mitchell: My responsibility extends this far. The Canadian Commercial Corporation is the agent which lets contracts for the Department of National Defence; and if my hon. friend will look up the contract in question he will find that it contains a fair-wage clause. I assume this other firm had the lowest tender. Let us be clear about that; there must have been a fair-wage clause in the contract. I do not know what the fair wage would be there, but when requested by other departments my department does set up fair-wage conditions in the area.

That is the answer to the first point. The second point had to do with holidays with pay in the building trades, if I remember rightly. When the federal government lets a contract the provincial legislation prevails. If the men are employees of the federal government—that is, if they are labourers—they come under the regulations of the federal department and of course are not under the jurisdiction of the provincial government, any more than the employees of a provincial government are under the jurisdiction of this department.

Mr. Knowles: There is a great deal of sweetness and light around here today, but I confess I do not feel that way. The correspondence I have read to the committee indicates that the minister did not know anything about this contract and was not even prepared to find out for me which department had let it. I was put to the trouble of having to place a question on the order paper, and the Secretary of State was put to the trouble of having to go through the routine of preparing the sessional paper that was tabled today. Now the minister rises in his place and says he knows there is a fair wage clause in that contract which was let by the Canadian Commercial Corporation. I remind him that the complaint made to him by the Winnipeg and district trades and labour council, which I supported, had to do with the fact that the shop which formerly had the contract was a union shop, paying not just the fair wages that are required by the provincial legislation as a sort of minimum but paying the trade union wage. From that shop the contract was taken away and given to a shop that may pay the fair wages required by Manitoba legislation, but wages which are less than the trade union wages in this industry. Frankly the minister's answer is not satisfactory.

Mr. Mitchell: It may not be satisfactory to you, but I am not going to take that from you or anybody else. I believe the fair wage policy of the federal government has put millions of dollars into the pockets of the working people of this country. There was a fair-wage clause in the contract, and those fair wages are worked out by my department. I have an office in Winnipeg. If when my hon. friend wrote to me he had been clearer, he would have obtained the information he sought. May I say to him: We are dealing with thousands of these cases. All you need to do is call up my secretary, myself, or the deputy and give the industrial relations department the information you desire to have. You do not need to get a stenographer from the pool or your secretary to do it for you. There are no sharp practices in it, let us clearly understand that, if that is the impression my hon. friend is trying to create.

The lowest tender got the contract at the fair wages prevailing in the area. At the moment, I do not know the size of the area on which the fair wages are based. I do not know the strength of the organizations on either side, who are concerned in this matter. We set up the fair wages in that particular industry, and that is what must be paid. When those wages are paid, the lowest tender gets the contract. What would my hon. friend say if the contracts were let to other than the lowest tender?

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, the minister said that there was a fair-wage clause in the contract. I understand that there is a fair wage clause in every federal contract, but that does not mean that fair wages are paid for work done under that contract, unless someone sees to it that they are. Putting a fair-wage clause in the contract is one thing; that is merely a formality. Someone should make certain that the fair wages are paid. The fair wages in the locality—they are not necessarily the union wages—have to be determined. They should be determined, so that those people who are interested in that kind of labour in Winnipeg can get the information quite easily. They should be able to ascertain whether or not that fair wage is being paid on that particular work.

So far as I know, the Minister of Labour has not stated that the fair wage is being paid. He merely said that the fair-wage clause is in the contract, and that the government is going as far as it need go. Perhaps it is the responsibility of the people living in the community to see that the fair wage is paid.

Mr. Mitchell: I have an organization in Winnipeg in charge of a conciliation officer. There cannot be any secrets about these things. All the people who are interested have to do is to see this officer, Mr. R. H. Hooper, the conciliation officer, and he will tell them. There cannot be any secrets about this sort of thing.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has tried to make out that those of us who are interested in this matter have been vague, and have not stated in the proper way the information we require. I would remind him that the president of the Winnipeg district trades and labour council wrote him a full-page letter setting out the facts on October 24. Then, I wrote him a full-page letter on October 26 endorsing what had been said in Mr. Murphy's letter. Apparently the minister did not get in touch with the people in his department who might have given the information. He did nothing, and now he tells me I did not ask him in the right way.

As to his question to me, would I want the government to award the contract to a firm that had not submitted the lowest tender, Mr. Chairman, if the firm offering the lowest tender is a sweatshop, I would rather the government take the higher tender and make sure that good wages are being paid.

Mr. Mitchell: Don't let that get abroad. I do not think there would be any government in this country that would consciously, irrespective of its political complexion, permit sweatshop conditions to prevail under its fair-wage policy. I mean, that is all very well for the boys back home, but you cannot get away with it here.

Mr. Knowles: It's the boys back home who are complaining.

Mr. Mitchell: If my hon. friend had been clear, or had said to me in the lobby that this is the information he wanted, he could have gotten it.

Mr. Knowles: It was set out clearly in the letter I wrote.

Item agreed to.

795. International labour conferences—further amount required, $15,000.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Regarding the international labour situation, and the international labour office, I think that this house could very well consider whether the people of Canada are not establishing a standard of living which is probably the highest in the world; wage scales which are of the very highest; an eight-hour day; insurance plans of all kinds; relief projects for farmers and others; family allowances, and about everything that human ingenuity can devise to make security for the people. Yet, we have not got security. It occurs to me that, through this international labour office, we could quite well investigate the labour conditions in some of the countries which are our neighbours.

Coming as I do from the Pacific coast, I might say that we are especially interested in all those countries on the Pacific, such as Japan and China. The other day the Prime Minister of India was a guest in this chamber. Half the population of the world exists in that Pacific area, yet those countries have not an eight-hour day; they have not any minimum wage, nor any workmen's compensation. They have not any mothers' allowances, nor family allowances. Most of the people across the Pacific have the lowest standard of living the world has ever seen. I ask the Minister of Labour whether Canada is not proceeding rapidly to establish such a lavish standard of social security in this country that we are becoming the envy of our Pacific neighbours?

We hear of Russia today, but Russia is merely the name for a great conglomeration of nations representing Asiatic races for the most part. It is for us in Canada to put our house in order, and not to go so far with social security measures that the rest of the world can never catch up with us nor share with us in a spirit of peace and goodwill among men.

Mr. MacInnis: I have heard some amazing statements in this house during the time I have been here, but I have never heard anything to equal that made by the last speaker. Does that mean that this country is not to take advantage of its natural resources; the skill of its people and the technical knowledge that we have, to make as high a standard of living as possible for ourselves? Does the member for Cariboo consider that the working people of this country have too high a standard of living now?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. MacInnis: Well, that is what he said; should we take steps to see that our standard of living is reduced. I do not think we have really begun to make use of the resources of our country to create the standard of living for our people which our resources could make possible. Anyone who takes the time to read the press from day to day, can note that some people in this country have a high standard of living; that is so without a doubt. But he can also note, that there are hundreds of thousands of people in this country who are living below a minimum standard of subsistence. Is the hon. member proposing that we ought to go slow on improving those low standards? As I said before, I have heard some amazing things here, but nothing ever to equal that.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. member for Cariboo was of course speaking for himself.

Mr. MacInnis: Of course.

Mr. Mitchell: Last year this government spent $700 million on social services. I can give the committee a breakdown, if they desire it. I have a vivid recollection of conditions when I was an apprentice boy, if hon. members will forgive this reference. We used to start work at six in the morning and work till 5.30 at night, with a half-hour for breakfast and dinner. We received the princely sum of seventy-five cents a week. To those people who want the good old days I say: Let them have them.

An hon. Member: Including the hon. member for Cariboo.

[Mr. Murray (Cariboo).]

Mr. Mitchell: I do not think there is any limit to the possibilities of this nation. I think we compare favourably with most other countries in the world. We are among the best countries in the world having regard to the broad general standard of living that exists in Canada. I hope that we shall continue to progress in that direction. I say that with the utmost sincerity. If anybody wants the standards that obtain in Soviet Russia, let him have them. As I have said before, if low wages and poor social conditions are to be the yardstick of national prosperity, let these people go and live in the Orient and see what it feels like.

Mr. Gillis: The vote of $58,205 is for the purpose of maintaining in the minister's department a small staff which handles the business of international conferences. I should like to find out who attends these conferences, how the personnel are selected and to whom they report when they return.

Mr. Mitchell: In the first place, as hon. members know, ever since I have been Minister of Labour I have endeavoured to get the co-operation of the organizations of both the employers and the employees on boards and with regard to everything in my department, in order to get a broad crystallization of their views; but of course, in the very nature of things, you cannot always accept their views. When a labour delegation goes to the ILO we get representation or an adviser from the four major labour organizations in Canada; they are the Catholic syndicates, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Canadian Congress of Labour and the running trades. Then on the employers' side we get representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the construction industry and the railway industry. All these persons are nominated by the organizations concerned. I ask them for nominations. I draw the line at some people, however.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): University men.

Mr. Mitchell: No. I draw the line at those people who do not believe in our way of life. That is the method that is used. What I have endeavoured to do since I have been in the ministry is to have an organization that looks after the international aspect of the affairs of the labour department.

Mr. Gillis: What I should like to ascertain is this. Recently there was a conference in Geneva?

Mr. Mitchell: Yes.

Mr. Gillis: It was on safety in coal mines. That was the purpose for which the conference was called?

Mr. Mitchell: Yes.

Mr. Gillis: They laid down a number of rules and regulations on the international scale?

Mr. Mitchell: Yes.

Mr. Gillis: What I should like to know is where one could get that report. Will it be through the minister's department?

Mr. Mitchell: If my hon. friend wants that report, I will get it if I have it.

Mr. MacInnis: I thought the reports were distributed. I get them.

Item agreed to.

150. To provide for the effective organization and use of agricultural manpower, including recruiting, transporting and placing workers on farms and related industries and assistance to the provinces pursuant to agreements that may be entered into by the Minister of Labour with the provinces and approved by the governor in council—formerly included in demobilization and reconversion, $360,000.

Mr. Harkness: Can the minister tell us just what agricultural labour is referred to in this item? I notice another item back a little farther, item 156, which apparently is for about $900,000 to provide for people coming into this country from other countries, placing them on farms and so forth. As I read this labour item, I wondered what this particular item was for. What labour does it refer to?

Mr. Mitchell: I will tell my hon. friend what it is. It is to meet the emergent labour situation in the agricultural economy of the country. My hon. friend probably remembers that, particularly during the war years, we used to send a quarter of a million people from the agricultural structure into base metals and other industries during the winter months and back again into agriculture in the summer. Then there was a movement backwards and forwards across the country from the east to the west to coincide with the harvest season in the respective parts of the country. Then of course you had the berry picking and fruit season in the Niagara peninsula, the Okanagan valley and in other parts of the dominion. The expense is shared jointly between the provincial governments and the federal government.

I do not know whether we shall use it to any great extent this year. I can say this to my hon. friend. I do not know what we would have done without that co-operation between the respective governments in the movement of this kind of labour, particularly during the war years and also since the end of the war. A half million is in connection with the d.p.'s. They are landed at Halifax and we pay their fares to the employers in agriculture, wherever they are going in the dominion.

Mr. Harkness: That is the later item.

Mr. Cardiff: I should just like to ask the minister if the government intends to carry on the same policy as it has carried on in the past with regard to placing these d.p.'s on farms.

Mr. Mitchell: Yes.

Mr. Cardiff: I think that policy is absolutely wrong. If you are going to bring d.p.'s out here as farm labour, then we want farmers, not people who merely call themselves agriculturists and stay on farms for just as short a time as they possibly can until they can find themselves a job elsewhere. In one year you cannot make a farmer out of a person of that calibre.

In the first place, they had no intention of farming when they came out here. The only reason they went out on the farm was that they could not get out here in any other way. I think the policy is absolutely wrong and the farmers of this country deserve better treatment than that. The farming population have put up with these men, and many of them are good men; I do not want to be misunderstood. But I would say that a number of the d.p.'s are absolutely no good to the farmers. The farmers are compelled to pay them good wages, and they are not worth their board. If the policy could be changed so that these men would stay on the farm for five years, many of them would never come out at all, because they would not stay that long. As long as you allow them to come out here and to stay on a farm for one year, you are going to get this class of immigrants, who are no good to the farmers, and we have to put up with them.

Mr. Mitchell: I just want to say this in defence of the d.p.'s. In a big and broad way I think they compare favourably with the people who live in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Ferrie: They are doing a good job.

Mr. Mitchell: Let me say this also. If some of our people had gone through what these d.p.'s went through in Europe, they would not feel very happy. I have been to many of these camps in Austria and in Germany and have seen the people that came out of them. Our experience has been this. I shudder to think what would have happened to the beet crop last year if it had not been for the d.p.'s. They have fitted into our way of life in the same way as other people have. In every race, colour and creed you get people who do not fit in. My hon. friend may have been unfortunate. Our experience is that there is a demand for them by the farmers, and by people who need domestics, and in other lines of endeavour, right across the dominion. That is the best yardstick that I know of.

Mr. Thatcher: I must say that I cannot agree with the hon. member for Huron North. Our experience in Saskatchewan has been almost uniformly good with these d.p.'s. Many farmers have asked me this question: "How can we get some of these men to help us?" If there is one feature of any governmental policy that I can agree with, it has been their bringing in of these farm workers. I think it was sensible. I think it was wise. I have only one suggestion to offer the minister, and through him the government. I wish they would extend this program a little further and allow our Canadians of German descent to bring in their relatives from Germany. In the past, Canada's experience has been that the German people usually have made the best possible settlers. They have made good agriculturists. I think we are missing a bet if we do not take advantage of the huge pool of manpower in Germany at the present time. I can see the Chairman getting ready to call me to order. I wish I had ten or fifteen minutes to talk about the matter.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member is under a misapprehension.

Mr. Thatcher: Good. I feel rather strongly on this issue. Many people may not agree with me but I do believe that Canada is overlooking a source of future citizens, a source of immigration, by keeping out Germans, particularly those who have relatives in this country. Naturally they will have to be carefully screened. We do not want nazis. But we are in the process of building a nation, and the manpower that we choose today is going to determine, to some extent at least, the kind of nation we shall have in the future.

There are many hon. members in this house who are of German descent. Almost uniformly they have been good citizens. I could name I suppose eight or ten members in the house who are of German descent. I think most hon. members will agree that they have made a pretty good contribution. There are many reasons why we should change our present policy towards Germans.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. member should direct his remarks to the Minister of Mines and Resources. He is speaking of immigration; I am speaking of d.p.'s.

Mr. Thatcher: I must bow to that. I was afraid I would be called out of order. However, I have to go home tonight and I thought I should get it on the record.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. Bater: I know that hon. members have their eyes on the clock. It is just about four minutes to six. I can promise the committee that I shall take not more than two or three minutes. I want to go on record and say that over the past few years it has been my privilege to be a member of the dominion-provincial farm labour committee in Saskatchewan. I want to take this opportunity to commend the government and the minister for the assistance that has been given not only during the war but in the post-war period. This work should be continued. I have a lot of figures that I shall not mention. I will not even look at them. We in the west have appreciated the assistance that has been given in bringing harvesters out to help us with our crops. Many men in my constituency and in the district where I live have come down to Ontario to help in the hay harvest. Not only did they help to harvest the hay but they learned of the problems of the farmers of Ontario. That in itself had a great deal to do with bringing the east and the west together. We have sent people of British Columbia to help to pick fruit. Many of the Metis, commonly known as half-breeds, in my constituency have gone into Alberta to help to take up the sugar beets. They have gone across the line and helped to take up the sugar beets there. This particular item is one that should be very carefully guarded and carried out in the future.

Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940—

157. Administration, including expenditures incurred in connection with the activities of the national employment service as delegated by the Minister of Labour in accordance with section 88 of the act, $19,645,631.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, there are a number of points that one might talk about with respect to unemployment insurance, but I shall deal with only one at this time. I want to say at the outset that the hon. member for Cape Breton South expressed our views when he said that this was essentially good legislation to have on the statute books, and any suggestions that we make for improving it do not detract from that view.

I propose to deal with just one of the changes that could be made. I shall review it briefly because I have done it on a number of occasions. I am sure I need only to outline my contention to remind the Minister of Labour of the various points in the argument. It has to do with the case of a worker who becomes unemployed, qualifies for unemployment insurance benefits, and then while drawing those benefits becomes ill. As the minister knows, in that situation the worker's unemployment insurance benefits are cut off even though there may still be no employment for him. I think that we have covered the ground in previous discussions of this matter. We have made it clear that although some of us want over-all social security, including health insurance, that is not what we are talking about at this particular time. At this time we are simply asking for a change either in the act or in the regulations, wherever it is necessary, to ensure to the worker who has qualified for benefits and is drawing them that he will continue to draw them even though he takes sick afterwards, particularly when there is no employment for him. In my view that last qualification should not be necessary. I mention it because when a worker has his benefits cut off that often happens to be the situation, namely, that the unemployment insurance office is still unable to supply him with work because he has taken sick, but when his wife goes down to collect the insurance she is told that her husband can no longer draw the benefits. That is the way it happens many times.

Perhaps as a result of this having been raised on the floor of the house a number of times during the past few years and also because it has been discussed in the various unemployment insurance advisory committees across the country, it has been discussed by the top level unemployment insurance advisory committee in Ottawa. My information in that connection grows out of a number of questions I put on the order paper and the answers given to them.

As a result of learning that the unemployment insurance advisory committee did give consideration to it and did refer the question to Mr. A. D. Watson, an actuarial adviser in the department of insurance, I moved a motion for production of papers, calling for the tabling of the report that Mr. Watson had made to the unemployment insurance advisory committee. That report may be found in sessional paper 61D, tabled on Friday, November 18, 1949. I had hoped that it would be a report dealing with this specific and rather restricted question which we have discussed so often on the floor of the house. It turns out, however, that Mr. Watson went considerably afield from that restricted problem and dealt with the whole question of sickness insurance. In my opinion that memorandum is not particularly helpful on the broad question of sickness insurance. In a footnote on page 1 of the memorandum to the committee, which is now sessional paper 61D, Mr. Watson makes his only reference to the particular question in hand, and this is what he says:

> The idea of limiting sickness benefit to periods of sickness falling within periods of unemployment is not herein examined, for such a provision would inevitably lead to serious anomalies and dissatisfaction and at the same time would open wide the door to fraud on the fund, mainly through arranging periods of unemployment so as to take in periods of actual or anticipated sickness.

I still feel that in asking the minister to consider this change we have a valid and strong case. I urge him to give this matter serious and favourable consideration. If the unemployment insurance advisory committee is to consider this matter and make recommendations to the minister I ask that they get some other advice because the footnote I have just quoted indicates a complete lack of understanding of the problem. I submit that the committee went to the wrong place when they got that advice. I urge the minister and his committee to get the best possible advice.

I am sure that hon. members who have thought about the kind of circumstance I have described will agree with me that when a worker becomes unemployed and qualifies for unemployment insurance, if he becomes sick while unemployed, his benefits should not be cut off, particularly, as is so often the case, when the unemployment insurance office has no employment for him.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): With unanimous consent, I would move the adjournment of the house until eleven o'clock on Monday. Before announcing the business for Monday I would say that the two resolutions on the order paper in the name of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Fisheries will not be discussed at this session. The first item of business on Monday will be the private bill in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops concerning crime comics. Then there is the motion in the name of the Minister of Mines and Resources which I am told is only a matter of formality; then Bill No. 220, to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947. This is only a small bill for the determination of compensation for injuries to government employees in Prince Edward Island. Then Bill No. 149, respecting bankruptcy; then Bill No. 216, to encourage the construction and conversion of vessels in Canada; then Bill No. 176, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Income War Tax Act. We expect that there will be a bill to amend the Customs Tariff Act introduced on Monday, but this has only one or two sections. As far as I know that will complete the program of legislation for the session. If we get through those different items we will move to go into supply, post office if the minister is here or, in his absence, justice.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 6.10 p.m.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

142. Departmental administration, $735,337.

143. Annuities Act, $785,871.

144. Fair wages, conciliation, industrial relations, industrial disputes investigations, including the administration of legislation relating thereto, and for activities re promotion of co-operation in industry between labour and management, $308,617.

145. Canada labour relations board—formerly included in demobilization and reconversion as the wartime labour relations board, $17,500.

146. International labour conferences, $58,205.

147. Labour Gazette and other publications authorized by Labour Department Act, $103,810.

148. Administration, $44,100.

149. Expenditures for vocational training under the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act, 1942, and agreements between the dominion and provinces approved by the governor in council, including projects for training of persons to fit them for gainful employment, youth training, apprenticeship training, vocational training at secondary school level, foremanship and supervisory training and for training of members of His Majesty's forces and other persons to fit them for skilled armed service occupations and to authorize the Minister of Labour to enter into an agreement with any province with the approval of the governor in council for such training, as well as to provide for undischarged commitments of previous years, $3,762,000.

150. To provide for the effective organization and use of agricultural manpower, including recruiting, transporting and placing workers on farms and related industries and assistance to the provinces pursuant to agreements that may be entered into by the Minister of Labour with the provinces and approved by the governor in council—formerly included in demobilization and reconversion, $360,000.

Demobilization and reconversion—

151. To provide for expenses relating to placement of labour planning; co-ordination of stevedoring, including authority to continue the regional boards known as "advisory boards labour department" to act in an advisory capacity to the Minister of Labour for the co-ordination of the work of the various divisions of the Department of Labour and the immigration branch of the Department of Mines and Resources, $127,420.

152. Technical personnel division—administration (formerly bureau of technical personnel and placement of university graduates), $38,640.

153. Vocational training for discharged members of Canada's armed forces; payments to the provinces for capital expenditure for vocational schools, buildings and equipment; and to provide for dominion contributions towards replacement by a province or municipality of machinery used in war emergency training; including undischarged commitments of previous years, $3,515,000.

Wartime labour relations board—now included in ordinary estimates.

154. To provide the necessary financial requirements to complete activities for the relocation, maintenance and welfare of persons of the Japanese race in Canada and to carry out the provisions of agreements entered into with the provinces in reference to the foregoing and to continue the appointments of necessary temporary assistance required in administering the project, $220,350.

To provide for the effective organization and use of agricultural manpower, including recruiting, transporting and placing workers on farms and related industries and assistance to the provinces pursuant to agreements that may be entered into by the Minister of Labour with the provinces and approved by the governor in council—now included in ordinary estimates.

155. To provide for payment to the national film board for educational films for exhibition, $24,000.

156. To provide for expenses that may be incurred in the arranging for and the movement of workers from outside Canada to work on farms and other essential industry in Canada when Canadian labour is not available to meet the need; including costs connected with the supervision and welfare of persons already immigrated to Canada under former authorized labour movements and administrative expenses connected therewith, $895,675.

B—Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940—

157. Administration, including expenditures incurred in connection with the activities of the national employment service as delegated by the Minister of Labour in accordance with section 88 of the act, $19,645,631.

158. Government's contribution to the unemployment insurance fund, $18,750,000.

Demobilization and reconversion—

159. To provide for the transfer of labour to and from places where employment is available in agriculture and industry and expenses incidental thereto, $225,000.

A—Department—

678. Fair wages, conciliation, industrial relations, industrial disputes investigations, including the administration of legislation relating thereto, and for activities re promotion of co-operation in industry between labour and management—further amount required, $21,000.

B—Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940—

679. Administration, including expenditures incurred in connection with the activities of the national employment service as delegated by the Minister of Labour in accordance with section 88 of the act—further amount required, $182,720.

680. Government's contribution to the unemployment insurance fund—further amount required, $250,000.

681. To authorize and provide for payment of unemployment assistance to residents of Newfoundland who have been employed in employment that would have been insurable employment within the meaning of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, if it had been employment in Canada, or who have been employed in insurable employment within the meaning of the said act, for at least thirty per cent of the working days within the period of three months preceding their loss of employment or thirty per cent of the working days within the period since the date of union, whichever period is the longer, and who lose their employment within six months prior to the date of union and are still unemployed at that date, or who lose their employment within a two-year period after that date, such assistance to be payable during a period of six months from the date of union or from the date of unemployment, whichever is the later, on the same scale and under the same conditions as unemployment insurance benefits under the said act and regulations made thereunder, and on rates based on the individual's wage record for the three months preceding his loss of employment; but no person shall receive such assistance and unemployment insurance benefits concurrently; and such assistance shall be deemed to be a benefit or payment within the meaning of section sixty-seven of the said act; the governor in council is authorized to make such regulations as he may deem necessary to administer this vote and give effect to the purposes and terms thereof, $2,000,000.

A—Department

795. International labour conferences — further amount required, $15,000.

Annuities Act—

796. To authorize repayment during the current or any future fiscal year out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund of moneys heretofore or hereafter paid to the receiver general of Canada on account of the purchase of annuities under the Government Annuities Act which are not so applied, $1.

B—Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940—

798. To authorize and provide for payment of unemployment assistance to residents of Newfoundland who have been employed in employment that would have been insurable employment within the meaning of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, if it had been employment in Canada, or who have been employed in insurable employment within the meaning of the said act, for at least thirty per cent of the working days within the period of three months preceding their loss of employment or thirty per cent of the working days within the period since the date of union, whichever period is the longer, and who lose their employment within six months prior to the date of union and are still unemployed at that date, or who lose their employment within a two-year period after that date, such assistance to be payable during a period of six months from the date of union or from the date of unemployment, whichever is the later, on the same scale and under the same conditions as unemployment insurance benefits under the said act and regulations made thereunder, and on rates based on the individual's wage record for the three months preceding his loss of employment; but no person shall receive such assistance and unemployment insurance benefits concurrently; and such assistance shall be deemed to be a benefit or payment within the meaning of section sixty-seven of the said act; the governor in council is authorized to make such regulations as he may deem necessary to administer this vote and give effect to the purposes and terms thereof—further amount required, $1,000,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CANADA FORESTRY ACT

REFERENCE TO REPORT IN HAMILTON "SPECTATOR" OF DECEMBER 2

Hon. Colin Gibson (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I wish to bring to the attention of the house a Canadian Press dispatch dated the 1st of December, published in the Hamilton Spectator on Friday, December 2, with reference to the Canada Forestry Act. In the report it states:

> Resources Minister Gibson, sponsor of the bill, said the federal government, which gained "considerable revenue" from Canada's forest resources, recognized no obligation to take a part in conservation.

I may say, as hon. members all realize, that the whole purpose of the act is to enable the dominion government to assist the provinces in the conservation of our forests.

OATS

SYDNEY H. PAWLOWSKI NAMED WORLD OATS KING AT CHICAGO GRAIN AND HAY SHOW

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Some two weeks ago I stated in the house that one of my constituents, John T. Eliuk, had obtained the highest award for oats and barley at the royal winter fair in Toronto. The house will be pleased to know that once again a distinction has been conferred upon the constituency of Vegreville. One of its residents, Sydney H. Pawlowski, a twenty-one year old farmer of Spedden, Alberta, was named world oats king at the Chicago grain and hay show a week ago last Saturday. I might mention that in 1940 his brother, Paul Pawlowski, won the oats championship.

I am sure hon. members will be glad to know, since most of my constituents are engaged in farming, that they are doing exceptionally well. Only a few weeks ago Jacob F. Melenka, of Warwick, was awarded the title of master farmer.

HOUSING

RENT CONTROL—FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE WITH PREMIERS OF PROVINCES

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table further correspondence on rent control, with the premiers of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Quebec. If someone will ask that the correspondence be printed in Hansard, and the house so desires, I shall be glad if that is done.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether the previous correspondence was printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Abbott: It was.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that this correspondence be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of correspondence, see appendix, pages 2754-57.)

CUSTOMS TARIFF

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO USED OR SECONDHAND MOTOR VEHICLES AND AIRCRAFT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 221, to amend the Customs Tariff.

He said: Mr. Speaker, although this bill stands in my name, it is being presented at the suggestion of my colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). Its principal purpose is to permit secondhand motor vehicles to be admitted into Canada in exceptional cases. Instances of hardship have arisen affecting immigrants and others who enter Canada and are not able to bring their cars into the country. The department is anxious to be given authority to admit such cars in special cases.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

PORTRAYAL OF CRIMES BY PICTURES IN MAGAZINES, ETC., TENDING TO INDUCE VIOLENCE

The house resumed, from Friday, October 21, consideration in committee of Bill No. 10, to amend the Criminal Code (portrayal of crimes)—Mr. Fulton—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Portrayal of crimes by pictures in magazines, etc., tending to induce violence.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Chairman, members will recall that when the bill was last before the house I pointed out, in the course of my remarks on the motion for second reading, that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops would merely bring crime comics as paragraph (d) under section 207 of the code, paragraph (a) of which makes the publication and sale of obscene literature an offence; that the prohibition of the publication and sale of obscene literature by this section had not deterred the publication and sale of that sort of literature to any great extent, and therefore that without more determined prosecution the mere adding of crime comics to this section would not likely solve the problem. Then I suggested that in drafting an enforceable amendment, the most valuable suggestions we could secure would be those from the crown prosecutors and law enforcement officers of the provincial governments, whose responsibility it is to enforce the Criminal Code; and it was arranged that we should leave the bill in committee in order that I might secure the views of the provincial attorneys general on this matter.

Perhaps the best way to indicate to the committee the questions I laid before the attorneys general would be to read the relevant portions of a letter I wrote to one of them, in this case the attorney general of Nova Scotia. All the letters were the same; and this one reads:

> Re: section 207 of the Criminal Code.
> As you know, a bill has been introduced in parliament to amend section 207 of the Criminal Code by adding a paragraph directed against those "crime comics," so-called, which tend to corrupt young persons.

Then I go on and point out the way section 207(a) of the code now reads, and say that the bill would add the following paragraph, indicating the wording of the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Kamloops. Then I say:

> The other parts of the section are not material for the purpose of this letter.
> Agreeing with the principle of the bill—which was introduced by the hon. member for Kamloops, Mr. E. D. Fulton—but not being satisfied that it would achieve its object in its present form, I suggested upon the second reading of the bill that it be held in committee in order to obtain the suggestions of the attorneys general as to the form of amendment that should be passed in order to make section 207 as enforceable as possible in respect both of obscene books and of "crime comics."
> One method I indicated was the deletion of the words "knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse" from the section as amended by the addition of paragraph (d), but I also pointed out that this method would place a heavy burden upon many booksellers and ought not to be adopted until we were satisfied that the section could not be used effectively to remedy the abuses complained of while these words remained; e.g., by proceeding against the publishers who could not as plausibly plead ignorance as the booksellers. My suggestion was made upon the understanding that the bill would be passed in as effective a form as possible before prorogation of the present session, and my motion was agreed to accordingly.
> Another method that has since occurred to me is to raise a presumption, rebuttable or otherwise, against the publisher, of knowledge as to the character of the book or magazine, but in the case of the retail vendor to retain the necessity of proving such knowledge affirmatively.
> I would therefore be most appreciative if you would give this matter your consideration and, after such consultation as you deem necessary with your prosecuting officers, let me have your advice and views upon the following matters:
> (a) Can section 207, as amended by the bill and without deletion of the words "knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse," be enforced effectively?
> (c) If the answer to (a) is no, can you suggest an amendment that would make the section so enforceable without eliminating the sense of these words?
> (d) Your views generally as to how the section could be best framed from the standpoint of enforcibility.
> Although this letter gives you, I think, the substance of the matter, I am enclosing a number of copies of the bill, No. 10, and of the Hansards containing the speeches. My remarks begin at page 1036 of volume 89, No. 26, Friday, October 21, 1949.
> In view of the pressure of time I should be most grateful if you could let me have a reply as early as may be, and not later than November 15 if that is possible.

The attorneys general of the provinces obviously gave this letter careful and in some cases even searching attention, and their replies and suggestions have been extremely valuable. From these replies, which are lengthy and which have been tabled, the following points emerge—this is really a summary of the main points established by the attorneys general in their replies:

1. Only one province, Ontario, questions that crime comics have a tendency to induce youthful persons to violate the law or to corrupt the morals of such persons.

2. Quebec and Saskatchewan expressly state that they are in accord that action is necessary. New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Alberta, British Columbia, Newfoundland and Manitoba, while not saying it in express words, leave no doubt as to their sympathy, by the manner in which they have replied.

3. The consensus is that section 207 as amended by the bill could not be enforced while the words "knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse" remain, and that these words should be deleted. At least four provinces, Alberta, British Columbia, Newfoundland and New Brunswick, however, make a distinction in this respect between obscene books on the one hand and crime comics on the other, or between publishers on the one hand and vendors on the other. The ideas put forth in this respect are: (a) That knowledge should not have to be proved against a publisher either in respect of crime comics or obscene books. A publisher may fairly be presumed to know the nature of his publication. (b) Knowledge should not have to be proved against even the retailer of crime comics. These are not like novels, where an evil interior may be unsuspected within an innocent-looking cover. Crime comics are conspicuous and their general nature well known, and retailers may fairly be expected to handle them at their own risk. (c) Knowledge should have to be proved against a retail book vendor, because it would be unfair to hold him absolutely responsible for all the books upon his shelves.

4. At least two provinces, British Columbia and Manitoba, which submitted two of the most thoughtful returns coming from the provinces, make the point that it may be practically impossible in any particular case to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that a particular crime comic tends to induce to crime or corrupt morals. They therefore suggest that the words included in the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kamloops "thereby tending or likely to induce or influence youthful persons to violate the law or to corrupt the morals of such persons" be deleted, and that parliament thereby take the responsibility of saying that crime comics do have that effect, and remove the point from the field of argument.

I also received expressions of opinion from members of the Criminal Code revision group. Mr. Justice Gerald Fauteux, of the Quebec superior court, answered in the negative the first question, whether the law could be enforced with the words "knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse" included.

It was the view of Mr. Justice Fauteux that the deletion of the words "knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse," would in theory facilitate enforcement but would—in his view, of course—be unfair to retailers and others, and thus might lead the courts to compromise on the facts.

Mr. Justice Fauteux, on (c) and (d), submits a draft which omits the words "knowingly, etc.," but makes it a defence, except as regards the production of such matter, to prove that the defendant did not act knowingly or had a lawful justification or excuse; and requires consent of the attorney general to commence prosecution.

Judge Robert Forsyth, the senior judge of the county court of the county of York, questions whether crime comics contribute to juvenile delinquency. While in the justice department he made a survey of a number of juvenile court judges, and never secured any such evidence. This was only a telephone survey. He believes phonograph records should be included. The most effective control would be by way of provincial licensing of distributors. He questions whether crime comics are within the words "thereby tending or likely, etc.," in the draft paragraph (d). Nevertheless he considers (d) as satisfactory as possible.

H. J. Wilson, K.C., deputy attorney general of Alberta, expressed a view which was the same as that expressed officially by that province.

Fernand Choquette, K.C., of the Quebec bar, answers (a) "no", and (b) "yes". Under (c) he would make it an offence to act negligently as well as knowingly, and the same with regard to (d).

H. P. Carter, K.C., director of public prosecutions for Newfoundland, answers (a) "no" and (b) "yes", but believes it would place bona fide vendors in a difficult position. He thinks that, without injustice, the words "knowingly, etc." could be dropped with reference to all handling of crime comics.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the department we have tried to produce an amendment which reconciles all these points of view, so far as we are able to do so. First of all I should like to move the text of the amendment; and then if I may, sir, explain its provisions and endeavour to relate them to the replies we have received from the provinces. I move:

That clause one of the bill be amended by striking out the first three words, "subsection one of," in line one, and by striking out all the words in the clause following the word "is," in line three and substituting therefor the following:

. . . repealed, and the following substituted therefor:

207. (1) Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment—

Perhaps I should interject here that the method we have followed in dealing with this matter is that where we wished to make changes in the substance—the wording of this section has been on the statute book for a number of years—we have tried, in the course of these changes, to redraft the whole section, incorporating the changes in substance and at the same time improving the language all the way through. We are trying to do a workmanlike job on the whole section.

If the amendment which I am now moving carries, section 207 will read in this way:

207. (1) Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who

(a) makes, prints, publishes, distributes, circulates or has in possession for any such purpose any obscene written matter, picture, model, or other thing whatsoever, or

Criminal Code

(b) makes, prints, publishes, distributes, sells or has in possession for any such purpose, any crime comic.

(2) Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse

(a) sells, exposes to public view or has in possession for any such purpose any obscene written matter, picture, model or other thing whatsoever;

(b) publicly exhibits any disgusting object or any indecent show; or

Now, that is already in section 207; we are just retaining it.

(c) offers to sell, advertises, publishes an advertisement of, or has for sale or disposal any means, instructions, medicine, drug or article intended or represented as a means of preventing conception or causing abortion or miscarriage; or advertises or publishes an advertisement of any means, instructions, medicine, drug or article for restoring sexual virility or curing venereal diseases or diseases of the generative organs.

(3) "Crime comics" means in this section any magazine, periodical or book which exclusively or substantially comprises matter depicting pictorially the commission of crimes, real or fictitious.

(4) No one shall be convicted of any offence in this section mentioned if he proves that the public good was served by the acts alleged to have been done, and that there was no excess in the acts alleged beyond what the public good required.

(5) It shall be a question for the judge whether such acts are such as might be for the public good, and whether there is evidence of excess beyond what the public good required; but it shall be a question for the jury whether there is or is not such excess.

(7) It shall be no defence to a charge under subsection one that the accused was ignorant of the nature or presence of the matter, picture, model, crime comic or other thing.

I should like, Mr. Chairman, to comment upon these changes. Subsection 1 makes everyone guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who publishes any obscene matter, or who publishes any crime comics. In that connection it is not necessary for the crown to prove that he did it knowingly, or that he did it without lawful justification or excuse. Under subsection 7 the accused cannot raise the defence that he was ignorant of the nature of what he published, or of its presence in his possession.

I think I should clear up a point there which might be overlooked. In order to contravene the act, the possession of this obscene matter by the publisher has to be related to his act of publishing, because the section says: "who makes, prints, publishes, distributes, circulates or has in his possession such material for any such purpose." This section could not be relied upon if someone planted an obscene book in someone's office and then prosecuted him. He would not have it there for the purpose of publication, so he would not be guilty.

Subsection 2 makes everyone guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse, sells obscene matter. This protects the retailer who does make a sale of that sort innocently.

Then the subsection dealing with exhibiting any disgusting object, and the subsection dealing with these advertisements of means, instructions, medicine, drug or other article intended for the prevention of conception, etc., are in the section now. There is no change in substance at all in that regard.

The definition of crime comic has been changed from that suggested by the hon. member for Kamloops, by striking out from his definition the words which make it necessary for the crown to prove that the crime comic upon which the prosecution is based tends to corrupt the morals of youth, and so on. Our advice from the law enforcement officers is that if that is included in the definition of crime comics, it will be an almost insuperable barrier for the crown to surmount, because it will be exceedingly difficult to prove that the specific crime comic upon which the prosecution was based would necessarily tend to corrupt the morals of youth. The advice that we get from those who have the responsibility for enforcing this legislation is that unless this parliament is prepared to make an outright prohibition of crime comics, it is not likely that we shall be able to enforce this section.

Subsection 4, which is to the effect that no one shall be convicted of any offence under this section if he can prove that the public good was served, and so on, is already in the section, and there is no change in substance in that regard. The same is true of subsection 5, and the same is true of subsection 6, that the motives of the accused shall in all cases be irrelevant.

The only other provision new in substance that is being added is subsection 7, which provides that it shall be no defence to a charge under subsection 1 that the accused was ignorant of the nature or presence of the matter, picture, model, crime comic or other thing. The effect is this: not only does the crown not have to prove knowledge or absence of lawful justification or excuse on the part of the accused as part of the crown's case against him in order to establish a prima facie case, but after the crown has put in its prima facie case the accused cannot come into a court and establish a defence of that kind.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to take the opportunity a little later of saying some words in connection with the title of the bill, to which, if this amendment carries, there will be a consequential amendment. Under the circumstances, therefore, perhaps I may be excused if I do not make any extended remarks at this particular stage, beyond saying, with regard to the operative part of the amendment itself, that the minister was good enough to show me the amendment a day or two ago and to explain to me the purpose which it is designed to achieve and the thought with which it had been drafted. I want to express my appreciation of the minister's courtesy and co-operation in making the copy available, and to say at this time, if I may put it this way, that the amendment is perfectly acceptable.

I want to make this further comment, however. My main interest and object in introducing Bill No. 10 was to deal with crime comics. To that extent I purposely omitted any reference to the part of the legislation dealing with the question of obscenity, or obscene literature, and so on; because it seems to me that subject is much more difficult to deal with than the question of crime comics. I feel that what has been done in combining the two in the one bill—that is, the general treatment of the question of obscenity and the other sections of the code—is acceptable. It is probably correct to say that obscene literature presents as great a problem as the crime comics, if not greater, and I am happy indeed that the minister and the government should have taken this occasion to deal with the two subjects under the one heading.

I wish to make this comment: While the amendment in toto is acceptable, and I am pleased indeed that the minister has taken this opportunity of amending the bill in this way to make it more effective, yet I think he will appreciate my position if I say that naturally enough I can in effect take no measure of responsibility for the part of it which deals with obscenity. I say that merely in the light of the fact that when I introduced the bill my major concern was with the question of crime comics. However, as I have said, the minister has shown me the amendment. I am not enough of an expert in the matter to say whether the amendment is entirely free from objection, but I believe that the part of it dealing with crime comics is even more enforceable now than it was in the form in which I originally presented it to the house.

Since that is so, and in view of the careful consideration and treatment which have been given to the matter by the minister and by the attorneys general whom he consulted, and the fact that these amendments conform to their recommendations, I have no hesitation in saying that as an amendment to my bill it is acceptable to me.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is difficult to follow this matter without having the bill before us. I endeavoured to make a few notes on the various sections, and there are one or two observations I should like to make.

First I think that the house in general and the country will thank the hon. member for Kamloops for having brought this matter of crime comics to the attention of the house. The acceptance of his suggestion and the resulting creation of public opinion in favour of action at this session of parliament deserve the commendation of hon. members. The minister should be commended on the difficult task he assumed when he endeavoured to find a means by which crime comics and obscene and pornographic—I am not sure of the word, certainly not "literature"—could be prevented from depraving the morals of our young people.

That the subject is a difficult one was obvious in what the minister said. The representation of the attorneys general indicated that they too felt that it was a difficult matter for parliament to become the judge of the morals of literature or of publications, such as these, the distribution of which we are endeavouring to prevent.

Mr. Garson: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but I am sure he does not wish to convey the idea that parliament is any more a judge of these matters now than it ever has been.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Garson: Parliament has always prohibited the publication of obscene matter, and in doing so it leaves to the courts the question whether a given matter is obscene or not. It does not set itself up as a judge.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not in disagreement with that. But in these amendments parliament is in effect actually saying: We judge that the possession of these things, crime comics, to begin with—

Mr. Garson: Only crime comics.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes—have a depraving influence. It is always difficult for legislation to maintain freedom of speech and at the same time prevent the exercise of licence by those who would destroy morals for monetary benefit.

I support the general principle, but I am concerned about how far we should go in our desire to accomplish the end we have in view, without making the law too strict or too stern and therefore cause juries under such circumstances to do what they have done throughout the years, namely, to acquit.

As I understand it, the amendments are divided into two sections. First, it is no longer necessary to prove that the publisher knowingly and without lawful justification or excuse published, or had in his possession for the purpose of publishing, lewd, lascivious, obscene matter or crime comics. I can see no objection to that, because it does away with the defence that I believe should not be available to the publisher, namely, that he did not know what he was publishing or what would be published when the document was finally sent out.

The last subsection is one that I find it difficult to support. It says in effect that it shall be no defence that the publisher did not know the nature of or the presence of the matter complained of. Is that not what the last section means? I find it difficult to bring that provision into line with section 1, subsection 1. There the offence is having in his possession for the purpose of printing or publishing. Having "in his possession" implies that the crown must, in doubtful cases, either directly or inferentially, establish that he knew the nature of or the presence of the matter complained of. If you intend to prohibit the publisher from having books, documents and crime comics which are lewd or detrimental to morals, then I submit that in order to close the door you have to remove the words "has in his possession".

May I cite an analogous case? In the early days in Saskatchewan under the temperance act provision was made for an offence which consisted of having intoxicating liquor in a stock of soft drinks. A Chinese resident in that province who had nothing to do with the liquor being in a stock of soft drinks—in fact the crown finally had to admit that the liquor had been planted there—was charged with this offence and convicted. The case went to the court of appeal in Saskatchewan, which said he did not have it in his possession because he did not know of its existence. But that is not the offence. The offence is that he did have in his stock of soft drinks intoxicating liquor.

Here we have, as I see it, an endeavour to get around this difficulty, by saying in section 1 (1) that the publisher is liable only if he has in his possession; and then you add a paragraph which states that it shall be no defence that he did not know the nature or the presence of the matter. I submit that these two sections, particularly as they apply to the word "presence", cancel out one another. In my view, so far as subsection 7 is concerned, to make it consistent with section 1 (1) it should read that it shall be no defence that he did not know the nature of the matter, rather than "the presence of the matter". I pass this suggestion on to the minister.

Sometimes, in a desire on the part of a legislature to close all the doors, other doors are opened. The definition of a crime comic is one which exclusively or substantially comprises matter depicting crime, either actual or fictitious. I believe in this instance the door is left open to a continuing stream of crime comics in this country—not crime comic books which exclusively or substantially comprise matter depicting crime, but do so only partly. Would it not be a defence to turn out a ten-page crime comic book containing four pages of crime comics and six pages of the ordinary comics the youngsters enjoy? With four pages only of crime comics there would be an absolute defence under the section as it now stands. I suggest that consideration be given to rewording it. It is not for me to suggest what the rewording should be, because I have not had a chance to prepare a proper amendment. Perhaps the words "a crime comic is one the general purpose of which is either in whole or in part to depict crime either actual or imaginary" might cover it. I am trying to offer some suggestions so that the law may be workable; for I know what crime comics do.

I see that one of the agents of one of the attorneys general has said he is not sure of what the effect would be. Well, I am not inclined to refer to personal matters, but, about a year ago after the session of parliament was over, some parents came to me to speak to me about their son, a boy of nine, brilliant, with a high intelligence quotient. He became a kind of boss and ran his gang. The gang committed a great deal of crime, and he kept up to date through the reading of crime comics. When I had him in my office and talked to him I said: "In the event of your being acquitted, you have a great future ahead of you. I am sure you really got into these difficulties unintentionally, and you will not have any such difficulty again". His answer was: "You were hired by my parents as my mouthpiece". In other words he spoke most contemptuously of any suggestion on my part that what he had done had been a mistake on his part. I believe that attitude is general. Young people of fifteen or sixteen years cannot help being enthusiastic about the possibility that they, too, as a result of misdemeanours and wrongdoings, may achieve the degree of newspaper notoriety—indeed sometimes adoration, as it is set out in some of the crime magazines—which some regard as an element of greatness.

While these amendments are stern, and wipe out some of the things upon which our heritage and freedom are based, in the administration of criminal law they can be justified only on the ground that obscene and lascivious books, which have no purpose other than that of monetary gain derived from their lewdness and indecency, are available. These books seek not to elevate and encourage ambitions on the part of the young, but rather to lead the minds of the people to a belief that wrong is indeed right. I believe these amendments will permit the enforcement of the law to an extent greater than heretofore has been possible.

Sometimes in respect of matters of this kind we remove the onus of proving knowledge or intent. The feeling in parliament generally, I believe, and certainly the feeling throughout the country, as indicated by the correspondence one receives, is that these things should be prohibited, but there should be assurance that in no case will any publication that is for the public good, or that is necessary or advantageous to science, literature or the arts, be prohibited.

I bring these suggestions to the attention of the minister to the end that this law may be more than merely an attempt to prevent wrongdoing; but that it will place in the hands of the agencies entrusted with enforcement of the law an instrument which will make certain that that which is so detrimental to the welfare of our younger people, and indeed to all who read, as well as to the manufacturers, producers and distributors, may be prohibited. There can be no profit from the sale of material which elevates crime and obscenity to the point where they become the literature of many people.

I commend the hon. member for Kamloops, as well as the organizations throughout the country which have joined together to make possible these amendments, for what they have done. It is an indication of what private members of parliament can do when they bring to the attention of the House of Commons proposals which are supported by public opinion.

Mr. Church: Mr. Chairman, having sat as police commissioner for many years with the late Colonel Denison, senior magistrate, and senior judges of York county—Judge Winchester, the late Judge Morson and others—I have seen cause and effect in relation to the subject matter of this bill. For a great many years magistrates and judges of the county of York have called the attention of the House of Commons to this matter. The law in this regard is in effect a penal statute. Police commissions, judges and magistrates throughout Ontario have had a great deal of difficulty with it, and so have the judges and magistrates of other provinces. For four or five years my sister, now deceased, was the national president of the Imperial Order of Daughters of the Empire. They approached the police commission concerning the cause and effect of this particular statute.

I notice in the bill there is no definition of the following words, "prints, publishes, sells or distributes any magazine," and cause and effect in relation thereto have not been dealt with. As this is a penal statute, you must read into Bill 10 the various sections of the Criminal Code set out in the marginal notes.

We used to have a leading textbook in the law schools entitled "Hardcastle on the Construction of Statute Law". You will have to look at Bill No. 10 and read into it the definitions in the Criminal Code. I think it is admitted that the definitions set out in Snow's "Criminal Code of Canada" are automatically read into the sections of the Criminal Code. I have the fourth edition of "Craies on Statute Law", edited by W. S. Scott, wherein he gives the definition of a penal statute. At page 453 he says:

> It is said that penal statutes must be construed strictly—i.e., that "when the legislature imposes a penalty, the words imposing it must be clear and distinct." "Unless penalties are imposed in clear terms they are not enforceable." In Tuck v. Priester, Lord Esher, M.R., said, with reference to section 6 of the Copyright Act, 1862: "We must be very careful in construing that section, because it imposes a penalty. If there is a reasonable interpretation which will avoid the penalty in any particular case, we must adopt that construction." "Where various interpretations of a section are admissible it is a strong reason against adopting a particular interpretation"—

That is what is proposed in this bill.

> —"if it shall appear that the result would be unreasonable or oppressive." But this rule must be read as applicable, if at all, only to penalties of a quasi-public character—

That is what this is.

> —and not to acts creating penalties for infractions of general law which are in the nature of purely civil remedies. The rules laid down in Heydon's case for the construction of obscurely penned statutes are there said to apply to "penal" as well as to other statutes: In Attorney General v. Sillem, Pollock, C.B., said: "All the penal statutes there alluded to, and in all the places where that doctrine is to be met with, are statutes which create some disability or forfeiture; none of them are statutes creating a crime, and I think it is altogether a mistake to apply the resolutions in Heydon's case to a criminal statute which creates a new offence. The distinction between a strict construction and a more free one has, no doubt, in modern times almost disappeared, and the question now is, what is the true construction of the statute? I should say that in a criminal statute you must be quite sure that the offence charged is within the letter of the law."
> This rule is said to be "founded on the tenderness of the law for the rights of individuals, and on the plain principle that the power of punishment is vested in the legislature, and not in the judicial department; for it is the legislature, not the court, which is to define a crime and ordain its punishment." As to enactments creating crimes, the rule was adopted in favorem vitae in respect of treason and capital felonies, and extended to misdemeanours.

I have seen the cause and effect of the subject matter of the bill, and I must compliment the hon. member for Kamloops for having called the attention of the house to this particular feature of it. I know that fathers and mothers come before magistrates and judges in criminal courts meeting weekly and plead for light sentences for their children because the parents say the cause and effect of the subject matter was the main reason why they got into trouble.

In the city of Toronto for many years past there have been publications that are not fit to read. Notwithstanding differences of opinion throughout Canada, I believe the subject matter is one which requires the grave attention of the house before we adjourn. The minister should be sure that the cause and effect of the subject matter of the bill have been dealt with adequately and appropriately in order to help the large number of youths of the city of Toronto and the country generally who have been getting into trouble. Many of them have been carrying arms, and so forth. It has been going on for a long time. It is a serious matter for the country, and I hope that we shall adopt some regulation or rule to check it here and now.

Mr. Applewhaite: For the information of hon. members generally, I should like to ask whether it is the intention to reprint the bill with the proposed amendment and distribute it so that we will not have to wait until the statutes are printed in order to have copies for distribution.

Mr. Garson: Does my hon. friend mean copies for distribution in connection with this debate, or for public distribution?

Mr. Applewhaite: That would depend on whether it is the desire to conclude the debate today, in which case it would not be available. If the debate is to be adjourned, however, it would be a great help if it could be distributed.

Mr. Garson: I think the desire certainly was to conclude the debate today. That was why I took the text of this amendment to the hon. member who had introduced the original amendment, to make sure it met with his approval. The hope was that if he did approve, the house would accept it and put it through. As to the printing of the bill separately for the purpose of law enforcement, and so on, that is a matter which will be taken into consideration.

Mr. Applewhaite: I believe all hon. members have had requests from many organizations for information, and if as soon as possible the bill in its final form could be made available for distribution, it would be a great help.

Mr. Garson: For that purpose it would be possible for us to get some mimeographed copies which hon. members could incorporate in their letters to their constituents.

Mr. Fulton: Would it be possible or desirable to have the bill as amended printed in full for third reading, so that as finally carried it will include the amendment the minister has moved?

Mr. Garson: I think we can have the bill printed in a form which will be of assistance to hon. members, but I should not think it would be necessary to hold up third reading for that purpose. We are in committee now. It is permissible for us to advance the bill another stage and give it third reading. Under the circumstances I think it desirable to do that. In the meantime we can proceed to have it printed in a form in which it can be sent out by hon. members to their constituents who have shown a great deal of interest in this matter.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): In his amendment the minister is repealing the present section which deals with the publication and distribution of obscene material and introducing an entirely new section 207. If I understood the amendment correctly, in it the minister more or less defines what is a crime comic; but he said there was no definition of obscene literature, that this was a matter for the courts to decide. It is in connection with obscene literature that I wish to make a few remarks.

Within the last three weeks an important decision was given by an Ontario court on a charge laid under section 207, involving the publication and distribution of an obscene novel tending to corrupt morals. While it is too early for the case to be reported in the law reports, there is a fairly full report in the Toronto Globe and Mail and the Toronto Telegram of November 24. If the minister ever had any doubt on the point it will have been removed by the opinions expressed by the various attorneys general, which would indicate that so far as future prosecutions for the publication and distribution of obscene matter are concerned there is no hope of securing a conviction.

Mr. Garson: No hope because of what? Because of this judgment in Brantford?

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): No; because there is no way of legally defining what is obscene literature. In this case the judge is reported to have said, "In my decision I am guided by the laws of this country", which of course is quite correct. Then in his judgment as reported in the newspapers he makes this pertinent observation:

> Who am I to say whether this book or any other book is obscene?

The book complained of was one of the twenty-five cent paper novels, distributed by the American News Company, that can be purchased at any bookstore throughout the country. After reading about this case I obtained a copy of the book and read it. It describes no less than eight serious crimes that are recognized by our Criminal Code. Two of them, rape and murder, are punishable by death. Other serious crimes are punishable by long terms in penitentiary, and may also carry the lash. The book sets out other minor crimes, such as the use of narcotics, theft, seduction and crimes of the kind.

I suggest it would be fair to ask any hon. member of this house to read that book and decide whether it is the sort of novel he would be content to have his teen-age son or daughter read; and then consider what possibility there would be of crown counsel in future obtaining a conviction which would prohibit the circulation of this type of literature throughout the country. This book emphasizes the absolute contempt of youth not only for parental control but for all law. All the boys mentioned in the book are of teen age; and one of the most damaging things about it, in my opinion, is the way the twelve-year old boys regarded these older teen-agers as heroes and models. Both boys and girls looked upon them as the ideal type to follow.

In this case the defence relied upon the contention that the author had attempted to portray realism. I looked up the dictionary definition of the word "obscene", and it says: "Offensive to chastity, delicacy or decency; expressing or presenting to the mind or view something that decency, delicacy and purity forbid to be exposed; offensive to morals; indecent; impure; offensive to the senses; foul; disgusting; of evil omen." The definition of an obscene publication is, "an indecent publication which, whether true or false, tends to deprave and corrupt."

With this definition in mind, may I say that here is a book which describes in detail a public dance held by this teen-age gang at which a twelve-year old girl was raped; a book which would indicate that the seduction of girls of teen-age is an everyday affair; a book which describes in detail how two boys attending school, who had a quarrel with their teacher, returned to the school to assault and murder the principal; a book which describes in detail the murder of one teen-age boy by another. These are just a few of the things in this book. If, as the defence contended, this was an attempt to portray realism, I think the minister must be convinced that any crown counsel in future will find it impossible to convince a court or jury that a book is obscene.

In this case the case for the prosecution consisted of the evidence of a police officer of the city of Brantford, who laid the charge, and who produced the book and read some passages from it. One passage he read dealt with this club of teen-age boys, and described how they imported a number of prostitutes for the evening. Another passage described the raping of the twelve-year old girl. The other witness for the prosecution was the principal of the vocational school, who described the book as literary sewage. The defence called a well-known literary critic of a large Toronto paper, a well-known columnist of the Globe and Mail, and Mr. Edwin J. Lucas, from New York, who is described as a crime prevention society director. These three witnesses gave evidence that this book had literary value, and that, in their opinion, it was an attempt to portray realism. The book in their opinion was not obscene.

The judge in his decision, as reported in the paper, points out clearly that the responsibility of proving the charge and bringing home a conviction rests with the crown. He says further that it is not enough merely to produce a book and say that it is obscene. The judge says that he has to weigh the opinion of all these witnesses, not in numbers but in content, and he is satisfied that the crown has not proven the charge. The judge goes on to say this:

> I have definite convictions on a matter of this character, but I am not going to inject my own views. It is my job to decide whether the crown has proved guilt according to the charge.

The judge further stated that while he would not have such a book in his library, nor would he advise having such a book in the school library, on the evidence presented to him he must render a verdict of not guilty and declare that the book is not an obscene book.

It is difficult, Mr. Chairman, to understand how this government could appoint a commission to inquire into what we call Canadian culture, and at the same time permit the publication and distribution in wholesale quantities of a series of books of this type. This is only one. I spoke to a distributor of these books, and he said, "Oh, well; this book you are speaking about is nothing; you ought to read so-and-so." We have a commission on culture, and yet one of our courts has decided that under our laws this type of book, which the school principal describes as literary sewage, can be distributed in wholesale quantities throughout the dominion.

I do not need to point out that the question of juvenile delinquency is a matter of concern to every community from one end of this country to the other. Nor do I need to mention that those of us who are lawyers can recall cases that have come to our attention in which a boy or a girl becomes involved with the law, and then in your office you see the tragedy of the parents being at a loss to understand how their boy or girl could possibly be mixed up in this matter. Frankly I say to the minister that while his definition of crime comics may stand up, so far as the amendment dealing with obscene literature is concerned I doubt that there will be any improvement in the future. In view of this judgment it is likely there will be even a wider and more wholesale distribution of this type of material.

While the accused may engage the best lawyers in the country, as was done in this case, and contend that it is realism and has literary value, I do not think any member of this house or any parent in Canada would say that this trash is the sort of thing we want our Canadian boys and girls to read.

Mr. Knight: I have expressed before in this house the opinion that generally speaking I am in favour of the freedom of the individual in regard to his reading. Censorship, even if it were efficiently conducted, is a difficult thing. First of all, there are differences of opinion as to the definition of "obscene". There is little general agreement in regard to this matter. Censorship, even if it is carried on with ability, depends for its effectiveness upon the co-operation and endorsement of the public.

I believe that the public has already indicated its support of this bill. It is a difficult problem to give to the adult individual freedom in the matter of his reading, and at the same time guide our young people and protect them from the literary malnutrition from which they suffer at the moment. My own approach has always been a positive one. You cannot easily prohibit people. I believe the best way is to substitute something which is good for something which is bad. I mean by that the encouragement of good literature and good libraries. I would draw to the attention of the government the desirability of encouraging the building up of good libraries. I would urge, too, the removal of all restrictions, particularly sales taxes and customs duties, upon good literature coming into this country.

While I am on the subject, I might mention the matter of textbooks. I have a letter from the Minister of National Revenue, in which he says that textbooks "on the curriculum", —whatever that means—are admitted free. I believe that is true, but it is not true of all educational books. Friends of mine who are university professors have complained bitterly that they are not able to get certain books they need—not those which are definitely assigned to the student in relation to subjects on the curriculum, but reference books. Anyone who has any knowledge of teaching knows that wide reading on the part of a man who is trying to teach a subject is more important to him—it may not be to the student—than the textbooks themselves.

I believe that in this day and generation every government has some responsibility in this matter. I know it is a disputed question. I have discussed it with newspaper editors. If you ask the average newspaper editor what his responsibility is in the matter of leadership in the reading of good literature the discouragement of slang, and that sort of thing, he will say it is not his business to run a Sunday school. He is working for a businessman, and his business is to run a newspaper and to sell that newspaper—in other words, to give the public what it wants. I decry that point of view. I do not know whether that is the attitude of the government in this matter—to give the public what it wants—or whether the government feels it has a responsibility of leadership; that it should try to induce the people to move along lines that are in their best interests. It is a question I do not wish to discuss any further here, because if I did so I might get into a lengthy argument.

I know that the assistance the government might give to university professors and teachers, by throwing off certain taxes, would cost money. It would cost the government money to support libraries. But may I refer to another letter I received, this time from the Secretary of State, in reply to a question I asked him the other night with regard to the printing bureau. He tells me that it costs $18,240 to print the divorce evidence which as members we receive carefully sealed in a brown envelope, and which, as regularly as we receive it, we throw into our wastepaper baskets. I suggest that there is at least $18,000 which might be earmarked for a better class of reading. There is a difference between government acquiescence and government leadership.

In this matter of the selection of literature there must be somewhere in the department —and I think it should be in the department of customs and excise—men who have some knowledge of these things, whose literary taste—and I draw attention to that expression—is above reproach, and who have some wide knowledge of literature as well as experience in the matter of mere living.

Having stated my objection to censorship generally, I want to say this about these particular crime comics, these things which the hon. member who spoke before me said are realistic, but which are not. There is a difference between a thing which is essentially realistic, as a part of a serious novel, and a thing which is made deliberately pornographic and filthy so that it may become a best seller or appeal to moronic minds.

There are children of ten, twelve, fourteen and fifteen who have not the experience in living to enable them to distinguish the good from the poor in that particular regard. Since this is a matter having to do with youth, I am giving to this bill my hearty support. I should like to congratulate the sponsor upon the courage and initiative he has shown in bringing it to the house. I should also like to congratulate the government upon adopting that bill with the necessary amendments. It has my hearty support, and I believe it will have the hearty support of the country as well.

Mr. Shaw: Hon. members are aware of the fact that from time to time over the years the hon. member for Macleod has raised his voice in protest against the distribution of crime comics and obscene literature. Were he not unavoidably absent from the house this morning, I am sure his voice would be heard again. He would do as he did earlier in this session; he would compliment the hon. member for Kamloops upon bringing Bill No. 10 before the house. He would also compliment the minister and the government upon the action which they are taking now.

A few weeks ago my leader, the hon. member for Peace River, advanced what he considered to be a positive program to deal with this subject. In supporting the bill as amended, the hon. member for Macleod would naturally be speaking for all of us in this group. We are pleased that this action is being taken, and we will support the measure.

Mr. Fulford: Last spring, Mr. Chairman, it was my privilege to attend a public speaking contest held in the town of Brockville; it was a contest among the school children of Brockville and district. The debate was won by a twelve-year-old girl whose topic was the harm or value of comic books. Subsequently this little girl won a contest, sponsored by the Ontario trustees and ratepayers association of eastern Ontario, participated in by public schools representing all counties in eastern Ontario, including the city of Ottawa. It was a great privilege for me to listen to this little girl, because a more stinging indictment could not have been made by anybody than was made by Nancy Howard of Brockville. The substance of her short discourse was the fact that all comic books are not harmful, but unfortunately the younger mind was not in a position to tell the difference between what is good and what is bad. She had a number of them pasted on a large board, and with a pointer she indicated those that she considered bad.

Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that later I went to the trouble of going to a bookstore and buying some of these publications, and I can testify that she was right; not only was it not fit literature for children, but it was not fit literature for adults. She pointed out then the comic books which depicted biblical stories, historical stories and nature stories, and which were good. I certainly think that if a child of twelve—and I was later assured by her teacher that this work was done entirely on her own initiative, without any help—can point to the danger that exists in the material on the bookstands and in the bookstores of Canada, it is indeed time that we in the House of Commons woke up.

I want to commend the hon. member for Kamloops for his initiative in bringing this bill forward for discussion and consideration. It should have been brought forward years ago. It is one of these things that has just grown. When comic books originally came out, there was no harm in them, but they were not good literature. The harm has crept in until today we must take a decided stand and see that these books are swept from our bookstands and bookstores.

There is little more I need to add, except a comment that may be of some interest. Yesterday I was speaking to the principal of one of Brockville's public schools, who told me that within the last few months the public library has been thrown open to the school children, and that the teachers take their classes there and instruct them in what are good books for the younger generation to read. As a result he says that there has been a marked decrease in the number of crime comics in the possession of the children; that the children have now become aware of the dangers that exist, and that they are asking for such books as "Tom Sawyer", "David Copperfield" and the better-known books on which the generation to which we belong were brought up. Unfortunately the parents are generally the last to discover what the child is doing or what he is reading. Until the time comes when there is an act with teeth in it, there will be the danger of these books getting into the wrong hands and influencing the minds of children when they are in their formative period; and in spite of what teachers, parents and others may do, there will be developed in children crime instincts which can do nothing but harm to young Canadians who should be given every opportunity to develop their minds properly rather than along the sadistic lines depicted in these books.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I think I was the first to support the hon. member for Kamloops when he brought in his amendment. I spoke then just as vigorously as I knew how, within my experience and intelligence. We are grateful for this amendment, and we are grateful that the minister did not carry it over to the next session. What standard shall we use when we are judging that a thing is right or wrong, whether it is a book or anything else? The standard is that set up by Mr. Speaker when he asks the blessing of the Master Teacher upon our deliberations. If we adopted that standard, many books would be removed from our parliamentary library which emphasize the breaking of the seventh commandment.

I support the minister in this amendment. I am pleased to know that the hon. member for Kamloops has his support. We should join heartily in co-operation to make these amendments a success.

Mr. Drew: The amendment before us is one which could be of great importance in dealing with an extremely serious situation. The hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough has indicated the difficulty of obtaining convictions under the law as it now stands, and in view of judgments which have been given, he has indicated his concern about the possibility of obtaining a conviction even under the amended section. It seems that it will not be possible to determine how far this new section will be effective until cases have actually been tried. If weaknesses are found, there seems no doubt that hon. members will be ready to support such further amendments as may have the effect of preventing the sale and distribution of this type of literature.

[Mr. Fulford.]

The section as it will now be framed has to do with both the obscene literature which was covered previously, and also what are described as crime comics, defined in the amendment as a magazine, periodical or book which exclusively or substantially comprises matter depicting pictorially the commission of crimes, real or fictitious. I hope that those who are called upon to deal with alleged offences under this amendment will not seek to find ways of avoiding the imposition of penalty, but will direct their minds to the clear pattern that is emerging from influences which produce an extraordinary similarity in crime amongst the members of the younger generation.

It has often been said, and with great truth, that juvenile delinquency is largely parental delinquency, and in the perfect society, which has not yet been reached, undoubtedly parents would be able so to influence their children as to prevent their reading books of this kind, no matter how readily available they might be. But we know as a matter of actual experience that if these books are available they will be read, and if they are read, they have a certain influence. Only two weeks ago a mere boy of sixteen was sentenced in one of our courts to be hanged, and the evidence demonstrated clearly that his mind had been influenced by books of this kind. We have had all too clear evidence of the fact that this type of publication is often dealt with merely on the basis of a fine distinction between what is adult literature and what is extremely harmful poison to the minds of our young people.

We can expect there will be those who sincerely question the withdrawal of the word "knowingly" from the first part of section 207 as amended. There will be a genuine concern about that; but it should be pointed out that this section deals only with those who make, print, publish, distribute or circulate, and it is not too much to ask those who have to do with the sale of these books to exercise some control over what they do sell. With regard to those who place these books or circulars in the hands of retailers, it is not going beyond the general principles of our law to say that since they accept the benefits of that distribution they should accept also the responsibility for it. After all, under the Criminal Code those who handle firearms, poison or explosives; those who start fires, and so forth, are charged with some responsibility for the thing they do, and the same principle should apply here.

The hon. member for Kamloops deserves great credit for the persistence with which, as a private member, he has continued to bring before this house the need for an amendment of this kind. I am sure that when this legislation passes it will be commonly known as the Fulton bill. I hope it will, because it will be a tribute both to his discernment in choice of a subject for presentation as a private member, and also to his persistence in furthering the legislation. In this instance hon. members will undoubtedly feel that the Minister of Justice and the government, having accepted the suggestions that have been made, having sought the advice of the provincial attorneys general and others, and brought in further amendments to strengthen the section, have co-operated effectively with the private member who introduced the measure. This is an excellent demonstration of the manner in which our system of parliamentary procedure should work.

Section as amended agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Fulton: There is a consequential amendment to the title, arising out of the fact that the amendment moved by the minister has just been adopted.

First let me express to the committee, and through the committee to the house, my appreciation of the support which has been given to this bill. I do not believe it is an exaggeration to say that when the House of Commons passes this bill it will have made a great achievement in the interests of Canada —and it is not the achievement of any one member or of any particular group of members. I express my sincere appreciation of the generosity of those who have spoken in pointing out that I introduced the bill in the first instance, but it represents an achievement of the House of Commons as a whole. All hon. members have united in a spirit of friendship and of urgency to accomplish something of great benefit to our whole country. If it were necessary to do so, I believe one could substantiate this statement by reference to letters that all hon. members have received. I have received many communications from humble men and women, parents who were desperately concerned with the welfare of their children, and conversations I have had with those parents moved me greatly. I know the deep anxiety with which mothers and fathers have viewed this matter, recognizing in it a frightful threat to which their children have been exposed. It was an exposure which was beyond parental control, because these crime comics were available in such large numbers and in so many places. I know that this anxiety of parents has played a large part in securing the extraordinary degree of unanimity with which this proposal has been received in the house.

In the past I have not hesitated on occasions to be a severe critic of the government. I take this opportunity to say, with all the sincerity I can muster, how much I appreciate the fact that on this occasion we have been working together for a common purpose. I express unreservedly my appreciation of the manner in which the government, particularly the Minister of Justice, have set themselves the task of accepting and improving upon the bill offered, and facilitating the passage of the legislation. I am profoundly impressed by the great and abiding strength and inherent fineness of our democratic system, in the light of the fact that this proposed legislation has been accepted and the purpose achieved, not, as I say, by any one group or individual using pressure or force in any form of manoeuvring, but quietly and co-operatively in the ordinary course of parliamentary procedure. In that procedure hon. members on both sides of the house, those holding official positions, such as the minister, and the private members, have worked together to produce the desired result. It makes me proud to be a Canadian, and doubly proud of the privilege of being a member of Canada's House of Commons, where this immensely powerful aspect of the democratic process has been demonstrated—and all this in marked contrast to the type of procedure which is not the strength but rather the weakness of countries governed by other methods.

As a private member may I presume finally to speak for all private members in all parts of the house—and I believe I do—by saying that we are immensely cheered, not only by the acceptance of this legislation, but by the fact that even at a time when governmental problems weigh upon the House of Commons and the country, my colleagues and I in the house should have been given an opportunity to contribute something positive to the country we all love so much, and which we are all so anxious to serve and to preserve as the homeland of decency and right; for this is really the purpose of the bill.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker):

That the title of the bill be amended by deleting therefrom the words in the parenthesis, "portrayal of crime."

Questions

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Mr. Hodgson:

1. Are payments under the Family Allowances Act made before proof of eligibility is established?

2. If so, what was the total amount of such payments made during the years 1948 and 1949 to date?

3. What amount, if any, of the above payments have been found to be overpayments in accordance with the terms of the act?

4. On what authority were family allowance payments made prior to proof of eligibility being established?

5. What action, if any, has been taken to recover overpayments made under the Family Allowances Act?

6. How much has been recovered to date?

Mr. Martin:

1. Payments under the Family Allowances Act are made on the basis of a declaration signed by both parents and stating the birth date of each child. Since this declaration is subject to later verification through provincial vital statistics records, or otherwise, it is not considered necessary to delay payment of family allowances until verification is made. (There are a number of points of eligibility for family allowances, including residence in Canada, attendance at school, maintenance by the parent, age under sixteen, and so forth. However, it is assumed in replying to this question that the inquiry turns on verification of birth dates.)

2. Payments made during 1948 and 1949 (to October 31) before verification of birth dates, may have been made with respect to accounts originating in 1945, 1946 or 1947, as well as in 1948 and 1949. While all accounts go into pay prior to verification of birth dates, the process of verification began early in 1946 when most provincial records became available and has progressed steadily since. Currently more than 96 per cent of all birth dates claimed have been verified, and more than 99 per cent of all those for which provincial birth record indexes have been supplied to family allowances offices. To determine now what payments were made in 1948 and 1949 in respect to children with birth dates not yet verified in those years would require the detailed analysis of over 1,800,000 family allowances accounts, covering over 4 million children. This would require many months' work.

3. Of the payments made in 1948 and 1949 on behalf of children whose first payments of family allowances began in those years, total overpayments arising because of birth date errors amount to $163, all of which has been recovered. In addition there remains as of October 31, 1949, a balance of $92,325 due to overpayments arising from birth date errors made in respect to children who were registered for family allowances before 1948. Of this amount, all except $5,371 is recoverable either by deductions from continuing accounts or by collection from the payee.

4. The Family Allowances Act does not require that the age of a child must be confirmed from provincial vital statistics records before payments are made. Family allowances payments are made on the basis of a declaration completed and signed by the parents. So far as birth dates are concerned, the birth dates claimed by the parents are subsequently verified by comparison with provincial vital statistics records. Such records are available only after several months following the registration of the child for family allowances. The vast majority of birth dates as claimed by the parents are found to be correct. To require parents to prove the birth date before family allowance payments could begin would mean inconvenience to them in procuring birth certificates and a considerable delay in beginning payments. Moreover the burden placed on provincial vital statistics offices in being called upon to issue so great a volume of birth certificates promptly would exceed their capacity.

5. Overpayments incurred under the Family Allowances Act are recovered by: (a) complete suspension of the account; (b) deductions from an account; (c) collection from the parent.

6. In the first years of family allowances payments, records of overpayments were not kept in a manner which permits of determining what amount of overpayments was due to birth date errors, and what amount was due to other reasons. It is not therefore possible, except with detailed examination of every family allowances account in pay at any time since July, 1945, to ascertain what overpayments were set up on account of birth date errors, or what amounts have been recovered against them. However, the balance of overpayments, for all causes, outstanding at March 31, 1948, was $493,291, in respect to 8,982 accounts. This balance on October 31, 1949, was $429,168, in respect to 7,397 accounts made up as follows:—2,495 accounts amounting to $150,374.25 where recovery is automatic by suspension and recovery from future payments, 4,420 accounts amounting to $250,998.36 where recovery is being undertaken by direct collection methods, the accounts having lapsed; 482 accounts amounting to $27,795.56 where every possible attempt thus far to collect the overpayment may have been regarded as uncollectable.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Of the total amount of $429,168, $92,488 is due to overpayments arising from birth date errors made in respect to children registered from 1945 to date. This includes all the children up to sixteen years of age who were registered in 1945, prior to the first payments of family allowances, as well as all children registered from July, 1945, to October 31, 1949, throughout Canada.

It is a matter of great interest to note, as has already been indicated, that of the payments made in 1948 and 1949 on behalf of children whose first payments of family allowances began in those years, total overpayments arising because of birth date errors amount to only $163, all of which has been recovered. This would seem to be, on examination of family allowances administrations in other countries, a record of administrative achievement.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE —EMPLOYEES

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. How many persons were in the employ of the Department of National Health and Welfare in 1939?
2. How many persons are in the employ of the said department at present?

Mr. Martin:

1. The Department of National Health and Welfare was established in 1944.

2. As at October 31, 1949—2,716 (excluding casuals, 137).

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS—FAIR WAGE PROVISIONS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Do contracts let by the federal government include any fair wage provisions?
2. If so, what are the terms of such provisions?
3. Are there any kinds or classes of contracts exempt from such provisions? If so, what kinds or classes?
4. To what extent do provincial fair wage laws and other provincial legislation apply to employers carrying out federal government contracts?

Mr. Mitchell:

1. Yes. The Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act, 1935, requires the inclusion of fair wage provisions in every contract made with the government of Canada for construction, remodelling, repair or demolition of any work.

Order in council P.C. 1206 of June 7, 1922 as amended, recently consolidated by order in council P.C. 5547, November 3, 1949, requires that labour conditions shall be observed by the department or departments concerned in connection with all contracts made on behalf of the government of Canada for the construction or remodelling of public buildings of all kinds, railways, canals, roads, bridges, locks, dry docks, elevators, harbours, piers, wharves, lighthouses, and other works for the improvement and safety of transportation and navigation; rifle ranges, fortifications, and other works of defence; dams, hydraulic works, slides, piers, booms, and other works for facilitating the transmission of timber, and all other works and properties constructed or remodelled for the government of Canada; also that the like conditions shall, as far as practicable, be observed by the department or departments of Canada, in connection with all agreements made by the government involving the grant of dominion public funds in the form of subsidy, advance, loan, or guarantee for any of the purposes mentioned.

Labour conditions are also observed by the department or departments concerned in connection with all contracts for the manufacture and supply to the government of Canada of fittings for public buildings; harness, saddlery, clothing, and other outfit for the military and naval forces; Royal Canadian Mounted Police; letter carriers, and other government officers and employees; mail bags, letter boxes, and other postal stores.

2. These are set out in the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act, 1935 and order in council P.C. 5547 of November 3, 1949.

3. Any kind of contract not specified in the answer to part 1.

4. Except as to the wages and conditions of employment stipulated in the federal fair wages and hours of labour legislation, employers carrying out federal government contracts are not exempted from the operation of applicable provincial legislation.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—RECOMMENDATIONS OF REPORT ON INTERNATIONAL CARTELS

Mr. Coldwell:

What action, if any, has been taken on each of the recommendations contained in the report "Canada and International Cartels", by the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act in 1945?

Mr. Garson:

A. The recommendations made in the report "Canada and International Cartels" are set out in pages 66 to 69, and may be summarized as follows:

1. Particular attention should be given by the combines investigation commission to restrictive agreements based on patents.

The following action has been taken in this field: The Combines Investigation Act was amended in 1946 to give powers to the exchequer court to issue remedial orders in cases of use of patents or trade marks unduly to limit production or restrain or injure trade. The combines investigation commission has been giving particular attention in its inquiries to restrictive arrangements based on patents. Recent actions have been taken in the exchequer court, instituted by the Attorney General of Canada, to impeach patents which formed the basis of restrictive agreements. Several of these patents have already been declared invalid.

2. The establishment of official government records which would show from time to time any significant change in the degree of financial control which corporations outside Canada exercise over individual domestic companies.

Information with respect to this matter is being compiled by the dominion bureau of statistics which, from time to time, publishes the results of its studies in this field. A comprehensive report was published in 1949.

3. More adequate provision for the initiation of inquiries by the combines investigation commission into restraints of trade and unfair trade practices.

Amendments made to the Combines Investigation Act in 1946 empowered the commissioner to receive and inquire into complaints respecting practices alleged to be offences under the act or under sections 498 and 498A of the Criminal Code. Provision was also made in the 1946 amendments to restore the power of the commissioner to initiate inquiries under section 12 of the act.

4. The building up of an effective organization under the Combines Investigation Act supported by sufficient appropriations.

The staff of the commission has been built up from an average of eight in 1945 to thirty-two in 1949. Appropriations have increased from $61,000 in the fiscal year 1945-46 to $170,683 in the fiscal year 1948-49. Further increase is made in the estimates for the current year.

5. Support should be given by the government of Canada to the establishment of an international office to deal with international cartels.

Canada participated in the United Nations conferences on trade and employment which resulted in the Havana charter for an international trade organization. This charter, which has been submitted for ratification to the participating countries, contains provisions for dealing with restrictive business practices by cartels.

*NEWFOUNDLAND—PHYSICAL FITNESS ACT

Mr. Higgins:

Has Newfoundland made application to be included within the provisions of the Physical Fitness Act?

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Martin: No formal application has been received, but discussions are taking place with the province of Newfoundland.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

INCOME TAXES AND SUBSIDIES—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Argue:

1. What was the total amount of (a) income taxes; (b) corporation taxes, collected from Saskatchewan individuals or corporations in the fiscal year 1948-49?
2. What other sums in the form of taxes, levies, or deductions were collected from individuals or corporations in Saskatchewan in 1948-49, and what was the amount of each?
3. What was the amount of each grant or subsidy paid to the Saskatchewan government in 1948-49?

DOMINION LANDS ACT

APPROVAL OF REGULATIONS TABLED SEPTEMBER 16, 1949

Hon. Colin Gibson (Minister of Mines and Ressources) moved:

That regulations made by the governor in council under authority of the Dominion Lands Act, chapter 113, R.S. 1927, which were published in the Canada Gazette on the 21st day of May, 1949, and the 23rd day of July, 1949, in accordance with the provisions of section 75 thereof and which were laid on the table on the 16th day of September, 1949, be approved.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the Dominion Lands Act requires that regulations made pursuant to the provisions of the act be tabled in the house, and that they be published in the Canada Gazette. They must also be approved by resolution of both houses of parliament, otherwise they expire at the end of the session. The regulations placed on the table are not new; they are a consolidation of regulations which had previously been approved by parliament.

Motion agreed to.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES COMPENSATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR COMPENSATION IN ACCORDANCE WITH P.E.I. ACT

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 220, to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Repeal of section 4.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I think I should make a short statement and explanation as to this bill.

Section 4 of the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947, provides that where an employee of the federal government is caused personal injury, where death follows an accident, or an industrial disease is suffered by such employee in the province of Prince Edward Island, the rate of compensation shall be that which is in accordance with the law of the province of New Brunswick. On the 23rd day of March, 1949, the Workmen's Compensation Act of the province of Prince Edward Island was enacted, and, I understand, put into effect on the same day. Therefore the province of Prince Edward Island now has its law of compensation in so far as government employees are concerned. This being the case, it is advisable that section 4 of the Government Employees Compensation Act, 1947, be repealed so that section 3 will now come into operation so far as the province of Prince Edward Island is concerned. In other words, it will mean when an accident occurs or death follows or an industrial disease exists involving employees of the government in the province of Prince Edward Island, by virtue of section 3 the law applicable will be that which is in existence at the time in the province of Prince Edward Island.

I am sure the bill will commend itself to the house.

Mr. McLure: This covers compensation for injuries to all government employees in Prince Edward Island, and it will now be the same as the rest of the provinces? Is that right?

Mr. Chevrier: The first part of the hon. member's question should be answered yes, and the second part no. The law applicable in the case of Prince Edward Island will be that which was enacted on the 23rd of March, 1949, but it is somewhat different in that province from what it is in other provinces.

Mr. McLure: It will be entirely up to them.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

BANKRUPTCY ACT

GENERAL REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION—VARIOUS AMENDMENTS

Hon. Colin Gibson (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 149, respecting bankruptcy.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: May I remind hon. members that the bill has been studied carefully in the standing committee on banking and commerce, and is now reported therefrom with a few amendments. Unless I have unanimous consent I shall have to call each clause separately.

Mr. Fraser: Will you indicate, sir, the sections on which amendments were made in the committee?

The Deputy Chairman: Yes.

Sections 1 to 173 inclusive agreed to.

On section 174—Coming into force.

Mr. Fleming: It is not my desire to break the spell which has been cast over these sections, but I think it worth saying that the fact the committee has found it possible to pass them with such speed is a tribute to the work done in the banking and commerce committee, which really has been working very hard on this bill, sitting twice a day for the past two weeks.

I should like to ask the Minister of Justice when it is proposed that the act be brought into effect. One of the factors which impelled the banking and commerce committee to work so strenuously on this bill was that representations were received from a number of responsible bodies indicating their keen desire to see the bill adopted and brought into operation as quickly as possible. Could the minister indicate when it is proposed to bring the legislation into effect?

Mr. Garson: I do not think I can give any more definite undertaking than simply to repeat the words of those who have urged that it be brought into effect as quickly as possible. Certainly it is our intention to bring this legislation into operation as soon as that can be done.

Mr. Fair: I should like also to ask the Minister of Justice whether the speed with which this legislation has gone through the house is responsible for the clocks in the chamber going on strike. Apparently they have not been able to keep up with us.

Vessel Construction Act

CANADIAN VESSEL CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

CONSTRUCTION AND CONVERSION OF VESSELS —ACCELERATED DEPRECIATION

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 216, to encourage the construction and conversion of vessels in Canada.

Mr. Drew: Is the minister explaining the bill?

Mr. Chevrier: If I may I should prefer to make the statement in committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Chevrier: The purpose of this bill is to give some measure of tax relief to those persons who build ships in Canada for operation under the Canadian flag.

In its second annual report, which has been recently tabled, the Canadian maritime commission has pointed out that the cost of construction of a ship in Great Britain is approximately twenty-five per cent less than the cost of construction of a similar ship in Canada. This represented comparative costs as of the 31st March of this year, and recent changes in monetary values have probably served to widen this gap materially. In any event it is safe to say that Canadian building costs are the second highest in the world; but owners who build in Canada have not the same benefits in regard to depreciation as those who build in countries which enjoy lower building costs.

The law as it stands at the moment allows a shipowner to write off by way of depreciation six per cent yearly of the cost of a new vessel against his profits. If there are no profits he still must write off three per cent.

It is well known that the shipping industry is a feast or famine business. It experiences fairly well defined cycles of reasonable prosperity and depression. There is not a uniform earning record, and for that reason the shipping industry does not generally represent an attractive investment. Moreover if a shipowner is compelled to take depreciation in loss years, he may lose the opportunity of fully amortizing his investment and therefore be under a disability when the time comes for him to secure fleet replacements.

The bill is designed to make shipping a more attractive investment and thus to encourage building in Canada. In brief, the bill permits a shipowner who builds or converts a vessel in Canada to write off his investment up to 33⅓ per cent per annum as quickly as earnings permit, and on the other hand he is not compelled to take depreciation in any year when he has experienced a loss.

Under such arrangement of flexible or accelerated depreciation the government does not suffer a tax loss. When the shipowner exhausts his depreciation he must pay taxes on the full amount of his profits without deduction. In other words he may use his discretion within the limits allowed by the bill to write off his capital investment. Under the particular conditions of the shipping industry I believe it is fair to permit capital write-off to be geared to cycles of fluctuating earnings.

A minor feature of the bill provides authority for establishing a reserve against quadrennial surveys. Under the Canada Shipping Act and under the rules of classification societies, shipowners face a regular and unavoidable expense in relation to special surveys every four years in the interest of the safety of the ship, its crew and cargo. This is another condition which is peculiar to the shipping industry, and therefore the bill envisages the setting up of reserves annually to meet such known and unavoidable liability.

The bill does not represent any new or radical departure in the principles of taxation as they affect shipping in other countries. On the contrary, it tends to bring Canadian legislation affecting shipping into line with that of other countries. The United Kingdom recently increased the first year's depreciation allowance from 20 per cent to 40 per cent. Sweden allows free depreciation, in the sense that the taxpayer may write off on his books any amount in his discretion up to 100 per cent. Denmark allows tax-free depreciation over a two-year period for amounts in excess of pre-war building costs. Many other countries have adopted varying methods in applying the principle.

One thing, however, which I should point out is that the benefits of the bill apply only to vessels built or converted in Canada. In view of the depressed state of the deep-sea shipping industry throughout the world, the demand for new building has fallen off, and I do not suggest that this bill will produce a large volume of building orders for Canadian yards immediately. I am, however, satisfied that it will give considerable encouragement to the building of some vessels, especially those required in the coastal and inland trades, where we are badly in need of new equipment. I believe that building of vessels encouraged by this legislation, together with such vessels as are required for government account, will enable us to preserve in this country a nucleus of a shipbuilding and ship repairing industry for defence purposes capable of expansion to meet an emergency in time of war.

The object of the bill before the house is to aid in the construction and conversion of ships. The bill may be divided into three main parts: One, depreciation with respect to construction costs of a vessel to be built after a date fixed by proclamation; two, depreciation with respect to conversion costs expended after the date fixed by proclamation on a vessel in existence on that date; three, depreciation with respect to ships sold.

Prior to December, 1948, the maximum depreciation to which the owner of a vessel was entitled was 6 per cent of the original cost. In 1944 or 1945, the normal rate was 4 per cent of the original cost. However, in order to encourage the sale of Park vessels, the normal rate was increased from 4 per cent to 6 per cent. Furthermore, ships purchased during the reconstruction period were entitled to double the normal rate, that is, 12 per cent.

The present position, therefore, is to allow a maximum allowable depreciation of 6 per cent of the original cost. This is in accordance with the straight line method as opposed to the reducing balance method. This bill will allow the owner of a vessel who constructs or converts his ships in Canadian yards to special depreciation which he may write off at the rate of 33⅓ per cent in a year. The bill contains certain other clauses which are of a minor nature.

I am sure this bill will commend itself to the house.

Mr. Green: This is the first opportunity that the house has had, Mr. Chairman, to discuss the allied questions of shipping and shipbuilding in Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: May I remind the hon. gentleman, without wishing to interrupt him, that this deals with shipbuilding only.

Mr. Green: Yes, I believe that is the great weakness in the government's position.

Mr. Chevrier: I am pointing that out because I hope the hon. gentleman is not going to commence a discussion of shipping problems, when this deals with just one angle of the problem.

Mr. Green: In the speech from the throne there was a reference to shipbuilding and shipping, in that it said that measures demanding our consideration would include a bill respecting assistance to shipping and shipbuilding in Canada. In the spring session, there was also a reference in the speech from the throne to a bill respecting assistance for the Canadian shipbuilding industry. Nothing further was heard of that bill to help shipbuilding, and the house prorogued without any legislation having been brought down.

Today we have a measure before us to aid the shipbuilding industry, but it would appear that nothing is to be done to help the shipping industry directly. In any event, this bill is brought before us in the dying days of the session, and it is described as "An act to encourage the construction and conversion of vessels in Canada".

As I understand the bill, and I believe the minister confirmed my understanding in his remarks, its purpose is to provide for accelerated depreciation in respect of ships which are built or converted in Canadian shipyards after a date to be set by proclamation. A ship may be depreciated in full over a period of three years. The bill also contains a provision for setting aside a reserve for what are called quadrennial surveys on all shipping. These provisions will be of some help to the shipbuilding industry, and for that reason I believe the bill should be passed by the house. We should bear in mind, however, the fact that a vessel can be depreciated only once. In other words, if the company that owns the vessel is making a good profit during the three years after the ship is constructed, then of course they would benefit by writing off this depreciation but depreciation can only be taken once, and when the whole value of the ship has been depreciated, this is no further benefit.

As I understand the measure, it helps with the building of any kind of ship; it is not restricted to ocean-going vessels. There is more control over the conversion of ships than there is over construction, because in the case of conversions the Canadian maritime commission have to approve of the conversion plan. I believe the commission are given no such control over the construction of ships.

One other feature of the bill is that there is no provision for a report to parliament, or, in fact, to the minister himself, on the operations under this act. Here we have a bill making a special provision for depreciation with regard to shipbuilding. I suggest to the minister that there should be written into the bill a provision that there shall be a report to parliament annually on the operations under the bill. From its terms, I take it that the bill is to be under the jurisdiction of the Canadian maritime commission. That body is given whatever control there is over the operations carried on under the bill.

That brings me to the story of the Canadian maritime commission. That body being the one which will administer this act, it is important to consider just what their powers are and what position they have taken. The commission was set up just two years ago after demands had been made for several years from all sections of the house. The United States for a long time has had a maritime commission responsible for advising the government on the marine policy of that country; it has really had control of the shipping and shipbuilding business in that neighbour nation. The Canadian maritime commission was sought in order that it might do for us the same job of work as was being done for the United States by the United States maritime commission. When we received the bill setting up the commission we found that it did not go as far as the United States bill, but the main job of the Canadian maritime commission was defined as being to advise the government and to advise parliament. Hon. members will find the duties set out in section 6 of the Canadian Maritime Commission Act, which is chapter 52 of the statutes of 1947. That section reads as follows:

> The commission shall consider and recommend to the minister from time to time such policies and measures as it considers necessary for the operation, maintenance, manning and development of a merchant marine and a shipbuilding and ship-repairing industry commensurate with Canadian maritime needs.

It will thus be seen that great reliance was placed on this commission. In effect, it was supposed to work out and to recommend a shipbuilding and shipping policy for Canada. It was also given power to have advisory committees. Section 9 provides:

> With the approval of the minister, the commission may establish and appoint the members of such committee or committees as it deems advisable to confer with and advise the commission with respect to any matter within its jurisdiction.

The commission has actually set up advisory committees, has called in leading people from all parts of the country, and has had their recommendations. It did not begin to function until November, 1947. Although the bill was passed earlier that year, the commissioners were not appointed until November 1, 1947. Under their act they are required to file a report. Last year they filed a report dealing with the five months of their operation from November 1, 1947 to March 31, 1948. In view of the fact that they had been operating for such a short time, they were not in a position to report much to parliament. They really were not yet in a position to make recommendations to parliament as to what policy should be adopted. For that reason the next report that they were to make, for the year from March 31, 1948, to March 31, 1949, was of the utmost importance.

[Mr. Green.]

Section 13 of the act, which provides for an annual report, reads as follows:

> The commission shall as soon as possible after the thirty-first day of March in each year and in any event within three months thereof submit to the minister an annual report in such form as the minister may prescribe of its affairs and operations during the twelve-month period ending on the thirty-first day of March, and the minister shall lay the said report before parliament forthwith if parliament is then in session, or, if parliament is not then in session, within the first fifteen days of the next ensuing session.

Actually the report was dated June 30; that is, it was dated at the last possible day after March 31, but it was not tabled in the House of Commons until November 24, not quite two weeks ago. Here is another instance of a minister and the government failing to comply with the provisions of a statute. In this case that deliberate breach of the terms of a statute is unfair to the house and unfair to the Canadian people.

Mr. Chevrier: I wish my hon. friend would omit the word "deliberate".

Mr. Green: The failure to file the report may not have been deliberate. Only the minister and the government know that. But the law called for the tabling of that report within fifteen days after this session commenced. It should have been tabled on the last day of September of this year. The position was that Canada's shipping and shipbuilding industries were steadily declining, that ships were being sold to other flags, that other ships were being laid up and that Canadian sailors were being put on the beach, that is, were losing their jobs. The government had promised action in the spring and had not taken it. It had promised action again in the speech from the throne of this session and yet the minister failed to table that report. It was not just another report. It was not like the report of a department which more or less follows the report of the year before. Here is a report which outlines the whole background of Canadian shipping and shipbuilding, and makes recommendations as to what should be done.

That was the job of the commissioners, and they have actually brought in one of the most comprehensive and worth-while reports that I have ever seen tabled in the House of Commons. Yet the house was not given the opportunity to view the whole picture as set out in the report, and to make up its mind as to what policy should be adopted in regard to shipbuilding and shipping. The men engaged in these two industries across Canada were not given that opportunity, and the Canadian people were not given the opportunity to review this report in order that they might make up their minds what policy should be adopted to meet a very serious situation. One of the most serious situations in Canada today is the plight of the shipbuilding and shipping industries. This has just been another case of stalling. Measures should have been brought in last spring to deal with the shipbuilding and shipping industries. The remedial measures, if not brought in last spring, should have been brought in earlier in the present session. The delay simply means that the allied industries of shipbuilding and shipping have been allowed to go further and further down.

Let me say a word or two about the report itself. It gives the history of shipbuilding and shipping in Canada, and a very interesting history it is, too. Hon. members will find a very good summary of the report commencing at page 7. It points out that back in the nineteenth century shipbuilding reached a peak in Canada when, in the year 1875—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I hate to interrupt the hon. member but it seems to me he is discussing the report at greater length than may be necessary to put forth his argument for the purpose of discussing this bill. I do not want to place a limitation on what he has to say, but it seems to me that at times he is hardly in order.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, in the speech from the throne we were promised measures to aid shipbuilding and shipping. This is the measure which has been brought down to do that job and in order to see whether or not it is ample, whether it meets the situation, I must certainly go into the shipbuilding question, and once I go into the shipbuilding question I must necessarily get involved in shipping because they are allied industries. I shall not be long but there are a few points in connection with this report which I simply must explain to the committee in order to make my speech intelligible.

Dealing with the history of shipbuilding in Canada the report points out that back in the days of the wooden ships, in the year 1875, there were nearly 500 ships built in this country. In the year 1878 Canada had 7,196 vessels of 1,333,015 tons and ranked fourth among the ship-owning nations of the world. That of course was owing to the efforts of Canadians in the maritime provinces who made such a splendid record in the days of the wooden ships. The report goes on to explain how, with the large-scale production of steel for shipbuilding in the United Kingdom, the Canadian shipbuilding industry fell away to practically nothing.

Then came the first world war which brought a great need for merchant vessels, and again the Canadian shipbuilding industry became of great importance. But after the war it faded away in much the same way as our shipbuilding industry has been fading away since the second world war. The report states that by 1939 there were on the Canadian registry only 38 regular ocean-going ships of one thousand gross tons and over, totalling in all 241,684 gross tons, of which eleven belonged to the Canadian National Steamships and ten were ocean-going tankers owned and operated by Imperial Oil. In other words, during the twenty years following the first great war the shipbuilding and the shipping industries in Canada had fallen away until there was practically nothing left.

At page 18 the report gives the picture after the second war. In 1948 Canada had 172 ocean-going vessels of one thousand tons or over, with a gross tonnage of 1,178,791 tons. I believe that is the largest ocean-going tonnage Canada has ever had. The figures are also given as of March 31 of this year. The number of ships is reduced from 172 to 145, and the gross tonnage is reduced from 1,178,791 to 981,255. I have not the figures for the end of October, but I think there is very little doubt that they will show that there has been quite a large decrease below the figures for the end of March, 1949.

The report also points out some fundamental factors in connection with these industries in Canada. For one thing it sets out that the cost of constructing a Canadian ship is only surpassed by the cost of constructing ships in the United States. In Great Britain the cost is 25 per cent less than the cost of construction in Canada. Our daily operating costs come second, the United States being $972.52 a day, Canada $810.50 and the United Kingdom ranking sixth at $525.46 a day. Italy, which is last, amounts to $421.71 a day. The report also points out that because of the position of our trade balances, because of the trouble the other countries are having in getting Canadian dollars, the situation of the shipbuilding and shipping industries has been made just that much harder.

In connection with the Marshall plan the report explains that under that plan half of the goods shipped to other countries must be carried in United States vessels and that the other half has to be carried in vessels of the countries which are receiving the aid, so that Canada gets absolutely no benefit from the Marshall aid plan, so far as shipping is concerned.

Then the commissioners come to certain conclusions. They do not agree that the Canadian merchant marine should be allowed to disintegrate. On the other hand they say we should not aim to have a large enough marine to carry all the goods we export. On the basis of national security the report says there should be maintained a Canadian merchant marine of a certain size. It points out that because Great Britain is in such a position geographically that she would probably be heavily bombed in another war, therefore it would not be wise to depend upon her shipyards; and that for defence purposes Canada must maintain a merchant marine.

The recommendation is that it should be on what is called a nucleus basis, the nucleus suggested being that there should be approximately 7,000 men employed in the shipbuilding yards and that the tonnage maintained by Canada should be 750,000 deadweight tons. I believe deadweight tons are not the same as gross tons—and the minister will correct me if I am wrong. My information is that a deadweight ton is approximately three-quarters of a gross ton. This would mean that the gross tonnage would be about three-quarters of 750,000 deadweight tons or 562,500 gross tons. In March of this year, as I pointed out a moment ago, the gross tonnage was 981,255. So that the commission has recommended a very drastic reduction in Canadian tonnage.

Furthermore, in recommending that there be only 7,000 men in Canadian shipyards the commissioners are recommending another very drastic reduction. At the peak period during the war there were 75,000 people engaged in Canada in shipbuilding. In 1947 the average monthly employment was 16,035 and in 1948 it was 14,596. The commissioners expect that by the end of this year that will have dropped to about 9,000 people working in Canadian shipyards, and it is their recommendation that there be a further drop to 7,000.

They also point out that Canada must get a new type of merchant ship. That is referred to at different points throughout the report. For example, at page 21 we find this statement concerning wartime shipping:

> The ships were of standard types designed to meet a wartime emergency. Their high fuel consumption, slow speed, and lack of refrigerated space unfitted them to hold their own against fast, modern, more economical cargo-liners which shortly after the war began to appear in British and foreign merchant fleets. It was obvious that, once the world-wide shortage of shipping had been overcome, the ships would not be able to compete with more efficient foreign vessels.

The unfortunate feature about that is that back in 1944 several of us urged the government to begin building faster cargo vessels. However the minister of munitions and supply of that day, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, took a strong stand against that suggestion. He said that, after all, these slow ships were the kind of ships Canada should have. He pointed out that most of our cargoes are of bulk commodities such as lumber, newsprint and other products of that type, and that there was no need to have these fast modern cargo vessels. It was his opinion that Canada's fleet should be a fleet of slow ships. As a result of that stand none of these fast cargo vessels were built.

I believe the position today is that Canada has none of these fast vessels, with the exception of perhaps one or two which have been built for the Canadian National Railways. The Minister of Transport will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe it is true to say that practically all our merchant ships today are of slow-going types which cannot compete with the faster vessels built immediately after the war by Britain, Sweden, Norway and other nations. So that we are in a position now of having to start from scratch in 1950, if we are to get rid of most of the ships we do own and build faster ships which can compete.

There is one other recommendation of the commission to which I should like to refer, and that has to do with labour relations. The report points out that there have been very poor labour relations in the shipping industry in recent years, and makes the recommendation that there should be set up a national maritime board. They say:

> The system whereby owners and the union make an agreement governing wages and working conditions for one year allows grievances to be built upon on both sides over that period, so that negotiations for the renewal of the annual agreement usually commence in an atmosphere of mutual hostility and distrust. In our opinion many of the difficulties could be overcome by the establishment of a national maritime board, representative of both employers and seamen, similar to the national maritime board in the United Kingdom, which provides in effect for continuous negotiation of wages and working conditions at any time and whereby grievances can be quickly dealt with through the operation of port panels.

The Minister of Labour is here and he will know whether there is any merit in that suggestion. However, I do draw it to the attention of the committee.

Mr. Mitchell: Was the hon. member asking me a question? If he was, I shall answer him quickly. There is no such thing as an agreement in Britain; it is all done by minutes. There is no written agreement.

Mr. Green: Is there a national maritime board?

Mr. Mitchell: There might be that. I was thinking in terms of an agreement.

Mr. Green: The recommendation is that there should be set up in Canada a national maritime board. This side of the picture is very important, because without good management-labour relations we can never have a first-class industry in Canada.

Mr. Mitchell: If I might say this about labour relations: when you have in unions politics of the kind indicated by the leaders who met recently in a conference, instead of having straight unions such as we find in the railways, you have some difficulty. You cannot play politics with trade union agreements, you understand.

Mr. Green: I realize that.

Mr. Chevrier: I realize that this is an extremely important matter to the hon. member; but, after all, surely we will have to stick to the measure before the house. The hon. member has been skating all around the question. I shall be glad to deal with the matter of shipbuilding, but I do not think it is fair at this time to go into a complete analysis of the report of the Canadian maritime commission, a large part of which has nothing to do with the bill.

Mr. Green: As I said a moment ago, there is to be no further shipping legislation at this session. This bill is presented to the house as the government's solution of the shipbuilding problem in Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: No, it is not.

Mr. Green: There may be some other plans. I hope there are, because I do not believe this measure will come anywhere near solving the problem. That is the reason I am pointing out these other facts. Canada simply must have a further and broader policy than we are given by the bill, to settle these two problems. The bill merely provides for accelerated depreciation. For example, suggestions have been made that the Canadian coastal trade should be restricted to vessels registered in Canada. I suggest that the minister should tell us whether or not the government will adopt a policy of that kind. The United States has such a policy, as have many other countries. Why should Canada not insist that her coastal vessels at least shall be built in Canadian yards?

The minister said the other day that negotiations were going on between Canada and the United Kingdom in an effort to give Canadian vessels some share of the carrying trade to that country. We do not know whether or not these negotiations have been successful. If some such arrangement could be made it would certainly help. Various other ways have been suggested to keep the shipbuilding and shipping industries on their feet. The Canadian maritime commission has recommended that there should be a merchant navy of 750,000 deadweight tons, and that 7,000 men should be employed in Canadian shipyards, but it does not recommend how that is to be done. The only solution the minister has produced so far is the present bill. We do not believe it will go far enough to enable Canada to attain the objective which has been set by the government's own commission.

We believe the government is drifting on this question, and that its policy is a faltering one. We believe leadership is required, and that if Canada is to maintain even a reduced merchant navy of 750,000 tons and 7,000 men in her shipyards, there must be some further policy introduced by the government. While the bill is good so far as it goes, it simply does not meet the problem. It is just like trying to kill a grizzly bear with a shotgun.

Mr. Isnor: Mr. Chairman, you were certainly most generous in the latitude you gave to the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I trust you will accord me the same privilege.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. May I say to the hon. member that when I gave that latitude to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, he gave me to understand that he was going to be brief. I understand that this will be the case with my hon. friend.

Mr. Isnor: Mr. Chairman, I can assure you that I will follow my usual procedure of endeavouring to be brief. In today's mail I received a letter, the first paragraph of which reads as follows:

> John Ruskin once said that "when we fail to praise a man who deserves praise, two sad things happen; we run the chance of driving him from the right road for want of encouragement, and we deprive ourselves of one of the happiest of our privileges, that of rewarding someone who has earned our appreciation."

I thought that the opening paragraph of the letter I received today expressed my thoughts as to what I should like to say to the Minister of Transport for introducing this measure. It may be true, as the hon. member who has just taken his seat stated, that it does not go far enough, but I am satisfied for the time being to accept it as a step in the right direction by way of assistance to our shipbuilding industry. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra went into the report of the Canadian maritime commission quite fully. I am going to endeavour to abide by the ruling of the genial chairman and not have him call me to order. I shall only refer briefly to those portions of the report touched on by the hon. member. In doing so, I shall not make my remarks extensive. Instead of reading entire paragraphs, I shall simply refer to them.

The Canadian maritime commission was set up for a definite purpose. I base my remarks on the bill before us today which is a result of the exercise of the duties carried on by the commission. When the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was speaking I felt he was justified in referring to this fine report. I want to compliment the Canadian maritime commission on the excellent manner in which they have complied and presented it. They have given us a history of the background of shipping from the early days right up to June of 1949. It is a report which every person interested in shipping should have at hand in his library so that he may turn to it as a reference guide so far as any matter relating to shipping is concerned.

As a result of their studies, they have taken certain steps to assist the shipbuilding industry. I do not propose to go over all the various points, and well chosen ones, raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, but I feel we should emphasize one or two things that the bill does. It is referred to as an act to encourage the construction and conversion of vessels in Canada. I should like to mention particularly the word "conversion". As shown in the report of the Canadian maritime commission, we have a large number of ships tied up at the present time because they are unable to compete with foreign-operated vessels. That is because of various causes. Operating charges and overhead expenses of Canadian ships are the second highest of nine listed countries, second only to the United States. The daily operating costs of United States vessels are given in the report as $972.52 compared with $810.50 for Canada. It is interesting to note that Italy has the lowest figure, $421.71, while in between of course we have the United Kingdom with a cost of $525.46. It is for that reason I feel the word "conversion" is a most important one in the bill. If this bill makes it possible for shipowners to reconvert or reconstruct ships that are presently tied up, by installing modern machinery and equipment which will give them greater speed and lower operating expenses, then certainly this is something that will be well received by the shipping interests.

I am going to deal particularly with one angle of the shipping industry which was touched upon by the previous speaker but has not been given the attention I think it should receive. I refer to coastal or inland shipping, which I think the minister will agree comes within the scope of this legislation. As I recall it, a few years ago the United Kingdom and Canada entered into an arrangement under which ships of commonwealth countries were given permission to engage in coastal trade in Canadian waters.

While that arrangement is reciprocal, it seems to me the advantage is all on one side, in favour of the United Kingdom. We are unable to operate ships that can compete in the coastal trade of the United Kingdom, owing to the high operating costs that have been mentioned. On the other hand Britain is well able to send its ships to Canada to compete in our coastal trade.

That is of particular interest at the present time; and why do I say that? It is because of the oil developments in the west, as a result of which tankers will be carrying oil on the great lakes and inland waters and along the Pacific coast. I have also in mind the iron ore developments in Labrador and the effect they may have on Atlantic shipping, particularly in Nova Scotia. I believe the minister would be well advised to take this matter into consideration now with a view to the future since, while this comes within the scope of the shipping act, I believe one year's notice is required to terminate the present arrangement. In view of what we may look for in connection with this huge development in Labrador I believe this would not be a bit too early to give that notice, even though it would not go into effect for one year, which would give us an opportunity to study the possibility of greater shipping activity along our coasts.

I believe we should confine this coastal trade to ships carrying the Canadian flag, as the United States has confined its coastal trade to its own ships since 1817. Under the navigation laws of that country Canadian vessels may not engage in trade between United States ports, but on the other hand our law does not permit the transportation of oil from Canadian refineries to be reserved for our own vessels. This would apply also to cargoes of iron ore from the Labrador fields, which I mentioned a moment ago.

On previous occasions I have shown my interest in shipping. I offered the suggestion that we should subsidize ocean freight when carried in Canadian ships. The minister has not yet taken any steps in that direction, but he has brought in a bill which will assist the industry. I like the idea of this depreciation, but I am not quite clear as to its provisions. Perhaps later the minister will be good enough to enlighten me and the committee as to the way it will work. As I understand it, at the present time a depreciation of six per cent is allowed. In other words if my hon. friend the Independent member for Comox-Alberni invested a million dollars in a new ship to engage in the business of carrying freight he would be permitted a six per cent depreciation write-off each year, which would amount to $60,000. Under this bill he could write off 33⅓ per cent each year, if he so desired, so that in three years he would wipe out his entire cost. Perhaps when the minister replies he will say whether this 33⅓ per cent may be carried over from one year to another, and perhaps broken down. Would it be possible for a shipowner to write off 10 per cent one year and 23⅓ per cent the following year, depending upon the balance sheet or the profit and loss statement for that twelve-month period? And if that is possible, over what period of years would a shipowner be permitted to carry on this practice? Perhaps the minister would be good enough to enlarge upon that when he deals with this matter of depreciation.

I cannot let this opportunity pass without saying that I feel this is a very generous offer. Some may wonder why such a generous offer should be made, and whether it is too generous, whether it will permit a ship to be written off in three years. A person might feel that he would like to invest a million dollars in a ship, but would hesitate to do so because after three years he would have no further opportunity to write off what he might have left. Of course any person who feels there is a profitable future in the shipping trade and invests a million dollars in a ship must think it is worth while when he is offered a depreciation of 33⅓ per cent instead of the usual 6 per cent. I know a good many people would like to have such an opportunity with regard to alterations, new fixtures and so on in their stores. Perhaps the Minister of National Revenue would take an example from the Minister of Transport and permit us the same depreciation in future.

I said I was going to be brief, Mr. Chairman, and I think I have kept my word in making these one or two points. In closing I should like to compliment the minister on having brought forward this bill as the first measure of assistance to an industry which badly needs help these days.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Did I understand the hon. member at one point to be asking whether it would be possible to have what I suppose one might call a retarded depreciation rather than an accelerated depreciation? Was that what he was asking?

Mr. Isnor: I did put a question somewhat along that line. I asked whether instead of taking the 33⅓ per cent in one twelve-month period a shipowner could take 10 per cent in that period and carry over the remaining 23⅓ per cent to another twelve-month period.

Mr. MacInnis: The senior member for Halifax concluded his speech by congratulating the minister on bringing forward this measure. I am sorry I cannot begin my few words by doing the same. In saying that, I may be misunderstood. It may be understood that I am opposed to this measure, but really I do not know enough about it either to oppose or to support it. I believe very few members in this house can say whether we are justified in subsidizing the shipbuilding industry under present conditions.

I come from a seaport, as does the member for Vancouver-Quadra, where the people are interested in shipbuilding, the sailing of ships, and the work and wealth which a seaport brings to a country. I shall, however, have something more to say on that point. I should like to have the minister reconcile some facts which I believe I can put before him with the proposal to encourage shipbuilding. But, Mr. Chairman, in order to prepare you, in case you are thinking of raising a point of order on me, may I say that we allowed this bill to go into committee without debate. In such circumstances the understanding always is that the debate which would have taken place on second reading can take place in the committee. Since we are discussing a bill to encourage the construction and conversion of vessels in Canada, I believe that everything pertinent to the construction and conversion of vessels in Canada, not only the building of them but the purposes for which they are built and the possibility of finding business for those vessels, is germane to the question under debate.

The government should not put the private members of this house in the position in which they have put them by bringing this measure before us. Unless we approve of the bill, we may be accused of obstructing the building of ships; then, if we do approve of the bill, we may be doing that which is not in the interests of Canada. As has been pointed out, we have the annual report of the Canadian Maritime Commission before us. It was tabled, if I recall correctly, after the estimates of the transport department dealing with the maritime commission had been discussed and carried. Consequently, there was no opportunity of discussing this report. It seems to me it is of sufficient importance that it should be sent either to the standing committee on marine and fisheries, or to a special committee of this house for study and report.

It is really nothing less than an imposition on this house to have a bill of such importance as this presented to it in the dying hours of the session. Let us keep in mind the title of the bill, "An act to encourage the construction and conversion of vessels in Canada". I have two press clippings in my hand, both of which are from the Montreal Gazette. One of them is dated Halifax, October 11, and bears the heading "Lack of cargoes ties up ten ships at Halifax docks." The article reads as follows:

Ten ships, five owned by Acadia Overseas Freighters Limited, of Halifax, are tied up here for lack of cargoes. The 7,192-ton freighter Seaboard Ranger, owned by the Triton Steamship Company of Montreal, arrived today and became the tenth. Shipping officials said high operating costs, stiff foreign competition and the recent devaluation of the Canadian dollar have contributed to the sharp decline in Canadian shipping.

The other clipping is from the Montreal Gazette of October 14. It is a longer article dealing with much the same matter, so I shall just read one paragraph.

Canadian flag owners complained bitterly about their inability to beat the problem. They say that federal assistance of some kind is required, but they shy from subsidization, as affording only temporary relief. They also admit that the government cannot order importers of Canadian products to use Canadian ships as transporters.

When you put that alongside certain paragraphs in the summary of the second report of the Canadian maritime commission, I believe we should carefully consider whether we are throwing good money after bad in building more ships. Again I say that I may be misunderstood, but let me read two or three of the paragraphs summarizing the report.

On page 8, paragraph 7 reads as follows:

During 1946 and 1947 ocean freight rates remained high, there was a world shortage of shipping and Canadian owners were able to find employment for their vessels. During this period Canadian shipyards were able to maintain a satisfactory level of employment due largely to foreign orders.

8. During the year 1948 competition from foreign ships became keener, freight rates declined and currency and import controls were imposed by many countries owing to the increasing world shortage of dollars. Profits in the shipping industry fell off. The volume of work in the shipyards, however, was maintained due to a carryover of foreign orders.

9. At the beginning of 1948 there were 215 dry-cargo vessels totalling 2,080,066 deadweight tons which had been sold to private Canadian operators for Canadian flag operation. It is found that such tonnage is in excess of Canadian maritime needs.

In another paragraph the commission indicates:

It is estimated that a deep-sea dry-cargo and tanker fleet of about 750,000 deadweight tons would be sufficient for the carriage of essential cargoes in the early stages of an emergency and to act as auxiliaries for the defence services. Such fleet should contain a proportion of modern vessels, faster than those comprising the present-day fleet. The present vessels are uncompetitive with foreign flag vessels in liner trades.

It seems to me that the only argument, or perhaps one of two arguments that could be made for assisting the building of more ships in Canada at this time is, first, for security reasons; we should keep our shipyards in working condition; second, that we might need a number of faster vessels than any we now have.

Here is another point upon which I should like to have some light. It is questions of this kind which should be discussed in a committee of this house and not in the committee of the whole, particularly with the limited time that we have available. During the year 1948 a great many of the government-owned ships built during the war were sold to private companies with the understanding that if the ships were sold the moneys received would go into escrow and would be used for building other ships. We should know how much money is available now in that fund for building ships. The companies buying those ships obtained them at a very reasonable price; they operated them while operation was profitable and then sold them at a good price to foreign companies that are now operating them and under less favourable wage and working conditions than those maintained on Canadian ships. When they were selling those ships to foreign owners, I think the government should have kept in mind the fact that they would eventually be used to compete unfavourably with Canadian-operated ships. All of these questions should be fully discussed, and they must be fully discussed before we can reach an understanding as to whether we are justified in supporting a measure of this kind, excepting only for the two reasons I have already mentioned, namely, security reasons and the building of perhaps some few faster cargo ships.

Then again there is the question of our international trade—what are other countries going to pay us for the goods they buy from us. On several occasions during this session I have heard statements made in this house that Britain could sell more goods here if their goods were cheaper priced. Now Britain is able to provide the service of transportation cheaper than Canada can provide it, and perhaps cheaper than a great many other countries can provide it. But the moment she begins to take advantage of that position, we begin to develop means to prevent her from exchanging those services for the goods she buys from us. It seems to me that we are being most unrealistic if we think that we can sell our goods to other countries and at the same time refuse to take from them the only goods and services which they can give in exchange.

All of these things should have been brought out and should be well understood by the members of the house before we are asked to make a decision on a bill of this kind. I say again that I never oppose a measure here if I can, with good judgment, support it. It does not make any difference whether that measure is brought before the house by the government or by some party in the opposition. As a matter of fact, I think the whole party follows that policy. We always try to support a measure on its merits. It is for that reason that I say that the Minister of Transport has put the members of the opposition in a difficult position or at least those from port cities and representing constituencies such as the one I represent.

I do not think there is anything more I need to say at this stage. I may want some information when we are dealing with the various clauses.

Mr. Gillis: I think the hon. member for Vancouver East has stated the case fairly well. I also am interested in this particular bill because I too come from a part of the country in which there are a great many ports. At this particular time, when everyone is in a rush to get away, I cannot understand either why the Minister of Transport brings in a matter as contentious as this one. The hon. member for Vancouver East suggested the only two reasons why this measure could be supported, namely, for security and to provide faster vessels. While the minister takes the position that we could discuss this matter when the proper item is before the committee, in my opinion we cannot divorce this question from the general question of shipping.

The situation in Canada today certainly does not warrant the building of ships unless we are going to use them. I think perhaps every member of the house is receiving correspondence from reliable people who are engaged in this industry; for example, from the naval association of Canada. Many of the officers and men who served in the navy during the war went over into the merchant marine. Shipping in Canada today is at the point where our ships are being tied up from port to port. I have on my desk a letter and a resolution dated November 29. In that letter and resolution, a copy of which was sent to the government, it was pointed out that at the present time in the city of Halifax fifteen deep-sea ships are tied up because of the lack of cargo. That resolution sets out that the ships that are now engaged in that business are being tied up from port to port because of lack of cargo. The reason they cannot get cargo is that they cannot compete with the ships that were bought by Canadian companies, sold to foreign countries and are now actually operating from Canadian ports in direct competition with Canadian shipping.

One example that is set out in the correspondence is that of one company which was offered a raw-sugar cargo to Cuba at twenty-five cents a hundred pounds. They could not take it. They said that it cost them twenty-eight cents to load it and unload it without hauling it at all. They therefore had to turn the offer down. A Swedish company takes that cargo and displaces Canadian shipping. When that 50,000 tons of iron ore was to come in to Montreal from Sweden, the Swedish government took the position that it was to be hauled by Swedish bottoms only. According to this correspondence, foreign shipping is replacing coastwise shipping in Canada. On another occasion, at the last session, I had the argument with the minister that foreign ships were doing that. He told me at the time that they were not permitted to do port-to-port trade in Canada, with the exception of British ships.

According to the correspondence from that reliable organization representing that trade, foreign ships, actually flying foreign flags, are doing port-to-port trade along the Canadian coast and displacing our own ships. We had better make up our minds whether we have a shipbuilding policy or not. Other countries are protecting their own bottoms by a proviso, as the Swedish government did with that 50,000 tons of iron ore, that it would have to be carried by Swedish bottoms. If we are to provide a subsidy for shipbuilding we have to make up our minds whether we are going to use the merchant marine, or use the boats, once they are built. Actually what the resolution that I have is asking at the present time is that the government subsidize the present industry so that boats now tied up in harbours may be able to continue to operate. We have to face up to the question as to what we are going to do with regard to competition.

A lot could be said on this question. I appreciate the minister's position in wishing to lay it over, but it is tied up with shipping. I see that the senior hon. member for Halifax is back in his seat. I was pointing out that in correspondence that I have, on the 29th of last month fifteen ocean-going ships were tied up in the port of Halifax owing to lack of cargo.

Mr. Isnor: I had already brought that to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Gillis: I did not hear the hon. member mention the number of ships. The hon. member for Vancouver East read some clippings into the record showing that fifteen ships were actually tied up in the port of Halifax. According to the correspondence they expect more to be tied up. That situation is developing all the time. What I want to find out is: if we are to subsidize shipbuilding in Canada, are we going to use the boats after they are built? If we are, then we have to get down to business and formulate some kind of policy to protect that industry.

I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East that this whole question requires more study. I believe it is an item that is contentious. It is important that it should lie over and be put in the hands of a competent committee to study the thing and work out some policy with the maritime commission. Very definitely the sections of the report read by the hon. member for Vancouver East suggest that other than introducing a subsidized shipbuilding policy something has to be done with regard to protecting the industry we now have that is lying idle. I believe it should lie over and be given more careful consideration than we are able to give it at the present time.

Mr. Church: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few constructive suggestions to the minister in connection with national shipbuilding. We are supposed to be the fifth nation in export trade. I believe that this is a national problem because in the past water-borne traffic has never had the support of this House of Commons that rail transport has. The country has spent hundreds of millions of dollars under private ownership and public ownership of rail transport. I support the national part of this work and believe that it is correct because we are the fifth trading nation of the world.

With regard to the encouragement, construction and conversion of vessels in Canada, we are back to where we were between the two wars. When the Petersen contract was before the house I took part in the debate. That was a contract having to do with ocean, maritime and great lakes rates. In connection with that contract the advantage which this country could get by a national system of construction and conversion of ships was referred to. It will be noted that the powers of the maritime commission have been enlarged. A committee composed of officials of the government are now working out a plan. The minister announced the other day when he referred to the Noronic that a committee composed of government officials was working at the present moment on enlarging the powers of the maritime commission to include the great inland waterways of Canada and the great lakes.

We are the fifth trading nation of the world, and our export trade very largely depends on shipping. Today shipping is a national question. A vessel was first defined as any ship that was not propelled by oars. That is the definition that was in the shipping act not many years ago, and it was re-inserted in the shipping act of 1934. The shipping act of two years ago went through the House of Commons after a very few hours' discussion. It broadened the powers, functions and duties of the Canadian maritime commission, and also dealt with some features of the present system of assistance. The present bill, which is to encourage the construction and conversion of vessels in Canada, is a forward step; it is a step in the right direction.

I just wish to call the committee's attention to one or two facts about it. I was chairman and harbour commissioner for nearly thirty years in the city of Toronto. In that city we have not a dry dock, all the way to Kingston, the nearest one. Boats like the Cayuga and Kingston have to leave Toronto to go into dry dock. I believe these ships were built at the foot of Bathurst street. They were very big ships for that time. Their sister ships the Corona and the Chippawa were also built at the foot of Bathurst street. I was chairman of the harbour commission for some years and commissioner for twenty-seven years. At a cost of $120 million the Canadian government erected the Welland ship channel from Port Weller to Port Colborne on lake Erie. I call the committee's attention to the fact that we have not a dry dock on the whole course of the great lakes. There is not a single dry dock, and the Cayuga and the Kingston have to go to Kingston to go into dry dock. There is no dry dock that I know of along the chain of the lakes. A magnificent ship was launched the other day at Collingwood, namely, the Coverdale. Mr. Coverdale was a great Canadian, born in Kingston, a former president of the Canada Steamship Lines.

Hon. members will recall that we used to have a type of ship sailing the great lakes which was of the old whaleback construction. They used to sail the great lakes and also go down to the maritimes and along the United States seaboard years ago. These ships are now taken off the lakes altogether. I do not know of any of them at the present time. As I mentioned, we have spent vast sums of money on the canal system, on the St. Lawrence and on other matters. I notice that the minister has changed the definition of conversion in the assistance given to present vessel owners, and exempts it from certain features of the Income Tax Act.

Deduction is permitted for income tax purposes. Then it goes on to deal with deductions in respect of conversion costs. I think it would be a good thing if the minister had a Canadian shipping list. We used to have one a few years ago. On that list were the name of the vessel, the year of construction, the ownership, the type, the year launched and its registration. All those points were listed, within the provisions of the shipping law of this country. In my view it would be a good thing to have that republished.

Then this bill goes on to deal with other matters. It deals with a deduction in respect of conversion costs, where there is a major alteration. Proclamation is to be made by the governor in council so that an allowance of 33⅓ per cent of the conversion cost is made. Then are set out certain exemptions regarding income tax, taking the matter out of the income tax law. An allowance is made for special depreciation, or extra depreciation. Then it goes on to speak about vessels concerning which allowances have been made in connection with the matter of disposal. This is to be determined by the Canadian maritime commission.

So that in reality this bill widens the powers of the Canadian maritime commission. I believe those powers should be applied to other parts of the country which are helping pay for the cost of this work. This is a national question. I have said that railway transportation has been treated differently. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent on railway transportation, and this has had a direct effect on rates—and I am thinking of the rates on coal from the maritime provinces. When it has to compete with rail transportation, water-borne traffic is assisted to that extent. This should be looked upon as a national question.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to say a word and to ask a question of the minister. First I should like to follow up the point made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. The hon. member asked the minister if this bill is the answer to the report of the maritime commission, and I understood the minister to say that it is not. I assume he meant that it is not a complete answer and I was glad to hear him say that, because it does not seem to be complete, or anything like complete.

I should like to read a few sentences from the report of the maritime commission—and I shall not take long, Mr. Chairman—which I believe will make it clear that this bill is no answer. And it is in that connection I wish to ask my question. Turning first to page 50 of the report we find this:

> Freight rates have declined by an average of almost 20 per cent since January, 1948, and Canadian owners are now operating on a very narrow margin if they are not suffering actual losses.

And again at page 53:

> If it is considered advisable to maintain the shipping and shipbuilding industries in Canada it is clear that they will require government aid. Neither the manner nor the extent of such aid is properly the subject matter of discussion in this report, but it should be pointed out that no amount of government assistance will effectively aid the shipping industry unless a solution is found in respect of its currency difficulties and unless its labour problems are resolved.

And I quote briefly from the next paragraph to make clear what is referred to by the use of the words "currency difficulties":

> Cargoes are frequently offered with freights payable in sterling or other non-dollar currencies, thus excluding Canadian vessels from participation. Foreign importers are induced by their own governments in various ways such as currency restrictions to use their own national shipping. In various trades Canadian vessels are excluded by the operation of regulations providing for the carriage of cargoes by either United States vessels or vessels of recipient countries under the Marshall plan.

I wish to make one comment and ask one question. No one can fail to sympathize with the minister in the difficult problem he faces, and I am not ready with any ready-made solution this afternoon. However, I do wish to ask this: How far is this bill, which provides what we might call accelerated or generous depreciation, to be considered as even the beginning of a solution, if in fact there are no operating profits now? The report of the commission seems to go almost to the point of saying that the industry is unprofitable. I do suggest that if the minister comes along with a bill which is beneficial only if there are profits, then it is really offering a stone where bread is wanted.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I should reply not only to the hon. member for Greenwood but also to some other hon. members who have spoken in this debate. The best way to sum up what has been said is to state that apparently in the opposition parties there are two views, the first of which is that this bill does not go nearly far enough, does not meet the position and does not even begin to face at the problem. That is the attitude of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, although he states that he does support the bill so far as it goes.

Then there is the view held by hon. members of the C.C.F. that this bill should not be approved because, in the words of the hon. member for Vancouver East, he cannot make up his mind whether he is for it or against it because he has not enough information to come to a conclusion. It is his view that the bill should be sent to a committee so that it might be fully considered, fully understood and fully discussed. In answer to those two points of view let me say, first of all, that this bill deals with one thing, and one thing only, and that is assistance to the shipbuilding industry. It does not pretend or purport to deal with shipping at all. Had it pretended to deal with shipping something would have been said concerning that point. There is nothing in the bill at all, however, which deals with that problem.

Why? I believe that during the consideration of my estimates, and in answer to questions raised by some hon. members, I stated clearly that so far as the shipping industry was concerned the position was a most difficult one—and I gave a number of reasons why it was difficult. At the expense of annoying hon. members I might repeat what I said at that time, that the shipping situation was extremely difficult not only in Canada but throughout the world. Ships were being laid up, and laid up not only in Halifax. I believe someone said there were 23 ships laid up at that point. Let me say there are 1,600 ships laid up in the United States. Why? There are not the cargoes or the freights there were in the immediate post-war period. Freights are declining at a very fast rate. More than that, the announcement made some time in September in regard to devaluation has aggravated the position.

So that this bill, and anything I shall say at the moment, will not be concerned with the shipping industry. I will say, if it is of information to the house, that the position in so far as the shipping industry is concerned is still being considered by the government. Discussions have taken place with officials of the United Kingdom. The chairman of the maritime commission has been in London and has discussed the position, in so far as the shipping is concerned, with the British ministry of transport and other officials. Those discussions have continued in Ottawa. I hope it will be possible for the government to make a complete statement on that aspect of the question before the session ends. I wish I could go further than that, and I am sorry that I cannot. I think that should be enough for the house to understand that the only thing we are concerned with at the moment is assistance to the shipbuilding industry.

It is said by the opposition that the provisions will be of some help. I think they will be of great help to the shipbuilding industry, as I said in my introductory remarks, and will be of help particularly to coastal and inland shipbuilding, and also to the fishing industry. The hon. member for Greenwood asks how this is going to be of any use if there are no profits; there are profits in respect to inland and coastal vessels.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to complete my statement. As I said earlier, the question of assistance to shipping is still under consideration, and I hope it will be possible to make a statement before the session is over.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I appreciate that the minister has said the bill is designed to assist construction rather that the shipping industry. Nevertheless, I think he will agree that to make the act of any value there actually have to be earnings in the shipping industry in respect of those ships which will have been constructed.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to continue by dealing with some of the statements made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. He took exception to the fact that the minister did not file the report of the commission within fifteen days after the commencement of the session of parliament. In the course of his statement he said it was a deliberate omission. There was no deliberateness on the part of the commission or on the part of the minister in not filing the report within the prescribed statutory period. If there is any blame to be assumed in connection with the fact that the report was not filed within the fifteen-day period, the minister must of necessity take that blame. The only reason and the only excuse I can give is that the moment the report was completed the printing bureau was asked to print it so that it could be tabled, and the printers replied that, because of the tremendous amount of work they had, they could not possibly do so within the time required. That is not an extraordinary feature in these days when the printing bureau is laden with all sorts of work. I think I can point to the fact that the national harbours board report has not been tabled within the fifteen-day period for the very same reason. Has any objection been taken to that? Just as soon as the maritime commission report was returned from the printing bureau it was tabled, and there was no deliberateness on the part of myself or anyone else—

Mr. Green: Why not table a typed copy?

Mr. Chevrier: —in not tabling it earlier.

Mr. Green: Why could a typed copy not have been tabled?

Mr. Chevrier: I suppose a typed copy could have been tabled, but the practice is to ask the printing bureau to print the report, as in the case of all other agencies under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport that are required to do the same thing. There are a number of other things to which my hon. friend referred. He said that there was no policy on the part of the government in so far as shipbuilding and shipping are concerned. As I said a moment ago, I am not going to deal with shipping. I hope it will be possible to deal with it at a later date. I want to challenge the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that there is no policy so far as the shipbuilding industry is concerned. There is a very definite policy which has been stated from time to time, and which meets the recommendation of the maritime commission, of a nucleus for shipbuilding.

I think the report clearly states that as a nucleus the shipbuilding industry should have an average of 7,000 men employed each month in the shipbuilding and ship-repairing industry, and second, that $28 million per annum should be spent by way of new construction. I think I announced not so long ago that within the last two years there had been $51 million committed for government orders alone, in Canadian yards, for building, conversion or repairs. There were employed in those Canadian yards at the end of October, I believe—I am just quoting from memory—some 8,823 men in both the shipbuilding and ship-repairing industries. Over and above the $51 million to which I have referred, $17,246,000 had been committed for shipbuilding and ship-repairing in a period of two years on account of domestic and foreign orders. For all orders these moneys total roughly $70 million in the last two years. That is going away beyond the recommendation contained in the report of the maritime commission.

Moreover, the maritime commission is charged with the co-ordination of government building for all departments and, as is stated in the report, it is in a position to plan government shipbuilding to be performed and carried out in Canada, in order to preserve a nucleus as recommended by the commission. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra made a considerable number of remarks dealing with the shipping industry which I do not propose to review. There is one exceedingly important feature in connection with the whole matter which was discussed by the senior member for Halifax, and I think also by other members. These members suggested that the coastal or inland shipping trade should be restricted to Canadian vessels only. I believe it was the hon. member for Cape Breton South who made the statement that this trade was being impinged upon by vessels of foreign flags. I do not want to make a statement at this time concerning this matter. I am not in a position to say at this time whether or not the coastal laws of the country should be amended. In fact, if that were so, it would be necessary, as the house knows, to amend the commonwealth shipping agreement. In order to do that it would be necessary to hold discussions with the other commonwealth countries and, as the senior member for Halifax stated, notice of one year would have to be given. In the discussions I mentioned a moment ago, now taking place between the chairman of the maritime commission and the British authorities, this is another matter that has come up; and I think it would be inappropriate for me at this time to make any statement that might prejudice those discussions.

In reply to the hon. member for Cape Breton South, who is not now in his seat, I must say that under the Canada Shipping Act a ship which is not British may not transport goods and passengers from one place in Canada to another place in Canada, either directly or by way of a foreign port. Furthermore, even a foreign-built British ship cannot do that unless it pays a duty of 25 per cent of its value and is thereupon licensed to engage in coastal trade. Subject to that statement, every ship that engages in our coastal trade must be built, registered and owned in some part of the commonwealth. Because of that regulation it becomes almost prohibitive for a foreign-built British ship to operate in the coastal waters of Canada.

Someone asked how this would affect the replacement plan, and suggested that this legislation was in direct opposition to what is being done under that plan. My answer is that what was done under the replacement plan was excellent. The money collected amounted to over $26 million. When we received those funds, which were placed in escrow, we collected upward of $9 million by way of payment of mortgages on the Park vessels which had been sold by war assets and Park steamships to Canadian owners. The balance of these moneys, some $14 million, remains in the escrow fund for building in Canada. So surely no one can attack the replacement plan or replacement fund at least as far as this bill is concerned, because all the money remains here for construction in our own yards. Someone suggested, too, that this might be throwing good money after bad. This is not throwing good money away at all; the government is not losing anything. This simply accelerates the depreciation on ships and assists the owner to amortize the expenditure in connection with new construction.

I think perhaps that is all I care to say at this juncture. My own feeling, the feeling of the government and I am sure the feeling of the vast majority of hon. members, is that this is an excellent bill. To some hon. members it does not go far enough. If you are dealing with the shipping end, then I am afraid I cannot disagree with that contention. As far as shipbuilding goes, however, I do not see how we could have gone much further than we are going, in allowing the owner of a ship to write off new construction in three years, or to write off conversion costs in three years, as this bill does. So I am sure it will commend itself to hon. members.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Might I ask the minister if all boats engaged in the fishing industry will come under this regulation, or if there is some restriction as to size.

Mr. Chevrier: The ships covered by this bill are those mentioned in the Canada Shipping Act, which defines a vessel as follows:

"Vessel" includes any ship or boat or any other description of vessel used or designed to be used in navigation.

So the answer to my hon. friend's question would be yes.

Mr. Drew: There is one feature of the explanation given by the minister that it seems to me might well create some misunderstanding as to the purpose of this bill. Its purpose is to carry out certain of the recommendations of the maritime commission, at least as far as assistance to the shipbuilding industry is concerned. While they do not presume to say how it shall be done, from the remarks of the minister it is obvious that the reason for this is to be found in the report itself, to which he referred with respect to certain details.

It is not possible to separate shipbuilding and shipping in the way the minister suggests. That is made perfectly clear at page 48 of this excellent report, which sums up the situation. According to the report, from a wartime high employment in the shipbuilding industry of 75,000 we have now come down to approximately 11,400, as of March 31 of this year, and the minister has told us this has further fallen to 8,300 as of the end of October. In reviewing the situation with respect to employment the report says at page 48:

For the purpose of this report it may therefore be assumed that in the future 3,500 men can be maintained in the shipyards on repairs and conversions alone. The remaining 3,500 men employed on new construction . . .

That clearly indicates that the discussion now taking place in relation to this bill has to do with a situation in which we may expect 3,500 men to be employed in shipbuilding and 3,500 in repairs and conversions. If we accept that statement, then shipping is very closely related to shipbuilding, because without active shipping we would not have the repairs and conversions; in any event the two are associated. There is no use building ships if those ships are not to be used for shipping, so the whole subject before us relates to the over-all policy of the government based upon the information contained in this report.

Whether this bill will achieve what is hoped, only time can tell. It is difficult for us even to know whether this is the best type of assistance that can be given, without having a more clearly stated declaration of policy by the government in relation to this report. I do think that on this occasion it is important to emphasize what has been the effect of withholding this report. I am not going to engage in any discussion as to why the report was delayed or otherwise, but it was presented to the minister on June 30. Under the act, it should have been tabled by the end of September. The report did not come to the house until November 24, at a time when we are sitting from eleven o'clock in the morning until eleven o'clock at night. Naturally, it was not possible for the members to devote the attention they would have otherwise devoted to this comprehensive review of the situation in regard to shipbuilding today, the history that has preceded that, and what this commission foresees in the future.

Mr. Chevrier: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Drew: Yes, surely.

Mr. Chevrier: Will he tell me, if he can, how the delay in the filing of this report has had one iota of effect upon the bill which is now before the house, and the advantage which shipowners will derive from this bill.

Mr. Drew: Earlier today we saw an excellent example of what can be done by the proposals put forward by private members, in regard to things that are for the advantage of the people of Canada. If this report had been tabled at the beginning of the session, with the extremely comprehensive survey of the shipbuilding industry and shipping which it covers, it might well be that this industry, which is today in so precarious a position both from a shipbuilding point of view and shipping, might have had the advantage of practical suggestions that would have implemented certain of the findings in this report.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to labour the point, but if my hon. friend can point to any harm that has been done to the shipbuilders, because of the late filing of this report, I would appreciate his telling me.

Mr. Drew: The report makes it quite clear that this industry is in a precarious position. Every day's delay in introducing whatever measures of assistance might have helped the industry has been injuring the industry, whether it be shipbuilding or the shipping that is the result of shipbuilding. The fact is that if this report had been tabled, there might have been practical suggestions. Since we hope that the discussions which are introduced in the various debates which take place during the sittings of this house are helpful, it might have been possible to have practical suggestions made at an earlier date.

I am not going to labour the point at all. I do say that the delay in tabling this report has denied to the members of the house an opportunity they would have otherwise had, of considering an extremely valuable report during this session. It is true there will be an opportunity of discussing the details of the report during the next session, but the procedure that has been followed has successfully prevented any adequate discussion of it during this session. It is obvious from the differentiation that is drawn between shipbuilding and shipping, that it is not now possible to discuss, in the detail which this report deserves, the plight of an industry which is of immense concern to every Canadian, from a security point of view, at this particular time.

So far as this bill is concerned, I would say that the observations of the member for Greenwood are very much in point. The advantage or otherwise of the bill will depend upon whether this industry can earn profits. That does not mean that the bill might not be of some help. My reason for raising the question at this time is that the delay in tabling the report denied the members an opportunity of considering it. This might have resulted in suggestions which might have been of benefit to this industry.

Mr. Green: During my remarks, I referred to the number and tonnage of Canadian ocean-going vessels of 1,000 tons or over, as appearing on page 18 of the report. Can the minister give us those figures up to October 31, 1949?

Will he also ascertain how many deep-sea cargo vessels, built in Canada for war purposes, are now under Canadian registry? How many merchant seamen are serving on the vessels in operation? A reply I received on October 15 indicated that at that time there were 118 vessels, 18 of which were not in operation, and approximately 4,100 merchant navy men were still serving. I should like to have those figures brought up to date.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no change in that reply, except that there should be added the 58 vessels which are in the United Kingdom. Those will be returned in 1950.

Mr. Green: No more ships have been laid up?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know what the date of that report was.

Mr. Green: October 15.

Mr. Chevrier: I think some ships have been laid up since then. At this time, the total number of ships laid up is 26.

I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, I am not able to give the figures my hon. friend requested earlier. If I gave them now, it would only be a guess. Perhaps I can get that information for him when we are considering the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Green: Will the minister say whether any progress has been made in the construction of faster cargo vessels for Canada? He said that approximately $26 million had been put in escrow when it was received from the sale of slow ships. It would be interesting to know how much of that had been spent for new, faster cargo vessels.

Mr. Chevrier: In so far as deep-sea vessels are concerned, none of that amount has been spent. In so far as coastal and inland vessels are concerned, I do not know the exact amount, but a substantial amount of the escrow fund has been spent for that purpose.

Mr. Green: Have we any faster cargo vessels?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Green: We have been told that the Canadian merchant marine have none at the moment. Is that correct?

Mr. Chevrier: None other than the three diesel vessels, owned by Canadian National Steamships, to which reference was made a moment ago.

Section agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Now that we are about to consider the other sections of the bill, may I remind hon. members of standing order 58, section 2, which reads as follows:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I hope that all hon. members will adhere to this rule.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. Green: Is this help limited in any way to ocean-going vessels or is it available to any ship?

Mr. Chevrier: It is available to any type of ship.

Mr. Green: Can any help be given to companies owning foreign ships?

Mr. Chevrier: What does my hon. friend mean by "foreign ship"?

Mr. Green: Section 2(c) reads as follows:

"conversion or major alteration" means a conversion or major alteration made in Canada by a taxpayer in accordance with plans approved in writing by the Canadian Maritime Commission for the purpose of this act;

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes, but the ship must be a ship of Canadian registry or a ship of British registry. Section 3, subsection 2, refers to a ship registered in Canada. If it is a ship of Greek, Panamanian, Italian, French or other foreign registry, it is not covered by the section.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Deduction in respect of capital cost of vessels for purposes of the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Isnor: That is a rather important point. I am going to put the same question in a slightly different way. If a purchaser, a Canadian, bought from the United States one, two or three ships, to bring them in here for a certain purpose, and carried on these necessary alterations or reconversion, would that come within the scope of the act?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, if he had paid duty and registered his ship in Canada.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the minister explain how this depreciation works? The point I have in mind is this. Is there a possibility that a person building a ship and getting this depreciation might later dispose of the ship after he had benefited by the depreciation?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; he can dispose of the ship but he cannot do so without paying income tax on the amount already depreciated. Perhaps I could explain that by way of an example.

Mr. MacInnis: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: Section 3 (1) covers the case of new construction. Assume that the ship costs $1 million and the plans and specifications are approved by the maritime commission. That owner may write off the ship at the rate of 33⅓ per cent each year. In other words, in the first year he may, if he wishes, write off $333,333. He might write off less, but he may write off an amount not to exceed 33⅓ per cent or, if my hon. friend looks at paragraph (b) of section 3 (1), the undepreciated capital cost to him of the vessel at the end of the taxation year. In other words, if he should write off 33⅓ per cent in the first year and 33⅓ per cent in the second year, he has then written off $666,666. If in the third year he decides to write off $200,000, he has then written off $866,666. In the fourth year all he may write off is the remaining $133,133. Is that clear to my hon. friend?

Mr. MacInnis: Yes. But suppose that at the end of the third year he decides to sell the ship, how can this depreciation be recovered?

Mr. Chevrier: That is covered by section 4; when we get to it, perhaps I can deal with it.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): The senior member for Halifax brought up a point on the general discussion. Is 33⅓ per cent the maximum amount that can be written off? If in the first year the shipowner made only 15 per cent on his investment, that is necessarily all he could write off in that year. In the second year would he be entitled to write off 33⅓ per cent plus the sixteen some per cent?

Mr. Chevrier: He need not write off anything but he may take from nothing up to 33⅓ per cent. He cannot, of course, write off more than the total amount of the cost of the ship.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): What he did not write off this year he cannot carry forward and add to the 33⅓ per cent next year. How long is he going to have it? Is he going to have this special depreciation, under this section, until he writes off the total value?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): For instance, if it took seven or eight years to write that off against the profits?

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Green: In this section power is taken to fix by proclamation the date from which construction will get the advantage of this provision. Will that date be of necessity a date in the future or is there any intention to set it back before the date of the passing of the act?

Mr. Chevrier: I hope it will be a date in the past; first, because this legislation was announced in the speech from the throne.

Mr. Green: In two speeches from the throne.

Mr. Chevrier: Quite. My hon. friend is right. Then again, because of the additional fact, I presume, that shipowners, seeing the announcement of this legislation, proceeded to build and expected to reap the benefit of the depreciation which this bill would give them. If it is construction that dates back for years, of course that is just out of the question. How far back we will want to go I am not in a position to say at this time; but I would think it should be retroactive to some reasonable, fair and just date.

Mr. Green: In the case of the conversion of a ship, the person asking for the benefit must get the approval of the Canadian maritime commission to that conversion. Otherwise he does not get any benefit under this act. But apparently there is no such restriction in the case of new construction. In other words, the Canadian maritime commission has no voice whatever in what new construction is to benefit from the act. Is that correct?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. That is the case.

Mr. Green: Why is there that difference in the way these two separate kinds of work are treated?

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that the reason for that is that the commission wants to be sure that the amount spent in the conversion costs is reasonable, fair and equitable.

Mr. Green: What sort of conversion does the bill contemplate? For example, is it the thought that slow ships could be converted into fast ships? That seems to me to be an expensive process, and I do not think that could be done. Can the minister give us some idea of the type of conversion he has in mind?

Mr. Chevrier: It is conversion of a substantial nature, where the costs would be fairly high. It would envisage the case of the conversion of a 10,000-ton cargo vessel to a fast, modern and up-to-date cargo ship.

Mr. Green: Is that feasible?

Mr. Chevrier: Whether or not that is feasible technically, I am not in a position to say. But it would envisage that; if that were possible from an engineering standpoint, it would be covered by this section.

Mr. MacInnis: The point was raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that there was no approval by the Canadian maritime commission for new vessels. Is that not quite a wide allowance for the ship company, in that they can build whatever sort of ship they wish, whether it is suitable for Canadian trade or not? I imagine that the purpose of this bill is to have vessels built that will be of value to Canada. It rests solely with the shipowner whether or not he is going to build that sort of vessel. But whether or not the vessel is useful to Canada, he can get the depreciation on it.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think that is an extraordinary provision. After all, if an owner wants to build a new ship, he is not going to spend a tremendous amount of money on it foolishly. If he decides to spend $1 million, $5 million or $6 million on a tanker or on a fast cargo vessel, he will go into it with his eyes open, I think, and after he has had plans and specifications prepared by competent naval architects. What I say now, however, does not apply to the escrow fund or the replacement fund. Perhaps my hon. friend was not in the house when I replied to some of his remarks in connection with the amounts of money that had been collected under the replacement fund. In so far as that money is concerned—and there is some $26 million—the plans for rebuilding in Canada will of course have to be approved by the Canadian maritime commission. That is already in the contract between the owner and the commission, providing for the payment in escrow.

Mr. Green: Would this provision apply to the man who builds a $100,000 pleasure craft?

Mr. Chevrier: No; it would not apply for the reason that he does not earn anything with the craft. It is a pleasure craft. I am informed by the tax expert that he would be entitled to no depreciation.

Mr. Green: Is the minister sure of that, because I am doubtful whether there is that restriction. The wording is so wide that it simply refers to a taxpayer, and this taxpayer may have something to do with the shipping business, at least enough to get him under the blanket of the section. The minister may very well find that somebody will decide to build a $100,000 boat or perhaps a $500,000 boat and then come along and claim this accelerated depreciation. It may be that that is not the intention of the bill, but we should know whether or not it can be done.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I am not a tax expert. This is a bill having to do with income tax, and I have to take the advice of those who know the position. The advice and the information I have is that there is no write-off or depreciation in the case of a pleasure craft any more than there would be on your own home. Furthermore, there is no point in claiming or getting depreciation if there is no profit. That is the whole purpose of the bill.

Mr. Isnor: I have one more question. Ten or twelve ships are tied up in the port of Halifax at the present time. In regard to our Park ships there is a special depreciation of 12 per cent. Would these ships be allowed 12 per cent of their total value at the present time and in addition 33⅓ per cent of their conversion expenditure?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): They would eat it up pretty quickly at that rate; it would soon be a hundred per cent.

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that the 12 per cent to which my hon. friend refers is covered by the ordinary normal law of income tax, and that in so far as the additional conversion costs are concerned they would be covered by this bill.

Mr. Isnor: Then the answer to my question would be yes.

Mr. Chevrier: In addition to the 12 per cent he has already claimed he may get this 33⅓ per cent, but that is on the conversion costs only. In other words, he would not be able to write off more than the conversion costs.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—The Income Tax Act not applicable in certain cases.

Mr. Green: Is the commission still in control of the replacement fund, or will the company which has money in escrow in the replacement fund be able to take that money out and spend it for constructing a new vessel without being subject to the approval of the commission?

Mr. Chevrier: It must be approved by the commission. In answer to the first part of the question, the commission is still in control of the replacement fund, and to receive the benefits of this bill an owner must spend escrow money on replacement or rebuilding in Canadian yards.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Governor in council may exclude vessels.

Mr. Green: What is the purpose of clause 6? Can the minister tell us what types of vessels are being excluded from the operation of the act?

Mr. Chevrier: Well, I have not anything in mind at the moment except to say that in the Canada Shipping Act the definition of vessel is pretty broad and pretty wide. It may be that the governor in council may want to exclude from the operation of this act any class of vessel that might be thought necessary. I do not know of any at the moment or I cannot anticipate any, but it is put in as a precaution.

Section 7 agreed to.

[Mr. Isnor.]

On section 8—Coming into force.

Mr. Green: In my earlier remarks I mentioned a provision for a report to parliament. Why is there not some section in the bill which provides that there must be a report of the operations under this act?

Mr. Chevrier: For the same reason that it is not done in the reports of ordinary individuals for income tax purposes. I understand that it is not the custom of the income tax division of national revenue to give reports of this kind to parliament. In fact the minister refuses from time to time to bring them down. For that very reason I think it would not be appropriate to do it under this bill.

Mr. Green: There never will be any way of finding out who gets the benefits of this act or in what amounts?

Mr. Chevrier: There will be provision for giving hon. members information concerning the total amount of depreciation which has been granted, but not individuals.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. MacInnis: By leave of the house.

Mr. Chevrier moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

INCOME TAX

INCOME TAX ACT AND INCOME WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENTS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 176, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Income War Tax Act.

He said: Perhaps I might say just a word in explanation of the seeming length of this bill. The house will recall that last year we undertook a major revision of the Income Tax Act, and that it applied for the first time on January 1, 1949. As was inevitable in a major undertaking of that kind, it was found that there were a good many, I will not say drafting errors but places in which drafting improvement could be made, which accounts for a very considerable number of the amendments in the bill which is now before the house.

In a good many instances the technique in making these amendments is to repeal the whole subsection and re-enact it, a procedure which also makes for a bit of length. Then of course in addition there are a number of clauses which are necessary because of the entry of Newfoundland into confederation. These two groups, technical drafting amendments, and amendments caused as a result of the entry of Newfoundland, and the amendments made necessary by the budget resolutions of this year, represent the sections of the bill which is now before the house, and account in some measure for what might seem to be a longer bill than one would expect.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take only a moment or two to say something about the principles involved in the income tax bill before us. I presume I would not be out of order if I were to discuss briefly one or two important points concerning the whole taxation policy as it is involved in the Income Tax Act.

One matter I wish to mention particularly has to do with the taxation of corporations, a principle involved in the bill itself. I shall illustrate what I have to say now, and what I have so often claimed in the house, that government taxation, particularly income taxation, nearly always pyramids in supercosts. This group has consistently brought that matter to the attention of the house, but with to date very little effect.

A short time ago, hon. members will recall, the Bell Telephone Company announced their intention to apply for an increase in rates, or more correctly for the right to boost their rates to subscribers. During November that company sent out in their magazine, Telephone News, some information which is at once revealing and disturbing. The company state in the magazine that they require to increase their income by $23,900,000 to meet their increased operating expenses of $14 million. I emphasize that: They say they require to increase their income by boosting their rates to subscribers to the extent of $23,900,000, merely to be able to meet increased operating costs of $14 million. This is a difference of nearly $10 million they require to meet government taxation. The words they use are these "in order to meet the additional taxes that would result from the increase".

A friend of mine saw the magazine and drew it to my attention. At the same time he wrote to the Bell Telephone Company stating that he had no objection whatever to meeting his legitimate share of whatever increase in rates there might be to help the company meet their increased costs. I suppose he was as anxious as we are to see that companies like the Bell Telephone Company are kept in a good financial condition, and that they are solvent. But my friend and I, and I suppose a good many others, strongly object to having to pay almost as much in addition to the increase in rates necessary to keep the company solvent merely to place in the hands of the government another $10 million in taxation.

To my friend's letter the telephone company replied as follows on November 16:

> Your letter of November 10 regarding our proposed rate increase has been referred to me for reply.
> You are no doubt aware that taxes must be paid on all revenues received by the company, except such part as is required for operating expenses, reserves for depreciation, and interest on borrowed money. After these expenses have been met and taxes paid, the money left—and this amount only—can be used for the payment of dividends and to build up a surplus to meet future needs.

And this is the part I should like to emphasize:

> Therefore, in order to receive an additional $14 million in net income it is necessary for us to obtain an increase in revenues of approximately $24 million.

The paragraph I have just read is the crux of the whole devilish, if I may call it that, situation. I will go further and say that it is Canada's heavy taxation policy, and in many ways our foolish taxation policy, in which we find reasons for a good many of the burdensome increases in costs of the goods and services our people have to buy from day to day.

Where would one find anything quite as asinine as the example I have just cited? Just imagine! In order to be able to extract $14 million from their subscribers so as to meet their increased costs—and those increased costs are the result of inflated wages, salaries and costs of materials—the Bell Telephone Company has to grab another $10 million to give to the government.

The example I have just given points up the request a good many of us have made from time to time with respect to the whole income tax policy of this country. We have done so in the house on more than one occasion. I refer to the present need for a change in the Income Tax Act, particularly as it relates to corporations and dividends. The double taxation of corporation earnings has been protested in the house time and again. We now join in that protest, and we do it as strongly as we know how.

The minister should exempt corporate profits from income tax and make those same profits taxable as dividends in the hands of the recipients or the shareholders. That is the only fair way to deal with the situation. The minister will argue that many corporations might beat the game by withholding much of their profits from distribution as dividends. Well, to prevent corporations from doing such a thing the government should provide taxation on undistributed profits and by this method encourage corporations to spend their profits by way of dividends. That, I suggest, would make it necessary for corporations to obtain new capital by the issue of treasury stock, which is, I suggest, the sensible way to finance.

With such a change as I have suggested in the income tax policy the government would relieve the Canadian consumer of a good many of the pyramided and inflated costs, such as we find in the case of the Bell Telephone rates.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Loan to shareholder.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to this section which I shall ask one of my colleagues to move in a moment. It relates to the effective date of the section. The amendment to section 2, which I shall ask my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, to move, is as follows:

That subclause 2 of clause 2 of Bill 176 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) The paragraph (c) repealed by subsection one is applicable to

(a) loans made before the fourteenth day of November, 1949, and

(b) loans made on or after that day to enable or assist the officer or servant to purchase, pursuant to an agreement entered into before that day, the shares held by a person who died in 1949 prior to that day; and the paragraph (c) enacted by subsection one is applicable to other loans made on or after that day."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I so move.

Mr. Abbott: By way of explanation, may I say that I think the 14th of November is the first day that the printed copy of the bill was available to members generally, although it was given formal first reading on the 10th of November. I think the other changes are self-explanatory.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wonder if we could have a copy of the amendment. In any event I am hoping, if I am successful in persuading the minister to what I hope to persuade him, that we will not need the amendment at all. I hope the minister is in a suggestible mood, and I hope I am in a persuasive mood because I want to point out to the minister that this change is going to defeat entirely the purpose—and I think it is a very worthy one—of the clause as it stands. I think the purpose was twofold. First of all it was to enable one or more partners or virtual partners in an enterprise to buy out the man who is the chief stock owner. Second, it was to enable the chief owner to cash in on his holding, and I am sure the minister will agree that is a most important aspect from the point of view of enabling the succession duty situation to be dealt with when it arises, thereby avoiding unnecessary liquidation of companies.

I understand the difficulty which the department has met, and it is a real one. Nevertheless I want to suggest to the minister that it is not necessary to destroy the effect of what I think is a very beneficial provision in order to meet the difficulty which has arisen. As I understand it, the difficulty is that the department has found, to my great regret, that people are attempting to abuse this by making loans which there is no intention to repay. In that way they hope to get the benefit without playing the game with this section. I urge on the minister very strongly that this was a most beneficial provision, and I think he will agree that as it is now it really makes the situation almost meaningless. All it means now is that the treasury stock of a company can be sold. It does not help the case of the large shareholder who was helped under the original situation. I suggest to the minister that it should be possible in some manner, as to which I am sure his skilled staff can advise, to prevent any abuse of the section.

One suggestion I make is that a time limit might be put on the repayment of such loans, and that terms of repayment should be insisted on. It may be that the minister's technicians can suggest better ways, but I do beg of him not to lightly destroy a provision which I think was a very beneficial one indeed before it has even got started, as I suggest he is doing by this amendment.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend will appreciate, this privilege has only been open since the new act came into force last year. I am sure he is familiar enough with these matters to realize that if a shareholder is permitted to borrow from the company to buy shares from, shall we say, a majority shareholder, it is a very easy way of enabling the company's surplus to be used to enable a junior partner to finance the purchase of these shares. I do not think that is desirable. We have had long discussions in the house and in committee on the alleged evils of section 126, and suggestions have been made that we should try to spell it out in a way that will prevent that. This is one way of spelling out a method by which it can be abused. I must confess I do not think it is particularly desirable that the assets of a corporation should be loaned to an individual in order to enable that individual to buy shares in the corporation from another shareholder.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Was that not the very purpose for which the clause was passed? Was that not the purpose, and no other?

Mr. Abbott: The real intention for which the clause was passed was to enable loans to be made for employees and others to buy what is known as employee stock. The Bell Telephone Company and other companies have employee ownership campaigns, and it was considered desirable to enable companies of that kind to make temporary loans to their employees to enable them to purchase stock in the company, but it was never intended that permission should be given to contravene the well-known principle of company law that a company must not lend money to its shareholders, because that is the simplest way in which to dissipate the company's surplus.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I appreciate that fully, and no one is more anxious to avoid that than I am. Nevertheless, I suggest to the minister that there is a method—and I have put it forward—of preventing this evasion of the act. Surely the minister will agree with the point I made that serious difficulties arise when a man has built up a business and is coming near to the end of his life; if he is not able to dispose of his shares, in all probability his death will wreck the whole business because there may have to be a liquidation, or at any rate it may very seriously impair it. Surely if the abuse can be provided against—then the very thing which I am describing and which frankly I thought was one of the main purposes of the section—the minister will agree the thing is most desirable. Surely the minister would at least be prepared to consider the further suggestion I have made as to whether this abuse cannot be prevented. I agree that the abuse should not be permitted. Furthermore, as the minister himself has pointed out, this section is just getting under way. Why is it necessary to take fright and cancel what seems to me to be the really beneficial effect of the section almost before it has had a chance to operate at all?

Mr. Abbott: That is the reason why the amendment is made at this time. I came to the conclusion it would be subject to such serious abuse that we could not leave it in these general terms. I agree that in the case of private companies very embarrassing situations can be created where the majority shareholder is getting on in years and the junior shareholders are anxious to acquire his interest, but there are other ways in which they can get the necessary capital to do that. They can borrow outside; they can borrow from banks or they can borrow elsewhere. I think it is very questionable whether as a general rule they should use the company's own funds in order to acquire those assets because that in effect amounts to a reduction of capital. There is probably no real security for the loan other than the shares of the company. I will consider the point raised by my hon. friend, but I am not prepared to go further at this time than to support the amendment which my colleague has proposed, and which will remove any possible retroactive effect of the proposed amendment.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister not at least do this? Surely it is not asking much to ask the minister to consider with his staff the suggestion which I made. After all, it is my information that the apprehended abuse is that the loans will be made and just allowed to carry on, and not be repaid, and that in this way the intent of the act will be defeated. I am suggesting in good faith a means which prima facie seems to me a cure for that situation. Will the minister not agree to at least let the section stand until he and his colleagues have had a chance to look at that suggestion? That is not asking very much.

Mr. Abbott: I do not think I can let the section stand, Mr. Chairman, because it has been given pretty careful consideration by myself and my advisers already. This is not a hastily introduced amendment, by any means. However, I have listened carefully to the suggestions made by my hon. friend; I hope I shall be introducing another budget not too late in the coming year, probably within the next five or six months, and if it is found that some further improvement in this position can be brought about I shall be very glad to consider it. However, the section as it stands, as it was introduced last year, offers such obvious opportunities for abuse that I am not prepared to let it remain as it is. That is the position. Perhaps it can be modified somewhat, but at the moment I cannot think of any amendment I would be prepared to accept on the spur of the moment.

As a result of the proposed amendment I am removing any retroactive effect. If anybody entered into a bona fide agreement between the time the new Income Tax Act was introduced last year and November 14 of this year, that agreement will be recognized. Between now and the next time we have occasion to consider this measure I shall give careful consideration, with my officials, to the suggestions my hon. friend has made, to see if there can be some further modification of the section to permit legitimate bona fide transactions.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not want to be persistent, so this will be my last attempt. I do suggest to the minister that if this amendment goes through it is going to be very difficult for him to return in the spring and shift the thing back again. It was my hope that since we still have two or three days left the minister might agree to look at it now, before the door is banged, because it seems to me it will be harder to do later on.

Mr. Abbott: I can only reply that my hon. friend was good enough some days ago to indicate to me that he had some concern about the restrictive effect of this section, and I have been giving it some consideration since that time. I have not been able as yet to arrive at a conclusion that I can recommend by way of amendment, other than the one I have before the committee at the moment.

On section 3.

Mr. Abbott: Here again I have a minor amendment. This section sought to minimize the adverse effects on stock dividends declared by non-resident corporations. A double test was set out in the section as to the corporations to which it should apply: first, shares which are listed on a recognized stock exchange; second, where more than fifty per cent of the share capital belongs to non-residents. I am now proposing that the requirement as to listing on a recognized stock exchange be eliminated, and that the ownership of the share capital be the only test. We have found in practice that there were some private companies to which similar considerations should apply, but whose shares were not listed on a stock exchange. So I would ask my colleague to move the following amendment:

That subclause one of clause three of bill 176 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"3 (1) Section nine of The Income Tax Act is amended by adding the following subsection thereto:

'(10) Notwithstanding subsection (9), subsections (1), (2) and (3) are not applicable where the corporation is a non-resident corporation, more than 50 per cent of the share capital of which (having full voting rights under all circumstances) belongs to non-residents'."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move accordingly.

On section 4—Deductions allowed.

Mr. Abbott: There is a typographical error here, really a printing error, which must be corrected. In paragraph (4) the word "blank" should be "bank." I am afraid I shall have to ask a formal amendment for that. I must apologize to the committee for the numerous amendments; but this is a very technical bill. I purposely had it distributed some little time in advance of bringing it up for consideration in order to get as many suggestions as possible, and that has resulted in the necessity for some amendments which I think are improvements.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move that the word "blank" in line 12 of paragraph (4) of section 4 be deleted and the word "bank" substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why is subsection (5) restricted to the expenses of railway telegraphers and station agents? What about the railway employees who have stopovers in the course of their duties?

Mr. Abbott: They are covered already under subsection (7) on page 4 of the bill. This was a group which apparently had been overlooked in the general consideration of railway employees.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not think subsection (7) covered them.

Mr. Abbott: I believe every group of railway employees whose duties require them to travel now are subject to the application of the same principle. That is my information.

Mr. Fleming: I am entirely in sympathy with the intent of subsection (7), but I do take exception to the draftsmanship. I do so with a certain degree of diffidence, but at different points in this bill we find nouns used as adjectives, in violation of the rules of good English grammar. Here in lines 10 and 11 of subsection (7) we have a very bad example. That subsection reads:

. . . where a taxpayer was an employee of a person whose principal business was passenger, goods, or passenger and goods transport . . .

I believe that is thoroughly objectionable English. I do not know why it could not have been expressed in some such words as these: "whose principal business was the transport of passengers, goods, or passengers and goods." I do not propose now to discuss other sections but I could show that a good deal of this sort of bad grammar is contained in this bill. If I may point to one other example to which the same remark applies, over on page 12, line 46, we have the expression "taxation years", with the noun "taxation", used as an adjective. Again on page 35 of the bill, line 35, we have the words "corporation director."

Mr. Abbott: These expressions have been consecrated by long usage in these statutes.

Mr. Fleming: I do not like to see parliament consecrating bad grammar in statutory form. I do not believe you could find a worse example of the violation of well established rules of grammar than in the words I quoted from this very section, "whose principal business was passenger, goods, or passenger and goods transport." Surely it would be much clearer and much more proper, and would be more readable and grammatical to say "whose principal business was the transport of passengers, goods, or passengers and goods."

Mr. Abbott: This was taken from the act of last year. I know my hon. friend's reputation as a grammarian, and I would not attempt to challenge it for a moment. As the committee knows, these sections are drafted by solicitors in the Department of Justice, highly skilled in the art. At the moment I am not in a position to challenge the accuracy of the point raised by my hon. friend. Since he has not proposed it as a formal amendment, however, perhaps he would allow me to call it to the attention of the officer of the Department of Justice who prepared this section. It may be that the same language occurs elsewhere, and we can correct it the next time the act is before the house for revision. In this section the use of the words "passenger, goods, or passenger and goods transport," I am told is taken from the bill as it was enacted last year. I wish my hon. friend had spotted it at that time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going to get into this grammatical discussion, but as a matter of fact, I did not understand subsection (7) to refer to railway employees at all. It is clothed in such difficult language that I thought it applied to automobile traffic transporting goods and passengers, and that it did not apply to railway companies.

Mr. Abbott: It applies to bus operators as well.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought it was restricted to bus operators and the like, automobile truckers, and so on. It was because of the obscurity of the language that I raised the point a moment ago. I saw the citation in the margin, "expenses of transport employees". It was for that reason I raised the matter a moment ago. I was not complaining about the grammar because, after all, that was not the point which interested me, but the wording itself. I had read this section carefully, and wondered why railway employees were not included.

Mr. Abbott: No one knows the difficulties of legal draftsmanship better than my hon. friend, the member for Lake Centre. I suppose one of the things that keeps the legal profession in business is the difficulty of accurately expressing in words exactly what is intended. I have enough confidence in the skill and ability of the draftsman in the Department of Justice, who prepared this section, to believe that, while it may not be perfect, it is not obscure. The meaning is quite clear.

Mr. Fraser: A number of men in business for themselves, as well as commercial travellers, have told me that the income tax inspectors ask them to produce receipts for meals costing as little as 50 or 75 cents. They feel they should not be forced to ask a waitress for a receipt for such a small amount.

Mr. Abbott: I shall bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Fraser: I see the Minister of National Revenue smiling, but I understand that has happened.

Mr. Abbott: I shall bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Fleming: The Department of National Revenue made a ruling several years ago, with which I had some occasion to become acquainted on behalf of certain brotherhoods of railway employees. It was to the effect that if vouchers were not presented by railway employees, who were on regular runs which kept them away from home overnight, the department would grant them a deduction of a flat $300 a year. If the taxpayer claimed more than that, he had to produce his vouchers. Will that rule be applied in the interpretation of this subsection?

Mr. Abbott: I believe that is really a question of fact. My hon. friend is right in saying that a standard rate for the running trades has, for some time, been considered as a dollar a day. It is open to the taxpayer, of course, to produce vouchers to show the actual expenses incurred, but I believe it was found that that represented approximately the amount which was usually spent. I am told that, for some time, that was accepted as a rule.

Mr. Fleming: It was a useful rule of thumb. May we take it that the same rule will be observed in the administration of this section?

Mr. Abbott: I cannot speak for that, because the administration is the responsibility of another department.

On section 6—Inadequate considerations.

Mr. Fleming: It is proposed to insert a new subsection (3A) in this section, and I should like to ask the minister whether this new subsection is being introduced to meet any particular situation that has arisen or whether it is a matter of tidying up the draftsmanship of the 1948 act.

Mr. Low: When the minister is replying to that question, will he tell us what is meant by dealing at arm's length?

Mr. Abbott: I shall come to that in a moment. This section really rounds out section 17 which, as drafted, covered a sale both ways, but did not cover a lease both ways.

Answering my hon. friend the member for Peace River, "at arm's length", is a phrase which I believe is fairly well understood by lawyers and the courts. It implies that the parties are not either related or connected, and that it is a genuine transaction in which the interests of both parties are adverse.

Mr. Low: There is no love between them?

Mr. Abbott: Not necessarily no love between them, but one should not assume there is any love between them. It has to be a genuine business deal.

Mr. Fleming: Have there been any cases under section 126 since it was enacted?

Mr. Abbott: There have been no cases since it was put in the new Income Tax Act.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Depreciation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask the minister whether this would be the place for him to make some reference to the new system of depreciation which has been proposed?

Mr. Abbott: Probably this would be as good a place as any. In my budget speech on March 22, I referred to the general principle of the new basis on which depreciation would be allowed. It will be found on page 1799 of Hansard. Perhaps my hon. friend has read it, and I do not know that it is necessary for me to repeat it now, but it might be as well if I were to do that. At that time I said:

> In the past allowances have been granted on the basis of wear and tear of assets used in earning the income subject to tax. Under the new regulations which my colleague the Minister of National Revenue is proposing, the governing principle will be the amortization of costs of depreciable assets. Incidentally, an effect of this will be to allow for obsolescence hitherto unrecognized under our act. In the second place the rates of write-off will apply to the written-down value of the asset account rather than to the total asset account. In the technical language of the accountant this means changing from the straight-line method of depreciation to the diminishing balance principle. Of course the rates of depreciation will be appropriately increased having regard to the diminishing base to which they apply. Thirdly, it is proposed to introduce what might loosely be described as a recapture provision. This provision will operate to ensure in effect that the deductions for amortizing the cost of an asset shall not exceed the final proven cost of the asset to the taxpayer. It will call for an adjustment against future write-offs where assets are disposed of after some use. I might add here that the so-called add-back or adjustment will be limited to the written-down value at the end of 1948 regardless of the price realized on disposal of assets in order that there can be no possible claim that under this provision capital gains are being taxed, or that this recapture provision has any retroactive effect.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister explain it now?

Mr. Abbott: If my hon. friend wants me to explain it, I shall be delighted to take a long time to do it, but I do not think he really wants me to do so. He knows as well as I do that the matter is an extremely technical one. The Minister of National Revenue and his officials have been engaged for some time in the preparation of the necessary detailed regulations to outline the basis upon which the new system will operate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister give a concrete example?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, I think perhaps I could do that. Take the case of an asset which cost the taxpayer $100,000. Rates of depreciation are established under the regulations to be enacted of, let us say, 15 per cent per annum. The asset as acquired is held by the taxpayer for five years. It will then have been written down to 25 per cent of its original value or, in other words, $25,000.

Mr. Fleming: That is on straight line depreciation.

Mr. Abbott: That is on straight line depreciation; my hon. friend is quite right. It would start off at 15 per cent, and there would be varying percentages down through the years. The 15 per cent would be applied each year to the depreciated value of the asset and at the end of, let us say, five years it would have a value on the books of whatever you like, say, $25,000 or $30,000. Then it is sold for $50,000 and in virtue of the recapture provision to which I have referred, the $20,000 would have to be taken up into profit and loss and would of course be subject to tax in the year in which it is taken. That is a fairly simple example. I understand that in more complicated cases it could be much more complex than that, but I think it illustrates the principle to which I am referring.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Regulations are now being made in detail which will govern this exceedingly important and vital thing. At what point does the house get a chance to see them? At what point do we get a chance to study them? Or are we just to take them on the minister's short, though highly interesting statement? I think it is a matter of great concern. As the minister knows, I have been trying to get these regulations for the last couple of weeks. It would be a natural thing for us to want to study them and even to confer with the business community and try to make sure that there was no suggestion that needed to be made. I understand that they are not even in print yet.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct. My hon. friend will appreciate the fact that they cannot be adopted by the governor in council until this particular section 7 is passed setting out some of the matters which must be spelt out in the law before the regulations can be adopted. My hon. friend will recall that until the amendment made to the Income Tax Act last year, the depreciation provisions were not even a matter of regulation. They were a matter of discretion. What will happen is this. After this law has been enacted, regulations prepared by the Department of National Revenue will be brought to the cabinet council, will be adopted, will then be published in the Canada Gazette and will be made available for all who are interested. They will then be subject to the general scrutiny of those who are interested, including the commercial community, lawyers, accountants and others who are considering these questions. So far as consideration by the house is concerned, I suppose they will not be available for reference and discussion here until the next session. But I point out to my hon. friend that under the act as adopted last year, and under the amendment which is proposed in this bill, and which is required in order to enable the regulations to be passed, it is provided that it will be done by regulation and not by ministerial discretion.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): But we are in this absurd position now, apparently: the regulations cannot be approved until we approve this act; and we cannot see the regulations before we approve it, so we are approving something, in effect, where we have had nothing but a very sketchy illustration, if the minister will permit me to so describe it; and incidentally he gave us the wrong figures, although that is neither here nor there. But it seems to me that this important thing is being dealt with as if it were something of trifling importance that is just done every day by the officials in their stride.

Mr. Abbott: That is not the case at all. The regulations are being made under section 11 (1) (a) which says:

> Notwithstanding any other provision in this division, the following amounts may—

And I leave out some words.

> —be deducted in computing the income of a taxpayer for a taxation year:
> (a) Such part of the capital cost to the taxpayer of property, or such amount in respect of the capital costs to the taxpayer of property, if any, as is allowed by regulation.

I indicated in my budget speech last March the broad principles on which depreciation will be allowed. I agree with my friend that the rules with respect to depreciation are one of the most important aspects of income tax law because they vitally affect the profit of the taxpayer which is subject to tax. But it has never been considered possible to spell out in a statute the detailed rules with respect to depreciation. It has never been done. Under the old act it was left to the discretion of the minister. Under the new act we provide that it should be done by regulation; that is, that it should be formally enacted in specific terms, tabled in the house, published in the Canada Gazette and available for all who wanted to see it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Afterwards.

Mr. Abbott: Afterwards, yes. But you have to have an effective order to make the regulations before you can enact the regulations. I have not seen these regulations yet. I understand that they are prepared and are ready for submission to cabinet council when this amendment is passed. My hon. friend quite properly asked me if I could let him have them two or three days ago, and he referred to it today. I told him that I had not seen them myself. I have not seen them yet.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That does not impress me greatly. I am quite aware that under the clause in the statute these regulations can be made. But I am submitting to the minister, who is usually a reasonable man, that actually, without knowing a great deal more than we now know, we cannot give any intelligent consideration to this section 20 that is now before us. Whether or not it has been the practice, I think it would have been good sense for us to see these regulations. I know they are still tentative; nevertheless, they would have given us an understanding that we do not have at present. As it is now we are asked to approve these regulations really in the dark.

Mr. Abbott: I just point out to my hon. friend that the principles that we are asked to pass on do not depend on the regulations at all. The principles are as I have enunciated them. The detail will be found in the regulations. But my hon. friend or any other member of this house has all the information he needs and is quite competent to pass on the principles.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not quite through yet. Some of my colleagues are anxious to have a go at the minister and I will give way to them in just a moment. I am quite ready to plead guilty to being just as stupid as the minister likes to accuse me of being, but I do not think we have had any real exposition of this matter. For instance, there is a phrase here that I do not understand. Perhaps the minister does not understand it either.

Mr. Abbott: Quite likely.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We are told here up to the present, "incidentally, that the effect of this"—that is, of the new system—"will be to allow for obsolescence hitherto unrecognized under our act." There is a short statement which goes to the root of depreciation. That is just stated as a categorical statement. There is no explanation of it here. As I say, I think we are left in a silly position. When we go back to our constituents and to our business friends and they ask us what we know about this important matter, we shall have to say that we just do not know anything, that the minister told us that regulations were going to be made but he had not even seen them himself.

Mr. Wright: I am not a lawyer and therefore do not understand all the implications of this section, so I should like to present a specific case to the minister and ask him just what happens in that case. A great many farmers, especially in western Canada, came under the income tax first between 1940 and 1943. We will take the case of a farmer who built, we will say, $10,000 worth of buildings in 1929 and in 1940 he comes under the income tax. He then writes off 5 per cent depreciation on the buildings, and that depreciation has been written off on the $10,000 that he started with. By 1949 his depreciation is all written off. He cannot take any further depreciation, although for five or ten years during the 1930's he was in the drought area or had no crop at all. He was paid P.F.A. Yet his right to take depreciation ceases at the end of twenty years. Is there any provision made for that? It seems unfair that he should not be able to take depreciation for twenty years during a period that he had not an actual income; it seems unfair that he should not be able to take depreciation on years when he had no income at all.

Mr. Abbott: If I understood my hon. friend's case correctly, the farm that he referred to has been completely written off in the period to which he refers.

Mr. Wright: No.

Mr. Abbott: As with all depreciation, you cannot take it twice.

Mr. Wright: No, it was not written off. He never made income enough to write off any depreciation during maybe a five-year or ten-year period in the thirties. Prices were low or he had no crop. Yet the income tax people insist that by 1949 his right to depreciate those buildings has ceased. That seems unfair.

Mr. Abbott: I am told that is one of the reasons for making the change that is contemplated here. Under the old rules he had to take at least half the allowed depreciation in a particular year, whether he had profits or not. Under the new system he is not required to take any depreciation at all in the particular year unless he sees fit to do so, and obviously he will not do it unless he has profits against which the depreciation can be allotted.

Mr. Wright: That again brings up the difficulties under the act. Most farmers have not kept books. All the department has is their word that during that year they did not have an income. What proof will they have to give to the department that they did not have an income during any particular year in which they could not take depreciation?

Mr. Abbott: Of course if they had profits they took the full depreciation against the profits. Under the old rule they would be obliged to, or they would be deemed to have taken half of the allotted depreciation whether profits existed or not. That has been operating up to the present time, and the result today would be that either the depreciation has actually been taken against the admitted profits or would have been deemed to have been taken to the extent of half the percentage allowed, applicable in each year in any case.

Mr. Fulton: I have information, and it comes from a chartered accountant of considerable experience, that this is in fact a retrograde step. My information is that in the United Kingdom the practice is in accord with what is called the straight-line method of depreciation; whereas this amendment sets up the reducing balance system. Will the minister comment on that? If that is so, why are we changing to what has been described as an antiquated system?

Mr. Abbott: I can only cite another opinion. I have been informed by chartered accountants and others in whose judgment I have a good deal of confidence that this is not a retrograde step, but a step in advance and that it actually is better for the majority of taxpayers than the old system. I cannot be otherwise than assertive on that. That is the advice which I have received from my own advisers who are highly experienced in these matters. I can make no claim to being an expert myself. As I said before, this is a very technical subject, one in which the accountants are very much more expert than members of the legal profession. I can only rely on information which I receive that this is an improvement on our old system and essentially fairer to the taxpayer, and that is why we made the change.

Mr. Fulton: May I make two comments on that? The first one is that under this system the taxpayer can never entirely write off the asset, because it is a constantly reducing figure which is diminished each year, the suggestion being a straight 15 per cent of the initial cost. The second is, what is the practice in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Abbott: On the first question my hon. friend is of course a highly skilled mathematician. He is quite right on the diminishing balance principle. You could not completely eliminate the value, but it can be reduced to infinitesimal proportions so that it ceases to have any commercial significance.

As to what the practice in the United Kingdom is, the information we have is that most of the British system is on the basis which we are now adopting, but I am not prepared to assert that with absolute finality. That is the information we have.

Mr. Quelch: I should like to get this down to fairly simple figures. Take the case of a farmer who has a tractor worth $5,000. At the end of five years that tractor has been fully written off. That farmer sells the tractor to another farmer for $2,000. Is the purchaser allowed to depreciate that $2,000, or has it been written off so far as he is concerned?

Mr. Abbott: The new purchaser would depreciate it at the cost which is $2,000.

Mr. Harkness: What about the farmer who sold it?

Mr. Abbott: He gets $2,000 back in income because he would have had the tax determined on a depreciated basis which has been proved in fact to be too great.

Mr. Major: The farmer would receive $2,000 from the sale of his old tractor. He would buy a new tractor for $1,500 on which he would take depreciation, and he would have $500 to spare.

Mr. Abbott: Which shows the great advantage of being a farmer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is one section that will need almost an army to enforce. I am speaking now for the farmers. If it is properly understood it will arouse a degree of antagonism the like of which has never been known before. I come from a province where the farmers pay income tax. When they begin to realize the meaning of this change that my hon. friend passes off with that graciousness for which he is famous, it will take an army of employees to enforce it.

Mr. Abbott: Why does my hon. friend say that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I say that simply for the reason that throughout the years in Saskatchewan the farmers have been in the position mentioned already by the hon. member for Melfort and the hon. member for Acadia. They have brought before the committee a situation that is serious. This section makes no allowance for conditions that prevailed throughout the years. Suppose the machinery was purchased in 1932 or 1933 and there was no crop for five or six years and there was no depreciation during those years. If the farmer disposes of his machinery he finds himself in a position where he is subjected to further taxation. There will never be a closing of the farmer's liability for taxes.

Mr. Abbott: If my hon. friend will permit me, this applies only to depreciation from now on. I thought I made that clear in my initial statement. It does not relate to the past.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I appreciate that. But when conditions are bad in any of the years, as they are for instance this year, then the situation is going to be most serious during any year that the farmer has a crop and disposes of any of his machinery that has been depreciated down. I suggest that the minister should give the widest publicity to this section and that the regulations should be published in all the papers. Some say that knowledge is strength. Knowledge of this section in the farming communities will arouse a great deal of ill feeling because it means that when a farmer has a crop after a series of no crops and disposes of any of the assets that have been depreciated down over five or six years, he will find himself paying an abnormal income tax on something that I personally regard as a serious invasion of his rights. I mention farmers particularly in that connection, for I believe that this section as now drafted will be productive of more antagonism than revenue.

Mr. Abbott: I have only one suggestion to make there. Perhaps I should not presume to suggest it but I think one should be careful about making assertions as to what the reaction will be—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have already received letters about it.

Mr. Abbott: —until the regulations are fully understood by those who will be affected by them. My hon. friend refers to bad years. Under the proposed new system, if the farmer to whom he alludes sells a piece of equipment at a loss he can continue to take depreciation on it, which he could never do before. He can average his profits over five years back and he can write a loss five years forwards and one year back. A combination of those various privileges I think will be found on application to be much more advantageous than the system which has prevailed up to the present time. Therefore I hope hon. members will not criticize the provisions in unqualified terms, until they are thoroughly informed as to the new regulations and the way they will work out.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is one good argument why the tentative regulations should be before the house so that, just as the hon. member for Greenwood has said, we may understand how these new changes are going to be applied. We make a general law in this section. I know one cannot cover a particular case in a general law; he must leave something to the matter of regulation. But those tentative regulations should be before the house so that hon. members may understand what the application will be in so far as the taxing administration is concerned, in connection with the regulations about to be announced.

Mr. Wright: I agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre that publicity should be given to this change, because I know it is a complete reversal of what has been happening in connection with depreciation on machinery. I know a great many farmers will not know anything about it unless some publicity is given to it; and they will continue to consider as capital gain the $1,000 or $500 for which they may sell a piece of equipment that has been depreciated, rather than place it in their income for taxation purposes, which has been the custom to date.

The minister has not answered my other question. He says the new legislation is not retroactive. Farmers during the thirties were not able to depreciate. There is depreciation taken on his buildings, whether he had an income in those years or not. That seems to be unfair.

The minister stated this new legislation will cover that, but it will not cover the retroactive period. That is the period they are worrying about—the time in the thirties when they were unable to take that depreciation.

Mr. Abbott: I wish I could explain a little more clearly than I have; however, I can only repeat what I said before, that this is probably the most complex and technical part of the income tax law. It is one which I think trained accountants are much better able to understand and explain than lawyers would be.

There will be no retroactive effect, so far as the new section is concerned. Value will be taken as it is today and depreciation will apply from now on. I sincerely believe, from the information I have been given, that they are more fair and more advantageous for the taxpayer than the rules which existed formerly. That is the only assurance I can give the house. I think we have to use the process of trial and error here as we do in so many other cases. These regulations to which I refer are still being worked on and will be put out as early as possible. I am informed by my officials who sit before me that the regulations, even if they were available today, might not help us in discussing the principle of the new rule. But, be that as it may, they are not yet ready.

Mr. Wright: Under the circumstances the minister should advise every farmer to have a chartered accountant make up his income tax next year. Farmers will not be able to understand these regulations. Hon. members cannot get an explanation they can understand.

Mr. Abbott: I am told however that the new system is simpler than the old one. So, I think it is like so many other cases—we are crossing our bridges before we get to them, and we are worrying about things we need not worry about. I would only ask the indulgence of the house to give this a fair trial. It would have been easy for us to have stuck to the old one. No one was complaining a great deal about it. I do not think one member in the house out of fifty really knew anything about it—and I include myself in the fifty. We are endeavouring to improve it. I apologize for not being able to explain it more clearly than perhaps others could do. However, that is the position.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, it is well for us to remember that this house, in legislating, while it has a responsibility with respect to the principle of the bill, also has a responsibility with respect to its form. Unless we can legislate in clear terms we are creating trouble for the taxpayer.

It is not without significance that when the minister sought to give the effect of the section he turned back to a speech he made on the budget last March. There he placed before us a paragraph which was clear and understandable. But when it gets down to a matter of carrying out the effect of the paragraph in the budget speech we find that there are in sections 7 and 8 of the bill, which are the sections dealing with depreciation, some six pages of legislative—

Mr. Abbott: Mostly definitions.

Mr. Fleming: —of legislative provisions.

Mr. Abbott: Mostly definitions.

Mr. Fleming: Well, that does not subtract one iota from the difficulty of construing the sections.

I suppose there may have been times when taxing statutes enacted by parliament were clear and understandable, but it seems to me that time has gone by. If these sections are a fair example of the kind of legislation parliament is to be called upon to pass nowadays, then the days of clear legislation are gone. Looking over this bill, and seeing these sections, and subsections and clauses, and then the exceptions to the provisions, and the exceptions to the exceptions, and the provisos, and the provisos to the provisos, and so on scattered all through this bill, one wonders what on earth the result will be. It reminds me of an expression from an eminent professor of the university of Toronto respecting the profound writings of Dean Roscoe Pound of Harvard law school on jurisprudence, when he said, "He uses English words, but it is not the English language."

One might say of these new provisions that they contain English words, but so far as we can find out they bear no resemblance to understandable English. It is very difficult for any man to follow them.

Then, there are a couple of points in particular I should like to mention. I understand it has been the practice in times past for the Department of National Revenue not to allow depreciation unless that depreciation is actually set up on the books of the taxpayer. That immediately raises the question as to the particular method of depreciation the taxpayer proposes to follow. I am informed that this reducing balance method as a basis of depreciation may become very cumbersome and unsatisfactory from the point of view of the taxpayer. If the taxpayer, to keep himself in the clear so far as the statute is concerned, is to follow this reducing balance method, and if, in trying to keep his books in such shape that he will understand them, he applies the straight line method, which is probably the one to which he has been accustomed, then he will be in great difficulty.

There are taxpayers who are urging upon the minister that the regulations be promulgated in the future so as to permit a choice of bases on the part of the taxpayer, and that he should be allowed to retain, if he so chooses, the straight line method.

There are several other features, and these have been drawn to the minister's attention. I refer particularly to a brief submitted to him by the board of trade of Toronto. These are matters with which it seems to me the minister has not dealt—or certainly has not dealt clearly tonight.

The first objection has to do with the retroactive feature. The minister has said there is no retroactive feature. I submit to him that it would be well if the new provision in respect of depreciation and the regulations yet to be made were made effective on a uniform date. It has been suggested that fiscal periods ending January 1, 1950, and subsequently would be satisfactory, and that the transitional provision could carry forward the former depreciation practice to that date.

The board of trade has made this comment:

> It must be obvious that from an administrative point of view this would be highly desirable. If this is not done, thousands of corporate statements already prepared and filed will be subject to amendment. Furthermore in a great many cases, where assets have been disposed of, a retroactive tax will be imposed. The board believes that this is an improper manner of dealing with the tax-paying public, and strongly urges that this retroactive feature of the proposed law be not enacted.

It seems to me, in commenting upon that point, that that is good sense and clear logic.

The second point has to do with the effect of this provision upon the stranger who at some future date is making a purchase.

Paragraph (2) of section 20 deals with property passing between persons some of whom were not dealing at arm's length. The effect of the paragraph as drafted would seem to work a hardship against a bona fide stranger who is a final purchaser in a series of transactions one of which was not conducted at arm's length. This would obviously be unfair and the wording of the paragraph should be changed to avoid such a situation.

The point arises as to these definitions to which the minister has referred. The particular definition to which I am now about to allude is on page 6 under subsection 3 (c), the definition of "proceeds of disposition". You will observe that the third and fourth clauses of paragraph (c) include:

(iii) an amount payable under a policy of insurance in respect of loss or destruction of property, and

(iv) an amount payable under a policy of insurance in respect of damage to property except to the extent that the amount has, within a reasonable time after the damage, been expended on repairing the damage.

The submission of the board of trade on this point is:

Taken together these two items—

That is to say, paragraphs (iii) and (iv) which I have read.

—seem to mean that in case of a total loss by fire the insured company would be taxable on the proceeds of insurance to the extent that the proceeds exceeded the undepreciated capital cost, (but limited to the amount by which original capital cost exceeds undepreciated capital cost). In case of partial loss, no tax would arise if the proceeds of insurance were expended in repairing damage.

This could quite obviously work serious hardship in the case of total loss by fire. In such event part, and possibly a large part, of the insurance moneys would be required for taxes. It is quite possible that some companies would not be able to carry sufficient insurance to cover both the fire loss and the resulting tax, and therefore would not be able to replace the plant facilities.

Then the board proceeds to urge very strongly that the proviso in subparagraph 3 (c) (iv) regarding amounts expended to repair damage should be extended to 3 (c) (iii) to cover amounts expended on replacement. That seems to be a most sensible suggestion. Surely it would not be the wish of parliament that, where insurance is collected on what amounts to a total loss or nearly a total loss, the tax gatherer should step in then and treat the payment made by the insurance company as proceeds of disposition.

It seems to me these points illustrate the definite weaknesses and shortcomings in the legislation now before us. I would suggest that the two related sections, sections 7 and 8 of the bill, should be held over until the minister has had an opportunity to draft amendments that will overcome these very proper objections to the present wording.

Mr. Abbott: I very carefully considered the representations from the Toronto board of trade to which my hon. friend has referred. As to the alleged retroactive question, I announced last March that depreciation for 1949 would be on the new basis. It is true the detailed regulations are not yet available, but I hope they will be within the next week or ten days. However, be that as it may, in the regulations it is proposed to insert a transitional provision that if the taxpayer takes depreciation in the year 1949 calculated on the old basis that dollar amount can be used for the 1949 period. In other words, he is given the option of taking it on that basis or on the new basis, whichever happens to be more advantageous. I think we have carefully guarded against any danger of retroactivity in the application of the new rules. I cannot agree with the submission of the board of trade on the question of insurance. If a man has insured a capital asset and he realizes an amount which is in excess of the written-down value he has in effect disposed of that asset, in an exceptional way it is true, and he has received a certain amount of cash for it. I see no reason why, if the proceeds of the insurance policy are in excess of the written-down book value, he should not be taxable on that excess.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Would it be all in the same year?

Mr. Abbott: He can of course refuse it and start depreciating on the new basis.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni):. Does the minister think it is fair that that should all be taken in the one year? After all, if there was appreciation over a period of ten years, why should it all be taken and made taxable in the one year? Getting it down to the simple tractor from Acadia, where the farmer depreciated his tractor in five years, and at the end of that time showed $2,000 profit you would charge him all that amount.

Mr. Abbott: There is one thing which is not appreciated. Under the new system all assets are lumped together as a group. Under the old system each asset had to be valued on the books as a separate item and depreciated separately. Under the new system they are lumped together and all pooled, and your depreciation is against the pool. Therefore if he had two tractors one could be offset against the other. It is really writing back into the pool. Take the case of the ordinary commercial enterprise where some stock in trade is lost as the result of a fire. Suppose it is not a total loss, but some machinery and equipment is lost, and there is other machinery and equipment and other assets which are depreciated. The collection on the insurance is $25,000 and the written down value is $20,000. Therefore there would be an apparent profit of $5,000 which would be taxable. That is taken into the operations for the year, but depreciation is taken against the pooled assets, and it is offset against that figure.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): How would the minister replace a saw mill if it was insured and then you came along and took your 20 per cent cut out of it? What has happened over the past seven or eight years is that costs have increased, and a saw mill that might have cost $500,000 then would cost $1 million to replace. Nevertheless, in the meantime you have reduced the capital you have there.

Mr. Fair: I believe the minister and the government are well aware that the taxation policy and agricultural policy in general have been responsible for the reduction in the production of agricultural products. I think that has been pointed out plainly many times in the house. Just as soon as farmers find out there is one more method by which their money can be filched away from them in the form of taxation, there will be a still greater reduction in the production of the country. I think it is a mistake to have the present system put into effect so far as farmers are concerned.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I find myself perplexed by the minister's attitude with regard to his refusal to admit that insurance money may be used for replacement as well as repairs. Let me ask, how much destruction must there be? In subparagraph 4 it says:

> . . . in respect of damage to property except to the extent that the amount has, within a reasonable time after the damage, been expended on repairing the damage.

Suppose there is 95 per cent damage. Can he replace it? What if the whole thing is destroyed? Suppose there is 50 per cent damage; he can replace, but if the whole thing is destroyed then he is going to be taxed and he cannot use the money for replacing the building. Is that correct?

Mr. Abbott: There are two separate things. The first paragraph, (iii), relates to loss or destruction, and the second one, (iv), relates to damage. In the case of loss or destruction the insured article is no longer there. It is not a case of repairing it but of replacing it. It is just as though the article has been sold; the only thing is it has been sold to the insurance company instead of to a purchaser. So far as the taxpayer is concerned, he has the cash, and if he had sold it he would have to use the cash to replace it if he wanted to. Since it has been burned, or destroyed in some other way, he has the cash from the insurance company. If that amount of cash is greater than the written-down value of the asset, then in effect he has got back more than his capital; he has been claiming a deduction as a capital expense which in fact he has not incurred. Therefore on the recapture principle it should be subject to tax. If the asset is damaged the insurance money, if entirely used to repair the damage, will attract no tax; but if there is an excess over and above what is required for repair then I take it that would be taxable income.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand the recapture principle; in fact that is the only thing I have understood tonight, really. It still seems to me that you are running into an absolutely illogical and even fantastic situation if you say the man whose building is ninety-five per cent ruined can replace or restore the damage, while the man whose building is one hundred per cent ruined cannot do so. Let us be frank about this. Insurance very seldom covers the whole value of a building, as we all know. In the practical outcome of this, say a man has a building worth half a million dollars, and he gets $400,000. According to the statement just made by the minister he can still be taxed on part of it.

Mr. Abbott: No, there would be no tax at all under those conditions. If the written-down value of his buildings is half a million dollars and he collects only $400,000 in insurance, he has had a loss. The new system would help him get the $100,000 back, because he can include that loss of $100,000 in his general pool. He could not have included a capital loss of that kind before; but if you have a running capital account of this kind you can take capital losses into it. That is one of the advantageous features of the new principle.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The Toronto board of trade stated a simple case, and I thought it was put very sensibly. Let me read it again, to see where the defect may be:

> The board draws your attention to paragraph (3) subsections (c) (iii) and (c) (iv) which define "proceeds of disposition" to include proceeds of insurance policies. Taken together these two items seem to mean that in case of a total loss by fire the insured company would be taxable on the proceeds of insurance to the extent that the proceeds exceeded the undepreciated capital cost (but limited to the amount by which original capital cost exceeds undepreciated capital cost). In case of partial loss, no tax would arise if the proceeds of insurance were expended in repairing the damage.

It seems to me the point is that in the case of partial loss the provision is sensible, but if you have the other case you run into this tax, which could prevent a man from carrying on his business.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend cited the case of a ninety-five per cent loss. If the proceeds were used to repair the loss there would be no tax. If on the other hand the proceeds from the insurance were $10,000 and it cost $9,000 to repair the ninety-five per cent loss, the extra $1,000 would be taxable.

Mr. Herridge: Numbers of people in my constituency own timber, on which in some cases they have paid taxes for from twenty to thirty or forty years, and they have also spent money developing and caring for it. Many of these people sell their timber on a stumpage basis for poles, logs, and so on. Are the receipts from that depreciated capital taxable?

Mr. Abbott: I am told that if the timber is sold on a stumpage basis the proceeds are taxable.

Mr. McCubbin: As a farmer I am just a little alarmed about this provision. We have become accustomed to the present method of depreciation of farm equipment and farm buildings, and now I want to ask the minister this question. In what way does this section alter the present method of calculating depreciation on farm buildings and equipment?

Mr. Abbott: I would like to give my hon. friend a detailed answer, but I am afraid I cannot do so. I am informed by people who are versed in this rather intricate subject of depreciation that the farmer will be better off under the new system than he was under the old one. I am making that as an assertion. I may be wrong, but I do not think I am, because we did not have to change the old system but did so in order to improve it. I return to what I said a little earlier. I wish I were technically competent to explain the intricacies of this matter, but I am not. However, I am assured by people who have made a study of it that it is an improvement on the old system and that it is better for the taxpayer, which includes the farmer as well as anyone else. That is why we have brought it in. I am afraid I cannot point out just why that should be so, though I shall try to in any specific instances that may be mentioned, but I suggest that people should not get too alarmed about the adverse effects of this provision before they see how it works out.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Harkness: The more I hear the minister attempt to explain this section the more amazed I become that anyone would contemplate applying this to the farmers of Canada. A moment ago the minister said that in his opinion it would be simpler and easier for people to work out, but in view of what he went on to say I do not see how that can possibly be the case. In the past practically every farmer I have known has had considerable difficulty computing his income tax. Many of them have had to get help from a chartered accountant, or someone of that sort. It seems to me that by putting through this section we will force every farmer to obtain the services of a chartered accountant; and as a result you are going to encounter intense opposition on the part of the farming population to this method of income tax assessment, as far as depreciation is concerned.

Under the old system when a farmer bought a new article, whether it was a tractor, a binder, a combine or anything else, all he had to do was take the cost and move the decimal point over, or in other words divide it by ten. If it was an ordinary piece of farm equipment it was on a ten-year depreciation basis, and the farmer could put down that figure one year after the other. If it was on a twenty-year basis he multiplied by two; if it was on a five-year basis he divided by two, and that was all there was to it. Even that was difficult enough for most people to follow through with many pieces of farm equipment. Now the basis has been changed, as I understand it. If a man buys a piece of equipment for $1,000, we will say, he depreciates it 15 per cent the first year, which brings it down to $850. The next year he has to depreciate it another 15 per cent of that amount. So the farmer is going to have to wrack his brains and spend goodness knows how long trying to figure it out. He will have to take each item separately year after year, and he just will not do it. He does not have time; he will not be bothered with it, and as a result you will not collect your taxes. In other words if you put through this amendment I should say you may get a farmers' strike as far as income tax is concerned. They will not be bothered with it and will not do it. I think you are simply laying yourselves open to all kinds of trouble. It would be much better to leave the old system, under which a man knew how to calculate his depreciation.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend realizes, this is intended to be a relieving section; and it is.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Abbott: It is intended to give the taxpayer further relief. Admittedly there may be a little difficulty getting it started, in arriving at initial values, but I am told when that has been done it is very much simpler to calculate depreciation than under the old system. I am making that as an assertion, relying upon the advice of people in whose experience I have some confidence. While I know some people are always averse to change and always think the present system is the best in the best possible world, that is not my philosophy. In matters of depreciation as in other matters I think we may be able to bring about an improvement. No farmer is obliged to take depreciation; it is an advantage which enables him to reduce the amount of his tax. Again I appeal for a fair trial for this new basis, which I am assured is better and simpler than the old one.

Mr. Graydon: The thing I think will be in the minds of most hon. members is this: If the minister does not quite understand the implication of this section, I do not know how he expects the farmers to do so. As a matter of fact, I have heard some members of this committee say that the farmer would likely have to have an accountant make out these forms. He has to have an accountant now. I do not suppose there are many farmers, certainly not in my part of the country, who make out their income tax forms themselves. Instead of making these forms more complicated, instead of making the law so obscure that even the minister is not able to understand it, I believe we should be simplifying it.

Mr. Abbott: I did not say that. I said it was a little difficult to explain in generalities.

Mr. Graydon: If a thing is difficult to explain, perhaps the person who is explaining it does not understand it himself.

Mr. Abbott: Or his audience; but that is the fault of the minister, not his audience.

Mr. Graydon: So far as the income tax which is applicable to agriculture is concerned, I have always felt, and I believe it is the thought of most people representing agricultural sections, that the call is constantly for some sort of simplification in the tax structure. The farmer does not want to have to go to his lawyer or accountant, and spend days getting his income tax in shape. The farmer is in an entirely different position from the ordinary individual. You cannot put his business on the same level as the ordinary business of industry and commerce. There is a distinction between the two.

All the minister has to do is to look casually into the distinction between the way a farmer has to conduct his business, and the way the business of industry is conducted. In most instances, there is little in common. When it comes to making out income tax returns, however, both of them are put in the same box, and are asked to make out their income tax returns on the same basis. This has been the difficulty facing agriculture during these last few months. There has been a great deal of agitation over the complex nature of the returns the farmer is asked to make out. Upon completion of the return, the farmer is never sure whether he owes the government $10 or $1,000. I believe once the farmer sees this act, he will have great difficulty in coming to the conclusion that he can make out his income tax return.

If we are going to make a move in any direction, I plead with the minister to make a move towards a simpler sort of return for agriculture, having in mind the fact that agriculture is in an entirely different position from industry. Apparently, industry is the section of our population upon which the income tax return standards are based. I wonder what industry would think if the farmers were to have the say as to what kind of income tax return there should be in this country? Industry would raise a howl to the high heavens, but a farmer is expected to fit himself into the sort of strait-jacket that has been prepared for industrial income tax returns. I believe the minister ought to consider that whole question, to ascertain whether we cannot have a simpler form for agriculture, because it is working a great hardship upon farmers generally from one end of Canada to the other.

Mr. Fleming: It was both comforting and challenging to hear the Minister of Finance say a few moments ago that he was technically unable to explain this section, or that he had not the technical knowledge or ability to explain the section. Now, that may be quite comforting to the rest of us who have tried to understand—

Mr. Abbott: Not the section, if my learned friend will allow me, but the detailed way in which this new system operates. The section is largely a section of definitions.

Mr. Fleming: —how it is to be worked out in the legislation now proposed. We are being asked to put into effect provisions which many of the members of this house, if they find themselves in the same position as the minister, will not understand when they are called upon to vote on them.

There is a great deal more than depreciation involved in this provision. If it were simply the changing from one method of depreciation to another, the matter would not offer nearly the complexity or difficulty that it does. It goes beyond that. It is a method of depreciation accompanied by a capital gains tax; in effect, that is what it is.

If this were a perfectly sound method of depreciation, this new method of the reducing balance instead of the straight-line method hitherto in effect, surely it should commend itself to the department. The department would say, "Very well, as a method of depreciation we are satisfied with the soundness of the reducing balance method and will accept it". The department does not do that. They say that when a sale is made of a depreciated asset later on they are going to step in and take what amounts, in effect, to a capital levy.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, no.

Mr. Fleming: With respect, Mr. Chairman, it means just that. You take a simple transaction. John Jones buys something and sells it. If he is not in the business of buying and selling things of that class, then whatever he has made on that transaction is a capital gain, and is not income. Therefore, it is not subject to income tax.

Mr. Abbott: If he did not claim depreciation, my hon. friend would be quite right.

Mr. Fleming: If the depreciation method that is proposed is sound, why should it not stand simply as a matter of depreciation? In this provision, the department is proposing to follow the asset, and it may go through more than two hands. If at some time in the future you are selling it at a greater value than the reduced value at which you are carrying it on your books, the department is going to treat that excess over the reduced value as income upon which you will be taxed. This will mean that the taxpayer is going to be pushed into a much higher bracket carrying a much higher rate of tax. It seems to me that that, sir, is the effect of this section. It is not simply a depreciation section, but is a section that provides for a method of depreciation and then goes much farther. It provides for the levying of a tax in a way that seems to me to amount to a capital gains tax.

Quite apart from that, sir, there are two points with which the minister has not dealt. In the first place, I raised a point as to the effective date, and the minister has indicated that regulations will make it possible for the taxpayer to make his choice between the two methods of depreciation.

Mr. Abbott: On the amount for a whole year.

Mr. Fleming: For fiscal periods, yes, up until January 1, 1956. Beyond that time there will not be a choice, but during this period there will be a choice. I should like to ask the minister, if he will, to clear up this point. It is tied up always with the requirement that the department insists that the depreciation must be set up in the books, and in the case of this option, the department will presumably insist on applying the method that the taxpayer has set up on his books.

Mr. Abbott: That will be covered by the regulations, I understand. I understand that the practice in the Department of National Revenue in the past has been that depreciation claimed for tax purposes must be the depreciation which is actually set up on the books. Now, the regulations to be enacted will cover that point, as well as provide some modification in the rule, perhaps. I am informed that has not been settled yet.

I should like to revert for a moment to what my friend has said. I think the fundamental principle here is fairly clear, as to the basis upon which the taxpayer is entitled to recover his capital, because that is the purpose of depreciation and obsolescence allowances. The detailed method as to how it is done is to be made the subject of regulations. The only reason that these sections are complex, and the regulations are rather lengthy, is that, in accordance with what seems to be the general wish of the members of this house and the public, we have eliminated the old ministerial discretion. Under the old system there were no long, elaborate regulations published and available for anybody. You went to the minister. There were certain predetermined rates of depreciation. You went to the minister and he had to rule upon the matter and he did not bother to have that spelled out in a section or to enact regulations. It was a ministerial discretion, exercised no doubt, in all cases, fairly and so on and so forth. But inevitably, in getting away from that we have had to draw rather long and complex regulations.

But the principle of the proposed new system is as simple as a, b, c. The application is quite complicated, it is true, but this recapture provision which has been referred to has been followed in England where the principle of capital gains does not apply. The principle is simply this. If you start off with a cost, you would depreciate that cost on a diminishing balance basis, each year, at the predetermined rate and take your depreciation for your book value at the beginning of the year. Obviously in mathematics you will never write it off completely. You will get down to a fraction of a cent. The recapture provision is simply this. If you sell it for more than the depreciated cost, you have more depreciation deducted from your tax bill than you should have had, and you should bring the difference back into your tax. It is just as simple as that. The application in different types of assets is admittedly complicated, and in talking in general terms it is difficult to explain particular cases. But there is nothing obscure about the main principle. Even a simple lawyer like myself can understand it.

Mr. Fleming: My point was not cleared up, Mr. Chairman. I am coming back to this point about the method of depreciation set up on the books of the taxpayer in 1949. This is the fifth day of December and when this bill becomes law, either the taxpayer is going to have an opportunity of sitting down then and deciding which of the two methods he chooses to apply for 1949 or the department is going to say: We have looked at your books and we find that this is the method you have been following; therefore because of the rule that the department allows depreciation only where it is set up on the books of the company or the taxpayer, we are going to apply that method. I am wondering how much time the taxpayer is going to have to exercise this option as between the two methods of depreciation for 1949.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend knows, very few taxpayers with complicated accounts are actually in a position to close their accounts and make their final entries until some time after the end of the fiscal period. That is why this three months, or it is six months now, is allowed for filing the income tax return. With the demand for accountants and auditors, it is seldom that you can get your audited statement until some little time after the end of your fiscal year. I am informed that it should be possible to have the new regulations available before the end of the year. I realize that is only three weeks away, nevertheless the Department of National Revenue are hopeful that as soon as this legislation is adopted they will be able to complete the regulations and publish them. While the time may be somewhat short, nevertheless I think there really will be adequate time for those who have to look at one option or the other to see which it would be in their interests to follow.

Mr. Fleming: My point has not been answered.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Acadia.

Mr. Quelch: When the minister argues that the new scheme will be fairly simple or that it will be just, I am not going to take exception to that remark. But on the other hand, when he says that the farmer will be better off under this system, then I say that he is just talking poppycock, because it will cost the farmer more money. It is bound to cost him more money. Let me explain what I mean. At the present time it is quite common practice for large farmers to sell off their machinery about every fourth or fifth year because they do not want to run the risk of delay at seeding time or harvest time. Seeding time and harvest time are short periods and they do not want to take the chance of a breakdown. So they make it a practice to sell off their machinery about every four or five years and buy new machinery. In the past, when they have sold off their old machinery, they have not had to pay any income tax on the price they received for it. But now the minister says they will have to pay a tax. How can the farmer possibly be better off when he now has to pay a tax which he has not had to pay in the past?

Mr. Abbott: They would not have to pay tax unless they sold the machinery at an amount greater than the depreciated value.

Mr. Quelch: That is what I am talking about.

Mr. Abbott: Are the farmers making a great deal of money selling second-hand machinery?

Mr. Quelch: That is not the purpose of selling the machinery. The purpose is to avoid loss of time as a result of using the old machines at harvest time or seeding time. The farmer might easily lose the price of a machine or half the price of a machine. But if the machine has been fully depreciated, he is going to have to pay income tax on the sale price. That has not been the practice in the past. Whether or not it is just is a question I am not going to argue. But the impression now is that he is going to have to pay a tax now that he has never had to pay in the past, and it will not be popular. The minister cannot argue that it is going to be popular.

Mr. Abbott: The farmer must be selling it to another farmer who would buy the same sort of machine.

Mr. Quelch: They are going to the dealer for new machines.

Mr. Abbott: I see. I am asking for information. Where does the old machine go?

Mr. Quelch: The dealer sells it to another farmer. He reconditions it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. May I ask hon. members to address themselves to the Chair.

Mr. Quelch: The dealer reconditions the machine and sells it to another farmer, and the other farmer will be allowed depreciation on that machine. But in the past, the farmer who has turned that machine in to the dealer has never had to pay income tax on the amount he received for the machine; but from now on he will have to do so. As I say, that is not going to be popular at all; in fact it is going to be exceedingly unpopular. I assure the minister that he will find that out as soon as the farmers begin to realize that they are going to have to pay that tax.

There is one other point I wish to mention. At the present time any expenditure of over $25 on capital has to be considered a capital investment and cannot be charged as an expenditure; that is if the amount is over $25. We find that farmers sometimes get wells drilled and spend perhaps $600. They do not strike any water. It is a dry hole. But they are not allowed to charge for that expenditure. They have to charge it as a capital investment. How much of an investment have you got when you have a dry hole? Yet they have to depreciate that dry well for ten years. It seems to me that that is nonsensical. Where a farmer goes to the expense of getting a well drilled, spends $600 on that well and gets no water, then he should be allowed to charge that as an expenditure for that year, because he must make a capital expenditure to get another well drilled in order to get water. It seems to me that provision is most unfair.

Mr. Abbott: May I give my hon. friend a specific illustration of how this works with respect to a machine, for instance, because that seems to be the case which is causing some concern. Suppose he sells a particular type of farm machinery for $4,500. Suppose that represents $500 over and above the depreciated value of that machine, so that he would appear to have a profit of $500. Then suppose at the same time he buys a new machine for $5,000. He sets off the $500 against the $5,000 price for his new machine, and the cost of his new machine to start depreciating from is $4,500, so that he pays no tax on what would seem for the moment to be a $500 profit. This is a continuing operation. That is the way in which what I probably not too accurately referred to as the pool system of depreciation works in the case of a farmer or any other taxpayer. There would be no tax payable on the $500 as a profit. That is the point I am making in the illustration I have given. It would be used to write down the value of the new machine which he bought in its place. He does not take it into income.

Mr. Wright: Has the minister or his department consulted any farm organization with respect to this change in depreciation before writing the act? Will they consult with them before bringing in the regulations with respect to it, because I am sure they could get some valuable suggestions from them?

Mr. Abbott: I cannot answer my hon. friend as to whether organizations were consulted, but I am told that in the administration of these rates in the farming community, the department is in constant contact with the farm organizations, including the federation of agriculture and others.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, back in 1947 the department got out a farmer's income tax guide. Last year there was not one published. I wonder whether—

Mr. Abbott: There was.

Mr. Fraser: I have not seen one. I see the Minister of National Revenue nodding his head. I wondered whether the department was going to get one out this year and put in it the a.b.c.'s that the Minister of Finance speaks of in this relieving clause. I feel quite sure that many of the farmers will be using the old income tax guide and they are going to be mixed up. There will be difficulties with the income tax inspectors and the farmers will be charged interest on taxes that they have not paid because they will not understand this clause. I think a book should be published as soon as the minister finds out what the regulations are.

Mr. McCann: The answer is that there was a guide put out last year, and one which will include what the income tax form will be will be put out very shortly.

Mr. Fraser: Will it have this new clause in it and the minister's a.b.c. explanation? He says it is as simple as that.

Mr. McCann: All the discussion that has been going on here tonight?

Mr. Fraser: Does the minister understand it?

Mr. McCann: It would have to be in two volumes.

Mr. Fraser: I wonder whether the Minister of National Revenue understands it.

Mr. McCann: Yes, I do.

Mr. Fraser: The minister is one man in the committee who understands it.

Mr. Abbott: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Herridge: I want to return to this question of tax on timber entirely liquidated. I want to give the minister one example that illustrates the point. I know of people who have held timber for forty years, owning the land and the timber. They paid taxes for forty years and cared for it. Theoretically a man could sell that timber off the stump in one year and obtain $20,000 or $25,000, and in doing so he would in reality completely liquidate his capital. After he conserves that timber all throughout these years he is taxed on the total receipts. I ask the minister how he can justify that tax on capital depreciation.

Mr. Abbott: Well, of course, if he sold the land with the timber on it, that would be a sale of capital asset. If he did as my hon. friend suggested, sold it on a stumpage basis in one year he could be taxed on the receipts in one year, on his income less any expense he incurred. Presumably in the thirty or forty years that he has held the land he has deducted his expenses of carrying it as a deduction from income. I would assume that in these circumstances the taxpayer would endeavour to dispose of the land on such a basis over a period of time that it would not attract taxes in a single year. That would be the only common-sense thing for him to do.

Mr. Fulton: It seems to me that one of the greatest objections to the principle of this thing is that the government is setting the rules for depreciation. The department will set them by regulation, and if the department is setting the rules and is saying to the taxpayer, here is the rate of depreciation, here is the percentage by which you may write down your capital depreciation each year, then the department should stick with that, and it should not have the right to change at the end of the year when the taxpayer sells his equipment. They should not have the right to turn around and say, you will pay a tax on the excess of the selling price over the depreciated value, because they set the rate of depreciation. I wonder whether the department will consider giving the taxpayer a refund or allow him to make a further deduction from taxable income if he sells the equipment below—

Mr. Abbott: He is given that under the new system. My hon. friend has put his finger on one of the advantageous features of the new system.

Mr. Fulton: It did not come out in the minister's previous explanation.

Mr. Abbott: I said that. I think I said it twice this evening.

Mr. Fulton: If he sells the equipment at less—

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Fulton:—than the depreciated value—

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Fulton:—he can take that out—

Mr. Abbott: Correct.

Mr. Fulton:—from his taxable income.

Mr. Abbott: To attempt to make real depreciation obviously rates have to be determined, but they are average rates, and they are attributed rates, and when you see what the real result is, if it turns out to be that the rates of depreciation have been too high and that the capital value has not diminished to that extent, then too much has been taken and there is a tax on the balance. If on the other hand the attributed rates of 15 per cent or 20 per cent, as the case may be, prove to be inadequate then the taxpayer is entitled to claim his loss.

Mr. Fulton: Can the minister say where that is in the section?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, it is not in the section. The principle is found in section 11, subsection 1, which says that the taxpayer is entitled to recover his capital in accordance with regulations to be determined by the minister. Under the old act it was discretionary. It was not in the act at all. It was discretionary. Now it is going to be spelled out in regulations. But the principle which underlies depreciation or obsolescence or depletion is that you are entitled to take as an expense an item representing the day by day, the month by month return of your capital through age, wear or use, and the principle is that you should not be taxed on income before you get your capital, at least that you should get your capital back, and that it is not true income so long as a portion of what you are receiving is a return of capital. In essence that is what a depreciation allowance is.

Mr. Fulton: Do I understand now that the minister says that either excess of selling price over depreciation or difference between selling price and depreciated value is on the one hand taxable and on the other hand deductible? Did I understand the minister to say that that principle is contained in section 11 of the act, or did I understand him to say merely that it is a principle which is to be worked out and applied in the regulations?

Mr. Abbott: That is a principle which is inherent in what I referred to as this recapture provision as a basis of depreciation. If you are going to recapture the profit you should give the man the benefit of the loss.

Mr. Fulton: I certainly agree with that. I wish the minister had made it clear to me before. It was not clear to me.

Mr. Abbott: This is the inadequacy of my gift of exposition.

Mr. Sinnott: I know the minister wants to be fair, but he has been a little bit dense about getting this machinery through. Nevertheless he has been fair. He has been trying to block up the holes in taxation. He says if a man bought a machine at $1,000 and depreciated it over a period of five years the machine is gone. Then if he turns around and buys a new one and gets credit of $500 on the old one he starts off with what he got on the other machine.

I come from an agricultural district and I am sure that the minister wants to be fair to all farmers. If a corporation or a man is in business and saves $100,000 he can go to the taxation branch and if he is the manager of that business he can get a fairly good compensation for being the manager of the business. Farmers are managers of their businesses, but I cannot see any section in this act which says that farmers are entitled to any compensation for being managers. There are thousands of farmers in western Canada who should be entitled to management compensation just the same as other people in business. I hope that when the minister looks at this in a fair way he will give them consideration.

The hon. member for Acadia spoke about farmers drilling for water and after having been put to considerable expense found that there was no water there and were not entitled to any consideration. I would ask the minister to give the same consideration to the farmers as he has to those who, under section 52, are exploring and drilling for oil. If he does that it will be quite fair.

Mr. Quelch: Would the minister reply to the point I raised about the well? When I asked my question he was busy arguing on the other matter.

Mr. Abbott: Would the hon. member repeat his question. I know it has been up before in the previous debate, so perhaps he would ask it again.

Mr. Quelch: Under the ruling of the income tax branch, if a farmer spends more than $25 on capital development he cannot show that as current expenditure. He must show it as capital investment. We will suppose a farmer drills a well at a cost of $600, and does not strike water. It is not an asset; but he is not allowed to show it as a current expenditure, and has to allow depreciation on it over a period of ten years. How can you depreciate something that does not exist? You have not got the well. He will have to drill another well, and when he drills that well it will be carried for ten years. But surely the well he drilled from which he got no water should be allowed as a current expenditure in that year.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Abbott: I shall have to discuss the matter. It is in the Department of National Revenue, and I do not know what the practice has been there. If a farmer spent $500 looking for water, and did not get the water, he would not have any asset to write off. He has just made an expense, for which he has no return. If he spent $500 and actually got a well, then he would have a capital asset. But that is not one which depreciates. Presumably, so long as nature continues to function, the well will continue as an asset, in perpetuity. He does not have to get back the capital, because his capital is undestructible.

Mr. Quelch: No, not in respect of a well. He would be lucky if he had a well which would last more than ten years. At the end of ten years he would probably have to put in a new casing or have to drill a new well. But my argument is that when you do not get water you should be allowed to show it as an expense, and it should be exempt for the full amount.

Mr. Abbott: I shall talk on that with the Minister of National Revenue. I can see some objection to allowing it as a current expense in the year in which it is incurred.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I just wish to make one or two comments. We have had a very interesting, but not a very profitable hour, until about the last fifteen minutes, at which time I think the minister made a clear statement. We have been asked tonight to approve something sight unseen. The minister also says that he had not had time to review this matter and has asked us to take the view of certain people who, I have no doubt, are reputable people, whom he has referred to as accountants. No one has more respect for accountants than I have; but I do not think they are the only people in the world, and certainly they are not the people who should give judgment in these matters. Whatever qualifications members of the House of Commons may have, they are supposed to have some kind of rough and ready judgment; and they are the people who should take the responsibility in matters of this kind. To do that they should have the evidence before them.

The minister was frank enough to say that he has not even seen the regulations himself.

Mr. Abbott: They are not completed yet.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If the minister had even come here and told us he had seen them and that they were all right, it would have been not so unsatisfactory. With that, I would add a final word, that we were all in the same position, and even the minister did not know what it was all about, except in general terms.

I say when we come to this again there should be an occasion upon which the house through a committee, or whatever may be the best means, should have a chance to look at this very important matter, and should have evidence before it, and should not be asked to take the responsibility which we now take, as I said before, sight unseen.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know how a regulation can be made to define the indefinable. I would point to one paragraph in subsection 3 which is supposed to clarify "total depreciation allowed to a taxpayer". If this is not a definition as impossible of comprehension as any ever produced in parliament, then I have never seen one impossible of comprehension. The paragraph states:

"Total depreciation allowed to a taxpayer"—

And that is what is being defined.

—before any time for property of a prescribed class means the aggregate of all amounts allowed to the taxpayer in respect of property of that class under regulations made under paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of section 11 in computing income for taxation years before that time;

I do not blame the Minister of Finance for saying he cannot define these things.

Mr. Abbott: There is nothing very complex about that definition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is not complex, do you say?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, just get a farmer to work that out, as to the total depreciation allowed to a taxpayer, under that definition! I do not know of a collection of definitions that ever equalled this one in incomprehensibility. The minister has said that we must not prejudge. I would ask him this—and for the moment I am speaking as the representative of an agricultural constituency. The farmer up to the present time has had an implement costing $1,000 on which there has been a depreciation for a period of three or four years, with the value of the implement now standing at $500.

Mr. Sinclair: That is the written-down value.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Down to $500.

Mr. Abbott: That is the written-down value.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He turns it in on another implement for $600. Is it not a fact that up to the present time he has not been liable for income tax on that $100?

Mr. Abbott: That is right. And up to the present time, had he had a loss of $300, he could not claim that either.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are talking about a gain. I say therefore that there is a very pronounced change made here, and that so far as the farmer is concerned—and I am using him only as an example of all classes—it means that farmers throughout the country will find themselves in a position where they will be taxed on what in effect heretofore has been a capital gain. This affects Saskatchewan particularly, because Saskatchewan is one province in which the farmers pay tremendous income tax.

That is what it amounts to. I am not for one moment dealing with the question of losses. This in effect is the first time parliament has made a provision for the taxation of capital gain, and this may well be the thin edge of the wedge in that direction. That is why it deserves consideration. While the minister says that all we do is to make some minor change, in effect by these provisions we are altering our system of taxation and, as regards the example I have brought to the attention of the committee, we are placing a tax upon what heretofore has been a capital gain.

The minister has said, "Do not prejudge us." I say if the farmers of western Canada had known what he meant when he read the statement upon the introduction of his budget last spring, and which he re-read this evening, there would have been an altogether different reaction toward this matter.

This is a change which cannot but arouse antagonism, for it is a change in the system of taxation, and will mean a larger amount of taxation payable by the people of this country who are affected by this provision.

The expression the minister used is that it is a recapture. It is more than a recapture; it is the first capture of a capital gain in this country. It is for that reason I suggest it be held in abeyance and not brought into effect. It is not just simply a method of altering the system of depreciation. It is in effect a form of additional taxation, and one that merits the consideration of members on all sides of the house. It is a change. It is all very well to say that losses may also be subtracted, but in so far as gains are concerned it is a capital gains tax.

Mr. Fleming: If I may say so, the minister did not completely answer the last question I asked him some time ago about the option he is proposing to extend by regulation to taxpayers in connection with the particular method of depreciation they are to set up for fiscal periods ending before January 1, 1950. By the time the statute is adopted and printed, and by the time the regulations are made, printed and circulated, it will be surprising if it is very much before the end of 1949. Then if it takes people time, as it certainly will, to digest, analyse and try to understand the law and the regulations, the option the minister is offering to them will be meaningless this year unless the minister is prepared to extend beyond January 1, 1950, the option he proposes to make available to taxpayers as to the method of depreciation for fiscal periods up to January 1, 1950.

Mr. Abbott: I do not know just what my hon. friend wants me to deal with.

Mr. Fleming: It seems to me the minister is going to have to extend the period for applying the option.

Mr. Abbott: If it is necessary that will be done. I do not think there is any question about that. I said a moment ago I felt sure taxpayers would be given ample opportunity to decide which of the two bases it is in their interests to adopt. Every reasonable time will be given to them to do that. I do not think my hon. friend need have any concern that there will be any difficulty on that score.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Don't be so impatient.

Mr. Abbott: I did not think I was impatient. I was just trying to be explanatory.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Your voice was impatient.

Mr. Fleming: I come back to the subject of the capital tax which I mentioned some little while ago. It seems to me that the Department of National Revenue must initially take the responsibility for saying what is a reasonable rate of depreciation, one that they will allow. Having done that, surely it is only reasonable that the department should stay with that rate of depreciation. If the taxpayer later on sells the depreciated article for more than the written-down value on his books, then why on earth should the tax-gatherer step in and lay his hands upon the excess? It comes back to this, that the department is saying that they allowed too much depreciation.

In the first place it seems to me it is the responsibility of the department to set such a rate of depreciation as will be fair. Having set that and enforced it for whatever period of time is in question, surely they should be satisfied to leave it at that. What is involved here is a great deal more than that. The government is not contenting itself with saying: We are going to set up a new method of depreciation. The Department of National Revenue is not going to content itself with simply setting a rate of depreciation. If they guess low then they are going to follow the asset when sold, and lay their hands on what is a capital gain. The hon. member for Lake Centre is perfectly right in saying this represents the first time parliament has undertaken to tax a capital gain.

When I mentioned this matter earlier this evening I gave a simple illustration. John Jones buys an article and he sells it at a profit. In effect that is a capital gain. He is not taxable on it unless he is in the business of buying and selling articles of that class. The minister says: Oh, well, the difference here is that you are introducing depreciation. Let them introduce their depreciation, but let them stop at depreciation. They set the rate, and if they do not set it at a proper figure, then surely the proper course for them to follow is to set a proper and reasonable rate. Let them revise their rate, and not follow the asset when sold and tax a capital gain. It is a vicious principle, and one that has never been recognized by parliament before. As has been mentioned here, it is going to affect farmers. Actually, it is going to affect every taxpayer in Canada into whose calculation of income depreciation enters in any form, because the moment that he sets up depreciation he has invited a capital gains tax.

Mr. Abbott: I have one observation. I do not want to hold up the committee, but one of the things we have been urged most strongly to make provision for is obsolescence, which has never been allowed before. I know of no way in which one can make provision for obsolescence except by setting maximum annual rates of depreciation which cannot be other than arbitrary, and can only represent an intelligent guess as to what will be the depreciation or obsolescence in that year, and if those expectations are not realized either take the excess back into profit or allow less to be charged. This is not a capital gains tax. It is the system which has been followed under the income tax provisions of the United Kingdom where capital gains have never been taxed, in the same way that they have never been taxed here. One of the things we are trying to accomplish by the changed system is to allow for obsolescence. This is the only way that I can see in which it can be done.

Mr. Wright: I should like to place another example before the minister and ask him what he thinks about it. We will say I invest $5,000 in a house, write off 5 per cent depreciation for ten years, and then sell the house for more than I paid for it. That is a capital gain, and I do not pay any tax on the amount. On the other hand, if I invest $5,000 in a piece of farm equipment, the price of farm equipment rises over the years, and I then sell that piece of farm equipment, you say it is not a capital gain and that it is taxable. I think the same rule should apply in both cases.

Mr. Abbott: It does apply in both cases if depreciation is taken on the house. As my hon. friend knows, one cannot claim depreciation as an expense on the house in which one lives. If it is a rented house you can claim depreciation at whatever the attributed rates are, 5 per cent or 7½ per cent. We will say the depreciated value of the house is $6,000, written down from $9,000, and that it is sold for $7,000. In effect it will have been over-depreciated, and there will have been a greater amount claimed as a deduction from income than should have been claimed. The $1,000 will go back in. In most cases it does not apply to private residences; it applies to machinery, equipment, business premises, and that sort of thing.

Mr. Harkness: I wonder if the minister can explain to us what the situation will be as to farm buildings under the new system so far as depreciation is concerned. Let me take a specific example. We will say a farm is purchased for $20,000. The buildings on the farm cost the original owner $10,000 to erect. He has depreciated them until their value, so far as he is concerned with the income tax people, is $500. The man who buys the farm figures the buildings are worth $5,000, and he estimates that of the $20,000 he paid for the farm $15,000 was for the land and $5,000 for the buildings. What is his situation under the new system so far as depreciation on the buildings is concerned? Does he have to put them in at $500, does he put them in at the $5,000 he figures they are worth to him, or does he put them in at replacement cost which at present prices would be $10,000?

Mr. Abbott: I would think the figure he would put them in at would be the portion of the price which he has paid that can be reasonably attributed to the value of the buildings. That would be the fair value of these buildings. My hon. friend gave an example of $20,000 for the land and the buildings. The fair value for the buildings would be $5,000. He would put those in at $5,000 and depreciate on that figure. The rest would be land, of course, which does not depreciate, so he would not claim anything there.

Mr. Harkness: The minister says he thinks that would be the case. Does he know?

Mr. Abbott: The matter of the fair attributable value would be a question of fact. If there were a dispute between the taxpayer and the income tax department it would be settled by agreement or by the income tax appeal board and then on to the exchequer court; but the question as to the proportion of the price fairly attributable to the buildings as distinct from the land would be a question of fact.

Mr. Harkness: It has nothing to do with the depreciated value?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The minister is completely wrong with respect to provinces where they have the Torrens system of land holding. In that case the registrar of the particular district in which the lands were situated just would not pay any attention to the principle you are talking about. The provincial tax would be on the value of the buildings at the time they were purchased, so the man in that case would be soaked both ways. Under your scheme he might pay very little but in provincial taxes he would pay a tremendous amount, because the actual or replacement cost of these buildings would be taken at so much and the land at so much. So you are going contrary to the established practice where the Torrens system applies.

Mr. Abbott: I suppose that is a provincial tax on the transfer, the land and building value?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Yes.

Mr. Abbott: My suggestion is that the value the new purchaser would place on the buildings for purposes of depreciation would be the fair portion of the purchase price he paid which would be attributable to those buildings.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I had forgotten the name of it, but now I remember it is called the assurance fund. In all provinces where the Torrens system applies they have something called an assurance fund, which is in direct contradistinction to the principle we are discussing now. So a purchaser would pay in perhaps two ways, under the law in a province where the Torrens system applies and under the system the minister is describing. I am quite sure many difficulties will arise. Knowing the minister, I am sure he will get his share, and the province will be called the blood sucker in the picture. The individual will suffer, whatever name he is called.

Mr. Quelch: I want to bring up another case, just to round out the argument. A farmer goes to a sale and buys a second-hand machine for $2,000. The age of the machine does not matter. He uses it for a few days, finds it unsatisfactory and puts it up for sale again. This time he gets $2,500 for it, so he makes a profit of $500. What happens to that $500?

Mr. Abbott: If he has claimed no depreciation on the machine that money would not be taxable at all; it would be straight capital gain.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Transitional provisions re depreciation.

Mr. Abbott: I have a short amendment which I shall ask my colleague to move, to add subsection (5) in order to include matters which previously were called depletion. It is purely a technical amendment which was overlooked in the drafting of the section. It reads:

That clause 8 of the bill be amended by adding the following as subclause (5):

(5) Reference in this section to depreciation shall be deemed to include a reference to allowances in respect of depreciable property of a taxpayer made under paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of section 5 of the Income War Tax Act.

Mr. Fournier(Hull): I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the section as amended carry?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On division, because I do not know what the amendment meant.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Computation of taxable income.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As the result of a letter which I received since we started to discuss this matter I should like to ask the minister for a ruling. This is the case of a married man living separate and apart from his wife, as he has been for a number of years. Is a person in that position entitled to the married exemption or the single exemption?

Mr. Abbott: The position, apparently, is this. If he is maintaining a self-contained domestic establishment in which he is supporting someone connected with him by blood relationship, such as children, he would be entitled to the married exemption. If he is simply supporting his wife and paying her maintenance, for instance, he gets the single exemption but can claim as a deduction the alimony he is paying, if that alimony is paid pursuant to an order of a court.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let us say he operates a self-contained establishment but that his family have grown up and left. His wife does not receive alimony from him; she lives apart and maintains herself. Is he then allowed the married exemption or only the single exemption?

Mr. Abbott: In that case he is considered a single man for taxation purposes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Does this clause result from a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada which recently went against the department in its collection of tax with respect to a man and his wife who had some income of her own?

Mr. Abbott: No. This clause simply increases the exemption from the previous $1,500 to $2,000, and so on. The question asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre was in regard to the position of a married man living apart from his wife. The ruling I have explained was introduced in 1943 or 1944, I think, certainly five or six years ago, during the war.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): At the risk of being a trifle out of order may I ask if in these amendments you are trying to get away from a decision by the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to a man and his wife who had a separate income?

Mr. Abbott: I am told I can assure my hon. friend that is not the case.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Medical expenses.

Mr. Fraser: In line 12 I see the words "a twelve months period ending in the taxation year." That would mean a period ending any time during that taxation year?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Fraser: It would not matter as long as it included twelve months?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Fraser: And from that point another twelve-month period would commence?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Fraser: While I am on my feet I should like to ask for a definition of paragraph (c) where I find the words "was totally blind at any time in the year or was, throughout the whole of the year . . ." I should like to know the definition of "totally blind". I ask this question because there are many people who are not what they call totally blind but who still require someone to help them around They have some sight, but very little Whose say-so do you go by?

Are those the people who are registered with the Canadian National Institute for the Blind?

Mr. Abbott: I believe that is the case, but I would have to verify that statement. The deputy minister who is in front of me is not quite sure on that, but he believes it is the one issued by the national institute for the blind. There is some test applied by that institute which is accepted for the purpose of this section.

Mr. Fraser: Then, the taxpayer would have to have a certificate from the national institute for the blind before claiming exemption? I believe there is another blind association, but the department does not accept a certificate from anything but the national institute; am I correct?

Mr. Abbott: I would not be sure, but the department certainly accepts the certificate from the national institute for the blind.

Mr. Fraser: That is the only association from which you do accept it?

Mr. Abbott: I would have to verify that, but I think that is probably correct.

Mr. Fleming: I am sure that the house is glad to see the changes that are being made in connection with the definition of allowable medical expenses. I should like to raise again the two subjects that I have raised several times in previous sessions in connection with this matter of allowable medical expenses.

The first concerns eyeglasses. Parliament has made provision for the allowance of the cost of aids to hearing as a deductible medical expense; that provision has existed for several years. We are now allowing aids to those who are crippled, artificial limbs and wheel chairs. I contend there is no distinction in principle between an aid to hearing and an aid to seeing. Nevertheless, as the law is administered today, the department will allow the cost of an aid to hearing, but will not allow the cost of aids to seeing. It seems to me that is an altogether illogical and unfair stand. The matter has been before the minister, and I would urge that before parliament meets again, he give the subject favourable consideration, and submit amendments which will permit those who have to make outlays for aids to seeing to deduct those as medical expenses.

The other point has to do with the purchase of drugs and medicines. Everyone knows quite well the discrimination which exists against city residents in this respect. When a physician prescribes drugs or medicines, fills the prescription himself and includes the cost of the drug or medicine in his account, the department admits it as a medical expense. If, as is the custom in urban centres, the physician simply writes a prescription which the taxpayer takes to the pharmacist, who fills the prescription, and charges separately for it, regardless of how much the taxpayer may have to spend on the necessary medicines and drugs, he is not permitted to have one cent deducted as medical expenses. Again that seems to me illogical and thoroughly unfair. It seems to me that situation has been allowed to continue quite long enough. I urge the minister to submit amendments at the earliest opportunity at the next session which will eliminate that unfair feature.

Mr. Low: I should like to say a word on subsection 6 of section 11. I am not opposing the section, but a change is being made to provide for those in religious orders, and I should like assurance that it will be applied without any discrimination. I should like assurance that it will be applied carefully enough to ensure that no loopholes are taken advantage of for the purpose of avoiding the tax. In order to secure some information, I should like to ask the minister two questions. What is the definition of the term "religious order"? Perhaps if he will answer that, then I can frame my next question.

Mr. Abbott: I think the definition would be a member of any recognized religious community, if that is a better term, or recognized religious denomination. This section is introduced because of certain special circumstances which have arisen. The committee will recall that the ordinary limitation on making gifts to charity stands at ten per cent of a person's income, but there are certain religious orders who receive no income as such, the members of which have to act as teachers. They are paid because of the fact they are teaching for a public school board. They do not keep these fees themselves, but give them to the order. Provided they are members of these orders or denominations which have, as the term says, taken a vow of perpetual poverty, this section enables them to turn that money over. It applies to a comparatively small group, and there have been some rather hard cases, so it seemed the sensible thing to do.

Mr. Low: In order to illustrate to the minister what I have in mind, I would recall to him the religious order known as the Hutterites. I believe that they pay income taxes. I think I am quite safe in saying that they do pay income tax on the total income of that colony or religious community.

Mr. Abbott: I have to inquire because that is not my department, but I am told that individuals of that particular group pay income taxes on the amount which they are paid for the work which they do.

Mr. Low: In addition, sir, I think you will find that the community itself does pay a lump-sum tax on the total of the community income. I administered that regulation for the Alberta government for some years before you took it over, sir, and I understand that you do the same thing. These Hutterite colonies are now within the definition the minister has given of religious communities or orders. It is for that reason they organize themselves as they do. Every member has taken what amounts to a vow of perpetual poverty, because not one of them draws anything more than his board and bed.

What I want to point out is this. Will the Hutterite colonies have to be told by anybody that, if they just change their procedure a little bit, and at the end of the year apportion to each member of the community his share of the year's increase and then say simply, in accordance with your vows of perpetual poverty, you give it back to the community, they can bring themselves within the provisions of this subsection, and apply for exemption from taxation? I just wanted to point that out to the minister.

One other thing: I believe the minister will find that certain Doukhobor colonies across this country are organized on a similar basis. I believe there are other religious communities, and I know of one in particular, in which the members have gone so far as to take a vow of perpetual poverty. They have concentrated not only all their money, but I believe would even give their life for their religious community. Under such circumstances, they might, by a slight change in their procedure, come within the terms of this section and claim exemption from taxation.

Mr. Abbott: I am glad the hon. member has brought this matter to my attention. In preparing the section, I had not thought of it. I think, perhaps, I shall give some consideration to the circumstances he outlines. If there is any difficulty, no doubt we should make the proper amendment in the language of the section, and I think we can do that in the next budget. In drafting this section, it was intended to provide for certain special cases, but perhaps the language of the section could be made either more general or more restrictive, I do not know which. It was not intended to meet the cases the hon. gentleman mentioned. I have some doubts as to whether it would, but if there is any question—

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Low: My only concern was to make sure that what we were doing would leave no loopholes.

Mr. Abbott: Quite so. I am anxious to accomplish the same result.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I must have a word on this matter, Mr. Chairman. If the minister can do anything in the world to make these Hutterites decent citizens of Canada who will pay their way, I am with him. They are the most useless outfit that was every imported into this country. They are no good to anybody. They grabbed every ranch with some water on it in the province of Alberta. I compliment the province of Alberta and Mr. Manning for spacing them so far apart that they can never get a new colony. I am with you, no matter what you do against these people who never will become citizens of Canada.

Section agreed to.

Sections 12 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

On section 17—Dividend deduction.

Mr. Fraser: This exemption on common and preferred shares does not lose its identity when it goes into an estate or trust, does it? If those are carried by an estate or trust, it does not lose that identity?

Mr. Abbott: No. There are appropriate provisions later in this bill, which is another reason why the bill has to be a little bit longer. When it is carried through a personal corporation, an estate or trust, they get the benefit of the tax credit.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Rate.

Mr. Abbott: I have a technical amendment to make the repeal of section 37 effective. It is a kind of drafting amendment. I will ask one of my colleagues to move it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved:

That the words "Section thirty-six of the Income Tax Act, as enacted by this section," and the commas, appearing in the first and second lines of subclause 2 of clause 18 of Bill 176 be deleted and the words "this section" substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am appealing to the minister that, after all the refusals he has given us, he should now let us have a crumb from the table. I want to read to him quite briefly what he said in his budget speech last March. In announcing the section which it is now sought to repeal, he said this, as reported at page 1798 of Hansard:

At present we have a flat rate of 30 per cent on all corporate profits. I am recommending that this 30 per cent be reduced to 10 per cent on profits up to $10,000 and increased to 33 per cent on profits in excess of $10,000. The house will at once recognize this as tax relief for small businesses and will, I trust, be heartily in accord with the policy.

I think the house was. We in this party had advocated the very same thing and we were naturally in full accord. The minister continued:

Our country as a whole owes a great deal to the small family type of business. They have to struggle along, grow and develop in competition with large and well-financed corporations whose activities may be nation-wide. My own belief is that small businesses should be encouraged and it seems to me that a useful way to do this is to lower the tax and take less out of the funds they need for growth and expansion.

I call your attention to this, Mr. Chairman, the minister continued:

All corporations, regardless of size, will, of course, receive this relief on the first $10,000 of profits but, as I have said, the rate of tax on profits in excess of this figure will be increased by 3 per cent.

Now we have this amendment changing what was then contemplated, what we had welcomed and what I still think was a wise provision. I understand the reason for the change. As always happens, there are certain people trying to take an improper advantage to which they are not entitled; but I am still confident that the minister and his staff can, as I said in the other case, prevent improper advantage being taken of it. I think it will be a most unfortunate thing if this section is watered down to the point where it will be of little value. The provision as now introduced, whereby related companies will be regarded as if they were only one company, and only one of the related companies will have this $10,000 provision, is, I submit, going to destroy the effect of the section. I hope that the minister will be prepared, as I say, to exercise his ingenuity and that of his staff to prevent invasions of it and to preserve this highly beneficial provision which we were just on the point of getting. In other words, I hope that it will not be still-born.

Mr. Abbott: This is a section to which we have been giving a good deal of care and thought. From the very outset we realized that we would have to insert in the act a provision to prevent the splitting up of large companies in order to take advantage of the 10 per cent rate. For instance, a chain store could incorporate all its stores as separate entities and get the benefit.

At the very outset, when I made my budget speech in March, we contemplated that the legislation would contain an appropriate provision with respect to related companies. Possibly the section which is contained in this bill is a bit more rigid than it needs to be; I am not prepared to say that it is and I am not prepared to say that it is not. Over the last two or three months I have received many representations, and some highly constructive ones too, from various taxpayers. Certain suggestions have been made. The principal one was that we should consider those companies which were created prior to the adoption of the act as one group and not apply this rule to them. But that does not commend itself to me, and I am glad to see that the hon. member for Greenwood shakes his head.

It is an important question. It is a new thing; it is a new departure. It has never been tried either here or in any other country before. I finally came to the conclusion that, before I make a definite change, I want more time to consider the possible alternatives. Two or three have been suggested. I have not been able to convince myself that any one of them is the proper one. But the undertaking I would give to the committee is this. Between now and the time we introduce the 1950 budget I will see if we can work out a more satisfactory section. Since 1949 is the first year that the section will operate, there can be no objection to making any amendment which it was decided was desirable apply to the 1949 period. In other words, I should like to leave the question open for another two or three months in order to enable me and my officials to see if we can arrive at some more satisfactory solution, if one can be found. I readily give that undertaking. I have a completely open mind on the matter. I hope we may be able to find an amendment that will give the protection which I think is needed against abuse and yet that will enable the legitimate case to get the benefit of the section.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I make one suggestion to the minister? I rather blush to make it because I have often talked in the house against discretion. But in order to get the benefit of this provision and to give it a fair start and until perhaps a more detailed protection against breach can be found, would not the minister consider using words to indicate that the minister shall have a discretion in those cases in which it is perfectly clear that an invasion of the act is intended? I do not think it would be difficult. It seems to me that no large company would dare to break itself up if it knew it had to face this test. With regard to small companies and new corporations, surely common sense would decide the thing. Where there is actually a separate enterprise that surely is the test.

Surely it is not really a test of shareholding; it is a test really whether there is a separate enterprise which is going to aid production in this country. I think that is what the minister had in mind when he made his speech last March. It seems to me it would be a great pity if his proposal is to be almost still-born by being hedged about in this way. Incidentally I think the section is going to be very difficult to administer. I do suggest to the minister that the loss to the treasury is going to be trivial. How many of these can you imagine taking place in the next few months? If you let your imagination run it could extend perhaps to say only a few hundred. The difference that you would lose as between the 10 per cent and the 33 per cent would be $2,300 a company. So if you had a thousand of them it would only be $2 million. It does seem to me—

Mr. Abbott: What is $2 million?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am using an outside figure. I do not believe there would be a thousand, I do not believe there would be a hundred. I am giving the minister an outside figure to show what I think it is.

Mr. Abbott: I thank my hon. friend. I will give consideration to every possibility here and I hope I shall be able to find a satisfactory solution. A number of suggestions have been made. As I say, I have not been able to convince myself yet that any one of them is the proper one. I have found from experience in these matters that unless you get something that is logical and sound in principle you get yourself into more trouble than you cure. Therefore I hope the committee will accept my assurance that between now and the time we have to look at this act again in the next few months I shall consider every alternative and see if I can improve the section, and of course any improvement will be made effective to the first period to which it applied, namely, the 1949 period.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do want to say one thing more.

Mr. Abbott: I would be against the discretion, I must say.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If the minister can find any other way I would prefer it. I do want to remind him of the very ample assurance which he did give last March.

Mr. Harkness: I am glad to hear the minister say that he is going to give this further consideration. I have had some representations from coal operators in Alberta who believe that this will work considerable hardship on them. There are a number of comparatively small mines there which are subsidiaries of or related to other companies, or the stock is held by another coal mining company. For the most part these small mines in Alberta have had a rather difficult time to keep going as things have been. The application of this section to them is going to make it more difficult. I would hope that the minister would be able to find some formula whereby concerns of that kind which have been in this subsidiary or related position for a considerable period of time would not be penalized as a result of this new legislation.

I quite sympathize with and approve of the fact that there must be some means of preventing a large company from breaking down into small branches in order to escape taxation. But these small companies that have been in this position for a considerable period of time are not the ones to which the minister referred. I do believe that they require some consideration. There is also a precedent for that in the excess profits tax which was imposed during the war. I believe that companies which were also subsidiaries and so forth were in somewhat the same position as I have described. The excess profits tax did not apply to them and their parent company. But if the parent company was broken down it did apply to the whole thing. I think that something along the lines of that precedent might be applied so far as this section is concerned.

Mr. Abbott: I shall study my hon. friend's representations.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I want to ask one question. The minister was very frank, as he always is, and said that he has not made up his mind with respect to the cure of the evil which he has in his mind.

Mr. Abbott: If there is an evil here.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The minister enforces me greatly in what he has just said. If there is an evil, he is going to consider it. Would it not be better, Mr. Chairman, to consider that evil until a couple of months from now and then bring in legislation rather than do what is being done now, namely, bringing in legislation which the minister frankly admits he does not know is proper legislation or not?

Mr. Abbott: No, I do not admit that. This is a new principle, and it is a very sound one, but the detail may be subject to improvement.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that I misunderstood the minister. I must frankly say that it was either my inability to understand or his inability to explain. The thing lies there somewhere

Mr. Abbott: Fifty-fifty perhaps.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The principle that I am trying to enunciate is this. The minister frankly admits that he does not know whether this is the proper remedy for the difficulty. Would it not be better for him to use the great brain that he has and all the assistants that he has, building up to the great epitome of the brains of the country, and leave the thing alone and not legislate about it until he knows what he wants to do? That is his position now.

Mr. Abbott: He knows perfectly well what he wants to do. He wants to have a rate of 10 per cent on the first $10,000 and 33 per cent for the larger companies. In the case of those so-called related companies, numerous subsidiaries, which represent a very small proportion I may say of the total companies who will get the benefit of this legislation, we might be able to evolve a little better rule. I do not say that we will, I am not admitting we will; I may find next spring that this restrictive provision will stay. If I can find that I can properly relax it I will; if I find I cannot, I will not. In the meantime I think the beneficial parts of it should be allowed to stand. I am not admitting for one moment that the law is defective. It is in principle a new departure, something that has never been tried so far as I know in any other country before. We shall proceed to some extent with the process of trial and error and see how it works.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Does the minister not think that the process of experimentation should be more confined than it is now? Leave it to the great brains which the minister has beside him, in front of him, behind him and all around him. He looks like the charge of the light brigade, except that the light brigade knew where it was going and he does not. He is suggesting that he does not know whether he is going to do a great good by taxing these dishonest corporations which are breaking themselves up into small units, or whether it will be more difficult for the honest little fellows who have lived all their lives within the law. It does seem to me that until he has a better answer than that to give to the House of Commons the legislation should not be proceeded with. He speaks about trial and error. I think he will find it more error than trial. Until he has made up his mind about something he should not say to us that he is going to try it on the dog. The dog may be dead by the time we come back next year. That is exactly the position which the minister has taken. Trial and error! I love good phrases. That is a wonderful one. He is hiding behind that at the moment. I think if he would just let his new departure go for a month or two he might be better off and I think the country would as well.

Mr. Abbott: I will just say one more thing. This clause will do exactly what I intend it to do, Mr. Chairman, as it stands. It may do a little more than I intend. If it does I will correct it. If that is the case I will correct it. It will certainly do what I intend it to do, as it stands now.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): It could be confusing to an awful lot of little people.

Mr. Abbott: And it will benefit the little people. It may not benefit people who have five or six or seven companies with a profit of $10,000 or less. But perhaps they cannot be categorized exactly as little people.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I know what your difficulty is; there is no question about it. Some of these big shots are splitting themselves up into splinter companies. It is all right to take care of them, and we will all be with you. But is it not just a little drastic at this moment, for that one reason, to turn on them now? You can make it retroactive if you wish; you have a big enough majority to do it.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 19—Foreign tax deduction.

Mr. Abbott: There is an amendment to move here. This is a technical section which looks rather impressive on paper, but is actually very simple. This amendment is consequential upon the amendment in section 13 of the bill, under which a new procedure is established for the taxation of persons resident in Canada only part of the year. The new rule is of course, as hon. members see, that it is prorated for the time they are in Canada or away from Canada.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That paragraph (b) in subclause one of clause nineteen of Bill 176 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(b) that proportion of the tax for the year otherwise payable

(i) that part of the taxpayer's income

(a) for the year, if section 28 is not applicable, or

(b) if section 28 is applicable, for the period or periods in the year referred to in paragraph (a) thereof, from sources in that country that was not exempt from income tax in that country minus amounts that are deductible for the year or such period or periods, as the case may be, under paragraph (d) of subsection (1) of section 27, is of

(ii) the taxpayer's income

(a) for the year, if section 28 is not applicable, or

(b) if section 28 is applicable, for the period or periods in the year referred to in paragraph (a) thereof minus amounts that are deductible for the year or such period or periods, as the case may be, under section 27."; and that the word "of" in the twelfth line of subclause two of clause nineteen of the bill be deleted and the word "on" substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Is this retroactive? I have a complaint with respect to the year 1947, which accounts are not yet settled, where a person moved to the United States and has paid income tax in that country. He is now being charged for 1947. At the same time he has paid as a resident of the United States, where he is on a pay roll.

Mr. Abbott: I am happy to assure the hon. member that this is not retroactive. It applies to the future, not to the past.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 20—Trusts or estates.

Mr. Fleming: What is the reason for shortening the period for the filing of trustee returns?

Mr. Abbott: There are now two forms, the information return by the estate or the trust, and the tax return. They are to be combined in one form, and the information return and tax return filed at the same time. It is all filed at the time the information return was filed before.

Mr. Fleming: Is there any reason for doing it this way? It will shorten the time for filing the tax return.

Mr. Abbott: I am told that in the new form when anyone has made out his information return it is simply a matter of filling out one more space, and he at once has his tax liability.

Section agreed to.

Sections 21, 22 and 23 agreed to.

On section 24—General.

Mr. Fleming: This again raises the question of imposing a penalty by way of interest on amounts found to be owing when a return is assessed.

Mr. Abbott: No, we are wiping that out.

Mr. Fleming: The department is reducing the period from 20 to 12 months. That is the period after which the return was actually filed. There was some discussion at the resolution stage as to what constitutes the date of assessment. There are actually two forms going out at the present time known as assessments. There is the form brought into use in the present year, which purports to be an assessment of returns filed on or before April 30, 1949. Many people have been misled by that assessment into thinking that that is their final assessment on their 1948 income.

Mr. McCann: If the assessment is correct, it is.

Mr. Fleming: That is only a provisional assessment. Many people were amazed at the rapidity with which assessments followed upon the filing of their returns for the year 1948. Actually, my understanding is that that is not the final assessment. Those returns are open to assessment at any time, quite apart from the long-standing provision in the act in regard to the opening up of an assessment for any reason at the option of the department. Will the minister indicate just how he is going to apply this provision, and how the interest is to be calculated?

Mr. Abbott: Under the old section which is now repealed, and for which this section is substituted, there was a penalty interest rate of one per cent on amounts due after assessment. That penalty of one per cent is eliminated now, and the same rate applies both before and after.

Mr. Fleming: I think the Minister of National Revenue might be able to tell us what progress is being made now in the reduction of the backlog of returns. Statements have been made from time to time indicating that reductions have been made in that large backlog.

The Deputy Chairman: Would there not be another occasion for the hon. member to ask that question?

Mr. Fleming: This would be a most convenient place to do so, when we are dealing with the question of arrears. We have always asked the question at this point. The Minister of National Revenue may be able to tell the committee now what progress has been made in reducing that backlog. I was about to say that the last time this matter was considered in the house the number of returns in arrears was more than 2,000,000, and there was a substantial number more than five years in arrears.

Mr. McCann: Very substantial progress has been made with the backlog. By the end of the current fiscal year, that is by the end of March, all assessments for previous years will have been made, and the taxation division will then be on a current basis.

Section agreed to.

Section 25 agreed to.

On section 26—Municipal or provincial corporations.

Mr. Abbott: I have an amendment to this section. Perhaps we had better call it eleven o'clock.

Section stands.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Fourth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Winkler.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will take up first Bill No. 221, an act to amend the Customs Tariff. Then we will continue with Bill No. 176, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and the Income War Tax Act. When these two bills have been passed, we will move to go into supply and take up the estimates of the departments of fisheries, national revenue, transport, health and welfare, reconstruction and supply, post office, and mines and resources. We will begin with fisheries and then continue with national revenue. Later tomorrow I will tell the house as to the order of the others. I am not sure what ministers will be available.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I did not hear you say justice.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, I did not mention justice.

Mr. Casselman: You might as well throw it in.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

RENT CONTROL—FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE WITH PREMIERS OF PROVINCES

Saskatchewan
PREMIER'S OFFICE

Regina, November 29, 1949

Hon. Douglas C. Abbott,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Abbott:

Re rent control

Thank you for your letter of the twenty-third instant stating that the federal government is willing to amend orders 813 and 814, which provide for the recent rent increases, so that they will be inoperative in Saskatchewan. The Saskatchewan government is pleased to know that the federal government is prepared to co-operate with us to this extent. However, you will remember that our proposals were contingent on adequate assurance being received that our legislation will not be declared invalid by the Supreme Court of Canada. You stated, "I am advised that there is no reasonable doubt regarding this point and that a reference to the supreme court is unnecessary."

With due respect, as there is a difference of opinion as to reasonable doubt, we would again request that the question be submitted to the supreme court for a ruling. This point should be made absolutely clear in order to safeguard the interests of both the landlord and tenant. As the question of jurisdiction is already being referred to the supreme court, there seems little reason why a second reference should not be made.

If it is decided by the supreme court that the federal government has jurisdiction at the present time, it does not necessarily follow that by rescinding your power in regard to one province, the legislation that province enacts will be valid.

Frankly, my government cannot understand your reluctance to obtain a ruling. No constitutional lawyer can be certain on a point of this kind, which has never received judicial consideration. Landlords and tenants are entitled to every reasonable guarantee that can be given them that any provincial legislation that is passed will be valid. You are in a position to get that guarantee for them without much extra work or extra cost.

Again, with respect, in spite of your decided opinion that our legislation will be jurisdictionally valid, we must remind you of the fact that your law officers were of the opinion that the federal government has jurisdiction in the rent control field at the present time. This opinion did not, however, preclude you from making a reference of the question to the supreme court. At the time of that reference you stated:

> "May I say at this point that the advice which the government receives from its law officers is that the existing federal regulations with respect to rent control are valid. But in a matter which concerns the welfare of so many Canadians, the government would not be discharging its responsibility to the people of Canada as it should if it did not take every precaution. It is possible that the courts would decide that our regulations are unconstitutional. We cannot disregard that possibility".

There you have stated your case frankly and, we think, correctly. You will note that that is also our position. The government of Saskatchewan asks that on behalf of the welfare of the people of this province the "possibility" of a ruling by the supreme court contrary to you and your law officers' decided opinion cannot be disregarded.

With these doubts in mind, we therefore request that a second such reference be made to the supreme court. If your advisers are so certain of the outcome, the reference should be expeditiously dealt with.

Yours sincerely,

T. C. Douglas

Province of Manitoba
OFFICE OF THE PREMIER

Winnipeg, November 29, 1949

Hon. D. C. Abbott, K.C.,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Abbott:

Re rental control

I acknowledge with thanks receipt of your letter of November 9, drawing to our attention the statement on the federal government's policy respecting rent controls which you made to the House of Commons on November 3.

In view of the possibility, as pointed out in your letter, that a supreme court decision may disallow the present controls, my government is of the opinion that at this time they should become sufficiently well informed on all phases of the matter that they would be in a position to deal adequately with any situations which may arise.

In order to do this we should secure a proper understanding of all the successive stages through which rental controls have passed. We must at the same time be certain that we have a proper understanding of the situation as it exists today, and the practical effect that the implementation of the latest orders will have on the problem.

In this consideration specific points have arisen on which we would find information from your department most helpful. For example:

(1) What proportion of all rented units in (a) Winnipeg and (b) Manitoba, are still under control?

(2) What facts and factors formed the basis for the government's decision that an increase in rents was justifiable?

(3) What was the basis used in arriving at the maximum percentage of increase allowed, as set out in the recent order which you announced November 3, 1949?

(4) In respect of the situation in Manitoba compared with other provinces, to what extent has the movement of rents in Manitoba kept pace with this movement in other provinces, and what is the relative present pressure on rent ceilings likely to be reflected in further rent increases when the new orders go into effect?

Any information with which you may be able to supply us in regard to these and other points having to do with the rental situation generally will be greatly appreciated.

Yours very truly,

Douglas Campbell

MINISTER OF FINANCE
Canada

Ottawa, December 2, 1949

Hon. Douglas Campbell,
Premier of Manitoba,
Winnipeg, Manitoba.

My dear Premier:

I wish to acknowledge and thank you for your letter of November 29, which arrived in my office yesterday.

I shall endeavour to obtain as soon as possible the information you have requested, although it may be that the statistics relating to the first and fourth numbered questions in your letter may not be fully available.

Yours sincerely,

D. C. Abbott

MINISTER OF FINANCE
Canada

Ottawa, December 2, 1949

Hon. T. C. Douglas,
Premier of Saskatchewan,
Regina, Saskatchewan.

My dear Premier:

Thank you for your letter of November 29, which I received a day or so ago.

As stated in my letter to you of November 23, the federal government agreed to suspend the recent changes in the rentals regulations as they apply in Saskatchewan, only on the condition that the Saskatchewan government gave a firm undertaking that it intended to introduce its own legislation not later than April 1, 1950, and requested the federal government to withdraw its rental regulations as from the same date.

The purpose of this arrangement was to create a position similar to what it would have been had your province acted at an earlier date and been ready to put its legislation into effect now. Otherwise, of course, we should not be justified in imposing more regid restrictions on home owners in Saskatchewan than we believe is proper and right in Canada generally, having in mind the purpose for which rental controls were imposed and the fact that virtually all other wartime controls have been removed. The entire arrangement depends upon your willingness to accept responsibility for the withdrawal of federal controls in Saskatchewan as from April 1, 1950. We cannot advise you as to the wisdom of such a step. Our position is simply that we are willing to withdraw the federal regulations in Saskatchewan so that there can then be no conflict between federal and provincial laws.

My colleagues and I have been giving further consideration to your request that another question be referred to the supreme court, relating to the validity of provincial legislation that may be operative after the federal government has removed its rentals regulations in that province. As you may have noticed from the press, our counsel notified the chief justice of the supreme court that it was possible that the reference might be amended as a result of correspondence that was taking place between the government of Canada and the government of Saskatchewan.

After a most careful review we are confirmed in our opinion that it is both unnecessary and undesirable to refer such a question to the supreme court. The validity of existing federal rent controls has been challenged in the courts, and we believe that we have a responsibility to the people of Canada to put the matter to a conclusive test with the least possible delay. Another question bearing on the validity of provincial legislation might confuse the main issue, would certainly not be a move calculated to help in bringing down an early decision, and might indeed defeat the whole purpose of making the reference at this time.

Moreover, there is no provincial legislation to refer to the courts. All that can be asked is a hypothetical question regarding the powers of the provinces to legislate with respect to tenant-landlord relationships, which no one has challenged even in wartime. The federal controls have been superimposed on provincial law. They have never occupied the field in the sense that they were the exclusive law relating to landlord and tenant. Hence when the federal regulations are withdrawn in any province the provincial law is the only law in that province relating to landlord and tenant.

I should perhaps add that when parliament is asked to extend the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, we would be prepared to recommend the inclusion of a provision that the rentals regulations shall not apply in Saskatchewan after March 31, 1950, so that the federal government will not have the power to pass any subsequent orders under that legislation affecting rentals in Saskatchewan, thus making it impossible for the federal authorities to occupy any part of the field.

The reason I suggested December 1 as the date by which we wished to have your reply was that the notices required under orders 813 and 814 of the wartime prices and trade board will be available in all parts of Canada within the next few days, and we wished to avoid distributing these notices in Saskatchewan if, in fact, they were not to be used. At any time up to the effective date of orders 813 and 814, namely December 15, 1949, we shall, however, be prepared to amend our regulations so as to suspend the operation of orders 813 and 814 in Saskatchewan, provided that you accept the responsibility for future rent control in Saskatchewan by requesting that the regulations in their entirety as they apply to Saskatchewan be revoked after March 31, 1950.

Unless such a request is received before December 15, the orders referred to will go into effect in Saskatchewan as elsewhere in Canada.

Yours sincerely,

Hon. D. C. Abbott,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa

Your letter dated November 24 re the federal rent control was delivered to my office on Saturday and reached me yesterday. It will be submitted to the members of the executive council of the province at our first meeting Wednesday of this week. An appropriate decision will be taken as soon as possible. I have asked for a copy of every federal order in council concerning this important matter, but you sent me only the one mentioned in the booklet entitled "Codification Administrative, May 1949". We consider these federal orders in council essential. Will you be kind enough to send me, the sooner the better, a copy of said orders in council. Personal regards.

Ottawa, November 29, 1949

Hon. Maurice Duplessis,
Premier of Quebec,
Quebec, P.Q.

I have your telegram of November 29 re rent control. The wartime leasehold regulations P.C.

Appendix

9029 appearing on page 15 and following of Codification Administrative which I forwarded to you on the 24th of November is the only order in council of the federal government now in effect upon the subject of rent control. The preamble to P.C. 9029 gives a list of the orders in council made from time to time, but these are now revoked and replaced by P.C. 9029. The orders of the wartime prices and trade board and of the rentals administrator which I forwarded to you at the same time are the only orders of the board or its administrator upon the subject of rental control which have general application. Personal regards.

D. C. Abbott

Province of Quebec

Quebec, November 30, 1949

Hon. D. C. Abbott,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

Mr. Minister of Finance:

I received today your answer by wire to the telegram which I sent you yesterday and in which I informed you that I had not received the federal orders in council relating to federal rental control.

We have noted your telegram to the effect that there is at present in this matter only one federal order in council in force, namely No. 9029 dated November 21, 1941.

These two telegrams and your letter dated November 24, delivered at my office Saturday the 26th and communicated to me Monday the 28th, were submitted to my colleagues of the executive council at a first meeting, held today.

You said you would comment on only one or two of the many points raised in the letter I had written to you recently. You state that the federal government's offer respecting rent control was unconditional and without any qualification whatever. Then you added: "I therefore find it difficult to understand the statement in your letter of November 16, 1949".

Apparently my statement was misunderstood. However, the facts show that it was correct.

On October 23, 1948 you wrote to me this:

"The constitutionality of continuing federal rent control has already been questioned and is now before the courts."

And you added:

"The federal government does not wish to do anything to prevent any province from making provisions to deal with the situation that would arise should continuing federal rent control be held invalid."

I have underlined the word "should" to stress the conditional character of your proposal.

Then, in your letter of November 9 you say:

"The government has therefore decided to refer the question of the validity of the rental regulations to the supreme court, in the hope and expectation that a decision will be given before the present legislation expires. As I have said, the law officers of the crown are of opinion that the rentals regulations are valid. They are also of opinion that both the law and the facts support the view that it lies within the authority of parliament to extend these regulations for a further period. Counsel will be instructed by the Attorney General of Canada to press this view before the court."

It is clear that the federal authorities continue to claim a right to set up federal rental control, and this attitude of theirs constitutes an obstacle to the full exercise of the rights of the provinces in the matter.

Brilliant lawyer that you are, you should not be unaware that it is contrary to sound tradition and to the best precedents to anticipate a judgment of the court to which the question has been referred. Nevertheless, eight years after entering a field which we consider exclusively provincial, you refer to the supreme court the question of the constitutionality of your rental control and at the same time you anticipate the decision of the supreme court, thus complicating the matter still further.

You pretend to offer the provinces the power to set up rent control. Therefore you persist in asserting that you possess such a right, and you place the province in the position of acknowledging a right of which we do not recognize the validity.

You will admit that the existence of two controls, one federal and one provincial, would be likely to aggravate the problem and, if possible, to increase its harmful consequences. This is indeed what would happen should Ottawa persist in its attitude, and if we did set up provincial control in the present circumstances.

For the past few years, as the federal authorities well know, and as you admitted in your letter of October 23, 1948, as well as in your previous letters, the constitutionality of federal rent control has been seriously questioned; nevertheless you continue to exercise powers which complicate the situation gravely while stating your desire to have the question of constitutionality decided by the supreme court.

The fact that you persist in claiming that rent control is a federal matter and that you have decided to maintain this viewpoint before the supreme court; the fact that you state in your letter that the federal government's law officers are of opinion that your rent control is constitutional—all that produces a situation which has to be taken into account and raises further and grave problems which do not tend to facilitate the settlement to be desired, and which we desire, of the difficulties caused and intensified by federal organizations.

It is easy to foresee the deplorable and complicated situation which would result from provincial control when the federal government continues to lay claim to the rights in question and asks the supreme court to sanction them.

It seems to us that the federal authority should not have constantly done and continue to do things of which the constitutionality is seriously questioned and is being submitted to the decision of the courts.

In claiming, as it does, the right to set up and to maintain rent control, the federal government asserts the right to set up at any time a federal control in opposition to provincial control.

The unfortunate victims of the federal decisions in this matter already have enough to complain of without their troubles and annoyances being aggravated by complications raised by the existence of both federal and provincial control.

You cite the example of the Saskatchewan government, which is apparently ready to set up provincial rental control. That is a matter which concerns the government of Saskatchewan. We have a clear mandate to administer the affairs of the province of Quebec, not of the province of Saskatchewan. Moreover, conditions vary from province to province and, that is one of the reasons why the rights of the provinces in this matter should have been respected at all times.

In short, we reaffirm that far from offering to the province the full exercise of its rights in this field, the federal government continues to render the full exercise thereof practically impossible.

We respectfully suggest to the federal government that it should modify its attitude and make it consistent with the rights of the provinces and with the rights of the people concerned. By removing, as you could easily do, the further and grave difficulties which you have added to the difficulties inherent in the problem, you would help solve the question rather than make it more complicated and more difficult. As to the present government of the province of Quebec, it is always ready to assume its responsibilities, but it desires that the federal government assume its own without any further delay.

Yours sincerely,

M. L. Duplessis

MINISTER OF FINANCE

Ottawa, December 2, 1949

Hon. M. L. Duplessis,
Premier of Quebec,
Quebec, P.Q.

My dear Premier:

This will acknowledge and thank you for your letter of November 30, which I have read with great interest. I assume from this letter that it is not the intention of the government of Quebec to assume responsibility for the control of rentals at the present time.

Kindest personal regards.

Yours sincerely,

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, December 6, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—TRIBUTE TO WORK OF ARMY PERSONNEL

Mr. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words on a question of privilege. Hon. members will have read in the newspapers of the extensive floods in British Columbia last week, mainly in my riding in the districts of West and North Vancouver. Now that these floods have more or less subsided I know those people would want me to express in parliament their appreciation of the great work which was done by the army, both reserve and permanent forces, in British Columbia at that time. The 6th field company of the reserve army responded immediately, and were soon followed by the engineers from the permanent force camp at Chilliwack, who built three Bailey bridges and restored communications. As at the time of the Fraser valley floods, the people of British Columbia again are appreciative of the great value of such a body of trained and skilled men in a time of local disaster.

INTERNATIONAL LIVESTOCK SHOW

WINNING OF CHAMPIONSHIPS BY CANADIANS

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Saturday's issue of the London Free Press carried the story of the winning of championships in the sheep classes by Charles J. Shore, a neighbour of mine at Glanworth, in Middlesex county. Two Holstein breeders, Archie Rath and R. M. Berry, also from the county of Middlesex, have set world records in milk production; and fifty-six other Canadians won top honours at the show in Chicago. These men have brought great honour to Canada and to the areas in which they reside.

POTATOES

REFERENCE TO PRODUCTION IN FORT WILLIAM DISTRICT

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce to the house and to all prospective potato growers that a farmer in the Fort William district raised 733 bushels of potatoes to the acre. So we have more than bush and rock in Fort William.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1949-50

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting further supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1950, was presented by Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

URANIUM

REPORTED SHIPMENTS FROM CANADA TO SOVIET RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Press dispatches indicate that a statement has been made before an investigating committee in the United States to the effect that Canada had supplied uranium to the Soviet. Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs in a position to make a statement with respect to these dispatches?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have seen these somewhat sensational stories from which equally sensational and, I am sure, unfounded implications have been drawn in certain quarters. The matters with which these stories deal are more particularly the concern and within the knowledge of my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who dealt with them during the war when the incident is supposed to have occurred. I would prefer to say nothing more now; I shall consult the Minister of Trade and Commerce on his return tomorrow, and possibly a statement could be made at that time.

[Later:]

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Two years ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce undertook to table the investigator's report in the Eldorado investigation. I would suggest that that be brought to the minister's attention, with a view to having it tabled because of its particular interest at the moment, having regard to the evidence that is being given in Washington.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE WITH BRITAIN

QUESTION AS TO FUTURE MARKET FOR CANADIAN WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): In view of the optimistic report to parliament given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to our trade, and in view of the statement of the Minister of Agriculture at a board of trade banquet in Brantford yesterday, as reported this morning in the Globe and Mail, does the Minister of Trade and Commerce agree that an attempt is being made to drive Canadian wheat from the British market, and that upon the termination of our present contracts the British market will be lost?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I suggest to the hon. gentleman that he read the Canadian Press report in the Citizen instead of the one in the Globe and Mail. The former is more nearly correct.

Mr. Wright: I have seen the statement in the Citizen, and it checks closely with the one in the Globe and Mail. Did the Minister of Agriculture clear his speech with the Minister of Trade and Commerce before he made it?

Mr. Gardiner: I suggest to my hon. friend that he read both reports again, because they do not check even closely. I read both of them this morning, and you would not think they were from the same reporter at all; but I happen to know they are, because I handed him the document.

QUESTION AS TO BRITISH PREFERENTIAL TARIFF

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Does the speech of the Minister of Agriculture represent government policy, in view of what preferential trade with Britain has meant to the people of this country?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I do not know what speech of the Minister of Agriculture the hon. member for Broadview is referring to.

STEAMSHIP SERVICES

INQUIRY AS TO OPERATION OF CAR FERRY BETWEEN YARMOUTH, N.S., AND THE STATE OF MAINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. H. Hatfield (Victoria-Carleton): Will the Minister of Transport state whether Canadian National Railways or the federal government is considering the inauguration of a car ferry service between Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and Rockland, Maine, or Boston?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): This matter has been under active consideration by the government, and a statement will be made in the course of the next few days. I believe I should say that the decision is in favour of the operation of a car ferry from Yarmouth, in the province of Nova Scotia, to a point in the state of Maine.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO USED OR SECOND-HAND MOTOR VEHICLES AND AIRCRAFT

Hon. J. J. McCann (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 221, an act to amend the Customs Tariff.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Schedule C amended.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to ask why it is not possible to enumerate the particular classes to which the amendment is applied, instead of putting it in the form in which we have it in tariff items 1215 and 1216, namely, an exemption from the provisions of these items by regulation of the governor in council in any particular case or class of cases.

The explanatory note gives a number of examples to which the proposed amendment is intended to apply, such as automobiles acquired by Canadians returning to Canada, and so forth. If this purports to be a complete enumeration of the classes of cases to which it is intended the amendment shall apply, why could we not have the classes set out in items 1215 and 1216 instead of clothing the governor in council with the power to make exemptions?

Mr. McCann: There is no great uniformity in the cases that will come up for consideration with reference to import into Canada of used cars or used aircraft. There are now 170 applications before the customs department, including 129 passenger cars, 24 trucks, 4 buses, a motorcycle and an ambulance. The reasons for the applications are many and varied. Some of them might be called distress cases, others compassionate cases, still others are for business reasons.

The applications as to 48 of the cars and trucks indicate that they were for gifts to Canadians from friends or relatives in the United States. Thirty-eight were from relatives, and of these, thirty-five were from immediate relatives—that is, father, mother, brother, son or daughter. Gifts of used cars by friends totalled 10; of these, three were donations to religious workers in Canada—gifts from religious groups or orders to Canadian evangelistic or religious orders, the parent body of which was in the United States.

There are also a number of cases of gifts from immediate relatives where the prohibition is particularly harsh. For instance, an American girl whose health has been poor married a Canadian. Her father wishes to give her one of the two family cars to facilitate her transportation and that of her family. Another case concerns a brother whose sister and her husband operate a small store. The brother is a successful businessman in the United States, and he wishes to donate a small truck.

A number of cases which should receive favourable consideration have to do with students. Twenty-three of the applications were from students who are taking post-graduate or specialized courses, and who resided in a foreign country for one to three years. Several of them were operating on D.V.A. subsidies, and they wish to have the car to save travelling expenses in moving their families, and to keep it for use in Canada.

Some real cases of hardship were created by the prohibition. The department's only alternative was to permit temporary entry into Canada which would be on a six months' permit. This meant that at the end of that time the car had to be exported and sold, causing great inconvenience and financial loss.

With regard to workers, nineteen workers who had obtained employment in the United States bought cars to transport them back and forth to work. They wished to bring them into Canada for reasons similar to those given by the students. The difference between these two classes is largely in the length of time the person was in the foreign country, the student being bound to at least one year, while the worker may stay for a period of only one month.

There is also the problem of tourists. Eight Canadian tourists who had acquired cars while visiting other countries wish to bring the cars back with them. The practice of buying a car in England for the purpose of touring the United Kingdom and Europe has been growing, and will probably become a greater attraction because of the devaluation of the pound. A problem arises when a Canadian purchases a car abroad and returns to Canada the next year. Such a car, having been manufactured prior to the year of importation, is therefore prohibited entry.

I could go on and enumerate many cases of distress. Take the matter of school busses. Every hon. member knows that the consolidation of schools necessitates the use of busses in a large number of rural areas. Some of these communities are not in a financial position to purchase new busses, but they can get used busses in the United States at a reasonable price, and thus give service to the community and to the school section at considerably less cost.

With reference to the importation of used aircraft and cars, it should be understood that the normal rate of duty still applies, and an appraisal value is put upon the used vehicle by the appraisers of the customs department.

One cannot set up a standard or uniform basis on which these vehicles will be allowed entry into this country; the cases must be considered on their individual merits. It is for this reason that we ask the house to give the minister and his officials the power to make application to the governor in council to permit entry of such vehicles in particular cases.

Mr. Fleming: Undoubtedly the minister has made out a case for entry of the vehicles of the kinds he has mentioned and in the circumstances to which he has referred. The concern of the committee must be with the way in which it is proposed to meet the situation, namely, by giving power to the governor in council to promulgate regulations in particular cases or classes of cases. From the concluding remarks of the minister I gather that the department has given consideration to the possibility of enumerating the classes of cases in items 1215 and 1216, and has found it impossible to make an effective or exhaustive enumeration. This leads one to the conclusion that most of the cases are to be handled by individual orders in council rather than by regulations applying to classes of cases. To the end that there may be some measure of parliamentary control, I think we should ask the minister whether reports will be made to the house on the cases in which the power conferred by this bill is exercised.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member will recall that the government has undertaken to file summaries of all the orders in council. That undertaking was accompanied by the statement that after the summary was filed, if more of these orders were requested, they would be tabled. Therefore in the statements tabled from time to time there will be a summary of all the orders in council, including such as may be passed under this act. If any of these are requested, they can be tabled.

Mr. Fleming: I thank the Prime Minister for his explanation. Will the regulations promulgated under this legislation be segregated in such a way that they can be identified in the list of the orders in council the Prime Minister may be submitting to the house?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes. In the summary there is an indication of what the order refers to.

Mr. McCann: During the war years this provision was in effect under the War Measures Act. When the War Measures Act lapsed, we no longer had the authority. Since then there have been so many requests with respect to cases to be dealt with that it was thought advisable to give that authority again to the governor in council.

Mr. Fraser: Where citizens of the United States have tourist camps or summer businesses in Canada, most of them come in with their cars under tourist's permit; but I understand that if they bring a car, a station wagon or a truck, they cannot use it in connection with their business in Canada. If they use the vehicle for the purpose of trucking supplies or transporting passengers or guests from the station to their hotel, then they are supposed to pay duty on it. Very few of the tourist camp owners or others who come to Canada and do business here in the summer understand that. The Minister of National Revenue should have indicated on the permit that a car so brought in must not be used for business purposes in Canada—the tourist business, hotel business or otherwise. People who come to Canada under these circumstances have the idea that they can keep the car here for six months; they do not know that it can be seized at any time by the minister's department. Something should be done to inform all those who come in under these circumstances that they may not bring these vehicles in and use them for business purposes.

Mr. McCann: We will take the matter into consideration. I can assure the hon. member that our enforcement officers check up fairly well on United States cars that are in here on permit, in order to see to it that they are not in business in competition with our own citizens engaged in trucking or carrying passengers. Such vehicles are admitted under permit for six months, for the personal use only of the owner. If he wants to bring it in when this legislation comes into effect he will have to pay the duty on it, and then he can do what business he likes with it.

Mr. Fraser: Not only in my own riding but in others across Canada I could name at least fifty American tourist resort operators, both men and women, who brought cars in and used them in that way and do not know that their cars could be seized. I have had letters from them.

Mr. Cruickshank: Tell them not to do it again.

Mr. Fraser: I believe the hon. member for Fraser Valley himself does not know the regulations.

Mr. Church: I am afraid that items 1215 and 1216 are going to have a most serious effect. The minister may shake his head, but they are going to have an injurious effect on Canadian industry. What are you getting in exchange for these concessions? You are going to repeal two items in the Customs Tariff, and substitute for them items 1215 and 1216. What will be the effect? We used to have a large trade in automobiles with Australia, New Zealand and other places. At the present time trade and commerce and industry are not getting as many orders, with the result that a large number of people are out of work. In this country we used to have what is called preferential trade with Britain and the dominions. We had trade with the old country on these items. Now you have lost your best customer in many products to which I will not refer today.

This provision applies to used or second-hand automobiles and motor vehicles of all kinds manufactured prior to the calendar year in which importation into Canada is sought to be made. Then there is reference to automobiles given to religious institutions or clergy engaged in religious or welfare work; trucks and aircraft imported as part of the equipment of United States firms engaged in exploratory or development work in the Alberta oil fields. Something might be said in favour of that, but this type of aircraft is not available in Canada for use in prospecting or in the transportation of supplies to remote areas. I fail to see how it is going to aid Canadian industry, because if there ever was a time when the small wholesale or retail man and the small manufacturer wanted help it is now, when taxation is at the peak. We used to spend $36 million on the whole civil government; now we are spending almost that much a day. We have got away up in the clouds—in the billions. I fail to see how this is going to help the manufacturer, small or large, who goes in for this type of work. If you ask me, it is going to have a very serious effect on industry generally throughout Canada.

Mr. McCann: As a competitive factor with Canadian industry, either in the automobile or in the aircraft business, the effect will be practically negligible. We have had no protests from either the automobile industry or the aircraft industry against this type of legislation.

Section agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. McCann (for Mr. Abbott) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

INCOME TAX

INCOME TAX ACT AND INCOME WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENTS

The house resumed, from Monday, December 5, consideration in committee of Bill No. 176, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Income War Tax Act—Mr. Abbott —Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 7—Depreciation.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, if I may, I should like to revert to section 7, on which we had a long and interesting discussion yesterday evening, and which contains certain statutory provisions relating to the proposed new system of depreciation allowance. I want to refer particularly to that portion of the debate which related to the agricultural taxpayer, the farmer, who is taking depreciation on his machinery, equipment and other assets on the former basis. A great many hon. members spoke, some of them farmers, others representing farming constituencies. I think the unanimous view expressed was one of some apprehension that this new basis would not be as advantageous to the farmers as the old basis. I may say without any hesitation that I do not share that view; but curiously enough the representations made in the committee yesterday evening were the first which we have received concerning that particular group in the community. There has been a good deal of discussion with the accountants association, with industry, and so on. Representations have been made, but so far as I am aware, and so far as my officials are aware, no spokesman for the agricultural community has come forward to discuss or to criticize the proposed new basis. That is perhaps owing to the fact that it was not fully appreciated or fully understood; but be that as it may, I am not criticizing anyone for failing to do so; I am simply stating it as a fact.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That shows what parliament can do.

Mr. Abbott: This bill has been before the house and available to hon. members for some three weeks, and the announcement has been before the public for some six months. I find that in most other groups, long before parliament attempts to discuss any proposed measure the people who are interested come to the department for information, or put in briefs, or make suggestions as to changes which should be made. It greatly facilitates the work of parliament if they do that sort of thing. I am not criticizing anyone for failing to do it. I am simply stating as a fact that the only representations that were made that this new system would adversely affect the farming group were made in the committee last night. I do not believe that it will. I think that when the farming community understand the basis on which it operates; when they understand that if they overdepreciate, it must be put back, but that, conversely, if they underdepreciate they can get the benefit of the law as a result of underdepreciation, they will come to the conclusion that the new system is better than the old one.

Be that as it may, there is no desire to force the system on the farming community. I can see that it might be difficult for farmers who have not complete records to keep track of the diminishing value, the diminishing balance basis; but bigger farmers would have no difficulty at all. Perhaps the smaller ones who keep their books less carefully would have some difficulty, and, having become accustomed to the straight-line basis, would prefer to keep it. I am not prepared to accept the view that the farmer as such is any more obtuse than any other member of the community; but in any event so far as the department is concerned there is no objection to the farming community continuing for the time being to operate their depreciation on the straight-line basis. It may be that after they have seen how it works for others they will prefer to have a new basis. Be that as it may, I have no objection to farmers and fishermen, who are both given special treatment under the act, as the committee knows, by being allowed to average over five years, continuing to depreciate on the same basis as that which has been followed in the past. To this end I have a simple amendment to section 7 which provides that subsection 1, which relates to the so-called recapture provision, shall not apply to farmers and fishermen. Under the regulations the basis for depreciation in the case of farmers will be the base period, as in the past, namely, the straight-line basis.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That section 20, appearing in subclause 1 of clause 7 of Bill 176, be amended by adding the following thereto:

"(6) Subsection (1) does not apply in determining income from farming or fishing."

Mr. Wright: I have just one comment to make on the minister's statement. I think that farm organizations should have been consulted, and should now be consulted with respect to this. From a reading of the bill it is difficult to determine the effect that it will have in particular cases. Unless the matter is studied further I suggest that the minister consult with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and other farm organizations with respect to these amendments.

Mr. Abbott: I would be happy to consult with the federation of agriculture, as with any other organized group or individual. In the past I have found that I do not usually have to seek them out when they are as well organized as the federation of agriculture. For instance, in normal matters they seek me out rather than my having to go and look for them. I suggest it is perhaps adding unduly to the responsibilities of the Minister of Finance that he should have to go about the country submitting proposed legislation to separate groups. I believe he has discharged his duty when he gives reasonable notice of it, and invites, as he always does, representations from interested parties. I should be happy to discuss this matter with any group that is interested.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): During the last eight or ten years there has been quite a lot of criticism about the write-off of engines for fishermen's boats. The engines that are being largely used today in fishing boats are converted automobile engines, the life of which in many instances would be two years, sometimes less. I have had complaints from fishermen that before they can write off the cost of the first engine, they would perhaps be using a third one. Does the regulation take care of that situation?

Mr. Abbott: The new one would, but I do not believe the old one does.

Section 7 as amended agreed to.

On section 26—Municipal or provincial corporations.

Mr. Abbott: I have another technical amendment to this section.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That subclause 3 of clause 26 of Bill 176 be amended by deleting the word "deriving" in the fourth line thereof and substituting therefor the words "substantially all of which derived"; and that the following subclause be added to the said clause 26;

"(5) In determining whether the income in the years 1947 and 1948 of a corporation or association incorporated or organized as a credit union or co-operative society is not liable to taxation by virtue of paragraph (q) of subsection 1 of section 4 of the Income War Tax Act, that paragraph shall be construed as if it were enacted in the same form as paragraph (i) of subsection 1 of section 57 of the Income Tax Act."

On section 30—Dividends declared.

Mr. Abbott: I have an amendment to this section, to correct a typographical error.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move that section 30 of the bill be amended as follows:

That the figure "1949" in the eighth line of subsection 2 of section 30 of Bill 176 be deleted and that the figure "1950" be substituted therefor.

Section 31 agreed to.

On section 32—Nonresident-owned investment corporation.

Mr. Fleming: Representations have been made by the Toronto board of trade in connection with subsection 3 which deals with nonresident owned investment corporations The board states:

The board has interpreted the provisions of the Income War Tax Act as extending the dividend exemption of section 4(n) to nonresident-owned investment corporations. The proposed legislation appears to be a retroactive change denying the exemption referred to. The board has on many occasions urged that retroactive tax legislation be not resorted to, and again points out that in the opinion of the board this is a highly undesirable practice and should be avoided.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend knows, this section relates to a relatively small number of companies owned by nonresidents who have investments in Canada. In 1946 they were given a special basis of tax treatment. They are taxed on the earnings of the company, not at the full corporation rate but at a special rate. Prior to 1946 it used to be 22½ per cent, with a deduction of 7½ per cent on income received from dividends on Canadian taxpaying corporations. In 1946 that technical difference was eliminated and the straight rate was made 15 per cent. However by inadvertence the provision of the corresponding tax credit section was not amended. If this section were not put in, the nonresident would in fact be getting a tax credit to which he was not entitled, which has never been allowed by the department, and for which I do not think there is any justification, in equity or otherwise.

Technically it is true that the effect of this section is to take the amendment back to 1946 when the change from 22½ per cent to 15 per cent was made, as I have indicated. I do not think any real objection can be taken to it.

Mr. Fleming: Would there be any serious loss if the section were made effective from the date of the minister's budgetary pronouncement? This would obviate any suggestion of unfairness resulting from the retroactivity of taxing legislation.

Mr. Abbott: I do not think so. I have before me the text of the resolution introduced in April 1946, which states:

That the special rates provided for nonresident-owned investment corporations be reduced for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years from 22½ per cent to 15 per cent, but that such corporations be taxable on all income received in Canada subject to deductions from the said income in respect of interest and dividends received from other such corporations and foreign taxes paid by the corporation.

In other words, the rate having been reduced from 22½ per cent to 15 per cent, there should not have been and there was never intended to be a tax credit to offset that 7½ per cent. The old system was 22½ per cent and a tax credit of 7½ per cent, coming from a certain type of investment. Having consolidated the two and taken the straight 15 per cent rate, as indicated in the resolution, the tax credit was to be eliminated. Through some oversight the tax credit section was not amended. But no nonresident-owned investment corporation has ever asserted that it should in fairness get the tax credit. They have never been allowed it. This is simply to cover the oversight in the drafting of the law. There is no justifiable claim for this tax credit.

Mr. Fleming: How many taxpayers are there within this group?

Mr. Abbott: The number has been substantially reduced in recent years. When I was in practice I formed a number of these companies, but since the change in the taxing law in the United States and elsewhere the number of the companies has been reduced. I have not any up-to-date figure.

Sections 33 to 44 inclusive agreed to.

On section 45—"Corporation" and "corporation incorporated in Canada".

Mr. Abbott: I have a technical amendment here.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That subclause 2 of clause 45 of Bill 176 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) Paragraph (j) of the said subsection 1 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'(j) "dividend" includes stock dividend except where the stock dividend has been declared by a nonresident corporation, more than 50 per cent of the share capital of which (having full voting rights under all circumstances) belongs to nonresident persons';"

Mr. Fleming: Is there nothing more involved in this amendment than the elimination from paragraph (j) of subsection 1, and combining with the opening words in paragraph (j) the words now appearing in clause (j) (ii)?

Mr. Abbott: That is right. It is consequential upon a change made in section 3.

Mr. Fleming: I wish the minister would change the expression "corporation director" so that it would read "director of a corporation".

Mr. Abbott: I must express my admiration of my hon. friend's ability as a grammarian.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 46 agreed to.

On section 47—Foreign tax deduction under I.W.T. and E.P.T. acts.

Mr. Abbott: I have a more important amendment to suggest to this section. The section as it stands refers to several classes of nonresident companies, and representations have been made as to the retroactive effect of the proposed section. While it is felt that the proposal is essentially fair in its terms, perhaps it would not stand in its present form. The section as amended will relate solely to what are known as 4 (r) companies.

Mr. McCann: I move:

That clause 47 of Bill 176 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(47). No taxpayer shall be deemed ever to have been entitled, by virtue of section 8 of the Income War Tax Act or section 9 of the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, to deduct from taxes otherwise payable under either or both of those acts for a taxation year any amount in respect of taxes paid or deemed to have been paid to a government other than Canada on income which was exempt from tax under those acts."

Mr. Abbott: The only prohibition here is against taking a tax credit on Canada on tax-exempt income.

Mr. Fleming: This is an important amendment, and it is difficult to follow without a copy before one.

Mr. Abbott: I think I know some of the points my hon. friend will want to raise, because I received a good many representations with respect to this section pointing out that if it were adopted in its original form it would change the rules of the game after the game had started; that it would have a retroactive effect. I recognize the validity of those submissions; consequently the proposed amendment to this section relates entirely to what are colloquially known as 4(r) companies, which receive income from abroad not subject to tax when included in their Canadian income tax. Therefore it is manifestly proper that they should not be allowed to take the tax credit of fifteen per cent which is allowed now on income which they receive free of tax.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps this section could stand for a moment.

Section stands.

On section 48—Newfoundland.

Mr. Ashbourne: I received a letter, dated November 29, 1949, from the Newfoundland board of trade, which reads:

> I have been directed to bring to your attention that part of the income tax bill at present before the federal house which has reference to Newfoundland's special position under the terms of union.
> It seems clear from clause 48, subclause 3, that business losses prior to confederation will not be allowable as deductions from profits made after union when computing taxable income. In other words, section 26, paragraph (d), of the Canadian Income Tax Act will not apply to Newfoundland taxpayers before April 1, 1949. Clause 48, subclause 3, of the bill reads as follows:

Clause 48, subclause 3, of the bill now under consideration is then quoted, and the letter continues:

> On the other hand there appears to be no provision in the bill which will relieve Newfoundland taxpayers from income tax and surtax upon dividends paid out of profits earned before union with Canada.
> Further, there seems to be no provision in the bill which will prevent section 9, subsection 6, of the Canadian act being applied to individual shareholders. This subsection provides that if the undivided profits of a corporation exceed what is reasonably required for the purposes of the business, a dividend equal to the amount specified by the minister shall be deemed to have been received by the shareholders. This may result in substantial taxes becoming payable upon pre-confederation profits.
> A refusal to allow the carrying forward of pre-confederation losses on the one hand and to impose tax upon dividends from profits before union on the other hand seems grossly inequitable.
> Yours faithfully,
> H. T. Renouf,
> Secretary.

Perhaps the minister could make a statement with regard to the taxation picture as it affects Newfoundland and clear up some of the points brought out in this letter.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member will recall that under the terms of union with Newfoundland, or the supplementary agreement, it was a condition that taxes would not be imposed with respect to either personal or corporation income tax in Newfoundland on earnings prior to the date of union; that in effect they would be given the same treatment as was given in Canada when the pay-as-you-go plan was adopted. The representatives of Newfoundland in the discussions were insistent that we should not look behind the date of union as to the position of a taxpayer in Newfoundland, and may I say at once that I have no quarrel with that position.

My hon. friend has raised two points, the first being with respect to the fact that losses incurred prior to the date of union would not be taken into account in subsequent years when the Newfoundland taxpayer is taxed in Canada. That is correct. Obviously when one is not entitled to look at profits in previous years, one cannot very well look at losses; the one must go with the other. So far as the income tax payer in Canada is concerned, I suppose the Newfoundland taxpayer can be looked upon as a newborn babe. We do not inquire into his tax status before he became a Canadian citizen.

As to undistributed surpluses on hand at the date of union, the same treatment is accorded here as was accorded to the Canadian taxpayer who first became liable for income tax in 1917. Under the law as it stands, pre-1917 surpluses can be distributed on liquidation free of income tax. Dividends are taxable income by definition under the law, and we do not look to see where a dividend comes from. That is true of dividends declared by any Canadian corporation. A pre-confederation surplus of a Newfoundland corporate taxpayer can be carried on its books and when distributed on winding up, or by any other method other than dividend payments, can be so distributed free of tax.

Section agreed to.

On section 47—Foreign tax deduction under I.W.T. and E.P.T. acts.

Mr. Fleming: The minister has said that a desire has been expressed that section 47 should not have any retroactive operation.

Mr. Abbott: Except in the one case.

Mr. Fleming: Except in the case of 4(r) companies.

Mr. Abbott: Except in the case of companies that are not taxed on income they bring into Canada which is in the form of tax-exempt income.

Mr. Fleming: The section is a difficult one, and the amendment is not an easy one to construe in the time available. I am bound to say that if the amendment is intended to eliminate any possibility of retroactive operation, it is not very clear. The observations of the Toronto board of trade on this point, which I understand is the principal point of the minister's amendment, indicated that they desired a wider change than the minister's amendment. The board of trade says:

This amendment appears to be a retroactive change in the interpretation of the above-mentioned sections of the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act,—

May I interject here that this reference is to section 8, subsections (1) and (8) (2) (A) of the Income War Tax Act, and section 9 of the Excess Profits Tax Act. The brief continues, speaking of section 47 of the bill:

—and has the effect of limiting the tax credit allowed in respect of foreign taxes paid by a foreign subsidiary to an amount equal to the average rate that would otherwise have been payable under the acts.

Mr. Abbott: That has all been eliminated, of course.

Mr. Fleming: The letter goes on:

The board understands that the sections referred to had the effect of granting tax credit at the marginal rate of tax that would otherwise have been payable on the income in question, and that the sections were so interpreted by the income tax division of the Department of National Revenue, and that in many cases assessments were issued on that basis. A retroactive change of this nature—

Mr. Abbott: That has all gone by the board as a result of the amendment that has just been moved.

Mr. Fleming: That is what I want to get at. I have been doing my best to absorb the effect of this amendment—

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I might elaborate on my explanation before my hon. friend continues.

Mr. Fleming: I wish to make just this one observation. If the minister will give the assurance that the purpose of the amendment is to meet this objection in its entirety, and that in operation the section will not have that retroactive effect which is strongly objected to in this brief from the board of trade, I have no further comment to make.

Mr. Abbott: It meets the case my hon. friend was referring to. There are perhaps six companies in Canada who come under what was known as the old section 4 (r); I think they are nearly all distilling companies. Under that section they are entitled to bring in dividends from foreign subsidiaries, include them in their Canadian income, and pay no income tax on them. Technically, under the law as it stands, though they pay no income tax with respect to that income, they might be able to claim fifteen per cent or some other tax credit deducted from those dividends at the source in the United States. I think I have only to state that position to demonstrate that it is hardly equitable. In fact they have never been given that credit, and that provision was included in the wider measure originally proposed in section 47. It is true that in form that can be urged as having some retroactive effect, but that is one provision which frankly I am not prepared to relinquish. As to the other provisions, in view of the representations which have been made by the board of trade and others I am quite satisfied to remove them. This, however, is one I feel I must retain.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 48 and 49 agreed to.

Mr. Abbott: I have an amendment that should be moved at this point, inserting a new clause in order to make provision for various international agreements which may exist in connection with Newfoundland fisheries treaties and the like. The section will be inserted immediately after the present section 49; and the amendment is as follows:

That Bill 176 be amended by renumbering sections 50 to 52, inclusive, as sections 51, 52 and 53, and inserting after section 49 the following section as section 50:

"50. Notwithstanding anything contained in this or any other act, an exemption from taxation provided for in an international treaty or international agreement binding on Newfoundland before the union of Newfoundland with Canada may be extended by regulation of the governor in council to taxation by or under any act of the parliament of Canada."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move accordingly.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask what is the meaning of the word "extended", and also if the minister would tell us what are these treaties and agreements.

Mr. Abbott: The section is based on the legal view, if you like, that technically international agreements, fisheries agreements or the bases agreements and that sort of thing in Newfoundland, are not automatically subject to Canadian legislation, but that we must extend our legislation to those agreements. This provision is inserted for that purpose. Probably my hon. friend knows that there are fishing agreements and fishing rights in connection with the old colony of Newfoundland that go back a great many years, and this section is inserted in order to make sure that we can take appropriate action to continue the international effect of those agreements and their adoption by Canada. This provision is broad enough to cover all agreements of the kind.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): These have nothing to do with exemption agreements with corporations in Newfoundland?

Mr. Abbott: No; those would not be international agreements.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When we say "extended" does that mean that they are continued as far as they affect Newfoundland, or that they are given an extended operation to affect the rest of Canada, let us say?

Mr. Abbott: They are not given an extended operation. I used the words "adoption by Canada", meaning they would become binding on the whole of the Canadian people. Previously they were binding on the government of Newfoundland as a colony or as a dominion or under commission of government, whatever may have been their legal status. Now we can declare that those agreements are extended to Canada.

Mr. Fleming: Would the minister be a little more specific as to the nature of these agreements? Normally one does not expect to find under international treaties or agreements the exemption of specific taxpayers or specific classes of taxpayers from taxation. In what way have these exemptions from taxation arisen in connection with these agreements?

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend may recall that under the United States bases agreements with Newfoundland, which I am told were confirmed by statute of the commission of government, certain special privileges were extended to United States forces at those bases. They were exempted from customs duties on cigarettes and other things they brought in; they were exempted from income tax and other taxes. I am not familiar with the details, but they were given special privileges. I am not acquainted with the terms of those agreements, but I know they are and have been the subject of discussion between our government and that of the United States. In addition there are those old fisheries treaties to which I referred, which give France, I believe, and perhaps other countries, the right to land on the shores of Newfoundland, to get bait and perhaps to bring in gear to refit their ships. I am not familiar with the details, but we felt it desirable to have an enabling clause here to preserve any such rights that may exist.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am still a little bothered by this word "extended". Is the minister satisfied there is no implication here that the privileges he has described as existing in Newfoundland might be asserted elsewhere by reason of this amendment?

Mr. Abbott: I can only say there is an interesting legal point involved. This clause was drafted by the deputy minister of justice. The point was raised, I may say, by the Department of External Affairs, which wanted to be sure that these bases agreements, fisheries agreements and so on could be recognized by Canada, and that it would be clear from the legal point of view that they were adopted by Canada or that they would extend to Canada. I have not given the word "extended" the critical analysis my hon. friend has.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the minister agree with that?

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I might put it this way. The section says that under international treaty or international agreement there are certain exemptions or special privileges which the general law of Canada might take away. This enabling provision says that those exemptions or privileges can be extended to Canada, notwithstanding the application of the general law, such as our customs law or our income tax law, or any of our other laws. The provisions contained in these pre-confederation agreements will be extended to Newfoundland, now that it is part of Canada, and what would otherwise be the general law of Canada will not apply with respect to those concessions.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As the minister has stated it, I think I understand it, and it is satisfactory. I find it difficult, however, to understand it from the wording of the section. If the section were framed in the minister's words, I would be happier.

Mr. Abbott: I shall not quarrel with my hon. friend on that, but I do rely for the drafting of these sections on the law officers of the crown who are charged with that responsibility. After careful consideration, the Department of Justice has submitted this language to me as being the appropriate language.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to revert to the minister's reply to my last question. Would I be correctly summarizing the position with respect to these international treaties and international agreements if I said that any exemption from taxation which they create is created for the benefit of aliens only?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Fleming: The other point I should like to raise, Mr. Chairman, concerns the concluding words of the proposed new section 50, upon which the member for Greenwood has raised a question as to the meaning of the word "extended". This section provides that these exemptions "may be extended by regulations of the governor in council to taxation by or under any act of the parliament of Canada." We are dealing here with the bill concerning the Income War Tax Act and the Income Tax Act. We are not including within the scope of this committee's review questions of exemption or taxability under other acts of parliament. On the face of it, this amendment seems to me to clothe the governor in council with power to continue exemptions provided by international treaty or international agreement binding on Newfoundland before union from taxation by or under any act of the parliament of Canada. I think before proceeding to the full extent of a provision of this kind, the members must be given an opportunity of considering all the taxing statutes enacted by the parliament of Canada which are in effect today. Surely this is not a proper amendment to be introduced at this stage of a bill the purpose of which is amendment of the Income Tax Act only. Surely the house is not going to be asked to go that far without careful consideration of the possible effect of such provision on other taxing acts of this parliament.

Mr. Abbott: I would think that the house would approve the principle that where preconfederation international agreements have been entered into granting immunities or tax concessions, or whatever it may be, to aliens, the Canadian taxation laws should recognize them as binding upon us. My hon. friend has a point, perhaps, from the technical drafting point of view,—that we should include a similar section in all statutes which may purport to impose taxation of any kind. In this bill, however, there are a number of essentially transitional provisions with respect to Newfoundland, and it did seem an appropriate place to give statutory authority to recognize those various agreements. We do not know yet what all of them may be. I did not think there would be any serious objection to the principle.

Any order in council, of course, which would grant this recognition would be included in the summary to be tabled, to which reference was made a short time ago. The house will be aware of actions which are taken to recognize these international agreements.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If I thought it would be of any use, I might ask the minister to reconsider the wording of this section, because he has indicated that he is not too happy about it. The minister made it clear that this is merely the adoption by Canada of the effect of these existing treaties so far as they relate to Newfoundland; is that correct?

Mr. Abbott: I believe, in effect, this gives us authority to adopt—if my hon. friend will include that word. This section is enabling; and it gives us authority to adopt international agreements entered into by Newfoundland prior to confederation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In so far as they affect Newfoundland.

Mr. Abbott: In so far as they affect Newfoundland.

Mr. Fleming: And also on the basis that the exemptions thereby created are created only for the benefit of aliens, not for Canadians.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, absolutely.

Amendment agreed to,

Section 50 agreed to.

Sections 51 and 52 agreed to.

On section 53—Deductions from income of corporations in petroleum business.

Mr. Abbott: I am sorry to say that there has been a rewrite of this clause. It is essentially a drafting amendment, and is a reenactment of the whole clause. It is lengthy but I shall give an explanation of it. The amended clause reads as follows:

That subclauses 1, 2 and 3 of clause 53 of the bill be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

53 (1) A corporation whose principal business is the production, refining or marketing of petroleum or petroleum products or the exploring and drilling for oil and natural gas, may deduct, in computing its income for the purposes of the Income Tax Act,

(a) the aggregate of the drilling and exploration costs, including all general geological and geophysical expenses incurred by it, directly or indirectly, on or in respect of exploring or drilling for oil and natural gas in Canada

(i) during the taxation year, and

(ii) during the previous taxation years, to the extent that they were not deductible in computing income for a previous taxation year, or

(b) of that aggregate an amount equal to its income for the taxation year

(i) if no deduction were allowed under paragraph (b) of subsection (1) of section 11 of the said act, and

(ii) if no deduction were allowed under this subsection minus the deduction allowed by section 27 of the said act.

(2) For the purpose of the Income Tax Act there may be deducted in computing income from the business of an association, partnership or syndicate formed for the purpose of exploring or drilling for oil or natural gas, the lesser of

(a) the aggregate of the drilling and exploration costs including all general geological and geophysical expenses incurred by it, directly or indirectly, on or in respect of exploring or drilling for oil or natural gas in Canada

(i) during the taxation year,

(ii) during previous taxation years, to the extent that they were not deductible in computing income therefrom for a previous taxation year, or

(b) of that aggregate, an amount equal to the income therefrom if no deduction were made under this subsection.

(3) Subsections (1) and (2) are applicable in respect of expenditures incurred in the calendar years 1949 to 1952 inclusive.

and that the following subclause be added to the said clause 53:

"(9) subsections 1, 2 and 3 of section 16 of chapter 53 of the statutes of 1948 are repealed."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move accordingly.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I might give a brief explanation of this section before we discuss it, Mr. Chairman. It merely renews for a three-year period the special write-offs allowed to the oil and mining industries. The amendment I have proposed, while impressive in appearance, is merely a rewriting and consolidation of the provisions mainly to recognize technical changes in the oil and gas industries. I think I can assure the committee that the redrafting is on balance beneficial to the industry, and does not effect any substantial change in the benefits under the clause. Where previously a separate paragraph was devoted to each of the groups, oil producing and marketing companies, oil exploration companies and gas exploration companies, these have now been consolidated into one provision. Furthermore, the associations, syndicates and partnerships in the industry, whether in the field of gas or oil, are now provided for in a separate paragraph. This rearrangement of the provisions is the result of extensive discussions in the income tax division with officials of the district offices concerned with the administration of this provision of the law.

Mr. Applewhaite: I am not familiar with the wording of the amendment, because I have not seen it, and I have not been able to follow it. But the remarks I have to make are based on the old section, and I ask the minister if he will follow me on the old section and then answer my question.

The old section provides for certain deduction privileges for corporations or associations, syndicates and partnerships in connection with drilling for natural gas. The old section then goes on to allow deductions for corporations only in connection with the mineral mining industry. Bearing in mind the fact that in at least some parts of the country a great deal of mineral exploration is done by syndicates and partnerships and not by corporations, I should like to ask the minister whether the same privilege should not be extended to syndicates and partnerships that has been extended to corporations.

Mr. Abbott: That is not amended. It has always been the law, I am informed, that the exploration costs incurred by corporations exploring for minerals will be eligible for deduction under this section, but that in the case of corporations, associations or partnerships, that applies to such associations formed for the purpose of exploring and drilling for natural gas. I was trying to ascertain the reason for the distinction. I have not been able to get an answer from the officials who are in front of me. They tell me that, so far as they are aware, there has been no demand in the mining field for an extension of that principle to them. It must be that in the oil fields they operate in this way and they do not in mining.

Mr. Applewhaite: It may happen that by the time a mineral mine becomes producing it will have reached the stage of incorporation, but it does not necessarily follow. I am certainly not going to move an amendment at the present time, not having the wording before me, but I would ask for the minister's assurance that the rights or privileges of corporations, partnerships and syndicates be equally regarded in connection with the mineral mining industry. Should the occasion arise I think it would be only fair to ask that the department have sufficient discretion to treat a syndicate or partnership as it treats a corporation.

Mr. Abbott: I shall be happy to look into that matter. So far as I am aware, this is the first time it has been brought forward since I have had anything to do with putting these resolutions through the house. I shall be glad to look into the matter.

The Chairman: Shall section 52 carry?

Mr. Abbott: This is a new section 53.

Mr. Fleming: That is the point I was going to raise. In form, the minister's amendment is really a rewriting of section 52. Has the number been changed to 53 on the original that was given to the chairman?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

The Chairman: I understand that copies of the amendment were distributed—the new section 53.

Mr. Abbott: It will be new section 53.

The Chairman: Shall section 53 as amended carry?

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Abbott moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to make just one comment. I repeat what I said last night. With deference to the minister, I want to ask him whether in future he will not try to enable this house to discharge its duty, or what I conceive to be its duty, namely, to bring whatever judgment it can to the important questions that come before it. The members can do that only when they have the necessary information available to them. I submit to the minister that what happened here last night is proof positive of the fact that the house cannot properly discharge its duties if it has not full information.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I agree that the house should have full information, but I cannot allow my hon. friend's remarks to go completely unchallenged. I have endeavoured to give the fullest possible information. I purposely have allowed this bill to stand for over two or three weeks in order to enable every member of the house who was interested to study its highly technical provisions, and, if they were in doubt as to the sections, to ask me or my department about them. I know my hon. friend is referring to some regulations which the department is empowered to issue under this measure that we are now passing. So far as I know, it has never been the practice to bring before the house regulations adopted pursuant to proposals which have not yet been enacted into law.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is because I believe the minister to be a progressive and forward-looking man that I suggest to him that he might improve things for the future.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

101. Departmental administration, $360,900.

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Before the committee proceeds with consideration of the items in the estimates, Mr. Chairman, I should like to give to the committee a statement and a report.

Since coming into this department approximately eighteen months ago I have, with some of the departmental staff, visited each of the ten provinces to discuss fisheries problems, prospects and betterment. These discussions have been held with provincial government officials, processors, fishermen, wholesalers, and cold storage and warehouse interests.

With each, the conversations were on their own problems, but, where possible, joint discussions also took place. Our visits took us from Bonavista, on the east side of Newfoundland, to Ucluelet, on the west side of Vancouver island.

These trips were for the purpose of gathering information for a composite picture of the whole industry, yet as intimate a picture as possible of the different districts. I therefore feel I should report on what the departmental officers and I have learned about this industry, and to give the committee also some idea of the actions we think we should take on behalf of the industry.

The fishing industry is North America's oldest industry. It is still a growing one, too. In the past thirty years, British Columbia production has doubled, as it has also in western Nova Scotia. In Newfoundland and the other areas around the gulf of St. Lawrence it has grown somewhat less.

In some east coast areas, the industry has been unable to provide good living standards for fishermen, except during the two great wars. Now, following the war, some of the eastern districts are again in a weak position. These weak spots stand in contrast to our great fishing resources. Canada has access to the world's greatest fishery resources on the Atlantic and the Pacific. We have the largest inland fresh-water fishery in the world. But on our east coast we do not fully use the available resources, although many foreign vessels catch fish right up to our coastal limits. On our Pacific coast the industry takes all the salmon, halibut and herring allowable without destroying the stocks. On the east coast, however, apart from a few species, such as lobster and Atlantic salmon, the resource is underdeveloped. The fish are there, and so are the fishermen; yet many fishermen have a poor living. Hon. members will want me to try to explain this condition.

In the first place fish are very perishable, as perishable as milk. But the fishing industry has to sell its products hundreds or even thousands of miles from the sea. Canned fish, it is true, may be shipped to grocery stores all over the world. But fresh, frozen, smoked or salted products suffer rapid spoilage.

Most of the finest things in the world are delicate. "Delicious" and "delicate" are almost the same word. They go together; and that is true of fish.

While fresh and frozen fish are difficult to merchandise, the methods are improving daily. The chain of refrigeration from the coast to the shops and to the housewives' kitchens is steadily growing. The fish product in modern packaged form is becoming more and more attractive. As a result, market expansion is possible.

Our fish trade has been held back, particularly on the east coast and in Newfoundland, by continued dependence on the traditional product—salted fish. Likewise it depends on traditional markets in the Mediterranean countries and the West Indies, where salted cod has to be sold to buyers whose capacity to pay is limited. However, some companies have switched away from salted fish to the fresh and frozen forms. These find their market in North America, where consumers' living standards are higher. The fresh and frozen products require more careful handling, but they are likely to yield greater and more stable financial returns in the future.

Processing—filleting, packaging and freezing—calls for larger plants using more up-to-date methods. In British Columbia this development took place readily. In the modern plants of Newfoundland and western Nova Scotia it is already well advanced, and in Gaspe, too—although Gaspe suffers from having only a five-months season.

Elsewhere on the Atlantic coast the future will see the concentration of industry at fewer ports, where modern processing and modern fishing methods will ensure more adequate living for fishermen. I shall return to this problem later.

You see a striking contrast between the development of agriculture and that of fisheries in the past forty years. Behind agriculture's progress goes quite a big national effort. Hon. members know the work of the federal Department of Agriculture in its science services, its production and market services, its experimental farms and demonstration stations. Alongside are the efforts of the provinces, both in research and demonstration, and the work of agricultural colleges. But in fisheries our national effort has been small in all these services. In the federal government our job up to 1938 was mainly the conservation of fish stocks. Only recently work has begun on fish inspection and the like. We still lack demonstration services to fishermen, as we have in agriculture.

For all these reasons some of our fishery resources have been under-used, our domestic and North American markets have not been built up, and we have areas of low standards in many of our fishing communities.

So far I have been talking about our coastal fisheries. Somewhat similar problems face the inland fisheries. Today I want to outline the future government program for meeting these problems. Some work has been started, and I should like to mention it first.

In British Columbia, which I mention first for no special reason, the fishing industry has expanded near the limit of the available fish resources. On that coast, therefore, the departmental program has a different emphasis from that in the east. In the west the need is partly for adequate protection of the stocks; and since the war we have increased the number of protective officers and boats to help meet this problem. But of more positive value are the steps being taken to expand the stocks of the valuable species. Such expansion calls for new methods of river management, for improvement of lakes through control of predators, for control of pollution, and in some cases for use of fish culture and hatcheries. This work is expanding in a new division of the department, made up of engineers and biologists.

Here, I might add, we intend to do everything necessary to conserve the salmon resource of British Columbia. We are anxious, however, to co-operate with those interested in hydro development. The department believes fish conservation and industrial growth can proceed without undue restraint on either side.

In the inland areas the direct responsibility of the federal government is in the Northwest Territories. Research has begun on the life history and spawning habits of goldeye, Arctic char and the beluga. A research vessel, the Calanus, has been sent to Arctic waters, and exploration at Great Slave lake has in recent years helped establish a new commercial fishery.

To help the fishery in the inland provinces, an inspection system for whitefish was introduced and is being currently expanded. The federal government is working along with the prairie provinces in research into the conditions affecting the fresh-water fisheries.

On the east coast, as in British Columbia, attention has been given to raising the supplies of the valuable species for which there appears to be always a ready market, such as lobster, Atlantic salmon, oysters, and clams. New research work has been undertaken in the scallop, flounder, salmon and shrimp fisheries. To help raise the standards, demonstrations of new fishing techniques are being carried out in flounder dragging, Danish seining, the Larsen floating trawl, and long-lining. This work of the St. Andrews station has already brought changes in fishing methods, and in the regulations issued by the department for conservation needs. On this coast, too, the department has increased its staff of protective officers, as well as its patrol fleet —as for example the launching of a new 65-foot vessel last month in Shelburne.

Research at Grand river and Halifax stations has expanded in recent years. To help develop the fresh and frozen trade, intensive studies have been made of the problems affecting the keeping qualities of fish, with results that are internationally recognized. New methods of controlling bacteria on boats and in processing have produced striking benefits to the industry. So has the development of salt fish dryers, smokers and machines for washing, cleaning and cutting fish for the expanding frozen fish trade.

Most of the industrial firms in the east are small, and depend for research entirely on the federal government. Only by finding new ways of doing old jobs, or by doing new things, is progress possible. The benefits of this research are evident particularly in southwestern Nova Scotia.

In Newfoundland the terms of union gave the federal government certain responsibilities for the administration of fisheries and the bait service. The integration into the federal government of these services has been completed. In addition, the Newfoundland fisheries board, whose powers now relate to salted fish, is being continued for five years after union. The union of Newfoundland with Canada adds greatly to our stature as a fishing country.

These various steps show what has been done to further the development of Canada's fisheries.

Before outlining our future program I should like to say a few words about the fisheries prices support board. Since its origin in 1947 the board has twice given price support, once in the maritimes and once in the prairie provinces. These two actions were reasonably satisfactory in bringing immediate relief to the fishermen concerned. But the expenditures provided no constructive long-term solution of the basic problems of the fisheries.

Fortunately, despite the loss of many important markets in Europe and in the sterling area, the industry so far has been able to meet most of its difficulties. Serious or widespread price collapse has been avoided. However, some operations have faced and suffered loss.

Prices support legislation alone cannot solve the whole problem. Prices support is a stop-gap solution to meet emergencies. It cannot remove all the hindrances to expansion I mentioned earlier. And these cause low income to fishermen. We believe that the support act is necessary as a short-term measure, but a constructive program must be found to remove the basic troubles. More fundamental remedies are to be found in better organization and methods in the fishing industry, both in producing and in selling. Future prosperity on a continuing, steady basis depends on marketing better quality products, both at home and abroad.

A proposal along these lines was made last May, and later discussed with the fishing industry at meetings in all the provinces. In September the fisheries council met in Ottawa, and gave the government its views on the proposals. I wish now to present to the committee the program we have drawn up.

This program might better be termed a framework for fishery development. It is aimed at removing the hindrances to expansion. Responsibility for its successful application, however, cannot rest alone on the government. We shall expect from industry a full measure of co-operation. On its part, industry must assume its rightful share of the risks as well as the rewards, and in doing so it will show initiative, and I might even say courage, far greater than at any time in the past.

Broadly speaking, future fisheries development probably lies in two directions: (1) in the expansion of North American and overseas markets; and (2) in the development of backward areas, which are primarily in the east but found also in the inland provinces. I should like to deal first with market expansion.

Hon. members will agree with me, I think, that quality determines quantity; that you cannot build a good turnover unless you have a good product. This is true in any trade, but it is especially true for fish. It is quality that sells. Now, getting good quality is not simply a matter of inspection of the product or the plant. Government inspection is only one of the steps. I want to say here how pleased I am that our fish inspection bill has received such warm support from members on both sides of the house. This bill will give us a chance to build an effective inspection service within the department, whereby inspection can be carried out in boats and plants and through the wholesale and retail trades.

But there must be more than inspection. Quality depends on how fish is handled in boats, in plants, in the selling trades—yes, and in the kitchens of restaurants and homes. From sea to table is a long assembly line; each part must do its own job well, but each has to fit into the other. Any program must cover each of these steps and try to provide for the industry the conditions that will allow it to do each of the jobs better.

The market expansion should be sought first, I believe, in North America. With us fish consumption is low, and the chances of greatly increasing our sales are excellent. To this end our program will be in three phases. There will be the extension of fish inspection, which will require a new division within the Department of Fisheries. The second part of the program will cover the assembly line I have already mentioned. We propose to establish another division within the present department, a division of technical services. The object here is to provide fishermen, small plants, and the wholesale and retail trade, with technical help in the improvement of their individual operations. This service would be advisory and would require able and qualified technical personnel. We believe it to be basic, and perhaps even more helpful than inspection for the over-all improvement in quality. We believe also that the provision and use of such a service should be prior to any extensive campaigns of advertising fishery products.

Without expanding on this at the moment we hope to add a third smaller division to the department in the form of a consumer services branch to work in the field of consumer education.

These three new services will be available for the Canadian fishing industry as a whole, although of course special emphasis will have to be laid on the technical development of the backward areas.

In market expansion these new services may be expected to operate as follows:

One section of the new technical services division will probably be devoted to the distributive outlets, giving to wholesalers and retailers in the main Canadian cities the knowledge, developed and approved through research, at home and abroad, that is necessary for better fish-handling. While this service will help to overcome some problems, it may not be sufficient to create the desired retail facilities. More direct steps of a financial nature are not being considered, since we hope that the industry and manufacturers of refrigeration equipment will help finance the extended use of low-cost freezing equipment.

Adequate railway transportation, especially on long hauls, is vital to the successful distribution of fish in North America. Our scientists have played a full part in discovering means of improving such facilities. We now intend to make every effort to encourage both railway companies to use and test the new type of refrigerator car that has been provided, and that can be used not only for fish but for other perishable foods as well. One of our own staff, Mr. Young, is responsible for this equipment.

I cannot deal with distribution without taking into account the export market. The position of some parts of the industry remains crucial and may even deteriorate further. Newfoundland and British Columbia have always leaned heavely on European and commonwealth markets, while the maritimes, in their salt fish trade, have depended on the markets of the West Indies. It is vitally important, therefore, that any general policies that look forward to the opening of such markets or to reduction in United States tariffs should give fullest consideration to the fish trade, and this the government will endeavour to do.

To round out the first phase of our new program, we plan to extend our work in the field of consumer education, as already mentioned. As some hon. members are aware, we now have available a new experimental kitchen. There, under the direction of trained home economists, fish products will be tested and new recipes created. These home economists will also be assigned to field duties, where they will give demonstrations and lectures on fish cooking to women's groups and to schools.

We intend also to develop relationships with those responsible for institutional feeding, with chefs of railways, hotels and restaurants. Not only shall we endeavour to encourage greater use of fish in mass feeding, but we shall also provide for this purpose as many technical services as possible.

To supplement this work we plan to develop new educational aids that will help consumers to know how to buy, what to buy, and how to cook and how to serve fish. We are planning new cookbooks, new pamphlets, instructional films and exhibitions.

The creation of these new services to the industry and consumers cannot be achieved overnight; we have no large industry, no large fishery schools from which to draw staff. Personnel will have to be trained, and some years will pass before the full benefits are evident to all. The important thing is to launch the program now, and to look for new hope and new progress throughout the industry in the next five years.

I now come to phase two of our program, that which concerns the development of backward areas. The administration of the fisheries in some provinces—the inland provinces and Quebec—is left by arrangement to the provincial governments. In the other provinces the federal government has complete responsibility for fisheries matters.

Because of this the department is considering the advisability of calling a conference with the provinces for review of joint action in the areas experiencing difficulty. Meanwhile the following steps will be taken by the federal government:

Earlier in this statement I referred to the underdevelopment of the east coast fishery resources. Accordingly, to help the industry of the maritimes take greater advantage of the stocks available, and at the same time to help them meet market demands for fresh and frozen fish, we have reviewed our policy in connection with Atlantic coast fishing trawlers.

At present licences for trawlers are issued only to Canadian-built ships. It has now been decided that licences will be granted to new trawlers built in the United Kingdom as well as in Canadian yards. Licences will be issued also to the better types of secondhand trawlers, bought either in the United States or in the United Kingdom, and registered in Canada after the payment of duty. Licences, however, will be granted to companies obtaining a secondhand trawler only when that company has laid down a new keel in Canada. These steps will help the east coast fishing industry modernize their fishing operations at somewhat lower costs than before, and the trawlers themselves will help to stabilize supplies and maintain quality and variety of fish foods.

In the backward areas, as already mentioned, there is a special need for the establishment of technical and demonstration services to fishermen and to small plants, particularly in the maritimes and in Newfoundland. These services are as necessary to fisheries as experimental farms and demonstration stations are to agriculture. We plan, accordingly, to use the new technical services division to demonstrate in each of the main fishing areas the best that is known on fishing and fish handling methods. We propose also to develop an intelligence service to fishermen, one of the most important functions of which would be to advise on the whereabouts of fish schools during the various seasons. Some additional staff will be required by the department to carry out this work, and there will be need for the acquisition or chartering of demonstration fishing vessels and gear.

The recovery of the poorer fishery areas in the east may require more than technical guidance.

We know we have to extend greatly our exploration and our surveys of the fish stocks around these coasts, and this too is part of our program. When you go to many of these communities you get the impression that they may be submarginal, that there is just not enough fish locally available to give the men a decent living. But you cannot be sure; so many of these communities depend on very small boats that can fish only a few miles from shore. Their equipment is so poor that they have to wait on the fish coming to them. With better equipment they would fish further afield, and go where the fish happen to be. We are not always sure, however, where fish are to be found, and in what numbers. The survey of the sea is not like making soil surveys. It is more difficult, more expensive, and takes longer to produce results.

I am sure, however, that greater exploration of our fish stocks is necessary—necessary in helping fishermen, and in helping to decide what areas are really submarginal, and what areas merit new investment in the form of harbours, boats, and plants. Much survey work will be necessary to give us the facts on which to reach decisions of value.

There are of course, in some parts of the east, other industrial problems beyond fisheries. The future expansion of the fishery has to be part of a more general program, and the success of such development will depend on the closest liaison between the federal and provincial governments. Each has an important part to play. Likewise the fishing industry itself has a major responsibility. Some parts of the industry may lack the management or the capital necessary for prosperous expansion. This we shall be surveying carefully. But I am convinced that the east has management, and much available capital, too, ready to apply to the expansion. At present there is a hesitation caused by the need to turn to new methods and new products. That hesitation, I am equally convinced, will give place to forceful action as the possibilities within the North American market reveal themselves. After all, if the people of North America each ate one pound of fish more per year, the fishing industry could hardly begin to meet the demand. The future is bright. The resource is there, and if not fully used by Canadians, will be further controlled by other countries.

The program I have outlined can begin now. The new services in inspection, in the technical application of scientific knowledge to fish production and selling, in consumer services, and in the greater exploration of the seas and its valuable species, will all aid market expansion. As it proceeds, the more backward areas can, by federal and provincial action, move in on the new developments.

The estimates now before the committee are of course those prepared a year ago. The new program will begin to be reflected in next year's estimates.

Mr. McLure: I want to congratulate the minister on the wonderful address he has given us on our fisheries.

It is one o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): When the committee rose at one o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I had just said grace before luncheon by offering my thanks and congratulations to the Minister of Fisheries. I had in mind making some extended remarks myself, but in view of the minister's address, in which he presented the over-all picture so well, I am going to make my remarks quite brief.

Prior to the election last June, the government, through the Prime Minister and the Minister of Fisheries, announced its policies on several occasions. I might say that those policies, and the way they were announced, did not meet with the approval of the fishermen, the fisheries or even myself. It is understandable that they would not suit me. In announcing their policies, both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Fisheries enumerated them in detail, and they always commenced with these words: "The government should do this," or "the government should do that." What we needed at that time was to have a little "will" put into it. I should have liked to see the announcement read, "The government will do this or that for the benefit of the fishermen." I hope the Minister of Fisheries will put that thought into action, so that instead of hearing him say, "My government should do this," I shall hear him say, "My government will do this in the interests of the fisheries."

Some time ago there was a full day's debate on fisheries in this house. At that time the members from the different provinces across Canada extolled the fisheries of their provinces. If I were to go into that in detail today, I would be only repeating what was said at that time. I might say this, however, that in the province of Prince Edward Island from which I come, we have without doubt, and without making any apologies to anybody, the finest fish that are caught. The fishermen are looking for broader and better markets for their fish. This is one of the most important things we shall have to consider.

For some of our products, such as lobsters, oysters, and a few others, we find a ready market at paying prices. For the canned fish and fresh fish, we have practically no market outside our own province. If the minister will fulfil that one part of his policy, namely, the bringing into use of refrigerator cars for transporting fresh fish, and also the establishing of refrigerated stores in some of the large centres, then I believe he will have accomplished something for the fishing industry.

As I said a moment ago, it is not my intention to make extended remarks, but while I am speaking on this vote No. 101, departmental administration, I wish to say that these estimates have been brought down in the usual way. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that the same antiquated ideas prevail, except in the case of the estimates of the Department of National Defence. The committee is being asked to vote approximately $7,200,000 for the carrying out of the work of the Department of Fisheries. Details are given for about 75 per cent of that amount, and then we are asked to vote a blank cheque for about $1,650,000. There are 47 permanent civil servants listed, the payment for whom amounts to $153,620. Temporary services in the same department cost $146,280. The details are given for the expenditure concerning the permanent civil servants, such as the amount each one receives, the position and grade, and so on. When it comes to temporary employees, we do not know whether there are 50, 60, or 100.

My first question of the minister is to give us some details with respect to this additional blank cheque which he is asking this committee to vote. I may say further in connection with this, that there is always a suspicion in the minds of most of us, although it is not voiced by the members on the government side. What else is covered in this vote of $146,280 in addition to the wages for temporaries?

Mr. MacNaught: In answer to the hon. member's question, I might say that the Department of Fisheries has a staff of 300 permanent employees.

Mr. McLure: This is just in the administration branch.

Mr. MacNaught: At headquarters, there are 46 permanent and 59 temporary employees; recommended for permanency, 16; and vacant, 16.

Mr. McLure: The 59 received a higher rate of wages than the permanent civil servants?

Mr. MacNaught: There are 16 who are temporary now but who have been recommended for permanent employment.

Mr. McLure: They receive that $146,280?

Mr. MacNaught: That is correct.

Mr. Gordon B. Isnor (Halifax): Mr. Chairman, I am sure that all those interested in the fishing industry will be pleased by the statement made by the Minister of Fisheries this morning. He dealt with this oldest industry in its various stages, and finished by stating that the industry is still growing. I like that "still growing" because I believe there is plenty of opportunity for this industry to develop to a great extent. He referred to the activities of the agriculture department. We who have followed the agricultural activities as compared with the fisheries believe we understand just what the minister meant. Perhaps the greatest piece of legislation in connection with advancement similar to that made in agriculture was the recent introduction of that bill entitled the "Fish Inspection Act". The members from the maritimes discussed this bill, and we were indeed pleased at the reception it met with from all groups in the house. I was particularly impressed with the able manner in which the hon. member for Queens-Shelburne dealt with this Fish Inspection Act. While I do not propose to go over all the points raised by him, in fairness to our section of the country I felt that I should once again bring to the attention of the maritimes one or two points raised by him.

He paid a deserving tribute to the fisherfolk of his particular part of Nova Scotia, in pointing out that during the years when things were not as good as they are now in Canada and the rest of the world, namely in the thirties, they by their industrious habits and manner of taking care of themselves did not look for relief but rather went out and through their own efforts raised sufficient vegetables and other things for the household—even by the planting of small gardens on the rockbound coast of Nova Scotia—and were thus able to carry on without any help from the so-called relief fund.

He also touched on what I thought was an important development in Nova Scotia, particularly in his part of the province, when he referred to the processing of kelp. He told us how this was not only used in his own province but was exported to Rockland, Maine, where various drugs and compounds were derived from it and were sold all over the United States. I think the picture he painted with regard to the fisheries industry as it applies to the province of Nova Scotia, and particularly to his own constituency, was exceptionally well received, because I have had many letters stating how pleased the writers were that our new member from Queens-Shelburne had taken such an active part and shown such a keen interest in this particular subject. I thought that it was only fair, Mr. Chairman, that I should pay that tribute today because of the fine picture painted by the minister in his report to us this morning. The two of them will, I think, be well worth preserving and reading in future.

Perhaps you will wonder, Mr. Chairman, why I departed a little bit from the subject. I would judge from the nod of your head and the wonderment on your face that you were about to say "Come back to the subject." It is all part of the picture of the fisheries industry. That was perhaps the first chapter. Then the second chapter was as developed by the minister this morning in his remarks. He covered the ground fully and gave us the program or framework as to the future of his department. I was indeed pleased to know that he had taken a broad view of this picture and that he was not going to allow it to stand still as it has done to a certain extent in the past. Perhaps it is because we have a combination of interests in the minister and the parliamentary assistant. In the minister we have one from the extreme west who is looking after the interests of the fishing industry as it pertains to the west and to the rest of Canada; and with him as parliamentary assistant he has an exceedingly able man from the province of Prince Edward Island. We therefore have one of the extreme eastern provinces and one of the extreme western provinces represented in the combination that exists today.

I think I should also pay a compliment to the efficient organization we now have in the Department of Fisheries. Our deputy minister is one whose reputation is known throughout Canada and the United States, and his name is well known overseas also. Hence I say that we are today in a more fortunate position perhaps than ever before having regard to the expansion of this industry which means so much to us not only in the maritimes and in Newfoundland but also to those who fish in inland waters, as mentioned by the minister this morning when he referred to the inland fisheries.

I am now going to come to what I think is an important branch of the development having regard to Nova Scotia. It will be recalled that prior to 1920 fish was distributed in only five forms: canned, salted, smoked, frozen whole and fresh. It was distributed to a large extent in bulk. Commencing at that time around 1920 distributors at the market purchased fish from dealers at the coast largely in the round form and processed it into fillets at the market. The processors at the coast gradually took over packaging and processing. At Halifax and other places we are concerned with the development of the fresh and frozen fish industry of the Atlantic seaboard. While I know that figures are not easy to follow, I wish to mention a few to show the marked increases which have taken place since 1932. In that year Canada exported to the United States 671,100 pounds of fresh and frozen codfish. Please note that I said "fresh" and "frozen". There is no suggestion that fillets were frozen and exported in that year. Hence we can assume that the export fillet trade has developed since that time.

In 1946, fourteen years later, Canada exported 39,168,000 pounds of cod fillets. I could also refer to the 1,125,000 pounds of fresh and frozen haddock shipped in 1932 and the increased amount of 3,022,000 haddock fillets shipped in 1946. You will therefore see, Mr. Chairman, the great increase which took place during that fourteen years. This has been a remarkable increase.

The total quantity of cod fillets produced in Nova Scotia in 1932 was 1,760,670 pounds. In 1946—and these are the most recent figures I have—18,509,600 pounds were produced. Of haddock fillets, in 1932 there were produced 3,882,860 pounds; in 1946, 3,194,000 pounds. These figures forcefully indicate the trend of change in the industry. It will be noticed that there is little change in the volume of haddock, but codfish, once despised, has come into popular demand.

Meanwhile, other countries have more than kept pace with Canadian efforts, both in the increase in volume and in the development of other species, both of which factors have created intense competition for the Canadian producer. I am therefore suggesting that the entire face of the fishing industry has undergone a complete change, and the policies inaugurated around 1929 or just prior to 1932, still being in existence, probably do not meet current requirements.

I pause here, Mr. Chairman, again to compliment the minister on his expanded policy. From the policy inaugurated and announced this morning I believe we in the maritimes shall profit to a very great extent, and I particularly have Nova Scotia in mind.

It would appear that the major problem facing the fishing industry, or at least the operator, is the shortage of raw material, which problem arises out of the lack of modern production vehicles, as well as a diversion of edible sea foods to bait services. Lack of raw materials creates certain major problems in the conduct of production and merchandising. I think the minister is familiar with that problem, and I am going to suggest a few subheadings, which read as follows: one, increasing overhead costs become excessive when applied to the small volumes available; two, difficulty is found in recruiting, retaining and satisfying suitable plant personnel; three, because of the first two factors, irregular employment is created; and, four, plant personnel cannot become proficient in exercise of skill.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I want to ask a question. Has it now got to the point that hon. members must rise in their places and read essays on certain subjects? What is your view, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Isnor: When I have been speaking in the past the hon. member has risen and raised the same objection. I have listened to hon. gentlemen talk at random quite often. I am trying to be as specific as possible in placing before the Minister of Fisheries constructive criticism, and in doing so I naturally have to refer to notes.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. member talks at random once in a while.

Mr. Isnor: The next point I should like to emphasize is that lack of continuity of supply engenders inefficient plant organization. As a businessman the hon. member should appreciate the definite manner in which I am placing these suggestions before the committee.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: The rule is clear that speeches must not be read. I understand that the hon. member for Halifax is about to conclude his remarks, and is following his notes.

Mr. Isnor: Mr. Chairman, I would not want you to think that I am going to conclude my remarks immediately. I definitely want to make some constructive suggestions to the minister.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Read on.

Mr. Isnor: My fifth point is that markets are lost to foreign competitors and other food products because of shortages. If I were asked, Mr. Chairman, to name which of these factors were the most important I would perhaps say lack of continuity of supply and losses sustained to foreign competition. These are the two outstanding factors that we must contend with, and I am sure that the minister and his parliamentary assistant will take note of them. To these factors must be added the expense of maintaining a sales force and sustaining advertising campaigns with inadequate market coverage. The minister brought that out this morning in his statement when he referred to the need of advertising and making known the good quality of fish so that it could be brought from the sea to the table in such a state that it would be well received by those at the table. That can be done only by proper marketing and by making known to the consuming public the benefits of eating more and more good fish.

I desire to point out that the growth and expansion which I have outlined have been accomplished with a minimum advertising effort and merchandising. It is claimed by certain operators that because of restrictions pertaining to the industry, arising largely through the opposition to modernization, we are not in a position to meet foreign competition, and unless a change of policy is forthcoming we shall lose the markets we now have. Again I say to the minister that he has recognized that fact and has made a change. Because of that change I believe we shall not have the difficulty we have had in the past with regard to modern foreign competition. I well recall not so many years ago, Mr. Chairman, the opposition to the introduction of steel boats. As far as I can ascertain this opposition no longer exists. At that time the inshore fishermen felt that they could not find outlets for their production. Credit for the improved condition of the inshore fishermen, it is believed, is due to the government's action in assisting these fishermen in the diversion of their efforts and in more profitable operations. Perhaps I could mention in particular government assistance rendered the lobster fishermen toward the improvement in the transportation of their product, and assistance in improving methods of curing, packing and grading salt and pickled fish, and in making modern transportation available in the expansion of highway systems to isolated villages. I think that has been a great help in providing collection services in the different provinces. That has been brought about largely through co-operation with the provincial highway departments, which have made possible the extension of good roads into those isolated fishing villages; thus providing a means of transportation from the fishing villages to the centres where the fish is disposed of.

Then again opposition to modernization was found to be coming from the deep sea fishermen who desired to enhance their earning opportunities by seasonal operations in salt and fresh fishing. To a great extent improved markets have eliminated their concern in that regard. Today I think it can be said the opposition comes primarily from the shipbuilding industry which naturally wishes to sell its services to the fishing industry. I wish I had time to develop this thought. Perhaps I shall do so at some future date. I say that because of the policy placed before us this morning by the minister. He said that he would permit certain types of ships to come from the United Kingdom and also from the United States. By that announcement he is going to meet the opposition to the competition which we have had to face in the maritimes in respect to a foreign type of ship which was permitted to fish off our banks at a time when we were unable to compete with that same type of ship. Because of that we were losing much wealth in our own country.

To regard this problem objectively, we must recognize that durability and efficiency of steel are essential to modern industry. I think the action taken by the minister will bring about the results desired, and we shall then be able to improve and operate along economic lines and thus compete with the modern foreign equipment. I feel, Mr. Chairman, that the steps taken this morning will be of real assistance to our fishing industry, and will also aid the shipbuilding activities of our country. As I understood the statement made this morning by the minister, it is to the effect that when one fishing concern brought a ship into this country, either from the United Kingdom or from the United States in particular, that firm would be obliged immediately to lay down a keel for a fishing vessel or a ship of a similar type. If they could not—

Mr. Mayhew: May I just make one correction? It is just the reverse. When they have laid down a keel in Canada then they may bring in a secondhand boat either from England or the United States.

Mr. Isnor: Thank you. I will say that as soon as a company shows enterprise by laying down the keel for a new fishing ship, they are then at liberty to bring in one foreign ship of the type mentioned by the minister. I say that should add greatly to our position in the matter of meeting competition from foreign ships.

I should like also to draw the attention of the minister to the need of storage refrigeration facilities along the Atlantic coast, as well as in other sections of Canada. I do not believe the minister touched on this matter this morning. As of August 1, 1949, the very latest figures I was able to procure, cold storages on the Atlantic seaboard were congested with some 5,860,000 pounds of herring and 3,110,000 pounds of mackerel, a large proportion of which will be used in bait services. This was mentioned in a speech made recently by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Kirk). He enlarged upon the matter to some extent, and I suggest his remarks should be kept in mind by the minister, his parliamentary assistant and his officials when we are dealing with this matter of enlarged storage facilities.

Total holdings of frozen fish on the Atlantic seaboard as of August 1 were 19,070,000 pounds; hence, approximately 47 per cent of the total cost of storage constitutes a dead burden on the industry. This is an uneconomical method of conducting business. The industry now finds it necessary to use this fish as bait, and carry this burden of services. It is suggested that this burden could be converted to an asset by diverting this large volume of edible food into human food channels.

It is felt that this factor is a real argument in favour of modernization of fishing vessels, or the shipping to which I have referred. Reference was made earlier to the development of other species of fish for the human-food market. In particular it is desired to mention the rosefish industry developed in the United States, which commenced in 1934 when 539,000 pounds of fish were sold.

In the port of Gloucester alone in the year ending December 31, 1948, we find that 178,800,000 pounds of rosefish were landed at a value to the fishermen of $7,405,740. That is the point I had in mind a moment ago when I said there was much wealth being lost to Canada by not using modern fishing equipment.

Except to the extent that Newfoundland processors have recently produced redfish fillets, Canada has not participated in this development, even though 60 per cent of the raw material used in this development was taken off the shores of Nova Scotia. Contemplating the policies governing the expansion of the fishing industry on the Atlantic seaboard, it appears that the department, in view of the announcement this morning, has recognized the value of this type of fish. I am very pleased to note this expansion in policy and, as I said before, it is my view that if this is continued we will certainly add greatly to the wealth of our fishing industry.

In closing I would say that the increased production of fish processors would have the effect of adding to the numbers employed. In his remarks the minister stated that they were not operating to capacity. One processor told me that he was operating at about 70 per cent of capacity. With the increased catch he would then be able to employ steadily a larger number of employees, and increase his production by 30 per cent, or bring it up to its 100 per cent capacity.

I say the policy the minister announced should add to employment as well as to the improvement of the fishing industry itself.

I would ask the minister to let the committee know what he and his department are doing in regard to oceanography. Two or three weeks ago I received a copy of the magazine Think in which appears an article entitled "Science of the Sea", and the article proceeds to show that the science of the sea is that of oceanography.

Because of this article I placed on the order paper certain questions to which I received full replies. I sent those replies to the fishing interests in Nova Scotia, who were pleased indeed to learn of the steps already taken to carry on studies in this important field of science, so far as the fishing industry is concerned. I hope the minister will be in a position later to enlarge upon the statement he made this morning by telling the committee what the department proposes to do. I am of the opinion that we should have greater study and training in connection with this subject, both on the extreme west and east coasts. At a meeting of Canadian universities last June this question was studied and a resolution was passed favouring the inauguration of studies on both coasts.

In closing I would ask the minister or his parliamentary assistant to comment on the following matters:

Will the increased use of steel fishing boats assist our fishing industry, and to what extent? I believe the answer can be given in the affirmative, but I should like to know the extent. I am referring to the minister's suggestion this morning concerning the use of a larger type of boat.

Will consideration be given to the production and processing of the rosefish so as to cater to additional markets?

Would the minister advise the committee as to what steps are being taken in respect to oceanography?

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Chairman, it was a pleasure to listen to the minister this morning deliver an excellent speech in which he outlined the policy of his department. I have already offered to him my congratulations on other occasions; today he has shown the obvious interest he has in his work and the attention he has paid to his department since he assumed leadership of it.

The minister's statement was all-embracing, and indicated clearly the amount of work that has been done by him and by his staff. It was particularly encouraging to the fisheries-minded persons from the new province. Hon. members may not realize it, but the fishing industry of Canada is a $200 million industry. As the Prime Minister said in September when addressing the fisheries council of Canada, a long time ago two fishes fed a large crowd; today the fishing industry of Canada can indeed feed a large crowd if it is properly encouraged and if the proper care is taken of it, as the minister indicated today.

The minister made one statement this morning which rather made me sit up and wonder whether I understood it correctly. He referred to the new trawlers which it was proposed to build, and said that many foreign vessels were catching fish right up to our coastal limits. Advocating the building of new trawlers, he said that licences will be issued also to the better types of secondhand trawlers, bought either in the United States or in the United Kingdom, and registered in Canada after the payment of duty. To me that statement was a startling one, knowing, as I do, something about the fisheries on the Grand Banks. On a fine day there it looks like a gathering of the United Nations, because you see ships flying the flags of Portugal, Spain, Iceland, Norway, France, the United States and Canada. I think we all know what has happened to the United States fishing grounds. Through the use of trawlers they have been cleaned out, and now they are coming up to the Canadian grounds to fish.

Mr. Winters: Is the hon. member referring to the use of a trawler in the sense of a fishing schooner, or to the newer method of trawling or dragging?

Mr. Higgins: I have no practical knowledge of the fishing industry, certainly nothing like the knowledge of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay, but, as I understand it, trawling of any kind is dangerous to the future of our fishing industry. The minister will be able to deal with this much better than I, but I am told that by the use of trawlers many of the small fish are killed in the bringing up of the general haul. Because of the pressure, many of the small fish cannot get out and are killed.

The point I am trying to make is that the United States banks have been cleaned out and United States trawlers are now a dime a dozen. They now come down to the Grand Banks and the banks outside Halifax in order to fish. The use of trawlers may or may not be bad, but I think members such as the hon. member for Halifax should be worried about how our fishing industry will be affected. What is going to happen to our inshore fishing, the small man who works out from his home with his motorboat and dories? If trawlers are to fish right up to his front door, what is to become of him and his family? He will have no livelihood. I may be voicing the views of an amateur, but I submit that this is a serious matter for the industry. The little experience I have had would lead me to believe that there is a real danger to the Canadian fisheries. We know what has happened to the European fisheries, and we know what has happened to the United States fisheries. Is it to happen to our fisheries as well? I do not believe the minister will allow it to happen.

The same thing is happening to our seal fishing. During the past few years more foreign fishing boats have been fishing in Newfoundland waters. Last year some six or seven Norwegian seal fishers came to our waters. Some regulations will have to be prepared to cover this matter as well. After all, these fisheries are ours—and I speak in the national rather than the provincial sense. They offer great future possibilities, and they should not be destroyed.

As I say, consideration will have to be given to the effect of trawler operations upon the inshore fisheries of Canada. I shall not say anything more on this matter at the moment, because I am quite certain some of my colleagues from Newfoundland will wish to speak on this subject, and will be able to do so with more authority.

I was glad to hear the minister say that more would be done in the way of fish conservation. I was glad to hear that a kitchen has been set up in his department to demonstrate the proper cooking of fish. I understand that the per capita consumption of fish in Canada is ten pounds per year as compared with the European consumption of about forty-five to fifty pounds per year. If we can get the Canadian people to eat another five pounds per year, which is not very much to ask, I doubt if the fishing industry will be able to catch sufficient fish to meet the domestic demand.

When hon. members go home to their constituencies they should advocate the eating of fish. They should not forget that fish is a great brain food. From this point of view there may be hon. members who would not want to have their constituents eating too much fish; but it is worth thinking about.

Mr. Riley: On what does the hon. member base his assertion that fish is a brain food?

Mr. Higgins: All I have to say is, look at the Newfoundland members.

The minister also referred to the salmon and lobster fisheries. In Newfoundland we are particularly interested in salmon fishing, which is extremely valuable. The British Columbia members, I assume, are also keenly interested in salmon fishing, but there is some difference between the Pacific and the Atlantic salmon. Pacific salmon make their runs up the rivers once a year and die, whereas the Atlantic salmon spawn a number of times.

The Atlantic salmon are being fished with cod nets much too close to the rivers. I have no doubt this is happening in the Nova Scotia rivers as well. I know definitely that our salmon catch is steadily dropping, and unless serious measures are taken to conserve our salmon fisheries in the not too distant years there is going to be a very poor outlook for salmon. I do not know whether this matter comes under the minister, or whether it is in the jurisdiction of the province, but I suggest that it might be advisable in certain of our rivers, where the fishermen now are catching the salmon as they enter, to take on those fishermen as wardens or something of the kind. In other words they might be paid the amount they would ordinarily obtain by fishing, and have these rivers kept free for the fish coming in.

Do I make my point clear? In each of these little bays where the rivers enter there are probably ten or twelve fishermen catching salmon. They take large quantities of fish, for which they receive very low prices. If these people could be subsidized, by the amount of their average earnings over a two or three year period, and not put their nets in those rivers, I think it would be well worth while. The hon. member for Halifax is aware of the great salmon fisheries that existed in Nova Scotia in the early days, and he knows the conditions there now. You have to be a pretty smart fisherman to catch a fish in some of those rivers in the maritimes these days, and we do not want that to happen in Newfoundland. In all sincerity I offer that suggestion to the minister, from my experience as an amateur fisherman, as something which might well help solve the problem in our province.

The minister mentioned canned fish, and this brings to mind a very interesting development, of which no doubt the minister is aware. In the Financial Post of November 5 there was an article describing the shipping of live lobsters in tins. This is an unusual development and the article states:

> The project was originated by J. R. MacDonald, a Boston seafoods packer, who has established an operation in Prince Edward Island, believed to be the first of its kind in the world.

If this is feasible, as apparently it is, we might create a market for lobsters in many parts of the world where they cannot be sold at the present time. As I say, the minister is probably aware of this development, and I merely mention it for the information of the committee.

The minister also referred to the fisheries prices support board. In Saturday Night of October 25 I saw this item in that connection:

> The fisheries prices support board spent more than one million dollars buying a variety of fish to support prices, but managed to sell less than $12,000 worth. It marked off more than $500,000 as total loss and still has an inventory of about $634,000 worth of fish products at the end of the fish year, March 31, 1949.

I do not know whether that is correct, but if it is, I believe something should be done about it. It is all very well to support the industry; I agree with that in every way, but would it not be very much better to give those fish products to some of the countries that need food at the present time instead of holding them in stock? Otherwise they will go bad and be of no use to anyone. I think all hon. members will agree that when our warehouses are stocked with butter, fish and other commodities, as they are today, and when people in other parts of the world are hungry—

Mr. Mayhew: That is exactly what we did with the fish we bought; we gave it away to needy people.

Mr. Higgins: Thank you; I did not know that. You may count on my active support in a program of that kind; I believe it is a splendid idea, and I think all hon. members will agree with it. I wonder if the Minister of Agriculture is going to give away his butter.

I thoroughly agree with the proposed packaging of fish and the general program envisaged by the minister in connection with fish inspection.

I have no comment to offer on the fine statement he made today, with which I entirely agree, except with respect to these trawlers; and on that note I should like to close my remarks. I believe serious difficulties may be avoided by proper precautions and proper protection with respect to trawlers. We have to think of the ordinary little man who is carrying on as a fisherman, and what is to become of him. If the hook-and-line man who depends upon his dory and his motorboat to get a few fish is to be put out of business by trawlers operating right on his doorstep, then I am afraid a great number of people may be on the dole in the not too distant future. It is something we must guard against. I should like to feel sure that we are not going to have any United Nations gathering out on our fishing banks, which I believe should be recognized as Canadian banks and preserved for Canadian fishermen.

The minister was kind enough to tell me he was going to answer a number of questions I submitted to him earlier. I do not know whether he would be prepared to give those answers now, but I believe he has the questions before him; therefore I need not repeat them. If he is prepared to answer them, I should be glad to get the information.

Mr. Isnor: I did not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but would he be good enough to tell us when any inshore fishermen ever took his dory to the Grand Banks?

Mr. Higgins: Not in a dory, of course; I did not say that.

Mr. Isnor: That is what the hon. member implied.

Mr. Higgins: I say the trawlers are going beyond the Grand Banks, and will soon be fishing on the very doorsteps of these men. That is what is going to happen. I do not know whether the hon. member advocates the unlimited use of trawlers. He comes from the maritimes; surely he would not.

Mr. Isnor: Is the hon. member aware that at the present time there are restrictions in regard to the distance within which trawlers may be used?

Mr. Higgins: I see the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay in his place, and he would be much more competent to answer those questions than I am. All I know is that I am very much concerned about the use of trawlers, and I made that remark because I feel that definite restrictions will have to be imposed upon their use.

Mr. Isnor: Apparently you do not know.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I come from a constituency that is outstanding for its fresh-water fishermen and fish. If the lake Superior trout is properly cooked, it will compare favourably with any other fish to be found anywhere.

I have sat in this house in past years and listened to the battles that were fought by members from the Pacific and Atlantic coasts for various reforms in connection with our fisheries, and now those reforms are being brought about. I am sure if the former hon. member for New Westminster were in the house now he would be happy to see so many of his suggestions put into effect.

I have a request to make of the minister. I know at one time the department issued a cookbook showing how to cook fish. I wonder if the department has another, or if it has an improved edition of the original cookbook. My suggestion, which I think would help him carry out his policy, is that he send perhaps a hundred of these recipe books to each member of the house and each member of the other place, so that they could put them in the envelopes with their Christmas greetings. It would not cost a great deal, and even if each hon. member had to contribute the cost I think it would be well worth while.

When I think of the minister and the way he speaks in the house, and when I consider the results he has achieved, I think of a man whose accomplishments speak louder than his words. We hope he may be long spared to continue to bring about these reforms.

Mr. C. T. Richard (Gloucester): I do not agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for Queens when he says that when the fisheries department announced a policy, he would like to hear the minister say "I will do such a thing," instead of "I should". I believe the minister can say "I have done those things," because I believe much credit is due to him for the improvement that has taken place in the fishing industry in the last few years. It is my opinion that more has been done to promote the interests of the fishermen during the last fifteen years than was done in all the years previous to that.

Let me give you an instance. In my county, until a few years ago, deep-sea fishing was carried out in schooners valued at about $2,500. They were powered by a gasoline motor, and the method of fishing was by a hand line or set line. Through the assistance given by this government, today we have sixteen draggers each of which cost in the vicinity of from $25,000 to $30,000. Some of these boats have brought in over one million pounds of fish in the last season; that is a lot of fish, Mr. Chairman. The whole system of the fishing industry on the north shore of New Brunswick has been revolutionized.

I do not believe too much praise can be given the minister for the businesslike way in which he has tackled these problems, and the policies which he has inaugurated. By talking to the fisherman themselves, the shippers and the packers, he has created a better spirit. They appreciate that they must throw their efforts behind the program of the fishing industry. I believe that by bringing these people together, the minister has promoted a better spirit between the fishermen in the province and the buyers. I hope that the new policies the minister mentioned this morning will be adopted promptly, for I am sure they will mean a great expansion in the production of fish, especially in the maritime provinces. I believe the total production of fish in the maritime provinces is approximately 100 million pounds. I can safely say that it would be easy to double this amount.

We are finding new markets for our fish. The trend today is towards fresh fish. In my county, most of the fish produced a few years ago was processed by the sun-cure method, and shipped to the European market. Today that same fish is being turned into fresh fillets, and is finding a ready market in the nation to the south of us. This has meant a much higher standard of living for the fisherman, for he is getting better prices than he was formerly. During the depression years, I recall fishermen selling dried codfish for as low as $3.50 or $3.75 a quintal which is about 112 pounds, and it took 220 pounds to make a quintal. Today, a fisherman is receiving 2½ cents for round fish, which means that these draggers I have mentioned produce about $25,000 worth of fish in a short season of five months. This means a great development for the fishing industry.

I may say that the fisherman has enjoyed a good season, and the fishing industry is the one thing in New Brunswick that has not shown any disturbing signs. In lumbering and other industries, there are signs of a recession, but the fishing industry has bright prospects. I hope that with assistance, such as was given by the government in the past, the fishermen will continue to prosper, for they have seen too many difficult years.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): First, I should like to congratulate the minister on the statement he made today. I am convinced in my own mind that, some time in the near future, we may expect the fisheries department to become a major department instead of the minor department it has been since confederation. It would be impossible to place too much importance on the fishing industry in this country. Many people are dependent upon it for their livelihood and, with proper management, it could be greatly improved. The welfare of our fishermen could be improved, also.

This great improvement, which I expect to see some time in the future, can be brought about when the fishermen of this country are taught to produce a better article. I have stated repeatedly that the Department of Fisheries, instead of trying to educate the fisherman to produce a better article, regimented the fishermen too much. They were told what they must do, and they were never given any assistance. Today I believe the department is teaching young men in their employ to be of assistance to the fishermen. When you find the employees of the fisheries department making friends with the fishermen, advising them, and helping them with their problems, you will find the industry will improve.

Speaking of the loss of markets in Canada, I believe that the fish-canning industry of this country has been hit harder than any other industry from the Atlantic ocean to the Pacific. Very little is said about it, however. During the war no trouble was experienced in marketing anything that could be put into a can. I often wondered why, when shipping space was so valuable, Britain could take any quantity of canned fish we were able to produce. In many cases, that fish was a gift from this country to Britain. When the war was over, after the fishing industry had gone a long way in assisting that country, we found they had no more use for Canadian fish.

Some people will say that the British have not the exchange. A little over a year ago I was in Britain and I was disturbed on being informed that Russian salmon was appearing on the British market. It was not bought with sterling, but the British had bartered tin plate for this Russian salmon. At that time all the warehouses in British Columbia were filled with salmon. I know that many of the delegates who were there tried to buy the B.C. salmon to take back to their country, not just a few cases, but carloads. They had to take this Russian salmon. It has not been explained to me why the tin plate could not have been bartered for Canadian fish.

The statement made by the Minister of Agriculture which was quoted in today's press is in line with what I have thought since the war ended in 1945. I do not believe Britain has treated this country the way it should have been treated; that is my personal opinion, but I do not hesitate in expressing it. We did everything we could to help Britain. We made gifts and loans of over $5 billion, yet today when we want to sell fish or anything that is produced in this country, the British turn it down. No reasonable explanation has been given to me for this state of affairs.

Previous to the war, the little county from which I come was shipping canned fish to one hundred different countries in the world, many of them within the commonwealth. Today this market has been lost to a great extent. In former years, we had no trouble disposing of all we had to offer. The quality is the same today or better, but it is utterly impossible to get into that British market and sell anything we produce down in the maritime provinces.

From following the discussions I have learned that one should not refer to previous debates in the house, but we have heard it said, and we have been warned, that we should watch carefully our neighbours down to the south of us. For just a few minutes I want to tell hon. members what those neighbours down to the south of us mean to the people of the maritime provinces. We will take the lobster industry, for instance, which is a big industry in the maritime provinces. In the four maritime provinces and the state of Maine we produce practically all the lobster that are produced on the North American continent.

Mr. Stick: What is that?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I said that in the maritime provinces and in the state of Maine we produce practically all the lobsters that are produced on the North American continent.

Mr. Stick: I thought you said on the North American continent.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): That is what I said, on the North American continent, and I think that statement is correct. More than 95 per cent of those lobsters produced in the maritime provinces are sold in the United States. Those figures are correct. About 60 per cent of the sardines that are caught in the section of the country in which I live are sold in the United States. Ninety per cent of the scallops dragged in the bay of Fundy are sold in the United States. About 80 per cent of the groundfish caught in that section of the country are sold in the United States. We have another industry that few people know anything about. That is the herring scale industry. It may sound trivial to hon. members but the herring scale industry in my part of the country means hundreds of thousands of dollars to the fishermen. They are sold 100 per cent in the United States of America.

When we speak of the balance of trade, I often wonder if the people of Ontario and Quebec realize just exactly the position we are in down in the maritimes. There is nothing that we have to offer that they want in central Canada. We are obliged to go to our neighbours to the south of us in order to sell our products. But when we bring that money back into Canada, if there is anything that we might want for our homes we have to go to Ontario and pay two prices for it. Those are actual facts. There is nothing they want to buy from us but they are always ready to sell.

I have told this story on many occasions. Down where I live there are many hundred of articles that I can buy in the United States for fifty per cent of what is charged for them in Canada. That is no exaggeration. I can give you the price tag if you want it.

An hon. Member: Give us some.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Very well. I saw a refrigerator in Calais, Maine, one month ago for $165.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the item under discussion.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): If the hon. member wants a reply, he is welcome to it. The same article sells for $340 in Canada, made by the same company.

When you speak of balance of trade I wonder why we down there are obliged to find markets somewhere else, but when it comes time to buy something we need for our own homes—and these are not luxuries today, we would all like to get them for our homes—we have to come up here and pay the people in Ontario two prices for them. I might mention here the austerity program that was put into effect a short time ago and which to my mind was necessary at that time. The manufacturers of this province took full advantage of it, and when the time comes for all restrictions to be removed, you will see the price of the article I have mentioned decrease 33 per cent overnight. They are taking full advantage of conditions.

To show you that these people to the south of us, who many of our friends think are selfish, are not as selfish as they might be, I want to read a very short piece from the Maine Coast Fisherman, which in my estimation is one of the best fishing magazines published anywhere on the North American continent. The editorial is headed "Lobster Tariff" and it reads as follows:

> "Why don't they put a tariff on Canadian lobsters?" lobstermen frequently ask. It doesn't look to us as though there is much chance of such a tariff ever being put into effect.
> Our government, expressing the will of the majority, has adopted a free trade policy. We Americans have told the world we believe in lower tariffs everywhere to encourage greater interchange of goods. We believe the trade thus created leads to better economic conditions. We believe this helps world peace.
> Even if a tariff were set up, it is questionable whether it would help the Maine lobsterman in the long run.

This is the state of Maine. To continue:

> It is an artificial way of forcing the consumer to pay a higher price for lobster. Furthermore, Maine cannot possibly supply the whole market. There would be fewer people eating lobster and paying a good deal more for it. The market would contract, the consumer would rebel, and sooner or later we'd be worse off than we were before.

That is the attitude of the Fisherman in the state of Maine, with whom we are competing today. That magazine is read by every fisherman in the state of Maine and that is the opinion expressed by the editor. If they should put a prohibitive tariff on fish that are caught in the maritime provinces, you could buy the maritime provinces for $1.50 an acre and you would take a big loss. We are wholly dependent on that market.

I am not going into the confederation issue. But many times, when people tell me that I am an American, I wonder whether, if at the time of confederation we in the maritime provinces had decided that we should like to go on the other side of the border, we would not be better off today. Again, as I say, I never hesitate in expressing my personal opinion; and that is my opinion at the present time. Under the set-up in this country I believe that if we were part of the United States there would be a great deal more prosperity in the maritime provinces than we are enjoying at the present time. There is nothing that we can sell in central Canada. The only thing we can do is to buy there and to pay two prices for what we buy.

I intended to be brief when I rose to my feet, and I think I shall stick to that idea. If we wish to help the fishing industry, it can be done with quality only. The one thing that will assist the industry is to produce better quality. I know the minister has that in mind, and I believe the department is behind him 100 per cent. You might market fish products marked "C.S." Canada standard, but that is not going to sell it. It is the quality that is in the can that is going to sell it. To a great extent I believe the trade mark is the thing that catches the eye of the purchaser. In order to produce better quality an educational program must be encouraged by the fisheries department. I have this statement to make before I sit down. Rather than go out among the fishermen and tell them that they cannot do this, that they cannot do that, hale them into court, fine them and do everything you can to make it disagreeable for them to get along, if the members of the fisheries department forget all about that idea and consider the fishermen their friends and act as their advisers, the fishing industry can go a long way.

Mr. Donald Smith (Queens-Shelburne): I had not intended to say much at this time, Mr. Chairman, but the minister's statement this morning has aroused my interest in this discussion. It was without doubt a most comprehensive statement of government policy. It was the most comprehensive one I have ever heard of government policy with regard to the fisheries in this country; and I am firmly convinced that it is the beginning of a big national plan in the great fishing industry.

I do not want to keep the house too long and I shall therefore be as brief as I can. I might ask the indulgence of hon. members, bearing in mind the fact that I have occupied so little of the time of the house up until this time; if I should delay them for five minutes or so I hope I shall not lose any friends.

I do not want to spend any time talking about quality. That is something that was discussed at great length in the house some time ago. The department and everyone else in the country is now well aware that the success of the fishing industry depends to a large extent on the quality of the product. I was glad to note in the statement made by the minister this morning that some emphasis is to be put on the establishment of consumer services. That is an excellent idea. In that regard I have just one thing to say, namely, that it does appear to me, and to many others in the east at least, that when the fishery cookbooks were sent to the publisher they came off the presses with complicated recipes for the preparation of fish. They contained substances to put into the cooking of fish which were hard to obtain. I should like to emphasize that the more simply fish is cooked the better it is. There are three or four changes that are most important. The fish must be bought in fresh condition. It may be cooked simply or otherwise but it must be cooked quickly, and certainly it must not be cooked too much. The fourth part of the change so far as the consumer is concerned is that as soon as it is cooked it must be served. Many of us from the maritimes have noticed that in the best hotels and the best restaurants of this country it is most difficult to get fish such as we would have served every day, if we like it that often, in our own homes.

I also regret to say that even in the best hotels and the best restaurants in Nova Scotia they have not yet arrived at a point where they can serve fish of a quality equal to that served in most of the homes along the fishing shore of the province.

I want to say just a word about the institution of technical services. The objectives outlined in the statement made by the minister were certainly sound, and I was glad to note that the department realized the necessity of able and qualified personnel in regard to the advisory services of a technical nature. In this regard I think it will be generally realized that qualified personnel is not easily available. I hope that the department will recognize that this kind of service will not oe helpful to the fishermen and to the fish processors unless it is staffed by qualified personnel. In my dealings with the Department of Fisheries I have found that they are always open to suggestions. I would hope that they would be open to the varied suggestions that are made in this discussion today.

The second point in the statement made by the minister, apart from quality, was the reference to the quantity. That reference to quantity concerned itself with something about trawlers. Some years ago on certain parts of the east coast there was quite a lot of opposition to the establishment of trawlers to any great number. There was a movement on foot which would have resulted in the banning of all licences for trawlers; but I do not think that the fishermen and those concerned with the fishing industry are as prejudiced today as they were some years ago. I think it is realized by all that there is need for trawler fish to ensure continuity of supply, even though a great deal of the trawler fish is very inferior in quality to that which is obtained by fishing from small boats. I am not quite clear on the reasons for the proposed encouragement of the operation of more trawlers. Is it that present market demands are not being met by the present methods of fishing? If that is so I think all progress should be made in modernizing fishing methods to secure all the fish that can be sold. But if market demands at the present time are met I should think that restricted action with regard to the issuing of licences for trawlers would be advisable. It would be advisable until the expansion of the market has demonstrated the absolute necessity of going into the larger productive method. I am quite sure that the farmer would not expand his farm without some knowledge of the future market. I do not think that many manufacturers would increase the capacity of their plants unless they were fairly certain that there was a market that they could supply at a profit. If this market does not exist at the present time, or if the market which we now have shrinks—that is a factor which is feared by a great many people in the fish business—I am wondering what the effect of more licences will be on these small boat owners of our province. In the constituency which I have the honour to represent there are actually thousands of those small boats, and these people are really the backbone of our economy. They are the backbone of our national effort in peace or in war, as has been very well demonstrated in the past.

I should like to point out that these small boats are getting larger. I do not mean they are getting soaked in the water, but the fishermen are gradually moving from smaller sized boats to larger sized boats. There was a time not very many years ago when fishing from so-called small boats was done close to the shore; but now there is a large number of these boats of a size which permits them to go quite a number of miles out to sea to fish on the banks. They go on two-day trips or longer. They are going to be worried, and I am going to be worried about the economy down there in connection with the questionable injury and the possible destruction of those grounds which are reached by these medium-sized boats. The western Nova Scotia fishermen will have great fears of the effect of any large increase in trawler licences. I have no doubt that the department is also aware of all these angles and will not grant licences to the detriment of the small-boat fishermen.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, although I did not have the pleasure of hearing the minister's speech this morning I have had the opportunity of reading it since. I would like to congratulate him on the manner in which he delivered his speech. I am sure he has taken a great interest in the fisheries of the maritimes, of Newfoundland and of the west coast as well. Since Newfoundland is very much concerned with fisheries I feel I would be recreant in my duty today if I did not make some observations on some of the statements which are to be found in the minister's speech.

The fisheries of Newfoundland are the most important industry in that province. Although the value of pulp and paper may exceed the gross value of the fisheries, nevertheless in the distribution of the returns the fisheries take first place. The fisheries concern more people. There are 30,000 fishermen, and they are scattered all over the island, all around its six thousand miles of coast line. Observations have been made in regard to the trawlers. As everyone knows, trawlers are boats that carry around twenty or thirty men. I know how they operate out of St. John's. When they were introduced into St. John's just a few years ago these boats operated in this way. They would come in with a load of 200,000, 250,000 or 300,000 pounds of fish, unload them and off they would go again, once a week, regularly just like a train on a schedule. I know the people who have brought these trawlers in and financed them are doing very good work. They have two or three very modern plants in St. John's. A number of people are employed at these plants when the fish come in, but I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that that fishery is to be compared with the salt cod fishery—that is, with the fishery that the people engage in around the Newfoundland coast. Take any of the little settlements around Newfoundland where the men are engaged in hook-and-line fishing or in trawling or in trapping, and in curing their fish. Such fishing is important to the fisherman because it is his vocation, his livelihood. He does not have to leave his home and go to St. John's, living away from his family. It is a way of living for him. It is a better thing economically for our country than an intensification of fishing through the use of trawlers.

The minister said, in effect, that the department is reversing the policy of former years by giving more licences. What is the limit of the number of trawlers going to be? How many are going to engage in this enterprise?

At the present time we have the French, who are supposed to have forty new trawlers this year. We have the Spanish, and we have the Portuguese. I think the Portuguese are the best of them, because they fish from small boats. But these big draggers which go over the banks are doing the simplest kind of thing; they put out a big dragnet astern and steam across the banks. Then they turn around and go back, raking up everything from halibut to flounders and dogfish—they get everything in their nets. What they do not want they throw away. Many small fish are thrown away, and in that respect it is uneconomical.

We have all those different nationalities fishing out there, presenting a serious international problem, I would say. The minister spoke somewhat disparagingly about the backward areas. I believe he included in that statement areas in Newfoundland. Then he referred to the traditional markets in Europe and in the West Indies for Newfoundland and other maritime provinces in connection with the marketing of cod. What are we going to do with our traditional markets? Portugal and Spain have been buying and catching Newfoundland fish for over four hundred years.

Mr. Stick: I should like to correct that statement. Spain has not bought any fish from Newfoundland for some years.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Well, if Spain has not bought any fish for some years, the fact is that Spain throughout the centuries has bought millions of quintals from us, and that country has been one of our principal markets. There may be a reason for the present condition, but it would not be in order to enter into a discussion of that today.

Portugal is the chief consumer of codfish, and salt cod is their principal article of diet. We do not need to give any lessons in cooking to the Portuguese, or any encouragement to the consumer in Portugal to have him eat our codfish. Why, therefore, should we speak disparagingly about them? But what do we buy from Portugal? It has been a matter of great regret that we have not been buying enough from Portugal, or from Spain or Italy or Greece or any of those countries which in the past have bought large quantities of our fish. We have not bought anything in comparison with the value of the fish they have bought from us. It is true that from the West Indies we do take molasses and some rum. But the value of the fish we export to the West Indies is greater than the value of the goods we buy in return.

Mr. Mayhew: My understanding is that at the present time we have a favourable balance of trade with both Spain and Portugal. In other words, we buy more from them than they buy from us.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The minister means that Canada as a whole is doing that?

Mr. Mayhew: Yes. And another thing: Portugal is now getting sixty per cent of her own requirements.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Of her own requirements?

Mr. Mayhew: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The Portuguese, Spaniards and French have been catching fish on the banks for hundreds of years, just the same as the British, the Newfoundlanders and the Canadians.

In regard to the marketing of fresh fish, let me say that the commission of government in Newfoundland tried to develop this industry within the last few years. They encouraged the marketing of fresh fish to a great extent. They advanced hundreds of thousands of dollars in modern plant equipment to merchants who bought fresh fish from the fishermen. But, sir, is it not dangerous, as the hon. member for Charlotte has said, when by a stroke of the pen the government of the United States could put an embargo on fish so that all that business would be wrecked? Therefore we should not pay too much attention to the fresh fish market to the detriment or neglect of the salt fish market. What we want is to try to have a proper balance.

I am certainly glad to learn that the minister is going to establish an extensive technical service. We have had technical research at various periods throughout the last seventy or eighty years in Newfoundland. From time to time the Newfoundland government has experienced a wave of that sort of thing. During the past ten or twelve years, under the commission of government, in accordance with the recommendations of the Amulree report the government carried out certain investigations along scientific lines. I believe that policy could be expanded.

There is one thing that can be beneficial to the fishermen—and the fishermen are the backbone of this industry. We must consider the fishermen in the first instance—and I am referring to the fishermen around the coast. What is their problem? It seems to me that the first problem of the fishermen is the purchase of supplies. I believe the provincial government is going to remedy that, because it has set up a new department of fisheries and co-operatives. They are not leaving everything to the federal government. The provincial government is going to do its share to assist in the promotion of the welfare of the fishermen. The co-operatives are going to encourage the co-operative purchasing of supplies, and this procedure will be helpful. The next question which arises in connection with fishing is the matter of bait. When the fishery is going well the two things that worry many fishermen are, first, a shortage of salt, and, second, a shortage of bait. Of these two the shortage of bait is the more serious as it is more frequent.

I have had correspondence with the minister in connection with the erection of bait depots, and I have suggested to him, as I now suggest to the committee, the advisability and feasibility of research being carried on with a view to setting up small bait depots instead of having large ones at central points. While those points may be accessible, still it would be more advantageous to the fisherman if he could have smaller bait depots in as many of the villages as possible. The fisherman will get up at two or three o'clock in the morning, and it is difficult for him to go, either by motorcar or by boat, back to a bait depot fifteen or twenty miles away to get his bait, and then come back and go out fishing again. In fact it is impossible for him to do that and operate successfully. If there were smaller bait depots in the settlements it would become a comparatively simple matter for him to get his bait supplies.

There are three principal methods used by Newfoundlanders in the catching of codfish. One is by traps—and I do not think the minister could do much about that. Another is by trawl line—that is where the bait comes in; and another is by jigging. Then we have the big banker. These banking vessels operate off the south coast ports of Newfoundland with dories. The men go off in the dories to fish on the fishing banks with trawls, and catch the fish in that way.

As the minister knows, the complaint is sometimes made that the great draggers interfere with the work being done by the banking vessels. I was glad to learn that the minister favours an interprovincial conference with the representatives of the federal government. I believe these problems should be considered at that time, particularly the matter of the establishment of bait freezers, and the undesirability of giving too many licences to trawlers. Too many of these trawlers would be bad for the economy of our country, particularly those sections of it in the maritime provinces and Newfoundland from which they would be operating.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Chairman, I shall speak briefly, because no one has spoken today from the west. I believe someone from the west coast should speak on these estimates. We are proud of the minister who comes from our province. This is one example where a businessman is doing a good job. With an industry controlling the large amount of money represented by the fishermen on the east and west coasts, we believe it is highly satisfactory to have a businessman at the head of the department, and that he is likely to do a more satisfactory job than could be done by a theorist. I think we all recognize that the minister has done a wonderful job in running his department. I think his accomplishments have been marvellous for a comparatively new minister.

The fishing industry which I represent on the west coast is happy over the progress that has been made. Some years ago they had not a great deal of confidence in the department. There are in my constituency some 2,000 fishermen who are centred around one of the largest canning factories in the world. These men now leave for the fishing grounds with the feeling that they are being looked after by the department. I go along with the hon. member for Newfoundland in saying that if the minister and the department are given time they will solve the difficulties of the industry in that province.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, there is a large fishing industry in the riding I represent and therefore I am interested in the minister's statement. This is the first time since I came to this house that a Minister of Fisheries has made a statement similar to the one we had today. This would seem to indicate that the department is taking hold of the industry in a realistic way. The minister has announced a program. Whether we agree with it in its entirety or not, the fact remains that there is a program. I am sorry that that program is not to be started until the estimates of next year provide the necessary finances. We should be doing something right away about the matters discussed by the minister in his statement.

The minister has said that he has two things in mind. First, there is the development of a market. That is necessary because there is not much use catching fish unless you can sell them. He tells us about the experimental kitchen that has been set up, and that is a good thing. The trouble with getting a larger consumption of fish in the past has been the fact that in many cases it was poorly prepared. Then the next thing is getting the fish from the source of supply to the market of consumption, and the minister indicates that steps are being taken along these lines.

I notice that some $80,000 is being provided in the estimates for co-operative education. For a long time I have been convinced that the only way to properly rehabilitate this industry is along these lines. You must get the people interested in the industry working on their own problems and accepting some responsibility, not only in connection with production and processing but in marketing as well. You cannot expect to make much progress working only from Ottawa or through some large fish company which is interested only in profits. There must be organization of those engaged in the industry on a co-operative basis. Ever since I have been a member I have noticed that from year to year, particularly in the minister's department, increasing amounts have been made available for co-operative work. The amount provided in the estimates this year is substantial and, as I say, that is the only way this industry can be made to work.

I should like to say a few words about the trawlers. I have gone to meetings of fishermen and have been in their halls when they have discussed this trawler question. As the senior member for Halifax indicated, foreign trawlers are not allowed to come closer than three miles and as such they do not affect the shore fishermen very much. The minister has indicated that licences are going to be granted to Canadian trawlers and to second-hand trawlers that have been built in the United Kingdom or the United States providing the company purchasing them lays down a new keel in Canada. I assume that is to stimulate shipbuilding, but it does not alter the fact that the shore fisherman takes a serious view of the trawler.

In my view the trawler is simply the mechanization of the industry. It is another technological advance that has to be reckoned with and if one is thinking ahead he cannot oppose it very well. The man with the small boat who must get up at four o'clock in the morning to go out and fish to earn an income of about $300 per year may lose his job, but he will not be losing very much.

The serious part of the trawler operation is the concentration of production. At the present time in Nova Scotia the whole industry is controlled by one company, the National Fish Company. The trawlers are going to fish for that company. That company also has a concentration of bait freezing and storage facilities at the different places along the shore. The shore fisherman will be placed in the position where he will have to work for that company on that company's terms; he will have to sell his fish to that company for whatever they want to pay. That is an angle the federal and provincial governments will have to consider. The shore fisherman is going to lose a not very good job through this process but will likely obtain a means of livelihood of some kind.

Another angle of the trawler question that is discussed by the fishermen with some heat is the charge that the trawler destroys the fishing grounds. I have heard this charged right along the whole coast of Nova Scotia. As the hon. member for St. John's West has said, a trawler will go out, put down its drag and then pull up anything that happens to come in contact with the drag. It keeps only a certain type of fish and perhaps fifty per cent of what is brought up by the drag is thrown back. After this goes on for some time there may be two or three feet of dead fish on the bottom and the live fish simply will not come in and feed. The result is a backing up of the fishing grounds. The shore fisherman cannot go out too far and in a few years' time there may be a complete destruction of the fishing grounds because of this practice.

I do not claim that I know all about this matter but I have heard men who make their living at fishing state that this is the case. In carrying out his new program the minister will have to give some regard to this claim. The perpetuation of the industry is something that should be guaranteed if at all possible.

I think the hon. member for St. John's West put his finger on a vital point when he referred to the bait freezing plants. I do not think it is an answer to the problem to concentrate the bait-freezing facilities at one or two points on the east coast. All along the coast are communities which have been built up around certain fishing grounds and I submit that a decentralization of the bait freezing facilities is necessary. I believe we should have smaller plants scattered along the shore and made available to the shore fishermen. I think that step is absolutely necessary; and I believe this also applies to storage facilities. You generally find the plant that has the bait also has the storage facilities, and unless you get the bait on that company's terms you do not fish. Then when you come in with a load of fish, unless you sell it to that company on its own terms there is no space for your fish, so you throw them back into the water. Fishermen have told me that has actually happened. They brought in a catch; there was no storage space, so they threw the fish back.

The minister has made a survey, and he knows the situation. He has competent men in his department; I believe his deputy minister is one of the best men on the continent in that field. I have known of his work for a long time, and I believe he has the confidence of the people who fish. I hope he will just keep in mind that possibility of making bait and storage facilities available along the coast, instead of being concentrated at one point.

That is all I have to say, but I do want to compliment the minister on what he has done. This is the first time I have seen a Minister of Fisheries bring in his estimates and indicate to the house that he has surveyed the industry and drawn up plans for the future. I believe he is making a realistic approach to the whole problem, and I only hope he remains in the department until he has been able to complete this program.

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): I want to bring just one matter to the attention of the minister, concerning which there has been a great deal of correspondence and as to which I have had a great many complaints. I feel that it should be brought directly to the attention of the minister so he may answer the question in the house, and in that way the people in the area to which I am going to refer will learn just what is going on.

I refer to the area off the county of Digby in the bay of Fundy. My understanding of the situation is that under our regulations Canadian draggers are permitted to operate up to within twelve miles of the coast, but that under international regulations United States draggers are permitted to operate up to within three miles of the coast. In addition we are continually receiving complaints to the effect that United States draggers are operating even within the three-mile limit. In this connection I have had a great deal of correspondence and many interviews with various officials of the department. I have found them most co-operative; they have sent in their patrol boats, but still the complaints come in that at night, after the patrol boats leave the grounds, these United States draggers operate within the three-mile limit.

With that brief background I want to ask the minister, when he replies to the various questions that have been asked, to explain to hon. members and those engaged in fishing in that area what steps have been taken or are being taken or are proposed to be taken to rectify this situation. Here we are endeavouring to protect the fishing grounds by keeping our own draggers away, yet at the same time United States draggers are alleged to operate within three miles of the shore.

Mr. Mayhew: In reply to the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, only ten days ago we had a new boat come off the ways at Shelburne. That boat is either in that area now or will be there within a day or two. Last year and again this year we had complaints that United States boats were coming within the three-mile limit, but this new boat is in there now, and another, the Cygnus, the largest in our fleet, will be able to go around there again in about a week.

Before I answer the other questions which have been put to me I should like the privilege of placing on Hansard the answers to a number of questions asked a few days ago by the hon. member for St. John's East. I could read them, but that would take some time and with the permission of the committee I would place them on Hansard.

The Chairman: Is that the pleasure of the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mayhew: The questions and answers are as follows:

Statements on questions raised by the Newfoundland delegation during the negotiations for the union of Newfoundland with Canada:

1. Trawling.

"Newfoundland trawlers will be permitted to fish (as they have been doing) to the three-mile limit off the coasts of Newfoundland, and an amendment to the Fisheries Act, 1932, will be introduced for this purpose.

It is understood that the policy as to trawler licensing in Newfoundland will be based on securing the maximum efficiency for the province's fishing industry and welfare for its shore communities.

With respect to the establishment of territorial waters it is our understanding that the 'headland to headland' rule, as it now applies to Newfoundland, will continue to apply."

Comment:

An amendment to the Fisheries Act, 1932, has been passed which will permit Newfoundland trawlers to fish to the three-mile limit off the coasts of Newfoundland when the act is proclaimed in Newfoundland.

2. Prohibition of export of bait fishes.

"At present the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act prohibits the sale of bait to foreign fishing vessels in Canadian territorial waters, except by special treaty or convention. An amendment to this act will be introduced in order to continue the practice now followed by Newfoundland in this matter."

Comment:

An amendment to the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act has been passed by the federal parliament which will permit this practice under the act when it is proclaimed in Newfoundland. Consultations have already been initiated with the province with a view to bringing this act in force.

3. Licensing of premises to pack fish (including filleting and freezing plants).

"It is understood that, while these matters will come under federal jurisdiction at the date of union, the Newfoundland fisheries board, during the time that it continues to operate, will be the medium through which application for licences will be made and the relevant regulations brought into effect."

Comment:

The Newfoundland fisheries board continues to be the medium through which application for licences are made and the relative regulations brought into effect.

4. Power of Newfoundland fisheries board to set quotas for fish for export.

"This power, which is involved in the marketing operations of the Newfoundland fisheries board, will be retained as a marketing function during the life of the board."

Comment:

"This power, which is involved in the marketing function of the Newfoundland fisheries board.

5. Market representatives.

"(a) The fish trade representatives of the Newfoundland fisheries board abroad (for which six positions exist and of which five are filled at present) will be continued as board officials, and be paid out of funds voted for the board during such time as the board remains in operation.

(b) The Department of Trade and Commerce will absorb into the Canadian trade commissioner service the two trade commissioners in London and New York, at present responsible to the Newfoundland department of natural resources."

Comment:

(a) Trade representatives of the Newfoundland fisheries board are being continued as board officials. Six positions exist, of which four are filled at the present time, i.e., Jamaica, Puerto Rico, Portugal and Italy. Consideration is being given to the appointments of representatives to Brazil and one other market, possibly Cuba.

(b) The Department of Trade and Commerce have absorbed into the Canadian trade commissioner service the two Newfoundland trade commissioners, who were stationed in London and New York.

6. Newfoundland fish export tax.

"The export tax of five cents per quintal on the volume of fish exported from Newfoundland will be abolished at the date of union."

Comment:

This export tax no longer applies and was abolished at the date of union.

7. Power of Newfoundland fisheries board to negotiate contracts.

"The Newfoundland fisheries board will not be required to deal through the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and may in its discretion continue to charge a fee or commission for its services in negotiating contracts, subject only to such export and import controls as may exist."

Comment:

The Newfoundland fisheries board is not required to deal through the Canadian Commercial Corporation in negotiating contracts and may continue to charge a fee or commission for its services in negotiating contracts. The revised fish inspection bill will not affect this arrangement.

8. Fish wrappers and packages.

"Wrappers provided by purchasers in the United States for their suppliers in Newfoundland will be dutiable after the date of union but will also be eligible for the ninety-nine per cent drawback on re-export as containers of fresh frozen fish.

Efforts are being made to arrange for the continued use for export of the present stock of wrappers marked 'Product of Newfoundland.'

Importation of printed wrappers of all kinds made from paper for domestic use is prohibited at the present time but permits may be granted by the Department of Finance in cases where the United States importer insists on supplying his own wrapper for the goods purchased by him in Canada. There is no restriction, however, on the importation of transparent wrappers or types of cardboard cartons or boxes usually used in the fish trade. These wrappers and containers are also eligible for the ninety-nine per cent drawback on re-export as containers of fresh frozen fish."

Comment:

Wrappers provided by purchasers in the United States for their suppliers in Newfoundland became dutiable after the date of union but at the same time became eligible for the ninety-nine per cent drawback on re-export as containers of fresh frozen fish.

Arrangements were made with the United States authorities for the continued use for export from Newfoundland of wrappers marked "Product of Newfoundland." The arrangement covered wrappers so marked as were on hand in Newfoundland at date of union.

9. Inspection fees on export.

"The present policy is to make no charge for inspection services."

Comment:

No charge for inspection services has been made by the Newfoundland fisheries board since date of union. This is in line with policy covering the inspection of fish and fishery products throughout the rest of Canada.

10. Tariff agreements.

"The position after union of the agreement between Newfoundland and the Dominican republic providing for a low rate of duty on imports of Newfoundland codfish into the latter country is being examined. If necessary the Canadian government will initiate discussions on this matter."

Comment:

Under the Annecy trade negotiations of 1949 the Dominican republic kept dry salted codfish under the existing M.F.N. rate, thereby ensuring the continuation of the preferential rates originally established under the Newfoundland-Dominican agreement of 1940.

11. Bait service.

"The Canadian government will seek legislation or take such other steps as may be necessary to provide that the Newfoundland bait service will be taken over and operated without fundamental change by the Department of Fisheries. If, after the date of union, changes are made for the benefit of Canada as a whole, the question of payment will be discussed between federal and provincial authorities."

Comment:

Since union the Newfoundland bait service has been operated by the Department of Fisheries without fundamental change.

Mr. Higgins: Has the minister tabled the answers to all the questions, or has he an answer to my suggestion with respect to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act?

Mr. Mayhew: The Minister of Agriculture, of course, is the authority on the P.F.R.A., but I think I am correct in saying that it is a program that was worked out to meet the effects of drought in the low rainfall areas of Saskatchewan and Alberta. The construction of dams, development of community pastures, introduction of new tillage methods, and so on, are all constructive solutions to the problems of the area.

The program I have just presented to this house outlines, I think, a constructive answer to the basic problems of the underdeveloped fishing areas of the Atlantic coast, including Newfoundland. The details of the fisheries program will be very different from the details of the P.F.R.A., of course, but the objectives will be somewhat the same. I have indicated that we propose to establish a technical service to provide fishermen, small plants and the wholesale and retail trade with technical help on the improvement of their individual operations. We propose to discover what are the best methods of fishing in the different areas and to carry out demonstrations for the benefit of the fishermen. What we have in mind is a constructive long-term solution for the low income areas where the resources and manpower are available, but where new methods of catching and processing fish are necessary to meet the demands of the modern world.

I do not wish to enter into any argument with respect to the trawler situation, but most certainly we would not have advocated a change of policy if there had not been a demand for more fish. Most processors, particularly in Nova Scotia, have not been able to supply that demand; in fact one community appears to be quite wrought up over the fact that we have been delayed so long in getting a boat to them. I am satisfied that in the over-all picture there will be more employment and that the standard of living of the fishermen and those on shore will be improved under this plan.

I want to leave just three thoughts with hon. members. At the present time in the maritime provinces we have the advantage of being closer to the grounds than the Americans; but the only way we can retain that advantage is by having equally good equipment, boats of the same speed and adequate gear. If we do not keep up our standard of boats and gear we will lose the advantage we have at the present time, and also lose the fish. The hon. member for St. John's East said Grand Banks was an international shoal. That is true; but the trouble is that there are not enough Canadian boats on that shoal to get our share of the fish, and that will be the position until we have more boats. So I think by granting additional licences to trawlers we will increase the earning power of the fishermen of the maritimes, and put them in a very much better position.

The senior member for Halifax asked if we thought our proposal concerning draggers would increase the productivity of that area. We most certainly think it will. He also spoke about the rosefish, which is new to the New England states. We have some, though not very many, on the Atlantic coast. The bottom is rough where these fish are obtained, and we do not allow our trawlers or draggers close to the shore, so we really have no means of taking them except in very small quantities. They are not a fish that will take any kind of lure or bait.

The hon. member also asked concerning the advisability of oceanographic studies. I would certainly agree with what he said and would hope that at least one university in the maritime provinces and perhaps the university of British Columbia would take this matter into consideration, and also that they would establish classes in fish engineering.

Those are two things that are sadly lacking, and we expect to get these trained men for our services. The hon. member for Charlotte said that this industry would become a major industry. It all depends on the way you think about it, I suppose, because it is a major industry now, if the hours of work mean anything. It is all worth while, however, and I have the greatest confidence in it.

The hon. member for Fort William asked about cookbooks, and suggested that we send 100 to each of the members. He did not suggest them as Christmas cards; but with an autograph on them, they ought to make good advertising for the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. Stick: Some concern has been shown about the extensive fishing on the Grand Banks. I understand that the latest scientific survey shows no depletion. Will the minister corroborate that?

Mr. Mayhew: I am advised that up to the present time there is no indication of depletion of the Grand Banks. I might also say that last fall there was a meeting of some nine countries in Washington to consider the North Atlantic treaty on fishing, that is for survey purposes. There will be another meeting shortly, I expect, and that will enable us to keep a close watch on what is happening, and regulate our own actions accordingly.

Mr. Blackmore: In presenting these estimates, the minister has impressed me as being a man with a purpose. I am glad to see that a man with a purpose is in charge of this department. We Social Credit members are from areas where fishing is not a major industry, but we like those who come from the fishing constituencies to know they have our hearty support. We have not said much, but we have felt a great deal. We are desirous of giving them our hearty co-operation, just as we know they have been desirous of giving us co-operation when we wrestle with the great problems which confront us, as we all work together to build a better Canada.

Item agreed to.

102. Fisheries inspection, including fishery officers and guardians, fisheries patrol and protection services, $2,983,000.

Mr. Sinclair: I should like to say a few words on this item. Before I do so, however, as the second member from British Columbia to take part in this fisheries debate, I should like to compliment the minister on the new program he has outlined, and to tell the members of the house that we members from British Columbia bask a little in the reflected glory which has come to us now because the minister has inaugurated so sensible a program for the development of our fisheries resources. The only thought, of course, which occurs to us is that if the governments of Canada had not waited eighty years to appoint their first British Columbian as minister of fisheries, progress might have been speeded up considerably.

The attitude of the minister reflects the extremely progressive outlook of the British Columbia fishing industry and the British Columbia fishermen. If the minister can imbue that spirit in the east, in those places to which the hon. member for St. John's West referred as the backward areas, I think the whole industry will benefit.

Great emphasis has been placed on conservation in the fishing industry. Effective conservation depends in large measure upon effective enforcement of the fishing laws. It is for this reason I am on my feet today. I have received a brief from the fishermen of the principal fishing town of my riding, protesting against the continuation of the practice of illegal sunken-net fishing for codfish. We in British Columbia speak so much about our salmon industry that there may be a tendency for people to forget our other fish. We catch halibut, tuna, cod and several species of ground fish in large quantities. The cod is the blue ling cod. It represents quite a source of income to fishermen generally. It is caught by hand lines, using small fish as bait.

There are several other means of catching these fish, which are ground fish, one of which is the use of a sunken net. This means a net hanging along the floor of the sea like a curtain, to intercept all types of ground fish. This method of fishing is illegal, except that in various parts of the province it is permitted for catching dogfish, which are a scavenger fish of no value except for the oil from their livers. This is a very easy method of catching all ground fish, including codfish, but the use of the sunken net to catch cod has always been illegal. Sunken nets are not allowed because they destroy so much of the fish. They catch not only the mature fish, but the immature fish which could have been thrown back if they were caught on a hand line. Moreover, the poacher who breaks the law in season is not too much concerned about fishing out of season either, and fishes when the greatest harm can be done, which is during the spawning season.

The fishermen in my riding are protesting about the slackness of enforcement of the law against sunken-net fishing for cod, and the small penalties imposed upon these fishermen when they are caught. I appreciate the fact that normally imposition of the penalty is not within the prerogative of a minister. But on the west coast of British Columbia, as I have said before, there are so many instances in which the department of Fisheries is policeman, prosecutor and judge, that it has a greater measure of control over penalties than any other department. Strict enforcement should not be difficult.

It is easy to recognize a sunken net, because it is so different from the ordinary net used to catch salmon. Salmon gill nets hang from wooden floats, like a curtain from the surface of the water, and they are kept vertical by light lead weights along the bottom edge. A sunken cod net is made up of long narrow strips of old salmon net. Large weights are placed along the bottom and small floats are used so that it sinks to the bottom but remains upright. A fisherman who has in his possession one of these long narrow nets, heavily weighted, is obviously in possession of a sunken net. The standard excuse of a man who is found in possession of a sunken net is that he had been using it in an authorized area. When a fisherman returns from an authorized area it would not be very difficult for him to report to the nearest patrol officer and get his sunken net registered. The patrol officers would know where these sunken nets were, and could easily check on their use.

The next thing to which I should like to refer is the use of otter trawls in the gulf of Georgia. These trawls are most destructive to all types of ground fish, because they are not selective. They catch the mature fish, the immature fish and the spawning fish. They also damage and destroy fish in the process of catching them. The fishermen in my riding, in the interests of conservation, urge the minister not to permit the further use of these otter trawls.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I should like to commend the minister on his statement today, and I join with the other British Columbia members in saying that we are not at all surprised at the capacity he has shown in this post. It is merely indicative of his success in other fields before he came to the House of Commons.

There is one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the house; I have already taken it up with the department. I should like to read to the minister an article that appeared in the press and was sent to me from my riding. It refers to this law-enforcement problem. The headline is, "Heavy penalties are imposed." It reads as follows:

> Edward Joseph, John Manson and Felix Thomas were sentenced to pay a fine of $200 each or to spend sixty days in jail by Magistrate T. Patterson last week.
> The case was the outcome of charges laid by the fisheries department against the three for having fish in their possession illegally, and obstructing a fisheries guardian in the performance of this duties. The latter charge was not pressed.

Incidentally the article also states that one of the prisoners has arranged to pay his fine, and the other two have left for the sunny vale of Oakalla prison farm. It is getting close to the Christmas season, and the harshness of these penalties has amazed me. I do not know what the fishermen of the maritime provinces would have to do before they would have a penalty such as that imposed upon them. As the minister well knows, the west coast of Vancouver island has been closed to seining this fall, in the interests of conservation, and with that course I have no quarrel. It seems to me, however, that this is an unnecessarily harsh sentence to impose upon native people where their only means of livelihood has been taken away from them. Only $41 worth of fish were involved in this seizure. As a matter of fact, their conviction depended almost entirely on circumstantial evidence.

It was maintained by the departmental officers out there that you could not catch cohoe salmon with a spoon, that they would have to be netted at this time of the year. That may or may not be true. I am not trying to argue the merits of the case as to whether the men were guilty or not; but it seems to me that under the circumstances the penalty that was imposed on them is unnecessarily harsh and severe. If the minister would be kind enough to do so, I should like him to take this matter up with his officials and look into all the circumstances surrounding the case. Then if he feels as I do, that an unduly severe penalty has been imposed, I would hope that he would take it up with the attorney general of the province of British Columbia and see if some part of this fine cannot be remitted. The least we can do is to see that these two native Indians out there do not spend their Christmas in prison.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The statement made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) reminds me of something that I should like to bring to the attention of the Department of Fisheries. Nearly every year in Charlotte county at the opening, on November 15, of the lobster season, which is the fall season, the fishermen will find the day of the 14th to be a fine day. At that time of the year it is hard to depend on the weather. If their traps are ready, along in the late part of the afternoon and early in the evening, they will try—as they have done in the past and as they will do in the future—to get these traps on the fishing grounds in order to start on the 15th. On many occasions I have known fisheries patrol boats to go out late in the afternoon or early evening of the 14th and find these traps on the fishing grounds. I have a bit of criticism to offer here.

Quite a long statement appeared in the Montreal Standard just recently saying that the fisheries department destroy the gear that belongs to the fishermen of the province of New Brunswick. I think perhaps that if some other way were found of disposing of fishermen's nets, traps or whatever gear it might be, instead of destroying them, it would leave a much better feeling with the people who are engaged in that industry. As to a fisherman who is overanxious and puts his traps out on the 14th, and they are found by an employee of the fisheries department, I would suggest that if a heavy fine were imposed rather than the destruction of his gear it would be a great deal better for all concerned. My reason for making that statement is this. A man may have 100 or 150 traps. He puts them out on the 14th. If an employee of the fisheries department destroys those traps, that man is not going to operate during that season. He may have a wife and four or five children. We do not know his circumstances. I believe it is entirely wrong for any department to destroy property. In other words, if something were seized by the customs department—we will say a car or whatever it might be—it is not taken out and burned; it is offered for sale. When traps are found that are being fished illegally, even though it is just a few hours before the legal season would open, I believe there could be found some other way of penalizing that fisherman than by destroying what he has to make a living with.

There is one other thing I want to bring to the minister's attention while I am on my feet, and it has been pointed out to him on previous occasions. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni mentioned illegal fishing out in his district. The crew of patrol boats on the Pacific coast in many cases are paid a living allowance while on board those boats. It may be that there is a good deal of patrolling and they have to work seven days a week; I do not know. But that same situation does not prevail in the maritime provinces. I have repeatedly asked for an explanation as to why patrol boats on the Pacific coast should provide living accommodation and food for the crew of the boat when the same thing does not apply on the Atlantic coast boats. I know of one particular patrol boat in my riding whose crew will be away two and three weeks at a time; they have to pay their own living expenses while on board the boat and keep a family at home. I think that is unfair. I believe the rule that applies on the Pacific coast should also apply on the Atlantic coast. I do not believe any line should be drawn between them. I believe that any crew of a patrol boat that is obliged to be away from home should be given the cost of living while on board that boat.

Mr. Brooks: I just wanted to ask the minister a question, but before doing so I also want to express my appreciation, as a maritimer, of what is being done in connection with the fisheries. I rather hesitate to say anything about it after listening to such men as the hon. member for Charlotte, who has been connected with fishing all his life and certainly is an expert in that matter. Listening to the discussion here this afternoon, however, one would think that the fishing industry was in splendid condition. But I have heard that the markets for fish are not the best. We know that you can sell lobster and other specialized varieties, but in general I think that the markets are not good, and I think it would be wrong to give the country the impression that, so far as the fishermen are concerned, the markets are in the best of condition. I think the minister is to be commended for trying to improve the markets, and I certainly hope that he succeeds.

The question I wished to ask was in connection with the difficulties that have arisen in the Northumberland strait between the fishermen and the law enforcement officers; what is the situation down there now? Are there more patrol boats or is there still a sort of civil war going on in that section of the country?

Mr. Mayhew: We have provided or are providing for three extra patrol boats for that district and we hope we will catch up with it. There has been a good deal of poaching going on this year both on the east and west coasts. To be perfectly honest, I have not much sympathy with those who have been doing it.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Mayhew: Yes.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Has poaching been carried on extensively in the bay of Fundy, or on the west side of the bay of Fundy?

Mr. Mayhew: No, it has not. But it seems as though every time a man who has been poaching or illegally fishing is caught, he seems to get quite a host of friends right away, and they come along and use all their influence. To hear some hon. members talking about the accused, they all seem to have large families; and I would not be surprised if they had three or four wives and that all the neighbours were depending on what they bring in from the sea. Where we have this illegal fishing, if we are going to stop it I think we must at some point be quite drastic about it. I do not think one needs to be drastic very often in order to make it effective. I do not want to be the judge. I am not the judge. As the Minister of Justice said the other day, we intend to make a change next year in our act so that the magistrate will have complete authority. He has complete authority now but the boats are confiscated and are turned over to us. He does not know whether we are going to turn them back, or going to sell them or what we are going to do. The result is that the magistrate will probably give a small fine, thinking that the balance of the punishment is going to come in the loss of the man's gear. Personally, I do not think that is right. The gear is his living and I think that if he is worth anything, it should go back to him and that the magistrate should be in a position to impose a maximum fine for the offence, whether it is a first, second or third one. I hope we shall be able to do that next year, and it will save us all a great deal of worry. I hope by that means we shall be able to stamp out some of this illicit fishing. I shall look up the report immediately in respect to what the hon. member said and see what can be done with it. In that case the fine seems to be fairly heavy. I understand that there are several offences in addition to the offence of illegal fishing.

Mr. Brooks: Are these three boats to remain in the area permanently or are they temporary?

Mr. Mayhew: They will be there permanently.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Again I should like to ask the minister to indicate whether he believes it is right to destroy fisherman's gear when he is found to be fishing out of season? Has the minister any sympathy with the destruction of fisherman's gear?

Mr. Mayhew: The situation there is that our inspectors are out in rather small boats. They pick up a number of lobster traps. The boat can only hold a certain number of lobster traps. If they were not destroyed they would have to come in, land the traps and go out again. In a good many instances the lobster traps are destroyed at sea where they are seized. It is done because the boats are not large enough to bring them in.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The boats that are on patrol in Charlotte county are sufficiently large to take care of forty or fifty lobster traps. When these traps are found the night before the legal season is to open, the rope, the traps and everything are destroyed. I believe that is a condition which the fisheries department should look into very carefully. As I said before, the owner of those traps may have a wife and four or five children. Lobster fishing is his only means of making a living during that season. Winter is coming on. Before the gear that belongs to him is destroyed, very careful consideration should be given to taking it ashore and at least giving him a chance to buy it back, or impose a fine which would perhaps convince him that he should not do it again.

Mr. McLure: With respect to the appointment of these guardians or fishery patrolmen, are the Royal Canadian Mounted Police employed in this work on Prince Edward Island as well as the ordinary people?

Mr. MacNaught: No.

Mr. McLure: No Royal Canadian Mounted Police are employed?

Mr. MacNaught: No.

Mr. McLure: Are they employed by the provincial government in fish protection?

Mr. MacNaught: I cannot answer that question with any degree of authority, but in some instances I believe members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are engaged by the provincial authorities for some of their protection work.

Mr. McLure: I should like to give the hon. member for Charlotte a little information. In May or July of last year in one part of the country fishermen were fishing a little before the opening of the season or a little after, I do not know which it was now, and they were fined around $20 by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They caught them in the act. They took their gear from them, but since it was election time in that locality the fine was returned and all their expenses.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I was afraid of that.

Item agreed to.

105. Oyster and clam culture, $73,700.

Mr. McLure: I want to find out something about the tariff on clams going into the United States. On the Pacific coast they ship into the United States a clam called the razor clam. That clam goes into that country under a 10 per cent duty on the Canadian selling price. But when you come to the Atlantic coast, where we have an abundance of clams, you run up against practically an embargo when you ship clams into the United States. There is a tariff of 35 per cent on the United States selling price. Can the minister give me any information on that, or can he find out whether there is a difference of from 10 per cent to 35 per cent on the valuation, which makes it almost impossible for a shipper in the maritime provinces to establish a sales price in the United States because he has to pay a duty on whatever the customs of the United States say their selling price is? On top of that 35 per cent is added.

Mr. Mayhew: I have not all the answers to the tariff. I do not know what the items are or what the rate is, but we shall look into it and see what we can do about it. What the hon. member referred to applies to a number of items in the United States tariff.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to get some information on the progress being made by the department in the culture of oysters. In the Northumberland strait around Prince Edward Island we have perhaps as good oyster waters as can be found anywhere in the world. The information I have is that the oyster industry has not increased in recent years as it should have. From time to time the department has sent out reports of the great possibilities in the culture of oysters and of the large number of barrels of oysters that could be produced on each acre if it were properly cultivated. I should like a report from the minister as to the progress that is being made. The estimate for this service has been increased by $22,000. The appropriation in the main estimates is $73,700.

Mr. MacNaught: In reply to the hon. member for Cumberland I might point out that the department, through its biological board, is doing everything possible to stimulate production of oysters. At the present time the greatest problem is the production of seed for the growth of oysters. I may say that the department and the board are doing their very utmost to carry on experiments and generally improve oyster development in the maritime provinces.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Can the parliamentary assistant inform the committee what progress has been made in the county of Cumberland, in the Malagash district and the Wallace district which have excellent natural oyster waters? I understand that artificial beds have been established there, which have been looked after for a number of years. I should like to know what progress has been made and what production has been obtained from some of these artificially cultivated waters.

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to inform the hon. member for Cumberland that although we have established a station in his constituency I have not before me a copy of the report. The production for Northumberland strait in 1946 was 3,100 barrels, in 1947 it was 2,400 and in 1948 it was 3,500.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): These figures indicate no great progress is being made.

Mr. MacNaught: There is an increase of 400 barrels over 1946.

Fisheries research board of Canada—
106. Operation and maintenance, $1,132,040.

Mr. Catherwood: The minister said this morning he was going to give some consideration to research into conditions in the fresh water fisheries. Would he enlarge upon that?

Mr. Mayhew: We have made arrangements with the prairie provinces to have investigations so far as whitefish are concerned, and also with respect to the beluga whale and the Arctic char. These are the chief ones. Then, in the Northwest Territories, we have put a boat in there this year, and we are now putting up a station for research work.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Black (Cumberland).]

Fisheries research board of Canada—
107. Construction and improvements, $181,800.

Mr. Sinclair: This is the item upon which, since I have been here, I have made a speech each year asking for the construction of a small dam near the mouth of Sakinaw lake. Looking back on my speeches it seems that they have gone in cycles—a long speech and then a short speech. Last year, fortunately for the house, was my year of the long speech.

Let me say that I was gratified to have enlisted the interest of the hon. member for Lethbridge. The same thing happens this year as had occurred before. Members of fishing ridings have their day in court on the last day, or the day before the last, in the session. Everyone is very anxious to get home. The wheat farmers spent two or three months discussing wheat problems, but now everyone wants us to be quiet so that they may go home.

The hon. member for Lethbridge has given me encouragement to go ahead and speak again. However I shall be brief, particularly if the minister will give me the assurance that in this item 107, for which no details are given, but in which there is an increase of about $28,000, there is provision for this small dam concerning which so many assurances have been given, and which unfortunately I have passed on to the fishermen in my riding.

Mr. Mayhew: The hon. member spoke about the Sakinaw dam and Sakinaw creek last year. We promised to have it investigated, and have spent some time in making that investigation. This is a marginal case, the decision being as to whether we should go ahead or not. We have decided to recommend the building of a dam on the creek, and we are now awaiting instructions or an agreement with the Indian affairs branch as to whether we can have access to the creek. I believe there will be no difficulty as soon as that permission has been obtained. At that time we will go ahead.

Item agreed to.

109. To provide for Canadian share of expenses of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission appointed under treaty dated May 26, 1930, between Canada and the United States for the protection, preservation and extension of the sockeye salmon fisheries of the Fraser river system, $169,500.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I should like to refer to the excellent work being done by the international commission on the Fraser river. I would refer particularly to the good work of a member of that commission, Mr. Olof Hanson, a former member of the House of Commons from Skeena.

Item agreed to.

111. To provide for transportation, dressing and dyeing and other expenses incidental to receiving and disposing of fur seal skins accruing to Canada pursuant to provisional fur seal agreement between Canada and the United States by exchange of notes dated December 26, 1947, $550,000.

Mr. McLure: How many skins have there been from the Pribilofs for 1949? What was Canada's share? The take in general was smaller, I understand.

Mr. MacNaught: Our share last year was 14,178. Of that number 65 per cent went to St. Louis, 25 per cent to London and 10 per cent to Toronto. A London firm is opening a curing factory in Toronto. We are giving them 10 per cent of the sealskins we had this year so that they may get started and see what success they can have in the curing of sealskins in this country.

Mr. McLure: What are the costs of dyeing and processing of skins sent to England, those sent to the United States, and also to Canada?

Mr. MacNaught: There is very little difference in the actual cost of dyeing and curing the skins in either St. Louis or in England. There has been a difference in the price received for skins from England and those from St. Louis. Speaking generally, the St. Louis skins have brought a higher price.

Item agreed to.

112. To provide for the destruction of harbour seals, $30,000.

Mr. Higgins: Is this by way of bounty?

Mr. MacNaught: This is for the destruction of harbour seals. Originally harbour seals were destroyed because they destroyed fishermen's nets. It has been found recently however that they act as host to the worm in codfish. That is the chief reason for their destruction today.

Mr. Higgins: And that is a bounty?

Mr. MacNaught: Yes.

Mr. Higgins: Why has it not been increased? I notice it is for the same amount.

Mr. MacNaught: It is proposed that it be increased in future years, but for the present year the bounty is the same.

Mr. Higgins: I should think an increase would be required in the future, because there is a much greater area to take in now. We have great difficulty with these harbour seals.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What proportion is paid out in the different provinces, particularly Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island? Is this all for the east coast, or is it partly for the west coast?

Mr. MacNaught: This table will give the information for the fiscal year 1945-46:

Province	Unit	No. of seals
Nova Scotia
	Unit A, Inverness	1
	Unit B, Richmond	36
	Unit C, Pictou, Antigonish and Guysborough	111
	Halifax	108
	Lunenburg-Queens	173
	Shelburne-Yarmouth	62
	Cumberland-Colchester	78
Prince Edward Island
	Queens county	141
New Brunswick
	Saint John-Charlotte	226
	Restigouche-Gloucester	21
	Northumberland	43
	Albert-Westmorland	3
		1,003
British Columbia		1,078
		2,081

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The bonus paid was $5 per seal?

Mr. MacNaught: Yes.

Mr. McLure: Is there any hope of having the bonus to fishermen increased?

Mr. MacNaught: That would not come under this item.

Item agreed to.

Special—

113. To provide for the extension of educational work in co-operative producing and selling among fishermen, $80,000.

Mr. Bryce: Where was the money voted under this item spent last year, and where is it intended to be spent this coming year? Could not some of this money be spent in Manitoba? The fishermen there need education in the co-operative movement just as much as those anywhere else. I had the good fortune to visit Nova Scotia and had the opportunity of seeing what has been done there.

Mr. Mayhew: Manitoba operates its own fisheries, and, as we are not responsible, the question would be better directed to the Manitoba government.

Mr. Bryce: That is what is said year after year. This is a federal vote to cover educational work for which the Department of Fisheries is responsible, and I think all fishermen should be entitled to participate in the benefits. I make this appeal again. The minister's predecessor made the same answer, but I think some of this money should be expended for educational work in Manitoba.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): What amount is expended on fresh-water fish propagation and salt-water fish propagation?

Mr. MacNaught: We have no such statistical information as is asked for by the hon. member. Many fish hatcheries are operated in the maritime provinces to assist in the development of fresh-water fisheries, including salmon and trout. In connection with salt-water fishing, expenditures are made for inspectors, biological boards, and so on.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Are any salt-water fish hatcheries operated in Canada?

Mr. MacNaught: The only hatchery for fish going into salt water would be the salmon hatchery.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Are the benefits under this vote being extended to Newfoundland?

Mr. Mayhew: The expenditures are as follows:

St. Francis Xavier university	$46,000
Social economic service, Quebec	24,000
University of British Columbia	10,000

Item agreed to.

114. To provide for the administration expenses of the Fisheries Prices Support Act, 1944, $170,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): This is a rather large amount for administration. I should like to know how much has been spent in the support of fish prices.

Mr. Mayhew: This is the administration item, and then there is an item of $538,989 to cover fish purchased by the board.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Is it costing $170,000 to expend $500,000? Are no expenditures being made on the east coast?

Mr. Mayhew: This is all for the east coast, and this item is a little more than half of what was actually spent. The balance will not show up until next year's estimates. The total spent in the maritime provinces was in the neighbourhood of $1,250,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Something over $1 million was spent to support prices in the maritime provinces?

Mr. Mayhew: Yes.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Where is that fish stored?

Mr. Mayhew: It has all been disposed of. Some of it went to UNRRA, some of it went to the Far East, and some to hospitals in Canada.

Mr. Wright: I think all members are agreed as to the principle behind the Fisheries Prices Support Act, but many of us are worried about when it may terminate. I believe the present legislation terminates on March 31, 1950. We have on the order paper a resolution, which apparently we are not going to reach this session, providing for an extension of the act and stating that it shall expire on the dissolution of the twenty-first parliament. That means that the price support in connection with both fisheries and agricultural products will terminate whenever the Prime Minister may see fit to dissolve parliament, which appears to be a very poor basis on which to support these products.

I wanted to ask the minister why, in this case, to administer a $25 million fund the cost should be $170,000 while in connection with the support of agricultural products, where the board is administering a $200 million fund, the cost is only $60,000. There seems to be quite a discrepancy. I understand the amount that may be expended is $25 million though only a small portion of that sum has been spent as yet.

Mr. Mayhew: I cannot be responsible for what other departments do, but thus far our administration costs are higher than those in connection with the agricultural prices support program. This arises because the Department of Fisheries lacks the machinery of investigation and administration that the Department of Agriculture has in its dairy products board, meat board and so on. In other words we had to set up and organize a whole department and had to cover practically the whole of Canada. These figures do not tell the whole story, which cannot be made known until the whole job is completed. Then we will be able to see what it has cost.

As far as the legislation is concerned, there is no date of termination in our act. I hope there will be, because I look forward to getting on a better basis for assisting the fishermen than the basis we have now. Out of the million and a quarter we spent in the maritime provinces the fishermen would not get more than fifteen per cent, and I think there are many other ways in which we can help the fishermen so they will get a greater proportion of the money actually spent.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I do not want to hold up the minister; he has given us a great deal of information and has been very good in answering questions, so I think the committee would like to see his estimates go through. However, I should like to know how much of the fish purchased was actually dumped; and I should like to know also if this board is still in existence, with the expenses going on, notwithstanding the fact that the minister says there is no fish now in storage.

Mr. Mayhew: No fish was actually dumped. Some cases that came in blew up; they were not properly packed in the first place, and those had to be disposed of, but those were the only cases that were dealt with in that way.

Mr. Brooks: The fish were given away, I understand; there was no market for them.

Mr. Mayhew: There was no market. We could have disposed of them on the market here, but we would have hurt that market as far as the fishermen were concerned, so we gave the fish away. The International Red Cross committee got $240,000 worth; gifts to Canadian public service institutions totalled $297,000, and $13,708 worth were sold, making a total of $538,989.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I have another question—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Selkirk.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I have a question along the line—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. gentleman must realize that other hon. members would like to ask questions also. The hon. member for Selkirk.

Mr. Bryce: I should like to continue a little further along that line. In reply to the hon. member for St. John's East I believe the minister said most of the fish bought by the support board was given away. I do not want anyone to misunderstand me; I was in favour of that legislation and I am still in favour of it, but I do not like to see the packing companies get good lake Winnipeg whitefish for one and one-fifth cents per pound. I have a return the minister was good enough to furnish, stating that 2,300,000 pounds were sold to packing companies for $28,000, which worked out at about one and one-fifth cents per pound. Nearly a million pounds were sold as fox and mink food, for which they got about one and a half cents a pound, and in the Toronto retail market about a thousand pounds of our good whitefish were sold at around 12 cents a pound. That was really good fish. There was absolutely nothing wrong with it, and I would rather see it given away than sold at those prices. I happened to be in Winnipeg when it was being unloaded at the packing plant, and I should have liked to see it go to needy families, or to UNRRA, or to some of those people I saw a few weeks ago in Britain who were so hungry for good fish. I wonder if the minister would enlarge on that briefly and say whether practically the whole of the Manitoba catch went to the packing plants.

Mr. Mayhew: We could not have given the lake Winnipeg fish to any institutions outside Canada. It was frozen fish, and could not have been shipped. The tullibee was not fit for sale, could not be sold on any market, and that was given for fox feed. We could not dispose of the whitefish in any other way, and the packing companies agreed to process it and put it into meal, so it was not sold to the public. There was no possible chance of distributing that fish at that time of the year so people could make use of it.

Mr. Bryce: Have you any in storage now?

Mr. Mayhew: No, we have nothing left; it is all cleaned out.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I would like to repeat my question as to whether the staff is still being paid at the rate of $170,000 a year, in view of the statement by the minister that no fish is now held in storage by the department.

Mr. Mayhew: A reorganization of the staff is going on at the present time. Some have been transferred to other branches, and we are cutting down as much as we can.

Item agreed to.

115. To provide for assistance in the construction of vessels of the dragger and/or long liner type, subject to such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council, $100,000.

Mr. MacInnis: I notice that the amount under this item last year was $200,000. If the minister has the information I should like to know how much was expended last year, the construction of how many vessels was assisted, and the names of the firms or individuals who built them.

Mr. MacNaught: I can give the hon. member the names of the vessels,—oh, it was the expenditure that he desired. In the year 1949-50, up to October 21, the expenditure was $44,175. From the beginning of the year 1948 up to date, it is $134,072.

Mr. MacInnis: What was the name of the firm, and how many vessels?

Mr. MacNaught: Twenty-two groups of fishermen.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Church: I am making my last speech this session on the committee stage of these bills. I hope we shall be able to close by Thursday night. I speak now for many reasons in connection with this work on divorce. I was a member of the private bills committee of the House of Commons for many years past and I wish to object to our being asked to pass these bills. I am a humble member of the Church of England. I believe that we should have some better and fairer consideration of this great problem. The problem is not ours. It has arisen since confederation. I wish to refer to two or three matters with regard to these bills tonight, and as to the way we do this business.

In the first place I wish to say this with regard to these particular bills. I am going to speak for only a few minutes. I do not wish to talk the bills out; far from it. I wish to raise a great problem in this committee about this question which is causing such wide differences of opinion among the people of this country. I have sat as a member of the private bills committee for many years past since I entered the house. While I believe it is desirable that we should close up as soon as possible, I wish to direct the attention of the committee for only a few minutes this evening to this question. Divorce is a canker in the state. It follows every great war. The Addington administration faced it away back in 1801 after the Peace of Amiens. Then the two Pitts faced the same problem. In connection with this work I might say that when the Constitutional Act was passed in 1791 we adopted in this country so much of the law as was adapted to our circumstances, with the result that after the Constitutional Act of 1791 we copied the common law of England in this country.

Divorce, I repeat, is a canker in the state. There is no doubt about that. The church to which I belong does not believe in it. I am only a humble member. While I am a Protestant I have great respect for the other Christian churches which labour so hard for the good of the people of this country.

In the first place, the principle is all wrong. Why should I be asked to pass all these bills in the manner indicated? I doubt if any other hon. members who had sat as long as I have as a member of the private bills committee would put up with it any longer. Why are we asked to pass these bills without any evidence before us? I wish to point out this fact. I was a member of the committee for a great many years. At the Lambeth conference in England a commission was appointed to study this question in the old country. The members of the Church of England believe in the injunction, "Those whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder", and I think it is a matter of practical good sense. The Right Hon. and Most Rev. Bishop Wand, as many hon. members know, succeeded Bishop Winnington-Ingram, who has many relatives in Ontario and throughout Canada. Bishop Ingram was the great bishop of London who worked so hard among the poorer classes in the London district for many years. He was succeeded by Bishop Wand who is the present Bishop of London and a member of the House of Lords. He was appointed only recently, and he made an address in Toronto on this question. As I said in the spring session in this house, he was appointed after a great deal of study of this problem. Who suffers as a result of this procedure? I contend it is the duty of the state to look after the wives and the children. Why should they be left, as the right reverend gentleman said in Toronto in an interview? He also preached on other matters in St. James Anglican cathedral in Toronto. The Bishop of London has found that divorce is a canker in the state, that it results in the state having to look after those who suffer. The women and the children of those who are divorced suffer every year as a consequence of these divorce bills. It follows every war. The present Bishop of London has entered on a tour of America. As I said last spring, he has made a great study of this particular problem. I know that the members of the other Christian churches in this country and many of those who are not members of those churches have also done the same thing.

On October 18, 1949, I said, as reported at page 908 of Hansard:

> In the church to which I belong, as a humble member—and that is the Church of England—the belief is this: those whom God has joined together, let no man put asunder. That was the principle of the conference in England for a great many years. Recently a commission appointed by the houses of parliament has been considering this whole problem. It is presided over by the Right Hon. and Right Reverend William Charles Wand, Bishop of London, who succeeded Bishop Winnington-Ingram. Over there, because of the way the country has been devastated by war, and for other reasons, the desire seems to be to extend the principle of divorce to include a great many things that were not considered before as grounds for it; one of these is desertion, and there are seven or eight other matters connected with it. I was glad to hear some of the members here tonight speak on this matter.
> Let me say this one thing further. In my humble opinion the state should do something to look after the wives and the children. Every state has people of this type. After every war it has these people and they are a direct charge on the municipality. I know that because I was head of a municipality. I know that they become a charge on the municipality not only for school purposes but for housing and many other matters like that. I believe that the time is coming when we should have some other system adopted by parliament for this work. When I was on that committee I noticed that we knew nothing about the bills. There is a principle of Roman law to the effect that marriage is a contract. The common law of England has been largely copied from Roman law. That has been the principle which has been adopted in this country also. It seems to me that we should provide a better system accordingly.
> In connection with this matter I want to point out that there is in existence a registration system. While I admit that it cannot be so in the province of Quebec, there is a registration system operated by the provinces. For what? For deaths and marriages. They have a register with the town or village clerk to that effect. In a great many of the provinces that law regarding these matters might prevail also; but in Quebec I admit that there is a different principle involved. No one wants to change their law. Far from it. I would never try to change their law because I believe that the majority of the people are entitled to have their say themselves.
> In conclusion, may I say that I think we should have a conference of the two houses of parliament, because it has been largely the prerogative of the Senate to hear and examine witnesses and all that sort of thing. I do not believe in the system. In the United States, after many wars, divorce is becoming a canker in almost every state. As I say, it follows largely as a result of wars. There is a registration system for deaths and marriages in existence in some of the provinces. I do not see why that system cannot be adopted. No doubt a different system would be required in the great province of Quebec. The archbishop who was investigating this question is travelling in the United States at the present time. He succeeded Bishop Winnington-Ingram, the great bishop of London, England. He is visiting the United States at the present moment and is going into all these questions. He recognizes that the divorce laws should be extended to include desertion.

I think there is something to be said in favour of that. I do not wish to occupy the time of the committee any further, Mr. Chairman. On page 224 of the Canada Year Book of last year, under the heading of "Vital Statistics", the following appears:

For many years after confederation, the number of divorces in Canada was very small. It was less than 20 in every year before 1900. There were 23 divorces in 1903, 51 in 1909 and 60 in 1913. These numbers were less than 1 per 1,000 of the yearly number of marriages.

One effect of the first world war was to increase the number of divorces. The generally unsettled conditions and the long separation between men on active service and their wives contributed to this increase. Changes in law and procedure which made it easier to obtain divorce was a further factor. At present, Quebec is the only province in which applicants for divorce must secure a private act of parliament.

There were 114 divorces in Canada in 1918 and 608 in 1926; the number had increased to 700 by 1931, 1,570 by 1936 and 2,369 by 1940. In every year since then the number has been higher than in the year before. The figures for the most part cover only final decrees of dissolution of marriage which alone constitute divorces; annulments and legal separations are excluded.

The statistics of dissolutions of marriage were revised in 1941 with the co-operation of the provincial authorities and the clerk of the divorce committee of the Senate of Canada.

In Ontario the high court judges are disgusted with the whole business. They want divorces transferred to the county court judges. The percentages have gone up. There is nothing further I can say. A divorce court was established in Prince Edward Island in 1945, and figures for 1946 are shown in the table I have before me. These figures represent less than one-tenth of one per cent.

In my view the House of Commons in all fairness should adopt separate principles for this work. We should not pass these bills seriatim. We should not pass them in the manner indicated, because we do not know anything about these cases. As I said before, it is the wives and children who will suffer, and who will become a charge upon the state accordingly.

PRAIRIE TRANSMISSION LINES LIMITED

The house resumed from Tuesday, November 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benidickson for the second reading of Bill No. 119, to incorporate Prairie Transmission Lines Limited, and the amendment thereto of Mr. MacInnis.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had to speak on any of these bills. I propose to speak on this one tonight.

In the first place I am in favour of the building of a pipe line. I say "a" pipe line because I believe that only one will be built. If that is so, I do not see any reason for the granting of so many charters for the building of potential pipe lines. We are told that several of these charters are being applied for in order that there may be certain manipulation in regard to financial matters, and that in that respect some of these applications are not what they appear to be on the surface.

I am no judge of that. I am in favour of the building of a pipe line or of pipe lines if, by so doing, there shall be an increase in the public service,—if, for example, it may result in the cheapening of the price of fuel oil and gasoline to those people who require it. The question is: Will the building of this pipe line or any other pipe lines, for that matter, accomplish this object? I have noticed particularly of late in the oil business in western Canada indication of a getting together in the matter of price on the part of the largest oil companies, a procedure which I think is not justified by the ease with which some of the oil is transported.

It is an admitted fact that the building of a pipe line should ease the transportation of fuel. But I wonder whether that will result in a consequent easing of prices and the elimination of what I would call manipulation of prices. In my own city of Saskatoon there are three major oil companies supplying fuel oil to consumers. It was shown that it cost one of those companies eight cents a gallon to transport their oil to a refinery and back to Saskatoon. On the other hand there are two other companies the expenses of which are much different. Yet we find that the final price to the door of the consumer is one and the same.

Furthermore, the city of Regina, which is much farther from Lloydminster, the source of supply, is enjoying a price of 14·6 cents a gallon, while in Saskatoon the consumer is paying 18 cents for fuel oil. I would be more in favour of granting charters to these companies than I am now if I were sure that the easing of the transportation problem would result in lower prices and in less of that sort of price manipulation.

Another thought occurs to me. Will the granting of this charter guarantee that such a pipe line will be built? Again I use as an example my city of Saskatoon, and tell the house about an experience we had. Just before the last war broke out a certain gas company, the name of which I shall not give, received a franchise to transport natural gas to my city of Saskatoon. Some people were so sure they would have this gas that they made arrangements to change their stoves from coal-burning to gas-burning.

The war broke out and, under certain clauses in the franchise, these people were able to get out of their contract during the duration of the war. They had put up a large sum of money with the city as a guarantee. We thought naturally that after the war was over the power granted under the franchise would be exercised. But that has not happened, and since the war Saskatoon has been waiting for its supply of natural gas.

Someone will say, "Is that not a legal matter? These people can be sued and damages collected." I am not learned in legal procedure, but I have learned through my experience that such procedure is somewhat slow and tortuous. Up to the present time Saskatoon has no gas, and so far as I know there is no prospect of getting any.

I give these facts as an example of a franchise which was granted, and nothing done about it. Another feature I should like to mention in regard to pipe lines is that a pipe line, by its very nature, is in itself a transportation system, just the same as is a railway. As such, in my opinion, it should be used by other people in addition to those who have obtained the franchise to construct the pipe line. Therefore one of the first questions I would ask with respect to this or any other pipe line is: Is this pipe line, or is it not, to be a public carrier? We have no guarantee of that.

When we ask such a question we are told that we have to address our question to the board of transport commissioners after the line has been built. I suggest we should address our question in the same manner as we should address the question as to the geographical position of the line—not after it has been built, but before. Another thing

I should like to suggest is that as this pipe line is a transportation system, it should be publicly owned. There are certain things about which I am worried in regard to this particular pipe line bill and there are certain questions I should like to ask.

If refineries other than those controlled by the company constructing the pipe line are to have the use of the pipe line, will there be regulations regarding such public service and as to the amount of outside material that may be carried by the pipe line in proportion to the amount of material owned by the company constructing the pipe line? Next, provided the company has or builds refineries along the route of the pipe line sufficient to refine the total capacity of the pipe line, can it then refuse to handle oil transportation for other companies?

Next, if pipe line capacity is allocated on a percentage basis can the company arrange its own chronology as to deliveries? Most hon. members are aware that on the western prairies there is a season of heavy demand for oil and a slack season. Will the company owning a line of this kind be able to use the line for its own purposes during the season of heavy demand and then permit the pipe line to be used by other refineries during the less valuable time?

Can the company insist that the percentage allocated to refineries other than its own shall be delivered on the prairies during the non-agricultural months? Can it be incorporated in the legislation that the percentage delivered to other refineries shall be on a year-round or a day by day or a month by month basis?

The building of this pipe line or of other potential pipe lines is a matter of concern to many organizations in my part of the country. I have the resolution which was sent to me by the trades and labour council of Saskatoon, which reads:

Whereas Canadian natural resources should be exploited for the benefit of all Canadians and Canada should endeavour to become a self-supporting industrial nation having all its resources under its complete control, and

Whereas, it is planned that the proposed pipe line is to be partly built—

This resolution refers to a different pipe line.

—and terminate on American soil making it no longer an all-Canadian enterprise.

Whereas, our dollar has been devaluated and we are spending $200 million annually buying oil from the United States, thus using American dollars, and

Whereas, an all-Canadian route for the proposed pipe line would employ Canadian labour in its construction and maintenance and would largely employ Canadian ships and sailors to transport this oil to the refinery with the prospect of a refinery at the lake-head with all its benefits to Canadian citizens.

[Mr. Knight.]

As I say, this resolution really refers to another pipe line but I am reading it in order to bring out my point that it is the concern of a great number of Canadian citizens that all of these pipe lines shall be built on Canadian soil. The resolution continues:

Therefore be it resolved, that this Saskatoon trades and labour council urge all its local unions to press the government to make this oil pipe line an all-Canadian route, and Further be it resolved, that this resolution be forwarded to the Honourable C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, asking him to use his influence with the government to take action to ensure the above undertaking.

They realized that the influence of Mr. Howe with the government is great and perhaps in that regard they are making something of an understatement. To summarize, may I say that I consider these pipe lines should be publicly owned as they concern public transportation. Second, if a pipe line is built it should provide service to companies other than the one building the pipe line. Third, any pipe line should be built on Canadian soil for its entire distance.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in the bill before us tonight for consideration we find an opportunity to renew the debate upon the application to incorporate a gas pipe line company by the name of Prairie Transmission Lines Limited. This company proposes to build a pipe line for the transportation of natural gas from Alberta, through the United States of America, with the primary object of serving the Pacific coast United States cities of Seattle, Tacoma and Portland, with any surplus being made available to Vancouver. We have before us for immediate consideration an amendment to the motion for second reading moved by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). This amendment will be found on page 2103 of Hansard of November 22, 1949, and reads:

That Bill No. 119 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house further consideration of this bill should be deferred until the house has been assured that the route of any pipe line built by the proposed company will be laid out so as to serve Canadian requirements before any such pipe line leaves Canadian soil.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver East upon that amendment because better than any speech or words that could have been used it places the issue squarely before us. At this point may I say that I intend to stop in time for a vote to be taken on the amendment. The issue is whether we shall insist on Canadian resources being used first to serve Canadian development, or whether we shall consent to the exploitation and exportation of our resources for the benefit and extension primarily of other interests. That is the whole question and it seems to me that the issue raised by the amendment goes far beyond the mere question of whether we shall incorporate a company. The issue involves the control and development of Canada's resources.

Those of us who have spoken in opposition to the incorporation of this particular company are doing more than speak against an individual incorporation. I realize that it has been said that there is a filibuster against a private bill, but I would point out that this is the first opportunity that has been afforded the house to debate the method of handling a tremendous new resource which has been made available to the Canadian people. The two private bills which have been before the house this session seeking the incorporation of companies to handle natural gas afford the first opportunity we have had to consider fully the policy that will govern the development, exploitation and transportation of this huge Canadian resource.

Those who are sponsoring the bill before the house tonight have taken the position that we should not oppose the incorporation of this particular company or of the other company that has been before us. They say that is the only principle involved in the bill, whether or not the house is going to grant incorporation to a company in order that it may subsequently make its application to the board of transport commissioners and the government of Alberta for permission to carry gas.

Far more than that is involved in this and the other bill now before the house. But if that were the only principle I would have no hesitation in saying that I am opposed to that principle, because I am opposed to the incorporation by this parliament of any company for the purpose of transporting and supplying to ultimate consumers elsewhere a Canadian natural resource, when the company through the sponsor of the bill will not give the assurance that the route will be through Canada and will serve Canada first.

Mr. Robinson: What about the bill last year?

Mr. Fulton: When the bill went through last year we knew at the time the company was incorporated that the route would be all-Canadian; but the assurance we have asked for with respect to this bill, as to whether this line will follow an all-Canadian route and serve Canada first, to my knowledge has not been given.

Mr. Robinson: The hon. member speaks of an assurance given in connection with the bill that went through last year. Is it not true that this assurance was given in committee; and is not the hon. member right now preventing this bill from going to committee?

Mr. Fulton: I am coming to that point now, because that assurance, wherever given, was given, and the public statements of the company agreed that it would be an all-Canadian route. On the other hand we have before us a statement by this company which indicates clearly that they do not propose to build their line through Canada. So it does not seem necessary to permit this bill to go to committee in order to establish something which is already established in the advertisements issued by this company.

In his statement in moving second reading the hon. member sponsoring the bill laid before the house the proposition that the route of the company is not involved in this motion. At page 1344 of Hansard for November 1 of this year he said:

> I wish to make it clear that the passing of this bill does not in any way establish routes for the transmission lines for this company.

He went on to say:

> As I say, as far as federal jurisdiction is concerned, under the direction of this parliament it was ordered in the last session that routes must be decided upon by the board of transport commissioners.

In my submission that statement is not strictly accurate, and I shall deal with it a little later in discussing the general Pipe Lines Act. Then at page 1345 the hon. member went on:

> I should like to inform the house that the bill has nothing to do with routes.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly true that the bill before us makes no mention of routes; but the advertising put out by the company does deal with routes, and lays out the route this company proposes to follow. The advertisement appeared in the Calgary Herald of August 11, 1949. I believe it has been read to the house already, so perhaps I need not read it in full, but it sets out that the purpose of the company is to transport or transmit natural and artificial gas and oil in the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, commencing at a point in the general Calgary area in the province of Alberta and thence to a point in the vicinity of Blairmore in the said province and thence to a point in the vicinity of Kingsgate in the province of British Columbia and thence to the United States of America, leaving Canada at a point at or near Kingsgate in the said province of British Columbia and re-entering Canada in the vicinity of Blaine in the state of Washington. This means that for by far the greater portion of its distance the line would go through the United States; and as we know from other public statements of the company its purpose is primarily to supply those United States Pacific coast cities of which mention has been made already.

So the advertisements and public statements of this company make their object perfectly clear; and it is that object to which I am opposed, for the reasons I have stated. I believe it is our responsibility as members of the Canadian parliament to see to it that Canada's resources are used for Canada's benefit. I do not say we should adopt the selfish attitude of saying, "You cannot have anything of which we have an abundance", but that we should adopt the attitude of saying, "We are going to use our resources for ourselves first, to fulfil our own requirements. Then we shall be willing to export our surplus to you; in fact we shall be willing to co-operate with you in a proper division of our resources". That is not what this bill does. The purpose of this bill is to export the gas to the United States first; then if anything is left over it will be sent back to Vancouver, entirely by-passing the interior areas of British Columbia.

In opposing that principle I should like to lay before the house some words which seem to me to contain a very clear statement of the attitude and sentiments of those who share my opinions in this respect. This statement is contained in the December, 1949, issue of a publication put out by Ross Whittall Limited, of Vancouver. In dealing with natural gas development in this country it says:

> Where the railways brought industries during the last half century so should natural gas bring them during the next, for it provides cheap thermal units at a fraction of the cost of transit.

I ask hon. members on all sides, who at least will sympathize with us in the vision we have as to the development of our province and the western half of our nation, to listen to these words:

> New towns should grow and, if our province has nearly doubled its population in the last decade, what may be the expectancy of the next? We then foresee the pipe lines providing valuable U.S. dollar exports to central Washington and to the U.S.A. Pacific seaboard and we know that these American populations will not grudge us our contention that first Alberta and then neighbouring Canadian provinces benefit from our newly-found economic stimulant. Geologists are satisfied that there is plenty for all; indeed we believe that one of the largest sources of supply may lie close to recently proved reserves beneath the Peace river block in British Columbia and Alberta. . . . but let us make sure that, wherever we find it, our Canadian natural gas serves and opens up the maximum quantity of our own country before it benefits the neighbouring states of America.

And, Mr. Speaker, the only time and place that responsibility which it is our duty to exercise here as members of this parliament can be exercised is now, in this House of Commons, in opposing this and other similar bills which seek to export gas first to the United States. If this bill were given approval we would lose control of the gas from here on. It would go to the United States, and from then on would become a United States resource not subject to Canadian control and of no use for the development of Canada.

Some hon. members have said it is not for this parliament to oppose the incorporation of this company, that we should leave it to the Alberta government to decide whether or not the gas will be exported to the United States, that they have the necessary legislation and the necessary machinery. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, it would be most unfair to impose upon the Alberta government the responsibility of saying whether or not their resources will be exported from Canada. The concern of that government is to make sure there is sufficient of their natural resources left in their province to take care of their own requirements. It is not their concern to prohibit its transportation from that province to the United States. A reading of the Alberta act shows that they are concerned mainly with the preservation of a supply, not the control of where any surplus goes, if there is a surplus, once it leaves the province.

It is said, "Well, leave it to the board of transport commissioners; let them say what the route of the pipe line should be; let that body take the responsibility of saying whether it should be kept in Canada or exported to the United States". I point out to the sponsor of the bill, who made that suggestion, that there is no provision in the Pipe Lines Act which would empower the board of transport commissioners to take that into consideration, in saying whether or not approval shall be given to a company. There is a reference in section 9 of the Pipe Lines Act covering approval of the route, but that act does contemplate the export of gas. It contemplates a gas pipe line going to the international border, and crossing into the United States. It is inherent in the act.

I am sure the sponsor of the bill, who is a lawyer, would agree with me that it would be beyond the powers of the board of transport commissioners to say that, merely because the route contemplates the international transportation of gas, they will not approve the application. The Pipe Lines Act itself contemplates an international gas pipe line. We cannot leave it to the Alberta government; we cannot leave it to the board of transport commissioners to decide whether or not a gas pipe line should serve Canada first before the gas is exported to the United States. There is only one place where that can be decided under the present set-up, and that is in this parliament. It must be decided, by our insistence as legislators dealing with the matter, that the route should be through Canada. There is only one way in which we can accomplish that result, and that is by insisting that there be embodied in the act incorporating the company a provision that the route shall pass over Canadian soil, and that the gas shall be used first to supply Canadian needs. Then, the surplus could be exported to the United States.

Mr. Robinson: Did you insist upon that for the company that was here last year?

Mr. Fulton: I have answered my hon. friend with respect to the company that came last year; it undertook to build a Canadian route.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Fulton: As I have stated before, I feel that the issue before the house at this time is the issue contained in the amendment moved by the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). Before any of these bills be allowed to pass, the sponsor of the bill should give assurance and that assurance should be incorporated in the act itself, that the pipe line will be built across Canadian soil, and the gas will be used first to serve Canadian purposes. Then, we shall gladly share the surplus with the United States. That proposition has been laid clearly before the sponsor, and the persons who seek incorporation of this company, and that assurance has not been given. For the reasons I have stated, and because I feel that in this parliament we must adopt a positive policy for the development of our own resources to build up the western area of our country as an economically powerful unit, and because assurances have not been given, I support the amendment moved by the member for Vancouver East and oppose the bill for which second reading is sought tonight.

Mr. J. H. Harris (Danforth): This particular matter, which is now before this house, is starting to grip the imagination of the people. I am of the opinion, sir, that our Canadian people should think of it from the point of view which has been brought to their attention for many years, that is the rather broad view which reminds us that, in so far as these particular resources which Providence has given to this country are concerned, we ought not to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for that great magnet to the south of us. We should have that intestinal fortitude to develop our own resources, within our own country, which befits the strong men of the north, who are going to make this country what Providence designed it to be.

Prairie Transmission Lines

Three years ago this month, it was my high privilege to receive a cable from London to go there immediately. The transport division of this government enabled me, although I received the cable on a Friday, to be in Kingsway house, London, within three days. Whilst there—I am talking, Mr. Speaker, about these gas and oil deposits that are in Alberta—my imagination was gripped by the possibilities provided by the gas and oil in Alberta. At that time I was able, sir, to interest some British concerns in those fields. I see my hon. friend, who is paired with me in the house, smiling. He has a ten million pounds sterling statement under his hands now, sent to him this afternoon, showing the magnitude of this enterprise.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that that same organization is working in Calgary, Alberta, today. They have sunk several hundreds of thousands of dollars into that proposition, and they are using thousands of feet of that natural gas to develop and produce a product which is required in this country of ours. This is only one small example of what might be done, if the hon. members in this chamber would only let imagination grip them, and attempt to develop our country. With the help of the know-how of those in Britain, we could develop our own country, and use all the natural products and the natural fuel to aid in that development.

Let us not continue for the next hundred years, Mr. Speaker, to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for the 140 million people to the south of us. Let us have the intestinal fortitude to develop our own country for our own people, and take full advantage of the possibilities we have in this country.

Some hon. Members: You have made it; it is nine o'clock.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Before I sit down, I know my time is up, but I want to answer one question that was posed to me today by the senior member for Halifax. I note that he is not in the house at the moment—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being nine o'clock, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—

296. General administration, $1,506,165.

Mr. Casselman: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Fleming: In reviewing the details of expenditure, one sees that an increase of some $2,633,000 in the estimates for the customs and excise divisions and an increase of $864,845 in the taxation division are attributable to changes in a number of items which seem to indicate a substantial shifting of staff from one branch to another. The details indicate that apparently a number of new positions have been created in certain branches, and a number of members of staff dispensed with in other branches. Will the minister indicate to the committee just what has been done? Will he also give to the committee information indicating the number of employees in the department, both temporary and permanent, and what trends are evident within the past year in respect of the proportion of permanent and temporary staff members?

There is another aspect of this question which has been of interest in previous sessions, and I think the committee would be obliged if the minister would make some statement on it. It will be recalled that it was this department which took over a large number of former members of the staff of the wartime prices and trade board when that staff was largely demobilized. At that time—

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): May I interrupt the hon. member?

Mr. Fleming: Yes.

Mr. McCann: I think the hon. gentleman has a misconception with reference to the estimates as presented. These estimates, while of the Department of National Revenue, constitute really two departments under one head: the department of customs and excise, which is entirely separate and distinct from the department of taxation, the other branch of the Department of National Revenue. Each has its own deputy minister and staff, and each performs a separate function of its own. When the hon. gentleman has concluded his remarks, I shall be glad to answer the questions he has asked.

Mr. Fleming: I can assure the minister that there is no misconception on my part as to the way in which the department functions as between the two principal divisions of it, customs and excise on the one hand and taxation on the other. We might make that clear to begin with. I can direct my remarks more specifically to either branch; but one would have thought it would contribute to the saving of time if in the course of a general discussion on the first item these matters were cleared up, because the inquiries I have for certain information now are applicable to both these divisions.

I was in the course of mentioning that this department was the one which took over a number of members of the staff of the wartime prices and trade board when that board was largely demobilized. At that time the salaries payable to the members of the staff of the wartime prices and trade board were higher than those payable to members of the staff holding corresponding responsibilities in the Department of National Revenue. Persons holding senior positions in the department were, in consequence of these moves, receiving salaries smaller than those of men who were junior to them on the staff but who had been taken over from the wartime prices and trade board at their same salaries.

The last time this matter was discussed in the house, which was a year ago when the minister's estimates were then under consideration, questions were asked with a view to obtaining from the minister a statement as to how far this anomalous situation had been eliminated. I ask the minister if he would bring the information of the committee up to date on that point as well.

Mr. McCann: The customs and excise divisions have taken over no former employees from the wartime prices and trade board. Some of them may have gone to the taxation division.

Mr. Fleming: They did. I did not suggest that they were taken over by the customs and excise divisions.

Mr. McCann: That is the item we are discussing at the present time. The general administration item here has to do with the administration of the customs and excise divisions. There will be an administration item also under the taxation division. As to the number of employees—and I think that was one of the questions asked by the hon. gentleman—as of October 31, 1949, there were 376 permanent and 192 temporary, a total of 568 in the general administration division. In investigation and audit, there are 438 permanent and 125 temporary, a total of 563.

Mr. Fleming: I do not ask for the breakdown by individual branches; it is just the total I want.

Mr. McCann: We will give you the total.

Mr. Fleming: We are subject to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but if we are to have the questions broken down as between these two divisions, I think we shall be at this matter a needlessly long time. If the minister has no serious objection, I think it would be much better if we could have some general information about the department without his insisting on breaking the information down as between the two divisions.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I may be of some assistance to the hon. member for Eglinton by bringing to his attention the fact that this department, unlike the other departments, is presented in the bluebook in this way: the first item, general administration, refers to customs and excise. It seems to me it might be well if we had a general discussion on customs and excise while the deputy minister of customs and excise is here. Then when we come to item 300, we can have a general discussion on taxation, at which time the deputy minister for taxation will be here. The Minister of National Revenue could certainly reply to the questions put to him by hon. members if we proceeded in that order. If the hon. member for Eglinton looks at the other departments, such as the Department of National Health and Welfare, for instance, he will see that the first item is departmental administration, and then the services; but there is only one deputy minister.

Mr. Fleming: There are two deputy ministers there.

The Deputy Chairman: In this case there are two separate departments. If the hon. member would like to make remarks of a general nature as to the department, I think it is quite all right to do so at this time. But as to specific questions which relate to taxation, I think he would be better advised to wait until the deputy minister for taxation is here.

Mr. Fleming: May I make it quite clear, in case I was not heard before, that I have not asked any specific questions about either of these main divisions. My questions have all related to the department in general. If we have to break this down and get information separately with regard to the two divisions, and total them up afterwards, it seems to me we are going to be taking a needlessly long time. You say, sir, that there is only one deputy minister of national health and welfare. With respect, there are two deputies, one of health and one of welfare, and we have always had a general discussion on the first item of the estimates of that department.

The Deputy Chairman: I agree with the hon. member. I certainly wish to permit this general discussion, but for the purpose of expediting business and permitting the minister to reply adequately to the questions which are being put, I think that unless we have the deputy minister for taxation in the committee in front of the minister it will be difficult for the minister to give all the answers to the questions put by hon members. Usually on this first item we have a general discussion. Hon. members make their presentations and the minister replies at the end. If the discussion takes place in that way, the Minister of National Revenue can reply to the questions with regard to the customs and excise branch, with the help of the deputy minister for customs and excise. As soon as the deputy minister for taxation takes his place in front of the minister, the minister could then proceed to answer the questions relating to taxation.

Mr. Fleming: I am waiting for some information. I again make it clear I have not asked these questions—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fleming: —in relation to either division specifically. I asked for information with regard to the department in general. May I have that information, please?

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. gentleman will admit that it is the practice to have a general discussion and for the minister to reply at the end of the general discussion. Is not that the practice?

An hon. Member: Not always.

Mr. Fleming: I did not think I was entering into that discussion. I was simply asking for certain information. I asked some questions.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, since the inception of the department and of the two divisions over thirty years ago—and the customs department is as old as confederation —it has been the custom and the time-honoured tradition to handle the estimates in the way that they are being handled at this time, namely, as of two divisions, and that is the way that I propose to give answers to questions that hon. gentlemen ask. The hon. member for Eglinton can add them together just as easily as I can.

I shall now answer his question with reference to the number of employees. The total number of permanent employees as of the 31st of March, 1949, in the customs and excise divisions was 4,579; temporary employees 1,414; seasonal employees, 237, making a total of 6,230. The largest number of employees is at the different ports—that is, in every town and city where we have a customs and excise tax office. There are 3,765 permanent employees in the ports and 1,097 temporary employees. Within the last year, 1948-49, these people have collected $1,064,937,347.81.

With reference to the first item, the increased expenditure of $177,000 is made up principally by the increase in salaries over a year ago. That amounts to $173,999. Office stationery and supplies amount to $5,000, and travelling $5,000 additional.

Mr. Fleming: I asked the minister whether reclassifications were being made this year. My question was in general; it was not specifically on the first item. Can the minister indicate whether there are reclassifications proceeding in the customs and excise divisions of the department? From the details given in the estimates, a substantial change in the numbers is indicated. One would think that a revision of various classifications was pending.

Mr. McCann: Not in this department. There is no far-reaching revision or reclassification. Occasionally employees are being made permanent. Our quota of permanent employees is eighty-five per cent, and we are fairly close to the maximum of that quota. The reclassifications go on practically the whole year round, depending upon the length of time an employee has been in the department. No one can be made permanent until he is in the employ of the department for a year. One person might come in in June and another in December, so that from month to month some reclassifications and permanencies are being effected.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the minister a set of questions in regard to censorship, particularly censorship of books. I asked certain questions of the Secretary of State, and at that time the Minister of National Revenue was good enough to say that I should ask them on his estimates and that he would be pleased to answer them.

I have certain ideas in regard to censorship which I shall not inflict upon the committee at this moment, but I shall preface my remarks by saying that I have always had a great deal of difficulty in rending the curtain which has been hung around the censorship branch in this country.

I think, sir, that the idea of censorship is more efficiently applied to the working of the department than it is to the material to which it is supposed to be applied. I opened this inquiry a year or two ago by addressing to the minister or to his department certain questions on the order paper. At that time there was a lack of information which astounded me, and encouraged me to pursue my inquiry. I have not yet received the answers to my questions, and I am going to ask one or two of the minister tonight so that he may have an opportunity to answer them, and I may be allowed to comment as we go along.

When I broached the matter first my concern was to find who was the one man in this country responsible for the final adjudication upon a borderline case—that is to say, who has the final say in whether a book shall be admitted to the country or not. I did not expect to get the name. That is not the point. I want to know what official it is in the department. I instituted my inquiry a couple of years ago, and for personal reasons I was not able to pursue it at that time. I insisted that that man should be a person who by education, background, experience and knowledge of literature would be competent to censor books coming into the country or books which are produced in this country.

I do not want to give the impression that I am in favour of censorship. On the whole I am not, except in the cases which were covered by the bill of the hon. member for Kamloops, to which I gave my heartiest support. Now we are talking about a different thing. We are talking about the censorship of adult reading, and the keeping out of this country of books which perhaps should be admitted, and the allowing of books into this country which perhaps should be kept out.

I have maintained, and I challenge contradiction—I can do this because the statement has never been denied—that this condition of affairs means that the men who in the past have been responsible for this censorship were not efficient, in the respects which I have outlined, to do that particular job. That is my general charge. The minister has the facts, and I shall listen with interest to what he has to say in that particular.

To go into the circumstances of this matter, let me say that the department and the officials in charge of censorship looked upon my inquiries, as I see it, in altogether too affable and casual a manner. They looked upon them as, after all, a matter of not much importance—"after all, any customs officer can censor a book." I have that, sir in the actual words of the gentleman in charge of that particular job, astounding as it may sound to many.

I shall not mention anyone's name, because I have no purpose of that sort. I am only anxious that if we are going to have censorship in this country we shall have efficient censorship, and done by people who understand what they are doing.

I do not think for one moment that people can be agreed upon this matter. One man's meat is another man's poison. I know censorship is a tremendously difficult operation, and that is the reason I want people with the necessary background to make wise decisions in the matter. That, I claim, has not been done.

In regard to this particular inquiry, I asked certain questions of the department. I said, "Who is this man? What are his qualifications? What is his education? What is his background?" The answers I received were so ludicrous that I blush to mention them to the house. I heard, for instance, that he had some twenty or thirty years' experience in the customs and excise branch—as if that would make him a literary critic. That is the first one.

The gentleman himself said at that time that he was only a temporary employee substituting for an elderly gentleman who was on leave of absence preliminary to his retiring from the service. That in itself was a peculiar situation—a temporary employee. He said he was going to be replaced, he hoped, by a permanent employee.

Perhaps I might say a word or two before I ask my question. I had intended to do this later, but I might as well give the house the rest of the story. This gentleman was interviewed by a member of the press and asked how he regarded this particular occupation of censor of Canadian literature? The pressman said this gentleman was an affable person who confessed that a daily diet of certain types of literature was not at all to his taste. He said he was filling in until the regular appointment was made.

One of my questions is as to whether that regular appointment has been made of a permanent person, and whether that person has the qualifications to which I have referred. This gentleman went on to say further, "It does not require any particular training to tell a bad book." I do not know whether the gentleman was suggesting that perhaps he could smell it. He said, "You do not need a lot of education to spot a bad book." That was his point of view in regard to censorship, a Mrs. Grundy point of view—nothing at all about the quality of the literature, nothing at all about the necessary realism that perhaps should appear in a novel to make it realistic, as distinct from the typical pornographic thing written with a deliberate purpose of creating a best seller. He had no conception whatever of those things.

He said—and I am quoting his words to the newspaper reporter of the Regina Leader-Post; and that reporter may be in the gallery tonight for all I know—

> You do not need a great deal of education to know whether a book is bad or not when you read it.

Then he goes on to discuss certain readers. May I for the information of the committee state—and perhaps I shall anticipate the minister—that there is a certain group of readers who are supposed to read these particular pieces of literature and then hand them on to this final mogul, whoever he is. He makes the final decision.

These readers, by the way, are not all men; I understand, and the minister will correct me if I am wrong, that the chief censor in this country is really a lady. However he said this:

> They had no special training for their work—

That is interesting.

> —but have had years of experience in the job. When appointed they had no special recommendations qualifying them for the position. They were appointed by the civil service commission.

That might help them. The gentleman went on to say, when pressed in regard to making a decision, and to what extent he was influenced by the decision of these particular readers, that he usually concurred in the findings of the readers. With his qualifications I suggest that that perhaps is quite probable.

> And either bans or approves importation of the book in question . . . If our appraiser is doubtful about certain passages you can pretty well depend upon it that they are bad.

Well, sir, to me this whole thing is astounding, in this day and age, when Canada is growing up and when Canada is more and more asserting herself as a nation, when Canada is more and more trying to encourage the development of her own writers in this country.

I could go on, because I made an investigation into this matter. I have a thick file upon it. I have statements from people and I have communicated with authors and with some persons bearing very famous names which would be recognized at once if I mentioned them in this chamber tonight. I have their opinions in the matter.

Then the matter of foreign language books comes up. How is a decision made as to whether foreign language books are to be admitted to this country? I remember asking a young mountie who was looking for seditious literature if the Ladies Home Journal was all right. He said he did not know, that he would have to look up the list and let me know later.

That is exactly the type of thing one would expect from the average customs officer, when it comes to censoring literature. The thing is just foolish. Literature is being handled like liquor, tobacco, sugar or something being brought across the line. How do we expect these men to become competent in the matter of handling foreign languages? As a matter of fact we did have several translators after the war. But now I understand from the Secretary of State, as I elicited by questioning him the other night, that these translators are practically all men who translate the two official languages of the country, English and French.

I have not received any satisfactory answer as to the number or the capabilities of the foreign language translators. A book is presented to a customs officer, I presume. I simply say this, that I do not think a customs officer is competent to handle that situation. The easiest thing for him to do is to admit the book and be done with it. The alternative is to be doubtful about it and send it up to the readers at Ottawa. The readers look around and find some passage in it which may be doubtful. They submit it to this final person, whoever he is, and he makes the final decision. And so some customs and excise officer in this country is telling me what I shall read and shall not read. I object to that.

Perhaps there is no use getting upset about all this. I could tell the committee a good deal more about it, and it is a sad story. You see, we have only one or two foreign language translators to handle the literature of all other languages, except French and English. I appeal to hon. members: What efficiency can one expect under the system I have described?

The minister may say that I make false accusations and these things are not true. All right; let the minister say so. I have been asking his department to say so for two or three years. One of the faults I find with the genial minister is that he does not trouble about these things; he seems to think that it is not of any importance. May I suggest to him that this is something which is perhaps a little over the head of this particular departmental official. This man is not a competent judge as to what I shall or shall not read.

These foreign books come in, and I am sure that some of them are all right and some of them are all wrong, but nobody knows. I have bought books that were on the banned list—and by the way I should like to ask the minister whether that list has been revised in the last forty years. I should like to ask him if Bellamy's "Looking Backward" is still on the list. I thought they took it off, but if they have not, it will indicate the kind of censorship we have had in this country.

I have some constructive as well as destructive criticism to make. I do not think that any one man, particularly the ordinary customs officer, should have the responsibility of making the final decision in borderline cases. I have recommended that a committee be appointed to help in this matter. Let the official have the name of being the censor, but he could be assisted by this committee made up of people who know something about the matter.

I think I have said enough, but there are some questions I should like to get in before the clock overtakes me. First of all, I should like to ask the minister whether the gentleman—I have not named him—who has been described as an affable, middle-aged man who was on a temporary basis, has been replaced by a permanent official who is capable of doing this work.

Mr. McCann: Ever since confederation there has been a law on the statute book that literature that is immoral, indecent and seditious shall be prohibited from entry into the country. I shall not keep the hon. gentleman in suspense any longer; I will tell him that the duty of enforcing that law devolves upon the minister in charge of the department. If there is a mystery man at all in connection with censorship, I plead guilty to that indictment. So far as Mr. Merriam goes, who has given him information with reference to censorship—

Mr. Knight: On a question of privilege, I have never seen Mr. Merriam in my life, nor have I ever communicated with him, nor have I ever received any information from him. The last time I asked the minister that question he did not give me the information that he was responsible. He said that a certain man in his department gave the final decision. In fact the last time I asked the minister that question he said: "Of course I do not do the work; the hon. member for Saskatoon city must know that we have a staff". I can turn that up in Hansard. I am glad to know—or am I?—that the minister is now the official responsible.

Mr. McCann: The hon. member asked me a question with reference to the former censor, whether he was still doing it and whether he was in the employ of the department. I was going to say no; that Mr. Merriam, who for some time did that work, is no longer in the employ of the department.

Mr. Knight: The minister said that I had received information from Mr. Merriam, a man whom I have never seen in my life. I can give the minister the man's name as I have it here. I shall send it over, because I do not like mentioning civil servants in the committee; but apparently the minister has no such scruples.

Mr. McCann: As I say, the responsibility belongs to the minister, but the minister cannot personally censor the books, and he depends upon his officials. The general executive assistant of the department is the one who has that responsibility, and he has persons to assist him with the reading and censorship of these books. If translations are required, and there are translators available in the Department of the Secretary of State, their services are obtained. If they cannot meet the requirements, then people outside the department are used.

I suggest that it would be folly for the department to have full-time officials who would have as little work to do as they would have to do in censoring books written in other languages for which entry into this country might be sought. I suggest that you do not have to be a great literary critic to tell the difference between decency and filth. I have looked at a number of these books, and without reading them very far I could see that they were not the type of literature that should be let loose in this country where everybody can read it. Just the other day a ban was placed on crime comics, and it is now a criminal offence for them to be sold in this country. Much of the literature that seeks admission to this country is so filthy and so immoral, and some of it so seditious, that the department would be doing a great disservice to Canada to allow such trash to come into the country.

Mr. Knight: I have no disagreement with the minister as to crime comics; I thought that would be understood by the minister. I think my actions will back up what I say, because I supported the bill against crime comics. Secondly, I do not think there is any need to have a lot of people skilled in literature on full-time pay in the department. It would be possible to have committees to read this literature without having people on full-time pay.

I have not been told yet whether there is a man definitely in charge of this particular work, and who is responsible for it. I should like to know also how many readers are reading this type of literature at the moment. I am not talking about crime comics or the other filthy things that were dealt with by the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. McCann: I simply gave that as an example.

Mr. Knight: I am referring to what might be termed legitimate novels. I admit that some of them should be kept out of the country, and I want them kept out, but I do not want those that should be let in to be kept out. Such books should not be kept out because of the attitude of a censor who does not know his business and who, in the case of doubt, refuses to admit a book. I think that has been the attitude of the department up until the present time. When I started my inquiry there were three readers in the department; is that the position at the moment?

Mr. McCann: There is not a single person whose sole duty is censorship. There is a sufficient staff to meet the requirements with reference to reading and censorship of these books, but this need varies from time to time. The responsibility is in no way put upon the collectors of customs at the ports of entry. If there is reason to suspect that any literature coming over the border at any of the ports is indecent, immoral or seditious, such books are sent to the head office in Ottawa for determination as to whether or not they should be allowed entry.

Mr. Knight: The question I asked the minister was perfectly straight and plain, but perhaps he did not understand it. I did not ask whether these people were full-time employees, whether they were customs officers or anything else. I asked how many people are engaged at times in reading these books —that is, both ladies and gentlemen—to decide whether or not they are proper reading matter for the people of Canada. That was my question. It is easy to answer. How many; one, two, three, or what number?

Mr. McCann: The number is three or more, depending upon the requirements.

Mr. Knight: Then I want to ask a further question. I think we are pretty clear that a book published in the United States is subject to examination by customs officers at the border. If the customs officer is in doubt he sends the book to Ottawa. Here it is scrutinized by the reader, who submits it to somebody for a final decision, and that decision is made. There have been instances, of course, where ten thousand or more copies of these books have been distributed throughout the country before the decision was made. I have known of books which were refused admittance at one customs port but which could be bought at the next town, where they had been allowed in; but that is just by the way.

Now we have the number of readers; there are three. I take it these are the same three who were in charge a couple of years ago, one of whom is the lady I mentioned, who I was given to understand was the main censor in Canada. This gentleman who was so long in charge has already stated that he accepted without reserve the advice of these readers, and that is my point. It was the reader who was making the final decision; the higher official was simply a customs officer who said, "Well, all right, if that is your choice." Now we have had the procedure in connection with books coming from outside Canada. Let us get at what is done in connection with books published within Canada. I take it that no books published in Canada are censored at all, unless information is laid by some individual or by an official in a provincial government who, after a book has been in circulation, discovers it and submits it to Ottawa for adjudication. Would I be correct in that?

Mr. McCann: We have absolutely nothing to do with books published in Canada. These customs regulations have to do entirely with the entry of books from foreign countries. As head of the department I take full responsibility for the final say as to whether these books enter or are prohibited, and I intend to do that until some better system of censorship is set up, if that is required, by the Canadian parliament.

Mr. Knight: That is exactly what I am advocating, that some better system of censorship should be set up by the Canadian government. That is why I am criticizing the system we have now. The minister says he is the final adjudicator, that he is the man who decides with respect to a borderline book. With all due respect to the minister—let it be understood that there is nothing personal in this, because the minister knows I have all respect for him and his ability—I suggest I would rather have censorship, that is to say the final adjudication, in the hands of a committee chosen to do that particular work, not necessarily on a permanent basis. Further I would ask the minister how many books are on the banned list at the moment. I am not talking about love story magazines or crime comics, or that sort of thing. What is the approximate number of books on that list?

Mr. McCann: I cannot give the figure accurately, but I am told it is in the neighbourhood of three or four hundred.

Mr. Knight: Perhaps the minister could tell me how many books have been banned during the past year, if he has that information.

Mr. McCann: During the period from April 1, 1949, to November 30, 1949, some eighty books and seventeen publications, in English and French, were prohibited. No foreign language books or publications have been prohibited during that period.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

[Mr. Knight.]

Mr. Knight: It is not carried. If my hon. friend would like to take up where I leave off I should be delighted. This is something I believe should be ventilated, and I propose to ventilate it. If my hon. friend desires to assist I should be glad to hear his opinion on the matter; otherwise I suggest he leave this matter to me. Now I ask the minister how often this list of banned books is revised. You know, as time goes by we get more modern ideas, shall we say, and there comes a time when Bellamy's "Looking Backward" may be read without objection. Who decides when books should be taken off this list? If the minister wants a definite question, how many have been taken off this year, if any, or in the last forty years?

Mr. McCann: The list is revised from time to time. I cannot say how many books have been taken off, but that revision is kept up sufficiently, we believe, to meet the need.

Mr. Carroll: I would not suppose that a publication declared immoral forty years ago, twenty years ago or even ten years ago would be declared moral today or tomorrow?

Mr. McCann: Certainly not.

Mr. Knight: A few years ago there was a good deal of controversy over "Bernard Clare" by James Farrell. I wonder if that book is still on the censored list? I merely use it as an example.

Mr. McCann: Yes, it is. I took the trouble to read it myself, and it is as filthy a thing as was ever printed.

Mr. Knight: I make no issue of that. I have never read it. I am well aware that the majority of hon. members are not interested in this subject, so I shall bring my remarks to a close. I might ask the minister one or two further questions which he can answer with yes or no. What is the system of examination of United States or for that matter any motion pictures coming from outside the country. Is that a provincial set-up?

Mr. McCann: That is a censorship which is undertaken by the different provinces.

Mr. Knight: And I assume the censorship of what goes over our public radio is a matter for the C.B.C.?

Mr. McCann: Yes; but I can say to the hon. gentleman that it is so pure it scarcely needs any censorship.

Mr. Knight: I think some of the hon. members to my right would not agree with that. Well, Mr. Chairman, I shall conclude my remarks by simply repeating what I said at first, that there is a sort of smugness about this department of censorship which I do not like. In the first place I think the whole thing should be publicly aired; I think the department should take the public into its confidence. I believe the public should know the criteria by which books are judged. As far as I can see the minister has only two words, one of which is "good" and the other "bad". I do not think that is good enough for this day and age. I think the public should be taken into the minister's confidence as to the criteria by which these books are judged. I have no purpose in discussing this matter this evening except to obtain information for myself. I could read questions I have addressed to the department, and its replies. I have several returns which say this sort of thing "Answer to question No. 1: No. Answer to question No. 2: See answer to No. 1." I have several returns of that sort but I have never been able to get to the heart of this business of censorship.

I would say that the first step towards reform is a ventilation of the whole subject. In the second place—I should like you to notice this term in what I am about to say—the administration of censorship is beyond the scope and ability of the average customs officer. I believe this is constructive criticism. I do not think it is fair to ask a minister to wade through the books about which he has been talking. I do not believe any minister of the crown has time to do that sort of thing. There should be, in my opinion, a responsible officer with the experience, background, training and education which would make him, in the eyes of the public, a person fit to do that particular work. As his assistants, because I do not think it is fair to make any one official responsible, he should have a committee of people who know something about literature. They could be on a permanent basis if you like, but I would suggest a temporary basis.

The department should take the public into its confidence in this particular matter. The public should know by what criteria these literary works, if I may call them that, are adjudged. The principle must be known. You cannot have any censorship unless you have the support of the public, and without such criteria being known to the public, censorship can only be applied in a haphazard and discriminatory way.

Mr. Hansell: I have just one observation, Mr. Chairman. Did I understand the minister to say that a book that might be considered immoral ten or twenty years ago would not, perhaps, be considered immoral today?

Mr. McCann: Not at all; I said the opposite.

Mr. Hansell: Oh, I am glad the minister said that; because if that were what he did say, I would suggest that the book does not change. If our attitude towards it changes, that is different. It would mean that the attitude we took would be immoral, not the book.

Taxation division—

300. General administration, $1,983,384.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask the minister a question about some remarks he made in the house on November 25. At that time, the minister was speaking about permanent and temporary servants in his department. He indicated that there would be a reduction of some 4,000 in his department after the current fiscal year, because of the fact that the backlog upon which the department had been working would be finished. Will the minister say a word or two more about that?

I notice that this year the figure, presumably for staff, is up nearly $1,400,000. Perhaps the minister would indicate exactly why that was, and would say a word or two more about the impending reduction of these 4,000 people who, according to his statement on November 25, would no longer be needed after the end of this fiscal year.

Mr. McCann: I think it might be well if I made a short statement with reference to the departmental activity. In that statement, I shall cover the points which the hon. gentleman has made. In submitting the estimates of the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue, there are a few points which I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members.

You will have observed that by far the largest item in the estimates comes under the heading "salaries". The amounts needed to meet these requirements are greater than ever before. There are two main reasons for this: One, a substantial increase in staff; and two, the increases in rates of pay arising from the general over-all salary increases common to the public services as a whole since the war, and also the normal increases arising from promotion, reclassification of positions, and statutory increases within grades.

To deal with the first point requires a brief reference to the position of the department before the war. In the nine years ending in 1939, there were filed 3,590,224 personal returns and 253,903 corporation returns. Collections on all counts, personal and corporation, amounted to $833 million. In wartime, tax rates increased, exemptions decreased, the Excess Profits Tax Act was introduced, and the federal government entered the succession duty field. As a result, there were filed for the nine years 1940 to 1948, 24,863,540 personal returns, 316,725 corporation returns. Collections for that period totalled $11 billion and $69 million on all counts.

Because of the pay-as-you-go system of collection adopted in 1942, a very considerable part of these moneys flowed in freely. But I think it is fair to say that, despite prodigious efforts to simplify procedures, the work of the division increased far beyond the capacity of the available staff. During the war, it was impossible to obtain the numbers of persons, men and women, especially in the skilled classifications, to keep the work on a current basis. In fact, many experienced men and women were lost to the services, and other war activities.

As hon. members know, a very serious backlog of work accumulated. At the end of the war, when staff became available, great efforts were made to recruit. To illustrate what happened, may I give you the following figures: On March 31, 1945, the staff numbered 6,421; it increased in 1946 to 7,097; in 1947, to 7,370; in 1948, to 10,478. The peak period was in March, 1949, when the staff totalled 11,704. Since that time, it has decreased and, as of October 31, 1949, it stood at 10,963.

Recruitment of course is but the beginning. Ours is a complex and difficult task, requiring that new employees be given extensive training, so that the full effects of the additional people were not immediately apparent. I am now happy to be able to advise you that, by the end of the current fiscal year, all returns filed in respect of 1948 and prior years will have been dealt with. To illustrate what has been accomplished, I should like to give you the production of assessments in this year. On October 31, 1948, we had 2,952,555 returns; from November 1, 1948, to October 31, 1949, we received 4,071,870 returns. The total was 7,024,425 returns. From November 1, 1948, to October 31, 1949, we assessed 5,868,677 returns, and the balance to be done between now and the end of March amounts to 1,155,748 returns. I can assure hon. members that the balance will be dealt with within the time limit indicated. I feel I should also add that it is my intention that all tax returns filed with my department will be dealt with without delay and, in any event, within twelve months of receipt.

To accomplish this gigantic task, it has been necessary to develop new procedures and new forms. The vast majority of individual taxpayers use the new form known as T.1 short, introduced this year. Our system now enables us to examine and assess practically all of these shortly after receipt. True, it is necessary to re-examine some returns and, as a result, it may be necessary to issue re-assessments. This is the point to which the hon. member for Eglinton referred last night. In all such cases, the re-assessments will be made within the year. There will be cases, of course, where taxpayers have deliberately falsified their returns. Where such returns are assessed without the true facts coming to light, the assessments will be subject to review at any time. Fortunately, it has been our experience that such returns comprise a small proportion of the total.

Because the work is now well in hand, and because it is at last possible to measure reasonably accurately the volume of future work, I am able to assure the committee that the decrease in staff evident in 1949 will be continued. It is expected that substantial reductions in numbers will be effected without major lay-offs, primarily because there is a large staff turnover and because, as the department is about thirty years old, there are members of the staff who are now reaching retirement age.

Before leaving the first point I should like to mention the amount of work involved in handling refunds. In 1948 the department processed all refundable savings claims for 1942, and in 1949 we processed the claims for 1943 and 1944. I am speaking, of course, of individuals, not of corporations. The following data will convey some idea of the volume of work involved:

	1948	1949
Cheques issued	1,184,033	3,048,621
Changes of address received	697,469	1,456,879
Letters received and answered Approx.	50,000	95,000

But, apart from the refundable savings, there are ordinary refunds arising from overpayments of instalments or overdeductions at source. These amounted to:

	1948	1949
Refund cheques issued	1,650,270	1,878,938

On the second point, I should like to draw your attention to the new wording which appears in the printed copy of the estimates. This arises from an important change in staff policy brought about during the past year. Recruiting of the staff has been brought under the civil service commission. I am sure hon. members will agree that this has been a progressive step. It meant, however, a complete analysis and, to a considerable extent, revisions of the department's establishments. In fact, these jobs have not yet been finished but will be shortly.

I should add that the estimates before you were prepared a year ago and do not anticipate those changes effected this year and planned for next year.

As to items other than salaries you will find increases in travel, telephone, telegraph, express and cartage and sundries; and you will find decreases in printing and stationery, postage, advertising and law costs. All of these other items depend to a large extent on the volume of work and the size of staff, subject only to changes in prices of materials or services over which the department has no control. I am glad, however, to report that the total for such items in this year's estimates is down substantially from last year.

I shall be glad to give you any further information you may need to answer whatever questions may arise out of your consideration of these items. I think perhaps that answers the hon. gentleman's question. As I have indicated, the prospect is that the number of staff will gradually go down; and when we have the staff to deal with all the returns and assessments on a current basis, the reduction which I indicated the other night ought to take place.

Mr. Fleming: I think the committee will commend the objective that the minister has set of seeking to assess all returns on a current basis.

May I ask him about two points, one of which I touched on earlier, the other having to do with refunds. On the subject of refunds I should like to ask the minister within what period of time it is expected that refunds will be issued to those from whose earnings deductions were made at the rates in effect prior to the budget speech of last March, which rates were reduced by that budget. I presume that work has been in hand while the budget proposals have been pending and that the department may be in a position, now that the legislation is about to come into effect, to proceed expeditiously with the issuance of the refund cheques. If it is more convenient for the minister to answer that question now, I could leave the other question until he has completed his answer.

Mr. McCann: The hon. gentleman of course understands that we have been waiting for the authority. As soon as royal assent is given to the bill that was passed today, those who come off the tax rolls, which would be 771,000, will get their cheques immediately. For those who have refunds coming because of reductions, just as soon as they file their returns, if there is a refund coming to them, it will be made.

Mr. Fleming: That is the point. I understand that the cheques are all ready and will go out immediately when royal assent is given to the bill.

Mr. McCann: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: The other point is one I mentioned earlier, and perhaps it has been answered in part by the minister's statement, but he might be a little more specific, if he will. I was referring to the large accession to the staff of this department from the staff of the wartime prices and trade board. I understand there was some difficulty about the adjustment of rates of salary, in view of the fact that the rates of salaries paid by the wartime prices and trade board were higher than those in effect in this department, with the result that after these shifts were made, some who were holding senior positions in the department were actually receiving less in the way of salary than members of the staff who were junior to them. Will the minister indicate whether that situation has been levelled off now and whether those discrepancies have been removed?

Mr. McCann: I think that situation has been straightened out. The salaries that we pay are, of course, set or at least approved by the civil service commission. We did not really experience any great difficulty in that regard because a great number of people who had been in the wartime prices and trade board were quite aware of the fact that they were in temporary positions and perhaps were receiving salaries at that time over and above the scale that we were prepared to pay. Hence I say we did not experience any great difficulty by reason of that fact.

Mr. Fraser: I just want to ask a question that I have asked every year. I hope the minister will make plans to put a permanent taxation office in Peterborough. I suggest it at this time because I should like him to ask the Minister of Public Works to make provision for that office in Peterborough when he is making plans.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Fraser: I should like an answer on that point.

Mr. McCann: I am not prepared to make any such promise. The matter of the location of offices is done largely with an eye to efficiency and an eye to meeting the requirements of a particular district. I will call the hon. gentleman's attention to a report that I tabled two or three years ago.

That report was made by experienced businessmen, in conjunction with representatives of the Department of National Revenue, who made a survey of the whole country and then indicated to us where they thought offices could be placed to the best advantage to serve the public.

Mr. Fraser: The taxpayer in Peterborough is obliged to go seventy-five miles down to Belleville in order to straighten out his various problems. The minister puts a temporary office in Peterborough after the new year. This year I hope that temporary office will start operations there earlier than it did before. Seventy-five miles is a long way to go, and I think something should be done for these people.

Mr. McCann: We will give the hon. gentleman's inquiry careful consideration.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Can the minister tell me what are the latest numbers of assessments made of farmers throughout the country, by provinces?

Mr. McCann: I would draw the hon. member's attention to the book that we get out in the Department of National Revenue called "Taxation Statistics". If he will take the trouble to look at that book he will get pretty nearly all the information he requires. Our office does not keep details as to the number of particular occupations in which they are assessed. That is a question the hon. member asked? How many returns were filed?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I want to know whether more assessments are made of prairie farmers than of farmers in other parts of the country.

Mr. McCann: The hon. member will get the information in this book.

Mr. Lennard: I wish to refer to a matter which I brought up on the defence estimates, and with which the minister is familiar. It had to do with the reserve army and the officers and inspectors of the cadet corps of Canada. As is well known, their pay is taxed. I have referred to the matter for years. I should like to know what progress has been made in the matter of exempting them from this unfair taxation.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, I would draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that our department is entirely administrative, and whether the law says this, that or the other thing we try to administer it. The hon. member's protests or his requisition with reference to the matter would be better directed to the Minister of Finance who makes the policy that we carry out. Much as we would like to individually, perhaps, we have no authority to exempt the particular pay that a reservist gets and not call it part of his income.

Mr. Quelch: Can the minister give us the number of prosecutions of farmers by provinces for failing to pay income tax?

Mr. McCann: The hon. member's question is, What prosecutions have been made against farmers for failing to pay income tax? The answer is none. We have not prosecuted them for failure to pay.

Mr. McLure: I wish to draw to the minister's attention something that I mentioned to him last year. The vote for the Department of National Revenue is $52,545,233. Tonight the minister has given us all the figures. In the details we have all the civil servants who are employed. The sum of $23,941,500 is allotted for temporary employees. If the department had given us all the details we would have been saved the trouble of digging them out. Some sixteen thousand or eighteen thousand temporary employees draw this $23 million odd. Those details should have been given in the estimates and we would not be voting a blank cheque all the time.

Mr. Hatfield: Is a farmer still required to make up a net worth statement?

Mr. McCann: Only, Mr. Chairman, where he fails to file an income tax return. He has his choice of either the cash basis or the accrual basis; but if he does not file a return of either he is asked to do so. If he still does not file a return then we ask him for a net worth statement, and we try to arrive at a figure which will indicate his yearly income over a period of years for which the net worth statement is filed.

Mr. Hatfield: How many years do you go back?

Mr. McCann: It will vary according to the circumstances.

Item agreed to.

Income tax appeal board—

303. Administration expenses, $50,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to ask the minister one question on the item of $50,000 for administration expenses. Will the minister indicate just what is the nature of the administration expenses connected with the tax appeal board? I do not mean in detail; it seems like a substantial amount, more than the salaries themselves.

Mr. McCann: The item of $50,000 has to do with the income tax appeal board. The salaries are statutory. They are fixed. The other expenses are: printing, stationery and office equipment $3,000; travelling expenses, court reporter's included—it must be understood that this appeal board sits in different parts of the country, and there are travelling expenses incurred—$30,000; telephones and telegrams, $300; court reporter's fees, $90 average each case, 160 cases a year, $14,000, a total of $47,000, and $700 for contingencies. These amounts added up make $50,000.

Item agreed to.

International short wave broadcasting station—

305. Maintenance and operation, $1,781,850.

Mr. Gillis: Will the minister give us a brief outline of just what particular service this international short wave broadcasting station performs? What wave length in Canada on one's own radio can one pick up on the station? We are spending a lot of money on it, and personally I have never heard just what function it performs.

Mr. McCann: Items 305 and 304 amount to $2,753,000. It is made up of performers' fees, $500,000; salaries, $628,000; news service, $50,000; postage and excise, $30,000; printing and stationery, $15,000; rental and accommodation, $25,000; telegrams, telephones, et cetera, $40,000; travelling, removal expenses and duty entertainments, $60,000; general operating overhead, $146,000; transmission lines, $31,000; power, $40,000; tubes and maintenance, $37,000; Crescent street, Sackville line, $50,000—that is from Montreal down to Sackville; improvements on leased properties, $5,000 and supervision charges, $84,850. That makes up the $1,781,850.

I think it might be of interest if I gave the committee some information with reference to the international short wave service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. On February 25, 1950, the international service of the C.B.C. will be five years old. In an inaugural broadcast Mr. Mackenzie King, who was then prime minister, said—and he was speaking to our troops overseas—

> Tonight, Canada enters the world radio arena. As we undertake this new service, let us resolve that, in peace as in war, we will be true to the ideals you are so valiantly upholding—ideals which have made our country a nation. The unity of Canada belongs not only to Canada, it belongs to mankind. If we are true to ourselves, Canadian unity may well serve as a model for the wider unity of humanity. In the unity of mankind lies the one sure foundation of enduring peace.

The most powerful weapon against misunderstanding is the frank exchange of information among nations. This is a time when curtains of any kind, iron or otherwise, are tragic in the extreme when they exist between large groups of mankind.

The above facts provide the justification for the use by the nations of short wave broadcasting. Canada increasingly for the past forty years has found herself thrust out into the main current of world affairs. She could not if she wished pursue a policy of isolation. Our history and the traditional ties that result from it, and our geography which places us in a strategic position in the world have settled that for us. Increasingly Canada has been playing her full role in international affairs. It is, therefore, logical that she should have an international radio voice and that is exactly what the international service of the C.B.C. is.

Mr. Drew: Is this still in the quotation?

Mr. McCann: No, Mr. Mackenzie King's statement was brief.

Briefly the purpose of the international service of the C.B.C. is to project abroad as factually, honestly and simply as possible information concerning life in Canada which will help listeners in other countries to form a clear and accurate picture of what goes on here. It is a conscious attempt to place Canada before world listeners as a western democratic country. The voice of Canada, as it has come to be called, includes information concerning the simplest as well as the most complicated aspects of Canadian life. Through the co-operation of various departments of the government it speaks as authoritatively as possible of Canada's policies —within the safeguards, of course, of security. We tell our listeners about the way we live in our homes, the way we worship our God, the way we educate our children, the way we amuse ourselves, the way we conduct meetings and large industries, the way we elect political leaders and the way our machinery of government functions. In other words we are trying to present a picture of Canada as a vigorous democracy.

The international service is beamed daily to Europe in English, Norwegian, Swedish, Danish, Dutch, German, Czech, Slovak, French and Italian. It is beamed to Latin America daily in Spanish, Portuguese, French and English. It is beamed once weekly in English to Australia and New Zealand.

The response to the service has amazed even the most optimistic of its friends. Since its inception, between 125,000 and 130,000 letters have been received from individual listeners in various countries. Between January 1 and October 31 of this year 26,996 letters were received. These come from all types of people and all bear witness to a growing, lively interest in everything that is Canadian. They often ask for information concerning business, concerning labour conditions, concerning conditions under which they can emigrate to this country, concerning education and a thousand other aspects of the life and enterprises of Canada.

I thought it might be interesting if I read you a few excerpts from letters received by the C.B.C. international service. I have here some letters which were received recently from Czechoslovakia. You will understand how much such letters mean if you pause to remember for a moment the risks run by those who continue to correspond with us from that iron-curtain country. Our Czech mail used to be the largest. Since the coup in February, 1948 it has, of course, shrunk very much. We still continue to get a volume of mail, however, which compares most favourably with that received from that area by the B.B.C. and the "Voice of America".

I shall not take the time of the committee to read these letters. However they are from a great many people in these foreign countries who expressed their appreciation of the service rendered by the C.B.C. I have taken time to give some information about the international service, because there are about a hundred new members in the house who know very little about it. I presume they wonder why we spend a couple of million dollars a year to continue the service. It was for that reason that I have taken the time of the committee to give this information respecting a service which is non-revenue-producing, which is owned for all the people of Canada and which is used for the purpose of disseminating news about this country throughout the world in order that it may help those people who are behind the iron curtain, and give them some information with respect to this free democratic country, and to tell them something about the way in which we live. It is a service which I believe throughout the years will pay back big dividends, perhaps not in dollars and cents, but if we can attract to this country people who will become good citizens in future years, the money spent for the international short wave service has been money well spent.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I am glad the minister did make the statement, because unless the older members of the house had served on the radio committee and followed this matter through since its inception, they would not know very much about what had taken place in this field.

I know of course that all hon. members support the international service and are glad to have the information the minister has just given. I do not see any other item in which the C.B.C. as such is provided for. I would say to the minister, and not in a critical way, that the service rendered by C.B.C. stations in the maritime provinces leaves much to be desired—and this is not because of any inefficiency on the part of the organization as such. In my view it is due to the way the wave lengths are allocated in those provinces.

Only a little more than a year ago a station was established in the city of Sydney. I live within thirteen miles of it, but cannot receive its signals. It is on a wave length that is not found on the average Canadian radio, and its signals are jammed in with those of American stations. While the national programs are carried by the station, you cannot get them when you are within even a few miles of it. The wave length is not found on the average Canadian radio band, situated as it is away over about 1700 kilocycles. That is in among the American stations.

I have received many complaints about it, and I am mentioning it to the minister so that it may be checked up. I do not live far from Sackville, at which point a powerful station is located; but I cannot receive it, either. The signals from the Sydney station cannot be received in Halifax, three hundred miles away. The Cape Breton stations are received only very poorly. On the other hand the privately-owned station in Prince Edward Island can be heard in practically any part of the province.

It seems to me the officials of the C.B.C. should discuss this matter of how wave lengths in the maritime provinces are arranged. I know that, in Nova Scotia particularly, the privately-operated stations are heard more clearly because of their better situation as to wave lengths.

Mr. McCann: The situation to which the hon. member has referred has developed because there was no other wave length available when the station was set up. While we are not discussing the C.B.C. execpt as it relates to the international short wave station which is managed by it, I would point out that representations have been made with respect to the whole matter of radio broadcasting to the Massey commission which is now sitting. I presume that some time next summer there will be a report from that commission suggesting changes that should be made for the betterment of the management of C.B.C.

Mr. Coldwell: Is it not expected that the report will be ready before next summer? I was hoping that it would be earlier because we expect a committee on the C.B.C. next session.

Mr. Fleming: It would have been most helpful to the committee when discussing these items to have had before it the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The year of the corporation corresponds to the government fiscal year and that report should have been available long ago. It would have shortened the proceedings before the committee and would have obviated the asking of certain questions concerning the work of the corporation. When will that report be available? In the past the report has usually been made available by the summer, but here we are in December and it has not yet been distributed.

Mr. McCann: I am informed that the report is at the printers.

Mr. Fleming: When was it sent there? Why was it not available long before this?

Mr. McCann: I cannot answer that question.

Mr. Fleming: I have just one word to say about reports. I think all hon. members are anxious to conserve time in the review of the estimates. It would save a great deal of time and avoid the necessity of asking questions if these reports were available.

We did not have his annual report when we were considering the estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State last week, but the following day or the next day after the estimates had been dealt with the report came to us. Last Saturday we reviewed the estimates of the Department of Labour without having the report of that department before us, and on Monday or Tuesday of this week the report was distributed. There was more than coincidence in that, I am sure.

We are now dealing with the item pertaining to broadcasting and are told that the report of the corporation for the year ended March 31, 1949, a year that closed more than eight months ago, is still at the printers. I should like to ask for any possible explanation for the delay in providing these reports to hon. members. With the house sitting in the fall surely it was the minimum duty of the government to do everything possible to expedite the distribution of these reports. I say it is lamentable that there has been such a sparse and tardy distribution of important reports. Lacking this particular report it has been necessary for some hon. members to ask questions about this international short wave station. That information would have been available in the report.

I should like to say a brief word about the relationship of the house to some features of broadcasting. I do not intend to go into the question at length, but I do want to say that I think it most unfortunate that a committee of the house on radio broadcasting has not been set up for two years. In the 1948 session there seemed to be good reasons for not setting up the committee because at the close of the 1947 session we had just completed an extended review of all the problems relating to broadcasting in Canada. In the early part of that session we were not aware that certain important moves on the part of the C.B.C. were under way. For instance, had it been known in the 1948 session that a large purchase of property in Montreal was contemplated, a strong request would have been made by the official opposition for the establishment of such a committee in order that that purchase might be considered before any commitment was made.

During the first session this year three requests were made by the official opposition for the appointment of a special committee on radio broadcasting. At first the minister was noncommittal and he simply indicated that the matter would be considered. Then when my leader pressed for the appointment of a committee a resolution was placed on the order paper, but with the summary dissolution that followed the resolution died on the order paper, and the committee was not appointed.

There is a great backlog of work for such a committee to do. This has been a short session and it has not been feasible to appoint a committee to carry on an extended review, but regardless of whether the royal commission headed by the Right Hon. Vincent Massey has completed its work or not, I submit that early in the next session a special committee on radio broadcasting must be appointed.

Mr. Lennard: You won't get it.

Mr. Fleming: If for no other reason I think the subject of television should be considered of sufficient importance to require the appointment of such a committee. A study of that subject is urgent and essential. This country is losing valuable time. We should have been acting long before this.

The policy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, to which the government is a party, has been one of dog in the manger. There were Canadian groups prepared to undertake the development of television at their own risk and expense, but through the control it exercises the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would not permit them to do that. The corporation may not have been responsible for that decision, and it may have been the responsibility of the government. When the government finally did make up its mind about the middle of the first session of this year and announced that they were proposing a loan of $4 million to the C.B.C. to permit that corporation to undertake the development of three television stations, two in Montreal and one in Toronto, I am sure some of us wondered how the Minister of Trade and Commerce could have given his blessing to that proposal. When this matter was under consideration earlier this year the Minister of Trade and Commerce was one of those who said that such an expenditure would benefit only the residents of the metropolitan areas of Montreal and Toronto. In fact, the minister is reported to have said this:

> If private operators think it worthwhile to risk their money, let them go ahead. Some of them, like Canadian Marconi, can hope to get it back by selling television sets. If I were living in my own town of Port Arthur I'd kick like a steer at paying taxes to bring television to Montreal and Toronto.

However, for some reason or other it became the policy of the government about the middle of the first session of this year to lend $4 million to the C.B.C. to develop three stations in the field of television.

I do not believe television in Canada ought to be a government monopoly. In the second place, I do not think it fair that the taxpayers of this country should be burdened with the cost of providing television on a basis which will benefit only the people in the metropolitan areas of Montreal and Toronto. When people who are capable of undertaking such a development are willing to risk their own money in it, without cost to the people of Canada, for the life of me I cannot see any sense or logic in denying them that opportunity, providing always—and there is general agreement on this—that the public interest is protected.

I am not going further tonight into this whole question of whether the C.B.C. ought to be permitted to continue as both competitor and regulator or, as it has been put in this house before, as judge and policeman as well as a party to the cause before it. I hope that very early in the next session an opportunity will be afforded parliament to undertake, by means of a committee, a study of this and of many other questions that have been developing since the last special committee of this house on radio broadcasting sat. It seems to me that is a matter of the highest importance. One might have hoped that the report of the Massey commission would be available early next session. If that should not prove possible, however, I submit that the House of Commons cannot wait. These questions I have referred to, particularly the matter of television, are much too important to be left in abeyance any longer.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not intend to oppose this item for the international radio service, though I am far removed from the metropolitan areas that have been referred to, which benefit from very lavish expenditures made through the C.B.C. in respect to such fancy things as television. I do want to remind the minister, however, that northern Ontario has been badly neglected by the C.B.C. with respect to radio service. Vast areas in that part of the country are receiving no benefits whatever from the payment of their licence fees, nor are they getting any service from the C.B.C. or the government. If from its revenues the broadcasting corporation cannot look after those sections which are rather sparsely populated, and which were assured of service in the Aird report which was the basis for the development of the C.B.C., then the time is coming when these more remote areas will have to vigorously insist that no more money be channelled through the C.B.C. for such fancy things as television and an international radio service.

I would hope the minister might be able to give us some assurance that if the C.B.C. cannot find the money to provide this service, some other funds might be provided through his department or the Department of Transport to meet the cost of providing repeater stations in northern Ontario. Practically all the pockets of population in that area are on the transcontinental railway lines. These railway lines have telegraph lines which carry practically all the programs to western Canada, and those programs should be tapped for the benefit of these areas. If the C.B.C. is not prepared to do that, as they say they are not—and they have been resisting our requests for many years—I think a general vote of this house should provide for radio service in that part of the country, as was promised years ago when the conception of public ownership was first developed. At that time it was said that unless there was public ownership alongside private ownership, only in the highly commercial areas would we have adequate service.

Mr. Coldwell: I should like to join with the hon. member for Eglinton in expressing the hope that a radio committee will be established early next year, but perhaps from a different point of view. I know we cannot discuss radio broadcasting under this item, but I do want to say I think the radio committee should be appointed in order that the people of Canada may get a proper perspective regarding the corporation, the work the international broadcasting station is doing, and the work of the C.B.C. in general across the country. When I look back over the years I often look at the members of the official opposition and recall the speeches made by the late Right Hon.

R. B. Bennett. He would not have agreed with the opinions expressed tonight by the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. Lennard: How do you know that? This is a different day and age.

Mr. Coldwell: I have read his speeches.

Mr. Lennard: But that is all on ice now.

Mr. Coldwell: If the hon. member wants to make a speech, let him do so. I am just referring—

Mr. Lennard: I am just checking up on you.

Mr. Coldwell: I would prefer that to be done by someone who can check up, rather than merely interrupt. It seems to me this committee should be set up in order that the public may be informed as to the services rendered by the broadcasting corporation and the extent to which that corporation has permitted private stations to contravene the broadcasting act and the regulations as approved both by the corporation and by parliament. As far as the stations in this country are concerned today, I think the people are getting thoroughly tired of the amount of soap and other advertising that goes on hour after hour, and the spot announcements that interrupt the programs every few minutes. I think we should look into the revenues of these private stations again, to see what they are actually making out of the monopoly the country grants them by way of wave length, because the possession of a wave length is the only monopoly there is in connection with radio. No one else can use a wave length that has been granted to a private station; therefore that station is given a monopoly.

It is said that these stations are operating without cost to the public, but in fact the cost is enormous when you consider the amounts people pay the advertisers for their products, against which the cost of broadcast advertising is of course charged. I think, too, the committee should go into the question of television, because that can be both a benefit and a menace, particularly to the small businessman and the small manufacturer in the country. The cost of television programs will be tremendous, and the propaganda and advertising effect of the programs going into the homes of the people can be tremendous as well. If hon. members would just think it through they would realize the extent to which monopolies could be built up in our country through this great new facility.

As far as the international service is concerned, I believe the station and the expenditures on that station have been justified as the years have gone by. It is good, I think, that a powerful station in North America, and in one of the smaller countries such as Canada, if I may use that term, should be able to speak to the people of Europe who are not able to get information from the outside world and who can enjoy the programs that are transmitted across the iron curtain from one of the democratic countries which is not a great power, and therefore has no axe to grind, as might be the case with a great power. However, I do not want to go into the question of radio broadcasting tonight. I do think, however, there should be a committee set up to consider broadcasting in general, and particularly to find out why the C.B.C. has departed from the act, for example, in establishing private stations of 50,000 watts power. This was never contemplated by parliament at the time the act was passed. I believe a local community station can perform a local service, but I do not think it should be allowed to obtain a coverage that can blot out many of the other community stations, and interfere with the very basis of our broadcasting act.

I am anxious to look into one or two of these features critically, to ascertain why it is that the regulations and the act have been varied by the broadcasting corporation in cases of that kind.

Mr. Drew: Are the staff or the performers of the international short wave broadcasting station being screened by the R.C.M.P. at the present time?

Mr. McCann: Yes, they are.

Mr. Drew: Can the minister tell us how many of the members of the staff or performers are at present not actively engaged until that screening has been completed?

Mr. McCann: They are all active.

Mr. Drew: Is it not correct that the screening which is taking place is being conducted in connection with a suggestion that there has been certain broadcasting conveyed to European countries, which was not in accordance with the purpose of setting up this station?

Mr. McCann: I am informed that the answer is no.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Do I understand that one who has been commissioned to read a talk over the short wave broadcasting station is being screened?

Mr. McCann: The answer to the hon. gentleman's question, Mr. Chairman, is that the topic and the script are screened most carefully. In some instances, the person who is delivering the talk is screened also; but there would be no reason to screen a musician in the employment of the international short wave station.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): The minister said that the performers are being screened. Those who are taking part in the programs are not in any confidential position. Where is the screening going to stop? Who screens the screeners?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I ask the minister if a further appropriation will be made for school broadcasts in British Columbia? That service has been doing wonderful work in the rural areas, particularly in northern British Columbia. I understand some money is provided for that?

Mr. McCann: That question is entirely out of order, Mr. Chairman. We are not dealing with the C.B.C. at all, except in so far as they manage this international short wave station.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I want to know more about this screening. Who is being screened, and by whom are they being screened? What is the purpose in it? Is a person who sings over the air one who must be screened? Is there some mysterious inflection in the voice, or what is it?

Mr. McCann: The permanent members of the staff are being screened.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Not all those who are participating in programs?

Mr. McCann: No; I would point out that there would be no object in screening somebody who was playing the violin.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Are the members of the staff regarded as being in a confidential position? Let us say an engineer; is he in a confidential position?

Mr. McCann: Except for the head of the division and his assistants, they are not in confidence.

Mr. Drew: I believe this should be clarified somewhat. It is obvious that there would be no occasion to screen violin players, acting as violin players, or shall we say a piper. But it is quite obvious that the screening was not directed to that. There would be a particular group who would be screened under circumstances of this kind, and I believe the minister is aware there is a particular group being screened. It consists of those who are making broadcasts by voice, and who are in a position to convey information to countries beyond the iron curtain. I do not think the minister will question the fact that there has been screening going on in regard to that for some time. Has the minister received an interim report, or any kind of report in regard to what has been found?

Mr. McCann: No, I have had no report at all. In any event, the report would not come to me.

Mr. Drew: There is no mystery about this. The minister has admitted that screening has been going on for some time. Those who are broadcasting by voice are being screened because of the fact they are in a position to communicate messages to areas that are not regarded as areas to which we would want certain messages to go. If the screening has been continuing for some time, as the minister has stated, then it seems that by now there should be some report, unless those who are under examination are not broadcasting.

Mr. McCann: The report, in the first instance, would be made to the chairman of the board of governors of the C.B.C. and the general manager. To date, there has been no report that would call for any positive action.

Item agreed to.

International short wave broadcasting station—

306. Acquisition and alteration; equipment, land and structures, including supervision, $971,250.

Mr. Drew: This item deals with the same subject, but I do want to point out why it is essential that a committee on broadcasting be set up at the beginning of the next session. In the earlier session this year, I received an assurance that that would be done. During this session we have not pressed the matter because of a statement that was made that this was regarded, although a session of a new parliament, largely as a continuation of the session that started last spring.

What has just been admitted is an indication of the reason why there should be a committee set up, and set up almost immediately after the next session begins, so that there can be an examination of this whole subject. In this case, $2,700,000 is being spent on this one operation under the direction of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. By the very nature of the activities it carries out, it could be a vehicle for the communication of messages which might be dangerous to the security of the state. The screening is being carried out, as has been admitted, with a recognition of that fact. It was only by questioning that this came out, and it was only by questioning at this moment that it was admitted there is some reason for screening in that particular case.

When I press for a report, it is stated that the report would not come to the minister, but would go to the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It is this uncertainty as to who has the information, when they get it—which was apparent in another case—that emphasizes the need for committees which can go to the root of the matter. A committee can ascertain what is being done in those branches of a department which, as agencies of government, are spending large sums of public money without direct supervision from any minister or deputy minister, but under direction of a public body. I can only repeat that because of what has been admitted now, with the admission on top of that, that the minister does not know what has happened in regard to screening that has been carried on for some time in regard to what could easily be an agency of highly improper activity, we see why it is so necessary that we start a complete examination of the whole activity of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as soon as we meet in the next session.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow I understand there will be two small amendments to one bill that has come back from the Senate. That will be the first item.

Mr. Coldwell: What bill is that?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is the Fish Inspection Act. There are two minor amendments. Then we shall move to go into committee of supply and take up reconstruction and supply, justice, external affairs, post office, health and welfare, mines and resources, transport and veterans affairs.

Mr. Coldwell: In that order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): For the first four items, in that order.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

101. Departmental administration, $360,900.

102. Fisheries inspection, including fishery officers and guardians; fisheries patrol and protection services, $2,983,000.

103. Educational extension service, including grant of $3,000 to Lunenburg fisheries exhibition, $190,000.

104. Fish culture development, $693,400.

105. Oyster and clam culture, $73,700.

Fisheries research board of Canada—

106. Operation and maintenance, $1,132,040.

107. Construction and improvements, $181,800.

108. To provide for Canadian share of expenses of the international fisheries commission appointed under treaty dated January 29, 1937, between Canada and the United States for the preservation of the North Pacific halibut fisheries, $35,000.

109. To provide for Canadian share of expenses of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission appointed under treaty dated May 26, 1930, between Canada and the United States for the protection, preservation and extension of the sockeye salmon fisheries of the Fraser river system, $169,500.

110. To provide for Canadian share of expenses of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission to overcome obstructions to the ascent of sockeye salmon at Hell's gate canyon and for investigating and overcoming obstructions to such salmon at other points on the Fraser river watershed (revote), $150,000.

111. To provide for transportation, dressing and dyeing and other expenses incidental to receiving and disposing of fur seal skins accruing to Canada pursuant to provisional fur seal agreement between Canada and the United States by exchange of notes dated December 26, 1947, $550,000.

112. To provide for the destruction of harbour seals, $30,000.

Special—

113. To provide for the extension of educational work in co-operative producing and selling among fishermen, $80,000.

114. To provide for the administration expenses of the Fisheries Prices Support Act, 1944, $170,000.

115. To provide for assistance in the construction of vessels of the dragger and/or long liner type, subject to such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council, $100,000.

116. To provide for assistance in the construction of bait freezing and storage facilities, subject to the approval of the governor in council, $100,000.

117. To provide for investigation into transportation and storage facilities in wholesale and retail handling of fish and fish products, $25,000.

674. Fisheries inspection, including fishery officers and guardians, fisheries patrol and protection services—further amount required, $241,400.

Fisheries research board of Canada—

675. Operation and maintenance—further amount required, $239,135.

676. To provide for administration expenses of Newfoundland fisheries board, $353,900.

677. To provide for maintenance and extension of bait service, $408,400.

786. Operation and maintenance—further amount required, $27,500.

787. Construction and improvements—further amount required, $100,000.

788. To provide for Canadian share of expenses of the international whaling commission, appointed pursuant to the international convention for the regulation of whaling, dated at Washington, December 2, 1946, $500.

Special—

789. Amount required to recoup the fisheries prices support account, to cover the net operating loss of the fisheries prices support board during the fiscal year 1948-49, $538,989.

790. To provide for assistance in meeting transportation costs on frozen herring purchases in British Columbia by persons, associations or companies, for bait in the 1948-49 winter fishery off Nova Scotia, $25,350.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

A—Department—Customs and excise divisions—

296. General administration, $1,506,165.

297. Inspection, investigation and audit services, $2,198,195.

298. Ports, outports and preventive stations, including pay for overtime, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, and buildings and rentals for temporary purposes, $14,581,241.

299. To provide for payment of expenses, law costs, refunds and awards arising out of seizures and charges of contravention of customs or excise laws, $300,000.

Taxation division—

300. General administration, $1,983,384.

301. Internal inspection and verification, $1,412,260.

302. District offices, $27,745,888.

Income tax appeal board—

303. Administration expenses, $50,000.

Miscellaneous—

304. Amount to be paid to the Department of Justice to be disbursed by and accounted for to it for customs, excise and income tax secret investigation services, $15,000.

Customs and excise divisions—

697. Ports, outports and preventive stations, including pay for overtime, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, and buildings and rentals for temporary purposes—further amount required, $115,000.

Taxation division—

698. District offices—further amount required, $173,680.

B—International shortwave broadcasting station—

305. Maintenance and operation, $1,781,850.

306. Acquisition and alterations—equipment, land and structures, including supervision, $971,250.

A—Department—Customs and excise divisions—

844. Ports, outports and preventive stations, including pay for overtime, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, and buildings and rentals for temporary purposes—further amount required, $625,000.

B—General—International shortwave broadcasting station—acquisition and alterations—

845. Equipment, land and structures, including supervision—further amount required, $687,681.

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—

846. To provide the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with funds approximately equal to the sum of the value at Canadian rates of the radio receiving set licences issued by Newfoundland prior to the date of union which were made valid until March 31, 1950, and the value of the reserves established by the Newfoundland Broadcasting Corporation out of previous revenue for the depreciation, obsolescence, replacement and expansion of the physical assets of that corporation taken over by the government of Canada under the terms of union; and further, to provide authority for the transfer to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of the title to all assets of the Newfoundland Broadcasting Corporation taken over by the government of Canada, $200,000.

934. Loans to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation repayable with interest at a rate to be fixed by the governor in council on such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine and to be applied in payment of expenditures to cover capital costs of television installations and to support the development of the service. Such loans, with interest, shall be a charge on the revenues of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation next after the charge imposed under the provisions of section 17 of the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936, $4,500,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, December 7, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

FORAGE PLANTS

H. M. GUILLAT NAMED CRESTED WHEAT GRASS KING AT CHICAGO GRAIN AND HAY SHOW

Mr. A. J. Bater (The Battlefords): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. It is a pleasure to announce that Mr. H. M. Guillat, a farmer in the North Battleford district, was crowned international crested wheat grass king at the international grain and hay show recently held at Chicago.

Mr. Guillat has been recognized as a progressive farmer for many years, and has won high honours previously in various shows, both in the district and farther afield.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REFERENCE TO CONSIDERATION OF ESTIMATES IN COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY ON DECEMBER 6 —TELEVISION ITEM

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, yesterday's Votes and Proceedings No. 60 contains what I believe is a serious mistake on page 345. Among the items of estimates reported to have been adopted in the committee of supply is No. 934, an item which reads in part:

Loans to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation repayable with interest—to cover capital costs of television installations and to support the development of the service, $4,500,000.

I believe that is a mistake in Votes and Proceedings, because I certainly did not hear that item called. I was following the proceedings closely, and it was just at eleven o'clock. I have asked my colleagues around me if they heard the item called, and they did not hear it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. gentleman has stated his question of privilege, and it occurs to me he might bring up the matter when the house is in committee of supply.

STEAMSHIP SERVICES

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION OF CAR FERRY TO OPERATE BETWEEN YARMOUTH, N.S., AND THE STATE OF MAINE

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, for a great number of years there has been a regular steamship service between Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and a point in the eastern United States, providing an essential transportation link between the southern part of Nova Scotia and the northeastern United States. Recent announcements indicate the possibility of abandonment of this service and the company operating such service can no longer give any assurance that it will be continued.

This situation has caused considerable concern both to the federal government and the government of the province of Nova Scotia. If Nova Scotia is deprived of direct water communication with the east coast of the United States it will cause considerable damage to her economy especially in relation to the tourist trade which brings in to Nova Scotia annually many thousands of dollars.

At the present time the S.S. Yarmouth operates between Yarmouth and Boston during the summer months making three trips per week. She is a vessel of 5,000 gross tons, with capacity for 500 passengers, 800 tons of freight, and 45 automobiles. It is felt that if this vessel is going to discontinue the service, some method should be found to increase the number of tourist cars which may be carried to Nova Scotia during the summer season. Both governments likewise feel that the situation cannot be left in a state of uncertainty, and that the tourist traffic into Nova Scotia should not only be maintained but increased.

I am therefore pleased to announce that it has been decided to build a vessel which will not only be adequate to carry the present traffic but which will serve to increase the tourist trade between Nova Scotia and the United States. The proposed vessel will be a fast modern car ferry with a capacity for about 200 cars and about 1,000 passengers. The service will be based on Yarmouth, and will operate between that port and a port in the eastern United States. Being a modern vessel it will offer facilities considerably better than those now available at a much cheaper cost to tourists and more in line with present and anticipated needs.

Officials of both governments are actively engaged on the project and plans are now under way for the design and construction of the ferry in a Canadian shipyard at an estimated cost of $3 million. The federal government and the province of Nova Scotia will share equally in this cost, the share of Nova Scotia being limited to not more than $1,500,000.

It is expected that construction of the vessel will be completed in time for the 1951 tourist season.

Mr. Brooks: May I ask whether any consideration has been given to the service between Saint John and Boston, which was operated for many years but has been discontinued?

Mr. Chevrier: This statement of course deals with one thing only. The matter to which my hon. friend refers will be given consideration in due course.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to ask the minister if he will give the same consideration to the car ferry service between Rochester and Cobourg.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would call the hon. member's attention to the fact that this statement is not debatable. Questions directly relating to it are allowed, but I would ask hon. members to make their questions brief and relevant.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): May I ask the minister whether any provision is being made for service between Nova Scotia and Maine for the season of 1950? I would also ask him whether consideration is being given to renewal of the direct service from New York to Nova Scotia.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot allow questions of that kind.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): May we have an answer to the first question, whether any provision is being made for the 1950 service?

Mr. Chevrier: I think that question should be answered, Mr. Speaker. The maritime commission is now in consultation with the present operators, and it is hoped that provision will be made for operation during the 1950 season.

Mr. Hatfield: The minister mentioned 200 cars. Did he mean automobiles, or railway cars?

Mr. Chevrier: It is obvious that this is not a railway car ferry, but a passenger and automobile car ferry.

Mr. Hatfield: It should be.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): One other question, if you will permit it, Mr. Speaker. Who will operate this service? Will it be operated by the Canadian National Railways or by the respective governments?

Mr. Chevrier: That matter has not yet been decided. It is being considered at the moment.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FREIGHT RATES—LIVESTOCK

Mr. Weir:

1. Have the railway companies granted a special freight rate lower than the general tariff in the movement of purebred livestock and the movement of livestock to fairs and exhibitions?
2. If so, what was the relationship between the said special rate and the regular tariff rates?
3. Does the federal government contribute to the freight cost of shipping (a) purebred livestock; (b) livestock moving to fairs and exhibitions?
4. If so, on what basis and to what extent?
5. Has notice been given to the effect that the railways are urging the discontinuance of the said special rate on the movement of (a) registered livestock; (b) livestock moving to fairs and exhibitions?
6. Has any department of government taken any steps towards retaining the special freight rate on the movement of (a) registered livestock; (b) livestock to fairs and exhibitions?
7. If so, what actions were taken?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West):

1. Yes.

2. There is no uniform relationship between the so-called special rates and the regular tariff rates. To answer this question more precisely it would be necessary to know the number and kind of animals involved, and the points between which they are moving. It would then entail some considerable time to work out the relationship between the regular rate and the special rate.

In general, however, the following applies:

A. Purebred livestock: (1) Within western Canada—one half regular tariff rates subject to certain exceptions. (2) Within eastern Canada—one half standard mileage tariff rates, less carload only. (3) Between western and eastern Canada—approximately one half regular tariff rates on carloads, and one half first class rate, minimum weight 6,000 pounds per shipment for less carload.

B. Exhibition livestock: Where the movement to one exhibition and return is involved in western Canada, the full tariff rate to the exhibition point is charged and the return movement is free. Within Ontario and Quebec the going and returning rate is 60 per cent of the regular rate. Between eastern and western Canada the western basis applies. Where more than one exhibition is involved, the over-all rates from the original shipping point back to the same point are adjusted by reductions of from 40 to 50 per cent.

3. (a) No. (b) Yes, to the Royal Agricultural winter fair only.

4. Each provincial government, excepting Ontario, pays the freight on livestock moving from the province to the Royal Agricultural winter fair. The Department of Agriculture of Canada reimburses the provinces to the extent of 75 per cent of the freight paid. The amount of this expenditure is approximately $10,000 per year.

5. (a) Yes. The tariffs applicable were cancelled June 1, 1949, upon full statutory notice. (b) Yes. The tariffs applicable are to expire December 31, 1949, unless sooner cancelled, changed or extended.

6 and 7. Yes. Officers of the Department of Agriculture have assisted livestock associations in preparing briefs which were submitted to the railway companies by breed associations. The Minister of Agriculture has written the presidents of both railway companies supporting the representations of the breed associations.

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION ACT—CONVICTIONS FOR VIOLATION

Mr. Catherwood:

1. Has the Department of Mines and Resources a record of convictions for violation of the Migratory Birds Convention Act for the nine months ending September 30, 1949?
2. If so, what is the total number of convictions and what amount was collected in fines?

Mr. Maybank:

1. Yes.

2. Thirty-five convictions, and the amount of $420 collected in fines.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT—STAFF

Mr. Gagnon:

1. Has the staff of the library of parliament been increased during the present session?
2. If so, by how many persons?
3. What are the (a) names; (b) places of birth; (c) salaries of the said employees?

Mr. St. Laurent:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Answered by No. 1.

COAL—SHIPMENTS FROM HIGHWOOD AREA, ALTA.

Mr. Hansell:

How many tons of coal have been shipped to eastern Canada from what is known as the Highwood area, lying southwest of Calgary, during 1947, 1948 and as late in 1949, as records show?

Mr. McIlraith: In 1947 there were no shipments of coal to eastern Canada from the Highwood area in Alberta. In 1948 and 1949 one company in this area made shipments to Ontario.

Since only one company is involved, the tonnage figures cannot be released, in accordance with the Statistics Act.

*NATIONAL FILM BOARD—ASSIGNMENTS IN UNITED STATES

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. Have any employees of the national film board been engaged, as such, in activities in the United States?
2. If so, where?
3. What was the nature of the assignment or assignments?
4. On whose request were the activities undertaken?

Mr. Winters: The question in the form in which it appears on the order paper is quite general, and I doubt whether it would be possible to give the hon. member information that would be of value to him. I have discussed the matter with him, and I understand that he has agreed to drop the question in this form, on the understanding that if he reframes it in a more specific way, I shall be pleased to try to answer it.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I can reframe the question now, Mr. Speaker, and the minister may answer it later if he cannot do so immediately. Have employees of the national film board been in the United States recently for the purpose of making films of atomic energy plants or installations?

Mr. Winters: The answer is that employees of the film board have been filming work in the United States recently on radioactive isotopes for use in connection with cancer research. The work was done jointly at the request of the Department of National Health and Welfare, in Canada, and, as I understand it, in the United States by the Medical Film Institute, which is an agent for the American Association of Medical Colleges.

BOARD OF TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough):

1. How many members are there on the board of transport commissioners?
2. What are their names, present and former addresses?

MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENTS ASSISTANCE ACT

Mr. Beyerstein:

1. Is the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act still in operation?

2. If not, when was it suspended and by what authority?

3. If the act has been suspended, has the government given any consideration to the reopening of the act? If so, when can an announcement be expected?

4. How many municipalities in Alberta have been assisted under this act during each of the years since its operation?

5. What was the amount of assistance to each municipality?

Mr. Belzile:

1 and 2. The Municipal Improvements Assistance Act was passed as an unemployment relief measure during the depression of the thirties when the fact that unemployment was so widespread and severe as to partake of the nature of a national emergency was felt to justify the government of Canada making loans on a subsidized basis to finance strictly municipal projects. As the primary aim was to relieve unemployment, one section of the legislation provided that the governor in council "may at any time fix and determine a date after which no loans shall be made to any municipality under this act". As unemployment lessened and tended to disappear following the outbreak of war, operations under the act ceased and no loans under it have since been made.

3. It is not the practice to announce government policy in answers to questions.

4 and 5. Edmonton, $228,878.85; Lethbridge, $100,000; Calgary, $225,000; Claresholm municipal hospital district, $28,000; Drumheller, $8,376; Grande Prairie, $100,000; Hanna, $100,000; Red Deer hospital district $55,000; Stettler, $7,000; Vegreville, $10,000; Wetaskiwin, $26,000.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK—LOANS TO INDUSTRY

Mr. Brooks:

1. What amounts were loaned by the Industrial Development Bank to industry in the various provinces of Canada?

2. What were the number of applications for loans, with the amounts involved, according to provinces?

3. How many were granted and how many were refused?

Mr. Belzile:

1. From November 1, 1944, to September 30, 1948, gross amount of loans, investments and guarantees authorized (less cancellations and reductions in amounts authorized):

Prince Edward Island, $39,000; Nova Scotia, $681,900; New Brunswick, $823,500; Quebec, $11,733,250; Ontario, $11,676,664; Manitoba, $1,508,684; Saskatchewan, $268,800; Alberta, $2,251,864; British Columbia and Territories, $4,357,612.

2 and 3. Details of applications by provinces are not of government record. For Canada as a whole, the information is as follows:

From November 1, 1944, to September 30, 1948, applications received, 1,640; applications granted, 586; applications refused, 519; applications withdrawn, 535. Amounts relating to the above applications not of government record, except as to applications granted which totalled (before cancellations and reductions) $39,027,624.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

IMMIGRATION—TRANSFER OF DEPARTMENTAL PERSONNEL TO TORONTO AND MONTREAL

Mr. Lennard:

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Return tabled.

NEWFOUNDLAND—MARINE SERVICES

Mr. Higgins:

1. Have requests been made for marine services, such as wharves, slipways and breakwaters, in the province of Newfoundland?
2. If so, by whom and on what dates?
3. For what locations?

ASSISTANT CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough):

1. Was a vacancy created by the recent promotion of Mr. Nelson Castonguay to the position of chief electoral officer?
2. Was the position of assistant chief electoral officer advertised?
3. If so, when and how?
4. How many applications were received?
5. What were the names and addresses of the applicants?
6. What were the marks or ratings received in each case?
7. Who makes the appointment?
8. For how long is the appointment?

2. What sum of money was paid to each person as (a) salary or wages; (b) sustenance; (c) mileage; (d) other allowances?
3. At what rate are (a) salaries or wages; (b) sustenance; (c) mileage; (d) other allowances paid to common labour, foremen, all other employees, under this act?

[Mr. Belzile.]

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION, SASKATCHEWAN —EMPLOYEES—FOREMEN

Mr. Argue:

1. What are the names and addresses of all persons employed at any time during 1949, as foremen, on Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act projects in Saskatchewan?
2. What amount of wages or salary has been paid to each of these persons during 1949?
3. Have any of the persons named in reply to question No. 1 received any other payments out of government funds, in addition to their salary or wages on the above-noted projects during 1949? If so, what is the nature of such other payments?

ELECTRIC POWER

DEVELOPMENT ON NIAGARA AND ST. LAWRENCE RIVERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs care to make a statement on the power development on the Niagara river and the St. Lawrence river?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am in a position, Mr. Speaker, to make a short statement at this time concerning the use of water from the Niagara river for the generation of hydro-electric power. At the suggestion of the United States government a group of Canadian experts are going to Washington to explore in an informal way with their opposite numbers there the possibility of amending article V of the Boundary Waters treaty of 1909 with respect to the use of water from the Niagara river for power generation. At the same time, they will consider how the scenic beauty of Niagara falls and river can best be protected and enhanced. These informal talks will begin tomorrow, December 8.

I am happy to be able to state that the Canadian party will include, in addition to federal officials, representatives of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario, headed by Mr. Robert H. Saunders, chairman of the commission, and the Hon. Charles Daley, chairman of the Niagara parks commission.

Article V of the Boundary Waters treaty of 1909 authorized a diversion above Niagara falls of 56,000 cubic feet of water per second to be divided between the United States and Canada. Additional diversions for both countries were authorized on a temporary basis during the recent war. These temporary authorizations need to be replaced by some permanent arrangement so that new power plants may be built in Ontario and New York state. These would replace a number of inefficient plants which are now in use.

In 1926 a special international Niagara board was set up by Canada and the United States to study the question of the preservation of the Niagara falls and river and to consider what remedial works might be needed to enhance their natural beauty. The board, in its final report, issued in 1929, made a number of recommendations, some of which have not yet been acted upon. The informal talks in Washington will provide an opportunity for consideration of any recommendations of the board which are still outstanding.

I have also been asked to say something about the joint use by Canada and the United States of the potential hydroelectric power resources of the international section of the St. Lawrence river. The most satisfactory and economical solution would be attained through ratification by the United States and Canada of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence basin agreement of 1941, which provided for the development of that section of the St. Lawrence for navigation as well as power. In the review of external affairs which I gave the house on November 16, I mentioned some of the many mutual interests which Canada and the United States have in this great project. Because of these mutual interests, I ventured to express the hope that the United States congress would be able to take action with regard to ratification of this agreement without much further delay. That is still our hope. However, if we cannot get implementation of this agreement for the double-barrelled purpose of navigation and power, the value of the power is so great that we shall have to give very serious consideration to abandoning the navigation and starting on the power side alone.

Mr. Church: May I ask the minister a question? In view of his statement on power in the St. Lawrence and Niagara rivers, which means automatically that blackouts are coming in Ontario and in other places, how are we going to settle these matters on the seven seas if we cannot settle a domestic matter such as this with a friendly nation?

COLONIAL AIR LINES

ORDER OF AIR TRANSPORT BOARD—NOTE FROM UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The press of this morning carries a dispatch from Washington indicating that some representations had been made to the government with respect to Colonial Air Lines. Can the minister enlighten the house on this matter?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am in a position to say something about this matter. It is true, as press dispatches indicate, that yesterday afternoon the United States ambassador left with me a note in which reference was made first to the show-cause order dated December 1, 1949, and served on the Colonial Air Lines by the Canadian air transport board; and second, to the delay surrounding Trans-Canada Air Lines application to the United States civil aeronautics board to operate the route between Montreal and New York.

In this note the government of the United States proposes discussions between representatives of our two governments, aimed at resolving the present difficulties. The Canadian government, which has not yet had an opportunity to reply formally to the note, will of course be quite willing to participate in any such discussions. The United States state department is aware that we have at all times been prepared to have intergovernmental discussions on these matters, and, in fact, discussions between officials of the two governments have been taking place recently. I personally am satisfied that in this matter the Canadian government has done everything possible to resolve the situation reasonably and fairly.

I wish to make it quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that these proposed discussions, which we shall be happy to enter into, will not in any way prejudice proceedings before the air transport board, nor prevent the board from proceeding with the hearing scheduled for December 12 next, when Colonial Air Lines will be required to show cause why the air transport board should not suspend the licence which was issued to that air line to operate the Montreal-New York route. This hearing, which will begin next Monday, is an administrative procedure within the regulations under which the air transport board operates, and will be proceeded with.

HUMAN RIGHTS

QUESTION AS TO PROCLAIMING A HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the government give consideration to proclaiming a day to be known in Canada as United Nations human rights day?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The government will of course give consideration to the matter suggested, but I should not like to forecast the result of that consideration.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I ask a supplementary question? If the answer is in the affirmative, will the town of Dresden, Ontario, be informed of the decision?

Mr. St. Laurent: I assume that if and when the decision is reached it will be publicized in such a way that all those interested may be informed of it.

TRADE WITH BRITAIN

QUESTION AS TO BRITISH PREFERENTIAL TARIFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Prime Minister? It refers to the speeches made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) at New York last night and the one made at Brantford last Monday night by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Do these two speeches taken together represent government policy, and does it mean the end of preferential trade?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member will have to read the speeches and draw his own conclusions as to what they mean.

Mr. Church: That is not necessary. It means the end of both. May I say to the Prime Minister that I have no conclusions to draw except that you are hanging preferential trade on the sour apple tree alongside John Brown's body.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have never attempted to hang anything on sour apple trees.

CROWN PROPERTIES

FEDERAL GRANTS IN LIEU OF MUNICIPAL TAXES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the supplementary estimates tabled yesterday, will a revision of dominion-owned properties in various municipalities be allowed, in the light of the statement as to the possibility of collecting taxes from these properties?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I am afraid I am not too clear as to just what my hon. friend's question means, or the information that it is intended to elicit. On November 14 I made a comprehensive statement as to the government's policy with respect to grants in aid to municipalities. When the item in question is called I shall be glad to answer any supplementary questions that may be put to me. Perhaps I am a little dense, but I do not quite understand my hon. friend's question.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Because of the fact that taxes were not collectable, assessors in various municipalities have neglected to determine assessment value.

Mr. Abbott: The grants will not be based upon assessments made by local assessors. As I indicated in my statement, the grants will be made on the basis of assessments which the government itself determines, as is done in all other countries that follow practices of this kind.

FISH INSPECTION ACT

FISH AND FISH CONTAINERS, ETC.—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 63, respecting the inspection of fish and marine plants.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Fleming: On a question of privilege, sir, Votes and Proceedings of yesterday, No. 60, as published, contain at page 345 what I say is an error. Among the items said to have been passed at last night's session of this committee this one appears under the heading "Loans and investments":

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation

934. Loans to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation . . . to cover capital costs of television installation and to support the development of the service . . . , $4,500,000.

Sir, my submission is that this is a mistake, because the item was not called. I have asked my colleagues around if they heard it called, and those to whom I have spoken agree with me that certainly the item was not called in their hearing.

Hansard has come to hand, and Hansard for yesterday, at pages 2826 and 2827, contains the report of a discussion on the last item, No. 306. At the conclusion of the discussion Hansard reads, "Item agreed to. Progress reported." There is no reference to the calling of this very large and important item, No. 934.

At page 2828 of Hansard, among the resolutions said to have been passed in committee, and reported, is this item, No. 934. But there is no statement in the text of Hansard as to that item being called.

There are a few other reasons that warrant my saying the item was not called. In the first place, we were told on the previous night that the estimates of the Department of National Revenue would be called. Item 934 is not among the estimates of the Department of National Revenue. If hon. members will look at the further supplementary estimates, No. 1, page 10, they will see three supplementary estimates in connection with the Department of National Revenue. On page 27 of that volume of further supplementary estimates they will see item 934—not under the estimates of the Department of National Revenue, but under the heading, "Loans and investments". This follows the previous heading, "Government-owned enterprises—transport".

Last, sir, and I think a complete reason for saying that item 934 was not called, is that the government had agreed not to call it. If hon. members will look at page 2052 of Hansard for March 28 of this year they will see that, following a statement made by the Minister of National Revenue on government policy with respect to television, relating to this particular matter, in which he said that it was government policy to ask for $4 million for the purpose of permitting the development of television by the C.B.C., Hansard records that at the conclusion of that statement I asked the minister this question:

> May I ask the minister a question arising out of the statement he has just read? Will the radio committee—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member has stated his question fully.

Mr. Fleming: I am just finishing it.

The Deputy Chairman: He is now proceeding to make a speech.

Mr. Fleming: No. I just wished to finish this quotation, then I shall be through. It continues:

> Will the radio committee have an opportunity of reviewing this policy and reporting to the house before the house is called upon to approve the loan of $4 million?
> Mr. McCann: The answer is definitely yes.

No radio committee has been set up. So I say the government certainly cannot have had any thought of calling that item, because this undertaking has not been fulfilled. Therefore I say that Votes and Proceedings for yesterday are in error, and item 934 should be struck out from page 345.

The Deputy Chairman: After looking over the discussion that took place on the items referring to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—either the item respecting the international service, or item 934, which refers to loans to be made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with respect to television—and after reading Hansard, it is quite clear that the discussion on the first item, concerning the international service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, was a general discussion covering all the operations of that corporation.

I knew, and I am sure some hon. members knew as well, that they were out of order in discussing on the first item, which referred to the international service, some of the things they did discuss, such as, for instance, wave lengths. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River criticized the C.B.C. because the northern section of Ontario was not served well enough. Then the hon. member for Eglinton spoke at some length about television. If hon. members will refer to page 2823 of Hansard they will see that he devoted perhaps a page to this particular aspect of radio, namely, television.

The hon. member goes on to say, at the close of his remarks:

> I am not going further tonight into this whole question of whether the C.B.C. ought to be permitted to continue as both competitor and regulator or, as it has been put in this house before, as judge and policeman as well as a party to the cause before it.

And he concludes by saying:

> These questions I have referred to, particularly the matter of television, are much too important to be left in abeyance any longer.

It seems clear to me that the sense of that was that all items pertaining to the C.B.C. were then under discussion; and that the hon. member was taking advantage of the general discussion then taking place to discuss item 934 as well. He is reported to the extent of about half a page on television as it appears in Hansard of yesterday.

Mr. Fleming: Quite true.

The Deputy Chairman: And he concludes by saying:

> These questions I have referred to, particularly the matter of television, are much too important to be left in abeyance any longer.

If one reads the speeches which then followed, especially the reply that was made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to some of the points raised by the hon. member for Eglinton, it will be seen that they have a direct bearing upon the setting up of a committee at the next session to deal with television, the allocation of wave lengths, and the establishment of a station of 50,000 watts in Ontario.

The leader of the opposition himself, at the close of his remarks last night, indicated that the item then under discussion dealt with international short wave, but he indicated that he wanted, as well, to press the matter of setting up a committee at the next session, and concluded his remarks by saying:

> We see why it is so necessary that we start a complete examination of the whole activity of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as soon as we meet in the next session.

We were then on the item dealing with the international service. When these items on the international service were permitted to carry I said: "There are three items referring to the C.B.C.", and I called each of them in order, including item 934. I said, "Shall these items carry?" I know some hon. members on the opposition side, as well as some hon. members on the government side said, "carried". I then said: "Shall I report the resolutions?" And it was agreed. It was then three minutes to eleven.

Therefore I believe the point of privilege raised by the hon. member cannot be entertained.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I should hope that before you make that as a final ruling you would be prepared to hear certain observations.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: I will not sit down except on order of the Chair at any time in this house.

I suggest it may be wise to give consideration to this item. The discussion had not been confined to the first item. The discussion, it is true, had been general on the first item, and the first item was agreed to as recorded at page 2826 of Hansard. When I rose to discuss the matter further it was pointed out that item 305 had been called, and I then explained that item 306 dealt with the same subject matter, and that I would continue the discussion. We continued the consideration of the second item at that time.

The statement is made that the item was called. Well, it must have been called quickly, and I will state further most emphatically that I did not hear it. If an item under a different heading in the supplementary estimates is called in the committee of supply, it should be pointed out at the time that we are turning from page 10 to page 27, and that the item in the supplementaries appears under another heading. Unless this is done, no member of the committee can keep in his mind what the item is. Suddenly to group items in this way and to call them off quickly while there is a certain amount of cross-discussion going on in the chamber, without any indication that one of the items is for $4,500,000, and having to do with a most important subject—is a procedure under which, I submit, we cannot properly deal with the estimates.

I ask that the government consider the wisdom of consenting to reopen this discussion. Otherwise any suggestion to facilitate procedure becomes an impossibility. There is another time when we can discuss this, namely, on the appropriation bill, and I assure the government that we will discuss it then if this item is not reopened. Undoubtedly there would be a wider discussion on the appropriation bill, and the discussion would thereby be extended.

Without attempting to make a ruling as to what was done, and having regard particularly to the fact that the course indicated now by the chairman is one which could not possibly have given hon. members an opportunity to realize that the item 934 was called, I submit that by consent this item should be reopened, so that it will not be necessary to renew the whole discussion on the appropriation bill.

Mr. MacInnis: I had not intended to speak on this subject, either now or when it might come up again on the appropriation bill; therefore I can perhaps be considered as an unbiased advocate. I think the difficulty has arisen through having two or three items called at once. They were called so quickly in order to get through with the estimates of the department that those who were interested were not able to catch the number of the item. As the leader of the opposition has pointed out, the items in question were several pages away from the items that we had been discussing, as well as being under a different heading.

As the leader of the opposition has suggested, I think the matter should be reopened and an opportunity given to those who are interested in the item to discuss it. I suggest that to the chairman and to the government. This is a case where we should use good judgment and not get into an interminable discussion over the point.

Mr. McCann: On a question of privilege, I should like to say a word or two. I concur in everything that you, Mr. Chairman, have said in explanation. When the estimates which I have to pilot through the committee came up yesterday, I submitted to the chairman the numbers of the items, in the bluebook, in the supplementary estimates, and in the further supplementary estimates, and I distinctly heard you call all the numbers. Following the calling of the numbers, the word "carried" came from the committee. It was unfortunate that just at eleven o'clock last night this very important item was called and passed and is so recorded in Votes and Proceedings.

I think perhaps the way in which the items are listed is not the best. Items having to do with international short wave, the C.B.C. and others things having to do with broadcasting, are listed under the Department of National Revenue, but they are entirely distinct from the activities of that department. The order in council which gave me the duty of indicating to parliament what has been done with reference to policy and transactions of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the international short wave system delegates that duty to me personally.

The hon. member for Eglinton is quite right when he says that on March 27 last I indicated to the house the policy with reference to television, and said that there would be an opportunity to discuss the matter before the radio committee. There was a motion on the order paper at that time to set up the radio committee, but as parliament was dissolved on April 30, that item was not reached. I gave that promise in perfectly good faith. During this session there has been no request by the opposition that the committee on radio broadcasting be set up.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a question of privilege, I asked the Prime Minister whether he would set it up, and he simply passed it off.

Mr. McCann: Perhaps I should retract and say that there was no motion on the order paper to set up the committee. I have no personal objection to this matter being discussed. I was surprised last night that there was not more discussion, but there certainly was discussion on the matter. The hon. member for Eglinton is reported, both in Hansard and the Montreal Gazette, as having spent a considerable amount of his time in the discussion of television.

Mr. Drew: Not on this item.

Mr. McCann: He did not enumerate the item, but he is reported both in the press and in Hansard as having discussed at some length the general question of television. If the hon. member was in error in not knowing the significance of the item as it was called, that is not my business. I brought up the item; it came before the committee and there was a general discussion on the whole matter. The item was called, the item was passed, and the resolution was reported.

As I say, I have no personal objection if the committee wishes to consider this matter further. We will have a clear statement as to what the policy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is in the matter of meeting commitments for setting up television, in accordance with government policy. The hon. member for Eglinton was a bit critical last night of the fact that we had not gone ahead with this matter. On what did he base his comment that we were not dealing fairly with private stations which had made application to be licensed to go into television?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, this is a speech in regard to what the member did or did not do, but it does not explain whether or not this item was carried. I understood the chairman to say that further supplementary items were called, and there are further supplementary items shown in addition to item 934. Based on the statement just made by the chairman, I think item 934 was not called.

Mr. McCann: I categorically deny that item 934 was not called. It was called. The chairman says so, and the Clerk says so. As I said, I have no objection to further discussion, but I am not going to be bluffed into the position that the item was not called, because that is not true. If there are other grounds for further discussion it will be on straight business grounds, and not because I am being bluffed by the leader of the opposition. What I say this morning is no more a speech than what you have said, Mr. Leader of the Opposition, and I have just as much right—

An hon. Member: Address the Chair.

Mr. McCann: —to indicate what my position here is as he has. To continue—

Mr. Drew: I do not propose to be tricked, either.

Mr. St. Laurent: I ask that the hon. member withdraw that expression. I do not think it is proper for the leader of the opposition to suggest that he is being tricked by the majority in the house.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, before you deal with that you will deal with the question whether it is proper to suggest that a serious argument I have made is an attempt to bluff the house?

Mr. St. Laurent: I have raised a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, and I ask for your ruling. I request that the expression that the leader of the opposition is being "tricked" by the majority, and by the chairman of the committee, be withdrawn.

Mr. Drew: I said I did not come here to be tricked, and I repeat that statement. I certainly have no thought of changing my words into those now used by the Prime Minister. The Minister of National Revenue said he did not come here to be bluffed, and I replied that I did not come here for another purpose. Both of us came here to discuss other matters, and I suggest we get on with the discussion.

Mr. St. Laurent: If there is any dispute about what the leader of the opposition said, the chairman should consult Hansard, and if the hon. member's words are what I understood them to be, then there should be an order that he withdraw them.

Mr. Rowe: The same goes for bluffing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A person would have to be a philological expert to appreciate the difference between "trick" and "bluff". I suggest that the Prime Minister might very well read his lecture to his own minister before talking to the opposition.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We are getting too far afield from the discussion on which this matter arose. It seems to me there might be some provocation in the words used by the Minister of National Revenue, although perhaps not to an extent that would justify the leader of the opposition in using the expression he did. When he said he was not here to be tricked, I took it that this might be a reflection on the chairman. I know he does not want to convey that meaning. I think the word "trick" is not parliamentary. On the other hand, it might be a good solution if the Minister of National Revenue and the leader of the opposition would get together on this question.

Mr. McCann: I would be the first to make amends. There is nothing further from my mind than to say anything offensive. If there was anything offensive in saying somebody was trying to bluff you, which is a common expression, I certainly withdraw unreservedly.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, since that is withdrawn, I withdraw the subsequent remark.

Mr. McCann: I should like to say one more word in order to expedite the business of the house. Last night I had my officers here, and was perfectly ready to go on with as lengthy a discussion as the house wanted on the question of television. I am still prepared to do so. I leave it entirely to the chairman to decide what course of action should be taken.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It seems to me there has been a first-class misunderstanding. Surely we want to be forbearing with each other and get on with the business at hand. It would be better if the government would accept the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition. By common consent let us agree there was at least a misunderstanding, and get together and work on that basis.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I suggest that if the minister is not ready to proceed this morning we may be able to find some time tomorrow—I hope not too much time—when we can have the officials here. In any event, we will try to find some time to have a discussion on the matter.

The Deputy Chairman: Some remarks have been made about the fact that two or three items are called at the same time, especially in the case of supplementary estimates which relate to subjects that have been under discussion. I was told by experienced members of the house that it was somewhat of an innovation on my part to refer hon. members to the pages in the bluebook, the supplementaries and further supplementaries. I have not done so all the time, but as much as possible I have referred hon. members of the committee to those pages. I still maintain I called that item last night, and that the discussion on it was such as Hansard has recorded. If there is unanimous consent to deal with it at a later stage, of course discussion will be permitted.

DEPARTMENT OF RECONSTRUCTION AND SUPPLY

381. Departmental administration—formerly under demobilization and reconversion, $98,180.

Mr. Fraser: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Winters: I have no statement to make at this stage.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to say a word and ask a few questions. One matter which I have mentioned before is the closing of the offices of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation all day on Saturday, with the result that workers have no opportunity to go to the offices to discuss matters with the heads of the corporation. Could it not be arranged that the offices of the corporation be closed on Wednesday afternoon, or some other afternoon in the week, in order that they might remain open on Saturday morning? It would not be necessary then for workers' wives to transact the business with the corporation. I have had letters and telephone calls about the matter, and a number of workers have spoken to me about it. Can the minister make some suggestion that will help?

Mr. Winters: There are several items in the estimates dealing with housing on which I think it would be more appropriate to discuss the affairs of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I shall be pleased to answer any questions at that time. I can say now, however, that the hours worked by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are designed to some extent to tie in with the practice as to hours followed by the lending institutions with whom Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation conducts much of its business. Therefore in the summer months the corporation follows the practice prevalent in that field of closing on Saturday morning, but the working hours for the week are adjusted to compensate therefor.

Mr. Fraser: Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was not set up to help any financial institution—at least, I hope not. I understand it was created to help workers. The corporation should do everything possible to make it convenient for workers to deal with them. Banks close at eleven o'clock on Saturday morning; why not have the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation offices remain open until that hour on Saturday morning and close on Wednesday afternoon?

Mr. Hansell: I should like to ask one question as to the administration of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. It seems to be difficult for smaller communities to come under the act, the operations of which seem to be pretty well confined to the larger cities. Why is it that people in the smaller places who wish to get loans under the act are unable to do so? One person wrote to me for information from a small community of about 1,500 people. I sent the information to the officials at the head office, and they were kind enough to explain the situation to me. I wrote to the person suggesting that he go to Calgary or Lethbridge and get the necessary information ,and that, generally speaking, loans should be available for the smaller communities. I have received a reply to the effect that this person visited both the offices in Calgary and Lethbridge, and the expression he used was that he was given the run-around. I do not use that expression in any unkind fashion, but people do get annoyed when they cannot get a thing through. Perhaps there are reasons for it. Will the minister throw some light on the matter?—because there are people in the smaller communities who wish to take advantage of this act.

Mr. Winters: May I say once more, Mr. Chairman, that I would prefer to speak about housing, and discuss Central Mortgage and Housing matters, under the specific items. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is a crown company reporting through a minister, who in this case happens to be the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. It is not, therefore, properly a matter of departmental administration.

I would inform the member for Macleod that there is a section in the National Housing Act, section 31A, which enables the government to make loans direct in areas in which, in accordance with normal mortgage practice, the lending institutions do not choose to operate. To the best of my knowledge, wherever there has been a request for loans that have not qualified in the eyes of the lending institutions, but which nevertheless have been eligible for direct government loan under section 31A of the act, those loans have been forthcoming.

Mr. Hansell: What is the procedure in that case? Does the applicant get in touch with the minister, or with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Mr. Winters: First of all the applicant communicates with a lending institution, because the government is not in the mortgage business to compete with the lending institutions. If the lending institution decides it does not wish to undertake that particular loan, then the applicant is free to communicate with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, who will consider it under section 31A.

Item agreed to.

382. Public projects branch—formerly under departmental administration, demobilization and reconversion, $123,380.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before I bring to the minister's attention what I have particularly in mind, I would ask him what is the purpose of the public projects branch. Is it designed to provide a shelf of public works against possible unemployment in parts of the country? I have the report of the minister's department for 1948-49, and from a perusal of that report it would seem that is the purpose of this vote; is that correct?

Mr. Winters: The function of the public projects branch, as my hon. friend suggests, has been to assemble a backlog of projects that could be used when the economic situation justifies it. It has a broader function, that of trying to provide engineering assistance to other departments who wish to bring their programs to a state of readiness for implementation. It also provides assistance to the Department of Finance in screening the various projects advanced for consideration by the different government departments, to break them down as to their labour content and material content, and to aid in arriving at a conclusion as to when the project should be implemented.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I believe that these projects are not receiving the attention they should. A question was asked by the member for Vancouver-Quadra on October 12, and the answer revealed the inadequacy of what is being done in connection with these matters. The answer was based on vote 384, which is for reconstruction projects, but I presume it amounts to the same thing. The number of reconstruction projects involved totalled four. One consisted of an amount of $40,000 to design an icebreaker; another was $150,000 for some water control improvements on the French river; $4,200 was for the construction of a virus laboratory, and $70,000 for the Department of Mines and Resources to construct a road in British Columbia.

The particular project I have in mind is one that has been referred to before during this session; I refer to the work on the South Saskatchewan river. According to the departmental report, $250,000 was spent on surveys, investigation and planning in connection with the two projects, the Red river diversion and the South Saskatchewan river, up until March 31, 1948. How much is being spent on this project this year? How much has been spent since March 31 last, and what expenditure is contemplated for next year according to the estimates of the department?

There is increasing unemployment in Saskatchewan by reason of the widespread drought of this year. As a result, almost a quarter of a million people have to receive some measure of assistance. Reference has already been made to other branches of possible assistance, such as the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The South Saskatchewan river project is necessary to the future economic development of our province. It has been declared feasible, and, having regard to the necessity of something being done this year to assist the people in parts of southern Saskatchewan, and the fact that the South Saskatchewan river project is directly in the centre of the drought-afflicted portions of the province, I feel that extensive expenditures should be made on surveys so that an early commencement of the work may be undertaken.

This is a matter, sir, which affects a quarter of a million people. I know they all could not secure employment on it, but many of them could. In proceeding with this work, not only would a strong foundation be laid for the diversification of industry in our province, but help would be given to these people, to the municipalities, and to the provincial government—which has already begun to make plans for assistance to relieve the present condition and ensure future benefits. It is the kind of expansion that does not mean the expenditure of money with no commensurate return. In this chamber I have never asked the government on the one hand to reduce taxation and on the other to increase expenditures.

This is the kind of expenditure that is self-liquidating, that pays off dividends in development. It will make productive an area of some 700,000 acres in the central part of Saskatchewan that was formerly unproductive, except for a few fertile areas. It will make available a development that will reduce the expenditures on prairie farm assistance. It will lay the foundation for the development of Saskatchewan industrially and productively.

As this is not a narrow parochial project but one which affects the livelihood and the welfare of a quarter of a million Canadians, and is one of the national development schemes, it is worthy of being on a shelf designed to alleviate the possibilities of unemployment. Will the minister say a word in regard to the matter?

Mr. Winters: I shall be glad to do so. I am aware of the importance of this project. I have talked it over on many occasions with people from Saskatchewan who are interested, as well as with the Minister of Agriculture, who is directly concerned with it for the government. The purpose of the vote which is under consideration now, $123,380, is the operation of the public projects branch of the department. There is a subsequent item, 384, which provides an amount of $1 million. The hon. member had reference to that as well. The purpose of that vote is to have a fund available for the use of any government department that wishes to undertake any project on an emergency basis but for which the moneys have not been voted by parliament. The funds are therefore forthcoming from this pool of $1 million, which has been increased by another vote of $1 million; and allocations are made from this fund until such time as the moneys can be voted by parliament within the department which is concerned with the project, and then they are recoverable to this fund.

Having regard to the importance of the project to which my hon. friend refers, if the Minister of Agriculture asks for certain allotments from this fund to undertake work over and above that provided for by votes of parliament, I can assure him that I shall be pleased to co-operate with him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I appreciate the minister's attitude. It is consonant with the attitude he displayed this summer when visiting the various provincial governments and learning about the problem at first hand. In fact, he was in Saskatchewan, and his visit there was greatly appreciated. It was of value not only to himself but also to those with whom he came in contact.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister broaden out the answer he has given to the hon. member for Lake Centre? In other words, will he tell us in a general way just what projects there are? I think it would be a matter of interest and perhaps of reassurance to the people, particularly in those parts of the country in which they are beginning to feel the pinch of unemployment.

Mr. Winters: I am not quite sure, Mr. Chairman, what my hon. friend wishes me to answer. Will he reframe the question?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What I am asking for is a statement, as complete as the minister feels he can give, as to the projects which are in existence or contemplated.

Mr. Winters: I cannot, of course, list the projects which are on the so-called shelf, but I can tell the committee that this fund is available, as I have said to the hon. member for Lake Centre, to any department that wishes to implement any of these projects for the purpose of developing Canada as well as for the purpose of alleviating unemployment, but for which there has been no vote of parliament. This fund can be drawn on for that purpose until such time as parliament has had the opportunity of dealing with the specific vote. This is an emergency fund.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Did I understand the minister to say that he could not give us a list of the projects on the so-called shelf?

Mr. Winters: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is that because the minister feels that to do so might, let us say, give information which might be injurious to the actual carrying out of the projects? For instance, if the minister was thinking of buying my house, let us say, to use as an office for his operations in Toronto, I can quite understand that he would not want to give notice of his intention for fear I might get too enthusiastic about the price. But, speaking seriously, may I ask him to what extent he feels he can inform us, and to what extent not, and to give us the reason for whatever withholding he believes to be necessary.

Mr. Winters: The so-called shelf, as it was conceived, was to be a repository for projects that were completely planned and ready to be implemented. I think it must be evident to the house that there is a relatively small group of projects that are brought to that stage and are not implemented. We believe therefore that a broader concept of the investment program of the government should be visualized, and we are trying to use this public projects branch in an effort to bring any project of any department forward to the point where it is in such a state of readiness that it can be implemented as required.

The report of the department for 1949 referred to the various categories of readiness. We therefore feel that the major function of this department is not to have a backlog of works which have been developed by other departments but which they have not seen fit to implement. We would rather take the broader view of it. For that reason I say it is not in the concept of the shelf to visualize it as just a repository of projects that have been completely planned and are ready to be put into effect. There have been some in that category, which have been completely planned but which, for various reasons such as shortages of material or shortage of labour in a certain district, it has not been considered expedient to implement. I doubt whether the committee would consider it wise if I were to list the projects that have been prepared for implementation.

Mr. Prudham: I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to the location of the route for the trans-Canada highway. In his statement of policy I believe he said that the route would be entirely up to the provinces concerned, with the reservation that it should follow the shortest possible route. If there should be a difference of opinion between provinces as to the most feasible or most desirable route, would the government be in favour of setting up a fact-finding commission, or assisting the provinces in setting up a fact-finding commission?

Mr. Winters: I know of no disagreement such as that suggested by the hon. member. The only thing I can say is that if the condition should arise, the government, in co-operation with the provinces concerned, would be prepared to take the necessary steps to overcome the obstacle.

Mr. Prudham: Has the route been finally determined by the provinces concerned, or is it still open to negotiation?

Mr. Winters: The routes are still open to negotiation. So far there have been no agreements.

Mr. MacInnis: I am a bit confused about item 382. Perhaps I was out of the chamber when the item was called and the minister made a statement that I did not hear. If he did, he need not make it again; I shall look at it in the record. What is the purpose of this item? What is to be done under it? Is it the sum total of the public projects branch? If the minister has answered the question, I shall look it up.

Mr. Winters: There has been some discussion on the item, yes. The total of $123,380 is simply the amount required for the operation of that part of the department. It does not provide moneys for public projects as such; it is for the operation of the department.

Mr. Fraser: It is a hope chest.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I know we are all interested in this item, and in what the department has in hand, or what it should have in hand. The public has been led to expect that a large number of government projects would be prepared and made ready to be carried out when the occasion warranted. Those of us from Nova Scotia, including the minister, who are familiar with conditions in that province, will recognize that the situation is becoming more serious in that part of Canada. This was recognized by the Minister of Labour on Saturday when we were dealing with his estimates. He said that there were pockets of unemployment in the maritime provinces. I asked him whether the policy of transferring workmen from Nova Scotia to central Canada was to be proceeded with as it had been in previous years, and he indicated that it would not be done because it had not been successful. He said that the workmen of Nova Scotia preferred to work in Nova Scotia, which is quite correct. This makes it all the more necessary to have works projects undertaken there, and they should be made more definite than the minister has so far indicated.

We have the statement submitted by the Minister of Labour showing the total unemployed in Nova Scotia as of December 3. The number was 11,625 in Nova Scotia, and 10,936 in New Brunswick, which is a very large number indeed, and does not include men employed in country districts and lumberwoods. I think the minister should indicate to the house what projects are on this shelf to which he refers that can now be undertaken in Nova Scotia. Quite a number of projects have been discussed in parliament, and there is no reason why they should be longer delayed. There is the question of the Canso bridge, which we have been waiting to take up with the Minister of Transport when his estimates come before the house. That has been put off, and except for surveying, no work has been done. Then there is the question of rebuilding the railway from Sydney through to Moncton. That should be undertaken. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough from time to time has brought up the question of the Guysborough railway. He brought it up again this session, and tried to impress upon the government the necessity of building that railway. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has been a member of this house since 1936. His representations do not appear to be taken very seriously by the minister or by the government; otherwise some answer would have been given by the government as to the policy with respect to that railway.

It has been proposed that the main trunk railroad that is to be rebuilt to serve Cape Breton and transport the products of Cape Breton to central Canada should go over the Guysborough railway rather than that the old line from Antigonish to Canso should be rebuilt. The minister might make some statement with respect to that.

There is also the question of the Chignecto canal, which has been before parliament since confederation. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert emphasized that subject in his speech on the budget debate this year, as I and other members have done in the past. This is a project that should now be undertaken, in justice to the maritime provinces. More than $350 million has been spent on canals in central Canada, but nothing has been done in our part of Canada.

There is also the building of the trans-Canada highway. That should be more definite in Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Edmonton West has just received a statement from the minister as to the route to be approved in his part of Canada. On different occasions I have asked questions as to the route in Nova Scotia. I have asked for the correspondence, and up to this time it has not been forthcoming. Perhaps the minister can give the committee the information today. Construction of the trans-Canada highway should be undertaken early this coming season in Nova Scotia, to relieve present and impending unemployment.

If the minister is not able to get the proper advice as to the route, I would be prepared to give it to him myself. I would say the route should go to Halifax, the capital of the province. The minister says that the route should be the shortest practicable east-west route consistent with the needs of the provinces and of Canada as a whole. I suppose the shortest possible route should go to Amherst. The branch trans-Canada route serving Newfoundland should go from Amherst along the Northumberland strait to Canso and to North Sydney and thence to Louisburg.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member speaking about the route of the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I am speaking about unemployment in Nova Scotia, and I am following the suggestion given to the committee by the hon. member for Edmonton West and replies by the minister. These are suggestions as to the locating of the route in Nova Scotia so that the work can get under way.

There are other projects that should be undertaken in Nova Scotia. They are due to the province for what we did during the war and what we have done since confederation. They are due to us because we did not obtain our share of industrial development during the war, and have not obtained it since the war. They are due to us, because I suppose the greatest amount of unemployment in all Canada is now to be found in that part of Canada. There should be some indication from the minister at this time as to what his department has in mind, and what the government is going to do to relieve the situation in Nova Scotia. I should hope the minister would give a more definite indication of what projects will be undertaken in Nova Scotia in the coming season.

Mr. Winters: I can inform the committee that every consideration is being given to Nova Scotia's particular problem, as the hon. member for Cumberland can well imagine. The shelf, to use that word, is not a static thing. Projects have been registered on it, and projects come off it. Quite a large program of works has been undertaken in Nova Scotia, involving the bridge across the strait of Canso and quite a comprehensive program of work on the highways in the public park in Cape Breton. Then there is the matter of marshlands reclamation, of which the hon. member is so well aware. Further, there is the trans-Canada highway project, with which we wish to go forward as soon as possible. Last week I suggested to each provincial government that perhaps they would wish to meet in Ottawa on December 15 and 16—those are the dates I have suggested—to discuss all matters of technical detail, as a preliminary step toward the signing of agreements, so that the project can be implemented without delay.

Then there is the matter of housing which, if used as we think it should be used, could provide employment for a great many people, and at the same time go a long way toward helping with the development of Canada. We know there is much to be done in the way of housing in Nova Scotia. We stand ready, through the legislation that the house was good enough to enact recently, to do our share in that respect. As my hon. friend knows, the provincial government has a large and well-conceived program of public works, the building of highways and other works which will contribute greatly to the alleviation of unemployment.

The hon. member has suggested that I had not taken seriously the remarks of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough about the Guysborough railway. I need not remind him that I took those remarks most seriously, and have had several discussions with the hon. member with respect to that project.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Is the minister in a position to make an announcement about it?

Mr. Winters: That comes within the department of the Minister of Transport, and I am not in a position to make an announcement.

This morning the hon. member heard the Minister of Transport announce that another ship would be built for traffic between Nova Scotia and the New England states. It is within the bounds of possibility that that ship can be built in Halifax. That remains to be determined. The point is that the situation in Nova Scotia is well understood, and that steps within our means are being taken to meet the condition.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The minister recognizes the fact that there is considerable unemployment in Nova Scotia, as shown by the figures I have given.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not wish to drag this out, but I would ask one or two questions. I would refer the minister to two answers he gave within the last couple of months to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

On October 12 the hon. member asked this question:

> What allocations, if any, has the treasury board made for reconstruction projects under vote 384 of the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950?

The minister listed four, which, after rough addition, I should think would total about $360,000. Then, in answer to a similar question on October 20 with respect to vote 890—

> What allocation, if any, has the treasury board made for reconstruction projects under vote 890 of the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950?—

—the minister answered, "Nil".

I got the impression from what he said that, apart from the trans-Canada highway and housing—and I am not belittling either of them—the minister indicated that his department was taking the position of a stand-by department, to assist other departments if there were certain things they wanted to do. Is that a fair interpretation of what he said? Would we be correct in assuming that the shelf has to do with tentative matters or hopes which may or may not be realized? I can understand why projects go on the shelf and are then taken off. However, I think the people would like to know whether in fact the projects under the auspices of the minister's department are substantial. The figure of $360,000 is relatively small. If he feels that no details can be given—and I shall not press him, because I am sure he would give them if he could—would there be any objection to giving totals, stating that there are firm projects to such-and-such an amount? Otherwise, as it now stands, those who read this discussion might come to the conclusion that, apart from the trans-Canada highway and housing, there is nothing very definite.

Mr. Winters: I do not think the question is whether or not the program of projects is adequate, but rather whether the over-all government program of investment is substantial. Through its public projects branch the Department of Reconstruction and Supply has attempted to co-ordinate the government's program of investment, and I think that in that attempt it has been successful to some extent. This is reflected by the high level of employment that has prevailed in Canada, and the total amount of the government investment programs since the war.

I am sure my hon. friend has read the departmental report for the year ended March 31, 1949, which gives a pretty fair indication of the total volume of the government's investment program. It would be an entirely wrong concept on the part of my hon. friend to say that the public projects branch, as I have referred to it, is the government's investment program. The public projects branch, as it was conceived, was to be a repository for completely planned and engineered works which could be taken off the shelf and put into effect. That, as an over-all conceived plan, is not adequate, because projects are fluid things. They are all the time being conceived and brought to varying degrees of preparedness.

My hon. friend will see by referring to the report that the survey instigated by the public projects branch by way of co-ordinating or attempting to co-ordinate the functions of all government departments reveals a backlog of public projects in various stages of preparedness amounting to something of the order of $3 billion.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Gillis: I should like to be clear as to the functions of this branch. Am I right in assuming that this vote is just to provide funds for administration of the branch?

Mr. Winters: This particular vote, yes; there is a later vote which does the other things.

Mr. Gillis: I cannot see what it has to do with the trans-Canada highway and the Canso bridge. This is a special branch of the minister's department. They survey the field, decide what public projects are feasible and, if they so desire, recommend them.

In connection with the trans-Canada highway, is not the work of this branch done when the work is planned? Will not the administration of that project be largely in the hands of the provincial governments? The provincial governments will actually do the work. Is it not true also that in respect of the Canso bridge, while this branch may have something to do with the planning, the implementation of the plans is in the hands of the Department of Transport? The minister's department does not follow through with everything that is planned; that is handed over to the department particularly concerned. In effect all that is being done is to maintain a planning branch.

Item agreed to.

383. Canadian government travel bureau—to assist in promoting the tourist business in Canada, $1,298,277.

Mr. Fraser: At what fairs and exhibitions in foreign countries, including the United States, will the travel bureau have exhibits? How many inquiries have been received from other countries, and how many envelopes containing booklets and other literature have been sent out, and at what cost?

Mr. Winters: The travel bureau will have no exhibits at fairs or exhibitions in foreign countries except in the United States. Last year the bureau had exhibits at Boston, New York, Chicago, Dallas, Seattle, and Los Angeles. Up to date this year we have received 301,000 inquiries.

Mr. Fraser: Has the department ever considered using a trailer outfit in order to advertise Canada in different sections of the United States, places which cannot very well be reached by mail? I am thinking of such places as Hot Springs, Arkansas, and resorts in South Carolina and North Carolina. This would not cost much more than to advertise in one magazine. It would be of great help in increasing travel to this country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Canadian travel bureau is one of the most important agencies so far as the obtaining of United States dollars is concerned, and I should like to know if it is still located in the barn.

Mr. Winters: It is located in the old supreme court building.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That building started as a barn, and then for seventy years it was the temporary supreme court building. I submit in all seriousness that for Canada to have such an outstanding public agency located in such a place is completely out of keeping with its importance. I know something of the work that has been done by Leo Dolan on behalf of Canada. Recently I was in the far west and one of the Canadians who seemed to be known to the people of the United States was the director of the travel bureau.

It is undignified to have in such a building an agency of government as important as this. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra points out that public relations are of immense importance, and for outstanding United States citizens who come from the tourist bureau, say, in Washington, to visit the headquarters we have here does not give them the impression that should be given. The immediate transfer of this agency to quarters more in keeping with its importance should be considered.

Mr. Winters: Recently there has been a complete renovation of these quarters, which has made them a much more attractive place in which to work. I shall have full regard to what has been said here this morning for the purpose of further consideration.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand a copy of the report of the fourth dominion-provincial tourist conference which was held in Ottawa on November 7, 8 and 9 of this year. This was a conference of dominion and provincial ministers and officials and of representatives of companies interested in the tourist business. Seventeen resolutions were passed, seven of which expressed congratulations or thanks to individuals or organizations. I am interested to note that the minister of trade and industry of British Columbia made a heavyweight contribution by suggesting that girls with long hair who work in restaurants should wear nets.

I should like to refer to resolution No. 2, which reads:

> Recommended: That the fourth dominion-provincial tourist conference go on record as being strongly opposed to the use of the words "Restricted or selected clientele" in tourist resort folders, on letterheads and advertising.

I should like to know what action is taken by the minister's department on resolutions passed at this conference. I am greatly interested in this question, as are many of my constituents. I appreciate the good work that is being done by the Canadian travel bureau, but having followed their advertising for a number of years I am of the opinion that the major effort is to attract tourists to the larger centres or to the resorts operated by the railroad companies. I think the Canadian travel bureau has overlooked the opportunity to develop the tourist business in some of the isolated, or what might be described as the backwoods, districts.

By way of illustration, may I say that I represent one of the most beautiful constituencies in Canada. Nobody will question that. I have never seen a line of tourist publicity or advertising concerning the beauties of the Kootenays or the tourist facilities offered by the many tourist resorts. I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will support me in that. There are marvellous opportunities for tourists in the Kootenay, Arrow and Trout lake areas, but, so far as I can find out, the Canadian travel bureau has not published any literature directing the attention of tourists to those regions. Again I say I am of the opinion they are inclined to advertise first the resorts of the large railroads and other hotel-owning companies.

Mr. Green: I concur in the statement made by the hon. member for Kootenay West. It does seem that a good deal of the publicity has to do with such places as Banff and Jasper, which do not need it so much. The Kootenay country is one of the lovely parts of Canada, and is a great attraction to tourists. I should like to know what steps are taken to publicize districts of that kind.

When the minister is answering, perhaps he will say something in reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre concerning the location of the headquarters of the Canadian travel bureau. I think it is disgraceful. After all, the travel bureau is the show window of Canada. Their business is to sell Canada, and they have to deal with men from the United States who are engaged in the same line of business, and to whom appearances mean a great deal. The United States has desirable and attractive headquarters for such work, and Canada, which needs tourists far more than the United States, has headquarters which a person hesitates to enter. I think it is a most serious situation and shows poor judgment on the part of somebody high up in the government. I should like an assurance from the minister that suitable accommodation will be found for the travel bureau.

Mr. Winters: The travel bureau operates on the principle that its function is to entice tourists to come to Canada. Once they come to Canada it is the responsibility of the provinces to induce them to visit their particular areas. For that reason the Canadian government travel bureau does not try to emphasize or portray any one area at the expense of another. We have to try to give the national picture, and to create in the minds of prospective tourists a concept that is Canadian.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I am quite sure all hon. members are in thorough sympathy with the appropriation. Their only criticism, and it is a real one, is that it is not larger. The person in Canada to whom the greatest credit should be given for initiating federal responsibility as to tourist traffic is Senator W. H. Dennis of Nova Scotia. There has been a great development in tourist traffic, although there were setbacks because of the war, the depression and other circumstances. It is a most important department for the maritime provinces, and particularly Nova Scotia.

I realize that our part of Canada has not profited as much as central Canada from the appropriation. There is a great deal more to be done. It is probably the most undeveloped tourist area in the country, and yet it has greater possibilities and potentialities than any other section of Canada. There is great scope for development with respect to United States tourists and others coming to Canada.

There is another point which should not be neglected. The travel bureau should assume greater responsibility for attracting summer vacationists to the maritime provinces from central Canada. A great many tourists go from central Canada to the United States and other places outside of Canada. They should be attracted to the maritime provinces in far greater numbers than they have been in the past. I should like to ask the minister what the department is doing to publicize the maritimes and attract people from central Canada to the Atlantic seaboard, our warm sea water and cool air.

Mr. Winters: The attractions of Nova Scotia are so obvious that it is hard to understand why people do not flock there in greater numbers. It is just a matter of time until they hear about it, and then we shall have no further trouble in that respect. The eastern provinces are doing a good job in inducing tourists to go to the maritimes. In Nova Scotia the tourist department is very active. New Brunswick has been doing a good job, as has Prince Edward Island. Newfoundland has now come into the picture. Newfoundlanders feel that their province has very great tourist potentialities, and they have every intention of developing them.

[Mr. Green.]

The hon. member for Kootenay West referred to the dominion-provincial conference which is called each year for the purpose of discussing all matters which can mutually help us to bring more tourists to Canada generally, and help the provinces to attract more tourists to their own particular areas. These conferences have been most fruitful. There has been a measure of co-operation which has enabled us to go forward from year to year to improve tourist traffic in Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You now have eleven departments working together, the federal department and ten provincial departments. Can the minister give us his assurance that there is really co-ordination, that there is not overlapping or even a contradiction of advertising? Does he feel it is in good shape?

Mr. Winters: Of course that is one of the major items for discussion at the conferences, and I think the provinces feel there is the type of co-ordination which reduces overlapping to a minimum, and which gets the most for their dollars spent on the tourist industry.

Mr. Harkness: I notice the major portion of this expenditure, some $875,000, is for advertising and publicity. Is that entirely or almost entirely spent in the United States, in the same way that most of the booklets you send out go to that country?

Mr. Winters: Yes; that is correct.

Mr. Harkness: Is there any advertising in Canada, along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Cumberland, to induce people to go from central Canada to the maritimes, or to western Canada, and particularly the Rockies?

Mr. Winters: What advertising there is for that purpose is done by the provinces.

Item agreed to.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Demobilization and reconversion—

890. Reconstruction projects, subject to allocation by the treasury board—further amount required, $1,000,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to ask the minister one question arising out of the statement he made this morning. Has there been a request by the Minister of Agriculture for any allocation from this fund for the year 1949-50 in connection with surveying and other like works on the South Saskatchewan project?

Mr. Winters: No, there has not. But there is, I understand, a sum provided in the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, I understand that; but not from this?

Mr. Winters: No.

Mr. Green: Can the minister give us any idea as to what projects this money is to be used for?

Mr. Winters: Just as required.

Mr. Fraser: The Ganaraska river runs through Port Hope. It floods every year. Has anything been set aside for the Ganaraska watershed conversion?

Mr. Winters: Not under this department.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—

385. To provide for contribution towards cost of subway at Sudbury, Ontario, to implement agreement entered into in 1939, $100,000.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. Winters: This is a revote of an amount that was first put in the estimates in 1939 for a project which, for reasons of war, was not proceeded with. It has recently appeared in the estimates again. I understand that Sudbury is now ready to go ahead with its share of the work. This is likely to be the last year this item will appear in the estimates.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—housing development, including commitments of previous years—

386. To provide for payments of amounts owing under guarantees pursuant to item 571 of schedule A to the Appropriation Act No. 5, 1947 (and pursuant to corresponding items in previous appropriation acts) to approved lending institutions in respect of loans made for the purpose of financing the conversion of existing houses into multiple family houses, such payments to be made out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, $1.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain this item also?

Mr. Winters: Under the old Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act, 1938, there was an amount of $50 million for home improvements, and it was all expended by the year 1940. Subsequently during the war, when housing was administered by the Department of Finance, it was felt that one means of obtaining more housing units would be to make arrangements with people who owned large houses to break them down into smaller units. That was an arrangement with the banks backed by the government. I understand there were approximately nineteen loans,—and I am speaking from memory—the total amount being something of the order of $15,000.

Mr. Green: That is for the whole of Canada?

Mr. Winters: Yes. That has been wound up now. This item of $1 has been carried in the estimates just to keep the item alive, in the event that it would be needed; but it too will disappear this year.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—

387. Emergency shelter—administration, $350,000.

Mr. Green: Is there any way in which the department or the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation can help to get a family established in suitable living quarters where, for example, the mother has been deserted by her husband, has two or three children, is unable to rent proper accommodation and is really living under slum conditions? During the summer the members from Vancouver city were shown quite a few dwelling places of that type. Is there any way in which steps can be taken to get a family like that out of slum accommodation and into either a wartime house or some other adequate accommodation? I presume there would have to be help from some local welfare organization, but is the dominion government in a position to give any assistance at all in such cases? I am afraid that under the new dominion-provincial housing plan, people such as those to whom I refer will not be covered at all. Could the situation not be met either from the emergency shelter fund or perhaps through the use of certain wartime houses? The number of families concerned is not large, but the cases are serious because the mother simply cannot make a move, and the children are the ones who are suffering the most.

Mr. Winters: The federal government's participation in the field of rental housing was, except for war workers' houses, only for veterans of world war II, and the houses are allocated on a priority system which takes into consideration length of service, number of children, ability to rent, and so on. Unless the case mentioned by my hon. friend is cloaked with that sort of veterans' preference, it would have to be a matter for some local social welfare organization.

Mr. Green: Could they not be helped under this emergency shelter administration vote?

Mr. Winters: In the emergency shelter administration, of course, there was also an element of veterans' preference; but in most cases the administration was by the municipality, which gave consideration to the various aspects of the needs.

In reply to one part of the hon. member's previous question, I should say that there will be a much better opportunity for the type of family he had in mind to be housed under the new legislation than under the federal government's participation in rental housing.

Mr. Fraser: I was pleased to see in the press of yesterday morning the following item giving an account of the response of the Ottawa fire department to a call to a house on Chapel crescent. It reads as follows:

> The fire fighters were brought to 353 Chapel crescent when two workmen deliberately turned an acetylene torch flame against the wooden ceiling joists in the basement of the apartment block. The wood did not burst into flames because the ceiling had been painted with fireproof paint which only charred and turned black.
> Project supervisor Harold Graham then touched a lighted match to a metal drum filled with rubbish. Flames licked the walls and ceiling of the basement and smoke filled the combination laundry room and locker room. In less than a minute an alarm bell in the front hall rang loudly and a tenant telephoned the fire department, according to previous instructions. It was all part of a test demonstration of fireproof paint and a newly-installed fire alarm system being tested by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation officials.

I wondered whether this paint was to be used on all the projects—I hope it is—across the country. I am glad that this department is more favourably disposed toward fireproof paint than the Minister of Transport. Because of the tests that have been made I feel that it should be used, and that all frame houses should be painted with fireproof paint. The national research council has certain formulas, the borax type, but there are other formulas which are excellent and which will stand up outside and in. I hope they will be used in these projects.

Item agreed to.

National film board, including the motion picture bureau—

388. General administration, including technical administration, $249,084.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I should inform the committee at this stage that items 388, 389, 390, 391, and also supplementary items 891, 892 and 893, have to do with the national film board.

Mr. Fraser: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Winters: There is one other item, namely, 560, under loans and investments, which has to do with housing.

[Mr. Winters.]

The Deputy Chairman: Does the minister wish me to call item 560 on housing now?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Item stands.

Loans and investments—Reconstruction and supply—

560. To provide for advances to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the construction and conversion of houses for rent to veterans and married members of the armed forces, including the acquisition and development of land, and the purchase of building materials, $75,000,000.

Mr. Green: This is a $75 million item. Perhaps the minister will explain it.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, this item is to cover houses built for the Department of National Defence, and also houses built for rental under the veterans rental program.

Mr. Green: It is entirely for the forces and for the Department of Veterans Affairs?

Mr. Winters: No; it is entirely for the forces and for rental to veterans.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words about this item and about the national film board. The size of the item itself would warrant—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This is not the national film board item.

The Deputy Chairman: We are now on item 560.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I beg your pardon.

Item agreed to.

National film board, including the motion picture bureau—

388. General administration, including technical administration, $249,084.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am sorry, Mr. Chairman; I am just as bad in arithmetic as the house was this morning.

Mr. Fraser: I hope the minister is going to make a statement.

Mr. Winters: Before this item carries I think I should say a few words about the national film board.

The National Film Act was passed in 1939, and since this is the tenth year of its operation, it is perhaps fitting that I should make a brief statement before the committee deals with the board's estimates.

In its ten years of operation, the work of the board has become an integral part of the cultural and economic life of Canada. In a most creditable way the board has done its job of interpreting Canada to Canadians as well as to people in many foreign countries; and, by so doing, it has stimulated tourist traffic, which has become a considerable item in Canada's economy. In this latter respect the board has been working increasingly closer with the Canadian government travel bureau. As the co-ordinator of film activities for government departments in accordance with the National Film Act, it has assisted many departments of government in carrying out informational functions assigned to them.

Many hon. members, I know, are personally aware of the wide public appreciation which exists of the work that the board has done, especially in the rural areas of Canada, and of the high quality of most of its productions.

The work of the board has, in fact, received unusual commendation on many occasions, and I think it only fair to refresh the memories of hon. members in this regard.

In 1942 the board was honoured by an award from the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Science in Hollywood for its production of the wartime film, "Churchill's Island", which was produced in the "Canada Carries On" series. This was the only occasion on which a film produced in Canada has ever received such an award. There have been other awards in the meantime, and perhaps the committee would be interested in a few of the recent ones. Last April the board was awarded four prizes for its productions entered in the Canadian film awards presentation, which was inaugurated by the Canadian Association for Adult Education. In addition, a group of national film board films entered in the Edinburgh festival, an event where awards are not given, received considerable commendation; and within the past few months the board has won awards at international festivals in Brussels, Venice, and Cleveland. Hon. members may have seen a press report this morning that a film of the board had won another award in Italy.

Within recent months letters and resolutions expressing appreciation of the work done by the board have been received from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Canadian Education Association, provincial federations of agriculture, home and school clubs, teachers' associations, medical and welfare associations, the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, the I.O.D.E., the National Council on Physical Fitness, the Canadian Council of Churches, the British Empire Service League, and others.

I mention this to indicate that the board has been turning out good films and receiving many expressions of appreciation, which do not always find their way into public print as often as criticisms.

It is a matter of regret to me that so many valuable employees of the film board should be obliged to work in an atmosphere of doubt, generated by the charges and criticism of one kind or another levelled at the board from time to time. In an attempt, therefore, to clarify the situation to the greatest possible extent, to answer unjustified criticisms, and to indicate what action is being taken to correct whatever deficiencies there may be in the board, I would like to make what should be construed as an interim or progress report.

The question of security in the film board was raised by the hon. member for Calgary East on Friday evening, November 18, as reported at page 1975 and following of Hansard. I promised to deal with it on these estimates, and I should like now to do so.

Hon. members are no doubt aware that the policy of the government respecting security within departments and agencies of government was authoritatively stated in the last parliament, on June 22, 1948, by Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, who was then minister of justice, as reported at page 5630 of Hansard. I think it would be helpful if I repeated the concluding paragraphs of that statement. They are as follows:

> The government is of the opinion that loyalty to the state of employees in positions of trust is an essential aspect of the efficient conduct of public administration. Moreover, there are certain duties of such a secret character that the state would not be justified in employing for their performance any person whose trustworthiness is in doubt.
> Under the terms of the Civil Service Act and regulations, the civil service commission is required to satisfy itself as to the character and habits of persons appointed by it to government employment. These provisions do not apply to all employees or departments and agencies, nor do they relieve departments of their responsibility for satisfying themselves as to the suitability of individual employees from a security standpoint.
> The particular attention of heads of departments and agencies of government has been drawn to their responsibilities with respect to the reliability of employees under their charge from the security point of view. A procedure has been approved which will enable them to discharge this responsibility as a part of their normal administrative function.
> This is the position of the government with respect to security in relation to government employees generally. There is, however, the special case of those who are members of or associated with the communist party. The government is satisfied, from all the evidence available, that it would be a risk to the security of the state to employ such persons in positions of trust. For this reason, and in the discharge of its primary responsibility for security, the government has decided that no person who is a member of the communist party or associated with it shall be employed in work of a secret character. I may add that the same rule applies to those associated with fascist organizations.

I want particularly to emphasize one point. It is the statement that "there are certain duties of such a secret character that the state would not be justified in employing for their performance any person whose trustworthiness is in doubt." Hon. members will observe that it is merely a question of "doubt." In other words, the responsible head of the department or agency must be satisfied of the complete "trustworthiness" of the staff of that department or agency which is engaged in the confidential work.

It is a distasteful, nevertheless a most necessary aspect of public administration, that senior government officials and responsible ministers must, in Mr. Ilsley's words, satisfy themselves as to the suitability of individual employees from a security standpoint.

Exceptional care must obviously be taken in the case of those engaged in certain types of work. Naturally, there is a special obligation to protect the secrecy of any matter entrusted to us confidentially by the government of another country. I am sure all hon. members will realize this so-called security screening is not at all like a public examination of members of the public service, and that it is the kind of activity which cannot be carried on publicly, and which is by its very nature adversely affected by publicity. The whole purpose of this kind of inquiry would be defeated if the government were obliged to announce publicly that it was being carried on.

I notice that it is stated in an editorial in the Financial Post of November 26 that:

> In public affairs there is nothing that isn't the property of the public. The press is the public's representative in finding out and reporting how our business is being conducted.
> Trying to conduct public affairs in private is dangerous, and it never works for long.

There is no question that the administration of public affairs would be much easier if it were really true that in public affairs "there is nothing that isn't the property of the public". But the fact is that public affairs have to be carried on by men and women—and I refer here to public servants and not to elected representatives—who, having regard to the nature of their employment, are entitled to some privacy, as are other citizens. I wish there were no Canadians—happily there are very few—about whose loyalty to Canada there was any doubt; but nearly all hon. members know that is not the case.

The worst feature of all in this business is that we cannot wait for actual cases of espionage or sabotage or other offences; we simply cannot afford to employ or continue to employ persons about whose trustworthiness we have no definite assurance. But it would be a grave injustice to such persons—against whom there is no charge of wrongdoing, but merely the absence of satisfactory evidence of trustworthiness—to proclaim their names publicly and thereby injure their reputations and their chances of alternative employment. What I wish to emphasize is that it is not the government which would be hurt by publicity but the men and women whose reliability and trustworthiness are under examination; and nobody wants to be unfair and unjust to individuals.

This so-called screening of the national film board, which we hope to complete as rapidly as possible, is being carried on because another department of government wishes to entrust certain secret work to the board; and it is the routine duty of the board to satisfy itself and the government, by the most thorough inquiries, as to the trustworthiness of the staff.

I can assure hon. members that we are carrying out that duty with the fullest consciousness of our responsibility for the security of the state, and also our responsibility to respect, to the utmost limits of safety, the rights and freedom of the individual members of the staff of the board. And that, I am sure, is an attitude the house will approve.

Many aspects of the board's activities are being studied by the Massey commission, and as I have already stated in the house, a brief was presented to this commission by the film commissioner. In fairness to the Massey commission, as well as to the commissioner of the film board, I did not try to shape the brief to meet my views or the government's views, despite the fact that I was not in agreement with many of its recommendations. It seemed to me that it would not be in keeping with the spirit under which the Massey commission was established if the brief of the film board was merely a statement of existing government policy. In my opinion, what was wanted was an independent expression of views with which the Massey commission might deal as they saw fit.

Some question has been raised, especially in an article which appeared in the Financial Post on November 19, and which has been widely quoted, as to the effectiveness of what might be described as the business administration of the board; and I might add that before the article appeared I had myself, as chairman of the board, decided that an independent study of this aspect of its operations might be helpful.

It should be borne in mind that the film board's activities are carried on in nine separate buildings in Ottawa, because, despite the best efforts of the commissioner and the board, it has not been possible to obtain accommodation for all activities under one roof. Anybody who has run an organization will know how difficult it is to obtain unified control under such circumstances, and the worst feature is that operations carried on under such conditions are bound to appear to be inefficient, no matter how sound they may be in reality. The Minister of Public Works has promised to take steps with respect to accommodation, and, as a first step, has arranged to have new film vaults provided.

With respect to business administration generally, as I have intimated before, I felt it would be advisable to obtain a report of independent management consultants, and, to this end, after due consideration and discussion of the problem, the firm of J. D. Woods & Gordon, Limited, was retained on November 15, to investigate into and report upon all those matters which can be classified as business administration. I have, of course, not yet received a report; but I may say that my action was welcomed by the commissioner and the board, who are agreed that nothing but good can come from an objective and outside consideration of the business and administrative practices.

It has been alleged that the board is seeking a film monopoly and the destruction of the private film industry. I can state positively that the board has no such policy. On the contrary, it is the policy to encourage private film production in Canada. I believe most hon. members realize that the board carries out many film functions which might not otherwise be performed in Canada, and I believe, too, that there are many cases in which, by its work, it has stimulated private enterprise to undertake operations which it might not otherwise have undertaken. I believe the position in this respect can best be illustrated by one or two examples.

Early in January 1949 a representative of the Quebec Productions Corporation saw me in Ottawa, after requesting the film board to undertake the processing of certain films for his company. He subsequently wrote to me on January 12 as follows:

Dear Mr. Winters:

In view of the great efforts that have been made to produce "Un Homme et Son Peche" to the highest technical standards of quality possible and available in Canada, would you please reconsider the possibility of the national film board laboratory processing our first release prints.

It is with much satisfaction and deep appreciation that we have noted the high standard of production negative quality that your laboratory has produced for us. Its technical excellence is on a par with production laboratories in Hollywood, New York and London . . . a standard that could not have been attained at any other laboratory in Canada. If Canadian feature production is to move forward, this production laboratory quality must be maintained or we cannot hope to compete in world markets.

Although commercial laboratories in Canada do undertake release printing it is a generally recognized fact that even this process does not attain standards comparable to laboratories in other countries. It is therefore considered undesirable to entrust our first "show" prints to the vagaries and vicissitudes of a laboratory unaccustomed and undesirous of meeting present day motion picture standards of production.

Since the quality of our first release prints will be instrumental in interesting further Canadian capital to the motion picture production industry in Canada, we feel that the only alternative to protecting our future (if the facilities of the national film board laboratory cannot be made available to us) is to apply for permission to have our release printing done at a reputable laboratory in New York city.

As this latter alternative will require some necessary arrangements and preparation, if we are to abide by our releasing contract of January 29, could I take the liberty of telephoning you tomorrow morning for an answer.

Very sincerely yours,

(Sgd.) R. J. Jarvis,

Director of Production,
Quebec Productions Corporation

On January 15, after expressing my views orally, I replied as follows:

Dear Mr. Jarvis:

This will confirm our conversation (Jarvis, Newman, Winters). With due regard to the time factor involved and other special considerations, I am prepared to acknowledge the particular circumstances prevailing and to agree that the national film board shall process the first release prints at no cost to the government of your production "Un Homme et Son Peche."

It is desired to emphasize that the national film board does not propose to compete with privately owned facilities in this field. It is understood that you will bear this in mind and take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that the prints for succeeding productions will be processed by privately owned facilities. At any rate, it is to be clearly understood that I do not intend that the national film board shall process prints from ensuing productions.

I am forwarding a copy of this letter to the commissioner, national film board, so that he may be guided accordingly. It is understood that you will contact him to work out the necessary arrangements, financial and otherwise.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) Robert H. Winters

I think that letter can leave no doubt as to the attitude of the national film board with respect to competing with private enterprise. Subsequently in February, 1949, Renaissance Films made a similar request for the film board to process their negative. The commissioner discussed the request with me and it was decided to advise Renaissance Films to contact Associated Screen News and reach an agreement. As a result of this contact, a telegram was forwarded to the film board by the Associated Screen News as follows:

Mr. John Bigras of Renaissance Films Distribution Incorporated has requested that negative developing and daily rushes of their feature picture "Le Grand Bill" be processed by national film board. To this we have no objection.

In order to be perfectly clear on this point and to encourage privately owned laboratories to get in position to do their own work, the commissioner, after consulting me, wrote to Mr. W. J. Singleton, Associated Screen News, on March 21, as follows:

Dear Mr. Singleton:

I am obliged to you for your telegram of March 17, which reads as follows:

"Mr. John Bigras of Renaissance Films Distribution Incorporated has requested that negative developing and daily rushes of their feature picture "Le Grand Bill" be processed by national film board. To this we have no objections."

As you know it is not the wish of the national film board to undertake work of this kind for commercial producers in Canada but in the circumstances since it is desirable that the work should be done in this country rather than in the United States we will agree to do it. As I have informed Mr. Bigras, we certainly will not agree to undertake to do any release printing on the subject "Le Grand Bill" and we have also indicated our hope that it will be possible soon to make arrangements whereby work of this kind which the national film board is now called upon to do shall be done in commercial laboratories.

Yours sincerely,

Ross McLean

I hope that these letters will dissipate whatever doubt there is that the film board is trying to destroy the private film industry. As is so often the case, the film board is perhaps regarded more highly in every other country of the world where its films are shown than it is in Canada, and I hope that as time goes on more and more Canadians will develop a better understanding of the work of the board and a broader appreciation of its contribution to Canadian life. I think I can speak for all members of the board and for the commissioner and his staff when I say that none of us believes the board is perfect and that we are all anxious to increase its efficiency and to improve its service to Canada. It is my hope that the film board can come to be regarded without prejudice everywhere as an important instrument in the expanding life of Canada; and, to this end, we will welcome the constructive criticism and suggestions of hon. members on both sides of the house.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to what the minister has said. I am pleased that he has brought down his estimates this year in time to permit a discussion of the different items. Last year and the year before we got these estimates in the dying hours or perhaps I should say in the dying minutes of the session and we could not properly discuss the different items.

For some years I have criticized the film board. I have not been hostile to the board but I have criticized it in the hope that it would produce better pictures. I believe that since I started to criticize the board it has been producing better pictures. I have had letters from men and women in Canada and the United States who know motion pictures and they have been definitely critical of the film board because of certain things that had been done. From 1945 or 1946 on I have tried to get the film board on a really solid basis and from what the minister has said it would appear that they are trying to get that way.

I do not think my criticism during those years has been unjustified as there has been much room for criticism. The minister has said that he has called in a firm of accountants and business managers to check the film board to see what changes can be made and what improved business methods can be put into force. I am glad this is being done. It is now almost four years since I first advocated that this be done and I am mighty pleased that this action is taking place.

The minister referred to the full-page article on the film board that appeared in the Financial Post. That article stated that a strip of film, I believe 94 feet long, could be prepared by a commercial firm for from $300 to $500 whereas the film board would quote $1,500 to $2,000. There must be something definitely wrong because in making its quotation the film board charges practically no overhead. I shall deal with that later on. I understand that the board charges only five per cent for overhead whereas a commercial firm would charge at least 20 per cent to 25 per cent.

In his statement the minister mentioned the fact that different organizations throughout the country have praised the film board. That is perfectly correct. There is no reason why they should not. In most cases these organizations are getting films absolutely free, although in some places different societies are asked to donate whatever they wish to the film council of the particular town or city where they have what is known as a film library. From such libraries these films go out, and sometimes there is a charge and sometimes there is not. These people get the films free and, as the minister knows, when something is given free of charge people will not criticize it. They think it is good and let it go at that, but the people who get the films free do not know that they are paying for them through taxation.

I have here Mr. Grierson's original report for the year 1939, and I want to bring home the fact that according to the report and what Senator Euler said on March 9, 1939, there was to be only one paid employee of the board. The people of Canada are beginning to realize that the film board is trying to create a monopoly in photography. They are definitely in that field. I will not say much about their motion picture operation, but as to stills it appears to me that the national film board is trying to create a monopoly. According to my information the film board will send one, two, three or four people to take still pictures almost anywhere in Canada. The taxpayers pay for them. The film board is not only stepping into the business of commercial photographers in Canada; it is also invading the field of press photographers and gradually squeezing them out of business.

An hon. Member: That is wrong.

Mr. Fraser: I heard an hon. member say, "that is wrong." It is not wrong; it is right.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I say it is wrong.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. gentleman to my left is quite in favour of the film board because there are a number of members of the C.C.F. party employed there. That is one reason the leader of the socialist party got up in the house a year ago and raised high heaven because of the fact that the film board was withdrawing its office in Australia. Why did he do that? Because it was catering to a socialist government, and he hated to see that done. I have looked on the film board for some years just as I would look at a thumb tack, headed one way and pointed another. That is why they have not got proper employees. I have been informed that the staff of the national film board has been cut. Of course it has been cut since the drastic rise which took place in the first years after the war.

When the minister answers some of the questions I am going to put to him, I should like him to say how many were employed by the film board in 1948, and how many are employed at the present time. I should also like to know whether employees of the film board have been discharged since the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have been screening them, and how many have been discharged because of communistic leanings. As a result of the investigation by the management consultants, it may be felt that there are some people there who are not suited for the work they are now doing. In 1946 I said there were communists in the film board, and on May 1, 1946, I put a question on the order paper reading:

1. Is Bert Hughes an employee of the national film board?
2. If so (a) what position does he hold . . .

The third question was:

3. Are there any known communists employed by the national film board?

I understand that man was discharged shortly afterwards. Probably one reason why it is felt there should be a screening of the employees of the film board is that there was a man employed—I do not know whether he is at the present time—by the name of Kinnaird. He was a personal friend of the secretary of Sam Carr. The film board paid his passage and all expenses to The Hague when he went along with the secretary on the tramp steamer Manchester Prince, I believe it was. In 1946 and 1947 film board employees were busy clipping from different newspapers in Canada—I do not know whether they are still doing it—every article they could find in favour of the Russians. The director of the film board may not know it, but these clippings came from his office at one time, and that is what they were doing. They were clipping from the newspapers anything that was favourable to the Russians.

I understand that there is in the employ of the film board at the present time a man named Borneman—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): What is the name?

Mr. Fraser: Borneman. This man and his wife were prisoners of war on the Isle of Man during the last war. They were employed by the film board.

An hon. Member: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Fraser: In his statement the minister mentioned that the national film board had done a great deal to induce tourists to come to Canada. They have done quite a lot, but commercial films made by Warner Brothers and Crawley films have done as much if not more than the national film board. They have produced some excellent films. When the minister is answering I should like him to tell us how many men or women are employed throughout Canada at the present time as district supervisors, distributors of films, or showing films. As the minister knows, the commercial photographers have presented a brief. I have read it and I think it is a good one. The motion picture industry has also presented a brief. I hope that something will be done to eliminate the stills department of the national film board.

The minister mentioned the film series entitled "Canada Carries On". If they are still being produced I should like to know what the cost was for 1949 and also what the proceeds were. Now, that would be proceeds from the rental as well as the sale. I understand that the film board has been asked, or it has been suggested to them, that they discontinue that service.

On February 23, 1949, a question of mine about the transportation and travelling expenses of the national film board was answered. The reply stated that the amount for transportation was $10,283.79; meals, $89,-809.01. There is an amount for entertainment shown, $1,500, but I do not know what that would be for. This does not correspond with the reply I had on February 18, 1949, showing that the transportation costs were $100,283.79. I believe there is an error in the figures appearing in Hansard of February 23, 1949, and instead of $10,283.79, it should be $100,283.79; that should be corrected.

In the auditor general's report, under the heading "national film board", I find this:

> Unused film prints held for the board's use or for sale to others, as of March 31, 1949, had a book value of $39,922.39. As this was $18,304.57 less than inventory value, the profits on sales which went into revenue were understated by a like amount.

Will the minister tell us where that $18,304 went. I continue to quote from the auditor general's report:

> On April 26, 1949, the board reduced overhead charges on film production from 10 per cent to 5 per cent, with effect from April 1, 1948, but no adjustment was made on sales of films during the year 1948-49 to other government departments. $11,637.34 of the resultant surplus was credited to the vote for production of films instead of being deposited to revenue.

Will the minister explain that?

The minister mentioned the fact that these commercial companies are anxious to have the national film board process their negatives. If the overhead of the film board has been cut to five per cent, it is no wonder that a commercial company wants the board to do the processing, because the company can get them done so much cheaper than sending them to New York, as the national film board was doing until about a year ago. I should like the minister to tell us why that overhead was cut, and how he calculates the overhead cost. The national film board pays no rent for the twelve buildings or more which it occupies in Ottawa; the telephones are installed free, and the janitor service is free. They have no taxes to pay, and there are no taxes on any of their film coming into the country.

There is one other matter I should like to mention—I have asked about it before—and that is the still pictures. Last year the number of still pictures totalled 167,854, or almost 500 a day including Sundays. In that number is included a picture made by the national film board approximately 6½ feet by 12 feet. I should like to know what those large still pictures were. The figures I have just given refer to 1948. In 1949, there was a picture 70 feet by 80 feet, and there is one 72 feet by 80 feet. I am just wondering whether they were made for election purposes.

Mr. Stick: Did you get any?

Mr. Fraser: It would be a shame if you did.

Mr. Stick: I did not, but I am asking if you did.

Mr. Fraser: No fear of that. There are a number of other questions which I should like to ask the minister, but I think I have asked sufficient questions for the moment.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Does the minister wish to answer those questions now, Mr. Chairman, or does he wish to answer all the questions at once?

Mr. Fraser: I would rather have the answer now.

Mr. Winters: The hon. member asked a great many questions, and I do not know whether I have all of them. First of all, he asked how many employees there were in 1948, and how many at the present time. There were 610 in 1948, and there are 573 today. He asked how many of them left the board this year. As I recall it, the number is 61.

Mr. Fraser: Were any of those screened out?

Mr. Winters: They left the board for a wide variety of reasons, most of them for personal reasons. The hon. member asked with particular reference to several people: Mr. Kinnaird, who resigned some time ago to go to the IRO; Mr. Hughes, who resigned in 1945; and Mr. Borneman, who left the board in 1947 to go to UNESCO.

The hon. member asked how many people there were in the field staff, and the answer is 68. He indicated that there was a brief submitted by the motion picture industry, but I believe the hon. member is mistaken in that. No brief was submitted by the motion picture industry.

Mr. Fraser: I should have said the commercial photographers.

Mr. Winters: That is correct, but no brief was submitted by the motion picture industry. The hon. member asked if the "Canada Carries On" series was still being turned out by the board, and the answer is yes. The cost last year was about $120,000. There were roughly twelve pictures turned out, at an average cost of $10,000 per picture. He asked if there were any requests to abandon the series, and the answer is that no such request has come to the attention of the board.

Mr. Fraser: What was the revenue from that series?

Mr. Winters: I have no information about the revenue from it.

Mr. Fraser: The board ought to have that.

Mr. Winters: The hon. member quoted certain comments made by the Auditor General about the unused film prints in the hands of the board for the board's use or for sale to others. The explanation is that the manufacture and purchase of film is financed from a revolving fund which, unlike other appropriations, is carried on from fiscal year to fiscal year. While the sum of $315,000 was realized on the manufacture and sale of those prints during 1948-49, this amount was carried over the fiscal year, in order to provide a reserve for the acquisition of printing materials in connection with manufacturing prints.

The second comment of the Auditor General concerned the reduction of the overhead from ten per cent to five per cent. By way of explanation, I would say that the sum of $11,637.34 was credited to the vote for the production of films, because a similar amount had been charged to this vote during the year in connection with a number of films produced for other government departments, which had exceeded the estimated cost. This excess was absorbed by the national film board, and charged to its own appropriation.

The hon. member said something about the costs of the film board being lower than the costs of commercial companies, thereby making it attractive to the commercial film companies to have their work done by the board. I can assure the hon. member that the reverse is true. The charges are certainly in line with those charged by commercial processors. If anything, the film board charges a little more in order to discourage that type of work coming to the board. The hon. member will recall that I made it perfectly clear to private film producers that the film board does not want to do that work in competition with private industry.

Mr. Fraser: With regard to the sixty-one who have left, the minister gave me a partial answer. I asked if any of those had been screened out, and he did not answer that question.

Mr. Winters: Sixty-one people have left. If the hon. member wants to know if any of them were asked to leave the board because they were communists, the answer is no.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I like the hon. member for Peterborough West, but there are times when he tries me sorely. He does it once a year when he gets on the subject of the national film board. He has made a study of this matter, but he has not done too much homework on it.

Mr. Fraser: That is all you know about it.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): When he said today that he felt he could claim responsibility for the film board having made better pictures, I felt that I should congratulate him, not on the result of his endeavours but upon his unmitigated egotism. That was a most surprising statement, coming from the hon. gentleman. It is only matched in other ways by his ignorance of the situation, when he said that the film board is trying to create a monopoly in still pictures, stepping into the business of the professional photographers. When I disagreed with him, his shattering reply to me was that there are members of the C.C.F. on the film board.

Mr. Fraser: There are.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): The hon. member says there are members of the C.C.F. on the film board. I do not know. There may be. I should like to think that there are. There are five or six hundred members of the film board, and according to the Gallup poll we have 13 per cent of the popular vote. One might presume that there are five or six members of the national film board who are intelligent enough to be supporters of the C.C.F. The hon. member said that the film board was trying to create a monopoly. The minister did not answer that allegation. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will correct me if I am wrong, but I am told there are some 1,700 members of the professional photographers' association and that the film board last year sold 1,733 prints, which does not appear to me to be terribly severe competition.

Then there was this inevitable question of screening. The minister said that screening is adversely affected by publicity. That is true. But I think we must also admit that an individual may be adversely affected by screening. I hope that everything possible is being done to protect the individual, because one can put an odd interpretation upon these words "associated with communists". We have here the Minister of Justice and by using in a certain way these words "associated with communists" we may condemn him. I know he did so in a perfectly innocent way, as did many members of this house when we had a communist member of parliament here. In the Manitoba legislature when the Minister of Justice was there, there was a communist M.L.A. Are we to use the word in that sense or how is it to be used? How does one define the phrase "associated with communists"? I am merely pointing out the difficulties. I do not like the whole business. What I want to do is to protect the individual as far as possible from an arbitrary use of power.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to correct the hon. member. I know he will not mind my doing so. If I heard him correctly, he said that last year there were only 1,700 still pictures sold. In 1948, 79,544 were sold; and this year, up to September 30, 57,755 were sold.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): What the hon. gentleman says may be correct, Mr. Chairman. If so, I am wrong.

Mr. Fraser: Those figures are in a return tabled in my name.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to mention this to the hon. member for Peterborough West. Apparently there are some from his vicinity who have a certain appreciation of the film board, one of them being the editor of the Examiner. I now want to quote part of what the editor of the paper said on February 3, 1943:

> The film board has its enemies, and so far as we are able to judge, they are drawn from that small but determined element in the country which is hostile toward art and new developments in education, and which cannot think of the film board's work as anything but "movies"—a damning word, implying a type of entertainment foolish at best and downright immoral at worst. But disregarding such numbskulls, the film board also has its supporters, even among people who are not fully conscious of what the board is, or how it works; these supporters are the thousands in Peterborough county and similar districts from the maritimes to the west coast, who find in the showings of the film councils something to feed their minds, something to chew on, something to increase their knowledge of the world and particularly of our own large and varied country.

That is a statement with which I find myself in substantial agreement. I should like to congratulate the minister on two counts. In the first place, I think he was quite courageous in refusing to accept the submission of the national film board to the Massey commission, yet permitting the film board to continue with its presentation. I think he deserves commendation for that action. I am glad to hear one minister at least rise in his place in this chamber and defend this department which has been so frequently maligned. Today we have an attack on the film board, to some extent concerted, which is rather reminiscent of the attack by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters on the C.B.C. Where are the attacks being made? One would have thought that this film producers' association would have presented a brief to the Massey commission and there made their case against the film board. But they did not appear there. All that we have indeed is some lavatory gossip in a newspaper article which has been printed in the Financial Post and which has received wide publicity all over the country. I am not prepared to accept the veracity of this article at all. For a paper of the reputation of the Financial Post the article on the film board was a rather shocking piece of work. I am surprised that a correspondent who has the reputation that Mr. Kenneth Wilson has should lend his name to it because it is full of inaccuracies, half truths and untruths. I think the minister ought to answer these statements before he is through.

Some of the statements in the article leave the impression that the film board squanders money in the most merciless way. One charges that the N.F.B. shoots 50 feet for every one exhibited as compared with the 5 to 1 ratio considered to be the outside economic limit by the private producers. I am quite prepared to believe that there have been occasions in the film board when 50 feet of film have been wasted for every one produced. But I am also certain that these were the exceptions. If one is to read the article, one is given the impression that this is quite a frequent occurrence. We are told here that the N.F.B. forgot to record sound on a certain movie which was being taken. I suspect it was the film dealing with the ballet. They are accused of having forgotten to synchronize sound at the same time as the pictures were taken, and it is said that they went back to Toronto afterwards, hired an orchestra and a hall and then dubbed in the sound. Had the people writing this article had any special knowledge of the work of the film board or the work of film studios, they would have realized that it was far cheaper to tackle the problem in this way rather than to keep an orchestra for two or three days while the camera men shot the portion of the ballet which they desired to use.

Then an attempt is made to show that the revenues of the film board are only some $31,000. Mr. Wilson should know much better than that. The newspaper article states:

> Yet the public accounts show revenues of "proceeds of sales" in 1947-48 for the film board of only $31,000.

These are net figures. After the costs have been deducted that is the net profit which accrues to the crown. We are told here also that the national film board—and the minister must answer this—is using political pressure to force the screening of its pictures in theatres throughout Canada. I think the minister can give a very simple one word answer to that.

Then we have the situation existing in the Department of National Defence. Here we have a department of government going to outside corporations to get its work done on films, and yet section 11 of the National Film Act states:

> All processing and production of films by and for government departments shall be undertaken by the bureau, except where the commissioner agrees that the work can be done through officers of other departments and that the results obtained will be technically adequate and economical, or where the board considers the use of commercial films advisable in the public interest.

I want to know whether the Department of National Defence approached the film board and whether it got permission to break the law. After all, if employees of the film board could go down to the United States atomic plant installations and there take photographs it is reasonable to assume that they were screened before they went. If that is so, why could not the same employees have been used by the Department of National Defence?

The national film board is accused of charging unduly high prices. Perhaps the minister can enlighten me as to the difference in price between productions of the national film board and commercial producers. Departments of government are alleged to have stated that they are unable to get a firm bid from the film board. I should like to know the truth of that. According to this article in the Financial Post there are complaints from the theatre people that films are slanted. I should like to know where these complaints come from. Then of course there is this outrageous statement that the hon. member for Peterborough West made about the national film board being a continuing threat to every professional photographer in Canada. I do not think that such is the case.

Mr. Fraser: But it is.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I have asked several questions of the minister which will perhaps keep him engaged for a moment or two. Let me repeat what I said. I think the film board is a most useful adjunct of government in this country. It has done a first-class job through the prairie provinces, and I am inclined to think in other provinces as well, and it is one which, instead of being hamstrung by this cavilling criticism, should be helped in every way possible.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to make a few remarks about this item. I listened with great interest to what the minister said, and with much of it I am in agreement. In any event, I think we would want to take a scrutinizing interest in this item, which is a large one; but there are three special reasons for our doing so. First of all the article which has appeared in the Financial Post—and I should like to say here now that I do not think the hon. member for Winnipeg North was at his best when he referred to a journalist of the standing of Mr. Wilson, whose standing incidentally he did admit, and spoke of his work as a "shocking piece of work" and as a bit of "gossip". I notice that the minister, while he perhaps qualified some of the statements that appeared in the article, has not undertaken to question its accuracy. I think Mr. Wilson's reputation would stand up against anything that has been said by way of criticism. I do not think that is the way to deal with this matter at all.

The second reason why we should be careful in our scrutiny of the board and of its activities is the brief which was presented to the Massey commission, as to which I shall say a word in a moment. The third reason is the incident which we all remember, and which happened in this house some two or three weeks ago.

When we are considering the film board we should remember that it is an agency and activity of government. I noted what the hon. member for Winnipeg North said about the minister dissociating himself from responsibility for the brief. That attitude of the minister was interesting. In one sense I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North in what he said on this but in another sense we must face the fact that the government cannot really dissociate itself from it because it is an agency and activity of government.

At the very outset I want to say that I believe in educational films. So far as artistic work is concerned I believe a great deal of good work is being done. I would not like to qualify a single word that the minister has said. People more competent than I hold these views. I am very sympathetic to the work that is being done. Nothing that I shall say this afternoon should be construed in the slightest sense as hostile. But the question is: Who is to be responsible for the production of this work? That seems to me to be the question and a very important question, and it is in that light that I wish to say a few words about the board.

First of all I wish to quote briefly from the article that has been referred to. I shall quote part of the act governing the activity of the board; and while this may not be a full statement of the purposes of the board, nevertheless it is quoted and I quote it now. The role of the board as set forth in the original act provided that it:

1. Shall advise upon and approve production, distribution and exhibition contracts and agreements in connection with film activities of the several departments of government and in respect of these act as intermediary between such departments and commercial firms.

2. Shall advise upon all departmental expenditures in the production, distribution and exhibition of films.

We hardly recognize the board in its present activities as emanating from such a rather modest beginning. The board has certainly grown. If I am correct in saying that it was originally intended as an intermediary, it has now become a principal. We now have a new kingdom and the king will want as many subjects as possible. I feel that in certain quarters there is the belief that the board as it now exists has become in no sense an intermediary for the other departments.

The article says:

It is now contended that instead of acting as adviser, confidant and intermediary, the national film board too often appears to be working in the opposite direction and to be concerned with extending itself into a big movie producing outfit.

For the moment I am not saying whether that is good or bad. I am just saying that we want to be clear on what we are doing, and not slip into a situation into which we do not intend to slip.

One of the things on which the minister was quite silent, and I am sorry he was, because it was one of the points in this comprehensive article, was the attitude of other departments to the board which, as I understand it, seeks to become an independent organization, and not have any of the limitations or disabilities of an ordinary government department. I understand that is one of the things they desire. I should like to quote one or two things which were said by other government departments because I think it is desirable that we should know just what the attitude is. After all, surely it cannot be healthy to have this board working, so to speak, in a jealous relationship with other government departments and in a state of disharmony.

This is one of the quotations given by Mr. Wilson as coming from one of the critics:

Instead of being helpful and co-operative in finding a solution to the department's problem, the national film board by its methods left a bad taste in its wake; antagonized a lot of people in the very arena where it is supposed to be the intermediary. And, incidentally, it caused a long delay in an important promotional program for Canada.

In particular I want to refer to what has already been adverted to by the hon. member for Peterborough West, namely, the relationship which developed in the Department of External Affairs. It appears that the national film board had established its own offices in Australia.

Another and important controversy affects relations between NFB and the Department of External Affairs. In the NFB brief to the Massey commission the point was made that NFB offices in Washington and Sydney, Australia, were closed last year because of "budgetary restrictions" and that "a part of the work they performed is now undertaken by the Department of External Affairs."

The point at issue here, in the view of External Affairs, is that while it has been looking after distribution of NFB films in these and other missions abroad, it has no control over what is distributed. And since Canada's relations abroad are its prime responsibility, it should have more control over the type of material it is required to distribute for NFB.

And that is just the situation we are running into, where a senior department of government finds itself in this relationship. Briefly I would summarize by saying that here are some of the points made by some government departments by way of criticism:

1. High prices and special charges.

2. Lack of co-operation. ("You get just what they want to give you," says one official.)

3. Inability to get a firm bid or price.

4. Long delays and unbusinesslike methods.

I should like to interject that I was glad to hear the minister say he has engaged the services of what I consider to be a very reputable firm, and I should think it would be very useful in the matter of improving business methods.

I said a moment ago that the board is going to expand. Certainly the brief before the Massey commission would indicate that it is seeking to expand in a big way. Let me read just one brief paragraph, because I think it is important and because I think it indicates that this board is getting very far from what I understood to be its original purpose. It indicates that it is now really seeking to be an over-all propaganda agency. And when I say "propaganda" I am not using the word in any invidious sense at all. All I am saying is that when people are put in the position of directing publicity to other people, inevitably their own feelings become involved. Here is the paragraph:

In defining its approach the NFB brief said: "The prime duty of a government agency in a democracy is to explain and illuminate, under parliament, the common objectives of the people. Its function is to stimulate and strengthen the processes of representative government, to reinforce a sense of community, and to emphasize not only the privileges but the responsibilities of a free society."

That sounds all right. From one point of view no one could object to a word in that. But I would point out to the committee that if one were to take out two or three words—for instance, if one were to delete the words, "under parliament", and delete the word "representative" and the word "free"—it would be exactly the kind of policy the dictatorships used. A dictator could approve of all that, with the exception of those three expressions.

What I am saying is that before we slip into a situation of that kind it is time for us to stop, look and listen. It is time for us again to make up our minds what this board has to do and what it has not to do.

Let me say again I do not wish to be misunderstood. No one has a greater appreciation than I have of the excellence of the artistic work being done. My question is whether it all needs to be taken out of the control of the other departments, and whether they have become practically the servants or, at any rate, inferior in their relationships to the board, instead of having the board as an adviser, as was the original intention.

As a matter of fact, my feeling is that I would not want the board, even if it were staffed by angels from heaven, to be put in a position of a propaganda agency—that is what their claim involves—and going ahead and sending out its material to the people of Canada, so far as we can see now, under its own steam, and without any scrutiny of any kind. The minister, with his multitude of other duties, cannot give all his time to it.

I come now to screening, the question aired in the house some weeks ago. I agree with everything that has been said about the difficulty of the problem. Those of us who can look back a little longer than we would like can look back to a world when screening was a thing not dreamed of in our philosophy. We thought it might happen in a place like Russia, where they had to have such things as passports. I was one of the last to believe that it could happen here. I came to that conclusion very unwillingly. We have to deal with it as best we can, realizing it is necessary.

In the light of that, it seems to me that a very lamentable situation was disclosed here two or three weeks ago. We will remember the different explanations given. We will recall that the Minister of National Defence very frankly admitted the difficulty he had got into. I think he was frank, and I commend him for it. But from that point on it became more and more obscure. We could not find out just how the screening was being done. As I understood the Minister of National Defence, he thought first of all it was done by the R.C.M.P. But the Prime Minister told us no, that the heads of departments had to assume the responsibility. I propose to say a word about that, because it seems to be a very difficult position in which to place the head of a department. I wonder whether it is a wise position to put him in. At any rate, the Prime Minister told us that, and the Prime Minister deprecated that this had, as he said, leaked out.

Well, reference has been made this afternoon, in a more critical fashion, to what the Prime Minister said. I suppose the truth is that there is something to be said on both sides. None of us want people to be damaged in their reputations. One is sympathetic with what the Prime Minister said. On the other hand I think the difficulty here was caused by delay—and I want to know more about that.

It seems to me we have had many months during which it is fair to assume or to draw the inference that nothing happened. Let me go back and put the case as I see it. This is not new. It is three or four years now since we knew that this problem faced us. If I remember correctly it is a year and a half since Mr. Ilsley spoke in the house dealing with this unpleasant duty which had to be faced, and indicating how it was to be faced.

Now, in December of 1949, we are told that this screening has not yet been completed. I am going to suggest that the best deduction I can make from various things that have been said—and I am going back to what the Prime Minister said; if I am wrong I am ready to be corrected— is that it seems to me clear that the R.C.M.P. have finished their job, probably finished it some time ago. Where has the information been since? The Prime Minister said that either the minister or the deputy in the case involved had to take the responsibility. That is a horrid responsibility to have to take.

I suggest it is a difficult thing to go to a man and exercise that responsibility over him, when you are working with him from day to day in close relationship. I do not think you would be competent to do it. How is it possible for you to believe that the man with whom you are associating every day, and who probably comes to your house, and with whom you have lunch or dinner—how can you possibly think that Bill or Tom can have anything wrong with him?

I am not competent to suggest exactly how it could be done; but I am convinced that if we knew all the facts, the reason we are in this difficulty, and the reason for this unfortunate disclosure two or three weeks ago, would prove to be that this information was available, but that it was not acted upon, or that it was too difficult for people to act upon, and that it just stood for months.

If that is so, then I say it is a most regrettable situation. We have been forced to the position of realizing what can be done even in apparently the most settled and happy communities by a ruthless minority. I imagine most hon. members in the house have read the book "It Can't Happen Here". If they have read it perhaps their feeling was the same as mine, and the same as that of every other person I have discussed it with—that is, how easily it could happen anywhere.

I think in this case we are entitled to know. I do not think we know yet and I think our minds would be relieved if we could be told just why this matter hung, as evidently it did hang, if not for years at any rate for a great many months. The Prime Minister regretted the publicity. My answer to that is that if this had been dealt with as it should have been dealt with it might have been that the situation disclosed, and in my opinion properly disclosed by the Financial Post, would never have had to be disclosed and the hon. member for Calgary East would never have had to raise the matter and the damage which has been done would not have been done.

I think we are entitled to know certain things from the minister. I think we are entitled to know what the government intends to do with regard to this film board. Let me say at once that I believe this board is doing a good artistic work, and here I should like to say something which I intended to say but forgot to say. I think there is a real danger lest artistic people, people who have gifts for this kind of work which most of us lack, be misunderstood. There is great danger that we more pedestrian people, who perhaps do not understand them as well as we should, may be unfair to them. I am the last person who wants to be unfair to them, but nevertheless a situation exists. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre deprecates the talk there has been. Why deprecate it? We are not going to get rid of it just by being sorry. We are going to get rid of it in only one way, by dealing with it in a forthright fashion.

As I understand it, the film board is miles and miles away from what it was originally intended to be. Maybe it is better as it is now, but I think we are entitled to know what it is going to be. I think we are entitled to know whether this board with the government resources behind it is going to build up a huge movie industry. We are also entitled to know more about the relationship of the board with private business. I think the minister rather glossed that over in a pleasant way and I think I detected him using one or two phrases from the brief presented to the Massey commission. If I do him an injustice in saying that, the wording was quite similar and perhaps there was just a little telepathy with some of the members of the board. At any rate, that was glossed over and I do not think it can be glossed over as easily as that.

I should like to ask the minister a few questions with regard to costs of production, because I think that matter was also glossed over. First, I think we are entitled to know what is to be the scope of this board. Am I correct in believing that it is now carrying on functions far beyond those which it was originally intended to perform? I have not seen any legislation authorizing what is being done. Then I think we are entitled to be taken more into the minister's confidence with regard to this screening. I say that with particular regard for those concerned because until this question is settled, and satisfactorily settled, this murmuring which we all dislike so much will just go on.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two on this item dealing with the national film board because of a certain note which I have detected in the discussion this afternoon. I am sure that no one would object to an institution such as the national film board when its duties are to build up a strong Canada, when its policies are to portray a Canada that will bring honour and respect to this nation. I am sure that we all desire such an institution to be effective. But if it is to be used for anything else, if it is to be used to produce a mentality in Canada which is foreign to the free democracy we love, then it becomes a dangerous institution.

Much has been said this afternoon and in previous discussions and also in the press about the necessity for screening. The Minister of National Defence has been criticized for the statement he made the other day in respect to the securing of another film organization to do certain work which some people thought should have been done by the national film board. This committee is not ignorant of what I am talking about. Personally I did not criticize the minister. As a matter of fact, I would compliment him upon being courageous enough to make that statement and bring to light what his officials regarded as being a necessary step.

If there is any criticism at all it should not be levelled at the Minister of National Defence, it should be placed squarely on the shoulders of previous administrations which permitted a force which seeped into almost every department of our national life, and which produced an attitude that flirted with communism. I am not going to be too harsh with respect to that one point because during the war years it seemed to me that many people and institutions, and perhaps, speaking largely, the nation itself, were caught in the net of public sentiment which was spawned by the clever, subtle, intellectual high command of the communist forces. This was brought to our attention quite forcefully just after the spy commission report was made.

That report by inference, if not by direct statement, cast some little reflection upon the national film board. Let us look at these things squarely. Let us remember that the same intellectual high command of the communist forces had a particular purpose in mind in those days, and still has that purpose in mind although perhaps there has been a change in public sentiment. Nevertheless, if the purpose of that intellectual high command was to infiltrate and attempt to mould the mentality of our people, does anyone suppose for one moment that it forgot all about the institution known as the national film board? It is all very well for someone to say: Oh, well, we are watching that carefully and we cannot put our finger on anything. We hope they cannot. Side by side with that hope, we trust that the intellectual high command was not so subtle and so clever as to be able to accomplish their purpose without anyone being able to put their finger upon any particular danger spot.

Much has been said about the matter of screening, and I am in full sympathy, as others are, with the idea that no individual should be harmed by any such process. Nevertheless, let me ask this question, and I think it is one that should be asked. Why should anyone who is loyal to Canada and our democratic way of life; whose loyalty is pronounced in any way, have any reason to fear a screening? That is the point we must remember. I will tell you the man who has reason to fear in these days. He is the individual who dares to make a real stand against the enemies of democracy; the man who refuses to pull his punches when he thinks he has an opportunity to expose the enemy. That is the man who has reason to fear. Some of us have given a little thought to this matter, and let us remember not to underestimate the possibility that "it can happen here". Let us not forget if it does happen here some people will have to pay the price, and it will not be those who fear screening but those who dare to take a stand against infiltration, no matter how costly it may be to take that stand. They are the people who will have reason to fear. They are the ones who will be sent to a concentration camp if it ever happens here. They are the ones who have to consider what may happen to their families and loved ones. In addition they run the chance of character assassination that takes place even in these days. These are the valiant individuals who have reason to fear.

Much has been said, and I must say it has come pronouncedly from socialist forces, as to the reluctance to carry on what they are pleased to call a witch-hunt. Let me suggest that the only people who have any reason to fear a witch-hunt are the witches themselves. I do not think anyone wants to see the national film board cease operations.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): What about Hollywood?

Mr. Hansell: What about Hollywood? It is permeated through and through with communist forces. I have not on my desk my file concerning Hollywood, but I assure you I have a file on that too which I would not part with for a good bit of money. My file on Hollywood is not for sale. The intellectual high command of communism knows the value of propaganda. There are two institutions in Canada that are the most powerful media of propaganda we have. I refer to the motion picture screen and the medium of radio. When I say that, I suppose someone will jump up right away and say: Oh, casting reflections upon films and radio. I cannot help that. The thing is that they are media of propaganda, and they are the first fields that what I call the intellectual high command will seek to influence. I agree with the hon. member for Greenwood that the minister cannot absolve himself of all responsibility in this connection. If he thinks he can, or if there is any move made to relieve him of that responsibility, we had better see that it is put right on his shoulders because there must be responsibility on government shoulders to protect Canadians from having filched from them our own free democratic concept and way of life.

Mr. Croll: Mr. Chairman, I have a few words to say on this matter. First of all I want to direct attention to a statement made by the hon. member for Peterborough West. He started out by suggesting that the film board was an inefficient organization. Then he said his criticism had improved its efficiency from 1945 onwards to the point where it was now doing quite good work. The hon. member for Greenwood spoke of extravagance. The expenditure of the film board is, as indicated, about $2 million. One million dollars is spent on the distribution of films, and another million dollars is spent on the cost of production. I think the house should know that it costs at least $1 million to produce an A film in Hollywood. Nevertheless we only allow $1 million to the film board to carry on all its work in addition to the distribution of films. Many millions of people see these films every year.

What I thought was the most serious suggestion was made by the hon. member for Greenwood who referred to the film board as a propaganda agency. I think for a minute we should make an examination to see just what sort of agency it is. What is the film board doing? It is true that it has produced a great number of films dealing with better education in an effort to show people how to live better, how to increase health standards, and what better housing means to them. It sends out films dealing with citizenship and better medical care. If that is propaganda we should have more of it in Canada rather than less. Then, of course, there is the usual bogey that the film board is being screened. Well, what is wrong with that? If the film board or any other government department, because of the restricted material used, should be screened, then let us go about the business of screening them. We could vet them and process them, too, for that matter. They are not objecting.

Yesterday mention was made of screening the members of the C.B.C., but there was no uproar in the country at all. There are other departments that are being screened, but the minute it comes to the film board there are a lot of oh's and ah's and lifting of eyebrows, without any valid reason. I believe it is about time the film board got a bill of good health from this house, once and for all. We ought to stop that—

Mr. Fraser: Wait until it is healthy.

Mr. Croll: It is healthy enough for the hon. member. He said it had improved in health over the years.

Mr. Fraser: Yes, it has improved.

Mr. Croll: Well, then, it is healthy. There is in my city a film council whcih is the largest in the world. There are people from educational groups, service groups, home and school, and church groups, who take an active interest in it. They are the people who believe it is good business for us to show Canada to Canadians. Last year in Ontario there were 31,947 bookings attended by 2,698,461 people. I ask this house, is that dangerous? Is that bad for this country? It is better for the people to be looking at these films than listening to that radio drivel, like "John's other wife", the singing commercials, and some of those patent medicine gospel singers.

The film board needs a little understanding. The member for Greenwood touched upon it.

[Mr. Croll.]

These people are a little different from the average civil servant. They are artistic people, creative people, imaginative people; they are wrapped up in their work. They are zealous. They do not press their pants nor comb their hair as often as some people would like them to. Being different is no crime in this country. As a matter of fact, when we examine our own family, we find that there are those who need a little more understanding than the others. Perhaps in those people we can light a little spark of something that may be creative; we can awaken an interest in them. We ought to encourage that sort of thing in Canada.

This is the first time I have taken part in this discussion. From the debate I have gained the impression that there was not a direct attack against the film board, but there seemed to be a sly attack made by private interests on this great public agency that is serving the Dominion of Canada. If it had been a bad agency, no one would have paid the slightest attention to this film board, and it would have died. Because it is good, it is attacked and slandered at every opportunity by certain people in this country.

Last year the film board won some prizes to which the minister did not refer. I believe I should take a few moments to refer to them. They made a film called "Ski Skill", and one called "Hot Ice" which won an award for sports films in Italy. There was another film entitled "Vegetable Insects" which won the first prize. There were the films "Hen Hop" and "Fiddle-de-dee" which were awarded prizes at Brussels. Another film entitled "Chante Jeunesse", which was made by a constituent of mine, won a prize at Venice. It has been said that a prophet is not without honour save in his own country and among his own people.

I say frankly to this house that I do not like to see the film board or any other agency being kicked or pushed around. I do not like to see these red-herring tactics being employed. It is time we started encouraging the creative young Canadians. The Canadian National Exhibition, which takes place in my city, is one of the largest, and is viewed by a large number of Canadians. Think of it; as an indication of Canadian culture, we present such trash as Olsen and Johnson. That is no indication of our culture, and our art. How are young Canadian entertainers going to develop if we do not encourage them in our own departments, in our own government. We are making a serious mistake to be overly critical.

I do not need to tell this house how easy it is to destroy, and how hard it is to build. We have to be measured in our attacks on this or on any other government agency. What I object to—it has not happened so much in the house except by innuendo—is the smear tactics used by some people outside. I know full well, and I believe people who are acquainted with the film agency know quite well, that the film board speaks eloquently for Canada. I ask this house to encourage it. I ask this house to expand it. In this film board, we have an organization of which we can well be proud. Criticize it—I am in full agreement with that—but let us make sure our criticism leaves it with more and not with less reason for pride. I appeal to this house to give the film board the ordinary fair play we give other agencies. It is ten years old, and it has been able to stand on its own feet. It has been able to do a great deal, particularly for rural life in Canada. I think we ought to encourage it rather than hamper it.

Mr. Harkness: I came here with notes for a fairly lengthy speech, but I find most of it has already been made by other people, so I shall be quite brief. I had a considerable number of questions, but a large proportion of them have been asked. Two or three speakers have referred to the rather definite charges which were made in the article appearing in the Financial Post. There were four complaints by government departments against the film board, and those have been mentioned. In addition to that, there were listed three definite complaints by commercial picture makers. It was said that the film board made use of political pressure; that it wasted public money through inefficient production methods; and that they used discrimination as regards allowing commercially made films to be shown on certain circuits. When the minister replies, I think he should answer those seven definite charges.

Since that phase of the matter has been thoroughly covered, I shall say no more about it. I might say that, unlike the hon. member for Peterborough West, who has made such a study of this subject for the last four years, my knowledge of it is not detailed nor complete. For that reason, I should like the minister to answer the various questions he has been asked by the committee, particularly those covering the seven charges. I should like to comment briefly on the remarks of the member for Winnipeg North. To a considerable extent his speech consisted of an attack on the member for Peterborough West and other members of the house, because they were criticizing the film board. In my opinion it was an intolerant speech delivered in an intolerant manner, a manner which I am sorry to say too often characterizes the members of his party. This does not apply to all the members of that party by any means, but it certainly applies to some of them. Some of them seem to believe that all knowledge and all right thinking lie within themselves. Anyone who disagrees with them is wrong and damned.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North reminds me of my Scotch ancestors, who believed quite firmly that the only way to heaven was through the Presbyterian church. Anyone who did not belong to that church was headed for an extremely hot spot, indeed. At least, I have gathered this from reading certain letters and works. I can imagine the hon. member for Winnipeg North, if he had lived 300 years ago, delivering himself of those same sentiments, in much the same manner as he did this afternoon. I should like to say to him and to the hon. member for Spadina that those of us who criticize the film board do not for a moment believe that there is no good in it. There is much good in it. It has done valuable work particularly with regard to circulating films in rural areas. For that work I should like to commend it. But the fact that it has done certain good work is no reason in the world why we should cease to criticize it for things that we think are wrong and bad. If the method of criticism which we employ is based on the old biblical adage "Spare the rod and spoil the child", it is a widely-accepted method of criticism and discipline, and I do not think anybody should complain because we employ it.

I should like to say something about screening. When the discussion of the estimates of the Department of National Defence was going on, the minister of that department said that it was not until May of 1949 that the film board was looked upon as vulnerable and thus needing to be screened. Apparently a "vulnerable" person means a person who is in a position in which he might do some harm if his political sentiments were not correct and therefore some attention needs to be paid to him from that point of view. It seems to me to be a peculiar thing that the film board was not looked upon as vulnerable until May of this year. The policy of instituting security measures certainly was put into effect earlier than that. The fact that certain people whose affiliations were suspect, to say the least, had been employed in the film board, —and some of them were still there apparently—should have been a reason why some screening of the film board should have been done before May of this year; that is my opinion. In fact, the delay in this matter is quite unexplained, and needs explanation. That is one point I wish the minister to touch on.

It was stated at the same time that screening of the film board employees had been going on since May, and that the situation should be cleaned up fairly shortly. There was, of course, a considerable amount of difficulty over what screening meant. We received a couple of explanations. It finally developed that the Minister of National Defence, to begin with, was speaking of screening as the work being done by the R.C.M.P. The Prime Minister said that was only one step in it, that the actual screening was done by the heads of departments. As a result, we perhaps did not get just as definite answers and as definite information as we should have had with regard to some of the questions asked as to when screening was done, how much was done, and so on and so forth. I think this is the time for the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to clear up these uncertainties which still exist. As a matter of fact, the statement was made in the house that this screening was still going on, and I believe the minister repeated that statement this afternoon. My private information is that the screening of the film board, so far as the R.C.M.P. are concerned, was completed some time ago and that it is not still going on.

Mr. Winters: The hon. member's information is wrong.

Mr. Harkness: Furthermore, my information is to the effect that as a result of the screening by the R.C.M.P., there were between 40 and 45 of what are known as "rejects". In other words, I take it that that means people who, the police reports would indicate, were not fit to be entrusted with matter of a secret nature for the Department of National Defence or any other department which had secret matter to film.

Furthermore, I have been informed of something else. I should, of course, like answers to all these questions. I do not know whether or not this is correct, just as, at the time this matter was first brought up, I did not know whether or not the allegation that the Department of National Defence would not entrust classified work to the film board was correct. I do not know whether these things are correct, but I have had information to this effect also, that with regard to these people who are classed as "rejects", the film board is now in the process of trying to transfer them to other departments or to other parts of the government service. If that is correct I would take extremely serious objection to it. It seems to me that a person who cannot be trusted in one government department, because of communist leanings or anything else along that line, cannot be trusted any place in the government service. It does not matter what particular position a man holds in the government service, opportunities exist for sabotage and for undermining the way of life of the people of this country. I should think that the last thing that ought to be done is to transfer to other departments of the government, into positions where it is presumed there will be no opportunity for subversive activities, persons whom the film board or any other branch of the government is not prepared to keep, on those grounds. The very idea of that sort of thing of course seems remarkable, if it is actually taking place.

When the minister was speaking, I noticed that he quoted something from a speech by Mr. Ilsley when the security measures were first introduced, and in which occurred a phrase to the effect that the government will not employ in positions of trust members of the communist party or people affiliated with them. I should like to know whether the government is prepared to employ people of that kind in positions of any kind. This business of saying "in positions of trust" is all very well; but as I said a moment ago, I do not believe that people of that kind should be employed in any capacity. They should be removed from the government service altogether. The government service certainly should not be a place in which people who believe in a way of life different from ours, and who believe in overthrowing our system of government by force, should find a means of making their livelihood and opportunities to spread their own particular ideas and faith.

I have a number of short specific questions which I wish to ask the minister, but I shall leave them over until he has replied to the various questions I have already asked.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not want to delay the committee, but I desire to say a word on this matter. First of all, I greatly regret that over the last few years the house has not been given an opportunity to set up a committee before which the national film board could appear and tell the house and the country what it was doing, and where members of parliament would be given an opportunity to inquire into its activities. Because of that fact I believe there has been in the country, with regard to the film board and its employees, a great deal of discussion that has not been particularly well informed. In some quarters it is fashionable for people to classify as communist everyone whose views differ from their own; that is a fashion that I hope will eventually pass, but many people suffer because of it from time to time. I think there should be no objection whatsoever to the screening of the employees of the national film board or of those of any other department. One of the things that puzzles me is that, when it was said that an assignment had been given to a private corporation, there was no outcry that the members of that corporation had not been screened. I say to the committee that while there is considerable danger from the activities of those who follow the principles adopted in the Soviet union, we must not forget that there are others, some of whom are violently opposed to the Soviet union, who are right on the other side and are equally dangerous to our democratic institutions.

Those of us who have followed recent events in Europe know that it was very easy for some of the leading nazis in Germany to find a place in the communist party and in the communist movement when the Russians entered that country, and to occupy even positions of trust in the eastern part of Germany when it was taken over by the Russians. I could recount several instances of that which have been told to me by people who fled from that area because they were neither communists nor nazis.

We have to remember that from time to time we get symptoms of the fascist mentality in this country. In a question he asked this morning the hon. member for Winnipeg North referred to the situation in Dresden, Ontario, where coloured people, old citizens of this country, are being discriminated against. Another instance is the spread of anti-semitism that we have had in this country over the years. Therefore we should not confine our activities to just one sort of subversive movement or subversive element. If we are looking into that kind of thing at all we should look into other elements subversive of our democratic way.

In my opinion the film board has done a fine job in many respects. As the hon. member for Spadina said a few moments ago, it has interpreted Canada well to many other parts of the world. Its films are shown in thousands of theatres in the United States and South America, as well as in the United Kingdom. The film board has given this country very noteworthy and very good advertising. As to its work in the rural areas, those of us who have knowledge of that work and of the circuits that have been promoted by the national film board realize what a fine job it has done of interpreting one part of Canada to another and of giving our people an idea of what might be done in this great country. A friend of mine in Great Britain wrote some months ago asking me whether I had seen or heard the Winnipeg choral festival. He said that he had the pleasure of seeing a film of the Winnipeg choral festival somewhere in Great Britain. He mentioned how delighted they were from time to time to get some idea of what was being done in this country, not only materially but in a cultural way.

While I have no doubt that there are many aspects of the film board's work that could be criticized, yet there are many aspects of it that could be strengthened by proper constructive criticism. It is a great pity that when we have an organization of this sort—and the same applies naturally to our Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—there are elements in this country, and I am not criticizing my hon. friends, who want to tear it down and destroy it because they feel that it interferes with some vested interest that they may have. Perhaps the minister might tell us the extent to which the national film board's finances have been depleted by giving to private corporations, on account of reductions in staff, and perhaps false economy, some of the work that should be done by our film board. We should see this problem in perspective. My suggestion is—and I have advocated it in the house—that we should set up a committee which would look into the operations of the film board, and see to what extent the criticisms are justified and to what extent improvements can be suggested, and to give this organization an opportunity to develop, not as a propaganda agency—goodness knows if I thought it were a propaganda agency I would be opposing it—but as an educational facility. From what I have seen of the film board's films, and I have seen a good many of them, there has not been any party political propaganda in them. So long as it continues to interpret one part of this country to another, to enrich the cultural life of the country and to give the people of other countries some idea of what this country is doing, we should do all we can to improve it and to expand and encourage its activities. We should see that vested film interests in this country, who fear that the film board interferes with their private gain and private profits in this field, do not propagandize members of parliament as they have attempted to do. We should endeavour to see this thing in its proper perspective and to give this organization, which I believe has done a good job for our country, an opportunity to continue its good work.

In order that we may know what it is doing I suggest again that at the next session of parliament we set up a special committee to deal with this very important agency. I believe that all our government agencies, the national research council, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the national film board and other agencies of that description, should from time to time be the subject of investigation by a parliamentary committee. We have just finished discussing the work of the atomic energy committee. I must say that I have never sat on a parliamentary committee which was more satisfactory and more free from recriminations and so on. I believe that if we all approach parliamentary committees in that way we can strengthen these organizations and put the record straight in regard to the misinterpretation of their efforts and misstatements of fact that we see in papers that try to promote various vested interests in this country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, there are just one or two matters to which I wish to make reference. On more than one occasion I had the honour to visit the headquarters of the national film board in Ottawa and to see the work there, and also to see in my own constituency and generally in rural parts of Saskatchewan some of the work done by the national film board. I say—and I represent no vested interest—that the work done merits commendation in so far as it is educative, aesthetic and artistic. One of the reasons why the film board has come under severe criticism is the fact that there is no direct responsibility to parliament, and also the fact that it is one body from which it is almost impossible to get answers to questions asked in the house. I have asked a number of questions and I find that they have become embalmed in orders for returns and do not find their way into the records of the house. To begin with, I am going to refer to a question which should not have taken a week to answer. The Votes and Proceedings of November 21 records this question in my name:

> What is the total expenditures in each of the years 1946 to 1949 for the production and processing of film for any government department or departments by commercial firms, giving particulars of the said commercial firms and the amount paid to each?
> 2. Did the national film board make any decision during said years that it considered the use of commercial firms for the production of films advisable in the public interest? If so, in what case or cases, on what date or dates did it so decide and for what reason in each case?

Those were questions which should have been answered. Yet we have waited since November 21 for the answers to questions which should have been brought down immediately. Was there a reason why these questions were not answered? I suggest it was not because of a lack of information. For if one reads the statute some questions do come to mind. The National Film Act, 1939, makes provision for a national film board consisting of the minister, who shall be the chairman—with the exception that the minister referred to in the act is the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and there has been no amendment to the act by parliament since that time.

Section 11 deals with the processing and production of films, and states:

> All processing and production of films by and for government departments shall be undertaken by the bureau, except where the commissioner agrees that the work can be done through officers of other departments and that the results obtained will be technically adequate and economical, or where the board considers the use of commercial firms advisable in the public interest.

I ask the minister this question: When did the national film board meet to determine that in the public interest any department of government should have its films made by commercial corporations? You cannot get around that section by simply saying that the Minister of National Defence decided, "I do not want to be bound by the law." There had to be a meeting; there had to be a decision made. I shall read that again:

> —except where the commissioner agrees that the work can be done through officers of other departments and the results obtained will be technically adequate and economical, or where the board considers the use of commercial firms advisable in the public interest.

Is that another of those statutes the cabinet walked right through?

Mr. Rinfret: What was the last part of that section?

Mr. Diefenbaker: "Or where the board considers the use of commercial firms advisable in the public interest". Because no minister of any department had any authority to have films printed for his department, except through the film board, unless there was a resolution such as that provided in section 11.

That question was asked as far back as November 21. Why was it not answered? We have become so used in this session to laws being passed by parliament and not followed that this may come to be known, not as a constitutional session but the session in which unconstitutional matters have been revealed.

I now come to the minister's reference, made in that amiable attitude for which he is to be commended, to the recommendations or submissions made to the royal commission. The film board is composed of the minister as chairman, with six other members. Recommendations were made to the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences, and among those recommendations was, first, that the board wanted to get into television; secondly they needed more money than the $2 million to discharge their responsibilities; thirdly they noted with regret that the total number of film board employees has declined to 540, and proposed an increased staff; next, that the film board should be reorganized, operating under an appropriate review by parliament. In other words, no doubt this would involve the setting up of another crown company.

I cannot understand how the chairman of a board, who is also a minister of the crown, can so lightly dissociate himself from the recommendations made to a royal commission by the board, and simply say, "Well, with some of those recommendations I do not agree". Surely there is no board set up by parliament, of which a minister is the chief member, that can make recommendations, and then have the minister turn around and say, "I have nothing to do with that; I am just the chairman of the board. The board cannot be set up without me as chairman, but the board has a separate existence apart from me that allows it to make representations in regard to improvements that should take place in the board".

This is another example of a disregard of parliamentary responsibility. The minister cannot have it that way. He cannot say, "I am the chairman of a board; they make recommendations, but I remove myself from them. There were some of those recommendations with which I did not agree". In order to have that cleared up so that we will know that the body which made the recommendations did not have the concurrence of the minister, I say parliament should be told those parts with which he agreed and the parts with which he did not agree.

After all, he is the responsible minister. Having said that, I pass on to one other matter, namely this screening operation. When did it start in the national film board? Going back to the days of Mr. Ilsley, we find that on June 22, 1948, he told parliament that in the interests of national security the attention of the heads of departments and agencies of government had been drawn to their responsibility with respect to the reliability of employees under their charge, from the security point of view. And then he went on to say this—and it was quoted by the minister—

> No person who is a member of the communist party or associated with it shall be employed in work of a secret character. I may add that the same rule applies to those associated with fascist organizations.

Then again, on June 26 he said this:

> As was indicated in my statement of June 22, in the government's view loyalty is not susceptible to any precise series of tests, and the only specific instruction which has been given by the government on this subject is that which I mentioned at that time, namely, the special case of those who are members of or associated with communist and fascist organizations.

Then, having done nothing until May of 1949, something took place, and the so-called screening began. What has been the result? Who but the government put the employees of the national film board under suspicion? They put all the employees of that board under suspicion—and it is not fair. Surely the minister can say now what was done between June of 1948 and May of 1949. How many members of the film board were found to be members of communist or fascist organizations? That is a question that he can answer. The phrase "associated with" is a difficult phrase to define, but I would take the meaning of associated with communists or fascist organizations to mean close association, collaboration if you will, with those who have membership cards in those organizations. The minister said that 71 went out this year.

Mr. Winters: Sixty-one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Sixty-one; I am ten out. Possibly I am being given the revised version which we get so often around here. How many of those 61 are now in other departments? That is a simple question.

Mr. Winters: Something like eight.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says that of the 61 that went out following the institution of this screening—

Mr. Winters: No, it was a matter of normal separation. Most of the employees of the film board are not civil servants; they are employed for renewable terms on a three-months basis and there are quite a number of separations in the normal course of events.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is exactly what I am trying to get at. You place suspicion on all of these people—

Mr. Winters: That is what the hon. member is doing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, I am not doing that; the minister did it. That is having recourse to the old method; that does not work at all. The minister has said that 61 went out. Will he answer this simple question in order to relieve the eight of suspicion: Were any of the eight screened for being members of communist or fascist organizations or being associated with them? Were they let out for that reason?

Mr. Winters: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then we are clear on those eight who were formerly employed by the national film board and who have since been employed in other departments of government. They are now of no concern to us?

Mr. Winters: Quite right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That clears them, but until that question was asked they were not cleared.

Mr. Winters: I said that earlier today.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister's statement was obscured with enough verbiage to make it impossible for us to follow it.

Mr. Winters: The direct answer was made in reply to a direct question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If I missed that I offer my sincere apology for suggesting what I did. If I have made a mistake, I will withdraw. I did not hear that, though I have been sitting here all day. Is it correct to say that, when an individual is put out by reason of communist or fascist membership or association, he is not taken into any other department of government?

Mr. Winters: I cannot say how he is disposed of after he is screened out.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the minister not in a position to say that when they are screened out, because they are not regarded as individuals who place their country above any other country, the government is not going to employ them in any other department?

Mr. Winters: Each department has its own responsibility, as I pointed out quite clearly in the statement I made earlier and as has been said on previous occasions in this house. Therefore I am not in position to speak for other government departments.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely there must be agreement as between ministers of the government as to the policy to be followed in this connection. Surely if a person is not safe in one department the ministers of the government must be sure that he would not be safe in another. Does the minister say that there is no agreement among the members of the cabinet on the question, whether a person who is regarded as being unsafe in one department can be regarded as being safe in another? That is what the minister said. Is there a policy in that regard?

Mr. Winters: The hon. member is well aware of the policy because I read it earlier today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My friends applaud. All I can say is that I am asking the question, and if the minister wants to have his estimates proceed in the way in which we always try to expedite them, he will answer the questions I have asked. First, is there a policy? The minister is not going to put me off that way. I submit that the question is a fair one and I ask for a fair answer. I do not intend to be put off by an answer such as this: "I previously read a written document which answered your question." I am asking if there is any policy among the ministers of this government that when a person is let out or screened out of any department by reason of his communist or fascist membership or association he is still available for employment in other departments of government? I am asking for an answer to that question.

Mr. Winters: The answer revolves around the use of the word "trustworthy".

Mr. Diefenbaker: We shall follow that through. I have all the time in the world and if the minister does not intend to answer, that is fine. Is a person considered to be trustworthy in one department when he is considered to be untrustworthy in the department of the minister?

Mr. Winters: I am not going to interpret the regulations of other departments of government. I can only judge a man's trustworthiness to do a specific job that I may have for him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the measure of trustworthiness upon which the minister proceeds? He says that he has a certain metre of trustworthiness. What is that? If a person in the minister's department is screened out —I will put it the other way—if someone is screened out—my hon. friends may help the minister all they want, but I am going to get an answer—of another department—

The Chairman: The hon. member should deal with facts relating to the film board.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know what you said, Mr. Chairman, so you will have to repeat it.

The Chairman: The hon. member should deal with those things that have to do with the film board.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With all respect and deference to you, may I say that these questions have not been answered before. I have asked a simple question: If a person is screened out of another department—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —will he under any circumstances be taken into the film board under the minister? What is the basis of untrustworthiness that denies a person being taken into another department? That is a simple question.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Perhaps it is too simple.

Mr. Winters: The hon. member is posing a hypothetical question as far as I am concerned. Each case would have to be considered on its merits. I do not know whether the hon. member was listening—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am listening and I hear everything the minister says.

Mr. Winters: Of course each case would be considered on its merits but I suppose that as long as human beings are what they are there will be variations in human judgment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, it is because of human nature that it has received the support of my hon. friends to my right. The matter is perfectly clear now. I should like to ask the minister one or two questions about a certain individual. Before I do so, may I say that there is no suggestion of this man being a subject of suspicion in the slightest degree. I mention that because when I bring up his name somebody may say: Did he in any way do anything of a suspicious nature? I want it to be clear from the beginning that he did not. I should like to ask the minister whether there was a former employee of the film board by the name of Wesley Greene who set up his own distribution facilities in Chicago? If so, how long has he been distributing films there for the Canadian government?

Mr. Winters: Yes, there was an employee of the film board by the name of Wesley Greene. He has been distributing films in Chicago for the film board for about five years.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is he still engaged in that capacity?

Mr. Winters: Yes, he is still acting in that capacity for the film board, among a great many other agencies which also have films to distribute.

Mr. Fraser: Ask him if he ever returned the $7,000.

An hon. Member: Ask your own questions.

Mr. Fraser: I just wondered if Wesley Greene ever repaid the $7,000 he owed the film board at one time.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Lake Centre has the floor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Peterborough West asked a question. He is looking for information.

An hon. Member: What are you looking for?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fraser: I should like an answer.

Mr. Mitchell: This is not a police court. Let us get down to business.

Mr. Winters: This man, Wesley Greene, owed the film board an amount which at March 31 of this year was $3,200. The balance owing as of December 2, 1949, is $2,900.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is there one Vaughan Deacon connected with the film board at the present time, and if so where?

Mr. Winters: He is the regional supervisor in Toronto.

Mr. Herridge: I am not going to detain the house very long, but I want to say a few words at this time as a member representing a large number of people who are most sympathetic to the work of the national film board, and who appreciate the work that is done by the board. I was pleased indeed to listen to the minister's statement which I thought was most constructive and complete. The general expression of opinion among the members surrounding me was one of great pleasure with his presentation of the facts. I prepared two or three sets of notes this afternoon, but I found as the afternoon proceeded that other members were saying what I intended to say. Therefore I am not going to repeat what they said except to say that I endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North and the hon. member for Spadina. I noticed that the hon. member for Calgary East criticized this group, but he did not answer the comments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

I was most pleased to note the reference by the hon. member for Spadina to the difference in the personnel of a department such as the national film board compared to other departments of the government. I think he said they had more imagination. I want to say I have found that out from experience. One day I had occasion to go to a branch of the Department of Mines and Resources where I had to deal with an ancient and frigid biddy. I found it difficult to get any information about natural resources from her, and I received very little inspiration concerning our natural resources. I went from there to the national film board and met some of the people there who are making films, and particularly one employee very interested in our natural resources. I thought at the time, what an interesting person. In the one case the lady was without imagination and could not enthuse or inform anyone about Canada's natural resources. In the other case the person was one of a group which has lived somewhat under a cloud because of the attacks of certain people, but a group able to inspire interest in our natural resources. I am sure they are doing more than thousands of the other type to make Canadians proud of Canada and its natural resources.

Comments about the national film board have been more or less concerning the larger sphere in which the board works, but I must say the people of my constituency appreciate the good work carried on by the board. I have had people tell me how much they enjoyed the community film, "Hometown Paper". It is a most instructive film for adults and children. The same applies to the film, "Country Health", the educational film, "The Postmaster", and films portraying British Columbia logging and other industries. Repeatedly I have had people working in various fields express their appreciation to me of the type of film presented by the national film board.

I believe the hon. member for Peterborough West spoke in somewhat critical fashion, at least by implication, as to the program, "Canada Carries On".

Mr. Fraser: Pardon me; all I asked was whether it was still being carried on and what the cost was.

Mr. Herridge: Possibly the hon. member's continued interest in the cost is an indication of a somewhat critical frame of mind. I am pleased to note that the dominion-provincial tourist conference, which met in Ottawa during the month of November, passed a resolution urging the national film board to provide a certain film under the program "Canada Carries On" because of the great benefit it would be to the tourist industry. I think the hon. member for Spadina said that in his constituency the film council had the largest number of members of any such body. According to the Trail Daily Times of November 25, I am pleased to note that the Trail film council has set a Canadian record. The article reads in part:

> Talks on Trail's film society and on radio operation were heard at last night's dinner meeting of the Trail junior chamber of commerce. G. L. Groutage, speaking of the work of the film board in the past year, said that the Trail group had achieved an all-Canada record in attendance at films on a population basis. A total of 55,000 people had attended 605 showings to date in 1949.

I think that indicates the interest of the people in the cities of Trail, Rossland and Nelson. As to the isolated country groups, mention has been made previously of the support of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Canadian Legion and other national organizations. Why do they support the national film board and express these opinions? Because they are advised to do so by their local branches, their local rank and file, the people who support them and who appreciate the work of the national film board.

I think the hon. member for Peterborough West said that people were interested because it was something for nothing. I challenge that statement. The people of my constituency are interested in this service because they appreciate its value. They appreciate it as a service for which they are entirely willing to pay. Farmers' organizations, the Legion, women's organizations, parent-teacher groups, teachers' organizations, church organizations, and in fact a very wide section of the people have expressed their appreciation to me of the work of the national film board. I think what counts in this respect is what the people think, and not the opinion of a few prejudiced people who are opposed to the principles under which the national film board is working. I am sure the minister will realize that the people of Canada as a whole are behind the constructive work of the national film board.

In conclusion, may I say a word about the staff? I have had an opportunity of visiting some of the technical branches of the national film board in Ottawa, and other branches of that board. I would say that I perceived a much different approach to their work than in some departments of government, and a keen interest, in contrast to the more formal application to duty which is found in some branches of the civil service. The same thing applies to those who work in the field. There have been a number of young men in my constituency doing work for the national film board. They have gone to unusual lengths to make certain that small, isolated communities receive film services. I should like to express the appreciation of the country people of my constituency for this good work on their behalf.

One other suggestion, Mr. Chairman: This session the minister forwarded us a letter, requesting suggestions about the regular Saturday morning showing of films by the film board to the members of this house. I believe the idea of showing films to the members is an excellent one, but I do suggest that on Saturday mornings the members are busily engaged in doing their office work or other tasks. I am in favour of these showings, but I suggest the showing be made to the members of the House of Commons on Wednesday evening, when they are more likely to be free to attend.

Mr. Drew: The discussion that has taken place this afternoon has indicated how far some hon. members have strayed from the point at which this board came under discussion, concerning the screening that is taking place. An attempt has been made to create the impression that an attack was made on the board by those who sit in other parts of the house than where the supporters of the government sit. I believe it is important for hon. members of this house, and the public, to remember that the only reason the film board is under any measure of suspicion at the moment is because of a statement made by the Minister of National Defence. He said his department was not prepared to entrust to the film board the filming of certain matters connected with national defence. If anyone is to blame for any cloud which hangs over the film board, it is the government for having failed to clear up the limited information which was given to the house on the night the Minister of National Defence answered the question concerning the article which appeared in the Financial Post.

I am astonished at the statement made in the house this afternoon, criticizing that article in the Financial Post. Those of us who believe in democracy in this country, and the right of a free press, also believe that it is the duty of the press to make use of that freedom for the purpose of keeping democracy a working mechanism, by informing the people as to the facts. The press is performing the service for which it is free only when the members of the press do give to the public information which comes to their attention, and which they regard as being of public importance.

Far from the writer of the article being subjected to any criticism by any member of this house, the writer of that article deserves commendation for having brought to public attention something of which the members were unaware before the statement appeared in that article. From that point forward, the members of the house have tried to find out what the facts really are. May I say with considerable emphasis that the members of the party which I lead have not indicated opposition to the national film board, but they have indicated opposition to the lack of information; they have indicated opposition to a system which denies to the members of the house the information they should have. Incidentally, it appears to deny that measure of supervision over the film board itself, which would assure the sort of efficiency that I should imagine every member of the film board would desire most.

This afternoon it was said that it was about time the film board received a bill of good health from this house. The way for the film board to get a bill of good health in this house is for the minister concerned to clear up the uncertainty that was created by the statement of the Minister of National Defence. There is no other way in which it can be done. That is not an obligation which rests upon the members of the opposition; it is an obligation which rests upon the minister in charge to say what the facts are, in a way that removes the doubt and uncertainty that was created in that statement, which was reported in the press and over the radio in Canada, as well as in the press and over the radio outside Canada. Certainly, this government agency upon which $2 million is being spent deserves to have a bill of good health. The fact is that, without a bill of good health, this house should not be passing these estimates. Unless the good health certificate is given, then we do not know whether this money is being properly spent.

Let us briefly review what did happen. The Minister of National Defence said that this department could not be entrusted with the responsibility of taking moving pictures of certain defence matters for educational purposes. Yet, we are told that the same organization which cannot be entrusted to take pictures of the workings of the breech block of a field gun, or the operation of the buffers of a gun, the taking down of a machine gun, or the movement of a tank, something of that kind for the purpose of instruction, is sent to Chalk River to go inside that ultra-secret plant and take pictures. This is the plant in which our atom secrets are kept. On instructions from this government, this same organization was entrusted with the taking of certain pictures connected with atomic energy in the United States.

Of all the fantastic nonsense this house has heard at any time during this session, that does exceed anything we have heard to date. A government agency cannot be entrusted with the taking of pictures of mechanisms of national defence, most of which we know to be simply carryovers from the war, yet this very organization is entrusted with the one thing that is still regarded as highly secret in connection with national defence in this country. Unless we have some explanation of that strange position, we shall not get very far. This whole thing started with the admission of the Minister of National Defence, and not through any criticism on the part of any member of the opposition, and unless we receive some explanation the whole thing will end up in a farce. The government entrusts highly secret work to that organization, but it is unwilling to give it work in connection with which the secrecy is only limited.

An hon. Member: It is six o'clock.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Before calling it six o'clock, in a spirit of co-operation, we should like to have the unanimous consent of the house to have a discussion of television at ten o'clock tonight. If that discussion is held tonight, we may have with us the manager of the C.B.C., but I am told he is going into the hospital tomorrow, so we would not have his advice and services on another day. If the matter were postponed, then the minister would be alone. We would hear speeches, but we would not have answers to all the questions that may be asked.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Drew: I will just continue my remarks, Mr. Chairman, from where I was when we rose at six o'clock. As was said by one of the members who spoke this afternoon, the two most powerful agencies of propaganda that exist today are undoubtedly the radio and the moving picture. In saying that, a distinction must be drawn between them and the daily press which has its responsibility for a much wider coverage than is possible in either of those cases. It must be a matter of concern that in each of these agencies which are under the control of the dominion government we find that a screening process has been taking place for many months and that we are unable to find out what the result of that screening is.

It is not enough for the minister in charge of the national film board to say that the board has accomplished great things and has won certain recognition. All of us will acclaim that fact and all of us will hope that the circumstances will be such that the work can be carried out on an even better and more satisfactory level in the future. But having regard to the bald statement that has been made, that the filming of certain ordinary national defence details cannot be carried out by the national film board until screening is completed and there is given the bill of health which the Department of National Defence is asking for, and not the house, then we are left in the position that we do not know what is being accomplished with the money we are being asked to vote.

Last night we found that in the case of one branch of the C.B.C. there is also a screening process which has been going on for many months. There again the minister responsible had no report, although he was not in a position to say that there had been none. In fact, it would be a surprising thing if he had stated that there was no report, because it has been going on for some time.

A situation has been put forward here which is not consistent with our principles of ministerial responsibility and the joint responsibility of the members of the government for what is done. In this case the minister of reconstruction is the chairman of the national film board. Without discussing the nature of the recommendations that were made by that board to the Massey commission, may I say that the statement made by the minister that he does not identify himself with the recommendations of that board expresses a lack of ministerial responsibility which should not be overlooked. He cannot wrap himself in some magic cloak; he cannot at one moment, as minister of reconstruction, be a responsible minister, and then at another moment in the same day, by wrapping this cloak around him, cease to be a minister of the government and simply be an independent chairman of a board which is an emanation of this parliament. That is utterly inconsistent with the simplest basic propositions of our system of responsible government and joint governmental responsibility. Whether the recommendations of the film board to the Massey commission were right or wrong, or whether they were partly right and partly wrong, is not the point that is so important. What is important is this. The minister should either accept full responsibility as minister for the chairmanship of that board or he should cease to be chairman of the board.

Mr. Winters: May I just say that that is strange logic.

Mr. Drew: It is not strange logic at all. Anything else is a strange lack of recognition of the responsibility of the minister.

Mr. Winters: That is your opinion.

Mr. Drew: I am quite prepared to let that opinion stand the test of any recorded history of parliamentary government.

Mr. Chevrier: We have just had a test of opinion.

Mr. Drew: Yes, we had a test of opinion; and nothing could better illustrate the whole attitude of this government than their constant reference to that fact. Not so long ago there was a man in Europe who said that as long as you could get away with something, it was all right.

Mr. Whitman: But he did not have elections.

Mr. Drew: That is not our principle of government.

Mr. Chevrier: It is yours.

Mr. Drew: And it is not our system here.

Mr. Whitman: Talk about North Stars; you know more about them.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Drew: It is unfortunate that we are not dealing with the department of excise because that would be a subject which the hon. member who is speaking now would know more about. The point I am making is this—

Mr. Whitman: What about Hong Kong?

Mr. Drew: Obviously a door has been left open, Mr. Chairman, and there is some rather noisy bit of equipment around this building.

Mr. Whitman: Just another member.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Drew: The minister who is now dealing with this department is the chairman of the board. He must either accept the responsibility as minister or he should cease to be chairman of the board. As to the present situation, he is the one to clear this board of any suggestion that it is not in a position to deal with the matters which should be entrusted to it, which suggestion has been raised by the statement of the Minister of National Defence and has not yet been answered in the house by any member of the government. As to the details, if the minister has not yet received reports from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as to the result of their investigation, then it is high time that he did. I would ask the minister to tell the house whether he has received reports; and if so, what the effect of those reports is, and what he intends to do about them.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to what has been said about the film board. I should like to know who went to China to make a film. What was the cost of his trip and of making that film? Has this film been shown somewhere? If not, why not? What was the relationship between the man who went to China and Mr. Ross McLean, the commissioner of the film board? I warn the minister that my information is to the effect that a tremendous sum of money has been wasted on the making of a communistic film in China, boosting Mao Tse-tung, the communist leader, and it was made by someone who was closely related to Mr. Ross McLean of the film board. I am not screening anybody. I do not know if it is true or not, but I should like to have complete information about that venture. If the minister is good enough to tell us I shall be thankful to him and I have some other questions.

Mr. Winters: The film referred to by the hon. member for Temiscouata was made for UNRRA. The man who photographed it was a film board employee, lent to UNRRA. His name is Grant McLean, and he is a nephew of the film board commissioner.

Mr. Pouliot: Thank you. Why has that film not been shown in this country? I have been informed—I wonder whether it is true or not—that the picture has not been shown because that man McLean, a nephew of the commissioner, took pictures that were glorifying communism in China. All I ask the minister is why that picture, made for UNRRA, has not been shown in Canada. I would ask him a supplementary question. Where is that film now? Who keeps it? What was the total amount paid for the film?

Mr. Winters: The film has been sold to Cardinal Films of Toronto for Canadian distribution, and it is distributed in the United Kingdom by United Artists.

Mr. Pouliot: Distributed under a socialist government. The minister did not answer my question. All I want to know is why the film has not been shown in Canada. What was the cost of the film? What was the amount paid for it to the film board?

Mr. Winters: The picture was sold on a percentage agreement to Cardinal Films and to United Artists. There is no information yet of the revenue that will accrue. The film has been released in Canada and has been shown in Canada.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank the minister for his answer but I am not satisfied. What I want to know is the cost of that film to the film board. Here is an instance of nepotism. Here is a commissioner who sends his nephew to China to make a communistic propaganda film and it has cost a lot of money. If they have some businessmen in the film board the minister should be able to answer me. All I want to know is how much that film has cost the country. That is my first question.

Mr. Winters: Sixteen thousand dollars.

Mr. Pouliot: Does that include the travelling expenses of McLean, his paraphernalia and his entourage to China? I want to know what has been paid for the travelling expenses of that tribe to China, the whole amount of expenditures, the travelling expenses and boarding in China and giving parties for the mandarins and everything. I want to know the total expenditures of the whole outfit.

Mr. Winters: The travelling expenses to which my hon. friend refers were paid by UNRRA.

Mr. Pouliot: How much was it?

Mr. Winters: I understand that the expenses to UNRRA for work done by Mr. McLean for the full year's assignment in China were $20,000.

Mr. Pouliot: Twenty plus sixteen is thirty-six, $36,000. Does that cover everything?

Mr. Winters: Yes, that does cover much more than the film to which my hon. friend refers; it covers other films as well.

Mr. Pouliot: And the whole venture was authorized by Ross McLean, the commissioner, was it not?

Mr. Winters: It was authorized with the approval of the board.

Mr. Pouliot: Outside the knowledge of the government?

Mr. Winters: I understand that the then chairman of the board knew about it. He was a member of the board. There are two members of the government on the film board.

Mr. Pouliot: Who decided that this film should not be shown in Canada?

Mr. Winters: Nobody has decided that. The film is being shown in Canada by Cardinal Films of Toronto.

Mr. Pouliot: Why was it not shown to members of the House of Commons to inform them about what is going on in China? I will ask the minister a supplementary question. How is it that the film board has lent one of the McLean clan to UNRRA to make a communistic film for the benefit of a Toronto company which has sold it to the socialist government in England? I wonder whether they are commercialized to that extent. I am quite surprised that the film board is trading films of that kind to another government. I warn the minister against all those who were in the film board during the war. Since the war has ended some returned men and women have been employed in the film board. Will the minister be kind enough to tell me what are the personal qualifications of Ross McLean, the commissioner of the film board, to act as such? On whose recommendation was he appointed in the first place? What was his training?

Mr. Winters: That was before my association with the film board, but the qualifications have been cited before in this house. Mr. McLean has had experience abroad in various capacities. He served as deputy commissioner of the film board for some time before he was appointed.

Mr. Pouliot: That is not a qualification. I will tell the minister that he was a low grade clerk at Canada House in London, and he was picked up by Grierson, and instantly he became the great pasha of the national film board.

Mr. Winters: I should remind the hon. member that Mr. McLean was private secretary to the high commissioner at Canada House in London.

Mr. Pouliot: Well, that is no recommendation.

Mr. Winters: It is a fact, though.

Mr. Pouliot: And I have another pertinent question to ask the minister. Who is the man who has been most photographed by the film board since the beginning of the war, and the one of whom there are so many pictures in the archives of the national film board? I want to speak of a man who has been over-photographed on all sides—and if the minister does not realize what I mean he will have only to ask McLean, who will tell him about it.

Mr. Winters: I cannot answer that question, Mr. Chairman; I don't know.

Mr. Pouliot: Then I will tell this to the minister, that there are thousands of proofs, and enlargements of proofs, and films, and snapshots, and camera films and exposures, of one man alone and in a group of two or more persons. They were taken since the war. My information is that there are ten thousand such pictures of various descriptions, with all the great of the world. I would like to know how many pictures there are, and who he is.

Mr. Drew: The mysterious Mr. X.

Mr. Pouliot: Photographed—

Mr. Winters: I do not know the answer, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pouliot: Photographed from the right, photographed from the left, photographed right in front, face photographs, photographed backwards, profile photographs, up and down —I would like to know who it is.

An hon. Member: Who is it?

Mr. Pouliot: The commissioner knows, And I would like him to tell the minister. I am told there are 10,000 pictures, proofs and enlargements, of that man since the beginning of the war.

An hon. Member: Who is he?

Mr. Pouliot: He was ten years younger then; now he is ten years older. But not a day passed without having several pictures taken of his glorious self. I would like to know who he is.

An hon. Member: Who is he?

Mr. Drew: It is not the hon. member for Temiscouata, is it?

Mr. Pouliot: What is the use of having so many pictures that serve no purpose? I do not mean the exposures of moving pictures. It is one moving picture, with many poses, many shots, taken on the way to the end. But it seems to me that I speak English clearly enough. I would like to know who is the human monument the film board has photographed so often, and with such joy, and at such expense to the country.

An hon. Member: Tell us.

Mr. Pouliot: No, no; that is a fair question. I speak of a living tower, of an historical giant, who is no more. I did not mean a physical giant, I meant an historical giant—and an hysterical giant; and I would like to know if the film board has some pictures, scores, hundreds of pictures, thousands of pictures, tens of thousands of pictures of one single man, to advertise the beautiful scenery of Canada.

An hon. Member: Who?

Mr. Pouliot: I don't know; I want to know.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Pouliot: Well, Mr. Chairman, before it is carried, if there is no more answer than that, the whole film board should be discharged, dismissed, sent home, fired—goodbye.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Temiscouata and I find ourselves at opposite ends of political discussions, but at times we come close together. I think the film board is perhaps one of those occasions when we are close. I believe the hon. member is just as much interested as I am in seeing that this branch of government is run in the way all of us would like to see it run.

The questions the hon. member has been asking come very close to some I had noted down to ask. The first of these is: Have any complaints been received about the leftist slanting of films produced by the film board?

Mr. Winters: I have received no such complaints, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Harkness: The minister says he has not received any complaints. Has the film board, apart from himself—because he appears to have divorced himself from it to some extent —received any complaints in the matter, or has the government as a whole received any?

Mr. Winters: I can only say that to my knowledge the board has received no complaints and I do not know of any other member of the government who has received any.

Mr. Harkness: It has been reported in certain newspapers, so that it is a matter of more or less common knowledge, that certain trade unions have complained that films made by the film board in connection with trade union activities were such as to encourage the development of communism within those unions. Has that never come to the attention of the minister?

Mr. Winters: No, it has not.

Mr. Harkness: I would recommend that he read a paper known as The Ensign, which I am sure is familiar to most hon. members, and in which there are reports to that effect. In addition to that I think there have been various other complaints from other sources in this connection.

However if the minister says that he has had no complaints and knows of no complaints, there is very little more I can say on the subject. But I think I can assure him that there have been such complaints, and I would recommend that he look into them and find out exactly what they are.

Have any films produced by the film board been suppressed or withdrawn because it was considered that they would have leftist or communist propaganda effect?

Mr. Winters: No, sir.

Mr. Harkness: The minister has said glibly No, that there had not been any; but I would like to ask him—

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that sort of thing should be allowed to go on. If the hon. member—

Mr. Harkness: Who has the floor, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: I understand the minister has risen to a point of order.

Mr. Winters: To a question of privilege. If the hon. member wishes to continue with that type of language, I think he should be more explicit. How does one say "no, sir" in a glib way? You tell me that.

Mr. Harkness: I can tell the minister that very readily. I was just proceeding to ask the minister whether he had inquired if any such situation had existed, either while he was minister of the department or before. I used the word "glib" because the minister rose immediately to his feet and said, "No" apparently without consulting anybody.

Mr. Winters: That is not correct. The hon. member is making statements that are not correct. I said, "No, sir," on the basis of my own knowledge since I have been chairman of the board, and I consulted the officials who are before me and they said the answer was "No" in so far as they knew.

Mr. Pouliot: The minister is all right, but the film board is not so good.

Mr. Harkness: I accept the minister's statement. If my reference to being glib is offensive, I gladly withdraw it. I did not mean to be offensive in any way. I think possibly the matter to which I refer of the withdrawal of a film or films took place before the minister took over his present position. Before the dinner recess the minister was asked a number of questions which I should like him to answer, particularly those with regard to the charges made against the film board allegedly by departmental officials, commercial organizations and others, as outlined in the Financial Post.

Mr. Pouliot: I wonder if the minister should not try to appease the hon. gentleman who has just spoken by having 10,000 pictures taken of him by the film board.

Mr. Winters: The charges to which the hon. member for Calgary East refers are not charges that have been made against the film board by government departments. As I understand it, they are items which are listed in an article which appeared in the Financial Post. As I understand it further, the seven points to which he refers have to do with high prices and special charges and the lack of co-operation and so on.

To my knowledge no government department has charged that the board charges high prices and makes special charges. I am sure that the board does not make a practice of indulging in things of that nature. As to lack of co-operation, I would say that the board is made up of two members of the government, a chairman, a deputy chairman and six members, three of whom are from government departments and three from outside the government service. I should think that those from the government departments would be in a pretty good position to talk of co-operation with other government departments. There has been no charge of lack of co-operation brought to the attention of the board, either through the three members who are members of government departments, directly to me, or through other avenues. The next item is with regard to the inability to get a firm bid or price. I do not know what specific instance or instances lie behind that. The estimating of the cost of a film is a difficult procedure. As I understand it, no one producing films can give an estimate that will invariably result in a firm price.

Then there is the charge of long delays and unbusinesslike methods. I have told the committee that I have asked the opinion of independent business consultants and I am anxious to see what they will have to say on this point. Then it is said that the national film board used political pressures to restrain commercial competition. I have no knowledge of that. Wherever I have felt that there might be a possibility of any restraint I have taken steps to overcome and prevent it, as I have told the committee.

Then there is a charge of extravagance and wasteful use of public funds through inefficient production methods. There again, as I told the committee, I want a report myself and I have engaged a firm of management consultants to look into that phase. Point seven is that the national film board is discriminatory in allotting screening time to commercially produced cultural and educational pictures on the national film board's rural circuits. I am told that that is not the case; where the commercial films are not in the nature of advertising they are given equal opportunity with films produced by the film board.

Mr. Harkness: The first point dealt with by the minister had to do with the charge of high prices and the minister has said that as far as he is aware the prices were not unduly high, or something of that nature. I ask him if he will categorically deny the statement which appears in the Financial Post article and which reads:

> What Government Departments Say
> An example: One department negotiated with national film board for almost a year trying to get what it considered a satisfactory basis for production of the first two of a series of films for display in all parts of the world.
> Rough outlines of how the subject would be treated were billed to the department at $800. That fee the department considered to be "outrageous" since commercial firms submit these treatments without charge as part of their service.
> After much controversy, bids were sought unofficially from outside firms. These bids averaged about 20 per cent lower than national film board. Had any of these firms been allowed to go ahead and make the pictures, national film board would then have billed the department with a surcharge for overhead or "advisory" services to the commercial producer, whether it did any advising or not. This surcharge is added to all national film board movie bills. It used to be 10 per cent; April, 1949, the surcharge became five per cent retroactive to April, 1948.

Mr. Winters: That charge is anonymous, it mentions no department. To my knowledge it is not well founded and I am informed by the officials who are here now that they have no knowledge of any such circumstance.

Mr. Harkness: I assume that the minister read this article which appeared some weeks ago and I have no doubt he has given some attention to it. Has he taken up that particular charge with the officials of his department and made an effort to find whether it was true or untrue?

Mr. Winters: To which department is the hon. member referring?

Mr. Harkness: The film board.

Mr. Winters: I have done that.

Mr. Pouliot: I should like to say a word about the set-up of this board, which I think is all wrong. May I remind hon. members that at the session of 1936 I sponsored a bill to repeal the Economic Council Act which was passed by the house during the regime of the Bennett government. Mr. Bennett's idea was to gather together officials from various departments to form an underground or subterranean government to advise the cabinet. It was just nonsense. When a man is appointed as deputy minister, as assistant deputy minister or as acting deputy minister of a department he should give all of his time to that department. There is no reason why he should divide his work and join other officials to form a board similar to the national film board. What is the conclusion from all that? It is that men who have been appointed for a special purpose pay no attention to the job for which they are paid, and they try to increase their emoluments by sitting on a board, commission or other body. Nonsense! One reason why the film board should be dispensed with is precisely because six of its members belong to other departments. It creates disorder; it prevents good government; it is absurd. That is why I denounced it thirteen years ago. With the support of the government of that day I had an act passed to repeal Mr. Bennett's legislation establishing the economic council. The minister was not then a member of the House of Commons. He knows the regard I have for him, but I do not want him to have any trouble with the film board.

In my view the primordial reason why the film board was established was not to contribute to the war effort or to advertise Canada but only to glorify one man who is now out of the picture. No one has dared tell us the number of pictures of this man which are kept in the archives of the film board, pictures that are no longer of any interest because they were never of any interest except to one who is gone. That is precisely the reason why it is impossible to secure any more information. Now that we have a government composed of real men I hope that all the sissy business will be dispensed with, and that we will not hear any more about the film board.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I should like to ask the minister whether the charge made by the Financial Post as to these fees is true, untrue, or partially true and partially untrue. That is simple.

Mr. Winters: You mean the charge of high prices?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The charge about the overhead charged in connection with these pictures.

Mr. Winters: There is an overhead charged. Is that what my hon. friend is asking?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You have read the article, and I have heard it and also have read it. Certain fees were charged to other departments whether or not work was done. Is that true or untrue, or partially true?

Mr. Winters: There is no charge made unless work is done.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): All right, let us get this straight. The minister's statement is that there is no charge made unless work is done. By that I take it you mean photography?

Mr. Winters: I am told it is any aspect of film production.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Let us make it photography; that is what the making of films is. Your categorical statement to the house is that there is no charge made by the film board unless photography is done?

Mr. Winters: No, that is not necessarily true. I say there is a charge for work done. That work may be photography, or it may be supervisory work; it may be sound recording or it may be another phase of motion picture production.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Then the truth is that there is a charge made whether or not photography is done.

Mr. Winters: There can be.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is the truth, and the Financial Post article is absolutely correct.

Mr. Winters: But the charge is made only for work done.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I know that. Suppose I put in a tender for something. I do a tremendous amount of work, and if I do not get the job I do not make any charge, but that is not the policy of the film board, is it?

Mr. Winters: They would not charge simply for putting in a tender on a picture.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You prepare a tender and you do a lot of work on it. Your tender is not accepted and therefore there is no charge you can make. That is not the policy followed by the film board, is it?

Mr. Winters: They would not charge for work involved in merely submitting a tender.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am not asking you that. Do they make charges where they do not get the work?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Casselman: It is not going to carry like that.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Oh, this is tough but stay and take it. It will not take a minute.

Mr. Garson: The only difficulty is the incoherence of the question.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The Minister of Justice says there is no trouble except the incoherence of the question. After his performance some days ago, he is the last man in the world to talk about incoherence.

An hon. Member: Shame on you.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): If it is shame on me, God help you.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have a few short questions to ask the minister. First of all I want to make one comment. I want to wait until the minister is free to listen to me.

Mr. Winters: I am listening.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As I understand it, what has happened is that we have listened this afternoon to a defence right across the board. There is no admission of any weakness of any kind. I want to know if I am making a fair statement. There has been no admission that any of the criticisms contained in this article were in any way justified. Am I stating it correctly?

Mr. Winters: No, I did not say that at all. I made it very clear in my statement. I said I wanted to answer criticisms that were not justified, and if and where there is something wrong with the board I want to find out about it. For that reason I have appointed a firm of management consultants to look into all these things which come under the classification of business management and report to me on them.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not know just what the minister meant by saying "report to me only".

Mr. Winters: I said "report to me on them".

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Oh, I beg your pardon. The minister has not really answered my question. I am quite well aware he did not say the film board was perfect in every way. He made it clear to us he was getting a business firm to go into this matter. I want to come back to my question again because it is important to me, at any rate. I want to know if it is correct to say that there has been no admission of any kind that any of the specific criticisms made in the Financial Post article were justified. Is that a fair statement?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Winters: I said very clearly, and I say again, that I do not believe the film board is perfect, and nobody in the film board believes it is perfect. I suggested that if there was constructive criticism from any side of the house we would be glad to have it in the hope of making the film board the agency we think it can be in the development of the country.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister and I seem to be travelling along parallel lines, so I will not ask my question again. I will just give my opinion for what it is worth. If anything could have shaken my opinion of the board, it is what has happened in the last four hours. If there had been a frank readiness to say, "Yes, we made this mistake and that mistake; there are these criticisms, and some of the departments have been critical about us", it would have been much better than to ask us to believe that there is nothing in these statements reported to one of the most reliable men and written by him in his newspaper. I think that is a fair statement. I just want to say that, so far as I am concerned, nothing could have made me feel more—

Mr. Winters: That is not a fair statement.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I shall not take the time of the committee any longer, but it is as close to a fair statement as I can make. I believe the minister is being misinformed to a considerable extent.

Mr. Winters: If I have been misinformed, I am certainly taking the steps open to me to find out.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister care to have me read my question in detail? I gave him a list of films for which I wanted the cost. Does he wish me to read that list?

Mr. Winters: As you wish; I have the list here.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The first one is "R.C.M.P. file 365", the maker and the cost?

Mr. Winters: The producer was Mr. Mulholland, and the cost was approximately $28,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is Mr. Mulholland a private producer?

Mr. Winters: No, the national film board.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): "Montreal by Night".

Mr. Winters: It was made by the national film board, and the producer was Mr. Newman. I am told the approximate cost of the two-reel version was $24,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): "River of Canada".

Mr. Winters: "River of Canada" was made by Associated Screen News. I have not the cost, because it was made about six years ago.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): "Feeling of Hostility".

Mr. Winters: "Feeling of Hostility" was made by the national film board. The cost was approximately $18,000 and the producer was Mr. Anderson.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): "Feeling of Rejection".

Mr. Winters: "Feeling of Rejection", was also made under the direction of Mr. Anderson, and the cost was approximately $22,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): "The Mother and Her Child".

Mr. Winters: The total cost of that was approximately $49,000 because there were two films, one in English and one in French. The producer was Mr. Paquette of the film board.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): "Horizons of Quebec".

Mr. Winters: The cost was about $32,000. It was made by the national film board, and the producer was Mr. Devlin.

Mr. Harkness: Could we return to some of the questions which I asked the minister earlier? When did the R.C.M.P. complete their part in the screening of the national film board personnel?

Mr. Winters: They have not completed it yet.

Mr. Harkness: If they have not completed it, how many people are still to be investigated?

Mr. Winters: That I cannot say.

Mr. Harkness: Then, when did they start this screening activity?

Mr. Winters: They started screening in May of this year.

Mr. Harkness: Is there nobody in the minister's department who knows how far they have progressed? Can the minister not tell me how many people remain to be screened? Surely someone in the department has that information.

Mr. Winters: No, there is no one in the department who has that information. The R.C.M.P. have been asked to proceed as quickly as they can, and I understand they are doing that.

Mr. Harkness: Upon how many people have the R.C.M.P. turned in unfavourable reports? When I say "unfavourable", I mean from the point of view of their position in working on so-called security films.

Mr. Winters: That information is not available to me.

Mr. Harkness: The minister says that information is not available. The Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence said the other night that the sole purpose of this screening by the R.C.M.P. was to turn the information over to the permanent head of the branch, and through him to the minister in charge.

Mr. Winters: That is true, but they have not turned any information over to me.

Mr. Harkness: This screening has been conducted since May, 1949, and it seems rather strange that no information has been turned over to the minister. I find it difficult to believe that the permanent head of the film board, or the minister, has not had some information about this matter. Do I understand you have no information whatever as to what reports the R.C.M.P. may have made?

Mr. Winters: That is true; I have not had a report from the R.C.M.P.

Mr. Harkness: Has Mr. McLean, the head of the film board, or the deputy minister of reconstruction and supply had any report?

Mr. Winters: No, sir, they have not.

Mr. Harkness: I am more or less in the situation, Mr. Chairman, that I find it rather difficult to believe that no one has had any report. I believe someone must have had some report. I shall ask the Minister of Justice if he has had any report.

Mr. Winters: I think I can assure the house that I am as anxious as anyone else to have this situation cleared up. A reflection has been cast upon the film board which is in no way justified, as was said when the national defence estimates were under consideration. This screening is a matter of routine, in order to enable the film board to undertake the type of work which is contemplated. We have asked the R.C.M.P. to undertake it, and we have asked them to proceed with it as quickly as they can, and give us their report. I can assure the house that when that report is received the appropriate action, if any is required, will be taken to put the board in the shape I think hon. members of this house would wish.

Mr. Harkness: We will leave that phase of the matter now. When was the film of the atomic energy project at Chalk River made by the national film board?

Mr. Winters: That film was made in 1947-48.

Mr. Harkness: So far as the persons who made that film, processed it and made the prints are concerned, were any security precautions taken? Was there any screening of those people?

Mr. Winters: Yes, every security precaution was taken. The people were carefully screened to the satisfaction of the R.C.M.P. and the Chalk River authorities. I understand that at all times they were under escort, and I can assure the house that every precaution was taken.

Mr. Harkness: If it was possible to screen those people and take all the necessary security precautions and so forth in 1947, how is it that it is impossible to allow the film board to make films for the national defence department of things which are much less secret, and which could not possibly do us as much harm from the security point of view? It does seem inexplicable that the film could be made in the Chalk River plant in 1947, the people were screened, and according to the minister, all the necessary precautions were taken; but today, the defence department will not allow those same people to make training films of national defence equipment which is not nearly so secret as the Chalk River project. This needs explanation.

Mr. Winters: That is not unexplainable. I made a note here that the hon. member made the remarkable statement that certain things are inexplicable and need explanation. This is one of those things that are not inexplicable. The number of people involved in the project totalled seven. They were known. Invariably the same people were involved in the film from start to finish. The film board consists of a relatively large number of people. The work within the board varies. There is quite a turnover by virtue of the nature of the employment; that is, the three-month period of employment. In order to ensure the type of security that is required under the government regulations it was felt, out of fairness to everybody, that a complete screening should be undertaken. I may say that the members of the film board were keen to have that done. It is taking a long time because there are a large number of people involved. That explains why the board must be screened whereas seven people from the board could undertake a certain confidential picture.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Harkness: Does the minister mean to tell me that the seven people who were concerned in taking this picture developed these films, printed them, and did everything else in connection with them? If that is the situation, that only seven people are concerned in any secret film that is made, there is no reason in the world why, during the past year, the Department of National Defence could not have had any film they wanted taken by these same seven people.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman, I want an answer to that question.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed to say something—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. If the hon. member does not mind, I think the minister wishes to reply.

Mr. Winters: Yes. I should say that although the greatest amount of security within the Chalk River establishment had to be maintained and the greatest safeguard exercised over the type of shots that were made, the film itself was not a restricted film and therefore could be developed by the film board without the same measures that have been required now.

Mr. Harkness: The minister still has not answered the question why, if these people could go and work at the Chalk River plant and make a film, they could not similarly make a film of our new ack-ack gun or any other national defence development which is certainly really not very secret.

Mr. Pouliot: May I say, Mr. Chairman, that I am satisfied with the answers given by the minister to the hon. member for Calgary East; I am much more satisfied with the minister's answers to him than with his answers to me.

Mr. Fulton: What is the government film bureau and what is the relationship between the government film bureau and the national film board?

Mr. Winters: The Canadian government motion picture bureau, which was under the jurisdiction of the Department of Trade and Commerce, was transferred to the jurisdiction of the film board in June, 1941.

Mr. Fulton: Then to all intents and purposes it is the same organization?

Mr. Winters: As the film board, yes.

Mr. Fulton: Who is the head of the motion picture bureau?

Mr. Winters: The duties of the motion picture bureau were assumed by the commissioner of the film board.

Mr. Fulton: On whose authority were outside agencies engaged to make the national defence films?

Mr. Winters: That is on the authority—under section 11 of the act, as my hon. friend knows—of the commissioner and the film board.

Mr. Fulton: So that the commissioner himself and the film board agreed that at that time they were not qualified, shall I say, from the security point of view to make these films?

Mr. Winters: No. They did not agree that they were not qualified from a security point of view. I say again that this matter of screening is automatic, and until it had run its course and the board were declared eligible to do the type of work which the Department of National Defence had in mind, the commissioner and the film board decided that those films should be done elsewhere.

Mr. Fulton: Was it done because of excessive caution, so that there would not be any reproach or criticism, or was it done in an effort to speed up screening, and to bring that problem to the attention of the authorities, or why was that decision made?

Mr. Winters: It was conforming to the regulations.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask another question arising out of an earlier one with respect to a film made in China. I do not understand the full implications. The minister said that the film was made by a member of the film board on loan to UNRRA and at the request of UNRRA. Will the minister say why it is and how it is that that film cost the film board $16,000? Why was not the whole cost borne by UNRRA?

Mr. Winters: Whilst this man was employed on an UNRRA assignment, he made films which became available to the film board and they have used them since.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister anything to add to his reply?

Mr. Winters: No, except that the rights in connection with the film made under that contract with UNRRA resided in the film board so that the pictures could be made available to the people of Canada.

Mr. Fulton: Then is it correct to say that the official who went to China, in addition to making a film or films specifically requested by UNRRA, made a film or films for the use of the film board?

Mr. Winters: That is a correct statement, yes. In carrying out his assignment he took pictures of scenes which were also used by the film board.

Mr. Fulton: Was he authorized to do that at the time of his departure?

Mr. Winters: Yes, he was authorized to do that under the terms of his UNRRA contract.

Mr. Fulton: Finally in that connection, will the minister say what was the division of travelling expenses borne by the film board and UNRRA respectively?

Mr. Winters: The Canadian government, through the national film board, paid part of his return fare from China. The remainder of the travelling expenses were borne by UNRRA.

Mr. Fulton: Can the minister say what the proportions were? Is that information available?

Mr. Winters: I understand that Mr. McLean returned to Canada from China by air, to carry out work requested of him by the film board, and that the film board paid the difference between his air transportation and the surface transportation.

Mr. Fulton: And that is all they paid by way of travelling expenses? Is that the position?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I have just one question and I am going to put it in words of one syllable if I can. Am I correct in understanding the minister to say that the screening of employees began in May of this year?

Mr. Winters: That is correct.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): And that neither the minister nor any of his officials have any reports from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at this date in December?

Mr. Winters: That is a correct statement of fact.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Are you sure that Stalin is not working there, and Nick Zabotin and some of those fellows? That is not the way the mounted police usually work.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There are two further cost figures that I should like to get; they are in connection with "La Cité de Notre Dame" and "Four Seasons". Are those figures available?

Mr. Winters: One of the films, "Four Seasons", I have learned was made by Crawley Films of Ottawa. The other picture was made under the directorship of Mr. Paquette of the national film board. They were made about four years ago and I have no costs available now.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I won't delay the matter. Will the minister undertake to give me the cost of this and of the Associated Screen News one that he had not got earlier? Will the minister give me these later?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The whole point is to find the relative cost.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, in regard to the questions that have been asked about the suppression of films, I am aware that the minister has not been in charge of this department for very long, but he has officials here with him. Recognizing that he can obtain the answer from them I would ask him if information is not available about a film that was prepared by the national film board on Russia, giving a picture of conditions in that country prior to the revolution, during the 1917 revolution and afterwards, and the film was suppressed because it was regarded as giving too favourable an interpretation of what had happened in Russia.

Mr. Winters: I learn that the picture to which the leader of the opposition is referring is called "Our Northern Neighbour". It was not suppressed. I understand that with the exception of the province of Quebec it enjoyed unrestricted distribution in Canada.

Mr. Fraser: I saw the picture that was taken at Chalk River and there was absolutely nothing in it that those who read the scientific magazines would not know. I imagine that why the members of the national film board were screened is that they were screened on going into the plant and not in relation to the pictures that were taken.

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Fraser: When I spoke this afternoon I told the minister that I thought the films of the national film board were greatly improved. I thought that the film taken at Chalk River was an excellent one.

I believe that the hon. member for Spadina suggested that I was criticizing the film board unduly. I am a great lover of motion pictures.

Mr. Whitman: Just a great lover.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. member for Winnipeg North criticized me. He read an editorial on those who criticized the film board. I believe that I have as much love for art and as much artistic ability as any hon. member in this house.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Congratulations!

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fraser: This afternoon I mentioned the stills department of the film board. I understand that on occasion the stills department of the film board solicits business from manufacturing plants. They go into a manufacturing plant and ask if they can take a photographic survey of the plant.

Mr. Winters: I am told that that is not so.

Mr. Fraser: Information to that effect has appeared in the newspapers. I am glad that that is not so. In the past there have been instances where the national film board has had to employ outside camera men. I wonder whether that is because the film board is not paying top prices for good camera men. Is that why the board goes outside?

Mr. Winters: The national film board retains only four camera men on a permanent basis. It often happens that the volume of the work is such that it is necessary to hire outside camera men.

Mr. Fraser: This afternoon I asked the minister about large blow-up pictures. What are they used for and to whom are they sold?

Mr. Winters: For photo murals used for display purposes at such places as exhibitions.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I ask the minister a question? Has the film board taken any pictures of the pipe line?

Mr. Fraser: I should like to ask the minister another question.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have not received an answer to mine.

Mr. Fraser: The following advertisement appeared in a New York magazine, put in by the national film board of Canada, 620 Fifth avenue, New York. I brought this up in the house once before. This is how it reads:

> The answer to this question may necessitate reviewing his life from birth . . .
> Why won't Tommy eat?
> 16 mm sound—2 reels—colour—$150 list

Was the film board set up to sell films of that kind in the United States? It was set up for educational purposes. Was it set up to sell 16 millimetre films in the United States or in any other countries?

Mr. Winters: Yes; under the terms of the act it is quite possible that prints of that nature can be sold in the United States.

Mr. Fraser: I wonder whether the business managers who come in on the job will check and find out whether it is proper to do that or not; whether you are making any money or not, or whether Canada gets any prestige out of selling advertisements of that kind. I do not think it is good advertising for Canada. I think it would be better to advertise Canada in some other way.

Mr. Harkness: In his reply to the leader of the opposition a moment ago the minister said that a certain film referring to Russia was suppressed in the province of Quebec but was distributed throughout the rest of Canada. What was the reason for that? If there is any place in Canada where Russian, communist or leftist propaganda would have the least chance of success it is in Quebec. If it was necessary to suppress it because of its slanting, or anything along that line, I think it should have been suppressed anywhere else in Canada except Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Harkness: No. I should like to know the reason.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is not a question; that is a statement. The hon. member does not know the difference between a question and a statement.

Mr. Winters: The picture was not banned in any sense; but it came to the attention of the board that certain people felt it might be better not to distribute the picture in Quebec. Therefore it was not distributed in that province.

Mr. Whitman: I should like to ask a question. Were any films taken of the game between the Alouettes and the Rough Riders and presented to the Calgary Stampeders before the final game with the Stampeders took place?

Mr. Harkness: I do not really think that is a satisfactory answer. The minister said that certain people thought it would be better not to distribute it in Quebec. That is not an answer.

Mr. Cruickshank: You have a closer connection with Mr. Duplessis than we have.

Mr. Winters: That is a matter of judgment to be exercised by the board and they exercised that judgment in what they thought was their wisdom.

Item agreed to.

889. Trans-Canada highway—to provide for preliminary engineering work and studies in co-operation with the provinces concerned, $25,000.

Mr. Green: Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. Winters: It is intended to cover costs incurred by the federal government in making surveys or carrying out any of the functions assigned to it under the act, until such time as further money can be voted by parliament. It is a preliminary allotment.

Mr. Green: It is the total vote for this fiscal year?

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Cruickshank: As I understand it, this film you are taking across Canada—

An hon. Member: Wake up.

Mr. Cruickshank: —will it be available to other branches of the government? They may wish to bring something else across Canada. I am asking this question, and I am not being talked out by anybody. I want an answer to it. This film is being taken at the public expense.

Mr. Winters: It is not a film.

The Deputy Chairman: I would inform the hon. member for Fraser Valley that this is an item for the trans-Canada highway, to provide for preliminary engineering work in co-operation with the provinces concerned. It is not for a film.

Mr. Cruickshank: Well, that is exactly what I have been trying to say. Will that information be available for other reasons, travelling across Canada? I am asking that question.

Mr. Winters: This is a specific vote under item 889 to provide an amount to carry out preliminary survey work on the trans-Canada highway. If the hon. member's question is as to whether it will be made available for purposes other than the trans-Canada highway, then the answer is that it is intended to apply only against that highway.

Mr. Cruickshank: I think that is a very fair answer, and I cannot see why we should pass this. After all the people of Canada will pay for it. If it is going to be available for one reason—and I am not against it at all—on a route across Canada, then why should not the information be made available to the people of Canada who are paying the bill—not you and I, but the people of Canada?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Cruickshank: No, it is not carried. I am asking the minister why it should not be available to any other department.

Mr. Winters: The information made available to the federal government will be made available to any other department.

Mr. Cruickshank: Thank you.

Mr. Winters: If they so choose to use it.

Mr. Cruickshank: Thank you.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

121. Departmental administration, $256,281.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, there are one or two matters I should like to direct to the attention of the minister, and I shall be very brief. The first of these has to do with the question of sex crimes. I bring to the attention of the minister through you, Mr. Chairman, a resolution passed and forwarded to the minister by the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire.

The resolution I have before me is dated at Nokomis, Saskatchewan, November 11, 1949, and reads as follows:

> We hereby endorse and approve the following resolution, which has been forwarded to the Minister of Justice, through the proper channels:
> "Whereas the 'determinate sentence' system now in use is unsatisfactory in dealing with many sex criminals who continue to be a menace to society after their release from prison;
> Therefore be it resolved that we the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire ask that provision be made that all such criminals may be retained until competent medical authorities are satisfied that they are no longer dangerous to be at large in the community."

That is signed by Julia E. Nichol, Last Mountain chapter of the I.O.D.E.

A number of these resolutions have been forwarded to the minister. When legislation was before the house two years ago the question of sex crimes was discussed. The suggestion was made that those persons who are generally recidivists after discharge from an institution, provided it is a penal institution, during their incarceration should be subjected to psychopathic treatment, such as has proven so successful in the state of Massachusetts.

I would ask the minister what has taken place in the last year and a half in connection with this problem, which is on the increase, and which strikes fear and terror into the families of this country. The number of cases is increasing, and I would ask the minister if anything is being done to meet the situation. Is the system to which I made reference two years ago, namely that in use in Massachusetts, being considered for Canada?

When it had been in operation for one year in that state the results were found to be so encouraging that the system was increased and expanded. Today in Massachusetts, even among major sex offenders, with two or three previous offences, after psychopathic treatment the number of recidivists has been reduced to nine per cent.

The second matter to which I would direct the minister's attention is in connection with the extension of the Borstal system in this country.

May I say the government of Saskatchewan has—

Mr. Garson: I wonder if we might take up the matters raised by the hon. member when the penitentiaries items are before us?

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is a general discussion and as a matter of fact I am leaving at ten o'clock and the committee is to go on to something else. I am sure the hon. member for Yorkton will be able to assist me materially in outlining what has taken place in Saskatchewan since 1947 as the result of that system being adopted. There has been a marked falling away in recidivism in so far as juveniles are concerned. According to the latest figures available, in two years there has been a reduction of approximately 30 per cent in crime among young men and women. I know the interest the minister took in these matters when he was premier of Manitoba and I should like to know from him the plans of the government with regard to the extension of the Borstal system, of course within the limits of our constitutional set-up.

There is one other matter I should like to mention. We are approaching Christmas and in one of the jails of this country is a boy of 16 years of age who is under sentence of death for murder, the sentence to be carried out in February or March. There has not been an execution of a boy of that age for many years. What good purpose is being served by holding over his head for two and a half months a sentence of death, which is against public opinion? When a death sentence is imposed on a juvenile in Great Britain under circumstances where commutation must necessarily follow, there is no delay and I suggest to the minister that no harm would be done by having the governor in council commute this sentence. I realize that this comes under the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General, but as we are dealing with Justice estimates I am making this suggestion. I feel that public opinion generally would support my submission that no good purpose is being served by maintaining a death watch day and night over this boy. It does not act as a deterrent to keep him in the shadow of death and it will not be beneficial in so far as deterring others is concerned. I should like the minister to comment on that.

I should like to know what provision is being made for prisoners suffering from advanced tuberculosis who are sent to penitentiary. Has it not been the general practice where a prisoner is suffering from advanced tuberculosis, regardless of the length of his sentence, to grant a ticket of leave as soon as possible in order to allow the prisoner to return home? I ask that because of a letter I received to that effect from one of the penal institutions. It is a rather dangerous principle to accept, that a prisoner possibly sentenced to a long term for a serious offence should be entitled to almost a free pardon because of illness and the difficulty of making provision for him to continue under incarceration.

These are four matters in connection with penal reform to which I direct the attention of the minister. When the minister makes his report I should like to have him state what is being done to implement the provisions of the Archambault report, particularly in the last eight or nine months.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend has asked a number of questions which for the most part have to do with the administration of penitentiaries, which he is quite right in saying comes under the Department of Justice. The annual report of the penitentiaries commission for the year ending March 31, 1949, has been in the printing bureau for some time but is not yet available for distribution. In lieu of the production of that report I had intended to make a statement which would be something in the way of a summary. I hope that in the course of making that statement I shall answer some of my hon. friend's questions, and then when I finish I shall answer those which have not been covered.

We in Canada are fortunate in that some years ago a most comprehensive study was made of the Canadian penal system by the Archambault commission to which the hon. member for Lake Centre has referred. That report can be regarded as almost a textbook on penology in Canada. There may be differences of opinion as to some of the matters set out in the report and as to the practicability of carrying out some of the recommendations in the precise form in which the commission made them, but I do not think there can be any quarrel on the part of anybody who is interested in penology with the broad principles therein set forth.

The report stresses that the basis for a good correctional system must be the protection of society. By that was meant a continuing and not merely a temporary protection. Simply stated, it involves three main principles. First, that those who are committed to penal institutions shall be kept in safe custody until they have served their sentences or are otherwise properly released according to law; second, that to the utmost extent possible the period of imprisonment shall be utilized to change and correct the antisocial habits that resulted in the sentence of imprisonment and to provide the prisoner with knowledge, habits and skills that will enable him to make his way in society upon release without again reverting to crime; and third, that as an aid to the second objective the prisoner will be treated humanely and fairly, and permitted such privileges as may be reasonably allowed with due regard to disciplinary and administrative requirements. I may say these principles have been accepted as the philosophy behind our present program in the Canadian penitentiaries under the commissioner, Major General Gibson, and his deputies, Mr. Joseph McCulley and Dr. Gendreau.

As steps in that direction we have first of all revised the salaries for all officers of the service. Whereas prior to 1945 the salary range for guards ran from $1,200 to $1,500 per annum, as the result of a series of salary revisions the initial salary for a custodial officer joining the service is now $1,980 rising to $2,280, with a higher scale for 20 per cent of the custodial staff reaching a maximum of $2,460. Instructors' salaries have a range of from $2,580 to $2,880, and chief keepers and chief instructors of from $2,280 to $3,480. The purpose of this has been to attract to this very important service a somewhat higher standard of talent than formerly was the case with a view to paying great dividends in the reduction of recidivism. That is one of the first replies I give to my hon. friend's question.

The next step has been taken with regard to the matter of having training courses for penitentiary officers. The first course began in February, 1948, and to date 213 officers have attended the eight courses which have already been completed. These courses are held at the Royal Canadian Mounted Police barracks at Rockcliffe, and are of six weeks' duration. The present courses are for the purpose of orienting our officers to the principles of sound modern penology, to increase their knowledge and to raise their standard in terms of their awareness of the factors that influence human behaviour, their knowledge of social problems and the causes of crime, their efficiency in their own specific responsibilities, their physical fitness, and their general interest in prison work as a career. We have tried to increase the salary schedule, to give training, and to convey to our custodial officers the pride and realization that they are in a very useful and worthwhile career in society in order that they may in the conduct of their work have an altogether different approach from that of custodial officers of say fifty years ago.

Another step in that direction has been the proper classification of prisoners which is now recognized as an essential part of our correctional system if a program of individualized treatment is to be carried out. In 1947 classification officers were appointed in all our penitentiaries. These officers were specially chosen for their duties, and are all university graduates with training in social work and experience in occupational counselling. They interview all newcomers to obtain full information as to their educational, social and economic backgrounds, their mental capacity, and their general interests and abilities. The success of any treatment program depends largely on the willingness and the interest of the prisoner to participate in it. The classification officer plays a most important role in interpreting to the inmates of our institutions the opportunities that are becoming increasingly available for their sentences.

The next step is one of the matters raised by my hon. friend from Lake Centre. Prior to the completion of the sentence, as the prisoner approaches his discharge from the penitentiary, the classification officer is the link with the John Howard societies—these which my hon. friend has in mind—the national employment service and the other agencies designed to assist in the rehabilitation of the prisoner upon discharge. In that predischarge period, just before the prisoner is to go out into the world again, the knowledge that has been gained of his mental and manual assets and liabilities by a proper system of classification is one of the greatest importance in assisting him in re-establishing himself in society and not becoming a recidivist. When I say that, I think we all realize —certainly we who have this responsibility do—that classification is no magic fairy wand or formula which will provide a solution for all cases, but we have found that it does assist greatly in developing a plan of treatment which will be best suited for the needs of the particular individual prisoner who has been discharged.

Another step that has been taken towards the prevention of recidivism is the very considerable developments which have taken place in improving the facilities available for actual educational treatment, if you will, of these prisoners. The Archambault commission pointed out that education should be regarded as an essential part of any program of rehabilitation, and that it was fundamentally, as is obvious, a particular problem of adult education. The prisoner should be regarded as an adult in need of education as well as a criminal in need of reform, and the educational program should be sufficiently broad in scope to influence the basic attitudes of those who participate, and to open to them new means of occupying constructively the long hours of leisure which they have at their disposal while in prison.

Then there are the opportunities which have been provided for many years in the Canadian penitentiaries to learn useful trades in the various industrial shops and construction activities that have been carried on. This type of on-the-job training, while it has benefited those who had the will and ambition to apply themselves, failed to produce skilled workmen who after discharge could compete in quality and quantity with employees on the outside of the prison. That is to say, it helped all right, but it did not give the man discharged that degree of skill whereby he could engage in competition after his discharge with those who were outside the prison, in such a way as to earn a proper livelihood for himself. Therefore it was evident that if we were going to equip these young men to obtain and hold employment in the competitive world outside, we must first of all develop, as the folk schools in Denmark have done for their pupils, an interest and pride in their work, and then train them so well that the quantity and quality of their productive output would rival that of their competitors in outside shops, and give them a social consciousness and a sense of achievement that would make them capable of attaining a position of economic independence upon their release.

I am sure my hon. friend from Lake Centre and everyone else will agree that nothing can be done which is more calculated to prevent recidivism than to equip the prisoner upon his discharge to gain economic independence by honest activity. In most cases it is because he is not able to earn an honest living, or perhaps because he is not able to get the opportunity to earn an honest living, that he is pushed by force of circumstances into earning a dishonest living, and then we have another recidivist. With this aim in view, we embarked in 1947 on a program of full-time vocational training designed to give the trainees a thorough grounding in trade theory and practice on actual projects during a basic training period of approximately 1,000 hours —I should like the hon. member to listen to this—of approximately 1,000 hours or practically nine months' elapsed time by penitentiary work standards. In addition, the trainee receives instruction in the related subjects of blueprint reading, shop mathematics and others necessary to achieve successful journeyman status. The initial courses were undertaken at Collin's Bay and St. Vincent de Paul penitentiaries. The trades included brick masonry, tinsmithing and sheet metal working, draughting and cabinet making. In January of this year this type of vocational training was extended to Saskatchewan penitentiary, and we now have organized similar courses at Dorchester.

I believe I should mention that the introduction of this training has had a marked effect upon the prisoners. There is a noticeable earnestness on the part of those assigned to vocational work, and they carry out their tasks with definite interest and attention. Already we have had several cases where "tickets of leave" have been declined, because the prisoner wished to complete his training. While we are not optimistic enough to expect 100 per cent recovery, I think we can say that this type of training is producing positive results, and is providing many young men with the incentive and ability to attain economic security which was not previously available to them. Such information as is available indicates that a high percentage of the trainees so far released, who have obtained employment, are still gainfully employed.

I should mention, perhaps, although this is not exactly a matter related to recidivism, that while the men are in the penitentiary we give attention to their physical condition. There has been a considerable increase in the amount of corrective surgery that has been undertaken. An extremely important part of penitentiary administration is the psychiatric work which is undertaken. I believe there will be general agreement that a good deal of crime is psychotic in nature. The psychiatric ward at Kingston penitentiary has been in operation for some months, and at other institutions the services of outside psychiatrists have been utilized in a considerable number of problem cases.

I should like to come now more directly to the point my hon. friend has raised, about the operation of these John Howard societies. I should like to refer to this matter of the placement and after-care of the prisoners upon discharge. The expansion and development of the activities of the various John Howard societies, as well as other prisoners' aid organizations across the country, have been most heartening to all of us who appreciate the importance of this work in making effective whatever efforts may have been undertaken to rehabilitate the prisoner during his period of imprisonment. No matter what training we may give a prisoner, no matter how successful our efforts may be inside the institution, if upon discharge the prisoner cannot get an opportunity of making practical use of that training, then all the expense and time will have been wasted.

In this connection, we utilize not only the John Howard societies and other prisoners' aid organizations, but also the assistance of the special placement division of the national employment service. It is important to find suitable employment for discharged prisoners as they emerge from the penitentiaries. The liaison which now exists between penitentiaries, through their classification officers, the local societies, and the national employment service, has proven most effective in providing information as to an individual's capabilities for employment, and in preparing him for placement. The results that can be obtained are dependent upon the proper attitude of society towards the discharged prisoner. His attitude towards society should be improved while he is in prison; but if we are to cash in on any improvement in his attitude towards society, then society must take a reasonable attitude towards him upon his discharge.

The results that can be obtained in this regard are dependent upon two factors. I mention the first one that comes to my mind, and that is a willingness on the part of the public and employers to offer employment to the man or woman who has served a prison term. The second factor is the will and the ability of the prisoner to hold a job once he has obtained it. This second factor, that is a prisoner's willingness to obtain and hold a job, can only be decided if he has an opportunity of getting a job. All too often that opportunity is delayed, because of the unwillingness of people to hire a man who has been discharged from prison until after his will has weakened, and any ability he had when he left the penitentiary has been dissipated. For that reason, the John Howard societies have been most effective in inducing that invaluable co-operative attitude on the part of society towards a prisoner upon his discharge.

With regard to some of the practical results, I might cite some statistics concerning educational facilities. The number of school teachers on the penitentiaries' staffs is now 17, more than double the number previously employed. On March 31, 1949, 1,205 convicts were taking correspondence courses of various types provided by the Department of Veterans Affairs and the provincial departments of education. The development of penitentiary libraries has proceeded during the year with a total of over 30,000 books now available. Circulation during the last fiscal year amounted to a total of 423,445, or an average of over 100 books per convict during the year.

Classification procedure in all institutions—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Is the minister sure of that figure of 100 books? It means a convict reads a book every three days.

Mr. Garson: I am quite sure of that figure. It is contained in a summary signed by Major General R. B. Gibson, the commissioner of penitentiaries. If we all had the same amount of leisure as the gentlemen in the penitentiaries, we might read more books than I can at any rate.

During that period there has been a total of 7,436 interviews with classification officers. In the matter of training officers, 8 training courses for penitentiary officers have now been completed, and the ninth course is in progress. Of the 183 officers who attended the first seven courses, 126 obtained honour standing.

In the matter of vocational training the statistics are interesting. Up to the end of the fiscal year 1948-49, 31,521 man-days have been devoted to this form of training. There are now 27 instructors in the four penitentiaries employed in the supervision and direction of the various courses being undertaken. Reports to date indicate that over 65 per cent of those who have taken the vocational training courses, and have been discharged, have obtained gainful employment in their trades and are re-establishing themselves satisfactorily in normal life. I believe that is one answer to the question of recidivism. I believe that is a great improvement over what has prevailed in the past, and I think it is encouraging that 65 per cent of those who have taken the vocational training courses and have been discharged have obtained gainful employment and have held it.

The penitentiary industries output has increased from $605,889 to $622,864.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): How many workers produced that?

Mr. Garson: There was a daily average of 1,836 convicts employed in these industries.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What about the previous year?

Mr. Garson: I am sorry, I have not the figures.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May I move that this item stand, and with the unanimous consent of the house, we revert to a discussion of television.

The Chairman: By leave of the committee, discussion on television will now be allowed.

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May I mention that if this discussion is terminated before eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman, we shall revert to Justice.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE—TELEVISION

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The rediscussion of this item 934 comes under the heading of "Loans and Investments, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation". The purpose of this item is that it shall be a loan to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation repayable with interest at a rate to be fixed by the governor in council on such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine and to be applied in payment of expenditures to cover capital costs of television installations, and to support the development of the services. Such loans with interest shall be a charge on the revenues of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation after the charge imposed under the provisions of section 17 of the Canadian Broadcasting Act.

Let me point out that, in the first instance, the purpose of this loan is to cover capital costs of the television installations and, second, to support the development of the services. Necessarily the capital costs in a great project like this will be very considerable, and the service charges over a period of years will also run into a great amount of money.

On March 28 last I gave to the house a statement of the present policy of the government on television. Perhaps it would be helpful for this discussion if I were to summarize that policy again. The government thought it wise to provide for extensive studies of the methods of television developed which would be suitable to Canada. For this reason the government included television as one of the subjects of inquiry for the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences which is now carrying on its work. In the meantime, however, the government decided that while the commission was conducting this inquiry, development of a Canadian television system should be undertaken on an interim basis. By entering the field now Canada would benefit substantially from the experience of others in the establishment of proper facilities and operating methods. A further advantage of development at the present time will arise from the large new outlet which will be provided for our Canadian electronic industry.

In that connection let me say that the experience of those in other countries, notably in the United States, during these past four years has proven beyond a doubt that television is something which is in demand in that country and throughout the world but that it is a very expensive development. Because I have the responsibility of reporting to parliament on behalf of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, I made it my business to make a visit to New York; and through the courtesy of the Columbia Broadcasting System, the National Broadcasting Company, and private concerns such as du Pont, I think I was shown nearly everything they had to show with reference to the development of television at that time. I was told at that time—and that was two years ago this February—that they had spent something over $50 million in the experimental stage and that they had not proceeded beyond the stage where they could produce television in what is known as black and white in contradistinction to what is known as colour television.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Did Columbia not have colour?

Mr. McCann: Experimentally, but not as a telecast.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): They were ahead of N.B.C.

Mr. McCann: Not at that time. I am speaking of two years ago.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I understand.

Mr. McCann: Since that time, I am informed, they have spent another $50 million. That means a total expenditure of $100 million to date by this and other companies in what is primarily experimental work in connection with that development.

In talking over the matter with the governors and the general manager of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation I expressed the opinion at that time that I did not believe it would be in the best interests of this country to proceed at that time with the development of television; that we could well wait until such time as the development had proceeded further; that we could, in the matter of dollars and cents, save a great deal of money and let the United States people who were in this field and had plenty of it do more of the experimental work, and that when the time came for the introduction of television in this country we would have all the advantage of the experimental work that had been done up to that time.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister tell us again what that exact date is that he is speaking of?

Mr. McCann: It will be two years in February. It was in February of 1948.

In addition to that, a further advantage at the present time will arise from the large new outlet which will be provided for the Canadian electronic industry. That of course means the manufacture of receiving sets for television. It might be of interest to tell the committee that at that time the sets that I saw there—and which were giving a picture that would be probably 16 inches by 20 inches—cost in the neighbourhood of $2,400. I was told that, in February of 1948, the cheapest set there cost in the neighbourhood of $400.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): They are much cheaper now. The minister knows that.

Mr. McCann: Yes, exactly. That is the point I am going to make. To such an extent has the industry developed that, from the latest advertisements I have seen, television receiving sets can now be procured at a cost of from $90 to $100; and I am speaking of a good set. Hence I think we gained by the wait which we have had over the past couple of years. But I assume, and I think correctly, that if we do have television in Canada, we have a potential development of an industry for the production of television sets which will be of great industrial benefit to this country. It must be known that if television is going to pay, it will pay upon a commercial basis. In any great centre—and I will take the city of Montreal, for instance, as an example—you are not going to get people in commercial business to spend their good money for advertising unless there is a sufficient number of sets in that centre to enable the advertisers to reach their public. I would say that that is the basis on which success has been achieved in the United States and upon which today television, as I shall attempt to indicate later, is making progress in the commercial field. Now in large centres there are sufficient numbers of receiving television sets to make it commercially worth while for industrial firms to spend their money in advertising by that method.

From the social point of view, developments so far in other countries have made it abundantly clear that television will become one of the most effective means of mass communication which has yet been devised. This new medium can be of great benefit to the national life of Canada, if properly developed. On the other hand, it could have a negative or a detrimental effect on our national life if it grew up in a haphazard way or in an un-co-ordinated manner.

In making plans for television, the government has been primarily concerned to provide that Canadians in various parts of the country will have the opportunity to receive

Canadian programs. To ensure that this shall take place the government is prepared to give the necessary support for the establishment of facilities in Canada that will meet the desire of the Canadian people to have a television system of their own. Because of our relatively small and scattered population, special efforts will be required to produce a good measure of Canadian programs, and to link together different parts of the country by vision as well as by sound. For these reasons it is clear that a large measure of public participation in television will be necessary.

It is not the intention, however, to exclude private operations from the field of television. I want to emphasize that, Mr. Chairman. It is not the intention to exclude private operators from the field of television. The development of radio broadcasting in Canada, through a combination of public and private enterprise, in a manner which a vast majority of disinterested Canadians approve and support, has shown the feasibility of this method. The Canadian Broadcasting Act provides that for broadcasting there shall be a national system publicly owned and operated and that there also may be private stations, the operations of which are co-ordinated with those of the national facilities. This procedure will be adopted with suitable adjustments for the development of television. I point out to you, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the committee, that the fundamental policy is an exact duplication of what has been carried on in this country in the field of radio, namely, a nationally owned and operated system, and in addition to that private stations throughout the country to meet local and community needs.

The public operation of television will be established to be supported by those who benefit from the system. That is the system we have in Canada with reference to radio. Those who receive the benefits of the system are the people who pay for the maintenance of the system. At the same time private stations may be licensed. The government believes that in this way television will become the means of encouraging Canadian talent, of expressing Canadian ideals, of serving the needs of the country as a whole, and of stimulating and strengthening our national life and consciousness.

The following interim plan has therefore been adopted by the government: First, the general direction of television broadcasting in Canada, in accordance with the Canadian Broadcasting Act, will be entrusted to the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which will arrange for television operations by the C.B.C. and by licensed private stations; second, in order to provide the required services the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation will (a) establish at this time national television production centres in the cities of Montreal and Toronto; (b) they will provide the services of television programs for broadcasting by stations which may be established in other areas of Canada, thus furnishing part of that programming. This service will be provided by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation either by means of kinescope recordings or by direct physical relays when these are available; (c) establish transmitting stations in Montreal and Toronto in association with the national production centres there. Third: In any city or area in Canada, including Montreal and Toronto, a licence to establish one private station will be granted to a private organization giving adequate assurances of financial means and of service.

I might point out here that the number of private stations that are to be licensed in any city will be dependent upon the frequencies which are allocated to those cities by a mutual agreement. Of course, Canada has only a certain number of available frequencies in its possession and at its disposal to meet the needs of telecast.

In view of the high cost of television operations it is felt that individuals or groups interested in establishing private stations in any city may wish to form an association for the purpose of applying for a licence. The reason for that, Mr. Chairman, is the great cost of television. If anyone is interested in the matter of television or has made a study of it all he has to do is to review the experience of people who have established private television stations in the United States. In the articles which have been in Fortune magazine in July and October of 1949, one of which I have before me, instances are given covering almost all parts of the United States. These articles show that the capital cost of setting up a television station is in the neighbourhood of $500,000 or $600,000. In addition to that, in order to operate it, before it is brought to a paying basis, it costs another $500,000. Therefore if it gets to the place where private people are interested in it and wish to get a licence for television they have to be prepared to spend something in the neighbourhood of $1 million before they are likely to get any return at all.

With reference to the number of applications which we have had for private licences, we suggested that it might be in the interest not only of the individuals who had made the application but of the development of television for two or three of these people concerned in a certain city to get together and form some sort of co-operation or arrangement and perhaps pool their costs. By doing that it would not be as much of a burden as it would be on one single concern.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What was their answer to that?

Mr. McCann: The answer to that has been almost negative, I think. They have not yet made any arrangements to that effect. Fourth: In regard to network arrangements, whether by teletranscription or direct physical hookups, the same principles will apply as in the case of sound broadcasting.

It will be some time before there are enough receiving sets in Canada for television licence fees and commercial revenue to cover the cost of programs and operations. It is necessary therefore for the government to provide loans to the C.B.C. to cover the capital costs of necessary installations and to support the development of the service. For these purposes parliament is being asked, through this vote, to approve a loan of $4,500,000 this year. Let me emphasize that this is going to be a very costly undertaking. It is going to take a number of years to develop it, and it may well be that we shall have to come back to parliament in another year and ask for a further loan with reference to the further development. I might as well truthfully tell the committee that $4,500,000 is not going to cover all the costs of putting television into operation in this country.

It is expected that the national television operation will become self-supporting from licence fees and commercial revenue in a few years. The plan by no means provides for the exclusion of non-Canadian material from our television channels. One will see a great deal of comment in the newspapers. I have some articles before me. It has come up for discussion that there are certain American people who evidently have the idea that their particular films to be telecast would be excluded from the Canadian field. That is not so. Our plan by no means provides for the exclusion of non-Canadian material from our television channels. The public will wish Canadian stations both private and public to carry some good programming from other countries. The national plan does make possible however a core of Canadian television broadcasting reaching an increasing number of Canadians across the country. The government believes that this national plan provides for the minimum amount of public support and co-ordination necessary to provide for an adequate development of television in Canada. It also provides conditions under which private organizations will have the opportunity to use television channels, but in doing so will contribute to the building of a national Canadian television service, at the same time being assisted in good programming by the national system.

When I said the loan calls for $4,500,000, I think it is only fair to give the committee some detail with respect to how that amount would be spent. It will mean the building of two five-kilowatt transmitters, towers, two studio centres, two mobile units, and the purchase of sundry capital equipment. It is estimated that that cost will be $3,600,000.

In order to carry on television you have to train people in that particular new line of business. So that we figure that our training research and travelling will cost $195,000. Experimental technical operation, research and development will cost $470,000. We have allowed five per cent of the amount for contingencies, which is $235,000, making a total of $4,500,000.

It was mentioned this morning that last year we intended to ask for a loan of $4 million. That has been increased to $4,500,000 because of the fact that we will require $500,000 additional for capital expenditures to cover the cost of a studio built in the city of Montreal.

I think I should say that the C.B.C. project will be implemented approximately as follows: A group of officials of the corporation will keep on planning, both for construction, organization and programming for some time to come. Employees will gradually be assigned jobs on television, either full time or part time. A General Electric transmitter will be bought for Toronto immediately upon the passage of this loan at an installed price of $184,000. A similar RCA transmitter will be bought for Montreal at a cost installed of approximately $204,000. Both of these will be five-kilowatt, operating with frequencies now being earmarked for use at these two points, Toronto and Montreal.

Negotiations are being conducted with the city of Montreal officials for approval of a plan for a transmitter to be built on Mount Royal. In addition to the studios, of course, it is necessary to have transmitters. These are very costly because of the great height at which they have to be built. I am told the one in Toronto would need to be 560 feet high, and that that would be of steel construction. The one in Montreal will not be so high if we can get permission from the city of Montreal and from the Quebec government to build it on Mount Royal.

As I said, negotiations are being conducted with the city of Montreal for the approval of plans for the transmitter to be built on Mount Royal. When the agreement has been reached, final approval will have to be obtained—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That mountain must be a couple of hundred feet high.

Mr. McCann: Yes, I think so. And that would mean that the one in Montreal would be 200 feet less than would be necessary for studios at places like Toronto or Calgary.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I wondered how high that mountain was. My house is higher than the mountain they have there.

Mr. McCann: Above sea-level, perhaps. When agreement has been reached final approval will have to be obtained from the provincial cabinet, which has to confirm the use of the site at the city of Montreal. It is hoped construction will start on that transmitter as soon as weather conditions permit us some time next spring. Plans are now under way for the construction of television studios on the site of the Radio-Canada building in Montreal, with an extension on the sixth floor of that building for TV staff and services.

It is proposed to build the transmitter and studio on the site in Toronto now owned on Jarvis street, and plans are under way in respect to that part of the projects. Studio equipment and accessory equipment will be purchased as we go along, and as we have determined exactly what our needs will be.

Early next spring some personnel will actually start training in some phases of television. Early next fall it is hoped studios will be sufficiently advanced to permit the full training of required staff both on the programming and technical side. From time to time when transmitters are installed there will be some test programs going on the air at regular intervals and on a regular schedule.

This plan will lead to both transmitters going on the air, according to a predetermined regular schedule, about September, 1951. It is hoped that the $4,500,000 will cover this part of the first phase of the development of television. We may be short of money because of the necessity of building some studios in the city of Toronto and, as I indicated, it may be necessary to ask for further loans at another time.

When we project this over a period of years we believe that the total cost will be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $10,700,000. We believe that the transmitters will cost in 1950-51 something over $1 million, and that in the next year that expenditure can be spread somewhat more. Operations with respect to research will be $70,000 for research and $125,000 for training. Station operations, through the period up to 1955, will probably cost about $9 million. Networks will cost $875,000, and contingencies $235,000. This would give a total expenditure up to that time of something in the neighbourhood of $10 million.

In making our calculation we are also looking at the revenue side, and we believe that in Canada in the first year there might be 2,250 receiving sets. In the next year we expect that that will go ten times as high, or 22,000 sets. By 1952-53 it will be probably 56,000 sets, by 1953-54, 111,000 and by 1954-55, 168,000.

If we count on the revenue from those sets, they should bring in a revenue of $3,600,000, and from commercial operation revenue $1,817,000. So that the total revenue in that period we estimate would be in the neighbourhood of $5,420,000. Our total expenditures would run as high as $14 million over the years and our revenue $5,400,000, leaving a net capital cost in the neighbourhood of $10 million. Let me point out that we do not wish to go into this business with our eyes shut. Over a period of years it is going to cost a lot of money. I feel we have followed a wise policy in not being too hasty with respect to this development. I believe that the policy of a nationally-controlled system in accordance with the powers given under the Canadian Broadcasting Act, and the benefit we have had of the experience throughout the years with respect to radio, will stand us in good stead and form a pattern for the development of this medium of communication as we go along.

I think perhaps it might be of interest to tell the committee something with reference to the progress that has been made in the United States. An article appearing in the Montreal Gazette of December 6 refers as follows to a speech given by Mr. John W. Craig of Cincinnati:

—John W. Craig of Cincinnati told members of the Canadian Club at a meeting in the Windsor Hotel yesterday:

Predicting that television will become a prime factor in Canada's national economy, as it is now becoming in the United States, Mr. Craig, who is vice-president of Avco Manufacturing Corporation and president of Crosley Distribution Corporation, criticized the idea that performances emanating from other countries should be barred from Canadian outlets.

"As television has entered the major consideration of the Canadian government and the C.B.C.," said Mr. Craig, "I have seen several statements to the effect that Canadian television should be for Canadians, and not a means of broadcasting non-Canadian visual material in this country.

Basically, it is very true that any nation's communications media should be devoted to native arts, science and progress. But isolationism here, as elsewhere, could easily be carried too far. We will miss an historic opportunity if we fail to encourage an exchange of television services between our countries. And by exchange, I most certainly mean both ways."

That is, there would be a market in the United States for our films to be televised or telecast just the same as the United States would expect that we would telecast certain of their films in this country. The article continues:

"Television will have a tremendous impact on Canadian life, as it has had in the United States, where the industry is barely more than four years old," he said.

I ask hon. members to note that:

He cited figures on its economic growth below the border, where, he said, there will be 20,000,000 sets in use by 1953, with 75,000,000 people listening to 700 stations. More than 1,000,000 persons will be engaged in the industry within the next five years.

Referring to television's economic growth, he said it outstripped radio this year in dollar volume. Number of sets produced were 6,500 in 1946; 175,000 in 1947; 1,700,000 in 1948; 2,500,000 in 1949.

Related to the population of this country those figures suggest what is possible in the development of the electronics industry here. The article continues:

Next year, he estimated, 3,200,000 sets will be produced. More than 150,000 persons are already engaged in the industry and there is a rush for new stations.

I emphasize again that from the point of view of the economy of this country there is a great potential development if we go along with this program of development of this important electronics industry. The report continues:

Demand for television sets exceeds supply and 1,000,000 more sets would be sold this year, if they were available, he declared. Surveys have shown that 75 per cent of sets in use are owned by families in middle and low income groups.

"Investment to date has not been profitable, but this is always the burden of pioneers in a major field of business," he said. "Industry has never quit under that burden in any worthwhile field and certainly there has been no quitting in this one."

I do not propose to take up any more time and I shall be glad to hear the views of the opposition or any others with reference to this matter. I have taken this time without apology because I wanted to outline some of the basic work that has been carried on so that we may have an intelligent and profitable discussion.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, it is most desirable that the minister should have given this survey of the general policy of the government as well as certain details that were not placed before the house last March. One of the things the minister emphasized is that this appropriation of $4,500,000 is merely the item in this year's estimates and that it represents only a beginning of the expenditures that will be involved. He makes it clear that there will be heavy expenditures in the future.

I could not help being impressed by one aspect of the minister's remarks. He referred to a speech by Mr. Craig to members of the Canadian club in Montreal the day before yesterday in which he gave figures of the development that has taken place in the United States during the past four years as indicative of what we may expect here in Canada. The minister referred also to a statement made by Mr. Craig of the experiences in the United States and as to what we might expect this new development will produce in our economic and social life. I think it is appropriate to point out that Mr. Craig was discussing a development under a system where there is not a single government-owned television producing station. All of that development has taken place under a system where the broadcasting as well as the production requirements for broadcasting rest entirely with the ordinary commercial activities of that country.

Having said that, I am not saying that that disposes of the suggestion that governments should be in this field. I am simply saying that it should not be overlooked, when a development in television in that country is placed before us as an indication of what can happen here in the way of expansion and development, that that development took place under a system which we are in effect denying at the very outset as the basis of our system. It is true that the minister has said that licences will be granted to private applicants if they conform with certain requirements. There is no use going over what has already happened, but the fact remains that although a number of private applicants have wanted to start television broadcasting, they have not been able to do so.

They have not been able to do so because it has not been possible for them to conform with the mumbo jumbo of the supposed regulations that are placed before them. This idea of people associating for the purpose of starting a single station in a large centre sounds very well, but it is not nearly as practical as it sounds. The fact is that a number of the applicants either have ordinary radio broadcasting stations at the moment or are interested in other activities. For instance, the minister will know of one who is actually a producer of electronic equipment. Then there are other companies with interlocking interests in other concerns. This idea of merging something which is only part-time does not work in this or in any other social experience in this or any other country.

That has been the rule. It may be that a more practical basis for allocating licences may be worked out, but we should recognize that the experimental development could be carried out without any expense to the people of Canada. There are private operators who are ready to risk their money to carry on through the experimental stages. I must confess that I am at a loss to see why it would not be good business from the government's point of view to allow that experimental stage to be carried forward with the risk capital of those who are prepared to put it up and then if the government is still of the opinion that it should be in this field on a wider basis, it could get into it.

Let us remember one thing in connection with the present situation. There is no similarity to the main purpose of the C.B.C. in what is now being done. At some future time there may be, but the fact that television conveys sound as well as a picture does not give it an over-all similarity to ordinary broadcasting. Ordinary broadcasting will carry for hundreds, and in some cases thousands, of miles. Television still has a very restricted effective area, and consequently the only way that a telecast can be seen over an extended area is to have a system of relay towers—I will not give the technical name but will describe them for what they really are—at sufficiently frequent intervals to carry the impulse forward at a maintained level so that the same image may be carried to a screen at a distant point as will reach the ordinary set within the immediate range of the first telecast studio.

The idea of setting up studios in Toronto and Montreal is, I suggest, contrary to the whole principle of the C.B.C. Why should public money in Canada be allocated for the purpose of giving telecast programs to the areas of Toronto and Montreal, or for that matter assume that you carry it still further and provide these facilities for the larger cities such as Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary, Vancouver, Halifax and Saint John? You have not even begun to approach a similarity to the C.B.C. because the area within which the television image may be seen is probably fifty miles at the outside around these cities. All the rest of the country, which is being asked to contribute through taxes to the maintenance of this great structure, gets nothing at all. On the other hand, ordinary broadcasting covers a wide area, and there are only a few parts of Canada that are not able to hear broadcasts through the co-operation of private stations which really do the major broadcasting in Canada today of programs emanating from C.B.C. stations.

With that difference I suggest that no sound reason has been put before the house for allocating one cent at this time. I believe this is a most improper, unsound and unjustifiable course. I say that believing that we should have television, and believing that the way we shall get television, without any sense of unfairness on the part of the taxpayer who gets no actual benefit, will be to permit those who are ready to carry it on with their own risk capital to provide for a television system. I am sure that thereby more Canadians will see television in the near future than if we place it under the restrictive procedure of the C.B.C. All that is going to happen here is that we shall be turning on a tap. The flood is going to come afterwards, but the trouble is we are going to put in the pipe, put a tap at a particular place, and then the flood is going to be in a limited area. This is a matter that in the experimental stage should be left to the initiative and the risk of those who are prepared to spend their money.

The advances in one year are almost incredible. Those who have seen telecasts in the United States a year ago and in recent weeks will find the change almost unbelievable. I should think it is likely that next year will see a similar change, and the year after that. This is the very time that a government agency should not commit public funds to something that is changing at such a rapid rate. In so far as this is concerned, I think we might also very well wait until we see what the developments are in the United States in regard to systems of extending the availability of television service through new methods.

I have said what I intended to say as to this item. For the reasons I have put forward I do not believe that on the merits one cent of public money should be put into this venture at the present time. But there is another reason why we should not be asked to pass this item now, one that is perhaps even more important from the point of view of the responsibility of government to parliament. The statement that the minister has made tonight as to policy is a summary of the statement which he made to the house on March 28 of this year. He has given more extensive figures as to the details. I may also say this is the first time we have had an indication that this is just putting in the penny ante, and that we can really expect the expensive chips to come later on.

Mr. Low: A slot machine.

Mr. Drew: This is just the start; this is just the primer. Once we are into it then on the ground of giving Canadians real service we shall be asked to support really large amounts for the next stages of this activity. That is the history of this whole development, and it will be the history in our case if we proceed with it. The minister has frankly indicated that this is just the beginning of a very expensive venture. There is another reason why it should not be considered now. After the minister had made his statement of policy on March 28, the hon. member for Eglinton said:

> May I ask the minister a question arising out of the statement he has just read? Will the radio committee have an opportunity of reviewing this policy and reporting to the house before the house is called upon to approve the loan of $4 million?
> Mr. McCann: The answer is definitely yes.

Mr. Chairman, I submit the government is bound in honour to live up to that undertaking, and not to ask the house, with the majority the government has behind it or otherwise, to pass a loan of this kind when it has given an explicit undertaking that the house will have the opportunity to examine the policy in the radio committee before a decision is made. It could not be more explicit. Surely the minister's words, "the answer is definitely yes", are as definite now as they were on the 28th of March.

Mr. McCann: Relative to the circumstances that obtained at that time.

Mr. Drew: Relative to the circumstances that obtained at that time, and the circumstances that obtained at that time were the solemn undertaking by the government to appoint the radio committee. If the government had any intention at all of asking for this loan at this time, it should have appointed the radio committee at this session, and in that way carried out its undertaking. It is no use saying: Oh, the $4,500,000 is printed in the estimates; of course we intended to deal with it. The $4,500,000 was printed in the estimates last March when that undertaking was given. The fact that the government decided not to continue the session at that time does not change the undertaking. The fact that the government, consequent upon dissolving the house at that time, was returned with the very substantial majority which is so frequently referred to by the government in regard to the things that it puts forward, is no reason at all why the government should now say that their undertaking at that time was only related to the circumstances. At that time the government knew there was going to be an election, and a statement such as that would mean that the undertaking meant nothing. I do not think the minister will make that statement because that would be the only meaning that could be attached to it, that it was not intended to mean anything. Some strange statements have been made by this government, but not yet so strange a statement as that. On the basis of that undertaking I submit that the government is in honour bound not to ask for the passing of this item, but should recognize the undertaking to set up a committee immediately the next session opens to deal with this question of policy, and then let the house decide, with some knowledge of what it is all about, after having listened to experts and not having listened to the minister repeat a speech made to the Canadian Club in Montreal—excellent though it may have been—as a basis for our decision of what this may mean to our economy.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I do regret that this particular item in the estimates has been reached at this late hour. When the member for Eglinton raised his point of privilege this morning, I understood the house leader to indicate that he would make a place for the discussion of this item on tomorrow's program.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May I interrupt for a moment? Before six o'clock I was informed that the officials of the C.B.C. could not be present tomorrow or Friday, since one of the gentlemen is entering hospital tomorrow. I did speak to the leader of the opposition, and suggested that if the hour between ten and eleven this evening could be set aside for the debate, the two officials would be present. At six o'clock, I did announce we would take this hour, and those were the circumstances which led up to this discussion.

Mr. Hansell: I appreciate the minister's remarks. I was not in the house at five minutes to six, and I do agree that the circumstances warrant the matter being brought up tonight. I must point out, however, that since the minister has made his statement, it only leaves about 25 minutes to discuss this matter. It happens that I have only 5 minutes left.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We would have no objection to giving unanimous consent if the hon. gentleman wishes to speak after eleven o'clock.

Mr. Hansell: I think that is what ought to be done. I believe the leader of the opposition has covered this matter thoroughly, but there are one or two things which he left out that deserve some attention. I would call to the attention of the minister and the house the fact that there is a royal commission on arts and letters listening to the various representations being made about this whole matter. This house is being asked to vote $4,500,000 to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for its proposed television operation, without knowing what that royal commission is going to report.

Unless the minister has some inside information, which I do not think even a minister of the crown should have while a royal commission is sitting, how does he know what the royal commission will recommend? Does he know that the commission will not recommend that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation remain outside the field of television? Nobody knows that. The leader of the opposition brought to the attention of the house the fact that the minister committed the government not to introduce this loan of $4,500,000 until the parliamentary committee on radio could be set up. The minister replied that he gave that commitment under the circumstances prevailing at the time. Since the royal commission is sitting today, the circumstances are even more acute now than they were at that time. There should be a special committee on radio before this loan is granted.

While I do not know what the terms of reference for the radio committee would be, in all probability it would have the advantage of the commission's report to guide it. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the government should be urged not to go forward with this matter at this particular time. Why all the rush? Parliament will be sitting again within a couple of months, so why the rush now? It seems to me that the rush is to accomplish this before the royal commission reports. Now, that is exactly the way it appears to me. Four and a half million dollars is a lot of money. I know the minister can say that this is a loan, but the minister has also said it is only the beginning. Television costs a tremendous amount of money, and the end is not yet.

Upon the basis of his own words, the minister may come back to this house on future occasions for further millions, so there is no purpose in asking him when this $4,500,000 loan is going to be repaid. If what the minister says is true, then it would appear to me that the $4,500,000 now being lent, plus perhaps another $5 million later, plus another $5 million or $10 million later, and plus something else later, running into $30 million or $50 million, will never be repaid. I agree with the leader of the opposition when he says it will mean taxing all of Canada for television services that will accrue to those who are citizens of the metropolitan areas. Now, that is not right. I am not saying that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should not enter the television field, but I am saying that if it is going to cost so much money, and private interests are willing to enter that television field without calling upon the Canadian taxpayer to foot the bill, then private interests should be given the opportunity of so doing. Up until now, they have not been given that opportunity. As a matter of fact, if anything, private interests have been discouraged.

The minister read from a report, Mr. Chairman. He concluded that report by saying that, in the past, industry has never quit when it has had to put up vast sums of money; it has seen the thing through. They have risked those funds. If he says that, he is offering an excellent argument for private enterprise. Let us be assured that it is private enterprise that is risking its own funds, and is seeing the industry through to a successful conclusion.

Mr. McCann: That was a quotation from Craig's speech.

Mr. Low: Which you used to bolster your own arguments.

Mr. Hansell: Which was used as an argument for supplying a crown corporation with funds that did not have to be repaid, as long as the taxpayer continued to foot the bill; that is the position.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is in the commercial field, Mr. Chairman, running competitively with independent radio broadcasting. I have no objection to that. But if they are in the field running competitively with independent broadcasting interests, then why should the corporation itself not be able to put up the funds for expansion in this field? That is what the private enterprise of the radio industry desires to do. Why do they not have the same thing, operating side by side as they do? I say again—and I emphasize this—that since the royal commission has not concluded its work and has not finalized its report and recommendations, this loan could well stand for the time being until that royal commission has reported. Then again, the minister has already said that this television is an expanding art. The fact of the matter is that much of this money may well be spent on equipment that might in a few years become obsolete.

Mr. Coldwell: Eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hansell: I know it is eleven o'clock.

Mr. Coldwell: How long are you going to be?

Mr. Hansell: Only a few minutes. They told me they would let me go ahead.

Mr. Mutch: Finish with it.

Mr. Hansell: I will ask the minister one or two questions, Mr. Chairman, since we are in committee, and then I will sit down. I do not think we can be satisfied with the statement the minister has given with respect to the future over-all plans for television in Canada. All he has told us is that they will be coming back for more money later on. What is that plan? That is the thing we should know. Another question I should like to have answered is this. How many frequencies are available in Montreal and in Toronto? If the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are going to take one frequency in Montreal and another one in Toronto, then will the other frequencies be available to private interests that would like to enter this field and develop it? If we grant this loan, will recognition be given to private operators where these frequencies are available in other parts of Canada in which the corporation is not at present prepared to enter the field?

In conclusion I think I should say that we as a party are absolutely opposed to passing this item until a committee has had ample opportunity to investigate fully and completely and to recommend to parliament that we make this loan of $4,500,000.

Mr. McCann: May I answer the hon. member for Macleod now with reference to the frequencies. In Toronto there are only three television channels available. One of those is reserved for the C.B.C. That would mean that there are two channels there available for private broadcasters.

Mr. Coldwell: Has that been decided? Has it been decided to grant the television channels to private broadcasters?

Mr. McCann: That is an international understanding.

Mr. Coldwell: For private broadcasters?

Mr. McCann: No, the number of frequencies available.

Mr. Coldwell: No. You said two frequencies were available for private broadcasters. Has that been decided?

Mr. McCann: I said that would leave two; I said that we were taking only one.

Mr. Coldwell: But the two have not been given to anyone else?

Mr. McCann: No, they have not been given at all yet.

Mr. Coldwell: They are still public property?

Mr. McCann: Yes. In the city of Montreal there are five channels, and two of those have been reserved for the C.B.C. In the city of Hamilton there is only one channel.

With reference to the statement that I made before with a view to having applicants get together, there were four applications from the city of Toronto: CFRB, CKEY, Famous Players Corporation and one individual by the name of Mr. O'Leary. If there are only three channels available in the city of Toronto, and one for the C.B.C., that leaves only two that could go to four of them. For that purpose we suggested that it might be advisable for them to get together in order that they could take advantage of them. I may say here that there has not been any rush on the part of private individuals to get into this field because of the fact that it has been so costly. I think we are quite within our rights, as custodians of these channels, to ask people who make application for one of them this question: Are you prepared to spend the money that will be necessary to put this development into operation? In very few instances was that the case; I think in only one, as far as I know at the present time, and that was from the city of Montreal. In very few instances did they say that they were prepared to spend an amount of money sufficient to carry on that development.

Mr. Coldwell: Eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Drew: Speaking of the case in Montreal, may I ask this question? Is it not correct that the Marconi Company and La Presse both suggested terms in money?

Mr. McCann: That is true.

Mr. Coldwell: It is eleven o'clock; if this is going on, I think we should call it eleven o'clock. If we are going to have a vote right away, then all right.

Mr. McCann: No. The item carried last night.

Mr. Casselman: No, no.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes. Then discussion took place this morning. The item was called last night. It was passed and carried.

Mr. Casselman: No.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): And it was so reported. I have had the officials of the house look up the journals and they have not been able to find anything in the way of a formula to bring that item back before the committee.

Mr. Casselman: Look at Hansard. There is not a word in Hansard about it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): What I said at eleven o'clock was that, in a spirit of co-operation, we would find time to discuss television. If you read Hansard tomorrow—and I have read it over myself to be quite sure of what I said —you will find there was no question that we would reopen that item, have another discussion and have a vote on it. I think that position is exactly the position taken by the chairman; and I do not think we should let the chairman down because most of the members of the majority think he was right.

Mr. Coldwell: I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we call it eleven o'clock. I do not think that the pages and the staff should be kept here any more than the members of parliament.

Mr. Drew: Let us have one thing quite clear. I cannot believe that any of the hon. members this morning had it in their minds, when it was understood that this item was to be discussed, that we were merely being afforded an opportunity to speak for the sake of hearing our voices in this chamber. I cannot conceive of any circumstances which would justify the taking of this time unless we were discussing this item with the idea that the arguments put forward would be directed to the item itself. It seems to me that there is another reason that I mentioned earlier why this item should not be considered to have been passed, and I am not now arguing as to the ruling or otherwise. There was a reason why the government should not have permitted that item to be called last night and that is that it will be a gross breach of faith if the government seeks to pass this item in the face of the undertaking that was given by the minister last night.

Mr. Rinfret: It was passed last night. Look at Hansard.

The Deputy Chairman: May I refer hon. members to Hansard of yesterday, page 2828, which shows clearly that item 934 was carried. May I also refer them to Votes and Proceedings, which are the journals by which we should go. As will be seen from reference to page 345, item 934 was carried. It being eleven o'clock, shall I report the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall take up peaceful departments, namely, post office, external affairs, justice, transport, mines and resources, health and welfare, veterans affairs, public works, trade and commerce.

Mr. Harkness: In that order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In that order.

Mr. Drew: That leaves what departments?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That will leave a few departments, also peaceful I hope. There are nine departments. I think it covers nearly every department that has not been discussed.

It being 11.15 o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF RECONSTRUCTION AND SUPPLY

A—Department—

381. Departmental administration—formerly under demobilization and reconversion, $98,180.

382. Public projects branch—formerly under departmental administration, demobilization and reconversion, $123,380.

383. Canadian government travel bureau—to assist in promoting the tourist business in Canada, $1,298,277.

Demobilization and reconversion—

384. Reconstruction projects, subject to allocation by the treasury board, $1,000,000.

385. To provide for contribution towards cost of subway at Sudbury, Ontario, to implement agreement entered into in 1939 (revote), $100,000.

Housing development, including commitments of previous years—

386. To provide for payments of amounts owing under guarantees pursuant to item 571 of schedule A to the Appropriation Act No. 5, 1947 (and pursuant to corresponding items in previous appropriation acts) to approved lending institutions in respect of loans made for the purpose of financing the conversion of existing houses into multiple family houses, such payments to be made out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, $1.

387. Emergency shelter—administration, $350,000.

B—National film board—

National film board, including the motion picture bureau—

388. General administration, including technical administration, $249,084.

389. Production of films, including authority to finance temporarily work performed for other public authorities or other agencies as the public interest requires, $784,000.

390. Distribution of films, $829,826.

391. Production and distribution of other visual materials, $121,000.

A—Department—

560. To provide for advances to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the construction and conversion of houses for rent to veterans and married members of the armed forces, including the acquisition and development of land, and the purchase of building materials, $75,000,000.

889. Trans-Canada highway—to provide for preliminary engineering work and studies in co-operation with the provinces concerned, $25,000.

Demobilization and reconversion—

890. Reconstruction projects, subject to allocation by the treasury board—further amount required, $1,000,000.

B—National film board, including the motion picture bureau—

891. Production of films including authority to finance temporarily work performed for other public authorities or other agencies as the public interest requires—further amount required, $10,500.

892. Distribution of films—further amount required, $56,500.

893. Production and distribution of other visual materials—further amount required, $6,500.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 8, 1949

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN TORONTO "SATURDAY NIGHT" OF DECEMBER 6

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): For a long time, Mr. Speaker, I have not risen to a question of privilege. I will do so now. My attention has been drawn to an article which appeared in the stalest of all weeklies, edited by the most self-complacent of all idiots; I refer to Toronto Saturday Night. The article is probably from the pen of a bureaucrat-minded, bigoted, besotted nonentity, the Canadian pocket edition of Harry Hopkins. It is on the word "blokes", which I have used in the past and which I will use again. I want to give my own definition of the word and what I mean by it when I utter it. It is quite different from the dictionary meaning. Whenever I use that word in the future everybody will understand what I mean.

Here is the article:

> The word "blokes," which is not very familiar to English-speaking Canadians, has come into popularity with certain French Canadians as an uncomplimentary designation for Englishmen—probably in much the same way as "Boches" came to be applied to the Germans.

That is false. The article continues, speaking of the member for Temiscouata:

> He is entitled to that view, but we do not think he is entitled to express it in the House of Commons in language of carefully calculated insult.

This is untrue. I do not call a "bloke" a man who is necessarily born anywhere outside of Canada. The word "bloke" applies to everyone, born anywhere, who is stupid enough to consider Canada a lemon to squeeze.

ATOMIC ENERGY

First and final report of special committee on the operations of the atomic energy control board.—Mr. McIlraith.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS —TABLING OF FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to lay on the table copies in English and French of the letter addressed yesterday to the premiers of the provinces with respect to the proposed conference on the procedure for amendments to the British North America Act. As was done on previous occasions, I imagine that hon. members would wish to have this letter printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Hon. members will note that in addition to this conference for the purpose of advising on a method of making in Canada amendments to the constitution, the government of Canada is proposing to the premiers of the provinces that there be another dominion-provincial conference after the next session, and that the preparatory work on such a conference be undertaken as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the letter appear as an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of further correspondence, see appendix, page 2976.)

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH MINISTERS AT COLOMBO, CEYLON

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, during the debate on external affairs on November 17, I said that Canada would be represented by a minister at the important forthcoming meeting of commonwealth ministers of external affairs to take place in Colombo, Ceylon, beginning January 9. I am now in a position to state that the government has decided that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should head the Canadian delegation to this conference.

The Minister of Fisheries, who will be representing Canada at the meeting of the governing body of the international labour organization at Mysore, India, at the beginning of January, will also, I hope, be available to attend the Colombo conference if the labour conference finishes in time.

The advisers to the Canadian delegation to the Colombo conference will consist of the deputy under-secretary, Mr. Reid; the head of the Far Eastern division of the department, Mr. Menzies; and Mr. Lepan, of the economic division of the department.

It has been arranged that the newly appointed Canadian high commissioner to Pakistan, Mr. Johnson, will travel with the delegation to Colombo en route to his post, and will also act as an adviser. A senior official of the Department of Trade and Commerce will accompany the delegation, because we hope to take advantage of our presence in Karachi, New Delhi and Colombo to explore the possibilities of increased trade between Canada and Pakistan, India and Ceylon.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*REPORTS ON PERSONS RESIDENT IN CANADA

Mr. Coldwell:

Are any reports on persons resident in Canada given confidentially, or otherwise, by the R.C.M.P. to private citizens, companies or corporations?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, this question is rather wide in its scope. I conferred with the hon. member who asked it, and he has agreed to substitute for the question on the order paper the following:

Does the Royal Canadian Mounted Police make a practice of providing reports upon the request of employers as to the character of persons seeking employment with such employers?

The answer is no.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—EMPLOYEES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What is the total number of employees of the national film board who have ceased to be employed by, or under, the national film board, since the first of January, 1949?

2. Of these, how many have been transferred to, or have secured employment in, other departments or agencies of government?

Mr. Winters: In answering a similar question orally yesterday, and from memory, when my estimates were under consideration, I said, as to employees who left the board this year, that the number was 61. Actually the number is 67.

The answer to the question of the hon. member for Lake Centre follows:

1. Sixty-six appointed under authority of the National Film Act; one appointed under authority of the Civil Service Act.

2. Eight have been employed by other departments or agencies of government.

Mr. Fraser: The minister has corrected a statement he made in committee of supply yesterday having to do with the subject matter of this question on the order paper. He says the number should be 67, instead of 61 as he stated yesterday. Does that also change the number that have been transferred to other departments, which is given as eight?

Mr. Winters: No.

[Mr. Pearson.]

POTATOES—IMPORTS AND EXPORTS

Mr. Hatfield:

1. How many bushels of (a) Irish potatoes; (b) certified seed potatoes, were exported to the United States each year from 1940 to date?

2. How many bushels of (a) table potatoes; (b) seed potatoes, were imported from the United States during each of the years from 1940 to date?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Exports to United States:

Calendar year	Table potatoes Bu.	Certified seed potatoes Bu.
1940	621,790	911,851
1941	229,336	676,500
1942	7,798	878,473
1943	63,646	1,056,622
1944	3,460,971	1,995,560
1945	3,433,319	2,163,477
1946	166,319	2,057,984
1947	2,859,284	2,216,497
1948	1,967,797	4,331,707
Jan. 1 to Oct. 31, 1949	1,073,964	4,713,163

2. Imports from United States:

Calendar year	Table potatoes Bu.	Certified seed potatoes Bu.
1940	994,338	2,357
1941	552,648	1,110
1942	671,408	335

1944	348,220	5,700
1945	3,312,675	11,633
1946	5,409,588	34,492
1947	642,167	3,567
1948	338,053	1,592
Jan. 1 to Oct. 31, 1949	519,505	3,260

BRIDGE BETWEEN ALLUMETTE ISLAND, QUE., AND NORTH RENFREW, ONT.

Mr. Proudfoot:

Have any representations been made to the government by the government of the province of Ontario or by the government of the province of Quebec, asking for an interprovincial bridge between Allumette Island, Quebec, and North Renfrew, Ontario?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No.

URANIUM

REPORTED SHIPMENTS FROM CANADA TO SOVIET RUSSIA

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on the orders of the day on Tuesday, December 6, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) asked for a statement as to reports on the dispatch of uranium from Canada to Soviet Russia. I can now answer that question.

A search of the files of the Department of Munitions and Supply and the files of Eldorado Gold Mines Limited, the predecessor company of Eldorado Mining and Refining (1944) Limited, reveals the following facts:

On May 6, 1943, Eldorado Gold Mines Limited received an inquiry from their New York selling agent, Canadian Radium and Uranium Corporation, reporting an order from Chematar Incorporated, a firm of reputable New York exporters, for 500 pounds of black uranium oxide and 500 pounds of uranium nitrate. The inquiry reported that the destination of the material would be Soviet Russia, where it would be used for purposes connected with the prosecution of the war against nazi Germany; that the black uranium oxide would be used for ferro-uranium compounds, which in turn would be used in the production of armaments; and that the uranium nitrate would be used for medical purposes.

Eldorado Gold Mines Limited, which was then a privately-owned company, applied to the arms export permit branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce for a permit for the export of this material to the United States. This was granted by the zinc control branch of the metals controller on May 11, 1943, after it had been determined in the meantime that an export licence from the United States bureau of economic warfare had been issued.

The invoice of the material indicates that 500 pounds of black uranium oxide was billed at $1,275 and 500 pounds of uranium nitrate at $1,180, making a total billing of this material of $2,455.

The material was shipped on May 22, 1943, to Colonel A. N. Kotikov, resident representative of the Soviet government purchasing commission, air service depot of the air transport command, Gore Field, Great Falls, Montana, U.S.A. Payment for the shipment was deposited to the account of Eldorado Gold Mines at the Royal Bank of Canada, New York. The documents covering this shipment appear to be all in order.

Since its mining operations commenced, Eldorado had been producing uranium as a by-product of radium, which was the product of commercial interest at that time. Uranium was being sold for a number of uses through ordinary commercial channels. It was natural, therefore, that the order to which I have referred was treated as normal in both Canada and the United States of America.

At this time, 1943, only a very few persons —very few indeed—knew that experiments in the use of atomic energy for weapons purposes were proceeding. Those who did know, however, realized the wisdom of not calling attention, by refusing to fill commercial orders, to uranium as a material suitable for any use other than the commercial uses to which it had been put for many years—uses such as those stated for the shipment in question.

It will also be remembered that in 1943 we were at the very height of the war against nazi Germany. Naturally it was then the policy of all the western allies to render any help possible to the Soviet union in the gigantic war struggle which that country was waging, with its allies, against the nazis.

I should add that, as atomic energy research developed, uranium became valuable, of course, for weapons purposes. In 1944, therefore, the Canadian government expropriated Eldorado Gold Mines Limited, in order to acquire closer control of this new strategic mineral.

After the acquisition of the property, Mr. Grant Glassco, of the firm of Clarkson, Gordon, Dilworth and Nash, was appointed by the government as a commissioner to examine into the affairs of Eldorado Gold Mines and the successor crown company, and was instructed particularly to look for irregularities in the shipment of radium and uranium.

Mr. Glassco's investigation revealed nothing to suggest that, in disposing of radioactive substances acquired by them, Eldorado and its agents dealt with customers other than the United States government and the ordinary buyers and users of these substances in Canada and the United States. A close check of the files shows no evidence of any shipment from Canada being re-exported other than the shipment I have just mentioned.

Mr. Green: After I had asked the question the other day the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked a supplementary question in which he said:

> Two years ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce undertook to table the investigator's report in the Eldorado investigation. I would suggest that that be brought to the minister's attention, with a view to having it tabled because of its particular interest at the moment, having regard to the evidence that is being given in Washington.

Would the minister be willing to table the report?

Mr. Howe: I have had Hansard examined to see what I did say. I find that on March 24, 1947, on the order for the production of papers as reported at page 1657, the hon. member for Lake Centre moved that a copy of the evidence taken in connection with the investigation of Eldorado Gold Mines Limited and an alleged conspiracy by French, Pochon and Pregel to defraud the said company, and the report by the commissioner in connection therewith, be tabled. I said that the report was not yet in the hands of the government, but in any event from inquiries I had made "it could not be tabled, for the reason that it contains information which is of a secret character affecting other governments as well as the government of Canada". That is the position today.

Mr. Green: That is the position still taken by the government?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

ELECTRIC POWER

DEVELOPMENT ON NIAGARA AND ST. LAWRENCE RIVERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I might have raised as a question of privilege. I am addressing it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the statement made in this morning's issue of the Globe and Mail and in other newspapers I would ask him these questions:

First, has the government any further information on the development of power in the Niagara river? Officials say that nothing has happened there since 1920 or 1922.

Second, what hopes are there for the ratification of any treaty separately? The treaty with respect to additional power at Niagara was before the house in 1922 and 1923. Has the attention of chief officials of the government been called to a statement by chief officials of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario, who have been asking ratification of this for twenty months? A spokesman for the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario has said that the report made in the house yesterday is erroneous; one of them went so far as to say—and used a word which I do not think should have been used—that it was "silly".

Is there any change in the international section of the St. Lawrence river regarding the use of power, either separately or in conjunction with the seaway plan? Will any further information be forthcoming before the session ends on these important matters? —because, as I said yesterday, no doubt blackouts are due in Ontario and in other places owing to the scarcity of power. Nothing has been done in the matter whatsoever. The Secretary of State for External Affairs should make a statement about it.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at the present time there is nothing I can usefully add to what I said in this matter yesterday. However I shall look into the questions raised by the hon. member and see whether a supplementary answer might be made tomorrow, or during the consideration of my estimates.

Mr. Church: It is just all talk; that is all it is.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

IMMIGRATION—JAPANESE NATIONALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources. Some weeks ago I placed on the order paper a question having to do with the immigration branch, and concerning permits being given to persons of the Japanese race to return to Canada. On November 21 that question was made an order for return. On December 3 the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) said that the responsible official was away, but that the return would be brought down as soon as possible. The minister's estimates are to be called today. I wonder if it would be possible to have that return before the estimates are under consideration?

Hon. Colin Gibson (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have made inquiries and understand that this return is about ready. It has taken some time to secure the information, because the Japanese admitted to Canada are screened over in Japan before they come here. There was some difficulty in getting answers as to the categories in which the Japanese should be placed. I shall try to bring down the return later in the day, if it is available.

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO CALLING OF COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in view of the rapidly diminishing market overseas, referred to especially the other day by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in Brantford, would the government give consideration, at least before the calling of another session, to encouraging the taking of initial steps toward calling a British commonwealth trade conference?

Mr. Church: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fraser: Wait for an answer.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The statement which preceded the question is one in which I cannot concur. I do not know of any rapidly diminishing market overseas. If there is any lack of trade, I suggest that at least we are having plenty of conferences.

Mr. Rowe: I suggest that the Minister of Trade and Commerce consult the Minister of Agriculture.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): May I say to the hon. member that he might consult the report of the meeting. I did not include quite as much territory as he has referred to.

Mr. Casselman: Quite a bit, though.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADA'S VOTE AS TO INTERNATIONAL FORM OF GOVERNMENT FOR JERUSALEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, how did Canada vote last Tuesday in the United Nations committee regarding a plan to give Jerusalem an international form of government? Has the government any announcement to make on the subject? In the event of Canada's supporting it, how will effect be given to it? What army will be assigned by Canada to it, either by voluntary recruiting or otherwise? Has this last-mentioned matter been considered by the government?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I believe the plan to which the hon. member is referring is that which was introduced into the United Nations by certain delegations for the establishment of an international form of government for the city of Jerusalem. There have been other plans, but I think this is the one to which the hon. member refers.

Concerning that particular plan before the political committee of the assembly, the Canadian delegation abstained. It abstained on the ground that it was not satisfied the plan could be carried out effectively. The plan was carried in the committee, and I believe is being voted on today in the general assembly of the United Nations.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

307. Departmental administration, $1,441,235.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Green: No. I should like to have a statement.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I should like to have a statement on this from the minister. I do not even know what department it is until I get my estimates book open.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Post Office.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Green: No.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, when you called the item first—

The Chairman: I have called it three times.

Mr. Fraser: A page boy was standing in front of the minister and no one could hear. I am wondering if the Postmaster General is going to make a statement at this time—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fraser: —because there have been a great many changes in this department.

The Chairman: Shall item 307 carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to make a statement.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not know whether my question should come under this item, but as I do not see any other item covering letter carriers I shall ask it now. I would draw the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact—

Mr. Rinfret: That would come under item 308.

Mr. Bryce: In the reorganization that has taken place in the Post Office Department, where some post offices have come under the civil service, is it only the postmaster who is so affected? What happens to the employees in the post office? Do they or do they not come under the civil service? Do they participate in superannuation?

Mr. Rinfret: For the moment, it is only the postmaster.

Mr. Bryce: Where there are two or three employees in a post office, is it intended to take them into the civil service so that they can participate in superannuation benefits?

Mr. Rinfret: The department has that in mind for future reference. There are still some postmasters to be taken in, and the others will just have to wait.

Mr. Bryce: Is it the intention to have employees in the post offices come into the civil service?

Mr. Rinfret: No decision has been made as yet.

Mr. MacInnis: As I understand it, this applies to the revenue post offices, and in that case the only person recognized as an employee is the postmaster, who in turn hires what staff he needs at whatever terms may be convenient at the moment?

Mr. Rinfret: The answer to the first part of the question is yes. The answer to the second part is no, because we control the terms and conditions of employment.

Mr. Fraser: Has any consideration been given to allowing mail to be carried free to the different veterans district offices? When these activities were concentrated in Ottawa a veteran could send his papers addressed to Ottawa without having to pay postage, but now that he has to send them to a district office he has to pay postage, and at times it is inconvenient for him to get to a post office to have his letter weighed.

Mr. Rinfret: That would not be permissible under the statute; there would have to be a change in the legislation.

Mr. Fraser: Does the Postmaster General not think that to change the regulations would be a move in the right direction?

Mr. Rinfret: I will consider it.

Mr. Shaw: There are a number of postmasters in Canada who have been operating on a straight commission basis and who are now being retired at sixty-five years of age. Has any provision been made to grant superannuation to those postmasters?

Mr. Rinfret: Since April 1, 1948, superannuation benefits have been available to postmasters in post offices with a revenue of over $3,000.

Mr. Shaw: When a postmaster is retired, is the vacancy advertised in all cases?

Mr. Rinfret: In the case of a post office with a revenue of over $3,000, the vacancy would be advertised through the civil service commission. Where an assistant has been in the employ of the department for more than fifteen years, he may be exempted from competing. In all cases notice is given to the Legion to submit any names of veterans they wish.

Mr. Shaw: Is the assistant who has been in the service for more than fifteen years automatically appointed to the position?

Mr. Rinfret: No. He may be exempted from competing if it is felt to be in the public interest to have him appointed.

Mr. Coldwell: Provided that he is qualified.

Mr. Rinfret: That is right.

Mr. Church: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to ask the Postmaster General a number of general questions because he is new to the position and probably it would not be fair, but I should like to call his attention to certain conditions in the Toronto post office.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

The revenue and surplus obtained by this department in Toronto is considerable. In 1946 it amounted to nearly $11 million, but then the cost of rural mail delivery was charged against the surplus revenue and in 1947 it dropped to a surplus of $8,773,000, and in 1948 to a surplus of $9,827,000.

In view of the large surplus, would it not be possible to pay something additional to the low-paid employees of the post office? Ten thousand extra employees will be taken on during the Christmas season to help deliver mail, and they should be paid at a proper rate. I can remember when the Minister of Public Works, along with the former postmaster general, Mr. Mulock, accompanied me on a tour of the Toronto terminal "A" post office in order to see the conditions under which the workers were sorting the mail. There is one large room there that is not really fit for human habitation. There is hardly any ventilation. Employees should not be asked to work under such intolerable conditions.

I should like to compare the postal revenue of Toronto with that of Montreal, the chairman's district. I admit that in Toronto considerable revenue is derived from the two large departmental stores, but, eliminating that factor, the postal receipts for Montreal are about $10,500,000 as compared with $16,500,000 for Toronto. Yet we have no post office in that city. There is a terminal "A" which was built by the old Grand Trunk and then taken over by the Canadian National Railways and used as the main post office.

I should like to direct the attention of the Postmaster General to the difficulty encountered when trying to buy postage stamps. Many people will be travelling this Christmas, and they should be able to buy stamps on the trains, or at least in the larger railway stations. Many soldiers will be going home for Christmas, and they should be able to let their people know that they are coming.

I should like to see some action taken to give the low-paid workers a better deal as to pay and working conditions. An effort should be made to improve their hours of labour and their working conditions. With the amount of second-class mail they have to handle, they all have humps on their backs. I have seen them delivering mail in the various districts of our city. The amount of second-class mail that must be delivered is an intolerable burden on the poor postman who has to go out in weather such as we are having at the present time. There should be some other way of making effective second-class delivery. I hope that the minister, if he gets an opportunity during the recess, will come to Toronto and investigate the post office situation. He has a good deputy and other competent officials in the department. In fact I know of no department of the public service that has more support of the people than the post office.

Mr. Rinfret: They deserve it.

Mr. Church: Everybody likes to see the postman coming around. They have a very efficient staff.

I am sorry to say that in this country the post office has not assumed many of the functions which it discharges in England. For example, telephones are under the post office in that country. I hope that in his travels the minister will go over to England with his deputy and investigate the functions which have been added to the post offices in England, France and other countries. As a result the post office in England is a great public utility, and is giving wonderful service to the people, as the post office here is giving to Canada. I believe there should be better working conditions and salaries for the rank and file members of Canada's Post Office Department.

Mr. Rinfret: The number of extra persons employed throughout the country for the Christmas rush is not 10,000 but 25,000. So far as the situation in Toronto is concerned, if action is necessary, action will be taken. As a matter of fact I have an engagement to go to Toronto on the 12th of December, provided that parliament prorogues before that time, and the deputy minister will accompany me. I will see what the circumstances of the situation are, and if there is anything to be corrected, I certainly will correct it.

Mr. Knight: I should like to ask a question or two about the holidays of postal employees. I am thinking now about the larger post offices where there are large groups of workers. Is there any uniform system throughout the country by which holidays are rotated, or do the post office staffs make their own arrangements in that regard?

While the minister is thinking about the answer, there are two or three other points which should be considered. It is obvious in an institution of this kind that all employees cannot get their holidays at the most favourable time of the year, which, in our part of the world, certainly would be June, July or August. There should be a system of rotation by which these favourable periods would be allotted to everybody in turn, irrespective of rank, seniority or position. A system of rotation would give every worker reasonable expectation of enjoying at least one good holiday every few years in terms of weather and the facilities dependent thereupon.

Then there is the question of changing of classes. I understand that in some post offices the holidays are arranged on the basis of classes of employees. A difficult position arises where a man is promoted. I do not know what the grades are, but let us say that a mail porter is promoted to the position of clerk. It seems to me that his promotion would upset the particular rotation. I wonder how that is handled. Would he automatically go to the bottom of the list in his new position?

Perhaps the minister will comment on the questions I have raised.

Mr. Rinfret: As to the question of holidays, I presume the hon. member for Saskatoon is talking about annual leave. If that is the question, they must of necessity be spread over a period of time—actually over a period of nine months. The choice is made by seniority, senior members having a preference over others in the choice of the time of the year at which they wish to take their holidays.

Mr. Knight: Do they have such a preference every year?

Mr. Rinfret: Senior members, yes.

Mr. Knight: Every year?

Mr. Rinfret: That is right; and it is done in accordance with the wish of the employees themselves. As to the second matter, the question is under review, in consultation with the employees.

Mr. Knight: I suggest that the wives and families of those at the bottom of the list on a seniority basis will hardly approve that regulation. I have heard there is some idea on the part of post office officials of changing the nine months' period to one of six months. I do not know whether there is a change of policy in view. The minister may be right when he says that the present system is the choice of the employees themselves, but I cannot conceive of such an arrangement being pleasant to most of them. Personally I do not think that rank or income should have any part in it. As a matter of fact those who enjoy higher incomes should be willing to give up these rights, because they can afford to maintain their wives and families at summer resorts, whereas the poorer employees cannot do so. There should be a system of rotation universally applied. When a senior employee has had his holidays in July, at a time when he can get the most enjoyment out of them, he should then go to the bottom of the list.

Mr. Rinfret: I am informed that the system was organized as a result of the unanimous wish of the employees. The question has to do with consultations we are having with the employees at the present time, and if they wish a change to be made in this connection, the matter certainly will be studied. It does not follow that because a senior member has a priority of choice for his vacation period, he will of necessity choose July or August. He might be a hunter, a fisherman, or a ski enthusiast, and might very well choose times suitable for the enjoyment of such recreations to take his vacation.

Mr. Knight: I suggest that ninety-five per cent of the people living in our climate would choose the summer months if they had a choice in the matter. The minister suggested that this was done as a result of the wish of the employees themselves. Does he mean the employees generally across Canada, or the employees in a particular unit, for instance, Winnipeg, Regina or Saskatoon?

Mr. Rinfret: It was the unanimous wish of all employee associations, and they are Canada-wide in scope.

Mr. Knight: The word "unanimous" means one hundred per cent.

Mr. Rinfret: That is right. Of course we do not know what discussions took place within the associations, but the end result is one hundred per cent representation to us by the associations.

Mr. MacInnis: Following what the hon. member for Saskatoon has said, I should like to say a word on this subject, because I think I know the issue involved. I have been associated with workers who regarded seniority as a very important matter. The hon. member for Saskatoon said he thought that ninety per cent of the employees might want a change made. I would agree with him if as individuals we were always able to look at things from the point of view of the majority. Unfortunately we are so constituted that generally we look at things from our own point of view. For years I was employed by an organization where seniority prevailed, and that seniority meant that some men worked on the day shift and others worked on the night shift. While a man was on the night shift he was always in favour of what we called the swing shift, but the moment he got on days he insisted that seniority should prevail. That is what happens here. The post office employees are organized; they have their associations, and there they determine how these things should be done. I would be reluctant to have the post office authorities make arbitrary decisions in these matters. In my opinion the best thing to do is leave it with the employees.

Mr. Cardiff: We have a new Postmaster General now, and often that means some changes are made. Has the Postmaster General given any further consideration to the extension of rural mail delivery?

Mr. Rinfret: These rural mail routes are being extended every week, almost every day. Applications are received, they are studied by the department, and whenever possible they are granted.

Mr. Church: I forgot to include one question in my remarks. In view of the revenues of the department, is there any hope of going back to the one-cent rate for drop letters for city delivery and the two-cent rate anywhere in the dominion?

Mr. Rinfret: I am afraid the answer would be that there is very little chance.

Mr. Brooks: I wanted to ask the minister a question in connection with rural routes. I understand there is a regulation under which there must be four mail boxes to the mile, and that regulation works great hardship in many country districts. On the one hand you may have fairly populous sections; then there will be other sections in which only a few people live, all covered by the one rural route, which means that the average will not be four boxes to the mile. It seems to me this is an obsolete regulation; it has been in force for a good many years, and I believe the time has come when people in the country districts should have daily mail delivery. In view of the large surplus the post office had last year, amounting to some $10 million, I do not see why this regulation should not be changed and the whole system revised.

While I am on my feet I should like to ask a question in reference to the post office in the village of Rothesay. I mentioned this matter last year. The situation there is almost intolerable. Rothesay is one of the finest villages in the maritime provinces, but it has a post office which would be a disgrace to any country crossroad. There are two large private schools at that point, a boys' school and a girls' school, in addition to a consolidated school; the population of that part of the county is growing rapidly, and I do hope the department will look into the matter. There have been a number of complaints, but nothing has been done as yet. I would ask the minister to give the matter attention.

Mr. Rinfret: As to the first question, increased costs have affected the Post Office Department just as much as they have affected other departments, and the various extensions of service that have been given have quickly diminished our surplus. It is not, as the hon. member said, a surplus of $10 million; it has been diminished to $2 million.

Mr. Brooks: The surplus last year was $10 million.

Mr. Rinfret: Yes, but this year it is only $2 million. If we grant too many extensions we may very well find ourselves in the red next year. As to the second question, I shall study the case of the post office the hon. member has mentioned.

Mr. Higgins: I have three questions to direct to the minister. As he will remember, I have had some correspondence with him in connection with the special stenographic allowance of $5 a month, which affects some 200 stenographers in the Post Office Department. On October 21 he advised me that he was going to discuss the matter with the civil service commission to see if something could be done.

The second question has to do with the carriage of mail by the ships of the C.N.R. around the coast of Newfoundland. I understand the present situation is that the mail is carried by crew members in their off-watch hours, in other words in their free time. Often a man will have to carry a bag of mail on his back for a mile or two, and I do not believe any provision has been made for compensation. Perhaps the minister could tell me whether the matter is being discussed, or what is the position.

The third question has to do with a comparatively minor matter, that is, the post office at Holyrood, as to which the minister will remember we had some correspondence. On November 11 I asked him for some information, but the matter probably slipped his mind. On November 8 he said he would inform me when an appointment was made, and since that time I have learned that an appointment was made on November 1. I was further informed that the appointment was made upon my recommendation, though certainly there was no recommendation of any kind made by me. I do not know how appointments in connection with these small post offices are made generally, but in our province they used to be more or less given to people who needed the little income obtained from operating the post office and supplying the service. In this case, however, I understand the appointment went to the wife of a wealthy merchant in the village of Holyrood, so I would certainly like to keep my skirts clear in that matter.

Mr. Rinfret: As to the special stenographic compensation, that was disallowed or abolished, not only in the Post Office Department but in all departments, under an order in council passed September 21, 1949, effective October 1, 1949. We have made certain representations to the civil service commission in that regard, but up to the present there has been no change in that policy.

As to the second question, I may tell the hon. member that the matter is under active consideration and an answer will be forthcoming in due course.

Mr. Higgins: Then may I say that compensation will be given these crew members?

Mr. Rinfret: I did not say that; I said we were considering the matter.

As to the third question, I am sorry I do not remember the circumstances in connection with the post office at Holyrood, but I shall have it checked and see what can be done.

Mr. Hansell: I want to ask the minister a question with respect to post office accommodation in two localities. I am well aware that the construction of new post office buildings comes under the Minister of Public Works, but I believe that post office accommodation generally is initiated through the Postmaster General. First I should like to ask about post office accommodation at Coleman, Alberta?

During the war years application was made for better post office accommodation. At that time the reason given for not providing such accommodation was that, because of the war, materials were scarce and perhaps skilled labour was unobtainable, and as a result the government were not carrying on any extensive construction. I believe that was a good reason. But within the last few weeks the application has been made again. Perhaps it is a little too soon to ask what progress has been made in that respect. I should be happy to follow up this discussion with documentary memoranda to the minister, but I know that he has been written to by the board of trade, and perhaps others. I understand the process is that application is made to the minister. Perhaps there are inspectors sent from the department, then recommendations are passed on to the Department of Public Works, and, from there on, something is either done or not done. Can the minister indicate what progress has been made in that respect?

While I am on my feet I wish to ask a second question; it is in respect to post office accommodation at Nanton, Alberta. I should like to know what progress is being made there. The minister may have seen a return that was brought down in the house about a month ago in regard to that matter. I am not going to elaborate on it. The return did not show a pleasant picture as to negotiations respecting accommodation over the past few years at Nanton. The final result, however, is that the present postmaster was told to furnish better accommodation. That was the understanding. Does the minister care to say what progress has been made in that regard?

Mr. Rinfret: The first question has to do with the post office at Coleman. The revenue of that office is $15,410 a year. At Nanton it is $9,300. I might tell the hon. member for Macleod that the situation about which he has just spoken is not restricted to those two places; it is general throughout the dominion. The department is greatly concerned about it, because it hampers our operations throughout Canada. There is a big backlog of construction to be undertaken. We have adopted the practice of recommending to the Department of Public Works the construction of buildings in places where the revenue is over $10,000. Among those offices a priority has been established in the public works department. We are pushing the construction of these post offices as much as we possibly can, because every building constructed will help us in our service. Beyond that I do not care to go.

Mr. Hansell: I will say just a further word with respect to the post office at Coleman. The situation is serious. The building is not adequate; it is extremely old, and there are not enough post boxes. While the minister says that the Coleman office has a revenue of around $15,000, the population of Coleman is over 4,000. Application has been made. I will follow it up with a letter to the minister. I wish that he would give every possible consideration to Coleman. With respect to Nanton, I will not ask a question but I will urge the minister to see that the plans that are now ready are speeded up as much as possible.

I have a question on another matter. Will the minister inform the committee what the procedure is with respect to contracts or agreements for the printing of postage stamps? Does that come under the Post Office Department, or under the Department of Finance? I believe there are several engraving companies. What is the procedure? Are tenders asked for? On what basis are contracts let?

Mr. Rinfret: It comes under the Minister of Finance, but we are consulted as to the printing of the stamps. The printing of postage stamps is provided for by contract. The duration of the current agreement with the manufacturer, the Canadian Bank Note Company, is from October 5, 1948 to March 31, 1950.

Mr. Hansell: For the printing of postage stamps they are carried over a period of time?

Mr. Rinfret: That is right—under contract.

Mr. Hansell: How did they get the contract? Did they make a bid? Does the other company also make a bid?

Mr. Rinfret: Public tender.

Mr. Gillis: I did not intend to question the minister about the construction of post offices, but as he himself has referred to the matter, there is a question I should like to ask him. In the public works estimates in the last session of the last parliament the Minister of Public Works had an estimate of $35,000 for a building in the town of Dominion, Nova Scotia, to replace an inadequate building. Replacement of this building has been promised over the last ten years, but nothing has been done. I understand that an official of the department looked over a building that might be purchased. I do not know how true this is, but I have been informed that local patronage skulduggery has prevented the spending of that $35,000 to improve the service there. Does the minister know anything about it?

Mr. Rinfret: The revenue from the Dominion office is $3,854. It is therefore not a project that the Post Office Department will recommend. The building he refers to is probably a public works project. If public works erects a building and offers us some space, of course we will take it, but it is not at the initiative of the Post Office Department that the building is being erected, if there is one being erected.

Mr. Gillis: That is quite right. The public works department did their part. They made the appropriation of $35,000 to build that post office.

Mr. Rinfret: And other things.

Mr. Gillis: If they are to build a post office, the building then belongs to the minister's department. It was to be built exclusively for the purpose of providing his department with adequate facilities in that particular town.

Mr. Rinfret: Was there to be only a post office.

Mr. Gillis: That is right.

Mr. Rinfret: In any event they would keep the title to the property. It does not pass to the Post Office Department.

Mr. Gillis: I do not care who has the title. What I am concerned about is the performance of the service, and why that $35,000 has not been spent for the purpose for which it was intended.

Mr. Rinfret: I am afraid the hon. member will have to ask the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Gillis: I intend to do so.

Mr. Rinfret: In the estimates this year for the town of Dominion there is a vote of $25,000 for a public building, not a post office.

Mr. Gillis: He has cut it down $10,000. You fellows were slow. You should have got that money spent and had this post office building constructed. I had no intention of raising the question with the minister; but when I heard him answer questions asked by the hon. member for Macleod with regard to the construction of buildings, I thought I might as well find out what he knows about this particular case.

Mr. Brooks: How is it that the town of Dominion, in Cape Breton, with a revenue of only $4,000, can get a post office, and the village of Rothesay, with a revenue of twice that amount, cannot get one?

Mr. Rinfret: As I have just said to the hon. member for Cape Breton South, it is not a post office building; it is a public building put up by public works, for some purpose of which I am not aware.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, like many other hon. members I regret that the Postmaster General did not make a statement. It would have saved a great deal of time when we are hurrying to get through his estimates. Had he made a statement he could have given us post office policy, but now we have to dig in and ask a hundred and one questions. However, in his wisdom he did not see fit to make a statement; therefore we shall have to extract from him, by the best means possible, the information we require.

One thing I did not know is that post office revenue had shrunk and that the net profit had dropped from $13 million to about $2 million. I cannot say that that is owing to a reduction in postage rates. A few years ago postal rates were raised 33⅓ per cent. The letter rate was raised from three to four cents, and that increase is still with us. I would not urge that the rate be reduced 33⅓ per cent and put back to where it was before if the money were used to give rural mail couriers a decent living wage.

There are a number of things that I wish to draw to the attention of the Postmaster General. The first is what I understand to be the new policy of the department in calling for tenders in the rural mail districts. I do not know whether I am properly informed, but I understand that before a man can tender on a rural mail route he must have certain equipment—and some of it is expensive—to carry on the work. Is this so? Has the policy changed in that regard?

Mr. Rinfret: Has the hon. member any more questions?

Mr. McLure: Yes, twenty-five more.

Mr. Rinfret: The answer to the first question is that the revenue of the post office has not shrunk as the hon. member for Queens has just asserted. What is true is that we have been giving better service, and that therefore our costs have increased in comparison with the revenue. Our costs having increased, of course our profit is less. We have absorbed the increased costs instead of asking for an increase in postal rates.

So far as rural mail is concerned, there is no new basis. It is true that in certain contracts a certain kind of equipment is required, but that is not new policy. It has always been that way, because we want to be sure that whoever gets the contract is equipped to carry it out.

Mr. McLure: Either the minister is right or I am right, or we are both wrong. I hold in my hand a copy of a mail contract which reads: "Sealed tenders will be addressed . . ." and so on . . . "to the Postmaster General." It goes on and gives a list of the mileage, where to call, and so on. Then there is this vital part: "Any tenders submitted must be with the clear understanding that this service is to be performed by a truck in summer and a snowmobile in the wintertime." That is certainly new policy.

Mr. Rinfret: What is the service to which the hon. member is referring?

Mr. McLure: Rural mail route No. 3, in Queens county, a distance of twenty-one miles. Just imagine asking a man, before he can expect to get a contract, to provide himself with a truck and a snowmobile! It is not possible to buy these vehicles at less than $4,500 or $4,000. The department is asking a man to provide himself with equipment at a cost of $4,000 to tender for a job on which he can get only $1,000 a year for four years, and then he would have to tender over again. It seems to me to be a ridiculous policy. If that is to be the policy, the department will have to provide the mail couriers with this equipment and charge them a rental. How can you expect a mail courier to pay $4,500 for equipment to run a service out of which he gets only $1,000 a year for four years? There is no guarantee of anything. That is driving the rural mail couriers to a pretty hard decision if they are to tender.

There is another thing with reference to tendering that I think is a new policy, and it is this. Suppose a man has had a contract—and I can give the names of a couple of men who have had contracts for from ten years to thirty years and have given the best of service. No civil servants in any part of Canada could give better service than the service that these men have given, and I can mention their names. They have worked all through the years at a salary or indemnity which was not giving them a livelihood. Now they are getting a little older, and what happens? When they ask for a little more for the mail route—and I do not believe anybody else would tender against them—the department says that it is too high in comparison with other mail routes. That is not much of an argument when some of the other mail routes are not paying a living wage. The question then arises, what is the man to do? Instead of the department making some compromise with him, as I think it should do, and give him a chance, it scouts around and finds some veteran who is getting a small pension of $300 or $400 a year, and says to him: You can tender at $300 or $400 less than the regular contract man. I have no objection to veterans getting the contracts, but I do object to a veteran having to use his small pension to tender in opposition to the other man. The Postmaster General should clear up that matter.

I should now like to refer to our own post office in Charlottetown. Prince Edward Island was the ninth province. Now there are ten. It is an island province, and it is entitled to whatever consideration is given to the other provinces of Canada in the way of transportation, postal accommodation or anything else. We are not rated as a province at all.

Under the new set-up the department has put in a regional controller, and that is all right. This regional controller is situated at Moncton. But under the regional controller there is a district director of postal services. One of these is located at Saint John and the other at Halifax. We should have a district director in Charlottetown, where we have a good post office staff. But no; we are attached to New Brunswick. I do not know what Newfoundland is going to be attached to, whether it will be with Nova Scotia or will have its own district director of postal services.

[Mr. McLure.]

I should like to know why our province is not treated properly in this regard. Prince Edward Island should have a district director of postal services. Of late years under this government we have become accustomed to that type of treatment. A year ago it took away from our city the branch of the Bank of Canada. However, we have forced them to the point where they are going to put it back. The government has also placed the headquarters of the Bank of Canada, as it affects Prince Edward Island, in New Brunswick. It has also taken away from us the head of the fruits and vegetables branch, and placed that centre in Saint John, New Brunswick.

I say we should not stand for it any longer. We should be told whether we are to have a district director of postal services in Prince Edward Island, to which we are entitled. Any important postal business in our province must pass through the Charlottetown post office, then to the district director, and then on to the regional controller at Moncton. From there it goes to Ottawa before any decision can be made in any matter of vital importance in connection with our postal service. I hope the Postmaster General will look carefully into this matter with a view to giving us better treatment.

The attention of the Postmaster General has been called to the fact that in the post office at Charlottetown there is a position known as the vendor of postage stamps. It is one worthy of some consideration, especially at the present time. The man who has been in charge of the office for the last forty-nine years, Mr. Aubrey F. Brown, has been one of the best public servants to be found anywhere. He accepted his position under contract on November 13 forty-nine years ago. He is now in his fiftieth year of service. His contract was for the sale of postage stamps, cards and the like, and was made under an agreement with the government of that day.

This man has continued his work without one complaint. His hours are long; I do not know why the authorities have made him work such long hours. Under his contract he must go to work at eight o'clock in the morning and must keep his office open until eight o'clock in the evening, with no time for lunch or dinner. If he leaves for any length of time, or is ill, he must employ and pay for assistance. This is certainly contrary to all the labour laws of this or any other country. He has three days' holidays throughout the year. It would seem that the postal department are endeavouring to get rid of him and to handle postage stamps through the main office, at which point they will have to hire two clerks to do the same work. This will give employment to two people and throw one out of employment.

The procedure of getting rid of this man seems peculiar. His contract calls for two per cent on all sales of postage stamps, cards and the like in that postal area. A few years ago when he applied for a higher rate he was told that he could not have it, because the contract called for only two per cent on all sales. At this time, however, the postal department are putting in meter machines. It may be said that for the businessman these machines are more efficient, but when this man suggested that he should receive his two per cent on the amount handled by the machine, which has reduced his income by over fifty per cent, he was told he could not have it. The postal department take all the revenue and do not allow him the two per cent to which his contract, signed by the postal department, entitles him.

Mr. Lennard: That is not a contract.

Mr. McLure: It was a contract when it was drawn, but it has never been renewed. The contract is broken when they want to relieve him of his job. The desire seems to be to put in two clerks to do the work he has been doing for so long without complaint. After all those years of service, in view of the small wages he was able to make—and it was all on a commission basis of two per cent, with some lean years—he is just able to make a living. He has always had to employ an assistant for an hour at noon and an hour and a half in the evening, and this has taken a considerable portion of his revenue. I hope that some arrangement can be made by which he can be retired on a small pension. It may be said that he is not a civil servant. But there is still no reason why the government should not make some allowance for his service of fifty years. I would ask the Postmaster General and his assistants to take this into consideration so that some satisfactory settlement may be made.

There are other matters I shall discuss later, but with one of them I will deal now. It was suggested to the postmaster general who held office three years ago that a committee be set up to study rural mail problems. The Postmaster General's reply to that, as reported on page 360 of Hansard of February 2, 1947, was as follows:

> I have no objection to having a committee consider this matter in an effort to improve the service.

In the following year, in reply to a question asked by myself, the minister stated, as reported on page 1039 of Hansard of February 10, 1948:

> It is not the intention of the government to establish a committee, but as I said before, a bill will be brought in to give authority to make further supplementary payments.

The Postmaster General might indicate whether at the next session he will set up a committee to study the problem of the rural mail courier. It is a problem that needs consideration.

The hon. member for St. John's East referred to the reduction of $5 a month in stenographers' salaries. According to the Postmaster General that reduction took place right across Canada. I should like to know if the government authorized it.

Mr. Rinfret: Replying to the question relating to rural route No. 3, Queens county, and the matter of necessary equipment, the department does not establish what equipment is required; that is left to the inspector to determine. The department insists that service shall be given under all circumstances, that the mail must be delivered every day. At times the contract requires that snowmobiles be part of the equipment available so that the mail may be delivered without delay.

Mr. McLure: Has the department one contract containing a condition of that kind?

Mr. Rinfret: There are quite a number of contracts in which the notices for tenders required that snowmobiles be provided. It might be that when a man makes his tender he has not a snowmobile, and I can quite understand that he would not purchase one before actually getting a contract. But no one has been prevented from getting a contract provided he can satisfy the department that he can acquire a snowmobile as part of the necessary equipment.

As to the men who have had contracts for ten and thirty years, I am sorry I have not the names. If the hon. member will supply me with the names, I shall have the matter investigated. I might say that as far as contracts are concerned, veterans have no priority. Also the amount of tender is not disclosed.

A complaint is made by the hon. member that there is no director located at Charlottetown. Directors are not appointed for each provincial district. We try to see that the directors are kept busy, and as the director in that part of the country would not have sufficient work from just one province, he is given jurisdiction over more than the one province. It is said that the post office inspector at Charlottetown must go to the director, then to another man and then to Ottawa, but that is not so. The post office inspector at Charlottetown has authority to deal directly with the department if he wishes to do so.

Mr. McLure: What is the need of having a director?

Mr. Rinfret: We have to be kept informed in a general way of what is being done.

With regard to the stamp vendor, Mr. Brown has been a vendor of stamps for the last forty-nine years under a contract. He is not an employee of the government, and therefore we do not regulate the hours he keeps. His contract calls for certain things, and he is the one who is the employer.

Mr. McLure: Who signed the contract?

Mr. Rinfret: It was signed forty-nine years ago. I have not seen it.

Mr. McLure: Whom was it between?

Mr. Rinfret: I have not seen the contract. I do not know.

Mr. Lennard: It is the general contract.

Mr. McLure: Is it a contract between the Post Office Department and the vendor?

Mr. Rinfret: I am informed that actually there is no contract, that he is just allowed to continue as is.

Mr. McLure: I beg leave to say that there is a contract. There was a contract when he got the position, and the Post Office Department must have it somewhere in its archives.

Mr. Rinfret: I am informed that there was a contract, but it has not been renewed, that he is allowed to continue as is. Complaint is made about the remuneration he receives, but there would have to be a change in the legislation to correct that situation. Section 7, paragraph (o) of the Post Office Act reads:

> . . . (o) grant licences to agents other than postmasters, for the sale to the public of postage stamps and stamped envelopes, and allow to such agents a commission not exceeding two per centum of the amount of their sales.

The vending machine to which the hon. member refers was put in to take care of the Christmas rush, and will be taken out in January. As this man is under contract, I do not think the question of pension can be considered for a minute. He is not an employee of the government, and I do not think a pension scheme could be evolved in that connection.

With regard to the reduction in stenographic pay, I have just drawn the attention of the hon. member to order in council 19/4847, passed on September 21, 1949, to be effective October 1. I think about 200 of a total staff in the Post Office Department of about 42,000 were affected.

Mr. McLure: I was under the impression from a letter I received that the civil service commission had ordered this reduction.

Mr. Rinfret: The civil service commission recommended it.

Mr. McLure: It is now established that the government made the reduction. The minister says that according to law they can pay this stamp vendor only two per cent, but I would ask him to note that he is taking away from him fifty per cent of his revenue by the use of the meter machine. Not only is that so in the post office; the larger firms are being induced to put them in. This stamp vendor is entitled to two per cent on the sales indicated by the meter machine.

Mr. Rinfret: The authority given to the Postmaster General is to issue a licence. It is not an exclusive licence; it is a licence for the sale of postage stamps to the public.

Mr. McLure: He had that licence under his contract.

Mr. Fleming: There is one question I should like to ask the minister about rural mail boxes. As I understand it, at the present time they are purchased by the department from one source and are sold to or put at the disposal of persons on rural mail routes. I am also informed that the department does not permit persons on rural mail routes to have other mail boxes, or to purchase boxes from other sources, even though other boxes may comply in all respects with the specifications followed in the case of boxes furnished by the department. I should like to ask the minister whether this monopolistic arrangement prevails, and, if so, why persons on rural mail routes should not be at liberty to purchase boxes for their own use from any source they choose, provided that they comply with the specifications that apply to boxes furnished through the department.

I am told that this rigidity on the part of the department prevents people from having anything more ornamental in the way of a mail box, and that highway authorities in Ontario, in the case of some of the new improved highways, have felt that the boxes in use, furnished by the department, are not very ornamental. May I ask the minister for a statement on this matter?

Mr. Rinfret: The hon. member for Eglinton has given only one side of the case; we must also look at the other side. People could put up all sorts of makeshift boxes.

Mr. Fleming: I expressly said that whatever is done must, of course, comply with the specifications of the department in relation to the box. All I am saying is that when anyone is prepared to comply with the specifications of the department in the case of his own box, there should not be any requirement that the boxes must all come from one particular source.

Mr. Rinfret: I am informed that the complaints about the boxes really resolved themselves into suggestions regarding the supports. Certain gentlemen visited the office yesterday, and an arrangement is being worked out so that it will be taken care of.

Mr. Fleming: Am I to conclude then, that so far as the department is concerned there is nothing to prevent someone else from supplying mail boxes to persons on rural routes, provided that they comply with the specifications laid down by the department as to the type of mail box that is now in use?

Mr. Rinfret: We cannot possibly do that. There must be uniformity in the boxes throughout, and if we allow an exception in one direction we will have to authorize it in the other direction. We want our boxes to be uniform, and not makeshift. One way or the other it is the same thing.

Mr. Fleming: Does that mean the boxes must all be purchased from the same source?

Mr. Rinfret: The answer is yes.

Mr. Fleming: That is a monopolistic arrangement.

Mr. Rinfret: The post office is probably the biggest monopoly in Canada.

Mr. Lennard: If that is so, in my own district I have seen about half a dozen different sizes and types of boxes that have been provided by the department.

Mr. Rinfret: In different years.

Mr. Lennard: There is nothing uniform about them at all.

Mr. Rinfret: We are not going to ask people to change their boxes every time there is a change in the type. At the present time we have a new type of box which I believe will hold twice as much as the old one. We are not going to force all the users of boxes to change the ones they have already purchased.

Mr. MacInnis: Following the question about a monopoly in the making of the boxes by one particular firm, will the Postmaster General tell the committee whether the price that the resident pays for the box is also stipulated?

Mr. Rinfret: The answer is yes. There is no monopoly, because it is under contract, and before the contract is let, tenders are called for. The contract awarded is to the lowest tenderer.

Mr. Major: What is the normal price charged for these boxes?

Mr. Rinfret: Four dollars.

Mr. Major: Would that price compete with anything people could make themselves?

Mr. Rinfret: If a person made one box I imagine it would cost much more than the department would pay per box for the manufacture of thousands.

Mr. Knight: This is the time of year when a good many people are sending food parcels overseas, chiefly to Great Britain. I am well aware there is a special rate on such parcels. In the first place, I should like to ask what the difference is between the rates applying to recognized Christmas food parcels and that applying to ordinary parcels?

Mr. Rinfret: The rates are as follows: Up to and including five pounds, 50 cents; up to and including ten pounds, $1; up to and including fifteen pounds, $1.50; up to and including twenty pounds, $2.

Mr. Knight: My question concerned a comparison.

Mr. Rinfret: It is fifty cents less than the regular rate.

Mr. Knight: Perhaps that will help to console the man in the street, but sometimes he does not realize he is getting a special rate on these parcels. The point to which I want to draw the Postmaster General's attention is that the rates for such food parcels are set in five-pound divisions. For instance, I mailed a package the other day which I estimated to weigh about five pounds. Unfortunately it was five pounds five ounces, and therefore I had to pay the ten-pound rate for what was virtually a five-pound parcel. As I say, the man in the street does not appreciate that, and perhaps does not appreciate he is getting a cheaper rate on that particular type of parcel.

Is the five-pound idea merely a convenient figure to divide or multiply by? Was it chosen for that reason, or is there another reason why five-pound divisions were selected? I would not mind so much paying a rate for six pounds on a five pounds-five ounces parcel, but it seems to me it is too much to pay double for a small parcel. Could the divisions not be in single pounds rather than five pounds? If one has a parcel that is an ounce or two over fifteen pounds, he pays the twenty-pound rate. Possibly the cheaper rate justifies that, and possibly not; but the people who are sending these parcels would much rather put the money expended on postage for the extra five pounds into additional food than give it to the department for not doing any work.

Mr. Rinfret: These rates have been fixed in agreement with the British authorities. As to fixing another limit for the packages, let us take six pounds; the same thing will still happen if somebody has a package weighing six pounds one ounce. We will be in the same position. We have to fix a certain poundage and not go beyond it, because there would be no use in setting a limit of five pounds if we were to accept five and a half pounds or even five pounds one ounce. We have to fix a limit, and that limit has been set at five pounds, ten pounds, fifteen pounds and twenty pounds.

Mr. Knight: I was wondering why it had been fixed at five. Why not four, or six, or three?

Mr. Rinfret: That is the arrangement we have with Britain.

Mr. Knight: My own suggestion is that one pound would cover it.

Mr. Shaw: An examination of the Post Office Department balance sheet indicates that in the past year it repeated its performance of previous years—that is, it piled up a considerable profit. In considering these profits we cannot be unmindful of the fact that the public works department bears a substantial burden so far as capital costs are concerned. The minister has not occupied his present office for very long, but I am sure that, like those who have preceded him as Postmaster General, he will be anxious to do everything possible to endear himself to the Canadian people. If he wishes to accomplish that purpose I suggest that a most effective way of doing so would be to recommend to the Minister of Finance, before the next session of parliament, that the four-cent postage rate be reduced by one cent. After all, that rate was increased during the war, and the minister might advise the Minister of Finance that the war has been over for some years. I am quite sure that if before the next session of parliament comes around the regular postage rate is reduced from four cents to three cents, it will meet with the general approval of the people.

Mr. Lennard: I want to ask the Postmaster General one or two questions in connection with alterations to public buildings in which post offices are located, referring particularly to a public building in my own constituency. Has the Post Office Department any planning experts who advise the Department of Public Works when these alterations are being made?

Mr. Rinfret: The department has an engineer, but unfortunately he also is very hard pressed at the present time.

Mr. Lennard: I ask that question because in the town of Dundas the government is spending between $30,000 and $40,000 on alterations to the public building in order to meet the needs of the Post Office Department. That is a two or three storey building, the second floor of which has been occupied for the past several years by the Veterans Land Act administration for that district. Now the post office needs more space, and that is why the alterations are being made. In the meantime I find that the Veterans Land Act administration is moving to Hamilton, and that the building in Dundas will revert to the condition it has been in for the last twenty-five years—that is, only half used.

There are several matters in connection with these alterations that I could mention, but the point is that the only steps necessary to make that additional space available to the post office would have been the installation of an elevator. Then the second floor of that building would have given all the space needed, and the people of Canada would have been saved more than $30,000. This is one project I feel was not fully considered, and in connection with which the planning was not properly done. Even after these alterations are carried out, the premises will be very unhandy from the point of view of the staff, and it seems to me if the postmaster had been consulted he could have offered suggestions which would have made these alterations much more satisfactory from the standpoint of both the staff and the public.

Mr. Rinfret: I shall bring that matter to the attention of our engineer and of my colleague the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Catherwood: What population must a town have before postal delivery service can be inaugurated?

Mr. Rinfret: It is not a question of the population of a city; it is a question of how many people are to be served. Two thousand points of call are usually required, provided that conditions for delivery are satisfactory and other requirements are met.

Mr. Catherwood: Then it is not on a population basis?

Mr. Rinfret: No, it is not; it is the points of call.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): We are now considering item No. 307, dealing with departmental costs and so on. I want to put on record in a few words a request on behalf of a community in the eastern part of Toronto which is not serviced by a post office as such, but where the department is renting sub-offices. In that fast growing section, which now has a population of about 200,000, we require adequate postal facilities. I do not expect the minister to give me a reply now, but I am asking the department to give that community the same consideration that was given west Toronto, where a public building was established on Keele street. I am not asking for this just because west Toronto was given that consideration, but because these facilities are needed in east Toronto.

I am asking the departmental officials if they will make a study of the situation in that community, which in the last quarter of a century has increased in population from 10,000 or 15,000 to well over 200,000, and to get together with the Minister of Public Works to see if those people cannot be given a dominion public building to provide accommodation for the Post Office Department and other departments of government such as customs, excise, immigration and so on. At the present time if an individual or business firm wants to clear post office parcels or to bring anything through customs, it is necessary to go almost ten miles down into the busy heart of the city of Toronto, clogging traffic and taking all day to do a chore which might be done in an hour if the facilities were available in that community. In the last two years we have had more than a hundred new factories in the area of which I speak, and about which the officials will know; and it is developing rapidly for the reason that industries have no other place to go; they must come to the eastern section of the city.

Without a long petition, which I could easily obtain, without bombarding the Post Office Department and the Department of Public Works with letters, I am making this request. All that is necessary, I think, is that a little common sense, good judgment and co-operation be shown by the officials of these two departments to see that this community, which is a city in itself, gets the facilities necessary if it is to conduct its business in a proper way.

Mr. Rinfret: As usual we shall use our best judgment.

Item agreed to.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

308. Post offices, including salaries and other expenses of headquarters and staff post offices and supplies and equipment for revenue post offices, $37,804,896.

Mr. MacInnis: There is a matter that I was going to bring up on the first item, but the minister told me that this was the proper one. I understand that the department has adopted a new system with regard to letter carriers in the matter of their transportation when engaged in the delivery of mail. My understanding is that formerly letter carriers travelled free on streetcars, or at least that they did not have to pay fare while in uniform. They are now required to pay fare when they travel on streetcars in the course of the performance of their duties.

I should like to point out that the letter carrier is not in the position of an ordinary passenger. In the first place, he has his load of mail. He may have to use the streetcar several times a day in the course of his work. I was a streetcar conductor for many years, and I know that under those circumstances letter carriers had their transportation taken care of. I should like to have the assurance of the Postmaster General that this matter, whether it has been decided or not, will be reconsidered. At this time of the year when a person is expecting a Christmas box but receives one in reverse, it is not cricket, as the English would say. It may seem a small thing to us, but I assure the minister that it is not a small thing to the letter carrier. I should like to have the assurance of the Postmaster General that he will reconsider the matter.

Mr. Rinfret: For some time the letter carriers have been getting free transportation while in uniform. The contracts were to the effect that the letter carriers would be allowed transportation from the post office to the beginning of their routes and from the end of their routes back to the post office. It never was the intention to include in those contracts travel between their places of residence and the post office. There is no special reason why they should be given a privilege which is not enjoyed by other employees who have to pay their fare from their homes to work and from work to their homes.

At the present time we are considering the various contracts relating to city transportation. In Ottawa we inaugurated a system of tickets. We are looking at the rates in the various other cities, because we are now faced with a demand by the transportation companies for increases in the current amounts of the contracts. In Montreal, for instance, the demand is for an increase of 33⅓ per cent. We are considering those contracts at the present time. We have not yet made any final decision.

Mr. MacInnis: I wonder whether I understood the Postmaster General aright. Instead of travelling free when in uniform, the letter carriers now get tickets that will take them from their homes to the post office and from the post office to their homes?

Mr. Rinfret: No. They have no ticket when travelling from their homes to the post office, but they are entitled to a ticket from the post office to the beginning of their routes or from the end of their routes back to the post office, or back to their homes if the distance between the end of their routes and their homes is greater by at least five hundred yards than the distance from their home to the post office.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Can the minister give us a progress report as to what is happening to the suggested new post office in Winnipeg?

Mr. Rinfret: I am told that the plans are in process of being completed by our department, and should be turned over to the public works department in a matter of days.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Have there been any complaints from the owners of properties that were expropriated? Have all the dealings been on an amicable basis, or have there been complaints?

Mr. Rinfret: To our knowledge there have been no complaints.

Mr. McIvor: It is a well-known fact that if a man serves in the House of Commons for fifteen, twenty, twenty-five or thirty years and then does not wish to go to the Senate, or does not have an opportunity to do so, when he is no longer a member of the house he is out of all the things that went to make him an efficient member. A corporation will give a pension. Civil servants get a pension. But a member of parliament will get nothing but bumps. I suggest to the Postmaster General that if a man serves twenty-five or more years in the house he should at least have his franking privilege, whether he is a former private member or former prime minister. I would ask the Postmaster General to consider this request. I think the member of parliament has earned it. I do not doubt that some of these men today get letters with no stamps on them, and are obliged to pay double postage.

Mr. Noseworthy: While we are on this item, can the minister tell me just what constitutes need for a post office in a district?

Mr. Rinfret: What does the hon. member mean by "need"?

Mr. Noseworthy: How badly does a district or a municipality have to be in need of a post office before it gets one? I am thinking now of a postal station, not just a sub-office.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. Rinfret: Does the hon. member mean a post office building?

Mr. Noseworthy: Yes.

Mr. Rinfret: The Post Office Department of course considers the needs of the various municipalities concerned. It is concerned also with the size of the municipality, and the revenue. Where the post office has a revenue of less than $3,000, it is up to the postmaster himself to supply the necessary premises. With regard to post offices with revenue of $3,000 up to $10,000, it is the public works department which usually arranges for locations, by way of lease, after conferring with our officials as to suitability of location. With regard to offices with more than $10,000 revenue, it is the principle of the department that post office buildings should be built, and recommendations to that effect are made to the public works department. As I explained this morning, there is a big backlog in this respect, owing to scarcity of materials, etc. We have had to establish some sort of priority with regard to these. We are pushing the public works department to erect these buildings, because we realize that in order to give good service we must have good buildings.

Mr. Noseworthy: Is it the officials of the Post Office Department who determine whether there is a genuine need for a post office building?

Mr. Rinfret: The inspector usually makes the report.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I have been asked by some of the members from Quebec and Ontario to raise a question with regard to franking. It has no particular application to the members who live a considerable distance from Ottawa, but rather to members from Ontario and Quebec who are frequently in the city on government business and have communications to send from the parliament buildings. I understand that the franking privilege ends ten days after the session ends. Some of these members request that the franking privilege be extended so that when they are in Ottawa on business they may frank their letters from the buildings here. I appreciate the fact that there might be an abuse of the privilege, but I am asking that the minister give the matter his consideration.

Mr. Rinfret: The suggestion certainly has merit, but we would have to amend the act. Section 43 of the act respecting postal service, in dealing with the frank, says:

> . . . letters and other mailable matter addressed to or by any member of either house at the seat of government, during any session of parliament, or to any of the members at the seat of government as aforesaid, during the ten days next before the meeting of parliament, shall be free of Canada postage.

Therefore the law itself would have to be amended.

Mr. Hatfield: I should like to refer to a request for a post office in my constituency. The former postmaster general promised to give it priority. A contract was called for this post office in 1939. The contract was let, but on account of the war construction was stopped. A piece of land was secured in 1939. When the contract was stopped the people in that district were promised that as soon as the war ended a post office would be erected. At that time the revenue was some $3,593. Today the revenue is beyond $9,000. The place is Plaster Rock, New Brunswick, a large lumbering and agricultural centre. In 1939 they had a large building. Today they have moved out of that building into a small building. The postmaster has only a small building in which to work. It is not becoming to the town. Since the revenues of this office have increased I hope that it will receive attention soon.

Mr. Rinfret: I shall be pleased to look into the matter.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I have not very much to say except commendation of the Post Office Department. So far as the public are concerned in my constituency they have been getting, on the whole, good service. The matter of how many boxes to the mile entitle a community to a rural mail service was brought up this morning. In my constituency there is one locality that had a rural route in previous years. The operation for over a mile in that district was discontinued. Justification for its discontinuance, as explained to me, was that instead of having four boxholders it had only three to the mile. I think it is desirable that the three boxholders should be served. Those who have been boxholders in the past should not be denied the privilege of a rural mail delivery.

Today we are at some disadvantage in discussing these estimates because we have not the last report from the department. I was able to get only the annual report for the year ended March 31, 1948, which is a year and nine months ago. Why should we not have the report for the year ending March 31, 1949?

The minister has stated the conditions under which post office buildings are erected. There is one locality in my constituency, namely, Pugwash, a seaboard town, the annual revenue of which must be practically up to the $10,000 minimum requirement. In any event, that community should be provided with a post office building. The building they have is not adequate to serve the requirements. I am sure there are many communities that have post office buildings where the revenue is much less than in the town of Pugwash.

Our service has been kept fairly free of political influence. I have had few complaints. That is a good thing for the service and a good thing for the department, and the public appreciate it. Where we do get complaints of political interference with the service and with appointments it has a bad effect all round. I believe it should be the policy of the department to keep it free from such influence. I have brought one instance to the attention of the minister. I shall not refer to it here. If the circumstances are as represented to me the department should take steps to correct this interference.

One of the complaints I have had in my constituency in recent years is the unfairness of the department in granting bonuses. Some mail couriers who made application for bonuses and pressed their claims were granted these bonuses or subsidies. Other couriers who felt that it was their duty to carry out their contracts, in accordance with the terms under which they tendered, did not know that increases were being paid and did not press for additional allowances. They continued to carry out their contracts at very small remuneration, while others received these bonuses. I consider that very unfair. Every person carrying on a service under the same conditions should have an equal chance to get these additional amounts which were granted during the war. I do not believe these bonuses are being renewed at the present time. That is one of the serious complaints I have had in my constituency. The department has shown great unfairness and discrimination to persons who got these increases.

Mr. Rinfret: The authority for the bonus was abolished on March 31, 1949. I thank the hon. member for his suggestion as to the reduction in the number of people holding boxes per mile. We are always eager to improve the service and we shall certainly study his suggestion. I accept with pleasure and thanks the hon. member's praise.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw the attention of the Postmaster General to a petition, which I received in August before I left St. John's, from two small settlements near a post office in Trepassey. The two places are Daniel's Point and Small Point. When I received those petitions I got in touch with the district inspector, and he told me I would hear about it when I got to Ottawa. Well, I have been here three months and I have not heard anything about it. I wrote to the Postmaster General a day or so ago. I wonder whether he is in a position to tell me if it has been decided or not.

In support of the request I may say that between 1931 and 1933 we had a depression in Newfoundland also, and we cut out a lot of post offices, cut down the service greatly. Now times are better and business is better, and there is a lot more mail coming. These two settlements are from four to six miles in from the main post office, and the practice is to send children across in dories to the post office. If they have to walk, they must go a distance of five or six miles each way to bring the mail back.

Mr. Rinfret: I have not seen the letter to which the hon. member refers. I shall certainly give it my best attention.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I put in a petition.

Mr. Rinfret: The hon. member referred to a letter sent to me, which I have not yet seen.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Just a couple of days ago.

Mr. Rinfret: I have not seen it yet.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Why have we not the report of this department for the past year? It is about twenty-one months since the last report.

Mr. Rinfret: I am informed this is due to delay in printing, which is brought about by the heavy business of the session.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The committee should have in its hands a report as important as this one before we have to deal with the estimates of the Post Office Department or any other department. It is most unfair to the members.

Mr. Rinfret: And to the minister, too. He has not got it either.

Mr. Noseworthy: Have any of the minister's officials looked into the need for a post office in Forest Hill and York township? A request was sent to the postal authorities about three years ago, at which time we were informed of the shortage of materials. That request has been renewed by some of the councils. There is a community of around 100,000 people. The post office nearest to some of these people is at least seven or eight miles away. I am informed that there is difficulty in mailing parcels or securing money orders for people outside Canada. In most instances the residents have to go to the postal station for that service.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

I have received a good deal of criticism concerning some of the substations tucked away in little corners of drugstores and grocery stores. I have been in some where a person who goes for mail is the last person to receive attention. Those who are making purchases are served first. I wonder if any of the departmental officials have looked into that situation in York township and Forest Hill?

Mr. Rinfret: A delegation was received recently and we are now studying their recommendations.

Mr. Charlton: The minister has said there are 25,000 temporary employees taken on for the Christmas rush. The estimates disclose an expenditure of almost $10,250,000 for temporary assistance. How many of those temporary employees are on a full yearly basis?

Mr. Rinfret: In this department on March 31, 1949, the number was 4,535 temporary employees on a yearly basis.

Mr. Charlton: Why are so many of these temporary employees kept on so long on a temporary basis?

Mr. Rinfret: I am informed the chief reasons are, first, the question of the quota per post office and, secondly, that certain people are not yet qualified through examination of the civil service. There are also other people acting as replacements for those on vacation, and matters of that kind. The two first named reasons are the chief ones.

Mr. Knowles: May I impress upon the Postmaster General the claim for a postal station in the Weston and Brooklands area of Winnipeg. I have had correspondence with him concerning this proposal, and would refer particularly to his letter to me of October 19. The information contained in that letter, bearing in mind what he said a few moments ago, strengthens my plea for consideration of this proposal.

As I understood the minister, an area in which a sub-office has a revenue of $3,000 to $10,000 a year merits a certain status, whereas once the revenue is greater than $10,000 a year consideration is given to the building of a post office building. The minister's letter to me of October 19 indicated that the revenue of the Dickens sub-office is approximately $9,000 per year, and that of sub-office No. 18 approximately $9,500 per year. Both those sub-offices are on Logan avenue, one at the corner of Keewatin street and the other at the corner of Quelch street, a very few blocks apart. They are in the same area about which I am speaking.

Their total revenue is $18,500 per year, according to the minister's letter to me of October 19. That seems to be considerably in excess of the $10,000 figure the minister mentioned a little while ago. His letter also confirmed what I had said to him, that there is a population of over 9,000 people in this area of Weston and Brooklands. It is true that there is a letter carrier service, but in a sense the area is separated from the other parts of Winnipeg.

I have received complaints similar to those mentioned a moment ago by the hon. member for York South. It has been pointed out that while there are these two substations in the area, one of which is in a drugstore—I am not sure of the location of the other one—there is a tendency for the customers of the store to receive attention before those persons who come in to buy postage stamps or to mail parcels. It has been suggested to me that it is time this community had a post office building. I would ask for any comments the Postmaster General would care to make, and I would hope that this matter might be kept under consideration by him until something is done about it.

Mr. Rinfret: What I said before applied to rural areas. There has to be a distinction between rural and urban areas, because if we were to build small post offices in cities where substations have revenues of more than $10,000 we would find that we would have post offices almost every mile. My earlier remarks were applicable to rural districts.

Item agreed to.

310. Railway mail service, $15,614,667.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Has any figure been set as a payment to the Canadian National Railways for carrying the mail from Port aux Basques to North Sydney?

Mr. Rinfret: No, the matter is under consideration.

Item agreed to.

311. Air and land mail services, $22,743,141.

Mr. Charlton: I have here a resolution, a copy of which was sent to the minister under date of November 22. I have not heard from the minister and I just wanted to make sure that he has the resolution and that the matter will be considered. The hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff) brought up this matter this morning. This resolution was passed by the Oxford county council which sent it on to the Brant county council, who in turn forwarded it to me:

Whereas, many farmers and individuals in the rural areas are not properly served by the rural mail couriers,

We, the council of the county of Oxford, hereby petition the Postmaster General to extend routes of the rural mail courier, so that mail may be delivered on every township road, county road and highway on which a person is residing.

Mr. Rinfret: I have received the resolution and the matter is under consideration.

Mr. Charlton: Has a decision been arrived at?

Mr. Rinfret: I am still considering it.

Mr. Noseworthy: It has come to my attention that the postal rates on parcels from Canada to Europe are just about twice what they are on parcels from the United States and I should like to know if there is an explanation for this?

Mr. Rinfret: I am informed that the transportation charges in the United States are paid by the recovery plan and we have no such plan here.

Mr. McLure: What are the regulations governing the keeping of mail overnight by a rural mail courier?

Mr. Rinfret: They are not supposed to do that.

Mr. McLure: There are points in Prince Edward Island where the mail is dropped off the train at seven, half past eight or even half past ten o'clock at night. The rural mail courier is not obliged to deliver that mail at that hour and I should like to know what understanding there is with regard to the mail courier keeping that mail overnight?

Mr. Rinfret: In principle we are against the practice, but no one is supposed to do the impossible. The mail is under lock and is well protected and I think that provides all the guarantee we can ask.

Mr. McLure: I take it from the Postmaster General's answer that under certain conditions it is quite in order for a mail courier to keep the mail overnight. The rural mail carriers working out of Charlottetown must sort the mail for their own routes. When they come into the post office in the morning they have to look up a stable for their horses and it takes at least an hour and a half to sort the mail for their particular routes. There are only five mail routes out of that post office and if one or two clerks were put on the sorting of the mail for a couple of hours in the morning it would save the courier that much time and he could make his deliveries that much earlier. It is a pitiful sight to see seven or eight horses standing in the cold wintry weather instead of being out on the mail route.

Mr. Rinfret: I am afraid the same situation exists throughout Canada. If we were to provide this supplementary service we would have to have 12,000 more men to do the work. That has always been and still is considered part of the work of the contractor.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Chairman, I am sure we are all glad to see the new Postmaster General putting through his estimates and I feel certain he is going to do a good job. I have wondered what is the fundamental philosophy of the Post Office Department? Is it a profit-making organization or is it a service organization for the people of Canada? I think it is important that that fundamental philosophy should be established. We have all been proud of the fact that this department operates at a profit, although I am sure the Postmaster General knows that that is not really true.

In connection with this air mail service I find the Post Office Department very loath at times to provide this type of service. They admit that there are places that should have air mail service but they consider it too expensive. Could there not be some co-ordination between the Department of Transport and the Post Office Department, each of which has a certain responsibility in connection with the transporting of passengers and mail.

The town of Courtenay in my riding is on a scheduled air line. Air mail service to this place has been requested but the answer has been that the department cannot afford it. It is difficult to sell the Canadian people the idea of using slow trains when a regular scheduled air service is available. If a letter is mailed at Courtenay at eleven o'clock in the morning it does not arrive at Vancouver until ten o'clock the next morning, almost 24 hours later. It could go by plane at five o'clock, arrive at Vancouver at six o'clock and make connections with the eastbound mail the same evening.

The people in that area are quite prepared to pay the seven cent air mail rate. I should like to see the department put in an air mail service on a three-months trial to see if the extra revenue would not compensate the department for the increased expense involved. I would appreciate it greatly if the minister and his officials would give this matter their consideration.

Mr. Rinfret: As far as the first part of the hon. member's question is concerned, this department is one of service, but due regard must always be had to the pockets of the taxpayers. As to the second question, last year we spent $8,213,000 on air mail service, but if we can give improved service there we shall certainly attempt to do so.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): How much of that went to T.C.A.?

[Mr. Rinfret.]

Mr. Rinfret: $6,500,000.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): The great bulk of it went to T.C.A.?

Mr. Rinfret: Yes.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): So it was just a transfer of government funds?

Mr. Rinfret: That is right.

Mr. Coldwell: If I am on the wrong item I hope you will excuse me for a moment. I know this matter concerns the Department of Public Works more than the Postmaster General. Some years ago a site was purchased for a post office in the town of Biggar, Saskatchewan, and an item was put in the estimates of the Department of Public Works to construct a building. It is a project that should be considered because Biggar is an important divisional point on the Canadian National Railways, a town with a population of over 2,000 and a large adjacent territory which the post office serves. I believe the revenue would warrant it. All I am asking is that the Postmaster General co-operate as much as possible with the Minister of Public Works for the erection of a proper building.

Mr. Rinfret: With pleasure.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Department and missions abroad—
51. Departmental administration, $2,170,510.

The Deputy Chairman: As the committee knows, the estimates of this department were carefully studied in the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I rise on a question of privilege. I said yesterday, at page 2587 of Hansard, that the film board had sold 1,733 prints, which did not appear to me to be terribly severe competition so far as the professional photographers association was concerned. The hon. member for Peterborough West attempted to correct me, and pointed out that up to September 30 of this year 57,755 prints were sold. The misunderstanding arose through my not making it clear that the 1,733 prints had been sold at commercial rates to whoever solicited them. From January 1 to September 30, 1949, as the hon. member for Peterborough West said, 57,755 prints were sold. Of this number 1,733 prints were sold at commercial rates to whoever wanted them, and the balance were sold to government departments.

Mr. Fleming: I also rise on a question of privilege. At page 2837 of Hansard I am reported as saying "quite true" after you, Mr.

Chairman, had made certain remarks. The first part of your remarks had some reference to item 934, and then you added this sentence:

He is reported to the extent of about half a page on television as it appears in Hansard of yesterday.

You were referring to me, Mr. Chairman. After that remark I am reported in Hansard as saying "quite true". My remark applied only to your last sentence, namely, that I had spoken to the extent of about half a page on television. It does not apply to your previous remark about its having a bearing on item 934.

The Deputy Chairman: I have listened to the two questions of privilege raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North and the hon. member for Eglinton. I should like to refer them to citations 192 and 193 of Beauchesne, third edition.

Mr. Fleming: As you have said, Mr. Chairman, these estimates were carefully reviewed in the standing committee on external affairs, and I am sure there is no disposition on the part of anyone to go over the same ground that was covered there. Nevertheless, as that was done a matter of several weeks ago and events have been moving pretty swiftly in certain quarters, I wonder if the minister has any further information to give the house concerning any of these matters, particularly with reference to the Far East.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is very much I can add on the general international situation to the statement I made in the house a few weeks ago. On the particular point raised by my hon. friend, conditions in the Far East, there have not been any developments of which I am aware that have altered the situation, and our attitude towards it. As to the question of the recognition of another government in China, I do not think I would have anything to add at this time to what I have said previously. If there are any other specific points which are of particular interest to the hon. member, I shall be glad to deal with them, but in general there is nothing I would care to add to what I said a few weeks ago.

Item agreed to.

53. Representation abroad—including payment of salaries of high commissioners, ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, consuls, secretaries and staff appointed as directed by the governor general in council, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or any of its amendments, $5,172,363.

Mr. McLure: What is the total number of commissioners, ambassadors, plenipotentiaries and consuls, and how many different countries do they cover?

Mr. Pearson: The total staff of the department situated abroad is 635, and that includes Canadian representation in forty-four offices in thirty-four countries. Of that total number there are fourteen ambassadors, six ministers, six high commissioners, one head of a military mission—that is in Germany—three consuls general, 69 foreign service officers of the seven grades, four consular officers; and administrative officers and subordinate staff make up the remainder.

Mr. McLure: Would that include trade commissioners as well?

Mr. Pearson: No, trade commissioners would come under the Department of Trade and Commerce, and would be in addition to the number I have mentioned.

Mr. McLure: How are these commissioners and ambassadors selected; by the civil service commission or are they straight government appointments?

Mr. Pearson: The heads of missions, whether they are ambassadors, ministers or high commissioners, are government appointments. Foreign service officers in our missions abroad are all appointed after competitive examination through the civil service commission.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Is there any policy outlined for the employment of young Canadians at these offices abroad? I mean as typists, filing clerks, and so on. Our young people should be trained in this particular field of service rather than employing personnel in the places where the offices are located.

Mr. Pearson: We employ Canadians in clerical, administrative and stenographic work in our offices abroad. We recruit them through the civil service commission, and train them in the department for service abroad. Subordinate appointments abroad are sometimes filled by local recruitment, but in general the stenographic, clerical and administrative staffs are recruited in Canada for service abroad and trained for that purpose.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Would the minister consider employing only Canadian-born people in these offices?

Mr. Pearson: We try to do that, but for appointment to very subordinate positions, such as messengers and so on, we do not think it would be economically desirable to send people from Canada. Any position involving any degree of responsibility, however, should be and is filled by a Canadian official.

60. Grant to United Nations Society in Canada, $5,000.

Mr. Fleming: The standing committee on external affairs adopted a resolution recommending that the government give consideration to increasing this amount, presumably in next year's estimates. I would ask the minister if he will give consideration to that recommendation.

Mr. Pearson: I shall be happy to give consideration to that recommendation by the committee.

Mr. Coldwell: I should like to support that request by saying that all of us who are interested in the United Nations organization would be grateful if that could be considered. Are we also considering item 779 of the supplementaries?

The Deputy Chairman: For the sake of order perhaps we should dispose of item No. 60, which covers a grant to the United Nations Society in Canada. The item to which the hon. member refers deals with the international children's emergency fund, and we shall come to that later.

General—The Canadian government assessment for membership in the following international or commonwealth organizations.

61. United Nations, $1,335,000.

Mr. Green: Press dispatches of yesterday, December 7, indicate that there was a vote in the United Nations concerning Southwest Africa. As I read the dispatches, a resolution was put through asking the international court of justice to rule on the status of Southwest Africa. That resolution was bitterly opposed by South Africa but was carried; and I believe Canada supported the motion. There may have been good reasons for that action on Canada's part, but the minister should explain them to the committee. South Africa is a sister nation in the commonwealth. Over a period of years she has been severely criticized by some nations which really have not much right to criticize, because they do not deal with their own problems any better than South Africa has dealt with hers; and I believe some nations at least have been very unfair in the attitude they have adopted toward our sister nation. South Africa is facing a very difficult problem in Southwest Africa, and it is all too easy for these other nations to throw bricks at her.

Personally I rather regret that Canada joined with the other nations in voting against South Africa on a question of this kind, which must make things very awkward for that country. One has only to think back to the meeting in San Francisco, where Field Marshal Smuts was one of the key men in bringing about the organization of the United Nations. If it had not been for his wise leadership perhaps there would have been no United Nations organization. In other years he has been attacked personally before that assembly; and now, this week, we have this further attack on South Africa in which Canada joined with these other countries. I should like the minister to give us some explanation.

Mr. Pearson: I think there is some misunderstanding in the mind of the hon. gentleman as to what we actually did, that is what the Canadian delegation did at Lake Success, on this matter. We have had close and very friendly co-operation with the South African delegation at the assembly. As the committee is aware, that delegation was under attack because of certain alleged inadequacies in its policies with regard to Southwest Africa.

We did not support certain efforts made by other delegations to impose obligations upon the Union of South Africa in respect of this territory which we thought she was not obliged to accept under the charter, but there was some doubt whether the obligation of supplying information to the United Nations on behalf of that territory rested with South Africa, and we supported a resolution to refer that and related matters to the international court to obtain a legal opinion as to whether South Africa was under an obligation to submit that information to the United Nations. That is all we did in that regard, and in the circumstances I do not think the South African delegation would quarrel with our attitude on that resolution.

Mr. Green: Then the press dispatch is wrong. According to it there were two votes. The first was on a motion to have the international court of justice rule on the status of Southwest Africa, and the report says Canada voted for that motion. Then apparently there was another vote concerning this matter of submitting information to the United Nations, and the report indicates that Canada abstained from voting on the second motion. Is the newspaper report correct?

Mr. Pearson: I have not seen the newspaper report, nor as yet have I seen the official report from our delegation, which will probably arrive today. We did vote for a resolution to submit to the international court the question of South Africa's obligations in respect of Southwest Africa, whether it is or is not analogous to a trust territory. All we wanted to do by that vote was to have this question cleared up by a legal opinion. We may have abstained on the other question, as to whether South Africa should or should not supply the United Nations with certain information; but if we did abstain, as I see it, that would not necessarily mean a judgment on South Africa's policy. One reason we may have abstained in regard to whether South Africa should or should not supply certain information would be that we felt it might be undesirable to take a definite position in that regard until we knew what was South Africa's legal position in regard to Southwest Africa.

Mr. Green: If Canada abstained from voting on the resolution asking for further information about Southwest Africa, why on earth should she vote for the resolution asking the international court of justice to go into the question of the status of Southwest Africa?

Mr. Pearson: With all respect, I do not think those two positions are inconsistent.

62. Food and agricultural organization of the United Nations, $191,000.

Mr. Fair: Could the minister give us a brief outline of the present position of the food and agricultural organization, particularly with respect to the setting up of a fund for the purchase of food in surplus areas for distribution in the deficiency areas of the world today? Just what is the position in that regard?

Mr. Pearson: The food and agricultural organization has just concluded its annual assembly. The leader of the Canadian delegation to that assembly was my colleague the Minister of Agriculture, and I believe he would be in a much better position to deal with that question if that would be agreeable to the hon. member.

Mr. Wright: It is agreeable, provided that we can get something on it from him on some of his estimates. We are having difficulty.

Mr. Pearson: I will bring it to the attention of the minister in the hope that he is able to say something about it on his estimates later.

Item agreed to.

64. United Nations educational, scientific and cultural organization, $306,500.

Mr. Low: Reports in various papers recently indicate a concerted effort on the part of some of the European countries to devote moneys from the contributions that are made by the various nations for the purpose of educating groups of children that have been taken away from Greece and lodged in countries like Roumania. Can the minister give us some late information on just what is being done with the moneys which are voted to UNESCO by this parliament and whether or not there is any danger that some of these moneys will find their way into the effort to educate people who have been gathered together in what are called the communist camps or atheist camps in Europe?

Mr. Pearson: With regard to the activities of UNESCO, the hon. member will recall that a statement was made on this subject in the committee. On page 136 of No. 4 of the committee reports he will find outlined certain projects that UNESCO has undertaken.

He has mentioned the particular question whether UNESCO funds are being used for the purpose of educating Greek children who have been taken from Greece as the result of the civil war and put in communist camps in Bulgaria, Roumania and other communist countries. I certainly have no knowledge of any such funds being used for that purpose, and I would be greatly surprised indeed if that has happened; but I shall be glad to look into the matter. In regard to these children, I might say that at the recent United Nations assembly we passed a resolution which I think will be effective in bringing about their repatriation to Greece, and I hope that will happen before long.

Mr. Low: In the meantime, if there is any effort on the part of the various organizations or of UNESCO itself to make use of Canadian contributions for such education as has been mentioned, I am sure that the minister will give the committee the assurance that he will resist it to the utmost.

Mr. Pearson: I shall be glad to give that assurance now.

Mr. Fleming: I will go further and say that if it is found that Canadian money is being used for that purpose or any money of UNESCO is being used under conditions of that kind, Canada should give serious consideration to abandoning UNESCO; because I do not think there is any Canadian or any member who wants to see moneys put at the disposal of UNESCO used for that purpose. I am quite sure that situation does not exist, but in line with what the minister said in reply to the hon. member for Peace River, I am sure that the feeling in this country would be just as strong as I have sought to indicate.

Mr. Pearson: I gave that assurance, and I am glad to repeat it. But I would not want it to be understood that I think for a moment that funds are being used by UNESCO for that purpose, because we have no reason to believe that to be the case.

Mr. Gillis: This question is not on that particular point. Can the minister tell us what means or methods they adopt to keep the people informed with regard to what discussions and decisions are taking place and what decisions are being made through the medium of that organization? About all we get is what the press gives us or what the minister reports to the house. Is a verbatim report kept of the committee meetings, of the general assembly meetings and of decisions that are made? Is there something that is reliable and that you can send back to people that are interested? I think the success or failure of that organization will depend on how well people are informed.

Mr. Pearson: I take it that the hon. member is now talking about UNESCO.

Mr. Gillis: No, about the whole set-up.

Mr. Pearson: With regard to the United Nations organization generally, I think we disseminate a certain amount of information through our department. There are other ways by which the people are kept informed. The United Nations division of information itself is a very active agency, and information from that quarter comes to Canada and other countries; in fact a considerable portion of the budget of the United Nations is devoted to the information division which is supposed to keep the member countries informed by radio, the press and through other sources of information. I think they have done that with some measure of success.

65. World health organization, $108,000.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister indicate the reason for the reduction in the amount of the item? Has it anything to do with the budget of the organization or does it indicate any lessening of activity on its part?

Mr. Pearson: I do not think that the reduction in the budget of that organization has anything to do with the lessening of its activities. There is a statement about the organization, which may be found at page 142 of volume 4 of the committee reports. From a study of the organization I think it will be found that it is maintaining its activities and that the reduction is a technical one which I believe will not interfere with the work. The reason why we reduced our own contributions was a purely technical one, namely that we had paid part of the contribution in the previous year, which meant we had less to pay this year.

Mr. Fleming: Today's press indicates that Bulgaria has withdrawn from the world health organization. Has the minister any information as to whether this indicates a general withdrawal on the part of those members of the world health organization that are behind the iron curtain?

Mr. Pearson: The Soviet union withdrew from this organization about a year ago, and it is therefore not surprising that the governments controlled by the Soviet union should follow that policy. Bulgaria's withdrawal is probably due to that fact.

Mr. Fleming: What about the other countries behind the iron curtain?

Mr. Pearson: I think some of the other countries have withdrawn as well. If they have not, I should not be surprised if they did so before long.

Demobilization and reconversion—

70. To provide for the Canadian government's contribution to the international refugee organization, $5,425,000.

Mr. McLure: Will the minister give us an idea of the total amount of contributions to the organization? I notice that the Canadian government's contribution is $5,500,000.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member will find a good deal of information about this organization on page 145 of volume 4 of the proceedings and evidence of the committee, where a report was made on it by the department. A good deal of detail is given in that report, and possibly the hon. member would not wish me to repeat those details now.

The total budget of the organization is $4,500,000 for administrative expenses and $150,000,000 for operational expenses. Of the $155,000,000 our share is, as the estimate shows, roughly about 3·5 per cent, which is generally in line with the proportion of the expenses of international organizations that this government bears.

Mr. Shaw: There are a couple of matters to which I should like to refer. Can the minister give us any information as to the number of displaced persons who have gone to each of the various countries that now contribute to this $155,000,000 fund?

Mr. Pearson: Since July 1, 1947, when IRO began its work, some 260,000 refugees have been resettled, some of them in their own countries of origin, some in other European countries and others in countries abroad. At the moment I have not before me a breakdown of that number, but again that is to be found in the report of the committee where figures are given on this matter. In Canada I believe we have taken since that time somewhere around 45,000 displaced persons, but I am not sure of the exact number.

Mr. Shaw: In the return which was brought down in my name and also in the evidence to which the minister referred, I noticed that certain expenses incurred in connection with displaced persons coming to Canada are met out of IRO funds. My experience with this has been that in some instances they have been paid, and in a great many instances they have not been paid. In my own constituency I know of two instances at least where the sponsors had to pay as high as $900 and $1,000 in order to bring displaced persons, refugees, to this country. In that connection I should like to ask two questions.

Since there are, or are presumed to be, a number of organizations in Canada which contact the sponsors of displaced persons and ask for certain amounts of money to be paid before these persons can come out, will the minister give us a list of what might be regarded as legitimate organizations which are now contacting the relatives of displaced persons and asking them for the payment of certain amounts of money before these persons can come out? Is there any method by which those who have paid these large sums of money can secure refunds? It seems most unfair when you take two cases. In the one case the bulk of the expenses have been paid, and in the other case none of the expenses have been paid even though it worked great hardship on the sponsor.

Mr. Pearson: So far as the government is concerned we deal only with the international refugee organization.

Mr. Shaw: Displaced persons?

Mr. Pearson: All displaced persons coming to this country under the auspices of that organization are treated in the same way. There may well be, however, other displaced persons who find their way to Canada in other ways, and I am not sure what the situation is in regard to the payment of their travelling expenses. The IRO does pay the travelling expenses of the people under its jurisdiction coming to Canada. I shall be glad to look into that and see if there are organizations of the kind the hon. member suggests, and find out whether injustices have been done through the activities of those organizations whereby some displaced persons get their expenses paid and others do not.

Mr. Shaw: I would certainly appreciate an investigation. The individual sponsor has no way of knowing whether an organization is legitimate or not; and of course they are so keen about getting those people out that they will sacrifice to the limit. I know of cases where it has occurred in order to get enough money to meet the demands of the organization. I certainly hope this matter will be looked into.

Mr. Coldwell: May I just say a word on this? I think the Department of Labour and the Department of Immigration ought to be commended on the manner in which they have dealt with this question of displaced persons in the last two years. One should express appreciation of the manner in which this has been dealt with latterly. For a year or two we were prone to complain that Canada was not doing her part in giving refuge to those who had suffered from nazi oppression and the threat of communist retaliation if they were returned to their countries of origin.

I have had something to do with the setting up of the IRO and have had considerable correspondence with the department in regard to people, particularly from the Baltic states, whom I regard as very desirable settlers in this country. I have found that the Department of Labour and our representatives overseas have given every attention to any request that has been made.

With regard to the point raised by the hon. member, I wonder whether it is because persons who wished to bring relatives and displaced persons had been, shall I say, sufficiently ill advised to accept approaches by certain people offering to bring relatives over for a consideration. I came across an instance in my own constituency a short time ago of an approach from Paris, as a matter of fact, in connection with the coming of the mother of a gentleman in my constituency. The amount asked for was $1,000. Fortunately the man who had been in contact with the people in Paris asked me about it when I was out there last summer. I said: "Don't send the $1,000. I shall inquire of our own department." I inquired in the department and the department made inquiries overseas. The result was that the necessary order in council was passed. The money for the passage of this lady from Germany to Canada has been paid to the Canadian National Railways and I have no doubt that if she can get out of Poland she will arrive here at a fraction of the cost that was originally asked.

As far as possible people should be advised to get in touch with responsible government officials or organizations, and get advice before they pay out large sums of money to get people into this country. As I understand, there is no need for them to do that. If the person is in a displaced persons camp the IRO looks after it. If they are not in such a camp the thing to do is to get in touch with the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific or one of the transportation organizations and the department, get the necessary permission, and the cost will be a fraction of what is asked.

I rose to say I have appreciated the co-operation of the department and the manner in which they have in the last two years at least endeavoured to work out the settlement of displaced persons and particularly the persons who I think can make a contribution to this country. However, I must add this. There is growing in the displaced persons camps a hard corps of persons who are not easily integrated, shall I say, into the life of the various countries. Because of war disabilities some of them have become deafened. For example, I know of a Latvian family where two of the children were deafened in an air raid by the British forces on a German city and the parents cannot come without them. On the other hand, I understand, this country is hesitant about bringing them in, or perhaps some people who have contracted lung trouble or something of that sort because they were refugees running away from the oppression of Hitler, or if it was in the Baltic states, from the Russians when they came in. They have suffered in the common cause, and perhaps I might suggest to the minister that some attention should be given to seeing whether the nations together can come to an arrangement whereby perhaps at least some of these people can be taken care of in our country. Indeed, perhaps if we erected institutions for some of these people, in years to come those institutions might be very valuable to this country in the field of public health.

I know it is a difficult problem, but I feel that as a Christian country, and actuated as most people in this country are by humanitarian principles, we should consider those who are not as physically fit as others we have taken to assist us in the performance of various types of labour in this country. I am speaking to the minister on behalf of these unfortunate people in the camps in Europe.

Mr. Pearson: I appreciate what the hon. member has said. A few moments ago I mentioned a figure of 45,000 d.p.'s having entered Canada. I find that up to December 31, 1948, 54,733 had entered this country.

Mr. Shaw: I intended no criticism of IRO or the minister's department. However, this matter has come to my attention, and in the second place I was thinking only of Canadian organizations, and did not have in mind organizations or individuals outside Canada who might be trying to secure money.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. Gillis: I might say my experience in connection with a sponsor bringing in a person from a displaced persons camp was not along the lines indicated by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. In the several cases I have in mind there was no organization such as that described by the hon. member for Red Deer. There did come to my attention, however, cases concerning people who were in displaced persons camps in Germany. The negotiations in connection with bringing them in were all carried on through the immigration branch. In one instance it took about three years before the person affected could be screened and brought through. All the expense was paid by the sponsor in Canada—every cent of it. To the best of my knowledge, in the several cases with which I was concerned the sponsors in Canada paid all the expenses, after a considerable amount of delay and difficulty, in connection with bringing in the remains of a family in Europe.

If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is of the opinion that all one has to do is to get in touch with the immigration branch or the Department of Labour, and that the expenses will be paid and the job done, I can tell him that certainly has not been my experience. Perhaps those people should ask for a refund.

774. International civil aviation organization, $138,759.

Mr. Knowles: Has the minister any further statement to make in connection with the matter about which I spoke to him a few days ago, involving the United States and Canada?

Mr. Pearson: I take it the hon. member is referring to the difficulty in connection with Colonial Air Lines?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: No; I have nothing further to say, except that we have received the note and will be answering it and will be having our discussion in due course with the United States authorities. The Colonial hearing meanwhile begins on Monday.

Item agreed to.

779. International children's emergency fund, $1,075,000.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see this appropriation in the estimates. The people in Canada have shown their interest in this fund because when last April an appeal was made a very considerable sum of money was raised voluntarily, as well as a contribution of some $6 million which I believe has been made to this organization.

I do not believe there is anything which can create more good will for this country and the other countries participating in the fund than can this international children's emergency fund. These children are helped wherever they may be, in any and every country. While it may be said that children are being helped in countries unfriendly to us, nevertheless I believe that when the children in those countries grow up they will appreciate what has been done for them, not only in the matter of providing food and clothing to meet their present distress, but also in the medical care and the treatment given them to make them useful world citizens.

I have always been interested in seeing this sort of thing undertaken, not only by private organizations—and I believe we should use private organizations as well—but, when the need is as great as it is now, by nations making contributions from the public purse. I am glad Canada is doing that.

Perhaps on another occasion I may point out the need of doing something for our own children in our own country. But the fact that we have to do so is no reason why we should not participate in a worth-while international fund to help children throughout the world. It is true that charity begins at home; but there is another part of the good book which says that if we cast our bread upon the waters it will return to us after many days. I think this is one way of casting bread upon the waters, and I am sure that one day we shall be rewarded tenfold for what we are trying to do now.

Mr. Fleming: I have only one comment, and it is this: We are just completing a review of the estimates of one of the most important government departments, and we have done it in the space of forty-five minutes, despite the fact that there are, I believe, thirty-five items. This has been made possible because these items were reviewed in the standing committee on external affairs.

This gives me an opportunity to repeat what I had said before, that I think parliament will do infinitely more efficient work on the estimates—

The Deputy Chairman: Order; the item under discussion has to do with the international children's emergency fund.

Mr. Fleming: I am making the observation—

The Deputy Chairman: Speeches must be strictly relevant to the item.

Mr. Fleming: What I am saying applies to this item as it does to the others, that the example here is one worth repeating in other departments, namely that the estimates be referred to a committee before they are taken up here.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

455. Canals service, administration, $81,400.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I shall not take up much time in discussing the estimates of this very important department. So far as the maritime provinces are concerned this department is most important. We have already had some discussion with respect to the transport board. The other night the hon. member for Charlotte made a scathing denunciation of trading relations with central Canada and of present government policy, and condemned the present situation as between the maritime provinces and central Canada. This is remarkable when one considers that this government has been in office continuously, with the exception of the depression years, since 1921. It might be worth while for me to read what the hon. member for Charlotte said, as reported on page 2785 of Hansard:

> I often wonder if the people of Ontario and Quebec realize just exactly the position we are in down in the maritimes. There is nothing that we have to offer that they want in central Canada. We are obliged to go to our neighbours to the south of us in order to sell our products. But when we bring that money back into Canada, if there is anything that we might want for our homes we have to go to Ontario and pay two prices for it.

That is a serious denunciation of the government's policies as they affect the maritimes. The freight rates with central Canada are excessive and it is most difficult for the producers of natural products in the maritime provinces to get their goods to the markets of central Canada. I am not going to follow that up except to point out that this matter is exceedingly important to the maritime provinces and we are not satisfied with what has been done by the government, by the minister or his predecessors in order to make it more profitable for us to trade with central Canada and attain that measure of prosperity we should have.

I am going to take a few minutes to refer to canals, to the Chignecto canal. The building of this canal has been before this house ever since confederation. The hon. member for Royal has brought it up recently, as well as the hon. member for Queens and the hon. member for Gloucester. This session it was brought up by the hon. member for Saint-John-Albert, the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough and other hon. members.

A committee has been set up in the maritime provinces to press for the construction of this canal. Many agree with me, that there is sufficient information in the hands of the department to permit them to announce a policy for the construction of this canal. We heard yesterday, and again today, oft repeated reference to the St. Lawrence canal. Everyone in central Canada seems to be straining at the leash to get that canal and power development under way. More than $350 million has been expended in central Canada on canals, and though the Chignecto canal was promised to us from the days of confederation, nothing has yet been done for us.

The minister has had this matter brought repeatedly to his personal attention and I am going to ask him to make an announcement today. I base this request on the premise that it is due to the maritime provinces, that it will have strategic defence value, that it will be commercially worth while and will provide needed employment as well. There should be sufficient information on the records to show that it is feasible. Engineers report possibilities of large power development.

I should like the minister to state what the government proposes to do in connection with the construction of this canal. If the minister states that he has not sufficient surveying and engineering data available, competent men should be appointed by the federal government and recommended by this Chignecto canal committee, which has been doing such good work in the maritime provinces. We would then know where we were. A declaration of policy should be made immediately by the government.

Mr. Gillis: A couple of weeks ago I asked the minister what progress has been made on the Canso project and he promised to make a statement on his estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: That item is considerably down on the list and perhaps I shall say something on it when we reach the item. With all the respect that is due to the committee I should like to remind it that this is the third day we have had the estimates of the Department of Transport before us. If there is to be a full discussion, of course I am prepared to answer all questions, but I should like to draw that fact to the attention of the committee at this time.

The hon. member for Cumberland made certain statements with regard to transportation generally and I am sorry that I must disagree entirely and fully with what he said about the manner in which transportation services in the maritime provinces are handled. I am sorry that I have not the data at my fingertips to confront the hon. member with what has been done transportationwise in the maritime provinces.

The chief matter with which the hon. member seems to be concerned at the moment is the building of the Chignecto canal. If one were to take for granted everything that has been said, one would come to the conclusion that little or nothing had been done by the Department of Transport or the government in connection with the building of this canal. As the hon. member has said, there is a great deal of data in the files of the department but that data indicates clearly that from an economic point of view this is not the time to build the Chignecto canal.

When I say that that indicates that this is not the time, I refer to the last report made in 1931. I would say to my hon. friend that in view of the representations that have been received from the maritime provinces and elsewhere since the beginning of the session and a short time before; in view of the further fact that the evidence now in the department is against the building of the canal from an economic standpoint—

Mr. Black (Cumberland): There has not been a canal built in Canada on an economic basis from the viewpoint of traffic.

Mr. Chevrier: If the hon. gentleman will permit me to complete my statement he can ask his questions afterward. I was saying that I would be prepared to give consideration to the appointment of a board of engineers to ascertain if in view of all the circumstances that exist today and which have changed since the last report was made it would be economical to construct this canal, having due regard to the possibilities of power development.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I point out again that, unless power development was also involved, there has not been a canal built in Canada on a purely economic basis. All canals are operated free of tolls. I would point out that there are hundreds of millions of tons of iron ore which will be looking for a market in the eastern United States, which will make use of this canal at a great saving in transportation charges.

Canals service—

912. Canals service — administration — further amount required, $2,500.

Mr. Hatfield: Has item 911 been carried?

Mr. Chevrier: What was the question?

Mr. Hatfield: Has item 911 been carried?

The Chairman: Item 911.

911. Departmental administration—further amount required, $20,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): How much revenue has been received by the department from the operation of canals? In the main estimates the annual amount appropriated for canals service is $7,501,000.

Mr. Chevrier: For the last fiscal year the revenue was $1,756,000.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): From what canals was that revenue secured, and was it from use for power purposes or transportation?

Mr. Chevrier: It was for leases for power purposes and other revenue accruing to the department from all the canals under the administration.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Was there any revenue for transportation purposes?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to be clear as to what items have been passed in this department, and what the program is. For example, did we carry 453, or does it still stand?

Mr. Chevrier: We carried both 453 and 454. Just a moment ago we carried 455, and I understand we are on 456 now.

Mr. Knowles: Are we on 456, or has the chairman called 911?

The Chairman: I will call the main estimates first, and the supplementaries afterwards.

Mr. Knowles: You have not yet called 911?

The Chairman: I called it.

Mr. Fulton: Are we on item 911?

Mr. Hatfield: What item are we on?

Mr. Knowles: We started today on 455.

The Chairman: Item 455 is carried.

Mr. Knowles: I want to say something on item 911. Tell me when you are calling it.

The Chairman: I called it, but if you prefer to deal with the main estimates now I will take them first.

Mr. Knowles: And then come back to item 911 afterwards.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: That is all right.

Item stands.

Canals service—

456. Canals—operation and maintenance, $3,809,650.

Mr. Green: I have a question on item 456 which also applies to item 457. There has been a substantial increase in both these votes, and I do not think there has been any increase in the mileage of canals in operation in Canada. Will the minister explain why it is there is such a large increase?

Mr. Chevrier: In the first case the increase is due almost entirely to increases in salary. In the second case the increase is due to the construction of a tunnel under the Lachine canal, which amounts to over $1 million, the revote being $910,000.

Mr. Green: There has also been a large increase in the number of personnel. Why was that necessary?

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed there has been no increase in personnel.

Mr. Green: If the minister will refer to page 276 of the estimates he will see that under canals operation and maintenance there is an increase of nearly 100. What was the reason for that?

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed there is no over-all increase. The increase referred to by my hon. friend is a transfer from one division of the department to another, and also from temporary personnel to permanent.

Mr. Green: The vote for temporary assistance is $150,000 higher for this fiscal year than it was in the last. There would not seem to be very much of a switch from temporaries to permanents, when one considers this amount.

Mr. Chevrier: I am told that is due to higher rates.

Item agreed to.

458. To provide for expenses in connection with St. Lawrence ship canal surveys and investigations, $20,000.

Mr. Fulton: I should like information as to whether anything under this item is allocated to survey or development work or investigation in connection with what is commonly known as the St. Lawrence seaway project, or is it entirely for existing navigational facilities?

Mr. Chevrier: Indirectly it is survey work. It is survey work in connection with the Lachine section of the St. Lawrence waterway. There was a report made under the supervision of a board of engineers, the chairman of which was Mr. R. A. C. Henry, and it was tabled in the house.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

460. Marine service administration, $17,830.

Mr. Drew: Under this item I wish to direct some remarks to the administration of the marine service generally.

On November 21 the Minister of Trade and Commerce read a report, on behalf of the Minister of Transport, who was not present at the time, giving what purported to be a summary of the findings of the Kellock commission in regard to the Noronic tragedy. At page 1991 of Hansard for November 21, I find that the following are the opening words in the presentation of the report:

I wish to give the house a summary of the report of the court of investigation into the loss of the steamship Noronic by fire on September 17 last.

What follows is a summary which was read to the house and appears in the record. In the report there was reference at a number of places to the outstanding examples of negligence which had contributed in some way to what took place. At one point I find these words:

Moreover, complete complacency had descended upon both the ship officers and the management. The fire which actually occurred found officers and crew without any organization designed to deal with such a situation.

I do not suggest that these words in any way failed to interpret correctly the situation which existed so far as the shipowners, officers and management are concerned as it appeared from the evidence. But there is one consideration which I think should be in the minds of hon. members. This was one of the most important statements made to the house during the present session. A tragedy had occurred which shocked not only members of the house, but every Canadian, and I imagine also every citizen of the United States who read of that disastrous fire and its appalling consequences. For this reason special significance attaches to this report, because everyone is concerned about the possibility and the danger of fire. No one with a sense of responsibility would refuse to do everything possible to prevent tragedies that result from fire breaking out where human beings are in a position of danger. It was essential, therefore, that a balanced picture of what was contained in the report should be presented to the members of this house, and, through the reporting of proceedings here, to the people of Canada.

What actually was not contained in the summary was a very important part of the findings of that report. When the summary used the expression that "complete complacency had descended upon both the ship officers and the management", it should have added that the report made it clear that complete complacency had descended upon the inspection staff of the Department of Transport, which was charged with this responsibility.

None of us here has any desire to direct unpleasant criticism at anyone, but we would not be doing our duty if we did not make sure that all the lessons to be gained from this report are placed before the members of the house and the people of Canada. Such a summary as was presented to hon. members, purporting to give a balanced picture of a finding of this kind, should have contained every essential consideration that might be in the minds of those who read it. That, I must say, is not my interpretation of this summary as I compare it with the report of the court of investigation set up by the minister under Mr. Justice Kellock, acting as commissioner.

On page 9 of the report, under the heading "Legislation, including regulations", I find these words:

Before dealing with the actual events of the night in question, it is relevant to consider the background of legislation and regulations to which the ship and its owners were subject.

Then the report goes on to deal with fire-resistant bulkheads, and says:

Under the provisions of section 405(1)(a) of the Canada Shipping Act, regulations were passed on the 7th of July, 1939.

It goes on to review certain regulations in regard to bulkheads, and on page 10 I find these words:

The Noronic was built in 1913 and had been constructed without any fire-resisting bulkheads. She was not required to comply with the provisions of regulation 47, the exemption taking the form of a certificate stating that the ship had complied with the regulations.

I want to repeat that sentence:

She was not required to comply with the provisions of regulation 47, the exemption taking the form of a certificate stating that the ship had complied with the regulations. There is nothing in the records of the board as to the reason for this decision but the evidence indicates that other existing ships were similarly treated. As far as the Noronic is concerned, it was not impracticable, on the evidence, to install fire-resisting bulkheads in accordance with the regulations. It must therefore be assumed that the chairman considered that, from the standpoint of expense, it would be unreasonable to require compliance.

I do not intend to extend my remarks on that point beyond saying that when the parliament of Canada passes certain laws imposing certain responsibilities, and employees in the service of Canada are entrusted with the duty of carrying out those laws and the regulations thereunder, where danger to human life is involved no official in the public service of Canada has the right to take upon himself the responsibility of saying that, because of cost, safety measures which are clearly laid down shall not be complied with. This is simply another evidence of the tendency to suspend the law being carried from government to officials of government. It is not something that stands by itself alone; it is evidence of a tendency we have seen in other cases as well.
